PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO PHOTOGRAPH IN BRANTFORD "EXPOSITOR" OF APRIL 30

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. My attention has just been called to the issue of the Brantford Daily Expositor, of Wednesday, April 30, 1947, which contains a statement as to the budget proposals, and on the front page is a reproduction of the photograph of a very handsome gentleman with a black moustache. Printed beneath the picture there appear the words "The Hon. Douglas Abbott, Dominion Finance Minister". Unfortunately the photograph is that of the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, premier of Quebec, and in view of the wide circulation which I know this publication enjoys in western Ontario, I felt, in justice both to Mr. Duplessis and to myself, that I should make this explanation.

CIVIL SERVICE

REFERENCE TO NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES IN RELATION TO POPULATION

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity, on a question of privilege, to make a correction at page 2990 of Hansard. On line twenty-one, in the second column, I inadvertently said "seven people". It should be seventy people.

WHEAT

DELIVERIES BETWEEN MAY 15 AND JUNE 30—SPECIAL INCOME TAX ARRANGEMENT

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a year ago the dominion government announced a special income tax arrangement available in respect to wheat marketed between April 1, 1946, and June 30, 1946. This arrangement was made because wheat was urgently needed for overseas shipment. Under this plan a considerable quantity of wheat was made available by producers a year ago and this wheat was promptly moved forward to needy countries. The plan provided an arrangement whereby producers could deliver their wheat during a limited period with the actual cash settlement taken at the producers' option in 1946, 1947 or 1948. Producers taking advantage o fthis plan received what was known as an emergency wheat receipt. The plan was entirely optional and producers delivering wheat during the period of time set forth could take advantage of the special arrangement or deliver their wheat in the usual manner.

The need for wheat overseas is just as urgent this year. With a greatly improved transportation position, wheat delivered now can be moved overseas in a very short period of time. The government and the Canadian wheat board have received many requests for a similar plan for a limited period in 1947.

The government has decided to make substantially the same plan available in connection with wheat delivered by producers in western Canada between May 15 and June 30. Under the plan which the government is proposing for this year, producers will be able to take cash settlement at their option in 1947, 1948 or 1949.

The dominion government feels that an arrangement of this kind is worth while if it will make more wheat available for overseas shipment during the balance of the present crop year. Full details of the plan will be announced at an early date by the Canadian wheat board.

REDISTRIBUTION

TEMISCOUATA COUNTY—REFERENCE OF PETITION TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): With the consent of the house I move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix):

That the petition of 144 electors of the parish of Squatteck who are opposed to the separation of the said parish from the federal electoral district of Temiscouata, together with a letter on the same subject from J. A. Laforest, mayor of Squatteck, Temiscouata county, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders.

I would read the accompanying letter from His Worship the Mayor, but it is such a fine one that I should be embarrassed if I did so.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES RESEARCH BOARD

PROVISION FOR SCIENTIFIC, TECHNICAL AND OTHER OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Fisheries Research Board Act to provide for the election of a vice-chairman, the appointment of an executive director who shall be the secretary of the board, and for the employment of such scientific, technical and other officers and employees as may be necessary for the proper performance of the board's work; and for the emoluments, salary or remuneration, as the case may be, of such officers and employees, also for the application to them of the Civil Service Superannuation Act as well as of the benefits enjoyed by civil servants.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION—PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY REGARDING OFFER TO NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF RECENT CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the subject of dominion-provincial relations. In view of the press reports with regard to Nova Scotia's attitude to the dominion's proposal with respect to dominion-provincial relations, will the minister say whether there has been any recent offer or any implied change in the offer made to the Nova Scotia government which has not been made to the other provinces? Will the minister table the recent correspondence with the province of Nova Scotia, more particularly a reported letter from the minister dated April 21?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): The answer to the first part of my hon. friend's question is, no. As to the second part, I think it is the intention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to table the correspondence between the dominion and the provincial premiers since the last correspondence was tabled.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With the permission of the house, I should like to table the correspondence in English since January 30, 1947, on matters of substance regarding tax agreements with the provinces.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the government give consideration to the printing of this correspondence separately, or to having it appear in Hansard? I think the other correspondence was printed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the other correspondence was printed in the Votes and Proceedings. If that is correct, I would ask that this correspondence be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of today.

CEMENT

AVAILABILITY TO VETERANS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction. On Friday he told the house that he would make a statement about the fifty per cent priority to veterans building their own houses. He said on Friday that priority was eliminated. Can he make a statement now?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I asked that a proper statement be prepared, but I am sorry to say that it has not yet been delivered to me. I will promise to make a statement not later than tomorrow.

Mr. FRASER: The reason I asked the question today is that the building supply men had no word of this until Saturday.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

AWARD BY U.S. GOVERNMENT OF MEDAL OF FREEDOM TO F. J. A. ORCHARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs or his parliamentary assistant. Is he aware of the signal honour which has been paid by another government to a distinguished Canadian veteran? I am referring to Mr. F. J. A. Orchard of Winnipeg, former president of the International War Veterans Alliance.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): I am glad that the hon. member brought this to my attention. I had intended referring to it in the house. The United States government has awarded the Medal of Freedom to Mr. Orchard for exceptionally meritorious service. As this is a most unusual distinction, I should like to inform hon. members of the reason for this recognition of a Canadian citizen. The International War Veterans Alliance, of which Mr. Orchard was president, is composed of members of the American Legion, the Canadian Legion, the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans and the War Amputations of Canada. It was founded with the purpose of promoting international good will and understanding among ex-service men and women on both sides of the international boundary. As a gesture of friendship, the Canadian members of this organization during the war set up in Winnipeg an information centre for members of the United States forces passing through Winnipeg. During the three years this booth was in operation, under Mr. Orchard's direction, service was rendered to 55,000 United States troops. I am told that Mr. Orchard personally was responsible for a great deal of the success of the work which was done. It is felt that the recognition he has been given is well merited.

PUBLIC HOLIDAYS

REQUEST FOR OBSERVANCE ON MONDAY OF VICTORIA AND DOMINION DAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I notice in the Ottawa Journal this morning reference to a suggestion in the Kingston Whig-Standard that our fixed annual and national holidays be observed on Mondays to give the general public the benefit of a few long week-ends, especially in summer. Victoria day falls this year on Saturday, which is a half holiday for most people. Dominion day comes on a Tuesday. Will the government consider having these holidays observed on Monday instead of Saturday?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am only one member of the government, but I shall be pleased to have my colleagues join with me in considering this matter.

BUTTER

INQUIRY REGARDING FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont.): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will a floor price be put on butter this year?

Mr. FRASER: Come on, answer. That is the first time the minister has been stumped.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the $64 question.

Mr. DROPE: May I ask if I will get an answer to my question?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I do not see any urgency in the question.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REMOVAL OF OFFICE FROM SASKATOON TO WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, arising out of a telegram I have just received from the Saskatoon city council with reference to the intended removal of the compensation claims branch of the unemployment insurance office from Saskatoon to Winnipeg, Manitoba, on the ground that the number concerned in Saskatchewan are so small. Will the minister state whether or not reconsideration will be given the decision to remove this office, by reason of the numbers who will be affected and who are subject to unemployment insurance in Saskatchewan?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In the first place, Mr. Speaker, since many hon. friends in the opposition have discussed at length the size of the civil service and why the government has not moved with greater expedition in that regard, I want to thank the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) for raising this question. This office comes under the jurisdiction of the unemployment insurance commission. Since the war ended we have set in motion a policy to reduce the numerical strength of what was then known as selective service. The unemployment insurance commission decided that on the ground of efficiency, or they so inform me, this function of their work should be centralized in the city of Winnipeg. I am afraid that decision will have to stand; and might I say that to some extent this question does show the inconsistency of the opposition in these matters.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I asked a question; I made no suggestions—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. In spite of the rules I permitted the hon. member to put quite a lengthy question and the minister to make quite a lengthy answer. I think that should be satisfactory to both parties. Orders of the day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: Ah-h-h.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That interruption was the most intelligent statement the hon. gentleman has ever made. I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not a bit disturbed. I have the same rights as any minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I asked the minister a question and in reply he made a political speech. I have a right to point out that there was no justification—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. gentleman to be kind enough to abide by the rules. He has put his question and he should be satisfied with the answer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Again on a question of privilege, sir, the rule you applied should be applied equally to the government benches in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to be kind enough to retract what he has just said.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have nothing to withdraw, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Reflection on the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to be kind enough to cooperate with the Speaker, one of whose principal duties is to protect freedom of speech in this house. I would ask hon. members to allow the hon. member for Lake Centre to give the explanation he wishes to give; but before the hon. member rises I would ask him again to be kind enough to withdraw what he just said about the Speaker.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I made no suggestion about you. My hon. friends over there—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am explaining. My hon. friends over there have a way of trying to prevent us over here from saying anything, by trying to howl us down. What I said, sir, was that we have the same rights on this side of the house as have any members on the government side. There was no suggestion about Your Honour.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MUTCH: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat made a statement which is not in accordance with the facts and impugned every hon. member of this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MUTCH: Just a minute, now. That is what he did when he said that we on this side of the house have attempted to howl down any member of the opposition. Some of us may have tried to insist that the same rule which applies to the rest of the house shall apply to the distinguished member and others in the opposition.

Mr. HOMUTH: Are you talking for a ministerial seat?

Mr. MUTCH: Over here there is a chance; over there, none.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I consider the incident closed; but I want it to be thoroughly understood that the hon. member for Lake Centre has said that he did not impute any improper motives to the Speaker.

SUPPLY

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. ABBOTT moved:

That a sum not exceeding $95,969,200.11, being one-twelfth of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1948, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, plus an additional sum not exceeding $5,853,666.66, being eight-twelfths of the amount of item 485 and nine-twelfths of item 610 of the said estimates, a total of $101,822,866.77, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1948.

He said: The committee will recall that the house has already granted interim supply covering one-sixth of all the items in the main and supplementary estimates for the current fiscal year, and an additional one-twelfth of certain other services of a seasonal or sessional nature, as detailed in the schedule attached to the act. That supply will ordinarily run out about the end of this month, but I understand that there is to be royal assent tomorrow and that the other place proposes to adjourn for two weeks. Therefore I spoke to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and the leaders of the other groups opposite and suggested they might be willing to pass additional interim supply today, an additional one-twelfth for most of the items, but in addition the full amount of two special items in the agriculture estimates. The first is item 485, amounting to $2,030,500, which covers subsidies on milk for butter, cheese and concentration purposes. Payment of that subsidy is continuing now, but the subsidy terminated the end of April, and those payments should be made within the next few days. In addition there is $6 million, included in the special supplementary estimates, to cover the subsidy on feed grain.

The passing of the bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of hon. members to criticize and discuss any item in the estimates, including these two special items, which will come up for discussion from time to time throughout the session; and the usual undertaking is given that those rights and privileges will not be restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. BRACKEN: The official opposition does not oppose the measure brought forward by the Minister of Finance. We are pleased to have his assurance that any of the items dealt with by this measure will be subject to discussion later, if it is the desire of any hon. member to do so.

Mr. ABBOTT: I give that assurance, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was wondering about the two items in agriculture; I presume there will be a place in the estimates where these matters may be discussed.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: In any event, probably the minister would allow us to discuss these items on his item for administration.

Mr. GARDINER: I have discussed this matter with the Minister of Finance and I have given the undertaking to permit such discussion. If it is desired to have an item named now, I shall name the marketing item, No. 23.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, by adopting the policy embodied in this resolution we are embarking upon a dangerous practice. The sum of $101 million is a lot of money; it is the money of the taxpayers. Here we are voting large sums of money for main and supplementary estimates down to March 31, 1947, and we did the same thing before Easter and sanctioned it all for a song. The total now is $101 million. I thought the government proposed a new policy last session, and I should think it would not have been introduced now, two years after the war. We are at the sixty-seventh day of the session; we have not discussed the estimates at all, and yet eight-twelfths of the money has been spent. This goes on from month to month.

At the end of last March we rushed through a supplementary before Easter, but we cannot strike a dollar off, and there is no use in holding a post mortem when the money is voted and spent. The people are complaining that huge sums are being spent like water. Surely parliament should regain some control over these expenditures. The sum mentioned here is nearly four times what was spent in 1896, for the whole year, to run the country. But today we pass a vote for over $101 million—unforeseen overdrafts—and we do it in the twinkling of an eye. Is that the way parliament is going to do its business?

Do not forget that this procedure of permitting expenditure of money by the executive, without the consent of the high court of parliament, is that same principle of taxation without representation, the principle for which the people in the American colonies were fighting when they tossed the tea into Boston harbour and afterwards left the mother country. Well, if that is responsible government under the Liberal party, a party which is going to hold a convention where they will talk for hours about responsible government, then we might as well say there is no responsible government left in this country.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ABBOTT moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1948, the sum of $101,822,866.77 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 204, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1948.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—$5,853,666.66 granted for 1947-48.

Mr. FLEMING: Are copies of the bill available?

The CHAIRMAN: This is an interim supply bill; I do not think it is customary to have copies.

Mr. ABBOTT: The bill is the same as bills passed in other years. Usually bills are not printed for distribution until after first reading. Since by unanimous consent this bill is being put through all stages this afternoon, it is not available for distribution. However, for those who are interested, it will be available later this afternoon.

Mr. CASE: I suggest that the chairman should read the sections. We are just sitting here like a bunch of dumb-bells.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right; no misrepresentation.

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps it would be sufficient if I were to read the short title. It states:

This act may be cited as the Appropriation Act, No. 3, 1947.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, May 12, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, on several previous occasions when speaking to the budget resolutions I have made reference to the western provinces; on this occasion I am going to devote my remarks to that forgotten part of Canada, the maritime provinces. I listened with interest to the speeches already made by various maritime members, and like most other hon. members outside the maritimes I have been amazed to hear of the continued recession in that part of Canada and the mounting unemployment. On this occasion I am going to try to present some recommendations which if carried out I believe will reverse the downward trend of the maritimes economy and the increasing maritimes unemployment.

I make no apology for speaking about the maritime provinces. I was in business a long time and I have a clear recollection that during that time we shipped many trainloads of material made in Toronto to the maritime provinces. Last evening I figured the approximate number of carloads shipped from the plant with which I was so long connected to the maritime provinces. If I average that number at only 40 cars per year it means that in the 65 years of that plant's existence —I was with the company for 20 years—more than 2,000 carloads of boilers and radiators and heating equipment were shipped to the maritime provinces.

I feel I have an interest in anything that will improve conditions in the maritime provinces because that means more employment for the workers in my riding and for the workers in other ridings in central Canada. I never can bring myself to that position where I talk only about my own riding. My riding depends upon the extent to which Canada expands, and an improvement in the maritime provinces benefits not only my own riding but the other ridings in central Canada.

The recommendations which I am going to offer were compiled by myself during half a dozen exhaustive survey trips through the maritime provinces in as many years. The last trip was made in September of last year when from the time I left home to the time I arrived back I drove my car 2,964 miles. Over half of that mileage was spent in the Squatteck area mentioned previously by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) when he was presenting a petition, and in connection with watershed problems in that area and throughout the maritime provinces.

Oftentimes I had to drive into remote and unsettled areas. I wanted to see the maritime resources and how close the different localities were to transportation. I wanted to gain some idea of the potential electrical development. Speaking for the moment about transportation—I shall have more to say about this later on— I found that there were many vicious bottlenecks through which trade within the provinces themselves had to pass. I found also that there were other vicious bottlenecks through which trade between the maritime provinces and the New England states had to pass, and through which trade from the maritime provinces and central Canada had to pass.

I had with me the reports of the reconstruction and rehabilitation committee so that I could select the parts of the provinces from which I could learn the most about resources and other matters I wanted to look into. The recommendations of that committee can be boiled down to three headings. The first is the extension of electrical production and rural electrification throughout the maritime provinces; second, the elimination of trade bottlenecks in the maritime provinces, to which I referred briefly a moment ago and, third, the expansion of maritime primary and secondary industries to process the four indigenous products of the provinces, that is, minerals, agriculture, lumbering and fishing.

I am going to deal first with electrical production, a matter in which I have always been much interested. I start with that because one of the ministers from the maritime provinces, in reply to a question—I am not sure that it was not asked by myself—as to whether or not electrical energy would be available if someone applied to the province of New Brunswick for a large block of power stated that New Brunswick was not very well equipped to supply large blocks of electrical energy but that if the water resources behind Grand Falls were conserved they would be able to supply a great deal more power.

I determined to ascertain if it were possible to increase the production of electricity at Grand Falls in New Brunswick. There are two principal factors associated with the production of electricity. The first is the head of water and the reservoir at the head of the penstocks. In this respect Grand Falls is not too badly off for the depth of water in the penstocks is about 125 feet and it is capable of being increased to 130 feet at high water. That is a fairly substantial head of water from which to produce electricity.

The next factor is the firm flow of water, and this is not so great at Grand Falls. At the present time under the best conditions there is a flow of about 2,400 cubic feet per second. They obtain this flow from a dam at the head of the falls behind which there is sufficient reservoir capacity to hold about 500 million cubic feet of water. Then they raised a dam at the outlet of lake Temiscouata, from which flows the Madawaska river and into which flows the Touladi river, and there they conserve another 4,500 million cubic feet. This gives them a total reservoir capacity of about 5,000 million cubic feet of water and from this they are able to obtain a firm flow of 2,400 cubic feet per second. From this flow they are able to produce at Grand Falls a total of 40,000 horse-power. This is not many horsepower when compared with Ontario hydro or Quebec hydro production, but it can be increased. Any increase in production will be of advantage to the province of New Brunswick and to the whole of the maritimes economy.

When I arrived at lake Temiscouata, I believe it was at the village of Cabano, I turned my car up into the highlands of the watershed of the Touladi river in the county of Temiscouata and continued for quite a long distance. I made a survey of the Squatteck lakes, having with me, of course, the reports of the engineers, and all I had to do was to ascertain where the reservoir sites were and go and see them, because I like to go and see these things for myself; I am not good at simply reading and repeating what somebody else has said. I saw these sites where another 20 billion cubic feet of water could be conserved. They also stated—and I examined the site to see if it could be done—that if the dam at the outlet of Temiscouata lake were raised two feet, another billion and a half of cubic feet of water could be conserved. If all the water in the watershed of the Madawaska river, which is the principal Canadian tributary of the Saint John river in Canada and supplies most of the water to the Saint John, was conserved, it would mean approximately 26 billion and a half cubic feet of water altogether above Grand Falls. That would mean that at Grand Falls they could have a firm flow of forty-two hundred cubic feet per second, which would produce another 25,000 horse-power. That would be a total of 65,000 horse-power, which would be a mighty smart block of horse-power in the centre of New Brunswick either for rural electrification or to promote primary or secondary industries.

To purchase these reservoir sites would require joint action by the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick and the dominion government, to supply the necessary money to buy the sites, which belong to pioneers, and these pioneers should receive fair compensation for giving up their land. Maritime economy can be greatly enhanced by the production of 65,000 horse-power at Grand Falls, instead of the present 40,000 horse-power.

About one-half of the flow of the river comes in from the state of Maine, so I drove to the remotest parts of the state of Maine—where I believe no wheels had been in years, for I could find no tracks and I could go no farther—to see the reservoir sites in Maine. But after an exhaustive survey which I made in that state I realized that we might just as well not waste time trying to get any more water from the state of Maine. I did find something that amazed me. Although the Allagash river, the principal tributary of the Saint John in the state of Maine, arises in Chamberlain lake in the international watershed and therefore should be under the control of the international joint commission and is controlled by the Ashburton treaty of 1842, I found the outlet of lake Chamberlain dammed so that no water can go through it, and the canal at the other end of the lake takes the water into Penobscot river. It is not much use worrying our heads trying to recover that water because on the Penobscot river are many big factories which would fight against any stoppage of the water. That water is now diverted out of the international watershed. I am not going to waste time on that. I return to where I left off a moment ago. If we wish to improve power production at Grand Falls it can be done. It will necessitate buying land from the pioneers and others to conserve the water in the Squatteck area, because we cannot produce power without water and without firm water. To produce 65,000 horse-power at Grand Falls—and it can be done—would require the conservation of all the run-off water in the Madawaska watershed, which flows into the Saint John at Edmundston.

From observation I would say that from 5,000 to 10,000 horse-power can be produced if reservoirs were properly built and controlled on the Tobique river, just before it enters the Saint John river. It has high banks, and a substantial flow, and it is an excellent place to build a dam which would have a substantial reservoir behind it. Why that water has been allowed to run as long as it has without being dammed is more than I can understand. If that water were conserved—and it can be conserved—10,000 more or less horse-power could be produced there. It would mean a very great boost to maritime economy. To boost maritime economy they must have cheap power and lots of it. The more they have, the stronger their economy becomes, and the better it is for all Canada; therefore I feel that in helping them I am helping the working men in the plants in Toronto.

I am going to run rapidly on and touch on a number of other matters. I may have to omit some but I will cover all I can.

I come to the Chignecto canal. I have been over that site many times from end to end, and last September I had the great pleasure of going along the route of the canal from the bay of Fundy to Baie Verte across the isthmus, with my good friend the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black). We walked over part of it and at various places stopped and observed. I am for a canal across the Chignecto isthmus. I will go further and say that the building of that canal has been fifty years delayed, at a great loss to this country. I go further and say, from some little experience, that the canal can be easily built. I go further and say that it is an outrage against the maritime provinces that that canal was not built fifty or seventy-five years ago. I say further that the building of that canal would revolutionize upwards the whole economy of the three maritime provinces.

The canal, if it were built, would shorten the distance from Charlottetown to Saint John by as much as 430 miles. It would shorten the distance from Charlottetown to the New England states as much as 325 miles, and would shorten the distance from the bay of Fundy to central Canada by as much as 375 miles—all for the good of trade. What this country wants more than anything else is interchange of trade; we can get that only by cutting down transportation rates, and the rates can be cut down only by shortening the distance and using boat traffic as much as we can. The whole coast of New Brunswick on the gulf of St. Lawrence is a vast treasure house of timber. The Chignecto canal would cut in two the price of delivering that timber from New Brunswick to the New England states. If it costs $10 per thousand feet freight now, a Chignecto canal would cut it down to $5.

Not far from my hon. friend's riding there is a great resource of gypsum at Hillsborough. I mention that now only because of the canal. They produce at present about one-half the gypsum produced in Canada. They have inexhaustible supplies of it. I can picture the Hillsborough gypsum mills being two or three or four times their present size if they could load the boats right at Hillsborough, as they could if the canal were built, and take the boats through the canal up the gulf and the St. Lawrence to Montreal, Toronto and other big cities in central Canada which use so much gypsum. That too would expand maritime economy and provide much more employment and much more business. It would provide steadier work for the maritimes; all of which would be equally good for us in central Canada. The more they expand the more we would expand.

Coming back to the canal, it would be about nineteen miles long. Two main plans have been submitted down through the years. One called for locks 300 feet in length by 48 feet in width, with a draft of 18 feet; the other calling for locks 500 feet in length, sixty feet in width, and a draft of 25 feet. The smaller canal would cost, according to the best reports I have been able to obtain, approximately $23 million, perhaps less. The larger canal would cost up to $38 million or less. In my opinion the larger canal would be the economical one, because larger boats would then be able to go through, travelling from the maritime provinces to upper Canada and from the maritimes down the east coast of the United States, thus building up a vast volume of trade.

When I think that a short distance of nineteen miles is allowed to block traffic, as we find in the Chignecto, I am amazed that members from the maritime provinces have stood it as they have done for the last seventy-five years. They have spoken repeatedly about it in the House of Commons but they have not got anywhere. They should organize a brigade of delegates from those three provinces and come here and present a programme for the building of that canal. I am going to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to do what the Minister of Agriculture has done on previous occasions when I have been willing and happy to assist him in his programmes for western rehabilitation. I am going to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to carry out the same type of programme for the maritime provinces, spread over a period of twenty years, at $5 million a year. This would represent a total of $100 million for maritime rehabilitation and construction, one part of which, I suggest, should be the Chignecto canal.

I wish to refer now to the writings of Mr. Ian Sclanders, which I have read carefully. Mr. Sclanders is one of the editorial writers of the Saint John Telegraph-Journal. I have never met him but he must be an able man, for his articles are written in an able and convincing style and contain a great deal of information. I suggest to the government that they publish all his articles that have appeared in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal about the Chignecto canal. I believe they were published in the spring of 1945, in the months of March and April and perhaps May. If the government would publish those articles and circulate them across Canada to the boards of trade, I venture to say that every board of trade in central Canada would be behind the building of the canal.

What would it mean from the standpoint of expansion of trade not only in the maritime provinces themselves but in central Canada as well? A great advance. In one of the articles to which I have referred, Mr. Sclanders tells about the chairman of the Nova Scotia power commission appearing before one of the inquiries held in connection with the canal and telling that board of inquiry that the building of the Chignecto canal would create a reservoir between the two bodies of water, and, owing to the fact that the tides on the bay of Fundy side rise so high, and would rise twice every day for ever, they would provide a never-failing source of water for the reservoir, that would enable the production of 40,000 horsepower of electrical energy. That would pay for the canal, and one result would be that the beautiful town represented by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black)—I mean Amherst—would double in size in a short time; Sackville and all that surrounding territory would also benefit by it, and they could send a cable carrying electricity across the short channel over to Prince Edward Island, which also needs electrical power.

Now there is a programme that would build up maritime economy and provide employment for many thousands of men and women in those three provinces. I do not know of any other way by which the people in those provinces will be saved from sinking down and down, unless the rest of Canada comes to their assistance and helps them to build these projects. One of the easiest ways of helping them is to provide a large volume of cheap power, and there are two or three sites that I have mentioned.

Another vicious bottleneck, one of the most vicious I have ever seen, is at the strait of Canso, which was mentioned by someone yesterday. I have spent quite a little time on the strait of Canso on several occasions but last September I was fortunate enough to be there when the car ferries were moving in and out. I examined the strait and I said to myself, "This is nothing short of scandalous". It is only 288 miles from Sydney to Halifax, the capital of the province, a very fine city indeed, and that unbridged strait is a menace to trade. It now takes from 15 to 19 hours to travel that 288 miles, provided there is no ice in the strait and the tides are not very high nor the wind strong enough to stop the car ferry. Imagine taking from 15 to 19 hours to go from Sydney to Halifax. That is an outrage in this day and age—just a common outrage. It is a waste of time. If that strait were bridged it would take from 7 to 9 or a maximum of 10 hours to go between the two cities. It can and it must be bridged. I am not in favour of a causeway.

When I returned to Toronto I called on some of the best engineers I could get in contact with to consult them about bridging that strait. The tide runs at about five knots, the water is about 200 feet deep, and the distance across the strait is a little less than 5,000 feet. None of these factors should obstruct the building of a bridge, though they are all important. I met an eminent engineer who is building six bridges across the Mississippi at St. Louis and I asked him whether I could see in Ontario a bridge of the type that he would recommend for the strait of Canso. He drove me to a site near St. Catharines, in the constituency represented by the hon. member for Lincoln, where they have been building a bridge over what is known as Twelve-Mile creek. They put the footings right down in the creek, but it was a rough creek owing to the fact that all the discharge from the DeCew power plant, where they develop 250,000 horse-power, floods against the abutments. It is built after the manner of certain Canadian National bridges —and I am thinking of one in northern Quebec over the Kenojevis river, which is 200 feet deep. It is what is known as a prepakt concrete bridge type.

I telephoned to Toronto this morning and got in touch with an engineer and asked what it would cost to bridge the strait of Canso, and he said a minimum of $15 million and a maximum of $20 million. Yet we have been told in committees here that a bridge could not be built for less than $50 million. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we shall have to consult the same type of engineers that the Canadian National railways and the city of St. Louis use. We must consult engineers who are experienced in building bridges of the type that would span the strait of Canso.

There is also, of course, the question of straightening out the tracks. I have examined it carefully. In part it is zig-zag and in many other places it goes up and down. If we straightened the track and levelled the humps and double tracked the line between Sydney and Moncton it would cut down the time consumed in taking a trainload of coal from Sydney to Toronto. I have no doubt it would reduce the time by two days and cut down the cost of freight proportionately—and we want to use Nova Scotia coal.

How can the people of the maritime provinces advance unless they can get their products out to the market at a reasonable cost? Bridge the strait of Canso, straighten and double track the railway, take out the curves and the bends and let us have fast traffic, because in these times fast traffic will do more than anything else to cut down costs and increase the economic efficiency of the country.

I must hasten along because my time is going and I want to get over to that beautiful gem of the gulf, Prince Edward Island. We have heard a good deal in this house about bottlenecks in connection with Prince Edward Island, and the bottlenecks there are just as vicious against traffic to and from the island as they could be. The people in central Canada have done little to carry out the terms of confederation to give that island a chance to expand as it should. It is a perfect garden. I went by car to Cariboo and to my amazement I had to back down on to a little boat. I rebelled against this at first, but I decided to back down on to a little boat and go across the channel over to the island. There again there is a monstrosity of a dock. The docks on each side, the one at Cariboo and the one at Wood Island are nothing short of shocking. This country ought to do the right thing for Prince Edward Island and give it proper transportation so that it too can grow, so that its farmers may have a chance. so that its merchants may have a chance. This province used to have a population of about 125.000. I believe it is now down to around 90.000, but with a chance it will expand again and there will be more business there.

As soon as you land on the Prince Edward Island side, what do you pass by? A whole string of shacks. They should be removed. I suppose they were left there by contractors. Give the island a chance. Make its entrance look beautiful. Then after you get to Charlottetown and go from there to Borden you have to go away around—I just cannot describe how you have to go, but it is twenty miles longer than it should be. At Charlottetown there should be a bridge right across the York river, a short one, only 2,275 feet long. It can be built by modern methods for $1,250,000. It would shorten the route from Charlottetown to Borden by twenty miles and speed up traffic. That would be for the good of Prince Edward Island. You cannot increase the tourist traffic and you cannot cut down the cost of freight by increasing the length of a route. You can increase the tourist traffic and cut down the cost of freight by shortening the length of that route by building a bridge across the York river for around $1,250,000.

That would be a small part of the five million dollars I am going to ask the minister of reconstruction for, for this year.

When you arrive at Borden, what do you find? There is a bottleneck there, the worst I have seen in America. To get on the ferry boat at Borden is a job, and to get off it at Tormentine is another job.

I cannot picture a group of women from the United States arriving at either of these places in Prince Edward Island, without dismay. In the one instance you have to back down on the boat, and in the other you have to go up a high ramp. I can picture them turning around and saying, "I will not do either; I will go back to my own country." In order to increase traffic you have to make it easy for people to approach the places they want to visit. There is not much ease in getting to and from Prince Edward Island on the present ferries.

I know we are having a new car ferry. I inspected it at Sorel. It is a fine ship. It will carry nineteen freight cars at a time. I believe last year some 19,000 loaded freight cars were ferried across the straits. It will carry about sixty motor cars at a time, and I believe last year some 33,000 motor cars and trucks were taken across the straits. On the day I went from Prince Edward Island back to Tormentine one of the officials on the ship with whom I discussed this problem told me that when he left Tormentine on the previous trip there were seventy-two cars left on the dock. People will not willingly wait for the ferry to make a return trip before they can get across to Prince Edward Island. A lot of them do; I did it myself, but I rebelled every minute I waited. When you come to the dock you want to get on the ship without undue delay. This new ferry will be all right for winter and summer, but it will not handle all the traffic in summer. I advocate another vessel, not a big one, but the regular type of ferry boat for trucks and motor cars—one on which and off which you can drive your car, instead of being obliged to drive up a high ramp, turn around the deck and scratch your car from one end to the other making the turn. That kind of transportation does not invite increased tourist travel. There again we have a chance to do something for that beautiful island and for maritime economy.

I think I shall finish with bottlenecks before I deal with resources. There is another bottleneck at the north side of New Brunswick. When you come to a place called Campbellton, if you want to take your car across the river you either go on a little dump of a ferry or you go up the river twelve miles, cross a bridge and come back down again. If there was a proper bridge at Campbellton, across to Mission Point, so that tourists when they come to Campbellton could drive right across the bridge, it would be much better. Nine out of ten would go up that gorgeous route, the like of which you cannot see everywhere, into what is called Gaspe peninsula. If such a bridge were built it would open up the whole of the Gaspe peninsula to tourist traffic.

The last bottleneck I want to talk about is the automobile route between Saint John and central Canada. Today you have to go down to the United States or up the beautiful Saint John valley. The trip through the Saint John valley is worth anyone's trouble; the scenery is magnificent; but if you are in a hurry you like to get to your destination. I would build a concrete highway from Saint John straight through to Sherbrooke and Montreal and thus cut off many scores of miles between the maritimes and central Canada so that trucks and motor cars could drive through rapidly. If Canada is to advance, as I think it will some day, it must do for the maritime provinces what we are now planning to do for western Canada, and I am for doing both. I will support the minister of agriculture and the minister of reconstruction in a twenty year programme at $10,000,000 a year to carry it on in western Canada. Now I want them to put through a 20-year programme, starting with at least $5,000,000 a year, to get on with the maritime rehabilitation and maritime reconstruction. Otherwise the maritime economy may go down and down and her population will not increase as it should. It is high time that the maritimes once again held the position in Canada which they held years ago. In this house their members, by their numbers, held a big place. But today, through no fault of the members but through the fault of Canada, they are down now to four for Prince Edward Island, twelve for Nova Scotia and ten for New Brunswick. That does not build up a country. I want to see Toronto grow. I want to see Montreal grow. From years of business experience I know of trainloads of goods that were shipped east. I said earlier in my talk that 60 trainloads of goods from one plant, of 35 cars per train, were shipped to the maritime provinces. Instead of shipping 2,000 cars of freight you can double it by doubling the capacity of the maritime provinces, and you would double employment in Ontario just the same as you would double employment in the maritime provinces. That is what we have to do. There is a programme which will do something not only for the maritime provinces but for all Canada; for if they grow, we will grow, just as if the west grows, we will grow.

The maritimes are full of resources. I did mention gypsum. I have on my desk a sample of slate from Hillsborough. It is as good slate as you will find anywhere. Why are we not shipping this slate all over Ontario and Quebec instead of bringing it in trainloads from Indiana and elsewhere in the United States? Give us water traffic. Give us cheap traffic and cheap freight. Load it up at Hillsborough and send it up through the Chignecto canal to central Canada. In that way you will get big business down there.

Here is another resource. It is oil shale. I do not know how many millions of tons of this there may be. I examined into it very carefully. During the last two or three years this country has spent $60,000 working these oil shale mines which are near Hillsborough. I saw along the track a pile of several hundred bags of this material. They had been lying there two or three years, and I took this piece out of one of them. I was not thieving; I had with me a man who told me I could have it. This has a value. Why is it not being developed? It should be developed. If the maritimes had half a chance they would go forward as the rest of Canada is going forward; but they are away down there in the forgotten part of Canada. Well, I am going to try to rip off the blinds and open all the doors there so that the rest of Canada can see what a wonderful place it is. Instead of having perhaps a little over a million people they should have two or three million, or more.

Then I went to a little place called Shediac, where I met a splendid man who was engaged in the processing of fish. I have forgotten his name, but I believe at one time some of his people were senators here. In 1943 that area shipped 27,000,000 pounds of fish from Shediac to the New England states, but on every pound they shipped they had to pay twice the freight they should have paid. If they could load it on a boat at Shediac, as they can, and take it through the Chignecto canal, the fishermen would get a great deal more for what they take from the sea. Those seas are full of fish, but these people are obstructed. They should have a chance to expand, but how can they with all these bottlenecks?

That is the situation all over the three provinces. There are vast resources of timber, fish, minerals and agriculture. I might say just one word further about the island. I investigated the situation there very carefully, and what I have said about New Brunswick and Nova Scotia applies there also. In the harbour of Charlottetown there is a splendid place for the construction of an elevator. I spoke to several hog producers there. They told me they were now raising about 70,000 hogs a year, a mere bagatelle for an island like that, but to do that they had brought from the west, I suppose under the assisted freight rates programme, something like 10,000,000 bushels of western grain to feed their cattle and hogs. Give them a line of boats from Charlottetown to Churchill; let them bring down not 10,000,000 bushels a year but 30,000,000 bushels of grain from the west. In that way you would promote interprovincial trade; you would do something to keep down the deficit on the Hudson Bay railway, and you would help the people of that island. If they could raise 70,000 hogs last year there is no reason why they could not raise a million hogs within a short time.

Mr. GARDINER: I have been advocating that for twenty years, but I could not get anyone to back me up.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will back you up. I notice that you and I see eye to eye on a good many things.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are both socialists.

Mr. MacNICOL: Socialists nothing. There is no socialist about me and the minister is not a socialist either. I will back him up in any programme to bring to the maritime provinces through Churchill, twenty or thirty million bushels of grain a year and thus cut down the deficits on the railways of this country. Then we will be doing something for the country instead of taking other people's money as we are doing now.

What would that mean? It would mean that thousands of young men and women who now have to leave the maritime provinces—and what I have said would apply also to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—for jobs in the New England states processing raw materials from Canada, would remain in this country and take jobs here. That would give our maritime provinces a chance to grow, it would let their economy expand and give them more employment. As far as I know that is the only way it can be done. If we as Canadians pull together and work together I believe the whole country will expand. One part cannot expand while the remainder stays still. I remember that the firm with which I was associated twenty or twenty-five years ago did ship thousands of carloads of material to the maritimes. Let the maritimes expand; then that firm will ship over the years perhaps five thousand carloads of boilers and radiators to those provinces, which would mean thousands of jobs in Montreal, Toronto and other places. We also brought back carloads of stuff from the McAvity people in Saint John, who make fine valves and brass goods, and from firms in Halifax.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you have been very kind to me and I am going to sit down. I have done my best to show how the economy of the maritimes can be expanded in the interests of the whole of Canada.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation of the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). His very first statement struck me forcibly; that his riding would expand to the extent that the rest of Canada expanded. I believe that is a fine motto, and I may use it later on when I speak about dominion-provincial relations.

I should like to preface my remarks with a well deserved eulogy of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Since the first day he came into this house I have watched this magnetic young man, and I was not astonished at the celerity with which he advanced in the public life of this country. When he was appointed parliamentary assistant he practically did the work of a minister. Later, when he was made a member of the cabinet, he came up to and surpassed all expectations. The way he was able to accomplish so much work was a revelation. In making that statement, I have more particularly in mind what happened last year, when he was the cabinet minister responsible for the army and air force. Then, on account of the condition of health of the Minister of Finance of that day, of whom I want to say a few words in a moment, the present minister had to assume the heavy responsibility of piloting last year's budget through the committee of ways and means. Again he was a revelation to the house and the whole country. Perhaps it will sound a little musical to his ears to hear some praise for a change, not only from this side but from the House of Commons as a whole, though he may have been compensated to a large extent by the fine commentaries which have appeared not only in the Liberal and independent newspapers but also in the Conservative press. I do not want to predict what may be his future, but there may be something even bigger ahead for the present Minister of Finance.

I should like to say a few words also about the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). We were fortunate indeed to have a man of his ability, his courage and his sincerity of purpose as Minister of Finance during the war years. He carried the confidence and respect of every citizen of Canada, regardless of party affiliations. I can apply the same words to the high office he occupies at the present time. He is giving the Department of Justice all his talents and all his sincerity, as he did when he was carrying the heavy responsibility of conducting the finances of this country in time of war.

Before I proceed with my remarks, I should like to read two or three excerpts from the Ottawa Journal, a newspaper which calls itself independent, but which is usually a good Conservative newspaper, of Thursday, May 1, 1947:

A Second Look at the Budget

Solomon in all his wisdom could not fashion a budget that would please everybody. When a finance minister comes, as Mr. Abbott came on Tuesday, with a budget giving nine out of ten taxpayers a 29 per cent reduction in income tax—a great number get much more than that—and lopping $110,000,000 off collective income tax payments, he is bound to please many.

And Mr. Abbott has given tax relief where tax relief was most needed—to people on wages or medium salaries. The Journal has argued often that our middle class population, people on fixed salaries, benefited less from war conditions and suffered more from war taxes than any other class. Mr. Abbott, acknowledging this, and remedying it substantially, says . . .

And later on:

Our own view, for what it is worth, is that Mr. Abbott has levelled off taxes (apart from excess profits) to where we may expect to find them for some years to come. We are now budgetting at the rate of about 2,000 million dollars a year; a great deal of our expenditure is uncontrollable; we have embarked on many heavy commitments, and may have to embark on more. In the light of that, plus things happening in the world (a good way to study the budget is in conjunction with this week's report of the foreign exchange control board), it might be as well if we braced ourselves for continuation of existing taxes, for some years at any rate, guarded against vain delusions, and felt thankful for our lot.

I believe that is very fair, and reflects what is in the minds of the people of Canada at the present time.

When the opposition mentions economy, we are in complete agreement. We favour curtailment of expenses, and retrenchment. But a few minutes ago I listened to my good friend, the hon. member for Davenport, and what he propounded to the house respecting requirements of the maritime provinces. No doubt those suggestions were all very fine, and perhaps they should be implemented. But I just leave this question to hon. members, as to how much it would cost the federal treasury if we were to give effect to the recommendations made—and I believe they were made sincerely—by the hon. member this afternoon. These things are worth remembering when we are discussing the budget and national financing.

Then, I have one word to say about taxation. During the last by-election in Pontiac, the candidate for l'Union des Electeurs approached the electors of that riding. He talked to the workers, the settlers, the professional men, and asked them, "Do you like taxation?" Naturally those people said, no; just the same as if he had asked them if they liked smallpox or typhoid fever. No one likes taxation. I do not like it. If anyone were to ask any member of parliament, that member would say, no; the same as the electors in Pontiac did last fall.

But when in the next breath the same speaker said to those people, "If you elect my party to power at Ottawa, taxation will disappear", then I call that demagoguery, pure and simple. It is not a proper appeal to the intelligence of the people of the country; on the contrary, it is an attempt to appeal to their passions. And one of the greatest dangers to democracy is these demagogic statements, wherein people make appeals to the passions of others, and attempt to take from democracy those things which make it a strong and living function.

These are points I am bound to make, because no matter what government holds office in Ottawa, no matter what its political stripe may be, we are bound to have taxation in this country, the same as in any other country of the world. They have taxes in Russia; they have taxes in France; they have taxes in socialist Britain, regardless of what some theorists may say. I say this with a bit of heat, because I do not quarrel with the ideology of any party. I have made a thorough study of the philosophical background and the monetary system of the Social Credit party. But when some of their supporters get on a public platform and say that they will abolish taxation, if they are returned to power, then I begin to doubt the sincerity of such utterances, and doubt the sincerity of the statements they make on the hustings during election times.

Why is our taxation high today? I will answer that, just as any one of my people in my constituency would answer it. When I hear hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party say that taxation is too high, I am tempted to ask them what happened in Canada during the last thirty or thirty-five years. I would tell them that in that time this country has taken part in two world wars. We were not the last to enter world war number one, nor were we the last to do it when world war number two began. We entered those wars spontaneously.

But what happened during those years of war? What happened, when the Conservative opposition brought upon the House of Commons crisis after crisis during the last war? Those were the days when the government sitting on the treasury benches told the opposition that Canada was making a magnificent effort in her every war department, and that all her population, whether they were in the armed forces, or in civilian occupations, were playing a full part. But the opposition brought on these crises time after time and, on many occasions, the work of the House of Commons was vitiated by the unfair political situations thrust upon it by the opposition.

What did they want? They wanted a million more men in uniform. They were telling the House of Commons that this country was not going far enough in its war effort; that we were not giving enough in lend-lease to our allies. They were saying that we were lacking in our effort; and all this at a time when the Minister of Finance of that day, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the cabinet as a whole were telling parliament and the whole of Canada that this country was making a magnificent, yes, a 100 per cent effort, that was the admiration of the whole world.

What would have happened if we had listened to the opposition? What would have happened if we had had a national government, if we had listened to the dictation of the committee of two hundred. Taxation would have been trebled; it would be three times what it is today. We cannot get away from those facts.

We must be realists, and I say it ill behooves any member in the opposition to say that taxes are high. True, they are high, but one of the greatest causes of our present high taxation is that we participated loyally and generously in two great wars for democracy and Christianity, when Canada, the empire and civilization generally were in jeopardy. And we are proud of having done our part, but there has been a price to pay for such magnificent participation.

It is easy to say that the war has been over for two years and that something more should have been done for lower taxation. But surely if I lose my house by fire today, it cannot be expected that it will be rebuilt, by itself, on the next day, when the embers are still burning. Surely we must be practical. Some of the statements made by members of the opposition would not seem to equal the logic of a school boy or a school girl under eighteen years of age.

We must be realists. No doubt taxation is heavy today. Perhaps it is not always equally divided over the different sections of our population, and is subject to changes and amendments, but at the same time it will never be as it was before the second world war. It was never as low after the first world war as it was before it. These are the things we must remember.

We must be realistic. Again I express the hope that God may never permit another world war to take place. But, Mr. Speaker, if such should happen again, and if at that time my party were in opposition I would beg of it to work hand in glove with the government in power at that time. Because a government in time of war has the full responsibility for all our activities, and its obligations are terrific. And if at some times the plans for this country were vitiated, it was due to the fact that the criticism was unfair; certainly the situation in Canada would have been deplorable if we had listened to the opposition at that time. I point out these facts because I believe it my duty to do so. I do not do it as a supporter of the government, but simply as a Canadian.

One word about booms and depressions. One after the other we hear similar whisperings to those of 1931 and 1932; here and there creep in whispers of death. They may be whisperings, but they are there, just the same. I was greatly surprised when my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), before the war was over, and only last year again made the prophecy that we would have one or two million unemployed. It is not fitting for the hon. member, because I do not think he believes that. We do not want a depression, just as we do not want a great boom. Neither of them is good. But I want my hon. friends of the C.C.F. to study the situation in Great Britain today, so that they may be at least logical.

I admit that my hon. friends of the C.C.F. believe sincerely and honestly in the theory of socialism. That theory is being tried out in England. During the last general election over there the Labour party told the fine people of Great Britain that, if that party were returned to power, the people would never have to face a situation such as they would have to face under a Tory administration. But what happened? The minute the Labour party attained power they found, of necessity, that they must forget most of their theories. And why? They must forget them for the simple reason that they have responsibilities in connection with governing the people, and every section of the people. I note how closely the British government watched Dumbarton Oaks, and how closely they are watching the tariff deliberations taking place at this time in Geneva.

We note, too, how closely they watch the financial situation in the United States, and the reasons for any change in that country. They do so because they are afraid that a big inflation in the United States may lead to a depression. Great Britain and the government of that country are honest enough to understand that a depression will spread, and one which envelops the United States is bound to creep into Great Britain.

I am not worrying about the government of Great Britain on account of its political shade, because I realize it is composed of Britishers. I was proud indeed when I noted that Russia was sadly disappointed because they did not make headway with their principles in that country; that the people of Britain were not communists, and that they remained British, and practical to the core. At the same time, if a depression came along, regardless of the fact that they have a socialist government in Great Britain, regardless of the fact that they have a socialist government at the present time in France and in Norway and in Sweden, it will affect the populations of those countries. The same depression will occur in Russia, and when it will hit that nation the only difference between that country and between Great Britain will be that the Russian people will not be permitted to express their own opinions. They will be compelled to take what the government gives them, while in Great Britain the people will be absolutely free to express what they think.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Are they going to have a depression in Great Britain?

Mr. BRADETTE: We should have learned by now that there is only one way to avoid a depression. After world war I we had an increase in intensive nationalistic economic feeling. We should remember what happened then in order to avoid a depression now. Our United States friends—and I say "friends" deliberately—attempted to penalize the best customer they ever had by putting on the Hawley-Smoot tariff so as apparently to hurt their best customer. The result was a depression. Surely we have learned something from these errors. An appeal was made indirectly by the Minister of Finance to the great nation to the south of us.

I do not fear the United States; I love that nation; I do not fear that great giant with all its idealism, the freedom and the liberty that they love so much, with their Christianity; their dynamic culture; I do not fear them. Surely it can be found possible for her to deal commercially with the rest of the world. How illogical it was for their statesmen after world war I to expect Great Britain to pay billions in war debt when they would not buy millions of dollars worth of her goods. The thing was economically impossible. These are the things the world must learn if we want to avoid the economic wreck that occurred after world war I. If every country erects a Chinese wall of tariffs almost sky-high, only one thing will result.

We Canadians are in a happy position. We want no aggrandizement of our territories; we do not want to enlarge our frontiers; we do not want the last pound of flesh. Therefore our voice should be clear in this thing. We should say to the world, not only through British preference, not only through multilateral trade agreements, but by every means possible that there should be more and more free trade in every section of the world. Before the war, when I heard that Germany wanted to fight because she could not get raw materials I did not want to believe that because it sounded so foolish. Surely it should have been possible for a nation like Germany to get the necessary raw materials. Surely after this war it should be possible for nations like Germany or Italy or all the other nations to have access to the raw materials of the world. Again I repeat that if we go into the same kind of foolish nationalistic and selfish economy that we had after world war I we shall fall again into the same situation that we had to face in the past.

I have hope, because the nations have learned, and through pressure from the people the governments must of necessity act. In the United States at the present time there is a great school of thought among workers, manufacturers and financiers, which realizes the viciousness that exists in high tariffs.

I come now to the matter of economy. There is no doubt that no hon. member on this side of the house wants extravagance, wants the people's money to be wasted, squandered. After all, we are just as responsible as are hon. members of the opposition. Let us be fair with ourselves. When I was Deputy Speaker, I think it was in 1944, for two weeks I tabulated the cost of the requests made by the opposition and I quit when I reach $2,000 million. The same opposition were also asking for curtailment of expenditures. Those who were most vociferous were the Progressive Conservative party. I should like to quote a few short sentences from the Financial Post, which is not an enemy of the Conservative party. They criticized that party's attitude in parliament as being the biggest political riddle heard in Ottawa in a long time and they referred to the leader of the opposition's statements that:

1. Old age pensions could be raised.
2. Radio licence fees eliminated.
3. Agricultural floor prices increased.
4. Veterans treated more generously.
5. Income taxes reduced one-third and exemptions raised.

If all those things were done it would have meant an increase of $650 million in the budget. A short time ago the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) was pleading for the beet sugar industry. I should like to see the government do all it possibly can for that industry. Then I hear other hon. members talk about maritime rights and freight rates. I should like to see all those things implemented. But again you must cut your sails according to the cloth you have. If the government had had a deficit of $200 million or $300 million we would have heard, and how vociferously, from the opposition. We must be absolutely realistic when we are dealing with financial matters, and the opposition should at least be consistent on this question.

I should like to say a few words about the gold mining industry, which is an important industry in my section of the country. However, I am a realist, and when a gold producer comes to me and says that he cannot produce gold for less than $38 or $40 an ounce, I tell him to forget about it. I am not in favour of subsidizing the gold mining industry, but at the same time I feel that that industry was not treated fairly when the Canadian dollar was brought back to parity last year. This was one industry that was singled out, and the then minister of finance knew that because he mentioned it specifically. When we deal with this question let us be practical.

We allowed some marginal gold mines to function for three and a half to four years with a premium of $3.50 an ounce due to the exchange difference between Canadian and United States dollars. Those people did not know how long that situation would exist. You cannot blame them for being optimistic. They thought it would exist for a period of years, that possibly ten or perhaps fifteen years would pass before the Canadian dollar would be at par with the United States dollar. Those people were allowed to go ahead producing.

The gold mining industry has always responded to any requests made of it by the federal government. Early in the war the then Minister of Finance made an appeal to the gold mines to produce as much as they could, and they responded immediately. A year and a half or two years later, when curtailment was necessary in the gold mining industry because of man-power and material shortages, they again responded immediately. This is an industry which has always stood on its feet, never asking for any special privileges. We sometimes hear it referred to as a sheltered industry, but it is not a sheltered industry. It does not want to be. It has never required shelter. All it wants is to receive fair treatment, and the comprehension of their problems.

No matter what may be said about it, our government has done something for this industry. Before the budget was announced, the Department of National Defence announced that assistance to the gold mines was provided by the government in three relief measures, the first of which raised the depletion allowances from 33⅓ to 40 per cent on profits earned after January 1, 1947, in the case of mines the value of whose output is derived to the extent of 70 per cent or more from gold. Second, in the case of low grade mines with profit margins under $10 an ounce, the minimum depletion allowance was to be $4 an ounce, instead of $2, the change to apply in fiscal periods ending after June 30, 1946. The third measure applied to new mines that have come into production since the first of last year and relieved them of the obligation of taking into their books the appropriate write-off for depreciation and pre-production expenses during the first three years of operation. These steps were intended to encourage prospecting and to stimulate operations, gold production having declined nearly fifty per cent in the past five years.

The door of the Department of Finance is still open to members of all parties to bring reasonable and logical pressure on the government to implement the necessary requests made, so that the gold-mining industry will play the full role it is intended to play in our national economy.

I repeat that when you hear it said in the House of Commons that all Canadian gold should not be sold in the United States market but on the open market, I say, no, for the simple reason that ninety per cent of the gold producers do not want the latter market. They do not want to black market, to bootleg against the United States treasury, and they do not want the responsibility of collections. In places like Egypt, India, North Africa and South America the producers may get as much as $50 an ounce for gold, but where will the responsibility lie for collection? Will they absorb all our gold production? Certainly not. There is only one natural market for gold and that is the United States treasury.

I listened attentively the other day to the statement made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), that perhaps a solution of the difficulties of the gold mining industry would be an increase in the price of gold per ounce by the United States treasury, but he said that would be pure inflation. I do not agree, because I have it on good authority that gold producers in the United States at the present time, with the price $35 an ounce in the United States, are in the red just as some Canadian producers are. The day is not far distant when the price of gold will be increased by the United States treasury. That will be a great help to Canada as well as to the United States. It could not be inflationary, for the very simple reason that you cannot oversaturate that market. Gold is not an ordinary commodity but one used only by governments for exchange purposes. Some say that the gold is just put in a hole in the ground and left there, and nominally that is true. But great big nations find their gold reserves today sadly depleted, and these gold reserves served a most useful purpose in bringing us victory in the last war. I shall gladly cooperate with any member in any logical way in promoting the interests of the gold mining industry. There is no necessity for politics in discussing the gold mining industry. The mine operators would be the first to resent that, because they are practical and logical men. But if ever the day comes when the price of gold is increased by six or seven dollars an ounce it will mean 200,000 more people employed in northern Ontario, northern Quebec and northern Canada as a whole, and will prove beneficial to the whole of Canada.

I want to say a few words about a very contentious subject, namely dominion-provincial relations. I know I am going to have with me in this the present leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Bracken), because his attitude was most logical and statesmanlike when he appeared before the Rowell-Sirois commission, and later on the dominion-provincial conference held for the discussion and adoption of that report. He made a wonderful impression there, not as a provincialist but as a true Canadian. He realized that the whole was greater than any of its parts, and his situation today must be unhappy because behind him there are men who are not playing the game on dominion-provincial relations, as he did as a real and true Canadian.

The doors have always been open so far as the federal government is concerned. I am not going to hold any brief for the premiers of Ontario and Quebec. They happen to be premiers of our two greatest provinces. But it is only by accident that Quebec has a larger territory than Ontario and that Ontario has more natural resources than some of the other provinces. I repeat the words which my dear friend the hon. member for Davenport used at the outset of his remarks: My riding expands as the rest of Canada expands and my province of Ontario expands when the rest of Canada expands. There is no getting away from that. There should be no poor sister in the confederation. When it comes to a meeting of the provinces with the federal government to provide health insurance, old age pensions, mothers' allowance and other social legislation we should all be one, no matter from which province we come. I am sure that no two men have a monopoly of all the grey matter in Canada.

Only yesterday it was announced that the premier of Nova Scotia has accepted an agreement with the federal government. The premier of New Brunswick and the people of that province have just as much intelligence as we in Ontario or the people of any other province. That fine little province of Prince Edward Island, which is smaller in area than my own riding, has its share of grey matter, as is so well shown by its sons scattered all over Canada. The province of Manitoba has good men at the head of its government. Then there is the province of Saskatchewan, and I want to speak a special word of eulogy of the premier of that province. I have read that he was most constructive in the deliberations of the dominion-provincial conference and that he did a good job. If there was anything bad or vicious in signing an agreement with the federal government I am sure that Mr. Douglas, who is an experienced parliamentarian and a true Canadian, would never have signed. The same applies to Alberta and British Columbia. Surely there should be a way of coming to agreement by honest compromise. There is nothing sinister in that. They tell me that when you get married you must be willing to meet your wife half way, and this applies to practically every action in our lives.

Mr. MARTIN: How do you know?

Mr. BRADETTE: I have heard that several times. Why is the air around dominion-provincial relations so vitiated at the present time? I say deliberately that it is done purely and simply for political purposes.

I have in my hand a report of a meeting which was addressed by Mr. Duplessis, premier of the province of Quebec, my native province, at the official opening of International Plywoods Limited at Gatineau, Quebec.

I wish to read an excerpt from an editorial in Le Droit, an Ottawa newspaper, of November 18, 1946. I am going to give, first of all, my own translation of this paragraph, and then I shall read it in French so that there can be no comeback on my interpretation of it. Speaking of dominion-provincial relations and the speech of Mr. Duplessis on that occasion, this article, which, I believe, was using the words of Mr. Duplessis, says:

In the first as in the last federal propositions, Mr. Duplessis sees again an assimilation attempt against Quebec, a menace to its right to develop according to her Catholic and French traditions, in taking away from her its financial means of action, in limiting its legislative jurisdiction of social order. Of this legislative centralization, of this assimilation by small portion, but positive on the long run, of this placing under tutorship, of this diminution of the facilities of Quebec, to organize and to develop its life in accordance with its Catholic and French mentality, of this Mr. Duplessis does not want any.

Now I shall read the paragraph from the editorial as it appeared in Le Droit:

Dans les dernières comme dans les premières propositions fédérales, M. Duplessis voit encore une tentative d'assimilation du Québec, une menace pour son droit à se développer selon ses traditions catholiques et françaises, en lui enlevant ses moyens financiers d'action et en limitant sa juridiction législative d'ordre social. De cette centralisation législative, de cette assimilation à petite dose, mais sûre à la longue, de cette mise en tutelle, de cette diminution des facilités du Québec à organiser et à développer sa vie selon sa mentalité catholique et française, M. Duplessis ne veut point.

(Translation):

Mr. GAGNON: That is so.

Mr. BRADETTE: No, that is not so; the statement is partly right and partly wrong.

(Text):

I have been a member of parliament for a long time in this fine assembly, and you will not be surprised, Mr. Speaker, and members who are listening to me will not be surprised when I say that I never saw or heard a single member of parliament who would like to see anything happen to provincial autonomy. The reason is very simple. I come here from the province of Ontario. My home town is the little town of Cochrane, a fine little spot in northern Ontario. I like my own town and will fight for it even against the big city of Toronto. I am an Ontarian now and love the province of Ontario and will fight for the province of Ontario because I am an Ontarian. But over and above all that there is a great big loyalty which we all honour and cherish, and that is of being a Canadian; it is Canada. And here in the federal house any legislative assembly has all the protection of provincial rights that it could wish to have. I never heard from the lips of any member of this house a single expression that would lead me to believe he would tolerate for a single moment any infringement of provincial rights.

Having said that, I am going to speak now as a man who was born in the province of Quebec and tell Mr. Duplessis this.

If ever the French Canadians in this country lose their faith or their language it will be due to themselves and themselves alone, but I know that that will never come. I make that statement deliberately, because there is no reason why religion or language should be mixed up with a question of this kind. It would be just as logical for Mr. Drew to say, in Toronto or in Kingston or even in Ottawa, that in signing dominion-provincial contracts the Protestant faith and the English language would be destroyed. I have lived forty years in northern Ontario, among English-speaking people of the Protestant faith, as well as among French Canadians, and I think you will believe me when I say that it has never occurred to any English-speaking person to do anything to prevent me from being a Roman Catholic. I say that deliberately and sincerely. If I have seen people who have not received that amount of respect which they thought they deserved it was because they were not true enough to their own faith or the French language.

On the question of language, it is true that the Canadian minority in Ontario had to fight for their rights and to the members of parliament I say, you should have seen the moving spectacle of French-Canadian mothers surrounding elementary, separate bilingual schools because there was legislation passed in Ontario—rule 17—which attempted to stop the teaching of the French language in the primary stages in the elementary schools. But by organization, through the vigilant guidance given by L'Association de l'Education de l'Ontario, by the rising of our men and women as one person, using all the weapons of democracy and just plain good judgment and intelligence, and speaking as one as Canadians of French descent, we brought our case before the provincial authorities for consideration, the privy council, the Ontario legislature and public opinion.

I want you to remember that the man who had put that unjust law on the statutes of Ontario, the Hon. Howard Ferguson, after years of practical and necessary agitation, was sufficiently courageous—because it needed courage—to repeal that act. The French Canadians are logical. They had logic on their side in this important question for them, therefore we thought that we could rely on the fairness and sense of justice of the English-speaking majority in the province and we succeeded.

Is there any single member, whether from the province of Quebec or from any other part of Canada; is there any single federal member who is prepared to tell us now that if the province of Quebec should sign an agreement with Ottawa it would mean parting with the rights of that province, either constitutional or natural, either faith or language? No one could make that statement because it would be absolutely untrue. That is why I deplore any statements that are not Canadian, statements that are not constructive. To my compatriots I will say this: If we respect ourselves in the province of Quebec and outside the province of Quebec; if we are true to our faith and to our mother tongue; if we are vigilant about our rights we shall be respected by the rest of the Canadian people.

One word about the premier of Ontario. I live in northern Ontario, and sometimes we make jokes about what is called Queen's Park, because it is so far away from us. The premier of Ontario seems to be afraid of centralization resulting from a dominion-provincial conference. He blows hot and cold, however; hot one day and cold the very next. At the conference, Mr. Duplessis walked out and Mr. Drew followed saying, "We shall have nothing more to do with it". A few weeks later, Mr. Drew said that we must have another conference, and then, later on, he declared that he would have nothing to do with a government in which he had no confidence. I would ask hon. members from Ontario whether that is the word of a statesman and whether it shows cohesion and consistency.

I respect Mr. Drew just as I respect all the premiers that have been in office in Ontario. I was honoured with the personal friendship of Mr. Ferguson, Mr. Finlayson and Mr. Hearst during the first years I lived in the northern part of the province. But there are certain things that the Canadian people must know about his lack of confidence in the federal government.

The Prime Minister, the leader of the present government, has not been at the head of this country by accident. The Canadian people, through the ballot box, soon find out the weight and ability of a man whom they put at the head of a country, a man who is to govern the country for years. If he is found wanting he does not remain long in office. How long has the Prime Minister been at the head of affairs in Canada? Mr. Drew should remember these things. I have mentioned previously the name of two members of the cabinet, the Minister of Finance and the present Minister of Justice. I mention now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I mention also the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), and I wish to pay him this tribute. We were fortunate indeed to have him at the head of so important a department during the war. He has done a job which was the admiration of the whole world, and I take second place to no one in honesty or sincerity, when I make this statement. I could mention every member of the cabinet without exception for their excellent services.

If I thought for a moment that the signing of an agreement with the dominion would be prejudicial to my own province I would be the first to oppose it. Why should anybody question the loyalty of members of parliament on any side of the house? Statements of the kind that I have just referred to are nothing but a reflection on the government and on every member of this parliament.

We have grievances in northern Ontario. I have heard an hon. member speaking of hydro electric power in New Brunswick, and it is all very well for members of parliament from southern Ontario to talk about the wonderful achievements of Ontario Hydro; but we have not yet Ontario hydro power in northern Ontario. We have developed all our mines and natural resources with private capital, and when we went to Toronto and appeared before the hydro electric, they said, "No. The field is not proven and we cannot go there at the present time". But individuals found it possible to go there. Through Ontario Hydro, we in northern Ontario have paid tens of millions in taxation to help bonus the southern part of the province. We did not begrudge that, because what is good for one section will eventually be good for every other part of the province. In my section there are farmers who have been farming for the last forty years, and in the summer months when there is rain they cannot get out because the mud is right up to their knees. We do not criticize that, because we know the territory is terrific and is too expansive to develop all at once. I repeat, we are logical, and I want the premier of Ontario to use the same logic in dealing with dominion-provincial relations as we use in northern Ontario in relation to Queen's Park and the provincial government, and with our real grievances we do not damn or condemn the administration.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if we have the necessary cooperation there is no reason why we cannot succeed, why we cannot arrive at constructive understanding. There need be no talk of hard bargaining. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario seemed to be scandalized because there was bargaining; but, after all, there must always be some give and take. There was bargaining at the time of confederation.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BRADETTE: I do not want to abuse the privileges of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead and finish.

Mr. BRADETTE: I thank you most sincerely. The premiers of Ontario and Quebec will be in good company if and when they sign agreements with the seven other premiers, because those other gentlemen are all true Canadians, as much Canadians as any of us in this house, and it is a reflection upon them to think otherwise. Why should we try to create the impression that the other premiers came here as beggars? They came here not as beggars but as Canadians negotiating with other Canadians in an endeavour to find a solution to a common problem. We do not want any duplication of taxation, but we do want to have the social legislation that we stand in need of implemented, and it ill behooves the two richest provinces to take the attitude, "Well, if they haven't got the money it is too bad for them".

I repeat the statement of the hon. member for Davenport. The expansion of Toronto and the expansion of Montreal is due to the expansion of the rest of Canada. The expansion of northern Ontario has helped southern Ontario. I may say that two years ago when I spoke in this house I then complimented the premier of Ontario, Mr. Drew. I said that he did well at the conference two years ago, but I cannot say the same thing at the present time. Let him forget politics for a while and work for the whole of Canada and, as far as my section of the country is concerned, we shall be 100 per cent behind Mr. Drew. We believe in Ontario, but we believe still more in our wonderful country and welfare, which is Canada.

Mr. SKEY: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BRADETTE: Certainly.

Mr. SKEY: May I ask if he thinks that his province of Ontario should be guaranteed individual exclusive fields of taxation under this dominion-provincial agreement?

Mr. BRADETTE: That is an elaborate question and it would take quite some time to answer it. However I will say this: If you read the British North America Act, the federal government can have all the fields of taxation it desires—it is there in plain black and white—but it does not want that. It wants to work in cooperation with the nine provinces in the Canadian federation for the welfare and benefit of the whole nation.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to take this opportunity, as others have done who have spoken in this debate, to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the splendid manner in which he presented the budget. It is a great honour indeed for so young a minister to have such a tremendous responsibility as the one he carries, namely, being the Minister of Finance for the Dominion of Canada. While I do congratulate him on presenting his budget and while I think he did it in a splendid manner, I cannot agree with the statements outlined in the budget. I am sure that a great many Canadians feel, as I do, greatly disappointed in the budget of 1947. After all, Mr. Speaker, the people were looking forward at this time with great hopes and expectations to a considerable relief from the terrible tax burden which they have carried for so many years. The minister in his statement presented to the house is estimating his revenue this year at $2,200 million. That is a huge amount. It is true, too, that the total revenues have greatly increased; but, in my opinion, the living standards of the people have not risen according to the production, and therefore the people of Canada have every right to look for greater relief from taxation.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) $2,200 million will have to be collected from in the neighbourhood of 3,000,000 families, making a total tax levy of over $700 on the average family. The average Canadian family can ill afford that tremendous amount. Not only did the Liberal party themselves do a great deal of boasting about the splendid budget that was brought down, but they were assisted in their efforts by the press across Canada generally. I do not contend for a moment that the press across Canada reflects the opinion of the people of Canada; but for some mysterious reason the press carried in great flashing headlines remarks such as these concerning the budget, "Finance Minister announces $352 million surplus." On the face of it, that sounds very good and it seems as though the government is doing a tremendously good job of financing. Then again, in one of the Ottawa papers there was the headline "Income tax slashes well received." I cannot for the life of me imagine where they got that opinion from, unless it was merely from the editorial writers.

That brings me to the point, Mr. Speaker, where I want to refer briefly to the Progressive Conservatives in this house. I was very much interested in the official criticism made by the Progressive Conservative party, and I refer to it in that capacity. I was amazed that there was really no effective criticism, and I am not so much surprised at that, because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) I think, gave the answer quite clearly yesterday when he was speaking to the house. He went to great lengths to point out that the policy of the Conservative party, ever since Canada was started, was one of raising tariffs and the policy of the Liberal party was always one of lowering tariffs. But the point is this: the Conservatives have been in power, and the Liberals have been in power much longer, but the tariffs have always climbed up.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is a matter of history. I am not saying something that is not a fact.

Mr. GARDINER: You had better check the record.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The Liberals have been in power all the time I have been in the house. During a portion of the time there was a war on, but for the last two years there has not been any great reduction in tariff rates that I know of, except in one or two instances.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where it did not make any difference.

Mr. JOHNSTON: And before that the Conservatives were in power. So I say to the Minister of Agriculture and to the Conservatives that it does not make much difference to the country which of the parties is in power. The people always get the dirty end of it anyway.

I want to refer to the criticism made by the Progressive Conservatives and when I say that I do it in a kindly way and just to show that their criticism was ineffective. I wish to refer to the Progressive Conservative amendment to the budget made on May 6, 1947, as reported at page 2805 of Hansard, and to read parts of it. I read over very carefully the speech of the financial critic of the opposition in the hope that I might find some place where there was some constructive criticism. The amendment starts out in this way and I read only that portion to which I intend to refer:

This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance (a) offer no relief from the oppressive burden of indirect and hidden taxes on staple necessities that compose the family budget, all of which taxes directly increase the cost of living;

(b) offer no encouragement to those engaged in the development of our natural resoures, especially mining and agriculture.

As I looked through Hansard, the only place where I could think that the Conservatives were making reference to the high cost of living and the treatment which they would give, was at page 2802. This is what the official critic of the Progressive Conservative party had to say:

I want to say a word about inflation, just a word dealing wholly with the question of money supply. The minister did not deal with that, and in a way I was sorry that he did not because I think it is important. I think it is important for us to remember that the means of payment in the hands of the public, that is to say, the money or its equivalent which people have in their hands, is two and a half times what it was in 1939. It was then $2,400 million and now it is $7 billion. I would urge strongly that that huge amount should be reduced, and incidentally I am glad to see the minister the other day began a measure of reduction by partly paying off a maturing loan out of the government's own resources.

I would interpret that to mean that the Conservative opposition are concerned about the tremendous rise in prices; they apparently blame that on the fact that the people have so much purchasing power in their possession and therefore would reduce that purchasing power. The only way in which I could see that they would effectively reduce the purchasing power would be by raising the taxes. I am sure the people of Canada would not at all appreciate having their taxes increased beyond their present levels If that is the solution the Progressive Conservative party would apply if they were in power, I think that would be even a worse day than we are witnessing at the present time. Then the amendment goes on:

(b) offer no encouragement to those engaged in the development of our natural resources, especially mining and agriculture.

The only reference I can find to this, in an offhand way, is on page 2803, where the financial critic had this to say:

Fifty years ago the man who retired with a modest competency could get five or six per cent on it and he could reckon on living the rest of his life upon the proceeds. What happens today when he receives three per cent? And he is lucky if he gets that.

There the financial critic is very much concerned because the government has endeavoured to lower interest rates. I would take strong exception to that. I think interest rates are much too high. I need not make further reference to that at this point, because I intend to deal with it later on. However, those were the only two points I could find in the criticism of the budget, so again I say the people of Canada would have a difficult time if those were the only solutions the Progressive Conservative party had to offer.

Let me now deal more specifically with the budget and the manner in which I think the people of Canada are taking it. Those of us in this house recall quite clearly that, before this budget was brought down, the tax exemptions were $750 for single persons and $1,500 for married persons. As social crediters we have always maintained that the tax exemptions should not be less than $1,200 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons.

Mr. MICHAUD: They ask a lot more than that in Quebec.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I said "not less." If the hon. gentleman will just listen, I think he will find that my statements are quite accurate. That is the unfortunate thing about the hon. member who spoke yesterday, and I intend to refer to that later on. He does the same thing; he sits here but he does not listen carefully, and he gets the wrong impression. Let me repeat; we believe the exemptions should be not less than $1,200 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons, and in a few moments I hope to be able to convince the hon. member that this is not asking too much. As a matter of fact, it is not sufficient, and really should be higher. It is true that some relief was given by a reduction in the rates, but when that is interpreted in terms of dollars and cents the relief is very little indeed. Let me refer for just a moment to the table put on Hansard by the minister; then I do not think we shall be so optimistic about this thing. If we refer to page 2556 of Hansard, a married taxpayer with no children and having an income of $1,800 would pay $68 for this year at the present rates. For the year 1947, with six months at the present rates and six months at the new rates, he will pay $52, or a saving of only $16. No one will seriously contend, not even members on the government side or the Minister of Finance himself, that $16 is very much relief to a taxpayer. Then a married taxpayer receiving $2,000 would pay $118 at present rates and will pay $94 during the full year, a reduction of $24, or $2 a month.

Mr. LESAGE: What about 1946?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I quoted the figure for 1947, which would be the tax payable under last year's budget, and I am quoting the figure the minister gave for the full year 1947, payable next year.

Mr. LESAGE: But you do not have there the reduction made in 1946.

Mr. JOHNSTON: As I say, the saving in this case is $24 a year, or $2 a month. Surely we cannot boast very much about that. A married taxpayer receiving $2,250 would pay $180 under the present rates and will pay $150 during the coming year, or a saving of $30.

Mr. LESAGE: For six months.

Mr. JOHNSTON: No; that will be his total tax.

Mr. LESAGE: In 1947.

Mr. JOHNSTON: No; for 1947, six months at the present rate and six months under the new rate. That will be his tax next year, so that he is saving only $30. That is nothing to boast about. I believe the people of Canada have every right to expect a better deal than that. Now let me just quote from a clipping I cut out of a newspaper the other day in regard to the cost of living, and we shall see just how far that $2 a month will go toward compensating people for the tremendous increase in the cost of living. This is an article from the Western Producer of May 1, 1947, headed "Housewives right on living costs." It states:

In Ottawa last Friday—

You see this is quite authentic.

—the bureau of statistics confirmed with figures what housewives have been declaring for a long time, that the cost of food, clothing and household requirements is considerably more than the official cost of living index indicates.

Between August, 1939, and the end of 1946, the official index showed an increase of 26·1 per cent. By last month it had risen an additional 2·8 per cent.

While these figures represented the official average advance, they did not give much indication of some of the price advances houseswives, particularly city housewives, have worried about. Egg prices are 70 per cent higher than they averaged in the period 1935-39. In the same class are cheese, round steak, rolled rib roast, stewing beef, veal, bacon, lard, rice, beans, corn syrup and lemons.

The bureau computes its index by averaging the weighted representative price figure for each of six main essential item groups: fuel, rent, foods, clothing, home furnishings and services and miscellaneous.

The food group—

And this is interesting to note.

—advanced 47·4 per cent; clothing 31·1 and home furnishings and services 28·2 per cent. Fuel moved ahead 10·3 per cent, rent—before the recent increase in domestic rentals—9·2 and miscellaneous, 12·6.

That is the increase in the cost of living; and compare that increase in the official cost of living with the measly $2 a month that the man I referred to is going to save.

Mr. LESAGE: What about the increases in salaries since the beginning of the war?

Mr. JOHNSTON: We will talk of that in just a minute; I am glad the hon. member mentioned it. Apparently he is satisfied that the people of Canada are receiving sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living, so for his benefit and the benefit of all hon. members in the house I want to quote what was stated by the Toronto welfare council in regard to a budget for a minimum standard of living and self-respect. They state that to maintain a bare relief subsistence for a family would require, as of May 1, 1947, over $2,300 a year before taxes.

Mr. LESAGE: How many children?

Mr. JOHNSTON: It would not make any difference whether there were one, two or three children.

Mr. LESAGE: Oh, yes, it does.

Mr. JOHNSTON: At present prices you show me the family in this country that can have a decent standard of living on less than $2,000, and for every one you show me I will show you five hundred who cannot. However, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to the hon. gentleman a little later, so I am not going to give him too much attention just now. I do not want to flatter him.

Mr. LESAGE: You had better not.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am coming back to you in a moment.

I now want to direct attention for a moment to page 2554 of Hansard, where the Minister of Finance was speaking. I am not going to quote at great length, because others have done a very good job of that, but there the minister had this to say:

In reducing the rates of income tax I have, of course, endeavoured to graduate them as fairly as possible, giving the greatest proportionate relief to those in the lowest brackets, but granting some relief to all.

Mr. LESAGE: That is good.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am not going to say that is not right. But the thing I want to point out is that he said he is giving the greatest possible relief to those in the lowest brackets. I disagree emphatically with that statement. I do not think the minister did give the greatest possible relief to those in the lowest income brackets. Surely no one would contend that a reduction of $6 in taxes for a year is any appreciable amount of relief, or $16 or $18 for one in the next bracket. Would that be considered relief by any sane person? Would that be considered as a great amount, or the greatest possible amount of relief? Surely not.

Then he said that he was granting some relief to all. I do not know whether he meant there some relief to all people in Canada, or just some relief to those in the income tax brackets. If he meant some relief to those in the income tax brackets, then I think he would be right; but if he meant relief to all the people of Canada he is most definitely wrong.

I want to speak for a moment about those persons who are not in income tax brackets. They are the ones who are being more harshly treated than any other people in Canada. And when one considers that those persons to whom I refer form about fifty per cent of the families and people generally in Canada, one realizes that a tremendous number of people are receiving no relief whatsoever. In fact, their living standards are being greatly lowered by the continual increase in prices, and the rising cost of living, as I have already indicated.

At page 2554 of Hansard, the minister said:

> The exemption levels established last year are high enough to exempt completely from tax more than half the people earning incomes in Canada.

That is an astounding statement, when the minister has the audacity to stand in the House of Commons—even though it was his first budget, and he may be inexperienced—and say that over half the people of Canada are receiving no benefit whatsoever, and then in the same breath say that fifty per cent of the people of Canada, if they are single, are living on less than $750 a year.

The government of Canada should be thoroughly ashamed of itself to make that admission to other countries, and to the people generally. It should be ashamed to admit in the same breath that over fifty per cent of the people of Canada, if they are married, are receiving less than $1,500 a year, and should be ashamed to say that it expects that a family could be maintained on that amount. That is an outrageous disgrace.

Mr. LESAGE: It is not true, if they have children.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am taking the minister's own word; if you want to contradict him, you can go to it.

Mr. LESAGE: I do not have to contradict him; but what you said is not true.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. JOHNSTON: I want to speak further about these people. For instance, for a moment let us consider the old age pensioner. I believe the average pension runs between $23 and $30, across Canada. And when I give those figures as the monthly payments, I am putting them terrifically high. Would anyone contend for a moment that Canada, such a rich country, cannot produce sufficient to give our elderly citizens a better standard of living than that? I think that is one of the most disgraceful things that ever occurred, to expect our elderly people—

Mr. MARTIN: Has the hon. gentleman ever thought of having the government of Alberta increase the amount?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am glad the minister mentioned that, because Alberta was the first province to do that very thing. And I say to the minister that even Alberta would have gone farther at that time, and would go farther now, too, if the federal government would not turn around and take it away from the old age pensioners.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to answer the question?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do not think I got the significance of the question. Would the minister mind repeating it?

Mr. MARTIN: I suggest to my hon. friend that perhaps he might ask the government of Alberta to do the very thing he is asking this parliament to do.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I answered the minister, because I said that Alberta was the first province in Canada to do that very thing. They increased it to a point where, at the present time, the pension in Alberta is $30 a month.

Mr. LOW: And without asking the federal government to share in it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: And the point was this, that if the provincial government had given more than that there would have been difficulty, because there is a federal regulation whereby, if more than $425 is received by the pensioner, the federal government's contribution would be cut down. So that it was unwise for the provincial government to give the pensioners more, with one hand, only to have the federal government take it away from them with the other.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member knows that is not so.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You explain it, then.

Mr. MARTIN: He knows, furthermore, that the government of Canada pays seventy-five per cent of the contribution.

Mr. LOW: But not of the additional $5.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I was not arguing that; I did not say that the federal government did not pay seventy-five per cent of the amount; but they do not pay one five-cent piece of the $5.

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend is trying to give the impression that this parliament alone is responsible in connection with that matter. If he gives the full story he will realize that the government which is paying seventy-five per cent surely has the right to suggest that the other jurisdiction, which is paying only twenty-five per cent, might well increase its share, if an increase should be made.

Mr. LOW: We did, to the extent of $5 a month.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I did not say that the federal government was not paying seventy-five per cent. I readily accept that; it does. But just because the federal government contributes seventy-five per cent, why should it have in force regulations which prohibit provincial governments from raising old age pensions as high as they like?

Mr. MARTIN: I will point that out when the legislation is brought down, and my hon. friend will have his answer.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am pleased to hear that. I think the minister will agree with me that it is long overdue. These elderly citizens have received too little for many years, and have had to live in a state of poverty.

Mr. KNOWLES: And they will still be poor.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am hopeful that when the federal government does bring down its old age pensions legislation the amount provided will be considerably in excess of $30 a month. And I sincerely trust that the means test will be eliminated. because it is a federal baby, and not one from the provinces. If that is done, then I think the minister's criticism would be justified.

Mr. MARTIN: One further question. In view of the question I put a while ago, is the hon. member aware that his neighbouring province of British Columbia pays more than the province of Alberta?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, but just at the last session of the legislature of Alberta provision was made for granting medical services, which will greatly outrun what is done by British Columbia.

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Alberta is always ahead in that regard. I am pleased to see the other provinces coming along, and I think Alberta has done much in prodding this government to bring down old age pension legislation which, we hope, will be worth while.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is the parliament of Canada. Let us deal with the things with which we are supposed to deal here.

Mr. JOHNSTON: And when we are dealing with old age pensions, let me say the amount should be much greater than $30 a month. It should not be less than $50 a month, without a means test. Some may laugh at that, and may say it is crazy to suggest that we should give an old age pension of $50. But is it crazy? Is it crazy to expect our old people to live on less than $50 a month, in view of the fact that prices have so greatly increased? Why, certainly it is not. We cannot expect these elderly citizens, who are not receiving enough to keep body and soul together, to continue living in that way.

In passing, I should like to refer to pensions for the blind, and to suggest that again in this instance the amount allowed is inadequate.

Time is passing rapidly, much more rapidly than I had thought, so I shall turn now to another subject. I want to refer particularly to the speech of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage). I should like to refer for a moment to that portion of our agriculturists who do not come within the budget, who are receiving no consideration by way of relief in taxation. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) asked for the number of farmers who pay income tax, and the return tabled showed that only 3·6 per cent paid income tax in 1945-46. This means that 96·4 per cent of the farmers of Canada are earning less than $750, if single, and $1,500, if married. In Quebec only one-tenth of one per cent of the farmers are receiving sufficient income to pay an income tax. These are the people to whom the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette) was referring when he asked the government to provide them with a decent standard of living. The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet is reported on page 3006 of Hansard as follows:

Mr. Speaker, since I still have a few minutes at my disposal, I should like to quote a few excepts from a book written by M. Henry de Jouvenel and entitled "Huit Cents Ans de Revolution Francaise":

The financial genius that was Law or Lass conceived every form of modern credit. He showered them on a distressed country with the cheerful faith of an inventor who ascribes universal powers to his discovery.

That applies to our social credit system, does it not?

He asked a question and I want to answer it. I think that statement shows the colossal ignorance of some individuals. Whether it is intentional or not, I cannot say. If it is done in pure ignorance, I sympathize with him; if it is done intelligently, then there is no sympathy warranted. Any hon. member who has been in this house for one, two, ten or twelve years should know that social credit is a system of distribution of surpluses. When the hon. member refers to a distressed country he could not possibly be referring to social credit. Canada is certainly not a distressed country; Canada is one of the most productive countries in the world. The other day the minister pointed out that our production had reached the high point of $11·1 billion, and it was possible that our production would exceed $12 billion this coming year.

Why should there be any family in the province of Quebec living a substandard existence? If we did not have the stuff in Canada it would be a different proposition, but according to the minister's own words Canada is one of the richest countries in the world. No family or no individual should have to live on an income of less than $1,500 or $750 respectively. The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet should take a lesson from the hon. member for Pontiac and do a little studying and find out what is the matter with this system.

An hon. MEMBER: We are doing it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You did not show it in that speech. I want to speak for a moment about the national debt. In this connection the minister said, and I quote from page 2551 of Hansard:

> The estimated gross liabilities of the dominion at the end of the fiscal year amounted to approximately $17,660 million, against which active assets of approximately $4,590 million were held, leaving an estimated net debt of $13,069 million as of March 31. This, of course, is $352 million less than a year ago, as a result of the surplus on the year's operations.

Although the minister did it later on, it would have been nice if he had stated right there that that surplus was due almost entirely to the sale of war assets, which amounted to $372 million. Do not forget that those war assets were built up by the people of Canada through the toil and labour and materials which they supplied and that they were then sold for a few cents on the dollar to realize $372 million.

In connection with our debt I should like to point out that our funded debt, as at the end of the last fiscal year was $16,524,161,000 and that on that debt we pay $437,000,000 in interest every year. At least three-quarters of that debt was built up during the war. The debt was caused largely by the government financing the war effort by borrowings from the chartered banks and individuals. According to the Canada Year Book—I am speaking from memory, but I think the reference is page 946 or 964—before the war twenty-five per cent of our taxes went to pay interest on our national debt, but since the war, because of the increase in the revenues of the country, about twenty per cent of the taxes now collected are used to pay interest on the national debt.

I suggest to the government that had they financed the war effort through nationally created credit, by the use of the Bank of Canada—the hon. member when speaking the other night did not seem to know anything about the Bank of Canada and I suggest that he do a little studying about it—they would not have created billions and billions of dollars of debt and we could have saved practically all of that $437 million. We could have used that to raise the tax exemptions to the amounts I have suggested without impairing the national credit whatever. We could have done away with the excise duties, which amounted to $75 million, and the sales tax, which amounted to $162 million. I suggest that that is one way in which we could have used the Bank of Canada and thus been able to raise our tax exemptions this year to a decent level. At the same time we could have lowered the cost of living without jeopardizing our financial status, so that the people of Canada would have received some benefit during the years to come.

The hon. member who preceded me said that we should not always be looking forward to a depression because, if we do that, a depression is likely to come. That may be so, but I am not so gullible as to think that mere wishful hoping will keep us out of a depression if it is coming. As was suggested by the hon. member, I want to look at the thing logically. When speaking the other day the minister referred to a possible depression, or I think he said recession. But there is not much difference between a recession and a depression. It all depends which end of the line you are on. One has already been predicted in the United States because of the lack of consumer purchasing power which exists there as well as in Canada. The U.S. Journal of Commerce reports:

The recession is here . . . a decline in production is taking place this month.

That was on April 24, 1947. Moody's Stock Survey of April 26, 1947, refers to "a business contraction of disturbing proportions".

Business Week of April 26, 1947, states that:

. . . though incomes have been rising right along for most people they long since were left behind by prices.

The U.S. Journal of Commerce also reports that wage rates are about twenty-one per cent "out of line" with prices.

These are warnings that we cannot well disregard. People may say that preaching a depression is apt to bring one on. Nevertheless the facts are there, and no less a person than the Minister of Finance himself has cautioned us against one. Therefore it is high time that we began to revise our financial system, and the people of Canada would do well to review the economic history of the Liberal party and of the Progressive Conservative party. If they do so they will find that the facts of history are these, that no matter which party was in power it has always led us into a depression. If we are to travel the same road again it does not take any great intelligence to foresee that we are going to come out at the same place. We have had all these warnings and the people of Canada would do well to take the advice I am giving. I also suggest that if the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet wants to come back to this house he had better mend his ways and learn a little about social credit.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): You think you are the best judge of that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Well, he seems greatly worried about it and I am simply giving him a little fatherly advice. I shall not have time, Mr. Speaker, to enter upon another subject in which I am particularly interested.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: By unanimous consent the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Then, with the permission of the house I shall make a brief reference to the agreement of sale which is being presented to returned men and civilians who are taking advantage of the government's wartime housing programme. I have the agreement of sale in my hand. I made some reference to it the other day, but I did not have a copy then and have received this since from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

First, let me say that proper consideration should be given to these men who offered their lives in the defence of this country, some of whom have come back crippled. Due consideration should also be given to those civilians who are building homes under this programme. The returned men offered their lives for us unconditionally and for not very much pay. I am not comparing their pay with the pay that was given by other countries, but generally speaking I say that they did not receive very much pay for what they were called upon to do.

Under this agreement of sale which I have received from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the returned man or the civilian is forced to pay 4½ per cent interest compounded half-yearly. In my view that is too high a rate for these men to pay. It should be not more than—I emphasize that, not more than—three per cent simple interest. When we sold victory bonds to the people of Canada we did not give them 4½ per cent interest compounded half-yearly. That rate should be changed to three per cent simple interest.

But that is not the major fault I find with this contract. The veteran who is building a home under this contract must sign this agreement. It is the only one presented to him. The government may say that it is just the standard agreement of sale. I agree that it may be the standard agreement of sale, but surely we should have some consideration for these men who offered their lives for us in the last war and have come home and are endeavouring to start up anew by buying a home for themselves. I shall read two clauses, so that hon. members may judge them for themselves. This one is taken from page 5 of the contract:

And also that he will give up possession—

That is referring to the purchaser.

—of the said lands on breach made in all or any of the covenants herein set forth without any notice to quit and without the vendor bringing any action for ejectment. And that, on such breach, these presents (at the option of the said vendor) shall be void without any recourse whatsoever by the purchaser either at law or in equity against the said party of the first part for or in respect of any matter or thing in those presents contained for the recovery of any moneys paid by the purchaser under or in pursuance of this agreement which payments, in the event of any breach by the purchaser of any of the covenants aforesaid hereby declared, shall be retained by the vendor as and for liquidated damages and not as a penalty.

Under this clause of the agreement, if a veteran should slip up on any one of his payments—he may have paid them all except the last one—if for any reason, perhaps by losing his job, he could not make that last payment he would have no equity in the house and no recourse to law. He has to give up every cent of equity he has in the house. That is a very severe contract for these men who fought for us in the last war. The next clause reads:

> And upon any such breach the purchaser shall forthwith become a mere trespasser upon every part of said lands and may be forcibly ejected therefrom by the vendor or by his employees or agents without any of them being in any way responsible for damages or otherwise therefor. And the vendor shall be at liberty to retain possession of said lands and at his pleasure to re-sell same without notice, upon such terms as he may deem proper and in any event absolutely freed and discharged from all and every claim whatsoever thereto on the part of the purchaser. Time being declared to be the very essence of these presents.

In other words, the vendor, in this case the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a subsidiary of the government, when the veteran has paid everything except perhaps his last payment which, for some reason or another he may not be able to make, can kick him out and re-sell his property to anybody, without calling for tenders or asking for bids, just sell it for anything they like and say to the veteran, "You have not got one cent of equity in this property; get off; you are a trespasser." If the veteran says, "I will take it to court," they can answer, "You signed an agreement that under these circumstances you have no equity in the property at all and you have no recourse to the law." In my view, Mr. Speaker, this agreement of sale is an absolute disgrace to Canada, and the federal government should see to it that there is no delay in changing the terms of this agreement of sale as it applies to veterans coming in under wartime housing.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

QUEBEC NORTH SHORE AND LABRADOR RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. EDOUARD RINFRET (Outremont) moved the third reading of Bill No. 106, to incorporate Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

GUARANTY TRUST COMPANY OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 172, respecting Guaranty Trust Company of Canada—Mr. Brown—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

[Mr. Johnston.]

On section 2—capital stock.

Mr. JAENICKE: I should like to say a few words about this section. When this bill was in committee we questioned a director of the company who was there to give evidence, and while it appears perhaps that for the convenience of the company it is advisable to change the head office, I am not so sure that it is advisable in the public interest. This company had its birth in the city of Windsor, Ontario, and it has established branch offices in other cities of Ontario. It established such an office in Toronto in 1934 and, according to the evidence given to us, the business in the Toronto office is now larger in volume than that in any other city. I think we should give this bill some thought before we approve this section, because of the danger of centralization. Some of my hon. friends talk about the danger of centralization of political power.

Mr. TIMMINS: What is the difference between Toronto and Windsor?

Mr. JAENICKE: I will tell you in a minute. I think there is much greater danger of centralization of industrial, economic and especially financial power in the cities of Toronto and Montreal. This was pointed out a few days ago by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and I do not need to repeat what he said. We find that our banks have their head offices in either Montreal or Toronto, and when we look at our trust companies incorporated under dominion law we find that most of them are now situated in Toronto or Montreal. Hon. members should think twice before assenting to more centralization of financial power in these two cities.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WORKMEN'S CIRCLE OF CANADA

Mr. DAVID CROLL (Spadina) moved the second reading of Bill No. 180, to incorporate Workmen's Circle of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. CHURCH: This seems to me to be an extraordinary bill for any hon. member to introduce into this parliament, inasmuch as it deals largely with property and civil rights within the province. In our province we have a workmen's compensation act and we have had labour legislation on the statute books since shortly after confederation. This bill grants very wide powers as set out on several of its pages; powers to maintain a general fund, make provision for deficiency in the general fund, dispose of surplus of benefit fund, acquire real estate, and so on. It covers matters that are largely provincial. In view of the fact that we have already such excellent labour legislation and labour unions, I am surprised that it should be considered necessary to establish an organization such as this at the present time, because, as I say, it undoubtedly deals with a large number of local matters that are covered by various statutes under the federal Department of Labour and under the province as well. Section 15 of this bill provides that the society may acquire the whole or any part of the rights, assets and property of any kind whatsoever of the Workmen's Circle incorporated under the laws of the state of New York.

What have we to do with an organization in New York? Have we not trouble enough of our own without bothering about what goes on in the United States? Why do we want to bother with any workmen's circle there? It seems to me that we are going around in a circle here. I have a great deal of respect and admiration for the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill and I know he has always been a friend of the working man, but I must say to him that I cannot see any necessity for a bill of this kind. I certainly do not see why there should be such an organization.

I have never mentioned race or religion in this country—I am not that kind of man—but I am afraid that if we are to have various organizations of this kind; if we are to have different circles set up, we shall have a tremendous amount of work in parliament from various other circles coming up for charters, some of which are more ornamental than useful. I do not know much about this circle, but in the other place it passed to the sound of a trumpet. There are secret circles in the other end of the building, and they are here today and gone tomorrow. I do not see why we should pass this bill. There was one bill for which second reading was asked there some time ago and it had not even been printed. I should like to get some explanation from the mover because he is a man who generally gives an illuminating address. He might be able to convert me and others too, but I say in all sincerity that we are going very far afield when we propose to incorporate societies that will be linked up with organizations in New York or elsewhere across the border. What we want today is a national policy not only for capital but for labour. I do say that about all United States organizations, even though they have been started for many years past and been in Canada. I say that the time has come when some reason will have to be given for coming to Canada to do fraternal business in the interests of peace and prosperity and the working classes in this country.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No. I want to ask the sponsor of the bill to give us an explanation of it. I have no opinion one way or another, but it does seem to suggest some extraordinary powers. It may be quite all right. I think we should have a full explanation of the intention of the bill.

Mr. CROLL: This is the ordinary incorporation of a fraternal society for the purpose of insurance benefits. The Workmen's Circle is a United States organization having branches in Canada. They have decided to embark on their own in Canada and have therefore requested this parliament to incorporate them. The reference made by the hon. member for Broadview to the Americans was merely for the purpose of taking over what assets they had in this country and accepting their liabilities. The bill has been gone over by the insurance department and they find it satisfactory. I thought the bill would be referred to the appropriate committee; but as the house is dealing with it, I may say that it is the ordinary bill of this sort. The Workmen's Circle have been in Canada for nearly twenty-five years. They are merely asking for the ordinary incorporation that a friendly and fraternal organization requires.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does section 5 carry out what you say?

The CHAIRMAN: Does section 1 carry?

Mr. HACKETT: I was going to ask if there is any reason for dealing with this bill in this way. This is the type of bill that generally goes to a committee such as the banking and commerce committee where it is dealt with in a businesslike way. The officials of the different departments affected can go there and give their views and enable the members of the committee to express an enlightened opinion. I do not know to what extent the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring this bill feels that he can vouch for those who are incorporating this society or feels competent to express an opinion concerning the various phases of the activities in which this body would like to engage. Is there any objection to referring this bill at this time to the committee on banking and commerce, which is the procedure that seems logical and proper to me?

Mr. CROLL: As a matter of fact, I was taken quite by surprise. I thought this bill would go to a committee and I think it ought to go to a committee. I am quite prepared to vouch for the people who are incorporating this body; I know of them and they are excellent citizens. However I am not fully acquainted with the bill and in committee we shall be able to explain it.

Mr. HACKETT: I think the hon. gentleman has been quite fair; the procedure suggested will enable the gentlemen who are interested in the bill to go before the committee and tell their story. The matter could then be dealt with in the usual businesslike way.

Mr. CROLL: I will move that the bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee.

Progress reported.

Mr. CROLL moved:

That Bill No. 180, to incorporate Workmen's Circle of Canada, be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to.

TORONTO TYPE FOUNDRY COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. DAVID CROLL (Spadina—for Mr. Sinclair, Ontario) moved the second reading of Bill No. 178, respecting certain patents owned by Toronto Type Foundry Company Limited.

He said: At the request of the hon. member for Ontario, I think it is fair that I should make a few explanatory remarks about this bill. The Toronto Type Foundry Company Limited are the owners of certain patent rights relating to printing machinery, such as feeders, folders and stitchers. Some eight patents are involved. Two of the patents have expired and six have two or three years to run. The purpose of the bill is to revive the two patents which have expired and to extend for an additional period of six years, the life of those patents which have not yet expired. The reason they ask for this is that during the war the owners were unable to use the patents because of lack of material and lack of manpower. As I have already stated, the period that they ask for is approximately the six-year period. Under British law application may be made to the courts for the purpose of extending the life of a patent. With respect to these patents that are applicable to Britain, that application has been made and has been granted. There is no such recourse to the courts in this country and so it is necessary to come to parliament. The company points out that it needs this legislation in order to operate successfully. In 1927, 1928 and 1930 similar legislation was passed by this house, though I have not with me and cannot seem to put my hands on the circumstances under which it was passed, but I have the references.

Mr. JACKMAN: Not in connection with the same company?

Mr. CROLL: No, not the same company. My suggestion is that because this bill is somewhat unusual it be sent to a committee where evidence may be heard and perhaps differences reconciled. I think the house should know that this corporation the Toronto Type Foundry Company, is neither a cartel nor a trust, but a family corporation of many years' standing in the city of Toronto. The public interest will not be injured if the bill is passed. There is similar machinery available in the country. Under the circumstances, and because it is an involved matter, I believe these people are entitled to their day in court. So I ask the house to give consideration to sending this bill to committee, where these people may have an opportunity to present all the pertinent facts before we deal with it here. There is a committee that has already dealt with the matter of patents, and it might very well be referred to that committee for such consideration and opinion as it may wish to give.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: A moment ago the hon. member mentioned that in the United Kingdom there was provision for making application to the courts in order to maintain these patents which were lost under the circumstances referred to by him. Would he tell the house the nature of the proceedings taken over there and where they can be ascertained or whether he has a record of them?

Mr. CROLL: Yes I have; I shall refer to my memorandum. In answer to the hon. member's question the British patent act contains a provision which permits the courts to extend the life of patents. This was done in the case of two British patents No. 281599 and No. 290509 which correspond to Canadian patents No. 283101 and No. 323334 which are among those covered by the bill. Extensions in Britain were granted on the ground that the patentees had suffered loss or damage due to war, which is the same basis on which this bill is being presented. There is provision in Britain for applying to what they refer to as the high court which has jurisdiction to deal with this matter.

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): I am rising to oppose second reading of this bill, and I do not think it should be referred to a committee. We are asked to extend the life of eight patents, two of which have already expired, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend. These are patents owned by the applicant, the Toronto Type Foundry Company Limited, who hold these patents as assignees of the original inventors. I searched these patents, and it might be well to put on record who were the original inventors and also when the patents would ordinarily expire, as well as the date of expiry of the two patents mentioned. No. 266582 expired on December 7, 1944; the inventor was one R. Hitchcock of Cleveland, Ohio. No. 283101 expired in September, 1946, and the inventor was again this Mr. Hitchcock. No. 323334 will expire in June, 1950, and R. Hitchcock again was the original inventor. No. 343638 will expire in July, 1961, and again R. Hitchcock was the original inventor. No. 376688 will expire in September, 1956; the inventor was William H. Draper of England. No. 328639 will expire in December, 1950; the inventor was James Cook, also of England. No. 332292 will expire in May, 1951; the inventor was Harold Mason, also of England. The last one, No. 292206, will expire in August, 1947; the inventor was Fred L. Manny, of Burton Harbor, Michigan.

I strongly and vigorously oppose the passing of this bill, for several reasons. In the first place, I contend that it would set up a dangerous precedent. Our Canadian law makes no provision for the extension of the life of a patent. There is a reason for that; and that is why the owners are seeking to extend their patent rights by this special act of parliament. I have tried to look up some previous applications of this kind. I find there have been several, and I refer in particular to one made to this house in 1925, which concerned the extension of a patent right with respect to radio tubes. The bill then before the house was the same as the present bill, and after a short debate the house refused the motion for second reading. Mr. J. L. Brown, at that time the member for Lisgar, in opposing the bill on that occasion had this to say, as reported at page 1232 of Hansard for 1925:

> In the judgment of many that time is too long;—

He meant the period of seventeen years.

> —certainly it is long enough. If the term is to be changed at all, I think we would favour reducing rather than lengthening it. Many reasons might be advanced why this patent should not be continued. The hon. member who has introduced the bill has indicated certain reasons why in his judgment it should be continued. I suppose the same reasons could be advanced by almost every patentee for similar indulgence.

I wish to endorse the sentiments expressed by Mr. Brown, especially his view as to the length of life of the patent and also as to the creation of a precedent. An interesting application of this kind was before this house in 1900, where a special act of parliament was sought to make provision empowering the commissioner to extend the life of certain patents. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then Prime Minister, took part in that debate, and this is what he said as reported in Hansard for 1900, columns 2671 and 2672:

> Now it seems to me that in public interest such requests should not be granted. The granting of a patent is an abridgment of the right of the community generally . . . I think as a general rule all such applications ought to be refused unless a very strong case is made out . . . For my part I do not think it would be wise to facilitate such extensions in any manner.

According to the explanatory note in the bill itself, and as stated by the hon. member who introduced the bill, the reason for this legislation is stated to be that conditions created by the war and business depression have prevented the petitioner from enjoying the patent rights to a fair extent. I would think that almost any patentee holding a patent right will have suffered to some extent by the same conditions stated by the petitioner, and if we grant this bill, what is to prevent this parliament's being swamped, perhaps not at this session, but at the next session of parliament, with similar bills? If we grant this we would have no moral right or justification to refuse other similar applications.

It may be argued, and it was argued, that in Great Britain and the United States there are powers which extend the life of a patent, and I shall discuss that later. I also understand that some of these particular patents have been extended in Great Britain, as the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) just told us they have. But Britain would not be faced with the same danger of precedent as we are in Canada, because the British law is a bit different from ours.

In Britain, for instance, most patents do not last for the life which was granted under the patent originally. In Great Britain, after the third or fourth year, the patentee has to pay an annual fee to keep his patent alive. If that fee is not paid, then the patent expires. The result is that in the sixteenth year only six per cent of the patents in Great Britain are in force; that is, of the patents granted sixteen years previously; while in Canada, under our law 100 per cent of the patents are still in force seventeen years after they were first granted. Therefore any precedent that might be set in Britain is not half as dangerous, because only a small number of the patents are in force. And an application in Britain must be made at a certain time. I shall also mention later some of the conditions which attach to an application for extension of time in Britain.

I say we cannot possibly afford to pass this bill for the reason I have stated, of creating a dangerous precedent alone. I say, further, that there is no legal right whatsoever to grant any such extension. Our act is silent as to the extension of patents. We have already dealt with war conditions, and with the delay which has been caused by war. Bill No. 16, which was finally passed by the house last Friday, makes provision for that. I would argue that for us to pass this bill would be in direct contradiction of section 28 (a) of the bill which was passed by this house last Friday, and which, by the way, was fully debated, fully discussed, and gone into in committee.

As I say, we have made provision for some extensions necessitated by war conditions. It may be argued that in Britain, and also in the United States, there is power to extend the life of a patent. This is true, and I have already pointed out the situation in that respect in Great Britain, where there is less danger of precedent because of the expiry of eighty-four per cent of the patents before their term is at an end. According to the British law, the courts have power to extend the time under certain strict and prescribed conditions. In Terrell on Patents (7th edition), on pages 266 and 267 under the heading "Extension of Term of a Patent", the learned author says this:

> The merit (to be shown by petitioner) required is that of great practical utility rather than that of exceptional ingenuity and it is to be judged by the benefit which the invention has conferred or is likely to confer upon the public.

In Trantom's Patent, 34 R.P.C. 28, at page 37, Sargant, J. said:

> There is no doubt whatever that before the court can exercise its jurisdiction in favour of a petitioner, it must be satisfied that there has been some merit considerably greater than is sufficient to support the grant of the patent itself and having regard to the nature and merits of the invention in relation to the public, I think the court has to find, as a condition precedent to exercising its jurisdiction in favour of the patentee, that there has been some considerable benefit given to the public by the inventor in respect of that invention.

It will be noticed that it is a condition precedent to exercising its jurisdiction that the court must find that there has been some considerable benefit given to the public by the inventor. That is a most important point, and nothing has been shown here, for instance, of anything of that kind.

In the United States there seems to be power vested in the commissioner of patents to extend the time under certain conditions again, but it appears from Walker on Patents, second edition, that the extension of time is restricted in favour of the original inventor. The author states on page 1177:

> It was against the policy of the law, if not against its letter, to extend any patent in the extension of which, if granted, the inventor would have no property right. The right to an extension was given by the law chiefly with a view to the advantage of the inventor, and not of his assignee or grantee.

It will be seen that under United States law this company would certainly not be successful in getting an extension of time, because the original inventors are not applying for this extension, but only the assignee. In the case before us all the original inventors of all these patents are apparently private persons, and the company which applies for this act of parliament is simply the assignee. There seems to be good sense and logic in this. When the original inventor assigned his patent to the company he undoubtedly received consideration, and this consideration was based in part upon the fact that the patent would last for a certain time. Now, if the assignee is to receive further time, I would argue that for this further time no consideration is given to the original inventor, because he is not a party to this extension, and he seems to be absolutely ignored. Consequently there is no legal right whatsoever.

And now what about any moral or equitable right in this connection? I claim there is no such right, either moral or equitable, in any patent. I believe that a patent is a contract between the inventor and the public, and if it is such, there can be no alteration of any contract under the contract law, unless it could be shown that the parties to the contract were not of one mind, or similar circumstances which are not applicable here. I find my contention to be supported by Frost on Patents, where the learned author says on page 159:

> A patent is to be considered as a bargain with the public, and ought to be construed on the same principles of good faith as that which regulates all other contracts.

And then on pages 300 and 301, the learned author says; and I find this interesting:

It cannot, however, be contended that an inventor has any natural, or even a moral right in his invention, for he does not create in the same sense as an author does. The distinction between the production of a great literary composition and the discovery of a great invention is made apparent by a contrast of a play of Shakespeare (Hamlet, for instance) with a world revolutionizing invention such as the steam engine of Watt. Had Shakespeare never written Hamlet, it is practically certain that the play would never have existed, and the literature of the world would undoubtedly have been the loser; but had Watt never lived, it can scarcely be doubted that the vast superiority of the plan of condensing the steam in a steam engine in a separate vessel instead of in the cylinder would have been perceived and communicated to the world by some other inventor. It is evident that an inventor merely produces a new art. The law does not recognize any natural or moral right in the inventor to the exclusive use of the invention, and will not, except on certain conditions, attempt to guarantee him a monopoly in the profitable exercise of it.

I have already pointed out the absence in the picture of the original inventors, and I would even go farther and say that it is neither moral nor ethical to grant an extension to this company without protecting the rights of the original inventors.

Moreover, the company is out of court altogether, because I think it has abused its patent rights, as I shall explain in a few moments. There being no legal right as I have pointed out the applicants come to this house as if it were a court of equity. It is an old recognized principle in equity that one who comes to equity must come with clean hands. I may say that this company offends against this principle because on the information which I have received none of the articles patented are now, nor have they ever been manufactured in Canada. Section 65 of the Patent Act provides in sub-paragraph 2 as follows:

The exclusive rights under a patent shall be deemed to have been abused in any of the following circumstances:

(a) if the patented invention, being one capable of being worked in Canada, is not being worked within Canada on a commercial scale, and no satisfactory reason can be given for such non-working.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I may say to the hon. member that so far I am with him, but I am wondering if he has the dates of assignment in order to bring it in line with his argument?

Mr. JAENICKE: I am sorry; I have not the dates.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You do not know whether these people have had an opportunity of working the patents?

Mr. JAENICKE: My information is that they have had these patents since the original applications were made; in every case they were assigned at the time the patent was issued.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They have had them for a long time?

Mr. JAENICKE: Yes. I have reason to believe that my information is correct when I make the assertion that neither one of these patents is being worked in Canada but the articles or devices which the patents protect have always been imported from foreign countries. This is an abuse of patent rights under our law and it is an abuse which affects materially our whole Canadian economy. At some time or another we should really look into this matter fully. In 1946, according to the commissioner's report, patents granted in Canada amounted to 7,412, of which only 495 were granted to Canadian residents, and of the 6,917 which were granted to foreigners, 5,845 were granted to residents of the United States. I may say that the picture in the United States is the very opposite, where the patents granted to United States residents amounted to 22,983, and only 1,655 were granted to foreigners.

When we were talking about the benefits of the public in connection with patents and patent rights, what public do we mean? Surely we refer to the Canadian public and to no other public. The public is very much concerned. May I point out that two of the patents have already expired, and consequently any rights under these are vested in the public, the Canadian public, which so far does not appear to have benefited because the devices and articles are not made in Canada.

I think it would be the most vicious precedent for us to create if we were to pass this bill.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the word "now" be deleted and that the words, "this day six months hence" be added at the end of the question.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to object to the present bill and to support the views of the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke). Bill No. 16, to amend the Patent Act, 1935, was adopted by this house a short time ago. It was discussed at length in the standing committee on banking and commerce and general provisions were adopted in so far as the duration of patents was concerned. This bill should be the law of the land for the Toronto Type Foundry Company Limited as well as for any other company or individual.

I do not see any reason why such a privilege sought by this piece of legislation should be granted. If it were granted any other company could seek the same advantage in derogation of the general principle. Why should we adopt conflicting legislation? It is only by way of exception that privileges of this kind are granted to an inventor for a determined period of time. At the expiration of that period the patent rights should be handed over to the public in order that fair and just competition may be allowed. There is no public interest in prolonging the life of the patents mentioned in this bill; only private interests are concerned. If we accept the principle of this bill our statute books will be full of private bills conflicting with or derogating the general law applicable to such a matter.

These patents originated in the United States, and in prolonging their duration we would be depriving Canadian citizens of the rights which they would acquire in the near future in connection with manufacturing or producing for the benefit of this country the articles covered by these patents. Why should we give to citizens of the United States privileges which are not given to our own fellow citizens?

Finally, this measure creates a monopoly to the prejudice of individual enterprise. When the Toronto Type Foundry Company Limited applied for the patents it knew they would be issued for seventeen years. It should have planned its production based upon that knowledge. It should be aware of the fact that Bill No. 16 provides special privileges for inventors who could not develop their patents during the war. I cannot accept the principle of granting a privilege of this kind to a large concern, which privilege could hardly be obtained by the ordinary man.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) stated a while ago that the present bill did not promote the establishment of a monopoly. I wish to indicate that the company requesting an extraordinary privilege, contrary to the general provisions of the Patent Act, does so in connection with six different patents. If it does not constitute a monopoly at the present time, it nevertheless has a tendency to do so and, on that ground, I am firmly opposed to the bill.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Hear, hear!

(Text):

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the previous speakers have given a clear indication of the objections that exist to the passage of this bill. The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) quoted from a speech by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in which he pointed out that in his opinion it was not in the public interest that patents should be extended. It has been suggested that in Great Britain provision is made for extension of patents by application to the courts, but conditions in Great Britain are entirely different in that fees are paid annually. A fee of £5 is paid in the fifth year of the life of the patent, a fee of £6 in the sixth, and the fee increases progressively at the rate of £1 a year up to sixteen years when the fee is £16. The patent holder has a substantial interest in the patent, and if he has not failed to keep his patent alive he has a substantial investment therein. That condition does not exist here, where the patent fee is extremely low to enable all persons who have a patentable article to secure a patent and to secure a monopoly of it for seventeen years. But it has not been the policy in this country to extend patents, nor is it the policy in the United States, although I understand that they have a law there which permits an extension of the patent where it was taken out by a veteran who was on active service and who was not able to develop it while on active service overseas. I should like to say, before this amendment is voted upon, that this is a free vote of the house. I think the objections that have been brought forward clearly indicate the objections that exist to extending patents in this way.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there are two sides to this question. I hold no brief for the people who presented this bill, but I think the matter should be more carefully looked into and a decision should not be jumped at in too great haste. It seems to me that it would be advisable to submit this matter to the committee which considered the amendments to the Patent Act.

What are the facts in connection with this application? Here they are. This bill seeks an extension of the life of eight patents. Two of them have already expired and the others will expire at various dates between now and 1950. The basis of the application for this extension is this, that by reason of wartime regulations which prohibited the securing of materials and man-power to develop these patents their owners have suffered a loss. They got the patents and were prepared to go ahead and develop them; they made a big investment. Then the war intervened, and the government made regulations that prevented the people who were to develop and make these machines from getting the necessary materials and the labour. Consequently they were held up, although I presume they had gone to a great deal of expense.

An hon. gentleman to my left said that this should be treated as a contract. I have not the cases here, but it seems to me that you will find plenty of authorities to the effect that, when it is impossible to carry out a contract owing to the intervention of war, that puts an entirely different aspect on the agreement. In this case these people had invested their money in these patents, prepared the machines and were all ready to do the work. Then the government passed certain regulations which prohibited them from getting the materials and prevented them from employing labour, because the government said it wanted to put materials to other use and men to work somewhere else. Consequently the patent holders stand to face a big loss. Is it fair or right that, because the war intervened, they should be deprived of their right of going ahead? Is it right that the privileges secured under the act should be taken away from them?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): What about the 180,000 other patents?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know anything about the other 180,000 patents. I do not know if there are 180,000 or not. But I think this particular measure should be considered on its own merits and should be considered upon principle rather than upon the assumption that consent to it might lead to flooding the patent office with other applications. Is that not the right way to deal with this matter, to consider it on its own merits rather than say: Oh, well, if we pass this bill there will be a lot of other bills come into this house.

That, I know, is only one side of the question. You can look at it in another way. You may say it is the wrong principle that we should do it in this way. Then it seems to me that if it cannot be done in this way, there should be an amendment to our Patent Act somewhat similar to the amendment to the English patents and designs act to enable a man who has secured a patent to go to the courts. He should be able to go there and not come to this house, when he finds himself in such a situation. Under circumstances like this, where a man has been prevented from developing a patent by reason of war intervening he can in England tell his story to the court and, if the court is satisfied, it can grant him an extension of the time in which he can control that patent. It seems to me that there should be an amendment to our Patent Act to cover a situation of this kind, and that is the reason I submit that it might be to the advantage of this house and of the country to have this matter sent to a committee of the house for consideration and not just brush it aside in this peremptory way without proper consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to its former business.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is not in his seat at the moment, because all those who have preceded me in this debate, including some notable and redoubtable members, have offered their congratulations to the minister upon the excellence of his budget presentation. I should like to add mine too, humble as they may be. I think he earned congratulations upon his presentation. However, after reading the budget I find that, while I can congratulate the minister upon his presentation, I cannot congratulate him upon the subject matter of the budget. Like the other speakers from this group, I am keenly disappointed over the things I see in the budget and disappointed over some of its important omissions, and those omissions will be the main part of my discussion tonight.

The budget itself is a rich man's budget, in a year when rich people are getting richer and poor people getting poorer. It is a direct negation of the government's promise to bring in a new order of society in the interests of the great mass of the producing and working citizens of Canada. A little over a year ago the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), then minister of finance, informed the house that the wartime prices and trade board had permitted Canadian manufacturers of farm machinery to increase their prices by 12½ per cent. He gave it as his positive opinion and that of the officials of the department, or of the wartime prices and trade board, that if these companies were not allowed this increase their profits might fall so low as to prevent them from continuing that business. But now a year later we find that the Massey-Harris Company had in 1946 the highest net profits they ever had since 1929, and that is after paying taxes. Besides that, they increased their working capital from $23,869,000 in 1941 to $31,470,000 in 1946.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are the figures the hon. member is giving the figures of their world business or their Canadian business?

Mr. BENTLEY: This is the Massey-Harris statement, probably including all the business they do.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the whole world?

Mr. BENTLEY: As far as I know. It still does not alter the fact that they did not need an increase in Canada, because they still had plenty of world business. It would appear that the judgment of the minister and his officials was inaccurate, and I can only conclude that their anxiety to protect the rights of big business to earn great profits at the expense of the working people of the country was the cause of the inaccuracy of his forecast.

Mr. ABBOTT: Pretty demagogic stuff.

Mr. BENTLEY: Well, the Massey-Harris people published their own statement, and whether they sell their stuff in Timbuctoo or in Canada the profits are there. They would not have gone out of business, and I made that statement as flatly as that at the time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe the figures are the consolidated balance sheet of their world business, and the profits were made mainly not on the export sales but on what they produced abroad.

Mr. BENTLEY: It still gives them a profit and does not alter the essential facts. These interruptions are all right, but I have only so many minutes, whereas the ministers get a lot of time.

Mr. ABBOTT: It reads better too when you send it out.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister ought to know, and I am prepared to have him interrupt at strategic moments so as to make my stuff read better. The minister also declares a surplus bigger, as he said, than the total of all previous surpluses, I believe he said since Canada became a dominion. In spite of all that surplus, he did not give any ear or consideration to our request for the removal of some of the nuisance and other unnecessary taxes. In the matter of soft drinks, I would point out this; and I do not regard soft drinks as being nearly as important as the milk subsidy. It is only fair, however, to mention that the $18 million or $20 million revenue that this country gets from that tax could well have been dispensed with and the children of poor families could have been allowed that five cent luxury, buying their soft drinks at a nickel a bottle. I know there are people who will say that the manufacturers of soft drinks would probably have retained the price anyway and put the extra money in their pockets as profit, and if I were convinced that they would have done so I would have made no plea on their behalf. But I know one manufacturer of soft drinks who has given me his categorical word that he would not have done that, that he would have passed on the two cents, and I think it is only fair that I should put on Hansard a telegram he sent me just before the day the minister gave his budget address.

It shows that there are some small operators who have a public conscience. Those are the fellows I like, the little people, private enterprise and not monopolies, just the little fellows in the little communities who have a public conscience and are willing to do the public a service. This telegram was sent to me from Swift Current, Saskatchewan, dated April 28, 1947:

T. J. Bentley, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Removal of war excise taxes on soft drinks will mean price of five cents to the public as we will pass this saving to it and will not raise our prices. As we see it we still urgently need a confection that can be purchased for five cents, more now than ever before as the public indicated its desire in this respect. Our quality will remain high and uniform as before. We respectfully urge removal of these taxes.

R. C. Dahl, Swift Current Bottling Works.

An hon. MEMBER: They would purchase ice cream cones.

Mr. BENTLEY: I expect there are some hon. gentlemen in this house who purchase confections and luxuries that cost a great deal more than that. It would do no harm to allow the children to have an ice cream cone as often as some folks have a bottle of Scotch.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then they would get too much ice cream; you have to be careful.

Mr. BENTLEY: There may be something in that and I will qualify my statement to that extent, but the principle remains the same.

However, the main thing I want to speak on tonight is the sins of omission in the minister's budget. I refer to the fact that no mention was made of any amendment or improvement in the laws affecting cooperative institutions in this country. Last year I criticized, as well as I was able to, the government's proposal for the taxation of cooperative associations and its failure to recognize by statute the difference between cooperatives and corporations. I stated then and I state now that this country has great need for a federal cooperative act which will clearly define what is considered to be a cooperative association for purposes of taxation and for all other matters of legislation.

This may be a difficult act to devise, because there are likely to be as many different opinions as there are provinces; nevertheless a start should be made and work to that end should be going on as rapidly as possible. In the debate last year I tried to define the difference between cooperative associations and profit-making corporations, for the benefit of hon. members of this house. I was, of course, unsuccessful in convincing the government to accept the difference as I see it, so I will repeat it tonight, even though this may be a little wearisome. There are not so many in the house and perhaps those who are here can stand it.

To begin with, a cooperative association is as purely democratic as any human institution yet devised. In a cooperative institution each member has one vote only; consequently a cooperative cannot be dominated by virtue of the money investment of any single individual or group of individuals. This is the acme of democracy, if I understand the word.

1. Cooperative shares are not traded on the open market; therefore they are not attractive to speculators.

2. Interest on capital is limited and usually small, and in some cooperatives interest on share capital is completely non-existent by virtue of the decision of the membership.

3. Cooperatives are non-profit business concerns, by philosophy, by declaration and by actual operation. They exist to provide a service to the members at what the members believe is less cost than their cost for similar services that are being provided by existing profit-making concerns.

Cooperatives come into existence only when enough people come to believe that a cooperative can serve them in that way. As a rule, cooperatives, by decision of the members, charge the rates prevalent in their area, or in that type of business for the goods and services they provide their members. But there are very good reasons for this. It prevents price wars, which would be bad for all concerned, and sometimes disastrous. It does more than that. It provides a measuring stick for (a) efficiency of operation; (b) proof of the belief that savings can be made by cooperative effort; and (c) a safe figure to work on to take care of all foreseeable contingencies which might arise in the business world in the course of the year projected, and in this way prevent, in so far as possible, any deficit.

If the truth of this is established, then obviously, at the end of the fiscal period, if efficient operation has been carried out, there is bound to be a surplus which is then allocated back to the members on a patronage basis. There is no profit. I want to emphasize and underline that fact, that there is no profit.

4. Cooperatives are completely open as to membership, being thoroughly non-political in a partisan sense, non-denominational in a religious sense, and non-discriminatory in so far as race and sex are concerned, in membership and in the matter of elected or appointed officers and employees.

5. Cooperatives provide for education in cooperative principle and practice, with a limit set on the amount which may be spent for this purpose. All members are encouraged, are even implored, to study cooperative principles in general and their own cooperative in particular; to attend the meetings, and take part in examination of the operations, finance and in formulating policies, as well as in voting for directors.

It can be seen by this explanation that cooperatives have a special feature which makes them differ sharply from purely profit-making corporations. That special feature is the identification of the owner with the user.

These are the five guiding stars of cooperative enterprise. No one is coerced into becoming a member, although all are asked to consider becoming members. No one can dominate the organization by economic power. All policies and practices are decided upon by open and fair discussion of the members, with responsible officers present to answer for their respective responsibilities. There is no proxy voting by blocks of stock in the hands of a few individual officers. Interest on the capital provided by the members may be paid or not paid, by decision of the members and by no one else; that is, until last year when it was made law that they must declare a three per cent profit before they could return their surpluses to themselves. Any surpluses of the year's operation cannot be withheld by the officers for expansion or other purposes, unless the owners of the surpluses—that is, the members—instruct such officers to withhold them for a given purpose, in which case such surpluses become an additional loan or share capital of each member. Hence, a surplus is his property.

This should make it apparent to everyone that this type of enterprise does not attract membership of any others than those who expect to use the services provided by the cooperative. It has no speculative or profit investment value. Interest takes second place to patronage dividends in a properly constituted cooperative.

Now I should like hon. members to observe the difference between cooperative associations, which I have just described, and corporations designed primarily for the purpose of profit making. In profit-making organizations each share has one vote, so that one person or a small group of persons controlling a large number of shares may decide the whole policy of that organization. Shares of this type of enterprise are listed on the stock exchange, many of which are bought and resold for speculative purposes, because the value of such shares fluctuates from time to time, and sometimes considerably. True, quite a few people may buy these shares for savings or investment, nevertheless these buyers may, and probably will, be spread over a great portion of the world, far removed from the headquarters of the corporation itself, and would be quite unable to exercise any democratic control over its operations. Such shareholders are usually invited to provide for the vote of their shares by a proxy to someone who is certain to be at the annual meeting. Hence an officer of the corporation who has a large financial interest in it himself, and who quite naturally will vote the shares for policies most remunerative to himself, may represent the voting shares of those who are without interest in his special policies. Thus, the theoretical element of democracy is nonoperative in actual practice.

In such a corporation the main purpose is to make profits on the investment, and the public are invited to buy shares for no other purpose than to earn interest or a capital dividend on such investment. This should clearly indicate the decided difference between money invested for the sole purpose of earning interest and money invested for the purpose of providing goods or services for the investor. In profit-making corporations there is no identification of the shareholder with the user.

This government claims to believe in cooperative enterprise. If it did not so claim I would not have made this speech tonight.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes.

[Mr. Bentley.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was wondering if the hon. member went so far as to object to people buying and selling the shares of a company on the market.

Mr. BENTLEY: I did not object. I was describing the difference.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not understand.

Mr. BENTLEY: I did not object. I have made no quarrel with that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Thank you.

Mr. BENTLEY: I have simply described the difference between the two.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member will appreciate that I was merely asking a question.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes. What I am trying to do—and as I go along I will show why—is to claim that the present taxation of cooperatives is unjust. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has said in this house more than once that he believes in cooperatives. In fact, he has taken credit to himself and the Liberal party for the rise of cooperatives in Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), the leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, has also said that he believes in cooperative enterprise. This government itself, by the very act of sending delegates to the Hot Springs food conference in 1943 and its subsequent acquiescence in the findings of that conference, has at least paid that much lip service to the idea of cooperative enterprise.

I am going to quote something which has been put on the records of this House of Commons on at least three occasions during this parliament, but which will bear repeating until everybody is cognizant of the great moral lesson contained in it. This is one of the findings of the Hot Springs food conference:

> That each nation examine its laws, regulations and institutions to determine if legal or constitutional obstacles to cooperative development exist, in order to make desirable adjustments.

But this government, in spite of its claim to believe in the ideal of cooperation, has deliberately made a law compelling cooperatives to be profit-making organizations, to the extent of three per cent of the capital employed; a most unwarranted action and a flagrant violation of the rights of free enterprisers—which cooperative members are—to decide whether they will invest their own money in their own business, interest-free or not. The law now says positively that they must not. It says that three per cent of the capital employed must be recognized as capital earnings, regardless of the opinion and decision of the owners of such capital.

It is true, of course, that some types of cooperatives may so conduct their affairs as to have no surplus at all at the end of the year, but the number in this category will be small. The greater bulk of cooperatives operate, as I pointed out earlier in this speech, on the practice of charging the prices prevalent in the area or type of business, and there is bound to be a surplus to be returned to the member patrons. The government has decreed by statute that this investing membership are not competent to decide whether they should or should not pay themselves interest on their own capital employed. This is one of the worst types of class legislation since section 98 of the criminal code. It is discriminatory law; it is very bad law, and this budget makes no provision for its removal.

Cooperative members have already adopted the principle of limited interest on capital, and they should be quite competent to decide to what extent within that limit they will or will not pay themselves interest on their own capital investment in their own business.

Another piece of bad law passed last year is the government decision to force cooperative associations to get from each member patron an individual authorization to retain any or all of the member's share of the patronage dividend. Heretofore, in my province at least, it had been the custom for the membership, in annual meeting or by local by-law, to make this decision by majority vote, after full and free discussion. This is democracy.

The government's ruling, just mentioned, means a plebiscite of the membership every time the board of directors and management desire to carry out what might be the expressed will of the vast majority of the members. As I have said, this is bad law, and I trust the government will take immediate steps to correct it, though there are no indications in the budget speech this year that the government is taking any interest whatever in cooperatives.

Let me point out another instance of the government's ineptitude in dealing with cooperative organizations. It has been decided, for purposes of income taxation, that patronage dividends actually paid out are an expense of operation. That is quite proper. The government has also decided that certain types of dividends become income in the hands of the receiver, and other types do not. Those which are not so taxable are described as consumer or cost of living goods, which are a saving to the family or the domestic budget. The other kind are the cost of production goods. These the member purchases for use in his business, such as gasoline for his power machinery, lumber for his granary, coal for his bunkhouse, and so on. The dividends on these become income in the hands of the member patron when paid to him by the cooperative, and they are taxable. I am not going to quarrel with that decision by the government, but recently they passed order in council P.C. 528 instructing the managers of all cooperative enterprises to make returns to the Department of National Revenue, setting out the amounts paid to each individual member in patronage dividends; and they have placed the onus upon the manager of the cooperative to decide in each individual case how much of the patronage dividend is in the class of consumer or cost of living goods and therefore not income in the hands of the receiver, and which part is cost of production goods which does become income in the hands of the receiver. I should not like to suggest that the government had any ulterior motive in doing this, but I emphatically advise them that this will cause more trouble among members of cooperative associations than almost anything else I could think of. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the government, what individual will allow the manager of any business, cooperative or otherwise, to be the judge of how he has used the goods he purchased during the year? If the government is deliberately trying to create dissension between cooperative members and their management it could hardly have chosen a better method. The government must find some way of placing the onus of responsibility on the individual receiver of the patronage dividend. Difficult as this may be, it is the only fair and sensible way of doing it.

Under the law as enacted in the budget of last year, the government did exempt new cooperative associations from income taxation for a period of three years. They are to be commended for this partial recognition of the fact that cooperatives are an important part of our national economy, but I submit that three years is not a sufficiently long period. This exemption of three years applies to new cooperatives starting on or after the first day of the year, 1947, a year when prices are high, when costs of doing business are very high, and costs of capital equipment are extremely high, so that a cooperative starting this year may find itself with a heavy capital investment and, in the course of three years, may find itself in the middle of a serious recession or repression. I am not prepared to decide which of these terms, recession or repression, is the correct one to use as compared to "depression." In any event, three years is not long enough for a cooperative association to ride over the vagaries of our present capitalistic system, with its booms and busts.

I should like to suggest to the government also that they alter the present legislation which provides that new cooperatives must have not less than twenty members, to permit a smaller number to be recognized. There are certain types of cooperatives, such as cooperative farms, housing cooperatives, fishing cooperatives and so on, which may require only five or ten or any number less than twenty for successful operation, and they should not be barred.

I mention these things, Mr. Speaker, because of my disappointment at the failure of the government to mention any of these matters in the budget or, as far as I have been able to see, in the budget resolutions which I believe were distributed yesterday or the day before. As I said last year, I believe the government pays too much attention to people who are opposed to the rise of cooperatives. I believe a great many governments do that. Provincial governments do it. Even though many governments claim to believe in free competition and so on, they are ready to listen to someone who wants legislation to prevent free competition. I notice that this year in the British Columbia legislature, where there is a coalition of the two old parties, there was an amendment to the cooperative associations act. The original act was passed in 1936, and under section 21 (1) of that act it is provided that an individual who freely becomes a contractual member of a cooperative is bound by the terms of the contract between himself and his association. Subsection 4 of that section provides that anyone who has knowledge of a cooperative marketing contract between a producer and an association, who solicits or persuades or aids or abets a producer to sell or deliver any produce otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the cooperative marketing contract, or accepts or receives for sale or for auction or for display for sale any produce of a producer delivered by the producer otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the cooperative marketing contract, shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty. Now this act has been amended by striking out the word "produce" in subsection 1 and substituting therefor the words "thing caught", meaning fish or other sea product. The act is further amended by striking out subsection 4 and substituting subsections 4 and 5. The new subsection 4 practically repeats the things contained in the old one, but subsection 5 reads:

> Every person who uses any property belonging to another person to catch, produce, or collect fish or other marine products shall not be bound by a cooperative marketing contract with respect to the sale, delivery, or other disposal of such fish or other marine products, and the preceding subsections shall not apply to the sale, delivery, or other disposal of such fish or other marine products.

This relieves the member of his contractual obligation with the association and removes the penalty that can be imposed upon those who aid or abet him in breaking the contract, if the producer is using any property belonging to some other person to catch, produce or collect fish or other marine product. The actual effect of this will be that on the big fishing boats, where the fishermen are paid a share of the catch, even those fishermen who are members of a cooperative association will not be bound by their contract with the association to deliver their share of the catch to the cooperative. It further means that the owner of the vessel or equipment will be able to use every method known to him to solicit, persuade, aid or abet the producer not to fulfil his contract, if he should be inclined to do so. In other words, a fisherman who wants to hold his job on a boat will be practically compelled to sell his share of the catch to whomever the owner of the boat wishes, and in the case of big companies it does not require a great stretch of the imagination to realize that very few of these fish will find their way to a cooperative association.

Whether or not the government of British Columbia had any other reason for doing this than that they felt it was a good thing to do, the fact remains that it will be discriminatory law. I can remember when the same attempt was made to prevent the farmers of the prairies from delivering their grain to the elevators of their choice. As a matter of fact, the private elevator companies were able to prevail upon the government here in Ottawa to take out of the Canada Grain Act that provision which gives the farmer the right to determine the destination of his own grain. To have that right restored took quite a long fight in parliament; it took the introduction of a private bill here by the then member for Mackenzie, Mr. M. N. Campbell; I believe it was called Bill No. 8. I believe this whole matter was discussed before the committee on agriculture, and members of both the old parties on that committee were opposed to the restoring of those rights to the farmers. It became a matter of great concern to those of us in western Canada, and became almost an election issue, to such an extent that, when the election of 1926 was over, the new government finally, after much delay, did reinstate and restore those rights to the farmers.

Under those conditions, and realizing the omissions in the budget, the government cannot wonder at my feeling at times—and others feel the same way—that they are too ready to listen to those who are opposed to the interests of the people themselves.

I have given these illustrations tonight, not in an effort to create antagonism, but to try to convince the government that big business is out, not only to prevent the expansion of the cooperative movement, but actually to kill it by these devices, if it can persuade the government to do so. Both this and past governments have been a little too ready to listen to this kind of people. Their readiness to listen in respect of this and other matters is the very reason for the existence of this party, and the party sitting to my left.

Both in spirit and in fact this budget is as much against the interests and democratic rights of the vast majority of Canadian citizens as are the examples I have just placed on record. There is no indication that the government has any intention of introducing a new order of society, nor is there any apparent intention on its part of even giving legislative aid to those little people who have the courage and the initiative to try to introduce it for themselves, through cooperative action.

I should like to commend to the government and the minister serious consideration of the points I have tried to place before them this evening. To my mind, the budget was aptly illustrated by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) who, I believe, is of Irish extraction. When he spoke yesterday he told the story of the Scotsman who gave his child a nickel to go to bed quietly, and then took the nickel away after the child had gone to bed. But there is more than that to the story, because when the Scotsman tells it about the Irishman he adds this, that the Irish father who did this made the child go without his breakfast as punishment for his carelessness in having lost the nickel.

It seems to me the budget is doing much the same thing to the people of Canada. It is trying to keep them pacified so that they may go to sleep, and then, when they are asleep, or when they are not looking and are convinced that no harm will come to them, or when they have become somewhat inattentive, they lose what they have got; and they are being punished when they awaken for not having been more attentive. I would ask the government to give consideration to the recommendations I have made tonight.

In conclusion, may I say that I have not said these things with any desire whatsoever to cause any member of the government or the opposition to feel that I am being unduly critical. I was simply trying again to bring to their attention the facts I brought out last year with regard to this cooperative movement, of which I think so highly. And I shall have to continue so to direct their attention, so long as I am a member of the House of Commons, or until some government gives actual effect to these recommendations, by legislative action.

Mr. R. N. JUTRAS (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal more particularly this evening with the problem of dominion-provincial relations. Before doing so, however, I should like to make a few observations on the budget, as such. I am pleased to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) in his seat, because he did so much work in connection with the present act, and also to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who has made such a fine presentation of the budget. I should like to join others in congratulating him; and to see also the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), because, after all, he is the one who collects the money.

I wish to refer particularly to this statement of the Minister of Finance at page 2557 of Hansard:

> We have been busy during the past year upon the re-writing of our basic income tax law in an effort to improve its arrangement, to make it clearer and simpler, and to remove ambiguities and anomalies. Hon. members, will, I think, be particularly pleased with the extent to which it will be less dependent upon the exercise of ministerial discretions. Senior officials of the Departments of Justice, National Revenue and Finance have spent many months on a very detailed revision. I have taken a considerable personal interest in their work in this field.

I fully realize that we shall have ample opportunity at a later day to discuss this question. However, at this stage I wish to ask the Minister of Finance and the officials of his department to make a complete and thorough review or study of the income tax act as it applies to the farmers of western Canada. I am satisfied that the act framed to take care of the conditions of eastern farmers will not meet the requirements and the conditions of western farmers.

It would appear that the present act applies with a flexibility sufficient to meet most conditions in the eastern provinces; but on the other hand it is equally apparent that there is a marked rigidity in its application to conditions in western Canada and that it fails to meet conditions in that part of the country. I do not make this statement lightly but after having made a certain study of the matter. Many hon. members have seen the various sessional papers which have been published and which seem to substantiate my contention.

I am not going to labour the point nor am I going to quote from tables extensively. However I would point out for instance that in the year 1945-46 Manitoba contributed $1,866,590, whereas Ontario contributed $1,086,000 and Quebec, $59,000. This makes a difference between Ontario and Manitoba of about $800,000, despite the fact that the number of farmers in Manitoba is one-third the number in Ontario. I could place on record the figures for 1944-45 which, I suggest, would give about the same picture.

The very nature of western farming is entirely different from farming in other parts of Canada. In the west it is big business and entails heavy capital expenditures, because the farms are necessarily large. Consequently, before a person begins farming his costs are high. Then, the cost of operation is correspondingly high, because a man is working a larger tract of land, with the consequent larger operational costs.

There is a further factor which is most important, and particularly as it applies to income tax. I have in mind the fact that the farming enterprise in the prairie provinces is much more precarious than it is in other parts of Canada, and many conditions bring this about.

First, there is the matter of fluctuating prices. Fortunately, in the last few years, under this government, definite steps have been taken to stabilize that factor. And under the wise guidance of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is certainly thoroughly familiar with conditions in western Canada, I am sure we shall not have to face the wide fluctuations in prices we have had in the past. I am quite sure that there will always be some fluctuations because there are hardly any local markets in western Canada. In my own province of Manitoba there are only two cities, greater Winnipeg with a population of 290,000, and Brandon with a population of 17,000. Consequently we have to go outside of the province.

Another factor which should be kept in mind is the hazards of nature in the west. I was surprised to notice the normal precipitation of rainfall in the western provinces. Many people think that in the west all is well outside the drought areas as defined by the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. However, as an example, I should like to take the town of Morris, a thriving community of 1,000 population, situated about the centre of the Red river valley in my constituency. I think that district is recognized by all as being the best agricultural part of the province. It is supposed to be the most prosperous. Morris is situated half way between Winnipeg and the United States boundary and just about half way between the Ontario and Saskatchewan boundaries. It is in the centre of the province and of the Red river valley. The normal annual precipitation at Morris is 17·9 inches, whereas the normal precipitation at Lethbridge, which is in a drought area, is 15.01 inches. The normal precipitation at Indian Head, which is also in a drought area, is 17.4 inches, which is just 0·5 inches under that at Morris. Consequently there are many crop failures in districts outside the supposed drought area. Farming is a precarious and costly enterprise.

The trust, loan and mortgage companies failed to understand this in the thirties and they paid heavily. They had based their agreements for loans principally upon eastern conditions. During the boom period they went out and lent money to the farmers quite freely and, when the depression came, they got panicky and began to fear they would not get their money. They then dashed out to try to collect all the money they could from the farmers, and in many instances they removed the very means of producing revenue which could have been used to pay them. The result was that in many cases they failed to collect and, what was worse, they left behind feelings of distrust and even hate. They failed to realize that it was to their advantage to enable the farmers to produce rather than to drive them off their farms by their efforts to collect too much, too quickly. They ruined the picture. As we know, our friends of the C.C.F., particularly in Saskatchewan, capitalized on that point with considerable success. That experience is full of significance for all concerned.

The farmer in western Canada either takes a heavy loss or makes a large profit. The chances are that he will get one crop out of three. When he gets a good crop he makes a pretty good profit, and all in all it balances from one year to the other. I realize that the enactment last year of the three-year plan will help the situation tremendously and I must again express our gratitude to the Minister of Justice who was responsible for that measure. However we have two more years to go before the plan comes into operation. Times are good now and some temporary relief in the meantime would be more than welcome.

On account of the heavy operating costs and capital outlays the farmers of western Canada went heavily into debt during the thirties, but I am happy to point out that the trend in that respect has been most encouraging to date. I should like to read from the annual report of the Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association as follows:

Mortgage and agreement for sale debts of farmers in the three prairie provinces declined 21 per cent in 1946.

This estimate is based on the experience of thirty life insurance, trust and loan companies which have a substantial investment in farm mortgages and agreements for sale in the prairie provinces.

They then show the total amount owing to the thirty life insurance, trust and loan companies on farm mortgages and agreements for sale, and those amounts for Manitoba were as follows:

1943	18,478,000
1944	13,041,000
1945	9,722,000

The statement continues:

In percentage reduction in the total amount owing Manitoba farmers were in the lead in 1946, the decline in that province being 23 per cent. Alberta was a close second with a reduction of 22 per cent and Saskatchewan was third with a reduction of 20 per cent. As already indicated, the reduction for the three prairie provinces combined was 21 per cent.

As will be seen from the table above, the decline in farm mortgage debts in 1946 was a continuance of a trend which has been evident for some years. The reduction which has occurred since the end of 1937 is remarkable. It is doubtful if any other group in Canada has been as successful in reducing their liabilities during the past nine years as have the farmers of the prairie provinces. As the above table shows, the amount owing on mortgages and agreements for sale by farmers in the prairie provinces is now less than a third of what it was at the end of 1937, the percentage reduction being 69 per cent. In Manitoba, the decrease since the end of 1937 is 75 per cent; in Saskatchewan 66 per cent; and in Alberta 73 per cent.

Then they show the total number of farm mortgages and agreements for sale in Manitoba held by these companies, as follows:

At the end of 1946 there were 4,694 fewer farmers in debt to these 30 companies than at the end of 1945. As compared with the end of 1937, the reduction in the number of farmers in debt to these 30 companies is 32,365, or more than 59 per cent.

To my mind, it is of great importance to the consolidation of the provinces and to the dominion that these debts should be paid off as rapidly as possible. A clause in the income tax act to encourage this trend still further, and I submit it with all deference to the present Minister of Finance, would go a long way.

I could go on and make more specific recommendations, such as the setting up of a board of arbitration, and herds being recognized as capital assets, but I know we shall have opportunities to do that at a later date. I know the minister is fully aware of those recommendations and, on the last point, the only reason it was not brought in last year was technical difficulties.

I wish to refer to dominion-provincial relations. My purpose in doing so at this stage is twofold. First, everyone recognizes the importance of the problem because so much of the most important legislation of the federal government depends upon agreement with the provinces and we have seen so many provincial budgets pending agreement with the federal government.

Another reason I bring it up at this time is that I believe more interest in this great problem should be awakened among individual citizens. This is not the problem of the premiers of the provinces; it is not the problem of the ministers of the cabinet or of members of parliament as a whole. It is the problem of every man and woman in Canada. Every organization, all governments, municipalities, school boards, civic clubs, yes, and young people's clubs should understand the full significance of the problem. It was brought to the fore in 1940 when the Rowell-Sirois report was published. It is unfortunate indeed that it came out at the time that it did, because it did not get the publicity it should have received and it was robbed of its publicity by the rapid advance of the German army in Europe.

Furthermore, the fact that it came out just at the beginning of the war made it appear as a report to meet wartime conditions when it is really a peacetime report. It is good to remember that this report was started in 1937 and that the work was completed before the war started, although the report was not presented until 1940, in the first year of the war. This report was not just another report. Usually royal commissions are instituted to look into one phase and one phase only of a particular subject and are necessarily restricted to that one phase. But the Rowell-Sirois commission had the widest possible powers and latitude; there were no restrictions whatever and they went into every phase of our economy, travelled thousands of miles and came back with, I suppose, thousands of pages of evidence, with the result that the twenty-nine appendices to the report constitute our greatest historical document. It contains a complete statistical picture of the evolution of this country from confederation to the second great war.

When the commission was set up we knew there was something wrong but did not know what or where. We did not know what the problem was and where the trouble lay, but we knew there was a real problem before this country. The commission gave us the facts and figures. We now know where the wheels grind and which one should be replaced for greater efficiency. The commission also made a number of recommendations which, in their opinion, would meet the problem. The federal government took the lead in implementing those recommendations. It tried again and again to bring about some settlement with the provinces. It took such an active lead in the matter that the rumour has gone out in certain quarters that the federal government is in desperate need of provincial sources of revenue to meet the cost of its wartime expenditure. Nothing could be farther from the truth. The tax concessions which the federal government is asking for are certainly not favours to the federal government. It is merely to consolidate the position of many of the provinces and to give them a full measure of stability. The constitution gives the federal government full access to both fields of taxation, direct and indirect, but the government realizes that nine weak provinces or seven or six or four cannot constitute a strong country. And now is the time to consolidate the position.

In spite of all the difficulties, the government has succeeded in signing fiscal agreements with six, perhaps now I should say seven provinces. The federal government should be warmly congratulated upon having made a good start but it is but a start and the federal government needs the full and unqualified support of every man and woman of this country to extend to all citizens the benefits which a complete agreement with the nine provinces could give them.

To get the full significance of the problem, we should go back briefly to the original proposals of the commission.

Let us remember also that when the commission began its work the main problem it had to face was the financial position of many of the provinces. Some were so much in debt that they were on the verge of bankruptcy; others could not see the day when they would ever get out of debt. The heavy burden that had driven them to this desperate position was the colossal relief expenditures. Some of the provinces were in such a bad position that they did not have a twenty-five cent piece to give to the schoolteacher. It is to the credit of this devoted profession that they gave their services on credit and for a mere pittance. Otherwise a great many children would have gone without any schooling at all. Such was the state of some of the provinces when the commission set out to find out the big question. Why?

We are in the midst of a relative prosperity now and human nature easily forgets. That was only in 1937. How can we assume that conditions will be different in the future if nothing is done about the matter? Fortunately, something has been done and a good step has been taken.

As I said, the main problem before the commission was the precarious financial position of the provinces. The solution of the commission was the following, and it was very simple, or comparatively simple in theory:

1. The dominion assumes entire provincial debt, not municipal.

2. To prevent the recurrence of such a debt, the dominion assumes entire responsibility for unemployment relief for employables.

3. To be able to meet that burden, the dominion discontinues the payment of subsidies, and gets the exclusive field of income, inheritance and corporation taxes.

4. To ensure a minimum standard of educational and social services, the federal government would pay the provinces an annual adjustment grant according to need.

It sounds very simple, but the great difficulty is that it requires a change in the constitution. The dominion saw there an obstacle that could not be surmounted. It therefore rolled up its sleeves and got down to work to try to find a way of accomplishing the same thing but within its constitutional rights and without diminishing by one iota the autonomy of the province.

The results were the federal proposals to the provinces, as we know those proposals. These are necessarily much more involved and complicated, because they are made to conform to the constitution and to respect scrupulously the autonomy of each province. In spite of all that, the federal government has since been accused of conspiring to wreck the constitution and of undermining the autonomy of the provinces. It is to prevent such accusations that the federal government took so much pains and put in so much effort to evolve the present proposals.

These proposals sounded so complicated and involved that very few people actually bothered to find out what they were and how they solved the problem of 1937—indebtedness of the provinces, threatening unemployment, and let me add here that even the big provinces in this dominion could take heed on this score, ensuring the distribution of a minimum of education and social services throughout the nine provinces. To these must be added the problem of keeping a steady and progressive development, not of one section or two of the country, but of every part of our great country.

To make the present proposals more readily understandable and to show in a practical way what has been accomplished and how the problem has been partly met by the temporary proposals now in force, I am going to show how they apply to my own province, Manitoba.

The province has withdrawn from the income and inheritance tax field and has agreed to limit its corporation tax to five per cent. In return, to stabilize the financial position of the province, the federal government pays to the province an annual per capita payment of $12.75, based on Manitoba's population in 1942. To this is added the escalator clause, which provides for an increase proportionately to the increase in population; then, no matter what happens in population, the minimum remains. The full statutory subsidies remain, as in the past, and the federal government also returns to the province fifty per cent of the amount of the province's income and corporation tax collection in the year ending April, 1941. This ensures the province of a guaranteed irreducible payment of $13,500,000 a year. This is far more than it ever got from the taxation field that it has agreed to vacate. This is how the province's revenue has been stabilized.

On the other hand, the problem of the heavy relief debt left on the shoulders of the province by the thirties was dealt with as follows. The federal government cancels half of the province's relief debt, this amount being roughly $5,500,000, and the other half of the debt is to be repaid by the province to Canada in thirty equal annual principal payments without interest. The other debt owing by the province to Canada for advances for its provincial share of relief works, to the amount of approximately $14 million, is to be amortized over a period of thirty years, with interest at $2\frac{5}{8}$ per cent per annum.

This places the province in a much sounder financial position and, as such, improves considerably the credit of the province.

For greater uniformity, the province has agreed to change its fiscal year, the idea being to have all the provinces end their fiscal year on March 31, in other words, at the same time as the federal government.

Thus, we, the taxpayers of that province, have been spared the annoyance and costly intricacies of a double taxation scheme, and the dominion guarantees revenues sufficient for the province to discharge its primary functions, better than before and with full confidence. To those who doubt the practical effect of the agreement, I wish to quote a paragraph taken from the budget speech of the premier of Manitoba, delivered on March 27 of this year:

> In lieu of taxes which, being based upon the ability to pay, are widely variable, we shall have a stable minimum revenue which will enable us to spend more freely, yet without imprudence, revenues which we receive from other sources. It is in consequence of this fact that the expenditures which we shall propose for the year ending March 31, 1948, will be increased by more than the increase in our revenues, which we enjoy under the dominion provincial agreement itself. Moreover, this stability has already resulted in a further improvement of our credit manifested by the favourable sale of $4,820,000 provincial bond, issued by public competition in November last, after it was known that we were reaching an agreement with the dominion government. The over-all cost to the province of this issue was 2·6 per cent, lowest cost in Manitoba's history, for a public competitive bond issue of this character.

It will be seen from that, Mr. Speaker, that this temporary agreement has at least accomplished that much, in that it has relieved the province of a heavy debt burden, that it has improved the credit of the province, and that it has ensured the province of an annual minimum revenue. This, to my mind, is most important, because the province, to speak of one at the moment, has definite yearly obligations that must be met and cannot wait. Whether there is a crop or not, the children must go to school, and the province must see that they have at least a teacher to teach them the three "R's" and a minimum of facilities. The same thing goes with the development of the resources of the province, and so on.

Furthermore, the province must see to it that the health of its people gets a minimum of protection. Epidemics do not wait for increased revenues. I am now speaking of bare minimum but, of course, this should not be the objective. When the production of the province increases, the federal grant increases. On top of that. the government has already taken the jurisdiction over unemployment insurance and has already instituted a national employment service. I mention it now because it was part of the original proposal of the commission.

This is what has been done. There still remains considerable to be done. The problem of preventing the recurrence of the provincial relief debt burden has not been solved. Now that we have cured the sore, it is, to my mind, most important that we should take preventive measures against its recurrence. This is just as important, if not more important.

The federal government has made an offer in that respect which awaits the general ratification of all nine provinces.

As I said previously, the federal government has instituted unemployment insurance and a national employment service. Further to that, should all provinces join in, it is ready to pay eighty-five per cent of the cost of unemployment insurance benefits to persons able and willing to work, who are not entitled or who have ceased to be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits; in other words, to put it bluntly, to pay eighty-five per cent of the cost of direct relief. Here again, the best way to deal with it is to plan the economy of the country in such a way that there will be a minimum of unemployment.

This is where the government's development and public investment programme comes into the picture. It is extremely important, to my mind, that the public works programme in the country should be gauged from a central focal point, and this can be done properly only by the federal government. This is the reason why the federal government has offered the provinces planning grants, public investment projects, has agreed to extend grants, public investment projects, has agreed to extend its national resources and development programme and research programme, and has proposed to give assistance to projects such as roads to open new areas, roads of national importance, and roads for the promotion of tourist traffic. I suppose every one of us knows of more than one instance where this suggestion would be of tremendous assistance to the people. I for one, in my own constituency, have a large area which could be described as the entire southeast section of Manitoba, which is in extreme need of drainage. I admit there are great difficulties. The cost of doing a good job of draining the entire section of the province has been estimated at as high as one million dollars.

It goes without saying that the province has not been in a financial position in the past to spend that much money. It has tackled the problem and has given local drainage here and there. I believe the work started and contemplated over a period of years adds up to practically a quarter of a million dollars. Eventually I suppose the province will complete the job, but it will be far more costly done by bits and pieces and it will take many years.

If assistance could be given to the provincial government for the drainage of that area, the work could be completed in a few years. It would mean that the entire area would be a productive area in a few years and, instead of being a source of expense to the province, would be a source of revenue for both the provincial and the federal governments.

In the same district, a move has been on for over twenty years to get the tourist highway project, known as the Piney highway, which would be a source of great tourist revenue to the province and to Canada. It has been recognized by authorities and a great many people as a scenic highway, and our friends to the south have repeatedly, year in and year out, made representations to Canadians to have this road built so that they may be able to come to Canada. It goes through an area extremely rich in wild life, big and small game. It is full of possibilities. It has been started by the province, but the province has made but a start. This is a perfect example of what could be done. If the federal government could give some assistance, I am sure this project could be successfully concluded in a very short time. I am positive that the revenue from it would be far in excess of the investment made. The more we delay developments of this kind, the more we delay the full expansion of the country.

In addition to these benefits, under an agreement with all the provinces the dominion would continue, of course, to pay family allowances. It would, further, pay an old age pension to all those seventy years of age at the rate of $30 without the means test and would assume the total payments and administration of the pension. On top of that, it would contribute fifty per cent of the cost of pension to those from sixty-five to sixty-nine years of age, at the rate of $30 a month, including administration. It would contribute sixty per cent of the cost of any specific item in a provincial health insurance scheme. It would provide additional grants in relation to general public health for preventive medicine. It would contribute fifty per cent of the cost to lower the age from forty to twenty-one years for blind persons, increase the maximum allowance to $30 and provide for treatment. Finally, it agreed also to give loans at cost for the building of hospitals in the provinces. These are the suggestions made to the provinces should the other provinces join in.

Mr. Speaker, there it is in black and white, how the federal government has already partly met the problem of 1937 and how it suggests it can be met fully. It asks little from the provinces. It promises stability to the provincial governments, and, above all, it promises a great deal to the people of the provinces. Not one of the provinces has been able to give to its own people the health and social services that the federal government is ready to give the people with their cooperation. Not even the rich provinces, or the wheel horses as they liked to call themselves at the last conference, have been able to do that, and it will be a long time before they are in a position to do so.

Ever since the proposals of the federal government were made known, one member after another in the opposition has been demanding this or that benefit, as if they were the originators of the idea. And better than that, we have seen members of the official opposition demanding development programmes copied word for word from the proposals, and yet never missing an opportunity to undermine the chances of a dominion-provincial agreement.

If they have no confidence in the government, why do they want to place the whole responsibility of old age pensions on the federal government? And why do they ask for such-and-such development programmes? I submit that everyone should start at the beginning, and lend a hand to lay a firm dominion-provincial foundation. I am sure that every individual member, particularly members of the opposition could be of great assistance in bringing about a successful conclusion to the signing of those agreements. As I look across the floor, I cannot help but think of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). When this question came to the fore I was a student and the leader of the opposition was my premier. He was a champion of that question in those days. I hope that he will gather up enough of that old western spirit to get in there and pitch, and help solve that problem once and for all.

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): In presenting the budget, as reported at page 2546 of Hansard, the minister has this to say:

> I need hardly say that hon. members will find that report worthy of careful study.

The minister was referring to the foreign exchange control board report for 1946, and it is my opinion that both the minister and Mr. Graham Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, went out of their way to overemphasize the temporary favourable exchange situation. The report of the foreign exchange control board for 1946 shows that there was an unfavourable balance of $603 million with the United States; that Canadian expenditures in the United States amounted to $2,178 million and that United States expenditures in Canada amounted to $1,575 million. To meet this deficit, reserves of gold and United States dollars were reduced by $263 million, and the remainder of the deficit, namely $237 million in gold and convertible exchange, was received from countries other than the United States; and $103 million represented an inflow of capital, and exchange adjustments.

In connection with that $103 million, I should like to read from an article which appeared in last night's Evening Telegram regarding the exchange situation between Canada and the United States:

> The reason for this selling of Canadian stocks is said to be that there is something of a "scare" as to the position of the Canadian free dollar. While the yield on Canadian stocks is satisfactory, American investors, it is said, are unwilling to gamble on the future of the Canadian free dollar.
> In the case of Montreal Power, which had a good number of American shareholders, local financial houses felt that there was a good basis for switching into other Canadian stocks. But the uncertainty as to the free dollar, and the various rules and difficulties surrounding international dealings, set up a hedge that American interests are unwilling to jump.
> American holders, it is stated, accepted the $25 offered by Quebec Hydro for Montreal Power shares, and took their money back into the States, taking a loss of around eight per cent on the "free dollar" market.

The analysis which is in the report is, in my opinion, entirely misleading because it represents the end of the year periods in 1945 and 1946 and does not truly represent the situation which was brought about by the parity announcement which the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) made on July 5 last. In my opinion, the minister should have given two statements, one dealing with the exchange situation from January 1, 1946, to July 4, 1946, and one dealing with the situation from July 5 until the end of the year. Then I think a further statement should have been presented to the house bringing the situation up to date to March 31, 1947.

The governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Graham Towers, has stated on a number of occasions since the first of the year that our deficit with the United States on account of commodity trade has rapidly increased during recent months. The minister suggested that members of this house should study this foreign exchange control board report, and I have tried to do so. It is my opinion that whoever was responsible for the preparation of the report did a first-class job of publishing a statement designed to conceal the facts. A calculation based on figures which were published in July, 1946, the date on which the devaluation of the Canadian dollar took place, showed the Canadian reserve of gold and United States dollars to be in the neighbourhood of $1,636 million, United States. It would appear that our loss in United States dollars and gold reserves from that date to the end of the year was $392 million for a six-month period, not $263 million for the twelve-month period, as was stated by the minister and as shown in the report. This annual rate is almost three times that indicated in the report by the minister and represents a loss in exchange at the rate of $750 million a year. If the minister had given us the true picture as it has been developing since July 5, 1946, he would have revealed not only quite a different situation as far as declining gold reserves and United States funds are concerned, but also that our deficit on commodity trading account with the United States has been steadily growing, especially in recent months.

Commodity trade and gold are the basic items in our United States dollar situation. In 1946 some $430,000,000 of our $603,000,000 deficit with the United States arose from commodity trade, and this deficit has been accumulating at a rapidly increasing rate. If we take the four quarters of the year 1946, those deficits were $93,000,000, $120,000,000, $126,000,000 and $158,000,000, while in the last quarter of 1945 our total loss in United States reserves was approximately $10,000,000, and the average for the years 1935 to 1939, prior to the war was $90,000,000 per annum.

Our accounts with the world are set out in one schedule, our accounts with the United States in another, but our position with the United Kingdom is studiously avoided in the report. Why were these figures not given in such a manner as to reveal the whole truth? In 1946 we exported to Britain $597,000,500 worth of goods. In the same year we imported from Britain $201,400,000 worth of goods. All we could take from Britain, or all that Britain could supply us, was less than $201,500,000. We therefore took from Britain gold to the extent of seventy-five per cent of all that we would take from her in goods, namely, $150,000,000. This resulted in Britain going out and buying, with the very scarce dollars she had, gold to turn over to us, which eased our exchange position with the United States last year. Britain has taken up half of the billion and one-quarter loan that we made, but while we are making the pretence of helping her through a loan authorized by this parliament, we are forcing her to go out in the market and use her scarce and precious dollars to buy gold to turn over to us. In effect, what we did last year was to exchange part of the proceeds of our loan to Britain for British gold.

In Canada we are making our gold miners produce with one hand tied behind their backs. By arbitrary revaluation we put our gold producers at a disadvantage, so that our net exports of gold are about half what they normally should be; instead of allowing and encouraging our own gold mining industry to produce the gold we exacted it from Britain. Surely the minister is not going to lead the country to believe that we could do this year after year. The $87,000,000 realized through UNRRA will not be realized again and, in February, 1947, we turned over $74,000,000 in gold to the international monetary fund.

If the minister had told us the whole truth, and explained the situation as it actually is, he would have said that we have about a year to go, as events have been developing up to date. Our expenditures are higher in the United States by many millions and our receipts are very much lower. The minister has resorted to a specious argument to indicate that the dollar revaluation of July 5 last really makes no difference. It makes $3.50 an ounce difference in Canadian dollars to our gold mining producers, and, if continued, may put many Canadian marginal producing mines out of business. It makes it more difficult for our exporters to sell to the United States, and easier for the United States to sell to us. Normally, such might be desirable, but why this government wanted to accentuate a difficult United States dollar situation is beyond my understanding.

In my opinion, the officials of the Bank of Canada, together with the officials of the Department of Finance and the present Minister of Finance, thought that Canada was equally as powerful as the United States treasury and the federal reserve system of banking in the United States, with the result that they created a situation in this country whereby our economy is virtually placed under the control of a nation twenty times as wealthy as we are. Knowing the damage they have done, they are like men sitting in a poker game which has got beyond their limits, watching their stakes being constantly whittled away, without having the courage to quit and admit the game is too steep for them, thus protecting their remaining cash.

Mr. ABBOTT: The Toronto stock exchange.

Mr. COCKERAM: Not protecting the Toronto stock exchange, but protecting the investor and workman in this country. In other words, they will not admit they were wrong in the first place, and they are now afraid of losing face. This poker game to date, as far as public knowledge goes, has cost the Canadian taxpayer $163,663,700, which sum was charged against the reserves of the foreign exchange control board. The minister did it to maintain a price ceiling policy which he is not maintaining anyway, and now, like Micawber, he is waiting for something to turn up. If they have a serious recession in the United States, then the minister can say, "I was counting on something happening there."

The significant thing is not that the official reserves of gold and exchange are only $263,000,000 lower than on January 1, 1946. The significant thing is that in this twelve-month period we parted with $500,000,000 of gold and exchange we otherwise would have had, and we borrowed the $103,000,000 balance of the $603,000,000 of deficit in our payments position with the United States.

Let us have this clear. The $103,000,000 inflow of capital means that the people of Canada as a whole borrowed that amount from the people of the United States. If an American buys a Canadian bond he has lent us the money and taken a mortgage against Canada in return. The $500,000,000 in gold and United States exchange that went to pay for part of this colossal 1946 deficit was made up of $263,000,000 from our reserves, $150,000,000 of gold which Britain turned over to us and $87,000,000 derived from UNRRA and from trade with South America. That is, we took $263,000,000 out of one bank account, $150,000,000 out of a second bank account and $87,000,000 out of a third bank account. The foreign exchange control board report tends to focus the spotlight on the first bank account only, namely the figures which were presented and which showed the $263,000,000, and keeps the other two in the shadows. If the $150 million in gold, which Great Britain found it hard put to part with from her own meagre store, were a recurring annual item, there might be an excuse for putting it aside in the main calculation. But it is not so. Neither is the amount from UNRRA. And as far as money from Great Britain is concerned, I think there was a news item the other day which stated that in the first three months of the year their exports had declined by something like £200 million. With that in mind I would think the chances of Canada obtaining gold from British sources this year would be very slim.

Authors of the board's report tried to soften the blow. But they know the situation is a critical one. While the figures are treated in a fashion to becloud its full extent, the chairman, Mr. Towers, was driven by hard facts to say in his report:

It is clear that in the long run we shall have either to reduce our deficit with the United States by selling more to, or spending less in, that country or to increase our United States dollar income from other countries.

It is worth noting that Sweden, a country whose economy is frequently held up as something to imitate, a country which came through the war unscathed, finds itself in the same sort of situation we are rapidly approaching. Note well that Sweden recently had to impose an embargo on all imports from the dollar area, which covered all items but a few which Sweden's northern climate cannot produce, such as textiles, and so on.

They are pursuing entirely conflicting and contradictory policies. How did we come by that $87 million United States windfall from UNRRA? It is because our produce sent to UNRRA collected United States dollars in going through the United States. But the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has decided that our farmers must not be allowed to sell their products to the United States. The difference between Canadian and United States prices was mentioned the other day by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). If our farmers, and our raw materials producers generally, were allowed to sell at world market prices our exchange situation would be cleared up overnight. As the government is acting now, the exchange situation cannot be cleared up except through some difficulty arising in the United States, which in other ways will reflect on us, to our disadvantage, because if they suffer a recession in business it will have unfavourable consequences for us.

Several aspects of the budget now before the house have been brought forward since this debate commenced a week ago. The other day, speaking in this debate, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe mentioned that the total expenditures of government estimated for the present fiscal year, totalling $2,100,000,000, are increased 379·7 per cent over the total expenditures in 1938, which totalled $553,063,000. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe also pointed out a more significant fact. He drew the attention of the house to the fact that, while the estimated national income for this year had increased to $12,000,000,000, as against $5,100,000,000 in 1938, the percentage of that national income required to cover the cost of our federal government had increased from 8·5 per cent in 1938 to 20·49 per cent in 1947. In other words, today one-fifth of the national income is now siphoned off to cover the cost of government in the federal field only, to say nothing of what Canadians, as individuals, and business in Canada, must pay in the way of provincial and municipal taxes. That, Mr. Speaker, indicates a serious situation arising in our national economy.

I, for one, believe that some economies could be exercised and help materially to reduce the cost of our federal government in Canada, but I do not believe that, through this medium alone, can that situation, by which one-fifth of the national income is required to finance the federal government of this nation, be changed. When we realize that a half billion dollars is required annually to finance the debt of this country, and another half-billion dollars is required for what is considered essential ordinary expenditures; when we realize that the defence of this nation entails an additional cost of a quarter billion dollars, we have some conception of why 12,000,000 Canadians today find themselves confronted by the federal government with an annual budget in the neighbourhood of $2 billion. We have essential expenditures also for social services, such as family allowances, which today total one-quarter billion dollars, and old age pensions, the cost of which will increase as our legislation is broadened and extended to meet present-day needs.

While I do not disregard the fact that economies can and should be exercised in the expenditures by the various departments of government, I do not believe that the effect of these economies, no matter how rigid they may be, would be sufficient to meet the present situation.

I, for one, am prepared to recognize that the billion dollar budgets that we have acquired during the war are something that will remain with us in the future. Believing that, and recognizing that economy alone will not meet the problem of better fitting this nation to carry such a load, I suggest to this house that we must make another approach that will better enable the people of Canada to meet the costs of government which, as I have pointed out, have shown such a tremendous increase during the past nine years.

In my opinion, when a nation turns to stabilize its economy after a terrible conflict such as we have just passed through, there is no better place it can turn to lick its wounds than by developing the natural resources of the country.

If we are to maintain the high standard of living, high cost of government, high percentage of employment, then we must direct our efforts into avenues that will create new wealth. The department of this government that is chiefly charged with that responsibility is the Department of Mines and Resources. I find, on reviewing the record, that the total expenditures of the Department of Mines and Resources for 1938, excluding the immigration and Indian affairs branch, total $11,368,472, or 2·05 per cent of the total expenditures in that year.

In the estimates now before this house, the expenditures of the Department of Mines and Resources, excluding the immigration and Indian affairs branch, are estimated at $14,301,303, or ·68 per cent of the total expenditures for the year. In other words, at a time when this nation should be directing its efforts toward the development of its natural resources, toward the creation of new wealth, toward efforts that will give gainful employment, we reduce the percentage of 2·05 per cent of the total expenditures made in the last pre-war year, to ·68 per cent for this year.

In my opinion, the efforts made in the direction which I have advocated were little enough in 1938, but today I believe the country will agree that they are pathetic.

When I realize that one of the greatest responsibilities of any government in Canada is the maintenance of a high national income in order to maintain employment, maintain our standard of living, maintain and increase our standard of social services, I believe the effort of this government to encourage and assist the development of the natural resources with which we are endowed is nothing short of pathetic.

The other day Prime Minister Attlee of Great Britain, in his speech in the British House of Commons, stated:

> Dangers to world civilization from another world war are greater today than they were between wars.

If that statement is true, as I believe it to be, then as a nation we should be extending every effort to develop our natural resources.

As one example of this, I would cite the case of gold. I believe that this nation should make every effort now to encourage gold mining in this country. I suggest this not alone because of the gainful employment it will create, nor because of the new wealth it will produce and the assistance that it will be to us at the present time in our foreign exchange position, but I believe all-out encouragement is necessary now as a move toward the future security and defence of this nation. It is a well known fact that during the last war the allies were able to purchase essential war materials from Spain and Portugal, and other necessary materials from South America and Turkey, because we had gold to make in payment for the same.

Further, I do not believe, nor do I advocate, that we today should build aeroplanes, guns, battleships, et cetera, on a big scale for our security in the future, because I recognize that these would likely be obsolete if and when they would be needed. I believe, however, that we should, for our own security, make every effort to develop the gold resources of this nation, in order that we may have the economic strength to defend ourselves should a great conflict overtake us, and into which we would be drawn because of our geographical position.

I would point out that that great nation to the north of us, Russia, is sparing no effort to seek out and utilize the latent mineral resources of that country. Compare that effort with that of Canada, where in this year, 1947 this government proposes to spend 0·68 per cent of its expenditures toward the encouragement of developing and utilizing our natural resources.

I further believe that an aggressive policy of encouragement to the development of our natural resources would lighten the burden of every taxpayer, because it would create new wealth, create gainful employment, bolster our exports and place this nation in a far more substantial and healthy position to carry out the present-day costs of government.

If some action of this kind were undertaken by this government it would do more than any other single action we could take to meet the serious situation which has arisen whereby one-fifth of the national income is now siphoned off to meet the costs of federal government alone. I would further point out that, unless this situation is met, and a serious effort is made immediately to do so, our position will become progressively worse in Canada.

In the past, great mines which have created millions of dollars in new wealth, great pulp and paper companies which today are bringing millions of dollars annually in United States funds, were undertaken by the investment of private capital. Today, if we are to continue to siphon off one-fifth of the national income to cover the costs of federal government alone, to say nothing of the percentage of the national income which is required to maintain provincial and municipal governments, very little will be left for investment that will develop our natural resources. For this reason, I believe it is essential that the seriousness of the situation be recognized and action be taken by this government immediately to place our economy on a more stable and more productive basis than is indicated in the budget now before this house.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing the budget tonight. Budgets may come and budgets may go, but seemingly the cost of living goes on forever. When goods are scarce and prices go up they always rise ahead of wages. When prices begin to fall it means unemployment. Therefore this budget might be balanced at this time, but tomorrow it might be absolutely meaningless in the case of a depression, or a recession, which is the more fashionable word at the present time.

This evening I should like to air some of the problems that face our citizens in the northern part of my riding of Skeena and in the Yukon Territory. Representations have been made from time to time by such bodies as the Atlin board of trade and the British Columbia-Yukon chamber of mines over the excessive costs of freight and passenger service into those areas. The Atlin district of British Columbia and the Yukon Territory are well known because of their history of gold mining. They came into prominence during the war because of their key geographic position at a time when there was danger of invasion by the Japanese. That part of the country has contributed in the past and is still contributing to the prosperity of Canada. It is certainly true that by far a greater proportion of wealth has been taken out of there than has been put in over a period of time, and this more so than in any other portion of the country.

There is still great unexploited wealth in that area, as is pointed out in a bulletin issued by the Department of Mines and Resources entitled, "The Yukon Territory" which was printed in 1944. On page 17 it states:

> To date, production of minerals in the Yukon has come from a few rich deposits. No area has been thoroughly prospected and little drilling has been done, except for placers. Prospecting has been handicapped by the remoteness of the territory and the severity of the winter climate, but much of the geology of areas that have so far received little active attention is favourable for the occurrence of minerals. This factor, together with the variety and widespread distribution of the lode and placer prospects suggest possibilities for expansion in mineral development.

Perhaps the greatest drawback to the development of that area is the complete dependence upon air transportation. At the present time that territory must be developed with modern industrial equipment such as large dredges which cannot be transported by old-fashioned ground equipment or by air. This is recognized by the provincial government of British Columbia, which at the present time, as I understand it, is willing to build its section of the road from Atlin to the Yukon border if the federal government will build their section from the Yukon border to the Alaska highway. That section of road would be only twenty-seven miles in length. I know that the Department of Mines and Resources has this under consideration and I sincerely hope that it can see its way clear to start that work this year.

The British Columbia-Yukon chamber of mines has, since 1945, carried on a struggle to have the freight rates and passenger rates of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines Limited lowered to those prevailing on the main line. To any government interested in such key points as our northern territories, especially those of northern British Columbia and the Yukon, it should be apparent that aid should be given to the people of those territories in their struggle to live in and develop the territories. The cost of living for people in those areas is such that it makes it difficult for them to operate and continue to live in that part of the country. I should like to give details of the cost of some of the things they buy, and these prices are as late as January 8 of this year:

Bread	25 cents a loaf
Milk	25 cents a quart
Eggs	90 cents a dozen
Potatoes	10 cents a pound
Oranges	$1.80 cents a dozen
Gasoline	80 cents a gallon
Wood	$25.00 a cord

Electricity 25 cents a kilowatt hour, plus eight per cent federal tax on the amount.

I understand that the rates for electricity in the more heavily settled portions of the country range from two to four cents per kilowatt hour, while these people have to pay twenty-five cents. The returns paid to industry and the worker are not a great deal higher than would be paid to workers and industry in more accessible parts. Some governments are showing an interest in northern development and are seeing to it that special considerations are given to their people in such areas. It behooves our government to do likewise if they wish people to settle in our northern territories.

Perhaps the greatest barrier to the development of the Atlin and Yukon territories is the complete monopoly in transportation and, unless this monopoly is recognized and dealt with, it will in the final analysis have a detrimental effect upon the development of the territory. For example, with transportation as it is at present, Atlin may well be regarded as being completely isolated. During the period from June 1 to October 15, the district is serviced by lake transportation. This service is given by the White Pass and Yukon Railways, which have a franchise on the lakes. Therefore, having their high freight rates and service protected by lack of competition, they have for the past ten years not given any passenger service on Atlin lake, thus leaving all such travel to the one and only air line serving the district, namely, Northern Airways. The capacity of the White Pass and Yukon railway equipment is limited and inefficient, making the transportation of big machinery out of the question, and the handling of tonnage too small to interest large mining operations. During the remainder of the year, the only method of obtaining freight is by air, unless the ice is suitable for travel; then freight is brought in by tractors and, if very good, by trucks. This mode of travel is not always safe, because there have been several cases of equipment going through the ice.

To bring freight in by air costs five cents a pound air freight and eight cents air express. This is brought in from Carcross, Yukon Territory, to Atlin, British Columbia, a distance of seventy-five miles, or approximately forty-five minutes flying time. The service is very poor, because they make trips with freight at their convenience, when they have a full load. The passenger service is the biggest headache. Rarely does the plane have even a single seat, because the majority of the passengers are crowded in with the freight and mail. The present year-round rate for passenger fare is $23 one way, or a little over thirty-two cents a mile, compared with 6·86 cents a mile from Whitehorse to Vancouver. It may be argued that this high price is necessary owing to the shortage of pay-loads regularly, but only twenty-seven miles of road have to be built by the federal government in order to alleviate the condition. The competition of road service would no doubt bring down the cost of air transportation and at the same time would facilitate the expansion industrially of that area. Surely a government which believes in competition would aid in bringing about that happy state rather than leave it in the present condition.

The British Columbia-Yukon chamber of mines has been fighting the high costs of passenger and freight charged by Canadian Pacific Air Lines between Whitehorse, Mayo and Dawson city. Their original complaint with respect to the service of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines and discrimination in tolls charged was dated June 15, 1945. They have carried on voluminous correspondence with Canadian Pacific Air Lines and the air transport board over this matter since that time. During this long struggle, they have seen an improvement in the type of equipment come into effect, equipment that should be able to operate more cheaply than the original equipment could. However, a decision of the air transport board, arrived at on February 15, 1947, states that the board is unable to discover that any discrimination against these centres exists; and that, in spite of the fact that more modern equipment is now flying over that area, which should lower the costs considerably. It is also a fact that a greater amount of activity is apparent in that territory than existed during the war. Therefore pay loads will be on the increase.

It can be argued successfully that one company, on being given a monopoly, should be able to operate at more reasonable rates than if competing lines were servicing the area, and seemingly this argument is recognized inasmuch as Canadian Pacific Air Lines have the sole right to operate passenger and freight service through this area. However, when a company is forced to make a profit by the nature of the system we live under, I believe it should become apparent to the government that help should be given to outlying areas, such as Dawson city, in order to cut down their costs. This can be accomplished through paying a subsidy to the company operating the mode of transportation or by a more rigorous perusal of their accounts than seems to be the case. That discrimination exists in this area is exemplified by a night letter which was sent by Mr. H. W. Firth, secretary manager, British Columbia-Yukon chamber of mines, from Dawson city to Mr. C. S. Booth, secretary of the air transport board, room 123, No. 3 Temporary building, Ottawa, Ontario, on February 24, 1947, reading as follows:

Your letter February 1 received. We note fare Whitehorse to Edmonton now seventy-five dollars. Whitehorse to Vancouver now eighty-nine dollars. But more particularly fare from Whitehorse to Fairbanks reduced to thirty-five dollars one way. Understand run leased to Canadian Pacific Air Lines further that same is dependent upon questionable volume of passenger revenue. Apparently subsidies direct or indirect are paid to lessee to provide service into foreign country. When may we Canadians expect relief from exorbitant fare Whitehorse to Dawson, sixty dollars one way presently charged under an exclusive subsidized monopoly. Delay in rectifying apparent prima facie case of discrimination and in our opinion outright favouritism shown carrier absolutely incomprehensible to this organization.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the hon. member the return fare from Whitehorse to Dawson?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I am sorry I have not that data at hand.

I believe that this night letter in its way is the best example that I can give of the problem facing these people. Again the government has within its power the opportunity to solve this question by putting through a road from the Alaska highway to Dawson city. This would provide a method of lowering rates faster than all the petitions that could be made before such boards as the air transport board. It would also give an opportunity for small independent businesses to be established in such towns as Dawson. For example, the Dawson city miners have been trying to operate a co-operative store there but, owing to the fact that they have to bring in such large quantities of goods in a short time during the summer season, they simply cannot get far enough ahead in order to carry a sufficient stock to make that business grow. Now that the Alaska highway is in that country, I believe it would be an economic proposition to ask the government to tie in with it existing industrial centres so that they could be given a chance to grow and develop.

Again, I should like to point out that other countries are developing their northern districts with all the aid that the power of the state can command. If we expect to keep pace and at the same time prove the ability of our democracy to exist, we must do likewise.

On motion of Mr. Benidickson the debate was adjourned.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 14, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, May 13, 1947.

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Wednesday, May 14, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF MAY 14

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. My attention has been drawn to a leading editorial appearing in the May 14 issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail, in which charges of dishonesty are made in the disposition of farm properties in British Columbia formerly occupied by persons of the Japanese race. I wish unequivocally to deny the charges which appear in this editorial.

Valuations made of these former Japanese lands were based on conditions which existed immediately prior to the outbreak of the war. The appraisals were made in the early summer months of 1942 when the war was at its blackest for the allied cause. No one knew at that time how long the war would last, but that these lands had any value for the reestablishment of Canadian veterans of world war II is attributable to the fact that Canada and her allies won the war, a fact which the Globe and Mail seems to ignore so far as Japanese nationals are concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member not to read from the editorial but just to state briefly his question of privilege.

Mr. TUCKER: I am not reading any part of the newspaper at all. I am referring to this editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail.

Mr. FRASER: This matter is before a committee, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TUCKER: This is a question of privilege. An attack was made on the honesty of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the other ministers, and surely I am entitled, on a question of privilege, to draw attention to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hon. members opposite do not like it.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Somebody else does not like it.

Mr SPEAKER: Hon. members know that the Speaker is responsible for seeing that the members abide by the rules. I would ask hon. members to allow the Speaker to do that. I suggest to the hon. member that according to the rules of the house a member speaking to a question of privilege should be as brief as possible. I would ask the hon. member to state his question of privilege and give his explanation as briefly as possible.

Mr. TUCKER: I intend to be as brief as I possibly can, Mr. Speaker, and at the same time make my meaning plain. I will say this. I have been assured by the director under the Veterans' Land Act that all former Japanese lands acquired by him and sold to veterans have been sold at sufficient only to cover their actual cost to him. No profit whatever has been made by the Veterans' Land Act administration on the transactions. There are no grounds for the suggestion in the editorial that the lands were resold to the veterans by the Veterans' Land Act administration at "vastly increased amounts". No evidence was submitted to the public accounts committee to this effect, and I protest against such a baseless accusation being made. The facts surrounding the purchase of these lands from the official custodian and their resale to veterans are readily available to the public accounts committee.

Mr. FLEMING: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The matters to which the hon. member is referring are matters which at present are being reviewed by the standing committee on public accounts.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is quite right.

Mr. FLEMING: The evidence has not been completed. The hon. gentleman is referring to something that will have to come before the committee in the way of evidence, probably next week. The statement the hon. member is making now is evidence which should be given before the committee.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, Mr. Speaker, may I proceed with my statement?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to remain silent. They will realize that the hon. gentleman who has the floor is referring to an article which appeared in a newspaper and which apparently contained statements which are contrary to the facts. I believe it is in the interests of the public, and particularly in the interests of the veterans, to know exactly what the administration intends to do. So I believe it is in the best interests of all that the hon. gentleman be permitted to make his statement.

Mr. TUCKER: The facts surrounding the purchase of these lands from the official custodian and their resale to veterans are readily available to the public accounts committee, and the Department of Veterans Affairs would welcome the most searching inquiry. Until this has been done I suggest that in fairness to the public servants involved no such charges, impugning the fairness and honesty of those public servants, should have been given such wide publicity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Seeing that I was personally attacked this morning in the editorial in question in the Toronto Globe and Mail, I think it is my right as a member of this free and unfettered parliament to rise on a question of privilege. I intend, sir, to ask the standing committee on public accounts which is now investigating questions having to do with the administration of the custodian of alien enemy property, to subpoena C. George McCullagh, the editor of the Toronto Globe and Mail, to substantiate if he can—and he cannot—the vile, foul, malicious, meretricious statements contained in that editorial.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): I also rise to a question of privilege, speaking as a member of the public accounts committee, to inform hon. members of this house that under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) that committee is quite capable of carrying on its affairs without direction from the minister or his loquacious assistant.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend apparently is unacquainted with the rules of parliament, which provide that any member of the commons, private member or minister, has the right to appear before any standing committee of this house and make an appeal to that committee, because a committee is only the creature and servant of parliament; and the committee then decides.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then appear before the committee and make application; we will hear you.

IMMIGRATION

POLISH SOLDIERS—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN WOODSTOCK "SENTINEL REVIEW"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to an editorial in the Woodstock Sentinel Review of May 6, attributing to me statements about Polish soldiers which I denied two days afterwards in a statement to the house. I was complaining about the lack of shipping and the abuses of priority shipping to the exclusion of British born. I have been a friend of the Polish nation. What I said is borne out by evidence before the labour and immigration committee of the other house on May 6.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Second report of standing committee on standing orders—Mr. Bertrand (Prescott).

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

TREASURY BILLS

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario):

1. What were the amounts of treasury bills issued by the following provinces and held by the dominion of Canada on December 31, 1946: British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan,, Manitoba?

2. What amounts of treasury bills issued by the following provinces and held by the dominion of Canada have been cancelled and forgiven by the dominion subsequent to December 31, 1946: British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba?

3. What were the rates of interest on the treasury bills cancelled and forgiven and was any accrued interest cancelled and forgiven? If so, give the amounts forgiven to each province?

4. What amounts of treasury bills have been accepted as refunding from the undermentioned provinces, giving particulars: (a) refunded over a term of years without interest; (b) refunded over a term of years with interest, giving the rates of interest on the latter; (b) charged by the dominion government to each of the provinces, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba?

5. Were any treasury bills issued by any of the undermentioned provinces and held by the dominion of Canada, cancelled and forgiven? If so, give full particulars as to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. British Columbia—Loans under relief acts, $34,112,249.99.

Alberta—Loans under relief acts, $25,862,000; subsidy overpayment, $350,000; total, $26,212,000.

Saskatchewan—Loans under relief acts, $70,668,403.20; loans under Saskatchewan seed grain loans guarantee act 1936, $2,637,398.15; loans under seed grain loans act 1937, $7,136,051.09; loans under seed grain loans guarantee act 1938, $10,605,541.48; loans under war appropriation act re Saskatchewan Power Commission, $34,560; total $91,081,953.92.

Manitoba—Loans under relief acts, $24,734,451.82.

2, 3, 4 and 5. The dominion government has not cancelled and forgiven, subsequent to December 31, 1946, any treasury bills issued to it by any province. However, it has agreed to recommend to parliament a programme of refunding, with certain adjustments, the treasury bill indebtedness of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia arising out of loans made by the dominion to the said provinces for relief and other purposes during the depression of the thirties. At a later stage in the session a bill will be introduced seeking authority to enter into the necessary agreements with the provinces concerned, and all details in regard to the amounts to be refunded or cancelled in the case of each province, the rate of interest, etc., will be included in the bill. However, the general principles underlying the proposed debt settlements and present calculations of the amounts involved in the case of each province with the amounts to be refunded or cancelled or otherwise dealt with are shown in the correspondence relating to the proposed tax agreements with the provinces, which was tabled as a white paper on January 30, 1947, and distributed to hon. members. The information will be found on pages 39 and 40 of the white paper.

The treasury bills now outstanding and referred to above bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, except in the case of a Saskatchewan treasury bill issued in connection with the Saskatchewan power commission, which bears interest at 3½ per cent per annum.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE TO THE VATICAN

Mr. CAOUETTE:

1. Has the government reached a decision regarding the appointment of a Canadian representative to the Vatican?

2. If so, what is such decision?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

WORLD WAR II—CANADIAN FINANCIAL CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENSES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What were the total amounts made available by Canada to members of the united nations in connection with the prosecution of the war (a) as gifts; (b) as loans?

2. What were the total expenses to Canada in connection with world war II up to March 31, 1947?

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Gifts

Under The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942— United Kingdom	$ 1,000,000,000.00
Under War Appropriation Acts—Gift of wheat to Greece	19,382,079.19
Mutual Aid
Under War Appropriation (Mutual Aid) Acts—
Australia	91,119,000.00
British West Indies	5,518,000.00
China	26,597,000.00
France	23,629,000.00
Greece	12,000.00
India	18,826,000.00
New Zealand	15,278,000.00
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics	159,113,000.00
United Kingdom	1,870,978,000.00

The above figures differ from those published in the final report of the Mutual Aid Board due to the elimination of the costs of goods on hand and declared surplus at the end of hostilities.

Loans

$700,000,000.00 to the United Kingdom under The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, which has been reduced by repayments to $419,822,848.83.

$10,000,000.00 to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics under the War Appropriation Acts for the purchase of wheat, which has been reduced by repayments to $2,500,000.00.

Temporary Advances under Section 3 of War Appropriation Acts	Balance Outstanding April 30, 1947.
Belgium	$ 501,006.40
Netherlands	3,590,717.42
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics	8,815,680.52

NOTE: Post-war loans made under the authority of The Export Credits Insurance Act and the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, and temporary advances made under the authority of section 3 of The War Appropriation Acts, and repaid, are not included.

2. It is impossible to segregate certain demobilization expenditures from war expenditures. Consequently the figures given below include expenditures made from The War Appropriation Acts, The War Expenditure and Demobilization Appropriation Acts and Demobilization and Reconversion votes in the Appropriation Acts.

Expenditures from War Appropriations
Fiscal year 1939-40	$	118,291,022
" " 1940-41		752,045,326
" " 1941-42		1,339,674,152
" " 1942-43		3,724,248,890
" " 1943-44		4,587,023,094
" " 1944-45		4,418,446,315
Expenditures from War Expenditure and Demobilization Appropriations
Fiscal year 1945-46	$	4,002,949,197
Expenditures from Demobilization and Reconversion Appropriations
Fiscal year 1946-47	$	1,313,188,000 (estimated)
		$20,255,865,996

DEPENDENTS' BOARD OF TRUSTEES—J. PEMBROKE

Mr. FRASER:

1. Did Mr. J. Pembroke make a tour of the various offices of the dependents' board of trustees since October 1, 1946?

2. If so, what was the total cost of such trip?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes, from Montreal October 14, 1946, for final meetings of regional dependents advisory (voluntary) committees at Port Arthur, Regina, Sudbury, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver, Victoria, Winnipeg, Quebec, Saint John, Charlottetown, Halifax, London, Hamilton, Toronto, and Peterboro; returning to Montreal November 23, 1946, and on December 4, 1946, at Ottawa.

2. $957.77 made up of transportation $511.65 and travelling expenses $446.12. Mr. Pembroke, chairman of the dependents' board of trustees, is not in receipt of salary or personal remuneration.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY SECURITIES

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What was the total value of Canadian Pacific securities of all kinds held in the United Kingdom, as at September 1, 1939?

2. What is the total value of Canadian Pacific securities of all kinds held in the United Kingdom at the present time?

3. Have any Canadian Pacific securities held in the United Kingdom been acquired by the government of the United Kingdom? If so, what is the value of such securities so acquired?

4. What is the total value of Canadian Pacific securities returned to Canada from the United Kingdom since September 1, 1939?

5. What disposition has been made of any such securities returned to Canada?

6. Are any such securities in the possession of the Canadian government?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1 and 2. The geographical distribution of the holdings of stock shown in the annual reports of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company follows:

December 31, 1939

	Percentage of Ordinary Stock
Canada	18·87
United Kingdom and other British	51·76
United States	22·86
Other Countries	6·51
	100·00

	Percentage of Preference Stock
Canada	·73
United Kingdom and other British	95·05
United States	·37
Other Countries	3·85
	100·00

December 31, 1946

	Percentage of Ordinary Stock
Canada	12·96
United Kingdom and other British	43·18
United States	37·68
	100·00

	Percentage of Preference Stock
Canada	·57
United Kingdom and other British	97·22
United States	·25
Other Countries	1·96
	100·00

Par value of total ordinary stock $335,000,000 (13,400,000 shares issued at $25 par value).

Par value of preference stock $137,256,921 (£28,203,477 issued in amounts of £1 and multiples converted at $4.86).

In addition there was outstanding at both dates £47,350,321 of 4 per cent consolidated debenture stock issued in sterling which is believed to be mainly held in the United Kingdom.

3. Information on the ownership of Canadian Pacific securities held in the United Kingdom is not available.

4 and 5. There was no repatriation of Canadian Pacific securities by the government of Canada. The distribution of ownership of shares shows a decrease in the number of shares held in Canada since 1939 and an increase in holdings of ordinary shares in the United States. Any securities returned to Canada since then have been more than offset on balance by shares purchased in Canada by investors in the United States.

6. None of the securities returned to Canada are in the possession of the Canadian government. However, the government continues to hold a small number of ordinary shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company acquired after the war of 1914-18.

DEBERT MILITARY CAMP—PROVINCIAL DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE BUILDINGS

Mr. STANFIELD:

1. Has the Nova Scotia provincial government leased or bought from the dominion government those buildings their department of agriculture is now using at Debert military camp? If so, on what terms?

2. If not, are they being used gratis?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. The Department of Agriculture of the government of Nova Scotia took over certain buildings at Debert Military Camp on August 1, 1946 on a rental basis. The amount of rent to be paid and the terms of the lease will be finally determined when the Department of Agriculture has decided exactly what buildings and services are required.

2. Answered by 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SOCIAL SECURITY MEASURES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What were the total costs incurred by the federal government during the 19th parliament in connection with studying and planning a comprehensive social security programme for Canada, including expenses incurred by the committee on social security?

2. What have been the total expenses incurred during the 20th parliament of Canada to date for studying and planning social security measures for Canada?

EVAPORATED MILK—PRICE INCREASE

Mr. DANIEL:

1. What portion of the recent one cent per tin increase in the price of evaporated milk is to be received by the producer, the processor and the wholesaler?

[Mr. Mayhew.]

2. What is the same breakdown with regard to the price rise of cheese and butter.

3. What proportion of the one and a half cent per dozen increase in the price of eggs accrues to the producer and other sections of the industry?

INTEGRATED HOUSING PLAN—ONTARIO

Mr. TIMMINS:

1. In what areas in Ontario are builders constructing houses under the integrated housing plan, in 1947?

2. How many builders are operating under this plan in each said area?

3. How many housing units under said plan are under construction in each said area?

Mr. McILRAITH: Return tabled.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

WAR ASSETS—SALES TO SALABERRY OF VALLEYFIELD

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie):

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the city of Salaberry of Valleyfield, or city of Valleyfield, the mayor or any other officer of the said city and the war assets corporation, concerning the purchase or application for purchase of assets in 1944, 1945, 1946 and 1947.

HOUSING

FULL PRIORITIES ASSISTANCE FOR VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I advised the house that the requirement that a house be fifty per cent completed before a veteran of world war II could obtain formal priorities assistance was being removed and that full priorities assistance would henceforth be granted.

I am now able to advise that these revised procedures are operative immediately. All veterans who come within the definition of a "veteran" established for this purpose may now make application to the priorities officer of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply for this assistance. To qualify as a "veteran" a man must have a minimum of one year's wartime service in Canada or have had overseas service or be in receipt of a war pension. Men continuing in the permanent force and who have had the required wartime service also qualify.

It will be necessary for a veteran to assure the priorities officer that he is building or will immediately commence to build a home for his own occupancy and which he himself will own. On an application form, PB-1047, veterans will be required to give the legal description of the land on which their house will be located and to provide copies of an agreement of sale and purchase if they are not already owners of the land.

Veterans will also be required to state in detail the building materials required for their home and priorities assistance will be extended only for the minimum quantities required to complete a reasonable type and size of house. Details concerning these new procedures are now available from offices of the priorities branch located at Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa.

Priorities assistance extended to veterans will continue to be governed by priorities officer's order No. P.O. 11B, which order channels building materials from the actual producer, down through the various distributional levels, to the veteran's home.

It should be emphasized that the procedures I have outlined have to do only with individual veterans building single houses for their own occupancy under other than the small holdings plan of the Veterans Land Act. Priorities assistance for the construction of groups of veterans' houses will continue to be available in accordance with procedures established by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. FRASER: Would it be possible for the veterans affairs officers in the different districts to have a supply of these application forms for full priorities assistance? It is pretty hard for veterans living a long distance away to get them.

Mr. HOWE: Any organization and any individual may obtain forms from the priorities offices.

Mr. FRASER: Thank you very much.

REGULATIONS WITH RESPECT TO OCCUPANCY OF DWELLING BY OWNER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance, copy of which I have forwarded to him. Will the minister advise the house if any changes are contemplated in the near future to ease rental regulations so as to permit home owners to gain occupancy of their homes in instances where they are suffering hardship under the present regulations?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): As I said in the house a week or so ago, the whole question of rental regulations is under serious study by myself and officials of the wartime prices and trade board. I am not yet in a position to make any statement as to what changes if any can be made in the regulations.

CANCELLATION OF BUILDING PROJECTS BY HOUSING ENTERPRISES LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DAVID A. CROLL (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. The press carried reports this morning that because of the high cost of labour and materials Housing Enterprises of Canada Limited has cancelled Greater Toronto building projects which would have housed about 200 veterans' families. My questions are these: First, is the government in any way a party to this decision, and, second, will this reduce the government's objective of 80,000 houses this year?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to both questions is, no. However, having in mind the public interest in this matter, I feel that perhaps I should make a statement outlining the relationship between Housing Enterprises Limited and the government.

In the summer of 1945 conversations took place between all life insurance companies operating in Canada and the government. It was realized that there was a great need for rental housing. The government explored with the life insurance companies ways and means whereby they might enter this field. The National Housing Act provided for direct investment by the companies under section 11. The companies felt that in view of current conditions they did not care to operate individually under section 11. By a combination of sections 9 and 11 of the National Housing Act, together with subsequent amendment to the act, the life insurance companies formed a wholly owned holding company called Housing Enterprises Limited.

The life insurance companies undertook to construct rental housing for veterans through the agency of Housing Enterprises. The financial arrangement was that a 90 per cent loan for 50 years at 3 per cent was made under the terms of the National Housing Act, and Housing Enterprises invested life insurance company funds for the remaining 10 per cent. Rentals were to be established so that the life insurance companies might earn a limited dividend of 5 per cent on their share, and the government guaranteed that they would receive at least 2½ per cent on money so invested.

By September, 1945, Housing Enterprises had formed an organization. By early 1946 some land had been assembled upon which to erect projects. The 1946 programme of Housing Enterprises amounted to 3,276 units, most of which are at present under construction.

When awarding contracts for their 1946 programme it became evident that firm bids could not be secured except at very high levels. To meet this situation Housing Enterprises entered into an arrangement with contractors for a target price whereby any saving in the target price was divided between the contractor and Housing Enterprises. Housing Enterprises were responsible for any costs incurred in excess of the target price.

The 1946 programme is now well advanced, and it is apparent that practically every project will exceed the target price, and that correspondingly high rentals will result.

It had been originally anticipated that although projects by Housing Enterprises would not be in the really low rental field, nevertheless rentals might be of the order of $35 to $40 for a four room unit. Because of increased building costs, rentals calculated upon the formula which I have described earlier are considerably higher than was originally anticipated. Even in their 1946 programme Housing Enterprises felt that it would be extremely difficult for them to fill the need at a rental level which was originally contemplated.

Last fall Housing Enterprises accumulated land for their 1947 programme. The unsatisfactory nature of many of their 1946 cost-plus contracts made it prudent for Housing Enterprises to require that their 1947 programme be carried out on the basis of firm bids. A firm bid has been received for some 400 units in Hamilton at a price which would result in rentals of $55, $65 and $75 for three, four and five room units respectively. Housing Enterprises feel that the purpose for which they entered the field is not being fulfilled, and that rentals which result from such high costs are far in excess of those which the scheme envisaged. Unless it is possible for Housing Enterprises to secure considerably lower prices on other projects, they do not intend to proceed with their 1947 programme.

The government is grateful to the life insurance companies for the time and effort which they have given to the operation of Housing Enterprises. Every factor has been unfavourable towards carrying out the original intention. I know that the life insurance companies are disappointed that they have been unable to produce the low or moderate rental housing that was originally planned. Nevertheless, the government appreciates the position of the life insurance companies, and although it regrets losing a potential volume of new rental housing, nevertheless it does concur in the decision which has now been taken by them.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. FLEMING: What will now happen to the very considerable number of houses which are under construction by Housing Enterprises Limited? Will that programme be carried through to completion?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, it is my understanding that Housing Enterprises Limited intend to complete all the projects at present under construction. My hon. friend will appreciate, of course, that Housing Enterprises Limited is a purely private project, carried out under the National Housing Act, and that any decision as to whether houses will or will not be completed rests with the insurance companies which formed Housing Enterprises Limited.

Mr. TIMMINS: Is there any obligation on the part of Housing Enterprises Limited to proceed with any of these projects they now say they intend to abandon?

Mr. HOWE: I know of no obligation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Did the minister indicate how many units had been completed of those which were begun last year?

Mr. HOWE: I gave the figure of 3,276 starts. I cannot say how many have been completed.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is there any indication of the rents which are being charged in the Toronto area?

Mr. HOWE: They are too high, I may say. They are not in a class of low-rental housing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How high are they?

Mr. HOWE: Probably about $45 to $55 a month.

Mr. CHURCH: What is the use of building, if you cannot pay the rent?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WORK STOPPAGE IN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW BRUNSWICK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Is he, or his colleague the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), in a position to make a statement with regard to the progress of deliberations with respect to the settlement of the coal strike? This is of transcendent importance to all the people of Nova Scotia. I think it is in the public interest that a statement be made.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): As my hon. friend is aware negotiations took place in Montreal yesterday.

Conversations were held between myself and the miners' representatives this morning, and they are continuing. That is all I can say now.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX

PRESS REPORT AS TO DEFERRED MAINTENANCE CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he made the statement attributed to him in a Canadian Press dispatch which appeared in the Montreal Gazette today, to the effect that a change in regulations will allow companies to offset excess profits by deferred maintenance payments?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend was kind enough to give me notice of this question. I have looked at the dispatch in question, and it is entirely accurate. The paraphrasing by my hon. friend is not quite correct, but that is no fault of his. A representative of the Canadian Press asked me yesterday whether the government had decided to fix a period under the existing statute within which deferred maintenance work carried out could be charged back to excess profits taxes paid in previous years. My reply was that the matter was under consideration but that no decision had been taken.

Mr. ROWE: Arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for York South, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if the government is adopting the practice of making important announcements to the press before they are made to parliament, especially on matters of taxation during a budget debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROWE: I do not need to be called to order. When someone to your right, Mr. Speaker, asks a question, usually a minister makes a speech in reply. I think I have a perfect right to ask the question. I should like also to ask the minister if the matter which he says is under consideration has not been covered already by an order in council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: P.C. 1502.

Mr. ABBOTT: So far as I am aware no order in council has been passed. Replying to the first part of my hon. friend's question as to why a statement was not made in the house, may I say that Mr. Carnegie, the head of the Canadian Press in Ottawa, asked me a simple question and I made a simple answer which I would have made to any member of the press gallery. I said that the matter which he inquired about was under consideration.

Mr. ROWE: As a member of the house I should like to ask a simple question of the minister. Was not an order in council passed on April 17 permitting deferred maintenance claims to be made against excess profits taxes? This is the matter which the minister stated was being considered.

Mr. ABBOTT: The period of time within which deferred maintenance may be charged against excess profits taxes has not, so far as I am aware, yet been fixed by the government. The hon. member for Lake Centre sent me a note asking for information about order in council 1502. I could not recall what it was and I said I would look into it and let him know. I shall do that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister mind tabling that order, P.C. 1502? It has not yet appeared in the Canada Gazette but I think it is a complete answer to the question raised by the member for York South.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be very glad to do it. I think it was passed on the recommendation of the Minister of National Revenue, but I will have the information very shortly.

[Later:]

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I wish to table order in council P.C. 1502 which was asked for this afternoon by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). At the same time I confess the error of my ways. I had thought the matter was still under consideration, but I find that while I was busily engaged in the preparation of my budget, and not attending council as regularly as I might, my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) on April 17 submitted a recommendation establishing the period within which this deferred maintenance might be taken.

FOOD

REPORTED SHORTAGES IN BRITISH AND UNITED STATES ZONES IN GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): In the absence of the Prime Minister I should like to direct a question to the leader of the house. Has the government's attention been drawn to a dispatch in the Globe and Mail this morning, sent from London by Herbert L. Matthews, regarding the food crisis in the British zone of Germany? Reference is made also to the serious situation in the American zone and in referring to both zones the item says "they are quite simply starving". I should like to know if the Canadian government has been approached in this matter, and if there is anything it can do in a situation which has economic, political and humanitarian aspects?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The leader of the house has suggested that I should answer the question which has just been asked and in reply I would say that no consideration has been given to the matter reported on in this morning's papers. However, consideration has been given on many occasions to the possibility of supplying more food for Great Britain and for the other countries which are concerned in obtaining food from Great Britain. All the food which can be accumulated under the different programmes that have been set up is being shipped mainly to Great Britain. Most of the food which we are supplying to any part of Europe is going to Great Britain. I have no doubt that the amount of food supplied by this country has some bearing upon what the British are able to do to take care of the position in Germany. With the exception of wheat, and other small exceptions, all the food supplied by this country goes to Great Britain. Wheat is divided up among the different countries, but again most of it goes to Great Britain.

Mr. COLDWELL: That food is passed on to the British zone under British responsibility?

Mr. GARDINER: Whatever food is passed on goes that way, except what is arranged for through the cereals committee which meets from time to time in Washington and determines what division is to be made of the different cereals. Then there is another committee which divides up the other food, and our food goes to wherever it is allotted.

SUGGESTED DIVERSION OF FREIGHT CARS FOR MOVEMENT OF WHEAT TO EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Has the government given any consideration to diverting more freight cars for the movement of wheat to meet the immediate need for food in Europe which has just been outlined?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The movement of freight cars loaded with wheat is far better now than it has been at any other time. I know my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), will confirm my statement when I say that within the last month or so the movement has far exceeded the priority agreed upon between the wheat board and the railways during the winter months. In fact, it is well above the 1,200 cars per day mark.

REPORTED CHANGE IN PRICE OF BACON ON BRITISH MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. R. DANIEL (Oxford): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture what effect the recent announcement in the press in regard to the revision in the price of bacon on the British market will have on the Canadian producers of bacon?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I did not read the press all through this morning so I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to.

Mr. DANIEL: This morning's press carried a report that Mr. Strachey had made an announcement of a change in the price of bacon.

PUBLIC WORKS

WHARF FACILITIES AT NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, arising out of a telegram which I received just before coming into the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: When hon. members are through laughing I will continue in this free and unfettered parliament. This wire is from the president of the board of trade, an important person, in North Sydney, Nova Scotia, and it points out that the harbour facilities there are closed out because of a lack of wharfage. Can the minister tell the house when his department intends to proceed with the building of the wharf which I understand he has in mind for that particular port?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I have not received any notice of the question, because the hon. member received his telegram only a moment ago. He would not expect me to answer such a question offhand. I will take this as a notice and give the answer tomorrow.

I. G. FARBENINDUSTRIE

INDICTMENT OF OFFICIALS—STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): On March 20 I received a return in reply to this question:

Is the I. G. Farben Company or any subsidiary of such company operating in Canada?

The answer I received was no, that investigations were still proceeding. Due to press reports that twenty-four top officials of the German I.G. Farben Company have been indicted by the United States government, has the government any further information in regard to the investigations being carried on here in Canada?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): The hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his question. In view of the widespread publicity in connection with the indictment by the United States government of twenty-four top officials of the I. G. Farben Company who were charged with plunder, spoliation and mass murder, I prepared a report which may be of interest to the house.

In the office of the custodian there are records of five patents which stood in the name of I. G. Farbenindustrie which, after the outbreak of the war, were licensed for use in Canada by the commissioner of patents under the patents, designs, copyright and trade mark (emergency) order 1939. In respect to these patents, royalties at the rate prescribed by the commissioner of patents in his licensing order have been collected by the custodian from the Canadian licensees. These royalties amount to a little over $8,000. The only Canadian company in which I. G. Farbenindustrie had any direct share interest was a company in Montreal in which I. G. Farbenindustrie owned sixteen per cent of the capital stock. The shares representing this interest were reported to the custodian by the company and vested in the custodian under the regulations.

There was also reported to the custodian a contract between a Canadian company and I. G. Farbenindustrie relating to the use of trade marks and technical assistance. All payments under this contract have been made by the Canadian company to the custodian. In this connection it my be stated that a company incorporated in the United States has laid claim to the amounts realized in relation to this contract by virtue of an alleged assignment from I. G. Farbenindustrie to the American corporation. This claim, however, has not been recognized by the custodian.

My department has not yet an official copy of the recent indictment preferred by the United States against twenty-four senior officials of I. G. Farbenindustrie. The New York Times of May 4, 1947, published extracts and summaries from the indictment. Reference is made in the indictment to cartel agreements with more than 2,000 major industrial concerns in the United States, Great Britain, France, Norway, Belgium, the Netherlands and Poland. The second count of the indictment, relating to plunder and spoliation, mentions the countries involved as Australia, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Britain, France, Denmark, Norway, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, Yugoslavia, Greece, the Soviet Union and the United States.

The head office of the I. G. Farbenindustrie at Frankfurt is in the American zone of occupation and it may be inferred that the indictments were prepared after examination of the records available at the headquarters of I. G. Farbenindustrie. It will be observed that in neither count of the indictment is there mention of relations with firms or industries in Canada. The Canadian government is keeping in close touch with the situation as it develops but has no evidence suggesting any Canadian firm or company has failed to make disclosure of any contracts with I. G. Farbenindustrie, nor is there any evidence that I. G. Farbenindustrie had anything which could be described as an affiliated or subsidiary enterprise or company in Canada.

UNITED NATIONS

REPORTS OF INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND AND INTERNATIONAL BANK OF RECONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Finance tell the house when he will be in a position to table the reports of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank of Reconstruction?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I cannot say, but they will be tabled as soon as they are available.

(Translation):

GALLERIES OF THE HOUSE

PRESENCE OF MEMBERS IN THE GALLERY RESERVED FOR SENATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) I have just received a telegram: Is a member permitted to occupy a seat in the gallery reserved for senators?

(Text):

In case the minister concerned did not understand, I should like to ask this question arising out of several telegrams I have received, like the hon. member for Cape Breton South, just before entering the house: Has a member of parliament the right to sit in the senate gallery?

WORLD TRADE CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Is the minister in a position to give the house any report concerning the proceedings of the international trade conference at Geneva?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. All I can say is that the conference is still proceeding. It has not broken down, and while it proceeds there is hope for its success.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 13, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

(Translation):

Mr. W. M. BENIDICKSON (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, may I at the beginning of my remarks say a few words in the beautiful French language, to congratulate my hon. colleagues who have already given the house and the country a fine example the Canadian parliament. That example should be followed in all sections of the country. I hope to improve my command of French, so that some day I may speak at greater length in that language during our debates.

(Text):

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does the hon. member take his French lessons from the same person who teaches the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank)?

(Translation):

Mr. BENIDICKSON: There takes place during the summer holidays, an exchange of students desirous of learning both our official languages. Students from Ontario register at various centres in the province of Quebec, while those from Quebec study English under highly qualified teachers.

It is perhaps the best means to know and to appreciate one another. That degree of national unity so much sought after, I am sure, by all Canadians will be attained more readily and more rapidly, because the knowledge of both languages will promote better understanding between the two groups.

And now, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall continue my remarks in my mother tongue.

(Text):

We are now discussing the admirable budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), a budget which has brought a considerable reduction in taxation to a substantial number of our taxpayers, and we are faced with amendments by both opposition parties. I propose to deal this afternoon with two sections of the amendment of the Conservative party.

In his amendment the financial critic of the Conservative party said:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance

I shall deal with the subject of agriculture, but I do wish to say something about the record of this government with respect to mining, and the record of the official opposition when they had the chance to administer the affairs of the country. I shall deal also with that section of the opposition's amendment which regretted that there was failure to provide for reconvening the dominion-provincial conference in order to complete satisfactory agreements with the provinces and a dominion-provincial programme of social security, health and public investment.

I think it will be admitted on all sides that mining has certainly been a war victim. The gold mining industry, particularly during the war years, had to take second place to almost every other industry in this country. Now that the war is over, every possible encouragement that can be given to that industry must be given to it, because there is hardly any enterprise which does not receive considerable benefit from the production of our gold mines. Transportation, industry, agriculture, forestry, professional and trained personnel all derive great benefit from the production of gold in this country. Then, an exporting country surely must be thinking in terms of its exchange policy.

Something has been said by the official opposition on the question of parity, which is not in the budget resolutions this year, but which is very much in the thinking of anybody interested in the gold mining industry. Those of us who represent constituencies in which the production of gold is an important factor have, I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, not been inactive in presenting the point of view of that industry with respect to parity. We also welcome the support in any representations of that kind which we have been receiving from several hon. members of the opposition. If I were to single out individuals I would certainly make reference to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram) who spoke yesterday, and I hope we shall again hear some words of encouragement for the gold industry from the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). However, practically all the constituencies in which gold mining is an important factor are represented on this side. I want to assure that industry that these members, the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Gourd), the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Gauthier), the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Little), the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Howe), the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), and so on, have been by no means backward in informing the Minister of Finance as to the desires of this industry in the matter of parity and everything else.

In the course of the debate there were references to the budget not saying anything about encouragement for mining. One of the reasons that the budget has no reference to the gold mining industry particularly is that, as a result of representations made to the Minister of Finance long in advance of the budget announcement, he was good enough to introduce a change in the depletion and depreciation allowances, which have been a decided boon to the mining industry. I wish to say that it is fortunate the minister made his announcement in March instead of holding it back until a later date; some of the mines might have been discouraged and might not have gone ahead with their development programme if the announcement had been deferred to this day.

I read carefully the remarks made by the financial critic of the official opposition. As all hon. members know, he spoke at considerable length, but only four or five lines of his remarks dealt with the matter of mining. In spite of that he thought that industry worthy of a particular clause in his amendment. All he had to say was this; he was very cagey:

> I wish to make one other comment of a much more serious nature, . . . As far as I could judge on first hearing, it seemed to me there was no beginning to deal with the situation in regard to the gold industry which is so vital in that all important aspect of our business relations, namely, exchange with the United States.

That is all he said on the subject that day. As hon. members know, adjournment of the debate took place; he had an opportunity for further consideration and continued his remarks almost a week later. But when I read the continuation of his contribution to the debate—and as I pointed out he thought that amendment was sufficiently important for him to use it as a reason for saying that we should not go into committee of supply in order to progress in the matter of completing these tax reductions—

Mr. KNOWLES: Ways and means.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: —I find that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) who, as we know, in this playtime or make-believe cabinet of the official opposition is supposed to be the pretender to the ministry of finance, said at page 2803 of Hansard as follows, and I want the people interested in gold mining to pay particular attention to it, particularly the Northern Miner of Toronto.

> Finally, I was disturbed with a remark which is attributed in the press to the governor of the Bank of Canada. I want to be very careful on this because it was only in the press and I think it may have been an offhand remark.
> I would not take it too seriously, but the governor was quoted as saying that it would be to our advantage—this is in connection with the whole question of exchange—if the price of gold were increased in the United States.

I pause in that quotation to remind the house that I can think of nothing which would be of greater benefit to the gold mining industry than an increase in the price of gold by the United States, which is probably the only country in the world in a position economically to make such an increase. I continue with the quotation from the speech of the financial critic of the official opposition:

> That disturbed me very much because, I suppose, there could not be a more inflationary measure and because it seemed to me that if that was the only way, or was one of the serious ways, which the government regarded as a possibility of dealing with this thing, or of finding a way out, then it seemed to me the matter was not being dealt with as it should.

He concluded by saying:

> Of course we all know that the final solution of exchange is trade . . .

That, of course, is good Liberal doctrine. I am hoping that in the course of the debate not only shall we hear words of encouragement for the gold mining industry from the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram) and the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), as we have been led to expect, but the leader of that party, who apparently saw fit to place the question of mining in an important amendment, will have something to say which is not evasive and not on the fence with respect to their attitude to parity and particularly with respect to their attitude to this question. Does he agree with the financial critic that it would be a bad thing if the United States raised the price of gold? I am hoping that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) himself will have something to say on this.

Mr. SKEY: How about the leader of the government?

Mr. BENIDICKSON: We stand on our record, may I say to my hon. friend. I am going to speak of that and I am going to speak of my hon. friend's record the last time his friends were given the opportunity of saying what they would do with respect to the gold mining industry.

However I do not expect a great deal from the leader of the opposition in the matter of a firm statement, because on this issue, as on most issues, to use the wording of one newspaper, he will probably "take refuge in the calculated obscurity of ambiguous silence."

Mr. KNOWLES: Say that in French.

Mr. IRVINE: He might as well.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: What is the comparative record of the party in official opposition and the government with respect to their attitude toward the gold mining industry? When that party now in official opposition had an opportunity to show their affection and keen interest in the gold mining industry between 1930 and 1935, what happened? When they took office, the government of 1929 had left them regulations under which there was a fifty per cent depletion allowance for the gold mining industry and a 33⅓ per cent depletion allowance with respect to base metals. The same depletion allowances were available for dividends from those industries. What happened? In five years in office they reduced the depletion allowances to 33⅓ per cent and they reduced the depletion allowances with respect to dividends to twenty per cent. In addition to that, I think the most uneconomic and most vicious tax that was ever imposed on the gold mining industry was imposed by the Conservative government in 1934. It was known as the bullion tax. In 1936, after they were swept out of office—and I think northern Ontario helped in the sweeping—the Liberal government introduced an important tax concession with respect to gold mining and that was an exemption from tax for three years for new producers. That was a Liberal measure. In addition, there was recognition that a certain period of time was necessary for what the industry calls "tuning-up", getting the machinery going, when a great deal of ore which clings to the machinery and so on is used. That amounts, on an average, to about half a year. So that a decided encouragement was given to the industry. For practically three and a half years a new mine was exempt from taxation.

I also want to point out that there is on the gold mining industry no tax, federally, which is not paid by any other industry in the country. However, that is not true of the administration of our hon. friends in the provincial sphere. In this amendment they are criticizing the government today for failure to give further encouragement to the gold mining industry. When there is only one Conservative government in the whole country, what has that government done? In the last budget it introduced the three per cent tax, the new mining tax of Ontario on gold mines. In addition to that, it eliminated the depletion allowance. I think we can only judge our hon. friends by what they do when they are given an opportunity to administer the laws of the country.

On the other hand, what is the record of this government? The depletion allowance, which I have said was reduced by the Conservative government from 50 per cent to 33⅓ per cent, was this year increased to 40 per cent. In addition to that, there was a per ounce depletion allowance of $4, which means that any mine whose margin of profit is less than $10 receives a better arrangement under that $4 proposition than it does under the 40 per cent one. The result is that, instead of some mines having a depletion allowance of 33⅓ per cent, as they had under the Conservative regime, they have a depletion allowance of 100 per cent in some instances, and 80 per cent in others. This is a decided benefit to the marginal mine.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the reference I propose to make with respect to the inadequacy of an amendment from the official opposition when it comes to the gold mining industry. I think the proof of the appreciation which that industry has for its good friends is in the representation in this house, in that the official opposition is not represented in any part of the country where gold mining is a major factor in the constituency itself.

I propose now to deal with the matter of dominion-provincial relations, another instance in which the official opposition thinks its resolution should be carried. If that resolution were carried it would mean we would not proceed with the reductions in taxation proposed by the Minister of Finance; and I do not think there is any question that the governor general would consider Mr. Bracken unable to carry on the administration, so that we would have an election.

What is the basis of this amendment? I am going to endeavour to show the house that there seems to be a lack of conviction on the part of the official opposition with respect to dominion-provincial policy, if we go back and look at the policies supported by the leaders in this particular field at a time when they were perhaps not as prejudiced as they might be now, having political motives for presenting an amendment of this kind. First of all, I want to deal with the record of the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken), which I may know perhaps better than most of those now sitting behind him because I came from the province of Manitoba and at one time endeavoured to assist the hon. gentleman in attaining his political desires. Based on fifteen or twenty years of experience with him, I am probably in a position to know as much about his attitude toward dominion-provincial affairs as almost anyone sitting behind him in this parliament. I should like, then, to give just a few extracts to show the attitude taken by the hon. gentleman in 1941, when a somewhat similar situation existed to that which has developed in the last year or so. In 1941, with the war in progress, and so on, there was a desire to have some unification of the taxation proposals in certain fields. As you know, Mr. Speaker, there were great difficulties with certain provinces. I will give the leader of the opposition his due and say that at that conference he represented a province which was prepared to go along with the proposals advanced by the administration which was in charge of the war effort; but there were others who did not see it in that light, and the situation existing today is parallel to the situation in 1941. After that abortive conference, the present leader of the opposition went back to Winnipeg and as premier of the province of Manitoba went on the radio and had this to say—

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): As the Tory leader?

Mr. BENIDICKSON: No; at that time he was a Liberal Progressive. He said:

> Two weeks ago tomorrow in the city of Ottawa the dominion-provincial conference which was called to consider the Sirois report, was wrecked.

He then went on to deal with the investigation which had been made by that commission, the reasons for calling the conference, and so on, and went on to say that there could be no just settlement of the problem without strengthening the powers of the dominion and that to do so, far from weakening, would actually buttress provincial autonomy. Then I have some further extracts. He said if they failed even to make agreements with those provinces that were willing, that the dominion in those circumstances—no; there were no qualifications; he said, "under any circumstances".

> Failing the consent of all the provinces, should the dominion enter into agreements with such of them as were ready to make them, or should the dissenting provinces be conceded the right of veto?

What did the present leader of the opposition have to say in that respect? He said this:

> Can we suppose that by erecting a Chinese wall around every province in Canada, by Balkanizing this country from coast to coast, that we would be adding to Canadian wealth or Canadian prestige or Canadian unity or making Canada a greater country than it has been in the past?

And he said:

> The provincial governments are not the only governments in Canada which have a responsibility. . . Indeed their responsibilities in this connection are of a minor character as compared with that of the dominion government.

Somebody may say that he had in mind simply the emergency of war. In that very radio speech, however, he quoted something said by the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King); and when I give that quotation I think hon. members will see that he was going far beyond the necessities of the war. Again when I give this quotation hon. gentlemen will appreciate the far-sightedness of the Prime Minister, because this is what he said, as quoted by the present leader of the opposition:

> The war inevitably will be followed by a period of reconstruction which will impose new obligations and burdens upon all Canadian governments . . . All I am sure will agree that the sooner we are able to make the necessary adjustments, the better equipped we will be to finance the war and to cope with post-war problems.

That is a quotation from Mr. King that Mr. Bracken gave in Winnipeg following that conference. Then he had this to say:

> Is the dominion government to be excused from the discharge of that responsibility by the fact that the premiers of three provinces walk out of a conference? . . . If we are to face the post-war period with a governmental system that has proven itself incapable of dealing with the depression years, the dominion government—not certain provincial governments—must bear the responsibility.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): If I may ask the hon. member a question, when this quotation was read was the leader of the opposition still the Liberal chief of the Manitoba government?

Mr. BENIDICKSON: That is correct, but I may say quite a change has taken place since that time. The leader of the opposition was enlisted in the hope that he could sell progressivism to the old guard of the Tory party, but I am afraid he has found that difficult, as we can see by his meaningless phrases on this crucial issue today. I am afraid Toryism has sold Conservatism to the Progressives.

If anybody stands out in the public mind today as the champion of the autonomy of the provinces; if there is anyone who would lead the public to believe that the provinces had been injured in some way by reason of these proposals, it is the premier of Ontario. I have done a little research, and I find that even in 1941 the views of the present leader of the opposition and Mr. Drew were not very dissimilar. In 1941 Mr. Drew, as leader of the official opposition in the province of Ontario, had views apparently quite the opposite of those he holds today. He went to Halifax—I imagine the climate was nice at that time—just at about the time of the Manitoba election. I looked up the records here in the house, and I find that his speech was given considerable prominence. Hon. members may be surprised at the headline: "Drew urges authority be centralized." He went on to say:

> Remedying Canada's system of overgovernment by more centralization of authority and attention to post-war employment problems were urged by Lieutenant Colonel George Drew, K.C., soldier, writer and leader of the Ontario opposition, describing Canada's overgovernment as the most colossally incompetent system in the world.

Then he went on to say:

> What we need greatly is to look at government from a business viewpoint, parallelling methods that a private business head office and nine branch plants would employ to promote more efficiency.

I am sure he would rise in all his hauteur today if anybody suggested he was operating a branch plant in Toronto for Mackenzie King and Company, with head offices in Ottawa. On that occasion he concluded his speech by saying:

> Canada's main problem was its decentralized governmental system, and the speaker declared a solution to that problem would ensure continuance of the national structure.

Probably at that time he thought, instead of stopping at Queen's Park, he would not be beaten out by the present leader of the opposition, so he was thinking in terms of the national party. Then I need hardly remind the house that in the province of Ontario no newspaper supports the present viewpoint—not the past viewpoint—of the premier of Ontario as does the Toronto Globe and Mail. Mr. Drew's champion in that respect stands out predominant in this province.

I should like also to read a brief quotation from a speech which was given by a prominent citizen of Canada, who is also a resident of Ontario. With the permission of the house I shall alter just one word in my reading of this speech and after I have read it, I shall point out to hon. members the word I have altered. This speech is quoted as follows:

> The Premier of Ontario is head of an unwieldy and costly government in the wealthiest and most fortunate Canadian province. It is an organization whose expenditures run close to $100 million annually. He is a clever man and knows well that the provincial government systems are altogether too costly, totally unnecessary and one of the principal causes of disunity in the country . . . I strongly urge him and all other provincial leaders to look squarely at the facts, provide some evidence of real public service, and let us get busy and scrap this expensive provincial system. National unity must come from within the provinces. Let us not, you and I, the people, be deceived by this clap-trap talk of provincial rights. It would be named better as politician's rights.

And later:

> The greatest service the Premier of Ontario could do for Canada, and something which would carry his name into history as a public benefactor, would be for him to state publicly what we all know; that our provincial governments are political misfits, that they are unnecessary duplications, luxuries we cannot afford, and endless causes of disunity.

In concluding his remarks, the speaker said—> —that if the people of any part of Canada get into trouble, all the country must assist them. We could not shirk our responsibilities as fellow Canadians.

I promised hon. members that I would explain where I had used one word in substitution for the word appearing in the quotation. I used the words "Premier of Ontario" where the speaker actually used the words "Mr. Hepburn." But the speaker was Mr. George McCullagh, publisher of the Globe and Mail, who made the speech on January 22, 1939.

Mr. Bracken, Mr. Drew and Mr. McCullagh —the chief champions of what they call provincial rights and provincial autonomy at the present time! What do they use as the bogey on which to hang their hats with respect to this argument? Hon. members are aware that they bring in the constitution—and that is always pretty baffling to the public. Mr. Drew, and also the premier of Quebec claim that the dominion has been invading rights which are theirs exclusively in the field of direct taxation. Let us look into that. The constitution is set out in the British North America Act, section 91 of which sets out the taxation rights of the federal government. In part, it says that the federal government has exclusive legislative authority for—

> The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.

Then section 92 of that act sets out the rights of the provinces and, among other things, it says this:

> The legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to—
> 2. Direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

Now, if the premiers of these hold-out provinces say that the provinces have a clear domain in direct taxation—and it seems that these provinces have a right to impose taxes of this kind—the constitution is, of course, with them. Of course it is. But if, however, they say that Ottawa has no right whatsoever in these fields, the constitution is clearly against them.

They are in a peculiar position, too, in that they claim they are resting on the constitution which they believe should be inviolate. It would require an amendment to the constitution to eliminate the federal government from the fields which they criticize the federal government for being in. Thus I say that, on the pretext of desiring to defend the constitution as an integral document, the premiers of Quebec and Ontario are, in reality, seeking to usurp powers specifically assigned to the federal government by the fathers of confederation; or, in other words, to whittle down the rights of the central government.

With respect to income tax, who entered the field of income tax first? The dominion government was in that field in 1917. Neither the province of Quebec nor the province of Ontario imposed income taxes until 1926. Yet they say there is intrusion upon their preserves. I know the argument is not of great importance at the present time, because we have found that, no matter how heinous would be this practice, these particular premiers are prepared to put up with this horrible and unconstitutional proposal, provided that the price is right.

The federal government, as we know, was represented by a capable group of cabinet ministers. At pages 508 and 509 of the proceedings of the conference, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) is reported as saying:

> The courts have repeatedly held that the dominion government has equal rights to impose either direct or indirect taxation. And let me say right here that I dissent entirely from the view that the fathers of confederation were mistaken when they gave that right to the dominion government. Where would this country have been at the time of the first war or the one which has just closed had it not the right to go into the field of direct taxation?

The Minister of Justice said that this nation would be a nation with its hands tied behind its back; and I think all hon. members will recognize that that is a fairly accurate statement.

Another argument advanced by the provincial premiers is that there is something dangerous, something wrong, something demoralizing in the subsidies principle. The financial critic of the official opposition has brought in Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Winnipeg Free Press and others to support him in that particular contention. The provincial premiers are alarmed at the percentage of their revenues that would come from the subsidies system.

I should like to remind hon. members that when this country became a nation, when the confederation agreement was made, the proportion of revenues to subsidies, with respect to both what it cost the dominion and what was received by the provinces, was greater at that time than it is under present agreements.

So I say that the real grievances, although they are used as a cloak, are surely neither the constitution nor the danger of subsidies; because we have seen that both of these premiers have indicated that at a certain price they will be prepared to do business.

I am reminded of a story I read in the Reader's Digest, in which Lord Beaverbrook was said to have been playing a game of hypothetical questions with a famous actress. In this game Lord Beaverbrook said to the actress, "Would you live with a stranger if he paid you £1 million?" She said without hesitation at all, "Of course I would." He said, "And if he paid you £5?" And she said, "What do you think I am?" He said, "We have established that; we just want to know the degree."

I say that obviously the two premiers have nothing on which to stand when it comes to a consideration of the constitution and the danger of subsidies. In fact, I should like to ask some of the federal members of the Progressive Conservative party—the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), the hon.

member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), and some others who come from provinces from which there is at least a semblance of Progressive Conservative representation—whether they feel that their governments, and the members they have in those governments, have sold their provinces down the river by concluding agreements with the federal government. I believe the finance minister of British Columbia is a member of the Conservative party. I want to know whether they think that either they have been neglecting their province and have made a poor agreement or that the agreement was a good one and that these agreements are robbery as far as the provinces of Ontario and Quebec are concerned. I do not think they are. I do not think the constitutional bogey is the real motivating force when it comes to the opposition which we have been getting from the chiefs of the major provinces. I believe the premier of Ontario disclosed his real objection when he said at the last conference, as reported on page 1206:

I think it will help us reach the agreement which is so essential if we realize that most of the beclouding difficulties which still exist between complete settlement and the position we have reached lie in the fact that we do not proceed simply to substitute for one tax agreement another tax agreement to deal with the same problem.

What has led to the increasingly wide circle of discussion has been the introduction into that relatively simple problem of a great number of projected promises in fields which were in no way directly related to the tax agreement which was coming to an end.

What was he afraid of? He was afraid of the proposals for the extension of social services. However, he had time to think about the matter; he went out to lunch; he came back and in continuing that particular speech he said:

We are now faced with the statement that it is essential for the dominion government to have very large revenues because of the undertakings they have given.

He referred to the war costs, and then he went on to say:

I would recall that in addition to these obligations created by expenditures on war itself . . . we realize that beyond all these are obligations that have been incurred since January 6, 1944—

That is when he protested that he thought his own government had nothing to fear in introducing itself into social legislation, and he asked for a conference. He went on:

—to the extent of many hundreds of millions of dollars, in regard to which no province was consulted in advance. It may be that the dominion government is committed to the continuance of those obligations it has undertaken, a point which means they must carry on.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Then, the following day he went on to say:

I said yesterday that a large part of the difficulty created for the dominion government was that instead of dealing strictly with the tax agreement they incorporated in these proposals a number of extraneous subjects which impose heavy additional burdens.

What is he thinking about? Social services. The proposals that had been made really exceeded the revenues that were ever received from those sources by these governments in days gone by. They claim that there is an invasion of provincial rights, but I say that that claim must be dismissed. I do not think they could find a lawyer who would support them in the statement that there is any invasion in that respect. I am sure that the real reason back of the opposition that we are getting is that they feel they can block the social security programme contained in these measures.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: I will conclude by saying that I consider it necessary that each government should arrive at some financial agreement. I am the first to say that if a further step is to be taken—and it is promised that it will be taken before the agreements are made—we must have a conference for the parties to decide upon dominion and provincial jurisdiction when it comes to this necessary social services programme. I would not support the agreements if I felt that there was an invasion of the constitution, which I appreciate and which I know the members of the federal government appreciate as being very dear. I am sure that the fight which we have been reading about in the newspapers is a phony fight. The real reason these people are backing out of this conference, the real reason for their procrastinating and so on is that they cannot see that we are moving along very quickly with respect to these wonderful proposals for the people of Canada in the way of social services.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my remarks I want to deal with two things that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) referred to in opening his speech. First, I want to correct something that he has assumed in error was said by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdon-

> . . . I suppose, there could not be a more inflationary measure and because it seemed to me that if that was the only way, or was one of the serious ways, which the government regarded as a possibility of dealing with this thing, or of finding a way out, then it seemed to me the matter was not being dealt with as it should.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was referring to the governor of the Bank of Canada who was reported in the newspapers as saying that a rise in the price of gold in the United States would be an advantageous thing for Canada. He did not oppose the statement made by the governor of the Bank of Canada; he simply said it was strange that the governor of the Bank of Canada should have said such a thing and it be admitted in the newspapers, because the whole reason for the definite reduction in the price of gold in Canada was that it was an anti-inflationary measure. The reason that statement was made was to show that, on the one hand, we had the government decreasing the price of gold in Canada because increasing the price of gold would be inflationary, and yet saying at the same time that an increased price of gold in the United States would be a good thing. On the one hand, you have the statement by the governor of the Bank of Canada and, on the other hand, you have the actions of the government. They do not jibe. Actually we are dependent, more than many of us like to think, upon the gold mining industry and in a minute or two I shall refer to that in more detail.

There is one other thing I wish to say with regard to the bullion tax put on by the previous Conservative or Bennett administration in the years of the depression. That bullion tax was a wholly iniquitous thing. I said so then and, in fact, I broke with my party on that issue. But let me say that the fathers of that bullion tax, the people who believed in it, the people whose brain child it was, are still officials of the Department of Finance; they are the people who are still responsible for the policies of this government. They are still there and the mining industry is still getting a short shrift.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a good thing for Canada that they are still there.

Mr. ADAMSON: I hope the minister is correct, but I do not think he is.

There was a great contrast in the presentation of the budget this year with the presentation of previous budgets by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). There was a difference not only in the presentation but in the preparation. Previously the budget required a period of confinement, and one would see the Minister of Finance in a state of high emotion, full of care and worry over the secrets he held in his breast. This year the situation was quite different. There was a gladsome cheerfulness, even a spirit of levity before the presentation of the budget and it seemed that the minister sought company rather than the solitude of a lonely cell. The difference in result was equally pronounced and, instead of giving birth to a wild, strangling octopus with a well-fanged voracious mouth which fastened itself upon the vitals of the Canadian people, sucked their blood and ate their sinews, this budget was a more pleasant affair, but it was not the grand, brave, healthy child its parents could have wished it to be. Rather it was a somewhat misshapen infant whose producers were forced to emphasize one part of it, leaving the rest of the body covered to prevent close inspection. It is with regard to what remains covered that I wish to speak today.

Heretofore in this house I have spoken on mining. I have tried to plead with the government to save the industry, particularly the gold mining industry. They have not listened; in fact, they have done the very things which are most likely to destroy the industry entirely. I will not go into the figures again, but I merely wish to say that if present mining costs continue at the same rate of increase as they did in the last calendar year, by the end of the year there will be only eight to ten straight gold mines which can operate at a profit. In the beginning of the depression years there used to be a saying in mining circles, "the big eight". It would appear from the government's policy that we are to return to a period when we can say, "not the big eight," but merely "the eight" which are getting by.

To show you, Mr. Speaker, that mining costs are still going up, two increases were made recently, an increase of ten per cent, I think, on dynamite, and another increase on steel. Prices of materials required by the mines are still rising.

The facts are simple, and they are these. If a mine can produce an ounce of gold after taxes and development for less than $34.80 an ounce, it can make a profit. If it cannot do this, it cannot make a profit. If it cannot make a profit, it cannot continue to operate. As a matter of fact, a great many mines will continue to operate, and are, in fact, operating now, when they should in their own interests be closing up, so that they may preserve their treasury until such time as the economic planners of the world's currencies realize that you cannot restore world trade with fantastically overvalued currencies. This may take years, and the mines which are now unable to make a profit or which see the handwriting of eventual suspension of operations as inevitable should take action now to close, and preserve their assets while they have them.

This is not an advocacy of doom. It is merely looking at the facts of the case as they actually exist. Many mines are today merely trading dollars. They are taking the ore out of the ground for what it costs them and they are exchanging it for dollars. That is what is happening. I am not going to mention the camps, but in a great part of the province of Quebec mines are operating today with no profit or at a loss. The ore in these mines is being depleted and, once gone, it never comes back. The net result is that we have today a number of mines which are merely trading dollars. Once the costs rise higher, those mines will be operating at a loss, and once that happens—and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it is happening at a number of mines right at this very moment—there is eventually only one thing that can happen to these mines and that is they must close. I suggest that many of them should preserve their assets, not take out their rich and high-grade ore, not deplete their treasury, but preserve their assets now so that when we have a realistic foreign policy and a different policy with regard to exchange from the present one they will be able to reopen and provide Canada with the necessary gold and exchange which we shall need when the reconstruction period really begins.

I come now to the reasons for the parity action taken by the government last July. The excuse for this offered by the government, that rising prices in the United States would cause rising prices in Canada, is open to question. However, if we assume that this supposition is correct, is it likely that an adjustment of currency of ten per cent will offset the impact of United States inflation on the Canadian price structure, particularly as the result was to establish two types of Canadian dollar, the external or free dollar, and the internal or controlled dollar, the former selling at a discount of approximately ten per cent?

I think we must look deeper for the reason for parity. We must look to external pressure put on this government to force them to take this move. What could that external pressure have been, and where could it have come from? I think it is reasonable to say that it could have come only from Washington, but what were the reasons that it did come? What lever could be employed by the United States government on the Canadian government to make them take this action? The lever could only have been an economic one, and it could not have been a tariff threat. Therefore we are left with the necessity of finding some other cause. We know that the Canadian exchange position was giving us an advantage over the United States in world trade, particularly in South American trade. We know that subsequently the United States trade with South America grew until it has become the largest segment of United States foreign trade. We know that it was important for the United States to foster this trade, and to do everything they could to increase it. Their most serious competitor in South America was Canada.

Last July, when the OPA ceilings were removed the present United States government was going through its most unpopular period in its own country; in fact, the Gallup polls showed that the present administration sank to an all-time low in popular appeal about that time. The country was beset by strikes of a desperate nature and foreign orders could not be filled. The situation was bad enough in Canada, but it was not quite as bad as it was in the United States. Therefore it would benefit the United States to have the ten per cent trading advantage enjoyed by Canada in the South American markets removed. What could be done to put pressure on Canada?

About the time the OPA was removed, the United States congress was in a recalcitrant mood. There was an important piece of legislation going through congress at that time, namely the British loan which is known as public law No. 509, chapter 577. We had already agreed to a loan to Britain, but the United States had not agreed to their loan of $3¾ billion. It was obviously important to Canada that the United States loan to Britain should go through, and this was clear to Washington. Here, therefore, was the opportunity for Washington to put pressure on Ottawa; here was the chance for a deal. Reliable sources have told me that a deal was made, and for placing the Canadian dollar at par with the United States dollar the United States administration gave assurance that the British loan would go through. The public facts are these and the dates are as follows: The OPA was ended on June 30, against the wishes of the administration. The then Minister of Finance for Canada made his statement regarding parity on July 6, and the United States congress passed the British loan on July 13. These dates are important because they quite entirely fit in with the information I have. This, I suggest, was the true reason why the Canadian dollar was put on a par with the United States dollar. At the time that the legislation was going through, we know there was interference by the United States government in Palestine. We have the statement of the British government at the time that, had there been no interference, a solution of the Palestine problem might have taken place. I think it is important that that fact be associated with the other, because it shows how Washington interfered in another situation.

I mention this here because it shows the vulnerable position of Canada in any squeeze play of that kind being exerted between the United Kingdom and the United States. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to suffer and suffer seriously if we do not maintain facilities within our own country to protect our currency. The best and greatest protection of the Canadian currency is gold, and a large gold production.

The result of the parity action has been, amongst other things, to create two types of Canadian dollars. The foreign exchange control board calls it the "unofficial Canadian dollar". New York sources have stated that the market for unofficial dollars is running at the rate of several hundred million a year. Be that as it may, the fact remains that we have an external currency selling at a discount of eight per cent to ten per cent and, in my opinion, it is likely to sell at a greater discount in the course of the year. One of the unfortunate results of this is that the United States tourist, knowing that his money is at a premium over ours, will demand that premium when he visits Canada, and there will be constant arguing and bickering between Canadian hotelkeepers and retail merchants and the United States tourists who will receive only one Canadian dollar for every United States dollar. One of the unfortunate aspects of this is that the average United States citizen knows little about foreign exchange. He will not change his money at the discount rate at his own bank before he visits Canada. He will, therefore, arrive in Canada with his pockets full of United States currency, and many of them will consider they are being cheated if they do not get the free or unofficial United States premium on their own currency. In fact, we are to a minor extent doing what Germany did in establishing the tourist marks for sale outside Germany at a considerable extent over the pegged exchange rate, the only difference being that we are doing it unofficially and against the government's wishes, whereas the German did it as a set fiscal policy.

I come now to the question of our adverse balance of trade with the United States. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) agrees that the situation is serious, but in my opinion it is far more serious than he believes. The official holdings of gold and dollars in the past year declined by $263 million, and our adverse balance of trade with the United States was $603 million. At the end of the year our holdings of gold and dollars were $1,200 million. We received substantial imports of gold of $150 million purchased from the United Kingdom, $87 million from countries other than the United Kingdom and the United States, largely for UNRRA account, and $103 million by what is termed "capital inflows and exchange adjustment." Nothing is said by either the foreign exchange control board or the minister as to whether these substantial sums are likely to be repeated during the present year. Therefore we must assume that we shall have to meet a $600 million deficit to the United States in hard currency and gold, largely from our own resources.

It is stated by the government that in July we should be able to exchange sterling for dollars. This, I think, is counting one's chickens before they are hatched and does not recognize the steadily worsening economic and political picture of the United Kingdom and all Europe. If we are unable to obtain the right to convert sterling into dollars our position will be truly desperate. I want to quote from an official statement of the government itself, a statement made in "Foreign Trade" by A. E. Bryan, commercial counsellor for Canada in London, at page 835. He says this about United Kingdom trading position:

> The internal financial problems of this country are, in the official view, relatively easy compared with the external difficulties created by the heavy adverse balance of payments. The chancellor of the exchequer, in submitting the budget to parliament, declared that no other country in the world, without exception, faced so difficult a problem. The sterling balances would never have arisen had lend-lease been the common rule among all the allies, and he pointed out that this huge balance could never be discharged, or even diminished, except by unrequited exports. In 1946, the total oversea deficit of trading account was £400,000,000, but the gap in 1947 will be considerably higher unless vigorous action is taken to reduce it.
> The accounts with soft currency areas just about balanced last year, so that the hard currency deficit on current trading in 1946 was approximately equal to the total oversea deficit.
> In 1947 the hard currency deficiency is likely to be substantially higher. The dollar prices have been rising and the United Kingdom authorities have been drawing much faster than they intended on the United States and Canadian credits. The essence of the difficulty, according to the chancellor, is that the United Kingdom has too much to buy for dollars because too little comes forward from the rest of the world. It has so far been selling too little for dollars, although it is hoped that the results of the international trade organization conference will help by increasing the flow of international trade.

This is a statement of the Canadian trade commissioner and can be assumed to be an official statement. Therefore we have a stark and official statement of the difficulties we are to expect in our international trade this year. I submit that, despite anything that he said, any hopes that he may have, we shall find it almost impossible to obtain gold for sterling without seriously, and tremendously seriously, disrupting the equilibrium of the United Kingdom's financial picture. That is a thing which this government or any government must be very careful about doing.

I do not want in any way to criticize the United Kingdom, but there are certain physical and inescapable facts which we must recognize. They are not the fault of any government, although, in my opinion, they have been intensified by the nationalization of industry in England; nevertheless they cannot be charged to the Labour government.

The first of these is that, even in the best of times, the United Kingdom cannot grow enough food to feed its population. The second is that, in order to obtain money to purchase the food it needs from foreign countries, it must export goods in exchange for the food. The third is that, to export goods, it must manufacture, and, to keep the wheels of its factories going, it needs primary power which, in England, comes almost solely from coal. The fourth fact is that the production of coal has declined, for physical and political reasons, to a degree where the output is not sufficient to keep the country warm and the industries going.

Prior to the war, Britain drew on her investments abroad to purchase the food she needed to keep her going. All these investments have now been liquidated. These facts, which form a vicious circle, are bound to force the United Kingdom into one of three courses. She can default entirely on the repayment of her loans abroad both to us and to the United States. She can export her industries and, with them, a sufficient percentage of her population to make it possible for the home agriculture to feed those who are left. The third possibility is that she may starve. There is no other way out. If we do not recognize the handwriting on the wall we shall continue to allow the situation to worsen and eventually be dragged down into the whirlpool of international bankruptcy.

I want to mention one thing here, and that is that instead of exporting capital to England we should be importing her industries and large parts of her population. If there is one thing that made the Canadian war effort a success, apart from the courage and energy of our people, it was the fact that the Canadian worker could command a great volume of primary power. Every Canadian worker had at his hands several horse-power of energy, whereas the worker in the United Kingdom had only a fraction of a horse-power. This important economic fact has never been sufficiently appreciated. The English today have the skills, and, despite the outbreak of wildcat strikes and other disquieting political phenomena, they still have energy. Not being a medical man or a psychologist, it is impossible for me to say what connection there is between the strange behaviour of the English people from time to time and the lack of food, and whether the political frustration which we find so alarming is not really caused by a condition of semi-starvation.

However, no matter what the reasons are, the results are just the same. Unless steps are taken to bring the British economy into equilibrium, the consequences will be desperate for the whole world but will be an absolute catastrophe for Canada. The first warning of what is to come is in the statement of the foreign exchange control board that our adverse balance of trade to the United States is $603 million.

The United States exchange situation is serious. There are three ways in which the government can stop this continuously accelerating adverse balance of trade with the United States. The first measure is, of course, the imposition of special tariffs against United States goods, which will prevent their entry into Canada. This the government will be loath to do, and, in view of the pious hopes expressed about the Geneva conference, I would think that at the present time it would be a retrograde step.

The next course open to the government would be to devalue the Canadian dollar. This would be tacitly admitting their mistake of last year and, if they have a secret agreement with the United States government, would be impossible. Furthermore, the devaluation of a mere ten per cent now would be wholly inadequate to arrest the adverse trading position.

The third step would be to reimpose wartime restrictions on exchange, and these wartime restrictions would have to be considerably more stringent than those imposed on Canadians during the war itself. We would have to make it virtually impossible for our citizens to obtain United States dollars, unless it was for the most vital needs, and we would have to prohibit Canadians from visiting the United States except in cases of the most dire sickness. There are no other ways out of the dilemma.

A great deal of hope has been placed on the international bank and the international monetary fund. The international bank has made its first loan of $250 million to France. This is a reconstruction loan. In other words, it is for relief, and it shows, I think, that the bank is being used as a relief agency. It is assumed that the United Kingdom will have exhausted her present loan by 1948 and will in that year require a further loan of at least $1 billion. Now, Mr. Speaker, the capital of the international bank is given on paper at $10 billion. If the nations already members subscribe their full amount, the capital is reduced to $7⅞ billion. However, in May, 1947, the break-down is that there has been subscribed $720 million in gold, $80 million in hard currency and $800 million in what is called less easily exchangeable currencies. Therefore, to be hard-boiled, the bank's capital, instead of $10 billion, is only about eight per cent of this. It seems to me that, since the United States is the principal backer of the bank, and, in fact, is obligated to put up about thirty-seven per cent of the capital, there will come a time when a political reaction in the United States will set in and, because the bank is dependent on action by congress—public law No. 171 passed by the 79th congress—it seems to me that we are running the extreme danger of having the Americans become rather tired of putting up all this money. We are, I feel, reverting to the old fallacies that we followed after the last war. That is, we are believing that we can maintain prosperity and prevent mass unemployment largely by the export of capital. I think our experience, and particularly the experience of the United States in 1929 and 1930, should be a great warning. If we try this method again I feel we shall have to export capital at an ever increasing rate, and that, once it is started, we shall not be able to stop it without immediately causing an international financial crisis of enormous repercussions.

Despite the fact that it is to be devoutly hoped that the Geneva conference will result in a lowering of tariffs. this in its turn cannot prevent a depression, because it takes away the flexibility which the imposition or the relaxation of tariffs provides for in national industry. I think also that we are whistling in the dark to keep our courage up if we expect countries to synchronize their fiscal policies to agree with the over-all policy of the world bank. Frankly, I believe it is impossible, because the economies of countries vary so greatly and their fiscal needs are so different. We cannot expect any government to give up its fiscal autonomy. We see this even in Canada where two provinces are, quite rightly I believe, refusing to abrogate these powers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what does this add up to? This adds up to the stark fact that we are going into the hole at the rate of 600 million United States dollars a year. We know we shall have to lend more money in goods, in cash and in services to the countries of Europe, and possibly Asia. We hope we are going to be repaid, starting July 15, from sterling currencies transferable at the fixed rate of $4. Even if this happens we are not out of the woods and, unless a radical change in the whole economic picture of the United Kingdom takes place, it does not seem possible that the sterling released will be sufficient, or will continue to be paid in sufficient volume for us to meet our adverse United States balance.

I want to say here that we may, and I expect we shall, come to the point where we are placed in this position. We may be able legally to demand sterling exchangeable in dollars to meet our adverse balance of trade. But by so demanding it, we may so jeopardize the economy of the United Kingdom and of Europe that it will make it virtually impossible for us to do it. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, we in this country cannot in peace time see the United Kingdom face bankruptcy and internal troubles any more than we could in war time not protect the United Kingdom physically with armed force. It is just as vital now that her economy continue in a healthy state as it was that the very life of that island should be preserved during the war. Therefore I say that we are taking one of the most colossal gambles in history. We are making the same mistakes as we made after the last war on a tremendously enlarged scale and, because of our fiscal policy with the United States, we are leaving ourselves vulnerable to squeeze play by that country or by the United Kingdom.

Production and production only can be our salvation, but we must produce the things that the world wants and must have. In an economic upheaval, one of our best and surest safeguards would be an abundant gold production and gold reserves. Our parity policy with the United States is certainly destroying our gold production and, despite the figures for last year, is seriously jeopardizing our gold reserves. To tie the Canadian dollar to the United States dollar at this stage in the reconstruction was one of the most dangerous steps any government could have taken. We have seen the results of the action taken by Sweden, in that she has had to put a complete embargo on all imports. The same forces that impelled Sweden to do this are at work in Canada; and I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that unless and until we are prepared to maintain and stabilize our own currency for the good of ourselves and not for the good of others, we are jeopardizing the whole economic life of the country.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to confine my remarks to matters dealt with in the budget speech, but as a consequence of my visit to the united nations in New York, and certain incidents which have arisen since then, I shall have to defer my criticism until a later day. I might pause here, however, to compliment the minister on his really amazing versatility in handling one department after the other with such apparent ease.

The subject I wish to bring up this afternoon is a statement which appeared in the press of May 7. I am quoting from the Ottawa Journal, which reprints an article taken from the New York Post in reference to a statement made by the anti-defamation league, and it quotes the league—

—as saying that Jaques had addressed "nationalist" rallies in various parts of the United States recently with Gerald L. K. Smith, leader of the newly organized Christian nationalist crusade. Smith told a press conference here yesterday—

That was in New York.

—that the crusade's ten-point programme includes preservation of the United States as a Christian nation, exposure of communism, and the "safeguarding of America against the menace of bureaucratic fascism."

I may say that my reply to the press locally was as follows:

The Zionist terrorists are not confined to Palestine; probably the most poisonous of them are at work outside Palestine, on this side of the Atlantic. Personally, I don't give a damn what they say. I'm not going to try to defend myself, but I am prepared to attack this common enemy of a free people any time or anywhere. This is the Zionist—that is the political zionist-communist front which is just as much a terror here as in Palestine.

Then, as a result of further statements in the press, the leader of this group, made a statement on May 12, which appears at page 2982 of Hansard:

[Mr. Adamson.]

. . . I want to make it clear that neither the social credit movement in Canada nor the group of Social Credit members in this house takes its lead from Gerald L. K. Smith, nor is associated with him in any way.

I can confirm that statement. I neither take my lead from Gerald Smith, nor does he take his lead from me. Then the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) went on to say:

The social credit movement finds its inspiration in the constructive principles of abundant living as taught by the Saviour of mankind, and in the economic teachings of Major C. H. Douglas of Scotland.

Let me say at once that all social crediters will agree to that. Social credit is the policy of a philosophy and, to put it as shortly as possible, I would say that policy could be defined as a Christian nationalism, that is, Christian in its widest sense, not in any sense of organized religion, but in the sense of the ideals as laid down in the Christian gospels; while we take "nationalism" to mean loyalty to one's own country. If any member of this house is opposed to Christian ideals and is not loyal to his own country, will he please get up now and testify? Now is the time; if there is anyone who does not agree with that, let him get up and say so or forever hold his tongue on this subject.

Mr. HARTT: Christianity is more than a form.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is also international, not national.

Mr. HARTT: It is international; it belongs to no one. I am going to sit here and listen to this philosopher.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It might do you some good.

Mr. HARTT: He might learn more from me than I would learn from him.

Mr. JAQUES: I do not want any interruptions, either.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. JAQUES: Why should I be referred to as a "notorious" Christian nationalist? Why should anyone be notorious who publicly defends the ideals of the Christian way of life, and defends the principle of loyalty to his country? Let me quote from a speech made in this parliament:

I wish to protest against the idea that any flag is a Christian flag. This idea is something that we have heard from many who today are dead but the germs of whose ideas are still being disseminated. Goebbels is dead, but his ideology seeps even into this House of Commons. The swastika was also a flag, and it represented a system of barbarism and persecution.

That statement was made in this house by Fred Rose, a convicted communist spy, and it explains why communists hate Christian nationalism. According to the Marxian communists there must be one world flag, the hammer and sickle, the symbol of international atheism and slavery.

Let me give briefly my reasons for addressing meetings in the United States. In the first place, I was invited to address audiences by reason of certain speeches I had made in this house. I accepted, and went first to Detroit, where I addressed a large number of people. I am not going to enter into any details at all, nor am I going to defend my action. I think anyone who is familiar with the situation in the United States will admit, as I found to be the case, that there was and still is a tremendous anti-British propaganda carried on there. I addressed audiences in various cities, including Detroit, Chicago and St. Louis; later on, Los Angeles and cities up the Pacific coast, and quite recently Philadelphia. My reason for going, mainly if not wholly, was to see what little I could do to bring about a better state of feeling between the British and United States peoples. I believe I can make the claim that, at least to some extent, I have brought about a better feeling between our two peoples.

To show the necessity for this, let me quote the words of an American who visited western Canada last fall, and who addressed meetings in various cities in Canada. I take this from the press reports of his meetings. He is reported to have said:

> In Palestine the Jews do not believe that the British empire should be preserved. They believe the British should be driven into the sea, and the issue left to the Jews and the Arabs—

Mr. HARTT: That is not true. Why do you quote it?

Mr. JAQUES: Because he said it.

Mr. HARTT: Who said it?

Mr. JAQUES: I have told you; please listen. It continues:

> . . . and the issue left to the Jews and the Arabs, with Russia in the background. Fascism is immensely strong in the United States today and there is intense anti-Semitism. Anything that happens in the United States is reflected in Canada, and Jews must fight fascism by supporting Russia through labour unions and progressive action on political issues.

Those are the words of Albert Kahn—

Mr. HARTT: That is what Hitler said.

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Albert Kahn, formerly editor of the anti-defamation league's radio programme, "The Hour". I do not believe that Albert Kahn spoke for the majority of the Jews. He spoke for the communist part of them.

Mr. HARTT: That is possible.

Mr. JAQUES: And I do not believe, either, that the majority of Jews in this country, or in the United States or in any other country are involved in communism, or in driving the British into the sea; because nowhere have they received better treatment than they have in Great Britain and in the British dominions.

Mr. HARTT: We could not live in Palestine without Great Britain, and we know it. It is true.

Mr. LOW: There is no quarrel about that.

Mr. JAQUES: No quarrel at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Fight the enemy; we are not your enemies.

Mr. JAQUES: Let me quote from a United States magazine, Destiny, particularly from an editorial headed "Anti-Defamation League", and stating:

> Sinister forces in our midst have done their work well, spending millions to suppress the truth, that we Americans may not know the devilish and diabolical programme by which the enemy within hopes to take over this great nation and enslave its people. The activities of this organization reach into every city, constituting a secret police in our midst, watching and listing our citizens. But read the facts, for free government in the United States is at stake, as well as the life and liberty of millions of innocent men and women. We have time yet to take action, but if we wait much longer it will be too late.

As proof of the power of this anti-defamation league, let me remind the house of meetings which took place in Ottawa a year ago last winter. We remember the meetings of the political zionists, one of which was held in this very house, which was well attended, and for which those who attended received no stigma.

Let me compare that with certain meetings held by the Canadian Arab friendship council. A dinner was held in the Chateau Laurier, to which were invited perhaps a hundred of the key people in Ottawa, including representatives from the churches, the professions, the city government, the civil service and members of parliament. Out of those hundred, I believe there were twelve or thirteen members of parliament. I do not think one businessman, or one representative from the professions or the churches accepted the invitation.

I asked friends of mine who are businessmen in Ottawa, and who were invited to the meeting, why they did not come. They did not hesitate to say that they did not dare to come, beause had they been seen there their credit would have been injured.

The same thing happened in Edmonton. When I returned home from Ottawa I was asked to address a dinner meeting at the Macdonald hotel in Edmonton. This meeting was called by the Canadian Arab friendship league. Again sixty or seventy of the key people in Edmonton were invited to attend, and again less than a handful—a half dozen, I think—put in an appearance. They told me the same thing, that they were frightened of the anti-defamation league. That is the truth, and what is the good of hiding it?

Mr. HARTT: No, it is because the speaker was boring.

Mr. JAQUES: Very funny! Very funny, indeed!

Mr. HARTT: We will get acquainted.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are going to be all right, over there.

Mr. HARTT: We are going to be pals.

Mr. JAQUES: I have no quarrel, nor can I have any quarrel with any one loyal to Canada and to the British commonwealth. But I give fair warning that I will fight any man who is out to betray our country and to turn it over to the tender mercies of the communists. I am going to fight him, and I don't care whether he is Jew or Gentile.

Mr. HARTT: That's the boy; we are with you. Stick to your guns.

Mr. JAQUES: Let anybody get up and—

Mr. HARTT: But don't shake all over the place.

Mr. LOW: I see you are wearing your pants thin.

Mr. HARTT: I don't follow it.

Mr. LOW: Don't make foolish remarks, then.

Mr. HARTT: Of that you are a good judge.

Mr. JAQUES: I do not want to be interrupted continually. What is this criticism? What is this fear? What is behind it? What does it amount to? It is nothing but character assassination, and great principles are involved. Evil men have gained control of propaganda, and they can smear and assassinate the character of anyone who dares to raise his voice against them. Give a dog a bad name, and hang him. Smear a public man by misquoting what he says and prevent him from answering by refusing to publish what he does say, and he can be destroyed as thousands of honest, patriotic public men have been and are being destroyed. This is nothing but the modern version of lynch law by which honourable men can be morally lynched by the masses, so-called public opinion, which is fed on the lying propaganda of these character assassins. The masses can have no opinion of their own; they are indifferent to the truth and too cowardly to defend it even if they know the truth. Only responsible, free individuals can be brave and just and moral. The masses are mobs and a mob rules by lynch law. That is how dictators gained power in Germany and Russia, and that is how the communists hope to gain control of the world.

What is a fascist? I was surprised when I looked up the definition of the word "fascist" in the encyclopedia and found that it means anti-communist. When addressing audiences in the United States and in Canada I have noticed that when I spoke against communism invariably the word thrown at me was "fascist". The chief communist smear is anti-Semitism. That serves a double purpose. It frightens public men from denouncing the activities of the communists and at the same time it frightens Jews who are not communists—and they are in the majority—into running to the communists for protection and paying them for it. That is well known.

What is a quisling today? I asked that question the other day in the committee. We were discussing displaced persons who had been sifted out in order that a certain percentage might be brought to this country or to the United States. I wanted to know how they had been sifted out, and I was told that the quislings and traitors had been sent back whence they came. Then I said, "What is a quisling today?" It is quite clear that if Russia was helping to do the sifting anyone who opposed communism would be called a quisling and be sent back to Russia for punishment. Hundreds of thousands, not to say millions of people have been sent back to Russia to their death or to worse than death, while the united nations, we included, have stood by and nobody has raised his voice against it because, if they did, they would be smeared by the anti-defamation league.

Communism is not an economic question. In the United States some of the richest men are leading communists, multi-millionaires like Marshall Field, Mr. Corliss Lamont, a partner of Morgan's, and others. I suppose the most communistic community and perhaps the richest community in the United States is Hollywood. I have been there and I know that to be a fact. The essential nature of communism is that it is anti-Christian. Unless we realize that, we cannot understand it nor can we deal with it.

There have always been communist agents working in all groups, in all organizations and in all parties. This is not the first time that I have been threatened by the communist secret police. Some of their agents are working within our movement. One such was detected a few years ago, and among his papers was found a note reading:

> There always are certain individuals prominent in the social credit movement who will deserve careful attention. Jaques is one of them. In my opinion this man is most dangerous to our cause.

That is, to communism.

> Despite our efforts we have never been able to unseat him. Watch him carefully, he has many followers.

In essence Marxism is anti-Christian and, until that basic truth is realized, we can neither understand it nor cope with it. Karl Marx, the father of communism and socialism, was an atheist. He hated all religion as the opiate of the people, but above all he hated Christianity. The whole issue before the world today is clear-cut. We must choose whether we are to advance according to the ideals of the Christian gospels, or whether we are to retreat to world slavery according to the doctrines of Karl Marx. That is the one all-important question. All other questions depend upon it and, until it is settled, there can be no peace in the world.

Soon or later we must all stand up and be counted. I have many friends in the United States, fine, fearless people who are fighting the communist enemies of their country and of our country. I should be sorry not to meet them again. But my mind is made up; I am in a fight to a finish against the red communists and pink fellow travellers. I shall not be stopped by threats. My silence is not for sale at any price. You shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free.

On motion of Mr. Zaplitny the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: Last week I intimated that the debate on the budget would be proceeded with without intermission until concluded, but I find there are two important expeditions of adventure in the course of public duty which will take some of our most prominent supporters and adherents away from the chamber. I am, therefore, compelled to ask the permission of the house to vary the promise I gave them last week about the budget debate.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will it be called a fruitless expedition?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The expedition will be crowned with success.

Mr. KNOWLES: A wild goose chase.

Mr. ROWE: In view of the expedition, does the minister expect any of his colleagues not to return?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No. That is a distinction which my hon. friend once enjoyed but which I have never enjoyed.

Mr. ROWE: I returned to the house, though.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Bonner Larose, Esquire, Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name royal assent to the following bills:

An act to incorporate Conference of Mennonites in Canada.

An act to amend the Inspection and Sale Act, 1938.

An Act to amend the Militia Act.

An act respecting a national wild life week.

An act respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.

An act respecting compensation for government employees.

An act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company.

An act respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

An act to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

An act to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

An act respecting export and import permits.

An act to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act.

An act to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products.

An act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

An act to amend the Patent Act, 1935.

An act to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

An act to continue the revised regulations respecting trading with the enemy (1943).

An act respecting Guaranty Trust Company of Canada.

An act to incorporate Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company.

An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1948.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 6.08 p.m.

Thursday, May 15, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ILSLEY—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. ADAMSON IN DEBATE ON MAY 14

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), and because I was Minister of Finance at the time, I rise on a question of privilege in regard to the charge made yesterday during the budget debate by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), that the Canadian dollar was restored to parity with the United States dollar last July as the result of pressure from the United States. In brief the hon. member claims to be reliably informed that a deal was made whereby in exchange for placing the Canadian dollar at par with the United States dollar—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ILSLEY: —the United States administration gave assurance that the British loan would go through.

Mr. FLEMING: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FLEMING: I contend that this is not a question of privilege. The statement of which the minister complains was made yesterday in the course of a debate which is still current in the house. If something was said which requires correction, that should be done in the course of the debate. It is not a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of opinion that the statement being made by the Minister of Justice concerns a matter of public importance, and as such would be a matter of privilege.

Mr. FLEMING: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that even if it is a matter of public importance any such charge should be answered in the course of the debate.

[Mr. Rowe.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe it is in the interests of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I believe it is in the interests of the house and the interests of the public that the correct information should be given by the minister on a question of such importance.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, there were ministers of the crown in the house yesterday at the time that statement was made, and this is not the time for a statement to be made in reply. It should have been made then.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has no question of privilege. The point of order was raised; I have given my ruling, and I would ask the minister to proceed.

Mr. ILSLEY: The statement made by the hon. member for York West was so absurd on its face that had I been in the house at the time—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ILSLEY: —which I was not, probably I would not have gone to the trouble of denying it. But to my surprise the statement has received wide publicity in the press and on the radio.

Mr. LENNARD: Rightly so.

Mr. ILSLEY: So, lest someone believe the statement, I wish to deny it forthwith, without any qualifications. I wish to deny that any pressure was at any time exercised upon Canada by the United States or any other country to restore our dollar to parity, or that there was any prior discussion of the proposed action—

Mr. CASE: This is the first explanation you have ever given.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And you don't like it.

Mr. LENNARD: That is all you have to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You never have anything to say.

Mr. ILSLEY —with the authorities of the United States or of any other country. The action was taken by the government of Canada completely on its own initiative, and for good and sufficient reasons, in the interests of the Canadian people as a whole.

It is most unfortunate, in my opinion, that circulation should be given to such mischievous rumours which are totally devoid of any foundation in fact.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PEACE TREATY WITH FINLAND

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has Canada yet signed the peace treaty with Finland adopted by the united nations at Paris recently, as set out in the white paper, tabled No. 7?
2. What action has been taken in the matter by Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes.
2. Canada has not yet ratified this treaty.

OLYMPIC GAMES

RELATION OF CANADA TO OLYMPICS COMMITTEE—APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, arising from an article in the Ottawa Journal of today to the effect that His Worship the Mayor of Ottawa has asked the government to look into and investigate the olympics committee. Do the people of Canada contribute to that committee, and does the government in any way recommend any of the appointments made in connection with it?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to be exact in making my reply. In the circumstances I shall have to ask my hon. friend to let the question stand as a notice.

FOOD

SHORTAGE IN EUROPE—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF CEILINGS ON AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the critical food situation in Great Britain and Europe, and the almost starvation conditions in many zones, will the government give consideration to the removal of all price ceilings from agricultural products so as to restore production, which has been steadily declining in the last two years?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that he evidently considers he is not the whole government.

Mr. CASE: That is news.

PUBLIC WORKS

WHARF FACILITIES AT NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) inquired as to the intentions of the government concerning new wharfage facilities at North Sydney. His question was based on a telegram he had just received. The hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. MacLean) had received a similar telegram at the same time, and handed me a copy of it so that I might make an investigation.

I understand that at North Sydney the government has two wharves, one of which was completed last year at a cost of $500,000. Any new project contemplated for North Sydney would be part of the post-war reconstruction programme; and if the government decided to build a new wharf, an item would appear in the estimates.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF ESTABLISHMENT OF FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask about a matter of urgent public importance, as a result of a number of telegrams and letters I have received. Will the Minister of Agriculture name a definite date on which the floor price on butter, if any, is to be announced?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I must agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), that I cannot speak for the whole government.

Mr. CASE: Think of that!

POSTAL SERVICE

REQUEST FOR AIR MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN WINNIPEG AND FLIN FLON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General, arising out of several telegrams received this morning. Will the minister recommend that an air mail service be included in the new air service to begin June 1 between Winnipeg and Flin Flon via Dauphin and The Pas? The present mail service by railway is very slow.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): I shall take the question as a notice, and have the department look into it.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 14, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Minister of Finance is not with us today, although I realize he may be more usefully employed where he is.

Mr. CASE: Where is he?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Every budget I have heard delivered so far has had its forgotten man. This one is unique in that the "forgotten man" is more than half the people of Canada. Never have so many waited so long for so little, and never have so many waited in vain. If one strips the minister's budget of its flippant optimism, nothing is left but a sop to private enterprise. In my view there will be keen disappointment in the ranks of those who are faithful to the government, and who had expected that two years after the war the government would finally have launched its much-tooted new social order.

Few people throughout the country today would deny that if the government had any intention two years ago of implementing its talk about a new social order by 1947, by this time they have discarded the idea and have relegated it to the limbo of forgotten things.

There are those of course still faithful to the government who say it is better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all. But the government's acquaintance with the new social order was of such a casual nature that I doubt if the romance ever developed at all. I do not think any single factor has contributed so much to the regression of government policy within the last several months as has the Minister of Finance himself. It will be admitted that the present minister has launched a new government policy which conforms to this government's old fashioned laissez-faire and drift policy, and this do-nothing budget characterizes that policy.

Since taking office the present Minister of Finance has done a beautiful hatchet job on the whole price control structure of the country. It is common knowledge that the 1939 dollar is worth only about 62 cents. If one takes into consideration the deterioration in the quality of the commodities that we buy today he will realize it is no exaggeration to say that the 1939 dollar is worth only 50 cents today. In the face of those facts the Minister of Finance blithely got up in his place in this house and with a great deal of cheer and beneficence announced to the house how fortunate the country was that more than half the population had the privilege of earning so little that they fell below the income tax exemption limit. I do not know how the people of this country will ever repay such left-handed generosity as that.

As I said, more than half the people of this country are the "forgotten man" as far as this budget is concerned. If we check the position of people such as farmers, casual labourers, clerks, fishermen, trappers, civil servants, school teachers, clergymen, and small business men, we will find that they are in an income group which does not benefit in any way from the cut in income tax. I will leave the income tax end of it at that point and deal with another factor in the budget which I think is more serious. I refer to the almost complete lack of any plan for the stabilization of income, particularly that of western Canada.

It is well known, and I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will bear me out in this, that if western Canada is to have a stabilized economy it must have more industries. The years of the war brought temporary prosperity, but the figures placed on Hansard the other day by the Minister of Agriculture do not tell the whole story. Although there has been a large increase in the gross income of the farmers of western Canada, there has been a more than corresponding increase in the cost of production. Therefore, their position is not as good as the minister made out. We must admit that their position today is better than it had been for many years; but as I said, it may be of a temporary nature. If there is to be permanent stability in the income of the western provinces we must have more secondary industries, particularly processing industries. This is a field which has hardly been scratched. I see no reason why the government should not take the initiative in establishing such industries in the towns and cities of western Canada. They have done a little bit along that line, because the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller) referred to the flax fibre mill which had been established in his town. That is a start in the right direction, but not enough of that sort of thing has been done in Manitoba or Saskatchewan. We are perhaps a little more fortunate in Manitoba than they are in Saskatchewan because we do not depend quite so much upon grain farming. We have a mixed farming economy, and to that extent there is a little more stability in our prospects of income.

The lack of secondary industries in western Canada has had another serious effect. The recent prairie census revealed that the prairie provinces are losing population instead of gaining it. In my opinion there is no reason why such a wonderful country as we have west of the great lakes should be losing population at this time. If we are ever to have a stable economy and a united nation there will have to be a greater increase in the population of western Canada than there has been so far. The past few decades have not shown the increases in population that should have been shown. In the next twenty or thirty years there should be an increase of millions in the population of western Canada. The resources are there; the opportunities are there in the way of primary production, but what is keeping the people away, what is causing the drift from the west to the east, which is the exact opposite to what the drift should be, is the lack of secondary industries. It is a serious thing, and I believe this government should take steps to arrest that trend. There is only one way I know of in which that can be done. Apparently western Canada has no attraction for private capital; therefore it is up to the government to use public investment and public enterprise to develop secondary industries, particularly processing industries, in order to provide something around which the population of the towns and cities of western Canada may live.

There are those who say that this is a private enterprise country, that we have free enterprise and if people do not like western Canada, they have a perfect right to go somewhere else. That is perfectly true, but let us not forget that this has not always been a free enterprise country, and it is not now in actual fact. Ever since the first prime minister of Canada introduced what he called a national policy, which meant the subsidizing of the industries of central Canada to provide Canada with manufacturing industries, this has not been a free enterprise country. When the tariff policies were instituted, all the people of Canada, regardless of whether they lived in the east, in the west or on either coast, contributed through the tariff structure to the building up of industries in central Canada. We are not objecting to that, because we realize it is desirable that Canada should have manufacturing industries in Ontario and Quebec or wherever else it is possible to have them. But we should not be deluded by the story that this is a free enterprise country, that those industries grew up through their own efforts. That is not so, because they were heavily subsidized for many years, and they are still being heavily subsidized through our tariff structure. The taxpayers are still paying for the manufacturing industries of central Canada.

If that is a desirable policy for central Canada then something of the sort is desirable for the west. I am not suggesting that we institute a new tariff policy for the west, but I do suggest that the government should consider using public investment and public enterprise to initiate industries in western Canada where the people themselves are not able to do it because of a lack of capital. I am saying these things because I believe there is a serious trend in present government policy away from public investment and public enterprise. During the years of the war the government were forced to use public enterprise in order to create a war effort. It was a struggle for survival, and although many of the members of the cabinet of that time were private enterprisers and did not believe in public enterprise, yet events forced them into the position where they had to use it. It must be said to their credit that they used it with great success.

Today the trend seems to be the other way. In this connection I should like to quote a few passages from a speech made by the Minister of Finance, I think on January 27, when addressing the Toronto board of trade. I think his remarks indicate the regressive policy of the government. Here is what he gave as his method for preventing the next depression—and I would point out that in this case he used the word "depression," which he has shied away from ever since:

> If at any time in the future a recession or depression is threatened, it may be far wiser and far cheaper to make drastic cuts in income and corporation taxes in order to expand consumer buying power and stimulate private investment than to embark, let us say, on an ambitious public works programme which is bound to be wasteful and would tend to perpetuate itself.

That was a statement of policy by the Minister of Finance, who said in plain language that his solution for a depression would be to cut the taxes of the corporations and thus in some mysterious fashion extend the buying power of the people. Then he goes on to say that he does not advocate a public works programme because it is bound to be wasteful and will tend to perpetuate itself. Why should any public works programme be wasteful? No one in this house has asked for public works which are unnecessary or useless, or which will not return a value to the country. Surely the government must have little faith in itself if it admits that any public works programme it might undertake is bound to be wasteful.

The other objection is that it might tend to perpetuate itself. What is wrong with a public works programme perpetuating itself as long as it is useful and producing something for the benefit of all the people of Canada? That is regression back to the laissez-faire drift which characterizes the present trend of the government. To emphasize that limitation the minister said in his speech:

> We believe that government should create conditions, a climate, if I may use that term, within which initiative can be exercised and enterprise flourish. To create such conditions, we believe it should be made possible, through reduction and simplification of taxes, and in other ways, for private enterprise to operate boldly and courageously, and, in doing so, provide most of the employment; and that government should, by direct action, fill the gap in employment—when, but only when, there is a gap to fill that would not otherwise be filled.

There are two parts to that statement which are very important. First of all he would create those climatic conditions for progress by reduction and simplification of taxes. I do not know what simplification of taxes would have to do with creating a proper climate for industry. But what will reduction of taxes mean to more than half the people of Canada who do not pay income tax today because they have not enough income on which to pay taxes? Surely the minister can see that under his programme the very people who would most need a shot in the arm, so to speak, would be the ones who would not get it, and the ones who would get it would be the corporations which would have their taxes reduced.

The minister went on to say that the government would take direct action to provide employment when, but only when, there is a gap to be filled that would not otherwise be filled. In other words the government is quite satisfied to leave everything to private enterprise, to let private enterprise decide not only how much employment there shall be, but in what particular industries, where it shall be and what the wages shall be; and the government itself will stand to one side as a sort of referee and only take action when there is a gap to be filled. That sounds all right, but it is not practical, because the government if it follows that course will never be prepared to do anything until unemployment is upon us. The last depression surely taught us this much, that if full employment is to be provided it takes planning. The government will have to plan their public works projects for the good of the people many years ahead, and not sit around and wait until the last moment, until private enterprise has broken down and failed, and then try to rush in and fill gaps by establishing camps in the hills where men can cut cordwood at twenty cents a day. But that is the policy the minister is trying to bring forward.

In contrast with that I want to quote what the Prime Minister said in his speech in 1942 to the American Federation of Labor in Toronto. He said:

> When the war is won there will be an immense task to repair the great physical destruction caused by the war . . . but the work of repairing and restoring the ravages of war will not be enough.

He recognized that, and went on:

> Fortunately, we are also learning that the only limit to our productive capacity is the limit to our resources, and our will and skill to use them to satisfy human need instead of human greed.

That is a statement which implies a great deal more than the Minister of Finance implied with his gap-filling statement. There is a statement by the Prime Minister which implies that it is up to the government, and was even in 1942 when the war was still on, to start looking towards the future and start planning for full employment. I like the words the Prime Minister used:

> . . . the only limit to our productive capacity is the limit to our resources, and our will and skill to use them to satisfy human need instead of human greed.

That does not sound very much like private enterprise. It sounds like public enterprise, that the objective of industry shall be to satisfy human needs. The objective of profit-making industry is to satisfy their own urge for profits—I will not call it human greed, although that was implied by the Prime Minister.

In contrast with that, the policy brought forward by the Minister of Finance looks puny. I think he should go back and read over some of the speeches made by the Prime Minister in 1942, 1943 and 1944 and try to follow them out in his budget. Surely when the Prime Minister admits that the only limit to our productive capacity is the limit of our resources and our will and skill to use them, it means that the government should undertake to see that our resources are developed to satisfy the needs of the people and that employment should be the right of the working man.

I want to emphasize this point further by quoting from the Prime Minister. Speaking at that same convention he used these words:

> The era of freedom will be achieved only as social security and human welfare become the main concern of men and nations.

Those are fine words. He went on:

> I would mention the following as a national minimum: useful employment for all who are willing to work.

All right; I am quite willing to accept that. But let us see what is taking place in practice. This may be only a slight indication, but I think it shows the attitude of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) towards this national minimum of every person having the right to work. On April 18, after the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) had asked the Minister of Labour some questions about the employment of persons from Nova Scotia in other parts of Canada, the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) asked this supplementary question:

> Will transportation be provided by the government to the place of employment for persons in New Brunswick who are unemployed to accept employment that is offered elsewhere?

The Minister of Labour replied:

> As my hon. friend is well aware, my department is not in the business of providing Cook's tours for everybody in Canada.

That is how they implement their promise of the right to work and the right to full employment for all the people.

In addition to the promise of full employment there was also the definite promise of social security for all. I have already quoted and I continue to quote from the Prime Minister's speech in 1942:

> It is necessary that social security and human welfare should be expressed in definite terms.

Those words were quoted as recently as May 9 at Niagara Falls by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), and he added these words of his own:

> If we are to justify some of the promises and assertions we made during the war it is necessary that Canada as a nation enact a programme of social welfare.

I agree with him. If we are to carry out the promises that were made, the government, according to the minister, should enact a programme of social welfare now. But what do we find in the budget? Look through the budget and through the whole social security programme of the government, and you will find that when it comes to implementing the promises made and repeated so often, only as recently as May 9 by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, even the minister himself is a little doubtful as to how well the government are succeeding, because he said:

> Some people may say some of these objectives have not been realized, but it is important to have a statement from the head of a government in these terms.

I agree that it is important to have that statement on social security in these terms, but I contend it is far more important that the government should now be presenting their social welfare legislation to the house so that the curtain will at least be lifted a little to give us a peek into this great new era of freedom promised by the Prime Minister in 1942. But so far what have we got? We have a mystical resolution on the order paper which promises something for old age pensioners, but no amount of prying or questioning can bring out what is going to be done. The government's programme seems to be well hidden, although some of the newspapers seem to be better informed on it than members of this house. So far as a broad general programme of social security covering the needs of certain classes of people, whom I shall mention later, is concerned, practically nothing has been done so far and nothing is in prospect. What the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) laid down when he said that that era of freedom will be achieved only as social security and human welfare become the main concern of many nations was in reality the basis of a socialist society, because it is the objective of a socialist government that laws shall be made for the benefit of society as a whole. Under a capitalist economy laws are made to protect the rights of capitalists, to protect the rights of privileged classes, and it is not surprising that in the house we hear hon. members who believe in capitalism make long speeches for certain classes of people; but when it comes to making laws for society as a whole, when human welfare becomes the objective of the programme, then you have socialism in practice. The Prime Minister laid down a socialist theory; the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin)—as recently as May 9—is beginning to doubt whether we are carrying that objective out as we should. We shall have more reason to doubt before we are much older.

I wish to deal with another point which I think is important, namely, the repeated references which have been made by members of the Progressive Conservative party, and particularly by the official financial critic of that party, to what they call the middle class. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) was the one who introduced it in the house when he made a plea for what he called the great middle class, which he characterized as being the backbone of the country. That same idea has been reechoed by many other hon. members who sit around him. I want the house to pause for a moment and realize what this actually means. What is a middle class? What is it in the middle of? Surely as soon as we begin to talk about a middle class we are automatically accepting the fact that there must be an upper and a lower class; otherwise there could not be a middle class. It must be in the middle of something. What the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said when he introduced this idea in the house was accepted without question and condoned by his speech. He tried to prove that there was a vertically stratified conception of society, something which I repudiate from the beginning. I cannot for a moment accept—I cannot understand how any hon. member living in a country such as ours could accept it—the idea of a vertically stratified society in which we shall have lower, middle and upper, middle upper and middle lower, and so on, classes. Thousands of people, yea, millions of them left beautiful spots in Europe to accept hardships and poverty in this country as pioneers in order to escape from a stratified class society. They came to this country and now in the house we hear hon. members say that we must have a strong middle class because that is the backbone of the country; we must therefore have an upper class, a lower class, and it shall be the duty of the lower class to keep alive the upper class with the middle class acting as a sort of referee in between. What sort of conception of society is that? I cannot accept it. I repudiate the very basis of it—and I am speaking for myself.

Mr. COLDWELL: And for all of us.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I say that if the Creator who conceived the earth and its population intended that there should be an upper class to rule and a lower class to be ruled, then he would have brought into this world an upper class with spurs on their feet and a lower class with saddles on their backs. We all have the urge to stand up straight; we will not bend our knee before any class. If we do, we are not worthy of the name of Canadians. I repudiate the idea, and I hope that never again in this house shall we get into a squabble about a middle class and their incomes and say we shall legislate for them. Let us for once accept the fact that there is only one class, namely, the Canadian people. There is only one class in the world and that is humanity. Let us legislate for humanity in this country and we shall be laying a basis for what the Prime Minister called in such fine words, "an era of freedom which will be achieved only as social security and human welfare become the concern of men and nations." He did not say: As the welfare of the middle class becomes the main concern of men and nations, only then shall we have the real basis of human society.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is a complete distortion of the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. JACKMAN: The remarks of the hon. member are a complete distortion of the remarks made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. What he referred to was the fact that some people have larger incomes than others, and that those in between are middle incomes.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I appreciate the hon. member's attempt to patch up a bad speech, but this is not the place to do it. He will have another opportunity and I hope he will use it. I hope he will quote from Hansard what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said, because it is in the record.

Mr. JACKMAN: No one knows better than I do what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said. There is no greater humanitarian in the house.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I wish to say that when these gentlemen refer to the middle class as being the backbone of society they should study the human anatomy a little more closely. If they do they will see that there is more to the human body than the backbone. The backbone of itself would be functionless and useless unless it had a few other attributes.

Mr. JACKMAN: The head and the belly. What the hon. member is saying is primary school stuff.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If the hon. member wants to talk about the belly he may go ahead.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is all he is thinking of, anyway.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If we are to talk about the backbone of this country, meaning thereby the main class of people who are necessary in the country, we cannot pick and choose because all the people who lead a useful life, who produce anything by means of their hands or their brains, are a part of human society. To say that some mystic middle class is the backbone of something is simply to exhibit one's ignorance both of the human anatomy and of society as a whole.

I now wish to refer to another serious matter.

Mr. MAYHEW: I am pleased to hear that what the hon. member has just said was not serious.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I said "another serious matter". I am glad the Minister of Finance has a spokesman in his place who may be able to answer some of the arguments I am using. If the parliamentary assistant disagrees with this, he will have an opportunity to contradict it.

I say very plainly that the present Minister of Finance is more responsible than anyone else for having wrecked the price control system in this country. No one denies that. I say also that he has been aided and abetted in doing so by hon. members on both sides of the house. Not all the reactionaries are in the official opposition; although the opposition are blessed with a good percentage, there are some on the government side. Also there are some progressive thinking people on the government side. Some of the back benchers on the government side—

Mr. JACKMAN: Don't forget to add us.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Yes, I shall be glad to include the hon. member's party later on in the right category. There are some progressive thinking members on the Liberal side of the house who have brought to the attention of the government the seriousness of the scuttling of the price control system and have warned them that it is time to do something to make good their pledges of a new social order.

Listening to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) yesterday afternoon I was pleased with that part of his speech in which he advocated that the government do not sit around and wait until the Drew-Duplessis axis makes up its mind what it is going to do, to make agreements for social security with the other provinces. But unfortunately the reactionaries on the government side occupy the front benches at the moment. What has happened is that there is confusion not only in the cabinet itself but on the whole Liberal side of the house. Watching their difficulties I am reminded of a poem written by Macaulay entitled "Horatius". Hon. members will remember the epic story of how three men held the bridge to Rome while the hordes were trying to attack it, and there was a point at which the attacking hordes were badly confused—which puts me in mind of the way the government is acting today. I will quote this verse, and I think there is much point to it:

> Was none who would be foremost
> To lead such dire attack:
> But those behind cried "Forward!"
> And those before cried "Back!"
> And backward now and forward
> Wavers the deep array;
> And on the tossing sea of steel,
> To and fro the standards reel;
> And the victorious trumpet-peal
> Dies fitfully away.

The Prime Minister sounded the trumpet peal in 1942 when he said the era of freedom will be found only when social security and human welfare become the main concern of men and nations. I am afraid that bugle peal has died fitfully away.

Now I want to go on with what I was saying about price control. Although the government is responsible for having destroyed the price structure in this country, nevertheless all of us in this house have a certain amount of responsibility for the advice that we give to the government, in so far as they carry it out. To that extent the official opposition is responsible for the advice it has given to the government, and which I am afraid has been too well carried out. In checking over some of the clippings I have saved up I find that, on the question of price control, the official opposition appear to have taken three different stands. I think they are to be congratulated on having added something new.

In the first place the leader of that party, the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) speaking in the Portage la Prairie by-election and appealing to the voters of that constituency for their support of the candidate who is now the member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller), used these words to appeal for their votes on the question of price control, as reported in the Winnipeg Tribune of October 19, 1946—a paper which I am given to understand is not opposed to the Progressive Conservative party. He said this:

> Mr. Miller's election will have no effect whatever on government controls, because his views, stated on every platform, are in entire accord with the government's stated plan.

There is one stand on which he appealed to the voters.

Mr. MERRITT: What is the date of that?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: October 19, 1946.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is authentic.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: His appeal to the voters was that the Progressive Conservative price control policy was exactly that of the government. I wish to quote from the hon.

member for Portage la Prairie, as reported in the Portage la Prairie Graphic of October 18, 1946, as follows:

Mr. Miller emphasized there was no difference between the Liberals and Progressive Conservatives on price control and inflation.

Surely that makes it clear; the candidate himself declared that there was no difference whatever between the Progressive Conservatives and the Liberals on the question of price control and inflation. They were both for inflation, and the leader of the opposition, in supporting the candidate, endorsed that. That is one stand, and on that basis they appealed to the voters of Portage la Prairie and won the by-election, I must admit.

Mr. MERRITT: The hon. member's party did not do very well.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: We preferred to conduct our campaign on the policy that we stand for rather than on shifting sands.

Mr. MERRITT: The hon. member is pretty holy, isn't he?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: But in this House of Commons it is plain to everybody who has ears to hear that one member after the other in the official opposition, this session and in other sessions, rose in their places and attacked the government, and abused Donald Gordon for having maintained the price control system. They thought it was the most iniquitous thing in the world. One hon. member suggested that we take a sawed-off shot gun and go on a man-hunt for the officials of the prices board.

Mr. LOCKHART: I still say so.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It is too bad you did not go out to Portage la Prairie and say it. That is the second stand. We have had two. Here comes the third one; here is the coup de grace. Speaking on May 7, 1947, on the radio, as reported in the Evening Citizen of the following day, the leader of the opposition had this to say. The report starts out:

John Bracken, Progressive Conservative Leader, told Canadians Wednesday night their cost of living "is mounting much more rapidly than your taxation is decreasing."

Who is responsible for that? Who has been advocating decontrol and the raising of the cost of living? Only today we heard one member asking for the sweeping away of price control. Yet they complain on the radio that the cost of living is rising faster than the tax reductions are coming into effect. This report continues:

Dealing with Finance Minister Abbott's budget, Mr. Bracken said more than half the Canadians who paid income tax had no relief through 1947 reductions cancelled by the increased cost of living in the first four months of the year. The reductions had been offset by the removal of government subsidies, forcing price rises in eggs, cheese and butter.

Mr. HARKNESS: Do you deny that?

Mr. COLDWELL: Who asked for the removal of subsidies?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: We have the three stands, the three-headed monster before us: (1) they are exactly the same as the government in their policy on the price control system; (2) they ask the government to do away with price control; and (3) they get on the radio and attack the government for having done away with price control. There you have it all.

An hon. MEMBER: And the government listened to them.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: His Majesty's official opposition has a responsible position in this country and has a duty to perform, and I believe it should take its duty a little more seriously. However, I will leave it at that, because time is going on and I want to place on record a few concrete suggestions for the government to consider. What I have said in criticism has been said in good faith, and I do not want to leave the impression that I wish to be destructive in my criticism.

I should like to suggest to the government that while there is still time they consider these proposals, I think that if they will look among the Liberal benches, when they are filled—and unfortunately there are not many here at the moment—they will find many members who are of the same opinion. Here are the proposals that I think are fair and reasonable. They are not all the proposals I should like to see enacted, but they are what I would think can be supported by this house:

1. Raise exemption levels to $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons.

2. Amend the old age and blind pensions act so as to provide an old age pension at the age of sixty-five at the rate of $50 a month and a blind pension at the age of seventeen at a similar rate.

3. Introduce legislation to provide for financial assistance to persons who are crippled or otherwise disabled and thereby prevented from earning a living.

4. Provide financial assistance to provinces for the purpose of improving and equalizing educational opportunities.

5. Amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act so as to make it more applicable to hail and flood damage and place its provisions on a smaller unit basis.

6. Amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act so as to make it a Canadian Farm Rehabilitation Act applicable to every province in the dominion.

7. Place a floor price of $1.55 per bushel under wheat with comparable floors under other farm products, fish and wages.

8. Remove from our statutes all discriminatory legislation against co-operative associations.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on May 6 of this year the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) concluded his criticism of the budget by moving an amendment consisting of three clauses. This afternoon I should like to deal briefly with those three clauses, one at a time. I should like to take them in the following order: the second clause first, then the first clause and finally the third clause.

The second clause of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario reads:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance
> (b) offer no encouragement of those engaged in the development of our natural resources, especially mining and agriculture.

It is with the agricultural aspect of that clause I should like to deal for a very few minutes at the commencement of my remarks. Had time permitted I should have liked to refer to the unfair taxation measures being applied to cooperatives, but I think perhaps when the house is in committee on the resolutions an opportunity will be given when it might be more appropriate to speak on that subject. I wanted to speak particularly with reference to agricultural cooperatives, and to object to the unfair and arbitrary decision introduced last year and applied this year, that such cooperatives must automatically earn a profit on whatever capital they may be able to use in their business. That, of course, is not a true picture. They do not earn a profit; they merely act as agents for their members; the receipts they get from their activities are held only in trust for those members, and do not form income in the hands of the cooperatives.

What I want to discuss principally at the moment is the fact that the taxation proposals of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) offer no relief from what is now a pressing and unjust situation, namely that the proceeds from the sale of breeding herds are still to be subject to income tax. The remarks I am going to make are based upon knowledge of the situation in my own part of the country particularly, the interior of British Columbia, where we have a large number of cattle ranches each operating a herd running anywhere from less than a hundred up to several thousands of cattle. It applies to the constituency I presently represent and to the one I have some reason to think I may soon be called upon to represent; that is, the Cariboo and Chilcotin areas.

This question was dealt with during the budget debate last year, while the house was in committee. On July 25 in conjunction with several hon. members of the opposition I put forward arguments in favour of relief from this unfair burden. Those arguments I believe are still sound; and their soundness was established by the fact that the present Minister of Finance gave no fewer than four separate assurances that the matter was being investigated, that it was still being considered and that it would continue to be considered in an effort to find a solution. This in itself indicates that the minister—as indeed he said in so many words—recognized that there was merit in the contentions advanced by those who favoured the proposition that proceeds from the sale of breeding herds should not be subject to the payment of income tax.

Of course there is great merit in those suggestions, because the imposition of that tax is causing a real and unfair hardship to many who have laboured all their lives to build up ranches; who have worked hard during hard times to maintain their herds—not necessarily to increase them but to maintain them—and who now, when they have an opportunity to sell those herds at a decent price and enjoy a little well earned leisure, are prevented from doing so because of the ruling of the revenue branch of the income tax department that the whole proceeds are income and are subject to taxation in the one taxation year. The fact that this process is continuing is discouraging these people from making such sales; it is discouraging others from entering the business of raising breeding herds, and is having an adverse effect not only upon those older people who wish to retire but upon the whole cattle industry throughout the country. The problem being so pressing, and the minister having indicated that the matter has been under consideration for at least three years, surely it is inexcusable that no action should have been taken in this year's budget proposals.

The principle is quite simple. It is that the basic or breeding herd is a capital asset. It is just as much a means of production as plant and equipment in a factory. Our own Department of Agriculture recognized this last year in the brief it submitted to the Department of Finance. That principle is recognized in the United States, where the bureau of internal revenue accepts the fact that breeding herds are capital, and proceeds from their sale are not subject to income tax. The matter was fully discussed in the house last year, and the views I put forward at that time were along the lines of a brief I submitted to the Minister of Finance, which he was generous enough to say contained some sound proposals. But all these generous expressions and promises of consideration are not doing anything to relieve the unjust burden which is being placed upon those engaged in the cattle industry.

I raise this point briefly now to serve notice, as it were, that I intend to discuss the matter more fully later on, and to say that I hope it is not too late even yet to take some action this year. I regret that the Minister of Finance is not in the house, nor is his parliamentary assistant. I hope someone, perhaps the Minister of Agriculture, will take word to him that some hon. members on this side of the house regard this as an urgent question and intend to thresh out the matter in committee this year, to force a decision one way or the other, in so far as it lies within our power to do so. I raise the question now so that the minister may perhaps give it further consideration, and by way of notice that it will be debated hotly when the house goes into committee on the budget resolutions.

The next portion of the amendment with which I wish to deal is paragraph (a), which reads:

> This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance
> (a) offer no relief from the oppressive burden of indirect and hidden taxes on staple necessities that compose the family budget, all of which taxes directly increase the cost of living.

At the outset it would be only fair to say we recognize that an important and welcome measure of relief has been given this year in the budget proposals. There is no direct criticism on the score of the relief that has been given, except that it was limited entirely to the realm of direct taxation and the relatively minor effects which result from the abdication by the dominion government of the field of gasoline taxes. I should like to make some general observation with regard to the question of the proper balance between direct and indirect taxation, which is raised in the amendment I have just read. We feel that relief should be given those groups in the lower income brackets, particularly those with large families; the middle class. I use those words again, and I want to refer to the argument just put forward by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny). I refer to the middle income group, those who are struggling to remain independent. These indirect taxes are not imposed on the basis of ability to pay; they are not desirable from that point of view, for they hit much harder those in the income group to which I have just referred. In dealing with this matter this afternoon the hon. member for Dauphin was guilty of a distortion of the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). He was reproached for that by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), but denied that he was distorting the words used. But what he actually did was to take the speech of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, which itself was directed toward what he regarded as the middle income group, and to turn it into a defence of what he said the hon. member regarded as a class structure —the principle of a ruling class, as the member for Dauphin put it, and a lower or ruled class. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario had no such thought in mind, of course. What he refers to is an income group. And there can be no denial, as a matter of fact, that there are large numbers in the middle income group.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. FULTON: It seems to me that this question of a class society exists only in the minds of hon. members such as the hon. member for Dauphin. Of course the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said that the middle income group was the largest proportion of society, because there are more people with incomes in that group than in any other group. That is simply a question of fact.

This party recognizes that initiative and ability will always produce results, and that those results are reflected in the incomes of those who exercise this initiative. We recognize that and we wish to preserve that system, because we want initiative and the incentive to enterprise that the preservation of this initiative system gives. We want the production of plenty, instead of the uniform misery advocated by the C.C.F.

To get back to the remarks I intended to make at the outset, it is true that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario gave figures, perhaps by way of illustration of what he meant when he referred to the middle income group. He did refer to those with incomes between $3,000 and $7,500. These figures have been criticized by some hon. members; indeed the other day the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) dealt with them.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: May I ask a question?

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind dealing with interruptions when I know what they are; but I cannot deal with them when two or three of them come in at the same time.

The fact that these limitations were used by way of illustration was referred to, as I say, by the Minister of Agriculture and by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud). But the operative words used by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario are found at page 2803 of Hansard, where he said:

> Let me say that by middle class I mean people, neither rich nor poor, who have a great desire to look after themselves, to provide for their present and for their future, and to be beholden to nobody, not even the state. They used to be regarded without question as the backbone of the community.

In discussion with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario—and it is regretted that he is not able to be in the house at the present time, owing to illness—I mentioned this fact to him and he agreed that the income range which he gave was perhaps given without a great deal of consideration. He said that he merely mentioned those figures in passing. He said that had he considered the matter carefully, or had he intended accurately to define the incomes of the group of people about whom he was speaking, he would have named a much lower figure. But he was not thinking of figures at all. As I have said, the operative words were his reference to that great group who are trying to look after themselves and, "to be beholden to nobody, not even the state." And in that group the hon. member agreed with me that he would have included all those who are engaged in the farming industry.

It is undeniable that indirect taxes hit this group, who for the most part have larger families than other groups, and hits them much harder than those with higher incomes. One has but to think of the taxes on such things as shoes, cigarettes, tobacco, tableware, and amongst other things, the indirect tax on soft drinks. I say that because it is the people with families who are hit most by this particular two cent tax—this is a tax which they must pay when their children buy soft drinks. But the same principle applies to all indirect taxes.

In addition one should take into consideraiton the effect of increased prices. The luxury tax, so called, of twenty-five per cent, and the eight per cent sales tax, are applied to the end price. If prices go up, taxes are correspondingly increased, because the taxation is levied as eight per cent on the total cost. That is why it is called a regressive tax.

We submit there is room for a reduction of these taxes. It should be remembered that this year there is a saving of government expenditures, through the removal of subsidies, to the amount of $208 million. Yet this tax reduction is not being passed on. There is an income tax reduction of only $110 million this year.

I should like to deal here with another portion of the remarks made by the hon. member for Dauphin, when he said that the official opposition was inconsistent when it advocated the immediate removal of all price ceilings—which, incidentally, it did not do—and then turned around and said, "You have allowed the cost of living to go up, and yet you have not given any relief in taxation." The fact is that by the removal of subsidies, which admittedly have had the effect of increasing prices, the government will have saved $208 million. But in the form of tax relief there has been passed on in 1947 only $110 million, thus leaving nearly another $100 million which might have been available in the form of tax relief. That is one point.

The other is that the only relief which has been given has been relief from direct taxation. The point we make in our amendment is that there should have been greater relief from indirect taxes which increase the cost of living. If the minister had removed subsidies which increased the cost of living, and at the same time removed indirect taxes to the same extent, the net effect on the cost of living would have been the same. Our point is that that great group of middle income people with large families should have been given this relief. Then, not only those who pay taxes, but also those who receive incomes which do not place them in income tax paying groups, would have received relief to meet the rising cost of living, and our financial position would have been placed on a sounder basis.

I should like to give a few figures with regard to the actual proportion of income derived from indirect and direct taxation. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) dealt with this at some length, but I think the picture is even worse than he painted it. It should be remembered that only $1,005 million is being raised this year by indirect taxation as against $1,045 million being raised by direct taxation. The figures as given by the Minister of Finance at page 2552 of Hansard show a total of $1,045 million being raised from indirect taxation and a total of $1,155 million from direct taxation at the 1946 rates, before the tax reductions were applied. But the reductions in taxes subsequently announced have the effect of taking off $40 million from the indirect and $110 million from the direct, thus leaving, as I say, $1,005 million to be raised by indirect taxation as against $1,045 million by direct. So that the proportion is 49·02 per cent as against 50·08 per cent. In other words we are raising virtually as much by indirect taxation as by direct.

It must be admitted that, despite what I have said to the effect that relief is desirable, the problem remains to be solved as to how this relief is to be given. How is one to decrease indirect taxation and still balance the budget? The answer to that—and I think the only answer—is by reducing government spending. Then the question will be asked: How are you going to reduce government spending?

I have a suggestion to make in that regard to which I shall refer in a moment. But I should like to say this, that we remember last year hearing the Minister of Finance reproach the opposition because, as he said, "You criticize us for the level of our expenditures, and you say 'reduce them', but you come along later and say, 'spend more money on this and on that'." I am reminded of the answer of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, who referred the minister to the book of Genesis, where he would find words to this effect: "The woman tempted me, and I did eat." If that is the answer of the government I think it is an indication of a weak-minded policy. If they recognize the necessity to reduce expenditures and fail to do so because the opposition does not suggest methods of reduction, then I say that they ought not to continue in office any longer. It is the government's responsibility to reduce expenditures, and they cannot evade that responsibility by saying that we have not suggested means of doing it.

There are some interesting figures in this connection. First, the national income as compared with the pre-war figures is up some two and a half times, an estimated $12,000 million this year as against $5,000 million in 1938. At the same time national expenditures by the federal government are up four and a quarter times, $2,100 million this year as against $550 million in 1938. Our federal government's expenditures have increased four and a quarter times while the national income has gone up only two and a half times. On analysing the situation further it is found that the proportion of the national income taken in taxes by the federal government was in the neighbourhood of one-ninth to one-tenth in 1938-39 but in 1947 it had increased to between one-fifth and one-sixth. In other words, twice as great a proportion of the national income is taken by the federal government in taxes now as before the war.

The problem becomes still greater when we realize that the total cost in taxes to the Canadian people of provincial, municipal and federal governments is over $3,000 million. The last available figures from the Canada Year Book show $3,231 million taxation revenue by all governments for 1943. That is over one-quarter of the national income of $12,000 million. Admittedly that figure is for a war year, but it must be remembered that taxes by the dominion government are practically as high now as they were during the war, that taxes by most municipal governments are going up this year, and certainly provincial government taxes have not come down. So I think we are safe in assuming that the figure of $3,231 million would be a fair estimate of the tax revenue today of all three governments in Canada. which means that over a quarter of the national income is being taken from the Canadian people by their governments through taxation.

This raises the question of whether there is not some duplication of services between these different forms of government, and whether some extravagance does not result from duplications which might be eliminated. To my mind this does not mean that the only method of eliminating duplication is by increased centralization. On the contrary, it suggests to me that a great deal of extravagance through duplication could be eliminated by increased decentralization, by the elimination of some of the things which the dominion government does.

One example is the cost of administration of family allowances. According to a return tabled in the house on February 27 in answer to a question of mine, the estimated cost of administering family allowances in 1947-48 was $3,881,415, or nearly $4,000,000. All provinces have social services and public and private welfare institutions which are already in this field. I see no reason why those services and institutions already existing could not assume some responsibility for this administration, thereby saving us some money. I know that there is a certain amount of political advantage to be gained from the fact that it is represented that the great and good federal government is actually paying all this money directly into the hands of Canadian families, but I suggest that the provinces could have undertaken a part of this administration although it might not have been quite so easy to say each time the cheque came in that it was a donation from the federal government. In answer to another question which I asked it was indicated by the Department of National Health and Welfare that the provinces had never been approached in this matter. There was no effort made to achieve a saving through having the provinces assume part of the responsibility of administering family allowances.

Although some saving might be made here, there is still the problem of how are we to get government spending down by any large amount. I think it will be agreed by everyone in the house, and probably everyone in the country, that the only way to get taxes down is to get the cost of government down—that is, if we are to have balanced budgets. I think there will be general agreement that taxes are still too high, when they are taking over a quarter of our national income, and that they must come down. With unsettled world conditions we have to insulate ourselves against any possible upset. To put it mildly, the Moscow conference did not achieve the ends it sought, and the Geneva trade conference may not succeed. There may be a recession in international trade and in conditions here and in the United States, so we must get our costs down to guard against the unforeseen possibilities referred to by the Minister of Finance. We must reduce taxation also in order that the individual may have sufficient of his income left after paying taxes to provide for his old age and unforeseen requirements and emergencies such as medical and dental attention, particularly in the case of a family.

We come back therefore to the same question: How are we to get expenditures down? There are certain irreducible increases in government expenditure just now—such as the increased cost of servicing the national debt, the increased pensions and gratuities payable as a result of the war; there are family allowances, and so on. Yet some reduction must be made.

Another suggestion is that we should examine costly items, such as the national film board, which runs into an expenditure of some four or five million a year, in a more critical attitude. We should say to ourselves something like this: We admit that the national film board, and other such institutions, may render a desirable service to the Canadian people, but at a time like this when it is essential that we get our costs down for the various reasons we have discussed, is it not in fact a luxury which we cannot at the moment afford? I think this should be our approach to such spending as that being made on the national film board and other such government activities.

Next there is the question of government publicity. A quick review of the estimates reveals that there are over fifty separate items for government publicity, with a total expenditure of over $3,000,000, not counting the Canadian information service which has a separate expenditure for overseas service. There are nineteen separate publicity items in the Department of National Health and Welfare alone. There is competing in publicity in each branch of the department. The total expenditures in that department are over $350,000. I suggest that a solution would be to set up a bureau of publicity along the lines of the bureau for translations. This at least would prevent duplication between departments, and I think would result in a considerable reduction in expenditure on government publicity. It would also ensure that such publicity as was put out would be non-political in nature. Then there is the question I have referred to already of the potential saving in the cost of administering family allowances. There are various other items one might mention, but time prevents my going into too great detail.

There is one main suggestion, however, which I want to make at this point. In trying to look at the problem analytically I am conscious of the fact that even with the reductions suggested we might save at the most some $12,000,000 and that we would not have found a real solution—although economies wherever possible should be practised. The most effective approach to, and the most obvious solution of the problem would be the appointment of a budget committee, charged with the responsibility of recommending sweeping reductions in expenditure. May I put it this way: It is surely obvious that each minister and deputy minister must regard their own department as most important; he would not be a good officer if he did not. Therefore he wants his estimates to be granted in full. Again, within a department the heads of branches will equally regard their own branch as most important; they would not be good civil servants if they did not, and so they are not going to recommend reductions in expenditure but fight for every dollar which they consider is required for what they regard as the essential services they are rendering to the country.

When it comes to comparing the estimates of different departments, the Minister of Finance cannot be a superman. He cannot possibly know all the details of every department and say that the estimates of this department are more justified than the estimates of that department. He cannot therefore exercise that police control over expenditure which is so essential if we are to reduce our taxes. For these reasons I think there should be appointed a budget committee. I am not limiting it as to numbers, but a budget committee should be appointed consisting of accountants and I should like to suggest also an engineer, which committee would work in consultation with perhaps two or three members of the cabinet, to go over the estimates and advise the cabinet as a whole which expenditures can be dispensed with, where reductions can be made, which expenditures should be allowed or even increased. I suggest as another approach to the problem that a limitation on total expenditure should be set. We are now spending two billion dollars a year. It might be said, let us try to get along with one billion and a half. The budget committee might approach the problem from that starting point and then examine the proposed expenditures of the different departments and apply the axe where needed and make recommendations accordingly. Only if some such approach is made shall we make a substantial reduction in expenditure.

The other advantages which such a budget committee might have would be (1) to ascertain what expenditures are really necessary; (2) to eradicate duplication, waste and extravagance; (3) since there are so many competing requests for increased expenditures—for instance, the British Columbia members are all urging that the principle of P.F.R.A. be extended to that province, which would not necessarily mean an increase in capital expenditure because it could be put on a self-liquidating basis over a period of years—the budget committee could, where necessary, recommend expenditures that are not now provided for, but which would be more advantageous to Canada as revenue-producing projects than some which are now being made.

Finally, and most important, this budget committee could bring the cost of government down more into line with the ability of the Canadian people to pay and more in line with our present uncertain position in world trade.

The third subject on which I should like to touch briefly is the third clause in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), that the budget proposals:

> fail to provide for reconvening the dominion-provincial conference in order to complete satisfactory agreements with the provinces,

And so on.

It will be eighty years next July 1 since the Dominion of Canada was created. I should like to suggest, in passing, that the government give consideration to setting aside next Dominion day for a special commemoration, so that we might recall to our minds the spirit in which confederation was achieved.

This question of dominion-provincial relations is, I think, one of the most important which faces the country today, and certainly the failure of the budget to advance any constructive solution of this problem is one aspect in which it is most open to criticism. The official opposition has urged, and many good Canadians both inside and outside the house have urged for some time now, that the conference be reconvened. But we recognize that there is a necessity for a new approach to the question if the conference is to get anywhere. A new approach is necessary to the question whether or not any readjustments of responsibilities as between the various governments should be made. It must be admitted that the conference broke up last year without any progress having been made on that head. But surely we should remember that between 1860 and 1867 there were similar disappointments and conferences broke up and had to be reconvened, but they kept at it in the spirit of give and take. Their approach was: We have to make an agreement in the interests of the general good of all. They realized that the general good of all could not be preserved or retained by denying the good of any of the components of confederation, and so they achieved a compromise between the general good of all and individual interests. I think, if we approach the matter in that spirit, we can undoubtedly achieve agreement, not only in regard to financial matters, but in regard to the other important questions of social security, public health and public investment.

I do not think it would be fair to try to apportion any blame for the break-down of the conference last May, but I earnestly suggest that the dominion government is open to severe censure for its attitude since and for its refusal to reconvene the conference. Had that attitude been maintained in the years between 1860 and 1867, there would have been no confederation. I suggest that the dominion government must find a new approach to this question, or we shall never get that re-confederation which all of us feel is so essential, including the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I am going to suggest a new approach, I hope a reasonable constructive approach, to this question. There are three reasons why I feel this is necessary.

In the first place, it seems that the approach of the federal government as illustrated in its present attitude is unsound, because it insists upon making financial agreements before it is willing to discuss details of a general agreement on other matters. That surely is not the sound way to a solution of our difficulties. If you or I, Mr. Speaker, wanted to go to a trust company let us say, to arrange with it to administer our affairs we would not discuss financial arrangements first. We would agree upon what it was we wanted done and then discuss the financial arrangements to carry it out. I think that illustration has some force because, after all, the federal government has no rights or powers of its own. Governments derive their powers from the people; to that extent our governments exist only as trustees for the Canadian people, and the federal government is there also as a trustee of the provinces. Certain powers were given to the federal government in 1867 and certain powers were retained by the provincial governments, which surrendered some of their rights to the federal government. If we approach the question in that attitude, that it is a trust we are trying to arrange for our mutual benefit and that we must agree on the terms of the trust before we settle the financial details we shall, I believe, be able to make progress.

Secondly, I suggest that the dominion government has been too uncompromising since the conference broke down last May. I do not ask the house to accept my own words for that. I should like to read the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in answer to a question asked of him by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) on March 17. The point I am making is that the dominion government is now insisting upon all provinces concluding financial arrangements with it before it will continue the discussions on other matters. That attitude was expressed clearly in the words of the Prime Minister on March 17 when he was asked if he would reconvene the conference. In reply to that question he said that the dominion government felt there was no point in reconvening the conference until the financial proposals had been accepted by the provinces. He read from a telegram which he had sent to the premier of Saskatchewan as follows:

> As soon as there is a sufficient acceptance of the proposed tax agreements we shall be ready to explore in a general conference or otherwise the possibility of working out mutually satisfactory arrangements in regard to the whole or any part of our earlier public investment and social security proposals.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. FULTON: I have just one or two sentences and I shall conclude. The Prime Minister concluded by saying:

> The conditions set forth there have, in the mind of the government, not as yet been fulfilled.

That is surely indicative of an uncompromising attitude, which insists that until these proposals are accepted, we shall not have any further discussion.

Thirdly, in actual fact, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason, even though the financial proposals have not been accepted, why the conference should not be reconvened, because the Minister of Finance's statement this year, as reported at page 2561 of Hansard, was to the effect that it would cost us $110 million more should the non-signing provinces sign the agreement. Here it is significant to remember that the reduction in income taxes this year is exactly $110 million. Furthermore the great tax fields, the corporation and personal income taxes, are as vacant as though the provinces had signed the agreement, because they have not imposed or reimposed these taxes to any greater extent than they could have done even though they had signed the financial agreement held forth by the dominion government. Therefore the tax fields are still as clear as they would be if the agreement had been signed. Consequently there is no financial reason why the dominion government should not proceed with the discussion of its social security, public health and public investment programme.

Furthermore, I suggest that it is too expensive to do it in any other way, because actually the taxpayers are paying $100 million more (again according to the minister's statement at page 1841 of Hansard) as a result of the agreements which have been signed, than if no agreement had been signed, and yet we have not advanced one step farther along the road to solving our problem in regard to social security, public investment and public health. Although the agreements have been signed and involve the expenditure of $100 million, these problems have not been settled; therefore surely it is obvious that the conference must be reconvened. It is too expensive financially not to reconvene it. There is no financial obstacle arising from the fact that all provinces have not signed. Surely then, it is too vital, too important to the spirit and the very framework and lifeblood of confederation to permit the problem to remain any longer unsolved. Surely it is in the best interests of Canada that the conference be convened again and these pressing problems finally settled.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the budget speech has given rise, this year as in the past, to many and varied appreciations. For my part, I wish to make a few remarks and express my views on certain subjects.

In the first place, let me draw the attention of hon. members to the tremendous debt of $16,500,000,000 borne by our twelve million population, which is throwing our national economy off-balance. It is the result of our undue participation in the war and our unprecedented bounties to England. Such extravagance was based on imperialistic feelings, contrary to the best interests of the nation and conducive to disunity among the people.

At the beginning of the war, the then Minister of Finance set forth the "pay-as-you-go" policy which he meant to follow. Obviously we overstepped the mark since our $3,433,000,000 debt at August 31, 1939, has grown up to the startling figure of $16,500 million, despite the many billions levied on Canadian taxpayers, so that we could pride ourselves on policing the world, on lending without interest to Britain, on being the Santa Claus of the empire. Such titles are expensive.

If only those sacrifices had helped to safeguard world peace and order. Far from it, the turmoil is greater than ever. Europe and Asia are starving; rivalries between countries are more acute than ever; and the will to dominate, so evident among the victors, is the forerunner of another conflict. Nazism and fascism have been replaced by a much greater danger, communism, which dominates a large part of Europe and threatens to spread throughout the world. Hitler and Mussolini have been vanquished, but Stalin, who is ten times more inhuman, has taken their place and is dictating the peace terms. In eradicating one evil we have given rise to another, greater than the first. No wonder that uneasiness prevails throughout the world. Surely, such poor results obtained at the cost of tremendous sums and of so many human lives give little cause for rejoicing.

Our policy of lavishness towards Great Britain is being continued in various forms even though the war is over and that country's budget shows a billion-dollar surplus.

For instance, in the case of wheat alone, we are selling ours to Great Britain way under the world price, and at the expense of the Canadian producer. In the words of a Canadian bank president:

> When the demand is brisk, we should be getting top prices for our surplus wheat, lumber, metals and minerals on the world's markets.

As a matter of fact, ours is not a Canadian policy, but a policy in the service of the empire.

A reduced scale of income taxation was announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) at the same time as a $352 million surplus, accumulated in the last fiscal year by means of taxes that were too high. Why should the new schedule not apply from January 1, 1947, instead of July first? When taxes are too high is hardly the time to accumulate surpluses.

As for the new tax schedule, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has shown that it brings no relief whatever to the majority of our citizens. In most cases of apparent reductions, they are completely cancelled by the elimination of subsidies on food products and a corresponding increase in the cost of living. So, the reductions are more apparent than real in most practical cases. In order to relieve the taxpayer, the exemptions should have been raised to at least $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married people.

Everyone needs a minimum revenue to live. Due to the present cost of living a person cannot live normally on $750 a year. Therefore, the government is not justified in maintaining the present exemptions while announcing a $352,000,000 surplus. The burden of indirect taxes applying to the necessaries of life should have been lightened; the large families would thereby have been granted a measure of relief.

In England, the exemption has just been raised from $600 to $1,000 and the subsidies on the necessaries of life have been increased. Let us stop extending gifts to foreigners and start thinking of our own people.

Another exemption should be granted to taxpayers, covering all medical expenses incurred.

As the act now stands, where medical expenses do not exceed four per cent of the income, no exemption is granted; if they exceed four per cent, the exemption is limited to a certain amount. Why should it be so? Does the government want to tax illness, misfortune or family obligations? For instance, most of us know what medical, hospital and nursing expenditures the birth of a child entails. People whose income is barely sufficient to cover the necessaries of life are unable, after they have paid their income tax, to provide the confined woman with the required care, or else they run forever into debt. In other cases, through lack of money, children are deprived of necessary medical care.

The provision of the act which limits the medical expenses exemption is antisocial and detrimental to the family. It should be repealed as soon as possible.

Another provision of the act that is antisocial, that discriminates against families, is that concerning exemptions for dependent students.

If I am not mistaken, this exemption used to be $500, and was granted to age 25. Why limit it now to age 21 and $300? Anyone knows that it costs more than $300 to support a university student. Costs are indeed so high that an "honour loan" system has been devised to help students complete their studies when parents cannot meet the expense. I therefore ask the government that the age limit be raised to 25 and the exemption to $500 per student.

There has been talk in this debate of immigration to boost our population and develop our resources.

In the view of certain hon. members and a certain section of the press, immigration means only immigration from the British Isles. What is this if not racialism, the very doctrine advocated by Hitler, against which we have fought.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who consider that this matter must be approached not from the "racial" standpoint but from the standpoint of "need" in the light of the interests of this country, not those of the British empire. It is both an economic and a social problem.

There can be no doubt that our population is not commensurate with our natural wealth. But if we must increase it by means of immigration, let us look to the character and quality of our future citizens.

But what section of the population calls for an increase? The urban or the rural?

At the present time, our cities are overflowing with people who cannot find any living accommodation, due to the scarcity of houses, or are compelled to live in revolting conditions, numerous members of the same family occupying a single room, often unsanitary. Before inviting foreigners to live in our cities, let us first provide homes for our own people.

However, there is one class of immigrants who could be welcomed as the need for them is very acute; I mean domestic helpers. At the present time, servants are unavailable, which constitutes a serious problem for many young families. The best way to increase population is to raise the birth-rate. Let us give our families the opportunity to hire the help they need to bring up their family properly and let us get that help where it is to be found. We will require no additional living accommodation for this purpose, since servants live with the families employing them. I hope the immigration regulations will be amended so as not to allow British subjects only to enter Canada as domestic help, but that the privilege will be extended to people from all countries, provided they are otherwise physically and morally fit.

In the case of the farming community, the situation is quite different, and I have no hesitation in saying that the immigrants we need are agricultural workers.

We have extensive vacant areas, as well as undeveloped natural resources, and there is room in this country for more farmers. Moreover, from a social standpoint, it is desirable that we should bring here farmer immigrants who can more readily be assimilated and have more stability. Workmen travel from one country to another, while people who settle on land stay there permanently.

Since the interest of this country requires agricultural immigrants, let us seek them where they can be found. Would it be in Great Britain? Excellent farmers are certainly not lacking in that country, especially in Scotland and Ireland, and I know a number of Scotchmen and Irishmen who have settled on lands in the countries of Beauharnois, Chateauguay and Huntingdon, and who own splendid farms. But can we hope that a larger number will come here, under the present circumstances? Far from being in a position to export farmers, Great Britain needs more of them. The shortage of industrial labour is so acute in that country that German prisoners of war are being held to alleviate the situation.

The same applies to other war-ridden countries.

On the other hand, there are countries where the rural classes are dissatisfied with their lot and would be only too glad to establish themselves on Canadian farms. Let us not bar them out systematically. We are in need of farm-hands, of miners and forest-workers. Let us, therefore, accept them from whatever country they may come as long as they are carefully selected as to their ability and character in order that no one may come into this country, spread subversive doctrines and stir up trouble.

To sum up in a few words, I say that mass immigration from any country whatever is not a desirable thing. There must be at all times a certain relationship between our birth-rate and the number of our immigrants and we must give newcomers time to assimilate themselves and become true Canadians.

Our immigration policy must be essentially Canadian, based solely on the needs and interests of Canada and of no other country whatsoever. It should not run the risk of making our country the world's dumping ground by opening the door too wide; let this policy be of a welcoming character but nevertheless strict, with selection based on individuals rather than on races.

Work, health and order are the main components required to give our country a powerful and prosperous impetus; we need citizens who wish Canada to become their sole country and who, merging with our masses, will help to build a great and united country, free within as it is without, consisting of different races which, without repudiating their native heritage, will contribute their own genius and fine traditions to the development of the Canadian nation.

I shall discuss briefly the relations between the dominion and the provinces. The Minister of Finance referred to the fiscal proposals made by the government to the provinces. The latter are asked to waive in favour of the federal authorities their right to tax personal and corporation income and to levy succession duties.

Such proposals, Mr. Chairman, would undoubtedly tend to deprive the provinces of their main source of revenue and to make them dependent on the central government. In other words, they are aimed at holding the provinces in bondage. In effect, they would mean interference with the exercise of the legislative powers which have been reserved exclusively to the provinces in social and educational matters.

The respective powers of the dominion and the legislatures in the fields of legislation and taxation have been set forth in the act of 1867. For a long time the constitution was respected, but during the past ten years repeated assaults have been launched by centralists with a view to concentrating in Ottawa social and fiscal legislation and administration.

That campaign has become more aggressive recently; it has even become a sort of bargaining which brings to light the true designs of its sponsors. I believe in provincial autonomy and in the part which French Canadians are called upon to play within confederation. Therefore, I feel that it would be a sheer betrayal to accept such proposals which not only violate the provisions of the pact of 1867, but encroach upon our most sacred rights. If there could have been any doubt in regard to the intentions of some advocates of centralization, the speech delivered by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) while he was Minister of National Health, has dispelled them. According to L'Action Catholique of December 16, he made the following remarks:

> Through its proposals, the dominion government is trying to place the provinces in such a position that they might relinquish their constitutional responsibilities. The dominion government is striving to avoid double taxation and to place the whole of Canada on an equal footing, which would enable all sections to develop their resources and to relinquish their responsibilities in matters of education and welfare.

Such was the statement made by the Minister of National Defence, while he was Minister of National Health.

We seek not to shirk our responsibilities, nor do we need the advice of Ottawa centralists on the Quebec educational system. We merely ask to be allowed to exercise our powers in the matter.

Let us briefly review the federal government's real or attempted encroachments on provincial jurisdiction. Advantage was taken of prewar unemployment to intrude upon social legislation, through unemployment insurance. In January 1941, the government called upon the provinces to accept the tax proposals embodied in the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission. These proposals which called for the permanent waiver of the three taxes under discussion, were turned down. Note that the Prime Minister took care to state that the report did not aim at centralizing powers in Ottawa. Thus are provinces despoiled of their rights on the claim that those rights are being respected.

In 1942, Ottawa secured from the provinces the power to enter certain tax fields until then reserved to provinces, but for the duration of war only.

Now that the war is over, the federal government wants to be allowed to exercise that power for another five years.

In 1917, income tax was inaugurated with the understanding that it would disappear at the end of the war. It has remained. It is thus that centralization in the hands of the federal government is gradually realized: the provinces are deprived, bit by bit, of their powers and the means of exercising them.

Under the pretext of temporary arrangements, precedents are created leading to permanent conditions.

The province of Quebec has more reasons than the other provinces for fearing such political centralization. Besides realizing that Ottawa will raise the greater part of its revenues from within our frontiers to return only a fraction of them to us, we know that it will be in a position to decide what use we shall make of that fraction it will return to us.

Here is what Mr. Angus Macdonald, premier of Nova Scotia, said on March 7 last:

> Could anyone deny that, if the greater part of the revenue accruing to the provinces has to be paid by the dominion, the time may come,—indeed, is it not probable that the time will surely come,—when the dominion will insist on deciding what use the provinces will put them to? The advent of that day will mark the end of provincial autonomy.

This is what centralization will lead us to; it would only increase, I believe, the unfair treatment meted out to the province of Quebec.

(Text):

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, so many complimentary phrases have been addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the presentation of this, his first budget, that it seems almost superfluous to add to them. Yet along with others I do wish to compliment him, even though I do not agree that his budget is as fine as he would have us believe.

Others have taken that budget apart and revealed to us its many deficiencies, and there is no need for me to do so. However I want to say that I share the disappointment felt by many thousands of people, in that the exemptions have not been raised to $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons. Speaking in this debate a few days ago, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said, as reported at page 2897 of Hansard, that people would not mind paying taxes for a decent social security plan. I quite agree with the hon. member. For many years as a servant of the church my salary with exemptions did not bring me into the taxable group. When I heard people from time to time grousing about the taxes they had to pay I said then, as I say now, "Give me the salary and I will gladly pay the taxes." That, sir, is the feeling of many thousands who are in such low income groups that they do not come anywhere near being taxable. Canadians generally are not a tax evading people. They know that it costs real money to run any country, especially one as large as this dominion, and they are prepared to do their part. But having said that, let me also say that they want their taxes used wisely and economically. They abhor reckless, wasteful spending, much of which went on during the war years; on the other hand, they do not want to strangle progress by the adoption of a penny-pinching policy. There is a happy medium to be struck and they want their Minister of Finance to strike it.

I also want to support another statement made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South when he deplored the fact that the Minister of Finance had not seen fit to drop the nuisance tax on soft drinks and chocolate bars. I have received representations from some comparatively small soft drink manufacturers in my constituency, and they have assured me that on the removal of the two per cent excise tax they will pass the tax savings on to their customers, keeping the price at five cents and maintaining a uniformly high quality of product.

I also want to voice my disappointment with the budget in that no change has been adopted with regard to the taxing of cooperatives. The amount of revenue that has accrued to the government cannot be much; but I know that ever since the tax provisions were applied to cooperatives at the last session of parliament they have not ceased to voice their objections. Let me point out to the minister that when cooperators from the Atlantic to the Pacific voice their objection, an increasing number of the Canadian people are speaking. Personally, I am in entire agreement with those who ask the government to introduce a cooperative act, one that will permit cooperatives to function on a proper basis.

I want now to leave the discussion of the budget for the moment and speak of other matters of national concern. The various countries of the world are engaged in a titanic struggle for markets for their surplus products, and Canada is participating in that struggle. At the moment the limitations of production give a head start to those nations which have the more quickly reverted to a peacetime basis. A hungry world is clamouring for consumer goods, but the day is not far distant when the supply will exceed the demand. Then good will, salesmanship and quality will again enter the picture. There are three areas which particularly interest Canada at the present time. They are the Orient, Great Britain and Europe. The oriental markets we shall have to share with others. The British market is fairly well assured to us by preferential tariffs. The European market has to be developed if Canada is to have her fair share of it.

By way of illustration, let me speak of Czechoslovakia and its needs and the possibility of Canada's developing a real market in that country. Today Czechoslovakia needs large quantities of wheat, rye and other coarse grains, lumber and other goods that we produce in abundance. These she can buy on the open world market at prevailing prices. The difficulty arises when we ask the question "How shall she pay for them?" Not only Czechoslovakia, but all European countries are anxious to buy from us. Their difficulty is that both now and in the future they must pay in dollars. Transportation costs to and from European countries must also be met in dollars. The fact that central Europe (Germany) is an occupied country makes the task all the more difficult in that more United States dollars are required to pay for land transportation. These, together with tariffs against goods originating outside the British empire make it impossible for them to obtain United States dollars by the export of their goods to both Canada and the United States.

While we can sell large quantities of Canadian products at the present time at world market prices, unless we are prepared to accept their goods in return, we cannot stabilize our trade with these countries now and look forward to the sale of our goods in the future.

Many of these European countries have exhausted their supply of dollars in buying small quantities, even of seed grain for milling purposes, at high prices caused by United States speculative marketing policies. To my mind, Canada should now plan her trading relationships with these nations so that we may develop and perpetuate markets that are open to us, by guaranteeing both now and in the future, the admission to our markets of desirable goods of many descriptions manufactured by eastern European nations and particularly Czechoslovakia.

In return for our Canadian products, Czechoslovakia is prepared to export to us large quantities of goods such as glassware, plate and window glass. She is also a great manufacturer of textile goods; goods that we in Canada need. And I scarcely need point out that there are other countries much nearer to these European nations than we are. They, too, produce wheat and coarse grains in abundance, lumber and a host of other products. If we are not quick to avail ourselves of the opportunities now offering of new and permanent markets, then we must not complain if, while we hesitate, other countries step in and consolidate a position for themselves.

In conclusion, may I point out that a mutual exchange of goods with eastern European countries will go far toward helping them to rehabilitate themselves. This is not a form of relief; it does not involve loans with any question of repayment. It is a good business arrangement for all parties concerned. There have been times in the past when we, too, have been short of United States dollars and our trade has suffered accordingly. Therefore we can appreciate and understand the position in which these eastern European countries find themselves at the present time. They have goods we need and we have goods they want. Let us get together on this thing. Our workers, too, will benefit and will be enabled to pay the taxes so dear to the heart of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I, too, should like to join with others in congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon the delivery of his first budget speech. In all sincerity, however, I cannot say that I congratulate him upon the contents of it. In the first place, I consider it took a somewhat dismal and unrealistic view of the future and, second, it fails to provide for an equitable distribution of the burden of debt and taxation.

If there is one thing that is necessary today more than anything else it is to maintain the confidence of the people of this country in our ability to go on and achieve that new order of which we heard so much during the war and of which we hear so little today. It is not to be wondered at if the people are today beginning to fear that they will seek that new order in vain, because they will recall, and hon. members will recall, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated during the war that, unless that new order was well on its way before the end of the war, we might look for it in vain. Many people are already beginning to wonder whether or not that promise was given merely in the form of a bribe that would cause them to be willing to undergo great sacrifices during the war.

We are still in a state of reconversion, a transition period from war to peace, and the maximum output of consumer goods has not yet been reached. On the other hand, I think everybody in Canada knows, or at least they should know, that when reconversion has been completed the Canadian people will be in position to enjoy the highest standard of living that they have ever had or ever dreamed of. We suggest that it is high time we face these problems realistically and deal with them adequately.

I should like to summarize briefly our economic position as disclosed by the minister in his budget speech. Our productive capacity is today many times greater than it was at the start of the war. We have greatly increased the number of our factories and industries and we have greatly increased their efficiency of operation. We also have more skilled labour now than we had at the start of the war and new areas have been opened up to provide raw materials for our increased production. In addition, while carrying on our war effort we were able to reduce our external debt by about thirty-five per cent. I shall refer to our internal debt later on.

The minister disclosed that our national production for 1946 was over $11,000 million and he suggested that by the end of the year it might reach $12,000 million, making a total personal income of $9·2 billion after allowing for investment income not distributed and contributions to pensions. This provides an average income of over $3,000 for a family of four. In spite of that favourable picture, the minister went on to tell us that over fifty per cent of the people in this country who earn income will have incomes of less than $750 in the single bracket and $1,500 in the married bracket. Keeping those figures in mind, I wish to discuss the minister's statement with reference to normal production, to be found on page 2548 of Hansard, where he is reported as having said:

> Moreover, our revenues are based on very high levels of production, incomes and imports which we probably cannot expect as normal levels in future years.

The question that immediately comes to my mind is, why does the minister call the present level abnormal; why does he suggest that we shall not be able to maintain our present levels of production in the future? I suggest that when the Minister of Finance makes a statement of that kind he is bound to create a feeling of lack of confidence in the minds of the people. There is no doubt that our production can be expanded considerably above present levels. At the same time there is no doubt that with over fifty per cent of our population today receiving low incomes we can greatly expand the consumption of goods in this country to provide an effective demand for any increased production that we may be able to accomplish.

In other words, that fifty per cent of the people in the low-income brackets represent a great potential market which we should develop in the future instead of spending so much time and energy in trying to find new markets here or there. It is high time we realized that right on our doorstep we have a potential market which we have never tried to develop in the past. After all, that was to be the purpose of the new order, to guarantee a Canadian standard of living. The Minister of Finance, along with many others, apparently takes it for granted that under our system we are bound to have booms and depressions; because we happen to be up today, he takes it for granted that we must be down tomorrow. Just because we have tolerated slumps and depressions in the past is no reason why we should be prepared to tolerate them in the future. They are not acts of God; they represent the stupidity of man in failing to deal with his economic problems.

I would say that unfortunately the policy of the government today is headed for lower production which may very well result in a depression. If you talk and think in terms of lower production, you will get lower production. In two or three places in his speech the Minister of Finance emphasized the fact that we could not expect to maintain national production, income and employment at present levels. I would suggest that the reason the minister says that is that he does not believe we can maintain an effective demand against that production in the future.

The Minister of Finance referred to the temporary nature of income from reconversion, from the spending of war savings and from our export sales on account of shortages caused by the war. The minister is not alone in that; that is the stand taken today by most financial authorities. The same stand was taken by the governor of the Bank of Canada in 1946, and it has been taken by Beardsley Ruml in the United States and by many other economists. They all fear that we face a depression in the near future, as a result of the fact that we shall have difficulty in maintaining demand against our production. I would say that in Canada we are very fortunate, because, our main problem is that while we can produce an abundance of goods for the people, apparently we cannot provide the necessary purchasing power to the people with which to buy that production. If our problem was that the country was so barren that we could not produce the goods the people required, then we would have a real problem on our hands. Fortunately that is not the case.

I want to deal with this question on a national basis and at a later time I shall deal with the international aspect of it. The Minister of Finance emphasized that when a nation exports goods it must be prepared to accept imports in return, to balance the trade; well so long as we do that we will not change the internal situation. It then becomes a matter of balancing effective demand with supply, whether that supply represents our own production or the production of other nations for which our own production has been exchanged. The problem remains the same just so long as you maintain the balance between your exports and imports. Referring to the times when our production and income fall off, the Minister of Finance had this to say on page 2553 of Hansard:

> We must expect, I believe, that at times when our employment, production and incomes are below satisfactory levels, our revenues will fall short of our expenditures. Indeed, at such times it will probably be necessary to incur expenditures of various kinds to assist in restoring better levels of employment and income.

What does the minister mean by "satisfactory levels"? He talks about having lower levels of production, and I should like to know what he means by "satisfactory levels." Will he agree that when our production and income fall below the optimum level, that level is unsatisfactory? That is, will he admit that just the minute our production falls below the highest level that we are able to accomplish and that the people desire, then it becomes an unsatisfactory level, and it would be the duty of the government to immediately make the necessary expenditures to maintain production at the high level? As pointed out already, the greatest danger to optimum production is a lack of effective demand. I would suggest to the minister that the most equitable way to build up effective demand today would be by expanding the purchasing power of those people who are needy and helpless. That is why in this group we have consistently urged that we should immediately take action to pay an old age pension of $50 a month at the age of sixty and a pension of $50 a month to all who are physically incapacitated and unemployable. The pension for those physically incapacitated would, of course, have to be graded according to their degree of disability. I suggest that it is not necessary to wait for an agreement with the provinces to do that because, if the federal government accepted full responsibility for paying these pensions, no province would, I think, object to receiving the sum on behalf of its people, and of course the pensions should be paid without the application of the means test.

The Minister of Finance would no doubt protest against the financial cost of such a proposal because, when it was suggested last year, I recall that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) objected that the financial cost would be altogether too great. On the other hand, I do not think anyone in the house will dare suggest that we shall not have the goods in this country necessary to satisfy the demand that would be created by the payment of those pensions, because, remember, the great problem we are afraid of in the future is lack of an effective demand, and that would be one way of creating an effective demand against the production that we know we shall have in this country. It is not a question of money; it is a question of goods. During the war the government repeatedly said that no financial limitations would be allowed to impede our war effort. Then why should we allow financial limitations to impede us in peace time and bring on a depression?

I recall a speech which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made in 1944, in which he said that after the war it should be easier to obtain the money to finance production and reconstruction than it had been to finance the war effort, and, further, that it should be possible at the same time to reduce both debt and taxation. It might be well for me to read just what he said, because no doubt he meant what he said at that time, and it is necessary that we should keep those words of his in mind today when people talk of our not being able to get the money to meet necessary expenditure, although we were able to finance five billion dollars a year for our war effort. I refer hon. members to page 2101 of Hansard of April 17, 1944. The Prime Minister was replying to a question by the leader of this group who had asked where the money was to come from to finance post-war projects which had been referred to, and the Prime Minister said:

> My purpose in speaking in answer to my hon. friend was, however, to point out that if it has been possible in this time of war for this country to raise the enormous sums which have been raised to help pay the cost of the war, running into billions of dollars, it it has been possible to raise at least half of the total cost of the war at the time of the war itself, it should be a very much easier task for the government to raise the money that will be necessary for the purpose of reconstruction. It should be easier for this reason. The money we are raising today is being raised unfortunately for the purposes of destruction of human life and property, and this on a colossal scale. The money that we will have to raise for purposes of reconstruction will be money that will be used for purposes of construction, used to further increase all commodities in order to satisfy human wants. Once a human want is satisfied, it seems to be the case that new wants are thereby created which will also have to be satisfied. I think it will be possible to satisfy many wants by maximum production of useful and usable commodities. It should not be difficult to obtain the money, in other words the effective demand, which will be essential, and at the same time I would hope to reduce taxation and also debt.

I am sure that every hon. member would like to agree with that statement, but it is not borne out by the record of history. We did not appear to have very much difficulty in financing the war of 1914-18, nor did we have difficulty in financing the war of 1939 to 1945. But I recall that during the 1930's we were told time and again in this house that it was impossible for the government to finance this or that because it lacked the money. The Prime Minister said that it should be easier to finance production and reconstruction in peace time than it had been to finance the war and that we should be able to maintain production and employment and income at the maximum level and at the same time reduce debt and taxation.

Mr. LOW: That is the challenge facing the government right now.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the Minister of Finance agree with that statement of the Prime Minister? Apparently he does not, or he would not have brought down the kind of budget he did. If he does agree with the Prime Minister he should withdraw this budget and bring down a realistic one. I do not blame the Minister of Finance for one moment if he disagrees with the statement of the Prime Minister, because I do not believe that it will be easier to bring into being and finance a new order than it was to finance the war effort so long as we carry on under a debt-creating system. The Prime Minister was careful to say that it "should be" easier, which is typical of so many of his statements. It might mean something, or it might be mere wishful thinking. We all agree that it would be easier to finance peacetime production than wartime production if our system of financing were sound and equitable, but unfortunately the government's war finance policy was neither the one nor the other, and consequently our peacetime programme is handicapped by a burden of debt extending to seventeen and a half billion dollars today. During the war a large percentage of our production was financed by going into debt and, while a large percentage of that production has been destroyed, the major portion of the debt still remains with us.

I do not consider it is an honest, perhaps I should say a businesslike statement to say that you have a surplus on current account when this surplus has been obtained by the sale of capital that has not even been paid for. That statement of the Minister of Finance reminds me of an incident in the early homestead days. I had a young neighbour from Australia who had no intention of following farming as an occupation. He was out to try to make money quickly. He went to a number of machine agencies in the nearby towns and bought up a number of new wagons. You could go to a machine agency in those days and buy machinery without paying any money down, but simply signing a note. After he had bought a number of new wagons he bought a number of teams on the same terms. Then he took a subcontract for railroad construction and stayed on the railway all summer. When he came back in the fall I rode to his place to see how he had got along. He seemed quite cheerful and said, "Not too badly at all." I asked him "Where is your outfit?" I could not see any horses or wagons around the place. He replied, "I had some pretty heavy expenses. They reduced my grade level by one foot and put me on force account work, and in order to meet my expenses I had to sell my outfit but I still have a nice little surplus." That is the position of the Minister of Finance today. That outfit had not even been paid for, but after he had sold it, he met his other expenses and had a nice little surplus. So in the future it will not be merely a question of finding money to maintain full production; there will be an interest charge of $437,000,000 a year to meet on our national debt. The financial advisers of the government would have us believe that a national debt owed internally is not a great handicap. Members who were on the banking committee in 1939 will recall how Mr. Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, in reply to a question whether we should be able to pay off the national debt, said that he did not think there was any sense in the question. He said, "Why should we pay off the national debt? The national debt is a national asset. Therefore why pay it off?" He went on to say that it was generally found that a country where the debt was reduced became less prosperous. Perhaps I had better quote his actual words, because some people may say I am taking an unfair meaning from them. These are the words he used in 1939 before the banking committee. They are found on page 80 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence. This question was asked:

> Is it possible for you to imagine any way by which we are ever going to pay the debt we have got?

Mr. Towers replied:

> As the debts of the government are an asset of the Canadian people, I do not see much point in the thing; except that, to the extent that the government thinks that the distribution of those assets of the Canadian people—which are its debt—is unsatisfactory, it may take steps to remedy that distribution in any way that lies within the legislative power; in fact, in any way, I suppose—by income tax or succession duties or any other action it cares to take.

Then, when we came back to the question of the national debt later on he had this to say, as reported at page 235. I think this statement is perhaps one of the reasons why the government has not shown any concern regarding the national debt. Mark well what the governor of the Bank of Canada said at the time when the national debt of this country was in the neighbourhood of $3 billion. He said:

> So that all I can say would be this, that in a country where the sum total of public and private debt was decreasing you have a country which is going backward, and which is becoming more poverty stricken. Generally speaking, in a country where you find there is no public and private debt you have a country resembling darkest Africa; there is nothing else.

Therefore, according to that, the bigger the debt, the bigger the asset; the bigger the asset, the more prosperity there is in the country. Why pay off your national debt? All you have to do is to create a bigger debt and we become more and more prosperous. I wonder how any businessman in Canada would do if he ran his business on that line. While an internal debt is not, of course, as serious a problem as an external debt because payment does not require sending wealth abroad, on the other hand, unless there is an equitable distribution of the debt claims it may be the major contributing factor to depression. That unfortunately is the situation regarding the national debt of Canada today. The greater part of it is owed to a comparatively few individuals and corporations. If anybody doubts that for one minute, in view of the great publicity and wide distribution our loans got during the war, just make an analysis of any one of the war loans made during the war. What will you find? You will find in each one of these that less than one-third of one per cent of the subscribers purchased sixty per cent of the total subscriptions. In addition to that, we sold over $3 billion worth of bonds to the chartered banks. So, while the national debt is a liability of all the Canadian people, the major part of the debt is an asset of only a minority. Therefore, directly or indirectly all the people will be taxed in order to pay the greater part of this interest to a minority in the country. This situation will become progressively worse in the future as the small bond holder is forced to sell his bonds in order to get the money to meet his cost of living.

During the war we repeatedly criticized this inequitable method of financing. We emphasized the need for more equitable distribution of debt. We repeatedly suggested to the Minister of Finance that all money taxed from people with incomes less than $2,000 in the married brackets and $1,200 in the single bracket be in the form of compulsory savings; that is to say, that all money that was taken from the people in the lower income brackets should be credited to their accounts in the chartered banks and frozen there for the duration of the war. Then, as production expanded in relation to demand, the government could release so much of these savings year by year in order to help maintain that demand against our production. This would have been a form of insurance against lack of effective demand. But, more important, it would have given the people in the lower income brackets a share of the national debt that Mr. Towers says is a national asset. But until such time that there is a more equitable distribution of the claims upon that debt, we are not in a position to call it a real asset of the Canadian people. It is a national liability, an asset of the minority of the population.

Furthermore, during that time we urged that, to the extent that the taxation and the borrowings of the people's real savings failed to meet government expenditures, national money could be used instead of money created by the chartered banks and lent to the government. During the war the government found it impossible to finance by taxing the people's savings alone. They found it necessary to get large sums of new money created, well over $4 billion. But instead of using our own bank, the Bank of Canada, they depended largely upon the chartered banks, with the result that we increased our debt to the chartered banks by over $3 billion. As a consequence of our war financing policy, we are now paying interest on $17,500 million of debt, the greater part of which goes to the financial corporations in the country. In other words, the government has insisted on maintaining a financial policy under which Canada has been forced into debt to provide a safe investment for financial institutions and corporations throughout the dominion.

The taxing of people to pay interest on this debt is bound to reduce effective demand and have a deflationary effect upon the country. Therefore we urge upon the government the need progressively to reduce this debt by refunding through the Bank of Canada. This has been our suggestion consistently throughout the time that we have been here, and I am glad to see that a progressive lead was given to the Liberal party the other day by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud). At one time there used to be others in the Liberal party who took a similar view. I refer to the former member for Vancouver-Burrard, Mr. McGeer, who is now in the senate, and the former member for Parry Sound, Mr. Slaght. But there are two members in the house now who used to take quite a strong stand on this question. I refer to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). The Minister of Veterans Affairs was a monetary reformer before I was a member of the house. These hon. gentlemen are now, respectively, a parliamentary assistant, and a minister of the crown. I believe they will find it difficult to convince the government that their financial policy was sound, and thereby make it possible to find the money that will be needed to deal with the veterans' problems adequately, because I have in mind a statement made by a previous minister of veterans affairs. I remember that back in 1936 when we were dealing with the question of making pensions retroactive the then minister of veterans affairs said that he quite agreed veterans should have their pensions made retroactive, but it was not a question of what the veterans should have but rather of what the government could afford, because, he said, the government was practically bankrupt. That was in 1936 when the national debt was less than $3 billion. I hope the hon. member for Rosthern and the present Minister of Veterans Affairs will be able to use all their powers to try to convince the government to adopt a realistic financial policy under which justice may be done to the veterans of today, and I hope we shall not have the same statement made as the former minister of veterans affairs made in 1936 that the veterans should receive a better deal but that the government was bankrupt. If there is any bankruptcy I would say it is bankruptcy of ideas rather than of money.

Mr. LOW: Economic illiteracy.

Mr. QUELCH: I should also like to join with the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska in his reference to the various letters which have been sent out by Mr. Wilfrid E. Krug. I think he has been doing a great service to Canada.

I believe there has developed in the country widespread opposition to the high rate of taxation levied in part in order to provide the money to pay interest on bonds held by financial institutions. The question is often raised, would financing through the Bank of Canada cause inflation? My reply would be, not necessarily, if carried out wisely. People today have money in bonds for investment purposes, in order to get the interest. If the people who hold these bonds today wish to spend that money they can take the bonds to the chartered banks and cash them. The chartered banks create new money for that purpose. That is being done. It was done in the later stages of the war and it is being done today. If the people holding bonds want money for their bonds they get that money today. Therefore, if we finance the purchase of these bonds through the Bank of Canada it will not make any difference in that regard. The people who get the money for their bonds will immediately seek investment in other fields. We insist that the refunding of the debts as they mature should be done through the Bank of Canada. Then the holders of those bonds, upon receipt of the money, will immediately seek investment in the proper field of investment, namely, in private industry and commercial enterprise.

The former Minister of Finance defended using capital from United States residents on the ground that we lack venture capital in this country; that is to say, he defended borrowing from the United States of America on the ground that we had to get a certain amount of capital from that country because we lacked venture capital. I would say that so long as investment in government bonds is encouraged, investment in industry will be discouraged. Refunding dominion bonds through the Bank of Canada would tend to force investment in industry and provide all the venture capital that we need. If the government still argues that the expansion of the chartered banks' cash reserves resulting from refunding would cause inflation, then it could very well amend the Bank Act to compel the chartered banks to maintain 100 per cent cash reserves behind their demand deposits; that would adequately prevent the danger of inflation.

I quite realize that the minister may say, "That would be too hard upon the profits of the chartered banks." But I do not consider it to be the responsibility or the duty of the government to provide investments for the financial institutions of this country and then tax the people to pay the interest on those investments. Let the financial institutions and corporations invest their money in industry instead of expecting the government to provide them with an investment backed by the resources of the country, and then use the Minister of National Revenue as a collector for it. That is really what the government is doing. It is making the Minister of National Revenue a collector for a most undesirable kind of racket.

Mr. LOW: Social security for the few.

Mr. QUELCH: If the government insists on financing in the future as in the past, then I would say that depressions are inevitable, with expanding debt. From confederation up to this year we have had only fifteen balanced budgets, with a continuously rising public debt. Even in the years when we had a balanced budget in this country our public debt still expanded, because the provinces and municipalities were forced into debt. Of course the minister may say that it is different this year, that we have a surplus, that there is no increase in the debt, and that we are actually reducing the debt. But as I pointed out, that surplus is due to sale of capital which cannot be considered, or should not be considered, as current revenue. If, during the past eighty years, it has not been possible to halt the growth of public debt, what likelihood is there that in the future we shall be able to halt its growth? Are we going to suggest that the reason we could not prevent the growth of debt in the past was that our ministers of finance were incompetent or dishonest? If we are not prepared to admit that, then I think we must admit the problems which will face the present and future ministers of finance will be far greater, because we have expanded our debt many times over. We have today many far greater problems to meet than we had in days gone by.

The Minister of Finance, like former ministers, apparently still believes or hopes that we can tax ourselves into prosperity and borrow ourselves out of debt. Doctor Cyril James, when giving evidence before the reconstruction committee, emphasized the fact that we need a new budget philosophy in this country. He said that we should have two types of budget: one to balance current expenditures and revenue, and another, which would be a long-term budget, to finance capital expenditures. He said that in all probability under that system we shall see the national debt increased by several hundreds of millions of dollars in the next 100 years. I do not know why he stopped at 100 years because, if we go into debt steadily for the next 100 years, I should imagine that we shall have increased our debt to such a size that we shall have even greater difficulty in meeting our obligations as long as we continued under the present financial system. The only sound alternative would be to finance our national projects through the Bank of Canada and pay for them through taxation at the rate of depreciation of the capital asset, so that the capital asset is paid for during its lifetime instead of the debt being passed on for future generations. When we finance as we are doing today, the debt may run on for many years, so that, when the final payment is made, you have not only paid for the capital asset in the form of principal, but paid for it many times over in the form of interest.

In closing, I should just like to say that the budget should have embodied in it the following features:

1. It should provide the means for maintaining an optimum development of our resources.

2. It should provide for maintaining the purchasing power of the people at a level sufficiently high to create an effective demand or market for our production.

3. It should provide the means for a basic income to all citizens.

4. It should provide for meeting any deficiency in revenue by the use of national money, thereby making it possible to bring about a reduction in debt and taxation and at the same time maintain the income of the country at its highest level.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Quelch.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, my observations this evening will be fairly brief, and more of a general nature. It is my desire to avoid repetition as far as possible, and when the budget resolutions are before the house they will provide ample opportunity for perhaps more detailed discussion.

In presenting his budget—and I may add that, in my opinion, he presented it extremely well—the minister was optimistic in proclaiming a surplus of something over $300,000,000. I do not find myself in such an optimistic mood as that of the minister on the night he delivered his budget speech. However, as he proceeded we found him to be quite frank in admitting that the surplus of $300,000,000 odd was perhaps made up largely of the proceeds from the sale of war materials by War Assets Corporation. Two or three weeks ago, in conversation with two officials of that corporation, I asked their honest opinion about the disposal of commodities placed in their hands. One man was very frank in saying that he thought the organization had been started a year too late. He said it was already evident that markets were disappearing rapidly, because new commodities of many kinds were now appearing and this had a definite effect on the prices that could be realized from the sale of war assets. He expressed the fear that perhaps much of the materials which could have been salvaged to fair advantage might be headed for the scrap pile.

From my observations and investigations in connection with some of the airports in my own district, in regard to the machinery and other materials disposed of there, I am inclined to agree with him. I hope he is wrong, because, after all, these materials would have been of considerable value if they had been properly sold. In any event, time will tell that story. But it seems to me that the surplus of $300,000,000 might shrink rapidly as developments take place in the very near future, and I should like to give one instance to show why I make this statement. A veteran located some distance from my own city, though still in my own constituency, bought from War Assets Corporation a large quantity of material with which to build himself a small home. I believe those materials consisted of lumber, wallboard, plaster base, electrical equipment, plumbing supplies and so on. Most of it was used material; some had been taken off other buildings during the demolition of airport buildings and the like. He bought the material at open prices; he could not get it anywhere else and in his desperation, because he was in a difficult position, he bought these things expecting to be given fair treatment. A little later on, he claimed to me that he had been overcharged, and spoke of one item in particular, that of plaster base, for which he said he had been charged $42 per thousand. It had been taken off the walls of an air force building and had the usual nail holes and ragged edges which anyone who knows anything about such materials would quite expect. He asked me about the price and I said, "Well, young man, there is something wrong, because the ceiling price on that commodity is $26 per thousand." I had occasion to inspect the materials, and I had to agree that it did appear as though he had been wrongly charged. So I took up the matter with War Assets Corporation here, asking that a competent inspector and valuator be sent to that job. This was done, and I want to thank the officials of the corporation for giving such prompt attention to this matter. They sent an appraiser, and I am told he was quite competent. He inspected the materials, and found that what had been stated was to a large extent actually true. Just two or three weeks ago I had a letter from this veteran expressing his deep gratitude for having received such favourable consideration. His account was reduced by a total of $600.

I say, Mr. Speaker, if an adjustment like that can be made in connection with one small lot of material our surplus of $300,000,000, which is largely accounted for by the sale of surplus war materials, might reasonably be expected to be considerably reduced. To me, this transaction smacks a little of inefficiency. I cannot understand why veterans in particular should be given that kind of treatment. This particular matter was straightened out and adjusted, but this sort of thing may have a definite effect on the actual results as far as our so-called surplus is concerned.

In his budget the minister provided some relief from income tax for those in lower income brackets, and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) in his able speech, and also again this afternoon the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), dealt with that phase of the matter in detail. I do not intend to deal with the statistics in this connection, because I believe that can be done more effectively in the discussion on the budget resolutions.

The war has now been over for two years, but the man on the street is far from satisfied when he sees his income tax and all other taxes continuing on a war basis. He states readily that production is rapidly falling off, a condition which he cannot understand. At the same time he says that food prices are rising with equal rapidity. Many I have talked to say it is just as if the minister had handed them a crust of bread with one hand and taken it away with the other. One chap, speaking in a humorous vein, likened it to the father who paid his child one cent to go to bed, and then took it away from him after he had gone to sleep. That seems to be the general impression of the average man on the street, particularly those who struggled so hard during the years of war. It applies with marked effect in respect of the man who worked for a set salary during the war years, and did not receive any great benefit from war production.

If there is a surplus either in the amount mentioned by the minister, or in a lesser amount—and I am inclined to believe that the lesser amount is more accurate—there has been nothing set aside for those old age pensioners, who have been promised something. Neither was there anything for blind pensioners, or for aged civil servants, many of whom took it on the chin during the war years.

With the advance in the cost of living industrial workers received a cost of living bonus, and rightly so; but not the old age pensioner, the blind pensioners or aged civil servants on retirement. They had to struggle along as best they could.

Only a few days ago there was tabled in the house a return setting out the hundreds of thousands of dollars paid by way of war supplements to many types and classes; and I shall not say "all", because some seemed to be overlooked, mysteriously. For the most part those war supplements were paid to civil servants in this city and elsewhere. I am one who believes that a workman is worthy of his hire, and I do not object to that practice. If a man or woman is worth a certain amount, by all means pay it. But I would point out that certain classes of people have been totally overlooked. I feel, therefore, that perhaps if the government had been a little more fair in the matter there might not have been so much surplus in the minister's hands as he claims.

I turn now to another surplus, one which I cannot understand. The records show that in the past year there was a surplus of $11 million in the Post Office Department, and that since the outbreak of war a surplus of $42 million, approximately, is credited to that department. It is true that at one time the minister did authorize a slight reduction in parcel rates to Britain. I claim, however, that he could have done much more, and that at the present time he can, and should, do much more.

Orders in council were passed almost overnight, and this is still being done. Yesterday we had evidence which would seem to indicate that one minister passed an order in council which another minister seemed to know nothing about. Apparently it is quite easy to slide them through. How about passing an order in council cutting postal rates back to the pre-war basis. It is about time that consideration was given to that, and that we stopped talking about a false surplus. A reduction of the kind I have suggested would help everyone to meet the higher costs of living. No one would complain, because it would affect the purse of every man who has to pay ten cents more for a pound of butter.

Particularly let us make a real effort to cut in half postal rates on food parcels being sent to Britain. A surplus of $42 million has accumulated in a department which I always thought was supposed to be a non-profit branch of government; at least that has been my understanding of it in my years in the House of Commons. I may be wrong, but that has been my impression. If that $42 million is included in the $300 million surplus, then I say it is time to hand out a portion of it to the people by way of a return to pre-war postage rates.

Hon. members have noted the effort being made by Ontario in connection with flood relief, one of the most worthy projects that could have been undertaken. I wonder if, just for once, the federal government could not take a lead from Ontario. The province is doing a real job in this respect, and I suggest that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) confer with the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) to see if something could not be done along the lines I have suggested. Let us share some of that $42 million of accumulated surplus with our friends in Britain who are starving themselves in an effort to feed starving humanity in Europe. If that effort were made, we would certainly be doing nothing wrong, and at the same time we would help our own people by permitting them to return to a pre-war basis for postage. I believe any effort on our part to allocate some of this accumulated money for the purpose of sending things at cheaper rates to the people in Britain would be commended by people throughout the country.

There is one further point I should like to discuss in some detail. Yesterday the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) announced in the house that the government agency to provide housing for veterans has largely failed. I would ask any hon. member this question: What is the poor veteran going to do? Speaking in a jocular fashion, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) said he intended to subpoena someone to attend before the public accounts committee. I am going to hold a public meeting on the ground where forty veterans homes have been constructed, and I am wondering whether I might subpoena the minister to come down to see what the actual situation is. Some hon. member suggests that perhaps we could take the public accounts committee there and have a meeting. That might be a good idea. However, we shall have a meeting there one of these week-ends and get to the bottom of this thing. I gave the details to the minister and I must say that he appears to be trying to do all that is fair. Today I received a communication that the matter will be followed through carefully.

If these government agencies have failed, what has the veteran left to turn to? Some of our hon. friends to my left here talk about free enterprise. If they had a chance to get behind free enterprise and free enterprise is given the proper opportunity to do the job, it should be given a chance to show what it can do.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Who is stopping them?

Mr. LOCKHART: I am putting it up to the government. If the members of the C.C.F. had their way it would be certainly stopped. The veteran must have some help. The distribution of building materials is wrong. I want to say a word to the minister of reconstruction about the distribution of certain materials. The minister told us some weeks ago that the supply of nails in the country was about equal to the demand. I suppose he was referring to the nails being produced by Canadian manufacturers. I am sure the house will be astounded when I tell it that from October 1, 1946, to March 31, 1947, a total of 32,487 kegs of nails was imported into Canada from the United States. Those were in addition to the production which the minister stated was nearly equal to the demand. The value of those nails was $266,825, or approximately $8.20 per keg of 100 pounds.

I ask any hon. member to go back home and talk to his veteran friends who are trying to build homes for themselves through private contractors, perhaps doing some of the work themselves. He will find that these men are being handicapped because they cannot get lumber or nails. Last Saturday afternoon I visited an area where at least forty veterans who had saved their money were trying to build homes without any help from any government agency. I talked to twelve or fifteen of these men; some of them told me that they had their excavations in; a few had finished their foundations and some had part of the framework up. Some of these men told me that they had gone to Niagara Falls, New York, to buy five pounds of nails at ten cents a pound plus one cent a pound duty. That was all they could get. That is the story they told me. If there are the nails in the country that we have been hearing about, then there is something wrong with the distribution. I am going to see these men again on Saturday; I have written to several of them, and I want to have a group of them there so that I can tell them some of the things I have found out.

As I say, I learned about the 32,487 kegs of nails which have come into Canada in addition to what have been manufactured here. The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Aylesworth) had his car here and he was good enough to drive me to one or two jobs which are in progress in this city. I went to one very large job and I counted 247 kegs of nails being used. A workman told me that the original order had been for 1,000 kegs of nails. I was told the name of the local hardware man who had the order, as he supposed. I called on that local hardware man and I begged him to give me a keg each of two and a half inch and four-inch nails for a veteran who is in dire need. I will not relate the circumstances, but they would almost bring tears to your eyes, Mr. Speaker, I wanted just one keg of each size and I could not get them.

This hardware man admitted that he had tried to get the order for 1,000 kegs but someone else had got it. He told me he could not give me any nails. He admitted that that amount of nails had been concentrated on the one job. When I visited the job I found that the nails came from the Bethlehem Steel Company in the United States. I saw the nails myself. They were splendid nails and were doing a good job nailing together the hundreds of thousands of feet of lumber which were being cut up in short length for a particular purpose. Thousands of feet of lumber and tens of thousands of feet of wallboard and panel board are being used. I did not go over the entire job, but I suppose I could have found several hundred more kegs of nails.

What I maintain is that the distribution is wrong. That lumber which is being cut up will never reach veterans' homes. You cannot cut lumber up into one, two, three, four or five foot lengths and expect to use it in a veteran's home. I am appealing to someone to try to find out whether this thing cannot be done in a more equitable way. I ask the government to try some way to channel lumber and nails into the hands of veterans or private contractors who are building homes for veterans. That is their only hope; there is nothing left. It is the last hope the veteran has. I appeal to the government not to permit the concentration of tremendous quantities of essential materials in the manner to which I have referred.

There certainly appears to be surpluses of materials in some places, and my point is that we should get behind the veteran, we should try through private enterprise to see that these goods, particularly lumber and nails, are channelled so that these homes can get under way. The veteran is up against an absolute stone wall today because he cannot get these materials.

I have no hesitation in criticizing this concentration of materials on large jobs which might just as well have not been proceeded with. I am pleading with the government to see that something be done at once to remedy the situation. I believe there was a tinge of sadness in the minister's voice when he made his announcement; I really believe he intended to see the veteran taken care of. However, he has failed. My plea to the government is to give the veteran this last chance. Bring about the proper distribution of the essential materials and then I am sure that we shall have, through the veterans themselves, by their own resources and through the resources of private enterprise, far more homes and far better homes than we have ever had under these government housing schemes in the last two or three years.

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I have always admired the quality of the budget speeches and the tone of the budget debates in this house. I want to congratulate the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Lockhart) on the forcefulness of his speech. I have on several occasions had the pleasure of tendering my congratulations to that prince of finance ministers, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). I say without hesitation that our people are coming to realize more clearly every year our debt to the former finance minister for his able administration during the war years.

If we keep in mind that Canada's first parliament lasted only forty-three days and that the first budget speech in April, 1868, forecast an expenditure of $14 million, it is interesting to recall budget estimates for some later years. For instance, for the year ended March 31, 1915, Hon. Thomas White budgeted for an expenditure of $190 million; in 1920 the same finance minister, then Sir Thomas White, budgeted for an expenditure of $620 million; 1925, Mr. Robb, $342 million; 1930, Mr. Dunning, $360 million; 1935, Mr. Rhodes, $351 million; 1940, Mr. Dunning, $550 million; 1945, Hon. J. L. Ilsley, $5,152 million, or just ten times as much as the 1940 budget; 1946, Mr. Ilsley, $4,650 million, and in 1947, $2,750 million; and for the financial year ending March 31, 1948, our present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) budgets for an expenditure of $2,450 million.

These figures give us some idea of the development of Canadian governmental finance since that first budget of $14 million. They also serve to make more clear the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley's colossal task and his tremendous achievements. But time keeps rolling on, and the Ilsley mantle, so creditably worn by him, has now fallen unspotted and secure upon the capable shoulders of another man. I have seldom been as proud of any budget speech I have heard as that delivered by the present Minister of Finance in this parliament on the evening of April 29. At the very outset he struck a note of triumph, a note of confidence, a note of achievement, yes, a note of mastery, if you will, and that note he held right through to the finish. As I listened to his words of conviction and his acceptance of the challenge of the future; as I gleaned something of the growth and expansion of this country's business as indicated in the budget figures just quoted. I realized once again how proud I ought to be, and how proud I am, of the privilege of calling myself a Canadian.

Major H. G. L. Strange, a widely known resident of western Canada, prominent in the grain trade and in research, recently returned from seven weeks spent in Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland and Denmark. He has this to say:

> The overwhelming impression comes over me that each one of us should utter a daily prayer of thankfulness that we are citizens of Canada with all that this great country has to offer to adults and to the future of our rising generation.

And then Major Strange, rightly or wrongly, goes on to say that hope for the future is almost disappearing in Britain and in the whole of Europe and is being replaced by a feeling of sadness and resignation. These are serious words made by a capable observer, a responsible man, and we may well pause to wonder as to the future.

We all realize that the years as they roll around bring some new experience; there is no doubt about that. During the course of my young life, I have listened to many budgets, some federal, some provincial, some municipal. I have heard finance ministers roundly criticized for having ended the fiscal year with a deficit. But it is a new experience to me to hear a minister criticized for having closed the year with a substantial surplus. I have heard shafts of ridicule showered upon a minister when he announced higher taxes, but again it is a new experience to hear him condemned when he announces lower taxes.

We all know that many a finance minister has had to run the gauntlet of opposition sniping, when he announced an increase in national or provincial debt, but again it is a novel experience to hear a minister roundly denounced when he has made a big reduction in the national debt.

I pause to ask, as I may well do, what is the score anyway? What is back of all this? What is in the minds of those who thus criticize the budget? Are we to assume, as we are compelled to do, that some opposition speakers are in reality saying to the finance minister: You should not have a surplus when we were all primed for you to announce a deficit? Are they saying to the finance minister: You have no right to lower the taxes in this country because we were confident you would have to increase them? And again, is their attitude not equivalent to saying to the finance minister: Why did you reduce the national debt? Why did you not increase the debt, thereby increasing our interest charges and thus compelling us to pay still higher taxes? Surely, Mr. Speaker, some of our opposition friends are beginning to realize the astounding absurdity of their criticisms, because the tone and calibre of many of their speeches do not lend themselves to any other interpretation than that I have just mentioned.

No one resents more than I do the fact that Hitler has compelled me to pay higher taxes. But I am thankful today to be living in a country and among people where we enjoy something—and greatest of all, our freedom—for the taxes we have to pay. It could have been different, for let us not forget that we are paying taxes to ourselves as Canadians and not to any foreign foe. It could have been different, yes, and it very nearly was different. Someone has well remarked how great civilizations of the past, such as Babylon, Crete, Egypt, Greece and Rome "went over the cliff." It is only as we get farther away from the suspense of the war days, only as more war secrets are being revealed, that we begin to realize how narrowly our own nation was saved from going over the cliff.

No, I do not like paying taxes; but when I realize that a large part of the taxes I paid last year was applied to reducing my indebtedness it takes away the sting. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) collected—and this is some of the criticism—mostly from Canadian taxpayers, $352 million that he did not use. The question is, what did he do with it? Well, he did not start stepping out. He did not act the part of Canada's prodigal son and encourage this nation to spend that surplus in riotous living. No; he did with that surplus just what he should have done; he did with it what any man with ordinary horse sense should have done. He applied that surplus of $352 million to the reduction of our national debt. What does that reduction mean to the citizens of Canada? Assuming interest paid at three per cent—the government is paying that and more on an average on its victory bonds—they have in that one retirement saved the people of this country interest payments of $10,500,000 annually all down the coming years. I leave it to the Canadian people and I leave it to the good sense of my hon. friends across the way to say whether or not that was good business. Further, Canada's net indebtedness remains at $13,069 million, figures almost beyond our comprehension. Suppose we were to continue retiring the debt at the rate of $352 million a year; any school boy could tell you in thirty seconds that it would take just thirty-seven years to retire the national debt, not including interest.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Then, according to Mr. Towers, the country would be ruined.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Do hon. members not think it is about time we got started? The war left us with a legacy of freedom, but it also left us with a legacy of debt. Canadians, old and young, rich and poor, may just as well face the facts. Some scoffing references were made to the Minister of Finance having received in the last fiscal year $372 million from the sale of war material by War Assets Corporation. These sales, our critics point out, cannot be repeated in any future year, and that only resulting from such sales was a surplus on this year's business possible. I suggest that that implication is unfair because, on the other side of the ledger, there are special war expenditures which will not have to be repeated another year. The Minister of Finance was frank enough to state both sides when delivering the budget, and I suggest that his critics should be equally frank. He pointed out that $320 million were paid out in war service gratuities. He pointed out that $70 million were spent in liquidation and termination of war contracts that had to be halted when peace was declared. That amount, too, was spent. These two items alone more than offset the $372 million received from war assets. In addition to these, there were many other large items of expenditure that will not apply in future years. Therefore I say that the argument, when analysed, is completely and overwhelmingly in favour of the minister's position.

May I remark right here that I regard it as a most creditable performance on the part of War Assets Corporation, to have turned back to the government in one year the sum of $372 million, with a lot more still to come. I confess to having been among those who at one time felt that War Assets Corporation was desperately slow in getting the wheels of distribution started. But the completion of their organization was doubtless a much bigger undertaking than most of us realized. I now want to congratulate War Assets Corporation on doing what I regard as a very fine piece of work, and I believe it is everywhere conceded that they are doing that work in the disposal of war material not only efficiently but above board.

May I digress to say that, in my experience, deputy ministers of various departments, secretaries, senior officials and all officials with very few exceptions did everything that was humanly possible in cooperating to solve the perplexing problems that were constantly arising following the period of the war. I want to extend to them, one and all, my deep appreciation and sincere gratitude.

Reverting to the budget, I accord the Minister of Finance every credit for collecting our taxes and reducing our debt when times are good. The great bulk of our citizens have more money than they ever had. It is true that the cost of living has risen; nevertheless over a million persons bought Canada savings bonds last fall at a coupon interest of $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. There is also this significant fact that interest bearing deposits in the chartered banks last year amounted to $3,476 million, an increase of $600 million over the previous year. The number of accounts represented was 6,063,000. This does not include the deposits in the provincial chartered banks or in the post office savings department. If we make due allowance for several accounts carried under one name such as trust accounts, it is still safe to say that over five million of our population have savings bank deposits to their credit.

May I here refer to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), in which he deplores the fact that we have indirect and hidden taxes. I am not sure that that comes with very good grace from some of those on the other side of the house. Part of the amendment reads as follows:

This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance

(a) offer no relief from the oppressive burden of indirect and hidden taxes on staple necessities that compose the family budget, all of which taxes directly increase the cost of living;

(b) offer no encouragement to those engaged in the development of our natural resources, especially mining and agriculture.

In that regard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made this pointed observation a few days ago. Many hon. members heard him. He said:

In my reading of the history of Canada, particularly its political history, I have always been under the impression that the members of the Conservative party were strong advocates of the indirect system of taxation and that the Liberal party over a long period of years had been a strong advocate of the direct system of taxation.

A big principle is introduced in the amendment, but let us see how it works out in practice. Much of the record, almost the whole record, of the Conservative party is manifest in their consistent raising of indirect or hidden taxes. We all know that. During the last Conservative regime, tariffs were raised to a startling degree. Sales taxes were raised. An excise tax of three per cent was placed on all imported goods. Taxes on lower incomes were raised; postage was raised; taxes on cheques were raised; nuisance taxes were levied and taxes on sugar were inaugurated.

Let us compare, say the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941, with that ended March 31, 1945. So far as the three chief hidden taxes are concerned, in 1941 customs duties made up 16·8 per cent of the national revenue; in 1945, only 5·37 per cent. Another hidden tax, the excise tax, represented 11·3 per cent of the national revenue in 1941. That was down to 7 per cent in 1945. Sales taxes represented twenty-three per cent in 1941 and were reduced to 9·7 per cent in 1945. The total of 51 per cent in 1941 was reduced to 22 per cent in 1945. That is the answer so far as hidden or indirect taxes are concerned. With regard to direct taxation—and I mean taxes that were not hidden—the present government came right out into the open. Income taxes and excess profit taxes, which five or six years ago formed only 28 per cent of our national revenue, now form about 60 per cent of it. There is nothing very much hidden about that; it is not nearly so hidden as is the implication in the amendment to which I have referred.

[Mr. J. E. Matthews.]

Paragraph (b) of that amendment expresses the criticism that the proposals of the budget:

offer no encouragement to those engaged in the development of our natural resources, especially mining and agriculture.

This is another complaint which I am going to diagnose for a few moments. I do not pretend to know anything about mining conditions. Those were well discussed a few evenings ago by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). But representing, as I do, just about the best agricultural constituency in Canada—and I have seen most of them—I propose to make a few remarks along agricultural lines, keeping in mind the purport of paragraph (b) of the amendment, particularly as it applies to western Canada. I do this because I think we are all agreed that there is no more accurate measure of our financial progress than is afforded in the realm of agriculture. In the maritimes, reports from Nova Scotia indicate that the farmers of that province netted $5,000,000 more in the year ended November 30, 1946, than in the previous twelve months. The Dominion Mortgage Investment Association reports that farm mortgage debts in the three prairie provinces are now less than one-third of what they were at the end of 1937. The research department of the United Farmers of Canada, referring to Saskatchewan, announces that during the years of crop failure and low prices there was a farm debt increase in that province from an estimated $200 million in 1930 to over $600 million in 1939, despite debt cancellations and adjustments. The research department now estimates that over two-thirds of that 1939 debt or, in other words, $400 million, was liquidated during the years 1942 to 1946. While the average debt per farm in Saskatchewan in 1939 was estimated at $4,398, the debt in 1946 was estimated at only $1,466, or less than one-third. That is certainly some accomplishment in seven years.

A statement appearing in the press a few days ago indicated that in 1946 alone Manitoba farm mortgage and agreements of sale debt was reduced by 23 per cent, and that since the end of 1937 this reduction amounts to no less than 76 per cent; certainly another great accomplishment. I am almost tempted to remark that this accomplishment was achieved under the beneficent reign of a Liberal government. The farmers of Manitoba no longer depend entirely on the wheat crop. They are following diversified farming, largely and successfully.

I wonder if it was possibly the Ontario farmers whom the hon. member for Muskoka, Ontario had in mind when he suggested in his amendment that they need encouragement. If that were his thought, then he may be right.

For instance, some Manitoba farmers came with live stock exhibits to the Toronto Royal a few months ago. The Toronto Royal is a wonderful institution and does credit in a large way to the people of Ontario. The Toronto Royal attracts to its show rings every year the cream of Canada's production from coast to coast. Notwithstanding the excellence of those dominion-wide exhibits, including, of course, many from Ontario farms, our friends from Manitoba carried off nineteen first prizes, sixteen second prizes, sixteen third prizes, fourteen fourth prizes and thirty-three others, or a total of ninety-eight prizes for live stock alone. But that is not all. Manitoba farmers at the Toronto Royal carried off also two grand championships, one reserve grand championship, one senior championship, two reserve senior championships, two junior championships, one reserve junior championship, one championship and one reserve championship. This means a total of eleven awards and ninety-eight prizes won by Manitoba exhibitors.

Mr. FRASER: That shows that Manitoba must have had good management and good government there for years.

An hon. MEMBER: They cannot get any nails.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Perhaps the Ontario farmers or those in the Muskoka district do need some encouragement after having fared so badly in the show rings.

May I add to that, Mr. Speaker, that in the field of dairy products alone Manitoba has seventy butter factories whose product last year reached a total value of $26 million. Lots of quantity, someone will say, but what about quality? Well, I will give my answer. At that same Toronto Royal a silver cup is always awarded for the highest score in dairy products, and I am informed that Manitoba exhibitors have won that cup every year without a break for over twenty years. Then just to lend a touch of sweetness, as it were, to the whole Toronto Royal performance, out of nine prizes awarded for honey exhibits last fall, Manitoba exhibitors walked away with seven.

My natural modesty almost compels me to refrain from making this further observation, that by far the largest percentage of those prizes and awards were won either in the constituency, or close to the constituency, of Brandon which I have the honour to represent in this parliament.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): All Liberals?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Some of them. To be serious about the matter, there is a reason for these successes; in fact, there are several reasons. First of all, there are climatic conditions, those gifts of an over-ruling Providence. Then there is the thrift, the intelligence, the vision of the farmers, their wives and families in that part of Canada. Another reason is the wisdom and the readiness with which they adapt themselves to the suggestions of the agriculture departments, both federal and provincial, which suggestions are made only after a keener, more comprehensive study of world conditions has been conducted than could possibly be made by the individual farmer. Our dominion Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is a man who, from long and wide experience and from careful observation, desires to adhere strictly to the policy of stability rather than speculation. In that I thoroughly agree with him, because farming has sufficient speculation in it at any time without one asking for more. A third reason is the wise, educational and aggressive leadership given by the Brandon experimental farm, one of the best directed in Canada. A fourth reason is the contribution made and the incentive furnished, down through the years, by the summer and winter fairs held at Brandon under the auspices of the provincial exhibition of Manitoba. These Brandon fairs are among the best, and on a yearly average are probably the best, of any held west of Toronto. As a matter of fact, the name might well be changed from Brandon fair to Western Canada Royal.

So I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that paragraph (b) of the amendment deploring the fact that the budget proposals offer no encouragement to agriculture falls rather flat when reduced to its par value. The farming population of this country will judge a government by performances rather than by promises. They have done so repeatedly in the past and will continue to do so in the future.

I might go on to speak of other records made by Manitoba last year in regard to the production of raw furs, the production of paper, the production of hydro electric power, and receipts from tourist travel. I should like to add that Riding Mountain national park, located just sixty-seven miles north of Brandon, was visited in 1946 by 161,308 people, being second only to Banff and coming very close, in point of visitors, to leading every national park in Canada.

Arising from another observation made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario in moving his amendment to the budget—and let me remark here that I always greatly enjoy his speeches—I want to point out that seventy-two new industries were established in Manitoba in 1946. This is a credit to the industrial development board of that province, but the regrettable feature is that only comparatively few of these industries were established in rural centres. Manitoba might well follow the example set by Ontario and see to it that her manufacturing establishments are located in many different centres of the province, particularly now with the advent of rural electrification. This is essential if the ultimate blighting consequences of centralization are to be avoided.

I have emphasized the points discussed so far, not because of any local colouring, except by way of illustration, but because of my belief that it would have been inexcusable had the finance minister not seen to it that our national debt was substantially reduced during the period of abounding prosperity in 1946. I trust that even with the levying of lower taxes there may be another drastic reduction in our debt in 1947. Why? Simply because that very fact will make possible still lower taxes each succeeding year. I am absolutely opposed to excessive taxation in any form, though I was always aware that the obligations of war would remain with us long after hostilities had ceased. I am also aware that taxation can become less only when the expenses of the state are curtailed. In this respect I am glad to note the tendency to reduce along many lines, including the number of so-called experts in some government departments. I am heartily in accord with an editorial which I recently read in a leading magazine, and which concluded as follows:

> This is a time for governments to do less and individuals to do more—a time for more production and less regulation—a time for converting not only the sword but the filing cabinet into the plowshare.

Therefore I am sure that to every Canadian the minister's announcement of lower taxes will be welcome. I have no doubt whatever that to have continued the recent high rates of taxation would have meant a serious set-back to this country. There is a distinct limit to the taxation a country can bear without dulling initiative, lessening production, diminishing returns and creating economic chaos. It is a healthy augury when the taxpayers have the courage and intelligence in the matter of taxes to say to any government, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further". A Canadian economist recently expressed the case in these words:

> Is it wise to discourage thrift, to put a high premium on spending? Should we rob posterity to maintain the dance of today? Saving has a social value. The loss to society would be great if saving ceased to be a virtue. We have reached the stage where the emphasis is almost entirely on spending. Will this policy bring real gains? It is very doubtful.

I am not going to discuss controls except briefly, even though they have a direct bearing upon the financial situation of Canada. That controls played a tremendously advantageous part in this country during the war no one will dispute. I hope to see controls steadily discontinued, not all at once but one by one, as speedily as conditions will warrant. This might result in some temporary dislocation of prices, but it would be only temporary, because greater production resulting from the removal of price controls would prove the best remedy for inflated prices. Give us an abundance of commodities and prices will take care of themselves. Most of the control regulations were fair and well advised. In my judgment, a few were, and still are, grotesque in their stupidity, and I shall have something to say about them later on.

In the matter of rent control, I am aware of the ruthlessness with which some property owners would have soaked tenants during and since the war years had there been no controls. I am also aware of the callous treatment accorded by some tenants to owners. I have in mind particularly cases of men and women advanced in years who in the past had demonstrated their faith in Canada by investing their surplus—often a small one, it is true—in residential property. I need not rehearse cases, as I could by the score, of the raw deals handed to elderly people who in some instances were relying upon those rentals for their livelihood. In many cases their hands were tied, and securely tied, against any rent increases. No matter that taxes were raised, that costs of maintenance were raised, costs of labour raised, costs of food and clothing raised, everything else raised; those elderly people were compelled to struggle on as best they could, with no redress. I stand for the right of any owner to have access to his own property. I am glad to see that a start, though not a very great one, has been made in this direction. I want to see regulations adopted under which proved rental injustices on either side may not be permitted longer to exist.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I once again tender my sincere congratulations, this time not to the finance minister but to the Canadian people, on having such a strong man guiding our financial destiny. A well known writer has said:

> There may be little doubt that we as a people are going through years of decision. Yet there are many signs to give confidence that after the troubled equilibrium of these later years there is a return to a greater soundness and balance of outlook. There appears to be a deepening recognition of the fact that the government cannot create wealth, but that anything it promises in the form of a gift must be taken away in the form of a tax.

There are signs that people and government alike may be returning to the realization of the fundamental economic truth that whatever regulations may be found desirable in the public interest, the most natural and the most fruitful role of government comes from what it may be able to do to reduce all that restricts and discourages, and to assist all that may release the immeasurable potentialities that lie in free individual effort and responsibility.

With the opinions of that writer, I am in full accord.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, evidently there is one champion from Manitoba who did not get a prize, but I am sure if it were left to this house he would be handed one right away. I rise to take part in this debate mainly for the purpose of endorsing the proposals contained in the budget speech delivered in this house on the evening of April 29 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I want to congratulate him upon the manner of presenting his budget. Nearly every hon. member who has spoken has extended his congratulations, but I believe one point, which perhaps affords him the greatest compliment, has not been mentioned. When he began his speech all the seats in the house were filled, as well as those in the galleries, and they remained so until the end of the address. Many times people can find excuses for leaving the house after speeches have gone along for an hour or so. It was quite evident, however, that on this occasion people were interested in the manner in which the address was delivered, and were anxious also to find out exactly what would be contained therein.

This debate has now been in progress for over two weeks. About fifty members have taken part in it. All the heavy artillery of the three opposition groups have been firing their shells and bombs at the budget speech, but thus far they have failed to dent any of the structure or supports. In fact, it has not suffered blemish in any respect, and still retains the appeal it had when first delivered.

Mr. FRASER: Watch out; there might be some delayed bombs.

Mr. MAYHEW: Perhaps, but that would not do much harm. From the fall of 1939 up to the present time Canadians have been diverted from their ordinary course of peace and progress, and have been operating under the uncertain conditions of war. Every bit of strength they had was directed to one purpose, and until the bringing down of this budget we had not been able to see clearly the path ahead of us.

It remained for the Minister of Finance to give to the country an indication of where we are going, and what our responsibilties are. I have said that the people of Canada, because of war clouds and the clouds of rehabilitation, had not been able to see clearly what they had to do. But in his budget speech the minister has brought great encouragement to them. How has he done it? The first encouragement contained in his speech was the fact that there was a surplus in the last year of $360 million. Another encouraging factor was that he was able to indicate and, I believe, on a sound basis, that our national income will be increased this year by another billion dollars. I know that is an estimate, but I believe it is on fairly conservative grounds.

Let me tell the house why I say that. One reason is that the industries of Canada are now ready to spend in this year $1,700 million in new industries, new plants, the renovation of old ones and other methods to bring in greater production. Who can estimate what $1,700 million in new industries will mean to Canada? One can state safely that this will go a long way toward making effective the increase of the billion dollars.

I wonder if the labouring people in Canada do not take great comfort from the fact that there are prospects of that increase in our national revenue. Surely it should mean to them that there will be more employment in 1947 than we had in 1946. During the greater part of 1946 we were short of man-power. So that I think the minister's statement would give definite encouragement to labouring people.

I have had some opportunity of investigating what is taking place in the first quarter of this year, and I say that if the other three quarters measure up to the turn-over in the first one, the minister's estimate of an increase of a billion dollars will be too modest. In other words, I think it will be more than that amount.

I know hon. members in the opposition have attempted on various occasions to say that there was no optimism and no encouragement in the budget speech. I cannot see from what source they derive their pessimism.

There is another point I should like to mention, and that is in connection with the forecast made by the minister respecting the construction industry, one which I am sure will be greatly increased this year. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr.

Howe) claims that it will be possible to build 80,000 houses in the present year, but 75,000 will be required annually to take care of our increased population.

Some seem to think Canada has been a static country. Let me point out that when I was born there were only 4,000,000 people in this dominion, whereas today there are 12,000,000. I say that, only to show that in the lifetime of one man, in a period of sixty years, our population has increased threefold. During those sixty years there have been seventeen or eighteen when we have had no immigration. In that time three wars have taken place, although we do not take much account of the South African war. It is known, however, that there was no immigration during either world war one or world war two; in fact, there has been none to speak of since 1931. On top of that we lost 100,000 of our male population in those two wars, but in spite of it all we have gone on and we now have a population of 12,000,000 people. I maintain that in the life of our own grandsons Canada will have a population in the neighbourhood of 35,000,000 to 36,000,000 people. We have every reason to be hopeful.

The minister was criticized for pointing out our difficulties, but he also pointed out the way we might go. We have our national debt and we know that the world around us is disturbed and unsettled. It is hard to fight against those difficulties, but the minister pointed out how we might go. I remember as a small boy learning to ride my first bicycle. I was going along a small path between two puddles. I failed to look at the path and kept my eye on the puddles, and I finally landed in the puddle. People who today are looking at our troubles—I do not mean that you should not know they are there—should know that if they keep on looking, that is where they will land up. That is where those people are trying to drive us at the present time.

I want to say a word or two about this surplus of $367,000,000 in connection with which there has been so much talk. Some hon. members have charged that the surplus last year was somewhat of a phony surplus because it was revenue which included a yield from the sale of war assets. It is apparently considered that it would have been sound accounting for the government to have set up its purchases of shells, bullets, ships, tanks and guns and other supplies of war as investments in capital assets rather than as supplies of short-lived duration which could only sensibly be regarded as the current inventories of war. In this more sensible light the government's accounts showed at the time of purchasing these supplies the total amount of their cost as an outright expenditure, and it is, therefore, in accordance with sound accounting that the revenue received from the sale of this war inventory should be treated as current revenue. I believe the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) even went so far as to say that he regretted that this money had not been used to reduce the debt. May I assure the hon. member that this is exactly the result of including this item in our revenue. The surplus on the last year's operation, as he will find stated in the budget speech, resulted in a reduction in our net debt of the same magnitude. There are some hon. members who seem to think the whole surplus was obtained from the sale of war assets, but if they will turn to the bottom part of page 14 of the appendix to the budget they will find a break-down of this surplus. It will be noted that the amount received from sales by War Assets Corporation was $182,400,000, and that the remainder was made up in various ways.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the hon. member state whether that surplus was used to purchase bonds in the hands of the Bank of Canada or bonds in the hands of the chartered or private banks?

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not get the meaning of the hon. member's question. It was used to reduce our debt.

Mr. HACKETT: My question was whether it was used to purchase bonds in the hands of the Bank of Canada or bonds in the hands of the chartered banks?

Mr. HARTT: It is the same difference.

Mr. MAYHEW: I am sorry; I cannot answer that.

Mr. FRASER: One hon. member says it is the same difference.

Mr. HARTT: It is reducing the debt of the government.

Mr. MAYHEW: Another argument advanced by several hon. members is that the exemptions under the income tax should have been raised to $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons. Apart from the fact that our exemptions are now generally the highest in the English-speaking world, I would point out that the greatest benefit from raising the exemptions would go, not to the lower income groups who would be relieved of tax, but to the taxpapers remaining after the increase in the exemptions. I am informed that of the total reduction in tax that would result from this change only slightly more than one-fifth would be for the benefit of those exempted from tax; the other four-fifths would go to existing taxpayers. Viewed in this light, the argument for increased exemptions takes on a somewhat different complexion.

I think the amount of money that we were at liberty to pass on as relief to the taxpayers of Canada was spent in the most equitable way. If we had increased the exemptions to $1,000 and $2,000, the benefits to a single man earning $1,000 a year would have been exactly $29, while the benefits to a man in the higher brackets of $100,000 a year would have been $200. I give that example to show where the money would have actually gone. It would not have gone for the relief of people in the lower brackets. This whole thing was planned to be of the greatest benefit to those who needed assistance.

I should like to refer briefly to another speech that was made by the hon. member for High Park (Mr. McMaster). The hon. member gave an interesting series of calculations in his speech. I say they are interesting because they represent an attempt to assess in brief space the amount of tax paid in total on family budgets at certain levels of income, a subject on which I am informed several large and studious books have been written. I feel I should point out to the hon. member that in his desire for conciseness he has probably overlooked the fact that the great staples of life which form the basis of every family budget—bread, milk, butter, eggs, flour, salt, fresh meats, fresh vegetables and fruits—are all completely exempt from sales tax. There again is an indication that, so far as this government is concerned, it has tried in every way possible to take the load off the people who need relief the most.

I am also informed, on the other hand, that he has considerably understated the amount of income tax reduction that will be received in a full year by married taxpayers under this income level. Such taxpayers, in place of the $18,000,000 reduction mentioned by the hon. member, will, in fact, benefit in a full year by an amount of $43,000,000, according to estimates which I believe are accurate. I would also point out that if account is taken of the family allowance, which as far as taxpayers are concerned may be regarded as in lieu of an income deduction under the income tax, then on balance the great majority of the taxpayers in the group mentioned are not paying a tax at all.

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in a reliable magazine called World Report and which gives an indication of the taxes paid in Great Britain, the United States and Canada. A single man with an income of $2,000, and with the new tax rate in effect, pays in Great Britain a tax of $447; in the United States, $249; in Canada, $220. A married man with one child and an income of $3,000 pays in Great Britain, $603; in the United States, $232; in Canada, $230. A married man with two children and an income of $10,000 pays in Great Britain, $3,497; in the United States, $1,810; in Canada, $1,930. Here again is the place where the government has tried to take the load off the people in the low income brackets and put it on the people in the higher brackets.

Mr. GREEN: What is the date of that magazine?

Mr. MAYHEW: April 29, 1947.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Do those figures take into account the state taxes in the United States?

Mr. MAYHEW: No.

I should like to refer to a speech made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Drope). He made a four-minute speech. I refer to it because I cannot quite understand the reasoning of some of our hon. friends opposite. The hon. member asked that the four-cent postal rate be reduced to three cents; he asked for a subsidy on butter, a subsidy on cheese and for the removal of the two-cent tax on soft drinks. In all what he asked for in that four-minute speech, for that is about all it was, would have meant a reduction of $63,000,000 odd in revenue. So I was quite pleased that he did not continue for the full forty minutes.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) this afternoon criticized the Minister of Finance for taking off price controls through the wartime prices and trade board. He would give one the impression that all controls had been lifted by the board. But I have here a long list of commodities which are still under control, several thousand of them, mostly foodstuffs, clothing, farm machinery of all kinds, meats of all kinds, sugar, butter and so forth which shows that the main staples of life are still under control. He also intimated that we were not paying any more subsidies. But if he will look at the estimates for this year he will find that we have some $35,000,000 for subsidies and to pay for losses on bulk buying in the United States. The greater part of this amount will be used in the subsidizing of cotton and textiles.

I want to finish, Mr. Speaker, with a general word or two. Canada has one job that it must do, and it must plan to do it very soon and in a big way. I mean that Canada has to take care of those Canadian people who are unable to take care of themselves. That is a part of our programme which, regardless of what comes, we simply have to do. I do not think it matters whether a Liberal government, a Conservative government or a socialist government is in power, because the people of Canada will demand that that be done, and, in my opinion, it can best be done through cooperation between the federal and provincial governments and the existing organizations as we have them today. It is a matter of planning and cooperation.

In my first speech in the House of Commons I spoke of compulsory contributory superannuation to look after our old people. I still believe that that plan should be put into effect as soon as we can possibly do so. I think that one plan would do a great deal to settle our social problems in Canada, and I hope to see that plan in existence before I retire from public life.

On the other hand, if Canada is to look after the people who cannot look after themselves as they should—and this includes their care and hospitalization—it must have a staunch forthright programme for the development of this country. In my opinion, that programme of development can best be carried on through some direction from the dominion and provincial governments, but mainly by clearing the road and providing the proper atmosphere for private enterprise to work in. In other words, again it is a matter of cooperation between the existing agencies which we have in this country and private enterprise. Since the war, private enterprise has already shown its determination to develop Canada and all its resources; and if private enterprise is given that green light I believe that it can best be done in that way. I do not mean to say that we should give private enterprise a licence to carry on just as they will, because some of them, not all, would take advantage of the situation. But by proper encouragement the government can assist private enterprise in many ways, and it can also exert a certain control over private enterprise but not so as to harness them and prevent them from going ahead and doing the job. Our forefathers developed this country and we are extremely proud of them. There were very few of them. I think the next generation or two will do equally well if given the same opportunity.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a red-letter day for Vancouver island, that two members from that small part of Canada should have an opportunity of speaking on the same evening. I hope, sir, that you will exercise your authority as a modern Joshua, and that you will stop the clock long enough so that the other member of the triple alliance, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), will also be able to speak before eleven o'clock.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew) on his speech, but I am going to ask his pardon if I do not follow the lead that he has given me in endorsing the budget speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I should like to call attention to the fact that, although he spoke for forty minutes, he did not reduce the taxes any more than did the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Drope) in the four-minute speech which he gave.

I referred to the triple alliance of Vancouver island. I want to refer to other triplets before this evening is over. During the budget speech the Minister of Finance said that the Department of National Defence had spent $376 million during the past year, which was $136 million more than was being estimated for the current year. With the armed forces now on a peacetime footing and demobilization completed, this country has a right to expect considerable reductions in the expenditures on defence. My only anxiety is whether these reductions are being made in the right place and are not such as to render ineffective the efficiency of the services. When war broke out in 1939 we were dangerously unprepared. Our navy and air force were poorly equipped; we were pathetically short in destroyers and other escort vessels, just the very type of vessel which our naval authorities had considered would be essential for the role that we should have to carry out in a major war, and as the experience of the last war showed they were correct, but we were short of these. We were also practically without aircraft or anti-aircraft artillery. Our army was small, badly equipped and without munitions. With these deficiencies we are no longer concerned, except that we cannot permit the forces to drift back into conditions of stagnation and frustration such as existed in the pre-war days. The sum of $376 million spent represents only three-quarters of the amount which the then minister of national defence asked parliament to provide last year to meet what he described as the minimum requirements. A saving of $113 million is very pleasant, but one is forced to ask, has there been a change of policy? Have there been unforeseen circumstances arising during the year? As far as the latter is concerned, I think not. It has been a perfectly normal year. The events have taken the course which they were estimated to take.

Then I must ask the question, was it just bad bookkeeping which made the minister ask for $489 million, of which he required only $376 million?

With regard to the changes in policy which have been announced either in the press or in the house during the course of the year, the outstanding one is the combining of the three defence departments under one minister, and that is a sound and practical course to have followed and is in accordance with the lessons learned during the two world wars in which the armed forces of Canada have played their share. I can speak for this party when I say that the opposition approves the amalgamation of the three services under one minister of defence, because that is a course which various members on this side of the house have recommended on several occasions. Experience indicates the necessity of a central organization for defence. One of the reasons which contributed to the unpreparedness of Great Britain in 1939 was the absence of a guiding hand to formulate a unified defence policy for the three services. There was no provision to ensure that, if war came, that country would be ready in all the important aspects to meet the situation. The weakness was not remedied merely by the appointment of a minister for coordination of defence. It is now an indisputable fact that no operation of war can be carried out by one of the fighting services unaided by one or both of the others. Any weakness or failure in any one of the elements, be it sea, land or air, invariably produces a profoundly adverse effect upon the prospects of success in the other. These truths are so self-evident that they need no elaboration.

The old conception of a sea power, a land power or an air power as being in some way independent of each other is now quite obsolete. They are totally interdependent. If we have not learned that lesson now; if we must wait for some future enemy to teach it to us over again, we shall probably perish in the attempt; yet nothing in the announced proposed post-war organization of the defence forces of Canada indicates that this government has learned that vital lesson or has really taken it to heart. When that lesson was applied during the war it showed conclusively that for success the command and direction of all the armed forces has to be unified at the top; there had to be unity of command, not only of all the forces of any one nation, but of all the forces of all the allied nations in each theatre of war. For each particular operation of war, whether it was the battle of the Atlantic, the landing in Normandy or the capture of Okinawa or in any other of the Pacific islands, a task force was designed and assembled. To each such task force a commander was appointed, and to him were allotted all the armed forces needed to do the job, although these forces did include elements from all the three armed services, the ships, the transport, the aircraft, the tanks, the artillery, the infantry and all the manifold services of supply and maintenance. Until this unification of command was achieved catastrophe followed after disaster. Once this unification was brought about, victory followed victory until the final conclusion of the war. But in spite of the lessons learned at such stupendous cost, when the reorganization of the armed forces of Canada was undertaken after the war the principle of unity of planning and direction was thrown into the discard. Though the services are now under one minister, each service still retains its independence in matters of organization, training, equipment and, to a very large extent administration. Surely the logical development of that close relationship which was built up during the war between the sea, land and air forces, demands greater unification than is now given to it in this country. As a means also of giving fuller play to scientific developments a much closer amalgamation is definitely indicated.

As if existing conditions were not bad enough, a clumsy and expensive attempt has been made to achieve some sort of outward semblance of unity in the Department of National Defence by superimposing upon the navy, army and air force headquarters an enlarged civil service under a deputy minister, with associate deputies, assistants and a numerous civil staff. At the head of each service is a chief of staff. Besides these three, and of equal status, is the director general of defence research. These officers form the chiefs of staff committee whose function is to advise the government on defence policies. They are the professional military advisers of the government.

The organization of national defence in its broader aspect, which should include plans for mobilizing the nation's resources, both civil and military, remains seemingly forgotten. I might refer to it as the forgotten factor. This requires the collaboration of nearly every government department and is concerned, not only with the interrelationship of the three fighting services and their supply, with scientific research and civil defence, but also with the preparation of plans for the country's transition from peace to war. Because these problems are the concern of the government as a whole, a defence committee under the authority of the cabinet, somewhat similar to the pre-war committee on imperial defence which was established in Great Britain, is necessary. Does such a committee exist? Is it being considered?

There is, of course, a defence council, but that is an entirely different organization. By order in council P.C. 887 there has been set up a reorganized defence council. This unwieldy body has nine members, six civilian and three military. The members are: Chairman, the Minister of National Defence; the parliamentary assistant to the minister; the deputy minister; the chief of the naval staff; the chief of the general staff; the chief of the air staff; the director general of defence research, and the two associate deputy ministers. Its functions would seem to be to allocate the available resources between the three services and to settle questions of general administration on which a common policy is desirable. But in the absence of guidance from a broader committee, such as a defence committee, its decisions are likely to be of a hit-or-miss nature. Its duties are defined in P.C. 887 as:

> to advise the Minister of National Defence on matters relating to the naval, military and air services.

I should like the house to note the limited scope which is given in that order in council to the defence council.

To come down one step in the departmental organization, each service maintains an independent staff responsible for operations, planning, training and intelligence. Thus we have an assistant chief of the naval staff, a vice-chief of the general staff, an air member for air plans and another air member for operations and training. Dealing with all the problems of manning, again each service has its own head, namely, the chief of naval personnel, the adjutant general and the air member for air personnel as well as directors of civil personnel and treasury representatives. Each of these officers is responsible for the recruiting, discipline and administration of all the officers and men of his own particular service, making uniformity and equality of treatment in matters of discipline, special allowances and pay and a host of things which affect the morale and welfare of the troops, almost impossible to achieve. As an example, there are in northern Canada today stations where the airmen receive special allowances for isolation, to which the soldiers living in the same quarters are not entitled.

Finally, there are three separate staffs provided for the equipping, accommodating and supplying of the three services. These are controlled respectively by the chief of naval administration and supply, the quarter-master general and the master general of the ordnance, now combined in one person, and the air member for technical services. Below all these levels, the triplication of organization is continued. Each service still has its own machinery for pay, medical treatment, and many other services of administration.

The feature hardest to understand is that, despite this triple set of naval, military and air planners, trainers and administrators, thousands of civil servants are charged with the general administration of the department, and the deputy minister is the senior permanent official on the defence council. The result is that in every department of administration the responsible service heads must find their way to the minister through the labyrinth of the deputy minister's branch. The service officers are thus deprived of initiative, obstructed and hampered in the discharge of their responsibilities.

It will be obvious that this complicated organization of the Department of National Defence must be incapable of making and executing a unified and workable plan for the defence of Canada. In peace time, the money allotted for defence must be limited. Each independent service is naturally and inevitably concerned to maintain its strength as high as possible, to keep up its efficiency, to conserve its traditions, and to protect what it conceives to be its own interests. Each set of planners will plan with these things in mind, and each service will bid against the others for such funds as they feel are likely to be made available. How then can there be any coordinated plan of defence under which all funds are spent in the right proportion on ships, aircraft, tanks and the other things which are needed to carry out such plans? With the department organized as at present, every plan of defence put before the government is the work of a committee, and in the very nature of a committee it must be a compromise as between the rival claims and interests of the three services. Who, for instance, is to say what proportion of the trades and man-power generally is to be mobilized for each service if war comes, or are the services to do as they did last time and compete in the open market for the men they need? I venture to say that the man-power difficulties during world war II arose very largely because there had been no adequate pre-war organization which could assign the resources in properly balanced proportions, in the light of the country's economic position.

What authority comparable to the defence committee of Great Britain is there or was there for coordinating departmental action in preparation for war? The problem needs continuous study, not only as between the armed services and civilian requirements, but also on an interservice basis, so that in terms of man-power, weapons and equipment the resources available are distributed in properly balanced proportions. Surely the proper answer, in order to apply the great lesson of the war and bring about the necessary unification, planning and direction, is unification at the top now. It is better to make mistakes now, and in the immediate future—and it is inevitable that there will be mistakes, as there are always mistakes when you are trying out a new system—than to wait until another war comes and then attempt to correct them, because, if another war comes, there may not be an opportunity to correct them.

I know that certain writers on parliamentary procedure say it is the duty of the opposition to criticize. One could go on criticizing the organization of the national defence department and the organization of the services, but if I can break away from the advice of those writers for a moment and treat the national defence department as something of far too great importance to this country to permit mere partisan advantages to be taken, I should feel that I was making a bigger contribution to this debate if I offered one or two constructive suggestions. I believe that the first step to bring about unification and to avoid such mistakes is the establishment of a defence committee under the authority of the cabinet; and the second is the appointment of a single, responsible, professional adviser to the government as chief of staff of all the armed forces. Under this head the three staffs now charged with the separate planning, training and organization, would be merged into one, and would be able to produce a single unified plan of defence and to design a balanced force to carry out that plan. Likewise the triple staffs now dealing with man-power or equipment or supplies should be unified under one head instead of under three; and anyone who says they are now unified under one head does not know what he is talking about. Only in that way can man-power be properly allocated in war. In no other way can economy and efficiency be secured in the supply of equipment, clothing and all the innumerable items needed by the forces. It is essential that the minister be provided with a guiding hand to formulate and unify defence policy for the three services. For lack of such unifying influence the separate aspects of our defence tend to be examined one by one. There is no provision for any thorough examination of the different service plans to ensure that if war comes, we shall be ready to meet it in all respects.

This weakness is not overcome by the appointment of a minister of defence. He has neither the time nor the technical training for the task. His chief concern is the administration of the services in accordance with the general policy and within the resources allotted to him. The chiefs of staff committee at present does not form a combined staff in the sense of an impartial organization which formulates plans without regard to the interest and prejudice of each particular service. You will never get that thorough unification; you will never have a proper, coordinated plan submitted to this government, until there is a chief of staff who is chief of staff of all three services.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the office of the deputy minister, with its cumbersome organization duplicating the administrative machinery of the services and hampering every act of the service heads, must be materially reduced. The financial saving in overhead would then be enormous. This reorganization can be brought about without any one of the services losing any of its worth-while traditions or peculiarities. For generations the army has welded its different arms and regiments—the artillery, the armour, the engineers, the infantry and so on—into brigades, divisions and corps. It has done so without diminishing in any way the efficiency of the separate units within those various arms; and, having done so, the army has been able to win major battles. And this was done while the individual characteristics and esprit de corps of each arm, and even of the individual regiments were actually being fostered. The same result can and must be achieved as between the three services themselves. So far, this government's attempt to form an integrated service can be described only as having been a topsy-turvy affair. The government has said to the very young naval and air force cadets attending Royal Roads, "You must learn to work and play together." But as you advance up the military hierarchy you find seniors still working in airtight compartments and officers of middle seniority endeavouring to serve two masters.

With reference to the policy for research, the problem here is to secure the continued and complete integration of military and scientific thought at all levels, and to ensure that, in the planning of defence research as a whole, account is taken of the scientific effort of the country in other fields, so that our resources may be efficiently and economically used.

In conclusion, I must reiterate that our defence problems cannot be viewed in isolation. We must be ready to play our part in any measure of collective defence which may be organized under the authority of the united nations, and we must maintain our machinery for collaboration in the defence of the British commonwealth.

The drastic reductions in the operational and training units, rather than in the overhead and administrative services, where they could have been made to advantage, cause grave concern as to the ability of our fighting services to fulfil those functions under the present policy of this government.

Mr. MAURICE HARTT (Cartier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that a member who has been elected in one of the constituencies of the province of Quebec should utter in the French language his first words in this House of Commons. I am glad to note, Mr. Speaker, that we have reached a stage where it is not necessary to apologize for using the French language in this house. If I take the liberty or indulge in the luxury of addressing you—

(Text):

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I don't know what he says.

Mr. HARTT: If I were you I would be ashamed to admit it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): One thing I thank God for: I am not you.

An hon. MEMBER: You could do worse.

Mr. HARTT: I would not change with my hon. friend—and he has nothing to offer, I assure him, for the exchange.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Carry on; don't be stupid.

Mr. HARTT: My hon. friend was so good as to admit his ignorance; I am glad he appreciates it.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I expected to be interrupted and to hear acknowledgments of ignorance. That does not upset me in the least. I wish to pay a tribute to the French Canadians and tell them how deeply I respect their group, which has contributed so much to the formation and development of our great country, Canada. If I make bold to utter these few words in French, it is with the purpose of rebuking those who harbour prejudice and because I wish to say that Providence has blessed Canada. If our friends were willing to show more tolerance and admit that the French Canadians have been the pioneers of this country, that they have greatly contributed to her development and have every right to what they claim, I believe that overnight the future of Canada would become greater and that we would thank God for having achieved so much progress. Mr. Speaker, I invite all hon. members of this house to visit the province of Quebec, the most liberal, hospitable and generous of all provinces, and the one which has done the most to ensure the future of Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I regret beyond words that at this stage of our development we still have to translate speeches in this Dominion of Canada; and I sincerely regret that some of our hon. friends, who state boastfully that they do not understand, do not seem to appreciate the disservice they are doing this country.

I said a few words in French. I am sure every hon. member in the house is as keenly interested as I am in seeing today and tomorrow a greater and a more glorious Canada. We can see it; we can build it; we can edify this as an example to the world, if we but agree to be a little more tolerant, a little more understanding, and to lead a life of give and take.

I do not have to plead for the French-Canadian: history speaks for itself. His accomplishment as a pioneer in this country, his contributions culturally, literally and otherwise should be sufficient. Every man of good will should be happy to recognize and to appreciate the rights of this large segment of our citizens—our compatriots, if you like—so that we may build a better and greater Canada.

I am grateful to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), who, I regret, is not at the moment in his seat. I applaud his splendid effort to say a few words in French. If hon. members only knew how much this effort was appreciated by the biggest ethnic group in Canada—the French-speaking people—they would all make a little effort to help promote that national unity, that unity of understanding and of purpose.

I also wish to thank the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), who is not at the moment in his seat, but who spoke beautifully in French. Let me say to him that any time he wishes he may come to Quebec, select a constituency, and be elected by acclamation.

Let me be frank, Mr. Speaker, when I say that I had not intended to speak in the budget debate. With the modesty with which

I feel I must assess my efforts, I wanted my contribution to be a constructive one, one which would be helpful in the subject under discussion. I wanted to submit hard facts and cold figures. I wanted to discuss with our hon. friends on the opposite benches the mistakes they may be making. I wanted to point out to them that the present budget will go down in history as one of the most glorious. Whether they accept my interpretation or not is a matter for their subjective decisions; it is up to them. But I had thought, in my naive fashion, that even Progressive Conservatives can learn something. At least they have adopted the word "progressive".

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They have forgotten more than you will ever know; but go on.

Mr. HARTT: They have adopted at least the word "progressive", and they progress like lobsters, swimming backwards. Like the Bourbons, they learn nothing and they forget nothing. They sing the song "Long, Long Ago," of the private interests.

Mrs. STRUM: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARTT: The lady member does not know how much encouragement she gives me. I could have said more were it not that my good wife is in the gallery. I suppose that is where my deepest criticism will come from. Like the Bourbons, I say that they learn nothing and forget nothing; they keep on hooting the hoot and have been hooting ever since hooting began. What a pleasant task! What a dream! But we cannot revert to yesteryear or to yesterday. Canada is a country that is looking forward in its social, economic and political structure and the quicker our noble and good friends learn that, the better this country will be.

I was going to speak about the election in Cartier.

An hon. MEMBER: Be careful.

Mr. HARTT: My hon. friend is invited to come down to Cartier where he will get a warm reception. I do this, not because this election is more important than anything else, but because it was unique in the history of Canada that in two former elections a certain gentleman slipped into the House of Commons, flowery as his name might have been. However I do not want to say anything unpleasant about him because he is not in the house to defend himself.

I do not want to say, though, that it was an abortion of history; it was an accident in Canadian political history. I can assure the house with all the emphasis at my disposal that Cartier or any other place in Canada never wanted to elect a communist. I say that the phenomena of 1943 and 1945 was an accident. I think I should repeat that to every hon. member, because we cannot foresee what might happen unexpectedly and insidiously in some constituency when something that is dead keeps creeping and finally seizes the constituency in order to make this national forum a place where its propaganda can be spread.

I want to tell the house that I ran this election without bravura or without bravado. I never referred to my opponents as communists because the word communist pre-supposes some intellectual and social study such as political economy. I called them bolshevists. There was nothing communist about that group. They never discussed political economy. They were never interested in the welfare of the people of Canada. They had one purpose, to create a bolsheviki Canada to serve the bolshevists of Russia. I called them spies with an ideology, spies with an excuse and a label.

The candidates who opposed them in 1943 and 1945 respectively did not emphasize that point. They were delicate. They tried to discuss old-fashioned politics. They tried to talk to the people in the old classical way of 1895. However I took my bolshevist friends to task and here is what I found out. Due to a deficiency in our election act these people were able, whenever a general election or a by-election was being held, to concentrate on one constituency, this time Cartier. All their sympathizers from Halifax to Vancouver, from every part of the country and from every part of the city, would invade the constituency and register as boarders with residents of Cartier who were of the same mind and political opinion. This was particularly true of Cartier. When the enumerators came around these bolshevists were entrenched and would give their names in as residents of the constituency. Consequently they were entitled to vote. I call the attention of the government to that deficiency in the act and ask that it be remedied.

Then they imported their professional gangsters armed with blackjacks in one hand and the hammer and sickle in the other. If there were negroes in the constituency who had some grievance the bolshevists would play on it and exaggerate the evil. That was true of Jews and others groups. They play on the weakness of the constituents and they make so much noise that a clear voice is not understood. They always manœuvre to have a multiplicity of candidates, because they feel that if they can split the electorate they will get a block of votes and be elected. That is what happened in 1943 and 1945. I reassure the house that at no time have the bolshevists elected representatives to this house through the communist vote of Cartier.

I want to express my grateful thanks to the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Bracken). He was in Montreal on a Friday three weeks before the election. He was asked whether he would present a candidate, and I understand he said no, that he would not, because he did not desire to split the anti-communist vote. I am grateful to him and I want to make this public acknowledgment. I must also express my thanks to another group—I shall mention their name because I think they can take it—the C.C.F. party. The leader of that party (Mr. Coldwell) refused to be jockeyed into the position of splitting the anti-communist vote in Cartier. I want to thank them and assure them that they have rendered a service to the country. I cannot say the same for the other groups. I know Mr. Masse said he was a social crediter.

Mr. LOW: He was not.

Mr. HARTT: I appreciate that and I accept the word of the leader of that group. He certainly was no credit.

Mr. LOW: He was not even social credit.

Mr. HARTT: He was not even a credit to his parish. The premier of Quebec financed Mr. Masse to the tune of $30,000. He sent down men to speak from the platform and he sent along his best organizer, Mr. Paul Bouchard. The gang from St. Henri was there.

I want to say with all reverence and respect that the sisters have a right to vote. Legally they had the right to vote and they received dispensation. When they went to register they allowed their pictures to be taken. There is nothing shameful about that; they were within their rights. But on election day you could not take a picture of any one of the sisters. Rumour had it that thirty costumes were rented and that other ladies were dressed in those nuns' costumes. That is why the umbrellas appeared. On their fingers there were diamond rings, and nuns have no diamond rings. They wore toeless shoes, and nuns do not wear toeless shoes. I am sorry the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) is not here to hear of the wonderful work that was done. I assure you that that was no credit to Canada.

The trouble is that we think of perversities only when they are about to engulf us at the time of an election. Our educational institutions and our social leaders at no time take the trouble to explain these perversities to the people, to explain this foreign system of politics. If they did so, without any name calling, but in a short and keen analysis, I am positive that we would have nothing to worry about in the future.

I want to say a few words about the budget, a few words perhaps motivated by a selfish outlook. I am new in this house, and I do want to share the glory and the honour and the respect which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has drawn upon himself in presenting this budget. It is no ordinary compliment to him, and it is no ordinary compliment to me that I should be sitting on this side of the house when a budget is presented that shows the greatest surplus in the history of Canada since confederation. Our hon. friends opposite bemoan that fact; they probably would not have liked to see so great a surplus, not that I impute any ill will to them or that they do not wish Canada well, but for some other reason peculiarly their own—I would not call it political—they did not wish that we should have a surplus. But the figures are there and, whether you put them head down or toes up, there they are; there they remain in Canadian budgetary history, and no amount of talking will change the figures one iota.

An hon. MEMBER: A war assets surplus.

Mr. HARTT: My hon. friends who have not the responsibility of government, how happy they are! We call it in French, "Il rit jaune"; they do not laugh so happily. I remember the first great war when butter was $1.10 a pound and sugar fifty cents a pound. That did not happen in the last war, and the laughter of my hon. friends opposite is really the laughter of pain if I diagnose it aright. I would not call it hysterical, because they are gentlemen of weight, some of them overweight. But that is their attitude, their outlook. The Tories have never forgotten the pocket boroughs and the rotten boroughs. The fact remains that there is a surplus of $350,000,000. It is there and it cannot be contradicted, whether you call it capital gain or the resale of war assets or whatever you call it. There is the surplus, and the indebtedness of the country has been reduced by that amount.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is—

Mr. HARTT: Anything you have to say get up and say it. I do not like shadow-boxing. I see my hon. friend blush.

Mr. JACKMAN: Blushing like a rose.

Mr. HARTT: My good friend from Rosedale has the first syllable of his constituency's name properly placed, the first of which is Rose, who is placed in St. Vincent de Paul and as for the other part of the name we will put a Liberal in his seat at the next election in Rosedale.

An hon. MEMBER: Try to do it.

Mr. HARTT: There will be no difficulty at all. Let the Tories just keep on as they are going and they will be dwindling and evaporating like exhausted volcanoes very soon.

We have reduced the national debt by $350,000,000, or by the amount of the surplus. One hon. member who posed as a great economist asked, What bonds did you retire, bonds in the hands of commercial banks or bonds in the hands of the Bank of Canada? When you pay off a debt, whether you pay it to one creditor or to another, you reduce your debt by that amount. That is elementary, so elementary that even my hon. friend can understand it. I do not mean the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), who wears a red tie tonight. I think he is coming our way. He could not have lived all these years in the province of Quebec and be anything else.

Then our hon. friends opposite complain of the income tax reductions. They are never satisfied. If the reductions had been less they would have said, why not more? If the reductions had been made for people in other brackets they would have said, why not reduce it somewhere else? I am a plain man, and I know that when I draw a cheque on my bank account, money goes out, and that when I make a deposit money goes in. That is plain, elementary, and my stenographer understands that, too, without having been elected for some constituency. Every newspaper, every accountant, every man that knows anything about budgeting knows that the average income tax has been reduced by fifty-four per cent, of which twenty-nine per cent is in the lower brackets. Every periodical, every newspaper, every economist admits that. But what do our hon. friends opposite say? They say, why did you not reduce the hidden taxes, the indirect taxes? It is like the boy who kills his father and pleads for mercy, being an orphan.

Hon. gentlemen opposite complain of the indirect taxes, and it was they who introduced them. They introduced the income tax. Every indirect form of tax is their baby, and now they want to lay the baby at our door. Let them bring up their own baby. I remember that we had no income tax until the first great war and I remember how prices went up. The members of the Progressive Conservative party are travelling backwards like a lobster. Suddenly they shift their position from the aristocratic group, from the money bags, those fellows who clip coupons, to the middle class. The financial critic for the opposition cried woefully: Why did not the middle class receive the necessary relief? Since when did I hear a Tory speak for the middle class? Why, they are now indulging in poetry, lyric poetry. Actually they have only one class and that is the exploiting class. High tariffs—that is what they want. I sympathize with them. A drowning man will clutch at a straw. They thought that by putting "progressive" on to their name they had accomplished something. The bolshevists did the same thing. They called themselves "progressive labour." The Tories call themselves "Progressive Conservatives." There is a contradiction in the name. One counterbalances the other. You cannot conserve and go forward. You have to stand still in one place. That is self-evident.

They cry for the middle class, and to cap it all, what did they do? I shall put some chocolate around it if my hon. friend likes that better. What did do? They moved an amendment. It divides itself into three parts like Gaul, and there was plenty of gall in the amendment. You remember your Julius Caesar: Omnia Gallia in tres partes divisa est; all Gaul is divided into three parts. And was there gall in the amendment? I submitted it to a jurist whom I consider an intelligent man. Here is what he said. The amendments, disregarding their intrinsic value, have for effect one thing. They admit that there is a fifty-four per cent reduction in the income tax. The opposition admits that, but because they are dancing the dance of long, long ago they introduce an amendment, and they say to the people of Canada in effect, there is a reduction of fifty-four per cent, but we shall move an amendment. If we win, you, the people of Canada, cannot get that reduction. There has never been anything more ridiculous in political history than in moving that amendment.

I come now to the third part of it. The refutations of the first two parts are self-evident, but there is one that I am keenly interested in, namely, the calling together of the provinces and provincial agreements. Well, who is holding out here? Tory for Tory; we have two Tory premiers, no matter what they call themselves. These Tories hold out against an understanding with the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. TIMMINS: No.

Mr. HARTT: Oh, yes. If my hon. friend has anything to say I shall listen; I want to learn. The arrangements for an interprovincial conference is a matter of Canadian importance; it is a matter of constitutional rights established and recognized by every court, including the privy council. My former colleague, Mr. Fernand Choquette, gave jurisprudence to the premier of Quebec, and said, "Here is the accusation that I throw at you. You are causing dissension in Canada and a disruption of confederation." You gentlemen were not in the Quebec legislature in 1942 when Britain stood alone, when you talked so British, when you believed so much that the destruction of Britain was a matter of a few moments, when human liberty was about to be destroyed, when that beautiful anthem which everybody sings or talks about but which everybody chooses to forget, was in the air, praising themselves for their part in the greatest moment in human history; it was at that time that the federal government called upon the provinces to relinquish certain fields of taxation, to rent them out, to give a chance to the federal government to carry on the war. The Liberal government at that time in power in Quebec said, "Take it; we will cooperate; we want to do all we can." What did Mr. Duplessis, who was a member of the legislature at that time, say? He was the leader of the opposition at that time. Had hon. members been there they would have heard Mr. Duplessis' speech. They would have heard him say that we were giving away our autonomy. It has nothing to do with autonomy. It is egomania; that is what it is. It is a mania for his own aggrandisement, to go down in history as the greatest French-Canadian. That may be possible for Mr. Duplessis, but when I heard the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) move his amendment and have it supported by people who are so British or Canadian I say it is something that is self-contradictory.

I do not know the premier of Ontario, but he is one of those coy babies who run away and say, "Come hither." You know those coy babies, the young ones. He comes to this town and blames the Canadian government—the government that speaks for the people of Canada, for our interests—for all the troubles. He accuses them of blackmail. If you call that statesmanship; if you call that patriotism, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that there has never been a more traitorous act in this country than the two premiers of Ontario and Quebec are practising, who are trying to encroach upon the rights of the federal government. If Mr. Duplessis and Mr. Drew—

Mr. JACKMAN: Shocking language.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Speak up so we can hear.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think he must have heard. I say that it is shocking language to say that two premiers of this country are traitors.

Mr. HACKETT: On a question of privilege or on a question of decency, I suggest that the term "traitorous" used by the hon. gentleman as applied to eminent public men holding positions of the highest trust in Canada should be withdrawn.

Mr. HARTT: Mr. Speaker, there was no question of privilege and there is no question of privilege when an hon. member holds the floor. There may have been a point of order.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is in this house.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HARTT: I will withdraw the word "traitor".

Mr. GREEN: We do not mind all this cheap abuse of ourselves, but the word "traitor" should be withdrawn.

Mr. HARTT: I withdraw the word.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the word has been withdrawn.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): What about "cheap abuse"?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; I think that should be withdrawn.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The pot calling the kettle black.

Mr. HARTT: Seeing where it comes from I do not mind, Mr. Speaker. I withdrew and withdraw the unparliamentary word "traitorous". There is nothing in the rules of parliament which forces me not to think what I like. Hon. members can make their own guess about it. I sat for eight years in the provincial house, and I heard Ottawa being spoken of as if it were the capital of Germany, not the capital of Canada. I resented it at the time and I said so; I repeat it here. If anybody is so touchy that he does not like Mr. Duplessis to be called to account, but would rather see Canada divided to suit his own purposes they can decorate it with any candy they like. It speaks for itself. It will go down in the annals of history. As a Canadian I feel that this man has not contributed anything to Quebec. I cannot speak intimately of the premier of Ontario, but judging him from his statements—I think somebody referred to them as a rhapsody in blue. Let me add one word, tragedy in blue.

The Dominion of Canada will overcome these difficulties. When the provincial treasuries begin to be empty, when no more subsidies of $20 million go to the provinces they will either have to tax or they have to come hollering to the Minister of Finance. To say that for a province to make an arrangement to rent its taxation rights to the mother parliament is an infringement of autonomy is misrepresenting the situation. Seven provinces have signed an accord, and they are satisfied. Does that say that they are not patriotic, and they do not want their autonomy just as much as the other provinces? It will have a bad effect. I do not want to play politics with the proposition.

I rose to speak tonight on another matter. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) said to me that I was wearing my pants thin. I could not understand him at that moment, but when I read over Hansard today I could follow the proposition. I do not think he will ever make that remark again. I am susceptible to invitations.

If I could say in words what I have in thought about that speech which the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) made yesterday in this house, I think everybody in the house might agree with me, but I think it would make history in the Canadian parliament. I have not too much time left, but as a preface, I have never heard anything more insulting to Canada. I have never heard anything so psychopathic. I never heard any such crackpot philosophy, such a half-wit and nit-wit ideology as I heard here yesterday. I have Hansard here, and if you, sir, would allow me the time I would analyse that speech from page one to the last letter. I would analyse it from page 3086 to the last page in Hansard of May 14 where the hon. member who spoke yesterday is reported. Here is a man who consorts with the greatest enemy of the British empire. Here is a man who is consorting with the former Ku Klux Klan. Here is a man, Smith, who has been declared anti-British and anti-semitic, who has hindered Britain to the utmost degree and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin says "I have gone to the United States to convert the Americans," and that he succeeded. After listening to the hon. member, I would say the only thing he can do by his speeches is to repel anybody who listened to him. There was not any coherence in what he said. He knows nothing at all about the people he spoke about. He misled and misrepresented the house in that statement. He is a propagandist for which Canada has given hundreds of thousands of young lives and billions of dollars in wealth. I do not think Canada wants that type. He objects to being called a Hitler. It is a compliment to him. I think Hitler had a little more brains. What he is looking for is publicity.

I have this copy of Hansard all marked up, and if I had the time I should like to go down the line to show you the contradictions, the inventions that this man has brought into this house, a man who has been consorting with the enemies of this country, but who says that he is a Canadian and a Christian. I wonder where he got that appointment as a Christian apostle. I know something about this Christianity. I am no foreigner to it. We have contributed to that Christianity. There is nothing in it which is not in Judaism. I admire the leader of the Social Credit party. I think he is a fine and genial person. In fact, I congratulate him on his first name, Solon, it being that of the great Greek lawgiver. I was hoping that he would live up to that name and not live down to his second name, Low. When he denied any association with Smith for his party, I admired him for it. But I am surprised that the hon. member who spoke yesterday was not read out of the Social Credit party. He is a menace to the country, and we are not ready to spend another one hundred thousand lives and billions of dollars to devastate half the world.

Mr. LOW: If the hon. member will show me where he is a menace to the country, we will have him read out of the party.

Mr. HARTT: I have not the time.

Mr. LOW: Oh, you waited until five minutes to eleven o'clock before mentioning this.

Mr. HARTT: I am willing to sit down with my hon. friend. I have great confidence in him, and I am willing to sit down and show him that his colleagues are singing the song and the dirges of misery that were sung in the countries which are now completely exhausted and devastated, and whose people were fed on the blood of others, people who feed on human lives.

Mr. POULIOT: Do not discuss it with the leader of the Social Credit party alone. Let us listen to the argument.

Mr. LOW: That is the idea.

Mr. HARTT: Let us begin at the beginning, if you will allow me to do so. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin rose and said that he intended to speak on the budget, but because he visited the United States and visited the united nations he had of necessity to change his speech. But he reported nothing about the united nations in the remainder of his speech. I refer hon. members to the report in Hansard. He does say something about the anti-defamation league. Let me tell you something about the anti-defamation league. This is a Jewish institution organized in the United States. It never crossed the Canadian border and it will not cross the Canadian border, because Jewish interests in the United States are not the same as Jewish interests in Canada. We have learned to serve one God in one way, but we respect the nation that gives us asylum and gives us a home and liberty. So if an American Jew finds his interests contradictory to those of a Canadian Jew, we cannot march along together. This anti-defamation league is supposed to have given a statement which was reproduced in the Ottawa Journal:

. . . as saying that Jaques had addressed "nationalist" rallies in various parts of the United States recently with Gerald L. K. Smith, leader of the newly organized Christian nationalist crusade. Smith told a conference here yesterday—

That was in New York.

—that the crusade's ten-point programme includes preservation of the United States as a Christian nation, exposure of communism, and the "safeguarding of America against the menace of bureaucratic fascism."

We all agree with that. The United States can have any religion it likes. So can Canada. It is the individual right of every person. It can have its ideology. It can have its own political system. What does the hon. member say?

I may say that my reply to the press locally was as follows:

The Zionist terrorists—

And so on.

Now, I ask hon. members to take Hansard. I do not want to read the whole thing. Not a word was mentioned in the first quotation about zionism or terrorism. But what does he do by that sophistry? Like a demagogue, he finishes a sentence quoting something, then interjects something else which has no relationship whatsoever to the two former quotations. The hon. member said in the house that the mob and the people do not understand. He is the only free man. The mob is not responsible and he is going to show them the way. So I say to you, first of all, the anti-defamation league may also be anti-zionist.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it is eleven o'clock.

Mr. HARTT: May I adjourn the debate?

[Mr. Hartt.]

Mr. KNOWLES: You have already spoken for forty-five minutes.

Mr. HARTT: I know that, but I want to bargain.

Mr. WEIR: May I adjourn the debate?

On motion of Mr. Weir the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 16, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CLAXTON—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. RAYMOND IN DEBATE ON MAY 15

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. Speaking in the house yesterday the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) at page 3108 of Hansard cited L'Action Catholique of December 16 as having quoted me as saying:

(Translation):

Through its proposals, the dominion government is trying to place the provinces in such a position that they might relinquish their constitutional responsibilities.

(Text):

Had the hon. member looked at L'Action Catholique for the next day, that is the 17th of December, he would have seen a correction, showing that I did not say anything of the kind but said almost exactly the reverse. Because this is a matter of some importance, and as the hon. member based a considerable part of his speech on this translation—or mistranslation—I know he would be the first to admit his own surprise at my ever expressing the view he credited me with, and I should like to quote from L'Action Catholique for December 17, as follows:

(Translation):

It does seem that a faulty translation by a contemporary has caused us to do an injustice to Hon. Mr. Claxton. We had been sent a newspaper clipping which ascribed to the Minister of Health a statement which was the opposite of what he actually said. As a matter of fact, one of our readers assures us that he has the English text. Mr. Claxton had used the verb "discharge" which the translator rendered by the expression "se défaire" (to get rid of), instead of using the proper term "s'acquitter." The minister was asserting that the offers made by the dominion to the provinces would enable them to discharge their obligations with respect to education and social welfare, and not to get rid of them—

And they ended their note with:

(Translation):

We are making this correction even before being requested to do so by Hon. Mr. Claxton, because it is a matter of justice.

(Text):

As it happens, I have the text of the speech referred to, as delivered in French and English. What I said in English was:

In its proposals to the provinces, the dominion government has tried to put the provinces in a position where they could properly discharge their constitutional responsibilities. It is not centralization for the federal government to offer to pay Quebec $57 million for what was never before worth to the province more than $31 million. The dominion is trying to avoid double taxation and treat all Canada on an equal basis so as to enable every part to develop its resources and discharge its responsibilities for the education and well-being of the people.

A French translation was given to the press at the same time. It will be seen from the foregoing that what I said was actually—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLAXTON: —almost exactly the reverse of what the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie quoted me as saying.

Mr. FERGUSON: I submit that in making a speech at this stage the minister is out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FERGUSON: I am tired of listening to that.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sure that like L'Action Catholique the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprarie will be the first to regret the error made.

MR. DROPE—FLOOR PRICE ON BUTTER

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont.): The hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Mayhew) is reported on page 3127 of Hansard as saying that in my speech of May 8, I asked for a subsidy on butter. I wish to correct the hon. member and I refer him to page 2892 of Hansard. What I said was: If the ceiling price and rationing are to be continued, a floor price should be put on butter.

PETITION

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present and endorse a petition signed by Mr. John Beckett and 256,282 others. It is very short, and I would therefore ask permission to read it to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the consent of the house to read the petition?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. COLDWELL: It reads:

To the Honourable the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled:

The petition of the undersigned citizens of the Dominion of Canada humbly sheweth:

That, in the opinion of your petitioners, the present standard of old age pensions is grossly inadequate to provide a life of security and dignity to the aged people of this dominion.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable house may be pleased, during the present session of parliament, to amend the Old Age Pensions Act

(a) to provide pensions of not less than fifty dollars per month at age of sixty-five,

(b) to eliminate the means test,

(c) to provide, in addition to the basic pension, a cost of living supplement, invalidity supplement, and free medical, dental, optical and hospital care, and

(d) to provide that all such pensions be paid in full from the dominion treasury.

And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 206, to amend the Act incorporating The Canadian Council of The Girl Guides Association.—Mr. Ross (St. Paul's).

WAR CHARITIES ACT, 1939

AMENDMENT CONFINING PROVISIONS OF ACT TO FUNDS ALREADY REGISTERED

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence, for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the first reading of Bill No. 205, to amend the War Charities Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HUMAN RIGHTS

FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—OBLIGATIONS UNDER UNITED NATIONS CHARTER—APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs, for the Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed and that Messrs. Benidickson, Breithaupt, Croll, Sinclair (Ontario), Belzile, Beaudoin, Pinard, Lesage, Marier, Rinfret, Whitman, Ilsley, Isnor, Michaud, Maybank, Mayhew, Diefenbaker, Fulton, Hackett, Harkness, Hazen, Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), Massey, Miller, Irvine, Jaenicke, Stewart (Winnipeg North), Hansell, Herridge be members of such committee, as far as the interests of this house are concerned, to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the manner in which those obligations accepted by all members of the united nations may best be implemented;

And, in particular, in the light of the provisions contained in the charter of the united nations, and the establishment by the economic and social council thereof of a commission on human rights, what is the legal and constitutional situation in Canada with respect to such rights, and what steps, if any, it would be advisable to take or to recommend for the purpose of preserving in Canada respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms;

That a message be sent to the senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose, and select, if the senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the said proposed joint committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour at this time to move on behalf of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who is absent from the house on a mission of devotion and duty, this resolution. I shall not repeat the words of the resolution which you have just been kind enough, sir, to declare to the house, but I do desire at once to remind the house that this is an implementation of the message contained in the address of His Excellency in the speech from the throne that a joint committee of both houses be appointed to consider what I consider to be one of the most important issues of our time.

We have had discussions in this house on many occasions on the subject of human rights and personal and fundamental freedoms in their relationship to matters of domestic concern. Since then events in a wider sphere have brought this question before us in a different form. We are to consider the subject of human rights and fundamental freedoms, not only as a Canadian problem but in relation to our obligations to other peoples, to the recently liberated peoples of the fascist states, to the awakening masses of Asia, to the citizens of our former allies whose concepts in many cases of human rights and freedoms, however tenaciously held, would seem to differ vastly from our own.

The inspiration for this international approach came in our day from what I might without extravagance term the memorable terms of the Atlantic charter. I am not going to go through the details of that charter this afternoon, as every hon. member of this house knows them as well as I do, but I will just quote:

They respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them . . .

The rest of the articles of the charter, to which I could easily refer, will be left for the discussion which may ensue.

When the united nations was formally constituted at San Francisco in April 1945—some of my hon. friends in all parts of the house were there—the very preamble of the charter set forth the supreme purpose of the united nations in the following terms—I shall quote only one paragraph because I shall be fairly hurried in my summary:

We the peoples of the united nations determined . . . to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small . . . and for these ends . . . have resolved to combine our efforts to accomplish these aims.

All through the charter, Mr. Speaker, we find the same ideal kept in the foreground.

Article 1, defining the purposes of the united nations, I need not read.

Article 13 includes this purpose among the principal functions of the united nations by providing that:

1. The general assembly shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of:
(b) promoting international cooperation in the economic, social, cultural, educational, and health fields, and assisting in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

Article 7 of the charter, which establishes the principal organs of the united nations, lists among them an economic and social council.

Article 55, is the basic article surrounding this debate, together with article 56. Article 55, dealing with the subject of international economic and social cooperation, pledges the united nations to promote, inter alia:

universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

Article 61 provides that:

the economic and social council shall consist of eighteen members of the united nations elected by the general assembly.

Article 62 authorizes the council to initiate studies and reports with respect to the purposes assigned and in particular:

It may make recommendations for the purpose of promoting respect for and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all.

Article 68 provides that the economic and social council shall set up commissions in economic and social fields and for the promotion of human rights.

That is a brief summary, Mr. Speaker.

All freedom-loving Canadians I am sure will note with gratification that the united nations have sought faithfully to carry out the purposes laid down in the charter. Pursuant to article 68 the economic and social council has already established a commission on human rights. At its first session in London the economic and social council on February 16, 1946, defined the functions of the commission on human rights, as follows:

> The work of the commission shall be directed towards submitting proposals, recommendations and reports to the council regarding:
> (a) an international bill of rights;
> (b) international declarations or conventions on civil liberties, the status of women, freedom of information and similar matters;
> (c) the protection of minorities;
> (d) the prevention of discrimination on grounds of race, sex, language or religion.

To which at a later meeting on June 21, 1946, there was added the following:

> (e) any other matter concerning human rights not covered by items a, b, c and d.

By a further resolution on June 21, 1946, the economic and social council took steps for the compilation of a universal survey of the subject in very definite terms which are available to all hon. members.

The commission on human rights has met and organized itself and has set up several subcommissions of experts. One of these is a subcommission on freedom of information and of the press. Its function is:

> —in the first instance, to examine what rights, obligations and practices should be included in the concept of freedom of information, and to report to the commission on human rights on any issues that may arise from such examination.

The other subcommission which has already been created is on the protection of minorities.

A drafting committee has already been established for the purpose of formulating a preliminary draft of an international bill of human rights in accordance with the great concepts laid down in the charter of the united nations. This draft will then be submitted to all states which are members of the united nations, for their observations, suggestions and proposals. The objective is that the proposed bill may be submitted to the general assembly of the united nations in 1948.

While no Canadian is a member of the commission on human rights, Canada is one of the eighteen nations represented on the economic and social council which created it.

The two members of this government who have attended and participated in the sessions of the economic and social council are the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), and I think we all owe them a great debt of gratitude for the work they accomplished in these deliberations.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that any document so far-reaching as an international bill of rights is of great importance to the people of Canada. It is essential therefore that our Canadian representatives should have the advantage of the fullest possible expression by the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people of their views on this subject. We must be ready to consider the draft international bill of human rights when it is referred to us.

One of the recommendations of the economic and social council adopted at the meeting in June, 1946, is as follows—and this is very important to us here:

> Members of the united nations are invited to consider the desirability of establishing information groups or local human rights committees within their respective countries to collaborate with them in furthering the work of the commission on human rights.

No action along these lines has been taken in Canada.

The joint committee of both houses of parliament which by the resolution now under discussion it is proposed to establish will undoubtedly give a lead along these lines. I think it can be said with safety that our Canadian attitude would be to have voluntary committees instead of those under governmental direction or control. It is doubtful that the Canadian people would look with favour upon organizations set up under government auspices. Nevertheless it is not too soon to draw attention to the desirablity of the Canadian people giving widespread and intense study to this vital and far-reaching subject.

May I be permitted, sir, with respect, to refer to what has been said in this house before in connection with this subject, especially by my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), whom I congratulate. There are certain historic landmarks of tremendous value to us in Canada. If we as a Canadian parliament and a Canadian people are to make our appropriate contribution to the formulation of world opinion on the subject of human rights and freedom, it is well that we should briefly look back to some of the historic landmarks in mankind's progress along the road to freedom. They include—and these things are fundamental—magna carta, the Declaration of Rights, the Petition of Right, the Habeas Corpus Act and the United States bill of rights, which was referred to in the debate in this house last year.

I shall not say very much about the fundamental doctrines of magna carta, they are so well known to every hon. member. It was an agreement wrested from a ruthless king by the barons of England; and, unfortunately, although it made the biggest contribution to this continent of any document in history, it did not make an equal contribution to the continent where it was formed. It was near the famous meadow of Runnymede you can see from the king's tower at Windsor castle that Grey wrote his famous elegy:

> Some village Hampden, that with dauntless breast
> The little tyrant of his fields withstood.

The principles it declares include: freedom of the church, the limitations on the payment of interest—my friends to the far left will be glad to hear that; prohibition of the levy of taxation without consent of the general council of the nation; arranging the assembly of the council of the nation; safeguarding the property of the dead; uniformity of weights and measures, if you please, back in 1215. The great paragraph was recited by my friend in the house a year ago, the real vital paragraph of magna carta:

> No free man shall be taken, or imprisoned, or dispossessed, or outlawed, or banished, or in any way destroyed, nor will we go upon him nor send upon him, except by the legal judgment of his peers or the law of the land. To no one will we sell, to no one will we deny or delay justice or right.

Magna carta, as every student of history knows, was the foundation of the Petition of Right, the Declaration of Rights, of the habeas corpus and the reform bills of England. May I quote to the house the words of Alexander Hamilton, one of the greatest Americans.

> The sacred rights of mankind are not to be rummaged for among old parchments or musty records. They are written as with a sunbeam in the whole volume of human nature by the hand of the Divinity itself and can never be erased or obscured by mortal power.

Magna carta was the formation, the inspiration of the constitution of practically every state in the union. In the legal system of the Puritan colonies of New England we find important features of magna carta. Their deputies were instructed to frame the body of their law in resemblance to magna carta, and the very words were repeated in 1641. In 1638 the colonial assembly of Maryland passed a bill to recognize magna carta as part of the law of the colony. In the charter of liberties and privileges of New York of 1683, you also find these title deeds. In Pennsylvania, the basic law of the state was said to be a sort of magna carta. Its familiar phrases appear in the charters and constitutions of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. In 1687 William Penn published in Philadelphia an edition of magna carta exhorting his fellow colonists,—and I quote:—

> —not to give away anything of liberty and property that at present they do enjoy, but take up the good example of our ancestors and understand that it is easy to part with or give away great privileges, but hard to gain them if they are once lost.

The American constitution was itself consciously linked with magna carta. As Lord Lothian, the former Philip Kerr, minister to Washington, said:

> The tea was thrown into Boston harbour with the words of magna carta ringing in men's ears.

The American bill of rights, passed ten years after the declaration of independence, traces its pedigree back to that ancient document, and as late as 1907, forty years ago in the constitution of the new state of Oklahoma the most famous sentences were repeated in the constitution.

I want to conclude that reference with a little touch from a speech of a great American general, that friend of freedom, Eisenhower, delivered in England just before he left. He loved London and London loved him. He said:

> When we consider these things,—

He was talking about these elemental things.

> —then the valley of the Thames draws closer to the farms of Kansas and the plains of Texas.

That is the cooperation we need today among the Anglo-Saxon peoples. I think I have dealt with that part which has to do with the sources of freedom, but I want to say that while magna carta was the inspiration of this country, it was never observed in the historical development of my own native country. That is true.

May I say something about habeas corpus. Let me quote Dicey's law of the constitution, sixth edition, page 217:

> The act, while the most important landmark in the constitutional history of England, in no sense creates any right to personal freedom, but is essentially a procedure act for improving the legal mechanism by which acknowledged right may be enforced.

And again at page 195—Dicey is the greatest authority who ever wrote on the British constitution:

> It declares no principle, and defines no rights, but is for practical purposes worth a hundred articles guaranteeing constitutional liberty.

The bill of rights of the United States I shall leave with the house. The house knows it, but I should like to quote what was said by Mr. Jefferson. In the first place this was his first inaugural address, delivered on March 4, 1801. I think the last words of the address are far more powerful than the words of the United States declaration of independence. I must say something here in a personal way. I think that the words of the United States declaration of independence are indefensible where they say that every man is entitled as of right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. It is obvious that in these days of uncertainty, in these days when nations have duties one to another, no one is entitled to free possession of life because his life may be at the service of the state. Liberty is a variable thing. On the streets of your communities, your municipalities or cities, there is interference with your liberty, and properly so. The pursuit of happiness depends on many elements. It depends on heredity, it depends on environment, it depends on political, social and economic conditions that surround one's life. There is no fundamental right to the pursuit of happiness but there is a fundamental right that one shall not be prevented from pursuing happiness.

This is what Jefferson said, in a far finer phrase, in my opinion:

> Equal and exact justice to all men of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations,—entangling alliances with none; the support of the state governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the general government in its whole constitutional vigour, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad;—

And these are the lines that I really wish the house to remember:

> —freedom of religion; freedom of the press; freedom of person under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected—these principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us, and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation.

It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that the American bill of rights, like the great British charters, laid no claim to the declaration of a new law; and as a fundamental principle that may be recalled, it was rather, sir, in the words of an eminent authority, Sir Maurice Amos, in his work on the American constitution, an attempt to insure—> —that certain fundamental axioms might be placed by the constitution beyond the reach of the ordinary legislature.

This was possible in the United States because its parliamentary bodies, its congress, its state legislatures derive all their powers from the express language of a written constitution. It is possible in a country which functions under a written constitution to define and limit the powers of law-making bodies. The function of the British North America Act is to lay down which of our two parliamentary bodies, the federal or the provincial, has jurisdiction to legislate in certain fields. In theory at least, Mr. Speaker, the dominion and the provinces have their rights under their respective jurisdictions. Hence if we are to consider whether in Canada we should adopt something in the nature of a bill of rights, we must do so having regard to certain conditions.

Let us never forget that we already possess in this country the rights affirmed in magna carta on the nineteenth day of June, 1215, the declaration of rights in 1628, the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679, and the great body, with its sweep and scope, of common law. We can legislate with no greater authority or durability than pertains to an act of parliament. Some of the subjects commonly associated with a bill of rights are not within the jurisdiction of the federal government but have been assigned by the British North America Act to provincial jurisdiction. That is one thing this committee will of course remember.

It will be noted, Mr. Speaker, that to the extent that we may wish to deal with the subject of human rights and fundamental freedoms as domestic legislation, there is much, very much, for a select committee to consider. It may even be desirable or necessary that consultation with the provinces take place.

Just a word about France. They attempted a comprehensive constitution last May but they finished up with a brief affirmation of a fundamental principle which they have had since 1789. May I read it—it is only four lines:

> The solemn affirmation of the rights and liberties of man and of the citizen consecrated by the Declaration of Rights of 1789—and the fundamental principles recognized by the laws of the Republic.

Thus, sir, we see that on second consideration the people of France regard it as wiser to avoid defining and confining in mere iteration of words those deeply ingrained concepts of men's inherent rights, whose greatest protection is not in printed words but in mankind's sense of natural justice.

I wish to say a word or two about my native country, and this will probably shock the house. Let me say how the principles of magna carta were there betrayed. Notwithstanding magna carta of 1215, notwithstanding the Bill of Rights of 1689, the Highlanders of Scotland, after the rebellion of '45 and the battle of Drummossie Moor in April, 1746, were prohibited from wearing their native dress or playing their native music or speaking their native tongue.

An hon. MEMBER: The government has done that too, as far as the kilts are concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will you listen to the Culloden oath? Probably you have never heard it before but I ask you to listen to it:

I do swear and as I shall answer to God at the great day of judgment, I have not nor shall have in my possession any gun, pistol or arm whatsoever and never use tartan, plaid, nor any part of the Highland garb, and if I do so may I be cursed in my undertakings, family and property. May I never see my wife and children, father, mother or relation. May I be killed in battle as a coward and lie without Christian burial in a strange land far from the graves of my forefathers and kindred—may all this come across me if I break my oath.

Mr. BRYCE: Craigellach.

Mr. MACKENZIE: This is no idle gesture. Here behind me—

An hon. MEMBER: Is a piper.

Mr. MACKENZIE: —is the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). There is on record a ruling of the Court of Session in Scotland—in Edinburgh—in the year 1746, which sentenced a Jacobite named Reid to be hanged for carrying a weapon of war in the form of a set of bagpipes.

Mr. REID: Some would like that today.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course, times have changed. Under the taxation laws of Great Britain, during the recent war, a purchase tax of 100 per cent was put on bagpipes because the government of the day ruled that it was a musical instrument and not a weapon of war.

And now I wish to leave with the house something which, I may say, is not my own, since I am only expressing opinions I have derived from history. I am being very impartial this afternoon, taking both sides of the argument. But there is something here that my friends of the name of Ross must appreciate. This is the most famous declaration of freedom, in my opinion, and I think I have read most of them in the world. Six years after the battle of Bannockburn it was passed by the Scottish parliament, in 1320, and addressed to His Holiness the Pope. There was a demand made that Robert the Bruce, who was then king, should be removed from the kingship of Scotland. I want to quote the last four lines, and those alone, because I think the hon. member for Lake Centre will greatly enjoy them. The pride and the arrogance which this declaration contained, with the great love of liberty, make a wonderful statement:

If this prince should leave the principles he has so nobly pursued, and consent that we, or our kingdom, be subjected to the king or people of England, we shall immediately endeavour to expel him as our enemy, and as the subverter both of his own and our rights, and will make us a king—

Note that, "will make us a king".

—who will defend our liberties; but long as there shall be but one hundred of us remain alive, we will never subject us to the dominion of the English.

These are the last four lines which are worth remembering:

It is not for glory, riches, or honour, that we fight, but for that liberty which no good man will consent to lose but with his life.

That is the Scottish parliament of 1320.

I come across the seas to the dominions. Professor A. Berriedale Keith, in his "Constitutional Law of the British Dominions", at page 91, says:

True to the British tradition—

Let us remember this.

—the dominion constitutions ignore entirely the question of defining the rights to be enjoyed by subjects.

That is by one of the greatest constitutional writers the world has known. If we look back, sir, we shall recall that the greatest right and privilege which the fathers of confederation sought to protect and preserve was that of remaining British subjects. If we hark back to the debates of 1865 we shall find that the great fear which drew the provinces together was that of being swallowed up in the American republic, notwithstanding its famous bill of rights. John A. Macdonald, whose father was born in my own native county of Sutherland in Scotland, and who was one of the greatest Canadians of all time—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. member did not make much use of that relationship.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Well, I am a great admirer of him; I could not be more so if I had met him myself. John A. Macdonald said:

If we are not blind to our present position, we must see the hazardous situation in which all the great interests of Canada stand in respect to the United States.

These were the early days.

I am no alarmist. I do not believe in the prospect of immediate war. . . . Still, we cannot trust to probabilities. The government and legislature would be wanting in their duty to the people if they ran any risk.

Cartier spoke, and he said that——the matter resolved itself into this: either we must obtain British North American confederation or be absorbed in an American confederation.

Listen, please, to this, in the same debate. I am going to leave only one paragraph with you. It is a graphic picture presented by that dour Edinburgh Scotsman, George Brown. He was talking about the historic battles between Britain and France, and about a just settlement in Canada, and these were his words:

Here sit the representatives of the French population discussing in the French tongue whether we shall have it. . . . Here sit the children of the victor and the vanquished, all avowing hearty attachment to the British crown, all earnestly deliberating how we shall best extend the blessings of British institutions.

These were three great men speaking in a great debate.

Now I want to say a very brief word about the essential features of the international bill of rights. In considering the proposed international bill of rights and the position which will be taken by Canada in respect thereto, I believe it is necessary that we should give some thought to the nature of the rights which we seek to protect and conserve. Lord John Russell, that great lover of liberty, notes three kinds of liberty, which I will just mention:

(1) Civil liberty . . . the power of doing that and that only, which is not forbidden by the laws. This definition comprehends the security of person and property.

(2) Personal liberty . . . the power of doing that which in itself is harmless, as speaking or writing, and of which the abuse only is criminal. Religious freedom and eligibility to office may also be comprehended under this head.

(3) Political liberty . . . the acknowledged and legal rights of the people to control their government, or to take a share in it.

Later in the same discussion, which is found in Ernest Rhys' "Growth of Political Liberty", Lord John Russell, while pointing out that civil and personal liberty have existed to a certain degree in despotic states, concludes in these words:

The only efficient remedy against oppression is for the people to retain a share of the supreme power in their own possession. This is called political liberty.

Professor Reginald Trotter—and I am sure you have all read his recent book—in his "Charters of our Freedom" comes to a similar conclusion. He says:

Freedom . . . means many things. Freedom in relation to government and law has two sides, civil liberty and political liberty . . . Experience has shown that without political liberty, civil liberty is in danger.

We feel, sir, that in our British and American systems of democratic parliamentary government we have a good working plan of political liberty. But I feel sure that when the question of fundamental human rights and freedoms comes to be debated by the united nations a school of thought will find expression there which will disagree profoundly with our theory that freedom depends upon our system of political democracy. It may well be, Mr. Speaker—and this is a matter for the committee to consider—that the international bill of rights, when it emerges, will fall far short of that which we as Canadians would consider desirable and even fundamentally necessary. If our conceptions of freedom are in the long run to prevail, the minimal bill of rights which is likely to emerge from the united nations assembly will require many amendments and augmentations in the years to come. For that process of spreading the spirit and the substance of freedom among other peoples we must prepare ourselves by experience, by example and by education.

I recall a speech that I heard delivered by Field Marshal Smuts, when I was a young undergraduate, to the red-gowned students of St. Andrew's university in Scotland. He spoke on freedom:

In the long run only the spirit of international comradeship can solve the problems of freedom and of peace. But in the meantime the supreme cause has to be kept going, and to be safeguarded from all danger, till the coming of a new renaissance of the European spirit.

Just a word to the house, if I may, on the source of freedom. As one delves, as I have delved somewhat in recent months, and as my hon. friend from Lake Centre has delved for some years, into the literature of freedom, one observes two specific approaches to the subject, apparently in direct conflict with each other. One school of thought regards freedom as the state of nature and looks upon all law making as tending to restrict man's natural and original freedom. Algernon Sydney says this:

The liberties of nations are from God and nature, not from kings.

Lord John Russell, probably the greatest apostle of liberty in many centuries, said:

What is called love of liberty means the wish that a man feels to have a voice in the disposal of his own property and in the formation of the laws by which his natural freedom is to be restrained.

The other approach seems to regard each segment of freedom as something wrested from authority.

There was a fine presentation made—and I shall not refer to it in detail at the present time—by Mr. Sandwell, of Toronto Saturday Night in a radio address under the series called "Our Heritage of Freedom", which was conducted some years ago, in which he seemed to take this latter position.

Perhaps in England the peak of this progression to absolutism was reached during the reign of King John. If so, sir, the retrogression from absolution begins with magna carta on the meadows of Runnymede and rounds down from precedent to precedent until we attain the free institutions of which all British people are so proud.

If there is one thing I wish to emphasize, and to repeat time and time again, in so far as British history is concerned—and British history is largely our history, because we derive many of our institutions from them—the greatest charters and declarations which assert and define our liberties have never been regarded as constructive new law but always as the assertion of ancient rights and privileges. That is a very important thing to remember. Thus, where magna carta asserts the rights of every free man to the lawful judgment of his peers, it is the ancient right of trial by jury which is being asserted there. And trial by jury exists among Anglo-Saxons from early days, but no man has been able to trace its beginning or its origin. Similarly the right of habeas corpus, discussed in this House of Commons a year ago, existed long prior to the passage of the Habeas Corpus Act. There is legislation bearing upon it to the days of the Tudors. Once again there is no historical, documentary record of its origin in British law.

When, therefore, we are confronted with proposals to legislate upon the question of human rights, we may with wisdom and propriety pause to consider whether our efforts are likely to result in the broadening of our rights and privileges, or whether perhaps we shall not blunder into the curtailment of them. Thus, sir, if in some statute or constitutional amendment we undertake to embalm and catalogue all the rights of man, and through oversight we omit just one item, it may be open to the courts to decide that because our bill of rights omits this particular thing, no such right exists. Hence in this country, taking its main traditions from two great nations, with its heritage of freedom largely based and founded upon comman law, and with its free democratic political institutions, I suggest that people should scrutinize and analyse closely any proposal to legislate about human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Many of the rights and privileges which we prize highly we do not owe to specific statutes. Rather we owe them to the absence of laws which would prohibit them. In my view it is more important that we should think and talk about freedom than that we should pass legislation in regard to it.

One of the great functions of parliament is the scrutinizing of acts of government—and from the activities of my hon. friends opposite in the last three months, I think that task is being most admirably performed. We of the Liberal party who constitute the present government believe intensely in the value of parliament, in which the grievances of the people may be brought to the light of day and analysed and discussed to the end that remedies may be found.

In a generation, sir, in which there has been for countless millions a greater curtailment of freedom than has been experienced since the barbaric empires of old, nothing is more important than that this parliament should be a forum for expounding the principles of freedom, so that men may learn to value them, and be willing to fight and, if need be, to die for them.

Again I come to that famous speech by Field Marshal Smuts on October 17, 1934. These are his words:

> The fight for human freedom is indeed the supreme issue of the future, as it has always been in the past. The new dictatorship is nothing but the old tyranny writ large. I fear the new tyranny more than I fear the danger of another great war. Tyranny is infectious. As Burke said: it is a weed which grows in all soils, and it is its nature to spread.

When, however, I warn against possible danger in the impulse to put freedom in a straitjacket by seeking to define it in words, I do not necessarily subscribe to the proposition that the present state of the law is perfect.

We had a distinguished Conservative parliamentarian here a few years ago—many of my colleagues will remember him—in the person of C. H. Cahan, who was a brilliant constitutional lawyer, although a profound philosophic pessimist. He made a most remarkable address in the series of broadcasts known as "Our Heritage of Freedom", one paragraph of which was in these words:

> Law has been contemptuously called the governing of the living by the dead. But we can never escape from our historic continuity with the past. It is inevitable that the past should govern the present; but the present is only the passing moment, and each succeeding generation makes its own contribution, however meagre, to the living growth of law.

It is a good thing that we of this generation should also seek to make our contribution as heirs to the common law. Perhaps our greatest contribution can be made in directing men's minds to the study of the essential principles of freedom. Let us engrave its great principle upon our monuments of marble and stone. Let us preach them from our pulpits and thunder them in the columns of our free press. Let us debate them in our deliberative assemblies until the eternal verities are enshrined in the hearts of men. But let us not delude ourselves that freedom can be created out of perishable pieces of parchment. Freedom is not a code of man-made laws. Freedom lives and abides and endures in the spirit and the soul of man.

I am going to ask the indulgence of the house—I am sorry I am speaking so long—to tell them something of my own personal experience in obtaining a bill of rights in Canada. It will be very brief. As the house knows, I was born overseas in Scotland. I came to Canada, arriving in Halifax in 1914. I did not know a soul in that beautiful city. I waited for the cushionless upper of the colonist train which was to take me over the long seven-day trail to Vancouver. I passed through all the provinces of Canada except one, Prince Edward Island. I knew something of the history of that grand island. Although I had to pass them by, I knew that I got my bill of rights from Prince Edward Island.

I went through Nova Scotia. I knew something of the history of Nova Scotia. I knew how Sir William Alexander got a charter in 1621 and how the barons of Nova Scotia were enabled to become barons when the esplanade of that old castle at Edinburgh was declared to be part of Nova Scotia so that they could take titles to their lands. I remembered about the arrival of the Hector from my native county in 1773 in Pictou harbour, where my good friend, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch) lives. I remembered how Norman Macleod came from the same place in 1817 and lived there for thirty-one years before he went to Australia and New Zealand. I felt that Nova Scotia had given me a bill of rights.

Then I went through New Brunswick, that glorious province, probably one of the most beautiful in Canada. I knew of the loyalists who had sacrificed much to keep a deathless devotion to their sovereign. They were the forebears of magnificent people. I felt that I had a bill of rights from New Brunswick.

Then I came up to old Quebec where I saw the glorious St. Lawrence. I remembered in my wistful reflections how Jacques Cartier had left St. Malo in April, 1534, and how Champlain came first of all to New Brunswick and then to Quebec with his missionaries, nursing sisters, pioneers and explorers. I remembered how for one hundred and fifty years they had given us in Canada the type of settlement and government which makes it possible for us to be here in this House of Commons today. I felt that I had a bill of rights from the province of Quebec.

Then I came past this building here as a humble immigrant, never dreaming that I would be debating in this house some day with the hon. member for Lake Centre. I thought of Galt and Guelph, and I thought of Goderich, Seaforth, Huron, the Yorks and Carleton. I thought of the grand history of the Scotch people of Ontario. I went up the shores of lake Superior and I felt that Ontario had given me a bill of rights.

Then I came to Manitoba, the Red river. I saw the great country there. I remembered how it was peopled from my shire, from my county who had made up the Selkirk settlers. I remembered how there had been women with children in their arms, how other stout-hearted women had borne children in the ice and snow. They went to the Red river and through a willingness to sacrifice and to shed blood and sweat, to fight frost and storm, they held that northwest for the British crown.

Then I came to the spacious reaches of Saskatchewan where the old pioneers opened up the country far up into the northern stretches of that grand province. Many people of my race were there. I have not the time to describe all these Highlands splendid people, but I felt that I had received my bill of rights.

An hon. MEMBER: Not many C.C.F.'s at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course I am not making a political speech. Incidentally I believe that the mother of the hon. member for Lake Centre was sprung from one of the old Selkirk pioneers. Then I came up to Calgary and the foothills and I went down that famous stretch from Calgary to Banff, one of the most famous in the country. Alberta is a province full of education, full of religion and full of changing political ideas. I came down to Banff and that bastion of grandeur of the Rockies and its eternal sentinels of hills. Then I came to Golden, which is the real entrance to British Columbia. What a wonderful name for an entrance to a province —Golden. Then down to Revelstoke, Kam-loops and Lillooet where Pauline Johnson, the great Indian poetess, wrote her famous poem, "The Trail to Lillooet":

Sob of fall, and song of forest, come you here on haunting quest,
Calling through the seas and silence, from God's country of the west.
Where the mountain pass is narrow, and the torrent white and strong,
Down its rocky-throated cañon, sings its golden-throated song.

Then to Vancouver, the queen of them all in Canada, queen of the Pacific coast. I come now, I know to the great relief of the house, to a summary and conclusion of what was intended to be an entirely neutral presentation of this question. Our confederation of four provinces was formed upon the basis of the British North America Act. That is our constitution, and our bill of rights, especially the bill of rights of the provinces now numbering nine. Canada has its charters of liberty, beginning with the Quebec Act guaranteeing the sacred rights of language and religion. Imbedded in Canadian rights are the rights of minorities. The rights of the provinces are clearly laid down in section 92 of the British North America Act and sustained in countless decisions of the privy council. Canada has her maritime rights, her prairie rights, her Pacific rights, her Ontario rights, her Quebec rights; of course they are there. Our rights in a federal state are such as are agreed upon by cooperation and consent.

Who gave us these rights in Canada? First the reformers of 1837, William Lyon Mackenzie and Papineau in their struggle for responsible government. Secondly the fathers of confederation, Macdonald, Cartier, Brown, Tupper, Howe and McGee. It was they who gave to the people of Canada their "dominion from sea to sea". It was they who laid the foundations of this nation and "builded better than they knew". Thirdly, Mr. Speaker, rounding down from precedent to precedent, Mackenzie, the stone mason of Sarnia; Laurier, the knight of the white plume; Sir Robert Borden, with the big booming voice like the breakers on Nova Scotia shores, and our beloved leader of the present hour, Mackenzie King—all these gave greatness and stature to the nation which the founders had established.

World recognition of Canada's stature was won by the achievements of our fighting men in the first great war. Legal sanction to the accomplished fact was recorded in the historic language of the statute of Westminster, the preamble of which made clear that the principles of the statute were merely in accord with the established constitutional position of all the members of the commonwealth in relation to one another.

The statute of Westminster confirmed the free association of the members of the British commonwealth of nations.

Once again in the second great war our knights of the battle clouds, our sailors on the embattled seas, our soldiers on the battlefields of Sicily, Italy, France, Belgium and Holland, supported by the united efforts of this arsenal of the empire, this aerodrome of the united nations, raised Canada to the status of one of the world's great powers.

This new power and authority which accrued to Canada through her military and economic might was not the result of the seeking after glory or the desire to impose her will upon others. Whole-heartedly Canada subscribed to the charter of the united nations, whose high purposes are succinctly stated in articles 55 and 56. May I be permitted to quote them, because they are the kernel of this whole debate:

55. With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the united nations shall promote:

(a) higher standards of living, full employment and conditions of economic and social progress and development;

(b) solutions of international economic, social, health and related problems; and international cultural and educational cooperation; and

(c) universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

56. All members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in article 55.

Here the united nations gave concrete expression to the ideal placed before the world by President Roosevelt in his four freedoms, and I think it might be well for us all to recall that marvellous voice over the air:

1. The first is freedom of speech and expression everywhere in the world.

2. The second is freedom of every person to worship God in his own way, everywhere in the world.

3. The third is freedom from want, which translated into world terms, means economic understandings which will secure to every nation a healthy peace time life for its inhabitants everywhere in the world.

4. The fourth is freedom from fear, which, translated into world terms, means a world-wide reduction of armaments to such a point and in such a thorough fashion that no nation will be in a position to commit an act of physical aggression against any neighbour anywhere in the world.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it is well that Canada should play her part in drafting and proclaiming to the world an international bill of rights as a guide and a direction post for the freedom-loving peoples of the world. It is less evident that Canada, free Canada, heir to the common law, should tamper with her heritage of liberty by seeking to inscribe in statutes the freedom that is inherently ours.

My personal conception, and it is not necessarily that of my colleagues but it is my own, is that we need, far more than a bill of rights, a bill of duties for our people. What would they be? Loyalty to this grand Canadian land in every single province, and loyalty to our sovereign. The second would be comradeship, the essence of comradeship among the one and quarter millions who have come back from fighting the war and saving freedom for us in Canada. The third would be unity, unity between the dominion and the provinces, unity between capital and labour, unity between provincial and federal authorities, unity between Canada and other freedom-loving countries. For the fourth, go down there and read the inscription on the national memorial, "Without peace there can be no enduring freedom; without freedom there can be no enduring peace" for your children who will be the leaders of Canada tomorrow. The duty and responsibility of this House of Commons of Canada is to lay deep and true and steadfast the foundations of a just and abiding and enduring peace for Canada. And the last one, and I trust I may not be termed irreverent, would be the application of the golden rule, the preservation in the Dominion of Canada of the eternal principles of Christianity as laid down in the sermon on the mount.

Not only are there the duties of the state to its citizens but there are the duties of the citizen to the state. The liberty of the subject is possible only within the security of the nation. Personal liberties are the treasured nurslings of liberalism. But national security, the security of the nation, against aggression, against sabotage, against treason, these are sacred trusts indeed, and they are in our keeping in this parliament of Canada. It was for these that our gallant youth fought on the seven seas, on distant battlefields, and amid the scudding clouds.

Let us by tolerance, by prudence, by patience, by mutual understanding build, ever higher and wider, our national structure of freedom, the expression of the very soul and spirit of our Canadian people.

Canada has never been behind in asserting her willingness to defend the right as God gave her to see the right. Let us carry on in peace as in war, in the spirit of service to humanity. The stern sense of duty which led Canada into the forefront of the battle for freedom found expression in the development of our own land. The hardy pioneers conquered the wilderness, laid low the forests and brought the plains into fertility. Let us be worthy of these gallant settlers of long ago and their great deeds. Let us recall them in the inspiring words of a great Canadian, John Willison:

> O generous land, O mighty inspiration
> That floods the morning of the world to be;
> Thy people are the builders of a nation
> Lofty, benignant, free.

Mr. McLURE: I rise to a point of order, or probably on a question of privilege. I hate to do so after listening to such a wonderful address this afternoon. But with reference to the government's motion, I have an objection that I have taken on several other occasions on similar motions. After all the talk on freedom, I find that one province, Prince Edward Island, has no representation on the committee. All other provinces are fully represented. I wish my point of order to be brought to the attention of the leader of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Thank you.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): No one could be other than deeply moved by the address to which the house has listened. No one could be other than deeply moved by the oratory displayed by my hon. friend. After all, oratory is the expression of those things that move one's emotions, coupled with the diction which all of us must congratulate the minister on possessing.

Since I cannot hope to emulate him, possibly in some things that I shall say I may perchance bring back the house from the cathedral of devotion to which my hon. friend brought it, to a practical consideration of the freedoms which recent years have shown, while the heritage of our people, have too frequently not been observed in our country.

My right hon. friend has spoken of freedom as something that is not a parchment; that parliament should become the forum for the declaration of the principles of freedom. If I understood him aright, while he asked the nations of the earth to agree, and Canada to take her place with the nations of the earth in the formulation of a great charter of world liberties, he frowned on the necessity of there being a declaration on the part of this parliament of liberties for the people within the dominion.

On a subject such as this I realize that our aim must be as far as possible to refrain from anything that might be considered partisan, and so I shall, but, before I am through, I shall have to point out some instances in this dominion which reveal that the great principles of magna carta, the Bill of Rights, the Petition of Rights and habeas corpus have been departed from in our country, have been departed from by the government across the way in such a manner that, while in theory our freedoms remain, in actuality the right of the individual to the assertion of those freedoms in the courts of our land has been denied.

First, sir, I shall deal with the international freedom bill of rights, if I may call it such, and I summarize the necessity for that bill of rights in the words recently used by Mr. Shotwell, president of the Carnegie endowment:

> The effort to safeguard human rights is, in my opinion, the most fundamental of all international movements today, and also the most difficult to achieve. This judgment runs counter to popular opinion because a movement to eliminate oppression is by no means as pressing and immediate as that to eliminate war. But the menace of war cannot be removed from human affairs so long as life and liberty are imperiled by arbitrary power. The purpose of international organization must therefore be something more than a direct attack on war itself, it must reach into the processes of peace to make sure that no subtle poison is being distilled to make the resort to force seem an escape from greater ills. Thus the two central problems of international relations, the guarantee of peace and the provision for human rights, are the realities behind the confusion in international affairs today.

The minister gave us a panorama of the freedoms that we enjoy as Canadians as our heritage by reason of our being within the empire. Freedom is difficult of definition. International freedom is difficult of interpretation. International law, as the years go by, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) will admit, has changed with changing conditions. International law progresses as man's conscience demands it shall progress. International law has made advances. Only the other day I was reading Grotius and Sir Francis Bacon. These two great internationalists took the point of view that war was justified anywhere in the world, provided it was against anyone or any nation professing other than the Christian faith. Freedom of religion was not appreciated. The English nobles at Runnymede endeavoured to enunciate principles of freedom as against the king. They enunciated, too, the first known declaration of religious freedom. For the first time the Jew was entitled—and I shall not read the sections; they are sections 10 and 11—to do business in England. The minister stated that the great principles were not lived up to, and that is true. Within fifty-five years after magna carta, the Jewish race was driven from England.

As I agree that although parliament can make charters, the nation can only achieve what is in those charters if the heart and soul of man demands the achievement of those ideals. I realize that you cannot make mankind good by legislation, but on the other hand, by legislation you can set out the ideals to which you wish men to attain. At the present time we are endeavouring internationally to set out a new set of responsibilities and duties of one nation to another under the rule of law. Declarations regarding freedom do not assure the practice of freedom; unless the right remains for the individual or the nation to have his or its rights established under law, they are but pious declarations.

Internationally we are endeavouring by easy steps, by difficult faltering steps to secure adherence to the rule of law everywhere in the world. The pathway to the future is indicated in the charter of the united nations. The united nations are striving to ensure freedom of worship and of expression, freedom from fear and want throughout the world, these being the minima of man's quest to assure and maintain the dignity of the human personality. There can be no freedom internationally without international order, nor can there be any international order unless there is freedom among the nations internationally.

Those of us who hope for the achievement of the rule of law realize the difficulties facing the united nations today. That idea can never be achieved as long as a wrongdoer among the nations has the right to veto any measures being taken to bring it under the rule of law. How long within our own country would justice prevail if wrongdoers nationally were permitted to decide whether or not for their wrongdoing they would submit themselves to punishment by the courts of the land?

As regards an international bill of rights, there have been approximately one thousand recommendations submitted to the united nations committee. Concrete declarations have been made by Professor Lauterpacht of Cambridge university, by the American Bar Association, and many others. A few years ago there was a declaration in Great Britain by Lord Sankey with regard to a bill of human rights. Lately the text was drafted by the executive committee of the Committee on Human Rights. These have been drafts of rights to assure peace in the world, and no one today argues against this principle that an international bill of rights is necessary if the united nations are to discharge their tremendous task.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I interrupt my hon. friend. I believe there is one before the House of Lords by Lord Reading.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. Lord Reading, son of the Marquis of Reading, finding the constitution in the United Kingdom today such that there have been interferences with the rights of the individual in Britain, has introduced in the House of Lords a bill of rights to cover many invasions of the kind that have taken place here in Canada.

An international bill of rights will deal with the political and economic liberty of men, with human equality, without regard to race, colour or creed. It will deal with social security everywhere in the world, because man today is beginning to realize internationally that war will result so long as the world is divided between those who enjoy a high measure of social security and those who do not.

The united nations is endeavouring to set up rights elementary in their terms, an expression of hope to all parts of the world. I welcome a committee being set up by this parliament for the purpose of having Canadians make their recommendations in order to render effective a bill of rights internationally, to be patterned in the spirit of our time.

Every one of these drafts before me seeks to establish international justice under law, international understanding and, above all, international tolerance, to which my right hon. friend referred so eloquently this afternoon. They seek to embody the principles of the great charters of Britain as well as the bill of rights of the United States. But, as my right hon. friend pointed out, an international bill of rights will not be sufficient to establish and assure rights in our country, having regard to the fact that under our system we believe that politically we have achieved a high degree of democracy. With sixty nations required to agree in order to bring about an international bill of rights, it is obvious that such a bill of rights can never assure the rights that we in our country want to establish for our people.

So far as the resolution is concerned, dealing with an international bill of rights, it has our support. I come then to the second part dealing with the establishment, or consideration for the establishment of a bill of rights for Canada, which reads:

> . . . what steps, if any, would it be advisable to take or to recommend for the purpose of preserving in Canada respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

I was disappointed at the stand taken by my right hon. friend. Instead of allowing the committee to determine its course in this regard—and when he speaks he must speak for the government—he left me with the impression that, as far as he was concerned, he was opposed to the establishment of a bill of rights for our country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not necessarily, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, that is the interpretation I placed on his words. Perhaps I might put it this way. My right hon. friend displayed less enthusiasm for a national bill of rights than he did for one internationally. In one breath he said we must have an international bill of rights to determine our rights, and, in the next, that nationally the establishment of a bill of rights or a declaration by parchment would not assure the perpetuation of the freedoms we ask for.

Last year, when he spoke in this house on May 13, as reported at page 1478 of Hansard, he left me with the idea that he was going to support a bill of rights. He said:

> May I say to my hon. friend that the place for that—

That is, the bill of rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, the declaration of rights.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

> —is not in connection with this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Did I not say "declaration of rights"?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, but I have no doubt that is what my hon. friend meant. Continuing:

> . . . the place for it is in those terms which may be brought to reality in a year or so from now, terms which would contain a joint declaration of this parliament and sent, if necessary, for such comment as might be made upon them to the provinces of Canada. And thereby may I say with the greatest possible respect for my hon. friend, whom I deeply respect, that we shall be worthy of the traditions of this great country of ours, and worthy of the great principles of freedom of the various provinces, and so build a charter worthy of the future of this nation which we all jointly love.

That was the declaration last year, and it is far removed, as I understand it, from the statement made now by my hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to hear that. I realized last year, when I drafted that amendment to the Citizenship Act, that it could not have a place in that act, but I submitted the amendment with a view to securing a discussion on that subject. I achieved the purpose sought, because public opinion across this country is asking parliament to bring in a bill of rights, a charter of Canadian freedoms. Within the last three weeks a petition has been signed by 501,000 people—and it will shortly be presented to this parliament—asking that consideration be given to the assurance of the maintenance of the great freedoms. I realize the difficulties under the British North America Act and the division of powers as between the dominion and the provinces. It was for that reason that I suggested, and now suggest, that, when this committee is set up, representatives from the various provinces be convened here, so that by joint action a comprehensive bill of rights may be evolved either by way of constitutional amendment or by statute.

When this session opened I placed a resolution on the order paper; but private members' days have been, to all intents and purposes, non-existent this session, and the resolution will not come up for discussion. I drafted a bill of rights in order to give a lead in this regard so that a committee would have something upon which to base discussion of the subject, but I did not introduce it because of my desire to secure joint action on the part of all parties in this house. This is not a political or partisan matter. It is one that, in order that success may be achieved, must have the support and cooperation of hon. members in all parts of this house and of the provinces of this dominion. The bill of rights I had drafted would have provided the assurance to Canadians, without regard to race or creed, of the following freedoms:

1. Freedom of religion.
2. Freedom of speech.
3. Freedom of assembly.
4. Freedom from wrongful interference by the state; and by that I mean freedom from unreasonable interference with person, home, reputation, activities and property of the individual.
5. Freedom from arbitrary detention and in particular that habeas corpus shall not be suspended or abrogated except by parliament.
6. The right of everyone to have his case determined without undue delay and assuring everyone required to give evidence before any tribunal or commission the preservation of all constitutional safeguards and, above all, the right of the individual to be represented by counsel.

My right hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs shakes his head. In Great Britain the Marquis of Reading has introduced a bill of rights, and that is one of the things which he demands, without which there cannot be freedom. There would also be provided:

7. The right of equal protection for all against arbitrary discrimination in the provisions and applications of law because of race, religion or any other reason.

Those were the political freedoms that I would have placed in a bill of rights. In addition to those, there would, of course, be social freedoms, if I may call them such, assuring educational, property and social security rights.

My right hon. friend says that the great danger in listing rights is that if you do not list every one of them the court might, in its wisdom, determine that because a certain right had been omitted, therefore that right is non-existent. That was why in the United States bill of rights a saving clause was added —which we would have to have added to any bill of rights established in this country—as follows:

The enumeration of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

My right hon. friend says we have these rights without a bill of rights. He traced the great charters of freedom. He referred to the Quebec Act and the Constitutional Act. He told of the great crusade by William Lyon Mackenzie and Louis Papineau in 1837 for constitutional government. He omitted the Act of Union in 1841. He referred, of course, to the British North America Act. It is interesting to read what happened when the Quebec Act was introduced in the House of Lords by Lord Mansfield in 1775. It was opposed in the House of Lords by many because of the fact that it would deny the right of habeas corpus and would permit lettres de cachet to be carried over into this new country, and would deny trial by jury. That was the reason for the opposition, and it is interesting as one looks ahead from 1775 to 1945 to the temporary establishment in our country of a procedure akin to lettres de cachet. It was a prediction and a fear expressed in 1775 which finally had its culmination in 1945. My right hon. friend said, "What could a bill of rights do? Have we not our rights?" Yes, we have our political rights curtailing the authority of the crown. My right hon. friend said words to this effect "What did magna carta do? Was it not departed from? It was, when the king became supreme over the courts of the land. It was departed from in the days of the star chamber when men were tried behind closed doors. The star chamber was effective. It got better results than the espionage commission in 1945. There were not so many acquittals in the star chamber as there were in the courts of this country after the espionage commission had met.

What would a bill of rights do? It would assert the right of the individual to go into the courts of this country, thereby assuring the preservation of his freedoms. These great traditional rights are merely pious ejaculations unless the individual has the right to assert them in the courts of law.

A bill of rights would be a contract between the individuals of Canada and the government of Canada. It would assert the right of the individual; it would assert the right of a minority to be protected in the exercise of its rights, against the majority. It would, above all, assure that each of us would have a legal right to be heard in the courts of this country.

We have political rights; what about the individual rights? After all, denying the individual his rights denies freedom. Our British heritage gave us our national freedoms. Our individual freedoms are maintainable only at the caprice of the government of the day. If we acknowledge the right of a government to declare the non-existence of these freedoms, while at the same time the great charters proclaim their existence, we deny those freedoms unless we permit the aggrieved individual recourse to the courts.

The difference between democratic government and authoritarian government is this, that, while democracy gives rights of the individual against the state, authoritarianism annihilates the rights of the individual. Democracy enthrones the sacredness of human dignity, while authoritarianism enthrones the power of the state.

A bill of rights must declare for this country a government of laws, not of men. And only under a government of laws can there be a full development of the human personality.

The history of our times shows that civil liberties have been seriously curtailed within the last generation. The fathers of confederation had no fear in 1867 that these rights would ever be curtailed. That is why they did not incorporate them in the British North America Act. If one reads the discussions which took place at Charlottetown and Quebec, this fact emerges, namely the acceptance on the part of the fathers of confederation of the certainty of the preservation of their individual liberties, without the necessity for their declaration.

All governments are responsible for the diminution of the freedoms. New conditions have developed. The assumption of new functions on the part of the state demands, if I may use my right hon. friend's expression, new landmarks to define the boundaries of liberty, and to restate the traditional rights of democracy. Laws and institutions must change with natural evolution. Our constitutional concepts alter.

There are some who are afraid of change, because they look on the past with unelastic reverence. I was interested the other day to hear the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) introduce a motion to do away with appeals to the privy council, one of our landmarks. A few days later, the premier of Saskatchewan announced that he was not satisfied with a decision by the Supreme Court of Canada, so that, in the endeavour to secure justice for the province of Saskatchewan, an appeal to the privy council was to be launched.

Mr. COLDWELL: So long as the right is there, why not take it, if you have a chance of winning?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will not argue that. But in addition to the right, there must also have been a hope that there would be a change, because surely no province would expend the fees necessary to go to the privy council unless it hoped that the Supreme Court of Canada would be declared wrong in the decision it had made.

Mr. COLDWELL: Hope springs eternal in the human breast.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And the hope is there only when there are those who believe that wrong has been done, and that a higher court will reverse the wrong.

My right hon. friend dealt with the battles for freedom fought by his highland ancestors, and in doing so resorted to all the eloquence that tradition could impart to his words. But he said nothing about the necessity of fighting for freedom today.

Freedom today must be fought for, as it was in the past. Freedom is indivisible; there cannot be fractional freedom in our country. When the state is supreme over the individual, then every person must be prepared to act on instructions from the state. Then personal freedom ends. History shows that if the state plans and provides for the individual, the state must have an unchallengeable right to direct the individual as to where he must go and what he must do. And when that is done, freedom ends.

My right hon. friend said that a portion of the Declaration of Independence was not in accordance with fact in that the doctrine that men are born free is a fallacy. Men are born to be free; they are not born free. Freedom does not mean the altering of regulations. It implies rules; it implies regulations.

My right hon. friend dealt with the various acts in Great Britain. As I have already pointed out, those acts and those charters did not establish the rights of the individual. They restricted the sovereign power of the state. He quoted Alexander Hamilton. It is most interesting to read the debate which took place at that time between Alexander Hamilton on one side and Thomas Jefferson on the other, when the United States bill of rights was being established.

Alexander Hamilton took the view that I thought my right hon. friend took. He used these words:

> I go further and affirm that bills of rights in the sense and to the extent in which they are contended for are not only unnecessary in the proposed constitution, but would even be dangerous. They would contain various exceptions to powers not granted, and on this very account would afford a colourable pretext to claim more than were granted. For why declare that things shall not be done which there is no power to do? Why, for instance—

Said Hamilton,

> —should it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed?

I thought the tenor of those remarks found expression in the address of my right hon. friend.

On the other hand, Thomas Jefferson, realizing that a federal union was being set up and that the rights of the individual had not been assured under the British charters of freedom, used these words:

> A bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular; and what no just government should refuse or rest on inference.

Answering what my right hon. friend said, that there is no need for a bill of rights as our freedoms are established, I would quote with approval Mr. Bernard K. Sandwell, as follows:

> The famous declarations of liberty in England, the Magna Carta and the bill of rights, have no binding effect upon the British parliament or upon the dominion parliaments upon which its powers have devolved in the respective dominions. Canadians learned with something of a shock a short time ago that their parliament, according to an express decision of the privy council, has power to send into exile and to strip of their property any Canadian citizen whom it elects so to treat; it can probably do so only by declaring an emergency to exist, but it can make its own emergency and the exile does not have to be connected with the emergency nor does it terminate when the emergency is over.

I am not going to deal with the emergency doctrine today, because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) is not in his place at the moment. Mr. Sandwell sets out the fact that all government has to do today is to have a majority in parliament in order to declare an emergency, and the individual freedoms that are interfered with in consequence may then be denied. Whatever an international bill of rights may do for Canada as far as I can see it cannot detract from the necessity of one for our own country. We have taken our liberties for granted as Mr. Sandwell says in that article; but events of recent years have shown that they can be lost by apathy. The answer through the years by those in authority to those who would uphold freedom is to the effect that, "I have heard those same arguments before." Charles I directed those very words to John Hampden in 1628.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He lost his head.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was 300 years ago; yet the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs resurrected them in this house some two weeks ago in answer to a speech I had made regarding freedom. You may ask me, "Where have our rights been interfered with?" I am going to mention a few instances. What about freedom of religion? We find interference with that right under the guise of its being a provincial right. Those whose rights are interfered with, if freedom of religion be one of our charter rights, should have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada to have their rights preserved and their freedoms maintained. They have not that right. I am going to ask the Minister of Justice to bring in an amendment to the Supreme Court Act to provide that when anyone has his freedom interfered with, by leave of the supreme court when he has shown to a judge of that court that there has been such interference, there shall be the right of that individual to appeal to that court. After all, if our freedoms mean anything they mean the right and the heritage of every Canadian. They are not circumscribed by territorial or other considerations.

There has been the interference with the right of freedom of the press. There was interference with the press where the press was directed what it should publish and when it should publish. When my right hon. friend says that jurisdiction to restrict the freedoms rests with the provinces I ask him to read the judgment of the supreme court in 1938 in connection with the submission regarding the Alberta press law.

Have we our freedoms when the state by order can provide for the deportation of Canadians whose only offence is their colour? Have we freedom on the part of the individual when in these days the crown's power increases and crown officials have clothed themselves with impugnity from challenge by the courts. How many of our officials may interfere with the individual's economic freedom without there being any right on the part of that individual to appeal to the courts because discretion has been exercised by that official? Does that not deny those principles of Magna Carta quoted by my right hon. friend:

To no man will we deny, to no man will we delay, to no man will we sell justice or right.

If we are to maintain freedom on the part of the individual I submit that we must grant to the individual in this country the right to appeal against the jeopardy of his rights which follows closed hearings by boards and officials. British constitutional safeguards were designed to limit the absolute power of the monarch, but they do not protect the personal liberties of the individual when challenged by the state.

A bill of rights today would be a declaration delineating the field of liberty that must be reserved to the individual against continuing invasion on the part of the state. One of the first principles of freedom is that a man shall not be a judge in his own case. How many times has that been departed from within recent years when under order in council, yes, under statute as well, recourse to the courts is denied against the caprice of an order of an administrative official? We have to bring our freedoms up to date when we live in a period where the government is going into business on an ever-increasing scale, and yet the archaic proposition remains that the individual shall have no right to proceed against the state except with the consent of the state, thereby denying the principle stated by Sir Frederick Pollock that Magna Carta established that "the king is and shall be below the law".

One of my hon. friends to my right has mentioned that there is a bill of rights in Saskatchewan. Yes, but the state bill remains supreme and is above the law courts of the country under that bill of rights in so far as the right of the individual is concerned to proceed for the invasion and infringement of his rights by the state. During the war and since, parliament went on a legislative vacation, and executive order in council is taking the place of what my right hon. friend described as a free and unfettered parliament, to such an extent that only the day before yesterday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) quite frankly admitted that he was unaware of an order in council which determines the rights of Canadians to the extent of millions of dollars, although it had been passed on the 17th of April last. Many orders in council still deny to the individual the right of recourse to the courts. Power in a state or in a state official without accountability to the courts permits of unequal laws being applied, and consequent injustice. Parliament has placed the power in the hands of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) to determine as between individuals who shall be subject to the law and who shall not. In some statutes we have denied the principle that the rule of law must apply equally to all in our country.

You might ask, is freedom of speech interfered with or freedom of the radio? I am not going to deal with that matter this afternoon except to say this, that those freedoms are in danger when you have a public radio system and private radio stations, often operating in competition with one another, and when the right to determine disputes between them rests with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is both judge and litigant. It judges its own case. That is an example of the denial of private rights and a danger potentially to freedom of speech in our country.

Mr. JACKMAN: It can make its own laws.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And what about freedom of the press? I realize the circumstances under which the section went into the broadcasting act giving the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the right to publish newspapers or periodicals. The statute was passed before we entered a period in our history when we were about to have a facsimile newspaper issued as a result of a broadcast over a frequency modulation network many hundreds of miles away.

Mr. HACKETT: The weeklies were suppressed for a whole fortnight in England a short time ago.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. We have established in this country an ever-widening system of government information agencies, ever expanding in their output rather than receding, and however unintentionally those in authority would have it, the power rests there of controlling or moulding, by government propaganda, the thought and the thinking of individuals in our country. What about freedom of speech? A case where freedom of speech was interfered with during the war comes to mind, and the government had to recede from the position it took. That was in the prosecution of George Drew when he spoke, and spoke truly, in regard to Hong Kong. I remember, too, on June 22, 1943, after Miss Agnes MacPhail, a former member of this house, had spoken against the judiciary, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs made this statement in the house:

I shall direct the attention of the censors to this dispatch, and see if arrangements cannot be made that publicity will not in future be available for matters of this kind.

That was during the period of the war when rights were interfered with in the interests of the safety of the state, but to criticize the judiciary could, by no standard that I know of, interfere with or disrupt our nation.

I come down to 1945. The emergency powers bill was introduced in November, 1945, when an all-powerful executive was reaching out for still greater powers and asked to give to the executive the power by order in council to deport Canadians without trial and to revoke their nationality without appeal. Parliament opposed that, but it is indicative of a trend that is taking place when the power of the state continues to expand without accountability to the courts.

I come down to a more recent example, and that is in connection with the espionage commission set up under order in council passed on October 6, 1945. No one today would say that there was not in that order in council a cavalier disregard of great and basic constitutional liberties, of those liberties which my right hon. friend says are guaranteed to all our people under the charter of British peoples. Under that order in council habeas corpus was swept aside by the simple subterfuge of averring that each man held thereunder was presumed to have been in lawful custody.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): But they were spies.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Of the fifteen who were held eight have been acquitted by the courts of this land.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Seven were spies.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does my hon. friend believe that we should have one law for the good and a different law for the bad? That order in council was a denial of those basic principles which we cherish. Liberty under law was denied and coercion and interrogation resorted to in order to translate suspicion into proof. The individual was denied the right to counsel. The Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that that was not very serious. Let me point out that every one of these international bills of rights which are to be in effect in British countries, in the United States, in Russia, in France and in China, declares in favour of the right of an individual to be represented by counsel and to be protected in his person from arbitrary interference or arbitrary detention and arrest, and above all, they prevent the denial of the right of the individual to test the legality of his detention. Fifteen were declared to be guilty by the royal commission and subsequent events proved that the commission was about sixty per cent wrong. That royal commission impaired or tends to impair respect for the judiciary. By the publication of the report it did irreparable harm to those whose names were mentioned before the trials, in that it said they were guilty before they were tried. It is doing irreparable harm today to individuals who have been found not guilty, and the government has seen fit to add an addendum to the report in these words, words that smack of persecution. These are the words:

> It must not be assumed that in any case the evidence before the commission and that adduced at the criminal proceedings were the same.

I abhor communism and all its works, but the added words signify an attitude that no government should display. They indicate a spirit of resentment because the courts of the country saw fit not to follow the declaration of a royal commission.

Canadians have the right not to be deprived of life, liberty or property without process of law. Should they not also have the right not to be deprived of reputations by an executive that is exasperated by the results in the courts? That addendum by the government condones the lawless enforcement of the law.

I am not going to deal any further with the matter at this time. Is there any outstanding constitutional writer who has approved what was done? The other day the Secretary of State for External Affairs called as his witness Professor Lower as an answer to me when I deprecated the possession of tremendous powers by the executive. He said, "What did Professor Lower say?" He quoted from the look, "From Colony to Nation", but Professor Lower wrote another article after the completion of the book, and I have that article here. It was published in the "Fortnightly Law Journal" on March 1, 1947. I am not going to call as a witness anyone who has not been accepted as a witness by the government, but Professor Lower who has. I am reading from page 2:

> Certainly government will now have a hard time convincing people that the safety of the state was endangered by the actions of a few misguided spies.

Listen to these words coming from an authority which the Secretary of State for External Affairs produced as a witness to demolish me a few days ago:

> The conduct of government, from Prime Minister to royal commission, over the espionage case, bore every appearance of hysteria, when it did not bear the appearance, as unfortunately in certain quarters it did, of sheer persecution.

A little later on he asks:

> Do we need a bill of rights in Canada?

He says:

It would seem obvious that the arbitrary experiences of the past few years have shaken our historical position of freedom, and yet the head of the government which has been in power during this period not long ago, could make a ringing declaration (over the air) in favour of liberty just as if the whole structure were as unharmed as in the days of his youth.

It is not unfair to characterize this as unawareness of the social process.

A little later on, he says:

The simple truth seems to be that there are always men in places of authority who prefer short-cuts, who are timorous and therefore avail themselves of power, who are impatient of parliamentary methods, who wish "to get things done" or who, by reason of something within themselves, some instinct for power, some egotism, actually desire to bring in authoritarian methods.

I could continue. He becomes even stronger as he proceeds. Finally, he ends up in support of the necessity of a bill of rights. He says:

The modern state has behind it a power not possessed by the Stuarts; a state police of whose conduct the ordinary citizen is unaware, just as he is unaware of the ideas which govern those who are in control of it. Such men may be in every respect estimable. They may be liberty-loving citizens. Or they may be obsessed with desire for power. They may, as police, feel the necessity for results overruling the stumbling methods of freedom. Whatever they may be, the citizen does not know their nature or their methods. All he can be sure of is that power "grows with that it feeds on."

Then he continues in effect to say that unless something is done in this connection to establish a bill of rights for Canada the state will continue to expand to the detriment of the rights and the freedoms of the individual irrespective of the terms of the charters.

I have a few suggestions to make. The first one is that this committee should consider the advisability of the repeal of the War Measures Act which has been on the statute books since 1914. In between the first and the second wars, on several occasions in the House of Commons a declaration was made that it was no longer in effect. That act, standing as it does, constitutes an invitation to any government in the future under the emergency theory to declare an emergency to the detriment of the rights of our people.

Mr. RINFRET: Who passed it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It was passed by the Sir Robert Borden government in 1914.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. MACKENZIE: A very necessary act, too.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My right hon. friend says it was a very necessary act. It was necessary in the period of the war; but in the days of peace, with the challenge that the state is making to the rights of the individual, Professor Lower supports the stand that I take, namely, that the act should be repealed.

My second suggestion is that the Official Secrets Act be considered by the committee in order to remove some of the present presumptions of guilt which deny an innocent person his full rights of defence. I suggest that the Public Inquiries Act, which was made such use of by the espionage commission, should be revamped, to the end that no longer shall the power rest in the hands of the state to bring an individual before a commission meeting behind closed doors, to hold him there and interrogate him with a view to self-incrimination, while denying him his rights. Even after the Public Inquiries Act was used by the commission, does it not strike hon. members as interesting and strange that most of those convicted at their trials were men who were not locked up at all but were men against whom proceedings were taken regularly according to law? Among those was a former member of this house and two or three others. Proceedings against them were in no way submitted to investigation or interrogation by this commission; yet in their cases convictions were obtained; whereas, when British principles were departed from, in many cases convictions were not obtained.

In the interests of our judiciary the time has come for parliament to make a declaration—I think it is about to be made in Britain—that a royal commission dealing with matters in any way of a political nature should not have seated thereon judges of our high courts of justice.

I have dealt with the Supreme Court Act, chapter 35, 1927. I am not going over the authorities, but they are to the effect that an individual who claims his freedoms have been denied has no inherent right of appeal to the court, because no matter of monetary value is in issue. The act should be brought up to date and an alteration should be made in that regard to the end that such anomaly should be removed.

I was going to deal with one other matter but I will not. It is the question of the constitutionality of a bill of rights. I refer hon. members to the judgment to which I have already made reference, namely, a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in 1938 dealing with the Alberta Press Act. It decides, as I understand the judgment of Mr. Justice Cannon, that every freedom is guaranteed to every Canadian and that when the British North America Act was passed it was never intended that any provincial authority should be allowed to derogate from those freedoms which are the inherent right and heritage of every Canadian and British subject.

As far as the resolution is concerned, I support it. It holds forth the hope that we shall be able to mobilize opinion, to educate ourselves in the preservation of freedom, and to assure that posterity shall have handed down to it the rights that are ours. Some may say, "What interest have I in this matter?" Well, sir, apathy and complacency menace human liberty no less than the positive actions of those who would destroy it. Free men can destroy their rights by indifference; they can forge their own chains by apathy.

Five hundred years before Christ, Heraclitus of Ephesus set forth a principle which is as old as antiquity and as new as modernity. These are his words:

> The major problem of human society is to combine that degree of liberty without which law is tyranny with that degree of law without which liberty becomes licence.

Freedom is not destroyed intentionally in many cases. It dies from misuse; its sphere is extended by proper use. It cannot be static. It is not the same today and tomorrow in a changing world, with the state ever advancing upon the rights of individuals. The principles of law that were applicable in justice fifty years ago are interpreted differently today. But the great abiding principles must be preserved. The right of the individual in his search of civil liberties is imperative.

What are civil liberties? The most sacred things of the human personality. They epitomize our belief in the dignity of the human being; they translate that dignity into rights which the individual can enjoy against the state or against other all-powerful individuals within the state. Civil liberties constitute the individual a sacred being. Civil liberties make him a sovereign in his dealings with the state, provided that he remains within the law.

There can be no civil liberties under laws that permit discrimination; there can be civil liberty only when there is, to use the words of Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, "free trade in ideas," the right of the individual to hold the view that I disagree with, so long as that individual keeps within the law and does not wish to undermine my beliefs by force.

Individual civil liberties, those that we have inherited today, guard the weak against the strong. What is needed are civil liberties by declaration of parliament which will guard the individual against the state. It might be argued that another government, another parliament, can revoke a bill of rights passed by parliament. True; but has not history shown that when laws are put upon the statute books, having the support of a vast majority of the people, they stay there?

A declaration of a bill of rights in this country would be a positive declaration on the part of men and women of all political faiths in their belief in civil liberties. Whether the federal authority has the power or not to pass legislation respecting civil liberties, its passage would strengthen the hand of the Minister of Justice in the matter of the disallowance of any statute which would deny freedom anywhere in our country.

To be effective, a bill of rights must represent, as my right hon. friend said today, the philosophy of the human being, and of a free people. It must deny the right of any government to interfere with my right to speak within the law; my right to serve my Maker as my conscience demands; my right to be free from the threats of a police state, whether consciously or unconsciously administered; my right to live my own life within the limits of the law, without regard to race or colour or creed; my right to belong to an unpopular minority anywhere in this country; my right to have recourse to the courts to guard me against the intrusions or the invasions of the state.

These are the rights, sir, which I hope—and I speak with feeling on the subject—this parliament and this committee will see its way clear to enunciate, to assure that every person, wherever he lives in this dominion, shall be allowed, if his rights are interfered with, to appeal to that supreme body, the Supreme Court of Canada, in order that equality of rights shall be attainable everywhere in this dominion.

I want to see a bill of rights declare the principles of liberty for all racial origins who come here and have come here because of their passion for liberty and their belief in tolerance. My right hon. friend mentioned that my mother's grandparents came to Red river with the Selkirk settlers. They came for the same reason that those who came later did so, because of intolerance and the denial of the right of the individual to have recourse to the courts of Scotland. They came to this country, as thousands since have come, because they believed that here they would find justice, righteousness and tolerance without regard to race and creed. Tolerance does not mean that I look across at my hon. friends on the other side and permit them to live and to have their view. It means that I welcome their viewpoint, even though that viewpoint is different from my own. Though we may speak different languages, all of us have the same heartfelt concept of liberty. With the trend that is taking place, having regard to the unanimity there is in this country, surely we in this parliament will join together without regard to any other consideration in a great crusade to assure, not only freedom today to every individual under the law, but freedom to those who will come after us.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—GRADUATION OF TWO VETERANS FROM UNIVERSITY OF MANITOBA WITH GOLD MEDALS

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege I wonder if I might bring a matter to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). Has his attention been called to the fact that two veterans, Harry Crowe and John Crowe, Winnipeg, brothers who served overseas and whose schooling was thereby interrupted, graduated this afternoon from the university of Manitoba, both of them receiving gold medals? Would the minister join with me in congratulating these two men on their record-breaking achievement?

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am only too proud, not only personally, but on behalf of the government, to identify ourselves with congratulations extended to these brilliant brothers. Perhaps with a certain amount of pardonable pride I might be permitted to refer to some of the courses which our department is carrying out. It is certainly with the greatest of pleasure that I identify the entire government, and indeed the house with the congratulations extended to these two brothers.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I add a word on behalf of the official opposition? It is a splendid thing to know that these young veterans have done so well. As a matter of fact, it has been a great inspiration to see the wonderful work done by all the veterans attending our universities. They have set a very high standard indeed.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my word, too. Surely this speaks well for our old alma mater of Manitoba. It shows that it gives a thorough training, and supplies the boys capable of taking it.

HUMAN RIGHTS

FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS — OBLIGATIONS UNDER UNITED NATIONS CHARTER — APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie (for the Prime Minister) that the house go into committee on a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee of both houses of parliament to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we in the C.C.F. give our complete approval, of course, to this resolution that a joint committee of both houses be appointed to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Never in all recorded history have the rights of man faced so ruthless a challenge as has been the case in the last ten or fifteen years. This challenge has been met. We survived the onslaught of enemies who were intent upon destroying freedom in the four corners of the world.

The cost of survival has been heavy. When history comes to be written it will be seen that part of the cost of survival is a world struggling in the birth pangs of a new social and new economic order; change is in the nature of things and change is in the air today.

On every continent exploited and subjugated peoples are struggling for their freedom. They are among those who fought in the last war, partly with the negative desire to defeat fascism, and partly for something more positive. I should like to think of that positive aim in the words of the declaration the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) gave to us this afternoon, that declaration issued by the parliament of Scotland in 1320. I repeat it here:

> It is not for glory, riches, or honour, that we fight, but for that liberty which no good man will consent to lose but with his life.

Six hundred years ago they fought in Scotland against the foreign oppressor. They fought for the right to nationhood, and today there is still that same desire in the world for the right to national self-determination.

Throughout the generations and centuries the conception of freedom has broadened out, and each generation must view it in the light of circumstances of the day. Freedom involves new problems as the years go by. Once again the time has come for us in Canada to re-examine what we mean by human rights and fundamental freedoms.

This last war was fought on the part of tens of thousands, not only to guard these essential freedoms of speech, of conscience and of the person, but for something more. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in the early days of the war that, unless a new order was well on its way before the end of the war, the world might look for it in vain. Those who fought the war looked for that new order. They fought perhaps with a sense of burning idealism wich was imbued in them as the result of the concept that this was the century of the common man, a concept which, as President Roosevelt said in 1944, realized that true freedom has no meaning unless man has independence and economic security. That is what we fought the war for. Mankind is now looking to the future with hopeful, if fearful eyes.

We realize that there are two paths ahead, either one of which we as free agents may choose to follow as we will. One path leads to heights of splendour yet undreamed of; the other to the darkness of hatred and strife. One leads to a realm where the human spirit will rise triumphant over the bigotries and persecutions of our age, where racial discrimination and intolerance of another's religious beliefs will be regarded as crimes against all mankind; where freedom of speech will be the inalienable right of every citizen; where men will no longer exploit their fellowmen for private gain; where every man will be master of his soul. That is one path we can choose.

The other path can lead only to that spiritual desolation to which our enemies would have consigned us. After the last war, Field Marshal Smuts told us that mankind was on the march. Perhaps we did not go far, but after this last holocaust humanity is once more striking its tents and is again on the march, this time in a much more decisive fashion. The yeast of liberty and of freedom is at work throughout the world. In Europe they are winning the battle which is being fought against industrial and agrarian feudalism. China is throwing off the chains of western bondage. India will, within a year I hope, have assumed that nationhood which is her due. Colonial peoples everywhere are demanding emancipation, while coloured peoples are demanding equality of treatment with the white peoples. The world is being rebuilt and we shall be false to our traditions if we do not play our part in ensuring that it will be built on the basis of the most enduring values—human freedom and respect for human dignity.

What of us in Canada? We are faced with the situation of an increasing complexity in our social and economic life which is compelling the state to interfere in fields which are new. When the state interferes in such a way there is always the grave risk of the infringement of the rights of individuals. While the state may so infringe upon the rights of the person there is also the danger, which some of us have found out to our cost, of equal infringement by the owners and managers of great aggregations of wealth. These are two reasons then why there is a growing demand for some amendment to our constitution which will safeguard our essential freedoms.

We are inclined to forget that our democracy was not attained by wishing it, nor can it be maintained by willing it. Democracy implies a constant struggle against irresponsible power, an hourly and daily struggle and one, if it is to be successful, that demands constant inspiration. New hopes and new enthusiasms have to be aroused. We can create those new hopes; we can create those new enthusiasms if we give to the people of Canada a charter of rights. Here is our opportunity to tell our people in Canada what our objective is as a nation, to declare without equivocation what are our rights.

Important as it may be to do that, it is even more important to protect those rights. The American settlers after the declaration of independence found that the common law of England which they had inherited was not sufficient to safeguard the individual, and Jefferson said in 1787:

> A bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular, and what no just government should refuse or rest in inference.

What was true then is true now, and no government of Canada can refuse a bill of rights to its citizens, one which will at once protect and inspire. We need that protection. We fought this war for democracy and the democracy which we have is developing cracks. We have permitted flagrant injustice to continue. We have violated and are violating the fundamental rights of the citizens of this country. This house has debated—and I do not intend to reopen the debate—the question of citizens of Japanese descent and the question of Chinese residents in Canada. I am not going to say much about that, but I could not help but notice the affection which the Minister of Veterans Affairs had this afternoon for the golden rule. As he knows, the golden rule is that we should do unto others as we wish to be done by. I wonder what the Minister of Veterans Affairs would do if the parliament of Canada were to strip him of his citizenship? I wonder what he would then think of the golden rule which he played up so much today? When I saw that it was the Minister of Veterans Affairs who was introducing this resolution I felt that perhaps human rights were in a bad way when we considered who the midwife was. Let me say that I think the legislation we have passed in this house against these people is a shame to a democratic parliament. I say also that we in the C.C.F. will never stop in our opposition to discrimination against any individual because of his race or because of his creed. We shall never stop that fight.

We see dangers to our civil liberties in various parts of Canada today. In Manitoba an attempt is being made to take away certain rights from a group known as Hutterites. In Ontario there was passed at the recent session of the legislature an act known as the police act, which is a direct threat against the democratic right of every citizen. In Quebec we have seen a religious minority persecuted to some extent because of its views. How can we blame the provinces for violating civil rights when the federal government of Canada has given them the lead? I do not hold them any more responsible than I do the present government. We realize the danger in idly standing by while a minority is oppressed. It has been said in the house frequently and it must be said again that, where a minority in Canada is oppressed, then every minority in Canada is in some danger.

There is in Quebec a sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses. According to the 1941 census, they had 136 members out of a total population in the province of some 3,331,882 persons. Many of those witnesses are today being accused of seditious libel and of being a nuisance. They are a small sect. In all probability, compared with other denominations they are poor. With great certainty I say they have no friends in high places. Some of these witnesses circulated a pamphlet called "Quebec's Burning Hate". Because they did so many were arrested and appeared before the magistrate and, as was their constitutional right, were allowed out on bail. There was a Canadian resident in Montreal, one Roncarelli by name, sympathetic, I assume, to the witnesses, who took up the bail which was authorized by the court; but when he did so he was penalized by the executive of the province for doing so, penalized to such an extent that his living was perhaps placed in jeopardy. Here is a an example of interference by the executive with the judiciary, and it is dangerous. I think most of us in this house will disagree with much of what the Witnesses of Jehovah said; we will deplore perhaps the way they say it; and yet I maintain as a democratic citizen that they are entitled to freedom to say it so long as they do not violate the laws of the land.

We in the C.C.F. hold no brief for those who attack the religious faith of another. We have no brief for abuses of freedom. But I recall to your attention, Mr. Speaker, what Benjamin Franklin said, that abuses of freedom of speech perhaps ought to be stopped, but to whom dare we give the power to do so? That is the recurring problem we shall always find in democracy. These abuses which we dislike so much must be stopped, but to whom do we dare give power to stop them?

It may be argued that the witnesses were intemperate in language. That I do not know, but I think it is a fair comment to say that those who opposed them were equally intemperate. I quote from Le Temps of Quebec:

> The Witnesses of Jehovah are impostors, scabby sheep, malefactors who must be destroyed before they can corrupt certain of our own people.

I believe that the editor of that paper has forgotten that great responsibilities go along with the great privileges of democracy, and one of the responsibilities is this:—Freedom must be given to those whom we believe to be in error and whose views we abhor, so long as they remain within the laws of the land. We say that in Canada we have freedom of religion. Freedom of religion means that the individual has the right within the law to try to persuade others to come to his way of thinking. Freedom of religion implies the right to proselytize. That freedom has been denied by the provincial authorities of Quebec, and to that extent I say that freedom of religion has been denied.

One magistrate by name Mercier said, when some of the witnesses were before him:

> Any measures are justified in ridding our Christian society of those transgressors of all laws, these enemies of all religions, these witnesses of falsehood.

It may be that they are witnesses of falsehood, but there are other examples, fortunately not many of them, in that province, who are proven witnesses of falsehood. I refer to that small group with no great following in Quebec known as the Union des Electeurs, who publish a periodical known as Vers Demain. In recent months this group has been printing extracts from the protocols of Zion. Any normally intelligent person knows that the so-called protocols are arrant forgeries and frauds and anyone who will print them does so only with the intention of stirring up group against group and creed against creed. Let me read what the editor of the Canadian Register says in its Quebec edition, and I should like to pay tribute to the editor of that paper. It is the organ of the English-speaking diocese of the Roman Catholic church in Montreal. This paper says:

> It is therefore with feelings of shame and horror that we have noted the publication in Vers Demain, organ of the Social Credit party in this province, of that spurious calumny of the Jews known as the "Protocols of Zion." This fantastic forgery, long known to all serious students as false, contains all sorts of nonsensical "revelations" of non-existent "plots." It is a vulgar and crude libel of our Jewish brethern which is capable of causing great harm among prejudiced or uncritical readers.

But still the attention of the executive of Quebec is centred on the Witnesses of Jehovah. Here I should like to quote from the remarks of Mr. Justice Jackson in the Supreme Court of the United States when the case of the rights of Jehovah's Witnesses came before that court. He said:

> As governmental pressure toward unity becomes greater, so strife becomes more bitter as to whose unity it shall be . . . Ultimate futility of such attempts to compel coherence is the lesson of every such effort from the Roman drive to stamp out Christianity as a disturber of its pagan unity, the inquisition as a means to religious and dynastic unity, the Siberian exiles as a means to Russian unity, down to the fast-failing efforts of our present totalitarian enemies. Those who begin coercive elimination of dissent soon find themselves exterminating dissenters. Compulsory unification of opinion achieves only the unanimity of the graveyard.

Mr. Justice Jackson has laid down certain principles of religious and civil freedom which I commend not only to the authorities of Quebec but to those in every province. We see that today certain basic rights are in danger in Canada and, as I said before, the federal government has led the way.

I now refer to a matter that has been brought before this house on several occasions. I should like to remind the house of the espionage trials, and what the leader of my party said about them last year: We regard with revulsion and contempt any Canadian who betrays or attempts to betray his country. I regard with something akin to that revulsion and contempt the conduct of the government in this case. A little over a year ago some thirteen suspects were arrested, were held incommunicado for several weeks, subject all the time to close questioning by the police. They were denied the fundamental right to counsel; they were denied the privilege of seeing their families. By odd irony, there was being held in Europe at that time a trial in Nuremberg, where some of the worst war criminals we have ever known were given these rights which we in Canada denied to our own people. One suspect, Doctor Alan Nunn May, was sent over to the United Kingdom. When he arrived there he was arrested, charged the next day and given the right to see counsel and also to meet with friends. These rights, despite the minister's talk of magna carta and habeas corpus, were denied in the espionage trials. I should like to know where magna carta and habeas corpus were during those months. The answer would be enlightening. Reading the evidence, one can only be struck by the fact that the commissioners emphasize that the procedure they adopted was legal in terms of the statute law of Canada. They justified a great part of their procedure under the Official Secrets Act, the Inquiries Act and the Canada Evidence Act. I am not skilled in law, but I do say this, that if that legislation permits the government to do what it has done in the past, then I think it is time to bring amendments to the legislation before the house so that rights of the individual may be protected.

But there was also an order in council passed which appointed the royal commission, order in council P.C. 411. Section 3 of this order states:

> That the said commissioners may adopt such procedure and method as they may deem expedient for the conduct of such inquiry and may alter or change the same from time to time.

I have heard it said that the government has assumed to itself at times great powers. These are extraordinary powers.

One of my principal quarrels is with the commissioners themselves and with their report. Although we were assured by the Prime Minister that they would be anxious to maintain in every way possible the freedom and the liberty of the individual, the commissioners refrained from telling witnesses that the protection of the Canada Evidence Act was theirs for the asking. In part of the report we read that certain persons did not, so far as the evidence discloses, take an active part in the subversive activities, but would have done so if required. I have not yet seen the evidence which would lead me to believe that that was so. I am compelled to believe that the commissioners deserted fact and law and became, for the time, soothsayers.

The commissioners declared on February 14 of last year that, unless individual rights were set aside and citizens suspected of being spies were held incommunicado, some of the basic purposes of the inquiry would be defeated. That statement is even more extraordinary, for neither the government nor the commission has yet made it good. I have seen no jot or tittle of evidence to suggest as to how this unconstitutional procedure helped the investigation in any way whatsoever. We are entitled to know where the security of Canada was aided by setting aside the constitutional rights of Canadians.

The government may say that it acted on the advice of the commission, but it is notorious that governments accept the advice of commissions only when they want to. The government cannot escape responsibility because of what the commissioners said. The government must be held accountable on several scores. In the first place, they permitted and, I maintain, permitted wrongly, the publication of evidence which was obtained by the commission in advance of the trials of suspected persons, and so in the minds of people at large the case was prejudiced. But the government also repealed one of our most fundamental laws, the right of every citizen to a fair and free trial. What is worse, the commissioners have taken away the good names and reputations of those who were found not guilty in the lower courts of the land. Here let me pay tribute to that standard of Canadian justice which will examine the evidence as it stands and not accept the judgment of those who occupy high positions in the judiciary.

As I said, the reputation of these people has been taken away. Many of them have lost their jobs. Perhaps all of them have lost their jobs and are finding it difficult to obtain new employment. Throughout all the days of their lives they will be pursued by the dark cloud of suspicion that at one time they may have been traitors to their country, and nothing which the government may do now can redress that wrong. Already their good names have been taken from them.

Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed.

We have not only left these people poor; we have left them paupers. We have destroyed their reputation; we have compelled them to use their savings or to borrow from their friends so that they could defend their names in Canadian courts; and the very least which can be expected is that the government will assume responsibility for this and pay the costs of those who were acquitted.

I should like to quote what the Prime Minister said last year, as reported at page 9 of Hansard:

I would also ask hon. members to remember in reading these reports that they have been prepared by two chief justices of the Supreme Court of Canada, gentlemen who, above all, would be anxious to maintain in every way possible the full freedom and liberty of individuals in our country.

I dispute the accuracy of that statement. Let me place beside it what Mr. Chitty had to say in the "Fortnightly Law Journal" of Toronto, which was reported about a year ago. Speaking of the politicians, he said:

They have abolished the constitution. They have deprived men and women of their constitutional rights not to be arrested uncharged, not to be held in prison unarraigned, not to have justice deferred or denied. They have subjected those men and women thus illegally arrested and imprisoned to inquisition and all that that implies. But beyond and above that they have destroyed the independence of the judiciary and suborned the courts to lend the appearance of legality to their crime.

[Mr. Stewart.]

I should like to say something more than that. Not only have the courts been suborned, but justice itself has been suborned and that by two justices of the Supreme Court of Canada. They found guilty those who were afterwards acquitted. They approached witnesses at times apparently, if one can read the evidence, with biased minds. They accepted and even created a commission which violated our most sacred rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I hate to interrupt my hon. friend, but I think that is not parliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the minister rose, it was my intention to rise and call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he should be very careful in his expressions when referring to the supreme court.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I submit that the hon. gentleman is not dealing with judges; he is dealing with a commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is the same thing.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is a distinction.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Though the persons may be the same, the office they held or hold is different. The hon. member was discussing the commissioners; it is just an accident that they were judges.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That very point raised by my hon. friend came up years ago and it was not sustained at that time. I am sorry I have not the decision in hand at the moment. The procedure is that it is not proper to criticize judges even in their capacity as royal commissioners.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I respectfully point out that if the government wishes to escape criticism all it has to do is to appoint judges to a commission. That is wrong. If the government appoints justices to a commission, then these justices as commissioners must be subject to criticism in this house as commissioners.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend is raising an entirely different point. The point he has raised has nothing whatsoever to do with the standing rules of the house. I submit that, according to the standing rules of the house, any reflection upon a member of a court is improper.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to say a word on the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am going to begin by beseeching the hon. gentleman not to continue in the vein of his last utterance but I must submit that he has the right to say what he is saying. It is because he has the right—possibly the duty—to say it that establishes the impropriety of putting gentlemen of high judicial office into positions which expose them to the things the hon. member is saying about them.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have just one word to add. My hon. friend used the word "justices", and I take objection to his statement about the courts being suborned. I quite agree that he is free to comment as he pleases upon the conduct of the royal commission. I am not an expert on parliamentary procedure, but I think it is going a bit far to say that the courts in this country have been suborned.

Mr. HACKETT: He should not say that.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course he should not.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I was quoting Mr. Chitty. May I say I had concluded with that aspect of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He is only a half journalist.

Mr. FULTON: He is a Canadian citizen.

Mr. ABBOTT: There are some ten or twelve million Canadian citizens.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I again ask the hon. member who has the floor to be very careful in the expression he uses when referring to the courts. It is not only a question of using unparliamentary terms, but I should call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum. Hon. members must be very careful when they refer to the highest court of the country.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I had finished what I had to say in that respect. You may rest assured that I shall always try to observe order and decorum in what I am assured is a free and unfettered parliament. We have seen that there are certain dangers to our civil and religious rights in this country. As part of our election manifesto in the last election, we in the C.C.F. said this, and I give it as a declaration of faith: That a bill of rights should be incorporated in the constitution, protecting minority rights, civil and religious liberties, freedom of speech and freedom of assembly, establishing equal treatment before the law to all citizens irrespective of race, colour or creed, and providing necessary democratic powers to eliminate racial discrimination in all its forms.

That is part of our basic philosophy of life, and yet it scarcely goes far enough. We need a supplement to a bill of rights such as that. We need a supplement in the shape of a bill of social rights, and that, I think, is implied by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the speech he made in Toronto before a labour convention a few years ago when he said that the era of freedom will be achieved only as social security and human welfare become the main concern of men and nations.

We are beginning to realize that democracy implies social rights as well as political rights, and I will give some of these social rights, not in any particular order of importance or in any particular priority. But we believe that every worker and producer has the right to sufficient income to maintain conditions adequate to human dignity. There are many aspects to these conditions, not the least of which is the belief, shared by all, that there is dignity in honest toil.

Another is that conditions of work shall be such that each shall be given moral and physical security and assured of his personal dignity. We believe in the right of the individual to leisure and to recreation, as we believe in the right of the individual to retire at the very latest, if he so desires, at the age of sixty-five, and to retire with an old age pension which is adequate to keep him in that dignity which we associate with the individual. We believe in the right of the individual to an indemnity in the event of unemployment. Too often it has happened that a man has lost his job because of some event which took place ten thousand miles away and over which he had no control. He was penalized and had to suffer, and many times was left in poverty. Today we have a measure which grants some relief in the form of unemployment insurance, a measure which is not yet enough to ensure men that dignity of which we speak.

We believe in the right of the individual to membership in an organization or association of his own choice and we believe in his right to strike after all procedures of conciliation and arbitration have been exhausted. These are the rights of the individual as a worker or as a producer. But we also have to consider the individual as a consumer, and he has social rights, too, which must be protected.

We believe the consumer has the right to freedom from want, and the right to share in the national wealth of the country. The consumer has the social right to a minimum of economic security guaranteed by a system of social insurance against sickness, inability to work, poverty and old age. The consumer has the right to join any form of cooperative organization, as has the producer, and so to take part in the economic life of the country.

But there are other rights which must be emphasized and one which is honoured more often in the breach, is the right to complete equality as between the sexes; and, stemming from that, the right of mother and child to all the consideration and care which society can provide. We in the C.C.F. believe in the right of the individual to own individual property, the right of the farmer to own a farm, effectively cultivated by himself or his family, as we believe in the right of the craftsman to own the means of craftsmanship.

We believe, of course, in the right of all to the fullest education in citizenship. It may be said that these rights are visionary; it may be said that they are impractical, that they are a dream. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I believe with all my heart and soul that the day is coming when we shall awaken to find that it is the night which has gone and the dream which has become the reality. The eyes of men are on the future, for we are weary of the past. The old world is dead. The future lies with those who abjure the errors of the past and with courage and resolution confront and solve the problems of our times.

These rights I have enumerated are the minimum rights essential to maintain that human dignity of which we speak. These are the minimum rights which will grant emancipation from the fear of insecurity and poverty, not only to our people but to the peoples of the world. These are the human rights for which we as democratic socialists are pledged to fight.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): It has indeed been a pleasure to listen today to the fine speeches that have thus far been delivered.

It is not always easy to know what to do. It is usually less easy to know how to do it. It is often very hard to have the skill, strength, freedom and courage to do the right thing, when the right thing is known. And so it will be found in this matter of human rights. It will be hard enough to agree as to what should constitute a sufficiently comprehensive catalogue of human rights. Let us try to solve that problem first. It will be much harder to come to unity of opinion as to why these human rights so commonly elude man's eager grasp, and as to how we might in parliament best proceed to attain those human rights and maintain them and guarantee them, both for ourselves and for our children as Canadians, as Britishers, as Americans and as citizens of One World. Yet this task must be essayed. Let us attempt this problem secondly.

There will remain, then, the question: Have we Canadians the skill, strength, freedom and courage to make the contribution requisite for providing and ensuring ourselves those human rights agreed upon as appropriate for all of us to enjoy? Into this thicket of investigation the time limit will hardly enable us to penetrate far. Yet this assignment, too, we must not shun. May we consider this problem as the third?

What should constitute a sufficiently comprehensive category of human rights? Christ laid down a delineation of human rights which I think all of us have been taught to revere, when he said:

> I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.

The American constitution laid down a fine suggestion for human rights when it said that man was entitled to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Then in our own times we have had the Atlantic charter which undertook to guarantee freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom from want and freedom from fear. And now there is a statement of essential human rights published at page 217 of the report of the united nations of 1946. It is the report on the second part of the first session of the general assembly of the united nations held in New York, October 23—December 15, 1946; conference series, 1946, No. 3. The statement contains the following, which I believe it is quite worth our while to contemplate. I read from page 217:

> Upon the freedom of the individual depends the welfare of the people, the safety of the state and the peace of the world.
> In society complete freedom cannot be attained;—

Those are not my words. Continuing:

> —the liberties of the one are limited by the liberties of others, and the preservation of freedom requires the fulfilment by individuals of their duties as members of society.
> The function of the state is to promote conditions under which the individual can be most free.
> To express those freedoms to which every human being is entitled and to assure that all shall live under a government of the people, by the people, for the people, this declaration is made.
> Article 1. Freedom of belief and of worship is the right of every one. The state has a duty to protect this freedom.
> Article 2. Freedom to hold opinions and to receive opinions and information is the right of everyone. The state has a duty to protect this freedom.
> Article 3. Freedom of expression is the right of everyone. The state has a duty to refrain from arbitrary limitation of this freedom and to prevent denial of reasonable access to channels of communication.
> Article 4. Freedom to assemble peaceably with others is the right of every one. The state has a duty to protect this freedom.
> Article 5. Freedom to form with others associations of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, or any other character for purposes not inconsistent with these articles is the right of every one. The state has a duty to protect this freedom.

Article 6. Freedom from unreasonable interference with the person, home, reputation, privacy, activities and property is the right of every one. The state has a duty to protect this freedom.

Article 7. Everyone has the right to have his criminal and civil liabilities and his rights determined without undue delay by fair public trial by a competent tribunal before which he has opportunity for a full hearing. The state has a duty to maintain adequate tribunals and procedures to make this right effective.

Article 8. Every one who is detained has the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of his detention. The state has a duty to provide adequate procedures to make this right effective.

Article 9. No one shall be convicted of crime except for violation of a law in effect at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence, nor be subjected to a penalty greater than that applicable at the time of the commission of the offence.

Article 10. Every one has the right to own property under general law. The state shall not deprive any one of his property except for a public purpose and with just compensation.

Article 11. Every one has the right to education. The state has a duty to require that every child within its jurisdiction receive education of the primary standard; to maintain or insure that there are maintained facilities for such education which are adequate and free; and to promote the development of facilities for further education which are adequate and effectively available to all its residents.

Article 12. Every one has the right to work. The state has a duty to take such measures as may be necessary to insure that all its residents have an opportunity for useful work.

Article 13. Every one has the right to reasonable conditions of work. The state has a duty to take such measures as may be necessary to insure reasonable wages, hours and other conditions of work.

Article 14. Every one has the right to adequate food and housing. The state has a duty to take such measures as may be necessary to insure that all its residents have an opportunity to obtain these essentials.

Article 15. Every one has the right to social security. The state has a duty to maintain or insure that there are maintained comprehensive arrangements for the protection of health, for the prevention of sickness and accident, and for the provision of medical care and of compensation for loss of livelihood.

Article 16. Every one has the right to take part in the government of his state. The state has a duty to conform to the will of the people as manifested by democratic elections.

Article 17. Every one has the right of protection against arbitrary discrimination in the provisions and application of the law because of race, religion, sex or any other reason.

Article 18. In the exercise of his rights every one is limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic state.

That concludes the quotation. I feel tempted to say just a word on that last division, article XVIII, inasmuch as several of our C.C.F. friends have been so greatly disturbed by reason of what some of us have said concerning the Japanese problem. I believe it would be a right good thing for them to read that section very carefully, to ponder it deeply, apply it to our own case and see how it will work out in Canada.

On page 65 of the publication from which I have just read, we are told that this statement which I have read was drawn up during 1943 and 1944 by a committee of lawyers and political scientists consisting of the following gentlemen, whose names I believe the committee will be pleased to hear. They are:

Mr. Henri Laugier, who is now assistant secretary general of the united nations in charge of the department of social affairs;

Dr. P. E. Corbett, formerly of McGill university and now of Yale university;

Mr. C. Wilfred Jenks, legal adviser of the I.L.O.;

Dr. Rajchman of Poland;

Dr. Hu Shih of China;

Senor del Vayo of Spain; and Professor Quincy Wright of the university of Chicago.

The statement was submitted to the general assembly by the delegation from Panama, as is recorded at page 217. By resolution of December 11, 1946, this draft was referred to the economic and social council for reference to the commission on human rights, for consideration by that commission in its preparation of an international bill of rights.

I feel tempted to say a word or two to the government regarding this bill of rights. If that bill of rights ever passes, and the government of this country undertakes to do what is suggested by the united nations, then the government will be adopting ways and means which have never yet been considered in this house or throughout this country. I think hon. members should be warned regarding that before they become quite consumed in their enthusiasm for the united nations.

In order to discharge to the full its responsibility suggested by this resolution, each and every state must evidently possess and exercise unchallengeable sovereignty. May I stop to comment at that point. To a great many in this house who have advocated so earnestly that Canada surrender some of her sovereignty, may I point out that if Canada surrendered essential sovereignty it would be a matter of utter impossibility for her to discharge the responsibilities which, by implication, are placed upon her by acceptance of that resolution.

Canada would have to have unchallengeable sovereignty over her economic system—over the goods and services she should produce and consume; unchallengeable sovereignty over her trading policy, to determine with whom she shall trade, and on what terms; unchallengeable sovereignty over her financial system with power to determine what she shall use as money and what shall be the credit system both for production and consumption; what shall be the price structure in Canada, and how those prices shall be determined, stabilized and maintained; unchallengeable sovereignty over the form of government which she shall use; unchallengeable authority or sovereignty over her legislative, judicial and executive system, over her defence system and over her educational system.

May I pause just to comment, for the benefit of a good many hon. members who, in my judgment, have expressed somewhat reckless enthusiasm for the united nations, when they have spoken in the house. It would be well for them to think right through this whole situation before taking precipitate action in connection with international organizations, and the surrender, in part, of this nation's sovereignty.

If she is to discharge her "human rights" responsibilities, there are several fundamental principles upon which Canada or any state ought to base her way of life domestically. Let me name five of these fundamental principles.

First: Her institutions should be democratic. We should have ministers and officials—including commissions, may I point out, and also emphasize—who will be not only responsible to the people and to parliament but sensitively responsive to the will of the majority, with the will of minorities deeply respected by the constitution, as well as by law and by institutions—conditions which, I fear, we are rather far from at the present time.

Second: The state should have decentralization of its political government, of its industry and of its financial control. In all of these respects the Dominion of Canada is today in more or less large measure deficient. To those who argue for centralization of power and more or less weakening the autonomy of the provinces, let me commend this principle to their consideration.

Third: The state should be founded upon the basis of individual enterprise—individual enterprise, stimulated to abundant production by an equitable profit system, by the right to own property, the right to save fair earnings, and the right of bequeathing property to heirs.

If I might stop just for a moment to discuss this question I would urge upon every hon. member, socialistically inclined and otherwise, that production in a state can be accomplished by only two devices. As the London Economist well illustrated it, we must use either the carrot to tempt the donkey forward or the stick to drive it forward. What is happening at the present time, under the guidance of the Liberals, is, in large measure, and under the urgent pressure of the C.C.F., to destroy the carrot.

Mr. KNOWLES: We think Canadians are more than donkeys.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It will not be very long until they will be as stupid as donkeys if politicians keep on as they are doing now. The government is utterly destroying incentive in the country.

Mr. KNOWLES: We think they are human beings.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am making my speech, and if anyone has any argument against what I am saying, I am quite capable of speaking for myself.

My stand is that we must be exceedingly careful not to destroy the incentive for production in this country. Otherwise, in one of the most wealthy countries in the world, we shall find it almost impossible to get that degree of production which is necessary to ensure an abundant standard of living. That condition, I fear, has already developed in some states, and is developing in others.

Fourth: In order to guarantee these freedoms, the state should use a debt-free economy based upon debt-free money, for consumption, as well as debt money lent, as at present, for production—debt-free money which would enable the government to be free from the control of financial institutions, debt-free money which would enable the state to render the resources of the country available in the form of goods and services; and to render the goods and services financially available, first, to the state's own people, and then, to the peoples of other lands.

Fifth: The state's way of life should be based upon the principle of economic self-sufficiency, stimulating adequate varieties and quantities of production by wisely beneficent defence of home industries, through price adjustments in favour of home consumers.

There will be plenty of people in parliament and throughout the country who will not agree with that statement. I can see now the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) rising in his place in this house at various times since I came here in 1935 in order to declaim against the iniquities of economic nationalism. I do not know exactly what he had in mind in respect of economic nationalism; but my general approach to this problem would be this: that the more nearly a state comes to producing the goods and services which it needs to supply its people with a desirable standard of living, the freer that state is, and the more likely it is to be strong and prosperous.

Liberals in the house as well as a great many Conservatives will be somewhat interested in the observations made by Mr. W. H. Moore, who was for a long time the member for Ontario in this house, in his recent book "Grey Days", which I fancy most hon. members have read. Mr. Moore had established a reputation for being a thorough student, a careful thinker and a cautious speaker. On page 100 of his book, he makes this observation concerning economic policy:

> It is a dogmatic phrase, "There is nothing else to do"; but I have not coined it; the admonition to balance our economy arises out of the requirements of human welfare in a changed world.

So I make no bones about suggesting that the country should have its economy, its way of life based upon the principle of economic self-sufficiency. Let us have our own oil produced in this country; let us have our own coal; let us have our own sugar and our own rubber; let us produce as many essential products as we possible can.

With the details of human rights as listed in the section which I read from the eminent committee's report there will be, I presume, but negligible disagreement in the house. May we seek now to arrive at a united opinion as regards what causes make human rights so hard to guarantee, and what this parliament can do toward remedying or even eliminating those causes.

The main causes of the miscarriage of justice in respect of human rights arise from insufficiency and insecurity of income—poverty—and from war.

The main causes of war are economic. Men fight because of commercial rivalries. Commercial rivalry results from shortage of purchasing power in home markets, from adverse trade balances, and the fear of adverse trade balances—and consequent irrepayable international debt. Men fight also for markets and for access to raw materials, which is only another way of saying what I have just said. Practically all these causes would efface themselves if the nations would recognize and adopt certain fundamental principles upon which the state ought to base its way of life internationally; that is, in its relations with its neighbour states.

These international principles involve the establishment of a world peace organization under which, first, each nation retains its complete sovereignty to order its affairs in accordance with the will of its people. I opposed the formation of the united nations. There are hon. members in this house who will remember that in March and April, 1945, I rose and opposed that organization, and I am convinced the day will come when members will realize that the whole San Francisco agreement was based upon false principles and has done more harm in the world than good.

But that does not mean that I am opposed to having an international organization. Mr. Anthony Eden, as I recall it, stood in this house and advocated the formation of an international organization based upon the blueprint of the British commonwealth. We British nations did not need to have a central organization established in London to order Canada to go to war when Britain was in danger, to order Australia or New Zealand to go to war. Those nations were fully aware of the danger which threatened them and they rushed into the conflict as quickly as did the motherland. Will anyone tell me that the nations of the world would not do a similar thing?

Why should there be an international police force with power to order nations to war, to order them to conscript men to be sent to it? The whole idea is so contrary to our democratic way of thinking that I stand astounded that hon. members were ever deluded by the concept. But that does not mean that I am opposed to an international organization based upon the complete sovereignty of every state, so that the state would be free to go into the struggle or stay out, as Eire did in this war. If the struggle is not of such a nature as would commend itself to the states concerned, then they could pretty well count on a good many states remaining out.

Second, each state undertakes to maintain adequate armed forces. Third, each power undertakes to go to the aid of any other member of the association of nations who is the victim of armed aggression.

Mr. JAENICKE: Who would decide that, if there were no central organization?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Who decided it in the British commonwealth?

Mr. JAENICKE: The world is not all British.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Who decided that Great Britain, France and the others should be united in the struggle? There was no central body with the power to command.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: There was a war.

Mr. BLACKMORE: During peace there is a war against poverty and there is a war to prevent war recurring. Surely we could not have any stronger motives to impel men to unite and go forward together. All we need is a set of sound principles upon which to go forward and such principles I am now laying down. I proceed: Fourth, each member undertakes to prohibit its nationals from owning or controlling any property or economic undertaking in another sovereign country. Fifth, each nation undertakes not to export goods to any other nation, except in payment for imports from that nation, without the consent of that nation's government. Sixth, each state undertakes to receive payment in goods and services for any debt owing to its nationals.

I am aware that there will be a good many hon. members who will not see eye to eye with me in respect of these principles, but I commend them to the consideration of members of this house as being principles upon which the welfare and harmony of a united world will be based when the world finally reaches a state of sanity and understanding in which it can have good will and cooperation. I add to the foregoing principles the following: seventh, each state undertakes that if at the end of seven years it shall have refrained from accepting goods or services (other than gold) in payment for goods and services it has sold to any neighbour state it will cancel the debt. Eighth, each state undertakes by means of some form of lend-lease or mutual aid arrangement to render available to any state of good will any supplies of goods and services which it may have in excess of the means to provide an abundant standard of living for all its own people. Ninth, each state undertakes to adopt such an economy and financial system as will make financially available for all its people whatever degree of material well-being may be found to be physically possible for the people in that state.

I commend these principles to the careful consideration of the proposed committee and of the members of this house. This resolution calls for the committee to examine into the possibilities of what Canada can do about the situation that is confronting the country. Here are some suggestions which will be found quite worthy of study.

We come now to the matter of Canadian skill, strength, freedom and courage to accomplish the "human rights" objectives which I have indicated and which we all desire. Have we the skill necessary to accomplish the things which are suggested as being appropriate and desirable by all the fine idealism which is written up in publications emanating from the united nations? My answer is that undoubtedly we do possess the skill. As proof of that, I point to our remarkable performance during the war. I point to the fact that in many cases we had factories and industries established hastily for the construction of war materials. Into these factories we had young men and young women brought who knew not a single thing about the processes they were called upon to execute. Yet in a surprisingly short time they learned and did their work so superbly well as to overwhelm the enemy with their production. Will anyone tell me that we cannot, under similar circumstances in peace time, train our young and old to accomplish these desirable objectives of production just as well as we did in the war? The only thing we need is adequate markets and profitable prices. That is what we had in the war. Some people have the idea that the reason we had so much success in production during the war was that there was a war on. That is not so. There was a good market at profitable prices, and every producer knew he would be sure of a market at profitable prices. That is all we need to get a high standard of production in a private enterprise country—the natural motive.

Have we the strength? I point to our manpower which performed during the war so magnificently, to our industrial structure, to our factories of various kinds, to our industrial skill, to our transportation facilities, splendid for a nation at our stage of development, to our parliamentary and civic institutions of which every Canadian can be justly proud, to our resources bountiful and rich, to our access to new discoveries and technological skills in great numbers.

Illustrative of my last remark may I refer to a statement made by an eminent chemist in the United States in 1942, because some hon. members may not have had an opportunity to read what this man said? I refer to Doctor Charles A. A. Stine, vice-president of E. I. du Pont Nemours, one of the greatest industrial chemists in the United States. He said:

> Under pressure of the necessities of war, the inconceivables of only two years ago are today's realities. American chemists are discovering new continents of matter and the world of 1940 has already become an antiquity. When the war is won we shall have at our command ten to a hundred times what we had before in raw materials. New and more versatile plastics . . . high pressure syntheses of ammonia . . . fertilizer of such capacity that the trends of agriculture may be changed . . . glass that is unbreakable and will float . . . wood that won't burn . . . hosiery from air . . . window screens without wire . . . the war is compressing development.

We Canadians have at our disposal all these superb skills and technological discoveries.

Apply them to our resources with our own national skills, and what sort of strength shall we have in Canada in the production of goods and services to produce a high standard of living, of human rights for the people?

Have we the freedom to do the things which we ought to do? Judging from that list of human rights, I am not so sure that we have not given up too much of our freedom already. For generations now, international finance has been exercising an evil influence over this country. Then when we signed the Bretton Woods agreement we gave up a considerable portion of our financial sovereignty and of our trade sovereignty. Then the united nations charter threatens our national sovereignty in respect of defence. The international trade conferences which we have held, and of which one is now in progress in Geneva, have endeavoured to deprive us of empire preferences which are vital to our economic prosperity and strength, and to force upon us the most favoured nation clause to make us impotent to protect our economy against the crushing impact of the productive potential of the United States.

To the degree to which Bretton Woods and the united nations charter have impaired Canada's freedom to act, I would suggest that this house insist that these agreements be modified, and if they cannot be modified I would be prepared to suggest in all seriousness that this house advise the government to take steps to withdraw from both the united nations agreement and the Bretton Woods agreement.

Have we the courage to do the things we ought to do to ensure human rights? Have we the courage to learn new things? Have we the courage to depart from old opinions? Have we the courage to adopt new concepts, new techniques, new ways? Have we the courage to advocate new measures for freedom? Have we the courage to fight for these new methods? Have we the courage to win? I often wonder. If there is any one thing that would cause me to lose a measure of my optimism and hope in this country it would be the very fact that so many seem to lack the courage even to consider new ways. Rather would they go forward in the old ways, even though they were assured that we were going over a precipice into chaos, deep, dark and dismal, than consider something new in the way of finance or some other economic system which might be of benefit to the nation. Have we Canadians the courage which is necessary, the courage which is more rare than is the courage to die on the field of battle? It all remains to be seen. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we have.

So in considering this resolution to set up a committee to examine into the whole question of human rights, I face the future with hope and with confidence. I believe that if the committee will apply itself to its task with earnestness, with singleness of heart and with open-mindedness, having a determination to do all that can possibly be done to solve the problems confronting mankind in this most dangerous hour, it will find ways and means of giving Canadians a measure of human rights such as Canadians have never even dared dream of as being possible in this country; for we have everything in this nation necessary to give everybody the highest standard of human rights if we would only use the resources and facilities and blessings which Providence has showered down upon us in rich abundance.

There must be a way in which our aged people can be guaranteed against the penury which now wastes them and chagrins us. There must be a way by which we can guarantee to people doing the work of this country the means of earning a livelihood adequate to support them in comfort and happiness. There must be a way of enabling the people of Canada as a whole to enjoy the good things which the Lord has given us in rich plenty. I say that in setting up this committee we ought to charge them with the solemn and sacred responsibility of discovering the means of enabling the people of Canada to enjoy and to share the rich resources which God has given them.

Mr. ROCH PINARD (Chambly-Rouville): I wish, first of all, to express my congratulations to all hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me in this debate. I was particularly impressed by the magnificent speech delivered this afternoon by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). It is not the first time that I have heard the right hon. gentleman express his opinion on matters such as are being discussed today, but in my opinion he surpassed himself on this occasion. I felt personally that not only his voice but his whole heart was speaking in defence of human rights and freedom. I wish also to congratulate the other speakers who spoke before me. It seems to me that everybody agrees on accepting the same principles.

As has already been mentioned, the economic and social council of the united nations organization established in June, 1946, an important body called the commission on human rights. It is often contended that international commissions of that sort are being unnecessarily multiplied by the united nations. During a recent visit to the seat of the organization at Flushing Meadows with some of our distinguished colleagues, I began to wonder whether such statements were entirely accurate. I am not in a position today to give any definite opinion in that regard because it is difficult to analyse the situation with fairness.

At the opening of the special session of the general assembly on the question of Palestine, which I had the privilege to attend, several of these commissions, eight of them, I think, were formed by the united nations' delegates. I do not think any of my colleagues present had the time to find out exactly the functions of these numerous new commissions. As a matter of fact, our chief Canadian delegate at the conference, Mr. Pearson, whose competence is highly recognized in all international circles, had the honour to be appointed chairman of one of these committees to investigate some of the political aspects of the Palestine question.

But among the more permanent international commissions already formed by the united nations, it appears to me that this new commission on human rights is one of the most important. Again our country was given the distinction of being represented on that commission on human rights by a capable Canadian, Mr. John P. Humphrey. Mr. Humphrey, who was a former professor of international law at McGill university, is very well known and has always been a credit to his country. On many occasions he has expressed his opinions and his desire to see unity established in Canada. In that respect his advice was often quoted, and it has demonstrated his wish to see better understanding and tolerance between the English and French groups in Canada. On such occasions he has proven that he knows well the problems of our country. His ability and broadmindedness will allow him to understand better the great problems facing mankind and also the task he has been called upon to fulfil as secretary of the commission on human rights.

At the time of its formation, the new commission was given by the council, among other things, specific instructions to submit a report regarding the adoption and acceptance by all the united nations of an international declaration on human rights and the rights and duties of states. The task imposed upon the commission was great, and its importance for the betterment of relations between individuals and nations and for the establishment and maintenance of peace cannot be exaggerated.

In its past and often useless efforts to prevent wars, the world, through its international organizations, has constantly tried to define certain great principles concerning the rights of individuals and peoples, and to force their recognition and observance by all nations. It has always been because such principles have been misinterpreted, ignored or violated by a nation or a group of nations in particular that conflicts of all kinds and wars of ever-growing intensity have devastated mankind. The same remarks apply to the numerous civil wars which, from time to time, have plunged certain nations into misery, desolation and even complete destruction.

But, if these former international organizations have, on different occasions, proclaimed their belief in certain general principles, it often happened that nations could not agree on these basic rules and their opinion could not be unanimous. The immediate consequence of such disagreements was the sudden discovery of undeclared hostilities, which gradually increased and developed to become sources of quarrels resulting in conflicts and wars.

One of the causes for such failures may be attributed to the fact that such international organizations understood their tasks too late; instead of working to secure the consent of all their members to the recognition of the intangible rights and duties of each at the beginning of negotiations, they waited until differences were actually created and then sought to find a solution. When passions have been aroused, it is often too late to intervene.

It is for one of these reasons, I think, that the economic and social council of the united nations has decided to define or enact for the benefit of its negotiations a declaration of rights and duties which will be accepted by all.

Since Canada has decided, by signing the united nations charter, to do its full share in the organization of this new post-war world, and wants to take an active part in all the deliberations of the new international council, I was glad to read of the intention of the Canadian government to participate in a constructive way in this new task of preparing this international charter of freedom. Such intention was indicated in the speech from the throne and also appears clearly in the order of reference of the new committee to be appointed.

But a strange thing struck my mind when I discovered that we, members of this parliament, were called to study the preparation of a bill of rights to be applicable to the world at large. If I rightly understand the nature of our task, we are to work as a nation, together with the other nations of UNO in drafting a declaration containing the enunciation of the rights, liberties, fundamental freedoms and duties of all the nations which signed with us the San Francisco charter. Yet, we do not possess a bill of rights of our own. We are to suggest to other nations for their approval certain rules and regulations which it did not seem necessary that we should adopt ourselves.

Members of the opposition could at this point object that it was up to the government to enact a bill of rights for our own country. I would answer first, that such would have also been the duty of other governments in the past.

But, even then, some members of the opposition could again intervene and ask us why we refused to adopt the amendment they introduced in this house last year, when we were dealing with the Canadian citizenship bill; for, at that time, an amendment to section 10 of the bill was suggested which was intended to incorporate in the new legislation on Canadian citizenship a bill of rights for Canada.

Again I would answer that the amendment as introduced was incomplete, or that the incorporation of a bill of rights in our citizenship bill was not the proper thing to do. In fact, those were the reasons why the amendment could not rally the support of the members of this house.

There is, however, in my opinion, a reason of much greater importance why it is not as yet possible for this country to enact its own bill of rights without its appearing to be unsound. I do not wish to give the impression that I am against the adoption of such an important measure; on the contrary. But in such matters we have to follow the usual and normal course.

Not only has it been the constant practice, but it is only common sense to enact measures of that sort only when a country has secured the disappearance of certain ties or bonds which may paralyse its complete freedom of action or be an obstacle to the proclamation of its real independence. There are things that a country must first do if it wishes to define the inalienable and sacred rights of its citizens. Among these things, there is the inevitable obligation to adopt, before everything else, its own constitution.

If we examine the case of all the other nations which decided, at a given moment of their history, to enact a bill or declaration of rights, we shall see that such nations did not take such measures before having, first of all, enacted their own distinctive constitutions.

For instance, in the case of our neighbour the United States, that country, after proclaiming its independence by a formal declaration in 1776, adopted its constitution in 1788 by special act of government. And it was only two years later, by way of a certain number of amendments to the constitution itself, that the United States adopted what they call their bill of rights.

In fact, in many cases—and I think it is the most logical way to do it—the bill of rights is incorporated in the constitution itself. In any event, one thing appears to be undeniable. There cannot, or at least there should not, be a bill of rights or a declaration of that kind enacted by a nation unless there already exists a constitution adopted by that nation, or unless one is formed simultaneously with such declaration.

To come back to the point I raised, it is my opinion that Canada should as early as possible, in order to follow the logical course, adopt its own constitution and then discuss the enactment, if it becomes necessary, of a Canadian bill of rights.

Who will deny that the most important of our rights as free citizens is that of adopting our own constitution? I would fail to understand our attitude if we were to study a definition of our rights as Canadians, if we decided to define these rights in a special bill, while at the same time we failed to ensure for ourselves the most important of this, the right to our own constitution as a free nation.

Both actions are necessary if this country is to affirm once more its maturity; if Canada is to attain its real freedom of action; if the nation is to complete its march toward final independence. In the meantime, in so far as the rights of Canadians are concerned, I feel we cannot be better protected than by the British North America Act, by the Statute of Westminster and also by the British charters of freedom, the principles of which have been constantly applied in our own country.

I have just given the opinion that it does not appear possible to discuss the enactment of a bill of rights for Canada before this parliament has adopted its own constitution. I also said at the beginning of my remarks that, at first sight, it seemed strange to me that we should participate in the preparation of a bill of rights for other nations while we did not even possess our own. But I think our position can better be defended in that respect, and it is my belief that if Canada does not possess a codified bill of rights, it still can work with the other nations and offer its constructive suggestions toward the drafting of such a declaration for all nations of good will.

Our participation in that important task will at the same time be of great assistance to us if we ever find it useful to enact our own bill of rights; for I believe that there cannot exist different principles in the determination of such rights by a nation in particular or by the world at large. I would go farther and say that it is necessary for a nation itself to possess a bill of rights, comprising more specific definitions of rights and obligations of a purely local nature and applying to that nation in particular. On the other hand, when it comes to considering a declaration which would be suitable and acceptable to all other nations, the principles are necessarily wider and, in some cases, different and specially applicable to the international field. But in no case should it be permissible for a nation to possess a bill of rights, the principles of which would be different from and contrary to those expressed in an international declaration of the same kind.

There are in the world of today many nations which already possess their distinctive bill of rights. Some of these nations, in the course of their history, have been called upon to modify and even to repeal some of the provisions of their own bill. In fact, this remark applies to nearly all those nations which, through a longer and more agitated existence, have undergone various transformations resulting from both internal and external events. And, of course, there are nations which appear to be fonder, by temperament or otherwise, of this sort of declaration, although sometimes they might forget more often than others to put its contents into practice.

But for all nations, those which have their own bill of rights as well as those like Canada which did not find it necessary to adopt such codification, the duty is the same, and the principles enunciated in their own bill should be identical with the contents of an international bill of rights.

For this reason, it will become necessary to study the bills of rights already in existence, so that they may be modified if they contain a definition of principles which would be contrary to the basic declarations which the world would wish to incorporate in an international bill of rights. In other words, all the united nations must again find themselves in complete agreement, and none of them must be allowed to advocate doctrines to their own people and defend ways of life which the world at large cannot accept but will be bound to condemn.

In order to be clear on that point, it is my contention that every nation must conform in its internal policies as well as in its international dealings to the same inviolable rules and orders. It cannot be authorized to preach at home theories that are rejected in the international arena. Neither can it impose upon its people a way of life or restraints on its liberties which are internationally disapproved.

I am sure that attitudes of that kind cannot be permitted and any nation which would persist in their practice should be subject to international sanctions; it is not my opinion that actions of that kind should remain unchallenged under the cover of the principle defined in article 2 of the charter of the united nations. If, for instance, freedom of worship or liberty of individuals is threatened by any act of any state, such injustice should not be tolerated simply because the matter would appear to be within domestic jurisdiction. Nations must also conform to article 55 of the charter, which imposes upon all members the obligation to promote respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms. That is where it appears essential to obtain for the guidance of every nation of good will a clear definition of the rights of nations and individuals. And it is to meet this necessity that the commission on human rights was established by the economic and social council.

The delegation of Panama submitted, at the first part of the final meeting of the general assembly held at London, a draft declaration, which the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) read some time ago. Such drafts were prepared by a committee of the American Law Institute in 1943 and 1944; that is, long before UNO was created and before the charter of San Francisco was signed. For this reason, they have the merit of not being influenced by political considerations. The commission on human rights is to consider such drafts as submitted by the Panama delegation, and is to report the whole matter for consideration by the general assembly. Although Canada was not represented on the commission itself, we find that Doctor P. E. Corbett, formerly dean of the faculty of law at McGill university, who was attached to the league of nations as legal adviser of the international labour office, was a member of the committee appointed by the American Law Institute.

I have read carefully the statement as drafted by this committee, which was submitted by the delegation of Panama as a basis for the preparation of an international bill of rights. I must admit that the document, although incomplete, is quite impressive. In its eighteen articles preceded by a short preamble, it summarizes well the essential liberties and fundamental freedoms of nations as well as individuals living in society.

I do not intend to discuss at length the clauses or declarations contained in that statement, which might well be considered as the proposed international bill of rights. But I wish to make a few remarks with regard to some of the principles embodied in that statement on essential human rights and also to refer to some of its deficiencies. First, I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to an omission of prime importance in that statement on human rights as prepared by the committee of the American Law Institute. The task of that committee, composed of legal and political scientists from all important cultures of the world was, as I said, to prepare a declaration containing a summary of the essential rights of human beings. We all know—and this could only be denied by a certain group of people whose blindness or bad faith has misguided them into the desolate regions of atheism, agnosticism or proud nationalism—that all rights whatever are not conferred by man, but must originate and derive from God. In our troubled world of today, when everything seems to be confused and when doctrines of all sorts assail the minds of us all, the only intangible principle dominating all the others should be enunciated in such declaration on human rights.

In other words—and I want to be emphatic on that point—no international declaration on human rights and the rights and duties of states should be approved by the united nations and by Canada in particular, unless faith in God and also belief in religion are firmly and clearly expressed therein. Many people seem to consider the separation of church and state as indispensable to the security of a nation. They would, of course, also be of the opinion that the same principle should apply to international relations.

This group of people would consequently advocate complete exclusion of religion, not only from schools or governmental organizations, but also from international meetings. Wherever such policy was applied, past experience has shown disastrous results. It is a fact that religious hate or even religious illiteracy always becomes an enemy to progress, to national security and also to the maintenance of international peace.

I read the other day some excerpts from an interesting United States publication called the "Relation of Religion to Public Education." This book was published by the American council on education, and it contains the report and conclusions of a committee appointed by such council. The committee, after more than two years of deliberation and study, came to the conclusion that schools should accept the teaching of religion as a factor of social life. I have found the following remarks very constructive:

> On all sides we see the disintegration of loyalties . . . the revival of ancient prejudices, the increase of frustrations, the eclipse of hope. . . . Religion at its best has always been an integrating force, a spiritual tonic for a soul racked by fear and cringing in weakness. . . . Its imperfections will not be lessened by an attitude of splendid isolation on the part of intellectuals, or of indifference on the part of those responsible for the education of youth.

After the horrible catastrophe of the last war, all men of good will must again return to the eternal truth if they are to succeed in their efforts toward better international realities and the maintenance of peace.

I do not wish to confuse the issue when I express such an opinion, and I am completely at ease in speaking in that way when I review the experiences of the past. If one examines with attention those declarations of rights which at times have constituted halting places in the history of mankind, he will discover that they contained in their preamble such reference to the divine power, dispenser of all rights. Such reference is found in magna carta, the Bill of Rights of 1688, which constitute the declaration of principles so precious to British people. It is also clearly expressed in all the great charters of rights that the French people have at certain intervals adopted for their guidance. The most important of such French documents is undoubtedly the famous declaration of rights in 1789, which, written in the blood of the revolution, became a symbol for the first republic of France. Although it seemed that the leaders of the revolution wanted to crush religion at the same time as aristocracy, Robespierre insisted, before having the "déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen" adopted by the national assembly, that reference be made in the preamble to divine authority. So it was "in the presence and under the auspices of the Supreme Being" that the national assembly adopted the solemn declaration. And on October 30, 1946, when France proposed its last constitution of the fourth republic, reference was again made to the principles of 1789, and the constitution reaffirmed the same social, economic and political principles.

In the United States both the declaration of independence and the constitution and its amendments, the American people expressed its belief in the Almighty, from whom is derived every right and every power.

I could refer to a number of other declarations or constitutions adopted by other countries, such as that of Eire, for instance; and in every one that I have consulted, the same faith in God and religion was reaffirmed. The only two documents I have consulted where such indispensable references were omitted, were the statement on essential human rights of the committee of the American Law Institute and the constitution of the U.S.S.R. In the case of the committee of the American Law Institute, I am convinced that the omission could be attributed to the absent-mindedness which is often the lot of legalistic scientists. But in the second case, the omission of reference to divine power in the Russian constitution is in perfect accordance with the policies followed by that country ever since.

May I make the wish that the new international bill of rights which our worried world is trying to create and proclaim will call for the protection of Him without Whom all our quests for peace would be vain? May I also express the hope that every nation will, in that respect, come to preach and follow the same doctrine toward a better conception by man of his duties toward God? The adoption of any other kind of bill of rights would be for the world a sad mistake and a miserable blunder.

I should like to be as categorical in discussing such articles of that statement on essential human rights as deal with the freedom of opinion and expression, the habeas corpus, the right to own property and the article which concerns the right of peoples to enjoy governments of their choice through democratic elections. As I have already said, I do not intend to discuss all the principles which, in my opinion, have to be embodied in an international bill of rights. It seems to me that theoretically they are all accepted by every nation. In fact, it is often the case that such principles are better praised and glorified precisely by such governments for which it has become common practice to violate them.

For instance, I have carefully read and studied the constitution of the U.S.S.R., and I must say that I have made startling discoveries. I am sure that an attentive reading of that document will be of definite interest to every one of us.

Embodied in the constitution itself is found a chapter entitled: "Fundamental rights and duties of citizens", which might justly be called the bill of rights of the Russian people, or at least of the Russian government. It is interesting to read about the great principles defined in that declaration and to try to reconcile their application with so many events which took place in that country or behind the iron curtain in all Russian dominated countries.

One can learn for example in that Russian document in article 125 that citizens of the U.S.S.R. are guaranteed by law freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly or street processions and demonstrations. And then he will recall so many events and occasions when such freedoms were constantly denied to so many Russians.

For instance, how could it be seriously contended that newspapers in Russia are allowed to comment on world or even domestic events with the same liberty and independence as is the case in our country or in any other democratic country whatever. If such contention was made, all we can say is that the Russian government is lucky indeed to find in all the newspapers of the U.S.S.R. such complete and unfaltering agreement and support. Even our great Liberal party in its most glorious days could never succeed in obtaining from Canadian newspapermen such decisive and constant help.

If it is a Canadian who reads such article of the Russian constitution, he will remember the recent declarations of Igor Gouzenko, a former Russian citizen, who could not in his heart and in his mind conceal any longer the real truth concerning the absence of liberty and freedom in his country.

In sections 127 and 128 is embodied the great principle that citizens of the U.S.S.R. are guaranteed inviolability of the person and that no person may be placed under arrest except by decision of a court of justice. I leave it to members of this house and to the public at large to reconcile that declaration of principle with what has happened in the U.S.S.R. in the past.

And coming to article 124 of the same constitution of the U.S.S.R. one cannot help being astonished to read that, if freedom of religious worship is recognized, freedom of anti-religious propaganda is also allowed to all citizens of that country. I may say that I know of no other country where freedom of anti-religious propaganda is especially mentioned and referred to in the constitution.

If one will recall, for instance, the trial and condemnation of Archbishop Stepinac by the courts of a Russian satellite, he will be inclined to think religion might be tolerated in those countries under Russian domination, but he will also believe that anti-religious propaganda is not only permitted but is strongly encouraged.

There is also another chapter in the constitution of the U.S.S.R. dealing with the electoral system, and I could not fiind anything in it to explain or justify what happened during the recent elections held in Poland, another Russian dominated nation. We all remember the strong but useless protests uttered at that time by one of the members of the Polish government.

For all these reasons, I think the time has come for the world to define in a clear declaration what it means by the rights and fundamental freedoms of nations and individuals.

And, Mr. Speaker, in spite of some events which may at times contribute to develop pessimism in the troubled sphere of international relations, I sincerely believe that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) found the right expression when he said at one of the meetings of the general assembly at New York:

> Each state represented here has its own ideals, its own standards, its own ways of life. Differences of outlook are therefore inevitable. It is what we do about these differences that is crucial. Attempts to exploit them to the advantage of any nation or group of nations can accomplish nothing wholesome or constructive. Let us beware of recrimination, of charge and counter-charge. Let us, with good will, patience and forbearance, pursue the course which leads to resolution and not to exploitation of differences.

For these reasons, if for no other, I am firmly convinced that the proclamation of an international bill of rights will go a long way toward helping nations to attain that aim.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house sets out a state of affairs which has been discussed in the house before. The resolution of the government is based upon the charter of the united nations, and it deals with human rights and fundamental freedoms. It proposes to appoint a committee of both houses of parliament to look into the matter so as to see what can be done.

Another related resolution, which was introduced by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), dealt with all the freedoms, including freedom of religion—which we hope we shall never lose in this country—freedom of speech, freedom from fear, freedom of the press, and the right of habeas corpus. There has now been added the right under which no one would be deprived of his liberty by order in council, or detained to give evidence without the benefit of counsel.

These resolutions were discussed in the session of 1937, on February 17. A resolution I placed before the house at that time proposed the appointment of a committee to look into these freedoms. They are all based on four things. My resolution is based on these four things: parliamentary reform, constitutional reform, cabinet reform and law reform —and to a great extent the latter. A long discussion took place in the house on February 17, 1937, in which the then minister of justice took part.

So far so good. In its resolution now before the house the government seems to forget one fact, namely that by the Constitutional Act of 1791 so much of English law was copied into the constitution of Canada as was adapted to our circumstances. This included the provisions in respect of habeas corpus, the various acts which had come before the country, the rights under magna carta, the Petition of Right, the Bill of Rights and the right of habeas corpus. All these things were included. Then came the Statute of Westminster.

All those matters were dealt with in the debate in that year. As I have said, the liberty of the subject is an important matter, and something which has been dearly bought in the old land. Many people have died for it, including Ridley, Latimer and Cranmer, who were burned at the stake. Then there were the seven bishops who won freedom.

I do not want the liberty of the subject to become a meaningless thing in this country. I said the other evening that in some places trial by jury was, to some extent, supplanted by trial by newspapers. Sometimes magistrates will remand prisoners for a week or two weeks until they make up their minds.

As I said before, we in the British commonwealth are very fortunate. Through our allegiance to the crown and to common ideals and interests and loyalties, this unseen link engenders a chain of mutual sympathy which has been moulded, and which has stood the strain of two long struggles for survival.

As Lord Chatham said in 1776, there is something behind the throne greater than the king himself. As I said in the house on September 11, 1941:

> Every principle for which the British nation struggled in the old land since the 17th century has been surrendered to the political caucuses. Parliament itself, which came into being to ensure that taxes shall be voted only by those who have to pay them, has become the institution through which those who do not pay them impose them on others. I want to emphasize to the committee that powers of legislation older even than the right of taxpayers to determine the national expenditure have been surrendered, and if we are to continue this sort of thing, the power of parliament will be gone forever. Whole spheres of activity, involving the livelihood of every man, woman and child in this country, have been removed from the jurisdiction of the law and of parliament and reserved for the determination of tribunals, irresponsible, irremovable, governed by no control and subject to no appeal.

I hope that state of affairs is now at an end. Many Indians and Eskimos are not yet citizens and have no social rights, although they were here long before we were. The Indians, for example, have no civil rights or civil liberties, even though those rights were guaranteed by treaty. We are not treating these people as I hope they will be treated when the resolution is considered.

It is not constitutional changes that are needed at the present time, because the matters referred to in the resolution are already the law of the land. It is the function of our law courts to see that the law of the land is carried out. Although this parliament deals with the liberty of the subject and the criminal code and other statutes, the enforcement of the law is under the provinces. It has been contended in this parliament that this legislature should enforce its own law. I believe it would be a good thing if we did that. We have what is called a duplicate system. We have a provincial system under section 92, and within it is another duplicate municipal system. All these freedoms referred to have long been the law of the land.

What do you propose to do? As I see it, this involves no constitutional change at all. The constitution is clear; that is not what we need in connection with these matters. After two long wars to secure freedom we need a change in the hearts of men. That is one thing which is more essential than anything else. We have been going around in a circle trying to find a solution to this problem. We propose now to appoint a committee, but that will lead to nowhere. We have had royal commissions, committees, conferences and ministers travelling abroad on this mission, and members of all parties have gone travelling, but it seems to me that all their efforts have largely been failures. As Tennyson said in his, "In Memoriam":

> Let knowledge grow from more to more.

And again in the early stanzas of "In Memoriam":

> Our little systems have their day;
> They have their day and cease to be:
> They are but broken lights of thee,
> And thou, O Lord, art more than they.

As I see it, one of the main factors is that we must get people back to where they started years ago, back to religion. Freedom of religion is one of the things in the charter which the government has set out. I believe that one of the great changes which will come about in this country is that we shall return, as I said the other day, to religion and the principles of Christianity. St. James in his General Epistle, chapter 1, verses 26 and 27, says of freedom and religion:

> If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his own tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain.
> Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

We have always had freedom of religion in this country. I know I have never seen any bigotry in the city from which I come, and I was born there. All the citizens have the same freedom; they are equal; they can run for any office. Some of the brightest students that we have are children of parents who came from European and other foreign countries, and long may it continue that way.

How are we to solve these problems? I do not know, but I wish to refer to what I said when this discussion was up before. I referred to the fact that in the early days of this country everybody owned some property, a farm, a little mill or something else. We have been slow to see how the rights of property have been taken away in Canada by big business; the old business has passed away, and a large majority of the people are just proletarians. In the days of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier it was quite different. In this house we are behind the times, and unless we make up and reform our house from within, it will be reformed from without. So far as my knowledge goes, none of the great reforms that have marked the history of England since 1800 originated within parliament; every one began outside. The same is true of our house. All our great reforms, except those which were initiated a few years ago, began outside the house. Reform was not enacted into law, either in Canada or in England, until parliaments were driven to do something. Look at the mother country. Parliamentary reform did not start in the House of Commons or the House of Lords, but outside those houses. The abolition of the slave trade, the abolition of the corn laws, prison reform, colonial reform, catholic emancipation and the reform of the franchise —all these started outside parliament.

I remember away back in the days when we had a committee which investigated the white-collar worker and the great reform which went on in our industrial system. That committee was appointed to make an inquiry in connection with the freedoms set out in this charter. What was the result? We were told about the principles of magna carta that no free man shall be arrested or detained in prison, and so on, and that there shall be no taxation without representation. Is that the law in Canada today? No. We have appointed numerous outside bodies that are imposing taxation. It was in defence of that principle of no taxation without representation that the American colonies commenced their struggle with the British government. Yet under universal suffrage we see magna carta restricted, if not abolished, and almost kingly powers conferred upon magistrates in connection, for instance, with the restricting of bail. Thousands of people are in prison for debt.

All the great landmarks of our constitutional history, beginning with magna carta, going on to the Declaration of Rights, the Petition of Right, and the Statute of Westminster, were founded on one principle; they were simply the reassertion of the principle of the subjection of the executive and of its members to the law of the land. It was the strength of the barons that made magna carta possible; a police force, so to speak, not to be used unless necessary, which gave us the liberty of our whole constitutional system. Today that liberty is contracted. Today the Canadian working man is at the mercy of arbitrary social conditions beyond his control. A century ago the reform of the franchise secured the liberty of trade and industry for the mercantile and industrial middle classes. Later it was extended to wage-earners; then women were given the franchise and their aid enlisted in the betterment of social conditions. We cannot afford any longer to sit still here and take no notice of what is going on in Canada. The danger to our freedom is greater from within Canada than from without.

What is Canada's answer to all this? First, we should put our own place in order, overhaul the British North America Act and revise our parliamentary system and the other systems I have named. We should adopt some system of Christian socialism for the workers of this country, the white-collar employees, the artisans and the farmers. A system of Christian socialism was brought in a hundred years ago by the industrial revolution in England. A similar movement brought about the evangelic and Oxford movements. There were great social reforms brought about in England a hundred years ago and similar reforms have been long overdue in Canada.

We must strive for freedom from within. We must be forever on our guard. It was the armed strength of the barons which made magna carta possible, and it is the armed strength of the British empire which will ensure the freedom of the British people. History shows that disarmament is impossible in a world where intolerance is so rampant. The disarmament of the free is the tyrant's chance now as in the days of King John.

In the debate on constitutional reform on February 17, 1937, I referred to how the provincial legislatures were created, and I had a word to say in relation to industrial employment, contrasting the precepts of Christianity with the way in which our industrial workers are used. Personality counts as nothing; the dollar is all supreme. Modern life is machine life, soulless, a life of standardization, a high speed production, a highly efficient organization for the making of profit. Dividends are the chief objective; to get dividends, human beings are sacrificed. Wages were often below the level of mere subsistence, so that people were forced into other ways of life to eke out a precarious livelihood. I spoke of the long hours of work exacted, but reforms have been brought about in that. Senior employees, after long years of faithful service, were in many cases cast out without a retiring allowance to make room for younger people. I said that the admonition, "Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ," was not being carried out. So, Mr. Speaker, these matters were before the house and before the countrry back in 1937. I do hope that something will be done to straighten out all these matters.

I should like to quote what I said in an election campaign in September, 1934 in Toronto-Broadview. I said:

> I am for property rights and contract rights of the capitalistic system and sound money but I am also for human rights first, last and all the time, and a social order that will give fair play to labour and the consumer and for removal of the admitted abuses of the capitalistic system. The cause of freedom needs our eternal vigilance. There is no true liberty for the working man today if his whole life and that of his family are continuously at the mercy of arbitrary economic forces wholly beyond his control.
> Take, for example, the effect of modern machinery on unemployment. Every new process seems to put men out of work. Our artisans are becoming machine minders, and women can mind machines as well as men. Thus you get a rise in female employment and a disastrous fall in the number of men at work. It is apparent to anyone that the very object of machines is to put men out of work. That is the reason they are invented and installed and they succeed in their purpose. Where is liberty while all this goes on?
> The welfare of man should be our greatest care as a people and that of our workers' children. There can be no true remedy until the whole structure of our national and economic life is so remodeled as to aim at a national balance and stability rather than at the largest immediate profits.
> It is more important that men, heads of households, should have the status of remunerative work than that our boards of trade and Department of Trade and Commerce should publish returns showing an increase in the country's wealth without any explanation of how that wealth was distributed.

The schoolteacher and not the judge or magistrate or policeman is the best protector of life and property today, as in the days of Lord Macaulay, 100 years ago.

The committee on price spreads appointed by the former prime minister of this country, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, did a great deal of good. I hope that the government will take this matter up and give consideration to all the matters that were included before as well as those to which I have referred to tonight.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss the general proposition of the motion that is before the house. I am prompted to say a few words by the utterance of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart). He has deemed it wise to criticize, in definite and pointed language, the conduct of the two commissioners who presided over the investigation into what is commonly called the espionage case. I think it was the great Napoleon who said that the best argument was reiteration. On no fewer than three previous occasions I have referred to the frequent and unfortunate appointment of members of the bench to tasks which lay beyond their judicial function. We declare frequently that we believe in the rule of law. The rule of law means to most of us a system of government which through its different branches makes laws, administers laws and interprets and applies laws to individual cases. Laws are made in parliament; they are administered by the executive, and they are interpreted and made applicable to cases by the judiciary. Happy indeed is the country which has a judiciary in which the people have complete and abiding confidence. That has been the lot of the Canadian people. Never yet within my ken has the judiciary, when acting within its proper sphere, been subjected to criticism in parliament or beyond. But in the last two or three years we have heard members of the judiciary criticized, and criticized violently, for their conduct and for their statements when fulfilling duties allotted and assumed beyond their own proper sphere of judicial activity.

My whole life, Mr. Speaker, has been spent before the courts. I believe in the courts. I believe in the integrity of the courts. I believe in the integrity of our judges, and I am made sad by the practice which exposes that great institution, the judiciary, to criticism such as we have heard levelled at it tonight. Some will say that criticism is unwarranted. I am not going into the issue as to whether or not it is warranted; but I submit that the conduct of the government, in appointing members of the courts to duties beyond their judicial office which expose them to criticism such as we have heard tonight, is unfortunate if not reprehensible. I am not prone to be unduly critical of those, who, in the immediate aftermath of the war appointed these gentlemen to the duties in the execution of which they have been so bitterly criticized. I am not prone to criticize the gentlemen themselves who answered the summons of the government, but I do say we have witnessed the fact that they have been criticized. We know that no judge can suffer that kind of criticism and not have it reflect upon the court of which he forms a part. I say to the government—and I must be fair, for there were grounds to say as much to governments which preceded it—stop this abominable practices of using judges to solve political or partisan problems. The practice is growing; every time that the government has a political problem that is urgent; every time that it encounters a political situation that is difficult of solution, it refers it to a commission and names a judge to preside over the commission, so that the problem may be stayed or solved largely by the high repute of the arbiter. It is not right that men who have been appointed to judicial office, men upon whose integrity and upon whose reputation for integrity depend the fortune, the good name and the liberty of the citizen, should undertake tasks which cause them to be called partisans and tools of government.

I am going to ask the government, not for the first time, not for the second time and not for the third time, to desist from the pernicious practice of naming men who hold high judicial office to preside over commissions and committees for the solution of problems that are highly tinged with politics. And should perchance my plea fall upon deaf ears, I ask the judiciary, men whom we respect and rely upon, to have the courage and dignity to refuse when they are asked to enter upon a field which exposes them and their high office to the suspicion and to the criticism, the like of which we have heard this evening.

Every word that was uttered tonight in criticism of these gentlemen I felt almost as a personal affront, for I knew it was a wound in the side of the great institution in the service of which I have spent my life. Never has there been a time, Mr. Speaker, when as a people we depended more upon the courage upon the integrity, upon the wisdom and upon the high repute of the judiciary than today when all about us shakes and trembles. A law-abiding people, we depend for the honest interpretation of our laws upon a judiciary whose reputation is inviolate. We ask the government to spare the Canadian judiciary so that its great tradition for impartiality may persist and its record continue.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I believe that the crux of the resolution before us is contained in the instruction that is given to the committee to consider:

> . . . what steps, if any, it would be advisable to take or to recommend for the purpose of preserving in Canada respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Our horizon has indeed been broadened by the terms of this resolution to the question of an international bill of rights. But I want to congratulate the framer of this resolution on the recognition that it gives to the fact that as a country we can best play our part in seeking to establish freedom around the world by making sure that it burns brightly within our own boundaries.

We have, to begin with, in this country a great heritage. Let there be no doubt about that. But some of us feel that that heritage is in danger. Perhaps one of the reasons why it is in danger is that it is precisely what the word implies, a heritage, not something that we won or fought for ourselves, but something that was handed down to us by people across the seas.

I dare to hope that, as the years go on, we shall transform that heritage into something really native, really part of the life of this country. In the meantime, we must face the fact that if we are to maintain and enlarge upon that heritage eternal vigilance is the price we must pay.

I should like to quote a paragraph from the writings of a distinguished gentleman in this country to whom reference has been made several times already today. I refer to Mr. B. K. Sandwell, who says this:

> Canadians have never had to achieve their own rights as against their own governments. They had to achieve the rights of their own government as against the government of the mother country, but the rights which they as individuals have against their own governments they inherited from that mother country. For that reason they may not appreciate them as highly as the British, who achieved them over many generations, or as the Americans, who devised a set of their own when they devised their own constitution. For that reason also they may not realize how very easily they can be lost nor, once lost, how desperately difficult they are to recover.

I was interested this afternoon in the argument put forth by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) for getting along if we can without a written bill of rights. He sang the praises of unwritten rights, of an unwritten constitution; and I am sure that there is something in all of us that responds to the idea of our rights and our freedoms being so clearly understood, so indelibly written into the hearts of our people that they do not need to be written in law and statute.

Unfortunately, however, we do not start from scratch. We are not in the situation where freedom and liberty are ours without question. We have had certain precedents. Reference has already been made to them today, to laws and orders in council that have been passed, which, in the view of some of us, have constituted a denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms. It is because we have had these denials that it has become necessary to make impossible their recurrence by getting down in writing the rights and freedoms that are ours.

In any society which has only an unwritten constitution, precedent plays a big part. I believe it is fair to say that that is the case in the United Kingdom. There is not a written constitution there, but there is a body of law and statute that has grown up through the years, and wrapped up in it is the story of one precedent after another. In that case, the precedents are overwhelmingly on the side of freedom and liberty.

We have many such precedents here. We also have in recent years precedents that are on the other side, and it is because we have these negative precedents that it is no longer possible for us to depend on an unwritten statement of our freedoms. We must get it down in black and white. I agree with those who have said, on both sides of the house, that this is not a matter to rush into merely by the presentation of a resolution or a bill to the house and by the passage of it by a majority vote. Not only is it a matter that should be referred to and discussed by a committee of the house as suggested in the resolution before us, but I support the proposal that representatives from the provinces might also be consulted before we achieve a final statement.

I accept the suggestion that a declaration of rights might be even more desirable than a bill of rights, but I press the point that the time has come in our Canadian history to get in writing the freedoms and liberties that we are seeking to establish, seeking to make not just a heritage we have received from the past but very much our own.

The result of the experiences we have had in recent years with the denial of certain rights and freedoms that we believed to be fundamental is that there has been a spontaneous growth of associations across the country concerned about civil liberties. I hold in my hand a communication from the Civil Liberties Association of Manitoba. I call the attention of the house to this one because it comes from my own province and I know quite well the executive members and the membership generally of this association. The letter before me is signed by Professor W. J. Waines as president of the Civil Liberties Association of Manitoba, and Professor David Owens as secretary, and I should like to place on record the suggested declaration of rights which this association has placed in the hands of all members of parliament.

I may say that this proposed declaration was sent to us after a recent meeting which was held in the city of Winnipeg, very largely attended, where citizens of that city made clear their interest in this question and their support of a declaration of rights.

Before I read the six points in this declaration, may I read one short paragraph from the letter accompanying it:

> We do not presume that every person concerned about rights will approve of the details and phraseology of the inclosed. We desire rather that the principles should be accepted, unprejudiced by the possible need for minor alterations in the statement.

It was in that spirit that this declaration was sent to us and it is in that spirit that I place it on the record of the house.

1. No Canadian citizen shall be exiled, nor deprived of his citizenship in any part, nor be discriminated against in the exercise of his citizenship because of race, religion, colour, sex, language or political beliefs.

2. No Canadian citizen shall be denied justice as administered in the regularly constituted courts of law; nor be denied protection against arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. To this end, and except in time of actual insurrection or invasion, the writ of habeas corpus shall override any administrative order to the contrary.

3. No Canadian citizen shall be denied freedom of religion in the right to profess, advocate and practise any conscientious belief not inconsistent with the rights of others.

4. No Canadian citizen shall be denied freedom of expression, either in speech or writing, except as provided in the laws respecting slander, libel and blasphemy.

5. No Canadian citizen shall be denied the right of peaceable assembly; nor be denied the right of association or organization for any peaceful purpose not inconsistent with the rights of others.

6. No Canadian citizen shall be denied the right to petition the government or to criticize it in good faith; nor be restricted in the right to bring suit against the crown or any administrative board, agent or corporation acting on behalf of the crown.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Do you believe the communistic party to be a political party and, if a man had political views along communistic lines, would you say he should not be deported?

Mr. KNOWLES: I will answer that question at another time. It is not asked at all in the spirit of this debate.

Mr. FULTON: What is the spirit of the debate?

Mr. KNOWLES: The spirit of the debate is one that concerns something very sacred and fundamental, and I thought the tone of the debate had been set by the speech made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) and the able speech made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I suggest that the debate should go on in that tone.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I say that introducing what you are doing into this speech, you brought the question on yourself, and you cannot answer it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I can answer the question quite easily, but for the reasons I have stated I shall not bother.

Mr. FERGUSON: You are embarrassed.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am presenting to the house at the moment a suggestion for a declaration of rights which comes from as responsible a body as there is in connection with this matter anywhere in the country, the Civil Liberties Association of Manitoba.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are not communists.

Mr. KNOWLES: No.

Mr. FERGUSON: All of them or some of them?

Mr. COLDWELL: None of them.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does my hon. friend imply that those who compose this association are communists?

Mr. FERGUSON: I will answer you at some more opportune time.

Mr. KNOWLES: Now who is it that will not answer the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Two opportunists in one evening.

Mr. FERGUSON: You cannot answer the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members not to interrupt the member who has the floor.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the spirit of the short paragraph I read from the letter from Professor

Waines and Professor Owens, before I quoted the six points, I should like to add a seventh point of my own. It has already been suggested a number of times in this debate, but I feel that when the question is being considered by the committee the whole story of human rights and fundamental freedoms should be before us. I would therefore suggest No. 7 to read:

No Canadian citizen shall be denied the right to freedom from fear and freedom from want.

The fact that an organization of men and women such as comprise this association, and others across the country, are concerned about this matter, bears witness to the need of something being done about it at the earliest possible moment. References have already been made today to the obvious encroachments on our civil liberties that have already occurred in this country.

First of all, there is racial discrimination. It does seem to me to be tragic, after what certain racial theories did to this world from 1939 to 1945, that any form of racial discrimination should be continued in any country that adheres to the democratic way and believes in human rights and fundamental freedoms. I was sorry to pick up a United States paper a few days ago—the Christian Science Monitor, which does such a good job of reporting—and have to read therein, as a Canadian, an article about our continuing on our statute books a law that denies to certain Canadians, because of their racial origin, rights which are accorded to other Canadian citizens. I am not going into any detail on that matter just now because we discussed it in another debate. But I suggest that the eternal vigilance which we must use to preserve freedom sooner or later must bring us around to the point where we get rid of racial discrimination from the statute law of this country. May we do it soon.

Reference has also been made this afternoon or evening to religious persecution as it has been practised in various parts of Canada. In recent months and recent years we have also had attacks on the rights of labour, injunctions against picketing and so on. We have people picked up because of their activities as trade union organizers, and on one pretext or another, imprisoned. Then we have had the whole sorry espionage incident which has been discussed so fully by speakers who have preceded me. I will not go into these matters in any further detail, but I just wanted to mention them as a prelude to something else that I wish to speak about, but which I fear I shall have to leave over until the next day we meet. At this point I would simply say that there are these obvious, but none the less serious threats to our liberty and freedom to which we must give some consideration.

There are, however, other threats to our freedom which are less obvious but which, in my view, are more sinister. They are threats not generally considered in discussions about civil liberty. It is about these very real threats that I wish to speak. But since it is almost eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and since this is launching into another part of what I wish to say, perhaps I might be permitted to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Knowles the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, May 19, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata) moved:

That the second report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on May 14 last, be now concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, believe it or not, I am not asking for any personal favour. As always, I represent the views of my electors, who have been very good to me and who do not want the wishes or suggestions of outsiders to be substituted for theirs. During the first days of the year there were some people at Trois Pistoles who thought it would be well to make a new county from part of Temiscouata and part of Rimouski. But as the combined population of Temiscouata and Rimouski is about 100,000, there are not enough people to make a third constituency. If it was the wish of my electors to make a different choice, I would have agreed to it because I would not go against the expressed will of the people. However, their desire, as manifested by petitions, is to stay in Temiscouata county; therefore I submit that a request or petition made by outsiders should have no weight with the redistribution committee.

My electors do not complain of the redistribution committee; they are satisfied with the work that has been done under my esteemed colleague the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret). I want to pay a special tribute to him for the arduous and painstaking work he has done in an effort to give justice to everybody.

It is not my desire to embark upon a discussion of the report of the redistribution committee in connection with other constituencies. All I am dealing with now is the report of the committee on standing orders, to which committee has been referred the petitions which I have tabled. After they were tabled they were examined by the clerk of the committee, and he said that the petitions were not drawn in proper form and therefore should not be received. Then I argued that some of the forms were antiquated, and I thank the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) for the support that he gave me on that occasion. He spoke as a great parliamentarian, as he always does; what he said has been appreciated by my electors on whose behalf I speak today, and I convey their thanks to him. I cannot thank you, Mr. Speaker and Mr. Beauchesne, but I can express to you the deep appreciation of my electors of the spirit of fairness that you showed on that occasion. When the matter was brought before the committtee another one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight), spoke very well, and expressed in the committee views similar to those which have been expressed in the house by the hon. member for Peel. To him also I convey the thanks of my electors.

I shall not take up much of the time of the house but I have here some very fine articles which have been published in different papers, Montreal Matin of May 5, the Ottawa Journal of May 6, the Toronto Daily Star of May 9 and the Ottawa Journal of May 14; and if I am allowed to do so I shall table them in order to save time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to place on the record these reports from newspapers?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Evitons les "chinoiseries"

Nos grammairiens se sont montrés très injustes à l'égard des Orientaux quand ils ont permis que le mot "chinoiserie" servît à désigner toute démarche, manifestation ou règlement inutile.

Mais nous n'y pouvons rien et, à maintes reprises, l'occasion nous est fournie de nous plaindre de "chinoiseries" particulièrement de "chinoiseries administratives". Celles-là sont abondantes: jamais, probablement, n'y en a-t-il eu autant.

La plus récente, c'est M. Jean-François Pouliot, député de Témiscouata, qui l'a signalée alors que deux pétitions présentées par un groupe de ses commettants risquaient d'être mises de côtés, parce qu'elles n'étaient pas rédigées dans les termes précis exigés par les règlements.

Les électeurs de Témiscouata, en personnes intelligentes, ont abrégé. Comme l'expliquait M. Pouliot, "ils ont exposé ce qu'ils voulaient en langage simple et très clair". Or, selon les règlements de la Chambre, c'était trop clair, trop simple, trop abrégé surtout, d'où l'intervention du député de Témiscouata pour empêcher que la requête aille tout droit au panier.

Rien d'étonnant que certaines lois et ordonnances soient tellement emberlificotées, si l'on songe qu'elles sont l'œuvre de législateurs ne prisant guère un langage simple et clair et préférant, au contraire, les formalités surabondantes qui compliquent et... embêtent.

The Form or the Substance

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot, member for Temiscouata, brought an extraordinary ruling to the attention of the House of Commons the other day. Two petitions signed by hundreds of electors in that riding and addressed to the House were refused consideration, he said, because they did not use the prescribed "sacramental words".

The petitions, Mr. Pouliot explained, had to do with redistribution, and were tabled in the ordinary way, but were not turned over to the Redistribution Committee because they did not conform to ceremonial practice. "They were addressed", said the Member for Temiscouata, "to Mr. Speaker and to members of the House of Commons instead of to the Honourable the House of Commons in Parliament assembled". That was the first offence. But worse was to come. The prescribed words "The petition of the undersigned humbly sheweth" were missing, the argument was not divided into paragraphs each beginning with the word "That", and the conclusion omitted the prescribed formality, "And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray". His electors, said Mr. Pouliot, were not strong on red tape, but they had made their meaning clear and plain.

Mr. Graydon supported Mr. Pouliot's request that the petitions be sent on to their intended destination, and the Speaker promised to look into the matter. Mr. Graydon's words were very sensible. "We should not be governed so much by the form as by the substance of a petition such as this", he said. "When the common people of Canada decide that they want to petition the House of Commons we should place as few obstacles as possible in the way."

With that doctrine we thoroughly agree. Parliament is the servant of the people, not its master, and nothing is less important than the form a petition to Parliament takes. If it is the honest expression of a group of electors on a matter of public concern, expressed in decent and intelligible language, obviously it should be received and considered, and if the rules interfere then the rules should be changed.

Jean-Francois Scored That Time

That genial man and Independent Liberal, Jean-Francois Pouliot of Temiscouata, gets sometimes upon the nerves of parliament. But when it comes to an issue of red tape vs. common sense, Jean-Francois is usually on the right side. He was on the right side the other day when he protested the rejection of two petitions which had been forwarded by his constituents.

It is a fundamental principle of democracy that the electors should have no difficulty in making their wishes known to their parliamentary representatives; if not personally, at least by letter. The post office recognizes this and charges no postage on letters to or from members at Ottawa during a session or ten days prior to it. It is also in accord with democratic principles that a group of individuals should have the right to contact parliament as a whole by way of a petition. That their petition must contain certain specified phrases may be a rule of parliament, but it is a rule which should not be too closely insisted upon.

In the present instance, certain electors of Temiscouata wished to protest a proposed change in their riding under the redistribution, and Mr. Pouliot presented two petitions from them to that effect, believing that these would be received and go to the redistribution committee. But they got tangled up in red tape. The rules say that petitions should be addressed to "the Honourable the House of Commons in parliament assembled." These were addressed to "Mr. Speaker and members of the House of Commons." The prescribed words, "the petition of the undersigned humbly sheweth," were omitted, as were the closing words the rules call for, "and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray." Moreover, the petitions were not divided into paragraphs, each beginning with "that"—evidently a particularly heinous fault. On these grounds the petitions were turned down.

It is no wonder that Mr. Pouliot protested. Mr. Gordon Graydon backed him up and said: "We should not be governed so much by the form as by the substance of a petition such as this. When the common people of Canada decide that they want to petition the House of Commons, we should place as few obstacles as possible in the way of their getting their views tabled in the House. I suggest that we waive any technicalities in this matter and allow the petition presented by the hon. member for Temiscouata to be tabled as he suggests."

Hansard does not record that Mr. Graydon's remarks evoked a cheer, but they should have done so. At any rate, Mr. Pouliot got action. The Speaker explained that "the House is not seized (what a word!) of a petition addressed to the members without mentioning the words 'in parliament assembled.'" The omission of "and your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray," was not so serious. The learned authority "May" agrees that while those words are "generally added," they are not necessary. In any event there was a way out. Mr. Pouliot could move that the petitions go to the committee on standing orders—which he did. And no doubt the committee on redistribution will finally get them.

But what nonsense it is to insist on stilted and archaic forms of expression. One of these days someone will faint if "sheweth" in a petition appears as "showeth", or if a bill is "entitled" instead of "intituled." Let red tape perish!

Those Letter Rules

The other day Mr. Pouliot complained in the Commons that the house had refused to receive some petitions from electors in his riding, Temiscouata, because they were not couched in the prescribed phraseology. The petitions had to do with redistribution, and their natural destination was the special committee dealing with that problem. Mr. Graydon in the discussion supported Mr. Pouliot's contention that since the desire of the petitioners was clearly expressed the wording of the document should not prevent them from being heard.

This week the question came before the standing orders committee of the house, and it refused to accept the petitions on the ground that they were improperly worded and did not conform to precedent—the reason also was advanced that to let them go on to the redistribution committee would be contrary to the ruling of the present and former speakers.

This time it was Mr. Knight of Saskatoon who, in the standing orders committee, opposed so fine an example of red tape and hampering custom. He took the ground that any citizen should have the right to take his case to parliament, and that antiquated rules should not stand in the way—"the spirit is much more important than the letter."

However the majority were against him, and against Mr. Pouliot and Mr. Graydon. We think it was an unfortunate ruling. We do not know what the Temiscouata petitioners ask, and it does not matter. What matters is that they have something they want to say to the House of Commons and are refused a hearing because of their ignorance of certain formalities set out many years ago.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, is not this matter already before the redistribution committee of the House of Commons?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been listening to the hon. member and awaiting to call attention to the fact that he should not discuss on his motion the redistribution of representation, as that matter has been referred to a committee of the house. Of course he is allowed to discuss the form of the petition which has been refused by the clerk of petitions.

Mr. POULIOT: Here is the report to which I refer, the main part of which I shall read in a few moments. There was also a letter and a petition from his worship the mayor of Squatteck, which will be submitted in due course to the committee on standing orders according to the procedure which has been established. But, sir, there are two points which I desire to consider in my brief remarks. They are the two points which have been raised by the committee on standing orders. This is a question of parliamentary procedure, and I took the trouble to analyse what was said about that matter.

The rule previous to standing order No. 1 read as follows:

In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by sessional or other orders, the rules, usages and forms of proceedings of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in force on the first day of July, 1867, shall be followed.

That was observed when the rules were amended in 1906. I hold in my hand the Votes and Proceedings of March 15, 1927, and there is an explanation under that old rule which reads as follows:

This rule prevents the house from accepting in unprovided cases the practice followed in Great Britain since the first of July, 1867. There is no valid reason why English precedents, where Canadian ones do not exist, should not be accepted irrespective of the dates at which they were established.

Which means that we can go very far back for precedents. I quote again:

The rule goes too far inasmuch as it compels the house to follow the British rules in force prior to 1867. It is somewhat difficult to be governed in any case by the rules of the British parliament as they do not always suit our conditions, whilst there is a better scope for meeting all requirements in accepting as guides its customs and usages.

In other words and according to the quotation I have just given, English procedure and customs and usages where Canadian ones do not exist, shall be accepted irrespective of the dates at which they were established. They offer a better scope for meeting all requirements and they shall be accepted as guides.

May says at page 794:

The right of petitioning the crown and parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the constitution. It has been uninterruptedly exercised from very early times, and has had a profound effect in determining the main forms of parliamentary procedure.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica is much more honest than May in that regard. It contains the following: "The political importance of petitioning dates from about the reign of Charles I," who was beheaded in 1649. "The development of the practice of petitioning had proceeded so far in the reign of Charles II, as to lead to the passing in 1662 of an act (13 Charles II, chapter 5) against "tumultuous petitioning", which is still on the statute book . . . And in 1817 (57 George III, chapter 19, section 23) meetings within a mile from Westminster Hall for the purpose of considering a petition to either house of parliament while either house is sitting were declared to be unlawful assemblies."

Mr. COLDWELL: What date was that?

Mr. POULIOT: That was in 1817.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The first edition of "A Treatise on the Law, Principles and Usage of Parliament" by Sir Thomas Erskine May, Clerk of the House of Commons "was in preparation exactly fifty years ago (1843-44) during those halcyon days of parliamentary existence when the standing orders of the House of Commons, now ninety-seven in number, were only fourteen"—I counted only ten—"when no rule or order prescribed that previous notice should be given a motion, however important; and when a motion might be met by any form of amendment, however grotesquely irrelevant. Excluding the standing orders which require the recommendation of the crown to motions involving a money change, and which regulate the presentation of petitions, the parliamentary procedure of 1844 was essentially the procedure on which the House of Commons conducted business during the Long parliament." This is from the preface of the tenth edition of May which has not been reproduced in the 14th.

In the very last of his countless last speeches, delivered on the eve of his resignation as Prime Minister of England, I heard Stanley Baldwin speak as follows at the Empire day and coronation banquet of the combined empire societies in London on May 24, 1937:

If you will only do as I have done, study the history of the growth of the constitution, from the time of the civil war until the Hanoverians came to the throne, you will see what a country can do without the aid of logic, but with the aid of common sense. Therefore my next point is: do not let us put any part of our constitution in a strait-waistcoat, because strangulation is the ultimate fate. And I would say one more thing: do not let us be too keen on definition.

How could anyone reason with the aid of common sense and without the aid of logic? I may therefore be excused for not following the advice of the right hon. gentleman, as I intend to be keen on definitions with the aid of both logic and common sense.

The same year the empire parliamentary conference met at Westminster Hall, which no building in the United Kingdom overshadows in historic importance. It is haunted by the ghost of Charles I, Warren Hastings, Sir Thomas More, Lambert, the Earl of Strafford and the cynically humorous old "Fox of the North", Simon Fraser, Lord Lovat; and many of the ceremonies in connection with the coronation of English kings were enacted under its lofty timbered roof. The Right Hon. Sir John Simon, who was then Secretary of State for Home Affairs, and who had been described as "a great statesman, an expert politician, and a great constitutional lawyer", made an amazing speech in which he asked this strange question:

> Do you think that ministers of the crown will be able to continue under the increasing pressure and speed of modern conditions to do their work as ministers, and to sit in the legislature as well?

As I was invited to speak immediately after him, I gave my answer to the question, and it was as follows:

> There is the alternative of suppressing either one or the other. If we suppress the cabinet the situation would be the same, because every member of parliament will be a cabinet minister and we shall have anarchy. If parliament is suppressed we shall have fascism, which Mr. Dillon hates and Mr. Lansbury detests.

The subject matter of the discussion being, "The future of parliamentary government", I spoke of the parliamentary procedure of the British empire.

The first standing order was passed in 1707, and there were only four in 1821. I made a comparison with the Quebec legislature, which has 688 rules, and I expressed the view that the rules of the various legislative bodies of the British empire were much more complete and to the point than those of Westminster. A New Zealand delegate said that he could conceive of a parliament being conducted without any standing orders at all. "I do not think", said he, "that the question of standing orders has very much weight so far as parliamentary institutions are concerned. If you have a Speaker who is a fair and just man, if you have tolerance in the chamber so that you listen to what others have to say, and if you follow the Speaker's ruling, I do not think it matters very much whether there are written standing orders or not."

He expressed the view that we should rely on the spirit of fairness of the Speaker and the spirit of tolerance of our fellow members, as I do now.

Sir Thomas Erskine May, who has been acknowledged as the main authority on the law, privilege, proceedings and usage of parliament, was born in London in 1815, the year of Waterloo. He was only sixteen when, in 1831, the Speaker of the House of Commons nominated him to the post of assistant librarian. At the time of his appointment there were only four standing orders, but countless were the precedents of every description.

In 1818 Hatsell had published a book entitled "Precedents of Proceedings in the House of Commons." May decided to do better, and he was given "the kind assistance of many gentlemen" to write a book which he filled with all the precedents he could gather, without using proper discernment. He included even those that were, according to his own description, "grotesquely irrelevant", and he went so far as to fabricate precedent. He was only twenty-nine when his illegible book was published. Twenty-seven years later he was appointed clerk of the House of Commons. He was raised to the peerage in 1886, under the title of Baron Farnborough of Farnborough, in the county of Southampton, a few days before his death.

He was born a collector, and his so-called treatise would be compared to the house which the Collyer brothers, who died not long ago in downtown New York, had filled with junk. The editors sell the revised fourteenth edition of the book for only $30.

The main portion of the report of the committee on standing orders reads as follows:

> Authorities on parliamentary procedure and practice, which are binding on the house under standing order 68, are unanimous in declaring: (1) that all petitions should commence with the superscription: "To the Honourable the House of Commons in Parliament assembled"; (2) that the conclusion should be the prayer, without which no petition is in order.

The only way to check up the authorities in the matter of precedents is to find out the first precedent. To my great surprise I discovered that Bourinot, 4th edition, pages 234 to 235, referred to May, page 525; and to my greater surprise I found out that May, 13th edition, 1924, page 610 and 14th edition, 1946, page 795, had no ruling to quote to support his contention that petitions to the House of Commons should be superscribed, "To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in parliament assembled." In fact he quoted no ruling whatever for his suggestion of an antiquated form of petition to the House of Commons, which has been reverently followed by all the authors on parliamentary practice for over a century.

Standing order 68 mentions only "a petition to the house". What is "the house" if it is not "Mr. Speaker and Messrs. the members of the House of Commons"? I have the evidence of Hansard to show that the petitions were tabled when the house was assembled. Why should we be bound to use nowadays the formula which May took upon himself to suggest 103 years ago? Is it not musty, rancid, decayed and out of date?

Now I come to the prayer. May says, at pages 795 and 796 that—

> Without a prayer a document will not be taken as a petition.

He gives two references, namely Commons Journal, 1651-59, page 427 and Commons

Journal, 1843, page 457. I looked up the first reference at page 427 of volume 7 of the Commons Journal for September 23, to 25, 1656. History tells us that it was during the protectorate of Cromwell, and four years before the restoration of Charles II in 1660. There was nothing to support May's declaration. I turned the pages of that old book and read on page 171 that on August 27, 1652 a committee for petitions was appointed to meet in the Star Chamber. Those who have revised May's book have been right on one point, when they wrote in the preface to the tenth edition that "the parliamentary procedure of 1844 was essentially the procedure on which the House of Commons conducted business during the Long Parliament," and it is still the same today. It has not changed with the times.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I will call to the attention of hon. members of the house the reference given by May in the latest, the fourteenth, edition published in February, 1946. Ten references to remonstrances, signatures, forgery or fraud on petitions date back to two centuries before the reform bill of 1832. They are in the Commons Journals for the following years: 1667 to 1687; 1688 to 1693; 1772 to 1774; 1792 to 1793; 1807; 1812 and 1813; 1817; 1821; 1826 and 1827; 1831. This book was out of the press last year. Could it be called a modern book?

May's second reference to the necessity of the prayer on petitions was Commons Journal of July 7, 1843, in the seventh year of Victoria, page 457. There was no ruling of the Chair about it. All I found was that a remonstrance of the secretary of the National Association, praying the house to establish better representative government, had been laid on the table and it was withdrawn the following Monday. Doctor Johnson calls "remonstrance"—strong representation.

There are so many interchangeable words in the dictionary that they have given birth to basic English. I looked up the Dictionary of the English Language by Doctor Samuel Johnson and I notice there that the words petition, request, supplication, prayer, entreaty, solicitation were interchangeable. Here is what he said with regard to "prayer."

1. Petition to heaven.
2. Mode of petition.
3. Practice of supplication.
4. Single formula of petition.

Then in the Oxford dictionary I find, at the word "prayer", under 5:

> The thing prayed for or entreated; specifically that part of a memorial or petition that specifies this.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

This is Middle English. And the petitions to the Commons, according to the Encyclopædia Britannica, shall be as follows:

> Must be in writing; must contain none but genuine signatures, and must be free from disrespectful language or imputations upon any tribunal or constituted authority.

And May, at page 795, says:

> The general allegations of the petition are concluded by what is called the "prayer," in which the particular object of the petitioner is expressed.

And it adds:

> To the whole petition are generally added these words of form: "And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray," et cetera, to which are appended the signatures or marks of the parties.

Bourinot, fourth edition, says at page 234:

> The conclusion should be "the prayer," without which no petition is in order. This prayer should tersely and clearly express the particular object which the petitioner has in view in coming before parliament.

The parliamentary meaning of "prayer", in Middle English, was that of "request" in modern language. Let us sweep away the dust of self-complacency and revise our rules and create our own precedents in conformity with modern times. This is to show that "May", who has been blindly quoted as an authority and accepted as such by other authors throughout the British empire, is outdated, because he and those who have revised his book have shown no discrimination and no discernment in the selection of precedents, and it is time that the House of Commons of Canada should have the rules revised in conformity with modern times.

I express my appreciation to the committee on standing orders who have forwarded the petitions which have been submitted to the house as exhibits to the redistribution committee. The question is not at all the word "petition", or "remonstrance", or any other word. The question is that the electors whom we represent shall have the opportunity at any time to get in touch with the House of Commons.

Sometimes a letter is wrongly addressed but it usually gets to its destination just the same and there are very few dead letters. I remember once a letter was addressed to "Jean-François Pouliot, Deputy Minister of National Defence", but I got it and answered it.

Mr. MacNICOL: You would have made a good minister.

Mr. POULIOT: It was a good letter too. I do not pay much attention to the address so long as I receive the letter, and the so-called petitions of my electors have been sent here not to request anything, not to make a remonstrance to the House of Commons, but just to express their opinion to the House of Commons, as they have a right to do. If I insist again on this matter it is because I thought that documents that bore the signatures of the independent electors of Temiscouata should find their way to the right place, to the redistribution committee.

Something happened which was a precedent. I was unavoidably absent from Ottawa on the morning when the matter was referred to the standing orders committee, and who came to my defence? It was editorials which appeared in the press supporting what had been said by my friends the hon. member for Peel and the hon. member for Saskatoon City, who took the same view before the committee as the former did in the house.

I express the high appreciation of my electors to these great papers, Montreal Matin, Toronto Star and the Ottawa Journal. Those who wrote these editorials have shown their readers that they are true to the very best traditions of the British parliamentary system. If I have had some difficulty, it was due to some opportunists outside my county—there are no opportunists in my constituency. There were three or four outside. One apparently was kidnapped during my first election. He was no more kidnapped than anyone here, but he disappeared like the prophet Elijah, although he was not in a chariot of fire. He is considered as one of his own class. The other was a young man who had no military record and who during the war was writing very hard letters to a N.R.M.A. man from the registrar's office in Quebec, and I complained bitterly about him at the time. He is just a little intriguer who wants to find a political nest for himself. But I know very well that these people who went to my electors and the electors of Rimouski telling them that my colleague, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Belzile) and myself were for change, were liars; and strangely enough they were supported by the parrot of the cream separators of the Quebec reform club, the legitimate heirs of the unforgettable Quebec Nipple club. I do not care about that. I thank the house, and I thank my colleagues who have supported me. I thank all my colleagues, and especially thank the committee on standing orders. I also thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. E. O. BERTRAND (Prescott): It would appear that in this matter, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is complaining about the action taken by the standing orders committee, although he did it in an indirect manner. In order to keep the record straight, to protect the procedure of the house and give a certain amount of explanation it would probably be well if a word or two were said about what has really taken place, in order to complete the record.

Under date of May 5, your committee received from the house the following reference:

> That the petitions presented by the electors of the parishes of Ste. Rita, St. Cyprien, St. Paul de la Croix, St. Emile d'Auclair, Notre Dame de Sept Douleurs and St. Jean Baptiste de l'Isle-Verte be referred to the standing committee on standing orders.

These petitions had been presented to the house by the hon. member for Temiscouata. In his report thereon, under date of April 30 and May 1, the clerk of petitions stated that the petitions were not drawn in proper form and therefore could not be received.

I have listened with great care to what was said by the hon. member for Temiscouata, and although he claims that he wants the committee's report to be supported by the house, he is making all sorts of complaints with regard to it, claiming apparently that red tape is being used and that the voice of the people at large is not being heard by the house. This is not at all the case.

Having regard to the report made by the clerk of petitions it would appear that the question to be decided by the committee was whether or not in this case the rules of the house and the forms sanctioned by practice with regard to the wording of a public petition had been observed. Without taking too much of the time of the house, and referring to the documents under consideration, may I say first of all that Your Honour, the Speaker, had stated in the house on May 5 that the house is not seized of a petition addressed to the members unless mention is made of the words "in parliament assembled", which statement the hon. member for Temiscouata criticized severely. It was pointed out that the petitions were not properly addressed and the clerk of petitions reported that they could not be received. This decision given by the clerk and by Your Honour is only the practice confirmed by the rules which have been enforced by this house in the past, and following precedent. The practice was enforced by Hon. Mr. Rhodes, a former Speaker. It was enforced by the rules and regulations in days gone by.

Naturally we should like that report of the standing committee on standing orders to be accepted as such, but not with the remarks which were made by the hon. member for Temiscouata. After all, we claim that we as the committee on standing orders are the guardians of the rules of procedure of the house, and that your committee had no alternative in this case but to report that the documents in question purporting to be petitions were not drawn in accordance with the rules of practice and not properly addressed and therefore should not be received.

If our report is to be voted upon, as chairman of the committee, I should like to make it plain that it is being accepted by this house in the terms in which it has been presented to the house by the committee and not on the recommendations which the hon. member for Temiscouata made in his address.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. I said nothing critical about the ruling of the committee. I moved the adoption of the report. But I said that May is bunk, and I repeat that.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

REVISION OF REGULATIONS—TABLING OF P.C. 1732

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies in French and English of P.C. 1732, dated Thursday, May 15, 1947, being the revised regulations passed under the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act.

These regulations were worked out in consultation with the representatives of the nine provinces at a meeting of the interprovincial old age pensions board, November 26-28, 1946. Following that meeting, it was necessary to put in textual form the changes agreed upon and to submit them to the respective governments for final approval. This has now been done, and in accordance with section 20 of the Old Age Pensions Act, the regulations are now in effect as of May 15, the date of their publication in the Canada Gazette.

I might point out that it is estimated that the effect of these regulations will be to relax the present restrictions applying to applicants for pension and to the circumstances under which pensions may be granted. The regulations have been completely revised and made more generous in their application.

I would draw to the attention of the house in particular the changes which have been made in the regulations dealing with the means by which an applicant may prove his age and the regulations regarding residence and calculation of income. These regulations have been relaxed in favour of the old age pensioner. Section 16 of the regulations in particular, defining income, provides that certain types of income listed under no less than eight different headings shall be ignored in calculating the amount of income which a pensioner is entitled to have and still be eligible for pension under the act. Changes are also made with regard to the method of assessing the income value of real property which a pensioner may have and still be eligible for pension. Distinction is made between the calculation of the income value of property which is used as a home and property which is not used as a home.

These and other changes are all calculated to relax in some degree the present restrictions which apply, through the act and regulations, to old age pensioners.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask whether that order in council could be printed in the Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. MARTIN: It is in the Gazette.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

INCOME TAX—NUMBER OF PERSONS IN CERTAIN BRACKETS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

During each of the last ten years for which complete returns are available, how many persons in Canada, after paying dominion income taxes, had net incomes (a) in excess of $25,000 per year; (b) $10,000 to $25,000 per year; (c) $5,000 to $10,000 per year; (d) $2,500 to $5,000 per year; (e) $1,000 to $2,500 per year?

Mr. McCANN: Information of the nature requested can only be provided for 1941 and subsequent years and is only complete for the years 1941 and 1942. As the figures are derived from statistics relating to taxpayers there is an unavoidable understatement in the lowest income classes due to the exemption levels applying to married taxpayers which were $1,500 in 1941 and $1,200 in 1942. Married persons with incomes below these levels would not be included. Subject to this important reservation, the requested figures are contained in the following estimated table:

Income After Tax	Estimated Number of Taxpayers 1941	1942
Over $25,000	621	558
$10,000-$25,000	5,005	5,771
5,000- 10,000	27,373	32,178
2,500- 5,000	105,896	192,357
1,000- 2,500	567,114	1,166,826

IMMIGRATION

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. How many applications have been received from individuals in each of the provinces for admission of relatives in Europe to Canada since September 30, 1945?

2. How many immigrants, exclusive of dependents of servicemen, have been granted admission to Canada as of April 15, 1947?

Mr. GLEN:

1. Information not available.

2. 36,873 immigrants exclusive of servicemen's dependents were admitted to Canada between September 30, 1945, and March 31, 1947. Figures for the period subsequent to the last mentioned date are not yet available.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED— SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. McKAY:

1 How many houses have been constructed or are under construction in Canada by wartime housing corporation, since January 1, 1947?

2. How many of these houses have been erected or are in course of erection in Saskatchewan?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. 2,763 housing units have been completed by Wartime Housing Limited between January 1, 1947 and May 3, 1947. This figure includes housing units the construction of which was started during 1946.

1,857 housing units were under construction by Wartime Housing Limited as of May 3, 1947.

2. 361 housing units have been completed by Wartime Housing Limited in the province of Saskatchewan between January 1, 1947 and May 3, 1947. This figure includes housing units the construction of which was started during 1946.

284 housing units were under construction by Wartime Housing Limited in Saskatchewan as of May 3, 1947.

AIRPORT CUSTOMS REGULATIONS

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Are customs services given without charge to American planes at Canadian airports?

2. Are similar services given by American airports to Canadian planes free of charge? If not, what charges are made?

3. Has the government attempted to make a reciprocal agreement with the United States regarding airport customs regulations?

4. If so, with what success?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Planes owned or chartered by private individuals and entering Canada for purposes of health or pleasure are given Canadian customs service without charge except in certain rare instances when they are required to pay for a taxi or other special transportation to bring the customs officer to the airport.

Commercial planes opearting on scheduled runs are given free Canadian customs service during "authorized hours" of attendance at international airports. They are subject to overtime charges outside of such regular hours and in certain cases are required to provide free transportation for customs officers.

2. No information.

3. The Canadian government is fully represented at the International civil aviation organization, which is presently engaged in considering international standards and recommended practices on customs, immigration, sanitary and related matters facilitating international air transport.

4. Standards and recommended practices have already been adopted and approved by a number of member states. Canada has already acted on some of the standards and practices recommended.

WAR ASSETS—PROPERTY AT FORT RAMSAY, QUE.

Mr. DANIEL:

1. Has any land or buildings located at Fort Ramsay, Gaspe, Quebec, been sold by war assets corporation?

2. If so, to whom, and at what price?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes. Sixty-seven buildings and one water tank have been sold but no land has been disposed of.

2. To the following purchasers at prices indicated:

(a) Buildings Nos. 5, 6, 23, 24, 30, 32 and 52, to the government of the province of Quebec for $6,761.60

(b) Buildings Nos. 3 and 8, to the government of the province of Quebec for $17,000. These buildings were sold for use at their present location. The land involved was leased to the province and the lease contains a provision that the dominion government may reclaim the land in the event of a war or a national emergency.

(c) Buildings Nos. 1, 7, 9, 31, 46 and a woodstave water tank, to the government of the province of Quebec for $7,120, under the same conditions of sale as outlined in (b) above.

(d) Five buildings, to the dominion department of Public Works for $953.

(e) Six buildings, to the Co-operative d'Electricite de Gaspe Sud for $9,200.

(f) Two buildings, to Mr. Henri Laforest, the owner of the land on which they are located, for $300. The land had been leased to the crown and the sale was part of the lease settlement.

(g) Building No. 56, to Mr. Raymond Trachy for $205.

(h) Thirty-seven buildings, to Sasseville & Laroche for $32,200.

(i) Two buildings, to Shell Oil Company of Canada Limited for $670.

Note: The buildings described in 2(a), (d), (e), (g), (h) and (i) above were sold for removal from their present sites with the condition that the purchasers restore the land to its original condition.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT—UNIFORMITY OF PROVISIONS—EXCHANGES OF STAFFS

Mr. WINKLER:

1. What action has the government taken to ensure uniformity of application of the provisions of the Income War Tax Act as these affect the farmers of the different provinces?

2. Does any exchange of staff take place between the Manitoba office and the Ontario and Quebec offices?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Meetings of the staff have taken place from time to time at which the various problems and matters of interpretation have been reviewed with a view to achieving uniformity. Further meetings will be held in the near future.

2. Occasional exchanges have taken place in the past. These will be more frequent in the future, especially when housing conditions improve.

PARI-MUTUEL TAX

Mr. MacNAUGHT:

What amount was collected by the government from pari-mutuel tax since the inception of the tax by (a) provinces; (b) years?

Mr. McCANN:

EXCISE DIVISION.

HOUSING—VETERANS LAND ACT—STRATFORD, ONT.

Mr. BRADSHAW:

1. Are any houses being constructed at Stratford under V.L.A.?
2. If so, when will they be ready for occupancy?
3. Is work now proceeding on these houses?
4. If not, are the houses now considered finished?
5. If so, why are they not being put to use?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Yes.

2. With exception of very small amount of painting, houses are completed and can be allocated as soon as arrangements are made respecting water and sewage disposal. Matter is under negotiation with city of Stratford.

3. Yes.

4 and 5. Answered by No. 2.

DISEASE IN NOVA SCOTIA BIRCH

Mr. WINTERS:

1. Has the serious situation respecting the disease prevalent in Nova Scotia birch come to the attention of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply?

2. Has the federal government been requested by the Nova Scotia government to relax export restrictions on Nova Scotia birch, and, if so, when will action be taken?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes.

2. Yes. The dominion government was requested to relax the export controls on infested birch. This was refused because of the difficulty of differentiating between lumber cut from infested trees and lumber cut from healthy ones and, also, the need of protecting Canadian consumers. Instead, a proposal was made to the government of Nova Scotia that if the cut of birch this year exceeded that of last year, 75 per cent of this excess could be exported. See also statements by the minister at page 2539 of Hansard for April 29, 1947.

PERMANENT FORCE BANDS

Mr. KIDD:

1. How many permanent force (silver or brass) bands are at present on the strength of the permanent forces, army, navy or air?

2. Where are they now located and what is the present strength of each unit?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Navy, 3; army, 3; air force, 3.

2.

Service—Location—Present Strength

Navy—H.M.C.S. Naden, Esquimalt, 24; H.M.C.S. Stadacona Halifax, 11; H.M.C.S. Warrior, (Seagoing), 10.

Army—Shilo Camp, Manitoba, 23; Brockville, Ontario, 25; Quebec, P.Q., 23.

Air Force—Ottawa, Ontario, 39; Toronto, Ontario, 30; Edmonton, Alberta, 30.

NATIONAL INCOME AND GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What was the total national income of Canada for (a) 1930; (b) 1933; (c) 1936; (d) 1939; (e) 1942; (f) 1943; (g) 1944; (h) 1945; (i) 1946 and how is said total national income defined?

2. What was the gross national product for each of the above years and how is said gross national product defined?

3. How much was received by persons in Canada (a) as wages; (b) as salaries; (c) as interest, dividends, etc., in each of the above years and what was the total number of persons who received the amounts indicated in the answers to (a), (b) and (c) of this question?

4. What is the estimated total national income and the estimated gross national product for 1947?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. National income is defined by the dominion bureau of statistics as the earnings of Canadian residents in productive activities, including salaries and wages, military pay and allowances, investment income, and net income of agriculture and other individual enterprise. On the basis of methods now in use, estimates are as yet available only for 1938 and subsequent years. Estimates of years prior to 1938 are available on an older basis which was discontinued after 1944. The older estimates are not comparable with the present ones.

	National income (millions of dollars)
	Basis now in use by Dominion Bureau of Statistics	Older basis now discontinued (not comparable with previous column)
(a) 1930	not available	$4,452
(b) 1933	not available	2,723
(c) 1936	not available	3,827
(d) 1939	$4,221	4,570
(e) 1942	8,277	8,044
(f) 1943	9,069	8,724
(g) 1944	9,685	9,186
(h) 1945	9,587	not available
(i) 1946	9,212	not available

2. Gross national product at market prices is defined as the value of all goods and services produced in a year by the labour, capital and enterprise of Canadian residents measured by a consolidated account of all costs involved in their production. These costs include salaries and wages, military pay and allowances, investment income, and the net income of individual enterprise as well as indirect taxes less subsidies, and depreciation allowances. Purchases of goods and services by one business from another are not included in this compilation. Estimates of the gross national product are available only for 1938 and subsequent years.

	Gross national product (millions of dollars)
(a) 1930	not available
(b) 1933	not available
(c) 1936	not available
(d) 1939	$ 5,495
(e) 1942	10,296
(f) 1943	11,124
(g) 1944	11,771
(h) 1945	11,478
(i) 1946	11,129

3. Salaries and wages received by persons in Canada have not yet been estimated as separate totals but only in a combined total. Interest, dividends, etc., received by persons in Canada are called investment income but estimates of these amounts include also the profits of governmental and private corporations.

	(a) and (b) salaries and Wages	(c) Investment income including interest, dividends, etc.
	(millions of dollars)
(a) 1930	not available	not available
(b) 1933	not available	not available
(c) 1936	not-available	not available
(d) 1939	2,540	782
(e) 1942	4,233	1,765
(f) 1943	4,790	1,809
(g) 1944	4,969	1,785
(h) 1945	4,865	1,916
(i) 1946	5,112	1,776

The total number of persons receiving salaries and wages in 1946 may be estimated as follows:

November 17, 1945	3,070,000
February 23, 1946	3,073,000
June 1, 1946	3,202,000
August 31, 1946	3,323,000
November 9, 1946	3,375,000
March 1, 1947	3,277,000

These estimates are obtained by deducting from the total labour force the following groups: own account workers, employers, unpaid family workers and persons seeking work who have never had a job. Unemployed wage earners, though not working on the dates given, were almost all working at one time or another in the course of the year.

Information prior to 1945 is only available for census years. The number of persons in receipt of interest, dividends, etc., have not been estimated for any date.

4. Statistical information is not yet available for the estimation of total national income and gross national product in 1947. The Minister of Finance presented an advance estimate of gross national product for 1947 in the budget speech (Hansard, Tuesday, April 29, 1947, page 2545).

SUGAR—CONSUMPTION FOR DIFFERENT PURPOSES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

Of the total quantity of sugar consumed in Canada last year, what percentage was used (a) for household use; (b) by bakeries; (c) by soft drink manufacturers; (d) by jam and marmalade manufacturers; (e) for the production of wine; (f) for all other purposes?

Mr. MacKINNON: Total quantity of sugar consumed in 1945: lbs. 947,135,428.

	per cent
(a) household (See item (h))....
(b) bakeries	4·8
(c) soft drinks	6·0
(d) fruit and vegetable preparations	8·4
(e) wine	0·9
(f) biscuits and confectionery	10·5
(g) other manufacturing industries	6·3
(h) all other purposes (household use, hotels, etc.)	63·1

EGG FLATS AND FILLERS

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. Are egg flats and fillers manufactured anywhere in Canada?

2. If so (a) where; (b) from what material?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Brantford, Ont., Trenton, Ont., St. Boniface, Man., Victoria, B.C.

(b) Materials used:

Ground wood.

Paper board.

EXPORTS OF FEED GRAINS

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. What amount of malting barley has been exported to the United States of America or other countries since January 1, 1947, to date?

2. What amounts of feed grains have been exported to the United States of America or other countries since January 1, 1947, to date?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Malting barley is not separately classified in trade statistics. Exports of barley of all kinds during the period January 1 to April 30, 1947, were as follows: To United States, 64,268 bushels; to other countries, 423,686 bushels.

2. Feed grains are not separately classified in trade statistics. Exports of grains of all grades during the period January 1 to April 30, 1947, were as follows:

	To United States	To Other Countries
	Bushels	Bushels
Corn	33,792	51,464
Oats	984,228	5,059,485
Rye	168,012	812,135
Wheat	37,103	37,382,005

POST OFFICE SEALS

Mr. HENDERSON:

1. Did the post office department call for tenders for two million post office seals?

2. If so, what was the name of the successful tenderer?

3. What was the price per M paid for the seals?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Yes.

2. Mayer Sealing Devices Reg'd., Montreal.

3. $2.60 per 1,000, sales tax included, f.o.b. Post Office Department, Ottawa.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY SHARES

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. How many ordinary shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were acquired by the Canadian government following world war I?

2. How many ordinary shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are now in the possession of the Canadian government?

3. Does the Canadian government hold any Canadian Pacific securities other than those referred to above?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. 20,000 shares.

2. 20,000 shares.

3. No.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. McKAY:

How many houses (a) have been constructed; (b) are under construction, in (i) Canada (ii) Saskatchewan, under terms of the National Housing Act?

Mr. McILRAITH: Return tabled.

MILK AND BUTTER SUBSIDIES

Mrs. STRUM:

1. What were the amounts paid out year by year from 1939 to 1947 to maintain the milk subsidy on (a) the producer subsidy; (b) the consumer subsidy on fluid milk; (c) milk being used for butter production?

2. What were the amounts paid out year by year from 1939 to 1947 to maintain the butter subsidy?

TRANSPORT COMMISSION—EXPENSES OF COMMISSIONERS

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. How much has been paid annually to each member of the transport commission since his appointment, for expenses?

2. Are the members of the transport commission provided with a private car?

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. FRASER:

1. What departments of the government arranged with the National Film Board for films during (a) 1946; (b) first four months of 1947?

2. What films were ordered by each department?

3. What was the total cost of taking, producing, etc., each of these films?

4. Were any of these films produced by outside film companies?

5. If so, by what firms and what was the cost of same?

Mr. McCANN: Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

IMMIGRATION—PERSONS OTHER THAN SOLDIERS AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a copy of all orders in council, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the departments of Mines and and Resources and Labour, relating to the entry into Canada of immigrants other than soldiers and their dependents from June 30, 1946, to date.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The department concerned has agreed to give the essential information in reply to another address. I would therefore ask that this motion be dropped.

Motion dropped.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH FRED ROSE

Mr. BENTLEY:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between Fred Rose and the Department of Justice and/or the Minister of Justice since October 31, 1946?

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask that this stand until I find out whether there was any correspondence. I do not think there was.

Motion stands.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister having to do with government legislation not yet introduced. From time to time members of the government have intimated that there is further legislation not yet introduced. My question is whether tomorrow or as soon as practicable the Prime Minister or someone on his behalf will give the house a statement with respect to legislation notice of which has not yet been given.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say that my colleagues and I have been considering the remainder of the legislation for the session, and I hope to be able to give the house a full statement not later than Thursday of this week. There is a good deal of legislation still outstanding, and I purpose therefore today to have a notice placed in the Votes and Proceedings asking the house to consider giving up the hour devoted to public and private bills on Tuesday and Friday evenings, and to begin Wednesday evening sittings. I hope hon. members will give careful thought to what is involved. We are now only a few weeks away from the 1st of July. If the house is to get through with the work it has to do before we get well on into the summer, some of these changes will have to be made.

Mr. BRACKEN: Did I understand the Prime Minister to suggest that he would ask us to sit Wednesday evenings as well?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not this Wednesday evening, but a week from Wednesday.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

COAL STRIKE IN THE MARITIMES—BASIS OF SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MATTHEW MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour what progress has been made in the settlement of the strike now in progress amongst the coal miners of the maritimes.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) and also the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr.

Gillis), who I understand would want to ask a similar question had he been in the house, may I say that the proposed basis of settlement reached by the negotiating committee of the union and the company, which is subject to approval by the miners themselves, is as follows:

(a) For continued operation of the mines until the end of the contract year, January 31, 1948;

(b) An immediate wage rate increase of $1 per shift;

(c) Cooperation by the union and the employees in every way possible to increase the tonnage production, equal at least to the pre-war rate of production by reducing absenteeism and increasing efficiency. In this connection, it is understood, of course, that to bring about this result there will have to be very close cooperation between the employer and the employees;

(d) For a review of production at the end of a six months' period, at which time, if production has been increased to the stipulated level of the agreement, an additional forty cents per shift will be made to the employees;

(e) For the settlement of other matters of a minor nature which were in dispute.

I sincerely hope that the miners themselves will vote in favour of acceptance of the terms of the settlement.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am out of place in thanking the minister on behalf of all Nova Scotia for his efforts in settling this dispute.

IMMIGRATION—WORKERS FOR QUEBEC TEXTILE INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour of which I have not given him notice. Has his attention been drawn to an article in Time under today's date dealing with the immigration into Canada of workers for the textile industry in Quebec? If so, is it correct that the wages to be paid are twenty cents per hour and that $6 per week is to be deducted for board, leaving these people $3.60 per week for everything else that they will need?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I can take care only of my own jurisdiction. The enforcement of the minimum wage laws of the province of Quebec comes under the provincial government. When I replied to a question the other day I said that the prevailing rate of wages would be paid. Frankly I do not know what are the prevailing rates in that area.

Mr. COLDWELL: We should know that before admitting people into the country.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am trying to look after my own jurisdiction. My hon. friend is very jealous about the province from which he comes and I take it that the kind people in Quebec are in the same category with respect to the administration of the various laws of that province. The order in council laid down quite clearly that the prevailing rate of wages in the district to which these people go should be paid.

NEUROLOGICAL RESEARCH

QUESTION OF ASSISTANCE TO MONTREAL NEUROLOGICAL INSTITUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). In view of the financial crisis facing the Montreal neurological institute, and in view of the service being rendered by this institute, both to Canada and the entire world, particularly in the field of research, will the government say whether sympathetic consideration is being given to a federal grant to meet the situation outlined by Doctor Penfield on Friday last?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that the government considered this matter some little time ago and has considered it favourably. When the supplementary estimates are brought down, or at some other appropriate time, an announcement will be made as to the manner in which government assistance will be forthcoming.

OLYMPIC GAMES

RELATION OF CANADA TO OLYMPICS COMMITTEE—APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On Thursday last the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked two questions with regard to the Canadian Olympic association, which he agreed to have stand as notice. The first question was as to whether the people of Canada contribute to that committee. The answer is that while the major part of the revenues of the Canadian Olympic association are raised by voluntary contributions from individuals and companies in Canada, the provincial governments provide certain grants, and since 1920 the federal government has provided financial assistance to meet the expenditures for Canadian participation in the Olympic games every four years. The association has estimated that their total expenditure for the 1948 Olympic games will amount to $125,000, and the government has been asked to contribute $35,000 towards this amount. Of this contribution, $17,500 would be made payable in 1947 and a similar amount in 1948. The government will recommend in the supplementary estimates the payment of these amounts as requested.

The second question the hon. member asked was:

Does the government in any way recommend any of the appointments made in connection with it?

The short answer to this question is no. The Canadian Olympic association is a committee of the amateur athletic union of Canada, which is made up of representatives of the national bodies concerned with various branches of amateur sport. As such, the committee is a purely voluntary and non-official organization. The only connection which the federal government has with the Canadian Olympic association is indirectly through the national council of physical fitness. This council, which is appointed by the governor in council under the National Physical Fitness Act, is made up of one representative recommended by each provincial government and a representative named as chairman by the federal government. The national council of physical fitness was asked last year to send a representative to the meetings of the Canadian Olympic association, and Doctor W. C. Ross of Halifax was named for this purpose.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): With reference to the statement made by the Prime Minister this afternoon, will the government consider advising Barbara Ann Scott not to compete in the Olympics?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that I think there has been altogether too much said on this matter already. For Barbara Ann's sake and the sake of sport generally, I think it would be well if further discussion of the matter were dropped.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is not the proper place to deal with such matters.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I say that we still think in British Columbia that Barbara Ann should have everything that is coming to her.

NEWFOUNDLAND

PROPOSED VISIT OF DELEGATION TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if there is any further word with respect to the projected delegation of Newfoundlanders who were to come here to meet this government?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Communications are being exchanged at the present time to select a date which would meet the mutual convenience of the representatives of Newfoundland and of those here who will have to participate in the conference. On Friday representations were sent to the high commissioner in St. John's, Newfoundland, asking him to put them before the Newfoundland representatives and to let us have their comment upon them.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will it be while parliament is sitting?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is one of the matters upon which their comment has been invited. The hope had been expressed that the meeting might be early in June. We have not been able to state at what time the session of parliament will be concluded. We are giving them the information we have about the dates that might be available and convenient, and we are asking them to let us know what their preference would be.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

HALIFAX BY-ELECTION—NOMINATION OF J. H. DICKEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State, who I understand is in charge of elections in Canada. In view of the great interest displayed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) in the Halifax by-election, is the minister aware that the biggest and most enthusiastic convention in the history of the maritimes last Friday nominated J. H. Dickey, who will win the election?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): I have not received a report of the convention.

IMPORT AND EXPORT CONTROLS

VISIT OF GRAHAM TOWERS TO ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): I should like to direct a question either to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. In view of a Reuters despatch from London, published in the Ottawa Journal of Friday last, to the effect that the purpose of the flying visit of Mr. Graham Towers to England was to discuss, first, a second loan from Canada; second, reimposition of certain Canadian wartime import and export controls in an effort to stabilize Canada's position should the world dollar crisis become more serious, is the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance prepared to make a statement to the house at this time?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that the Minister of Finance is unavoidably absent today but he will be in the house tomorrow and I know the minister has in mind answering that question at that time.

HUMAN RIGHTS

The house resumed from Friday, May 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie that the house go into committee on a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee of both houses of parliament to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to conclude the remarks I was making when the house adjourned on Friday evening, but before I do so may I in a sentence or two express my gratitude to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government for the announcement made this afternoon with respect to the Montreal neurological institute. I am sure that all those who know anything about the work of this institution, particularly its work in the field of research and what it means to human kind, will feel proud not only that Canada has such an institution within our boundaries but that the government is now prepared to render the financial assistance that has been announced this afternoon.

When I was speaking on Friday evening in the course of this debate I made clear my whole-hearted support of the contention that the time has come for getting down in black and white the freedoms and the liberties that we so cherish in this democracy. As part of my argument I recounted some of the threats to liberty which we have experienced in recent years and which now make it necessary to set aside the negative precedents that we have had by a clear declaration of the rights of Canadians. As I concluded on Friday evening I suggested that, in addition to the obvious threats to our liberties, there are other threats perhaps not so obvious but, in my view, even more sinister.

I think, first of all, of the confusion of thought that exists with reference to this whole question of liberty and freedom. I regret to do so, but I am bound to say I felt that that confusion was exhibited by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) who introduced this motion. We all enjoyed the fine speech that he made, and we could not help but feel that he spoke with deep emotion and with a deep love for the concept of liberty and freedom. Yet somehow or another it is possible for that same minister not to realize the danger there is to freedom when we put upon our statute books a law that denies to certain Canadian citizens, merely because of their Japanese racial origin, rights enjoyed by others. That confusion exists in a number of ways in this country, and the tragedy is that it is found not amongst those who do not care about liberty but amongst those who claim to espouse its cause. We have, for example, people who say they want to preserve our democratic traditions and the heritage we have gained from the people across the seas, particularly in the United Kingdom, and yet they want to deny freedom of speech to people who may hold differing political ideas. We in this group have no use, for example, for the communist party in this county or for the things that they would try to do. But we want to make it quite clear that if you are going to stand for freedom of speech you have to stand for it in all cases. Certainly anyone who breaks the law should be treated accordingly. Certainly anyone who advocates the overthrow of democracy by force is going beyond the bounds of free speech, but within those bounds we suggest that to deny freedom of speech is to scuttle the whole principle for which democracy stands.

I am sure that most of us in this house were disturbed over the week-end by the reports that came from Toronto of people there who felt that the great singer, Paul Robeson, should be denied the chance to speak in the midst of a concert that he was giving there on Saturday night. No matter how it is dressed up; no matter how one tries to say it was a concert and not a public address, the fact is that the news has gone around the world that an attempt has been made in Canada to deny Paul Robeson the right to speak. That is a matter of shame for all of us, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest that incidents like that make it doubly clear how necessary it is for us to establish this committee and also how necessary it is for the committee seriously to consider recommending a definite declaration of rights for our Canadian people.

Having made it as clear as I can that I support actively and aggressively without any reservation those who, like the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), press the necessity of maintaining and preserving our traditional freedoms, I want to go on and say that it seems to me that we must now move further. In my view, freedom today is threatened principally on a different front from what has been the case in the past. Freedom is threatened today by the tyranny of economic processes which doom hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of people to a lesser life than that to which they are entitled. The great charters of freedom which we have had in the past and to which reference has so fittingly been made in the course of this debate all came out of precise situations. They expressed the desire of mankind at a particular stage in his development to win his freedom from a certain kind of oppression which was bearing down upon him at that particular time. Freedom is not an abstract, nebulous thing. Freedom to human beings means freedom from whatever tyranny would enslave man at that particular time. So it was with Magna Carta, so with the Bill or Rights, so with the declaration of independence, so with the declaration of rights of 1789 and so on. It is still true that we must guard against the tyranny of the state, as was the case with all those declarations. But it is also true that in our world today we have another kind of tyranny which is even worse than that which our grandfathers and those who came before us experienced. One of the beginnings of that realization was high-lighted in the enunciation of the four freedoms when it was declared that, in addition to freedom of speech and of religion and of assembly, we must also have freedom from fear and freedom from want.

I have used the illustration before, and perhaps I might be permitted to use it again, that our grandparents in this country twenty-five, fifty and seventy-five years ago lived economically at a level much below ours today. They struggled with the elements and with primitive means of agriculture and industry. In their day the main freedom they required was freedom from the interference of the state and freedom for Canada in terms of responsible government. We still need those freedoms. But for us, and particularly for our children and our grandchildren, there is something else. Even if they have freedom from domination of the state, they will not really be free unless there is economic freedom, unless the people have an opportunity to live in the kind of homes which make possible healthful and decent living standards, unless all children born in this country have an opportunity for equal education, and for all such education as they are capable of taking. People will not be free unless there is security aganist unemployment and against having their whole lives mortgaged by the expenses of hospital and doctor bills. In particular, they must have security in their old age.

Our grandfathers did not have to worry so much about economic forces. They were all together in the battle against nature, the battle against the conditions of that day, with the primitive means at their hand. But our children and our grandchildren are up against forces of an economic nature over which, as individuals, they have no control.

It is still true that the state must not dominate the individual; but it is not good enough just to say that the state must be pulled off. The state also has a responsibility to individuals to see to it that their freedom and their fundamental rights are not interfered with.

I know that this poses a real problem for our day, and for the generation which succeeds us. The problem is one of how to achieve security without losing one iota of freedom. I have already admitted it will be a task. We shall have to carry forward the eternal vigilance which has always been the price of freedom. But the tragedy today, as I see it, is that so many people who espouse the cause of freedom take it for granted that it is a choice between freedom on the one hand and security on the other. This is portrayed before us in ideological terms. We have had it suggested that there is no other choice than one between the supposed freedom of western capitalism without security and the supposed security of soviet communism without freedom. But one of the most sinister threats to freedom today is the confusion of thought which takes that view and stops there. If we are to think this thing through we shall come to the place where we shall realize that neither is satisfactory, and that it is not a choice of either security or freedom; they go together or both will be lost.

I want to make my position perfectly clear, that if that choice had to be made I would choose freedom, and use that freedom to fight for security, rather than give up my freedom for the purpose of attaining security. But that is not the choice. What we must move on to is that kind of society in which we maintain the freedom of the individual, not just by pulling the state off, but by using the state as an instrument of the people as a whole to protect the people against the economic forces, not only in a negative manner, but in a positive way, in the sense that it is the job of the state to provide for the economic advancement and improvement of the life of our people.

This is a tremendous task that is on our hands. What we are taking part in just now is not merely a series of speeches concerned about the preservation of the freedoms which have come down to us from the past. Yes, we can wax eloquent about them. But we have got more than that. We are breaking new ground in our day and generation. Let us look to the future and realize the tremendous opportunity that is ours to move on to the achievement of freedom with security. Ours is the chance to achieve something much greater than was ever dreamed of in 1215, or 1689, or 1776, or 1789; or through the 19th century. I submit that freedom with security provides a goal worth the eternal vigilance which is its price, a goal toward which our destiny impels us. We should be content with nothing less.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to express a word of appreciation to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) who introduced this resolution. I felt that he spoke with a great deal of eloquence and feeling, and also gave a most inspiring and instructive speech.

The resolution is most comprehensive in its scope. It is to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the manner in which those obligations accepted by all members of the united nations may best be implemented. It is also to consider Canada's legal and constitutional situation with respect to such rights, and also what steps, if any, should be taken or recommended for the purpose of preserving in Canada respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

I should like to commend the government for the scope of the resolution. Under its terms the committee will be in a position to consider what in this day and age may be taken as human rights and fundamental freedoms, and what can be done to have them more strongly established in Canada. So far as I am concerned, if anything can be done to make them safer and more secure in this country, I would feel the committee would be well justified in taking the necessary action.

One of the significant statements made by the minister which, I believe, is not sufficiently realized in Canada, is that the various enactments and bills of right, including Magna Carta, had actually only the force of acts of parliament; no more. Any subsequent parliament could repeal any of the rights laid down in any of those historic documents. Parliament at any time could have repealed any of the rights laid down in Magna Carta. There seems to be a lack of appreciation of that fact, and it seems to many as if there are some fundamental freedoms guaranteed to the British people which cannot be taken away from them by their parliament.

As any student of constitutional history knows, parliament in the United Kingdom has power to take away any rights whatever from a citizen of the United Kingdom, including even the right of life itself. Bills of attainder have been passed which did that very thing, namely deprived men of their lives and property. And, so far as the constitution of Great Britain is concerned today, there is nothing to prevent the passage of an act of that kind. So that parliament today in Great Britain still remains all-powerful, with a power over life, liberty and property of the subject.

That principle has been more or less followed in Canada. Some people think that, because we have decisions based upon our constitution, and that because from time to time acts are declared ultra vires, we have a constitution like that of the United States. My understanding of our constitutional position is that, outside of the rights given in the British North America Act in regard to the use of two languages in parliament and otherwise, and in respect of the education of minorities, the whole effect of the British North America Act was to divide legislative jurisdiction between the provincial and federal governments. The idea was to be that in their respective spheres of influence the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of the provinces were to be as all-powerful in their control over the citizens as the parliament of England is over its citizens.

The only qualifications I would make of that, to conform with the position today, would be these: first, we have not taken the right to amend our own constitution. In fact, in our own constitution, as laid down in the British North America Act and amendments, and as completed by the Statute of Westminster, it has been laid down that we have no right in this parliament to amend it. The constitution also provides that, so far as the provinces are concerned in the exercise of their jurisdiction, they are liable to have their rights in regard to the passing of any law within their purview disallowed, so that such laws may be disallowed by the government of Canada as a whole. Outside of that, under the Statute of Westminster today, this parliament and our legislatures are supreme with respect to the right to legislate touching all these matters.

I understood that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), in discussing this matter, was satisfied that that state of affairs should continue, and that was about the only part of his main contention with which I myself did not agree. On page 3158 of Hansard, he said:

> It might be argued that another government, another parliament, can revoke a bill of rights passed by parliament. True; but has not history shown that when laws are put upon the statute books, having the support of a vast majority of the people, they stay there?

That has been the tendency in the past, but I am not so sure that it is a sufficient guarantee today that, should we pass such an act of parliament, some parliament that succeeded us might not immediately cancel it. I have a feeling that we should go farther than that. Are there not rights so fundamental that they should not be interfered with by a majority in this parliament, which might not represent a majority in the country at all? We know there is the possibility of having a tremendous majority in support of a certain party for certain ideas in this parliament, which was elected by much less than a majority in the country. That is quite possible, and should all rights be subject to the will of a particular parliament, acting as it might be not in accordance with the will of the people, but only in accordance with a minority?

That very problem was faced by the people of the United States, and they decided that there were certain fundamental rights which inhered in the people themselves and that they should not be subject to be taken away from them by the members of congress—certain rights to liberty, the right not to be proceeded against by the government, certain rights such as we have in Magna Carta. They felt that congress should not be able to take these rights away from the individual by a majority vote, but that these rights could be taken away only by a change in the constitution, which would require a demonstration that an overwhelming part of the people in the United States desired to have such rights interfered with.

This is provided for by requiring that there must be a two-thirds majority in congress and that three-quarters of the states in the United States must agree to any change of that kind before these rights can be interfered with. Many people say that our system has worked better than the system in the United States in protecting fundamental rights and human liberties. They say that too much faith can be put in written constitutions, that if people know that the parliament they elect can take away all their rights from them, they will be more careful about the kind of parliament they do elect, whereas if they feel that parliament cannot touch their rights they will be more careless in the sort of parliament they elect, knowing that it cannot entrench so far upon their rights.

Again, other people suggest that a constitution is of no value if the government becomes too powerful. They cite the constitution of the Soviet Union, which guarantees all these fundamental rights and freedoms, but which no individual citizen of the Soviet Union can enforce because the government has become all-powerful.

These are, of course, arguments which this committee will take into consideration. But what is going on in the world today in regard to this great question of the rights of the individual? I have mentioned the Soviet Union. No one will say that there are any real fundamental rights or freedoms that can be enjoyed under the control of the Soviet Union, and why is that so? It is because the government of the Soviet has become so powerful that, no matter what rules have been written into the constitution, they cannot be enforced against the government.

Throughout the world today there are those calling themselves communists who are working to have the same sort of system established everywhere. We know that the United States is worrying now about how to stop the spread of that system throughout the world.

There are others who advocate a system of complete socialism, who advocate the state owning and controlling all the means of production, all the means of distribution, whereby the state would be so powerful that the citizen in such a state would be very much in the same position as the citizens of Soviet Russia. The question, then, arises: What powers should you give to the state to act by a mere majority in parliament? If it is true that, should the state take control of all the means of livelihood, the people are all working for the all-powerful state and must look to the state for their living, and by that very fact they lose their real, essential freedom, the question we have to ask ourselves is this: Should these various rights to which I have referred, the right to property, the right not to have your business taken away from you, the right not to have the state, as we find even in a province in Canada today, setting up an industry alongside you, free from taxation and subsidized by the state, whereby your own living is taken away from you—should these rights, I ask, be liable to be taken away from the people by a mere majority in parliament?

I grant that in a democratic state there is no question about it that what the majority want to do they will ultimately find a way of doing; but the question is whether that right should be given to a mere majority in parliament, which may not have the support of the majority of the people.

What are some of these rights which, I suggest, should not be subject to the will of a majority in parliament? I suggest the right to freedom from arrest as one of them. I suggest, freedom not to be dealt with in any way by the government except by due process of law. These rights should not be taken away by mere vote of parliament. I suggest, again, the right not to be arbitrarily detained; that should not be taken away by a mere vote of parliament.

Mr. KNOWLES: Or by the government.

Mr. TUCKER: The government in Canada does not and has not taken it away unless parliament gives it or has given it the right. Let my hon. friend not pretend that that has ever happened in Canada. Anything the government has done in the last few years has been done by virtue of a vote of this parliament.

Mr. FULTON: Kept secret for a long time though.

Mr. TUCKER: The power was given the government by vote of parliament.

Mr. FULTON: But kept secret—

Mr. TUCKER: Will my hon. friend please allow me to proceed. I shall come to that argument in due course. I suppose I might as well deal with it at once. I am not finding fault with what is done in days of crisis when the very safety of the state itself is involved. If people are ready to see the state decline to defend itself and would rather have it go down because it fears to have the government resort to means that are necessary for its defence, then by that very fact all liberties might be lost. I think much too much has been made about what has been done by the government pursuant to the powers given it by this parliament for the preservation of the country's safety in time of war and in time of crisis. I am not talking now about that. I am talking about ordinary peace time when there is no crisis.

Another right which I suggest must not be taken away is freedom from oppression by government. Do not let anyone think that does not happen in Canada today. I will give the case of a trapper named Wilson who had the exclusive right to trap over a leased area for ten years in Saskatchewan on payment of $25 a year. The government moved in and gave that right to somebody else. They gave other people the right to trap the muskrats off the leased premises.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: How many muskrats?

Mr. TUCKER: That has nothing to do with the matter. The point is that they entered in and trapped the muskrats off. This man then said to the government, "You have broken my lease from His Majesty the King", and he asked the right to go into the courts and prove his damage. But he was refused that right, and on top of that the government paper, the Saskatchewan News, issued at public expense in Saskatchewan, berated, abused and slandered him and those who took up his cause. These are facts that I am stating. Let no one say that no government whatever in Canada today has oppressed the citizens of the country.

Then what about the right to use public moneys to start a business next door and then say that government business shall not be subject to taxation, and thereby drive citizens who are taxpayers out of business? Is that not using the power of the state to oppress the citizen? That is happening in my province. Then what was done, for example, in regard to fire insurance? There are throughout Saskatchewan hundreds of insurance agents, some of them representing co-operative insurance companies, who have made it their lifelong business to engage in this work. The state there stepped in and said that any institution that took a grant from the government has to take its fire insurance business from the government. Then the government went around and appointed their political friends to handle that business. Is that not taking away the right of the citizen to make his living?

Mr. KNOWLES: Louder, please.

Mr. TUCKER: I know my hon. friends cannot answer that, and so they try to laugh it off. But that is not sufficient.

The right of freedom of speech is another right that should not be taken away by the mere will of the majority that happens to be elected to this parliament. Then there is the right of opinion, the right to a free education, not the right to have your children sent to school and educated in ideas of a special group that are absolutely against the things that many people believe in. Education should be free and fair. It certainly should not be an attempt to inculcate socialism, as is being done in our province today, and that cannot be denied. Surely there should be some protection against the rights of the people being taken away in regard to their children. There should be the right of freedom of movement from place to place in the country, the right of freedom to work and earn your living where, when and at what you please. Surely no man should have to go to another man in government or outside of it for permission to earn his daily bread for himself and his children. Surely that right should be protected, and surely an overriding and all-powerful government should not have the right to take it away from him. There should be the right of freedom of religion, and the right of freedom to join associations or not join associations, as people wish; and there should be the right of free assembly. Surely these are fundamental rights that should be given to every free Canadian citizen, and he should not be left in this position that, if perchance a majority that believe in the doctrines of socialism or communism, and are ready to wipe out some of these rights in order to make their view prevail, get into office and form a government, they can take those rights away by a majority vote only. A system of complete socialism or communism cannot be introduced in the United States without a change in the constitution of the United States, whereas in Great Britain a complete system of communism can be introduced by the will of the present parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TUCKER: A complete system of socialism, I should have said. I do not know the difference; I have never had it explained to me. That is why I use the words interchangeably. Perhaps there is some difference.

Mr. GARDINER: There is not any difference.

Mr. TUCKER: But a complete system of socialism can be introduced in Great Britain. It is doubtful if the will of the people is still behind that. Once it is done, it is very hard to undo it.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): What about the by-election?

Mr. TUCKER: The mere fact that a government may win a by-election—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): They won there too.

Mr. TUCKER: Just a minute. Does my hon. friend say that because he can go out and win a by-election, he has the right to take away from the citizens these fundamental freedoms?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Not a bit of it.

Mr. TUCKER: If you say you have a right to take freedom, liberty and their property away from people because you win by-elections; if you deprive a citizen of the right to earn his own living, have you not taken away one of these fundamental freedoms from him?

The question we must ask ourselves is this: which sort of system do we want in Canada? Do we want a system where these freedoms can be entrenched upon by the mere will of the majority in parliament or a system whereby it must be clear that the people are overwhelmingly in favour of it? That is one of the things that this committee will have to consider. I know some people will say, "Oh, the senate will protect us". Let nobody ever think that the senate will be able ever to protect anything in this country.

Mr. KNOWLES: Except themselves.

Mr. TUCKER: If the people represented in this Commons chamber have a big majority desirous of doing something, they will pass a resolution as representing the sovereign people of Canada and they are going to present it to the parliament at Westminster. Is the parliament at Westminster going to listen to the will of the people of Canada as represented in this house or to the opposing will of the senate? With the way our constitution is today, with a really radical government in power, determined to impose complete socialism on this country, let nobody think there is any protection in the senate or any protection in the British North America Act either.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): That is very comforting.

Mr. TUCKER: I know it is comforting to my hon. friends.

Mr. GARDINER: Where are the Saskatchewan C.C.F.'ers now?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Having a cup of tea.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where are the Saskatchewan Liberals?

Mr. TUCKER: The Saskatchewan Liberals are going to be back here in good numbers, believe me. But if I may go on, I know my hon. friends who are here from Saskatchewan cannot answer my arguments. They can only try to laugh them off. That is a sure sign that they are unanswerable.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TUCKER: Now if I may proceed, let us take, for example, the question of provincial rights. The way our constitution stands today, are we perhaps to expect the parliament at Westminster at some future time to refuse to do what this parliament or this House of Commons asks should be done? Suppose some province is against it. We shall be asking them to interfere in the internal affairs of the country which has stated over and over again that it is a nation and is entitled to run its own affairs. This committee will have to consider the position it is putting the United Kingdom parliament in, and whether that parliament is likely to refuse to do the will of the people of Canada in the only way it can judge it, as expressed in this house, the way our constitution stands today.

I was quite interested in my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) when he said one of the rights that he recognized—and I will just throw this out for the consideration of my colleagues in Saskatchewan—was the right of the farmer to own a farm, but what were the qualifying words? They were, "effectively cultivated by himself or his family". In other words, if you do not farm it right in the opinion of the government, or if you do not do it yourself, or if your family does not do it, it might be taken away from you, according to them.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): No, read the dictionary.

Mr. TUCKER: That is what you said. You cannot deny it.

Mrs. STRUM: What about social security legislation?

Mr. TUCKER: I know it bothers you.

Mrs. STRUM: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. TUCKER: Yes.

Mrs. STRUM: What about the farm security legislation that was recently disallowed?

Mr. TUCKER: The farm security legislation has nothing to do with this debate. But if my hon. friend would read the British North America Act she would find that one of the rights reserved to the dominion parliament exclusively, by section 91 of the act, is the right to legislate in regard to interest.

Mrs. STRUM: But you have implied—

Mr. TUCKER: I will read it from the act to my hon. friend. The reference in regard to interest is found in section 91 of the British North America Act, subsection 19:

. . . the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to . . . (19) interest.

Premier Douglas, speaking over the radio in my hearing, said that this act was an attempt to cut down interest. I have his speech right here. He, by his own words, said they were trying to do something that he knew in his own heart or should have known they had no power to do.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Go back to Saskatchewan and find out.

Mr. TUCKER: I tell you it is just a fake issue. Every lawyer in Saskatchewan knew that act was ultra vires the province, but the C.C.F. government thought if they passed it and had it disallowed, they would have something to shout about. It is one of the biggest fake issues this country has ever seen, and it shows how empty the C.C.F. are in their programme when they have to resort to this sort of thing.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Why don't you go back to Saskatchewan?

Mr. KNOWLES: What would you do about farm security?

Mr. TUCKER: I would protect the farmer in a more effective way than is being done by the present government.

Mr. KNOWLES: How?

Mr. TUCKER: It is being done today by Liberal legislation. For one thing, there is the right of the individual moratorium. If a person is not getting a fair deal, he cannot be proceeded against by court action if the government forbids it. There is also the Limitation of Civil Rights Act. That is what the Liberals did, and that is the way people were protected during the hard times. What does the record show now? During an equal period of time, after the C.C.F. came into office, there were more foreclosures than in the same period immediately before the C.C.F. government took office. Yet they talk about protection for the farmer. However, let me proceed.

Mrs. STRUM: They like it.

Mr. TUCKER: I know you like it. You think it pays good political dividends, but it is mostly applesauce and fake.

Now, there has been some suggestion about the repeal of the War Measures Act. I should say there would be no great advantage in repealing that legislation. The moment any emergency arose which required action under the War Measures Act, any government which wanted to protect the liberty and freedom of Canada would require such legislation, and presumably any parliament would re-enact it. If the government did not have the power to act it might not be able to take the necessary steps at a crucial time, such as the days that may lie ahead. So I doubt very much whether the War Measures Act should be repealed, because it does not affect the liberties of this country in any fundamental way.

However, there are a couple of matters on which I do feel strongly, and I am glad the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) is in the chamber to hear me speak on them. I should like to ask him to consider seriously taking away any right there may be to immunity on the part of the crown from being sued. I am told that today the right to sue the crown federally is granted automatically. If that is the case there is no reason to preserve that immunity, because it preserves to any government wishing to make use of it the right to prevent that action being taken. If it be said that it protects the government against vexatious actions, then I say the government does not need protection against vexatious action any more than individuals or corporations need it. Surely a government with all the power it has at its disposal can defend itself against vexatious actions just as members of this house or any other people can. So I suggest, with all the seriousness at my command, that we do away with this old right of the crown, at this very session of parliament. If the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan wishes to preserve that right for itself, let it do so, but I say no Liberal government should want to preserve the immunity of the crown beyond the present session of parliament.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. TUCKER: Well, my time is almost up.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does he know that the crown corporations act of Saskatchewan provides the right of suit against—

Mr. TUCKER: I was not talking about the crown corporations act. If my hon. friend would leave it to his Saskatchewan colleagues to speak about these things it would be done more effectively; but I understand he is bound to talk about everything, so he throws himself into this debate.

Mr. KNOWLES: They are too bored to bother.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. TUCKER: The Canadian National Railways has always been subject to suit, and quite properly.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the wheat board?

Mr. TUCKER: I should like to see them all subject to being sued. At the recent session of the Saskatchewan legislature it was provided that crown corporations could be sued, but the right of immunity of the government from suit has been carefully preserved, as my hon. friend will find if he looks into the matter. So my argument holds, and in asking his question I suppose he has only succeeded in delaying my presentation of the remainder of my argument.

There is another matter, which has been brought up by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and on which I hope it will not be left to this committee to make any recommendation but that action will be taken at this session. That is the right of any subject whose liberty or fundamental freedoms are involved in any substantial degree in the opinion of a justice of the supreme court, to go to the Supreme Court of Canada with his case. He should have the right to go to that court and establish his fundamental freedom or liberty, whether or not any monetary consideration is involved. That is the court to which any Canadian should be able to go to vindicate his fundamental rights and freedoms, under the law, and I should like to see the Supreme Court Act amended in this respect without further delay.

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North, with the well known attitude of the C.C.F. party, has suggested that they are the only ones who want to see the people enjoy the benefits and abundance of this modern age. The hon. member said something in regard to the freedom of western capitalism, without its security. I have heard many C.C.F.'ers suggest that we have no security in this country, no security under western capitalism, as they call it. I would say to him, based upon dozens of letters I have seen from people who have lived under socialism, that they are anxious to get out to this country, where he says there is no security. I say to him there is more real security in Canada for the individual and his family, more security in his home and in the right to earn a living, as well as in all the fundamental freedoms, than in any socialist country in the world today. Yet he suggests that under so-called western capitalism there is no security. When he says that he is absolutely going against the facts of the situation.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I don't suggest it; I say it.

Mr. TUCKER: I say that we of the Liberal party have always put the benefit of the individual first. We believe in protecting him against monopoly, against undue power, whether it is in the hands of the—

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't you do it?

Mr. TUCKER: We are doing it better here than they are doing it in socialist Russia, which the hon. member admires so much. There you have real socialism, which interferes with the individual far more than he is interfered with by any system here. We say we believe in protecting the individual against all forms of monopoly, all forms of oppression—

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't you do it?

Mr. TUCKER: I say we are doing it far better than it is being done in any other country in the world, and my hon. friend cannot deny it. What I say is that the oppression an individual may suffer under a government where there is a complete system of socialism; where his job may depend upon his ability to please his political rulers, and so on, is worse than you will ever see under any system such as we have in Canada. When hon. gentlemen of the C.C.F. say, if we have to choose between these systems, of course we will choose our present system, they, in effect, say our present system is preferable. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) knows that what I say is true; he has already said, in effect, that our present system is better than socialism.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Rubbish.

Mr. TUCKER: Nevertheless he reserves the right to go ahead and advocate socialism which brings about that very situation he does not want.

Mr. KNOWLES: I said it was better than soviet communism.

Mr. TUCKER: It is the same thing in the result.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no.

Mr. TUCKER: It is bound to be the same thing.

Mr. KNOWLES: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, I have here your political bible, "Make this your Canada," written by your president and secretary and endorsed by your leader. Here I find the Regina manifesto, in which these words appear:

> We believe that these evils can be removed only in a planned and socialized economy—

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER:

> —in which our natural resources—

Including land.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does it say that?

Mr. TUCKER: Is not land a natural resource? Do my hon. friends say land is not a natural resource? Let them get up and say so. Then it goes on:

> —in which our natural resources and the principal means of production and distribution—

Our natural resources and the principal means of production and distribution.

> —are owned, controlled and operated by the people.

Then the last words, the famous last words of this manifesto, are:

> No C.C.F. government will rest content until it has eradicated capitalism and put into operation the full programme of socialized planning—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER:

> —which will lead to the establishment in Canada of the cooperative commonwealth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER: I notice that some of my hon. friends from Saskatchewan cannot bring themselves to applaud that statement, and I congratulate them on their fundamental honesty. I noticed that; anyone on this side of the house could see it. I say to my good friends from Saskatchewan who did not applaud, the problem is that the real bosses of the party are the ones who believe in this, and when they get into power this is what will happen, whether my hon. friends like it or not.

If I may be allowed to proceed, Mr. Speaker, I have considered this question of a bill of rights, and I say that these fundamental rights and freedoms should be protected in any way we find it possible to make them safer and more soundly established. I should like to go farther and endorse this second bill of rights which was given to the American people by that great humanitarian, the late President Roosevelt in his message to congress. Here is a report of what he said:

> President Roosevelt outlined in his message to the United States congress, today "a second bill of rights"—economic rights. He listed these rights as including:
> The right to a useful and remunerative job in the industries, or shops or farms or mines of the nation;
> The right to earn enough to provide adequate food and clothing and recreation;

The right of every farmer to raise and sell his products at a return which will give him and his family a decent living;

The right of every business man, large and small, to trade in an atmosphere of freedom from unfair competition and domination by monopolies at home or abroad.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER: I say "Hear, hear" to that too. One unfair competitor is a government which pays no taxes and does business itself at the expense of the people.

Mr. KNOWLES: For the benefit of the people.

Mr. TUCKER: If the people have to keep a horde of people working at a loss and put others out of business, I do not know how that would benefit them. This report continues:

The right of every family to a decent home;

The right to adequate medical care and the opportunity to achieve and enjoy good health;

The right to adequate protection from the economic fears of old age, sickness, accident and unemployment;

The right to a good education.

All of these rights spell security. And after this war is won we must be prepared to move forward, in the implementation of these rights, to new goals of human happiness and well-being.

I say that the Liberal party is just as devoted to the achievement of that second bill of rights as any other party in this country. We do say, and we have proved by our record, that we have been more successful in bringing those rights to the individual man and woman. By our record we have shown that we are devoted to the second bill of rights. But in seeking that second bill of rights we should not abandon or endanger the ancient and primary rights and fundamental freedoms of our people. If we come to value security or well-being more than freedom or liberty we shall end up by losing both. On that basis I would suggest that this committee of this house study this great problem which lies before us and I am sure that, in doing so, they will make a great contribution to the economic well-being and to the preservation of the liberties of free Canadians.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) has violated the spirit of this debate which was set so well by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) and maintained by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He was disappointed when we refused to take him seriously. I really cannot take seriously anyone who professes to lead a party and then will not go to the province. I do not want to take up any of my time answering charges which have no validity and which the hon. member himself knows are false.

Mr. TUCKER: I know that the charges I made are true and the hon. member has no right to say that I know them to be false. She may be a lady member but she must be governed by the rules.

Mrs. STRUM: It was an innuendo. The hon. member tried to put the legislation in regard to farm security in a false light. He knows, I know and every hon. member knows that what finally claims a farm is not the government; it is debt. The Liberal government did not take the farms from the farmers of Saskatchewan; it was the accumulated debt. The unpaid interest finally took those farms and caused the foreclosures. The hon. member for Rosthern knows that the proper thing to do is to pass legislation which will check the growth of interest in those areas when our farmers cannot meet their obligations. That was the spirit of the legislation; it was something that would guarantee to the farmer his equity so that he could not lose his farm. I should like to see the kind of argument the hon. member has put forth made on the floor of the legislature in Regina.

Mr. TUCKER: It was made there and outside the legislature.

Mrs. STRUM: I am not going to take up time discussing such puerile arguments. First of all, I should like to discuss one of the first clauses of the united nation charter. I wish to point out that there are certain areas in which these freedoms do not apply equally to men and to women, and I want to urge this parliament to proceed to implement the provisions of the Atlantic charter and remove discrimination against women wherever it exists. In the very first clause of the charter we find this:

We the peoples of the united nations, determined to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small.

Then article 55 reads:

c. Universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

Were we to implement that article, the result would be to remove inequalities as between the rights of men and women. At this time I should like to consider some of the inequalities which still exist. The first inequality is that of pay in a job which requires the same amount of skill and energy. I should like to refer to the report of the royal commission on equal pay which was appointed by the British government and which covered the period 1944-46. I find there reference to the method employed in recruiting civil servants, and I wish to quote from page 11 of the report as follows:

. . . and the nature and level of the responsibilities resting on those who serve in them, are carefully defined, and defined without any reference to the sex of their members; that, correspondingly without regard to sex, their members are treated as fully interchangeable within the same class and grade; and that the method of recruitment, at least in the case of the treasury grades and the main departmental grades (that is to say in the great majority of cases outside the post office) is normally by open competition, acceptance or rejection being determined simply by the standard reached in this, irrespective of the proportion of women to men among the successful candidates that is thereby entailed.

Then it goes on to say:

The differentiation in pay between men and women, itself defined with great clarity in this field, can correspondingly be asserted to be genuinely and unmistakably a differentiation related solely to their sex.

The report points out that the examinations are the same; the qualifications are the same; the jobs are interchangeable and there is no difference whatever as to the kind of service required, but the wage scale is different because of sex. It states that in the case of the basic grade, that is up to nineteen years, the wages are the same, and I quote from page 13 as follows:

In the case of staff of age 19 and less there is no discrimination between the sexes, at 20 there is a differential of about six per cent, and thereafter the normal 20 per cent differential is applied.

So that once your civil servant becomes twenty years of age you begin to discriminate, and very shortly there is a difference of twenty per cent between the wages paid to men and women. Women in these categories at no time get more than eighty per cent of what the men get. Page 12 gives the reasons for this:

The scales of the main common established grades first diverge in the early twenties, when the men may be assumed to be acquiring or contemplating family responsibilities.

It just assumes that all men will marry and have families and that no woman will have responsibilities. This discrimination not only affects the basic pay but also overtime, because the overtime rate of pay is based on the basic pay. Again, women suffer discrimination, not only in wages and in overtime but also, upon retirement, in their superannuation allowance which is based upon the average salary they receive during the last five years of their service. The woman receives a smaller superannuation allowance because of the smaller basic pay she has received, regardless of the fact that she has given skilled and devoted service to the government.

It goes on to point out that there is a relationship between civil service pay and the pay that women receive in industry. I think we should consider this very carefully. Let us consider how it applies, for instance, as between a married man and an unmarried man. If we are to consider the difference between men who have responsibilities and women who have none. Let us see how it works out as between men with no responsibilities and men with families. We do not underpay the men because they do not marry. We do not reduce their salaries because they do not beget offspring. No one would attempt to use that mechanism to adjust the difference between men who marry and men who do not. We use the income tax mechanism to adjust the salary difference between men who have family responsibilities and men who have none. If we ever had any objection to equal pay for men and women, the family allowance ended the last legitimate excuse for inequality of pay, because now, not only do we give a man an income tax exemption for himself and his wife which single people do not have but in addition we give him a cash payment for each child plus additional exemption. So I say the family allowance has removed the very last excuse that we might have had for this inequality in pay.

It is assumed, in our traditional method of dealing with these matters, that women have no dependents, but I think we should examine that because it, too, cannot stand up to the light of day. There has been a survey made in Washington by the United States Department of Labor, women's bureau, of 13,000 women doing war work, and of those 13,000 women engaged in war work seventy-five per cent expect to continue working. Why did they want to continue working? Here is the break-down of the reasons.

Out of every 100 women, eighty-four had to support themselves and in many cases others; eight for some special economic reason, such as buying a home, paying off debts or educating children; eight only because they liked working but did not need to work.

Out of every 100 women who planned to continue working, eighty-one lived with their families and only nineteen lived apart from their families.

Of every 100 women who lived with their families, thirty-three contributed regularly to the household all their take-home earnings; twenty contributed regularly one-half or more, but not all; forty contributed regularly less than one-half, and only seven made no regular contribution toward family support.

Of every 100 women who lived with their families and planned to continue in the post-war labour market, 93 contributed regularly to family expenses. Nearly two-thirds (62 per cent) of the total money in the pay envelopes of all these women who contributed was allocated each pay day to household expenses. Of every 100 women who lived apart from their families, practically all were dependent on their own resources for self-support.

But even if women do not keep up separate households or support dependants the woman worker is supporting herself, and here we come to the question of married women being gainfully employed. Married women are being dismissed from every department of government. It is often contended that married women have no right to teach unless there is an emergency and other teachers are not available. It is commonly held that married women should be happy to live off the earnings of their husbands or of their brothers or fathers unless such earnings are very low. In that case she might conceivably supplement the family income by charring or doing some other unskilled job. Even married women do not object to this invasion of the field of employment by other married women. But do we hang out the "Stay Out" sign when men who have sufficient income from other sources enter the business or professional field? No; we say he is noble. His money has not spoiled him. He wants to work when he does not need to. He keeps his own self-respect and that of his associates if he chooses to work. Of course this denial of the basic democratic freedom to work is an artificial restriction of employment based on fear, fear of less than full employment. It is because we are afraid there are not enough jobs that we say that certain people shall not be permitted to work.

There are other denials of freedom, because the moment that you deny equality of treatment you have invaded the field of human rights and fundamental freedoms. This denial of freedom through the denial of promotion is a common thing in almost every field of public endeavour. In spite of the fact that it is the women who keep the churches open, it is the women who go to church and carry on its work during the week and through their meetings raise thousands of dollars, while the men sit back when they feel like it—in spite of the fact that it is the women who, in the large majority, turn out and support and maintain the churches, how many women ministers of the gospel have we ever permitted to train or to function? We are just beginning to say to the women who maintain and foster and keep the churches alive that they might be permitted to preach. That is true of all other fields of activity. How many women professors have we? How many heads of colleges are women, although we have many highly trained women with very respectable degrees? But if there is a man in sight—any man, who can be chosen we choose him because he is a man, over the better qualified and more experienced woman simply because she is only a woman. And this is practised by a society that calls itself a democracy. I think we shall have to revamp our thinking and leave off practising this witchcraft in our social relationships.

I am going to give the house a little quotation from a clever article by Charlotte Whitton in a recent issue of Maclean's. She has put the case so well that I got her permission to quote this in relation to promotion and responsible positions held by women. She says:

You could count on your ears the number of women—other than in family firms—who sit on elective boards of directors, though in corporation after corporation many a chairman has a competent woman assistant where his brains are supposed to be.

This discrimination is reflected in average salaries among the 125,000 women in all avenues of trade, from messenger girl to manager. In Saint John, for instance, a woman clerk averages $14.58 a week, her male counterpart, $25.48; in Montreal a woman gets $17.63, a man $28.03 a week; in Calgary the figures are $17.91 and $29.36.

Or swing to the 300,000 women and girls in major manufacturing. Their average earnings ran $532 a year in 1941 against their brothers' $1,075, and again this is not in the heavy industries. Even in textiles a man averages about $980 a year against a woman's $500.

Women slave at the very same machines at less return for their toil than men. In one town "sewing-machine operators, male," draw $1.20 an hour where "female" draw 78 cents; and seamstresses drop even lower if they shift to but slightly less onerous work.

In the rubber plants, men and women packers at the same stands—take one centre at random—rate 70 cents against 52 cents. Shoe workers in the same shop at the same bench (and with no difference as to whether a male or female is being shod) draw 44 to 64 cents an hour per man as against 30 to 41 cents for women. Males running about as bakers' helpers in biscuit plants will draw 49 cents against the woman's 40 cents for the same unit of work.

And why a man draws 50 to 77 cents an hour for stuffing sausages beside a woman who draws 40 to 53 cents, only the sausages can tell!

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): How extensive was that survey?

Mrs. STRUM: I shall let the hon. member have the magazine.

I have here a valuable contribution from the Royal Bank of Canada, which deals with women and their work. One is surprised these days to note the things banks put out. I quote from it, as follows:

Consequent upon their growing sense of their value and importance, women are urging that they should have equality with men in both opportunity and reward. A sub-commission on the status of women told the united nations economic and social council in May that equality with men in all fields of human enterprise—political, civil, educational, social and economic—should be sought simultaneously. There is a growing conviction in democratic countries today that the only test in employing people on any work should be their efficiency.

I believe all hon. members will agree that only training, skill, efficiency and integrity should be the criteria in relation to employment. Here is another quotation from the same source:

A list of occupations open to women includes nearly the whole alphabet from accountancy to zoology. The United States Department of Labor has listed 1,050 industrial occupations out of 1,500 as suitable for women, and an additional 350 as "practically suitable." Much of the change in acceptability of women in industry is due to wise management, which is concentrating on fitting conditions of work to the needs of the workers, and is realizing more and more that deftness in execution may more than make up for lack of strength.

I believe all hon. members will agree with that; and as we apply engineering science to jobs we shall lessen the strain for the male workers, and thereby make it possible for women to do many jobs now beyond their strength.

There are hopeful signs that we are beginning to think and act like democrats. I would draw the attention of hon. members to a clipping I took from one of the Ottawa papers, dealing with the payment of teachers in Scarboro township. I was very happy to read this, and I should like to place it before hon. members:

Women teachers in school area No. 1 of Scarboro township will get the same salaries as men teachers, the school board for that area decided last night. The board granted wage increases totalling $60,000 a year.

The minimum salaries of $1,200 for female teachers and $1,400 for male teachers will be replaced with a minimum of $1,500 for all. Maximum salaries of $2,200 for ladies and $2,400 for men will be replaced by a new maximum of $3,600.

Principals, who now earn from $2,280 to $2,800 will in future get from $2,500 to $3,600.

I should like to meet the members of that school board because, by removing this discrimination in respect of people who have the qualifications and the ability to teach, in their own little bailiwick they are beginning to carry out the provisions of the Atlantic charter. They are refusing to practise this denial of freedom in their relations with their fellow men.

There is another feature I should like to point out, and that is our new citizenship bill, which takes another step when it removes discrimination in connection with citizenship. Last year we established, for the first time, the right of a woman to decide whether or not she will change her citizenship at the time of her marriage. Before that, it was out of her hands. Of course we had an amendment which said that within six months a woman might declare her citizenship, and if she took steps to retain it she would not lose it. But very few girls knew that existed, or realized the importance of it, and therefore lost their citizenship. I was happy when we took that step last year, by guaranteeing to all human beings in Canada the right to decide what their citizenship would be.

Only recently in our immigration branch there has been introduced another order in council which gives to girls the same right now enjoyed by boys, of allowing them to bring their fiancés to this country, and to marry and take out citizenship papers.

This was not true until just recently. Since airing my case on the floor of the House of Commons a few days ago, I have been informed by the minister that this decision now applies to girls as well as to boys, and I wish to thank and to congratulate the minister upon having taken this step.

I was happy at the last session to note that at least one minister, who was then Minister of National Health and Welfare, and who is now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), recognized the ability and skill of the women assistants in his department. He was the only minister who brought one of his women assistants to the floor of the house, thereby recognizing her value to the department, and I congratulate him upon his having done so.

All hon. members know that in all government departments there are highly trained women of long experience who, if the ministers happened to be away, could run those departments. These women hold positions of great responsibility, and their services are of great value to the minister. It is time we recognized them and gave them the promotion and the pay their services merit, without discrimination as to sex. I hope that in our relations with each other we shall refuse to violate the spirit of the Atlantic charter, by recognizing basic human rights and fundamental rights of human beings everywhere. Let us start now, in Canada.

Mr. JEAN LESAGE ((Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, the high level at which this debate has been carried on, coupled with the considerable interest it has aroused in the house and in the minds of the public, are proof of its paramount importance. Important it is and even necessary that from time to time representatives of the people suspend their studies of practical matters and legislation so as to give examination to high principles of political and social philosophy, and their application to our legislation.

In the complexity of modern times, too often we are inclined to forget that such principles are the background of laws.

The purpose of the motion presented by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), in one of the most eloquent speeches heard in this house, is the appointment of a joint committee of both houses to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms. If the only effect of the motion were to permit the present discussion, I think there would be unanimous agreement that it has already served a useful purpose. The order of reference to the committee to be appointed is to consider what steps if any should be taken for the purpose of preserving in Canada respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms and also the manner in which obligations arising out of such rights and freedoms, accepted by all members of the united nations, should best be implemented in the world at large.

The adoption of a bill of rights for Canada as proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), in a well documented speech, involves a number of difficulties which, at the moment at least, would appear to be insurmountable. These difficulties have been outlined by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard). I do not intend to repeat what they have already said so accurately. May I simply set out some of the objections.

First, matters pertaining to property and civil rights fall expressly and exclusively under provincial jurisdiction. Second, in practice, under a constitution such as ours, it is utterly impossible to lay down laws in irrevocable statutes which would bind for the future parliament and the provincial legislatures. They are each within its own sphere the supreme authority through which the will of the people can be expressed at all times. Unless a bill of rights is part of our constitution, it is impractical, according to the opinion of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, with whom I am in thorough agreement. I quote him at page 3173 of Hansard:

> There are things that a country must first do if it wishes to define the inalienable and sacred rights of its citizens. Among these things, there is the inevitable obligation to adopt, before everything else, its own constitution.

And further:

> In any event, one thing appears to be undeniable. There cannot, or at least there should not, be a bill of rights or a declaration of that kind enacted by a nation unless there already exists a constitution adopted by that nation, or unless one is formed simultaneously with such declaration.

Another strong objection to the incorporation of a bill of rights in our laws as a statute is, to use the expression of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the danger of putting freedom in a strait-jacket by seeking to define it in words. Any law, any statute is, by its very essence, a hindrance to liberty. You cannot, through a law or a statute, hammer the fundamental principles of human rights and freedom into the minds, hearts and conscience of the people.

Laws cannot instil principles; they are inspired by them. Our laws will preserve and ensure the respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms to the extent and only to the extent to which those who write the laws are convinced of the necessity of the preservation of those rights and freedoms. No element, no faction, no group in Canada seriously and vocally challenges the principles of democracy; and, at least ostensibly, they respect human rights and fundamental freedoms but let us not forget that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

What is true for Canada is not true for the world at large. Even after six years of a terrible and devastating struggle for freedom, which ended in complete victory for the armed forces of democracy, we who do not suffer, at least to the extent mentioned by the members for Lake Centre and Winnipeg North, have to realize that three-quarters of the world is enslaved by communist totalitarian doctrine and practice, and by absolutism. In the liberated countries of Europe, two years after the end of the conflict, people do not enjoy the liberties that we, here, consider as commonplace.

Communism, which, by the very essence of its doctrine, denies human rights and fundamental freedoms, constitutes the greatest danger that we have to face, not only in the world at large, but in North America and in Canada itself. We have to fight in our own country the danger of a subtly organized communism boring into our labour unions. There is a struggle to be fought. In its fundamental aspect, it is basically one between those whose conception of society is materialist and whose malignant and cynical opportunism reflects their creed, and those who believe that peace, prosperity and happiness can be achieved only in conditions of freedom, law, and faith in God. Laws may, to a certain extent, prevent the expansion of communism, but the best way to stop it in our country and the only way to fight it in the world is to spread our own doctrine of democracy. Canadians must take part in a crusade to convince the people of the world that they cannot find security and happiness except in the application of the principles of Christianity and democracy.

I said "Christianity and democracy," because democracy, as I see it, is a political expression of Christianity. In their struggle for the survival of their faith, the persecuted Christians of ancient Rome preached the doctrine of the dignity of each human soul, the doctrine that God intended man to be a good neighbour to his fellowman and the doctrine of the essential unity of the entire world. The first principle of our democratic Christian philosophy asserts that all men are brothers and that God is their father. The fundamental truth that all rights and freedoms derive from God was recalled on Friday last by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville in a speech of irrefutable logic, supported by a constant rising trend of ideas. As I read Hansard, I felt that, between the lines, there was the sound philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, philosophy immovable through the centuries since mediaeval ages, which is the Christian foundation of our democratic principles. And I could not but think that, whatever may be the criticism against them, our classical colleges of the province of Quebec are second to none in the philosophic formation of true Christian democrats.

There is no doubt that the uneasiness in international relations today is primarily due to the supremacy ascribed to materialism over spirituality. Materialism has brought about regimes based on brutality, the abuse of force and complete disregard for spiritual values. We shall not enjoy fundamental freedoms and human rights unless we turn our minds and souls toward those spiritual values; we shall not win our struggle against communism unless we convince the peoples of the world that only in the application of the principles of Christianity and democracy will they find security and happiness.

Mr. BURTON: Let us do it by deeds and not just by words.

Mr. LESAGE: That is exactly what the Liberal government intends to do, because Liberal principles are founded upon and are similar to true, sound, democratic principles; whereas socialism has never been based upon democratic principles.

It is useless to embark on a crusade for freedom if we are not ourselves convinced and imbued with our doctrine, and if we are not ready to give to it the shining glory and the dynamic force which bring about universal adhesion. Louis Marlio expressed the idea in these words:

(Translation):

> Victory has cost us dearly, but it will have settled nothing and will serve merely as a preparation for another world conflict in the next generation. should democracy fail to achieve a victory which is much harder to win and much more essential, the victory over itself.
> Democracy must regain the necessary dynamism in a world subjected to a complete technical evolution; it must adapt its institutions to the economic revolution we are witnessing and it must seek, by a more extensive application of the life-giving principle of brotherhood, a solution to the conflicts which are developing with a growing acuteness in the economic, social and international fields.

(Text):

The victory of our principles in the present situation when the world is divided into two camps depends in a large measure upon the dynamism of our democracy. The essential truth of democracy must capture the hearts of men all over the world if human civilization is not to be destroyed in wars and revolutions far more terrible than anything that has yet been endured. Canada, as a first contribution to the crusade for democracy, could offer our democratic principles for the drafting of an international declaration of human rights and fundamental freedoms which could be accepted by the nations of the world as a guidance in their domestic legislation and international relations.

Recently, in April of this year, a group of individuals representing liberal thought in nineteen nations, alarmed by the danger of communist oppression, have decided to come together for the purpose of "winning general acceptance of democratic principles and to foster a free society based on freedom and personal responsibility, and to provide means of collaboration between men and women of all countries who agree with these principles."

At a meeting held at Oxford of what was called the Liberal world union or the Liberal international as opposed to the red international, these opponents of socialist fascist and communist parties, desiring to express in words democratic and liberal ideals, adopted a manifesto containing the following principles:

(I)

1. Man is first and foremost a being endowed with the power of independent thought and action, and with the ability to distinguish right from wrong.

2. Respect for the human person and for the family is the true basis of society.

3. The state is only the instrument of the community: it should assume no power which conflicts with the fundamental rights of the citizens and with the conditions essential for a responsible and creative life, namely:

Personal freedom, guaranteed by the independence of the administration of law and justice.

Freedom of worship and liberty of conscience.

Freedom of speech and of the press.

Freedom to associate or not to associate.

Free choice of occupation.

The opportunity of a full and varied education, according to ability and irrespective of birth or means.

The right to private ownership of property and the right to embark on individual enterprise.

Consumer's free choice and the opportunity to reap the full of the productivity of the soil and the industry of man.

Security from the hazards of sickness, unemployment, disability and old age.

Equality of rights between men and women.

4. These rights and conditions can be secured only by true democracy. True democracy is inseparable from political liberty and is based on the conscious, free and enlightened consent of the majority, expressed through free and secret ballot, with due respect so the liberties and opinions of minorities.

(II)

1. The suppression of economic freedom must lead to disappearance of political freedom. We oppose such suppression, whether brought about by state ownership or control or by private monopolies, cartels and trusts.

We admit state ownership only for those undertakings which are beyond the scope of private enterprise ( ) in which competition no longer plays its part.

2. The welfare of the community must prevail and must be safeguarded from the abuse of power by sectional interests.

3. A continuous betterment of the conditions of employment, and of the housing and environment of the workers is essential. The rights, duties and interests of labour and capital are complementary; organized consultation and collaboration between employers and employed is vital to the well-being of industry.

(III)

Service is the necessary complement of freedom and every right involves a corresponding duty. If free institutions are to work effectively, every citizen must have a sense of moral responsibility towards his fellow men and take an active part in the affairs of the community.

(IV)

War can be abolished and world peace and economic prosperity restored only if all nations fulfil the following conditions:

(a) Loyal adherence to a world organization of all nations, great and small, under the same law and equity, and with power to enforce the strict observance of all international obligations freely entered into.

[Mr. Lesage.]

(b) Respect for the right of every nation to enjoy the essential human liberties.

(c) Respect for the language, faith, laws and customs of national minorities.

(d) The free exchange of ideas, news, goods and services between nations, as well as freedom of travel within and between all countries, unhampered by censorship, protective trade barriers and exchange regulations.

(e) The development of backward areas of the world with the collaboration of their inhabitants in their true interests and in the interests of the world at large.

Mr. Speaker, there is very little in the declaration I just read with which the true democrats of the Canadian parliament would not agree, except for the fact that it does not mention God as the source of all rights and freedoms. I suggest, however, that the declaration be studied by the committee and I submit respectfully that it would at least form a sound basis for discussion in the committee.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): It is nearly six o'clock, but perhaps I might say a few words before that hour is reached. During this debate we have listened to a number of very good speeches indeed; some of them were quite eloquent. My purpose in intervening is to try to consider what practical steps the committee should take and what attitude the House of Commons should assume with regard to the proposals set forth in the resolution. I shall not read the resolution which is before the house, but I gather from it that the main purpose of the inquiry which is to be conducted by the committee is to consider the manner in which our obligations to the united nations may best be implemented. As part of this inquiry the committee will have to consider the legal and constitutional situation in Canada with respect to human rights.

In the third place, the committee is to consider what steps, if any, it would be advisable to take or to recommend for the purpose of preserving in Canada respect for and observation of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Some of the speeches that have been made during the debate seem to have proceeded on the assumption that the emphasis I have given to the respective objects of the committee is misplaced, and that the main purpose of the committee is to decide whether or not Canada should have a bill of rights and, if so, what should be in it. My own conception of the main purpose of the committee, as I stated at the beginning, is that it is to consider the manner in which our obligations to the united nations may be best implemented. But as the formulation of a bill of rights undoubtedly is within the scope of the terms of reference, I think it will be necessary for me to consider what is involved in that proposal, whether it would be possible to carry it out, and what steps the committee should take in regard to it. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has argued last session and this session in favour of a bill of rights for the dominion of Canada. If you will be good enough to call it six o'clock now, Mr. Speaker, later I want to examine some of the proposals of the hon. member.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the terms of reference applicable to the proposed committee. Certain of the speakers in the debate this afternoon made some interesting points. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) in particular pointed out a fact that we should not lose sight of, that under the British constitution the principle of the supremacy of parliament is the important principle, that parliament may make any laws it wishes, may confer rights, may alter rights or may even deprive individuals of rights by its act. He pointed out also that that principle has been extended to the British dominions and that in the Dominion of Canada this parliament is supreme within the sphere of its jurisdiction and the provinces are supreme within the spheres of their jurisdictions.

That being true, the adoption of the other system, the system of constitutional limitations upon the powers of parliament, would be a radical departure from the principles which have heretofore applied. It would be an introduction into our system of a feature of the American institution; it might possibly be called an Americanization of our constitution. When I say that I am not prejudging the case or the issue as to whether it would be desirable, because that is a matter within the sphere of the terms of the reference which the committee, if it thinks fit to take up this question of a bill of rights, will be free to decide.

I was approaching the point in my remarks where I felt it would be necessary to consider carefully just what is meant by the adoption of a bill of rights for the Dominion of Canada. I am not sure whether the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) favours the adoption of a constitutional amendment or merely the enactment of a dominion statute. On page 3152 of Hansard of May 16, I find this passage from his speech:

> It was for that reason that I suggested, and now suggest, that, when this committee is set up, representatives from the various provinces be convened here, so that by joint action a comprehensive bill of rights may be evolved either by way of constitutional amendment or by statute.

I should like to consider for a few moments just what the case would be as respects the dominion and the provinces and the relations between the dominion and the provinces if the first alternative were adopted, that is, the enactment of a constitutional amendment. The only way in which our constitution may be amended is by an amendment to the British North America Act. As all members of this house know, under the British North America Act property and civil rights are within the jurisdiction of the provinces. The first observation I should like to make is that if our constitution is amended by the enactment of sections comparable with those in the American constitution severe limits would be placed upon the field of jurisdiction now delegated to the provinces. I think it is well that the house should realize that and should understand it thoroughly.

The theme has been laboured, particularly within the last few months in this house, that the dominion should not invade the jurisdiction of the provinces. If the constitution is amended in this way it would mean that the right of the provinces to legislate as they think fit in the field of civil rights would be limited and curtailed. The principle of provincial legislature supremacy in the field of civil rights would no longer exist. It may be that my hon. friend favours the other alternative, that of a dominion statute. When I turn to page 3158 of Hansard I find this passage from his speech:

> Individual civil liberties, those that we have inherited today, guard the weak against the strong. What is needed are civil liberties by declaration of parliament which will guard the individual against the state. It might be argued that another government, another parliament, can revoke a bill of rights passed by parliament. True; but has not history shown that when laws are put upon the statute books, having the support of a vast majority of the people, they stay there?
> A declaration of a bill of rights in the country would be a positive declaration on the part of men and women of all political faiths in their belief in civil liberties. Whether the federal authority has the power or not to pass legislation respecting civil liberties, its passage would strengthen the hand of the Minister of Justice in the matter of the disallowance of any statute which would deny freedom anywhere in our country.

In other words, it is suggested that it might be desirable to pass a dominion statute, whether or not we have jurisdiction to pass that statute, affecting as it would civil rights, and then use the statute as a basis for the disallowance of provincial statutes which might be passed from time to time in conflict with the dominion statute. There, again, I think the house should understand the implications of that proposal. The practice of the disallowance of provincial statutes, while not wholly uniform and perhaps not entirely settled, is more or less so and, generally speaking, the dominion authorities respect the rights of the provinces to legislate within their constitutional field.

It is a somewhat serious proposal that the dominion government should pass an act somewhat regardless of whether it has the power to pass it, affecting as it would civil rights, and then use that act, whether constitutional or unconstitutional, as the basis for the disallowance of acts passed by the legislatures of the respective provinces. I want to say again that I am not prejudging the case; I am a member of the committee, and I do not intend to take a position in this matter in this house in advance of the discussion in the committee. But I do want to point out to this House of Commons the seriousness of these proposals and their radical nature.

The hon. member for Lake Centre then dealt with a miscellaneous assortment of proposals with respect to specific statutes. These proposals were not necessarily tied up to his bill of rights proposals, but I should like to say a few words with regard to those and the amendment or repeal of individual statutes. The hon. member for Rosthern mentioned two of those proposals this afternoon. One was that fiats be abolished, that so far as the dominion government is concerned, and that is as far as we can go, we should do away with the necessity of obtaining a fiat.

This matter arose in this house a few weeks ago and I stated that, so far as I was concerned, I had an open mind on that proposal. I will go farther and say, not only on my own behalf but on behalf of the government, that we have no objection to that proposal. When I say that I want to say that, so far as we are concerned, the proposal has little or no practical importance, because I have made inquiries and find that during the last twenty years never has a fiat been denied except in an admittedly frivolous case, and I do not know whether there have been many or even any of those. Persons who desire to bring actions against His Majesty the King in the right of Canada are granted fiats automatically unless, as I say, the action is of a patently frivolous nature. So from a practical point of view it does not matter whether we abolish or continue fiats in the dominion field. I see no objection whatever to abolishing fiats and, if the committee and the house wish to do it—I would not want to get the matter into controversy because the issue is not one of practical importance—the government would have no objection to introducing the necessary legislation, but I would hope that we would not be asked to do it until next year because of the lack of practical importance of the issue involved.

The other matter mentioned by the hon. member for Rosthern this afternoon and also by the hon. member for Lake Centre was an extension of the appellate powers of the Supreme Court of Canada. That is a question which requires study. If and when appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council from the Dominion of Canada are abolished the whole question of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada will have to be carefully reviewed. At the present time except in criminal cases Canadians have the right to apply to the judicial committee of the privy council for leave to appeal in all cases. They do not have the same rights in the Supreme Court of Canada, and it may be necessary, it may be desirable, to extend the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court and to make the necessary amendments to the Supreme Court Act. That is a matter which could properly be studied by the committee if the committee considers that it is of importance commensurate with that of the other subjects of great importance which it will have to consider.

Another act which the hon. member for Lake Centre mentioned as being one which perhaps ought to be amended or revamped, I think was the word he used, is the Public Inquiries Act. The point about the Public Inquiries Act is just this, that witnesses are not as such entitled to counsel in proceedings before a royal commission. The relevant sections of the Public Inquiries Act are these:

> 12. The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this act, and shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.
> 13. No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice shall have been given to him of the charge of misconduct alleged against him and he shall have been allowed full opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel.

Under these sections a witness before a royal commission is entitled to counsel if a charge is made against him in the course of the investigation, and he is entitled to counsel and to reasonable notice before any report is made against him so that he may attend with counsel. These provisions were at the time the act was passed, I think in 1912, regarded as adequate. The point which has been raised recently, as a result probably of the espionage inquiry, is not a new one. The point was fully discussed in the debates of the day in 1912 or 1913, and it will be found that Sir Robert Borden, after an open-minded discussion of the issues involved, advised the house that, in his opinion, these safeguards were adequate. It may be argued that they should be extended; it may be argued that they are sufficient. If the matter comes before the committee that is set up, the debates of that day and much other material available on the subject will be of great value to the committee. But that again is a matter pertaining to the amendment of a specific act of parliament rather than a part of a bill of rights.

Another act that was mentioned was the Official Secrets Act. It is suggested that the Official Secrets Act is too hard on the accused, that certain presumptions of guilt should be removed from the Official Secrets Act. If that position is put forward in the committee I think anyone who puts it forward will find some pretty strong reasons for the present provisions of the Official Secrets Act. The presumption of innocence is, it is true, an old and highly prized right. It has been found necessary, however, in much provincial legislation and in some of our dominion legislation to reverse or remove this presumption in particular circumstances. Nearly every session there comes before the house legislation which precipitates a debate as to where the onus should lie. The only point I am making is that no general or universal rule can be laid down. I do not know that anybody would advocate that all the presumptions of guilt in the Official Secrets Act be reversed. The presumption was reversed in the Official Secrets Act of Great Britain, and it has been in our own. It would be prejudging the case to say that our present act is perfect, but it is also prejudging the case to say that it should be changed because the presumptions are reversed in certain circumstances.

There are in this world a great many highly ntelligent persons who have made a careful study of our British system of law and procedure with certain objects in mind. Those objects are to take full advantage of the rules, so that they can carry on espionage within Canada with impunity. Persons who are real offenders against the Official Secrets Act are persons who are selling out and betraying their country. Spies are not likely to leave much evidence behind them, either direct evidence or circumstantial evidence. Their methods are developed so as to capitalize, to the full, presumptions of innocence, necessity of proof beyond reasonable doubt, necessity of corroboration and all the other rules which have been worked out through the centuries as safeguards of liberties by courts and legislators who had in mind crimes very different from the kind of crimes that spies commit. Consequently the provisions to which my hon. friend objects were enacted for the protection of the state and of the liberties which the existence of a democratic state provides. It may be that some changes in this legislation are desirable; but if the question is raised in the committee the committee will have to decide how far we dare tamper with legislation which has been forced upon us by pressure of modern espionage methods.

Then, I come to the War Measures Act. While I have stated carefully that I do not wish to prejudge any of the proposals which have been put forward, it is almost impossible for me not to prejudge that one. The proposal is that the War Measures Act be repealed. The wording used by my hon. friend is this:

> I have a few suggestions to make. The first one is that this committee should consider the advisability of the repeal of the War Measures Act, which has been on the statute books since 1914. In between the first and the second wars, on several occasions in the House of Commons a declaration was made that it was no longer in effect. That act, standing as it does, constitutes an invitation to any government in the future under the emergency theory to declare an emergency to the detriment of the rights of our people.

Then there followed some questions and interjections, following which the hon. member for Lake Centre said:

> My right hon. friend says it was a very necessary act. It was necessary in the period of the war; but in the days of peace, with the challenge that the state is making to the rights of the individual, Professor Lower supports the stand that I take, namely, that the act should be repealed.

I should like the house to understand the seriousness of that suggestion, namely, that the War Measures Act be repealed. The War Measures Act was passed in 1914, and has remained on the statute books ever since. It remains dormant unless there is a war, insurrection or apprehended war. It is admitted by the hon. member—and, I think, by everybody else in Canada without exception—that the War Measures Act is necessary in time of war.

The proposal seems to be that we wait until there is a war before we pass it, that we repeal it now and then wait until there is a war before we put it on the statute books again. I do not know how that proposal appeared to hon. members, but in a country the size of Canada and with the possibility that if we got into a war again that war would burst upon us with great suddenness, would we not be taking an entirely unwarranted gamble in the time factor if we were to take the War Measures Act off the statute books of this country?

An American general, I believe it was Major-General Russell P. Groves, said not so long ago that the first few hours of surprise assault in another war might cost the lives of forty million Americans. I do not know whether that is so or not. But it is because I do not know, and because none of us knows, it would be extremely serious to make it necessary for parliament to be called together before the necessary legislation could be enacted for the carrying on of a war.

And then, think of all the things which have to be done when the war clouds are gathering. Before the last war, the defence of Canada regulations were in course of preparation for at least six months before the war came, because during the summer of 1939 it looked as if war were coming. Those regulations could not have been prepared, except under an act, and that act was on the statute books of Canada.

The same is true of regulations respecting foreign exchange control, respecting trading with the enemy, respecting dependents' allowances and various other regulations which were prepared in advance, so that, if war did come, we would not be caught napping. And they all had to be prepared under the War Measures Act. If those persons who were working on those regulations did not know what kind of act they would have, or whether they would have any act at all, or what the provisions of the act would be, how could they possibly place themselves in a state of readiness for any conflict which might possibly come?

It might be said that if it looked as if war were looming up we could put the act on the statute books. But I think if hon. members will consider the proposal they will see some pretty serious objections to it. If Canada were to enact a War Measures Act in anticipation of a war, it might be extremely prejudicial to our international relations. In effect, it would be a declaration that we were expecting a war. It would be interpreted, probably, as a declaration that we wanted a war. The economic effects; the effects on markets and on the prices of commodities and on government financing would have to be taken into consideration, if an act were passed such as the War Measures Act in anticipation of a war, when there was still a hope that such a war might be avoided.

That act was passed in 1914, and it was left on the statute books of this country between the wars. Now some well-meaning professors come along and write treatises saying that we should repeal it. And the hon. member for Lake Centre identifies himself with that proposal. As I said before, I do not want to prejudge anything which may take place in committee; but it is pretty hard not to prejudge such a proposal as that.

I now come to another matter which has been discussed at length in the press, and which my hon. friend discussed at some length in his speech. I refer to the espionage inquiry. My hon. friend says in that connection:

> I come down to a more recent example, and that is in connection with the espionage commission set up under order in council passed on October 6, 1945.

May I interject at this point that the commission was not set up under the order in council of October 6, 1945. It was set up in February, 1946, but the order authorizing the detention and interrogation of those who were believed to have the information about espionage was passed on October 6, 1945. Then the hon. member continues:

> No one today would say that there was not in that order in council a cavalier disregard of great and basic constitutional liberties, of those liberties which my right hon. friend says are guaranteed to all our people under the charter of British peoples.

Much has been said in criticism of the action the government took with reference to the espionage inquiry. And little, I must say, has been said on the other side. I have received some letters from persons who were concerned about the methods which were adopted, and who have protested about them. I have tried to point out to my correspondents, as I should like to point out to the house, certain vital facts which I think it is high time were pointed out.

It should be pointed out that, while measures of an exceptional nature were taken in the investigation of the Gouzenko charges, the situation was one of grave and acute emergency. The government had reason to believe that information of a most important kind, including information relating to the atomic bomb, was disclosed to a foreign power by persons connected with Canadian governmental activities. Apart altogether from the other kinds of information that were being communicated, the communication of information about the atomic bomb might have had the most far-reaching and devastating consequences. Anyone who has read much about the effects of the atomic bomb—a book, which, I believe, is called "Hiroshima" is a good example—which include the agonizing suffering and mass destruction of men, women and children, must realize the appalling consequences which might have flowed from the flouting by government servants of governmental policies in relation to secrecy in this field; and from violation of oaths of secrecy, and from violation of the Official Secrets Act. Let us not forget that we were not confronted with any ordinary situation at all. We were confronted with an extraordinary one.

While exceptional steps were taken to bring into the open conspiracies which we had reason to believe existed, and which have since been proved to have existed, there are certain facts which should be borne in mind. One is that every step taken by or on behalf of the government was legal. The report of the royal commission clearly establishes this fact. To hear a great deal of the criticism made, one would have thought we in some way violated the Habeas Corpus Act or we had broken certain laws. As the hon. member for Rosthern pointed out this afternoon, however, no order in council was passed that was not authorized by legislation of this parliament. We operated under the authority of this parliament, and the royal commission operated under the authority of this parliament in every step it took.

The second fact is that no one denies the capacity or sense of responsibility of the royal commission itself.

There has been some criticism of the government for selecting two judges of the Supreme Court of Canada as royal commissioners, but I would like to point out to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), who is very strong on this point, that there are certain great and grave situations wherein it is not inconsistent with the dignity of a judge, nor is it inconsistent with the duties of the judiciary for them to act as royal commissioners, and that fact has been recognized in the old country as well as in this country for a great many years. Here, if ever, there was a case where the public must be satisfied of the impartiality of the commissioners and of the reliability of their findings, and therefore we felt we were completely justified in going to the highest tribunal in the land and taking two judges from that court and setting them up as a royal commission.

No one denies the capacity or sense of responsibility of the eminent counsel who conducted the investigation before the commission. One of them was president of the Canadian Bar Association at the time, and the others were men of character and capacity, and a deep sense of responsibility.

No one denies the gravity or emergent character of the situation to be dealt with. No one denies the desirability of dealing with the situation effectively. No one denies that the investigation might very well have been a fiasco had not such steps been taken.

In this event, if it had been a fiasco, we would today have been assured by those who are attacking us that the investigation was a mere witch hunt, that the bogey of communism had once more been falsely raised, and that Gouzenko's stories were merely figments of the imagination. That is what we would have been told today, and this is borne out by the avidity with which critics of the government seize upon every acquittal to prove that the prosecution of the person acquitted was unjustifiable, a conclusion which is invalid, as I shall try to show in a few minutes.

So much by the way of background of the position we took. I am not going into all the charges, accusations and grounds of criticism of the government and of the royal commission; they are pretty well answered in the report of the royal commission itself. But it is said that we should not be circulating that report, and it is said in particular that a certain note which the government authorized to be placed in a statement appended to the report should not be circulated.

Let me read what my hon. friend says on that latter point, and this is something which I feel like almost indignantly repudiating. On page 3156 of Hansard, he says:

> I abhor communism and all its works, but the added words signify an attitude that no government should display. They indicate a spirit of resentment because the courts of the country saw fit not to allow the declaration of a royal commission.
> Canadians have the right not to be deprived of life, liberty or property without process of law. Should they not also have the right not to be deprived of reputations by an executive that is exasperated by the results in the courts? That addendum by the government condones the lawless enforcement of the law.

Let me tell the house, in case they have not been following this matter, what the addendum was. A report was published and, as I shall argue in a few moments, it was not only our right but our duty to circulate that report. Certain of the persons reported against were tried in the criminal courts and were acquitted. We felt that, in fairness to them, the fact of their acquittals should be communicated to those who received the report, and so we put in the front of the report a statement that certain persons had been acquitted. But we made this addendum:

It must not be assumed that in any case the evidence before the commission and that adduced at the criminal proceedings were the same.

It is that addendum which makes some critics see red—I am not trying to make a pun on the word "red." It makes them very angry because they say it is unfair to the accused. If we had not added it, the fact that we were publicizing the acquittals would be taken as a criticism or perhaps a repudiation of the work of the commission, and it was certainly far from our wish to express any criticism of that kind, for reasons which I shall state.

I think the answer to what my hon. friend says there, and to similar forms of criticism, can be given to the house most concisely by my reading a letter which I wrote to one of the civil liberties associations with whom I have an enjoyable correspondence, the civil liberties association of Manitoba. That association, on the 28th day of April, sent me a resolution which was in the following terms:

1. That the Canadian government be requested to repudiate the note added to the report of the royal commission on espionage and dated January 30, 1947, reading:

"It should not be assumed that in any case the evidence before the royal commission and that adduced in the criminal proceedings were the same."

This statement is not only unfair to persons acquitted in the recent trials but also implies contempt for the law of Canada as administered in the courts.

2. That the Canadian government be requested to withdraw from circulation the report of the Kellock-Taschereau royal commission.

Upon receiving that letter, I replied—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Who sent it?

Mr. ILSLEY: —to the Civil Liberties Association of Manitoba in the following terms; and I am reading this letter into the record because it replies to the charges that have been made by various persons including the hon. member for Lake Centre, and replies more compendiously than I otherwise could.

Mr. HACKETT: Who wrote the letter?

Mr. ILSLEY: I did.

Mr. HACKETT: No. Who wrote the letter to which you are replying?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is signed by David Owens, secretary, civil liberties association; and my reply is addressed to David Owens, secretary, Civil Liberties Association of Manitoba. It reads as follows:

Ottawa, 10th May, 1947.

Dear sir,—

I have your letter of April 28, 1947, advising me of the contents of a resolution recently adopted at a general meeting of the Civil Liberties Association of Manitoba. This resolution requests that the Canadian government withdraw from circulation the report of the Kellock-Taschereau royal commission. I am of opinion that I would not be justified in recommending that this be done.

This commission, as you know, consisted of two judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, the highest court in the land. They were assisted by counsel of equally high standing in their profession, one of whom was the president of the Canadian Bar Association. The proceedings were conducted with care and fairness and every witness was given the fullest opportunity to tell his story and explain all circumstances which appeared in any way to reflect upon him. The result of this investigation is a report of immense value to the nation. To deny such a report to the public because some of the witnesses were later acquitted after prosecution would be in my opinion unwarranted.

Is it not possible that the difference between the purpose and nature of the proceedings before the royal commission and the purpose and nature of the proceedings before the criminal courts has been overlooked? The royal commission was not a court having criminal jurisdiction. Its findings were based upon preponderance of evidence, while those of the criminal courts were based upon proof or lack of proof beyond reasonable doubt. The commission in the report, after setting out the evidence adduced before them, stated its opinion as to what certain witnesses and others did. There is no reason why this opinion should not be presented to the public together with a statement of the grounds upon which the opinion was based. It is open to the public to decide whether or not the opinion arrived at was a correct one.

It must be kept constantly in view that the report disclosed a most serious conspiracy to furnish secret information to a foreign power and that subversive elements had infiltrated into the public service on a considerable scale. In a matter of such vital importance to the whole Canadian public, it would be, in my judgment, indefensible to withhold from publication the commission's report of the steps it took and of the conclusions it arrived at. The withdrawal of the report from circulation would, I believe, be an undemocratic suppression of information to which the public is entitled.

The resolution passed by your association also requests that the Canadian government repudiate the note added to the report reading: "It should not be assumed that in any case the evidence before the royal commission and that adduced in the criminal proceedings were the same." The allegations advanced for this request are two in number: First, that the statement is unfair to persons acquitted in the recent trials, and secondly, that the statement implies contempt for the law of Canada as administered in the courts.

I regret to say that I am unable to agree that either of these allegations is correct. There are, in my opinion, good reasons for the addition of the note in question. It was recognized that upon acquittals taking place, it would be only fair to those who were acquitted to state that fact to those receiving the report. The statement setting out the acquittals was therefore added and circulated with the report. This statement, however, would have been incomplete and misleading had it not contained a note to the effect that the acquittals were not necessarily based on the same evidence which was adduced before the commission. The note might even have gone further and pointed out that the rules of procedure and the evidentiary principles upon which findings were based were necessarily different. In any event, had the note not been added, those receiving the report might very well have come to the conclusion that the government was, by pointing out the fact of the acquittals, criticizing or repudiating the work of the commission, which the government was and is far from wishing to do.

The government regards the work of the commission as having been immeasurably beneficial to the interests of Canada. The commission did its duty and did it well, just as the courts did their duty and did it well. The commission was set up for one purpose, the courts functioned for another. The rules of evidence and procedure were not the same, the evidence itself was not necessarily the same, and a belief in the propriety of the steps and action taken by the commission is in no way inconsistent with a belief in the propriety of the steps and action taken by the courts.

I am unable to understand the following sentence in the resolution referred to in your letter: "This statement is not only unfair to persons acquitted in the recent trials, but also implies contempt for the law of Canada as administered in the courts." For the reasons which I have stated, I do not regard the statement as unfair to the persons acquitted in the recent trials, nor can I agree that it implies any contempt for the law of Canada as administered in the courts.

I accept your statement that your association in no way condones subversive activity, but I must observe that the withdrawal from circulation of the report of the commission as requested by your association, while not condoning subversive activity, would make the climate more favourable to the growth of subversive activity and remove a formidable barrier to its spread.

Yours very truly,

Mr. REID: Did you get an answer to that one?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not yet.

Mr. REID: I should not think you would.

Mr. ILSLEY: I come now to a part of the speech made by the hon. member for Lake Centre, in which he quotes with approval certain statements of Professor Lower, as reported at page 3156 of Hansard, one of which is as follows:

> The conduct of government, from Prime Minister to royal commission, over the espionage case, bore every appearance of hysteria, when it did not bear the appearance, as unfortunately in certain quarters it did, of sheer persecution.

This raises the important question: Should the concern which the government felt over the disclosures of Gouzenko be characterized as hysteria, or was it the type of grave concern which the people of Canada expect from a government having a deep sense of responsibility for the welfare of its citizens, the preservation of its institutions and the future of the state? If hon. members think that the proper word to describe the state of mind of the government was "hysteria" rather than "responsible concern", then the hon. member for Lake Centre has made out a strong case against the government. But if they feel that the concern we displayed was justified, then there is no case against the government, but on the contrary there is the strongest of all possible cases for the government. As for myself, I believe that our concern was justified to the hilt. I believe that if we had not taken prompt, vigorous and effective measures, we should have been recreant to our trust. The government of Canada, by resolutely investigating and bringing to light the shocking facts revealed in the espionage inquiry, rendered an immense service, not only to the people of this country, but to those of other democratic countries. The view now put forward—and apparently with approval—by the hon. member for Lake Centre is that we became too excited. One would almost think, to hear this view, that, after all, this was not an important affair. But I am satisfied that is not the view taken either by the rank and file of the Canadian people or by responsible observers abroad. We have been attacked for the manner in which the investigation was conducted, but some of this attack has been a manifestation of party politics. I confidently assert to this house, from conversations I have had with many Canadians in all walks of life, that far from the public resenting the steps taken by the government, they endorse those steps. It is all very well for opposition critics and arm-chair critics, now that the offenders are brought to justice, the plots exposed and the public of democratic countries put on the alert, to indulge in criticism of this, that or the other step which was taken; but these opposition critics would have sung a very different song if, as a result of our public service not having been cleansed of subversive elements, the drive against our institutions and our liberties had gone unchecked. We had a grave responsibility to shoulder. We assumed that responsibility and are prepared to defend the course we took, both here and elsewhere.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us calls for the nomination of a committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms, which would also seek the best way to fulfil certain obligations entered into by all members of the united nations organization.

In this materialistic age of ours, the terms right, justice and freedom are in some quarters strangely misused. Some so-called master minds construe them so as to cover all sorts of errors and abuses. They claim the freedom to do everything they please as if such a right were admitted in a well-organized christian society. For them, a right is a means to any end. They would establish the principles of a new justice, or rather injustice, to do away with social order, to deny God, divine and natural laws, to substitute a pagan state to the Almighty Himself, who is the source of all good and therefore of all rights and freedoms.

I wish to protest against this materialistic and pagan trend. Allow me to say briefly what are, to my mind, freedom, and right and justice.

To be free does not mean to have one's own way with everything, to such a pass as to exalt evil to a system and to legalize injustice. To be free does not mean to organize opposition to God and persecution against His ministers, to deprive man of his faith in God. To be free does not mean to tolerate open warfare against God and the state which is the dispenser of justice from above. Freedom is the right man has to act for the good and not for evil. Liberty is the right to act, for temporal motives, according to human dignity and to the dictates of one's reason, which implies the respect of the rights and property of others, and for spiritual motives, which represent the ultimate end of man.

Indeed, if liberty means the right to do anything why then adopt a bill of rights? If such a bill is not based upon the recognition of God, how can we adopt principles consistent with His justice? If we are not agreed upon the basic principle of the authority of the state, which consists in enforcing respect for God, private property and social order, what would be the value of declarations which will substitute licence and revolution to true freedom?

Therefore, it is necessary to distinguish as between freedom of worship and the anti-social and anti-religious propaganda of certain sects whose tracts are filled with libels and blasphemies. Those anarchists demand freedom of religion but at the same time they defy the divine and human laws and spread hatred against the Catholic, Protestant and Jewish religions. Far from being advocates of true liberty, they are the fanatical partisans of licence and anarchy. I do not agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—what a strange combination—in regard to the meaning of freedom of worship.

Jehovah's Witnesses and similar sects are entitled to their beliefs, but let them not deny other citizens the same privilege. Let them show regard for the law and the religious convictions of the majority and all will be well. As crown prosecutor for the province of Quebec, I have had to read some of their pamphlets that were a tissue of abuse and blasphemy, repeatedly condemned by our criminal courts. Whenever such people transgress the laws of the land, provincial governments can only summon them before the courts as in the case of any other law-breakers, and no one should seek to derive some political advantage out of a situation such as that. I don't see why an exception should be made, in the name of freedom, in favour of the very ones who disregard it and attempt, by libel and falsehood, to spread discord and hatred in a country like ours where peace, order and charity should be the rule. Man is not free to sow hatred; for he then abuses liberty which entitles him to act for the good and not for the destruction of society.

Who will claim that a member of society has a right to destroy the other component parts of that body? Right is everyone's due. Justice is that virtue which inclines the will to a recognition of the rights of others.

It is surely neither right nor justice to trample upon one's oath of allegiance or to betray one's country. A Canadian's first duty is to seek his country's welfare. Any deviation from this sacred duty must not only be punished but prevented by all means at the government's disposal.

I, therefore, congratulate the Government for having taken energetic measures to fight communism. A spy ring had been organized and constituted a menace to our country's security. A number of subversive acts were denounced and names were brought to the executive's attention. What was the duty of our government? According to the hon. member for Lake Centre, we should have refrained, for the sake of freedom, from interning those who were suspected of designing against the very existence of the Canadian nation. For the sake of this so-called freedom, were we to permit a group of enemies in our midst to maintain communications with certain foreign powers, to the prejudice of Canada?

Mr. Speaker, not only was the government entitled to do so, but they were in duty bound to stop, by all available means, the activities of a group suspected of jeopardizing our constitutional and social freedoms. It was a duty on a plane far superior to the temporary physical freedom of an individual against whom suspicions have not led to a conclusive proof.

I hope our bill of rights will never allow a traitor to enjoy his freedom while he is a menace to the majority of our citizens.

It is therefore imperative that in the Canadian bill of rights the divine as well as the temporal rights be safeguarded against any encroachment by enemies of Christian faith and social order.

Would it not be necessary, on that occasion, to ensure more protection for the rights of certain citizens and of the racial groups which are the very foundation of this country? As a matter of fact, the structure of our nation has been built up by French- and English-speaking Canadians; they have the same rights and it behooves them mutually to respect them, especially as regards language, education and religion. Therefore, I feel that complete recognition of those rights would go a long way toward the achievement of perfect unity in this country.

In the province of Quebec, the English-speaking minority enjoys, from the standpoint of education, the same rights and privileges as the French-speaking majority. Mr. Speaker, there is no reason why this principle should not be observed in all provinces toward the French-speaking minority. Let this principle be written into the charter of our rights and let the provinces accept all its implications by ratifying it. That is a ground of dominion-provincial understanding which no province would have the right to ignore. In so saying, I am neither raising prejudice nor rousing passions.

On the contrary, I claim, in the name of true liberty and plain justice, a right which is no doubt recognized by an overwhelming majority of this country's citizens. It is through mutual recognition of those fundamental rights that we shall make Canada a Christian democracy whose influence will extend throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, let us be realistic and sincere. Our liberties rest upon the ten commandments which constitute a charter for free men in a Christian society. We must draw from true principles of charity the boundaries of freedom, that is the right to act legitimately for our own good and that of our fellow-citizens. Let us do justice unto others as we would wish upon ourselves and there will be room in this Canada of ours for all men respectful of divine, natural and civil laws. I hope that our country will never give shelter to the traitors, the anarchists and the ungodly.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I think the house has listened with interest and profit to the sober statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). I have never criticized, either openly or otherwise, the action of the government in the espionage trials. I had my doubts, my fears and my reservations in regard to the procedure, but I did not know how much the government knew and consequently I felt that I was not in position to judge as to what they had done. On the other hand, I did not criticize those who were criticizing the government, because I felt that that was their right. But I did feel that there was a little too much criticism in the espionage cases when one took into consideration the lack of criticism in a case which I felt was much more important, where not just a mere handful of people were concerned but where several thousands were concerned. Several thousand Canadians had their freedom interfered with, their property rights taken away, and there was very little heard about the matter.

The persons concerned in the espionage cases were brought to trial and some were found guilty, which was justification to some extent for the action the government had taken. Others were found not guilty. But they had their day in court, while these other people to whom I refer, Canadians of Japanese origin, have not had their day in court up to this day. So I felt all along that too much attention was given to the one case and not sufficient to the other. In reality, the circumstances, that is the interference with freedom, was the same in both cases. If it was wrong to take away the freedom, at least for a short time until they were convicted or released, of the few concerned in the espionage cases, surely it was wrong in the case of the people of Japanese origin.

What I wanted to speak about tonight and my reason for taking part in the debate is to say that during the course of the debate I felt that the fundamental principles underlying human rights and human freedoms were not very much discussed. In my opinion, the basis of freedom is equality; where there is no equality freedom is limited. My reading of history leads me to believe that history down through the ages is largely a struggle of the working class to throw off the yoke of its exploiters and masters. The growth and extension of democracy have been brought about by new classes coming up and taking part in the government. By such process has democracy been extended.

Much has been said about Magna Carta. Magna Carta in reality conferred freedom on but a small segment of the population of England of that time. The great mass of the English people were yet beyond its benefits, and indeed not for centuries down through the industrial revolution and even until 1874 when universal suffrage for the male population was adopted in Britain did the mass partake of the benefits of democracy.

I have here "British History in the Nineteenth Century", by George Macaulay Trevelyan, a noted historian, from which I quote a paragraph or two to indicate the position of the working class in Britain around 1795. At page 158 of this book, the author says:

> The Tory panacea for unrest had been proclaimed in 1795 by Bishop Horsley when he said that "the mass of the people had nothing to do with the laws but to obey them."

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. MacINNIS: Because they had nothing to do with the laws. They did not have the franchise. They had no part in the administration of their country's affairs. As the reverend bishop said, all they had to do with the law was to obey it, and that remained the situation for a considerable time after that. So those who think that liberties and freedom are being curtailed are in my opinion, away off the mark. I do not believe that liberties and freedom are being curtailed. I believe that liberties and freedom are being extended every day. That is not to say that we should not be careful of those liberties and concerned to preserve them. To continue the quotation from Mr. Trevelyan, he says at page 159:

> Citizens, indeed, the workmen were not. They had no word in the government of England, and no civic position in the local area which they had come to inhabit. If they happened to be lodged within a chartered town, they lived under a close corporation and its municipal magistrates. If they were outside such precincts, they were under the rural justices of the peace and the antiquarian relics of the court leet. Neither urban nor rural authorities were called upon to provide for health, lighting, decency or education in a new factory quarter. They were content to quell riots and to arrest trade unionists, seditionists, deists, frame-breakers and other criminals.

For a long, long time after, that was the position of the working class in England, but that is not their position today, and they are not treating their so-called superiors in the way their own class had been treated for so many centuries.

Along the same lines I have another quotation from "The British People, 1746-1946," by G. D. H. Cole and Raymond Postgate. It covers the period from 1746 to 1946, and referring to the position of the industrial workers in Britain and more particularly to children of a tender age, the authors say:

> To this early period of labour shortage belongs the "parish apprenticeship" system, under which many thousands of children from London and other large towns, having become inmates of pauper institutions, were shipped in droves to the new factory areas, there to be bound apprentices to some cotton lord who undertook to feed and clothe them in a barrack built specially for their occupation, and even to give them a minimum of schooling in his factory school. This system, which, as we have seen, Peel's "first Factory Act" of 1802 was designed to bring under some sort of regulation, died out rapidly as soon as local supplies of child labour became available; for the factory owners soon found that "free" labour, which they could engage and discharge at will, came cheaper than pauper labour which they were bound to maintain throughout the period of apprenticeship, whether trade was good or bad. In bad times, the "free" factory children had to be kept by their parents, or out of the local poor rates, of which the factory owners paid only a relatively small part.

Those were the conditions in Britain for many, many years. How different in Great Britain today, under that "terrible" socialist government, where the welfare of the children is the first concern of the state.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Is it any better—

Mr. MacINNIS: It is better.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Any better than here?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not talking about that at the moment. But while equality and the benefits of equality, freedom, have been increasing down through the years, they are still far from perfect.

I have heard several speakers declare that we could not have social security without the danger of losing our freedom. That is the philosophy of the well to do, the philosophy of the comfortably fixed, those who already have both security and freedom. But let me tell those people that the person who has lost his security has also lost his freedom; for what freedom has the unemployed got? What freedom does that man enjoy who must come and go at the behest of another? All the freedom he has is to accept what he gets, or he has freedom to starve. The man who has lost his security has also lost his freedom.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And his human rights.

Mr. MacINNIS: And his human rights; that is quite correct.

Mr. LESAGE: That is what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, and he has been Prime Minister for a long, long time. My hon. friend spoke this afternoon and there were a great many flaws in his philosophy. It could be shot through with so many holes that you could drive a horse and cart through them.

Mr. LESAGE: It was the philosophy I learned in a university.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not have the good fortune to go to a university, but I will back my philosophy and my ability to state it against the hon. member's any day, also its correctness in relation to present economic and social conditions. As I said before, as regards those who talk of losing our freedom if we are to have security, that is the philosophy of the well-to-do. We cannot have freedom unless we have security. We cannot have freedom in its fullness unless we have security.

A moment ago I said that equality was the basis, and the only basis, that freedom can have. In this country, in so far as there is division among us, that division arises because of certain people wanting a greater share of the goods they produce. Others fear that if those people do get a greater share of the wealth their labour produces they themselves will have to do with a smaller share.

That, after all, is the difference between us, largely, in the many industrial and the other disputes which arise between the various classes in the community. There is good ground for such disputes. The man who lives on an income of $5,000 or $10,000 has a great many things that the man who lives on an income of $1,000 or $1,200 or less does not have. Not only can the man with the income of $5,000 or $10,000 have certain things for himself, but he can do certain things for his children that the other man cannot do. And does anyone really think any man with spirit will see other children having things his children cannot have, without making a protest about it?

I have here a news item from the Ottawa Journal of May 6, 1947. It is a report of a speech made by Doctor G. E. Hall, dean of the medical school and president-elect of the university of Western Ontario. He was talking about the students attending university, and pointed out that the children of those in the low-income groups had far less chance of attending university than the children of those in the high income groups, or the middle income groups.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): We all know that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am telling it to you now, so that you will know it better and do something about it, and so that you will not complain when the man in the low-income group wishes to increase his income so that he can send his children to university, too.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Is that your fault or mine?

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not say it was your fault.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I would ask the hon. member not to interrupt.

Mr. MacINNIS: Doctor Hall said:

> There is no such thing as equality of opportunity. Among the so-called superior students those whose parents had incomes of $5,000 or more went with one hundred per cent to university. Only forty-two per cent of children whose parents with incomes of $3,000 to $5,000 went to university, and only twenty-two per cent from families with incomes of $2,000 or less.

Since we were told a few days ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that more than one-half of the earning population of this country received incomes of less than $1,700, it will be seen how few of those in that group will ever get higher education and, consequently, be in a position to take any of the better jobs which come along in either commerce, government or the professions.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does Doctor Hall give the proportion of those who finish university? I think the hon. member is right in his figure respecting those who enter; but I think it is those in the lower income groups who get through. I was one of them.

Mr. MacINNIS: Those figures are not here; but I think that is not particularly important in this connection. What is important is not that one should have the ability to finish his education in a university, but that he should have an opportunity to enter it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I agree with that; I just wondered if the hon. member had the figure.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have no fault with the question. As I said, unless we extend equality of opportunity it is idle to talk about human rights and fundamental freedoms, because they do not and cannot exist without equality. I am not ,and I think no one else is in a position to say if a bill of rights should be passed by this parliament as a statute, or should be an addition to our constitution. I believe they have a bill of rights in the constitution of the United States. I spent some few years in that country and through that fact together with my reading, I am fairly conversant with what takes place over there. I do not think they have any more freedom or assurance of freedom than we have in this country.

They passed numerous laws, besides the bill of rights itself, to protect the freedom of the individual. But instead of protecting the freedom of the individual, some of them have been used to protect the freedom of big business.

I hold in my hand a book entitled "The Folklore of Capitalism", by T. W. Arnold, who, I believe, was at one time either the attorney general or the assistant attorney general of the United States.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): How old is it?

Mr. MacINNIS: The book?

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: It was published in 1937.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): You are always quoting some old book.

Mr. MacINNIS: Old books are worth reading.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Yes, but you do not stand by them.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Arnold was referring to the due process of law in the United States constitution, the fifth amendment. The due process of law provides that no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval or other forces. And he pointed out that, instead of that amendment's now being used to protect the ordinary citizen, the ordinary trade unionist or other person who comes within the grip of the law, today—and this is what he says at page 34:

> Today this amendment is one of the reasons why railroads are protected from a federal pension system. Public control of business becomes the same as taking away property. Great national organizations become individuals.

We cannot in my opinion, base our assurance of enjoying freedom on a statute or as part of the constitution.

I think the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) would argue that there are sufficient safeguards in our laws to protect the people who were mixed up in the espionage cases. But it is clear that those statutes did not save them. I am certainly convinced that there were laws to protect the persons of Japanese origin who were removed so ruthlessly from their homes on the Pacific coast. And yet it was not done.

Our liberties, regardless of what is in the law, can never be safe unless we are ever watchful that nothing shall interfere with them.

Mr. PAUL EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the government is to be commended for proposing the nomination of a committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms. I hope this motion will meet with great success.

But let us not delude ourselves. The standard definitions of freedom and human rights were coined centuries ago and have long since been embodied in the statute books of so-called civilized nations, where they lie dormant, save when the crash of guns breaks in upon their slumber.

Every time men are bent on devouring one another, those rights and freedoms provide material for tirades and slogans intended to whet the soldiers' mettle. But when the struggle is over, they don the shrouds which they had shed for a time, and men soon forget the destruction wrought in their name.

"All good maxims are in the world, but we fail only to apply them." Thus spoke Pascal, three hundred years ago.

The important thing, to my mind, is not therefore to seek new definitions, nor to enlarge the scope of our governing principles, nor yet to place a new legislation on our statute books, but to show Americans, Europeans and Asiatics how we Canadians make use of the freedoms secured through the valour of our pioneers, the heroism of our discoverers, the martyrdom of our missionaries and the blood of our soldiers. It is to act in such a way that our country set an example to the rest of the world, so that all may know that in North America, in this beloved Canada of ours liberty is respected by all, and that it is alive not only in our minds and in our hearts but also in the acts of our parliaments.

"Theories are not conducive to progress; they only lead to upheaval." We must not imitate Plutarch who beat his slave while writing fine speeches on morals, or Cicero who reproached himself with feeling too deep a sorrow upon the death of a beloved servant.

Mr. LESAGE: Or Mr. Duplessis!

Mr. GAGNON: "Christianity with its doctrine of equality before God and human brotherhood caused the greatest moral upheaval among ancient communities" and set free millions of slaves and Christianity will bring perfect happiness to modern society. If mankind is to survive it must heed the precepts set forth in the gospel by the Saviour and put into practice the divine commandment: "Love thy neighbour."

Liberty, Mr. Speaker, does not thrive upon empty talk and legal documents. It requires concrete facts, tangible acts, a sincere attachment and courageous men ready to carry its torch into all the homes of the world, from the richest to the poorest.

Liberty is dying today from the ridiculous misuse of its name; it is withering away from abuse in the hands of leaders of nations. In order to give it a radiant and beaming life, it is necessary to apply strictly the sacred principles which make it so fine and so essential. It must be jealously guarded against abuse by those who, mistaking it for licence, turn it into anarchy. In heaven's name I hope that the new charter will not have the same lamentable fate as its famous predecessor, the Atlantic charter of April 14, 1941. Canada, with other allied countries, had also signed, on January 1, 1942, the famous declaration of the allied nations, which came out of the Churchill-Roosevelt agreement. What happened later on, to quote only one of the articles of the charter, clause 3, which provided that:

> Their governments respect the right of all nations to choose the political system under which the latter shall live and desire restoration of the sovereignty and autonomy of those deprived of them by violence?

Who thinks today of that declaration, Poland enslaved by Russia, Czechoslovakia, Russia's satellite, Archbishop Stepinac's Yugoslavia, who all signed this solemn pact and are now prone under the muscovite yoke?

The Right Hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), referred last Friday to the many violations of the Magna Carta in Scotland, his native land. It would be interesting to recall here the many violations of our constitution of 1867 and the provincial liberties transgressed and tampered with in the last 80 years by the central power.

The government, which must set the example should respect and recognize provincial rights just as hon. members of this house should be consistent in granting others the same freedom they claim for themselves and in not denying their political opponents, outside this house, the right to disagree on certain matters and to fight for the triumph of their cause.

It is so easy and it takes so little courage to insult those who are absent and are immensely superior to their slanderers, that I am not surprised to see some hon. members take the opportunity of their contributing to the debate or use the services of that hotbed of Liberal propaganda, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to attack those who, in spite of blackmail by the federal authorities, in spite of all sorts of threats and pressure by centralizers, stubbornly insist on defending the rights and freedom of the citizens they are committed to help and protect.

Mr. LESAGE: Sacred freedom!

Mr. GAGNON: If, however, there was ever a man who should give the example of gratitude and respect for the provincial authority, who should, I repeat, be grateful to the Quebec government for allowing him to enjoy the benefits of our institutions, our broad-mindedness and the goodwill of all our people, it is the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Hartt), whose recent charges against the leader of the Union Nationale and whose perfidious innuendoes against worthy nuns of Montreal are particularly malicious and stupid. Have not the French Canadians been specially generous to him—

Mr. LESAGE: That is not your fault.

Mr. GAGNON: —and have they not shown him a measure of confidence which I am tempted to regard as being exaggerated?

For my part, I am glad to tell him that every time he will attack, without reason, the authorities of my province, whether they be represented by Liberals or Union Nationale members, every time he uses insulting words against those who have been entrusted with the leadership of Quebec, I shall rise in my place to denounce him. "Freedom of expression is not freedom to lie," wrote André Maurois.

If the French Canadians were treated by the Ottawa government and by the other provinces of the dominion with as much consideration as the province of Quebec shows for its minorities, we would not have to spend our energy in claiming rights which should be recognized to us without any resort to bargaining or subterfuge. The province of Quebec is in favour of order and peace. "Freedom is our sun", and we will not permit organized gangs or godless sects to extinguish its light.

We live on very good terms with our fellow-citizens whose language and religion are different from ours, but the government which is now in power in my province will never let Jehovah's Witnesses, communists and others of the same ilk—

Mr. LESAGE: And the Lachute workers.

Mr. GAGNON: —take advantage of the freedom we extend to them to sabotage our institutions and contaminate the sound element of our population. Let them go to Manitoba, if they wish. They shall no doubt enjoy there the protection of the honourable member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), who seems to have such a soft place for them in his heart. We shall not complain if they move there, and we shall not be sorry to see them go. In the province of Quebec, no one has the right to commit crimes in the name of freedom and I hope our leaders will never forget that "the word freedom may sometimes lead men into slavery".

Because it cherishes freedom, the province of Quebec does not want to be fouled by trouble-makers, anarchists or advocates of revolution. Neither does she want to become a ghetto for the communist-minded Jews from the lowest strata in European countries.

Mr. HARTT: Is that what you call freedom?

Mr. GAGNON: Before concluding, I wish to quote a few words from a highly respected patriot of our province, Canon Lionel Groulx. They show much better than I could do it myself the contribution made by the French Canadians in the preparation of an unwritten bill of rights in this country:

> Never before in the civilized world have freedom, the rights of the human person and western humanism been discussed as much as they are at present. We French Canadians have not contributed quite as much as others to the greatness of our country in certain spheres, the commercial, financial and industrial, for instance, but no one has surpassed our common contribution to Canada's political or constitutional progress, to its climb towards freedom. One hundred years ago, our people were the first to disseminate the initial formulae of political liberty. Nowadays, we again remain in the van of the country's national aspiration towards a less theoretical independence and in its resistance to oppressive centralization. The achievement of Acadian and French-Canadian minorities in Canada has run a parallel course. The people of our race have fought and still suffer today; why? Because they have refused to submit to the rule of might; because, true sons of freedom-loving ancestors, they have not stood for any encroachment upon their rights as fathers, men and citizens; because they believed in Christian equality of rights and refused to consider constitutions mere scraps of paper. I claim that such examples of courage and human dignity, though set by humble folk, none the less carry the stamp of grandeur and fruitfulness. These little people have done good service to the whole country. The fact must be proclaimed and will remain our exclusive glory as long as it is useful and fitting to resist oppressive state control as well as blind levelling powers that aim at standardizing the species; as long as clinging to the stars remains a lofty privilege, as long as we hold necessary to the life and greatness of the country reverence for those ancient ideals called spiritual values, that is to say, loyalty to one's cultural heritage, human freedom, justice and right.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

(Text):

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I have listened to this debate with much interest, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot say that I feel very happy as a result of it. I have listened to the criticism from this side of the house. Unfortunately I do not understand the French language, so that I do not know what the French-speaking members have said. But I cannot agree with the criticism made of the Department of Justice and the royal commission for their part in bringing the spies to trial. I must say I do not quite see the purpose of this bill of rights. I do not quite see what is behind it. I do not know why Canadians should need to pass laws in this day and age for the purpose of securing the freedoms and human liberties. Who and what threaten our liberties today? The Canadian people have arrived at a state of freedom which, if it does not surpass, certainly equals the liberty of any people who have ever lived on this earth. It seems to me that what threatens the freedom of the Canadian people —and that of all other people for that matter— is nothing more or less than the threat of surrender of the sovereignty of this country. To those people who are so anxious to protect the liberties of the Canadian people, I put it to them to tell this house and the people outside this house how they intend to guarantee the freedom of the Canadian people when they propose to surrender that freedom to international control. That is what I should like to be told. Many hard things have been said of the procedure taken against the spies. I am not a lawyer, so that I am ignorant of legal terms and language; but many harsh things have been said about the actions of the commission and even of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Spies are not ordinary criminals. The ordinary criminal attacks individuals and he can be treated as such, because his threat is no more than a threat against an individual. But a spy is at war against the state; that is, he is at war against everybody in the state. It is true that some of the accused were afterwards found not guilty. I must say that I think it is curious that the longer the trials were continued, the bigger was the percentage of the accused who were released. I know there was an immense amount of pressure brought to bear. One hon. member—I think it was the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot)—obtained the information that outside pressure was being brought to bear in the interests of the accused; pressure from the United States, for instance. But even if some of the accused were found not guilty, is anyone so naive as to think that people who chose as their intimate friends and companions above all others—as the accused did for years—persons who were afterwards convicted of spying, did not know what was going on? I cannot bring myself to believe such a story. Legal proof may have been wanting, but I have no doubt in my mind of their moral guilt.

I think that the people of this country owe an immense debt. Perhaps the greatest service that has ever been rendered to them, in peace time at least, was the service which was rendered by the Department of Justice, the royal commission and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police by exposing the spy ring. I should like to record my appreciation of the fact that at least some of these spies were brought to justice. If there was a mistake I think it was that the inquiry stopped short. There are plenty more, Mr. Speaker, who while they may not be committing legal offences, beyond question are working to undermine the faith and loyalty of the people of Canada, and such people have no right to be in the employ of this or any other government. I was glad when Mr. Ahearn, who, I believe, is not a politician, was moved to provide for Mr. Gouzenko's future. I think that was a fine gesture, and I should like to congratulate Mr. Ahearn on what he did. For let us consider that in spite of our Department of Justice and even despite our most excellent mounted police—and there is no finer police force in the world than the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—had it not been for Mr. Gouzenko, who was able to produce the legal evidence, these spies still would be at work selling out this country and the Canadian people. Therefore I say the Canadian people owe an immense debt to Mr. Gouzenko for what he has done.

With regard to the civil liberties organizations, there is no doubt that most of them are part of the communist front. I am not going into that aspect of the matter tonight; I make the statement, and I shall stay with it.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend permits, he referred to Mr. Igor Gouzenko, not Mr. Nicolai Gouzenko?

Mr. JAQUES: Well, I do not know that I did, but the man to whom I was referring was the man who supplied the information which brought about the conviction of these spies.

With regard to the civil liberties people, who are so anxious to assert and to parade their belief in liberty, let me quote from the report of the royal commission, at the bottom of page 223. I have quoted this before in the house, but I make no apology for quoting it again:

A statesman with every means of observation wrote in 1937:

"A communist is not only the holder of certain opinions; he is the pledged adept of a well thought out means of enforcing them. The anatomy of discontent and revolution has been studied in every phase and aspect, and a veritable drill book prepared in a scientific spirit for subverting all existing institutions. The method of enforcement is as much a part of the communist faith as the doctrine itself. At first the time honoured principles of liberalism and democracy are invoked to shelter the infant organism. Free speech, the right of public meeting, every form of lawful political agitation and constitutional right are paraded and asserted. Alliance is sought with every popular movement towards the left."

That is a quotation from the book "Great Contemporaries," by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill.

I now come to what I think is the main point of this whole question. How were decent, honourable, loyal citizens converted into spies, so that they were not only willing but anxious to work against their own country? We have the answer in the report of the royal commission, and I am going to quote it at length, for I know that very few people outside this house have read this report. Here the commissioners are describing how these young Canadians were persuaded and twisted and turned from their loyalty to this country to become spies, and at the bottom of page 72 they say:

As the courses of study in the "cells" undermine gradually the loyalty of the young man or woman who joins them, it is necessary to say something as to the content of the courses pursued in them, as that is reflected by the evidence.

The curriculum includes the study of political and philosophic works, some of them far from superficial, selected to develop in the students an essentially critical attitude towards western democratic society. This phase of the preparation also includes a series of discussions on current affairs, designed to further a critical attitude toward the ideals of democratic society.

But this curriculum would appear in reality to be designed not to promote social reform where it might be required, but to weaken the loyalty of the group member towards his or her own society as such.

Linked with these studies at all stages, moreover, goes an organized indoctrination calculated to create in the mind of the study-group member an essentially uncritical acceptance at its face value of the propaganda of a foreign state.

Accordingly the study groups are encouraged to subscribe to communist books and periodicals. The Canadian Tribune and Clarion of Toronto, New Masses (a periodical published in the United States), National Affairs of Toronto, and Club Life have been among those mentioned as regular objects of study and discussion in these groups, as well as selected books on Russia.

In some cases the effect of these study courses seems to be a gradual development of a sense of divided loyalties, or in extreme cases of a transferred loyalty.

Thus it seems to happen that through these study groups some adherents, who begin by feeling that Canadian society is not democratic or not equalitarian enough for their taste, are gradually led to transfer a part or most of their loyalties to another country, apparently without reference to whether that other country is in actual fact more or less democratic or equalitarian than Canada.

Here is a paragraph which to me appears to be important:

Indeed, a sense of internationalism seems in many cases to play a definite role in one stage of the courses. In these cases the Canadian sympathizer is first encouraged to develop a sense of loyalty, not directly to a foreign state, but to what he conceives to be an international ideal. This subjective internationalism is then usually linked almost inextricably through the indoctrination courses and the intensive exposure to the propaganda of a particular foreign state, with the current conception of the national interests of that foreign state and with the current doctrines and policies of communist parties throughout the world.

Let me repeat one sentence:

In these cases the Canadian sympathizer is first encouraged to develop a sense of loyalty, not directly to a foreign state, but to what he conceives to be an international ideal.

There is the whole reason for the intense opposition to what is now called nationalism. Nationalism is opposed to internationalism and, as long as a man believes in and stands for nationalism, his loyalty to his country cannot be undermined. That is the reason for the attacks on nationalists, not only in this country but in the United States. Those attacks always come from the communist front. That is why I am a nationalist and why I intend to stay a nationalist. It is the only protection against the modern form of disloyalty. It is the only protection that we have against a foreign state or a foreign ideology which has one purpose only, the enslavement of the world.

That puts a label upon all those people who have attacked nationalists as such, including myself as a so-called leader of nationalists in this country. I am a social crediter, and I am proud of it. That is my answer to those people who attack me, because I stand for Canadian nationalism which means loyalty to Canada and to the Canadian people.

Mr. POULIOT: The question is not to be a nationalist leader but to be sincere.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is pretty clear that he is sincere.

Mr. JAQUES: No man can serve two masters. May I turn for one moment to certain attacks which have been made upon me, upon this group and upon the social credit movement. All social crediters are nationalists in the sense that they are loyal to their country. Nothing will move them from that. I have in my hand a magazine called Today. I do not know whether it has led the fight, but it has certainly been prominent in the fight against and in smearing me and in smearing the social credit movement in Alberta and in Quebec. It always boils down to this: Our crime is that we are nationalists. This magazine is called Today, but I understand it is no longer published.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yesterday now.

Mr. JAQUES: It might be called "Yesterday." I understand that the social crediters of Quebec do not speak of today because their paper is called Vers Demain or towards tomorrow.

Mr. POULIOT: The old tomorrow.

Mr. JAQUES: They look ahead, not back. Underneath the title of this magazine today appears, "Anglo-Jewish Monthly." Let me say at once that this magazine is no more Jewish than I am and it is no more Anglo than is the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Hartt).

Mr. HARTT: Well put; I agree with that.

An hon. MEMBER: It must be wrong.

Mr. JAQUES: I have here the facts of how this magazine was started, who started it and why it was started.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I would call his attention to the motion before the house to which the discussion should be relevant. The motion is to appoint a joint committee of both houses to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms and the manner in which those obligations accepted by all members of the united nations may best be implemented. The hon. member's discussion should be relevant to the motion before the house.

Mr. JAQUES: With all due deference, I maintain that what I am saying is absolutely pertinent to the subject under discussion. I believe we are discussing a bill to protect our liberties and human rights, and I am endeavouring to show that the real threat to our human rights and freedoms is not the way the Department of Justice handled the spy case; it is the actions of those who are so anxious to discredit the Department of Justice, the royal commission and the mounted police. I think, when hon. members hear what I have to say, they will agree that this is pertinent.

The magazine Today was planned by a national organizer of the Labour Progressive party, J. Gershman, in order to obtain the confidence of the Zionist and B'Nai Brith organizations. In July, 1944, R. S. Gordon, staff writer of the Canadian Tribune left that publication to become editor of Today. Contributing editors were R. A. Davies, Mark Tarail, Beryl Truax, Bernard Mergler and Dyson Carter, all members of the communist party. Associated with them were Doctor Leopold Infeld, Monica Mugan, J. A. Gagnon, Professor B. Fairley, D. Wren and Louis Fitch, all definitely communist supporters. Daniel Ross, the first business manager, was educational director of the L.P.P. in Toronto. He was replaced by Sam Walsh of the Young Communist League.

Mr. HANSELL: Quite a picture!

Mr. JAQUES: The reason I quote that is to point it out to those who apparently are unaware of just what is going on. There you have a magazine which has gone out of its way to attack the social credit movement in general and me in particular, and I might add to attack the leader of this party and the social credit movement in Quebec. It attacks us on the ground of fascism and anti-semitism, but when we come to look into the thing we find that it is purely a communist paper and nothing else.

Just to give one illustration of the policies of this paper, here it attacks the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), for whom I have the greatest respect. It is speaking about the Polish soldiers who were brought to this country and says:

These Polish fascists must be farmers, according to the statement of Mr. St. Laurent—

It includes the former minister of justice.

—and will presumably be settled in the province of Alberta, where there are a considerable number of veterans who have not got jobs. Why does Jaques go out of his way to praise Watson Kirkconnell for espousing the cause of these anti-Semitic thugs—

Referring to the Polish soldiers, of course.

—selected for the pogrom spirit? Mustn't sneeze at 4,000 well-trained allies who can be relied upon to teach the people of Alberta and Canada some of the elementary principles of pogrom-making.

That should give the members of the house and the public some idea of the sort of propaganda that is being used against the social credit movement in general and against me in particular, and of course that sort of thing is not confined to this magazine. I quote it only because I happen to have a copy here. If one listens to the radio or reads the columnists in various papers one cannot fail to be impressed by the immense amount of communist propaganda that is being put out by men like Elmore Philpott, for instance, who for years has been steadily trying to undermine the loyalty of the people of this country, continually criticizing the conditions of this country in comparison with that of Russia, but he takes mighty good care to stay in Canada and not go to Russia.

That brings me to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the film board. Why should men like Philpott be given all the time apparently they want, and they have been given it for years on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? They have no responsibility to anybody. But those who stand up for this country and for its institutions and are loyal to this country and denounce those who are not loyal, what do we get? Nothing but smears and criticism from the press and the radio.

Mr. POULIOT: Bill of rights! Bill of rights!

Mr. JAQUES: Let me quote the second part of Mr. Churchill's statement about communist methods:

The creation of a mild Liberal or socialist regime in some period of convulsion is the first milestone. But no sooner has this been created than it is to be overthrown. Woes and scarcity resulting in bloodshed are to be arranged between the agents of the new government and the working people. An apologetic attitude in the rulers should be turned to profit. Martyrs are to be manufactured. No faith need be, indeed may be kept with non-communists. Every act of good will, of tolerance, of conciliation, of mercy, of magnanimity on the part of governments, or statesmen is to be utilized for their ruin. Then when the time is ripe and the moment opportune, every form of lethal violence, from mob revolt to private assassination, must be used without stint or compunction. The citadel will be stormed under the banners of liberty and democracy; and once the apparatus of power is in the hands of the brotherhood, all opposition, all contrary opinion must be extinguished by death. Democracy is but a tool to be used and afterwards broken. The absolute rule of a self-chosen priesthood is to be imposed upon mankind without mitigation, progressively forever. To be forewarned is to be forearmed.

Finally, to bring the thing up to date, I notice an article in Saturday's paper, dated from Hollywood and headed "Russia using Hollywood to crush U.S., says Menjou". I understand that Mr. Menjou is a movie actor. I am not going to read the article, but at the end it says:

Communists in Hollywood have caused hundreds opposing them to be fired by ganging up—

That is by communist ganging up.

—on their innocent patriotic victims.

A year ago the nationalists, for whom I have spoken on two or three occasions, were unable to hold meetings in Los Angeles because of the communist opposition organized against them—twenty thousand communist pickets in Los Angeles, and those pickets were organized by the then attorney general of the state of California. The leading movie artists and the leading moving-picture people helped to organize and finance that tremendous opposition in Los Angeles. When I was there last December we held our meetings in peace—no pickets and no disturbances. The tide has turned. Now the communists are on the defensive. Now they are appearing before the committee on un-American activities, and have to explain their actions. And let me warn the people who think they are doing this country a service by attacking nationalists who are loyal to the country, that the tide is turning. It is turning in the United States, and when it turns there it will turn here. And when it does turn I should not care to be one who has shown that his loyalty is not to Canadian nationalism, but to the cause of internationalism and communism.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to a debate like this, which probably is a late result of the reconsecration week of six years ago. I do not know to what extent it will be profitable, but we hear fine expressions of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) calls good will. It is good will for all the nations of the world, and it is a good sign.

But if we are going back to the past, and if we think of what has happened even in this house, we might recall that seldom charity begins at home, and that some members of parliament are more inclined to say to others: "Do as I say, not as I do."

That is something which happens naturally during a war. It is a case of intermittent folly, and the intervals of lucidity are signalized by amnesia. It is a diagnosis I have often made; and I noticed that during the war there was only one way to think, a way contrary to that which has been expressed by the hon. member who has just spoken. During the war one was not permitted to say that he was a red-blooded Canadian. No; one had to be an imperialist; one had to be a colonial; one had to think only in terms of the British empire and the British commonwealth. That was the mental state, not only of one but of all during the war.

I do not know who has hypnotized my colleagues whom I like very much, but it was not only on this side of the house that that feeling existed. It was the feeling among all groups and parties, with few exceptions. And all seemed to be proud of that inferiority complex toward the empire and the commonwealth. Everybody was proud to be an empire serf or a colonial or commonwealth serf. They were glad of that; and in different language they were repeating what Lord Bennett said at the time he sailed for England, "I am going home"—when everybody was sending him elsewhere.

But that is what happened. During the war I was called a supporter of Hitler by those who were strong for the bill of rights, because I was defending the rights of the farmers, the railway men and those who were helping the war effort while working in overalls. During the war I was told by a cabinet minister that the only duty of a Canadian who was in good health was to enlist, thereby leaving aside all labouring men. And there was no protest in the house.

Moreover I remember at the time the plebiscite bill was being discussed in committee, the chairman, who is no longer in the house—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but until now I do not think his remarks have been relevant to the motion.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I have been reading most carefully what appears in the motion, and I am inspired by some of the names I see in it. I name nobody, but I should like to make a comparison between what happened in yesteryear and what has been said today.

Naturally, as you know, in court we can examine a witness upon his record. That is not a bad thing. It is permissible to question witnesses upon what we call their credibility. I am not so sure about the degree of credibility of some of those who have spoken about the bill of rights and about those lofty ideals which I have not yet seen in action.

But, sir, if I read the motion correctly, I find that one of the human rights is freedom of speech; and my freedom of speech was encroached upon by the chairman of the committee of the whole when the plebiscite bill was before that committee. I remember that that gentleman, who is now somewhere else, was railroading the bill through, probably to get spurs—or I do not know what else. I rose in my place and he said, "Section 6 adopted." We were then on section 7. I said, "Mr. Chairman"—and he said, "Section 7 adopted". I said "It is not adopted; I was standing in my place at the time it was called. I was standing at the time the previous section was called." He said, "It is carried" and it was, finally. Bill of rights!

I remember, sir, that I made reference to the promise made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) to give a million jobs to the veterans. It was sinful to mention that in the house, and he called me a demagogue because I referred to a promise he had not fulfilled.

An hon. MEMBER: What is a demagogue?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not know what it is, but it must be a big insult. Bill of rights! I remember that not so long ago some members were insistent about the N.R.M.A. men who had not served the sentence that had been imposed on them. Bill of rights! Bill of rights! They thought that the law was not severe enough upon them and that Quebec was the greatest sinner in that regard. Bill of rights! Bill of rights! How many times did we hear that from people who have now a new flag—the flag of rights? They never speak of duties but of rights, like Robespierre, and the men who drafted the declaration of human rights at the time of the French revolution—les san-culottes. Les sans-culottes qui parle des droits de l'homme. It is the pantless who speak of the rights of man. I use an historical expression.

How much did we suffer? How much were we insulted by the press? We had here Mr. Cardin, who was a most honourable man, and there were others. There was Mr. Raymond. I do not always agree with him, but he is a most honourable gentleman and there were many others. There were those who crossed the floor with him, and especially my dear friend the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget), who is a most estimable gentleman. We were all called fifth columnists because we were not imperialists, and it takes courage for the member who preceded me (Mr. Jaques) to have said that he was a nationalist. I am not a nationalist; I am a Liberal. I believe in love of country, and I believe it is no sin to be a nationalist; but it takes supreme courage to make that affirmation in the House of Commons. Why? Because freedom of speech is a fake here. It does not exist. There is an atmosphere which is created to destroy the personality of a member of parliament as soon as he takes the oath of office. We notice that. It is visible. A member of parliament the day after he is sworn in is different from the man he was before he was sworn in. Why? Because there is a special atmosphere here in Ottawa, an atmosphere that reduces the heads of some people to the size of small oranges as the Indians do in Ecuador. I do not say that to be offensive; I say it because it is true.

Sir, I will tell you of an incident that occurred in 1936. You were not in parliament and the Sergeant-at-Arms was not the one who sits here today. There was a young man from my county, a very nice fellow, who had been appointed a messenger of the House of Commons upon my recommendation. He was doing his work well and was most unobtrusive. No one had complained about him. He was all right. He was a good messenger. One day I had an argument with the then minister of finance, who was not the present Minister of Justice—it was one of his predecessors—and the leader of the opposition, who was Lord Bennett. It was about some high officials who had been under the wing of Mr. Bennett for a time and who had succeeded in making themselves comfortable under the Liberal wing, under Liberal feathers. History repeats itself.

Mr. LOW: Liberal tail-feathers?

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I am not insistent on particulars. But one day I was up in my office and the boy came in—well, he was a man of twenty-eight or thirty years of age—bent in two, and he started to cry. I am not touched by the tears of a man except one who is in mourning, who has lost a parent or a very dear friend. I asked him, "What is the matter with you?" He said, "I will tell you. The day after you said to Mr. Bennett and Mr. Dunning that you would put both of them in the same bag"—of course, I did not add that I would drown them, because I would have kept my promise—"I was transferred from my job of messenger to cut ice downstairs, and the first day I worked at that it was pretty hard on me. I did not tell you when you recommended me that I suffered from rheumatism, but the day after that I bought another pair of gloves and tried to do my work. Now I am bent in two and I cannot go on like that. I am very sorry; it is impossible." I said, "Wait a minute". I went down to the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms and said, "You are just a bunch of swine. The way you have acted with this man is a shame on all of you, and if you do not send him home to recuperate and give his job back to him I will rent the largest hall in Ottawa; I will have a radio, and I will denounce you all as a bunch of swine." He said, "Send the boy to me and I will fix him up." And he was fixed up. The year after, Charlie Dunning said to somebody, "Well, I tried to corner him and I did not succeed."

Well, I thought it was cowardly but it happened; it happened under this roof. No bill of rights! No bill of rights! I wonder if with a bill of rights like that it will be better than when I was insulted by Ralston, when he was falsifying my work. Who rose in my defence; who defended the draftees against Ralston in English discussion; who defended the workers of the soil; who defended those engaged in industry, and who defended the member for Temiscouata? I was defended by my hon. friend the member for Peel; I was defended by my hon. friend the member for Saskatoon City; but I was fighting the fight of the common man without any support in the house most of the time. I had to put up my own fight alone and I suffered a lot, but I did not complain about it.

When I hear the discussion about a bill of rights, I think of most of the speeches that have been made, with few exceptions; and I mention among the exceptions the one that was made just before I spoke, the one that was made by the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) the one that was made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), because they were not in the moon when they spoke. They spoke about actual facts. How can we expect to rule the whole world when the leaders of the other countries pay no attention to Canada?

It reminds me of a story of the late Mr. Lapointe, at one time minister of justice. He was brought up in the country; he knew the ways of living of the people, and he used to tell with great humour very fine stories that had a touch of philosophy. He had two friends in the county of Kamouraska. One of them was a client of mine. He was a notary public and his initials were T.M.T.—not T.N.T. He had a cousin there. He was not a notary public and his name was Wenceslas, and he used to be called Cariboo. When he spoke, people used to say "Boom, one cariboo; boom, boom, two cariboo." But this is of no importance whatever.

There was a day when it was a great honour to be on the same seat with a member of parliament. In those days there were carriages with two seats but four places. Wenceslas sat in the back where Mr. Lapointe was to sit, leaving the front seat next to the driver to T.M.T. Then T.M.T. was quite indignant. He said, "Wenceslas, take your place. Sit in the front." Well, the story of Canada is not very different, and I am sorry about it. All the powers tell the duly accredited representatives of Canada, "Take your place, Canada; sit at the tail-end."

Now we are going to reform them. It is purely academic. I find this debate frivolous and I find it futile. I said that once before on another occasion. I find that nothing will come out of it except expressions of good will which lead nowhere. This house must reform itself. We must not simply speak phrases. We must first set an example of good will, understanding, and tolerance to others. When a member of parliament is speaking here, some hon. members say, "Time, time," or "Quack, quack."

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): "Quack" yourself.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I will tell my hon. friend that I will say that to him the next time he speaks and I shall be doing only as he has done. I have been most tolerant. I have not interrupted the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross). I have compassion for him. He shows the extent of his sincerity in supporting a bill of rights. There is no more intolerant man in this house than the hon. member for St. Paul's. He will support the bill of rights, and he will go to Toronto (St. Paul's) and say, "I am for the bill of rights." What rights? He will be unable to say, but he will be for that bill of rights.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Let the hon. member speak for himself, not for me.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. member gets angry it will be a good thing, because he is never so eloquent as when he loses control of himself.

One matter to which we should all give thought is that of discontinuing making speeches which amount to nothing.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely, "Hear, hear." What will come out of the discussions of Friday and today? Will Uncle Joe Stalin, the Americans across the border and the Chinese be much concerned about the marvellous speeches which were made here on Friday and today?

Mr. BENTLEY: We will send them a shipload of platitudes.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not know; perhaps they will make a different use of the paper which is sent to them.

Mr. KNOWLES: What were you saying about the debate in this house?

Mr. POULIOT: I think my hon. friend is perfectly right when he speaks about platitudes, expressions of good will, being printed in the reports of these two sittings. We suffered a good deal. I remember one day when there was another chairman of the committee of the whole and when there was the assistant in Doctor Beauchesne's chair. My case was clear. The chairman ruled in my favour, but a member of the cabinet winked and then he changed his ruling.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: He started a romance.

Mr. POULIOT: He wanted me to apologize for saying that Ralston had put into my mouth words that I had never used. That was pretty tough, you know. And when I had to withdraw the expression "pompous" as applied to brass hats, it was also pretty tough.

An hon. MEMBER: You bet.

Mr. POULIOT: And it was the tougher because the request came from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). It is hard to realize how difficult it is for a private member to stand by his guns and be true to his convictions, even if he is wrong, provided that he is sincere.

As you know, sir, during the war exemptions were allowed for conscientious objectors, Mennonites, Hutterites, and Doukhobors; but after the farmers had been promised exemption from military service, they had to join the colours. You remember the difficulty we had in trying to defend them just because there were some men in the army and in the department who thought that the duty of every Canadian was, as was stated in the house by the government, to join the colours. I am not anti-militarist any more than I am anti-British. But I find that it is a provocation of Russia to continue to consider her as a country which desires to wage war on Canada. I am not pro-Russian either. I am pro-Canadian. I am not any more pro-Russian than I am pro-British; and I am not anti-British either. But I consider Canada before England, Russia, France, China or any other country in the world. There was an investigation directed against the Russians, at the instigation of Igor Gouzenko. The evidence was obtained; the trials were very well prepared, and some of the accused people were found guilty. There were other arrests during the war. There was the arrest of Mr. Chaloult, as well as of Mr. Drew. But proceedings against Mr. Drew were stopped. He did not undergo any trial, but Mr. Chaloult did. But the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who came to the defence of Mr. Drew—and quite rightly—did not say a word in defence of Mr. Chaloult who had won his trial in Montreal. I will tell my hon. friend that I do not believe in the civil liberties league. I think those who are in all those leagues are just imposters who exploit human credulity and who are ready to defend scoundrels at the expense of honest men. Moreover I will tell my hon. friend and you, Mr. Speaker, that during the war very discreetly I looked after a bitter Tory journalist from Toronto, as well as a French journalist from Montreal. I telephoned the offices of the Prime Minister and several other ministers so that no charge was laid against them. The memoranda against those two journalists were drafted by one who is a former member of the press gallery and one who is actually in the press gallery, but when I asked for that memoranda at the beginning of the session I could not get it; it was secret. I should like to have shown the insincerity of a man who is enthusiastic about the civil liberties league, who does not understand the problems of French-Canadians, and who betrayed the press gallery during the war, when I successfully defended it.

That is something. I never would have spoken of it if this debate had not taken place; but we have that intelligentsia which is a curse to the country. I am going to speak at home on Sunday about the future of youth, and I will tell youth that universities are to a large extent the cause of the unrest that exists in the country today. Young men are no longer taught to work from the bottom of the ladder and to climb gradually to the top, as former generations did. Young men are taught in social science courses and economics courses that they know all, that they are supreme, that they have nothing to learn, that they are ready to teach the world; and afterwards they try to organize for themselves, their families and their friends some fine nests where they will be comfortable while doing nothing and getting large amounts of money at the expense of the taxpayers of this country.

We have a lot to learn, but we have to come back to fundamentals. We cannot live on friends; we cannot live on declarations of rights such as those we have heard from all parts of the house. What does it amount to? My hon. friend said it—"Platitudes." And we listen to that. Today hon. members were anxious to come to this important debate about the bill of rights. In the first place, the discussion in this committee will be the cause of a great loss of time for the members, and the report will amount to nothing.

Before I conclude, I want to come back to what I was about to say. What I said had to be said by me, but I have more to say. Why take Russia, and say it is an enemy country, that those at the Russian embassy are spies? It may be true; I do not deny it, but why say that only about Russia when we know very well that under the roof of the high commissioner for the United Kingdom there was a woman who was a well known communist, who was found guilty and sentenced, who had been a pink communist since 1932? Why have two weights and two measures? How is it that members of parliament are such sophomores that they ignore the fact that, while ambassadors and consuls may call themselves observers, they are only spies de luxe. They are accepted. The trouble with Russia was that they were looking through the keyhole; they showed bad manners, but others are spying just the same. Up to the time Canada declared war on Japan and the Japanese ambassador and his family returned to that country, there was no nest of intrigue and spying like the city of Ottawa, and everyone knows that.

Well, sir, here we are. It is a difficult matter, and the question is not to make a fine speech that will carry the house. The question is to see about the future. When we hear about human rights, fundamental freedoms, the improvement of health, et cetera, et cetera, how is it that we have so much money to give to other countries, that we can look after the children of other countries but cannot look after those in our own country who are invalids, unless they are seventy years old or are blind? It is extraordinary. We have a lot to do, but before reforming other countries let us reform ourselves. Let us come down to brass tacks; let us be realists; let us do something for Canada before running ourselves for the benefit of other countries who pay no attention to us. In that connection the only thing to do is to think of our own country. There is so little freedom of speech that I am sure some newspapers will criticize the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) tomorrow because he said he was a nationalist. They will say he is such a short-sighted man, such a narrow-minded individual to describe himself in that way. Is this a bill of rights? Is this respect for liberty? I am ready to respect the liberty of everybody. I fight hard; I do not start a fight, but I can defend myself all right. But this is not an infringement upon the liberty of others. I respect the liberty of all, but I also want my liberty and freedom to be respected by all, which must be the feeling of everybody. If it is possible to awaken the House of Commons to its own responsibility there is no finer body of men in Canada. Then we will be able to go places and do something.

On motion of Mr. Hansell the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 20, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Sixth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION

POSTPONEMENT UNTIL SEPTEMBER 30, 1947, OF ISSUE OF PROCLAMATION TERMINATING ACT

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copy of order in council P.C. 1994 of May 20, 1947, the effect of which is to postpone from June 30 to September 30, 1947, the issue of a proclamation terminating the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940.

Hon. members will recall that many duties on imports from the United Kingdom were temporarily eliminated, and others were substantially reduced below the British preferential rates in effect in 1939, as a wartime measure under the War Exchange Conservation Act. It was provided that this act should expire on the date of the issue of a proclamation under the War Measures Act declaring that a state of war no longer exists, or on such earlier date as may be fixed in a proclamation of the governor in council.

In view of the decision to conduct tariff negotiations on the basis of Canada's pre-war rates of duty, an order in council was passed December 30, 1946, providing for the issue of a proclamation on June 30, 1947, terminating the War Exchange Conservation Act. It now appears probable that the negotiations in progress at Geneva will not be completed by June 30. Accordingly, the government have decided that it is not desirable to restore the regular rates of duty on that date, and have postponed to September 30 the issue of the proclamation in question.

POSTAL SERVICE

ISSUE OF NEW CITIZENSHIP POSTAGE STAMP

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will no doubt be interested in knowing that it has been decided to issue a special postage stamp to commemorate Canadian citizenship. The stamp will be of the 4-cents denomination. Arrangements are being made for its sale on or as soon after the 1st July next as possible. The new stamp will not replace the current 4-cents red, but will be supplementary to it. It is expected that the special stamp will be available during a period of two or three months.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask whether this special stamp will be the same size as the ordinary postage stamp? I notice that in the United States they are reducing the size of their stamps for convenience' sake, and I wondered if the government here was doing the same.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It will be a little smaller than the special Graham Bell stamp.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Graham Bell stamp was pretty big.

Mr. BOUCHER: May I ask the Postmaster General if it would not be most appropriate to put the picture of Barbara Ann Scott on the new citizenship postage stamp, thus exemplifying true Canadian citizenship?

Mr. STEPHENSON: In view of the statement which the Postmaster General has made with respect to new postage stamps, will the Secretary of State tell us how many people in Canada have taken out citizenship papers up to the present time? It might be well to tell us how many at $5 and how many at $1.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): I could not give these figures offhand. I think the question ought to go on the order paper.

IMPORT AND EXPORT CONTROLS

VISIT OF GRAHAM TOWERS TO ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram), asked a question arising out of a Reuters dispatch from London to the effect that the purpose of Mr. Graham Towers' visit to England was to discuss, first, a second loan from Canada and, second, reimposition of certain Canadian wartime import and export controls. He was good enough to give me notice of his question. I am sorry I was not here yesterday to answer it, but I do so today.

The dispatch was the usual newspaper speculation as to Mr. Towers' visit. As the house knows, he has been in the habit of visiting London and Washington at various times to discuss with the central bank and the treasury officials matters of mutual interest to the respective countries. That is the purpose of his visit to London. Before his departure he and I did not go into all the matters that he proposed to discuss, but I can say that he was neither instructed nor requested to discuss either of the specific matters referred to in my hon. friend's question.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance, of which I have given him notice. Will the minister comment on the statement of the premier of Nova Scotia, as reported in the press of last Friday, that the dominion government, as indicated in the Minister of Finance's letter of April 21 last—and here I quote the words attributed to the premier of Nova Scotia—"has abandoned the idea of securing compensation in return for vacating the fields of amusement and pari-mutuel taxes?" In the light of the statement, will the minister further say whether the way is not now open to a resumption of the dominion-provincial conference?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): That of course is a matter of opinion. I would not think the fact that, as stated in my letter, the dominion has stated it will be its policy to vacate the pari-mutuel and amusement tax field as soon as circumstances will permit, would of necessity have any bearing on the question of a further dominion-provincial conference. As the house knows, seven provinces have already entered into, or are in the process of entering into, tax agreements for five years, and therefore so far as these provinces are concerned there is nothing to be gained by a further conference. As to whether this makes it easier for other provinces is of course purely a matter of opinion.

POSTAL SERVICE

REQUEST FOR AIR MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN WINNIPEG AND FLIN FLON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, arising out of a telegram I have just received from the Dauphin board of trade. The telegram refers to the proposed air service between Winnipeg and Flin Flon commencing June 1, and strongly recommends the inclusion of an air mail service on this route. Is it the intention of the government to include the air mail service between these two points?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I am aware that the air transport board has licensed a private operation for service between Winnipeg and Flin Flon. However, the hon. member will appreciate that post office contracts are given by the Postmaster General. Perhaps my colleague can answer the question.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is he prepared to make a statement now pursuant to the serious consideration he has given to the request of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) for an air mail service between Winnipeg and Flin Flon?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): I am not in a position to answer the question immediately, but I shall take it as a notice and answer it either tomorrow or the day after.

NAILS

INQUIRY AS TO REASON FOR INCREASED PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): In view of the announcement in this morning's press that there is to be an increase in the price of nails, will the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply say whether the companies which manufacture the nails are working to full capacity, and whether the question of price is the reason for the present shortage of nails in Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The nail plants are working to capacity to the extent that they can obtain steel rods. It is hoped that the increased price for nails will divert additional raw material into the nail plants.

RENT CONTROL

REGULATION PERMITTING INCREASED RENTS FOR RESIDENTIAL PREMISES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is there any law or regulation permitting landlords of residential premises to increase rents by any amount greater than the ten per cent referred to by the minister some time ago? There seems to be a lot of confusion about this.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister make a statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that he put his question on the order paper.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is urgent, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Howe.]

EMIGRATION

CANADIANS LEAVING FOR YUGOSLAVIA—PERMISSION TO REENTER CANADA—AMOUNT OF CAPITAL EXPORTED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I am sorry I did not notify the Prime Minister of this question. Recently there have appeared in the press, statements that large numbers of Yugoslav Canadians are leaving this country. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it is a fact that some fifteen hundred are leaving Canada to return to the seat of government of Yugoslavia, and if so, whether they have received export permits to take with them $2 million worth of equipment and materials. In this morning's Montreal Gazette there appears the statement that Canada has been blackballed by Yugoslav communists as a country where people jump from buildings and commit suicide and where the common man has no future because of the capitalistic system.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend is surely not serious in expecting that I should be able to answer the question immediately. I shall be glad to get him what information I can as to the numbers who have secured export permits. I doubt whether I can give confirmation or the reverse of the accuracy of his statement about what happens in Yugoslavia.

Mr. ROWE: It appeared in the Gazette.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That does not necessarily mean it is correct.

Mr. ROWE: Perhaps I may be permitted to ask another question of any member of the government. Do they know anything about this holus-bolus exodus from Canada at a time when we need population? I can appreciate the Prime Minister's reply and I am sorry I did not notify him of the question. Surely some member of the government knows something about it.

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): Apropos of the question asked by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Can he inform the house how much capital is being exported by the Yugoslavs who are leaving the country, and whether export permits have been granted with respect to that capital?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I will take note of the question.

Mr. COCKERAM: I desire to direct a question to the Minister of External Affairs. Has the government given assurance to the Yugoslav emigrants now leaving Canada that at the end of the five year period they will be allowed to reenter Canada? Are they travelling under Canadian passports, and if so, are they retaining their Canadian citizenship?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member sent me notice of the question, which I received just as I came into the house. I can say at once that the government gives no assurance to Yugoslavs or to anyone else about their rights to reenter this country. They have to ascertain their rights from the existing Canadian legislation. With respect to the other portions of the question, I shall make inquiries from both the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Mines and Resources. Of course, if Canadian citizens of Yugoslav origin apply for Canadian passports they have the right to get them. I will also inform the hon. member how long a naturalized Canadian, travelling from Canada on a Canadian passport, can be away without endangering his Canadian citizenship under his certificate of naturalization.

GOLD

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PRICE FROM $35 TO $50 AN OUNCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): I should like to direct the following question to the Minister of Finance. Will the government consider raising the price of gold from $35 to $50 an ounce? During recent months the price of copper has been increased 100 per cent, zinc 100 per cent, lead 150 per cent, and there has been a substantial advance in nickel—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MENARY: In 1932-33 the then government raised the price of gold from $20 to $35 an ounce—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would advise the hon. gentleman that the next time he has a question to ask and the Speaker rises and calls order, he be kind enough to resume his seat.

Mr. MENARY: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I did not know you were on your feet.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, May 15, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. R. KIRK (Antigonish-Guysborough): First of all, I should like to join those speakers who have preceded me in this debate, in offering my congratulations to Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the excellent presentation of his first budget, and on the message of good cheer and hope which it contained.

The wide acclaim being accorded to the minister is indeed well deserved; and the measure of his worth is indicated by the generous manner in which he himself bestowed upon his predecessor in office much of the credit for such an inspiring budget.

An intelligent examination of the sound economic and financial status of this nation at the present time is, I submit, a remarkable tribute to the manner in which the finances of Canada were handled during the war—a period which was certainly the most anxious in our history. So, at this point, Mr. Speaker, I pay my humble tribute to the man who worked hard and long, who gave his efforts and ability unstintingly to the service of his country with such superb success as has made this budget possible, the former minister of finance (Mr. Ilsley). In extending my congratulations to a minister of the crown, it is with added pleasure that I do so, in view of the fact that he is a native of my own province.

In an effort to contribute to this debate, Mr. Speaker, I propose to invite the attention of the house to matters which are full of importance to the every-day life of many thousands of Canadians, and particularly to the section of the country which I have the honour to represent.

Two of Canada's greatest primary industries, fishing and agriculture, form a major means of livelihood to which the people of Nova Scotia daily devote their lives and efforts. I do not think that I am being repetitious, and certainly I disclaim any platitude, in stating that the farmers and fishermen of Canada must at all times be regarded as the backbone of this country. They know no fixed hours; they observe no particular holidays. Yet, Mr. Speaker, when one lives with them and among them, as I do, the conclusion is inevitable that here indeed is Canada; here are the men and women who are daily actually making the greatness of this nation. And so I state that any matters which affect the daily lives of such people must be regarded with respect and assumed to be of importance by the government and by this house.

All hon. members know of our individual efforts with various government departments on behalf of our constituents, and it is true, we can often accomplish much good without inviting the attention of the whole house to the work in hand. However, what I have to say today has not, I think, been mentioned by other speakers, and I shall therefore take a few moments to place some suggestions before the house on behalf of that part of Canada usually referred to as "the maritimes".

To maritimers, it was indeed a pleasure to hear the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) address this house, one week ago today, in the interests of the maritime provinces. Representing as he does not only a riding in central Canada but a riding in one of our most highly industrialized centres, the hon. gentleman's remarks were particularly gratifying and encouraging.

Few there are in Canada today who can vie with the hon. member for Davenport in personal knowledge of the outlying districts of our vast country. The interest he has shown in the problems confronting each section of Canada displays the wide viewpoint of a true Canadian—one which all Canadians might well strive to attain; and his spirit of unity and tolerance should be extolled and emulated if Canada is to find herself a truly great and united nation.

It is inspiring to those living in the maritime provinces to know that we have such a good friend in central Canada as is the hon. member for Davenport, and I am proud to pay this tribute to him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the fisheries industry, it must be admitted that much important progress has been made during the past few years. We are gradually approaching a point where all people directly concerned with this industry are cognizant of the necessity for scientific approach to it, whereby we may compete successfully with those countries which for many years past have been miles ahead of Canada in fisheries policies.

The present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) is indeed to be congratulated on the fine work he is doing in the development of Canada's fisheries. I was more than pleased to learn of the expansion to be made in the department's field service. The establishing of fisheries schools and the training of young veterans in the scientific aspects of the industry will, I am sure, be most beneficial in promoting the welfare of our fisheries and our fishermen. However, in spite of whatever progress may have been made and which is likely to be made in government policy in this sphere, I think that we must at all times bear in mind that it is the welfare of the fisherman himself which must be the nucleus of any policy for our fisheries. And no matter how many national or international conferences may be held with reference to our fisheries, or how vigorously the scientific aspect of the fisheries may be pursued, we must at all times have the general well-being of the fisherman himself as a paramount consideration. This is a reason for my having mentioned at the outset that matters which may appear to be unimportant in comparison to other major items in the budget are nevertheless of the greatest importance to the daily lives of our people. This is a function of parliament which I suggest must be borne in mind constantly by each government department and by the house as a whole.

The coast line in the counties of Antigonish and Guysborough is, as is well known, very rugged, and this makes the work of our fishermen more difficult and dangerous than it is in most other places. During the fishing season it is essential that the fishermen take advantage of every possible hour in order to secure as large a catch as possible. In the present circumstances there are days lost unnecessarily all during the season because it is not possible for the fishermen to go out in their boats. I realize that during the war years it was not practicable for the government to undertake work to overcome these handicaps. However, I have no hesitation in stating now that any post-war undertaking of the government must recognize and implement much needed and overdue construction work in this respect. I strongly urge the planning and early construction of suitable wharves and breakwaters. True, the fishermen of years ago did not have such facilities; but surely, Mr. Speaker, the fishermen of today are entitled to share in the progress of our civilization. However, sir, I have to state that rather than enjoying the fruits of such progress, our fishermen, in comparison to their fellow workers in the industrial areas, seem to have been forgotten, and the available results of our modern advancement have been denied to them. The construction of good wharves and the erection of adequate breakwaters is, I insist, an immediate necessity in many parts of the maritimes, and I trust that the representations which are being made in this respect will bring good results. This is not a work which requires any great outlay of money, but it is one which for many years to come will react to the benefit of this great and essential industry.

In this connection I also urge the immediate necessity for a complete change in dredging operations in the maritimes. The present position is entirely unsatisfactory, and in my opinion it can be improved immensely. I recommend the acquisition by the government of a sufficient number of large and small dredges to do the work which at present remains undone because the dredges now in use are ineffective, or because of a lack of dredging equipment. The unfortunate result of the present position is that men are actually prevented from accomplishing their work, or are severely handicapped in their efforts to do it. This is one suggestion which would solve some of the existing difficulties, and the expenditure involved would be a wise and beneficial investment for the government to make.

In another matter of practical help for our fishermen, the policy of other countries has been to erect small cold storage and freezing plants at many convenient points. Such plants have the twofold effect of preserving the fish catch and of maintaining a sure supply of bait. The lack of bait prevents fishing activities on those days when no bait is available. The erection of such small plants as I mention would solve this problem. In those few places where there are such plants, they have been highly successful. In advocating such a policy, I do so with the knowledge that the increased return enjoyed has more than justified the expenditure involved. I say that we have long since passed the stage when such facilities are regarded as extravagant. They are now actually a necessity.

In advocating such material advantages for the fishermen, I am not unmindful of the necessity for our concern with his more personal welfare. I need do no more, I am sure, than to mention the grave hazards faced by the fishermen day by day. We have, it is true, tried to minimize these to some extent. However, I know of places where the hazards can be greatly lessened, and to this end I urge the adoption of some suggestions which I shall make—suggestions which, I may say, are the direct result of representations made to me by the fishermen themselves.

I suggest that a more thorough system of bell buoys and whistle buoys would be highly desirable as a measure of increased safety for small-boat fishermen. I am aware that there are objections to this measure because of the possibility of confusion. However, I suggest that at many points of danger which exist at present, no confusion whatever would result. Rather would there be, I maintain, a great deal of security which in too many instances is now absent. The cost of installing such safety measures is trifling; the benefits would be great. I know that it is not a lack of a sense of responsibility which has prevented the adoption of such measures, but I would urge the government to undertake this very simple and inexpensive work as soon as possible.

I wish to mention another item respecting aids to fishermen which has already been emphasized in this house, notably by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters). As I have stated, I wish to avoid repetition and so I shall content myself with voicing my support and endorsement of the proposal. I refer to the maintenance of an adequate coast guard patrol. Every year in the maritime provinces we are forcefully, and all too often sadly, reminded of the necessity of an adequate coast guard. In common with other hon. members from the maritimes and British Columbia, I look forward to early action on this proposal.

In the other great primary industry of agriculture I welcome the progressive leadership given to the industry by the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Of course most of our farms in the maritimes are not comparable in size with those in central and western Canada, but we maritimers are fully aware of their vital necessity in our lives. Maritime farmers have done, and are continuing to do, a really splendid job, and are producing ever-increasing quantities of farm products. In our agricultural policy we must continue to pursue the programme which has been given such successful impetus and direction during the past few years. Not only must we expect full and good production from our farmers, but we must also assure to the farmer a just and reasonable return from his difficult and highly important work. While maritime farmers have increased their production, especially during the war years, very often under severe difficulties, the unfortunate fact remains that they could be producing still more. Again I shall try to avoid repetition by saying briefly, and as strongly as I can, that the reclaiming of the marsh lands of the maritimes is an urgent, desirable and highly advantageous undertaking.

Perhaps I cannot do better than repeat the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture as made to this house on May 30, 1946, at page 2013 of Hansard:

> We are looking for land upon which to settle men coming back from overseas, upon which to settle persons who are coming from the overpopulated areas in other parts of the world, and upon which to settle the sons and daughters of our farmers in different parts of Canada who still wish to carry on in agriculture. Doctor Archibald was with me on that second visit, and I agreed with him when he said that there was no place in Canada in which a better job could be done, where money could be spent to better advantage than to take care of these marsh lands and make them produce as they are capable of producing. I think everyone who is familiar with the situation will agree with me when I say that that job ought to be done.

I am sure that all members from the maritimes welcomed these words of the minister, and I trust that his expression of interest and approval will soon be translated into action. I submit that enabling legislation should be introduced during this session to overcome the difficulties which prevented earlier extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to eastern Canada—legislation designed to assist not only in the reclaiming of marsh and dike lands in the maritimes, but also the preventing of soil erosion, by flood control of fresh water rivers. In this I am heartily in accord with the opinion so ably expressed in this and previous debates by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. McGarry) and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor).

I should now like to ask the attention of the house for a few minutes to some other matters which pertain particularly to the welfare of eastern Nova Scotia. I shall be brief in my references, and shall try to offer some specific suggestions.

Some few years ago the construction of what is popularly known as the Guysborough railway was begun. This would be a branch railway between Sunnybrae and Guysborough, designed to meet the urgent needs of that section of Nova Scotia which has no railway facilities whatsoever. I do not intend today to indulge in statistics of population and production. All this information has been determined years ago and is on record. Under a Liberal government work on the construction of this railway was begun in 1929, and a great deal of money was spent. However, the government which succeeded the Liberal government in 1930 issued orders to discontinue the work. Nevertheless even the Conservative government of that time recognized the necessity of this railway, for on June 15, 1931, Hon. R. J. Manion, in answer to a question asked in this house, stated that the Canadian National Railways expected to complete construction of the Guysborough railway by August 31, 1932. But no further work was done on the railway.

As far back as 1939, Mr. Speaker, speaking in this house on the United States trade agreement, I emphasized the urgent need of completing this Guysborough railway if the people in that area were to benefit from that trade agreement. However, the war brought in its wake the need for other urgent and more necessary expenditures, which overshadowed for the time all other considerations. Now that the war is over, and a considerable part of the demobilization costs have been taken care of, the importance of post-war projects has become paramount. May I say, with the full endorsement of all people in that part of Nova Scotia, that the need for completion of this railway is every bit as great now as it was in 1929, if not more so. The present position of having the right of way purchased and paid for, the concrete abutments for bridges in place, of having ready all preliminary work and allowing all this expenditure and preparation to come into disuse, is not what it should be; if I may use the word, the situation is intolerable. Remember that this is no mere temporary or unproductive enterprise. I can tell the house with full knowledge whereof I speak that the fishing, lumber, agriculture and tourist industries of Guysborough county are today suffering from neglect and lack of development because of the failure to complete the Guysborough railway. My constituents of Guysborough county of every political persuasion are unanimous in their endorsement of my representations to the house today, and I take this opportunity to make the strongest appeal to the government for immediate action in this matter. The house may sometimes grow weary of the claims sponsored by members from the maritimes, of all political parties, but I feel sure that all members who have a knowledge of this subject will support the appeal which I make today. I hope that by the time another budget speech is being debated in this chamber I may be in a position to voice the thanks of my constituents for the government's authorization for the completion of the Guysborough railway.

While on the subject of railways I desire to support the plea which has been put forth by other maritime members for the realignment of the railway track between Sydney and Moncton. The present position is that so long as the authorities persist in their refusal, or should I say omission, to realign this portion of the railway and to eliminate or at least reduce the present grades, then so long will there be an economically unsound railway policy in that part of the maritimes. I am not expressing a mere non-professional opinion; but I am restating the findings of competent engineers and economists who have made exhaustive studies of this question. As long as the present position is maintained there will be a twofold loss—a loss in operating revenue to the railway, and a loss to the people whom the railway serves, through a poor and inefficient service. I suggest that this part of Canada is just as deserving of an expenditure to eliminate such conditions as are other parts of this country which have received it. I say that this work is necessary for the welfare of the maritimes, and I therefore urge that these improvements be undertaken immediately.

Undoubtedly the question of transportation facilities at the strait of Canso is intimately related to the matter which I have just been discussing. I know that this whole problem is receiving the serious attention of the government, and that all available expert advice is being sought. However, I do want to say now that improved services over this important route are of utmost importance. Hon. members are familiar with the heavy amount of traffic being handled across this strait, and I think that we are all aware of the national importance of the traffic. Certainly the people of Cape Breton and of the mainland of Nova Scotia are fully entitled to better transport facilities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another matter to which I would like to refer. I have already discussed it on more than one occasion with the hon. minister concerned, and I think I cannot do better than bring it to the attention of the government and all hon. members of this house. I refer to the necessity of constructing an airport in Antigonish-Guysborough. Already a survey has been made of a site outside the town of Antigonish, and I understand that blueprints are in preparation indicating the feasibility of such construction. The location is strategically placed, being in the direct air path about midway between Halifax and Sydney. Who of us living back in the early nineteen hundreds could visualize the tremendous changes that have taken place in our transportation methods by the introduction of the automobile? And who among us today can, or would dare, prophesy the possibilities which the future holds for similar advancement through the growing popularity of air transport? There is no doubt that in the next few years the construction of landing fields in close proximity to each other will become a necessity and, as I have already said, the site of which I speak is admirably suited to such a purpose. Progress in Nova Scotia can be materially helped by modern air communication, and it is safe to assume that the business which would result from an airport in this vicinity, coupled with its service as an emergency landing field, would definitely justify its existence. In this connection I might remind the house that the greater part of my constituency is without any railway facilities whatsoever. I again urge and appeal to the government to complete arrangements during the present summer for construction of this airport.

Representing Antigonish as one county in my constituency keeps constantly in my mind the great work being accomplished by the extension department of Saint Francis Xavier university. I feel quite safe in expecting that when the minister pilots his estimates through the house he will continue the support which the government has been giving to this work. Indeed, I should like to feel equally hopeful that the government will increase this financial help in any supplementary estimates that may be brought down.

This budget which we have been considering for the past while presents to me two distinct conclusions. There is first in the measure of taxation relief which has been afforded and in the financial statement of the country's status, every reason for us to have firm belief in the soundness of Canada's economy. I am sure that as shareholders in Canada we must be pleased by the annual statement of our treasurer. There is, secondly, the expectation that we may look to the future in the confident assurance that, with the proper guidance which it is our duty to provide, Canada will continue to progress.

I make these two observations, Mr. Speaker, because the work being done at Saint Francis Xavier university, which is popularly known as the Antigonish movement, is a work which has helped to accomplish what we have attained, and will serve to ensure our future prosperity. I endorse the many statements that have been made in calling this work the greatest application of Christianity that has been practised in our time. So far the effects of the Antigonish movement have been noticeable mainly in the maritime provinces; but it is gradually extending all over Canada. Indeed already it has started in countries outside of Canada, as evidenced by the number of students from foreign countries now enrolled at the university. I am sure it will be agreed, Mr. Speaker, that the Antigonish movement is the very essence of democracy; and as long as it continues to have the support and enthusiasm of the government and the people that it now enjoys, democracy and free enterprise in this country will be assured.

In conclusion I wish to express the pleasure of my constituents at the sound financial state of Canada as disclosed by the Minister of Finance in the budget. At this particular period of our history, in the aftermath of the greatest struggle the world has ever known, the youth of Canada, and in particular the young men and women who were in various branches of the services, need a great measure of encouragement in order to devote their best efforts, their intelligence and their ambition to the building of this great nation. I think we may take pride in the fact that our country's present economic status, and our expectation for the future in the light of Liberal government policies, will provide the encouragement which I mention as being needed. Indeed, the same encouragement is there for those of us of an older generation to help and guide the younger Canadians in their work.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I say that we have every reason, in the light of this year's budget, to look forward to the future greatness of Canada with full faith and complete confidence.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): "We have just ended a year in which our accounts show a surplus—a surplus larger than the accumulated total of all the previous surpluses in our history. Today we see a Canada enjoying a degree of prosperity never exceeded in living memory. We look forward to a year of high production and incomes. . . . Our available manpower is almost fully employed, with some surpluses in special areas and trades and equally real shortages in others. Demand continues to outrun supply in many lines of business. Our exports remain at high levels, limited in most cases only by our own ability to supply. Imports are pouring into the country from the south in large volume, without appearing to divert much demand from our own production. Private business is proceeding to expand, repair and improve its capital on a scale so large that its plans will be severely limited by scarcity of materials, equipment and labour. Some increases in inventories are occurring but apparently not on a large scale, presumably because the pressure of demand in most cases is so excessive that neither producers nor dealers can keep ahead of it. Consumer purchasing continues to expand and there is as yet little sign in Canada of any widespread unwillingness or inability on the part of consumers to buy what is being offered to them."

Mr. Speaker, these are bold and ringing words, but they are not mine. They are the words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

Are they true? I assume that they are; I like to believe that they are. But should it happen that any of the legislation embodied in what we have been pleased to call the omnibus bill be challenged before the courts; should it come about that the right of parliament to invade the provincial field of legislation be challenged; should someone question the right of the executive to take unto itself all the prerogatives of parliament—yea, should some citizen deny the power of parliament to surpress the elementary rights of citizenship; should someone say that those rights which have been arrogated to itself by parliament, upon the basis of a national emergency, are not properly taken because no national emergency exists, then the first witness to be summonsed to dispel the fiction and to show up the falseness of the so-called national emergency would be the hon. gentleman who has spoken so truthfully and so well of his country.

The Minister of Finance tells us that employment is complete, that trade is unrivalled, that earnings are greater than ever; that we are a happy, a prosperous and a vigorous people going forward to our destiny. And those statements are made by a responsible minister after a colleague, only a few short weeks before, had said that there exists a national emergency which justifies the suppression of the constitution of this land!

I mention this, not with any desire to be disagreeable to the minister—no. I mention it so that the fiction—I was going to say the farce—of this national emergency might show its painted face and its withered limbs once again to the scorn of right-thinking people in this dominion.

And what of the budget itself? I will not attempt to criticize it in detail. Had the minister consulted me, or had he been interested in what some at least on this side of the house think, he would have done away with the excess profits tax. I think, in the first place, that "excess profits" in this sense is a gross misnomer; the person who devised that name was a master of the art of propaganda. There is something in this unseemly combination of words that savours of selfishness, something that savours of impropriety which should not be applied to the tax. This terminology should be banished from the sober and accurate language of a taxing statute.

But I go further and say I believe that the treasury itself would have been richer at the end of the taxing period had this excess profits tax been eliminated immediately. Because the minister knows, as do others who have some acquaintance with business, that it is only natural that he who has a savoury bit in prospect would wait until his participation in the benefits therefrom would be greater than if taken under the excess profits tax legislation. I submit that even if such action were contemplated, the statement should not have been made that the tax was to be abolished. I do think there are some things which either should be done or should be kept behind the walls of that vast and ever-changing reservoir of government policy.

My friends to the left probably will not share this sentiment: I am not of those who are profoundly impressed by the idea of planning. I like to plan for myself, and I am quite willing that my neighbour plan for himself, but the difficulty comes when we begin to plan for others who do not wish to be planned for. I am brought to this observation by the fact that after the war we entered upon a brave new era, and the minister of finance at that time—the Minister of Finance of today will correct me if I am wrong; I looked for the text but could not find it—went before a dominion-provincial conference here in Ottawa and outlined the government's great new plan. It was a plan to tax ourselves roundly during periods of prosperity and build up a treasure house into which we might delve in periods of depression, when taxes would be lowered and public works started that the people might have bread. I thought to myself as I listened to the budget speech how quickly plans vanish. My hon. friend and his party may have wished to continue in the plan that they outlined, but there is a master who has to be obeyed, however pious the wish that runs contrariwise. The electorate insisted on reduction in taxation, and reduction in taxation was made. Plans for the rainy day, plans for high taxes during a period of prosperity—and this is a period of unrivalled prosperity—plans for bad times and public works then to be undertaken—all these plans went into the receptacle which in the end receives all plans, the ash can.

Now about housing. I have heard my friend to the left tell the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) that his plans had failed, and I heard the minister the other day himself speak of one of his measures—I think it was Housing Enterprises Limited, but I am always uncertain, Mr. Speaker, when I approach these multiple activities of government; when I begin to talk about them. I feel that the night is dark and I am very far from home. But his plans, like the plan about which I spoke a moment ago, found their way one by one into the same receptacle. Until we have broken this stiff-necked Canadian people of its waywardness, of its desire to do things for itself in its own way, we are not going to fasten the collar of bureaucracy upon them. They are going to do things in their own way, and when it is attempted to force other ways of doing it upon them, those other plans will invariably fail. So I listened the other day to the minister telling the story of the abandonment of that particular plan, just as he abandoned making aeroplanes and abandoned the monopoly of the air, and just as other plans must shortly be abandoned.

But I want to make this suggestion to the ministry, ere it is bereft of all its powers of doing something for the little brother, the people. It is unfortunate that all the housing has been done in the cities, that all the building has been done there. Oh, I know some gentleman is going to say that this act and that act provides for housing in the country, but the houses that have been built in the country, whether for the veteran or for somebody else, are so negligible in number that we can forget them right away. We have seen the already substantial industrial development of our own country greatly increased by the exigencies of war. We have added to our plant capacity. We had to make munitions of every type, and we took into this great and new plant a new army of workers. We took in the mothers and the wives and the daughters of the Canadian people to participate in the great work of urgency; they came from the land, from the villages, from the parishes into the industrial centres. This is not one of the minor tragedies of the war. There they are going to stay, and there the government has attempted to build houses for them. If the government had consulted me I would have suggested to them that they make a great effort and offer some enticement to these brave people who had come from the land into the cities, to summons them to go back home, back to the soil. I would have attempted to entice them back by building for them good, warm and attractive houses near the source of all that is rich and good in any country—the mother earth. The government has overlooked that opportunity.

I come to another point that I would like to have heard the minister deal with more fully and more effectively. I need not assure the minister that I do not hold myself out as a person of deep learning in economics, but I do know that Canada is one of the great trading nations. This country in terms of population is small, almost insignificant; yet it ranks third or possibly fourth among the great trading nations of the world. This country exports somewhere between 35 and 40 per cent of its production. What portion of it is manufactured? I do not exactly know, but if you assume that newsprint is manufactured goods, if you assume that cheese, butter and bacon are manufactured goods, I make bold to suggest that at least half our exports are manufactured goods. We can live as we are living now if we can find markets, external markets, foreign markets for these goods. Where are we to find these markets? In the past always, I may say, we have bought more from the United States than we have sold to that country. To pay our debt to the United States we have relied upon the proceeds of our sales to other countries, which we have converted from pounds-sterling or other currency into dollars which the United States have accepted in settlement of our accounts. Today, outside of the United States, there are no foreign markets. There are markets to which we are shipping goods, but we are shipping goods which are paid for how? By credits that we have established. They are paid for by ourselves.

I should have been very happy if the minister had brought to bear upon that problem some of his experience and some of the information which association brings to him, because we all know that this condition cannot persist. It must come to an end, and shortly, unless there be a change. I should have liked the minister to deal with this topic, because it seems to me it is the most important question which confronts us as a people today; it is all important to our economic survival. Unless we can find markets for our manufactured products, for the products of our farms, of our forests and of our fisheries; unless we can find markets which can give us in exchange for our goods something which we can use in the United States to settle for our excess purchases there—oh, I am not one of those who thinks the world will come to an end if we have hard times—there will be a drop in our standard of living, there will be unrest, discomfort and suffering among our people. Our people will be able to survive only if they go back where most of them came from, to the land, and any government which neglects that fundamental truth is not alert to the great possibilities and dangers which confront our people.

I should have been glad had the minister been a little more explicit, a little more careful when he talked of our reserves of United States dollars. To one who read his speech casually, to one who listened to it even with great attention, as it was my privilege to do —and possibly if too many of my party friends were not listening, I may say with a wee bit of pride for he comes from a part of Canada that is dear to my heart, he was not sufficiently explicit. I wish he had told us exactly how rapidly our reserves of United States dollars are disappearing; for we should then have been in a much better position to appreciate our plight.

I am going to ask the minister to do several things, but one thing that I want him to do, and I believe he will do it, is to tell the house exactly what inroads we made upon our United States reserves last year, and what so far this year. I understand that up to July 5, 1946, we were accumulating rather rapidly, and that after that we not only lost what we had accumulated but made heavy inroads into our reserves; that in fact we were in deficit something over $600 million. If I am wrong, so much the better; but if it be true, we should know it; we should know the full unvarnished truth whatever be the cause.

There is another matter—and this is one that is somewhat difficult to talk about because it affects our hearts as well as our heads and to many of us it affects the heart first; we are told that Mr. Towers, the governor of the Bank of Canada, is in England. We know that in the annual report of the Bank of Canada Mr. Towers has sounded a note of warning. We know that in his report on the foreign exchange control board he has sounded another note. "The testing period lies ahead." he says. He points out in guarded language, but in language that is ominous nevertheless, that there must be a change or Canada will find herself in a most difficult situation. Most people would like to know what the facts are. In this house in the last few months we have heard much about charity. In the last few days we have heard much about justice. They are great virtues. But there is one that underlies them all, and that is truth. We are entitled to the truth in this house, the whole truth, and I implore the minister to take the house into his confidence.

Mr. ABBOTT: He has.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not of those who are scornful of the skilled man, of the man who has made a specialty of banking or economics and who occupies a position of trust in one or in many departments of government. I do not wish to belittle these men; but, sir, I have respect for the wisdom of the men of affairs; I have respect for the experience of this house, close as it is in the wisdom of the electorate, and I believe that however great be the perils that surround us, the best way to meet and overcome them and the best way to allay the uneasiness that pervades the whole country is for the minister to take the house into his confidence and let the house know exactly what the situation is.

The house would like to know what markets are available anywhere in the world. The house would like to know where our commodities, whether the products of the farm or the forest, of our fisheries or our industrial plants, might be sold. The house would like to know the necessities, the actual condition, of those to whom we have made advances. There appeared the other day in a government publication, under the heading "Canada's cost of war, aftermath estimated at twenty billions of dollars", a few concise and revealing statements. The statement I am reading from shows what amounts had been disposed of by gifts, by mutual aid, and by loans. Anybody who totals these figures will find that the three billions of our national debt at the beginning of the war shrink into insignificance compared with our largesse during and since the war.

I am not arguing that it was not a wise thing to do; I am not arguing that we should not go further; but I do say that this house should not be asked to take the responsibility of a decision which may involve our own survival until it has all the facts clearly stated and in a form fully intelligible not only to parliament but to the people of this dominion. I do not think I am going too far when I say that possibly owing to habits of secrecy which was cultivated, perhaps necessarily, during the war, there is a tendency today not to trust parliament. There is a tendency to do things in an arbitrary way because they have been advocated by the experts. Again, I do not wish anyone to think that I am criticizing the experts. The experts have their place. They have made special studies and investigations. But I believe that all their technical knowledge should be tried out with the touchstone of experience, and I do not think it is well that this country should further advance into the realm of indebtedness until all the facts have been clearly brought to parliament.

Mr. ABBOTT: Will my hon. friend allow a question?

Mr. HACKETT: Certainly.

Mr. ABBOTT: What facts does he believe have been withheld from parliament other than the day to day foreign exchange position of the foreign exchange control board?

Mr. HACKETT: Well, I will not—

Mr. ABBOTT: If I might complete the sentence, I would say that the report of the board—

Mr. HACKETT: I do not think that the hon. gentleman's statement on our relations with the United States and the position of the United States dollar was one that the ordinary individual could understand, and I do not think it was one which set forth in all its implications, as it should have been set forth, our real position.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a matter of opinion, Mr. Speaker. But the report of the foreign exchange control board was in strict accordance with the statute which called for it. It was a full and complete report; it gave the position as at December 31, 1946, and it was tabled at an earlier date than the statute called for.

Mr. HACKETT: That may be, but it dealt with the period of a year, and it did not break it down into two, when there were two different sets of conditions applied. There were the first six months when the Canadian dollar was at a discount of ten per cent and, as I understand, we were accumulating reserves. There was the period subsequent to that when we were eating up our reserves and we not only ate up what we had accumulated during the first six months but made vast inroads into our reserves; and as I read the report, I do not think that was set forth as amply as it should have been.

But I do not want my hon. friend to feel that I am critical in the sense of hostility. Our Canadian problem is a great problem and it requires the good will and work of everybody, be he expert, be he minister or be he humble member of parliament. I believe it will inure to the benefit of Canada; it will inure to the benefit of those whom we wish to aid, if we do not act until all the facts are before us.

Now what is the position in England? I do not know. We have varying reports. Public men, public servants come here and they make statements which are contradictory. I am hopeful that when Mr. Towers returns we may have information which will be more nearly complete, more reliable, and which will enable us to set a course that will be for our own benefit and for the benefit of those whom we wish to aid.

If the moneys which we are advancing are serving the purpose for which we are advancing them; that is, if they are tending in those countries which are receiving them, to prime the pump, that is one situation. But if they are not serving that purpose, if there is no hope of inducing the pump to bring forth water from the well, or if the well be dry, it is well that we should know it. I am only suggesting that we take those precautions which a prudent administrator would take, which a careful merchant would take, which a successful farmer or manufacturer would take. We want to know the facts. We want the benefit of the expert's advice. But we want to be in the position of bringing to bear upon these problems the wisdom and experience of the Canadian business man and the Canadian member of parliament.

There is one other item I will ask the minister to keep his eye upon. We seem to be drawn into a great number of international organizations. I have been, I will not say horrified, but amazed at the great cost of these ventures. I should like to be quite certain that we are not paying more than our share and that no unnecessary payments are being made for these purposes.

There is just one additional word that I wish to say and I hope it will not be misunderstood. There seems to be a growing tendency on the part of the government to send forth civil servants as its emissaries to internationl gatherings. I am the first to admit that in our service we have able men. Recently in the state of New York we have seen one of them play a major role. But, Mr. Speaker, in my view that is not his place. Where policy is being made, where leadership is required for a country, there should be present the minister or his elected deputy. I am not critical of the individual, but I wish to point out that between the two German wars every country in continental Europe underwent a parliamentary crisis and there developed a powerful executive which completely annihilated parliamentary and democratic institutions. This may happen to us. I deem it my duty to point out that Canada's growing habit of being represented by civil servants who some day may have to serve under another government is subversive of our whole scheme of government and is tending to undo the very excellent Canadian civil service.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I am sure everyone in this house enjoys listening to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). I always appreciate listening to his sincere and, should I say, charming witness to the ideas and the tempo of the mid-Victorian period. I am quite sure he is conscious of the possibility of the near future as far as the economy of Canada is concerned, and that he is fully conscious of the vulnerable position Canada occupies with regard to exports and foreign markets. But, Mr. Speaker, he is recommending to the house the orthodox policies of the past which have produced nothing but war, depression, and war again. I shall have something more to say later in that respect, but I rise first of all to support the proposals with regard to the budget placed before this house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I do so because I think those proposals were consistent and logical. Why are they consistent and logical? Because they represent the approach of a movement which has a conscious social objective and is moving toward a definite goal.

I am not going to take much time now to deal with other aspects of the budget except to say that so far I do not think the arguments put forward for higher exemptions have been satisfactorily answered in this debate from the other side of the house. I must say that I am one of a good number of members of this house who very much deplore the fact that this government has not seen fit to remove the restrictions still placed upon cooperatives. I greatly enjoyed the speech made by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley). I think he gave an excellent exposition of the cooperative movement in this country and the stand of its members with regard to present taxation of the cooperatives. Why was he able to do that? Because he knew what he was talking about. He has spent his whole life in the cooperative movement, and he knows what it means to the average workingman and to the average farmer. I think the government lacks imagination in this respect—this government which placarded the country prior to the last election and assured the people that they stood for a new social order. There is no more inexpensive way for this government to contribute to the building of a new social order, a new economic democracy, than to assist the cooperative societies and organizations by removing these restrictions.

Again I think this government shows lack of imagination even in minor matters, as for instance, in the tax on electrical energy and the tax on soft drinks and chocolates. The youth of this country are organized into various groups. In my constituency there are teen-age groups, through which young people get together to take part in social activities in the community. Yet this government has not sufficient imagination to give these boys and girls, these young Canadians, a pat on the back by making it possible for them to have soft drinks at the pre-war price. May I say that the manufacturers of these beverages in my riding have informed me that if the government will take the tax off they are willing to sell the drinks at the previous price of five cents a bottle. But the government has not imagination enough to make that inexpensive concession to these young Canadians and say: We are willing to exempt you from that taxation because we are getting plenty out of the old sinners.

This afternoon I want to deal particularly with the wider aspects of the situation which the hon. member for Stanstead mentioned.

First I wish to quote briefly from an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of May 9:

War-Scared Businessmen

When the businessmen of La Chambre de Commerce of Montreal are assured in their annual report that the single "greatest psychological factor" hampering Canada's "return to normal" today is fear of another war, it is time that the rest of the Canadian business world laid that fantastic bogey. It is a product of stupid propaganda and silly hysteria—confined entirely to this continent.

Nowhere in Europe today among responsible statesmen is there any fear of war. Certainly the Soviet Union is in no posture to wage it. Characteristic of the widespread European view that the next war—if it ever comes—is a long way off, is the recent declaration of Mr. Jan Masaryk, Czechoslovakia's foreign minister and president of the world federation of the united nations association. He knows both Europe and North America as few statesmen know these continents. And he finds that the united nations delegates are far more optimistic now that world differences and world complexities will yield to peaceful treatment than they were only six months since.

What is wanted, however, is that the united nations must be backed up by the "enthusiasm of which people the world over have shown themselves capable in battle and reconstruction." In other words, not only must every kind of political, cultural, religious, labour, intellectual, and youth and other organizations rally behind the united nations and its purposes, but the businessmen of the world must come to see that it is their business too to help to remove the misgivings, misunderstandings, suspicions and hatreds which encumber the economy of the nations and check or frustrate their commerce.

I think the gentleman who wrote that article had a sound and realistic approach to the present situation. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I may say that is not only the opinion of the editor of the Citizen, but I find it is also the opinion of a good number of progressive thinking business men and others in this country, and I want to approach the subject along those lines. There is no question but that thinking people in this country realize that we are approaching a difficult period. There is a great deal of uncertainty with regard to the future. What is our position? The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) asked the government to define where our possible markets lay, and he offered certain orthodox proposals and remedies. We must think of this, that at the present time the British government has completed a trade pact with Poland; that trade negotiations are going on between the British government and the Soviet Union; that there are possibilities the Soviet Union may supply other countries with food and obtain from British commonwealth countries the goods they require, the wool they need from Australia, and the machinery and electrical equipment required from other British countries. At the same time those who know the facts realize that the United States is making terrific inroads in the South American markets. Where are the markets of the future? Regardless of our political philosophy, whether we are capitalists or socialists, if we are realistic in approaching this situation we must appreciate that, as far as Canada is concerned the markets of the future lie in war-torn Europe or in substandard Asia, and I think it is on that basis we must try to work out a solution.

I mention this, Mr. Speaker, because many people in this country are today realizing more than ever the dependence of Canada's economy on foreign trade. This afternoon I wish to emphasize the necessity for the development of foreign trade and therefore, for this purpose, the development of satisfactory international relations. In speaking on this subject, I am conscious of my responsibilities as a representative of the people. When I come to deal with this international situation as it bears on world trade, as it bears on this budget and on future budgets in this house, as it bears on the budgets of the provincial legislatures and on the budgets of the common people of this country, I am more than ever conscious of my responsibilities. In my mind's eye I can see the smelter workers of Trail in my constituency, tramping up and down to the smelter; I can see the small farmers, the fruit farmers, working their land; I can see the people living in the villages and towns carrying on their ordinary activities. At the same time I can look back and see in my mind's eye the effects of the last depression and realize, as one who served in the first war, what a critical period in history we are now reaching; and I can see, as clearly as the day I discerned them at close range, the rows of crosses at Ypres and the Somme. It is in that spirit that I approach this question. In my opinion it is essential that we approach this matter objectively, not in any ultra partisan spirit; and it is essential that in dealing with this question this parliament particularly should be a strictly deliberative assembly and not a propaganda sounding board. I believe we have to review the question as a whole, and that is a difficult thing for many people to do in times like these. Did you ever stop to think, Mr. Speaker, that in looking at even an ordinary tree no two people see it in exactly the same focus. One will see one side; another will see the other; one will see it in blossom and the other will see it in leaf. I believe that if we are to find a solution we can all work together to bring about we must take what I would term a worm's-eye and a bird's-eye view of all these important questions.

In dealing with this question this afternoon, I intend to attempt to analyse opinions, motives and situations in the spirit of objective inquiry, and on that basis I erect the structure of my argument. Before proceeding to, shall I say, the correct trading aspect of the situation, I want briefly to review the history of the past. Without question, in the field of external affairs the major concern of the British people at this time is centred on the relations of the western democracies, or perhaps I should say the western capitalist democracies, and the Soviet Union; and as far as North America is concerned, our major concern is the relation of the United States, as our nearest neighbour, with the Soviet Union. In looking back over the history of external affairs as it has been related to this house, I think we may say without question that control of foreign policy remains one of the unsolved or only partly solved problems within our democracy. To some extent this is due to the apparent remoteness of the question as far as the average person is concerned. Foreign affairs have in the past been very remote to the average person carrying on his or her daily activities. It is also due in part, I think, to the fact that, in the majority of cases, democratic forms of government have been developed primarily to improve internal conditions. We are only beginning to develop an understanding of the fact that we must be directly concerned with what is happening in other countries. This has been particularly true of Canada. We have only accepted our direct responsibility in external affairs during the last twenty-five years; but the impact of the second world war and the principles enunciated in the charter of the united nations have stimulated multitudes of people in this country to take a direct and daily interest in external affairs and our relations with other countries. So when I speak on this subject this afternoon I am conscious that I, together with others in this house, represent the aspirations, the wishes, the desires and the hopes of hundreds of thousands of people in this country.

A discussion of external affairs in this house usually takes place on a resolution sponsored by the government or by a private member, or on estimates, or on particular occasions, or during major debates. I am taking this opportunity this afternoon to deal with this subject in this major debate, because I believe it is directly related and directly connected to our trading position and therefore to the development of our economy which, as I said before, concerns this budget and future budgets in this house, as well as the budgets of average Canadians. In going over the records of this country, I find that a perusal of history indicates that this and previous governments have a record of fine sentiments rather than progressive policies in the field of international affairs. A very well known gentleman in this country, I think it was André Seigfried, said on one occasion that, although collective security represents a conviction, as far as Canada is concerned to date it has been a conviction de luxe. The principles of collective security have, in times past, been loudly talked about; but, as far as I can find from the records, neither this nor any preceding government has taken a strong stand for collective security when the opportunity presented itself. Today in every critical international situation precious hours of peace have ticked away without the voice of Canada being heard fearlessly throughout the world. What is our record in that respect? I do not think it is one of which we should be proud, in times of peace. We did not speak out in behalf of collective security on the question of sanctions during the Abyssinian war. We failed to speak out in support of a democratic government in Spain. Then I think the crowning achievement of this policy under which collective security was purely a sentiment de luxe, as I say, occurred just a few days prior to the outbreak of the last war, when Canada proudly recognized the then king of Italy as emperor of Abyssinia. I think that was the climax of a record which we must seek to change.

The records of this house, as I read Hansard of the past, clearly indicate to me that on many occasions when hon. members have sought to develop Canadian opinion or to arouse the Canadian public to a definite and dangerous situation, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has discouraged debate on external affairs. He has asked hon. members to restrain themselves, and to limit debate.

In my opinion and, I think, in the opinion of a good many members in the house a ventilation of these great and mighty matters would have informed the Canadian people and would have given Canada the ability to speak with a stronger voice. In my opinion, as I read the history of the past, in respect of foreign affairs this government and preceding governments have depended upon time, the follies and foibles of other governments and the shortness of human memories to give the appearance of reality to a policy barren of a single definitive statement in support of collective security, until war was inevitable.

Our records show that when the United States and Great Britain were in agreement we were courageous enough to say, "me too." When the United States and Great Britain were in disagreement Canada was mum. My major point in this connection before proceeding to anything further I have to say this afternoon is that, according to the records of the past, Canada has allowed precious moments to pass and to tick away without raising its voice fearlessly on behalf of collective security. I am appealing this afternoon that that policy be changed.

We are in a splendid position as a nation small in numbers and great in potential wealth. We agree that, so far as our position in the world today is concerned, we are living in one of the vital spots of the world. We are in a splendid position, as a member of the British commonwealth of nations, as a good friend and neighbour of the United States and as a neighbour of the Soviet Union, to interpret the policies of these nations one to the other, and to act as mediator in a world which offers great possibilities for those who have courage to speak. I ask this government at this time to speak up for Canada.

A second world war has been fought and has been won at the cost of terrible sacrifice in life, human suffering, human happiness and treasure. We have affirmed our belief in the charter of the united nations. And it is because of that fact, because of the history and experience of the past, and because of our position that hundreds of thousands of Canadians are expecting some action on the part of this government in support of the principle of collective security, before time ticks away, once again.

I shall go on now to deal briefly with a situation that exists in the world today, because it is of great concern to hundreds of thousands of Canadians, and that is the attitude of the United States to the Soviet Union and to the European problem. We are very much concerned in this question at the present time, because we are supporters of the united nations charter.

I am dealing particularly for a few moments with the American policy with regard to aid to Greece and Turkey, and in that connection I wish to quote brief statements from the state department of the United States government. I have very little time at my disposal. If I had more I could produce plenty of documentary evidence to support my argument. However, at the present time I shall be as brief as possible in the presentation of the documentary evidence supporting my argument. This is taken from a state department statement with regard to the situation in Greece:

> There is no indication that the Soviet Union will change its attitude of hostility toward the present Greek government.

That is the common argument that the state department takes. Here we have the basing of military aid to a nation because it cannot expect the U.S.S.R. to discontinue its verbal hostility to the present Greek government.

And then, passing on, I want to point out briefly to the house what President Truman said in this connection, and also what the food and agriculture organization of the united nations, which we support, have recommended. President Truman said:

> A militant minority, exploiting human want and misery, was able to create political chaos which, until now, has made economic recovery impossible.

And the food and agriculture organization reports:

> Not until governmental arrangements can be worked out which have the confidence and support of the great mass of the Greek people can a clear and consistent economic programme be established.

Again President Truman says:

> Greece must have assistance if it is to become a self-respecting democracy. The United States must supply that assistance.

And the food and agriculture organization reports:

> A proposed united nations advisory mission should replace all other international and foreign economic missions in Greece.

Then again President Truman says:

> . . . the united nations and its related organizations are not in a position to extend help of the kind that is required.

And the food and agriculture organization reports:

> In addition to the economic and social council itself, a number of united nations agencies might be interested in such a mission, including FAO, the international bank, the monetary fund, the international labour office, united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization, the proposed international trade organization, and other specialized agencies.

Again President Truman says:

> Congress should provide authority for assistance to Greece and Turkey in the amount of $400 million for the period ending June 30, 1948.

And the food and agriculture organization reports:

> Greece will need an initial international loan for 1947-48 of at least $100 million.

Again President Truman states:

> Congress should authorize the detail of American civilian and military personnel to Greece and Turkey and provide for the instruction and training of selected Greek and Turkish personnel.

And the food and agriculture organization reports:

> Greece should reduce expenditures for military purposes as rapidly as increasing international confidence and increased reliance on the united nations make possible.

I say in that connection that a foreign office official of the British government admitted to a question asked in the house that something under 2,000 officers of the present Greek army previously served in a German security force. I mention that only to indicate the type of government it is proposed to assist at the present time.

The Manchester Guardian, a first-rate Liberal paper in the old country, and one which most Liberals whether they live in England or on the North American continent respect, recently straightforwardly declared that Englishmen should be ashamed of the existence of the present government in Greece, and concluded that Greece should be cleared of British troops in the very near future, because it becomes more and more difficult to justify their presence there. Let us not forget that the present British government inherited a most difficult situation on that score, and that at the present time those troops are being withdrawn.

Then, so far as Turkey is concerned, every informed person knows that Turkey is governed with an iron-fist rule. It is not a democracy. It is a country where liberals are jailed—and when I refer to "liberals" I speak in the broad sense which would apply to some of my hon. friends opposite. They are not allowed to spread their ideals. Trade unionists are suppressed. I am sure that without doubt, hundreds of thousands of Americans and Canadians are shocked by this bolstering up of the Greek government, this suggestion of help for that government on a military basis, and help for Turkey which, to date, denies freedom to her own citizens.

The great majority of Canadian people realize that the Greek people require help, and are in support of financing Greece in order to overcome the conditions existing there at the present time, and to develop self-liquidating projects.

Now, passing on, in an effort to show the situation as it really exists, I should like to point out who are supporting this policy, a policy which was commenced in 1917 and has been continued by certain people from that date to this. I am going to deal with the record of those who are the most vehement exponents of this policy and also with the record of the opponents of this policy. First of all, I deal with the financial press of the United States. What do the Wall Street papers have to say? Wall Street opinion is well expressed in the Wall street weekly, Barrons, which, commenting on the present policy in the United States, has this to say:

> He (President Truman) had to pay lip service to the Roosevelt policies with a few cliches about the united nations. Mr. Truman cannot be thanked too gratefully for his honest and straightforward presentation of reasons for embarking on a course so alien to that of his widely worshipped predecessor.

There is no question about this course being alien to the policies of the late President Roosevelt. Recently the Wall Street Journal had this to say:

> Greece and Turkey are only starters, all eastern and central Europe and much of Asia could come within the active scope of such operations.

Even Mr. Bevin, on his return from the conference at Moscow, publicly announced that the press—and by that he meant the capitalist press of the world—did a great deal to hinder the progress of the Moscow negotiations. Leading oil companies of the United States are, without exception, solid in their support of this policy, and included in the list of prominent supporters is the famous Mr. Gerald K. Smith, who is always against constructive progressive action.

Mr. KNOWLES: You mean infamous, not famous.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Yes, infamous.

I am not here to defend the Soviet Union. I realize the provocative statements that are made from time to time in that country and that much of their propaganda, so far as Canada and the United States are concerned, appears stupid. I would recommend that they employ good Canadian or United States publicists, because it is obvious that the Russians do not understand the psychology and outlook of the Canadian and the American people. I realize all that. At the same time a great section of the press of this country and particularly in the United States have been most unfair to Russia throughout the years. I have in my hand references and press clippings going back for twenty years, which indicate that these papers on this side have not told the truth but have done everything to create distrust, suspicion and misunderstanding and to disorganize our relationships with Russia.

Whom do we find among the great exponents of this policy of protecting United States capitalism in Europe? One of the most vehement exponents of this policy, one of the leading exponents continually since 1917, has been the former President Hoover, from whose palsied hands the late President Roosevelt rescued the economy of the United States. Why is that? It is clear to anyone who has read the record and followed the speeches and statements of ex-President Hoover. In 1907, Hoover was a mining engineer employed by British interests in the far east prior to the first world war. He became a successful capitalist in collaboration with large British corporations, and between 1909 and 1910 he floated and had a major interest in eleven Russian oil companies. By 1912 he was associated with the British multimillionaire, Leslie Urquhart. He floated the Russo-Asiatic Corporation, whose shares rose from $16.25 in 1913 to $47.50 in 1914, and in that same year the corporation in which Hoover was the leading shareholder, obtained the following concession from the Czarist regime: 2,500,000 acres of land, including vast timberlands, and waterpower; estimated gold, copper, silver and zinc reserves of 7,262,000 tons; twelve developed mines; two copper smelters; twenty sawmills; 250 miles of railroad; two steamships and twenty-nine barges; blast furnaces, rolling mills, sulphuric acid plants, gold refineries; huge coal reserves. The total value of these properties was estimated at $1,000,000,000. We all know, if we read the records carefully, that, under Hoover as food administrator for the United States in Europe after the last war, food was shipped from this continent and used by Hoover for political purposes. It was given to German commanders and German generals to distribute to populations which had become politically acquiescent. On October 13, 1931, Hoover, when president of the United States, stated in an interview with the San Francisco News:

> To tell the truth, the ambition of my life is to stamp out Soviet Russia.

We place Mr. Hoover's interests and policies beside the statement made by Henry Wallace in New York when he said:

> The plan to condemn Russia is really secondary to "that push for oil."

That policy has continued from 1917 down to this day. It is not related to the interests of this country or to those of Europe. It is strictly related to monopoly capitalism, and if these people are allowed to go on unchecked and to defeat the aims and purposes of the united nations the world will be plunged once again into another war.

Now let us see who is opposed to this policy of military aid to Greece and thus opposing the united nations. There are millions of progressive Americans who are opposed to this policy of military aid to Greece, and millions of British people; the cooperative organizations of Great Britain; the trade unions of Great Britain; numerous groups of veterans in the United States; large numbers in western Europe; Turkish Liberals; the federal council of churches of the United States; hundreds of thousands of Canadians; Sir John Boyd Orr, the great British scientist and forward-looking person; Senator Pepper and other senators and congressmen of the United States; the former Mayor LaGuardia, whose recent splendid article, "Don't Finance Foreign Armies," expressed a strong opposition to this policy. In addition to that, we have Henry Wallace, a former vice-president of the United States, in my opinion the most lovable and individual figure in American political life today, that great descendant of a truly great United States family. I had the honour to meet him a few hours before he left for Great Britain by air and to have a conversation with him concerning the present situation. I soon realized why he has inspired multitudes of ordinary people in the United States and Great Britain. There is a warmth and bigness in him that mark him off from all his rivals. I am certain of this, Mr. Speaker, that, should Mr. Henry Wallace decide to come to Canada he can be assured of audiences in the thousands who support his policies.

What is the record of the man? Coming from a good, progressive United States family, a Liberal capitalist, he was editor of Wallace's Farmer, serving the farmers of the middle west. As secretary for agriculture in the United States, Wallace was able promptly to bring order out of the chaos of farm misery. He effected a masterpiece of planning for the common man.

As secretary of commerce, he faced a greater task, giving effect to his belief that the greatest social objective which confronts mankind, is to lift the level of substandard peoples up to ours, as the pathway to peace. As vice-president of the United States he was frequently referred to by the late President Roosevelt as "commonsense Henry". This latest phase in his courageous career is no break with the past. He is continuing his fight for the positive constructive view of society, both at home and abroad. We all know he was welcomed in Britain and endorsed by many members of the British House of Commons. We all know of the reception he received in Sweden and France and of the reception he is receiving at the present time throughout the western United States.

I notice that in the Ottawa Journal recently our own Prime Minister made some criticism apparently of Mr. Wallace speaking abroad. In the Ottawa Journal of April 26 the Prime Minister is reported as saying that he thought it is a most astonishing thing for the former vice-president of the United States to go to Britain, and that an unfortunate example had been set. In reply to that, I just wish to point out to our Prime Minister that we are members of the united nations, and the first words of the united nations' charter are: "We, the peoples of the united nations", and so on. It is no longer, "we, the governments of a post-war world". It is no longer, "we, the governments of the united nations", or "we, Mr. Prime Minister King," "we, Mr. Attlee", "we, Mr. Truman", or "we, Mr. Stalin", but "we, the peoples of the united nations". On that basis, Henry Wallace was fully justified in making his great bid against policies that will lead us to war.

All I am asking, Mr. Speaker, is a fair approach to this situation. I cannot do better than quote from a speech made to the Canadian club on June 20, 1945, by Mr. Dana Wilgress, at that time ambassador to the U.S.S.R. I shall quote from a copy of the manuscript he used on that day. Mr. Wilgress speaks with twenty-nine years' experience in private business, as a trade commissioner and as an ambassador to that great country. I shall quote only a sentence or two, because my time is rapidly slipping by. I suggest that hon. members secure a copy of that speech and read it. It is one of the best balanced presentations of the subject I have read to date. Mr. Wilgress had this to say:

> It is the duty, therefore, of all British countries to try to understand the Soviet Union and to promote good relations with that country.

In conclusion, he had this to say:

> I repeat, it is the duty of each and every Canadian to try and learn as much as possible about the Soviet Union.

I wish I could have dissertated at length on some aspects of this question, but I wish to present my concrete proposals. Now is the time of decision as to whether we are to go forward with new policies based on new ideas, or whether we are to accept the Victorian policy of orthodox ideas and trade as outlined by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) who preceded me. Now we are to decide as to whether the surpluses of the North American continent are to be invested in assisting other and low-standard nations, or whether we are to permit ourselves to be driven to economic isolation and to economic nationalism. It is a question, in my opinion, and in the opinion of many Canadians, of trading our way to peace and making preparation for that now, or of economic nationalism leading to war.

I submit the following programme as at least a signpost to peace. I do not underestimate the difficulties, but I think we must have the will and the purpose if we are to overcome the present tendencies in some parts of the world. Canada should take a very strong stand at the united nations on adherence to the principles of collective security. We should desert the policy of collective security de luxe which existed in former days.

In the near future, President Truman will visit Canada. He will be welcomed by all shades of opinion in this dominion, whether we agree with his policies or not, because he is the head of a great country, a great neighbour of ours. I would suggest that it would be a good gesture—and it is surprising what gestures can do at times in an unsatisfactory climate—for this government to send an invitation to Mr. Stalin to visit Canada. I do not know whether he would come or not, but at least it would be a gesture, and would show our friendliness. This government should initiate trade discussions—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. HERRIDGE: May I have two or three minutes to finish?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house, the hon. member may continue for a few minutes.

Mr. HERRIDGE: This government should initiate trade discussions with the U.S.S.R. immediately. Other people are taking an active part in that respect and I think we must. This government should immediately commence trade discussions with the U.S.S.R. because, if we sell them goods, it will mean jobs. I know it is a complex and complicated situation, but it is essential for us to explore every field in that respect.

This government should undertake the planning and development of the Canadian north to develop friendly relations with the U.S.S.R. The government should also commence a long-term treaty of friendship with that country. I shall not outline a programme such as that, but I do think the programme is an essential if this budget and more particularly future budgets of the house, of the provincial legislatures and of the Canadian people are to be satisfactory in the days to come. The programme which I have enunciated to the house, Mr. Speaker, has the support of hundreds of thousands of people—make no mistake about that—in many walks of life, business, farming and working people. If action is taken along these lines; public and private investment are channelled first into social security measures at home and large-scale development of our natural resources and public services and low interest and long term trading credits abroad are instituted, budgets of this parliament are more likely to be satisfactory in the future.

The point I wish to make before concluding is that in this modern industrial world our surpluses must go first into social security, development of public services at home, and to the lifting of levels of the substandard people abroad. If we are not willing to do that, economic nationalism is inevitable, and, with that, future war. But the achievement of these objectives is not possible as a result of government action alone. In conclusion, I wish to quote from Prime Minister Attlee's speech on the second anniversary of V-E day in London. This is what he said:

> We shall never get a lasting peace if it depends only upon agreements between governments. We shall only get it by agreement between peoples and it must not be a passive agreement, but an acute constructive promotion of peace. I want to see a relationship growing up between the peoples of all countries towards the united nations such as we have in our own country between the people and parliament.

I just wish to say this in conclusion: The muffled drums of discontent with present policies at home and abroad are beginning to roll in this country, and I am certain that, if this government does not change direction, those muffled drums will soon be sounding a tattoo, a call to action in support of policies that will change the social and economic climate of our times and lift the hearts of men above the fears and suspicions which envelop us today.

Mr. MAX CAMPBELL (The Battlefords): The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) brought down his budget on April 29. First of all, I wish to congratulate him on the clear, concise manner in which he presented it and on the large amount of information that it contained. There were some statements in the speech that possibly have not received the consideration that they should have received in the house, and my comments this afternoon are to be along the lines of discussing these particular statements.

The first one is that Canada is enjoying a degree of prosperity never exceeded in living memory. I think we can all agree that we are living in that high degree of prosperity, at least a great many of us; but I am worried as to what the future holds regarding that prosperity, and as I go on I shall explain what I mean. The minister did not tell us directly, but he did tell us in a roundabout way that this prosperity is due to the last war. It was caused by the war; I do not think there is any doubt about that, as I believe the minister will agree. The minister also gave a warning when he said that we cannot afford to be complacent; and later he said at page 2545:

> Any such forecast in these uncertain and abnormal times is subject to a wide margin of possible error and to many qualifications. In particular, we must expect that the figure will be less than that I have mentioned—

With that part I am not concerned.

> —if a substantial recession should occur in the United States later this year.

There is a warning there that has not been noted to any great extent in the speeches that have been made in the house so far in this debate. If a recession does take place in the United States it will most certainly be reflected in our Canadian economy.

If anything, the minister's speech was too optimistic. He should have put more emphasis on this warning. I picked up the Christian Science Monitor of Thursday, May 15, 1947, and I saw the following:

> Nation heading for "bust," former New Deal aides caution
> America's economy is heading towards a "bust" and something should be done about it quickly. That is the conclusion of an eleven-man committee on economic stability, headed by Chester W. Bowles, which made a fifteen thousand word report today, containing a nine-plank emergency programme, to Americans for democratic action. The committee declares that ominous signs of recession are increasing, asserts that never so far in history has the nation staved off an economic recession when conditions have got out of hand, but adds hopefully that the tools are available to prevent a prospective slump.

Then it details a series of drastic measures and so on. Further, it says:

> The committee urges President Truman to name at once a price-adjustment board under "an outstanding business leader" to guide the downward course of prices from their present "fantastically high levels."

It gives a list of the members of the Bowles committee. These men were probably all concerned with the planning of prices during the war. Then it goes on:

> The warnings and recommendations from this New Deal voice of the recent past came as stock-market prices were sliding to a new low for 1947 on Wall street, and as repeated reports from Russia declared the Kremlin was basing its policies on an expected American slump.

Then further on:

Sharp stock-market decline reflects pessimism. Physical volume of retail sales are 8 per cent below a year ago. Large inventories are now "highly vulnerable" to price declines. Plant and equipment expenditures are tapering off—

And so on. Then it goes on:

We must face up frankly to the fact that never before in our history have we succeeded in staving off a break-down in our economy when conditions have got out of hand. Doubts must be dispelled. The government should announce its firm intention to stave off such a recession and to underwrite a high level of prosperity.

A few days ago I picked up another magazine, Collier's, of March 29, 1947, and I found an article headed "Let's Talk Business," by Beardsley Ruml. I quote:

Frankly I see no objection to discussing in public the possibility, even the probability of a falling of business activity and of employment in the coming year. I know that many leaders in business and government are against such talk, that they would like to treat the subject as a skeleton in the closet, with the door shut and locked.

That is exactly the attitude which a great many members here take when those of us in this group discuss these matters.

The conclusion for 1947, therefore, writes itself. The unusual forces that were responsible for the high level of demand and of employment in 1946 have been weakened. No sufficient replacement forces are in sight and consequently we must anticipate a growing recession of business activity.

The United States government have thrown almost all controls out of the window and have left private enterprise to regulate itself. It has no efficient way of doing this; when prices start falling there is no telling where they will stop, and this may result in a panic and possibly develop into a major depression.

Our economy and that of the United States are kept operating by capitalists reinvesting their profits. Just as soon as they stop doing that, the trouble starts. Our whole economy depends on whether profits are held or spent, which seems to me to be a foolish way of conducting our national business. Big business has been putting great pressure on this government to remove controls, and this government has weakly given way, with the result that prices have risen so high for many things that consumers are turning away and leaving them on the shelves.

Investment capital is becoming uneasy. For example, Housing Enterprises Limited have cancelled the 1947 housing programme. They realize that houses being built and sold at present prices can never be paid for by the ordinary working man. Once prices start to fall, factories and businesses generally are going to cut their staffs, and soon we shall have unemployment, which may affect a large percentage of our population. I am worried about this situation because we are not ready for a recession. No plans whatever have been made to meet one, and I am anxious to see a conference called between the dominion and the provinces so that plans can be prepared to cushion any depression that might come.

We are living in a world which is desperately anxious to have the leaders of the nations find a solution of many perplexing problems which face the world today. People want nothing so much as peace and an opportunity to live quietly by their own firesides, with some hope of security and a chance to live. It is more than two years since the collapse of Germany, and we have not even begun to make any headway toward the solution of the many vexatious world problems.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and this government, together with the provincial governments, can, if they only will, give some real leadership in the matter of dominion-provincial relations, and I am sure that is what the public of Canada want. They want unity in a time like this. What will happen to hundreds of thousands of our people if we should go into another recession or depression without having decided who is to be responsible for such important matters as unemployment and other problems?

Surely the political leaders of today can forget their differences and get around the table and discuss and decide upon the allocation of jurisdiction and responsibility for such matters as unemployment, health, national marketing, a labour code. the social security measures that we all want, and a programme of public works to act as a cushion against this depression that might come.

In all sincerity, I would ask the Prime Minister to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference, and with the same sincerity I would also appeal to the provincial premiers. They have a golden opportunity to give leadership here in Canada, not only to Canada but to the world. How can we expect world leaders to work together if our own leaders cannot work together? Bury the hatchet; forget any prejudices you might have, forget past differences and think for once of the people of Canada. Canadians who have the best interests of the country at heart want unity, because in unity there is strength. Canada is today calling on her statesmen for leadership, and will not tolerate for long any leader who, for political or any other reasons, refuses to cooperate for the good of the country. The report of the Rowell-Sirois commission on dominion-provincial relations, in its recommendations had this to say at page 275:

While the commission believes that new governmental machinery should be kept at a minimum, it nevertheless considers that special provision should be made to facilitate cooperation between the dominion and the provinces. In an earlier day, when the functions of government were relatively few and administrative organization relatively simple, it may have been possible for dominion and provincial governments to operate largely in watertight compartments. But with the great expansion of governmental functions, and the growing complexity of administration, it is no longer possible to do this without serious loss of efficiency and economy in government. Cooperation between the autonomous governments of the federal system has today become imperative. The commission recommends as the principal means to this end that dominion-provincial conferences, which have hitherto met at infrequent intervals, should now be regularized, and provision made for frequent meetings, say every year. It urges further that the conference should be provided with an adequate and permanent secretariat for the purpose of serving the conference directly and of facilitating cooperation between the dominion and the provinces in general.

I now wish to comment on another part of the finance minister's speech, in which he says, as reported at page 2554 of Hansard:

The exemption levels established last year are high enough to exempt completely from tax more than half the people earning incomes in Canada.

Again on page 2543, he makes the statement to which I have already referred:

Today we see a Canada enjoying a degree of prosperity never exceeded in living memory.

I think it is a sad commentary on our economic system that in a time of Canada's greatest prosperity more than half of our people earning incomes get less than $750 if single or $1,500 if married; and that 96.4 per cent of our farmers are getting less than $1,500 a year. The question that I should like to ask the house is whether a million or so of the Canadian people must always remain poor, when in a time of such great prosperity they are having as low a standard of living as the minister's speech shows.

Mention has been made of the United States many times and reference has been made to the high standard of living there. It is claimed that the United States has the highest standard of living in the world. I believe that for a great many of the people in the United States that is true. I have another magazine here, Magazine Digest of May, 1945, and in it there is an article by Senator Claude Pepper, in which he says:

During the past year, at least ten million workers in this country received an average of less than $1,300 a year. This is considerably less than 65 cents an hour straight time on a 40-hour week, 50-weeks-a-year basis. And that figure—ten million workers—doesn't include those in agriculture, the professions, or government or domestic service.

Even with an income of $1,300 a year—and many receive less than that—these families are unable to maintain life on a fair standard, in terms of today's prices. War labour board investigators find that an average family of four people should have a minimum income of $1,454.72 a year. That works out to 73 cents an hour. This is the standard, set for relief workers by WPA in 1935, given in terms of today's costs.

Then he goes on and finishes up by saying:

The much-talked of "workers' prosperity" obviously has not been felt by these ten million workers and their families.

This is in a country which boasts, as I have said, of having the highest standard of living in the world. Surely this article, together with the statement of the Minister of Finance, is a tragic admission of the failure of what we call the capitalistic system or what some people call private enterprise.

Coming back to the statement of the Minister of Finance that Canada is enjoying a degree of prosperity never exceeded in living memory, I said at the beginning of my remarks that we should stop and take a good look at present-day conditions and ask ourselves what we can expect in the future. I do not think anybody will deny that our prosperity—prosperity for fifty per cent of the population—is due to the war and conditions which have arisen out of the war. Billions of dollars were pumped into circulation during the war, and since the war Canada has been lending and giving to Great Britain and other countries close to $2 billion with which to buy the products of farms and factories. No doubt we are experiencing the greatest boom in all our history. What I want to know is: How long will it last? That is the major problem we in this House of Commons must face. Shall we hold our position? Are we going forward to new levels where all our people have a high standard of living? Or shall we slide back into another depression?

The war has been over for more than two years and we have been in the process of unwinding our war machine and our war economy. I was very much interested in a book I ran across the other day, which was written by Stuart Chase and entitled, "For This We Fought". This is Stuart Chase's latest book and in it he tells the story of the veterans in the United States. I should like to say right here that we in Canada have provided for our veterans possibly better than has the United States, but still we shall probably find that the condition which applies in the United States applies here as far as a great many of our veterans are concerned. Chapter 1 of this book is entitled, "Men in New Suits"; chapter 2, "Service Centre"; chapter 3, "What the Veterans Want"; chapter 4, "What the People Want"; chapter 5, "The Five Year Miracle". In that chapter Stuart Chase tells of the wonderful production which was achieved in the United States and of the building up of the tremendous army which was built up there. Then he goes on to chapter 6, entitled "Let Down", which I wish to comment on. That tells of the let down of the veteran in the United States. Stuart Chase has this to say at page 57 of the book, "For This We Fought":

To unwind a total war economy is, of course, as much of a planned operation as to wind it up. American planning was good enough to build an army of 160,000 men to 10,000,000, practically overnight, while doubling gross national product. But nobody in power wanted very much to be responsible for unwinding—with the exception perhaps of Mr. Bowles. President Truman had a programme, but he was not expert in pushing it, while congress treated it with disdain. The national association of manufacturers demanded the removal of all price controls.

Pretty much the same story that we have seen here in Canada.

The New York Times led a powerful press campaign to turn the whole economy over to the unfettered forces of free competition.

That was what they did, and now they are paying for it. But here is something I am sure we do not have in Canada:

The Sentinels were organized by business men in Detroit, pledged not only to end all war controls—

And listen to this.

—but to repeal all social legislation since 1933.

I do not need to comment on that.

The mood of Civvy Street was to refuse responsibility for the changes which history had forced upon the country. Let nature take her course, and let us organize to get ours—this seemed to be the general idea. As I write, two million organized workers have been on strike or threatening to strike. Westbrook Pegler can hardly keep up with them. Many angry people would like to make strikes illegal. President Truman's threat to draft workers when they strike against the government has evoked both applause and bitter resentment. Yet millions of fellow citizens cannot be moral delinquents. There must be a human cause for this outbreak of strikes.

Of course there is a cause.

To discern the causes one needs to look coolly at the situation and keep his temper, but that is not easy, especially if one is emotionally involved in the outcome. It is easier to think that some stubborn, greedy and unreasonable persons on the other side are purposely thwarting us. Workers see managers of great corporations, bloated with war profits, standing in the way of their just rights. Managers see "communists" and "foreign agitators" standing in their way. Editors see wicked bureaucrats encouraging wicked labour leaders.

All these pictures are askew. Certainly there are wilful egotists in the labour movement, as elsewhere in the community. There are some pretty mean chaps running corporations here and there. The strike crisis in 1946, however, is the product of the rank and file—far too many of them to be written off as undesirables. Look at the telephone girls, or the locomotive engineers. If they are wicked and greedy, so are we all.

Then he asks this question:

What is troubling the workers? Chiefly fear for their security. They have vivid memories of the depression. "Am I going to lose my job again?" they wonder . . . "If the shutdown comes, can I stay in this town, or must I move again? Where do I find a house if I do move? What is going to happen to the kids?"

I could read the whole book, and I am sure all hon. members would be interested.

I should like to point out that business cycles and price levels in Canada have followed pretty closely those of the United States. In order to give the house an idea of how those cycles have operated in the past, I am going to make use of a chart which is to be found at page 455 of the book, "Economic Behaviour." This chart traces the booms and depressions that have taken place in the United States for the last 150 years, and in order to give hon. members a picture of how these price levels have varied during that time, I have had the chart enlarged. The line running through the middle represents normal prices, and of course the lines above and below represent prices during the booms and depressions. In that period of 150 years there have been thirty-one booms and twenty-six depressions. The first sheet shows the price levels for the years 1790 to 1863. If the minister is interested in this chart I will send it over to him when I have finished with it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I never could read graphs.

Mr. CAMPBELL: This gives a pretty good idea of how price levels have been going up and down. Sometimes they remain normal for a year or two, but not for very long at a time. I ask, how can business men or farmers or fishermen have security under a system where the price levels rise and fall to that extent?

The second page of the chart gives the price levels from 1864 to 1937, and it will be noticed that prices remained down for a ten-year period beginning in the thirties. I need not take up more time with this; though if I had time and had been able to find the material I should like to have made an analysis of just what causes these depressions. During the lifetime of many hon. members we have had two major depressions in Canada, which were relieved by war; and the question we must ask ourselves is, do we need to have a war to take us out of the next depression which, according to many economists, may come within a very short time? In this sort of economy I ask, where does the little man come in, the man who works hard and saves his money with the idea of going into business or perhaps buying a little farm? Probably he will be forty or fifty years old before he can accumulate enough capital for his purpose, and if he should decide to start in business during one of these boom periods it will be just too bad for him, because he will most certainly go bankrupt. Just picture for a moment the misery and desolation of the man who has a family, who loses everything and has to start all over again at the age of fifty. Look at the experience of veterans of the first war who went into business or who bought farms, machinery and stock at inflated prices. They struggled on for twenty years, and many of them still owe large sums of money. Think of the many letters members of this house receive from people who are past their best working years, and who now find it almost impossible to get work. Apparently the only thing this government can do is to give them jobs around these parliament buildings. Only last winter one of these old men between sixty-five and seventy died up here with a snow shovel in his hands.

Then I went to the "Canada Year Book" to ascertain how many registered failures we have had in Canada. I found that from 1923 to 1941 inclusive there had been 34,555 commercial failures in Canada, and this includes only those who went into bankruptcy; it does not take into consideration those who quietly folded up and faded away. In this book from which I obtained the chart, Stuart Chase stated that in the United States 100 great corporations got eighty per cent of all war contracts, and that upwards of 500,000 small business men went out of business in that country during the last war. Part of Canada is in a depression right now. We have heard most of the members from the maritimes tell of the need for new industries there. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has pleaded for his miners in Nova Scotia, where a large proportion of the people depend for their livelihood upon one company. The Dominion Steel and Coal Company has gobbled up a large part of the natural resources of the maritimes and cannot or will not spend the money needed to bring the coal mining machinery up to date. Think of the worker worrying about how long his job will last. Possibly he has bought a house on the instalment plan and remembers that during the previous depression his father or his buddy lost his home.

Look at the insurance figures. Over eighty per cent of Canadian policy-holders lost their insurance during the thirties. One of the worst indictments of the present system is the report of the insurance companies given many times in the house as to what happens to 100 average young men by the time they reach the retirement age of sixty-five years. Statistics show that one will be wealthy; four will be well to do and able to enjoy comfort and recreation; five will be working for a living, with no prospects for relief from drudgery; thirty-five will have died, in many instances leaving families enduring hardships, and fifty-five will be dependent upon friends, relatives or charity.

Mr. Speaker, I do not like this capitalistic system, but I do say to the house that it is the system I do not like, and that I have no personal animosity whatsoever toward capitalists. I have known many wealthy men and, as a rule, they are pretty fine fellows. They average out about the same as any other group in the community. But what I do object to is the system which gives only half of the people at a time like this a decent standard of living. A system of that kind is not good enough. If it were possible for everyone to make profits and to get along under a profits system, I would be for it. But under this system there is no doubt that the multitude must work for a pittance in order to make profits for the few.

May I say one more word, because I have only a few moments left in which to speak. The system under which we now operate has had the effect of driving our young men from the farming communities to the cities. After spending some time in this section of Canada and having had an opportunity to see the type of work factory workers do, I have advised young men in my home community to stay on their farms, and not to come to the cities looking for cushy jobs, because such jobs are seldom found. The position of a man who must stand at a machine all day, and perhaps perform only one motion, and who must be at his work on the dot at a certain time each morning does not compare favourably with that of the boy on the farm; and for that reason I have advised them not to leave their farms.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT

PENSION RIGHTS—BREAK IN SERVICE FROM CERTAIN CAUSES

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable feeling and a consciousness of the deep significance of this measure that I rise to move the second reading of Bill No. 24. I am very happy to have associated with me as the seconder of this motion my hon. friend the member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson); I trust that this association across the floor will be evidence of the non-partisan nature of this bill and of our concern that it be treated as in the interests of the railroad workers of Canada.

In the United Kingdom there is an interesting practice whereby members of parliament who wish to be associated in support of a measure in addition to the mover and seconder are permitted to attach their names to legislation presented to the House of Commons. If that practice were followed in this parliament the list of sponsors supporting this measure would, I am sure, be a lengthy one. In addition to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River on the government side there would be, I know, all the members from the Greater Winnipeg area, also the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) and, indeed, government supporters from all railway centres in Canada. Further, on this side of the house there would be a long list of supporters of this measure. To begin with, I would mention the hon. members for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and Calgary East (Mr. Harkness). To my left I would mention the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). I see already certain members looking to me and expressing the hope that I will include them, and I am very happy to include the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). In fact, this list of individual names, Mr. Speaker, is not to be taken as restricting the generality of the foregoing, and that applies particularly to members of my own group. To be fair, I ought to list all the C.C.F. members, but I will mention particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny), the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe), the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight), the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton), the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay), the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

There is one other name that, I feel sure, would have been found amongst the supporters of this measure, namely that of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I say that because many years ago he was interested in a situation similar to the one the recurrence of which this bill seeks to prevent. In the days when the Prime Minister was in opposition back in 1919, he led a fight for the restoration of pension rights that had been lost in the year 1910, and I say to his credit that one of his first achievements after he succeeded in forming a government in the early twenties was the restoration of those rights. So I know of his interest in the matter that is now before the house.

There is, as hon. members know, wide support for this measure across the country. I have under my hand a sheaf of letters which I personally have received from correspondents in eight provinces of this country, all except the province of Prince Edward Island, and I have been told by many other members that they, too, have received numerous letters asking them to support Bill No. 24.

The purpose of the bill is to protect the pension rights of railroad workers against loss due to absences of various kinds, including loss when out on strike, and it grows out of the unfortunate experience of 1910 which I have already mentioned, and of 1919 to which I have made frequent reference in this house.

Section 122(1)(c) of the Railway Act gives to railway boards of directors authority to establish retirement or pension plans. This bill would add to the appropriate paragraph the following words:

> Provided that in the administration of any railway retirement or pension plan, leave of absence, suspension, dismissal followed by reinstatement, a temporary lay-off on account of reduction of staff, or absence due to an industrial dispute, strike or lock-out, shall not disqualify any railway employee from any retirement or pension rights or benefits to which he would otherwise be entitled.

In other words, the purpose of this amendment is to make it perfectly clear that the pension rights of railway employees, provided that such other conditions as are laid down in railway pension plans are met, cannot be lost or abrogated because of a break in service for any of the reasons indicated in the proviso which I have just read. I am sorry to have discovered, on consulting my legal friends, that it does not seem to be possible by legislation to correct the injustice of 1919. I refer to the pension rights that were lost both in that year and in 1918 by Canadian Pacific employees who were out on strike at that time. The purpose of this amendment has to do with the future—from this day forward. Its purpose is to prevent the recurrence of such an injustice. That is the reason I am asking the House of Commons to add this amendment to section 122(1)(c) of the Railway Act.

As hon. members know, I have spoken a good many times on behalf of Canadian Pacific employees who lost their pension rights because of the strikes of 1918 and 1919, and I shall continue to press their case as thoroughly as I can in whatever way it seems possible to try to secure justice for them. But the bill before us does not relate to these men. As I have already said, it has to do with the future, from this day forward.

The situation today is vastly different from what it was in 1919. To begin with, at that time in many cases pension plans were on a non-contributory basis. Rightly or wrongly—I think wrongly—that argument is advanced in discussing the 1919 case. It no longer is an argument so far as the present or the future is concerned. All railway pension plans are now on a contributory basis. I am sure that those who agree with me that something should yet be done for the 1919 men will have no hesitation in saying that, now that pension plans are on a contributory basis, the rights of railway employees under these benefits should most definitely be protected.

In addition to the change in the structure of the pension plans, one might add that opinions have moved a great deal forward since the 1919 strike. In those days it was necessary for the present Prime Minister in his book, "Industry and Humanity", to argue in these words:

> If lifelong public service in industry is to receive its fitting reward, years that are denied the opportunity of employment should not be subjected to the humiliation of dependence on charity.

It is no longer necessary to argue these views; theoretically they are now generally accepted. Some of us may not be satisfied with the extent to which they are practised, but the principle is recognized today by industry that employees are entitled to protection in the form of pension rights. So has the view of society as a whole changed considerably. We no longer think of old age benefits, whether it be to people retiring from industry or to our older citizens generally, as a form of charity or hand-out, but rather as a right to which people are entitled. Therefore, because of these changes not only in the structure of pension plans, but changes that have taken place in the attitude of industry and in the thought of our people, I submit that this is a measure the principle of which really has the support of hon. members in all sections of the house.

In terms of another debate which the house has not yet concluded, may I borrow a phrase and say that this bill is, in effect, a bill of rights for the railroad workers of Canada. I am sure many will share my hope that the day will come when there will be a similar bill of rights for all workers in this country, when all pension rights will be protected; but I ask the house not to allow the fact that we have not yet reached that point to tempt members to fail to give that right at least to this section of workers for whom basic provision is already set out in the Railway Act.

I do not wish to speak further; I hope that by listing, as I have, a great many hon. members as joining with me in sponsoring this bill it will put them on record as in support of it and make it unnecessary for too many to speak, so that we can get the bill dealt with tonight. On that basis and on behalf of the railroad workers of Canada, I present to parliament this bill of rights, this bill designed to protect their pension rights and benefits. I take pleasure in resting the case for them in this high court of parliament.

Mr. W. M. BENIDICKSON (Kenora-Rainy River): It gives me a great deal of satisfaction to associate myself with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in seconding this amendment to the Railway Act. I want to thank the hon. member for his willingness to allow me to be associated in such a direct way with this bill.

I was not long a member of the house before it was brought to my attention by my riding that there was a long-standing injustice there resulting from some railway labour difficulties of the period 1918 and 1919. Immediately on looking into the file to see what the situation was, I found that this was a problem which had been before the Department of Labour for a great number of years.

Tribute has been paid tonight not only to many of those in the house who have been taking an interest in correcting an injustice of the past but to those who are sympathetic to the bill in order that there cannot possibly be a recurrence of injustices that have previously taken place. In paying a tribute to hon. members present, I wish also to pay a tribute to my predecessors from the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River, both of whom were railway workers and who, I found on investigation of the file, had for many years been endeavouring to rectify the situation of our fellow townsmen who find themselves today without pensions as a result of what I think is a harsh attitude taken after severance of employment for a few hours in 1918 on the Canadian Pacific railway. Those predecessors were the late Mr. H. B. McKinnon and the Hon. Peter Heenan, who himself at one time was Minister of Labour of the dominion government.

I cannot take credit for the drafting of the bill before the house, much as I appreciate being associated with it. However I am looking forward to this bill being sent to the railway committee of the house which, I think, will ensure that from a legal point of view and from the point of view of principle, it will be given a careful review. By the bill being sent to that committee, opportunity will be given for representations to be made and persons to be heard both from the railways and from the union organizations. It may be possible that there are some technical and legal objections to the amendment as now drafted. If it is not possible to accept the amendments as drafted I feel sure the principle is such a good one that it ought to be carried into the new labour bill that will be presented to the house shortly, and the benefits will then accrue not only to railway workers but to all workers who are under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Labour.

In order that the house may have a little indication of the kind of grievance that we hope will be corrected in the future, I should like to place on record a statement that has been provided me by the International Association of Machinists, lodge No. 28 at Kenora, who report facts of the 1918 strike. As I say, reference has been made to some of our workers who are at least seventy years of age and over and who have no pension rights. In 1918 there was a railway strike at Kenora involving just a few individuals. It lasted for only a few hours. The men were called out by the head man of the local organization whom they respected and who was in a position of authority over them at that time. He represented an organization with whom the Canadian Pacific Railway Company saw fit to negotiate. No one was either paid off or reengaged and there was no real break in service. The company engaged no one else in the place of those who were out, and was put to no expense. The men themselves in a matter of hours found that they had been called out unwisely or without authority of those in higher authority in the lodge outside our town. As soon as they learned of this situation, they immediately went back to work. It is therefore very unjust to say that these people who at that time may have been over the age of forty, which was the top age at which people would be entitled to enter a pension scheme, should have been denied that pension, notwithstanding that some of them had worked as long as fifty years for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at the time of their retirement. I know there are others who wish to contribute to this debate and consequently my remarks tonight must now be concluded in order to give them that opportunity. I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) again for bringing this most important matter before the house, and I hope it will receive not only good discussion tonight but consideration in the committee. I hope that the principle will be kept before the house when the labour bill is presented before the session concludes.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I, too, have had considerable correspondence with respect to the injustice which a number of railroad employees have sustained by reason of the cancellation of pension privileges because of a break in their services. The last one of these letters arriving contains four cases of injustice which, I believe, will rather surprise the house.

The first one is that of a conductor who was out for just two years and was reinstated with full seniority but denied his pension. The second is that of an engineer who had a similar experience, and the third is also the case of an engineer with a similar experience. The fourth case is that of another conductor who had the following unfortunate story to tell.

This man entered the service on June 10, 1907, and was dismissed on April 1, 1931, and reinstated on November 1, 1933. He has record merits 106 to his credit and has three demerits for only a trifling error which he committed because of the tremendous rush of work which was upon him on the particular occasion. This man at the age of sixty-five will have forty-three years' service of a highly meritorious quality with a break of only two and a half years, but he will have no pension.

I believe all members of the house will agree that the men to whom I have referred as being mentioned in this letter have sustained a serious injustice. Labourers ought to be rewarded according to the length and quality of their service. All members will, I believe, agree with that. Retirement pension is part of the labourer's just reward. The faithful labourer's title to his pension is therefore a sacred right that ought to be protected by law.

This Bill No. 24, if it should become law, would, as I understand it, protect the right of the labourer to his pension. I therefore gladly support the bill and refrain from further speech in order to enable some more of the many members who, I know, would like to rise and support it to have the opportunity.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that two minutes is all I need to put before the house my views on this subject. With the general idea underlying the bill I am most heartily in accord, but I have some doubt as to whether the wording of the bill is adequate for the purpose. I have a good deal of familiarity with the circumstances which have given rise to this piece of legislation that is proposed tonight.

Hon. members have given examples of men who had suffered as a result of the unfortunate industrial disturbance of 1919. I am afraid that if I were to undertake to give examples of men who have suffered greatly by reason of that occurrence and the actions of the employer afterwards I would keep the house here until a late hour tonight. I should think that hundreds, yes, many hundreds of real personal friends, very well known to me, are among those whose stories I could tell.

I feel, however, that this legislation, drafted just as it is, may not accomplish what the mover, the seconder and all other sponsors have in mind. I believe it ought to go to a committee. Whether it gets second reading before going there or whether it should go to the committee for study is, I believe, quite immaterial, but I think it ought to go tonight to some committee, and the question arises whether it should go to the railway committee or to the committee on industrial relations.

I believe that all those who support this legislation will agree that if we are to consider the matter properly it would be wiser to have the bill go to the industrial relations committee, whether after second reading or simply being sent there for study and report. I have had an opportunity of discussing this matter with the two ministers who are concerned, railways and industrial relations respectively, and I am happy to be able to say that there will be no difficulty from the point of view of either of them.

I am not going to take the responsibility of moving that the bill go to a committee; I rather think the Minister of Transport will deal with that himself. But I would suggest that it be the industrial relations committee to which it should go because, despite the fact that it is an amendment to a railway act, the subject matter belongs in that committee naturally; and the same is true of another piece of legislation before the house at the moment. When it comes up I should like to see it go to the industrial relations committee. I believe hon. members will all agree that we should apportion work to committees according to subject matter, rather than according to the name of the act being dealt with. I close with that thought.

I only wish to record that I am strongly in favour of the idea underlying the introduction of the bill. I am the more so by reason of the fact that I was intimately connected with the industrial disputes of the day which caused this trouble, and also by reason of the very large number of friends I have who suffered as a result of that industrial dispute. If anything can be done to prevent that sort of thing in the future, to make sure that other men will not suffer as these old working mates of mine have suffered, I shall certainly be glad that I had a hand in trying to get that legislation on the statute books.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): It has been my good fortune to serve in divisional points and become thoroughly acquainted with railroad men, and I would say that they would compare favourably in character and unselfish service with any group of men, workers clerical or otherwise, in Canada. I have ridden the freights with them and I have learned to know them, at all hours of the day and night. There is, in my opinion, no one better entitled to any benefit of the doubt than railroad men.

In addition to the trouble of 1919, with which I was quite familiar, I would give as my argument in support of this amendment, however it may be fixed up legally to make it of use, the case of a young man, married, a credit to Canada, who during the depression was on the spare board. It was his job, but because he did not work for more than two or three days a month, or perhaps not that, his priority for pension was limited to the time he worked. I do not think it is fair. I could stay here for an hour speaking on this question, but it is far better for me to listen myself out of trouble.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): I rise to support this amendment, not because of any particular knowledge that I claim or that may be acceded to me by my railway friends on railway matters, but I am interested in the principle involved in this legislation and, so far as I am in the habit of committing myself, I am committed to supporting that principle. I rose to say that, whatever committee this bill goes to, and whether it goes to it before or after second reading, I hope that the amendment will be reported back to the house and that this parliament will at this session implement the principle which is at stake in this legislation.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Just before this bill passes, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word or two. I do not intend to go to any great lengths. I have been warned that I should not read all the articles which I hold in my hand lest I talk the bill out, and I do not want anyone to get the idea that I am trying to do that. All members of the Social Credit party are in favour of supporting the principle of this bill. We do think, however, that it should go to the committee, so that we may be absolutely sure that the wording of the bill, when it is presented to the house, will be such that it will convey the ideas that all hon. members hope will be in the bill. We are pleased to have this opportunity of putting ourselves on record.

Mr. C. C. MILLER (Portage la Prairie): I rise also, Mr. Speaker, to support what has been said in favour of this bill to amend the Railway Act. In the riding which I have the honour to represent there are a good many railroad men who have suffered an injustice, just as previous speakers have said has been the case in their ridings. I think any member who has any knowledge at all of railroad men or their problems, should be in favour of an amendment such as this; and I certainly hasten to support the bill before the house.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): I do not want to take much of the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, but I also have in my constituency a good many of these men who will be affected by this bill. I want to assure hon. members that I am whole-heartedly in support of it.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Like some of the other hon. members who have spoken, I also have as constituents a number of men who will be affected by this bill, and I therefore feel that I should at least say a word or two on their behalf. Like the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), I have also ridden on freight trains with some of these gentlemen, but I do not know whether it was under the same circumstances. I was either riding side-door Pullman, blind baggage, or on the rods, and these men were kind enough to allow me to go from here to there when I did not have the price of a ticket. Therefore I feel that I owe them a considerable vote of thanks. However I think this bill has all the merit that the mover and those who supported him stated that it had. For that reason I hope it passes this house unanimously.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up much of the time of the house either. All I wish to say is that, having seen the injustices caused by the old act, which is archaic, I wish to support the principle of this bill.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should say something. I have railway men in my constituency. I have probably been associated with railroad organizations longer than any other member in this House of Commons, but I still believe in the sanctity of contract, and I think this should be said. I am still old-fashioned enough to think that the best agreements are those negotiated between free men. At the moment there is in existence in each of these railroads an exceptionally good pension scheme. Do not forget that this thing cuts both ways. You cannot have one law for the rich and one for the poor. If you are going to deal with one industry, you should deal with all of them. I am speaking just for myself now, and that is why I say there is something in the sanctity of contract. When you establish a pension scheme it must, by the very nature of things, be based upon what I think the insurance people call its actuarial soundness. I am not opposing the principle of pension for those engaged in industry, but I believe it is a question which should be discussed between those who are engaged in the industrial structure and are concerned with it. You can have a lock-out or strike which may completely destroy a pension scheme when you go right across the board; and those things should, in my judgment, be given due consideration.

I think I have fought for pension schemes as long as any member in this house, but I believe that they are better done through contractual relations between employers and employees. The railroad organizations of this country are probably the best organized and have had the longest contractual relations of any in the history of this country. In the main, they have got along well together. I want to say that, in my judgment, they stood second to none during the war period in promoting the interests of industrial stability in the Dominion of Canada.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke of a bill of rights. In the last week we have heard a good deal here about a bill of rights, and I think it is time that somebody spoke about a bill of responsibility. I was not feeling very well the other evening, because I had a bad cold, and was not able to listen to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), but I shudder to think what would have happened if this government had not been courageous in action—and assumed the responsibility that went with it—in connection with a certain incident in this country, as a result of which people were called to their just reward in the penitentiaries.

In these days of, might I say, emotional stress and strain after a great war, it is necessary at least that the members of this house assume some responsibility for the leadership which, in my judgment, is necessary in this difficult period. I know something about the emotional conditions after the last war. I know something, as I think do many hon. gentlemen in this house, about the emotional conditions that exist in certain sections of this country at the moment. Let me say clearly that I am not for one moment opposing the principle of pensions for men and women engaged in industry and commerce and, if necessary—to extend it a bit further—in the agricultural structure of this country. Let me make that quite clear, because I know what emphasis will be put on my remarks of this evening. But I say that we should look at both sides of the matter. It would not be fair to the working men and women if you set in motion a policy of insurance which was actuarially unsound. Let that be clearly understood. Who know best—the parliament of this country or the ranking officials of the labour organizations and the industrialists when they sit down and fashion an instrument predicated on the principles I have enunciated to see to it that the men and women engaged in a particular industry receive a pension when their days of labour come to an end? A great deal of legislation has been passed by this house and by the legislatures of this country in that regard.

But let me say also that I have knowledge of strikes and lock-outs in this country where the industry itself was being destroyed, and I am not blaming either the one side or the other in that regard. There are always two points of view to a dispute. But when you are passing basic legislation, which is to become part of the law of the land, you must be very careful. Some of us have some knowledge of what is necessary in connection with pension schemes of this description. I want to say to my hon. friend and the trade unionists in this house that the whole history of insurance provisions in the many trade union organizations of North America during the last twenty-five years shows many plans that were conceived without full knowledge of the actuarial conditions that should be met in order to see to it that, after many years of payment into such funds, those contributing would receive the pensions to which they were entitled. I have only to refer to the experience of my own organization, which made the same grave error some years ago; and I am sure other hon. members know of other organizations—not only labour organizations, though I am more familiar with those—which have had the same experience.

I emphasize this point, that it is very easy to stand up and say, "Three cheers for the red, white and blue", but I do not think you are doing justice to the men themselves, to the organizations they represent in Canada or to the good sense of this House of Commons unless you take a sound, commonsense point of view in connection with legislation of this description.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I should commend the house for two things this evening. The first is the unanimity of opinion which seems to prevail in regard to at least the principle of this legislation. In that respect may I say immediately that if there is the same unanimity when I have to bring before the house matters concerning my department, I shall be very happy. The other point for which I think I must commend the house is the fact that hon. members have decided to speak so briefly. I refer particularly to the sponsor of the bill (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who generally are inclined to be somewhat long-winded but who, this evening, spoke very much to the point. I am particularly happy that the hon. member for Lethbridge did not see fit to speak on his monetary theories and seek to establish that this change could be brought about in that manner, because if he had I am afraid we would not have reached a decision on this bill this evening.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Why bring it up now, then?

Mr. KNOWLES: I could have spoken on old age pensions.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let me tell the house—

Mr. LOW: Just wasting time yourself.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend need have no worries about the time I may waste, because

I think I can conclude the remarks I have to make before the time allotted to private and public bills has expired. I think the house will agree to one thing, namely, that the purpose of the legislation is something which should receive careful consideration. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke of the fight the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) led many years ago in connection with lost pension rights, and I am sure if the Prime Minister were a private member today he would feel as he felt then. But I do not believe the Prime Minister would have introduced this kind of legislation because, while I have a great deal of sympathy for the railway workers and others who may have lost their pension rights, as my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has just said there are other factors which must be taken into account. That is that if the legislation now sponsored by the hon. gentleman does not meet the situation, or, in fact, endangers or makes the situation of certain railway workers worse, then we should be very careful to avoid disturbing the present position in regard to pension rights. When I speak I can deal only with those who are employed by the Canadian National Railways. I do not know the position in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, though I understand that it is very much the same.

The provisions of this bill are sweeping, not only because they have to do with railway workers but also because, as my hon. friend the sponsor admitted, other workers in other spheres of industrial activity may seek the same sort of legislation. I have no quarrel with that, but I say we must be careful about the manner in which we proceed. So before legislation of this kind is enacted, it is a sound principle to ascertain what the position of the law is and what it has to say in reference to the pension rights of railway workers. If it is found deficient, then let us amend it. If one goes to the source he finds that there are three acts having to do with pension rights of railway workers; and I repeat that I speak only in reference to the Canadian National Railways. First, there is the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railway employees' provident fund, which was established in 1907 pursuant to the act bearing that name, later amended in 1913. Then, there is the Grand Trunk railway superannuation and provident fund, which was established pursuant to an act of 1874, and, finally, there is the Canadian National Railways pension fund. If this legislation were enacted without similar changes being made in the legislation governing those funds which, as the Minister of Labour said, have been found actuarially sound, and which have been approved by the Department of National Revenue, then I do not think such legislation would have much effect. Let me quote rule 16 of the Canadian National Railways pension rules, which covers practically everything my hon. friend asks. That rule reads:

16. The following need not necessarily be considered by the pension committee as a break of continuous employment or continuity of service:

(1) Absence on leave.

(2) Temporary lay off on account of reduction of forces.

(3) Suspension or discharge if followed by reinstatement or reemployment within one year with the approval of the head of the department.

In reaching a conclusion as to whether there has been a break in continuity of service the fact of the employee entering other employment during such absence, whether on leave or from suspension, discharge, or lay off, may be considered by the pension committee.

So with but one exception, that having to do with strikes or lock-outs, the pension plan covered by rule 16 of the Canadian National Railways fund is practically the same as the amendment sought by my hon. friend. Before enacting legislation such as this, therefore, one should be very careful that a plan which has been built up over the years is not upset.

For reasons I shall give in a moment I do not believe this bill should be given second reading, but I do think it should be studied in principle. I believe the principle my hon. friend has enunciated should be given careful consideration, and I make that statement because of the words which are appended at the end of the proviso. Perhaps I should read the whole proviso, which is as follows:

Provided that in the administration of any railway retirement or pension plan, leave of absence, suspension, dismissal followed by reinstatement, a temporary lay-off on account of reduction of staff, or absence due to an industrial dispute, strike or lockout, shall not disqualify any railway employee from any retirement or pension rights or benefits to which he would otherwise be entitled.

That, to my mind, notwithstanding what has been said by the hon. member, immediately raises doubt as to the retroactivity. And I agree fully with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) that there is a doubt that this legislation may not meet the situation my hon. friend has in mind. He did say that he had not in mind retroactivity, but that he had in mind the future only. The fact that he says that does not decide the issue, because a definite meaning is expressed in the words used, which I have just read, namely, "to which he would otherwise be entitled." There is a doubt, and those words might indicate that when an employee is reinstated he would be permitted to make retroactive payments into the fund. If this were allowed, then the legislation might well be unconstitutional. Then, it might well become a money bill and is invalid.

Furthermore, I mentioned two pension plans other than that of the Canadian National Railways. I mentioned that of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways. Those are railways owned by the government of Canada, and the employees of those railways are employees of His Majesty. If that be so, that raises an additional doubt which, added to the doubt as to retroactivity, might immediately make the legislation such that we would have to vote sums of money concerning the men who would be reinstated or who would be taken on after suspension, and so on, as set out in the legislation my hon. friend sponsors. And if that is so, there is great doubt about the validity of the measure.

Then, again, there is the additional point about the schemes. I am informed by those who are familiar with the schemes that Bill No. 24 would purport to take away the exercise of certain discretion by the pension board. The pension board of the Canadian National Railways is composed of seven men, three of whom represent labour and four of whom are appointed by the railway company. There are cases where employees have been guilty of offences which would not entitle them upon reinstatement to their service prior to dismissal, but it would be extremely unfair to grant a man who has been dismissed for cause in all cases a greater right than would be granted to an employee who resigns, without any black marks against him, and who would be considered a new employee upon reemployment.

There were a number of other points which struck me as I read this legislation. However I understand my hon. friend wishes to say a word or two in reply, and I shall not speak longer at this time. Let me say this, however, in conclusion, that, so far as the principle of the bill is concerned, in my view it should receive further consideration by a committee of the house.

So far as the legislation itself is concerned, I think there is doubt as to its constitutionality, as to its validity and as to its retroactiveness. Those are points which I think should be settled before second reading of the bill is given by the house. I therefore believe that the principle of the bill should be studied by a committee before whom witnesses, either from the railway or from the brotherhoods, would be called, and from those who have set up and established pension plans.

Since the hon. member placed the bill on the order paper, I have given some thought as to which committee it should be referred to, and if it is the will of the house my suggestion would be that it go to the industrial relations committee which would be more suitable than the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I therefore move:

That this bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for public and private bills having expired, the house will now revert to the business in hand before six o'clock.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. ROLAND BEAUDRY (St. James): Mr. Speaker, may I make some brief comments concerning the budget. If one had any doubts about the merits of the budget now under consideration these would have been dispelled long ago by the type of criticism which has been directed toward it by the various parties of the opposition.

This criticism has added little to the hope, wish or thought, in any quarter, that the country might find a sounder financial document to guide us through the coming year. The budget itself, however, and the minister's introductory speech do give the majority in this house substantial cause to hope and trust that under this government Canadians will be gradually relieved of their tax burden.

I heard with particular interest the minister's reference to the disturbing migratory movement toward the south; I refer to the introductory part of his budget speech, in which he recognized that a good many Canadians find, each year, that the pastures are greener elsewhere, and in which he expressed the hope that the present budget will tend to make our own pastures more verdant. I concur in his recognition of the fact, and his expressed hope; and I fervently pray that at some near date he may be able to offer Canadians a perspective other than that of taxes, even decreased taxes, almost from birth to death—not to mention the post mortem cess on what may have been saved from the tax collector.

Far be it from me to berate this government for this state of our affairs. We gathered a lot of impetus in our disregard for a man's right to retain his earnings, during the period 1914-1921—and habit is a hard taskmaster. However we seem to have regained a more proper outlook on the relationship between expenditure and normal revenue; and this, I am sure, should incite Canadians to remain in this country.

May I suggest to the minister that two more strokes of his brush might help to give our pastures a greener tint. One affects almost exclusively the part of Canada for which I sit in this house. I would submit to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that his purpose would be achieved in part if he would bend some of his efforts toward obtaining for Canadians of the French language more adequate representation in what constitutes the greener pastures of the civil service—the higher brackets financially and executively. To him and the other members of the cabinet I would point out that the assurance of better things to come in that field would have undoubted influence over my compatriots of the French language in keeping them at home.

The other suggestion is with respect to the country at large. May I suggest to the Minister of Finance that in his future taxation plans he might incorporate some means of telling Canadians that they are not born in this country with the taxation millstone forever around their necks, some means of inciting Canadians to remain at home instead of emigrating at the rate of thousands a year, some means of ensuring that, if from the age of puberty to the age of near senility they must pay tribute to him, there may come a time in their lives when they can prepare to meet their Maker without first filing an income tax return.

Concretely, may I suggest to the Minister of Finance that from the age of fifty-five onwards, Canadians be entitled to a decrease in the current rate of income taxation, a decrease based both on their age and on the amount of income they are fortunate enough to have accumulated or to earn?

May I urge that, beginning with the taxation year in which a Canadian citizen has reached the age of fifty-five, he be given an exemption of five per cent of the taxable amount of his income for each year of age he has reached from and over fifty-five, until the age of sixty-one, inclusively, and that from then on the exemption increase by ten per cent for each year of age? In practice this would mean that a man of fifty-eight would pay eighty per cent of the tax which his neighbour of forty would pay on a similar revenue, that a man of sixty-two would pay fifty per cent of the tax which he would have paid had he been ten years younger; and it would also mean that a man of sixty-seven would become free from his duties to the country, income-taxationwise.

There may be some objections pertaining to the amount of taxation a rich man of seventy years of age might evade. But there would be no difficulty, I am sure, in setting a limit to the amount of revenue to which this provision should apply, and perhaps I might suggest that the average Canadian would be well protected and would not be discriminated against if the maximum revenue to which this exemption might be applicable were set at $8,000 a year.

The bureau of statistics sets the normal expectancy of death in Canada at 66·29 years for women and 62·95 years for men. In the light of this, it could hardly be thought that, by such an exemption as I advocate, the country would suffer a considerable loss of revenue. But the minister would do what few ministers of finance in any country have found it possible to do; he would instil in the heart of every Canadian the hope that, at some time, they might thumb their nose at his minions. That, of course, might be enough to prolong the life of every citizen by some years.

We are daily legislating toward achieving some measure of state-controlled financial security for old age. Should we not also legislate for those Canadians who would rather provide for that security themselves, with a greater measure of pride and satisfaction—and more economically to the country?

Pension plans and insurance plans are encouraged by the government and exemptions are given on amounts contributed toward them by the tax payer; yet there is generally a toll on their benefits. Would it not be more logical for these exemptions to remain applicable, and to ensure that, if a beneficiary lives long enough to enjoy the fruit of his savings, he shall do so to the fullest measure possible and not only after a division of spoils with the lord high collector?

Should not Canada grant that a man has carried his full share of the financial burden of the country when he has contributed to the full extent of his financial resources for forty years, and should there not be a tapering off from then on, so that those fortunate few who have escaped the scythe may also avoid the scalpel of our income amputation revenue department?

I believe that the minister has figures indicating that the proportion of citizens in this country with revenue bearing incomes for the treasury is somewhat lower than six per cent in the sixty year old category. I am sure that no one in Canada would begrudge that six per cent a slightly richer old age, least of all the Minister of Finance whose physical appearance would lead one to believe that he himself would enjoy the exemption for quite some time.

There are some few in this house who seem to believe that along with our brand new citizenship certificates should go a brand new treasury certificate, valid for $20 a month for life. The minister has it in his power to grant, with the rights of citizenship, another right, that to a tax-free old age and to a modified taxation in later middle age.

I hope that these will soon go hand in hand. This duality of rights would, I believe, instil in Canadians more faith in their future than the pessimistic prophecies of the apostle of a commonwealth or of a credit which has nothing social about it unless perhaps its promised manifestations are used as tokens for parlour games at social gatherings.

Mr. PERCY C BLACK (Cumberland): I have nothing but good will personally for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) who brought in this budget. I am not sure, however, that he has not taken something that rightfully belongs to Nova Scotia, because we have had able finance ministers from that province, including his predecessor, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), Hon. James Layton Ralston, the Hon. E. N. Rhodes, Hon. W. S. Fielding, and Sir Charles Tupper.

The budget is for the 1947-48 period. It is for the third post-war year. We as Canadians are proud of our achievements during the war and our favoured position in comparison with other countries of the world. It is well that we have a high national income, and we must maintain it in order to meet the cost of government. But it is becoming painfully evident to every housewife in the low and moderate income groups that much of the increased income the minister talks about is swallowed up in the increased cost of articles that go into the family budget.

The ordinary expenses of the government increased $200 million in 1946-47. The budget for the current year shows a further increase in costs of seventeen departments of government, with the supplementary estimates still to be provided for. The government appears to love to tax for its own fast increasing expenditures and also for provincial governments which would like some fields of this taxation for their own purposes.

Many will be pleased that there has been a reduction in the income tax, and it could not be otherwise with war expenditures no longer necessary. Relief goes to those in the higher tax bracket. They have been severely taxed and few will begrudge them the relief this budget brings, but there is no relief for those in the lower and middle brackets. Their indirect taxes are not reduced by a penny. Their direct tax relief is cancelled out by higher costs. Already living costs have increased this calendar year in an amount greater than tax reductions to be enjoyed by half the income taxpayers of Canada. Business, moreover, has been greatly disappointed that there have not been cancellations or reductions in taxation imposed on business during the war. The Halifax Chronicle sized this up in a heading: "Business gets little out of budget—except lecture".

The Minister of Finance reports the national income in the last fiscal year to be $11,100 million. It is a matter of interest to all Canadians to know where this originates. About three-quarters, or $8 billion, is credited to the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The three premiers of the prairie provinces in recent signed statements claimed that the agricultural income for Manitoba last year was $250 million; for Saskatchewan $388 million and, for Alberta, $432 million, or a total of $1,070 million. Nova Scotia is reported by the bureau of statistics as having had $34,700,000. We are told that British Columbia is rolling in wealth and prosperity. Its population increased from 817,861 in the 1941 census to 1,020,000 in 1946, according to the ration book and other returns, and this is, to a considerable extent, a drain on us in eastern Canada. It is already planning on three additional members after the next census, and these will probably be at the expense of Nova Scotia.

It is recognized that the maritime provinces are not sharing in the prosperity of other parts of Canada. Coming from Nova Scotia, I take pride in the development of Canada as a whole, but my first duty is to the maritimes which need all the help they can get, and I appeal to parliament for more than "sympathetic consideration". Nova Scotia has a great history. There would have been no Canada without it. Responsible government started there, as did free schools. Confederation had its beginning in Nova Scotia. We have done our part in peace and war. Nova Scotia has great resources in farms, mines, fish, lumber, industry and tourist attraction. The tourist branch at Ottawa has only thirty on its staff for all Canada, while the film board has over six hundred. Unfortunately most of our production has been in the raw unfinished form, exported to provide the least employment to our home people. We have raised and educated our population and a large portion have gone to build up other parts of Canada. They have been leaders in banking, in industry, in the professions, in education and in statesmanship. Many Nova Scotians now feel that we have too much statesmanship for others and not enough looking after our own interests.

It is recognized that we have not prospered in confederation as have other parts of the country. The government and many of the public men in office at Ottawa seem to take it for granted that this has to be our lot. If we had been told at confederation that we were to be "unprivileged", the "have not" province, the "poor relation", terms we now hear so often, there would have been no confederation, and we would have made our own way as part of the British empire. Although I still believe in Canada, I also earnestly believe that we in Nova Scotia who have contributed so much over the years deserve better treatment within the Canadian nation.

This government and their party have been given support by the people of Nova Scotia rarely equalled in any country, and our people are now more and more convinced that we have had too much politics and we have not had fair treatment. They recognize that we have some disabilities and they must be overcome so that we may share in Canadian prosperity. That many men outside the maritimes are now of this opinion was recently illustrated when the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) came whole-heartedly to the support of our cause. I am pleased that to some extent I was instrumental in inducing him to come to the maritime provinces last summer. This great Canadian geographer, industrialist and parliamentarian, who has criss-crossed and covered Canada many times in his travels, has taken up the cudgels in our behalf. From his wide, embracing store of knowledge of the nation, he proclaims us to be the forgotten part of Canada. I appeal to every public man and businessman, irrespective of their politics, to come to our rescue and to aid us in our plight.

I have heard several other hon. members ask privately "why do we stand for things as they are?" My answer is, too much politics.

I do not like to repeat and enumerate our disabilities and grievances, but continued neglect makes repetition necessary. Hon. members have been told again and again about war contracts. From July 14, 1939, to December 31, 1946, the maritime provinces received $380,500,000, while Quebec had $5,223,600,000 and Ontario $5,436,700,000, a comparison of $10,660,300,000 to our $380,500,000 in the maritimes.

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

In shipbuilding contracts the government now passes us by. When all yards have to be worked to capacity we had some contracts. Now when the government can pick and choose, Halifax and Pictou are not on their list.

The government had many crown companies operating during the war. On page 35, dealing with the budget, the capital assets of the crown companies still operating are listed at $85,755,000. Not one dollar of capital expenditure included in this amount was made in either Nova Scotia or the maritimes. There are also large expenditures, which I shall not refer to in detail, at Chalk river, running to $27 million. The trading company known as the Canadian Commercial Corporation has large contracts for $300,872,575 for all Canada, but only $2,151,351 had application to Nova Scotia. This has to do with price stabilization and export credits.

There never has been and never could be a like opportunity to establish industries in Nova Scotia with peacetime potentialities as during the war and the years since. However, this appears to have been farthest from the thoughts of those entrusted with the spending of the billions of dollars of war moneys.

There were large expenditures for military camps and airfields, but these have all been wrecked and made useless for peacetime industry and development, thus giving rise to the impression that, in their origin, the benefit of contractors was a greater consideration than the future well-being of the people in these localities. Debert, now a wreck, was the scene of approximately a $14 million expenditure. Contractors benefited from $4 million expended at Windsor; Cornwallis, about $10 million; Shelburne, over $4 million; the Exhibition grounds, Halifax, $1 million; Maitland, $3 million; and Point Edward, Cape Breton Island, $3 million; with like expenditures totalling in all more than $50 million there has been practically nothing to assist the permanent building up of our province and the providing of peacetime employment. One peacetime establishment, the naval college, was transferred to Royal Roads in British Columbia. I had an opportunity of visiting Royal Roads and I regret exceedingly that the college was taken from Nova Scotia although it now has a magnificent site.

Although we have heard much about the Canso bridge or causeway, and Premier MacMillan did announce before the last election that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) had approved this construction, nothing has been done except a survey which was made under pressure. The Jacques Cartier bridge at Montreal was built at a capital expenditure of $19 million and five per cent bonds issued. Deficits have accumulated totalling $6,822,000, all guaranteed or paid by the federal government. The St. Lawrence bridge cost $23 million plus deficits, but no such expenditures in Nova Scotia at Canso or Halifax harbour!

The Chignecto canal has been before this house repeatedly, and it has been projected ever since the Acadians first came to Nova Scotia. It is warranted both as a commercial and as a defence undertaking, and it would have been built long years ago except for the fact that our part of Canada has been in the "have not" class.

Central Canada has had $243,752,399.78 expended on canals, and there have been accumulated deficits of $114,130,209.81, or a total of $357,882,609.59. There is an additional expenditure of $275 million projected on the St. Lawrence canal. We in Nova Scotia have a canal, the small St. Peters canal, started in 1854, suspended in 1856, resumed in 1865, finished in 1867—all before confederation; also a small canal for fishing boats in Guysborough. But the Chignecto canal, a construction which would enhance the entire economy of the maritimes, has been put off from the days when the Indians and early settlers used this crossing.

We contributed to the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, but we were never permitted to have it enter Nova Scotia. We also contributed to the Grand Trunk Pacific costing hundreds of millions of dollars, and all we got was the election cry, "Listen to the whistle of the Hong Kong train." The Sydney-Pictou-Moncton railway waits with other Nova Scotia projects for rebuilding. It now runs up and down, in and out and round about, so that at modern railway speed everyone that rides it would be a "humpty dumpty."

There has been the possibility of cheap tidal power plants at Petitcodiac, Chignecto and other places, providing large blocks of still cheaper secondary power, but they have remained only mirages.

The Minas basin ferry service was in operation for more than forty years between Kingsport, Parrsboro and Wolfville. The government of Nova Scotia had the motor ferry boat Kipawo built and operated from 1928 under subsidies. It was required for war purposes, and traffic was then compelled to go 150 miles during the shortage of gasoline and rubber. Our people willingly put up with this during the war, but naturally they expected the service to be restored at its conclusion. However, this boat the Kipawo, was sold in Newfoundland by War Assets Corporation for about its cost price—$26,000—and no boat, among the hundreds built and leased by the government, was made available for the resumption of this service, although local parties had agreed to undertake its operation.

I have received repeated representations from the boards of trade and others, the last being as follows under date of May 3 of this year:

> A report of the Valley board of trade, held in Kentville, Wednesday evening, was given by W. C. Mosher, who stated that efforts are being made to restore the ferry service between Parrsboro, Wolfville and Kingsport, although the railway is not interested in the project, the matter is being taken up.

Money for everything but not for this service, which was a matter of pride to the people of the localities served but now a further proof of decadence. I may say that the $26,000 realized from the sale of this boat will now go into the surplus funds to swell the $352 million reported by the Minister of Finance as a surplus.

I obtained a list from the war expenditures committee of some of the ships acquired by the government during the war, and money or costs did not appear to be a factor. There are sixty-three ships in this list, and I am going to give the costs on some of them:

Ship's name—Length—Name owner	Cost repairs and rents while under R.C.N.	Cost of reconditioning for return to owners or cash settlement
Fifer yacht, 104 feet, Empire Stevedoring Co., Vancouver	$ 29,958 41	$ 17,985 98
Andre Dupre yacht, 125 feet, Marine Industry.....	31,008 21	9,010 73
Rayon D'Or, trawler, 140 feet, Maritime Fisheries, Quebec	41,347 78	103,361 51
H.C. 60 yacht, 97 feet, Eastern Motorship Co., Halifax....	27,213 68	10,049 25
Norsal, fishing vessel, 128 feet, Powell River Co., Vancouver ($15,048.00 per year) Total.....	14,835 02	16,500 00
G.V. 14 gate vessel, 135 feet, Marine Industries.....	52,225 33	24,906 44
H.C.P. yacht, 53 feet, Fulford ($1.00 rental).....	484 57	22,448 52

Reported to war expenditures committee. Sixty-three vessels in all, yachts, tugs, fishing vessels, trawlers, motor launches, gate vessels, motor vessels, et cetera. Some vessels were chartered at $1.00 per year, plus repairs while in operation, overhaul costs before being returned to owners.

Our people are supposed to be pleased when they learn that private owners, in addition to the return of their boats, were awarded costs of repairs in excess of their original value. No ferry boat! No post-war industries for us! Sugar refinery closed! Rolling mills and airplane factories and other plants closed! The plate mill made into scrap! Not so in central Canada.

To show how we fared in Nova Scotia in comparison with central Canada, I am going to quote a few sentences from the proceedings of the committee on war expenditures on May 30, 1946, at page 527:

Mr. Cote, M.P. (Verdun): . . . it is my duty towards the corporation (war assets) and the Department of Reconstruction and Supply to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the people of Verdun and the outskirts of Montreal generally, will derive a great benefit from the setting up of this multiple-tenancy occupancy of that building in Verdun . . . In Verdun there was no industry before . . . Close to forty industries are now operating, not all full time yet, but most of them will be before long, and they will provide employment to around four thousand people . . . I think the members will agree with me . . . that the corporation and the Department of Reconstruction and Supply deserve credit for what has been done there.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before Mr. Berry answers, it seems that it is in the Montreal and Toronto areas where they are to reap the benefit of the application of this policy, where new industries are being established. I was wondering if by some happy circumstance that policy could be extended to our province, more particularly to Amherst, where there are a number of large buildings . . . they have as fine a record in the building of planes as . . . any other place in Canada.

There is the subject of government assistance for our marsh lands in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There was never in the history of this parliament a better case made out for a special project, and it does not need further argument from me.

The government has been pleaded with by the ministers of agriculture of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and others to announce its permanent policy, and to get work under way this year while the weather is favourable. The federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made his budget speech but made no reference to this.

All the members from Nova Scotia have had a recent letter from Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, Minister of Agriculture of Nova Scotia, dated May 6, asking for action. I quote a few sentences from his annual report to the provincial legislature, Department of Agriculture, page 150. I am not quoting from his letter, although I have it here:

Repairs to dykes and aboiteaux on Nova Scotia marsh lands have been carried on for some years past on an emergency basis, pending the approval of a more comprehensive policy providing for a long-term constructive programme that will eventually restore these fertile dyke-lands to their normal productive capacity.

In former times when these marshes were at the peak of production they contributed much wealth to the adjoining and neighbouring upland farms which in most cases were too small in acreage to successfully carry on without the hay, pasture, and grain produced on the dyke-lands. If Nova Scotia is to expand farm production, these marsh lands must be rehabilitated, for it is in these areas that the majority of our productive and potentially productive farms are located . . . Nova Scotia must have more crop land and as these dyke-lands are fertile and productive and when properly drained and protected from tides compare favourably with the best prairie soils, the rehabilitation is simply a matter of conserving an important and necessary natural resource.

Both federal and provincial authorities have now accepted the principle that the rehabilitation of the marsh lands is of national importance and that the undertaking should be organized on a permanent basis.

There is very much more I could say, Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a report called "Fifty Years of Progress on Dominion Experimental Farms". At the front is a picture of the federal Minister of Agriculture, and it is quite proper that it should be there. I was interested in seeing his report on the experimental farm at Nappan in my constituency. I am going to read just a few lines from that, at page 103:

The dyke-land of this farm forms a part of one of the largest tracts of dyke-land on the continent. . . These vast dyke-lands will ever remain a tribute to the work of the French, for it was they who first won them from the tides of Fundy.

I say with a little shame, that no such tribute could be paid to the men who are carrying the responsibility for rehabilitating these lands at the present time. The provincial governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are prepared to do their part. The property owners are prepared to do their part, but it is impossible for them to do so without the assistance of the minister and the government at Ottawa. The minister last year laid down a general policy the undertaking involving quite an expenditure. He has approved repeatedly, but the difficulty is that no action is taken. There is nothing being done, and the people who are interested in farming down there are becoming more and more discouraged.

The operation of the coalfields, a great national industry in Nova Scotia, was under the control of the federal government during the war, but this has been far from satisfactory. The government has paid out large subsidies for the production of coal, for which Nova Scotia should be grateful, but the government's policies have not given good results. Experienced miners were encouraged to enlist and men with no experience were sent to the coalfields throughout the war while heavy income taxes discouraged overtime work. We should be producing 8,000,000 tons of coal a year, worth $50,000,000, but there has been continuous dissatisfaction among the miners, and the industry has been in the worst position in more than twenty years. I want to thank the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) on behalf of all Nova Scotia for his efforts in settling this long-drawn-out and very unnecessary strike.

While I am not taken into consultation very often, I feel that the members from Nova Scotia should forget partisanship and work together. There is much I could say with regard to the subject of dominion-provincial agreements as it applies to Nova Scotia. I set out my views in a radio address on February 18, in which I stated, "From a money standpoint it is now difficult for Nova Scotia to refuse the last offer of subsidy payments and our provincial taxpayers would suffer by a refusal." I am, however, against the trend of centralization and dictation emanating from Ottawa.

I read with interest Premier Macdonald's address before the Halifax junior board of trade and his commendation of the efforts of the Nova Scotia government in the depression years to keep the province solvent. I am especially interested in that because I was a member of the government of Nova Scotia at that time. We were then administering affairs in Nova Scotia with a revenue around $8,000,000, while $22,000,000 is now expended. We needed additional revenue, but we did not impose a provincial income tax in Nova Scotia and it has never been imposed. But what has been the result? When the federal government took over the entire income tax they increased taxation more in Nova Scotia than in any other province—from nothing to the highest level. Other provinces had only the income tax increased that they had already imposed. Nova Scotia got no credit for its thrift or for imposing higher taxes than other provinces on gasoline, car licences and other things. Nova Scotia financed its own requirements and issued its own bonds during the depression years. It met all its obligations and kept all its municipalities solvent. The four western provinces were largely financed by the federal government during the depression period by federal treasury bills as follows:

Total treasury bill debt:

Manitoba	$24,734,451.82
Saskatchewan ..	80,441,852.44
Alberta	26,212,000.00
British Columbia	34,112,249.99
Total	$165,500,554.25

When the federal government entered into separate agreements with the four western provinces, they made settlements of these treasury bills, which were still owing by these provinces, the total being dealt with as follows:

To be cancelled	$55,456,164.06
To be repaid (out of proceeds of natural resources settlement)	15,987,500.00
To be refunded (without interest)	49,729,979.99
To be refunded (with interest over a period of 30 years at 2·58 which liquidates the principal as well)	44,326,910.19

We in the east were not consulted when this settlement was made. The four western provinces are rolling in wealth and national income in comparison with the maritimes, but no comparable treatment is accorded to us. Our people got first information through the boastings of the western premiers in the press.

Nova Scotia met the impact of the depression as best it could, and many municipalities, including Cumberland, never went on relief. The province did not pay for shelter or rent and property holders made heavy contributions, all of which saved the federal government large sums. Nova Scotia still has a funded debt of $25,389,000 of 4½ per cent bonds and $15,185,000 of 5 per cent bonds, making a total of $40,574,000 carried from the depression years. If Nova Scotia had the same consideration as the four western provinces this debt would be settled by:

Cancelling	$13,592,000
Allowance for natural resources Nova Scotia helped pay for	3,918,000
By refunding without interest ...	12,189,000
By having paid off in 30 yearly instalments at 2⅝ per cent interest and principal	10,875,000
	$40,574,000

In previous sessions I have referred to the unfairness of the federal tax on electricity. The tax is on the cost to users of electricity generated by private enterprise and my county of Cumberland pays about $150,000 a year, while Montreal and other places served by government generated electricity and low cost financing escape paying such taxes. Heavy corporation taxes increase our costs on privately generated electric energy, but not on government hydro electricity. The tax is on the cost to users, not on the kilowatts, so that users from the smaller and less efficient plants pay the heavy taxes. Nova Scotia built 218·5 miles of rural electrification last year, subsidized and encouraged its construction in an effort to bring modern conveniences to rural communities; and the federal government makes no contribution, assumes no responsibility, but lays on heavy electric taxes under the guise of war. Nova Scotia has a programme to build 500 miles of rural electrification next year and the following years, and Ottawa will gather in more taxes from us.

I join with the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) in his protest against Ottawa's treatment of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick with respect to the marketing of birch affected by "dieback". This affects hundreds of millions of feet of hardwood in these provinces. I resent the insinuation of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) that lumbermen of the maritime provinces cannot be trusted. We have a well established lands and forests department in Nova Scotia, now presided over by Hon. J. H. MacQuarrie, who stated in Halifax on May 10:

> People at Ottawa do not know what they are doing. Ottawa was to blame for the fact that Nova Scotia lumbermen could not market birch affected by dieback, wood that would be useless in five years or less . . . We have not ceased one iota in our efforts and we will continue our efforts until we do get relief for the people of Nova Scotia. They (Ottawa) do not seem to have the faintest knowledge of the situation.

This is one more proof that Nova Scotia's interests get little consideration at Ottawa today. Surely the requests of the department in Nova Scotia should be accepted.

I have not told the whole story, but private members from all parts of Canada should join forces with the hon. member from Davenport, so that we in Nova Scotia will not be "the forgotten part of Canada."

I do not want hon. members to think, even if we have not had fair treatment and even if we have not prospered as we should, that we have not great resources and great production, shipped away, it is true, mostly in the rough and unrefined form when industry should be based upon it at home. This was well pointed out by the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Stanfield) in his splendid speech in this debate when he said:

> Many Canadians who have never been to the maritimes seem to have the idea that maritimers are only hewers of wood and drawers of water. This certainly is a mistaken idea. The maritimes are a beautiful country and the maritimers are the highest type of Canadian citizens.

Nova Scotia must indeed have great wealth as well as great thrift, or it would not have the capacity to purchase the long list of articles and commodities from central Canada totalling many millions of dollars every year with a minimum of reciprocation. The heads of industry and bankers marvel at our purchases of motor cars, trucks, tires, batteries, farm machinery, cement, electric motors, tobacco, sugar, flour, radios, medicines, tools, jewellery and a hundred and one articles, and still we are able to educate our boys and girls so that they may be enticed away from home to take places at the top all over Canada. We are now told that there is to be a big increase in freight rates on our purchases and sales. We in the maritimes threw in our lot with Quebec and Ontario and, if they are to supply us with our necessities such as motor cars, trucks, cement, farm machinery, electric motors and such articles, I think we have the right to have them delivered to us freight paid at the lowest factory prices.

For better or for worse, we are part of Canada which has a proud place in the world today. Our people are more and more coming to the opinion that we have not had a fair deal. We in Nova Scotia want our proper place as an integral part of this great and expanding country.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, consideration of a national budget raises the question of fundamental principles which govern in the national economy. To say that we cannot achieve national greatness unless we lay down and pursue sound long-range objectives and sound fundamental principles is to make an assertion which is self-evident. The point at issue, however, is what constitutes sound long-range objectives and sound fundamental principles. Each political party represented in this house considers that the fundamental principles and objectives to which it subscribes are sound, even though they are at variance with those of other parties. These principles therefore cannot all be right and neither can they all be wrong; and I doubt very much that it will ever be determined in this house which of these principles are sound and which are not. The political party atmosphere will not permit such to be done. "My party; right or wrong, my party," remains the dominant attitude of all political parties in this house. The most that can be hoped for is that the discussion and debate upon these issues in parliament will enable the electors to draw their own conclusions and determine their own course of action, and in the few moments at my disposal I wish to make my small contribution to that end.

So confused are the issues today that it is necessary that we define more carefully than ever before each and every term we use. There can be no intelligent discussion of any subject until we first define our terms. As simple as they are, such terms as "democracy," "freedom," "security" and so on, today mean different things to different people. That is equally true of many other terms we use such as "capitalism," "free enterprise", "private enterprise," "full employment," "socialism," "communism", and so forth. Such confusion is abroad today that we find totalitarianism masquerading under the cloak of democracy, slavery being represented as freedom and anti-Christianity being propagated under the sacred name of Christianity. How imperative therefore that we have a clear conception of what is involved in the terms which we use. I should like to use my time on this occasion to indicate my conception of some of the terms to which I have referred.

I wish, first of all, to indicate what conditions I think must prevail before our society can be characterized as a genuine democracy. As to definitions, I prefer the one given by Major C. H. Douglas, the founder of social credit principles, when he said that democracy is government in accordance with the will of the people. This means that in a genuine democracy the people should be able to get the results they want from the management of their affairs.

Accepting this as a general definition of democracy, I think it is fair to say that systems which have been designated as democratic have failed dismally to produce results in accordance with the will of the people. Even in countries where the outward forms of democracy have been most successfully established, the people have obtained very few of the results they wanted. On the contrary they have had insecurity, poverty, want and war meted out to them, and have seen individual freedom diminishing at an alarming rate. Instead of government in accordance with the will of the people, we have had government contrary to the will of the people.

The people of Canada are not getting from their present government the results which they desire. The people of Canada are willing and able to produce the things required for a standard of living very much higher than what they are at present enjoying. The standard of living which the people are entitled to enjoy should be limited only by their willingness to produce and their capacity to consume. At the present level of prices that should certainly represent an income of at least $4,000 a year, tax free, for every family of four. And as industry gets back to capacity production on a peacetime basis a substantial improvement on that amount should be possible.

I say, sir, that the people of Canada are willing and able to produce goods and services necessary to sustain and improve such a standard of living. But they can neither raise production completely to those levels, nor can they bring about the complete distribution of that production unless their efforts are accompanied by certain actions which the government must take, actions which the people themselves cannot take and which must therefore be undertaken by the government on their behalf.

The present government has not taken such steps and has not legislated in such a manner as to permit the people to produce to the limit of their desire to consume, and which will permit them to consume to the extent of that production. The present government is not governing in accordance with the will of the people of this country.

The question therefore arises: how can a government be compelled to govern in accordance with the will of the people? Before this question can properly be answered, another matter of fundamental importance must be determined, and that is the real purpose and function of parliament. Parliament today has departed a very great distance from its real purpose and function. I consider that Major Douglas has stated the purpose of parliamentary institutions as well as anyone has. In a speech at Buxton on June 9, 1934, he made the following statement:

> Instead of electing representatives to inform bankers and industrialists (who understand the technique of their jobs perfectly) how to do them, and to pass a multitude of laws which, while providing unnecessary jobs for large numbers of people who could be better employed still further impede industry, the business of democracy is to elect representatives who will insist upon results and will if necessary pillory the actual individuals who are responsible either for the attainment of results or their non-attainment.
> It is not a bit of use asking democracies to decide upon matters of technique; and it is quite certain, as has already been demonstrated, that if you throw a plan to a democracy it will be torn to shreds.
> It is not the business of the parliamentary machine to reform, for instance, the financial system. It is the business of the parliamentary machine to transmit the desires of the people for results out of the financial system, and to transmit to the people the names of individuals who are responsible for the financial system, so that by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, which has undoubtedly been established as vested in the representatives of the people, they may if necessary take steps to remove those responsible for impeding the will of the people. If it is pleaded in extenuation that those in charge of any particular function of the state, such as finance, do not know how to produce the results desired, then it is the business of parliament to provide them with all the advice available. But if they will neither take action within a reasonable period of time and will not accept advice if provided, then it is the business of the representatives of the people to remove them, whether they are alleged to be operating under a system of private enterprise or as public departments.

In the fewest possible words Major Douglas contends that the chief duty of a member of parliament consists in seeing that the people get the results which they want from the management of their affairs, and not in suggesting the methods by which those results can be obtained.

In another part of his Buxton speech, Major Douglas makes the following comment upon the situation into which parliament has drifted as a consequence of concerning itself about methods instead of results:

> We elect parliamentary representatives at the present time to pass laws of a highly technical nature, not to ensure that certain results are achieved. As a result of this, not merely in this country but everywhere in the world, as far as my observation takes me, we are witnessing a set of second-rate experts in the seats of government ineffectively endeavouring to give technical direction to a set of first-rate experts who are actually carrying on the functions by which society lives.

I agree whole-heartedly with these statements and I suggest it is imperative that Canadians take steps immediately to rehabilitate democracy in Canada in accordance with the principles suggested by Major Douglas. It is not the duty of members of parliament to pose as experts on methods. It is quite in order for a member of parliament to be an expert on methods, but it is not his function as a representative of the people. It is his business to see that the people get the results which they want. And if he is not an expert himself, it is his duty to see that experts are hired to devise methods by which results can be obtained.

Therefore, on behalf of the electors of Jasper-Edson, whose spokesman I am privileged to be, I demand that the government, and in particular the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) see that methods are devised which will permit the electors of Jasper-Edson, along with the rest of the people of Canada, to produce to the limit of their desire to consume, and which will permit them to buy to the extent of that production, without in any way interfering with their individual and personal freedom.

If the experts at present employed are either unable or unwilling to produce the results desired within a reasonable period of time, then the government should dismiss them and replace them with individuals who can and will produce results. I quite realize, however, that the voice of one member of parliament, or of even a dozen, is not sufficient to compel the government to take action along these lines. Were a majority of members from both sides of the house to do so, I am satisfied that it would not be long before such results would be forthcoming. The reasons that a majority of members in this house will not rise and make such demands of the government are twofold: party politics and lack of organization on the part of the people, such that they can insist upon obedience to their will. The political party system makes it very difficult for the people to exercise their democratic privileges and assume their personal responsibilities, even if they are so inclined. The political party system cannot properly serve democracy. Once every four or five years, the people are given an opportunity to vote simultaneously for a candidate and a party platform. The people as a whole have no voice in deciding the contents of these platforms. They are prepared by a small minority group with an eye to vote-catching. Often the platform deals for the most part with methods, concerning which neither the drafters of the platform nor the general public are qualified to form a wise judgment. Nothing could be more confusing. Elections find the voter wondering whether to vote for a candidate, a platform or a political party.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): How did you get elected?

Mr. KUHL: I grant that I was elected on a political party basis, but I am trying to indicate in what way it can be improved.

During the election campaign, each party viciously attacks the platforms and the candidates of the other parties. The people being unorganized become the victims of high-pressure propaganda in which extravagant promises, abuse, deceit and even intimidation are used to trick them into voting power-seekers into office.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I spoke against you in your constituency and we lost our deposit, but I think you will agree with me that I never said one word in criticism of you. Will you not admit that?

Mr. KUHL: I appreciate that very much. That was mutual.

Mr. HANSELL: It would not have made much difference anyway.

Mr. KUHL: After the election, the successful candidates cannot be controlled by the electorate. They vote themselves their own indemnities and submit to the dictates of a few party "bosses" who are the party organization between elections. The policies which have been implemented under party government are certainly not in accordance with the will of the people.

Political parties need a considerable amount of money to maintain their organizations and their propaganda. Those who provide the party funds expect favours for their support. Having paid the piper, they can compel the party "bosses" to play any tune they desire. The results are exactly what may be expected under the circumstances. The history of political parties has been an unsavory record of graft, patronage, and political corruption.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You are not talking about Alberta now, are you?

Mr. KUHL: I grant that so long as there are political parties, no matter what name they assume, they are subject to the same abuses, although we hope that we have a cleaner record in our party than has been the case with some of the older parties.

Political parties divide the people into conflicting camps—each striving to win their support to vote them into office and each attempting to discredit the other parties. Under such a system no representative, however sincere, can possibly serve the interests of the people effectively. The party system makes this impossible. "Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation", and if one may judge by the results of the political party system in every country, it has all but succeeded in achieving this. There is no reason or need for the people of Canada to be divided into a number of conflicting political camps, because all people want substantially the same results from the management of their affairs.

All people want and must have adequate food, clothing and shelter, even though their individual tastes in this respect may vary considerably.

All people want security in old age or when they suffer loss of income through illness, unemployment or other causes

All people want the personal and individual freedom to worship God according to the dictates of conscience; to choose or refuse to do whatever they wish, provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the same right of every other individual; to acquire by their honest efforts their fair share of the desirable things of life, such as education, property, luxuries and so forth.

The only difference of opinion which exists is regarding the methods by which these results can be obtained. However the people, as the supreme authority, should not be concerned with methods.

The concern which the people should have is for an organization through which they can secure obedience to their will. Workers in industry, farmers and others, have found it necessary to organize as unions in order to gain the objective they want. Because the principle underlying trade union movements is right, they have had a measure of success in securing better working conditions and wages. Political and economic systems can be made to function in the best interests of the people, if they will organize for that purpose, just as trade unions organize for a more limited purpose.

It is gratifying to me to observe that such an organization has already commenced in Canada and that it is growing daily. The movement and the organization to which I refer is the Union of Electors. This movement is something new in the political life of Canada, but it is already far beyond the stage of infancy. Its greatest strength is at the moment in the province of Quebec, which is evident from the attention which the hon. members from the province of Quebec are paying to the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette), who was elected to this parliament, not as a member of a political party, but because of the assurance which he gave the electors of Pontiac that he would at all times demand the results which they desired.

The Union of Electors is not a political party. It is a union of the voters who are organized to get the results desired in common by all the people, irrespective of race, religion or party affiliation.

The objectives of the Union of Electors are:

1. To state the results wanted from the management of the affairs of the country in all spheres affecting the lives of the people.

2. To control the elected representatives of the people at all times, and through them, all the people's governing bodies, local, provincial and national.

3. To insist on and enforce obedience to the will of the people on all matters of policy.

It is only through such an organization of the electors that Canada or any other country can experience government in accordance with the will of the people. I am indeed glad, therefore, to see such an organization of the people developing in Canada, and I intend to do everything I can to encourage it and assist it until it encompasses the majority of Canadians from Vancouver to Halifax.

In my remarks thus far, Mr. Speaker, I have indicated some of the circumstances which I think must prevail in our society before it can be characterized as a genuine democracy. I have suggested that the duty of members of parliament in a democracy proper should be confined to securing results rather than devising and debating methods. I realize, however, that we shall not alter our course without a period of transition. Until the people are organized to demand otherwise, parliament will continue to discuss methods rather than results. Before concluding, therefore, I intend to contravene the principles which I have just enunciated, by making a few remarks concerning methods.

Judged from the point of view of orthodox budgets, this budget is no doubt as good a budget as any orthodox economist could draw up. My general criticism is that an orthodox budget does not reveal the true facts about the national economy. In a substantial measure, this budget falsifies and conceals the real economic facts and conditions of this country. I deplore this situation and, on behalf of the people who sent me here, I protest against it.

I say that this budget falsifies and conceals the real economic condition of the nation because it deals only with money which the government extracts from the taxpayers and indicates no relationship between the money in the hands of the people and the goods and services which they are expected to buy.

The question at the root of the whole situation is one of the monetization of real wealth. In the highly industrialized and power-mechanized system of production of today, a barter system of exchange is obviously impossible. The only means whereby the people can draw from the pool of national production is through the monetization of that pool of production. Money must be created and must be put into circulation before goods can be either produced or distributed. In a modern economy this is done largely through loans to industry created and lent by the chartered banks. The orthodox economist assumes that this means is sufficient to enable the people to buy back their production. He believes that the total money in the hands of the people is always equal to the total of the prices of goods which they are expected to buy. He believes that production and income are one and the same thing. Because he believes this, he concludes that if part of the national production is to be diverted to public services of various kinds, the only method of doing so is to take from the people in taxes an amount of money sufficient to divert to public service whatever part of the national production is required. Such a conclusion would be sound if the premise upon which it is based were sound. I contend, sir, that the premise is most unsound, and therefore any conclusion based upon it must also be unsound.

In normal times when there is not an abnormal expansion of capital goods, as during a war, and immediately following a war. income does not keep pace with production. Money income is always less than the price value of production. This premise is not conceded by orthodox economists, but it is nevertheless borne out by the facts of industry. Because money income is never equal to national production in normal times, I say it is unnecessary and unsound for a government, with control over the nation's money, to go into debt or to levy taxes in order to divert part of the national production to public services.

In normal times a country suffers from a lack of purchasing power as compared with its producing power. There is an actual physical shortage of money in the hands of all the people collectively as compared with the total prices of goods. An increasing proportion of our national production remains unmonetized. This unmonetized portion of national production has been partly monetized in the past by government borrowings of newly created bank money which is paid out for public works, bonuses, subsidies and for other governmental purposes. This does not balance the economy, however, for this money is charged to the national debt to be collected through taxes. But it is mathematically impossible for the people to buy the total of national production and pay these taxes as well. The most popular misconception as to why the poor are poor is that the rich are rich. Many imagine that their incomes are low because the incomes of others are too high. The implied remedy is, therefore, to tax the rich. I am not suggesting that the rich ought not to be taxed, but I do assert that it is impossible to distribute the whole of national production by taxing the money from the rich and giving it to the poor.

Mr. HANSELL: That is the socialist idea.

Mr. KUHL: Orthodox economists, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) do not say that the poor are poor because the rich are rich, but the government's financial policy implies that such is their belief. In the debate upon the subsidy question, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) asserted that all subsidies have come out of taxation and must necessarily do so. Such a statement certainly leaves the implication that the only method of helping the poorer is to tax the richer. I take issue with the Minister of Labour when he says that subsidies have come out of taxation.

Mr. MITCHELL: Where do they come from; out of the sky?

Mr. KUHL: I am going to tell the minister presently if he will maintain his patience.

Mr. HANSELL: He would not have made that remark if he had known.

Mr. KUHL: Up until the present budget the government has incurred huge deficits which have been met by government borrowings of newly created bank money. This freshly created bank money which was borrowed by the government was used to meet governmental expenditures including the payment of subsidies. It is true that these borrowings are charged to the national debt and are collectible through taxation, but the fact of the matter is that the debt is never collected; it is merely refunded, the principal remaining and the interest compounding.

It is therefore incorrect to say that subsidies have come out of taxation. They have come out of newly created bank money, which is borrowed by the government, but which is never collected in taxation.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will the hon. member permit a question? Will he say the taxes he paid last year were in the same category, that they did not come out of himself?

Mr. KUHL: No; I grant that part of the money which the government uses is derived from the people in taxes, but also much of the money which the government uses to pay subsidies and meet other expenses is freshly created bank money borrowed by the government and charged up to debt which is not collected from taxes.

Mr. MITCHELL: Backed by production.

Mr. KUHL: In other words, part of the national production which could not be, and was not monetized through the usual routine of business, was monetized by the government through the use of debt money. I contend, sir, that if any part of the national production must be monetized by the government in order that the people as a whole can avail themselves of the total production of the nation, then that monetization must be brought about free of debt and free of taxation. This I consider to be one of the most important and most sacred duties of any modern government.

When the state, through its appropriate financial agency, issues debt-free, tax-free money in payment for public services, bonuses, subsidies, et cetera, it is not playing Santa Claus, and neither is the public getting something for nothing. When the government creates and pays out money in this manner, it is merely acting as the agent of all the people in monetizing goods which already exist, which have been produced by the people and therefore belongs to them, but which they cannot acquire until such goods are represented by money.

Socialists contend that the state cannot distribute goods which it does not own. The fact that this is being done every day through family allowances, old age pensions and in many other ways, proves the fallacy of such a contention. When the government augments the regular incomes of the people with money sufficient to raise total income to where it is equal to total production, consumers can buy all goods offered for sale whether they are privately produced or publicly.

Had governments monetized the unmonetized portion of national production with debt-free and tax-free money in the past, there would be no national debt today and there would be no interest charges to be paid in the form of taxes. The national debt is a national lie. Canadians have always paid their way physically in anything they have ever done, whether it was the promotion of peacetime enterprise or the waging of war. The only costs in doing anything are physical costs, that is, human energy and physical materials. Canadians, collectively, have always met all physical costs. Then how can it be logically argued that a national debt is unavoidable?

The only reason that there is a national debt is that governments have not been faithful to their sacred trust. The highest and most sacred prerogative which the crown can enjoy is the exclusive monopoly of the creation and issue, in the original instance, of all the money of the nation. Successive governments in Canada have, by degrees, surrendered this most sacred prerogative into the hands of private persons.

As a consequence of this most dastardly betrayal, the whole nation is now in bondage to the mere handful of individuals who exercise this prerogative. Instead of these private persons proceeding to the crown for the use of sums of money, the government now goes cap in hand to these private purveyors of financial credit, and mortgages the entire nation to them.

This nefarious practice has now reached such proportions that the interest charges alone on the national debt are almost equivalent to the total governmental pre-war expenditure, and the end is nowhere in sight under the present financial policy.

I say, sir, that those who have been and who continue to be responsible for these reprehensible circumstances should be regarded as arch-criminals, who should be tried for their crimes and punished accordingly.

In an earlier debate in this house, one of the C.C.F. members, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in disparaging tones suggested that the Social Credit members do not believe in anything except just printing a lot of money. Such a statement carries with it the implication that money in a modern economy is of very little consequence, and that very little attention need be paid to the manner in which it is created and put into circulation. Such a statement merely indicates how badly the hon. member for Cape Breton South and those who think as he does, are misinformed on the subject of money.

I readily grant that the things which make up a standard of living are the goods and services which the people are capable of producing and desirous of consuming, but the point which the hon. member for Cape Breton South seems to overlook is that the production and distribution of goods and services in a modern economy are absolutely impossible without the use of money. The starting point of every economic activity today is money. No matter how great the natural resources of the country may be, and no matter how willing and able the people may be to develop those resources, not a wheel in industry turns until money is first put into circulation.

Money is the mainspring in a modern economy, and without it the economy stops dead. Money is the master-key to the whole economic question. Hence those who enjoy the privilege of creating and issuing the money of the nation hold the power of life and death over the people of the nation by virtue of that privilege. Is it any wonder that one of the oldest bankers, Baron Rothschild, at one time said, "Permit me to create the money of a nation and I care not who makes its laws"?

The private bankers today are the sole arbiters in Canada as to how much money goes into circulation, as to where it goes into circulation and as to the terms under which it goes into circulation. This places governments and the people entirely at the mercy of the private bankers of this country. It is positively idle, therefore, to suggest that money is of very little consequence in a modern economy.

What is the problem of the old age pensioners? It is purely a money problem. Those who ask for more generous pensions take it for granted, and rightly so, that goods and services are available in sufficient quantities to maintain them in decency and health. But all that they are lacking is money with which to acquire the goods and services which are available in abundance.

What is the problem of the blind and the otherwise incapacitated? It is nothing but a lack of money with which to buy the goods and services which are available in abundance. What is the problem of the farmers and other primary producers? It is nothing other than money which must be paid out in the form of subsidies and bonuses in order to guarantee them their proper proportion of the national income.

Almost every individual in the nation considers that his income is too low and that his taxes are too high. In other words, he is lacking in money. And so one could go through the entire economy and find that the problem in almost every case is a lack of money. It is taken for granted, and rightly so, that the goods and services are available, or will be before long, to support the higher incomes which are demanded.

However the only source of money which the government chooses to use to attempt to augment the incomes of the people is nothing but debt and taxation, both of which aggravate the situation instead of improving it.

The Progressive Conservative members deserve the criticism which they receive for advocating increased services and decreased expenditures in one and the same breath; for, were they in the seats of the present government, their source of money would also be nothing other than debt and taxation. They plead, of course, that they would eliminate extravagant expenditures; but, even were they to do so, the amount of money which would be secured by that means would be a mere bagatelle, as compared with what is required to bring about a balanced economy.

The C.C.F. members seem to suggest that they advocate sources of money other than taxation, but a close analysis of their statements indicates that their proposals for raising money for governmental purposes involve nothing other than taxation and are therefore no different from the proposals of the Liberals and the Progressive Conservatives.

The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), in the debate upon the subsidy question, stated that the money for subsidies under a C.C.F. administration would come out of increased production. Such a statement may seem to mean something else, but it cannot mean anything other than that the money would be derived from taxation, for, regardless of by how much production is increased, all other economic factors are increased proportionately. If national production is doubled, the deficiency between income and production is also doubled, and no scheme of taxation can ever bring about the complete distribution of national production. The C.C.F. proposals are therefore just as ineffective as are those of the two old parties; in fact, they are exactly the same kind of proposals.

Therefore, inasmuch as all our major national problems resolve themselves into the one problem of an insufficiency of money, I contend that the system of debt and taxation must be completely abolished except for the purpose of redistributing part of the national income, if such is deemed necessary, and for the purpose of withdrawing excess credits if such a situation should ever arise. All funds required by the government for the purpose of monetizing the unmonetized portion of national production must be provided by the government through its own financial agency, debt-free and tax-free.

The rectification of this one fundamental feature of our national economy is the key to the solution of all our problems. The nationalization or socialization of any part or of all of industry and finance, whether monopoly controlled or not, is as unnecessary as it is undesirable, to bring about a complete and equitable distribution of national production.

The people of Canada, on their individual initiative as responsible private enterprisers, are willing and able to produce all that they will ever desire to consume. So long as the government, as the agent of the people, sees to it that the entire production of the nation is monetized so that it can be distributed in its entirety, I am prepared to depend upon the people working privately upon their own initiative to raise the production of the country to any desirable level whatsoever.

With sufficient money in their hands at all times to buy their fair share of national production, economic security with individual and personal freedom becomes a reality for each and every Canadian.

In a world of confusion, the people of Canada have a better opportunity than those of any other country in the world to assert themselves as the supreme authority in the land and so establish a genuine democracy that will ensure a high standard of living with the freedom to enjoy it. Thus Canada may demonstrate to the world that the causes of economic disaster, aggression and war, which exist in the organization of society, may be removed by the people themselves. This is the challenge which faces the people of Canada today. They may apathetically drift along the course now leading us to disaster, or they may lead the world toward that genuine Christian democracy which will enable all nations to live at peace with one another.

Mr. C. T. RICHARD (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, although the debate on the motion before the house has now been progressing for upwards of two weeks, yet from the other side of the house we have heard so little of a really constructive nature that I hesitate to take part in this debate, for there is hardly anything to refute—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Don't let that bother you.

Mr. RICHARD (Gloucester): —particularly from your extreme left. As to the particulars of the budget, I intend to say very little. I should like, however, to be permitted to make a few remarks in a general way on the situation of the maritime provinces. I believe this situation is a subject which is quite relevant to the one we are discussing at the present time.

If no real criticism has come from the other side of the house or even from the press of the country I believe it is due to the fact that our opponents and our critics have been taken by surprise and that in the matter of concessions in taxation the budget disclosed much more than they anticipated. Indeed, prior to the presentation of the budget there was such a pressure brought upon this government and upon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to wipe out all controls and to make sweeping reductions in taxation that, after hearing the Minister of Finance, we may say of him that he is bold when being cautious and even cautious when he is bold.

I share the opinion, however, with some other members of the house that perhaps the Minister of Finance could have shown a smaller surplus by extending certain services or else by reducing taxation along some lines. But we on this side of the house—knowing the Minister of Finance as we do, as a true Liberal—know that he has the interests of the people at heart and that, should an emergency arise, he will certainly make good use of that surplus.

I believe that we can say that this budget, although not the first one since the cessation of hostilities, may be called the first peacetime budget, for it has all the earmarks of peacetime economy. We have had several budgets since hostilities ceased, but there were such extraordinary expenditures to be made, such as those for bringing from overseas all our troops, rehabilitation, replacing those soldiers in their former positions, maintaining a large personnel and many other matters arising out of the war that it was necessary to maintain a high rate of taxation. This budget we find is quite commensurate to our needs and quite within our means.

We may, therefore, call it a peacetime budget, for we find alleviation in the matter of taxation and we find that we are again getting into our normal way of life. We are, therefore, charting our course to a permanent peacetime economy, which must be planned on a firm basis, which must be planned shrewdly, which must contain policies which, projected into the future, will ensure that, whatever happens outside our own boundaries, we shall not strike shoals which may be dangerous to our own domestic economy. We must adopt policies whereby every province and every section of the country will derive equal advantages. We fashion policies whereby no province will benefit at the expense of another and no one section will expand industrially while another section languishes. I believe that we have not followed that course in the past. I believe that we have adopted policies—both fiscal, tariff and otherwise—whereby industry has been centralized in just two provinces in this dominion, and naturally so has capital, to the great detriment of the other provinces, particularly our own maritime provinces.

I crave the indulgence of the house to be allowed to speak for a few moments about conditions in the maritimes along the lines which I have just mentioned. I know that hon. members, after hearing members from the maritimes, may think that we are provincial, and that we are forever bewailing our lot; but I want to remind hon. members that we feel we have grievances which are real; and until a solution of these problems is found, I say that we shall not have a true economy in this country.

You often hear it said that in the maritime provinces we discuss parting or separating from confederation. It may be true that perhaps at times we regret that we ever entered confederation; but I want to assure the house that it is my belief that at no time was public opinion ever crystallized to the point where any decision was arrived at to take that step. We cannot understand, however, how the rest of Canada cannot see that we have grievances, that we have not shared equally with the other provinces in the advantages accruing from confederation, and that no real effort has been made to see what caused that result and whether this down trend in our economic life cannot be stopped.

It is true that we have appointed commissions to study conditions in the maritimes, and I may mention two particularly: the Duncan royal commission, and the White commission. I might also mention the Rowell-Sirois commission which embraced conditions in the maritimes. I now wish to refer to these commissions for one particular purpose, and that is to show that those commissions came to the decision which I desire to point out here. I wish to read just one paragraph from the Duncan royal commission report to show how it proves our case. This quotation from the Duncan commission report is found at page 20 of the report of the White commission:

> We are far from saying that the dominion, within its sphere of control, has done all for the maritime provinces which it should have done.

It then goes on to quote how Canada, a vast country, had to look after new provinces and was preoccupied in other business, as it were, and how possibly the maritimes—the old provinces—were neglected. Then the conclusion of that paragraph is as follows:

> But reasonable balance is within accomplishment if there be periodic stocktaking.

That is the suggestion made by the Duncan commission.

In support of my claim that we did not derive all the benefits which should have accrued from confederation to the maritime provinces, I read from the White commission report at page 20:

> We are in accord with the claim of the maritime provinces and with the finding of the Duncan commission that these provinces have not shared proportionately with the other provinces of Canada in the economic advantages accruing to the dominion as a whole from confederation and in our recommendations have taken it into account as one of the most impressive elements in their case for more favourable financial arrangements.

The recommendations of those two commissions were carried into effect in so far as financial arrangements are concerned. Increased subsidies were granted. Freight rates were cut down. But I submit that these were only palliatives which never did settle firmly and finally the problems of the maritimes, and it was never the intention to settle them by these recommendations.

There are those who contend that the situation in the maritimes would have arisen notwithstanding confederation, and that these conditions were bound to come. I do not quite share this opinion. I believe that our situation today is due to confederation, to the relinquishment of the rights which we then possessed and the granting to the central power of responsibility for policies, the exercise of which brought about the conditions in the maritimes today. It is not pleasant perhaps to go back to conditions existing several generations ago. However, probably it is necessary to do so in order to ascertain what caused the economic situation that exists in the maritimes today. Sometimes these things are not brought about by one event but by a chain of events which culminate in a situation which has not been foreseen.

Let me take you back, sir, to the days of confederation. We in the maritimes were prosperous; we were the most prosperous section of British North America. We were masters of our own customs and excise; we held the gateways through which would flow our foreign trade both export and import. We knew the progress that had been made in the country to the south, how they had developed their ports on the Atlantic seaboard. We could visualize, therefore, that our own future would be patterned along the same line and that we would reach the same prosperous condition they enjoyed. When we entered confederation, therefore, we knew we were jeopardizing a great deal. So it is not surprising that when confederation was first discussed in the maritimes the leaders of industry at that time did not entirely agree with it, because they knew just what it would mean to jeopardize the advantages we then possessed. However, confederation was put forward for the purpose of uniting the provinces into an economic unit, as well as for military purposes. That induced the leaders of the maritimes to enter into the pact, for it became quite evident that the provinces needed an outlet to the sea; that some day they might be attacked, and the St. Lawrence route alone was not sufficient to ensure their defence.

Therefore we went into confederation. When we compare our position at the time of confederation with our position today; when we view the progress that has been made in the country to the south, the development of their great ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Portland; when we realize that we have the same geographical position and the same energetic people, with only an imaginary line separating us—when we consider all these things we wonder why, from an economic point of view, we have remained at a standstill and progress has passed us by.

I have shown that no personal motives induced us to enter confederation. The sole aim of the maritimers was to build a strong nation, and I may say the attitude of the maritimers has not changed one iota since that time. We have supported every move and every expenditure that have been made to develop this into a great country. We contributed to the development of the west, even though hon. members from that part of the country may not see it in that way. We assisted in a costly immigration policy from 1900 on, though we could see we had not the advantages possessed by the west and that, therefore, we would derive very little benefit from such a policy. Our railways having been built practically at the expense of the public treasury, we contributed our share to the construction of the railway systems of this dominion. We encouraged the development of the inland water route by the construction of canals between our lakes and by the deepening of the St. Lawrence river in order to make Montreal one of the greatest ports in the world, even though we knew it was to our own detriment. In every way the provinces aimed first to make of this a great country, notwithstanding the fact that sometimes it might have been detrimental to the best interests of the maritimes themselves.

Need I cite any more examples to show our unselfishness in the history of our country since confederation? May I point out again that when the subject of a rapprochement between the provinces and Ottawa was discussed, the maritimes were the first to come forward and offer their cooperation; and here today we are relinquishing certain rights to the dominion government, though again this is to our detriment, because these money grants, being based on population, will not bring the same benefit to us since our population will not increase in the same ratio as that of the other provinces. Again we have worked against our own interests and for the benefit of Canada, to make it a great country. I am sorry that up to the present these conferences have not been successful. The whole problem as I have seen it—because as a member of the New Brunswick government prior to the last war I attended two of these conferences—is the suspicion and distrust the provinces feel for the central authorities in Ottawa; and until that distrust is banished from their minds there will not be a successful conclusion to these conferences.

I would not speak about these maritime matters at such length if the other evening the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) had not made certain suggestions to improve our economic conditions. I wish to thank him for what he said and for the support he has given us, and if I answer him I want to assure the hon. gentleman that I do so in a friendly way. He told us that to improve the economic position of the maritimes it would be necessary to develop Grand Falls to the full extent. I want to tell him that prior to 1925 the Liberal government of New Brunswick had all plans prepared for that development, but the Conservative party came into power and turned everything over to the International Paper Company. From that day forward the province of New Brunswick lost control of Grand Falls. Then he also advocated construction of the Chignecto canal. I want to say that we approve the stand he has taken, that everyone from the maritimes stands behind this project. I believe it would bring to the maritime provinces the New England markets, which are the natural markets for the maritimes since they are closer to our shores. We cannot expect the upper provinces to be the sole markets for our exportable surplus in sea, forest or farm products. In my estimation the New England states are our natural markets, as they were before confederation.

A moment ago, Mr. Speaker, I told you how Grand Falls was lost to the province of New Brunswick by being turned over lock, stock and barrel to the International Paper Company, that octopus in the power and paper field. That was one occasion when we were sold down the river, but I will tell you of another. In 1911, when the question of the approval of the trade treaty between the United States and Canada came before the Canadian people, by flag waving and the slogan, "No truck nor trade with the Yankees", we were hoodwinked into refusing that approval, something we have regretted ever since. That was another occasion when we were sold down the river.

Mr. ISNOR: By whom?

Mr. RICHARD (Gloucester): By the Conservative party that come into power, controlled by the industralists of central Canada who made us believe that they had a ready market for all we could produce, but who today too often consider us as their poor cousins.

Since my time is limited, I should now to say a few words about something which is peculiar to the maritime provinces, and which means a great deal to them. I refer to the fishing industry. Only a few days ago I came across some figures which showed that the production of sea products from the maritime provinces has been valued at $31 million, and this figure does not include the processed value, which is considerable.

This administration has done wonderful things for the fisheries. It is the first administration which has ever really helped the fishermen by giving them assistance in the construction of their boats, in the establishing of processing plants and freezing plants, and in the securing of new markets. Today in the person of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) we have a man who does not waste his time or the time of the house in saying what he proposes to do, but rather goes ahead and does things. I am sure every member from the maritime provinces will stand back of him in that. However the fishermen in the maritimes need better facilities.

Before concluding, let me say that I blame no political party, and no particular regime for our situation. Sometimes I admit that we are partly to blame ourselves. Our whole economic future depends upon the establishment and the promulgation of certain policies by the central government, and by the financial institutions over which we have no control, except indirectly.

We of the maritimes do not ask for any special privileges or hand-outs; rather, we wish to share in the progress of the country. We are convinced that Canada cannot be a great nation if one section of it is economically weak. The strength of confederation may be likened to a chain which is as strong as its weakest link. We therefore urge our administration and our financial institutions, all those who are interested in making this a great nation, to study our problems. We ask every maritimer—because there are some to be found from coast to coast—to become good will ambassadors on our behalf, and to preach what we have been attempting to show the country. When I say that there are maritimers from coast to coast I mean that, because of economic conditions, they have been forced to leave our provinces and have established themselves successfully in all parts of Canada. At one time, indeed if not today, the heads of four of the biggest banking institutions of Canada were maritimers.

Maritimers are maritimers always. They cannot forget the land of their birth, that land whose beauty in its rivers, its lakes, its mountains and its seashore is unexcelled anywhere. But those maritimers are also Canadians at heart. While they may be maritimers by attachment, they are Canadians first and always. Perhaps their feelings are best expressed in the words of that maritime poet who said:

> Friends I have found in far and alien places;
> Beauty and ardour in unfamiliar faces.
> But deep in my heart is the land I call home,
> Canadian am I in blood and bone.

On motion of Mr. Case the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 21, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. Since the National Housing Act was passed, with how many approved renting institutions has the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation entered into contracts with a view to constructing rental housing projects?

2. How many units have been completed?

3. What are the monthly rentals for such units?

4. How many institutional housing corporations have been established by life insurance companies in Canada?

5. How many housing projects have been commenced by such holding companies?

6. How many units have been completed?

7. At what monthly rents are they available?

8. How many loans have been approved under part 3 of the National Housing Act, according to provinces?

9. How many rural housing units have been completed, according to provinces?

10. What was the average amount of the loans in each case?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No contracts have been entered into with lending institutions with a view to constructing rental housing projects. However, the corporation has approved the acquisition of land by one lending institution in Winnipeg and by two lending institutions jointly in Montreal on the understanding that rental housing projects will be erected on the land. Details of the projects have not been submitted nor approved, nor have any guarantees been made to the lending institutions concerned with respect to return on their investment.

The corporation has also approved the investment of one lending institution in Toronto in acquiring land and erecting a six unit rental project. However, in this case the corporation has given no guarantee to the lending institution concerned with respect to return on the investment.

Approval of these investments has been given in accordance with section II (subsection 9) of the National Housing Act, 1944.

2. None.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. 32, by Housing Enterprises of Canada Limited, the single institutional holding company formed by all life insurance companies operating in Canada.

5. 32, to April 30, 1947.

6. 643, to April 30, 1947.

7. Maximum monthly rentals for the projects, as fixed by the wartime prices and trade board, vary according to the type of housing accommodation supplied, e.g.: single houses, row housing, and multiple dwelling units, and by the number of bedrooms, etc., per unit. Rentals range from $40 to $85 per month.

8. Part III of the National Housing Act 1944 has not yet been proclaimed. Consequently no loans under it have been approved.

9 and 10. Answered by No. 8.

INCOME TAX—ARRANGEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. During what years has the government of Canada collected income taxes for the provinces of Canada and is it still collecting them?

2. Has the government of Canada granted to the provinces during those years amounts in lieu of such taxes?

3. Has the same treatment been accorded the provinces and Yukon territory with respect to the suspension of those grants?

4. If so, did the government of Canada suspend such grants to the provinces in proportion to their profits on the sale of liquor?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1 and 2. It is assumed that these questions relate to the suspension by provincial governments of the collection of income and corporation taxes pursuant to the Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreement Act, 1942. These taxes were suspended in the years 1941 to 1946 inclusive and in lieu therefor the government of Canada made certain stipulated annual payments to the provinces.

3. The corresponding action taken in the case of the Yukon territory was outlined in parliamentary return No. 128.

4. No.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—"CANADA CARRIES ON"

Mr. FRASER:

1. What was the total cost of production for the films "Canada Carries On" put on by the National Film Board for the years (a) 1945; (b) 1946?

2. How many different subjects were produced?

3. What was the total revenue raised from all sources for the use of these films for the years (a) 1945; (b) 1946?

Mr. McCANN:

1. (a) $98,174.57; (b) $128,981.63.

2. 1945, 11; 1946, 12.

3. (a) 1945—$2,638.36—after costs of prints and promotion; (b) 1946—$2,901.63—after costs of prints and promotion. (These figures refer only to revenue received from theatres and do not include sales of prints of the films made to Canadian and foreign purchasers as these figures are not deemed to be revenue.)

RADIO BROADCASTING—TIME MADE AVAILABLE TO POLITICAL PARTIES

Mr. FULTON:

1. What is the total amount of time made available without charge by the C.B.C. to national political parties on the national and French networks in a full year on the basis of the arrangement now in effect in that regard?

2. What is the value of this time in terms of money?

3. Is any charge for this time collected from the private stations who carry these broadcasts? If so, give details of rates and total amount collected?

4. In the alternative, are the private stations required to carry these programmes without recompense? If so, how much time is so taken from the private stations in a full year and what is the arrangement in this respect?

Mr. McCANN:

1. (a) Trans-Canada network 12½ hours; (b) French network 12½ hours.

2. If this time were sold for a commercial programme the charges would amount to $54,328.

3. No.

4. These broadcasts are scheduled in time reserved for C.B.C. programmes under the arrangement with basic affiliated private stations.

INCOME TAX—COMMISSIONER AT REGINA

Mr. PROBE:

1. Is there at present an income tax commissioner for Regina division?

2. If so, who is he and when was he appointed to this post?

3. If not, how long has this post been vacant and who is acting in this capacity pending appointment being filled?

4. Have representations to fill the vacancy been received from public groups or citizens, and what action has been taken?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes.

2. Mr. W. H. Bailey, C.A., appointed May 12, 1947.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. No.

WAR ASSETS—SCRAP METAL

Mr. DANIEL:

1. How much copper and brass, and alloys thereof, has been sold as scrap metal, by War Assets Corporation since the end of the war to date?

2. What types of scrap were sold, and what was the quantity and price received for each classification?

[Mr. McCann.]

3. Who purchased this scrap and what was the price paid by each purchaser, and what amount did each buy?

4. What export permits were issued for scrap sold to dealers for brass and copper?

5. Who received these permits?

6. What amount of scrap was covered by each permit?

Mr. HOWE: It is not the policy to answer questions of this kind. The answer could be of value only to those having the material mentioned for sale, and the purpose would be to get the prices to know what his competitors are bidding; therefore I would ask that the question be dropped.

Question dropped.

RADIO BROADCASTING—"POPULAR PLAYHOUSE"

Mr. FRASER:

1. Does the C.B.C. broadcast the play "Popular Playhouse?" If so, on what day and what hour is this broadcast and over what stations?

2. If broadcast by C.B.C. what is the total cost of each broadcast including leased wires, editing, and all other expenses incidental to this programme?

3. Over what stations is this play broadcast?

Mr. McCANN:

1. This programme was terminated on April 24, 1947.

2. See No. 1.

3. See No. 1.

MARKETING OF SOWS WITH PIG

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

How many sows with pig have been marketed in the various provinces of Canada by months, since January 1, 1947, to date?

Mr. GARDINER: No information.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. How much has been spent by the federal government under part 5 of the National Housing Act during the past year for (a) investigating housing conditions and the adequacy of housing accommodation in Canada; (b) investigating the factors affecting the cost of construction and the measures which may be taken to secure economies and increase efficiency; (c) encouraging production of plans and designs to stimulate low-cost production; (d) studies made of land utilization and community planning?

2. What universities or provinces have received grants provided by section 26, part 5 of the National Housing Act?

3. How much of the $5,000,000 to be appropriated from the consolidated revenue fund for carrying out the provisions of part 5 of the National Housing Act were spent as of March 31, 1947?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. During the fiscal year 1946-7:—

(a) $40,065.

(b) $12,500 approximately.
(c) $5,989.
(d) $69,662.

2. Grants under part V, section 26 of the National Housing Act, 1944, have been made to the university of Toronto and Laval university. No grants have been made to provinces under this section.

3. $266,317.14.

OIL COMPANIES—GRANTS FOR STORAGE FACILITIES ASSISTANCE IN MANUFACTURE OF BURNERS

Mrs. STRUM:

1. What amount of money, if any, has been granted by the government to oil companies, to assist in supplying storage facilities?

2. What amount of money, if any, has been granted by the government to assist manufacturers of oil burners?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. None in so far as this department is concerned.

2. None in so far as this department is concerned.

FORD MOTOR COMPANY—ADVANCES FOR EXTENSION AND NEW BUILDINGS

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Did the government of Canada, from 1939 to date, advance money to the Ford Motor Car Company of Canada Limited (a) for the extension of buildings; (b) for new buildings?

2. If so, how much for (a) extensions; (b) new buildings?

3. Has the government of Canada sold to the Ford Motor Car Company of Canada Limited (a) the extensions; (b) the new buildings?

4. If so, how much did the government of Canada receive for (a) the extensions; (b) the new buildings?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. (a) No.
(b) Yes.

2. (a) Answered by 1(a).

(b) $94,617.06 was advanced to Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited for the construction of a building on lands at Ojibway, Ontario, owned by Canadian Steel Corporation Limited and leased by the crown.

3. (a) and (b). No.

4. (a) and (b). Answered by 3.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—WOOD MOUNTAIN

Mr. ARGUE:

What were the salaries and expenses paid to all the Prairie Farm Assistance Act inspectors who were working in the electoral district of Wood Mountain during 1946?

POSTAL SERVICE

REQUEST FOR AIR MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN WINNIPEG AND FLIN FLON

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Yesterday the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) asked me a question as to the projected air service between Winnipeg and Flin Flon for the carriage of air mail. Inquiry is being made to determine the degree of postal advantage and to ascertain the cost of such a service.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CORRESPONDENCE WITH FRED ROSE

Mr. BENTLEY:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between Fred Rose and the Department of Justice and/or the Minister of Justice since October 31, 1946.

IMMIGRATION—REQUESTS FROM COMPANIES, ETC., TO SEEK WORKERS ABROAD

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a copy of all orders in council, correspondence, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of Labour, relating to the entry into Canada of any persons, arising out of any application or request from any company, corporation, organization or industry, as from June 30, 1946, to date.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING VETERANS' PREFERENCE, INCREASED SALARIES FOR COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Civil Service Act to provide, inter alia, a statutory basis within the act for veterans' preference in appointments to the civil service; to provide for payment of increased salaries to the chairman and members of the civil service commission; payment of annual increases in rates of compensation to temporary employees; and for the establishment of certain temporary positions, appointments thereto, and remuneration thereof.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAMME—PUBLIC BILLS AND ORDERS—WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

On the order:

Government notices of motions—The Prime Minister—That on and after Tuesday, the 27th of May, 1947, the provisions of standing order 15 be suspended in relation to the procedure and order of business from 8 to 9 o'clock p.m. on Tuesdays and Fridays until the end of the present session; and that on Wednesday the 28th day of May, 1947, and all subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the present session the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules as provided for other days.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before this motion is made, may I have the permission of the house and of Your Honour to make a statement respecting the business of the house.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) asked on Monday if I would give the house a statement on legislation remaining to be introduced. I said I would do so on Thursday. On reflection it seemed to me to be preferable to give the statement today, in the light of the resolution which is now before us on the order paper. I believe, if the house has before it a statement of the business which remains to be disposed of, hon. members will be inclined to take a more favourable view of the resolution about to be proposed.

The legislation still to be considered by the house falls into two main divisions. The first division includes measures of which notice has already been given and which will be found in today's order paper under

1. Introduction of bills;
2. Government notices of motion;
3. Government orders; and
4. In Votes and Proceedings of yesterday (Tuesday, May 20, 1947).

The second division includes measures of which no notice has been given up to the present, but which I shall presently seek to outline.

First a word about the measures of which notice has been given.

Under "introduction of bills" there appears notice of an act to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933. That measure has not as yet been introduced.

Under "government notices of motion" there are the following resolutions respecting:

A bill to amend the Civil Service Act.

A bill respecting industrial relations and investigation of industrial disputes.

[Mr. C. Gibson.]

The latter bill is a most important measure. It contains in all over seventy sections.

Under "government orders", the following measures appear among those already introduced. I am enumerating them because I wish the house to get a picture of the whole.

First and foremost, I would mention the resolution respecting the measure to amend the Old Age Pensions Act. In addition, there are:

An act to amend the Publication of Statutes Act;

An act respecting article 41 of the charter of the united nations;

An act to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act;

A resolution respecting pensions or other superannuation benefits for senior appointees of the Department of External Affairs serving outside of Canada;

An act to vary the Saskatchewan natural resources agreement;

An act to amend the National Housing Act, 1944;

An act to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939;

An act respecting the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company;

A resolution respecting a bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act;

An act to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act;

A resolution respecting a bill to amend the Railway Act;

A resolution respecting a bill to amend the Fisheries Research Board Act;

An act to amend the War Charities Act, 1939;

An act to incorporate the Port Alberni harbour commissioners.

In Votes and Proceedings of Tuesday, May 20, 1947, will be found notice of a resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice respecting a measure to amend the Judges Act, 1946; one, in the name of the Minister of Agriculture, respecting a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939; and a measure in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to provide for the accession of Canada to the convention on the privileges and immunities of the united nations.

May I now reply specifically to the request made on Monday by the leader of the opposition for a statement of government legislation which remains to be introduced. All that I have mentioned so far has already appeared, or some notice of it has been given, in one or other of the publications of the house, but the following measures have still to be introduced —and may I say that most of them are practically ready now. There may be one or two that will be delayed before they are introduced, but I expect to see them on the order paper shortly.

First and foremost, there are the bills which arise out of the budget resolutions. They include:

A bill to amend the Excise Act.

A bill to amend the Income War Tax Act.

A bill to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

I understand that the number of these bills is about twelve in all. There are the following additional measures to be introduced by the Minister of Finance:

A bill to authorize agreements with certain provincial governments;

A bill to amend the Superannuation Act;

A bill respecting Canadian National Railways financing and guarantee;

A bill respecting Canadian National Railways refunding and financing;

A bill to amend the Trust Companies Act;

A bill to amend the Insurance Act;

A bill to amend the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act;

A bill to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act;

A bill to amend the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act.

The following bills are to be introduced by other ministers:

A bill to amend the criminal code and possibly a separate bill to amend the criminal code respecting certain pari-mutuel charters;

A bill to amend the Identification of Criminals Act;

A bill to amend the Interpretation Act;

A bill to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act;

A bill respecting jurisdiction of United States service courts;

A bill respecting the dominion fuel board;

A bill to create a maritime commission;

A bill respecting the east slopes of the rockies;

A bill to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

In addition to these measures, there are to be introduced the following resolutions:

A resolution approving the peace treaties with Italy, Hungary, Roumania and Finland;

A resolution approving the constitution of the international refugee organization;

A resolution approving the instrument of amendment of the constitution of the international labour organization;

A resolution respecting the conservation of fisheries on the high seas.

In addition to all this, I would say there remains such legislation as may grow out of the reports of the standing and special committees of the house. The latter include the committees on redistribution; the Dominion Elections Act; joint special committee on the Indian Act; committee on canteen funds; sessional committee on railways and shipping; committee on broadcasting.

I would remind the house that there is still before it a resolution to constitute a committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms, the debate on which is not yet concluded.

The debate on the budget has been in progress for some time past. It also is not yet concluded.

Finally, I must remind hon. members that all estimates of the present year remain to be passed, including those which have been before the house for some months, together with the usual supplementary estimates, also the appropriation bills to be based thereon.

As far as I am able to see at the moment, the statement I have made includes all the measures the government propose to introduce at the present session. I cannot guarantee that all will be proceeded with, nor can I guarantee that, as the session runs on, some matters may not arise which will require the introduction of additional measures. Of such at present I have no knowledge.

I must leave it to hon. members themselves whether they will not be prepared to endorse unanimously the motion I am about to bring before the house, which is to the effect that from next week on the government is to take for its business the hour now reserved for private and public bills on Tuesdays and Fridays, also that the house is to sit on Wednesday evenings. Some understandings on some matters may have been reached with some hon. members by my colleagues the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As regards any such, I think we can find a way of meeting them in the course of the session. Near the end of the session there may be some private bills to which we shall have to give a night or two. I hope hon. members will see that here is a programme which, unless we are all prepared to expedite the business of the house, may carry us, not to the end of the summer but to the end of the year.

An hon. MEMBER: Merry Christmas.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that tomorrow hon. members cut this statement out of today's Hansard, place it in their pocket-books or paste it in their hats, and look at it occasionally as the business proceeds.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wish to thank the Prime Minister for this full statement of a full programme for the next few months. I wish to say on behalf of those who sit with me that we are prepared to support this motion.

Mr. MacINNIS: No motion has yet been made.

Mr. McCANN: It is coming.

Mr. BRACKEN: We are prepared to support the programme suggested by the Prime Minister.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, has the motion of the Prime Minister been moved?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I made this statement in advance, in the hope and expectation that when the motion is moved it will carry unanimously. Did the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar wish to speak on the statement?

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to speak on the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I will move:

That on and after Tuesday, the 27th of May, 1947, the provisions of standing order 15 be suspended in relation to the procedure and order of business from 8 to 9 o'clock p.m. on Tuesdays and Fridays until the end of the present session; and that on Wednesday the 28th of May, 1947, and all subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the present session the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules as provided for other days.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I had an opportunity this morning of discussing this resolution with my colleagues, and they desire me to say that we are prepared to agree to the taking of the two evening hours, one on Tuesday and one on Friday, but we feel that the members still need Wednesday evening. My colleagues are not agreeable to taking that at the present time.

What has been said this afternoon by the Prime Minister about the very large amount of business yet to be done emphasizes again the desirability of doing something about the arrangement of the business of this house. It is obvious that we cannot proceed to do the business of parliament in the manner in which we have been accustomed to do it in bygone days. The British House of Commons, from which we take much of our procedure, owing to the pressure of business over the last number of years has had to devise ways and means of curtailing debate. We have tried to do that by agreement among the parties, but we have failed. I know that on occasions I have given what amounted to a promise to other members of the house as to the number of speeches, and so on, but it is difficult to live up to any such undertaking. Something will have to be done about the rules.

In the interests of the health of the members of parliament we should not be sitting in this city all through the hot summer weather. Something needs to be done about the times of sitting of the house. Personally I favour the assembling of the house in the autumn for, say, six weeks, to get through the debate on the address, bring down some of the legislation, and try to conclude the business of the session by June 1. It is obvious that the days of three and four months sessions are gone, and something will have to be done to facilitate the business of the house and protect the health of the members. For several years past, members of the house have been unable to get away for a holiday and be with their families during a period when they can enjoy the sunshine. Judging from the long list of government business presented by the Prime Minister, if we deal with these matters properly we shall be here until September at the earliest. I wanted to place these views before the house in order that we may be thinking about them with a view to facilitating the business and protecting the health of hon. members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say a word in reply to my hon. friend. First of all, I wish to thank him and members of his group for agreeing to allowing the government to have the hour on Tuesday and Friday used for government business. I am afraid that I shall have to ask my hon. friend and his group to allow us to sit on Wednesday evenings. I would point out that it is easy to arrange the business of the house so that if, for example, on a Wednesday evening a number of members may wish to take the evening off, we can find some bills or estimates which all of us will agree are non-controversial, and have them brought forward at that time. The British House of Commons has an enormous amount of business to transact and it manages to get through all its business with about one-third of the house present at any time of the day. I do not think that a member is called upon to be in his seat throughout all the time the house is sitting. If hon. members receive the bills in time to see what they contain, they can govern themselves accordingly. I believe that by arrangement between the leaders the programme can be made satisfactory.

With regard to the summer, I think that all of us would like to have some time off for a vacation, and perhaps none more than members of the government. I notice that often it is forgotten that, in addition to all the business of the House of Commons, members of the ministry have to carry on as well the business of government, whether the house is in session or not. It is a pretty heavy task, when the house is in session, to attend to correspondence, arrange for interviews, receive delegations, hold daily meetings of the cabinet, and consider the many matters that have to be discussed. I would draw attention to this fact, and it is one of the reasons why business is taking up so much time of parliaments today: there is a new class of public business altogether which has come to the fore since the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is concerned with matters of international relations. In that connection, there are the meetings of the united nations organization which are fixed for the autumn months. There are various international bodies on which members of the government and leaders from the opposite side are represented. I think we would be wise to seek to have the autumn reserved for that class of meetings and, as far as possible, to encourage other nations to bring their business on in the autumn instead of at a time when, in most countries, the houses of parliament would be normally in session.

I do not think I need to say more than that the real way to get through the business of the session is by having fewer and shorter speeches.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I closed the debate.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Speaker did not announce that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think the Speaker announced that. I thought the Prime Minister was really opening the debate when he spoke.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I did think I was concluding the debate when I spoke. If I had thought my hon. friend was going to rise, I would have done him the courtesy of waiting until he had spoken. However, I would ask the house to give him an opportunity to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He would not say anything anyway.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would direct attention to the fact that I understood the Prime Minister was concluding the debate, since no one else had risen; and I was about to put the question to the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has unanimous consent, he may proceed, but it should be well understood that the debate will be closed after that.

Mr. BRACKEN: In view of all the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member be allowed to speak.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): It is customary, I believe, for a motion to be moved and then for a statement to be made in support of that motion. Then if the mover of the motion wants to close the debate he has an opportunity of doing so. On such occasions, however, the Speaker advises the house that if the hon. member moving the motion then speaks, that closes the debate, and that was not done on this occasion. I had thought some of the hon. members to my right would wish to speak, and I did not want to get in between them and the mover of the resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MacINNIS: When this motion was moved I understood the cooperation of the house was requested. You can shout me down, but that is not the way to get the cooperation of this group.

It seems to me a number of mistakes have been made in preparing the programme for this session. We now have an enormous programme laid before us. If that programme had been before us when we were discussing other matters we would have realized the work that was ahead of us before the session could be concluded and we could have made arrangements accordingly; but that was not done. What I see now is that we are asked today to give away Wednesday evenings. In a few weeks we shall be asked to sit on Saturday.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: And many of those now pounding their desks will not be here. By the time we finish there will be a bare quorum in the house. Then within another few weeks we will be asked to sit mornings.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: We shall be dealing with the business of this house in a way in which it should not be dealt with. Hon. members are being paid to give due consideration to the legislation that is brought before parliament, and they should stay here until that legislation has been dealt with in an orderly way. We should not be like a bunch of school boys, trying to get away as quickly as we can. I know of no other business institution that carries on its business as the business of this house is carried on. I would ask the Prime Minister to give hon. members an opportunity to do their work in a way that will be a credit to parliament and a credit to the country, instead of shoving a great part of it through at the end of the session without proper consideration as has been done every session since I have been here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

ADVERSE TRADE BALANCE WITH UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance, of which I have not had an opportunity to give him notice. I will ask him to accept this as notice, if necessary. The adverse balance of trade between Canada and the United States has doubled in the first three months of this year as compared with last year. I should like to ask the minister to make a statement to the house as to the effect this trade trend will have on our reserve of United States dollars. If he is not prepared to make that statement this week perhaps it could be made early next week, after he has had an opportunity to study the matter.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I can answer that question now. I have a somewhat similar question from the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram), in which he says:

In view of the grave concern arising in Canada over Canada's exchange position with the United States, will the minister consider making a statement to the house at the earliest possible date as to the exact position, and what action if any is contemplated by the government to meet the situation?

I do not think it is desirable to make frequent statements as to our exchange position, and in this connection I have nothing to add to what I said in my budget speech on April 29.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

EDIBLE OILS

ARRANGEMENT FOR SECURING ESSENTIAL SUPPLIES FROM ARGENTINA—NEWSPRINT SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of a statement appearing in the press today that a deal has been concluded between the government of Canada and the Peron government of the Argentine under which Canada will sell additional amounts of newsprint to the Argentine in exchange for vegetable oils from that country. Is the minister in a position to make a statement on this matter?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): An arrangement of the kind mentioned has been made. I had not thought I should take the time of the house to outline its terms, and I prepared a press release which is going out this afternoon, giving the particulars. However, my hon. friend and perhaps other members are interested, so I shall be very glad to give the house the details of the arrangement.

For some months we have been facing special difficulties in securing essential supplies of edible oils at reasonable prices. Since early in the war, as a result of a worldwide shortage, world supply and distribution of fats and oils have been the subject of discussion and allocations by international committees of which Canada has been a member, and under arrangements recently agreed upon we are entitled to import in 1947 about the same amounts as last year. However, that alone does not assure us supplies. Some of the sources from which we drew heavily last year are no longer available to us; and our need for imports is greater because domestic production of lard and other animal and marine oils and fats is running below last year's levels.

We have been confronted by a very difficult and serious situation. If certain negotiations had fallen through, we should have found ourselves lacking nearly half of our imports of edible oils. Moreover, since the larger part of our domestic supplies does not become available until later in the year, the full impact of this shortage would have fallen in the summer months. Less than half of normal supplies would have been available. Important industries would have been completely disorganized, particularly the baking industry. Shortening for household purposes would virtually have disappeared from retail stores.

To meet this situation we have concluded arrangements which will go far toward assuring us of our minimum 1947 requirements of edible oils. The most important source of these oils available to us this year is the Argentine republic. We have therefore been negotiating with the government of that country to sell us up to 18,000 metric tons at prices which, while above last year's, are considerably below open market quotations prevailing at present, and in all the circumstances can be considered as not unreasonable. We have now reached a firm arrangement for 9,000 tons of oil, and negotiations covering a further 9,000 tons are well advanced.

In discussing these arrangements with us, the Argentine government has drawn our attention to the fact that they have been experiencing serious difficulties in securing their minimum supplies of newsprint and that their country is being less favoured in regard to supplies of newsprint from Canada than other countries also dependent on Canadian supplies. They were only prepared to make edible oils available to us under a special arrangement whereby newsprint tonnage would be made available to Argentina equivalent to the tonnage of oils received. Under this arrangement, which has been agreed to, if the full 18,000 tons of oil is received, the newsprint tonnage sent in return will be less than one-half of one per cent of total Canadian production, estimated at 4,350,000 tons for 1947. The arrangement will therefore have no significant effect on other shipments, domestic or export. If ordinary commercial newsprint shipments to Argentina continue, and I have no reason to believe they will not, the amount of Canadian newsprint going to that country will be somewhat greater than last year, but slightly below the 1940-45 average.

In order to avoid the complications involved in imposing export control, we are implementing our part of the bargain by instructing Canadian Commercial Corporation to buy newsprint from all the Canadian producers, in amounts depending on their production, and sell it to Argentina.

[Later:]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Did the Peron government ask the Canadian government to permit the sending of Mosquito aircraft from Canada as part of the quid pro quo for delivery of oil?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the Minister of Finance at what price newsprint will be sold to the Argentine government? Is it the same price that the Canadian Commercial Corporation will pay the newsprint companies?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I have not that information.

CIVIL SERVICE

PRESS REPORT AS TO FIVE-DAY WEEK FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. Is there any truth in the report published in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday that the government is considering instituting a five-day week in the civil services. It is now on a 36½-hour week.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): So far as I know, no consideration has been given to the matter.

EMIGRATION

CANADIANS LEAVING FOR YUGOSLAVIA—PROTECTION OF PASSPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The question, I believe, is so important and of such pressing urgency that I ask Your Honour's indulgence and that of the house while I give three sentences of explanation of the question.

My question is: Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs take steps to see that the Canadian passports carried by the expatriate Yugoslavs now in process of returning to their homeland are protected in such a way as to prevent their alteration or transference to other persons, and ensure that each Canadian passport issued to this group will be easily identifiable on its reentry into Canada?

I ask this, Mr. Speaker, because first, from press reports, it is obvious that this exodus is a communist-inspired movement; second, because of the trouble with passports issued to those persons going to fight in the Spanish war whose passports were removed from them in Spain, and many of which passports have subsequently been used by international communism; and third, because the Canadian passport is today considered as the most valuable international document of identity.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, although I received notice of the hon. member's question only a few moments before coming to the house, I can give the hon.

member assurance that the department will continue to take all practicable means to safeguard the integrity of Canadian passports. Further, the suggestions contained in the letter covering his notice of question will receive careful consideration.

PERMISSION TO REENTER CANADA—AMOUNT OF CAPITAL EXPORTED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to answer the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), which he said he would take into consideration today?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member is referring to the question of export permits granted to persons returning to Yugoslavia?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have asked my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) if he would make a full statement to the house in the matter. I believe there is considerable information to be gathered before a proper and complete answer can be given. I believe my right hon. friend proposes to make a statement tomorrow, is that not so?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope so.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

QUESTION OF EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture whether, inasmuch as I did not hear the Prime Minister mention a bill extending to British Columbia the principles of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, is it still intended to introduce that legislation at this session?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The matter referred to has been under consideration by the government, and I hope to be able to make a statement about it tomorrow.

RAILWAY ACT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Transport whether included in the list of legislation yet to be brought down is an amendment to the Railway Act?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): It is all ready. The resolution is on the order paper, and I hope to be able to deal with it next week.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 20, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I take note of the time, and I shall fix my course for 4.30. That would appear to be about correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: No; 4.28.

Mr. CASE: I hope I do not need the two extra minutes.

I have listened to the suggestion made with respect to the length of the sessions and the health of the members, and I feel it is an important one. While I sat here today I thought it would be a good idea to start in by ripping those awnings off the windows so as to let a little honest-to-God daylight into this impressive and depressing chamber. I am sure the architect who was responsible for this building must have placed the windows there for some purpose. There is no doubt that glass could be placed in them which would reflect light, and, on occasions, we could have the benefit of some daylight. The leader of the C.C.F. has said that we miss all the sunshine, and he is right.

This afternoon I am privileged to take part in an important debate. In doing so I feel I am favoured inasmuch as I did not lead off at the time when the presentation of the budget had had a certain stimulating effect—an effect, however, which died suddenly after the Canadian people had an opportunity to examine exactly what the budget meant.

It is customary, so it seems, to compliment the Minister of Finance, but I feel on this occasion I shall have to confine myself to complimenting him only upon his personality and his genial manner, because there is nothing in the budget which merits compliment. I shall proceed in a moment or so to indicate why I take that view.

The minister presented to the house a budget in which he indicated a surplus of $352 million. It is only fair to say that he had no more to do with that surplus than did the man in the moon. The minister had only recently arrived from the Department of National Defence, and upon taking office in the Department of Finance he received a legacy, so to speak, from the sale of capital goods, the cost of which we have never been advised. Possibly more than $2 billion worth of goods, which Canadians bought through the purchase of victory bonds and through taxation, were sold for a total of $372 million. In spite of that enormous sum, the best the minister could indicate was a surplus of only $352 million. Yet it was so great that he himself did not know what to do with it. He proceeded to indicate a tapering off in the over-all amount of income tax, but in doing so he did not think of the little fellows who were earning a mere subsistence. He did not change the level at which the tax would apply.

This year he has budgeted for a surplus, but with certain qualifications. He has taken a rather gloomy attitude toward the future, and he is much in doubt as to his ability to deliver the goods. Because of the attitude of the Minister of Finance and the government generally there has been a failure to inspire business or to encourage private enterprise to play its full part, at a time when that inspiration and encouragement are so necessary in the affairs of this nation.

I feel that we might well weigh in the balance the experience of the minister's predecessor, who was charged with the responsibility of raising vast sums of money to carry this nation through a very trying period in our history. He proved himself equal to the task of extracting from the Canadian people, by taxation and by the sale of victory bonds —the best security in the world—at a time when patriotism was running at great heat, untold billions of dollars. But with his mind fixed upon such a large target he failed to weigh in the balance the capabilities of the Canadian people in time of peace and so we found in the estimates last year that the former minister of finance, backed by his years of experience, budgeted for a deficit of approximately $300 million.

When the present Minister of Finance appeared before the House of Commons he gallantly pointed out that through the good management of his predecessor he was able to present a surplus of $352 million. I wonder if the Canadian people realize that they were just about $700 million out in their estimates. In other words, it was nothing more or less than a pure guess. A school boy could have come just about as close to it. If the present Minister of Finance with his limited experience can budget more accurately, then there is no reason to believe that the administration needs any particular financial talent to administer the affairs of the Department of Finance. I say that we must wait and see. I think the Minister of Finance would have shown greater courage and would have inspired the people of Canada had he copied the example of his predecessor and budgeted this year for a deficit of a quarter of a billion dollars, cut right across the levels of taxation and unshackled the restrictions which are handicapping this nation as it fights its way to greater heights in peace time.

I should like to refer to the way in which the budget has been accepted. During the war I remember listening to a talented lady address a public meeting. She said, "If you want to know how the war is going, do not read the headlines, just look at the financial sheet." If you want to know how much this government has inspired business in this country, just turn to the financial sheet in your daily newspaper and there you will find a shrinkage in values to the extent of millions upon millions of dollars.

I am saying this with all kindness and respect, because in making my criticism I want it thoroughly understood that I bear no personal ill will toward any of those sitting opposite. I appreciate indeed the responsibilities which they have assumed, but at the same time as a member sitting on this side of the house I can afford to be critical of their methods. This government has carried on government at the administrative level, but I challenge any member of the government to stand up and say that they have solved one major national problem since the closing days of the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I accept that challenge.

Mr. CASE: Good; you will have an opportunity—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I say that this government has done the finest job of rehabilitating the returned soldier of any country in the world.

Mr. CASE: One can always depend upon the Scottish people to accept almost any challenge and argue a point whether they are right or wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Especially a silly one.

Mr. CASE: There is no one I would rather have accept that challenge than the right hon. gentleman who has just spoken, because there is no one for whom I have greater respect, and there is no one who has been more complimentary to myself.

I wish to deal now with what I consider to be the national problems facing this country, and then I shall assess the value the government places upon the manner in which it has solved these problems. For instance, I am going to ask: Does the government believe that it has solved the housing problem? My experience is that there are scores upon scores of people who are still seeking shelter. There are thousands who believe that government policy has been such as to hamper the construction industry, and that the restrictions which have been retained have handicapped the manufacturers and suppliers.

A resolution was passed by the council of my home city and addressed to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe). The clerk of the municipality has communicated the resolution in the following terms:

> As a result of requests received from the Owen Sound rehabilitation council and from various citizens, the city council has instructed me by resolution, passed unanimously at its meeting held May 12, 1947, to write you requesting that controls upon building materials for the Owen Sound area be removed in order that the same may be released to individuals desiring to undertake the construction of their own homes and to complete homes upon which construction has been started and cannot be completed owing to inability to obtain necessary materials.
> I think I should point out in this connection that in the past eighteen months, the municipal corporation has sold to individuals, 187 building lots upon the condition that the purchasers thereof will construct a dwelling before obtaining title thereto. None of these purchasers to date, has been able to complete his dwelling and claim his deed, due to the fact, in almost every case, that building materials cannot be secured by individuals who have no priority.

The local government bodies are charged with the responsibility of finding some means by which they can provide shelter for their people. Their appeal to the government is to get the building industry out of the muddling mess they have been put into, and give private enterprise a chance to show its worth.

I ask the government: Has it solved the problem of production? Goods are in short supply. Almost any article of great necessity is difficult to obtain. I have heard hon. members claim that they are unable to secure even a shirt, but I believe that that situation has improved somewhat. But the government has failed to solve the problem of supply or production.

I ask further: Has the government solved the agricultural problem? All I have to do is to point to the thousands upon thousands of vacant farms throughout Canada to show whether farming has lost its attractiveness, or whether the government has inspired people to return to the soil and dig from the good earth the wealth the nation depends upon, the food that the world is seeking to prevent starvation. It is true that many factors enter into this question. Farming has not lost all its attractiveness, and I would be the first to encourage a return to the farm lands of this country. I believe there is something in store for our farmers, but the tendency is to make it so attractive for people to leave the farms and seek to earn their living in urban centres, in the bright lights, that it is almost impossible for farmers to carry on and secure the help they need for their farms. Indeed the farmer cannot depend upon a thirty-six hour, a forty hour or a forty-four hour week or an eight hour day. His time is set by the sun, and he must employ his labour and talents from daylight to darkness in order that his work can be completed. However, we find the natural tendency is to encourage people to become more or less dependent upon some central authority. In other words we are developing amongst our people a nation of leaners rather than leaders. The natural trend is toward governmental paternalism. In time, then we look back and assess this period in our day and generation, we shall find that it was one of the most dangerous periods through which we have passed.

History, Mr. Speaker, has a habit of repeating itself. Students of history will tell you that when the great Roman empire was on the march, when they were beating their ploughshares into swords, they were masters and monarchs of all they surveyed; but the moment they began to make it more attractive for people to live in the urban centres, when their people began to flock into their towns and cities from the great agricultural lands, the great nation began to crumble and decay, and today not a vestige of that empire remains. As a matter of fact we hear no more of the great Roman empire.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. CASE: If the hon. member would like to ask one.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does he think that the suggestion of the financial critic of the official opposition, the hon. member for Muskoka-

Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), of increasing the interest rates, would encourage the buying of these unoccupied farms?

Mr. FERGUSON: Figure it out for yourself.

Mr. CASE: To begin with, I have not the speech of the hon. member before me, and I do not know whether the hon. member who has asked the question would put the proper construction upon it, but I shall tell him that from my own point of view interest rates are directly related to our general over-all economy. One has a direct relation to the other, but just where the balance is I am not going to indicate at this time.

I have spoken of houses; I have spoken of production; I have spoken of agriculture and I am now going to ask if the government has solved or even indicated its ability to solve the problem of holding this nation together in the sense that we appreciate national unity. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that they have almost wrecked confederation, and I say that with all sincerity; because they have gone forward by hook or by crook, by intrigue or by persuasion, to bring into line seven of the provinces of Canada, to get them to make an agreement with the central authority, while they overlook the fact, that within this great dominion, in the two central provinces, reside over sixty per cent of the entire population of Canada. From this same area comes over seventy per cent of the entire revenue of the dominion.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): All through tariff.

Mr. CASE: If there had been a desire to arrive at a uniform agreement there would have been common ground on which they could have traded. As a matter of fact I cannot understand why the government should seek to lay down a formula which had to be accepted in its entirety when they would have been making equally good progress had they accomplished any one part of the programme.

It seems strange that the impression should be abroad that by having one central taxing authority and by passing out money to the various provinces which are not charged with the responsibility of raising the money, you can lower taxation. The direct opposite is likely to be the result. No government should spend money that it is not responsible for raising. The government which raises the money should spend it and answer to the people from whom the money comes. That is the only way we can properly assess, criticize or determine their ability as administrators.

I can think of the days gone by in the history of the country, when it was determined that we should become a confederation, when there gathered first at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and later in the city of Quebec, those who later were known as the fathers of confederation. If we think that our task today is a difficult one, we have only to imagine how much more difficult their task must have been in those early days when they faced problems which were practically unknown. And yet by a series of compromises they were able to bring about the birth of a great nation. I would remind the house that this same confederation is held together in a spirit of compromise. It is held together indeed by a very delicate thread, and it would not take a great deal to upset it. The present administration is charged with the awful responsibility of determining our future course. It transcends all political parties or partisanship of any kind. We know the difficulties that are experienced, but no one can charge the premier of Ontario with blocking the agreements, when all you have to do is to refer back to the time when a farmer from Elgin county by the name of Mitchell F. Hepburn walked out of the conference and would not even enter into negotiations. Therefore, sir, I say to you that you have before you a clear picture which is apparently unsatisfactory to those who are responsible for the negotiations.

I now come to the matter of trade. Our over-all trade picture has attractive features, but I am thinking of our position with respect to the United States of America, and I am asking myself a lot of questions. I am sure the Minister of Finance and his advisers must be greatly concerned about the constant draining off of United States dollars or United States exchange at a time when we need that exchange to carry on our business. I could not understand why the exchange situation was levelled at parity, and I asked the then minister of finance, now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) where the pressure came from. With all due respect we must accept the answer he gave the other day in reply to the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). Nevertheless I say to him and I say to the government that there must have been pressure from some source, because to my knowledge, and I have been a fairly regular attendant at the house sessions, no member of the House of Commons ever rose in his place and advocated parity with the United States dollar. Do hon. members ever stop to realize the advantage that we enjoyed? Yet the Minister of Finance referred to this in his budget address and said that on the whole it was working out satisfactorily, or words to that effect. Do hon. members ever stop to think that this is a time when we are seeking to expand Canadian markets? For a time we enjoyed the great advantage, when our Canadian dollar was worth only ninety cents in the United States, or conversely the United States dollar would buy $1.10 worth of goods in Canada. It was not only the trade with the United States of America, but trade we were seeking to develop in Latin America, the very trade that the Minister of Finance referred to this afternoon with Argentina. All this was wrapped up in the standard value of the United States dollar. Then, what happened with respect to our gold mining industry? After all, gold remains a standard of value because it is durable, and we have plenty of it in our hinterland and in our rocks, but we must encourage miners and free enterprise to take this precious metal and put it where it can be used in a monetary sense as a backlog for the nation's trading balances.

I think it was the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) who made the remark that the best thing that could happen to Canada would be for the United States to raise the price of gold. I regret that we take that attitude, because this is one instance in which Canada can indeed offer to give a sense of leadership. We should not have to wait for the United States to increase the value of gold. For our own protection and for the benefit of one of our great natural resources, one of the largest employers of labour, we should set our course to encourage the mining of gold. It would be within the realm of possibility to pay $40 an ounce, for native-mined gold, or even more; because once you have paid $40 an ounce for gold you are no longer paying interest upon that sum; you have a durable medium of exchange which will satisfy all trading balances throughout the civilized and trading world.

Now I have said that the government has failed to give leadership and inspire industry, that it has failed to solve one major national problem, and I have been challenged by the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I have no doubt that when he speaks on the budget he will indicate clearly the problem he feels he has solved, and if he refers to his own particular department I will pay him this compliment: I believe he is making every effort to solve his problems as they arise.

I believe, too, I should be complimentary to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen). I was sorry to hear of his rather serious illness, but I had it in mind to convey to him the compliments to which I intend now to give expression. He has shown a sense of leadership in setting up a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to examine the Indian Act. I believe that as a result of his initiative there will come some source of help and enlightenment in the building up of the Indian population of Canada who were our first citizens. I feel it is a great honour to have been associated with that committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. The members have been faithful in their attendance and sincere in their approach, and that is one place where I always feel quite happy, because politics are entirely forgotten and we work together for something that will bring to Canada and Canadian Indians some measure of relief which will free these people from that feeling of inferiority from which they have suffered.

The former secretary of state, now Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), might have been commended for a noble act when he brought into the house the citizenship bill, which was received in Canada with a great deal of fanfare, and which he so ably piloted through this house. It was well received, but unfortunately he put it on the auction block and offered it for five dollars. The first bidder was the Prime Minister; then the minister knocked it down to one dollar, and yesterday the Postmaster General said he would put it out in the form of postage stamps. I think it is in order to ask him how many postage stamps one has to buy in order to obtain a citizenship certificate.

May I remind the Minister of Finance that he continues to discriminate against married women. He has put the married women in a different class from any other Canadians, and I think that should be resented. In our hospitals and other institutions where women were willing to work, and where they are badly needed, he has said in effect that every woman may earn $750 a year before becoming liable for taxation, but that so far as married women are concerned, for every dollar the married woman earns over $250 her husband will have to take it off his exemption. That is a rank discrimination.

Another respect in which there has been neglect is that no consideration has been shown for parents with children over twenty-one who are going in for higher education. It is not every parent who is financially able to see his children through school so far as higher education is concerned. The better his education, the better equipped he is mentally and academically, the greater becomes a young man's potentiality as a taxpayer. I certainly think that some provision should be made for exemptions for parents of young men and women attending university, going in for medicine, law, or any other recognized profession, in order that such parents might be encouraged to divert some of their money towards that purpose. I for one know something about the sacrifices generally that are made in that respect.

The Postmaster General set out to solve his problems by introducing a bill which gave him wide powers to grant bonuses up to $800,000 to rural mail carriers. But that solved nothing. The rural mail carriers should be put upon a basis where allowance would be made for depreciation in respect of equipment, and they should be entitled to join in some superannuation scheme on a contributory basis. If that were done it would satisfy a lot of rural mail carriers.

As a matter of fact, speaking of superannuation. I suggest that if this government showed a sense of leadership it would long ago have given consideration to some method of superannuation for members of parliament, so that the moment a man arrived here he would begin to pay into a superannuation fund, and if he were rejected at the next election, if he failed to return he would have laid the foundation for a contributory old age pension on his own behalf. Many who are in this house today have spent their lives in the public service. Under the scheme I suggest they would eventually be superannuated or would have some guarantee of economic security in their advanced years. There are many politicians, I might say, who find themselves poorer instead of being enriched after long years of public service, and that is not a very fine tribute to the appreciation which the people have of their public servants.

I have said that there has been no leadership. I have been here for a number of years, and apart from the citizenship bill and the Indian affairs investigation which is under way, and which I hope will result in something, I have yet to find any major piece of legislation which would inspire our citizens. There is no overall planning. There is no programme of expansion or building, and we know that our country is languishing from lack of direction.

I look upon our municipal councils as the very bulwark of democracy. They live close to the people and can interpret the people's needs and wishes better than any other level of government. We know that services are badly needed. Take, for instance, our educational institutions. Thousands upon thousands of dollars must be spent, and spent immediately; and certainly over a period of years hundreds of millions will be spent to guarantee to our children a proper education. Would members of the House of Commons be surprised to learn that in Saskatchewan alone almost one thousand Indian children are being denied education because there are no schools? That is a direct responsibility of the federal government, leaving the municipalities out of it. We are in dire need of more educational institutions.

Again, take our hospitals, gaols and asylums. Consider the hospital situation, particularly as regards mental patients. Some members may have read a series of articles in Liberty magazine by D. M. LeBourdais on what the writer terms "Canada's shame" with regard to our mental hospitals. I am not going to attempt to deal conclusively with this matter, but I would refer to the situation in the province of Quebec, where there is one mental institution housing 6,200 of these unfortunate souls who are condemned to a life of despair, sorrow and darkness, with about ten part-time doctors or psychiatrists. The inmates are sleeping in the corridors, anywhere a place can be found to put them. Moreover if you will read the report of General R. B. Gibson, a commissioner appointed under order in council P.C. 1313, regarding the penitentiary system in Canada and turn to page 11 you will find that he said:

> A population of 1,100 is too large to be handled efficiently in one institution, and the facilities available in St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary are inadequate to deal with a population of that size.

Mr. Speaker, no one of these institutions can properly house 1,100 persons. Yet we have across Canada a situation with respect to our mental institutions which is a disgrace indeed to organized society. I have pleaded with this government to use the credit of the country and the public services to construct such buildings, which ordinarily fall in the non-taxable class, for the purposes of educational institutions, gaols, asylums and hospitals. If that were done at least it would be a lead. While some have said that the adoption of this plan would be a blow at big business, I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that it would leave a field for big business that would inspire others to further achievements in the development of Canada. It would encourage the return to this country of thousands of our young men who have gone to the United States and other parts of the world; and among them are scientists and engineers whose ability we miss and whose devotion to science and engineering would make a great contribution to the people of this nation. If you think I am wrong about that, I want to read into the record a statement by one whom I consider sufficient authority to back me up on this issue. I quote as follows:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile.

These words come from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in an article entitled, "The Issues as I See Them", published in Maclean's magazine of September 15, 1935. That was when the right hon. gentleman was in opposition, and they were the fine words he used to describe the issues as he saw them then. Since that time, to the credit of the government or his administration, they did create the Bank of Canada as a complete public institution. We could use the facilities of the Bank of Canada to guarantee the things which this nation is crying for. I am not asking for a hand-out. I do not want to associate myself with any bonuses or gratuities which are not earned. I subscribe to the theory that a dollar which is not earned has no value. As a matter of fact I will venture to say that you could walk down the street in the city of Ottawa with a handful of brand new ten dollar bills, and if you attempted to give them away nobody would want them because people would question whether they had any value. In other words the value of money depends entirely upon its acceptability and upon confidence in your system of government. I am reminded by someone back of me that I might try that experiment. But that very same gentleman offered me his roll yesterday and I questioned its value because I thought he was altogether too generous. Even yet I think it is fictitious.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that when a workman works, he earns his living by the sweat of his brow. We can process our natural resources, such as our rocks, our minerals and our forests, and we can erect structures which will become an asset to the nation, and what does the worker do when he is paid? Well, ordinarily he might buy himself a package of cigarettes for thirty-three cents, and twenty-five cents of that or thereabouts will be for taxation purposes. Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if you go for a shopping tour in Ottawa this afternoon with your wife—

Mr. REID: It is a half holiday this afternoon.

Mr. CASE: Then do it tomorrow afternoon, and I will go with you. In going around the shops in Ottawa, spending what you would spend in an average budget, a matter of about $25, how many of you realize that almost $8 of the $25 you spend goes for taxation purposes? That is the situation which exists at the present time. Even the best of these people need some sense of leadership, but above all they need the facilities which this nation can provide. Rich though it is in resources, the only way in which we can guarantee the new heaven and the new earth that the Prime Minister spoke about during the dark days of the war is to give effect to the productive genius of this nation, to encourage all our people to put their shoulders to the wheel and earn their living by the sweat of their brows and not depend on any hand-outs.

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, more than sufficient time has elapsed to permit the country at large to digest the sensational sections of the budget. The result, it would appear from information at hand, is such that, instead of finding himself or herself with a potentially greater income, the man or woman with an average pay cheque or envelope finds the opposite to be the case. In fact, the months of May and June will see them further behind, financially speaking.

On numerous occasions the attention of the house has been directed to the tables illustrating the "percentage reduction from present rates" of income tax to that of the proposed rates of income tax. When one looks at the tables in question it cannot be denied that it is correct that the government can save the taxpayer a sum of money ranging from fifty-four per cent in the lower brackets to seven per cent in the upper brackets over the amount contributed currently. However, an examination of another set of government statistics, appearing in the same document with the tables of reductions, reveals that "the cost of living and wholesale price index" has steadily risen in the instance of all items from 124 in June, 1946, to 127 in December, 1946, to 128 in February of this year. These figures are taken from the budget in Hansard of Tuesday, April 29, 1947, and can be seen on page 2600 of that document. The same table gives a more dreary picture in the instance of "wholesale prices", which reveal a figure of 142 for June, 1946; 145 for December, 1946; 148 for January, 1947, and 153 for February, 1947.

It would be most enlightening to know what the price index reveals for the current month, now that prices are really starting to climb, with the lifting of subsidies and price ceilings on a long line of goods.

Allow me to illustrate in another fashion what I have just noted. It is found that in the case of a married man with two children of family allowance age the government will save this man with an $1,800 annual income the truly stupendous sum of $16 in his next income tax return. That is about thirty cents a week. If this typical family uses only three pounds of butter a week the saving in income tax is completely wiped out by the action of the government in removing the subsidy on butter. Add to this the rising cost of eggs, Cheddar cheese and other staples of the dinner table, and the so-called saving in income tax gradually mounts to a sizable deficit. The humorous side, if such it can be called in dealing with a serious subject of this kind, is that today the family in question is also paying more money in higher prices, whereas the so-called saving in income tax, running as high as fifty-four per cent, does not take effect until July 1 of this year.

I should like to deal for a few moments with the basis on which the reductions in income tax have been computed in the present budget. The Minister of Finance has said that the reductions are as high as fifty-four per cent in the lower brackets, and as low as six and seven per cent in the higher brackets. As we check the figures in the budget there can be no doubt that this is true; but one thing has bothered me. I wonder why the income tax reductions this year have been computed on a percentage basis. People who have made a study of previous budgets introduced in this house tell me that reductions have always been computed on a dollar basis. If the amount to be contributed in income tax were either increased or decreased in any previous budget, the differences were given on a dollar basis. Of course it is quite easy to convert the percentage basis to the dollar basis, and in order to develop the argument I wish to present this afternoon I am going to do that at the present time.

Let us take, for example, the fifty-four per cent reduction in income tax paid by those coming within the lower income brackets. For a single person earning $800 per annum, this reduction of fifty-four per cent means a saving of $6 in the amount of money he will contribute to the federal treasury this year. Last year he had to pay $11, so that the saving is fifty-four per cent; but the dollar saving is only $6 per annum. Take the case of a married man with no children, whose annual income is $1,800. He, too, saves fifty-four per cent. This year the new income tax rates will save him $16, while on the basis of a full twelve months' period the dollar saving will be $32. Let us consider for a moment the man who receives a much larger income and who has been given a reduction of only seven per cent. According to the tables, the income tax reduction of seven per cent applies to incomes of around $200,000 or more. Of course such incomes will be made up of salaries, investments and so on; but the seven per cent reduction on $200,000 amounts to $10,385 per annum. Then take the case of a man receiving an annual salary of $5,000. His reduction in income tax is fourteen times greater than the reduction given the man in the $1,000 a year bracket. Similarly the reduction given the man earning $10,000 per annum; his reduction in income tax is almost thirty times greater than the reduction of the man earning $1,000 a year.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): But how much more does he pay?

Mr. MOORE: That has nothing to do with the point I want to develop, but I have the tables here which I shall be glad to let the hon. gentleman have if he would like to see them, giving the reductions in income tax for the three groups I have mentioned.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It doesn't make any difference what he pays; it is what he has left after he pays it.

Mr. BENTLEY: He doesn't want an answer to the question; he just wants to be funny.

Mr. MOORE: I appreciate the hon. member's question, since I endeavour to study these questions as deeply as possible. The point I am making is that I believe the government should have completely eliminated the income tax on all incomes within the lower brackets. During the past two years the trades and labour council and the Canadian Congress of Labour have submitted briefs asking that all incomes within the lower brackets, that is up to $2,000 for a married person and $1,000 for a single person, should be absolved from the payment of income tax. I think a careful study of the budget indicates that this could be done and the government could still maintain sufficient revenue adequately to carry on the services of the country. As we peruse the pages of the present budget we find that the reduction in personal income taxes amounts to around $70,000,000 a year, while the reduction in the excess profits tax amounts to $269,000,000, or approximately four times as much. The taxation statistics put out by the Department of National Revenue for 1946 show the amount collected in taxation from the income group I have been discussing, that is those receiving from $1,000 to $2,000 per annum, in round figures amounts to approximately $145,000,000. So I submit that if the government had wished to do so they could have largely eliminated taxation in this field and made up the difference by way of extractions from the excess profits tax.

I do not want any hon. member to think I have anything against companies and corporations in Canada which are making profits, but I think the excess profits tax is a fair tax because it is based upon profits which are greater than normal. During the depression years from 1936 to 1939 we found that a large number of Canadian companies were able to make pretty fair profits. When the war broke out, the excess profits taxation was imposed, under which the average profit for the four years mentioned was known as the standard profit. Anything in excess of that became excess profits and subject to heavy taxation. I believe the government should continue that plan into the peacetime era. I believe it should be continued for this reason, that in Canada today we have a twenty-seven year backlog of production. First, we had the depression, during which a considerable backlog of production developed. Then, we had the war period, when another backlog of production developed. We also have foreign markets, and at the present time our industries are running all-out in an effort to supply them. So today the profits of Canadian industry are the highest in the history of this country, and I think the government should take steps to collect a large proportion of that money in taxation, which could be used to provide better social services to our people.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the hon. member would permit a question, what would he do in the case of a small manufacturer who made $15,000 during the standard period, we will say, and who is now doing three or four times that amount of business because of his abilities and the work he has put into his concern? Would the hon. member take all that profit away from him, or would he allow that manufacturer to grow?

Mr. MOORE: I take it, Mr. Speaker, that companies and corporations are very much like individuals. There may be two individuals in a certain line of business. One will make a success; the other will not be able to get along so well. I believe a case such as that mentioned by the hon. member should be considered by the government, and if it is found necessary to make reductions in such a case, then I believe those reductions should be made so that the taxes on those industries which are not as successful would be lower. However I do not see that this argument has very much weight at the present time. There may be some industries in regard to which certain reservations would have to be made; but, generally speaking, Canadian industry is running all-out today and making greater profits than ever before. I have in my hand a number of press clippings: "B.C. Pulp and Paper doubles its profit this year. Nets $991,000." Another, "Borden's Milk sales the highest in four years." Another article is headed "76 per cent profit gain for oil company"—and this is the Canadian Oil Companies Limited. Another states "Sears, Roebuck doubled" its profit, and another states, "Price's net profit shows 123 per cent boost."

Those are things which I think the government should cash in on. It should use the excess profits tax to the full, and collect taxes in order to provide social services for this country. No one believes more fully than I do in the services rendered by the federal government, but I think it is following a wrong policy in not fully taxing big business in Canada. There are other advantages which would occur if the suggestion were followed that taxation on smaller incomes be wiped out. One would be a tremendous saving in the labour of administration which goes into the work of compiling, printing and checking income tax papers of the groups which should not be paying taxes on small earnings. This saving in work would then permit the harassed revenue department to concentrate still more on larger incomes, which would result in still greater revenues for the government in tracking down those who are not now paying the income tax they should be paying.

It is true that this is another problem. Yet it is a fact that the removal of income tax from the lower levels would permit revenue officials to concentrate more on those who are avoiding their responsibility by not paying their full share of income tax. This does not mean that the great bulk of income tax returns are incorrect, because it is felt that the great majority of people are inherently honest. However, among those in the higher brackets there is a fair percentage who are not paying all that the tax laws require. It is this group which I have in mind, and which revenue officials will admit exists in goodly numbers.

Whilst I am on this subject of taxing still further the higher income tax payers, I might observe that action should have been taken in absolving from taxation the incomes of married women who are working and earning sums less than $1,000. It has been the experience of many that married women who go out and earn some money in addition to that earned by their husbands, usually do so because there is an economic need for such earnings. I do not believe the average husband desires that his wife should be a bread-winner. But if it is necessary, in these days of high living costs, for both to earn a livelihood, then some assistance should be given these people by lowering the amounts they should pay in income tax to the federal treasury.

I cannot help coming to the conclusion that a reduction of the amounts to be collected in income tax in the near future has resulted in no benefits such as the government attempted to visualize in the budget now under discussion. I do not wish to say more at this time with respect to the personal income tax.

I now turn to the excess profits tax. I am of the opinion that a most serious error has been made by the government in reducing its income from this source. Since the name implies that these are "excess profits", there should have been no argument whatsoever as to the reduction or otherwise of this tax. Apparently, according to the government, it is perfectly satisfactory for large business organizations and individuals not to be taxed as heavily on their more-than-normal profits.

Mr. ABBOTT: Would the hon. member permit one simple question? How does he define normal profits?

Mr. MOORE: When I refer to normal profits I refer to what the government established as the standard profit on which excess profits taxes were based. I regret that I did not use the word "standard".

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish to argue with the hon. member, but that is the difficulty, and it is also the basis of the unfairness of a so-called excess profits tax in peace time. However, as I said, I do not wish to interrupt.

Mr. MOORE: According to the figures in the budget, the revenue from the excess profits tax will mean that the federal treasury stands to gain approximately $500 million. It is possible that the saving granted to large business groups in respect of their excess profits tax will be more than sufficient to meet the federal government's obligations in respect of old age pensions payments. I could go through the budget and show other instances where the amount saved by business in reduced excess profits taxes would pay for the cost of other essential services. And hon. members should note with care that these are excess profits.

I cannot by any stretch of the imagination worry myself about the so-called burden carried by big business when called upon to pay the treasury taxes on their excess profits. After all, this is not a matter of paying taxes on ordinary profits. Again I emphasize that these are taxes on excess profits. According to the income tax laws, there is more than enough leeway for these large corporations to meet many obligations, which can include large amounts of money for all sorts of expenses, depreciation, sinking funds, and a great host of other items which are properly deductible under the law from excess profits. With these facts in mind, it can scarcely be said that the keeping of the excess profits tax at its former level would be a hardship on big business.

The government is considering amending the statute which deals with the excess profits tax. If this change is to be implemented, plans should be made to retain that objective whereby taxes on excess profits would continue to remain at a high level so as to ensure the government a large source of income and at the same time permit further tax reductions in the salaries of those in the lowest income brackets.

A study of the revenues the government expects from the huge taxes on items such as candy, soft drinks, chewing gum and other similar items reveals that these revenues are not so great when compared with total revenues expected. It is granted that the figures will reach a sum of about $32 million, most of which will be taken from the small allowances of young children, and from poor people, who indulge in consuming these penny products.

To make up for this loss of revenue, if these so-called nuisance taxes were either wiped out or reduced considerably, the taxes on such items as pari-mutuel bets, luxury products which only the wealthy can afford, might well be raised to meet the difference. Beyond question, the revenues received from pari-mutuel bets should be much higher than they are at the present time, on the principle that if people have money to throw away at race tracks the government should take advantage of this tendency and collect every possible cent. As the racing business is conducted today, most of the money does not go to the betting fans but rather into the coffers of the operators. I would much rather deprive race track operators of some of their dollars than increase the cost of a chocolate bar for a child. As the situation stands today, that is what is taking place.

One of the items which contributes to the high cost of living is the sales tax which, in my view, in many ways could be described as one of the nuisance taxes. Since there are few items not subject to sales tax, a reduction of one or two per cent in this tax would reduce the cost of living by an almost similar amount. This is a subject the government might well consider, and thus give some reduction in the cost of living.

There are a number of matters to which the government should give immediate consideration, and which should be included in the next budget presented to the House of Commons. One of these is an increase in pensions for the blind. I am sure most hon. members have within the past four or five months received letters and resolutions requesting increased pensions for blind persons. Any move on the part of the government to increase these allowances to blind people would be a worthy gesture.

I should like to devote the time remaining at my disposal to a discussion of matters affecting my own constituency. I come from a part of the country which is comparatively new so far as development is concerned. The matter with which I should like to deal now has been brought to the attention of this house already by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller). It has to do with the completion of No. 10 highway from The Pas to Flin Flon, Manitoba. No doubt hon. members will wonder why I bring up this matter in the house since it is a purely provincial issue, but I do so because the government set a precedent during the war years by contributing funds to provincial governments for the construction of highways in mining areas. This was done particularly in Ontario and Quebec. I shall not take the time to give the details of the moneys provided by the federal government to construct highways in those areas.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was to open up new mining areas.

Mr. MOORE: I agree that it was to open up new mining areas. Flin Flon grew rapidly from a village in 1930 to its present size. The provincial government of Manitoba began the construction of this highway just before the war, but the construction was stopped after the outbreak of the war and for some reason they have not been able to get going again. About fifty miles of the highway needs to be constructed. This is through a difficult country and the cost of construction will be high, possibly between $450,000 and $500,000 to complete the road. Apparently the Manitoba government does not feel that it is financially capable of undertaking the job.

The people in Flin Flon have become rather tired of having to depend upon the railroad for communication with the outside world. Although the service is as good as could be expected from a second class railroad, it is not good enough for a city the size of Flin Flon. There is a growing feeling throughout the whole district that No. 10 highway should be completed as soon as possible. It would be greatly appreciated if the federal government could see its way clear to contribute at least a part of the cost of constructing this highway to the provincial government.

There is another angle from which this matter of constructing this road can be approached. According to a report made the other day by the provincial government of Manitoba, the premier of that province has announced a surplus of $4,000,000 for last year. At one time the present leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken) represented the provincial constituency of The Pas in the Manitoba legislature. This was when he was the premier of the province. This matter was brought up the other day by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, a member of the Progressive Conservative party.

I think I shall send a copy of his speech to the Honourable Errick Willis, minister of public works in the provincial government, who is a member and leader of the provincial Progressive Conservative party. There is a coalition government in Manitoba and I would hope that the federal Progressive Conservative group and the provincial Progressive Conservative group could get together with the minister of public works of the province in order to bring about the much needed completion of highway No. 10.

There is just one other item with which I should like to deal at this time. This was brought up yesterday by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) when he discussed a telegram which he had received from the board of trade regarding the inauguration of an air service between Winnipeg and Flin Flon via Dauphin and The Pas. The people in Flin Flon are particularly interested in having an air mail service included in that service and I would ask the ministers concerned to give every consideration to the inclusion of an air mail service which is so much desired by the people living in this northern area.

Mr. J. I. HAMEL (St. Maurice-Lafleche): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my remarks on the budget in my own language, I think this would be a proper time to congratulate my English-speaking colleagues who have used the French language in part of their speeches. To my mind they were well advised in doing so, because they showed to the people of this country their desire for a better understanding between our people. My remarks will deal, first, with the budget and then, second, with federal-provincial relations.

As far as the budget itself is concerned, I would point out that in my opinion it is unfair to the low income groups whose situation will be worse in 1947 and 1948 than it was during the war. Coming to the federal-provincial relations, I intend to make clear that the federal proposals are based on five equivocals and they face the provinces with three alternatives. First, they are faced with the alternative of signing the agreement and giving away their legislative autonomy in the matter of direct taxation. Second, they are faced with the alternative, as far as Quebec is concerned, of losing some $50 million. Third, which arises from the second alternative, is the serious consideration by these provinces to withdraw from confederation.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the budget. I do not intend to play the financial expert, but simply to discuss this document as would the average citizen, who will be called upon to pay the costs.

Most newspapers have given a lot of publicity to the reductions announced in the speech of the Hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), whom I am pleased to congratulate for the extraordinary ability he showed in defending what, in my opinion, was a bad cause.

The budget introduced on April 29 last, is bad because it is antisocial and prejudicial to the family, for the following reasons:

First, indirect taxation remains at the same level and, according to forecasts, will produce $300,000,000 more than last year. One does not have to be a financial expert to realize to what extent indirect taxation, added to the price paid by the consumer, increases the cost of living.

Second, the reductions announced in the income tax are absolutely misleading. When they are considered in relation with the general economic policy of the government and the country, it becomes plain that wage-earners in the lower brackets will be more heavily burdened in 1947 and 1948 than last year.

A few figures will suffice, I believe, to prove that statement. Take the single man earning $750 a year. He will be entitled to a reduction of $6 on his income tax; on the other hand, due to the cancellation of subsidies which he previously enjoyed on certain goods, due to the increased prices of certain essential commodities, he will be more heavily burdened than last year.

Supposing that he consumed one pint of milk every day, or 183 quarts per year, he will have to pay $5.49 more on account of the removal of the milk subsidy. If he pays $12 per month for his room, the rental increase will mean for him the payment of $14.40 more during the year. Supposing, further, that he consumes one pound of butter per week, he will have to pay, under that item, $5.20 more. I could keep on adding to that list. In fact, he pays $6 less for income tax, but for three essential commodities he will have to pay $25.09 more. Can any one advance seriously the claim that the position of people in the lower salary brackets is being improved?

Those facts are all the more striking when the position of family heads is considered. Let us take the case of a married man with no children whose yearly income is $1,600. The tax reduction from which he will benefit will amount to $12. He will have to pay $10.95 more for his milk. If his rental was $20 per month, he will have to add $24 a year on account of the 10 per cent increase, and probably $7.50 to cover the rise in the price of butter. The net result is a decrease of $12 in his income tax and an increase of $42.45 in the cost of living, hence a net decrease of $30.45 in his purchasing power merely for those items.

The position of the married man with two children is still worse. If his income amounts to $1,800 the tax reduction in his case is $10. He will have to pay $21.90 more for his milk on the basis of two quarts per day. For his rent, supposing he pays $25 per month, he will have to pay $30 more for the full year. As regards butter, the extra expenditure will be $10.40, if his family's consumption is two pounds per week. The net result is a reduction of $10 in his income tax and an increase of $62.30 in the cost of living; hence a net decrease of $52.30 in his purchasing power.

Such a state of things will, to my mind, give rise to labour conflicts which are always very unfortunate for the people as the whole. In order that the working masses might be provided with a suitable purchasing power, all wage-earners, and married persons more particularly, whose income did not exceed $3,000 should pay no income tax.

To prevent our middle class—for which I have a great deal of sympathy—from being taxed too heavily as a result of the exemptions granted small wage-earners, the government should resort to radical means and bring about a monetary reform in order to reduce the budget by some $450,000,000, which amount only represents the interest we must pay.

If the small wage-earner, after considering his own case, looks over the treatment afforded corporations which draw their income from profits, he will wonder whether at present, when companies are accumulating profits that are perhaps unequalled in history, it is fitting to eliminate taxes on excess profits.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize that I am not a socialist. In comparing the pros and cons of state enterprise with those of private enterprise, I favour the latter on principle. However, I cannot help realizing that if private enterprise is unable to exercise self-discipline and to be content with reasonable profits, it will be the main cause of its own downfall. I am not unaware that, during the war, revenue derived from capital was heavily taxed. However, in that sphere, we must not lose sight of certain things.

In the first place, as a result of the war, personal income tax has increased far more than corporation income tax.

At page 930 of the "Canada Year Book" for the year 1946, I find that personal income tax receipts increased from 46·5 millions, in round figures, in 1939 to 763 millions, in round figures, in 1945, representing an increase of over 1600 per cent.

Income tax levied on corporations, dividends and interest increased from 95 millions in 1939 to approximately 303·5 millions in 1945, representing an increase of slightly over 300 per cent.

On the other hand, as happens in practically every war, income derived from capital increased far more than that derived from labour.

Again, at page 908 of the "Canada Year Book" for the year 1946, I find that income derived from labour increased from $2,540,000,000 in 1939 to $5,037,000,000 in 1945, while income derived from investments increased from $782,000,000 in 1939 to $1,811,000,000 in 1945.

After deducting income tax in both cases, I find that income derived from labour increased by approximately 171 per cent from 1939 to 1945, while income from investments increased by some 220 per cent.

In view of the above, I wonder how the government could be justified in maintaining a tax on the incomes of small wage-earners while announcing at the same time the abolition of the excess profits tax.

I repeat that, in my humble opinion, such an attitude will give rise to industrial disputes for which the greater responsibility will fall upon the government. In order to ensure social peace and the normal distribution of production which can be derived from our economic organization, it would be but fair and just to decrease the return on capital and increase the return on labour; but we are doing exactly the opposite. No wonder that subversive theories find suitable ground in our country.

The present budget is antisocial because it grants no relief to the small taxpayer, but it is even more so as far as families, and especially large families, are concerned.

Let me give in that connection a few examples of injustice. First, the income tax reductions granted for the first two children are greater than that granted for the third child and so on.

I have here a copy of the 1946 income tax form used by taxpayers. Let us take, for example, the case of a married man whose income is $1,800 per annum. If he has not children, he will pay income tax to the extent of $172 per year. If he has one child, he pays $118 or $54 less. If he has two, he pays $64 or $108 less. The reduction is $54 for each child.

A man with three children pays $21. The average reduction for each child is brought down to $50.33. But a man with four children pays $7. The average tax reduction for each child comes down to $41.25.

This unfair treatment is coupled with the decreasing rates of family allowances.

Mr. LESAGE: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he actually suggesting that the head of a family with four children pays $21 income tax on a salary of $1,800?

Mr. HAMEL: Those figures are taken from the last income tax form which has been distributed to taxpayers for 1946. My hon. friend will observe that the present budget is based on the same principle.

Mr. LESAGE: But it is precisely this injustice which is removed by the present budget.

Mr. HAMEL: I shall prove that the injustice remains.

Mr. LESAGE: Not on a salary of $1,800 per year.

Mr. HAMEL: Perhaps not on the same salary.

But when I look into the position of the married man with a monthly income of $200 in 1947, here is what I find, according to the income tax reduction schedule for 1947, on page 24 of the publication issued by the Department of National Revenue. He is granted a $2 monthly reduction for his first children. But this drops to $1.75 for the eighth child.

On the other hand, while family allowances amount to $8 in the case of the first children, they come down to $2 for the eighth child.

If I add to the above remarks that indirect taxes are in no way reduced but greatly increased because of the rise in the cost of living, I must conclude that the present budget is absolutely antisocial and detrimental to the family.

I wish to say a few words now on federal-provincial relations.

According to our constitution, to whom does the power of direct taxation belong? Does it belong to the provinces exclusively? Have provincial legislatures concurrent jurisdiction with the federal parliament in these matters? Have provincial legislatures higher jurisdiction than the central authority?

Some hon MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HAMEL: All those questions can be discussed by experts in constitutional law. But one thing is generally admitted and the act is very clear on this point. Provincial legislatures have the power of direct taxation. Section 92 (2) of the British North America Act is positive and unequivocal.

(Text):

In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

2. Direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

(Translation):

In view of that legislation and of the outbreak of war, the Dominion government asked the provinces, in 1942, to relinquish temporarily their right to direct taxation.

Due to the war also, the provincial legislatures agreed to the Dominion's request, but in my opinion they did wrong. Now that the war is over, the time has come to find a permanent solution to that important problem. At the present time it seems that the stand taken by Ottawa towards the provinces is as follows: We have invaded the field of direct taxation and we intend to stay. Whether or not you sign the proposed agreement depends on you. If you sign, we will give you in return, in the case of the province of Quebec, something like 50 million dollars. If you refuse to sign, and it is up to you—cynical is it not—we shall not give you anything and we shall continue to collect personal and corporation income taxes as well as succession duties, in the same manner and at the same rate for all provinces. To remove any doubt in regard to my interpretation of the Dominion government's attitude, I shall quote the following from the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance on April 29 last:

Should all three provinces entertain agreements effective this year, our expenditures will be increased by an additional $110 million or thereabouts. If they do not, then we can reduce our net debt in proportion.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the two central provinces cannot afford to give the dominion government a 100 or 110 million dollars per year.

Mr. GAGNON: True.

Mr. HAMEL: In my humble opinion, three solutions may be contemplated by the Quebec and Ontario legislatures.

In the first place, they can yield to the ultimatum of the Dominion government, accept the proposals and relinquish their legislative autonomy in the field of direct taxation which may become by far the most important.

In the second place, they can refuse to submit to the ultimatum from Ottawa and thus lose 50 million dollars per year to the benefit of the central government.

In the third place, and in my opinion it is a logical result of the second solution—those provinces may seriously consider their withdrawal from Confederation.

I do not intend to discuss each of the three solutions. I shall simply point out a few reasons which, to my mind, fully justify the stand taken by the province of Quebec and the rejection of the Dominion proposals by its premier. The proposals are based mostly on evasion.

First, the Dominion's evasive attitude in offering temporary agreements and claiming at the same time that their chief purpose is the creation of a permanent system of social security.

Second, the Dominion government is being unfair in taking advantage of possibly different circumstances in other provinces to thrust an identical solution upon Quebec and Ontario. Separate agreements in this instance are unfair and create uncertainty. Some provinces are kept wondering if their neighbours have been granted better terms.

Third, the doubt being fostered in the public mind as to the real reasons for the pressure from Ottawa. The public is led to believe that the main reason for the agreement is to guarantee the Canadian people a plan of social security which they would be first to enjoy whereas, in my humble opinion, the real reason for the Dominion's insistence on the exclusive right to direct taxation is a desire for more freedom to engage in foreign commitments, such as export credits, last year's remission to Great Britain of an incalculable debt and, finally, the billion and a quarter loan to the United Kingdom.

Fourth, the doubts cast in every responsible people's mind by the statement of the Hon. Minister of Finance, on January 25 last, when he said:

> In stating the particulars of this programme, the substantially higher payments now being offered by the dominion to the provinces must be taken into account. The increased direct payments offered the provinces will require a proportional adjustment in the previously offered expenditures for the implementation of social security programmes and public investments.

Fifth, ambiguity as to the real object pursued by the central power. In view of the difference between the preliminary and final proposals, there is doubt as to whether the real intention, the real object of the central power is not, first and foremost, that of interfering with provincial jurisdictions, of controlling the expenditures of the provinces, in short, of placing them under trusteeship.

Ambiguity as to the objects; ambiguity as to the real meaning of the proposals; ambiguity as to the real motives behind the proposed agreements; ambiguity as to their duration; ambiguities resulting from separate agreements; ambiguities in the statement of the Minister of Finance, as appearing in his press release of January 25, 1947.

Mr. Speaker, I am not a supporter of the Union Nationale, but I cannot refrain from commending the stand taken by the premier of the province of Quebec, when he refused to jeopardize, on the strength of such ambiguities, the provincial legislative autonomy in such an important section of the fiscal field.

Mr. HARTT: There is a real premier!

Mr. HAMEL: Mr. Speaker, the present and future importance of these financial discussions between the federal and provincial governments, cannot be hidden from the people. My hon. friends are laughing, but they may not be laughing later on. Whether we like it or not, in my humble opinion, the fact that the central power has monopolized, besides all the fields already available to it, the complete fields of direct taxation, will inevitably reduce the provincial governments to the rank of servants of the central power. What is being done today will also be done tomorrow. Then, as now, the provinces will be told to sign some agreement, to accept certain terms, or be deprived of all help. Today, in a matter of subsidy for general provincial administrative purposes, Ottawa orders: "Accept certain terms or I shall deprive you of $50,000,000 a year"—as far as the province of Quebec is concerned. But tomorrow, dealing with a special subsidy for educational, agricultural or health purposes, Ottawa will say: "Certain agreements have been concluded with UNESCO; unless you accept the non-confessional school system, you shall be deprived of such a subsidy. Unless you adopt such or such a method, such or such a system of farming, you shall be deprived of such other subsidies" and inevitably the Quebec people will have to sacrifice piecemeal their traditions, their culture, their characteristics, for the safeguard of which they had to wage a two-century struggle.

Moreover, it seems that the central government displays an inconceivable cynicism when they ask the province of Quebec to renounce its legislative autonomy as regards direct taxation, at the very moment when the treatment meted out to the French-speaking minority is more unfair than it has ever been since the battle of the Plains of Abraham.

Mr. HARTT: That is certainly untrue.

Mr. GAGNON: It is quite true.

Mr. HAMEL: I might perhaps point out a few examples of such treatment.

Let us consider first the housing question: the dominion government takes it upon itself to meddle with that problem by granting money and priorities.

Mr. LESAGE: It has to do so, since the provincial government takes no action!

Mr. HAMEL: As a result, in all metropolitan areas, except those of the province of Quebec, the building of houses in 1946 showed an increase of 12·71 per cent. In the case of the Quebec metropolitan area—and I call the attention of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet to that fact—it has decreased by 7·40 per cent from 1945 to 1946. For the Montreal metropolitan area—I ask the hon. members on the other side of the house to note those figures—the decrease in 1946 as compared with 1945 is 22·47 per cent, while general building in this country increased by 12·71 per cent, according to figures on housing that were published by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. BELZILE: Would the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. HAMEL: Certainly.

Mr. BELZILE: Do the statistics to which my hon. friend has just referred include the houses built under the veterans housing act?

Mr. HAMEL: They relate to general building, and I may say to my hon. friend that I propose to discuss the stand taken by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr.

Howe). I shall prove that in the case of all grants which the government pays in connection with the building of houses for veterans or others, the province of Quebec is the least favoured of all.

Mr. LESAGE: Because the veterans are less numerous there.

Mr. HAMEL: Ottawa has entered the sphere of social welfare through the establishment of family allowances. I have studied various systems of allowances in some thirty countries, British or other, and I must say that none of the methods followed includes a decreasing rate when the children exceed a certain number; on the contrary, the trend is toward the increase of the benefits for the larger families. Here, in Canada, because it so happens that large families are especially to be found among the French Canadians and certain non-British new Canadians, there has been developed a system which is duplicated nowhere in the world, and through which the following result is obtained:

Outside the Northwest Territories and Yukon, where the average allowance per child is $5.87, Quebec has the lowest rate, $5.88, while it is $6.62 in Ontario.

Mr. GAGNON: That is for Ontario.

Mr. HAMEL: Now, Mr. Speaker, what about the dominion civil service? With respect to the French-speaking element, the situation in that sphere is such that, as my hon. friends opposite will no doubt admit, since I presume they are honest and sincere, it threatens to shower ridicule upon all members of the federal house.

An hon. MEMBER: That is true!

Mr. HAMEL: According to the 1941 census, the French-speaking minority represents 30·27 per cent of the whole population while the proportion of French-speaking employees did not exceed 12·25 per cent. I do not hesitate to say that the government service is thus depriving the French-speaking population of some $30 to $40 million and of some 20,000 employment opportunities. This state of things has caused such a commotion in the province of Quebec that a public and independent organization, such as the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, fully realizing that this intolerable situation threatened good understanding and national unity, felt in duty bound to submit a report to the Gordon Commission. The Quebec legislature unanimously sent the dominion government an official protest and was supported by the hon. members opposite as well as by the Quebec Liberals.

As a result, the government, in an attempt to ignore the unjust state of things they wish to maintain and to blind the observing and accusing eye, instead of righting this revolting unfairness, has decided to leave out of the census all differentiation pertaining to racial origin. In the last census, that of 1946, they already took steps to this end by omitting, in open violation of the Statistics Act, Chapter 190, section 19, this differentiation which is required by law.

Mr. GAGNON: That is true!

Mr. HAMEL: There is not one French-speaking deputy minister in 22; this has been unheard of since confederation. Yet, it is claimed up and down the province that the Prime Minister, who is responsible for these appointments, is the friend of French-Canadians. The joke has worn threadbare.

Even the dominion proposals, however, uphold an intolerable discrimination. Subsidies vary according to each province, here as elsewhere; the per capita grant paid to the province of Quebec will be the lowest in the country. Ontario's will amount to $18.04, Alberta's to $18.64, Saskatchewan's to $19.03, Nova Scotia's to $19.20, New Brunswick's to $19.69, Manitoba's to $19.77, British Columbia's to $21.29 and Prince Edward Island's to $24.31, while that of Quebec will be only $17.29, namely, $2.37 less than the average rate.

An hon. MEMBER: What was it at the time of confederation.

Mr. HAMEL: Let my hon. friend be patient and I will inform him of what happened at that time when it came to divide the debts.

Mr. GAGNON: He is annoyed by all this.

Mr. HAMEL: In view of those facts, I say without hesitation that the present dominion proposals are indefensible as far as the province of Quebec is concerned, and those who support them are shouldering a heavy responsibility towards future generations, and I wish it to be known that I am above party politics. That responsibility is even greater since hon. members to your right, sir, are, according to some newspapermen, perhaps the most brilliant to sit here for many generations, that responsibility is even greater because those hon. members are absolutely unable to correct discriminations which, I sincerely hope, must deeply humiliate them. Before asking their French-speaking compatriots to approve a programme that will inevitably weaken provincial authority to the benefit of Ottawa, my hon. friends should seriously consider the attitude they should take and place the welfare of their compatriots above party politics.

(Text):

Mr. BONA ARSENAULT (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche (Mr. Hamel) who has just resumed his seat has interpreted the nationalist or the autonomous point of view in so far as federal provincial relations are concerned. The hon. member is an experienced lawyer. He is an able speaker, but unfortunately, I am afraid he has not succeeded in convincing many members this afternoon.

Mr. GAGNON: Not on your side.

Mr. HAMEL: Maybe we know why.

Mr. ARSENAULT: There are two over there who are convinced, but they were convinced before listening to the speech. I have listened carefully to the hon. member's speech, and from the notes which I took while he was speaking I gather that the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche and those whom he represents still wonder what are the real reasons for the federal proposals to the provinces. In the second place, he claims that the federal proposals violate provincial autonomy. If I am wrong. I wish to be corrected.

Mr. HAMEL: I did not get the first reason, but the second is certainly true.

Mr. ARSENAULT: All right. Third, he claims that the province of Quebec has an exclusive right in matters of direct taxation. Fourth, he denounced the separate arrangements between the federal government and the provinces as being an unjust practice. I shall endeavour to answer the hon. member point by point, and it is a very easy task, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member represented his school of thought in so far as federal-provincial relations are concerned. I represent another one, and I am proud of it.

Let me deal with the first point: What are the reasons for the federal proposals to the provinces? A careful study of economic fluctuations in Great Britain and Canada covering a period of 150 years indicates that since 1815 we have suffered from fourteen major economic depressions at various intervals ranging from six to ten years: in 1815, economic crisis; in 1825, economic crisis; 1836, economic crisis; 1847, economic crisis; 1857, economic crisis; 1866, economic crisis; 1885, 1895, 1905, 1915, 1921, 1929, 1937—economic crises.

Mr. HAMEL: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. ARSENAULT: Certainly, with pleasure.

[Mr. Hamel.]

(Translation):

Mr. HAMEL: Is the hon. member suggesting that the depressions he mentioned were not exactly universal, that they did not extend to England, France, Belgium and the whole world, but only to Canada?

Mr. ARSENAULT: It was universal precisely because no country had done anything to prevent it and in making such offers to the provinces, the Dominion government is seeking to avoid the next depression, which would be the fifteenth.

(Text):

From the sad experience of the past and particularly from our more recent experience of the thirties, we should be desperately blind if we did not now take the necessary steps to adopt measures in order to protect the Canadian population, as I have just said in French, against the calamity of another economic crisis, which, according to the trend of the past and under the conditions which have prevailed so far, is due for 1949 or 1950. Therefore it is the duty of this government and our first duty as members of this parliament to see to it that the Canadian people of all regions and all classes, the Canadian people whom we represent in this house, do not experience once again at least in our lifetime the social injustices, the sufferings and the iniquities which will be brought about by another, the fifteenth, economic crisis.

In a country as great as Canada, so immensely rich in lands, forests, fisheries, minerals and other natural resources, with a small population of not quite 13,000,000 inhabitants, we do not want, as was suggested by the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche, to go back to the conditions which prevailed in 1921, for example, or in 1930, or even to the conditions which prevailed from 1937 to 1939, because, if we remember well, the last economic crisis was sunk in the rivers of blood of the last great war. We do not want to see again in this country thousands of Canadians on direct relief, or living in a state next to starvation merely because of the lack of proper provision in the constitution of this country, or the lack of collaboration between federal and provincial powers, or, in other words, because of the blindness, the short-sightedness and the foolishness of men.

If peace is to guarantee anything to the Canadian citizen it must at least guarantee full employment, just compensation for employment, and the establishment of a liberty of enterprise truly and positively democratic. The sort of economy we have experienced in the past, particularly from 1918 to 1939, between the two world wars, cannot guarantee either full employment, just compensation for a good day's work, or the establishment of a truly democratic liberty of enterprise. I for one would hate to think that future conditions of employment in this country could be, as has been the case in the past, solely determined by the private judgment, good or bad, of individuals, ignorant or speculative or selfish or short-sighted, who, within less than twenty-five years, have led the Canadian population to the graveyards of two major economic crises.

That is to say, Mr. Speaker, that, from now on, economic forces will have to be curbed or guided in this country. From now on, if we want to avoid the tragic consequences of another economic depression the responsibility for full employment in Canada must rest upon the federal government. We cannot go back to the past. We are headed for the future; and in the future this Canadian government will have as its first duty to exercise a guiding influence on the propensity of the Canadian people to consume; for example, partly through the government's scheme of taxation, partly by influencing rates of interest or promoting investments, and partly by other devices such as developing Canada's international trade, for example, and so forth. Whether we like it or not, this means that we have now reached the point in our economy where, in these ever-changing world conditions, this country needs a certain amount of planned economy; that we have reached a point where the devices necessary to ensure full employment will involve a larger extension of the traditional functions of the federal government.

Mr. HAMEL: Would the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. ARSENAULT: Certainly.

(Translation):

Mr. HAMEL: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he satisfied with the present distribution of public moneys in Canada?

Mr. ARSENAULT: We are surely not satisfied, since the Dominion government has been trying for two years to conclude agreements with the provinces in order to establish in Canada a taxation system that would be exactly suitable to present conditions. It is quite clear that we are not satisfied—it is self-evident.

(Text):

Under the worn-out system of laissez-faire, no means is open to the federal government of this country to rectify economic distress except through competitive struggles for outside markets. We have now to learn—and this is important, because this is where wars come from—how to provide permanent prosperity and full employment in this country by applying adequate and proper adjustments to our domestic policy. International trade should cease to be what it has been in the past, a desperate expedient to maintain employment at home by forcing sales on foreign markets, by merely shifting our unemployment problems to other countries. This government, conscious of its responsibility toward the Canadian people and strong in the experience of the past, is seeking the best possible devices in order to achieve that end of attaining full employment and assuring the progress and prosperity of this country.

In so far as the prevention of economic depressions is concerned, we cannot but readily admit that the federal government has grave responsibilities. And in order that this government may stabilize—and I should like the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche to listen to this carefully—the volume of employment in Canada in such a way as to prevent another economic crisis, it is essential that our fiscal policy be perfectly harmonized with our international trade policy, with our tariff policy and with our monetary policy, all four of which fall under federal jurisdiction.

In making its proposals to the provinces, the federal government has clearly expressed its views on how the objectives set forth can be attained. Its view may be summarized briefly by quoting four paragraphs from page 7 of the federal proposals of August, 1945. They are:

> First, to facilitate private enterprise to produce and provide employment.
> Secondly, to promote bold action by the state in those fields in which the public interest calls for public enterprise in national development.
> Thirdly, to provide through public investment, productive employment for our human and physical resources when international and other conditions adversely affect employment.
> Fourthly, to provide on the basis of small regular payments against large and uncertain individual risks for such hazards and disabilities as unemployment, sickness and old age.

The hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche claimed that federal proposals violate provincial autonomy. I shall not place in doubt the sincerity and good faith of the hon. member, and of those who have opposed and are still opposing the federal proposals to the provinces. But what I will place in doubt is their ability to seize the urgent problems this government has to solve in the best interests of the whole of the Canadian community, with a broad Canadian outlook on such problems.

Prosperity, as peace, is indivisible. It is impossible for one province or group of provinces in this country to be prosperous while others are maintained under a struggle of want and fear. In 1867 we decided that this Canada should be one nation, from one ocean to the other. If we have not changed our view, we today must let this nation act as such, when the life or death of the Canadian population is involved.

We have heard a lot from the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche about provincial autonomy. May I state, in the most forceful language possible, that there are no more able, no more efficient and no more sincere champions of provincial autonomy, that real autonomy for example which means the guarantee of fundamental rights to each and every province in confederation, than the members of the Liberal party in this House of Commons. And I challenge anyone in the house or outside it to point his finger to a single item in the federal proposals to the provinces which violates any of the fundamental rights guaranteed the provinces by confederation.

Hiding behind a smoke-screen of so-called liberty of the individual, of so-called provincial autonomy, of so-called respect for constitutional rights—and it is all for political purposes; they might as well admit it—those opposed to the federal proposals constitute themselves—

(Translation):

Mr. HAMEL: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) has no right to impute motives.

Some hon. MEMBERS: They are not motives.

(Text):

Mr. ARSENAULT: —the most effective agents, not only of economic depression, but of the establishment of communism in this country; for I do not believe for one moment that our democratic system can survive another major economic crisis in Canada.

They pretend to see a question of fundamental rights where there is nothing but a matter of dollars and cents. They endeavour to paralyse the action of this government which for two long years has struggled to try to compensate for the deficiency in our constitution on financial and fiscal matters in endeavouring to establish the best possible basis of federal and provincial cooperation, as an essential part of a kind of new deal which must be worked out in order to readjust our fiscal system, to encourage public investment and the expansion of private industry, to open markets to agriculture and primary industry, to expand our export markets and to maintain a high level of national income—not merely a higher standard of living—to ensure continued opportunity for full employment and to devise a sound and consistent programme of post-war reconstruction and public works, and to widen and develop social security services in Canada. All these measures are devised in order to protect and to safeguard the Canadian public against another economic cataclysm. Those who today, under various pretexts, oppose the means of achieving those objectives, by way of federal-provincial collaboration, certainly do not realize the awful harm they are doing their country.

We who represent constituencies from Quebec will recall that until 1937, under the pretext of infringement upon provincial autonomy, old age pensions were denied the old people in the province of Quebec, pensions such as provided by the Old Age Pensions Act.

(Translation):

Mr. GAGNON: Did Mr. Taschereau do that?

Mr. ARSENAULT: Certainly. It was passed by Mr. Taschereau in 1936.

(Text):

While the other provinces of Canada were taking advantage of the Old Age Pensions Act, for ten long years we in Quebec were arguing, as we are arguing today, over provincial autonomy; and this at the cost of millions and millions of dollars lost forever to our old people. At the same time the population of Quebec was subject to federal taxation to the extent of about one-third of the total revenue of Canada. For a period of ten years the aged people have lost millions of dollars, while they have paid millions in taxes for the benefit of the aged people of other provinces. Since 1937, when the aged people in Quebec were first able to take advantage of the Old Age Pensions Act, have we in Quebec lost any of our so-called sacred rights?

It will be remembered that when the measure providing for family allowances was introduced by the Mackenzie King government in 1944 the cry of so-called provincial autonomy and so-called sacred rights was raised in the province of Quebec and in at least one other province. For weeks and weeks in this house members of the Conservative party forcefully denounced the establishment of family allowances throughout Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: But they stood up and voted for them.

Mr. ARSENAULT: Have we in Quebec lost any of our so-called sacred rights by permitting family allowances to be distributed in Quebec on the same basis as they are distributed in other parts of Canada? After two years of experience in the distribution of family allowances, who will take the risk to deny to any low wage-earner's family in Canada the right to take advantage of the Family Allowances Act on the pretext or even the ground that it might transgress some confused section of the British North America Act?

And again today, at a time when it is found essential, in the best interests of all the provinces of Canada and of the Canadian population at large, to put some order in our Canadian homes, to prevent an economic depression, to check deflation which affects the low wage-earners of this country in the worst way, which leads individual enterprise and small industry to bankruptcy and which constitutes the hot bed of revolutionary ideas and communism, we still hear from some people the cries of provincial autonomy, constitutional rights and sacred rights.

I am all in favour of provincial autonomy, but not that type of autonomy which teaches to the younger generation of this country that Ottawa is the capital city of some foreign nation where there are to be found bitter enemies of confederation and provincial autonomy.

The third point raised by the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche was that the province of Quebec has the exclusive right in matters of direct taxation. Direct taxation is one of the grounds upon which they fight the federal government proposals.

(Translation):

Mr. HAMEL: Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the hon. member that I did not use those words.

(Text):

Mr. ARSENAULT: I am happy to find out that the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche is already changing the views he expressed in his speech.

(Translation):

Mr. HAMEL: That is untrue!

(Text):

Mr. KNOWLES: How long since you changed your own?

Mr. ARSENAULT: Section 92, subsection 2, of the constitution gives the power of direct taxation to the provinces "within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes." However, it is a fact that section 91, subsection 3, of the British North America Act gives the Canadian parliament the power of raising of money by any mode or system of taxation. That means direct as well as indirect taxation. This power has been confirmed over and over again by the judicial committee of the privy council. For instance, a decision of the judicial committee in 1932 in Silver Brothers versus the Attorney General for Quebec and the Attorney General for Canada reads:

> The two taxations, dominion and provincial, can stand side by side without interfering with each other, but as soon as you come to the concomitant privilege of absolute priority they cannot stand side by side and must clash; consequently the dominion must prevail.

In connection with the federal right to direct taxation, there is another decision of the judicial committee in 1924 in Caron versus The King, which reads:

> The dominion income tax is intra vires of the dominion parliament, and its application to the salaries of a provincial government minister is valid.

The last decision I should like to quote is one given in 1937 in Forbes versus the Attorney General for Manitoba, which reads:

> Lastly, there is here no conflict between the dominion and provincial income tax legislation. Both income tax may co-exist and be enforced without clashing, and there is no room for the application of the doctrine of the occupied field.

In view of the very text of our constitution and the many decisions of the judicial committee granting the Canadian parliament unlimited power in the matter of direct as well as indirect taxation, how can this government be accused of wanting to reach some agreement with the provinces for the sole purpose of securing new fields of taxation when it is so clearly established that the Canadian parliament has already both fields of taxation, direct as well as indirect, at its unlimited disposal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

Mr. ARSENAULT: It will take me only five minutes to finish.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ARSENAULT: Where and how do the federal proposals infringe on provincial autonomy? There have been repeated demands for a new conference with the provinces following the failure of so many dominion-provincial conferences. The hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche claims that a separate arrangement between the federal government and an individual province is following an unjust practice. If the autonomy of any province is to be respected, then a conference of the provinces would have no power over that individual province.

Seven provinces have now accepted the federal government proposals in order to avoid double taxation. No new conference of the provinces could make those seven provinces give up their agreements with the Canadian government. No new conference of provinces could force the remaining two provinces to enter into a financial arrangement with the federal government if they do not want to. The idea of renting by one government of fields of taxation to another government is a tragic admission of a serious weakness in our constitution, but a dominion-provincial conference would have no power to amend the constitution, no more than it has the power to dictate the course that any individual province should follow.

However, there should be a permanent division of the direct taxation field between the federal government and the provinces. In order to achieve that objective, there would have to be an amendment to the constitution in connection with the division of fiscal powers. It is obvious that certain of the direct taxation powers should be assigned exclusively to the provinces, but this has not as yet been done, either by the text of the constitution, or by the decisions of the judicial committee.

The amendment of our constitution should not be long delayed, unless the Canadian government reaches a satisfactory basis of cooperation with all the provinces. The risk of another economic depression and of communism is too great in this country for us to lose any more time arguing over such an important issue.

(Translation):

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. ARSENAULT: Certainly.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Inasmuch as taxes are paid by the same persons, where is the advantage in having them collected by the Dominion government rather than by the provincial government?

[Mr. Speaker.]

(Text):

Mr. ARSENAULT: It is a matter of what the federal government is aiming at to avoid double taxation in this country. Time is for action, and I do not see that we have too much time ahead of us. I suggest that the whole question of federal-provincial relations should now soon be referred to the people of Canada as the main issue to be settled at the earliest possible day by way of a general election; and wishing that for the good of this country we some day in Canada benefit by perfect harmony between the federal and provincial powers, may I be permitted, before resuming my seat, to quote two paragraphs from page 408 of "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty", by Doctor Maurice Ollivier:

> Two classes of people have been the enemies of Canadian unity; those who have placed another country above Canada in their love, affection and admiration, ever stressing the alleged superiority of that country over our own, and secondly, those nationalists with a narrow provincial concept who have constantly attacked the federal power just as if the provinces were not represented at Ottawa and were not part of the federal system but separate entities fighting a foreign government.
> They have wilfully confused provincial rights with minority rights and constantly refused to acknowledge that what benefited one province was for the advantage of the other.
> Canada as a whole cannot be happy and prosperous when one part suffers from poverty, sickness, deplorable living conditions or drought whether these be the result of low wages, bad housing or an act of God.
> We should, therefore, bend our efforts to maintain in this country popular government, individual liberty and social justice as the only means capable of assuring to all an equal chance to work and to profit from the better life that comes with material progress, in other words, of guaranteeing to all, freedom from want and freedom from fear, remembering that economic and political nationalism has always, in the past, created racial strife and world disasters.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 6.07 p.m.

Thursday, May 22, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) presented the first and second reports of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, and moved that the first report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PALESTINE QUESTION—COMMUNICATION FROM SECRETARY-GENERAL

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table an official communication received from the Secretary-General of the United Nations Organization, Lake Success, by the Department of External Affairs on May 15. It is a resolution reading in part as follows:

Whereas the general assembly of the united nations has been called into special session for the purpose of constituting and instructing a special committee to prepare for the consideration at the next regular session of the assembly a report on the question of Palestine.

The general assembly resolves that:

1. A special committee be created for the above-mentioned purpose, consisting of the representatives of Australia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, India, Iran, Netherlands, Peru, Sweden, Uruguay, and Yugoslavia;

2. The special committee shall have the widest powers to ascertain and record facts, and to investigate all questions and issues relevant to the problem of Palestine;

3. The special committee shall determine its own procedure;

4. The special committee shall conduct investigations in Palestine and wherever it may deem useful, receive and examine written or oral testimony, whichever it may consider appropriate in each case, from the mandatory power, from representatives of the population of Palestine, from governments and from such organizations and individuals as it may deem necessary;

5. The special committee shall give the most careful consideration to the religious interests in Palestine of Islam, Judaism, and Christianity;

6. The special committee shall prepare a report to the general assembly and shall submit such proposals as it may consider appropriate for the solution of the problem of Palestine;

7. The special committee's report shall be communicated to the secretary-general not later than 1st September, 1947, in order that it may be circulated to the members of the united nations in time for consideration by the second regular session of the general assembly.

The communication contains this further paragraph:

Report of first committee as approved by general assembly contains paragraph relating to composition of special committee which reads as follows:

The committee associated itself with the views expressed by the representative of Venezuela that the states, members of the special committee, should appoint persons of high moral character and of recognized competence in international affairs, and that those appointed would act impartially and conscientiously, in accordance with the purposes and principles of the charter of the united nations.

I have pleasure in informing the house that Mr. Justice I. C. Rand, of the Supreme Court of Canada, has accepted the task of representing Canada on this committee. He will be accompanied by Mr. Leon Mayrand, of the Department of External Affairs.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PHYSICAL EXAMINATION OF PROSPECTIVE IMMIGRANTS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many (a) Hollanders; (b) Belgians, have been accepted for immigration to Canada since the first of January this year?

2. Of those accepted, how many have arrived in Canada as of this date?

3. How many doctors whose duties are to physically examine prospective immigrants to Canada are engaged by the Canadian government in (a) Holland; (b) Belgium; (c) France; (d) United Kingdom?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Information not available.

2. Information in form asked for not available. 264 immigrants of Dutch origin and 63 persons of Belgian origin were admitted to Canada from overseas between January 1 and March 31, 1947. Figures for April, 1947, are not yet available.

3. Holland, 1; Belgium, 1; France, 1; United Kingdom, 4.

MOUNTED POLICE—DR. BRAITHWAITE

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. When did Dr. E. A. Braithwaite first join the force of the N.W.M.P.

2. For how many years was Dr. Braithwaite on the force and/or on the payroll of the NW.M.P., the R.N.W.M.P., and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

3. What positions did Dr. Braithwaite hold in connection with the above?

4. On what date was he finally retired?

5. Is he on pension?

6. If not, for what reason?

7. Has he applied for pension? If so, what steps have been taken to grant same?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. May 7, 1884.

2. (a) Actually in the force from May 7, 1884, to May 6, 1892. (b) He then became a medical doctor and later was appointed a contract surgeon to the force, during which time he had a private practice. He was on the pay roll as a contract surgeon from March 1, 1894, to December 31, 1931.

3. During the period shown in 2(a) he was a staff sergeant. During the period shown in 2(b) he was a contract surgeon, but in recognition of his long and faithful service he was appointed an honorary surgeon by order in council of November 16, 1911.

4. December 31, 1931.

5. No.

6. He was not an actual member of the force, except for the period shown in 2(a) and is therefore not eligible for pension. Furthermore, he was not a contributor to the pension fund.

7. Yes. No steps taken by the government to grant pension as it has no authority to grant pension.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION —INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. LENNARD:

What are the names of the insurance companies operating in conjunction with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. McILRAITH: As of May 20, 1947, the following: Canada Life Assurance Company, Confederation Life Association, Continental Life Insurance Company, Crown Life Insurance Company, Dominion Life Assurance Company, Equitable Life Insurance Company of Canada, Great-West Life Assurance Company, Industrial Life Insurance Company, London Life Insurance Company, Manufacturers Life Insurance Company, Montreal Life Insurance Company, Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada, North American Life Assurance Company, Northern Life Assurance Company, Prudential Insurance Company of America, Sovereign Life Assurance Company of Canada, Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, T. Eaton Life Assurance Company.

JAPANESE CANADIANS—SABOTAGE

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Were any Canadian citizens of Japanese racial origin who were resident in Canada during the period of the war with Japan (a) charged with, or (b) found guilty of acts of sabotage? If so, how many were charged and how many were found guilty?

2. Were any persons of Japanese racial origin who were not Canadian citizens but who were resident in Canada during the period of the war with Japan (a) charged with, or (b) found guilty of acts of sabotage? If so, how many were charged and how many were found guilty?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. (a) Not so far as the government is aware. (b) Not so far as the government is aware.

2. (a) Not so far as the government is aware. (b) Not so far as the government is aware.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—FORMER CANADIANS IN GERMANY AND ITALY

Mr. WINKLER:

1. How many cases have been reported to the government where Canadians visiting in (a) Germany; (b) Italy, prior to world war II, were either induced to renounce their Canadian (British) nationality voluntarily or under duress?

2. Of the above, how many ex-Canadians have applied to have their Canadian citizenship renewed?

3. Of the above, how many had their holdings taken over by the Alien Property Custodian?

4. Of the above, how many have (a) returned to Canada; (b) indicated a desire to return to Canada?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Return tabled.

WESTMINSTER HOSPITAL, MIDDLESEX COUNTY

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

1. How many employees at Westminster hospital, county of Middlesex are on a temporary basis?

2. What number of years has each of them been temporarily employed?

3. How many are on a permanent basis?

4. How many employees of the dominion government in the county of Middlesex, other than Westminster hospital, are on a temporary basis?

5. What number of years has each of them been temporarily employed?

6. How many are on a permanent basis?

JUDGES ACT

ASSOCIATE CHIEF JUSTICE, PROVINCE OF QUEBEC— ADDITIONAL JUDGE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend The Judges Act, 1946, to change the title of the superior court judge in and for the province of Quebec, who is appointed to perform the duties of the chief justice in the district as constituted for the Court of King's Bench sitting in appeal within which the chief justice does not reside, Montreal or Quebec, as the case may be, to "The Associate Chief Justice"; and to provide a salary for an additional judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. CHURCH: The same principle should apply to the senior judge of the county court of York, Ontario, who does similar work.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

INVESTIGATION OF INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES—PROVISION FOR BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS, ETC.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill respecting industrial relations and investigation of industrial disputes and to make provision therein for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of the remuneration and expenses of the members of the boards and commissions and the officers, clerks and employees appointed or engaged by or under the authority of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

CROP FAILURE PAYMENTS—AWARDS TO FARMERS WITH MINIMUM PRODUCTION

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend The Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, to provide that the two schedules of payment now provided under the emergency year section and the crop failure section be merged and become payable in any year without specific authority from the governor in council and without requiring that a minimum number of townships be eligible before the crop failure schedule of award is payable; that the restriction in respect to the payment of awards to farmers with a certain minimum production of wheat may be removed; and that certain provisions be clarified in order to facilitate administration.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

STATEMENT OF PRESENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): In answer to questions asked previously on the orders of the day, I should like to make a statement.

The question whether the principles of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act should be extended to all Canada by legislation this session has been up on a number of occasions during the session. As previously stated in answer to questions by members, the government has been considering the matter. I am now authorized to make the following statement of present policy.

The present Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act will be continued as applicable to the established P.F.R.A. area in the three prairie provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

This act was passed in 1935 and amended in 1937, 1939 and 1941. It provides that works may be undertaken to rehabilitate certain areas in the prairie provinces even though the constitutional position is that such works are the responsibility of the province or municipality. There were, however, a number of special circumstances which justified P.F.R.A. Included in these is the fact that the dominion government administered the lands and resources of the area during its period of settlement and the further fact that there was reason to believe at that time that a very large area was subject to drought so severe and of such long duration as to make permanent residence difficult if not impossible without conservation and distribution of water. The experience prior to 1935 tended to substantiate that belief. The dominion government therefore set up P.F.R.A. under which the settlers are assisted to rehabilitate the area.

The act provides that on the advice of committees set up under authority of the act and to obtain certain results the minister may expend such money as is voted by parliament and authorized by the governor in council for "the development, construction, promotion operation and maintenance of any project or scheme under or by virtue of this Act, or enter into agreements with any province, municipality or person with respect thereto."

The organization set up by the Department of Agriculture has been operating under this act since 1935. The money voted has been spent to conserve and distribute water, to organize submarginal lands into community pastures and regrass areas within these pastures and to finance experimental work intended to stop soil drifting. The money spent to conserve and distribute water has been spent on dugouts, small dams and small irrigation projects.

The government provides from one-third to one-half of the cost of providing dugouts and small dams. The individual or the individual and the municipality provide the balance.

The government builds the dam and main distribution ditches in the small irrigation projects. The individual pays for the water delivered at a designated point and organizes and finances his own irrigation district under provincial legislation. The government has assisted in levelling land.

The government fences, regrasses and provides capital expenditure to put water on community pastures. The individuals pay fees to place stock in the pastures.

The whole programme is one in which the dominion government cooperates with the individual in rehabilitating the area. The individual does much of the work and either contributes to the cost or pays for services received. In many cases, both for the construction of pastures and for irrigation projects, farmers have been required to make their land available to the government and receive in return the value of the land unimproved by the project or other land in exchange.

We have now reached the time when larger irrigation projects are being proposed to P.F.R.A. The government has provided funds with which to proceed with the construction of a dam on the St. Mary river in Alberta. This is an international stream, and the total cost of this dam is being provided by the dominion government.

The objective of the whole programme is to make it possible for settlers who were induced to enter the area to remain and to so develop its possibilities of water conservation and use as to greatly increase the number of persons who may live in Canada's largest agricultural area.

It has been suggested that because of the benefits already apparent in the area to which P.F.R.A. has been applied, the principles of the act should be extended by legislation to all other parts of Canada.

In view of the constitutional relationship between the dominion and the provinces the government has decided that such legislation should not be recommended. It is held that the same obligation does not exist in other parts of the prairie provinces or in the remainder of Canada as in the drought area of the prairie provinces.

It is considered, however, that there are certain works outside the drought area which if undertaken would be of assistance to all Canada through making possible increased development of farm lands which if left to provincial or municipal responsibility might greatly retard Canada's development. With regard to these the dominion government would be prepared to discuss with the provinces concerned plans under which development could proceed over a period to be agreed upon, sufficiently long to bring about the desired results, but not to exceed five years.

Among these projects are:

1. The dike or marshlands of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick;

2. Certain projects related to farm lands in British Columbia, and

3. Certain projects related to lands all across Canada which have not previously been utilized as cultivated farms but which, if developed, would provide increased employment and home building possibilities.

Any expenditure of money on these projects will be brought before parliament and legalized through an item on the estimates.

Mr. FULTON: I will ask the minister to tell the house whether the discussions with the provinces, which he intimated the government would be ready to undertake, are now in progress, and if so, what has been achieved, or whether a date has been set on which these discussions will commence?

Mr. GARDINER: No discussions are under way at present resulting from this decision of policy. No doubt we will be hearing from the provincial governments immediately after this statement is made public, and we shall be prepared to meet them at any time.

Mr. BENTLEY: Would projects such as those up around the Elbow and South Saskatchewan rivers be included in those coming within the third category the minister mentioned?

Mr. GARDINER: All the area in Canada outside the P.F.R.A. district is covered by the third portion.

IMMIGRATION

CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH POLISH GIRLS ARE BEING BROUGHT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources; and I should like to say that I am sure we all regret the illness of the minister. In view of conflicting reports regarding the conditions under which one hundred Polish girls are being brought to Canada, and because of the membership of Canada in the intergovernmental committee on refugees, which apparently is involved in the matter, will the government inform the house with regard to the contracts under which these girls are being admitted for employment in the textile industry of Canada?

And will the government table all communications, memoranda, copies of agreements, et cetera, which relate to this matter?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): The first part of my hon. friend's question deals with the matter of immigration, and I shall see that an answer is submitted tomorrow as to that portion. I shall also confer with my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), to whom the second portion of the question refers, and I am quite sure he will add the information requested.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO REDUCE IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealing with a different subject. It arises from a dispatch from London, published in today's press, to the effect that Canada may join Britain and other countries in drastically cutting imports from the United States. I would ask the minister if this report is correct and, if so, whether he is in a position to advise the house with respect to the progress of the negotiations.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have very little comment on the question asked by the leader of the opposition. This is a newspaper story. If an announcement is to be made on this subject it will be made by someone representing the government.

EMPIRE DAY

OBSERVANCE BY PARLIAMENT ON MAY 23

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister and the other leaders in the house to the fact that tomorrow, May 23, is known and celebrated throughout the British empire as Empire day. We have missed observing this day in this house in other years. My suggestion is that on the opening of the house tomorrow tribute should be paid by all the leaders to what the empire stands for. Elaborate programmes have been prepared in the schools across Canada, and it is only meet and right that we should do the same in this parliament. As Burke says of the empire, "We should elevate our minds to the greatness of the trust to which the order of providence has called us," and this is more necessary now than ever before.

If no reply is to be given am I to take it that the government and the house are in favour of this scuttling policy? The empire seems to have few friends in this house.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MACHINERY AND EQUIPMENT FOR USE IN CONNECTION WITH PRODUCTION OF COAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Because of the need of accelerating the production of coal in Nova Scotia, and the need of new machinery to suit our mining conditions in order to bring our productivity more in line with that of other coal producing areas, I wish to ask the Minister of National Revenue the following question. Will the government consider as exempt for custom duties purposes all machinery and equipment imported into Canada for use exclusively in connection with the production of coal?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Some machinery and equipment for use in connection with the production of coal is already provided for as free of duty under the customs tariff. Tariff items 410, 410j, 410m and 410o provide for free admission of this type of machinery and equipment. A number of other items provide for free admission from the United Kingdom, but dutiable from other countries. It would require a tariff change to provide for the free admission of all machinery and equipment as suggested.

GOLD

STORAGE OF BULLION BY MCINTYRE-PORCUPINE MINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance, of which I sent notice. In view of suggestions made in the house for the devaluation of the Canadian dollar or an increase in the price of gold, and Canada's need of American exchange, what action does the government propose to take regarding the storing of large amounts of gold bullion by the McIntyre-Porcupine Mines, Limited, or other mining interests who may be adopting a similar policy?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I received notice of my hon. friend's question just before coming to the house. I shall give it consideration, and will endeavour to make an answer as soon as possible.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO HOLIDAY FOR STAFF ON VICTORIA DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, last Monday I asked the Prime Minister whether the government would consider giving the staff of the house a holiday on Saturday next, May 24.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FAIR: At that time the Prime Minister said the government would be glad to consider any suggestion. I wonder if he could make an answer today.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The house is master of its own actions, and responsible for its own personnel. I would say to my hon. friend that I think we will be helping the civil service of Canada and members of the public service generally if we do not make too many requests on their behalf for holidays. I have no doubt that in all departments the right course will be pursued by those in charge.

Mr. FAIR: I was not dealing with the civil service; it was the staff of the House of Commons I had in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was speaking of both.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 21, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. D. WYLIE (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, rising to take part in the debate I am reminded of what was said the other evening by another hon. member, that no matter how much we spoke it would not change the budget one iota. But I am also reminded of what the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) says so often in the house, that this is a free and unfettered parliament. So I am going to accept his advice and take part in the debate. I am always glad to hear the Minister of Veterans Affairs speak with his rich Scottish brogue, because I too was born in Scotland, where we did have freedom. And let me assure the house that I shall uphold freedom at any time, in support of the minister in that respect.

It is customary on an occasion of this kind to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon his budget. I therefore offer my congratulations upon his clear delivery and and his genial manner of presentation. On many occasions it is most difficult for us in this section of the house to hear what is said by cabinet ministers, but I can assure hon. members that we heard every word the Minister of Finance uttered, and his effort to make himself heard is deeply appreciated.

However there is very little upon which I can compliment the minister in his budget speech. I am sure most Canadians expected that the budget would contain many more tax exemptions. It was our expectation that those exemptions would be increased, especially in respect of the income tax. It is my view that there was no reason why the exemptions should not have been increased at this time.

May I say a word on behalf of the wage-earners, and those in the salaried group? During the war we did not mind deductions at the source, because the government required money and by having these amounts deducted at the source from month to month we were assisting the war effort. But now, with the war over for two years, I feel it is time the government gave consideration to discontinuing this practice. When I say that I have in mind this procedure as it affects members of parliament, and perhaps I might be permitted to state the situation as it applies to me. Last year $769 was deducted from my indemnity, in August, if I remember correctly, and the government had the use of it until April 1 of this year. I received no interest on that money, although I was entitled to the use of it for six or seven months, and to the use of some of it for a year. I did not have that use. But if we happen to be even one day late in sending in our cheques at the end of the year we are penalized to the extent of five per cent.

Now, what about those working on a straight salary who may not be receiving as much as I receive? Before deductions were made at the source one who had a salary of $150 or $175 a month got that amount each month. But what happens today? The government steps in and takes ninety per cent of the amount it expects to take, and these people do not have the use of that money for a year. I contend this is an invasion of the rights of the individual. It is the money which belongs to the man who earned it, and he should have it. The wage earners and salary earners are suffering discrimination in this respect.

Business men and farmers are not required to submit their income tax forms until the end of the year. Why not put the wage earner in the same class? I see no reason why we should discriminate against anyone just because he is working for a salary or wages. In my opinion that is unreasonable. I think our wage earners are just as responsible as anyone in business, and I am sure that at the end of the year they will recognize their responsibilities and pay the government what is coming to them. It may be argued by some that they do not feel it when a few dollars are taken off every month, but the fact remains that all taxpayers should be treated alike. In my opinion deductions at the source should be discontinued now that the war is over and we are again in a period of peace.

When the minister presented his budget I expected that there would be reductions in the indirect and nuisance taxes, the taxes that we have to pay every day. One impost which has been referred to in this house on several occasions is the tax on soft drinks and chocolate bars. I have received many letters from small bottlers, and I have one here from the Shamrock Bottling Works in Medicine Hat which I think I should read to the house because it is really worth while. High school students and others of our younger people are going on strike against buying soft drinks and chocolate bars; they are going on strike against other things, and I think that is entirely wrong. We have too many strikes today, and in my opinion the government is forcing the younger generation to go on strike against these things. They may not get any reduction in the price of chocolate bars or soft drinks, but it is being instilled in these young minds that by going on strike they can get something. I submit that the government is doing something it should not be doing when it taxes soft drinks and chocolate bars. There are many persons in the lower income brackets, and their children are just as much entitled to chocolate bars and soft drinks as the children of people in the higher brackets or those who are well off. This is what Mr. Millensifer, the manager of the Shamrock Bottling Works, says in his letter:

> Soft drinks must be sold for the same price as candy, gum and ice cream, et cetera, otherwise it is a serious deterrent to our business.
> The retailers are fed up with high priced soft drinks and odd penny transactions which puts their bread and butter business in jeopardy.
> The public feel that their daily wants should not be the subject of high taxations. Soft drinks are part of the Canadian way of life, are the wholesome beverages of children, teenagers, workers and veterans. Such a temperate custom should be encouraged, rather than penalized by special war excise taxes during peace years.

That man is quite willing to sell his coca-colas at five cents a bottle. I also have a letter from Reverend V. A. Hall, minister of the First Baptist church, Medicine Hat, reading in part as follows:

> Today, we as ministers and social workers are called upon continually to do everything we can towards overcoming the terrible juvenile problems. With the increase of emphasis upon wholesome gatherings for youth I feel strongly that it would be a great help in the right direction if the government would see fit to drop the two-cent tax on soft drinks. It would assist the work being done and would also bring the soft drink into a different price field than beer.

How true those letters are! It is up to the government to discontinue these nuisance taxes, not only on soft drinks but on many other items.

There is another matter I have in mind, and it affects many of the people in Alberta. I refer to the eight per cent tax on gas and electric bills. There are about 50,000 users of natural gas in Alberta, located in about 32 cities and towns and they must pay this eight per cent tax while those using coal do not pay a tax. This is another example of discriminatory taxation. We are fortunate in Medicine Hat in having our own gas, but when we pay our bills at the end of the month we have this extra eight per cent to pay. Efforts have been made to have this tax removed, but so far without success. This is just another of the many taxes that should be discontinued.

I am sorry the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is not in his place this afternoon, because I wanted to say a few things about old age pensions. Any time old age pensions are discussed in this house it seems to get under his skin; it appears rather hard for him to sit still. I should like to say a few words about old age pensions this afternoon despite the fact that a bill is to be brought down in the near future. This legislation should have been brought down long ago. I have sat in this house now for three sessions and I can see no reason why that bill could not have been brought down the first session I was here.

During the debate in the house the other day the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) was speaking and a few words passed between the hon. member and the Minister. The hon. member had this to say, as reported on page 3034 of Hansard:

> And the point was this, that if the provincial government had given more than that there would have been difficulty, because there is a federal regulation whereby, if more than $425 is received by the pensioner, the federal government's contribution would be cut down. So that it was unwise for the provincial government to give the pensioners more, with one hand, only to have the federal government take it away from them with the other.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member knows that is not so.

I should like to know who is right.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am, of course.

Mr. WYLIE: I quite believe that. I have had a lot to do with old age pensions, and that is exactly the way I have found it. If it is not the way, then we should be told. I am sure that is the way the pension boards in the various provinces consider it should be done. It is up to the minister to straighten out this matter and tell us what are the regulations. I know he brought down some regulations the other day, but all I have to go by is the statement he made. I hope there will be some relaxation of the restrictions.

I have received through the mail many signed cards, as other hon. members have, asking for certain social security and pension benefits. They are not the cards mentioned the other night by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage). I do not think there was any money made on these cards. The ones he referred to were cards which he claimed were made for perhaps less than one cent, and they were sold for five cents. All I have to say about that is that if the Union of Electors can sell their cards for five cents, and people will buy them, they should be free to accept that five cents, because it is known where their campaign funds are coming from, and that is more than the hon. member can say about his party. I would ask him to get up and tell this house where his campaign funds come from. The cards I am discussing now are entirely different from those cards. They are the same shape and about the same size. They urge social security and a retirement allowance of $60 a month to men at the age of sixty and to women at the age of fifty-five without any means test. That may be a little too much to ask; I do not know, but I certainly would like to see the old age pensioners get a little more than they do now.

What the minister said the other night reminds me of a letter I received from an old age pensioner seventy-six years old. This gentleman had been a school teacher all his life, and when we were short of school teachers in Alberta he returned and taught school. When I say he taught school, I should explain that what he did was this: the papers were forwarded from the department to the school and this gentleman marked them. By doing that he earned something like $400 in one year. But because he earned that money his pension was discontinued for one year. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) said that there were no old age pensioners who had children. This is one man who had one child still going to high school in Medicine Hat, and he was responsible for her; no one else was responsible for her. But his old age pension was cut off for one year because he did something for the children in that area.

I noticed an item in the press the other day which surprised me very much. We all know of course that a short time ago the Liberal party had a big convention in Toronto. I imagine that most of the aspirants for the leadership of the Liberal party in Ontario were responsible men, but when I saw one of them trying to play politics with the old age pension I certainly could not wish that party any luck in their next election.

Mr. GRANT: What are you doing now but playing politics?

Mr. BLACKMORE: He is doing what he came here to do—looking after the common man.

Mr. GRANT: The other fellow was doing the same.

Mr. WYLIE: This is what one of the aspirants for the leadership of the Liberal party of Ontario said, according to a report in the Ottawa Citizen of May 16:

> During the policy report debate, the convention turned down a suggestion that the party go on record as favouring a $40 a month minimum old-age pension. Mr. Lamport, chairman of the public welfare committee, said this was not the time to "give away the dynamite of the Liberal campaign for the next election."

Mr. GRAYDON: What dynamite?

Mr. WYLIE: A minimum of $40 a month for old age pensioners. I was very much surprised to read that in the press, and I certainly hope that the party will never be in power to carry that out.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are as safe as a church on that.

Mr. WYLIE: What I mainly rose to discuss was irrigation, but after listening to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon I do not know that there is very much that I can say. We do have a problem in the west in the drought area for which irrigation is the only solution. I often think that one-half of Canada does not know how the other half lives. In discussing problems pertaining to western Canada I do not think

I should be classed as a nationalist at all. I have a devotion to those drought areas. I am reminded of a trip I was privileged to take about two weeks ago, sponsored by the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross). On that trip I saw areas I had never seen before and got to know many members with whom I had never before been intimate. It made me realize that when you get to know one another and understand their problems, things are much easier.

In the west, according to the last report of the Department of Agriculture, there are in Saskatchewan 1,541 townships which averaged from eight bushels per acre down to zero; 750 townships averaged five bushels or less to the acre. Those 1,541 townships affected 42,592 individuals, and they received a total amount of a little more than $12,000,000. In Alberta there were 890 townships, 442 of which averaged five bushels or less to the acre, and 448 eight bushels or less. Those 890 townships affected 18,244 individuals, who received a little over $4,000,000.

When you tell people in the east that we have yields in the west averaging sometimes four bushels or less to the acre, they seem unable to realize it. They think it just cannot be so. That is why I say that people in eastern Canada should see the conditions in that large area in western Canada, especially around the first of July. Just imagine a man with 480 acres of land, 400 acres under cultivation. The general practice would be to put 200 acres each year under crop and 200 under summer-fallow. That means that he would thresh 800 bushels of wheat, and at $1.35 a bushel that would bring slightly over $1,000. In other words, his income for that year is slightly over $1,000, and out of that he has to meet all his expenses. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act has done wonderful work. He will receive $500 from the government through the P.F.A.A., and if it were not for that he would be on relief. But he has 80 acres more, and some people may say, he still has 80 acres of pasture. Well, in the drought area 80 acres will carry only two head of cattle; that is the recognized number of stock that will be carried in such an area, 40 acres per head. The provincial government leases the land on that basis, and as a matter of fact in some areas only three head of cattle per quarter section, or 160 acres, can be taken care of. It is hard to realize that. Well, there is only one solution to that, and it is irrigation.

I realize that the dominion government has started on the St. Mary-Milk river dam, which will hold 270,000 acre feet of water and will supply water to another 345,000 acres of land, and partly to another 120,000 acres. That is only one dam, but we have many others. We have the Red Deer diversion scheme, which the hon. member for Acadia often speaks of. When you think of what can be done in the way of irrigation in that area you will see the significance from the standpoint of population. We sometimes wonder why we are having a redistribution in the matter of population. The population in those areas can be increased by thousands if we make use of natural resources. The dominion government and the provincial government, of course, have come to an agreement over the conservation of the watershed on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, and I am sure we are all glad to see that. It is badly needed. That is our only protection to supply water in the future for our drought area.

I notice some of the eastern papers are taking up the question of irrigation, and I refer particularly to the Globe and Mail, which at times rather surprises me. They must have a western writer on that paper, and I have one editorial here in particular which is very good. They explain what the Lethbridge area produces. It produces $100 million worth of goods, $70 million in agricultural produce, and that is produced in an area which, before irrigation was used, was producing very little. It tells of Saskatchewan's problems and the way the population has decreased in that province. It tells what can be done by more irrigation in that area and it has this to say:

> Twenty years ago the population of the Lethbridge northern irrigation district, for example, was 1,500. Today it is 10,000. The dry land farms in the west support an average of 3·5 persons per square mile; irrigated farms 30 per square mile. Average returns per acre throughout Alberta is $12. In the irrigated sugar beet fields near Lethbridge it was $111 in 1946.

That just shows what irrigation can do when it is in an area such as we have in southern Alberta. But the writer entirely spoils the editorial in his last paragraph. I am going to read that paragraph because so many people in Ontario do not quite understand what irrigation means to the west. The writer says:

> Also, if Alberta is fully appreciative of the values of water control, nothing like the same degree of understanding has been evinced by Ottawa or, for that matter, by the federal members of parliament representing those western areas most susceptible to drought. Up till now the lone parliamentary voice, which for long cried in the wilderness, has not been that of a western member nor even of a farm member, but that of a Toronto manufacturer. It would be appropriate about this time, we think, if there was something heard from representatives of those areas vitally concerned with this question.

That last paragraph spoils the whole editorial. I agree that the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has done a lot in advocating irrigation and letting people know the results, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that any time the hon. member wants to come to Medicine Hat he will get a hearty welcome. But there have been others in this house who have discussed irrigation, before the hon. member sat here. I refer particularly to Doctor Gershaw, who is now a senator. Since 1935 we have had the member for Acadia here, the member for Battle River, and the member for Lethbridge. Will anyone try to tell me that they have not discussed irrigation in this house? Surely not. The former member for Medicine Hat, between 1935 and 1940, made many speeches on irrigation. I suggest to the editor of the Globe and Mail that he read Hansard a little more and inform himself before he spoils a good editorial by adding a little politics at the end of it. The hon. member for Davenport has done much to sponsor irrigation in the west, and I hope he will be back to see us.

In Alberta we have many other areas that can be put under irrigation. As a matter of fact, we have 976,000 acres that have already been surveyed, which can be put under the ditch. That means that we shall have an additional 10,000 farms. What does that mean in its economic effect, not only on Alberta but on Canada as a whole? It means that we shall have 976,000 additional acres under irrigation, and 9,590 irrigation farms would be created. Assuming that each irrigation farm would support five members of a family, the rural population would be increased by 47,950 persons and the urban population would be increased by at least 39,000 persons. Assuming that each irrigation farmer spent approximately $2,000 on the purchase of farm implements, it can readily be seen that the agricultural machine manufacturing industry would benefit to the extent of $20 million in orders for assorted implements. In addition to the purchase of farm implements, the need for sundry processed goods, fabrics, utensils, clothing, et cetera, would be approximately twenty per cent of the total annual farm production, to the benefit of transportation and eastern manufacturing concerns. These are just a few figures.

I could discuss the irrigation problem for hours and still not exhaust the subject, but I cannot deal with it fully in forty minutes. In fact, I sometimes think that forty minutes is too long for any member to speak in the house, especially if we are to get through the business outlined yesterday by the Prime Minister. But no matter how much we talk about irrigation, there is only one way to do it and that is through action by the government. We found all the money we wanted during the past war, and I see no reason why we cannot find just a little bit more to satisfy our own people and keep them contented. We have wonderful opportunities in that southern area for the rehabilitation of many of our veterans and the farmers who are already there. Let us give them just a little better deal. Let us get busy on irrigation. Let us have a little more action and less talk.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the budget remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had about them elements of both inflation and deflation. In the picture he drew in advance of his actual announcement of his budget proposals there were strong elements of inflation. But when he proceeded finally to announce the fiscal changes he was actually proposing, I think all members must have realized—or must realize now if they did not do so before—that a process of deflation was at work having regard to the glowing promises which preceded the actual proposals.

Any decrease in income tax is necessarily welcome to a tax-burdened people. The decrease which the Minister of Finance announced is welcome, but it is not adequate. To most of the people who are affected, it is trifling in amount. I submit that it cannot be regarded, in most cases, as more than a token reduction. It will be accepted gladly, but only as the slender first instalment of reductions which must be made. The reductions, of course, are not fairly measured in terms of percentages but are fairly measured in terms of what the reduction means in dollars and cents to the man of small means, the man in the low-income bracket or lower middle bracket. To the average taxpayer, the married man with two children, with an income of $1,800 a year, it means that this year the reduction will be only $4; to the man with an income of $2,000, the reduction is only $16; to the man with $2,250 of income, the reduction is only $25; to the man with an income of $2,500, the reduction is only $32; to the man with an income of $2,750, the reduction is only $39; and to the man with an income of $3,000, the reduction is only $49. These reductions are entirely inadequate.

I have just one comment on the surplus. I am not prepared to offer any words of commendation to the Minister of Finance on the size of an alleged budget surplus when it reflects such inexcusably inaccurate budgeting as we have seen this past year. Actually the government has taken from the people of this country, on various accounts, $352,000,000 more than they actually needed to balance their accounts, and this at a time when the taxpayers have been suffering greatly under an excessively heavy burden of taxation. Fourteen per cent more was taken from the people in taxes than was actually needed to finance the government expenditures of last year.

If this is put before us as a surplus of $352,000,000 on current account, then I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not an honest surplus. It has been brought about by the sale of government assets to the total of $372,000,000 so that actually on strict current account there is a deficit of $20,000,000. That is no more truly a budget surplus than it would be in the case of a man, we will say, with an income of $2,400 a year whose expenditure is running to $2,600 a year, who has made up his mind that he is not going to have a deficit, and who goes out and sells his motor car and refrigerator for $500, ends up with $2,900, and says that he has come out with a $300 surplus.

This budget is also woefully lacking in any attempt at an approach to the problem of spending. The government had an opportunity this year, relieved as it was to the extent of $900 million of expenditures on account of demobilization and reconversion, to grapple with the problem of bringing expenditure within the capacity of the people of this country to bear. On the contrary they have taken advantage of that relief from the burden of expenditure on demobilization and reconversion account to begin the upward spiral of expenditure in the majority of the departments of government. In seventeen out of twenty-eight departments expenditure for the current fiscal year is to be greater than last year. It is not enough for the Minister of Finance to say that the responsibility rests on parliament, unless the government is prepared to give parliament a really effective opportunity to review the estimates in detail. That cannot be done when the house is sitting in committee of the whole. There are too many here and it takes too much time. These estimates are chronically left until too late in the session for any comprehensive or thorough review. If parliament is to have any effective participation in the review of expenditure, a different means must be found from that in vogue at the present time.

Furthermore, the habit of heavy taxation is a difficult one for this government to shake. The habit has become so deep-seated. Actually this year the Minister of Finance says that he is budgeting for a surplus of $190 million; and even in the unlikely event, under present circumstances, of all the remaining provinces coming in and accepting the terms proposed by the dominion government in respect of an agreement, there will still be a surplus of $80 million, which represents an excess of taxation over the amount actually required to meet this year's expenditure.

The means resorted to by the Minister of Finance or by the government for accomplishing the reduction in the income tax is not a satisfactory or adequate method. Actually, as against reductions in taxation which for this fiscal year ending March 31, 1948, will amount to $160 million, the government has relieved itself of no less than $208 million in subsidies as compared with the past fiscal year. Let us leave out of consideration entirely those forces which are at work at the present time to increase the cost of living, and just put this problem on the basis of the amount which the dominion government contributed last year in the form of subsidies to help reduce the cost of living. The dominion government has now relieved itself of that grand total of $208 million as compared with last year. As against that they offer reductions in taxation for this fiscal year of only $160,000,000. That is a poor sample of a reduction in taxation which will offer any net benefit to the people. Actually the government has been offering $160,000,000 with one hand and with the other taking away $208,000,000 in terms of the cost of living of the people. What do these trifling token reductions in income tax mean to the married man, with two children, whose income is $2,000? As I mentioned a moment ago, his reduction in income tax this year is just $16. How far will that go to meet the increased cost of many articles which are staple household necessities and to the cost of which the government formerly contributed by way of subsidies? As a matter of fact in the case of most families that reduction of $16 will not cover the increased cost of one of these staple necessities of life, let alone all of them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I turn briefly to the related subjects of trade, exchange and the plight of the gold mining industry. Our fiscal relationships with the United States have reached very serious proportions; and because of the difficulties the countries in the sterling area are having in converting currency, the situation affects us in our external commercial relations in almost every quarter. In the year 1946 we had a trading deficit with the United States of $603,000,000, by a very wide margin the highest in our history. Compare that with the figures for some earlier years. In 1938, the last full year of peace, our trading deficit with the United States was $149,000,000. In 1941, when we were making substantial purchases of war materials in the United States, our deficit was $318,000,000. In 1946 it jumped to $603,000,000, and it has not stopped there. As a matter of fact the tempo has quickened, and in the first quarter of this year our trading deficit with the United States amounted to no less than $204,000,000. The situation is approaching alarming proportions.

Consider this in relation to the gold mining industry, which in those dark days of the thirties did so much to carry this country through the depression. We were very glad then to have an industry for whose product there was always a market, especially a market in the United States to help reduce our trading deficit with that country. In 1941 gold production in this country netted us $205,000,000. In 1946 it dropped to half that figure, $103,000,000. Today it is nothing short of tragic to see what is happening to this great Canadian industry. Apart from some of the big producing mines, which in times like these can fall back upon their higher grade ore bodies and stop mining on their lower grade stopes, the gold mining industry has reached a critical position. Exploration work is at a standstill. The marginal mines are at a standstill. The whole industry, apart from a few very large mines, today is faced with nothing short of ruin, and this government has not offered anything in this budget to save that industry from destruction. The need has been there for any government with its eyes open to see; but it stands back with arms folded and watches this industry proceed to ruin.

The difference between the Canadian dollar and the United States dollar on the unofficial market in the United States; or, if you like, the difference between the Canadian dollar ruling at a discount up to June last and the United States dollar as it ruled at that time in terms of premium, represented in great mining areas in Canada, not confined to one province alone, the difference between valuable ore bodies and heaps of rock. That is just what the reduction in the price of gold has meant, and this situation cannot be redeemed apart from an increase in the price that gold produced in this country is able to fetch in the United States. If some encouragement were given the gold mining industry it could contribute mightily to redressing our unfavourable trading account with the United States, and I urge the Minister of Finance to lose no time in addressing himself to this problem and at least offering the gold producers of this country a price equivalent to the price of the American dollar with relation to the Canadian dollar ruling in the unofficial market in the United States.

[Mr. Fleming.]

It is a matter of general regret, I am certain, that in the present budget the Minister of Finance has not done anything to remedy the injury he wrought last year to married women in respect of their income tax. Here we have the labour department boasting in a recent publication about the number of married women who are employed. They make this statement:

> In 1946 twenty-one per cent of all persons gainfully employed were women, as compared with seventeen per cent in 1939 and thirteen per cent in 1911. Of all women employed in 1946 in industries other than agriculture, twenty-three per cent were married.

We need married women in those lines of industry in which they are employed today. The time has not come when we want to see married women retire from those lines of employment in which today they are filling a role which cannot be filled otherwise. I am thinking of nursing, of the needle trades, of domestic service, and a good many other avenues of female employment.

I turn now to the subject of indirect taxes. I suppose indirect taxes are always popular with governments because they are hidden and, not being known or appreciated by the people, they are thought by governments to be painless. It is like the dentist who gives a patient gas but takes out the tooth just the same. This government is certainly fond of levying indirect taxes. Of a total of $2,458 million in taxes raised by the government from the Canadian people last year, $1,436 million was raised by direct taxes and no less than $1,022 million by indirect taxes. Yes, indirect taxes are at the highest point ever reached in the history of this country. I wish to comment on several matters, and to say something in the first place about the way the sales tax is applied. What I have to say about the sales tax applies with equal force to all these indirect taxes, because they are consumer taxes. They bear no reference to the capacity of the taxpayer to pay, and therefore bear relatively much more heavily on the man with a small income, particularly if he has a large family or other dependents.

The pyramiding of the sales tax is a serious problem. Let me give you an actual case as an example. A wholesaler pays $10 a dozen for hosiery; the eight per cent sales tax amounts to 80 cents. His mark-up is 20 per cent, making the selling price by the wholesaler to the retailer $12.96. The retailer adds 50 per cent, again on the total, making a price of $19.44. In other words the consumer is not paying a sales tax of 8 per cent; by that pyramiding method he is paying a tax of 14·4 per cent. This is one example of many that could be cited.

I wish to refer also to the so-called luxury taxes. Actually, in terms of normal peacetime, this is a misnomer, and I think the Minister of Finance ought to be the first to admit it. It is not a luxury tax. There may have been some justification for calling it a luxury tax in time of war, when it was deliberate government policy to siphon off manpower from certain avenues of production and concentrate it on the production of war materials, but that does not bear any relationship to the situation in peacetime. Let me refer to the way this so-called luxury tax is working out at the present time. It is full of anomalies, and it is time the government removed those anomalies.

Today a refrigerator is taxable, but an icebox is not. A vacuum cleaner is taxable, but a carpet sweeper is not. An electric range is taxable, but a coal range is not. Fountain pens, clocks, watches, plated and pewterware, trunks, bill pouches, shopping bags and things of that kind are taxable as luxuries, but oil paintings, oriental rugs and other items incidental to a luxurious or semi-luxurious living standard are not taxable.

Let us consider the way in which this tax applies, particularly to necessities required by young people who are setting themselves up in housekeeping. Jewellers, too, have a legitimate complaint on this score, as well as consumers.

Why should alarm clocks, knives, forks, spoons and glassware be classified as luxuries, and subjected to luxury tax? If one puts a $1,000 table on a $3,000 oriental rug in his home, those articles are treated as necessities and are not taxed as luxuries. But if he puts on that table a fork costing $1.50, the fork is treated as a luxury and is taxable accordingly. There is no sense in taxation of that kind. It simply does offence to reason. I believe the minister has admitted as much, because, writing to the Hon. Angus Macdonald, premier of Nova Scotia, on April 21, 1947, he said this:

> These taxes, along with a considerable number of other special taxes, such as those on gasoline, soft drinks, candy bars, luggage, clocks, jewellery, furs and the like, were imposed by the dominion during the war emergency. I imagine that most governments are more anxious to take taxes off than to put them on.

So far as the taxes to which I have referred are concerned, I say the people of this country would like to see a little action on the part of the government toward taking them off.

Is it realized that if one enters a florist shop today and buys cut flowers he will not pay luxury tax? But if he buys flowers in a vase he pays a tax not only on the vase but on the flowers as well! This is another anomaly. If one buys flowers in a vase, he pays a tax on the whole purchase—a luxury tax on the complete purchase. It is unjust.

Not only are these taxes working an injustice on the consumer, but I can tell the house they are working a serious injustice on a young Canadian industry. I refer to the ceramics industry. Before this tax, this industry was making some headway and employing a considerable number of people, but under present tax conditions it is faced with extinction. I beg of the minister to appreciate the seriousness of the problem this young industry faces, and to bring relief to it and thus bring relief to the consumers who are buying these commodities. If I had time I could give examples showing reductions of employment in the numbers of persons engaged in the ceramics industry. These reductions have been made recently, when the industry has been feeling the full weight of the tax. In some instances the reductions run up to 60 or 75 per cent of the numbers employed.

The amendment offered on May 6 by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) deplores the failure of the Minister of Finance in his budget to provide for the reconvening of the dominion-provincial conference in order to complete a satisfactory agreement with the provinces and a dominion-provincial programme of social security, health and public investment.

Let us not for the moment be too confused over figures, but rather realize fully the realities of the situation. Somehow a way must be found to reach agreement with reference to taxation fields, social security and public investment as between the dominion and the provinces. It is a fact that there cannot be that over-all agreement which is so essential unless there be a dominion-provincial conference. But the dominion government, which alone can call such a conference, refuses to do so, and demands that Ontario and Quebec yield and, in advance of any conference, accept terms offered previously by the dominion government. All the provinces are asking that the conference be reconvened, but the dominion government refuses to convene it.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, they are not.

Mr. FLEMING: I say the time has come when this nation demands that the conference be reconvened. The party of which I have the honour of being a member believes that a way to agreement can be found. But we say this, that it will not be found by methods pursued in this chamber by some hon. members opposite during the course of this debate, by calling the premiers of Ontario and Quebec hard names. That will not bring about a solution of this problem.

Mr. ABBOTT: And calling the action of the dominion government political blackmail will not help, either.

Mr. FLEMING: I would remind the Minister of Finance and any other hon. members opposite who may be interested that these premiers are not speaking for themselves alone. They speak for the legislatures of their respective provinces. On April 1 of this year the Ontario legislature by a vote of 57 to 21 endorsed the position taken by the premier of that province in the course of these negotiations, and in connection with the offer made by the dominion.

In Quebec the legislature has recently enacted Bill 30, with the effect of authorizing the provincial government to negotiate a general basis of agreement between the dominion and all the provinces, but not on the terms that the dominion is insisting should be accepted. Before hon. members opposite go too far in calling the premiers of these two provinces hard names, I would remind them of what Mr. Godbout, the leader of the Liberal party in Quebec, had to say not so long ago. Speaking in the throne speech debate in the Quebec legislature on February 18 of this year, Mr. Godbout said this, as reported in the Montreal Daily Star of February 19:

> Naturally, Mr. Godbout proceeded, the preservation of provincial autonomy is the first prerequisite. The province cannot, under any pretext, sacrifice any of its sacred rights and privileges.

And further down:

> But as regards the Ottawa proposals, Mr. Godbout said—

And, by the way, these were the latest proposals made by the dominion government—

> —he could not say that he approves them, or whether he objects to them.

And again:

> Mr. Godbout claimed that, in the light of what he learned of the Ottawa proposals, he felt they could not be accepted in their entirety. For example, he was against the Ottawa government entering the succession duties field, because in his opinion that should be left exclusively to the provinces. Furthermore, he believed that a number of taxes of another nature, now collected by Ottawa, should be retained by the provinces.

The premiers of these two provinces not only are willing to meet the dominion and the other provinces in a general conference, but have implored the dominion to call a conference. And this has been going on ever since the conference was adjourned in May, 1946.

On January 23 of this year the Premier of Ontario wrote the Prime Minister a letter, at the conclusion of which he said:

> I assure you that the government of Ontario will be ready to attend such a conference in Ottawa at any time and there examine and consider all proposals on their merits. We are most anxious to arrive at a settlement which will be just and fair to the people of every part of Canada.

And the Toronto Globe and Mail of May 7 reports a statement by Mr. Duplessis to the same effect, as follows:

> Mr. Duplessis expressed his willingness to attend another plenary conference, but declared his unalterable opposition to any secret meetings.

He continued:

> Conferences, secret or separate, are contrary to the spirit of the federative pact.

Mr. Drew is reported in the Globe and Mail of May 7 as follows:

> We want an agreement with the dominion, but we also want an examination of the constitution so that our taxation system may be simplified, improved and made more efficient for the great years ahead.

The fact that the Premier of Nova Scotia entered into an agreement recently with the dominion government, apparently with a considerable measure of reluctance as to the terms eventually settled upon, has not changed the position with regard to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. We have statements to that effect. I have only time to refer to the one attributed to Colonel Drew which appeared in the Globe and Mail of May 14, in which he said, "Our stand is still"—that is after the agreement with Nova Scotia—"that a further inter-provincial conference is needed to discuss the situation."

I implore the dominion government to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference. The crux of this matter revolves around six minor fields of taxation. Having regard to the size of those fields and the revenues accruing to the dominion, is the dominion government justified in refusing to reconvene the conference unless the provinces forgo these fields except the gasoline tax? Here is a list of the yields from these six taxes in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1947, and I will give the figures in millions only:

Gasoline tax	$36,000,000
Amusement tax	14,500,000
Pari-mutuel tax	2,500,000
Electricity tax	5,000,000
Security transfer tax	1,000,000
Succession duties	23,500,000
	$82,500,000

The dominion has withdrawn from the gasoline tax field, so actually all that remains at stake are five fields of taxation with a total revenue of $47 million. When the Minister of Finance is budgeting for a surplus of $190 million this year, is he justified in standing firm for the retention of these fields of taxation? Having regard to the fact that the war ended two years ago, and that the war emergency which occasioned the entry of the dominion into these fields has passed, I submit that it is the primary duty of the Minister of Finance to withdraw from these fields of taxation. When he has budgeted for a surplus for this coming fiscal year I submit that he should eliminate these taxes and leave them to the provinces.

I have only time to make one or two hasty references to the agreements already signed. First, so far as this Progressive Conservative party is concerned and as its distinguished leader has said on more than one occasion, there will be no interference on the part of this party with agreements already signed. The leader of this party has said that if the Progressive Conservative party were in office today the provinces which have signed would get at least as good terms as those they already possess, or better.

Second, the terms offered by the dominion go far beyond the terms of the original offer upon which agreement was found to be impossible at the dominion-provincial conference in April and May, 1946. The actual advance in the total cost to the dominion is $100,000,000 per annum over the original offer considered at that time. A total of $225,000,000 is the estimated cost to the dominion this year if these proposals had been accepted by all the provinces.

In the next place, so far as the third and most recent bait offered to the provinces is concerned, it increased the cost by $26,000,000 and the minister made clear in this house on March 28 that the government will insist that this sum be taken into account when the dominion and the provinces sit down, if they ever do sit down, to discuss the problems of social security and public investment.

It is not enough to have individual agreements with some of the provinces. There must be a general agreement; there must be some attempt made to preserve the workability of our constitution by allowing uniform constitutional relationships to subsist between the dominion and the various provinces. Therefore the pursuit of secret agreements is essentially wrong in principle. There must be open negotiations—

Mr. ABBOTT: There are no secret agreements and there never have been.

Mr. FLEMING: —to which all the provinces must have full access.

I ask hon. members on the other side of the house who represent Quebec constituencies if they are prepared to go to their constituencies and say that they advocate the acceptance by their province of the lowest per capita rate of all the provinces. This is inherent in the latest dominion-provincial proposals by the federal government, because it would pay only $16.63 per annum for every person in Quebec, as against higher figures for the other provinces, $17.29 for Ontario and running up to $23.33 in the case of the most favoured province.

The nation wants an agreement. It wants the dominion and the provinces to sit down together. The nation demands that the dominion government call the provinces together. It was the desire of my leader to bring about an adjustment of the fiscal relationship between the dominion and the provinces on an equitable basis that led him to form his coalition government in Manitoba some years ago. The desire to see that accomplished was one of the things which led him to enter the federal political field. If the present dominion government will not move to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference in order to bring about an agreement between the dominion and the provinces, then it may be well assured that a government headed by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) will do so at the very first opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, this brings me to the concluding passage of my remarks, which I should like to deliver in French, trusting that you will overlook my shortcomings.

(Translation):

The Progressive Conservative party believes that a way can be found to bring about agreement between the dominion and the provinces on the important questions of fields of taxation, social security and public investment.

Mr. GRAYDON: Hear, hear!

Mr. SPEAKER: Order! Before interrupting the hon. member who is speaking, I suggest that the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) should ask his permission to do so.

Mr. GRAYDON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FLEMING: This party affirms that compulsion on the part of the dominion government and unfair use of its vast powers to exert pressure on the provinces, are not the way to bring about agreement. It condemns such tactics as offending the spirit of the constitution.

This country was brought into being by agreement, embodied in the British North America Act—agreement between men of different provinces and of two great races and cultures. Destroy respect for that agreement, destroy the respect due to the constitutional rights of the provinces, and you destroy the basis of confederation itself. Our national well-being will never be advanced by doing violence to the constitutional basis of our nationhood.

I said that the Progressive Conservative party believes that a way can be found to bring about general agreement between the dominion and the provinces. It can be done if the dominion government will stop treating the provinces as subordinates, and if it will cease its persistent efforts to centralize power in Ottawa at the expense of the provinces. Let it restore to the provinces those fields of taxation which the provinces have said they wish to retain in order to continue to be sovereign under the constitution, and the way will immediately be opened to reaching a unanimous agreement.

Agreement between the dominion and some of the provinces is not sufficient. If confederation is to remain a fact the constitutional relationships between the dominion and all the nine provinces must be uniform, always reserving the rights guaranteed under the constitution to the province of Quebec and its people.

Hon. Liberal members who during this debate have been deriding and attacking the premier of Quebec and the premier of Ontario are contributing nothing to a true solution of the problem. If they really desire an honourable agreement between the dominion and all the provinces, let them refrain from their silly tactics of calling Mr. Duplessis and Mr. Drew names. Let them remember that these two honourable gentlemen have been honoured by the people of their respective provinces with their confidence, and that their policies on dominion-provincial relations have recently been strongly endorsed by the legislatures of their respective provinces. These two men have a duty, not only to the people of their own provinces, but to Canada to protect the constitution, just as the dominion government has a duty to protect the constitution. Mr. Duplessis and Mr. Drew are the kind of men who will perform this duty, no matter how bitter and unfair be the personal attacks made on them by Liberal members in this house. Hon members would do well to remember that Mr. Godbout, the Liberal leader in the province of Quebec, when speaking in the Quebec legislature on February 19, requested that the dominion vacate the field of taxation which Mr. Duplessis, Mr. Drew and Mr. Angus Macdonald have said the provinces must possess exclusively.

Mr. Duplessis stated in Quebec city as recently as May 6, that he was willing to attend another plenary conference. The legislature of Quebec, by its Bill No. 30, has authorized Mr. Duplessis' government to enter into agreements with the dominion government. Mr. Drew has for months been urging the dominion government to reconvene the conference. The premiers of the other provinces have all been asking for the same thing. Under these circumstances, there can be no excuse for the refusal of the dominion government to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference.

I call upon the government to put aside petty partisan politics and to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference, and thus to open the way to negotiations and unanimous tax agreements, the kind of agreement by which the constitutional fabric of this nation may be strengthened, and prosperity and security won for all our people, not by bureaucratic centralization of power at Ottawa, but by achieving the maximum of provincial autonomy with a minimum of centralization.

Mr. ABBOTT: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. ARSENE BONNIER (Saint-Henri): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. member who has just resumed his seat on his splendid handling of the French language. If 90 per cent of the members in this house did as much, it would promote agreement among the provinces and between the two great races which people them.

Mr. Speaker, I will devote part of my remarks to my constituency, which is, by the way, one of the largest in the province of Quebec, since it has a population of 80,000 numbering an electorate of 50,000. Needless to say, should the government act, in the interest of my fellow citizens, on any of their long standing requests, any such steps would surely be highly appreciated.

I also wish to point out that I represent the largest industrial county in the province for there are more industries within my constituency than in any other of the city of Montreal. Altogether, there are 160, some small, some large, but all fairly important. In that district, one finds, for instance the Canada Car & Foundry plant, which employs only men and numbers about 6,000 workers; during the war, one of its sections built airplanes and thus did great service to the country. There is also the Canadian Tube plant, just about on the same footing, since it employed some 6,000 men. Last year, it built a million dollar addition to its present establishment. I can tell hon. members opposite who are always talking about nails that we produce them in my constituency. If they care to pay us a visit, they may be able to buy a number of interesting things.

Dominion Textile have three branches and some 10,000 employees; many women and aged people, unable to find work elsewhere, are hired by this company. Imperial Tobacco, the important cigarette factory known to all, has a large staff consisting mainly of women. R.C.A. Victor also numbers many employees while Crane Limited, another important enterprise, retains a large staff as do General Steel Wares and the luggage concern of Eveleigh. Tooke Bros., big scale manufacturers of shirts, dressing gowns, ties, and so on, have a very flourishing industry in my constituency. Simmons Limited, manufacturer of iron beds and various iron supplies, number a great many employees. The important Robert Mitchell foundry also has a large staff while the Steel Company of Canada, manufacturers of nails and pipes, retains the services of a great many employees.

Mr. Speaker, it would take too long to list the 160 industries of my constituency. I have mentioned only a few. Would the house allow me, in order to save time, to put this table on record?

(Text):

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to table the memorandum?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may continue.

Mr. Speaker, in our county, we need a tunnel under the Lachine canal, the Côte Saint Paul tunnel. Not only the present government, but all governments have recognized the great need for that tunnel. It was recognized in 1932 and 1½ million dollars were then voted in that connection. Ottawa did not have a Liberal government at that time and there was no by-election in the offing yet the necessity for that undertaking was recognized. A request was also made in 1935 during the general elections. However, the member then elected, my predecessor, Mr. Mercier, was appointed judge and was unable to press the authorities for the construction of that tunnel. I must add, Mr. Speaker, that at the time of my election in 1938, not only the candidate but the government undertook to have that tunnel built. The latter recognized that it was urgent to pierce a tunnel at that point. The Hon. Mr. Rinfret and the Hon. Mr. Cardin both saw the need for it. They are no longer with us, but the present member for St. Henri is anxious to have those promises fulfilled.

In 1938, a certain amount of money was voted and the site was chosen, after various difficulties had been overcome. As a matter of fact, due to certain drawbacks, the site was changed two or three times. Finally, it was agreed to pierce the tunnel at a certain spot, and soundings were taken. In 1938, there was a re-vote for that purpose, and another in 1939. Instructions were given to draw up plans. Everything went well until war was declared in 1939. At that time, plans were almost complete, but the government deemed fitting to suspend all operations during the war. I bowed to that decision, but last year I renewed my attempts. The housing crisis was so acute, however, that all building materials were required for dwelling purposes, and the government asked me to postpone my request until this year. Now, in 1947, I do hope that the government will fulfil its promise and vote once again the amount of money that was provided in 1938. I shall have to take up the matter with the city of Montreal, inasmuch as they contribute the land. I promise to go through all the necessary steps and to secure from the city of Montreal acceptance of the terms which I was granted as alderman for the ward. Let us begin to fulfil our obligations.

Reports were made in 1938 on the traffic borne by the Côte Saint Paul bridge. Statistical records were compiled very recently. They show that automobile, truck, pedestrian, bicycle and other traffic has doubled. If it were not asking too much I would again request permission to have this table placed on record. It is very long and would take some time to read.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that the house does not encourage members to place tables on record, lest Hansard become too bulky. He has been granted that permission once by the house and I wonder whether he would obtain it a second time.

Mr. BONNIER: This document would be too long to read, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think that hon. members would take in every particular.

(Text):

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to put the document on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

(Translation):

Mr. BONNIER: Here is the table in question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a few words on the subdivision of my constituency. A chunk has just been cut out of it. The government enacted a very interesting measure giving the province of Quebec eight additional constituencies, four of which go to Montreal. These had to come from somewhere else, from other constituencies, here and there. As it has been necessary to take part of mine away, I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have received a number of protests, besides having made one myself. A committee of the house has been set up to judge these matters and they have decided that some sacrifices were necessary. There is no part of my constituency I would like to get rid of. My electors are all workers, right-minded workers.

I have gathered majorities in all sections. If I lose any of it, the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will be the gainer—

Mr. ABBOTT: Hear, hear!

Mr. BONNIER: —and my former constituents will lose nothing on the trade since the Minister of Finance will be their new representative.

In any case, if ever the former electors of my constituency, who were used to me and whom I have had the occasion to serve, wish to have recourse to my help, I shall always receive them sympathetically, their new position notwithstanding. The hon. the minister need entertain no fear about that piece of territory.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): He is not the timid sort.

Mr. BONNIER: The members of the Union of Electors are few in my constituency and the small group of about 10 or 15 are not in that section and I shall take care of them. I have a majority of close to 11,000 and my six opponents all lost their deposits. Although they call themselves the League of the Union of Electors, they are neither numerous nor dangerous. However, as a branch of the Social Credit party, they still advocate a $20 a month bonus for all citizens without increase in taxation. I repeat for the benefit of the minister, that, until the end of my mandate, that is, until the next general election, I will continue to take the interest of my whole constituency to heart and I wish to assure all my constituents that I am always at their service.

Mr. ABBOTT: Thank you.

(Text):

Mr. D. J. McCUAIG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the house and to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) what I think is unfair and unjust treatment imposed upon farmers and small businessmen in respect of income taxation. This applies especially to the part of the country from which I come, where there has been a series of crop failures. For income tax purposes the farmer was unable to carry his losses over from year to year prior to 1944. The income tax law was amended in 1946 in order to remedy this unjust situation, but it went back only to 1944. By this amendment the loss on the 1944 operations could be carried into 1945 and subsequent years. But this left huge outstanding losses on operating expense incurred in the years prior to 1944. I should like to ask the minister: If this principle holds good back to 1944, why not be fair and go the whole way? The principle cannot be changed.

I will give an example in my own district. In 1936 we had practically a crop failure. We just got seed out of it. In 1937 there was a complete crop failure. There was not one bushel threshed in our district. In 1938 the crop was spotty. In 1939 and 1940 we had the worst infestation of grasshoppers ever seen in western Canada. In 1941 there was a good crop and in 1942 there was the biggest crop we ever had. This is what happened. Hundreds of farmers were asked to make out income tax returns in the years 1943 and 1944 and to go back as far as 1940. Over the bad years there was a huge accumulation of debts—bank loans, machinery debt, repair bills, store accounts, doctor and hospital bills, back taxes and plenty of other things. The government, instead of giving the farmer a little encouragement, actually ruined the farmer's credit by not allowing him first to pay his debts, which I call his first obligation, to honour the trust and confidence which his fellow men, the small businessmen in town, had placed in him.

In 1942 there was a quota on wheat. The farmer could sell only so much. The same was true in 1943 and 1944. In 1943 and 1944 income tax inspectors travelled all over the country. The income tax branch and its inspectors completely ignored those past operating losses and allowed only current expenses which came within the income tax exemptions for the one year under review. The farmer was taxed for money which was not his, but which belonged to local businessmen who trusted him, gave him credit and provided him with means to carry on over those trying years. He was taxed to the limit on the income of those years I have mentioned, while he still owed a large amount of money.

Furthermore, there is the matter of the $1,200 exemption. In the years when the farmer had little or no revenue, he could not take advantage of that $1,200 exemption. He went into debt for the necessities of living and cost of operation of the farm. When a better crop year came along, he got the $1,200 exemption for that one year only, but still carried an accumulation of debt from the bad years. He was not permitted to carry forward the exemption of previous years in order to help pay the debts of those years. I want you to see, Mr. Speaker, that the farmer was stuck at both ends of the game, going and coming.

Let me give another instance. The income tax branch ruled that if a car was proved necessary for the carrying on of farming operations, car expense would be allowed. Expenses were allowed but depreciation was not allowed. If depreciation was not an expense, I should like to know what it was. I call it just plain chiselling. I would ask the minister to make a note of that.

The farmer's wife and family put in long hours, before school and after school, working in the garden, milking cows, feeding calves and raising chickens. They were the busiest people on the farm, but they were not allowed one dollar for their work. When it came to harvesting those things, they were required to give an account of every nickel, for income tax purposes. There was no thought or sympathetic consideration given to the appalling need for better homes, family needs, worn-out machinery and dilapidated buildings or, as was mentioned by an hon. member the other day, a well, which is a most necessary thing, for a farm must have water. After a farmer had spent long years wearing out tanks and wagons in drawing water, and had reached the stage when he had saved up a few dollars and could dig a well, the cost of the digging of this well was not allowed as an operating expense. This was what I call just more plain chiselling.

This is a far cry from the way our big business friends were treated. Double depreciation was allowed in many cases and, after making huge profits during the war, many government-assisted and built plants were handed back to the big fellows for a mere song. The Crane people were given $400,000. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) called it an incentive subsidy so that they would produce more. There was a large field ahead of this company; consumers were crying for more of their product and were likely to continue to do so for a long time. Why did this private enterprise industry not jump into it with their own capital or borrow money from the banks on their own responsibility, as the farmer has had to do? I think the government was pretty free with the taxpayers' money, money which belonged to the little people whom I am representing. Furthermore, no ceiling was put on the goods this company were making. They got the price they asked and they got subsidies besides; and do not let us forget that they had a complete monopoly on this product.

There is nothing needed more in the world today than food. People can do without bathtubs, but in order to live they must have food. Here we have, as a friendly gesture, $400,000 given to one firm with which to make bathtubs. Many times this amount was chiselled away from the tillers of the soil in income tax and subsidies, which subsidies should have been part of the selling price in the first place, but in my opinion it was called a subsidy so that it could be withdrawn and would not look so bad as would the reducing of prices. The farmers are not asking for an incentive; they are asking only for equity and justice. The most important industry in Canada should be treated on a par with other industries.

While this was going on, the Liberal government was deliberately taking the farmer's wheat and selling it to Canadian consumers at thirty cents a bushel less than he could get for it on the export market. The stockman got the same kind of deal. A floor price was put underneath his product when it was in the hands of the packer, but no floor price was put under cattle when they were in the hands of the producers. Why was the agriculturist, the humble tiller of the soil, treated in this way? I can only see it as a continuation of the spirit of the feudal lords toward the common man. The concern of our economy is not for the health and welfare of human beings, to provide better homes, better families, better bodies. The concern of our economy is for money, power and control. In the short space of ten years we have seen a lot of material things pass into history. For instance, Mussolini and his gang, Hitler and his gang, Tojo and his gang, all have passed into history. Why? Because there was no place in their philosophy for the teaching of the Man of Galilee: service and humility. Yet it would appear that we have learned nothing. This is the most damning indictment against our so-called democracy today, and I do not think we have the chance of a snowball in the hot place to build a Canadian empire under an economy of this kind. We educate thousands of our children only to have them leave Canada, a land of great potential wealth and beauty. At the present time thousands of our young people are getting married, and they say they are not going to have children; they say they cannot afford to have children.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCUAIG: That is quite common, and it is not a laughing matter. It will have a serious reaction on Canada's population in the next twenty years. I have been among these young people, and one hears that said on every hand. The magnificent churches of our cities are only half-filled today; yet the beer parlours are overflowing with men and women.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCUAIG: The drink bill is increasing at an alarming rate, and members laugh about it. We are selling millions of bushels of wheat to brewers and distillers, good food which is needed for millions of starving children. Juvenile delinquency, accidents and crimes are increasing, and we have not the accommodation to care properly for fifty per cent of our mentally ill people. A large percentage of our working people are living in homes without modern accommodation, such as bathtubs and toilets. These things are recognized by the public today, as is manifested by delegations, briefs and petitions brought before this government. Just recently a petition was presented in this house bearing the signatures of over a quarter of a million people praying for more humane treatment and care of our old people. The plight of the physically handicapped and war widows was brought to the attention of the government. Public opinion is aroused in Canada today as never before, for the adoption of social Christian principles as propounded by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation: humanity first.

To support this contention, Mr. Speaker, with your kind permission I shall submit some evidence, and from a corner of the house you would hardly expect it. I want to do honour where honour is due, in this case to an hon. member who, I think, is a conscientious and sincere gentleman. I quote from the speech of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), as recorded at page 3179 of Hansard for this session:

> We cannot afford any longer to sit still here and take no notice of what is going on in Canada. The danger to our freedom is greater from within Canada than from without.
> What is Canada's answer to all this? First, we should put our own place in order, overhaul the British North America Act and revise our parliamentary system and the other systems I have named. We should adopt some system of Christian socialism for the workers of this country, the white-collar employees, the artisans and the farmers. A system of Christian socialism—

An hon. MEMBER: What is that?

Mr. McCUAIG: I will give the hon. member a copy of the C.C.F. national manifesto. Further on, the hon. member had this to say:

> In the debate on constitutional reform on February 17, 1937, I referred to how the provincial legislatures were created, and I had a word to say in relation to industrial employment, contrasting the precepts of Christianity with the way in which our industrial workers are used. Personality counts as nothing; the dollar is all supreme. Modern life is machine life, soulless, a life of standardization, a high speed production, a highly efficient organization for the making of profits. Dividends are the chief objective; to get dividends, human beings are sacrificed. Wages were often below the level of mere subsistence, so that people were forced into other ways of life to eke out a precarious livelihood. I spoke of the long hours of work exacted, but reforms have been brought about in that. Senior employees, after long years of faithful service, were in many cases cast out without a retiring allowance to make room for younger people. I said that the law of Christ, that we should bear one another's burdens, was not being carried out.

Apparently the hon. member for Broadview knows the monopolistic bible. Two thousand years ago, Mr. Speaker, it was said, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" and "A contrite heart and humble spirit should lead them." I wish the hon. member for Broadview every success and the best of luck in his evangelistic work in the Tory camp.

The espionage trials and other activities have led to a virtual campaign against communism and a spirit of hate against the U.S.S.R., not only in Canada but in the United States. Witch hunting and building capitalist bridgeheads around our democracies is the order of the day. The purpose of this is to prevent the communist ideology and philosophy from spreading farther into the western world.

As a practical man and a solid Canadian, who got his education in the hard school of trial and error, in practical application and results, I would say that we are starting at the wrong end and using an entirely wrong method to remedy this most dangerous situation between neighbours. The U.S.S.R. philosophy and their way of life is their own business, in their own country, and, if it is attractive to our people, we shall not stop it here by force, or government-sponsored subversive action. We can do it only by showing the world that we have something better—not in flowery words, but in the manner of practical application, in the utilization and distribution of all our great resources in the interests of all our people in Canada. This was the purpose of creation, and it is for the interests of mankind.

Let us put man on the pedestal, and show all the world that we glorify God's greatest handiwork—man in the image of his Maker. And let us do some straight thinking about this. If we do so we need not be afraid of any ism in Canada.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have not usurped much of your time during this session, and even though I push prorogation half an hour farther toward Christmas, I propose to make a few remarks at this time. I assure you that in dealing with the budget I shall endeavour neither to thresh old straw nor to advance any new economic ideology.

Having been in the house now for my third session of parliament, I thought I might usefully make some remarks concerning my observations of what we have been doing. I begin by complimenting the House of Commons, under your able direction, sir, upon the splendid tone generally maintained in our debates. I am not suggesting that in this respect we are all free from guilt. A week or so ago I saw my own name in the paper in connection with a short debate in which I took part in an exchange with one of the ministers. I assure you, sir, that I did not read with pride what I said on that occasion. I sincerely trust my adversary at that time would hold the same view concerning what he said.

[Mr. McCuaig.]

Those were little things. But it seems to me the absolute low in political public discussion was reached here the other night in the maiden speech of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Hartt). Speeches of that kind are not going to do us any good. However, you, sir, and hon. members have the satisfaction of knowing that if there is any change it must be for the better; it cannot be any lower than the bottom of the barrel.

I turn now to some matters concerning which I think there might be some improvement. I appreciate Your Honour's difficulty in dealing with questions asked when the orders of the day are called. I am conscious, too, of the difficulty you must have in making spot decisions as to a question's urgency or relevancy. It seems to me that we would do well to adopt the practice in the British House of Commons whereby, so many times each week, a definite time is set aside when questions may be asked of the government, and when there is no particular matter of urgency to be decided.

I must, however, offer some little criticism of the two ministers who unfortunately are not at the moment in their seats. I refer to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I am sure no one would suggest for one moment that hon. members on this side ask any questions in which there could be political implications.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I should think that would be generally assumed by the house. I would rate those two ministers by stating that the Minister of Labour wins all championships, not only through his failure to answer questions he is asked, but also for including politics in every reply he makes. The Minister of Finance is not a good second; indeed he is well down the list. I would not care to classify the rest of the field. It seems to me, however, that questions are not meant for that purpose. And, lest there be any doubt about the matter let me say that I was speaking ironically, because I know it does come from both sides of the house.

Having said that, I turn to a matter which has arisen in outstanding form during this session. I refer to the procedure of mixing legislative matters in one bill. We had, of course, the omnibus bill, and I appreciate it is not intended that the practice set up in that bill shall be followed. Perhaps it represented an unusual occasion. But, more important—and there was no reason for this—we had in one piece of legislation the coupling of immigration with Chinese exclusion. There is nothing mutual about those subjects, and it seems to me that they should not have been placed in one bill.

Indeed the situation is like it would be if Your Honour were to ask me out to dinner—and may I add that that is not a hint—and you placed before me some caviar. I then tell you that I do not like caviar, as a result of which you say to me, "You eat the whole dinner, including the printer's name on the menu, or you eat nothing at all." That is exactly the position in which we are placed when the government ties together in one piece of legislation subjects which should be the subject matter of two or three bills, or whatever number the subjects would justify.

My next complaint is not against the government, but it is one for which, it seems to me, there should be a remedy. I refer to the utter lack of trained people in this building who could be of assistance to private members who are honestly trying to find out something about a subject in which they may be interested. I go all the way with what was said last year by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), because private members on the government side and also on this side may find ourselves interested in a subject which would be dealt with in a department of one of the ministers. We may think that the government is wrong, and that an error in judgment is being made, and may feel that another course should be adopted.

What do we find? We find we must do all our own digging. This is in no sense a criticism of the few splendid people we have in the library. We just have not the kind of people I think we should have, and in my view it would be good for parliament and for the country if ministers were attacked a little more often.

One may make up his mind that a piece of legislation is totally bad, or that some of it is bad. I am not suggesting for one moment that it is intentionally that way. I refer to an honest difference of opinion. He comes into the House of Commons with what little assistance he can find and attacks the piece of legislation. The moccasin telegraph immediately gets working to the official gallery, and, in ten minutes or so, three, four, five, ten or fifty—take whatever number you want—people begin to work to show that you are wrong even though they know you are right. In other words, they attempt to find little reasons here and there to show that the fellow on the opposite side is wrong, even though they know he is right. It seems to me that that is carried a very long distance.

Let us assume that I ask a question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I do not see him here and I am getting lonesome—oh, yes, I have found him now. Let us assume that I ask the Minister of National Defence what has happened to a certain thousand men in some camp in some remote spot in this country. Immediately the boys go to work and the first answer I get is that there is no camp with one thousand men. Sergeant Cook has ulcers of the stomach and is off strength for the moment, so the answer is given that I am just completely wrong.

Then he will carry on, "I will tell you how completely wrong you are because, by order in council 947,777, which I now table, it shows that the whole command was disbanded and there is nobody there at all." He will continue, "That order in council is 947,777A, because the treasury branch did not want to pass 947,778." I am beaten before I start, simply because I am unable to find any means in this building whereby I can gather the facts I need. It is easy to say to a private member, "Why do you not go and dig?" This is the ordinary life of a member of parliament in Ottawa as I have found it. I am not an early riser but I try to get here by ten o'clock.

An hon. MEMBER: Good.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am happy the hon. member thinks it is good. At eleven o'clock you have committees to attend; you have your lunch; you sit from three to six and from eight to eleven; in the meantime you take care of your correspondence and the errands you have to run and that sort of thing. Most of us live here in an atmosphere which is not good—I am referring to the air—for at least twelve hours a day. It just is not possible for anyone, unless he maintains a clipping service out of his own pocket, unless he pays research people himself, to have a sufficient and exhaustive knowledge of any subject in which he is interested. I mention these things in the ordinary life which we live.

In addition to that, we have all the reports of the committees. For example, we want to go home and be able to know something of what the veterans committee—it is not sitting this year—or the Indian committee or some other committee has been doing. We all try to keep up as well as we can with what has been accomplished. We should be able to go to someone and say, "Let me have a summary of what has taken place there." It is true that we have secretaries, but I doubt very much if many hon. members have secretaries who are capable of doing that. I am happy to say that I have an excellent secretary, but as yet I have not asked her to go through that business.

I turn now to a matter which interests the country greatly, the leadership of the Liberal party. I should like to give some excellent advice, because I know there are many people interested in knowing just where the mantle will fall. I have been watching some of the aspirants very carefully across the floor for some time, and I say to them that they should get out more into the country. As far as the people in the area in which I live are concerned, they could have two heads because they really do not know them. It may be that they prefer the anonymity—perhaps that is the wrong word—it may be that they prefer not to be seen, but I think they are all gentlemen of not undistinguished countenances and certainly we should like to see more of them in the part of the country in which I live. My last thought is that they should adopt the method employed a long time ago and simply cast lots for the mantle and settle the thing quickly in a friendly fashion.

I turn now to the budget. Every hon. member has complimented the Minister of Finance. I intend to do likewise, but only in one particular. I am always interested in forensic efforts whenever I find them, and I think one of the finest exhibitions I have ever seen was when the Minister of Finance used some words that will long remain in my mind. He stood up to his not inconsiderable height; his voice was resonant and ringing, and he gave an example of the greatest courage ever exhibited by a public man when he looked across here and with flashing eye and ringing tones said, "This is a real surplus." I compliment him upon that kind of performance. It was an oratorical effort which I think I shall long remember.

If this is a real surplus, then the minister can push water up hill with a sieve. He reversed all the ordinary laws of accountancy. If he still uses the method that he used here I am quite sure that he could upset Newton's law of gravity, and it would take most of us until tomorrow to find out that perhaps he was wrong.

I mention one other thing, a thing which, of course, is not political. I heard on the radio last night that a bridge was to be built between Halifax and Dartmouth, and I heard something about certain marsh lands in Nova Scotia. May I say that anything I say at the moment about the maritimes I want to preface with the statement that is usually found in books: Any reference to any person living or dead is purely coincidental. Taking my mind back through history, I remember that Lief Ericson discovered Nova Scotia some five or six hundred years ago. I was unable to find in the library any of Lief's memoirs, but I am sure that at that time he had something to say about the marsh lands of Nova Scotia. You will remember that Longfellow wrote a poem about the Acadians; this is the forest primeval, the murmuring pines and the hemlocks, and so on. That was his great poem, "Evangeline." I am sure the only reason Longfellow did not write about the marsh lands was that he died before he could really get anything ready on the marsh lands.

I have been reading Hansard for a considerable number of years and I can assure you, sir, that I have read of these marsh lands being discussed at almost every session of parliament for a great many years. I want you to believe me when I say I am sure that this is purely coincidental and has nothing to do with a certain by-election to be held in Halifax a month or so from now.

I shall mention only two things in connection with the budget. I mention, first, one little thing, and I do so only because I do not think I have received as many communications about any other subject as I have about this little matter of the tax on soft drinks. These letters come from Y.M.C.A.'s, church organizations and others. I have no doubt the drive was organized, but they all seem to feel keenly about this tax, and I think it it not yet too late to have this little bit of tax taken off.

I want to say a word about something which is not in the budget and which, I think, is not in the estimates of the Department of National Health, and I do so because, next to the soft drink matter, I am quite sure that my correspondence with respect to the disease of arthritis has been heavier than on any other subject. If I suggest to you, sir, that I speak feelingly on this subject I hope you will not think I am trying to make a pun; nevertheless it would go both ways.

When we hear, as we did last year from the then minister of health, that 600,000 of our population of 12,000,000 are suffering from this crippling disease, it does seem to me that no time should be wasted to find out, by way of research, why this thing is and, for those who already have the disease, what the cure may be. I realize that members in opposition are constantly suggesting to a government that it should go and spend money here and there. We want the government to do something in the west, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie) so well put it and as so many others have put it. We want this and the other fellows want that and, I suppose, if one took a pencil and added up all these proposed expenditures they might reach a staggering sum beyond the capability perhaps of any government to provide. So that it comes down to this: it becomes a matter of judgment for the government itself as to how the money we have can best be spent. Mr. Speaker, I recommend this expenditure on the cause and cure of arthritis, not only to relieve suffering—and it is intense in many cases and there are many sufferers—but because it has a bearing on our economic life, so much so that one could almost call this expenditure a self-liquidating project. The blow it strikes at our economic life through making 600,000 of our people unable to work is an argument on the economic side which might perhaps assist the minister in dealing with the treasury board.

I come now to discuss something of a serious nature, namely the wheat board. I have some figures. I am not asking permission to put them on Hansard by just filing a piece of paper, because I want to read them to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). But first I want to say this. There has been no meeting of the agricultural committee of this house, I think since 1942. At no time in the history of the wheat board since 1936 have the audited accounts of that board ever been placed on the table of the House of Commons. I do not want to be misunderstood. I realize that, by statute and in fact, statements have been filed by the board itself, but no audited statements have ever been filed as such and were never filed before any public body in Canada until a few weeks ago when they were tabled in a senate committee. It is unfortunate that at that committee there was no reporter, so that only one copy of the statement was available. I did get a quick glance at it and, with assistance, extracted from it some figures which I should like to give to the house.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, when the house was good enough to give me three or four minutes at the dinner recess I assured you I intended to deal with only one other subject. I intend to live up to what I then said, but I must make this admission. I have listened with some care to the speeches made in this the greatest of all deliberative bodies in the Dominion of Canada, and I have noticed that, whoever speaks, whether it be on a bridge over a creek in his back yard or on baby bonuses or on international affairs, we have all become accustomed to the statement that it is the greatest problem facing the Canadian people at this particular time. Perhaps it is in our own bailiwick, but I do not pretend for a moment that what I am about to say ranks in that class at all.

As I indicated then, I intend for the first time in my life—I mean my life in this House of Commons—to use some figures, and these figures concern the wheat board of this country. And lest my hon. and very close and old friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) has any doubt about them, I can only say to him that I do not see any of his cohorts upstairs at the moment. I give him these figures on my responsibility as a member of parliament, and I say that as to their approximate correctness. By approximate correctness, I mean that there will be no deviation of over one per cent, and in any event it will be a very small figure.

This wheat board of ours cost, in 1939, in administrative and overhead expenses, $677,342; in 1942, $842,149; in 1945, $1,592,543. You will remember that this is all handling the same crop. I will admit they did take up some minor things like rape seed and a few incidentals which do not very much restrict or enlarge the picture. I may say to you, sir, that the increase there is 134 per cent between 1939 and 1945, and between 1942 and 1945 it is still 89 per cent.

I turn to some individual items and, first, I deal with the question of salaries. Before I go farther, may I assure everyone here that I am not at all presuming, or suggesting from these figures, any dishonesty or anything even savouring of that on the part of those who operate the wheat board. When I have given you these figures I intend to try to draw an inference which I think is quite fair and which has been consistent with the attitude taken by those of us who are in this parliament. I have extracted a number of items as follows:

	Salaries
1939	$304,566
1942	560,262
1945	1,114,116

I am using 1945 because that is the last crop brought to a finality, as I understand it; in other words, July 31, 1945. The percentage increase between 1939 and 1945 is 266 per cent, and the percentage increase over 1942 is 96 per cent.

Next I take rentals:

	Rentals
1939	$28,721
1942	38,871
1945	62,360

That is an increase of 117 per cent to 1945 and 60 per cent over 1942.

Here is a small item, but it seems to me to need explaining:

	Postage and excise
1939	$ 4,177
1942	10,528
1945	62,970

That is an increase of 1,403 per cent over 1939 and 49 per cent over 1942. The next item is audit fees:

	Audit fees
1939	$15,000
1942	28,500
1945	58,000

That is an increase of 286 per cent over 1939 and 103 per cent over 1942.

The next item is one that I do not understand. I am inclined to think it must be on a rental basis or something of that kind. It is called tabulating equipment:

	Tabulating equipment
1939	$19,347
1942	39,184
1945	62,569

That is an increase from 1939 to 1945 of 223 per cent and an increase over 1942 of 59 per cent.

The next item is travel:

	Travel
1939	$13,161
1942	49,711
1945	80,985

That represents an increase of 515 per cent over 1939 and 63 per cent over 1942.

I will get rid of all my figures and then I shall have some comment to make upon them. In the period, from 1936, when it was instituted, to 1945, the end of the crop year of 1944, this board lost in its operations $112 million. I wish to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and the house, how that was paid. They took a credit of $24,800,000 from their predecessor. They have obtained from the dominion treasury $87,450,000, and that is divided into two amounts. On July 31, 1945, they received $67,469,000, and at that time there was charged up and still to be drawn, $19,980,000. So you see how the loss has been made up.

One other item I intend to call to your attention and it is this. The balance sheet of July 31, 1945, shows that they have set up—and I quote exactly: "provision for expenses of issuing final payments", presumably referring to payment out of a residue of $10,377,597, or, in other words, ten per cent of the total, for issuing the final cheques with respect to the balances outstanding on participation certificates to farmers for that year. I said, sir, that I had no intention of charging against the wheat board anything savouring of dishonesty, or anything of that kind. But what I do say is that we in this party endeavoured to have this matter referred to a committee where there might be an examination of the operation of this board, but we were refused that by the government. May I also say that both the groups to my left, if my memory serves me correctly, voted with the government, although I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) voted with us on that occasion. Remembering that they were handling the wheat crop of western Canada—that is not exactly all; there were other little duties added—I put this to you, sir, with great respect, that we have never had any explanation. Can you imagine that? We had great difficulty with the Department of Trade and Commerce. It took us at least six weeks in this house to find out what balance they had on their hands for the 1945 crop. But can you imagine it?—in salaries, there was a 266 per cent increase; in rentals, 117 per cent; postage and excise, 1,403 per cent; audit fees, 286 per cent; tabulating equipment—and that is a big word—223 per cent; travel, 515 per cent. All that without any explanation whatever having been given to this House of Commons!

I base my criticism on two grounds. I think even the most rabid-thinking person who sits opposite to me or to my left will agree that I am at least fair in this. My argument is twofold. The first is that if ever accounts required examination by the House of Commons, those accounts of the wheat board, of which I have given you instances, require examination. Perhaps I should have given the over-all figure. It is this. In 1939, total administration and overhead amounted to $677,342; in 1942, $842,149; in 1945, $1,592,543, or an increase, over-all, of 134 per cent in 1945 and 89 per cent in 1942. As I say, my criticism is twofold. I say that is something which should have had examination by the standing committee on agriculture. Just to mention this increase in astronomical figures is to say enough, it seems to me, almost to force on the mind of any fair-minded person that they are at least worthy of examination.

My second criticism is this. Here we are paying in one year to a firm of auditors, whose name escapes me at the moment, although I think Brown is the first name in the firm—

Mr. PARENT: Brown, Brown and Brown.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member over there is colour blind.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Frankly, I know I am getting a little bit deaf, but I do not like these whispering campaigns. The point I make is that this is one place at least, having regard to all our crown companies, where this audit should be in the hands of Mr. Sellar, auditor general of the Dominion of Canada. I have not actually seen the auditor's certificate, but I assume it is that usually meaningless thing which is attached to every audit—where they say, we have seen this and we have seen that; the papers we asked for have been forthcoming, and so on—which, through sad experience in the courts, they have been driven to do and which, as we all now know, means nothing. But if the auditor general of the Dominion of Canada had these figures which I have now read, does anyone think he would not have had some comment to make with respect to them? I would ask the house to remember that we are continuing this wheat board now at least to the end of the British wheat agreement. The people over here at the moment want to continue it forever. I am quite sure they will change their minds about that as circumstances develop. But this is not a business where you need research people, or where you need great technical experts. It is just a bunch of people buying selling wheat, and that has been going on since the world began. Why this particular government company or crown company—call it what you like—is not under the auditor general and is not under the civil service is something that I at least—and it may be my fault—am completely incapable of understanding. Nor in the discussion on the Wheat Board Act did we receive any explanation from either the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) or the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who collaborated so closely, as the house will remember, in answering some of the embarrassing questions which were then asked. We have not yet heard one reason given why that should not be so. I imagine it is a continuous audit. You could not pay $58,000, I am sure, unless it were a continuous audit. I have no doubt there are a bunch of bright boys over there who are learning chartered accountancy, and they were counting cheques and counting dollars and using this $62,569 of tabulating equipment rather well. I imagine they are not one-finger fellows. They can probably play the equipment as a man or woman plays a piano. But when we pay $58,000 a year, sir, for an audit, and all we get is just what I have told you, then it seems to me that Mr. Watson Sellar should be called in.

I close, sir, by repeating that I am not making any sign of a charge of dishonesty against anybody. But I say that this business has now cost the taxpayer $100 million odd, aside from what it has cost the farmer. This board made so much money, but their total loss over that area I have given is $100 million odd. What we are doing here is launching into something the end of which we know not.

Let us take two other institutions which are both government-owned and operated. Let us take Trans-Canada Air Lines and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We all remember the history of the Canadian National Railways, and we all know they have been burrowing into the treasury of this country all these years. Now T.C.A. has started. Last year the C.B.C. lost $400,000, and this year will lose $500,000. There is only one place that money can come from. What we are doing, generally speaking, by these crown companies, these government operated companies, is just starting another snowball which the taxpayers of this country, through their dollars, will have to provide the energy and strength to push back up the hill whence it came.

Mr. MARCEL BOIVIN (Shefford) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, over the week-end I had the occasion to discuss at length with a group of my constituents who belong to the working class, the different measures now before the house and I was asked to express my opinion on the budget. I answered that I would do so in the very near future and so, with your permission and relying on the indulgence of hon. members, the voice of Shefford will once more be heard in this chamber.

On September 10, 1939, Canada declared war on Germany and on May 8, 1945, the united nations achieved final victory over their enemies. In just about a quarter of a century, our country had been through a second great war which had lasted six long years.

According to an old saying which I heard not so long ago, when your neighbour's house is on fire you must lend a helpful hand, if you want to protect your own buildings. Once the fire is extinguished, the victims are left to themselves to assess the damage and one often forgets all about his own efforts, although they may eventually have serious consequences.

I must say that on April 29 of this year, while listening to the financial resolutions submitted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), I was reminded of this saying with the only difference that instead of a fire it was a war. Having lent a helpful hand to our allies, we know what will be the effect of that help on our financial position. Worrying serves no purpose; the consequences of our gesture will long be felt, but it is to be hoped that those whom we have helped will do likewise unto us, should we ever need their assistance.

Like hon. members who have spoken before me, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to offer my most sincere congratulations to the Minister of Finance for the splendid way in which he presented his first budget. One can readily see that upon taking charge of his new department, he did everything he could to reduce considerably wartime expenses and I sincerely hope that he will continue to do so during the present fiscal year, in order to help the Canadian people who sorely need further tax reductions at the present time.

The members of this house were pleased to hear the Minister of Finance render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's when he paid the following tribute to his predecessor:

> Behind us are the huge and difficult budgets of the war years—high water marks of achievement set by a minister of finance whose name will long be remembered and honoured by his fellow Canadians.

All hon. members will acclaim that statement and they understand that the present Minister of Justice had a hard and thankless task during the war, as Minister of Finance. In addition to providing a sound financial administration he prevented inflation.

You will agree, Mr. Speaker, that inflation threatened all countries of the world, save Canada, thanks to his wisdom and perspicacity, thanks also to the sagacity and foresight of those whom he selected for the task of protecting the stability of our currency.

There have been many shortages, it is true, owing to the many difficulties encountered by manufacturers and because a great number of them found it impossible to obtain raw materials. But through the department which came under his wing, the wartime prices and trade board, prices were held in constant check. In this way, Canadians saved millions and millions of dollars. I admit readily that he directed his department in a masterly fashion with the wise help of the Prime Minister, who has been leading our fair party for the past 27 years and has proved to the world that Canada could grow as well under a sound administration in times of stress as in years of prosperity.

On behalf of French-speaking members, may I congratulate most sincerely our English-speaking colleagues upon their successful efforts in learning our language. You have been listening, these last few days, to the hon. members for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) and Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). To the latter, who has experienced great difficulty in learning French, I extend my congratulations and those of my colleagues. The hon. member for Calgary West should try to imitate his colleagues instead of passing remarks. Thereby he would help his own people and contribute to a greater extent to the unity of Canada.

As I have already stated in this house, I belonged to the working class until June 11, 1945. Therefore, paragraphs 3 and 4 of the budget speech aroused my interest. For this reason I should like to refer to it and to call the attention of the minister of finance to certain statements, in order to assist the workingman and the small wage-earner. The minister said:

> Our available manpower is almost fully employed.

It is true that there is no scarcity of manpower, but even with the lifting of wage controls and the granting of small wage increases, the low wage-earner is still experiencing financial difficulties.

For instance, let us take the case of a labourer who, in 1940, was receiving $18 per week. He was then paying 25 cents for two pounds of steak, $20 for a suit of clothes, $4 for a pair of shoes, $2 for a hat and proportionate prices for other items. Now let us suppose that in recognition of his devotion to duty and his hard work, his employer has given him an increase of $16 a week—if so he is more fortunate than most of his fellow workers—and he is now receiving $34 per week. However, he must now pay 50 cents per pound for steak—and not of the best quality at that—$60 to $65 for a suit—more in many cases—$10 for shoes and higher prices for all other items. In order to bear out those statements, I got in touch with a dealer in men's furnishings of Granby who told me that prices of goods have increased generally by 20 per cent from 1940 to 1946 and in some cases by 60 per cent since the lifting of controls. Generally the quality is much lower.

It must be admitted that wages have not gone up at the same rate as the cost of living. I trust a solution may be found and I even wonder if decontrol has not been too hasty.

Mr. Speaker, if I remember rightly, at the time of the last budget I requested exemptions of $1,200 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons. Now, about personal income tax, in going over the new schedule, I recalled the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley's statement to the effect that:

> The income tax is the fairest and best tax on which to rely for the bulk of our revenue. More than any other, it takes ability to pay properly into account and this applies as well in the lower brackets as in the higher.

I have often given thought to those words and while we have been told that last year's exemptions of $750 and $1,500 were high enough to relieve more than 50 per cent of Canadian wage-earners from all income tax, I feel it was not properly taken into account. For instance let us go into the financial situation of a single man earning $100 a month, or $1,200 a year.

As a first item, his room rent is now $6 a week, or $312 a year. His meals, at a minimum of 50 cents, cost him $1.50 a day, $10.50 a week or $546 a year. That is item No. 2. Let us allow him, say, $2.50 weekly for cigarettes and pocket money and we have a third item of $130 a year. Now allow the same taxpayer $60 for a single suit of clothes during the year, $50 for an overcoat, $5 for a hat, $10 for a pair of shoes, a minimum of $25 for handkerchiefs, socks, shirts, ties and underwear and $50 for working clothes. Allowing only a minimum in each case, item No. 4 amounts to $200 a year. Under item No. 5, we have medical treatment for an amount of at least $50. This does not take into account any time lost nor casual expenses and yet it provides only a bare existence and not by any means a decent standard of living.

But I was forgetting, Mr. Speaker, that the same individual is subject to income tax. Looking at the table given by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, I find that on an income of $1,200 a year he must pay by cheque to the order of the Receiver General of Canada, the sum of $61 representing item No. 6. If we add up those several amounts, we get a total of $1,299, which means a deficit of $99.

Now let us take as an example, the married man with two dependent children and a salary of $2,000 a year. There we have:

Minimum rent, $30 a month, $360 a year.

Electricity, $4.50 a month, $54 a year.

Recreation for the family, $4 a week, $208 a year.

Clothing, for himself, $200 per annum.

Clothing, for his wife, $100 per annum.

Clothing, for his children, $150 per annum.

Food, $3 a day, minimum $1,095 per annum.

Medical expenses, $100 per annum.

Life insurance, householder, ignoring the rest of the family, $84 per annum.

Fire insurance, $8 per annum.

Income tax, $36 per annum.

Omitting household and miscellaneous expenditures, we have a total of $2,395 per annum.

To be generous, let us deduct family allowances of $7 and $8 a month, or $15 a month, $180 per annum.

The total becomes $2,215, representing a deficit of $215.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this married man earning $2,000, even after receiving family allowances worth $180, still shows a deficit of $215 and runs into debt.

When his children are a little older, he will find some excuse, in spite of compulsory education, to keep them out of school so that they may help him, not to clear himself from debt, but to balance his budget.

From the example which I have submitted today, it will be realized, I trust, that expenses must be further reduced and that the worker must be granted enough of an exemption to meet his obligations, for it must not be forgotten that if he is financially successful the country benefits by it.

Note that the above-mentioned tables are based on $1,200 and $2,000 exemptions. How would the figures compare if I had compiled this information according to the $750 and $1,500 exemptions in effect in 1946?

I was not in the least surprised to read in the newspapers that on March 31, 1946, 328,288 Canadians had not yet paid their income tax. I fear that, under present conditions, the number will increase. For that reason, I entirely agree with what the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) said in this house on May 12 last, about income tax and the payment of interest by taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, although I have proven that, in my opinion, the present exemption is too low, I admit that this budget is very interesting. I had looked forward to an increase in exemptions but the government decided instead to decrease the income tax 29 per cent on the average. The reduction is as high as 54 per cent in the case of those in the lower income brackets and thus, it will benefit the working class.

I have carefully noted what the minister said on April 29 last. I quote:

> Some increases in inventories are occurring but apparently not on a large scale, presumably because the pressure of demand in most cases is so excessive that neither producers nor dealers can keep ahead of it.

Later on, he said:

> . . . most of our imports have had to come from the United States.

In that connection I must say that at the present time commercial travellers are selling large quantities of American goods to our stores at a much higher price; such a condition is disadvantageous to the Canadian people who will have to pay more for the goods, but it is also unfavourable to our own industry which will find the market overstocked when it is in a position to produce at full capacity.

Speaking of the working class, the Minister of Finance mentioned dwellings and said there was still an acute shortage in spite of all the efforts to alleviate it.

There is no room for doubt in my mind, after listening on January 7 to the statement of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) to the effect that despite shortages of materials, 59,846 housing units had been built in 1946 and that construction of 80,000 units was contemplated in 1947.

I am very anxious to know the cost of houses which have been built with a great deal of difficulty without the help of a government subsidiary. I know very well that in 1946 nobody could obtain nails anywhere except on the great market which became popular with many people and which is still called the black market. Gyproc could be had on the same market, for a small consideration. To secure any plumbing material, one had to oil somebody's palm, even when oil was scarce.

On July 11, 1946, page 3342 of Hansard, I dealt with a few points in connection with building. I now wish to add that construction of theatres, garages, restaurants, summer cottages, and all buildings detrimental to the providing of materials required for private homes should be suspended for a certain period of time.

Allow me to quote from an article published in La Voix de l'Est, Granby's daily neswaper, on February 21, 1947 under the heading "Significant Figures on the Need of Houses for Workers". This report told of a survey launched in 25 urban centres by a workers' league. It showed that only 5·9 per cent of the workers owned their homes in my province.

Those statistics also reveal overcrowding; there are an average of 6·76 persons per housing unit whereas each unit contains only 4·67 rooms. In 60·4 homes there is no dining room, and in 34·6 there is no living room. In 12·4 per cent of cases, people sleep in the kitchen; in 23·8 per cent in the dining room and in 41·4 per cent in the living room. This survey shows that steps should be taken to remedy the situation.

The minister has referred in the budget speech to the high level of our production and income, owing to a large extent to our export trade. It is true that Canada exports more goods than she consumes and that exports are necessary. The minister insisted on the fact that the export credit programme was essentially a transitional measure.

He also made a statement which the people of Canada had been expecting for a long time when he added that the government did not contemplate a continuing, large-scale programme of government lending to finance our exports to other countries.

It is true that we have done our full share to help our allies when they were in danger, and I note with pleasure, from the speech of the minister, that we are returning to a business basis and I trust that notwithstanding the increased prices we shall not be called upon to make further extended loans to England or to any other country, which would be detrimental to our own interests.

May I now broach another topic of keen interest to my own constituents, agriculture, which, in so far as it applies to other parts of Canada, takes up a large share of the debates in this house. There has been a call for increased production through proper use of abundant farm machinery and improved methods of cultivation, undoubtedly with a view to boost our foreign markets. It should be noted, however, that our export policy is such as to make it impossible for a great many of our farmers to keep producing at the increased rate they have been doing, at the wise suggestion of experts. Box cars have all been requisitioned for the transport of goods, for the shipment of grain for overseas so that what little grain is shipped to eastern Canada is often sold milled and sacked, at consequently higher prices though of lower quality, while slow deliveries often puts farmers in a difficult position. I hope we may look forward to improvement in this respect and that the present handicaps to the Quebec farmers will be removed with the help of the departments concerned.

In closing, I should like to extend my deepest congratulations to the hon. Minister of Finance for setting the course of his financial policy for the general purpose of avoiding inflation as far as practicable and thus assuring Canada of a farm and industrial production that will make ours one of the world's least unfortunate if not most prosperous of nations.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) surely created a great impression at the time it was made. However, there is a but. The following analysis of it in this house and outside is a sure indication that the proposed budget does not at all meet the expectations of the average taxpayer, nor his wishes.

Had the minister considered the numerous representations submitted to us in the last months, he surely would have realized, for one thing, that, in connection with the income tax, the small taxpayer expected an increase in the exemption to at least $2,500 for married men and $1,500 for single persons. It has already been amply proved that the $1,500 exemption granted the married man is absolutely inadequate and that the present rates of taxation applying to incomes of family men, assume a character that is detrimental to families and even anti-social. However, there is another very serious disadvantage arising from the deduction at the source; I do not mean to criticize the system itself, for I consider it commendable. I claim that were we to lighten the burden of taxation for those in the lower income brackets, we would, at the same time, remove, for thousands of taxpayers, the inconveniences resulting from the administration of this system.

We all know that, at the present time, the employer has to deduct part of his employee's salary, on the assumption that his total income will be based on the wages paid to him. If the job is temporary or intermittent, as is often the case, the wage-earner may subsequently be unemployed for a certain period, or he may have to be satisfied with a lower salary, so that, at the end of the year, when everything is reckoned, he would find out that his total income for the twelve months does not reach the amount of the exemption he is entitled to. Then he will have to get busy and write the proper authorities to claim the amount deducted from his salary and it will be many months, sometimes a year, before he recovers those deductions.

A very large proportion of wage-earners have the tax deducted at the source and are in the position I have outlined; hence, by raising the exemptions, we would avoid the inconvenience and trouble incidental to deductions at the source for thousands of taxpayers, while at the same time, making a social contribution.

If the government must, on the one hand, take the required means to collect needed revenue, it should, on the other hand, try to spare its citizens troublesome practices that are hardly profitable but prompt those upon whom they are inflicted to criticize and protest, often with full justification.

There is no doubt that it has cost the government a great deal to collect these insignificant sums deducted at the source, and it is obvious that the checking required when claims are submitted and the mailing of refunds have put the treasury to considerable expense.

How often have we not heard complaints from dissatisfied workers who, after a few months employment, find that the few dollars so essential to them and their families are deducted from their pay. They know that they can claim a refund, but they are also fully aware that it will not be forthcoming for many a month. Then, they voice their criticism, grumble against the state and society and claim that they are unfairly treated: as a result, they become fertile soil for the development of subversive ideas.

I honestly believe that the government should have increased the non-taxable portion of income and, in order to maintain its returns at the same level, it should have lowered the exemption granted taxpayers in the upper brackets.

Other taxes should also have been eliminated. I refer to those which are generally known as nuisance taxes. The revenue which they provide could easily be derived from other sources and their repeal would bring the people a measure of comfort far outweighing the receipts accruing from said taxes.

In wartime, the people willingly submitted to these taxes because they were ready to make all sorts of sacrifice, but now that the war has been over for two years, they are entitled to some slight relief. Moreover, the circumstances under which these taxes were introduced must not be forgotten. Not only was it necessary to fill the treasury coffers with the funds required for the pursuit of our war effort, but the idea was to curtail, as far as possible, the demad for the goods thus taxed. Due to wartime needs, it became imperative to apply strict restrictions on the consumption of all goods, save those of an essential nature.

Although the purchasing power was very high, the government could more easily convince the people that they should make use of that power to purchase war savings certificates and war bonds; today, however, circumstances are entirely different. The reasons which motivated that kind of taxes no longer exist and the government should help the Canadian people to return as quickly as possible to a normal life and enable consumers to obtain more easily the goods of which they were partially or totally deprived during the war.

This debate on the budget gives us the best opportunity of stating and submitting to the government, and to the population as a whole, the needs and representations of our fellow-citizens.

I take this opportunity to make a few remarks on Canada's internal policy and also to indicate my constituents' views on our external policy.

Mr. ARSENAULT: May I ask the hon. member a question before he deals with our external policy? Will he vote for or against the budget?

Mr. DORION: The hon. member will no doubt see for himself when I have finished my speech.

An hon. MEMBER: I am not so sure about that.

Mr. DORION: As far as internal policy is concerned, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the question of foremost interest to the Canadian taxpayers is the matter of dominion-provincial relations. Judging from the speeches made during this debate, I would say that that question was the subject of a great many of them. I do not hesitate to say that I was particularly interested in the speech made yesterday afternoon by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault). The hon. member for Bonaventure who, on that occasion, supported centralization of power—and I congratulate him upon his courage—employed two arguments. First, he contends that the dominion government should have greater power in the fields of direct and indirect taxes, in order to prevent the depression which we may have to face two or three years hence. He summed up his thought in one sentence, which I find on page 3310 of Hansard. Here is what he said:

—in making such offers to the provinces, the dominion government is seeking to avoid the next depression, which would be the fifteenth.

The hon. member for Bonaventure spoke to us about the first fourteen depressions the world has known during the past hundred and fifty years. He submitted, as I have shown by quoting his own words, that in order to prevent the next depression, the central government should be granted extended powers.

I well remember the last depression, Mr. Speaker. The others occurred before my time and I did not witness them. I recall, however, that in 1929 and during the following years, many countries experienced a depression as severe as that which bore down on Canada and perhaps more so. Yet they did not have to contend with provincial legislatures. Take England, for instance. Obviously England did not have to cooperate with provincial governments. France was ruled by one central government. Belgium, Holland and many other countries where there existed no provincial governments were hit by the depression as severely as Canada and suffered even more bitterly.

Obviously it is very easy to make a statement, but arguments are needed to support such a stand. Personally, I know that during the twenty-seven years that I have been a practising lawyer, had I asserted, whenever I took up a case in court: "Your Honour, my client is right", that would not have been sufficient for me to win my case. Such a statement must be based on facts which can support it. In many instances, as I have just shown, many countries that had but a central government, were unable to prevent depressions; that is clear and obvious.

In one European country, the depression was less severe than in others. Indeed, I remember that in 1933, when Hitler came to power in Germany and began to prepare his country for the terrible and devastating war from which the world has just emerged, the depression was much less acute there than elsewhere; note, however, the kind of economic and political system that country submitted to during the years which were the forerunners of the dreadful catastrophe. Everyone knows that Hitler enslaved his people and shot his political opponents. If that is the type of economic and political system the hon. member advocates in order to prevent depressions, I will have none of it and much prefer democratic systems like our own, even though that may mean putting up with the drawbacks of depressions which, nevertheless, could easily be avoided if we took the proper means.

The second argument which the hon. member for Bonaventure put forth in support of his stand was drawn from three privy council decisions and from the constitution; he mentioned sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. Obviously, when one refers to legislation which at first sight appears more or less clear, its text should be carefully read and considered in order to be well understood. Section 91 of the British North America Act begins with the following sentence:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

Section 92 gives a list of the exclusive powers of provincial legislatures. I quote the following excerpt:

In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say:

Direct taxation within the province, in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

I stress the following words "for provincial purposes". It is true that paragraph 3 of section 91 authorizes the Dominion Government to levy indirect taxes as well as direct taxes and I shall not argue that point. However, it seems to me that the Dominion Government is granted the power to levy direct taxes subject to the provisions of section 92. It is evident that those two sections should be read together. We cannot contend for one moment that the Dominion Government alone should have the power to levy direct taxes and deprive the provincial governments of the same right. It is evident that, in principle, both governments have the right to levy direct taxes.

However, there is a difference between having a right and exercising it. If my good friends will listen to me for a moment, they will see that in examining legislation such as this, it is easy to draw clear and precise conclusions but one must not confuse the issues. I repeat that it evidently follows that the Dominion Government cannot levy taxes without taking into account paragraph 2 of section 92; in other words, the provincial legislatures will first have the right to levy direct taxes needed for provincial purposes, and that necessarily follows from section 91.

Again, section 91 authorizes the Dominion Government to levy direct taxes, provided it takes into account the provisions of section 92. When a province must find revenue for provincial purposes, section 92 grants power to the provincial legislature to levy direct taxes to satisfy provincial needs. Once the province has availed itself of the right to levy taxes for provincial purposes, then and only then may the Dominion Government levy direct taxes for federal and not for provincial purposes.

Mr. ARSENAULT: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. DORION: Yes.

Mr. ARSENAULT: I want an answer immediately. I refer to the case of Silver Brothers vs. the Attorney General of the province of Quebec and the Attorney General of Canada, which dates back to 1942, regarding bankruptcy, mentioned in the Appeal Cases, page 189. Does the hon. member not admit that in this case the judicial committee of the privy council granted to the Canadian Parliament, that is the Dominion Government, priority over the provinces in the field of direct taxation?

Mr. DORION: I have here the "Dominion Law Reports" which contain precisely the case of Silver Brothers which he quoted yesterday. I shall come to that later.

Mr. ARSENAULT: I would like an answer.

Mr. DORION: You will get it, perhaps sooner than you wish.

Mr. ARSENAULT: I gave my answer yesterday.

Mr. DORION: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if sections 91 and 92 are to be reconciled, if they have any meaning at all—for I base my contention on the law—if, as I am told, those direct taxes are to be set to rights, we must come to a logical and reasonable conclusion, based on the words I have just quoted and not on imagination. This only possible conclusion I have just expressed.

The hon. member for Bonaventure referred a moment ago to the three decisions given by the privy council which he quoted yesterday in support of his argument. Last night I took the trouble of reading those three decisions in the "Dominion Law Reports". Let us consider first the case of Forbes vs. The Attorney-General of Manitoba, which is contained in volume I of the "Dominion Law Reports" for 1937. Here is the judgment:

(Text):

The legislative authority of the provinces under section 92, (2) of the British North America Act, with respect to "direct taxation within the province," embraces the power to levy taxes upon residents of the province in respect of their incomes even though a resident be an employee or servant or officer of the dominion government, and the exercise of such power by the province is no encroachment upon the exclusive powers of the dominion parliament, to fix "the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the government of Canada," under section 91 (8) of the British North America Act; nor is it ultra vires of the provincial legislature to provide that if a wage-earner within the province receives his wages from an employer outside the province, without deduction of tax, the wage-earner shall himself pay the tax whether the outside employer be the dominion government or anyone else.

(Translation):

It appears from this decision, Mr. Speaker, that provincial legislatures have the power to impose a tax on wages in addition to the tax levied by the dominion government. This is the case of Forbes vs. The Attorney General of Manitoba.

Mr. ARSENAULT: Would the hon. member read the last paragraph of this judgment, after the word "lastly"?

Mr. DORION: The last paragraph of the case I have been quoting?

Mr. ARSENAULT: The case of Forbes vs. The Attorney General of Manitoba?

Mr. DORION: My hon. friend may see for himself. I shall have the book sent to him.

Mr. ARSENAULT: Read after the word "lastly".

Mr. DORION: I quote this decision of the privy council from the "Dominion Law Reports". I do not think that these law reports can be questioned.

As regards the case of Silver Brothers vs. The Attorney General of Quebec and the Attorney General of Canada, here is the judgment passed by the privy council:

The hon. member will find that decision in volume II, 1932, of the "Dominion Law Reports", page 673, which states:

(Text):

It was competent for the dominion parliament to enact section 17 of the Special War Revenue Act, 1915 (Can.), chapter 8, as amended by 1922, chapter 47, which provided that, notwithstanding the provisions of the Bank Act and the Bankruptcy Act or any other statute or law, the liability to the crown for excise taxes should be the first charge on assets in priority to the claims of the crown in the right of a province, such legislation falling within the fourth proposition enunciated in re Fisheries Act, 1914.

But that provision must be read in conjunction with section 16 of the Interpretation Act of Canada, enacting that "no provision or enactment in any act shall affect in any manner whatsoever the rights of His Majesty . . . unless it is expressly stated therein that His Majesty shall be bound thereby;" and the effect—

(Translation):

Here I would ask the hon. member for Bonaventure to pay careful attention to the following:

(Text):

—and the effect of reading them in conjunction is to add to section 17 the proviso that the priority so conferred shall not operate against any right in the crown in a province where such right would be diminished by the priority being asserted against it, and, as there existed in the province of Quebec legislation giving priority for all sums due to the crown for certain taxes, therefore the province of Quebec, which had filed a claim in bankruptcy for such taxes, was entitled for taxes therefor over a claim by the dominion for taxes under section 17;

(Translation):

Now, that judgment of the privy council shows that provincial taxes have priority over dominion taxes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. COURNOYER: Will the hon. member permit a question? I believe it was in connection with the execution of the judgment.

Mr. DORION: No, it deals with the whole case.

Mr. COURNOYER: It was a bankruptcy case.

Mr. DORION: Take this document to the members opposite so that they may read it. The last judgment quoted by the hon. member for Bonaventure is the judgment in the case of Caron vs. The King, which is found in volume IV, 1924, of the "Dominion Law Reports", page 105. As I stated at the beginning of my remarks, it was ruled in that case that the dominion government has the right to levy direct taxes; however, something else was decided in the same judgment. Reference is made to the former Parson case and I read at page 108 of that report:

(Text):

Their lordships adhere to that view and hold that, as regards direct taxation within the province to raise revenue for provincial purposes, that subject falls wholly within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures.

(Translation):

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the issue raised by these proposals of the federal government? The dominion claims the right to raise money within the provinces by means of direct taxation and then to hand out certain amounts to the same provinces such as, for example, a sum of fifty and some odd millions of dollars to the province of Quebec. What do you expect the provincial government to do with that money if not to spend it for provincial purposes?

Mr. PARENT: Let out contracts for road construction.

Mr. DORION: That is the kind of intelligent interruptions we hear too often in this house.

As I said, if the federal government is to hand out money to the provinces, that money will of course serve provincial purposes. The governments of the provinces have no other use for it. Now, I submit that if the central government raises, through direct taxation, sums of money that are subsequently affected to provincial purposes, its action is contrary to the constitution, to the law and to the judgment of the privy council which I have just quoted. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems clear that the supporters of centralization who base their argument solely on the British North America Act and the decisions of the privy council which I have quoted, must come to the conclusions which I have just drawn.

That is probably why the hon. members who spoke on the matter in this debate struck a different note and, for the most part, made it a question of partisanship, of personalities.

Mr. LANGLOIS: It is your very own policy.

Mr. DORION: Turning, for instance, to the speech of the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay), on page 2937 of Hansard,

I single out a sentence there that sums up the whole argument of his speech. I quote:

Just listen to Mr. Duplessis, and then to Mr. Drew; they both talk the same language.

Mr. LANGLOIS: They do.

Mr. DORION:

. . . They have the same epidermis, the same skin. They make the same sounds. They're twins, nay, Siamese twins, as my hon. friend has just pointed out.

The friend referred to by the hon. member for Dorchester was the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) who a few minutes earlier had stated precisely that Messrs. Drew and Duplessis are Siamese twins. Now the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville should possibly have recalled a certain recent speech of his own at St. Hyacinthe. In La Presse of Tuesday, May 13, 1947, I find the report of a meeting held at St. Hyacinthe where the principal speaker was the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville. The hon. member is quoted as follows:

A good part of the strikes affecting the country of late may be laid at the door of the C.C.F.

Ottawa also has a few independents, that is to say camouflaged Tories.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DORION: I am glad the hon. members opposite are pounding their desks. It proves that the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville is not the only one who knows something of camouflage.

Mr. LANGLOIS: The whole province of Quebec has learned about it, through you people.

Mr. DORION: At the time of that election, we did see, Mr. Speaker, what camouflage could be in the province of Quebec. There were all kinds of Liberal candidates: Independent Liberals, anti-conscription Liberals, anti-war Liberals, official Liberals, orthodox Liberals and even candidates who were not at all Liberals.

Mr. GAGNON: And how many more!

Mr. DORION: But the day after the election, all those various categories of Liberals had joined into a single, united, well-disciplined Liberal front.

An hon. MEMBER: How many Independents did you have in the last election?

Mr. DORION: But then, on this matter of camouflaged Tories, I would much rather abide by the judgment of the voters of the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay than that my hon. friends opposite who, in June of 1945, set up an organization that exhausted all possible means to bring about my defeat, as was admitted by the Liberal organizer himself. It was then that, throughout the constituency, Liberals kept calling me "camouflaged Tory." It was their sole argument anyway. Well sir, the Liberals of Charlevoix-Saguenay—and I call them that because for the previous twenty-five years they had been regularly returning a Liberal member to the house of Commons, each time with majorities of 8,000 to 10,000—those good, and shrewd Charlevoix-Saguenay Liberals were quicker than my hon. friends opposite to understand what to think of my opponents when they talked of a "camouflaged Tory", and elected me with a 4,000 vote majority.

Mr. Speaker, Quebec Liberals labour under the peculiar delusion that anyone who is not a Liberal must perforce be a Tory. They cannot conceive of anyone capable of independent thought, of acting on his own, with the courage to have personal ideas and truly to further the interests of his constituents.

Mr. Speaker, I now resume my quotation from the report in question:

. . . that is to say "camouflaged Tories who, for all their official denials are none the less supporters of Mr. Bracken's Conservative party and opponents of the Liberal party, as was forecast in the 1945 elections.

Those independents are of the same ilk as the members of l'Union Nationale, a party begot of imposture which carries on merely through imposture.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DORION: Mr. Speaker, though I have long been in politics I don't think anyone could ever accuse me of being dirty. My politics have always been clean and I mean to keep them so. However, if my hon. friends wish to hurl that kind of insults, I want them to know that I am also willing to lower myself to using the same weapons.

Mr. LANGLOIS: You started in 1935.

Mr. DORION: And I have in my possession certain files that might be very useful to me.

Mr. PARENT: He is adept in blackmail only.

Mr. DORION: As I said, Mr. Speaker, the hon. members who discussed that question of dominion-provincial relations have turned the question to one of short-sighted petty politics and, did you wish to be convinced of that fact, you would have only to read their speeches, particularly that of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) reported on pages 3028 and 3029 of Hansard. Also the utterances of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Hartt), of which I quote the following excerpt from page 3136. He said that, in 1942, the provincial legislature had handed over to the central power the right to collect indirect taxes in the province of Quebec and:

It was at that time that the federal government called upon the provinces to relinquish certain fields, to rent them out, to give a chance to the federal government to carry on the war. The Liberal government at that time in power in Quebec said, "Take it; we will cooperate; we want to do all we can." What did Mr. Duplessis, who was a member of the legislature at that time, say? He was in opposition at that time. Had hon. members been there they would have heard Mr. Duplessis' speech. They would have heard him say that we were giving away our autonomy. It has nothing to do with autonomy.

It is always the same: a personal struggle against two premiers.

Mr. HARTT: That is the plain truth.

Mr. DORION: And now, they want these people to beg the federal government to be kind enough to grant them permission to cooperate with them? Mr. Speaker, I claim that the hon. members now on the other side of the house are reducing the question to a matter of petty politics and thereby serve very badly not only the province of Quebec, but the whole of Canada and they are contributing to preclude a possible agreement between the federal and provincial governments.

And while I am speaking about the hon. member for Cartier, I wish to take him to task for a statement contained in his speech and which appears on page 3134 of Hansard. I quote:

I want to say with all reverence and respect that the sisters have a right to vote. Legally they had the right to vote and they received dispensation. When they went to register they allowed their pictures to be taken. There is nothing shameful about that; they were within their rights. But on election day you could not take a picture of any one of the sisters. Rumour had it that thirty costumes were rented and that other ladies were dressed in those nuns' costumes. That is why the umbrellas appeared. On their fingers there were diamond rings, and nuns have no diamond rings. They wore toeless shoes, and nuns do not wear toeless shoes.

Mr. Speaker, had such a statement not applied to an institution that is both respected and honoured in the province of Quebec, I would not have referred to it.

Mr. HARTT: Look at what is written. I said, "Other ladies were dressed in those nuns' costumes". There is no question of the nuns.

Mr. DORION: However, if the hon. member for Cartier is sincere—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order! I must remind hon. members that the first duty of the Speaker is to uphold the dignity of the house and I ask everyone to help the Speaker in keeping order and decorum. Another duty of the Speaker is to protect the freedom of speech. I believe that everyone should feel in duty bound not to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor, without his consent and without rising from his seat.

Mr. DORION: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Cartier was serious in making that statement may I ask him how in this poll, where there were a returning officer chosen by himself I am sure, a clerk also of his choice and at least five or six representatives of candidates—since there were five candidates at that election—how such a group of people allowed persons under such disguise to cast their votes. If his allegations were true, an inquiry should be held immediately and the returning officer as well as the clerk responsible for such shocking irregularities—that is, letting people vote who had no right to do so —should be arrested.

Mr. HARTT: The union nationale was also represented.

Mr. DORION: Mr. Speaker, I said a while ago that I wished to make a few brief remarks regarding the sentiments of my constituents on the matter of Canada's foreign policy. They will conclude my speech.

In this connection, I believe our first duty is to decide as soon as possible to belong to the pan-American Union. We are expected there, our participation is anxiously awaited. There is not the least doubt that belonging to that union would be in the best interests of our country. Why delay a step that becomes more and more essential? It is probable that our participation in the pan-American Union would give more weight to our views in the international councils.

Mr. LALONDE: Would the hon. member allow me a question? Is not membership in the pan-American Union reserved to republics alone? I am not sure, that is why I ask.

Mr. DORION: In answer I would say that there is a place for Canada in that body, that the seat reserved for our country is empty and that we have had numberless invitations to join the union.

Mr. LALONDE: Republics only are eligible?

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Will the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. DORION: I am sorry. My time is running out fast, Mr. Speaker, and I will not allow questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: You will be given the necessary time.

Mr. DORION: Are the ties binding us to England so powerful and so close as to prevent us from dealing on a basis of equality with other American nations? No matter how energetically we rely on the Statute of Westminster to claim that we have become an independent nation, as long as the facts remain as they are at present; as long as, while making grandiloquent statements, we act as colonials, so long will our share in international affairs keep us away from the discussions of peace settlements.

There is another courageous step that the government should take as soon as possible: that would be to name an ambassador to the Vatican. I do not wish to boast too much about it, but I am proud of having been the first member of this house to advocate representation at the Vatican.

In passing, may I say this to the Right Hon. the Minister of External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent): newspaper comments which appeared the day after I discussed this matter in 1944 show that I did not shock the country. On the contrary, comments were entirely objective and I am more and more convinced that the time has come to take this step.

Canada, with a diplomatic corps as distinguished as it is numerous, does not officially recognize the Holy See.

During the past few years, more particularly, the Holy Father has acquired singular prestige in the eyes of individuals and nations. A glance at the list of people to whom he has granted an audience is all the evidence needed.

Without going into further detail, allow me to recall a curious episode of contemporary history; I refer to the fact that the diplomatic corps accredited to the Holy See confined itself within the Vatican from 1940 to 1945.

Towards the end of May 1940, Ciano informed the Nuncio that in case of war, the diplomats accredited to the Holy See would not be allowed to remain in office unless they settled in the Vatican City. Where and how was a diplomatic corps to be accommodated in that tiny state which entirely lacked hotels, boarding houses, schools, private dwellings, theatres, hospitals, cafes and cemeteries?

All the states concerned claimed it their right and proclaimed it their duty to have their diplomatic agents accredited to the Holy Father remain in office during the dreadful crisis of war; they therefore asked the secretary of state to provide the necessary accomodation for them in the Vatican City.

With amazing speed, the Vatican engineers effected the required changes.

France, Poland, Belgium and Great Britain were the first four states to request Vatican hospitality. Next came the South American republics: Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, Peru and Venezuela. In 1943, China established diplomatic relations with the Holy See and Dr. Cheou Kand Sie then joined his allied colleagues.

During the war, forty states kept their representatives to the Holy See in office.

All these diplomats did not confine themselves to the Vatican just for the fun of it, for entertainment was scarce; neither did devotional reasons keep them there, for many of them—the busiest—were not even Roman Catholics. Why were all these states so anxious to remain in direct contact with the Pope?

England, ignoring ancient prejudices when empire interests are at stake, devoted herself to the common cause. The presence of a British legation at the Vatican has not modified in the slightest degree the position of the established and non-conformist churches in England.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up.

Mr. DORION: I shall be through in two minutes.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Let him speak!

Mr. DORION: A little later, the United States asked that Myron T. Taylor, president Roosevelt's personal representative accredited to the Holy See, also be admitted to the Vatican City.

Thus, among the important nations of the world, only four are not represented at the Holy See, namely, the Soviet Union, Mexico, Turkey and Canada. We are indeed in strange company.

Had normal relations been maintained between Canada and the Holy See, a great deal of misunderstanding could have been prevented among Canadians themselves.

I hope that the government will take into consideration the numerous representations from all parts of the country and that the question of a representative to the Holy See will shortly be settled once and for all.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about another aspect of our external policy.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I believe that the house has granted sufficient extra time to the hon. member to allow him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. DORION: Very well, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

Mr. J. H. FERGUSON (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, as a descendant of British ancestors who over 100 years ago fought in the defence of Canada; as one whose ancestors of English, Irish and Scottish stock associated with the French Canadians to settle this country and make it possible for us to live here in peace, harmony and progress under a democratic form of government, I would be remiss if I did not take a few moments to say something in reply to the hon. member of the C.C.F. party from Maple Creek (Mr. McCuaig), who today put his arms around the communist government of Russia, asked that Canada set an example to that country, extolled its great virtues, and compared it with this great country of ours.

Mr. KNOWLES: And quoted the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church).

Mr. FERGUSON: I say the examples we set 100 years ago are now being followed by that communist country, which is only in its infancy as compared with the great Dominion of Canada. But I considered it my duty simply to remind hon. members of the C.C.F. that it is most obnoxious to the house to compare the Dominion of Canada with a communist controlled government in a country such as Russia is today.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is a complete distortion of the hon. member's speech.

Mr. FERGUSON: The hon. member's speech is no more distorted than some of the mentalities which try to interpret my remarks.

Mr. KNOWLES: That would be impossible.

Mr. FERGUSON: The house has heard and remembers only too well the attempt of the Minister of Finance to hearten the people of Canada with the budget speech which has had so many holes shot in it that it now looks like the sieve the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) spoke about today. The minister's eloquence only coated the speech with a very fine tissue, but nothing capable of withstanding the well directed, accurate and justifiable shots that so easily punctured this government's budget to such an extent that further criticism is now unnecessary. The great majority of the people of Canada see quite clearly through the hoax that the Liberal government have endeavoured to foist on the Canadian people who sorely need, and are entitled to, at least some semblance of capable management and guidance of their public affairs.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I propose to bring out reasons that suggest more reasonable treatment for the people of Canada than they have been enjoying under a government that has mishandled the affairs of this country. We see on all sides government doubt, fear, contradiction, faltering in face of rising prices and possible acute chaos of the entire business of Canada. There is little promise for the wage-earners of this country if the government stubbornly persists in its present course. Too many people are complacent about the sinister shadows that hang over so much of the once civilized world. It can happen here. Canada lies squarely in the stream of history. It can guide that stream or be swept away by it. We can, and we should, be able to help in a momentous way to avert the decline of western civilization and a reversion to the dark ages. World conditions of today were not unexpected. Pestilence, suffering, famine, hardship and the complete economic and political dislocation of the world are a consequence of the devastating war through which the world has passed.

Germany is divided and broken, slowly starving. They are festering in ruin as a result of the poison of fascism and, worst of all, the virus of communism.

Thousands of Dutch wish to emigrate from broken Europe. Belgium suffers from wounds of ancient animosities. France, politically bankrupt, stands, yes, but feeble, with the vampire communism feasting on the blood of the weakened bodies of her labour unions, army and government. Communism is strong in Italy, and all eastern Europe lies behind the iron curtain. Only Greece, whom the Right Hon. Winston Churchill referred to as "small in numbers but great in spirit", is now the frontier between paganism and Christianity.

More important still is the plight of Britain and the attempted liquidation of the British empire by the Labour government which, we hope, is not so severely stricken by the cancer of communism that the British ministers may see the folly of their ways before it is too late, that they may understand the efforts of the enemy and combat these efforts successfully so that the great people of the British isles may, while there is still sufficient of the old spirit left, rally as they did at El Alamein, on the shores of Dunkirk and throughout the country as a whole when obliteration seemed inevitable, and return to the true and tried, old but sure, form of real democratic government.

The British pound has lost its magic; the British people are stripped of the wealth of empire and bowed down under a crushing burden of taxation. British money is no longer available in Greece or any other place to support the forces of western civilization. Too well has the poison that has been slowly administered throughout the British empire taken effect by ruthless, ungrateful foreigners and guests of the empire; also, born British, those living in the lowest strata of humanity, despised, shunned and exterminated by all countries of the world for endeavouring to administer at a price, the death potion to their own beloved land. The chaos and ruin, the suffering and possibilities of the British isles today may have reached the stage, God forbid, that makes it incumbent on the dominions of the empire to come to the aid of the motherland, the land that spells freedom and fair play; but aid must also come from all those from other countries who have been fortunate to emigrate to the dominions within the empire.

Now, can Canada do her share? Have we ourselves clean hands? How light has been our burden when we consider all that God gave us and all the advantages we have had in facing the tasks that were ours? Have Canadians reached the stage when they can now say we have accomplished our great but pleasant task? I say, no. But we will, and can, rise to heights within the British empire mightier by far than the greatest patriots ever dreamed of.

If we would only put our own house in order and stop procrastinating! Can you believe, Mr. Speaker, that we have in Canada conditions similar to what they have in Europe. It is hard to believe, but we have. What is this government doing about the matter? The people have the right to know. This government, through its Department of Labour, knows, or should know, full well that one of the greatest causes and reasons of rising prices is lack of production, housing shortage and all the many obstacles that the people of Canada rely on the government to eliminate. All these factors sap the energy of our people and expand the costs of government. Communism is making further inroads in every walk of endeavour throughout the dominion from coast to coast.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) knows in his heart of the deliberate attempt of those in the communist party in Russia to bring this country to a condition where it can be taken over in the not too far distant future just as easily as Roumania, Poland and other countries not so long ago proud, prosperous and successful. They have been made to lie in bed with the avowed enemy, countries once governed by the true democratic form of government.

Do the people of this country realize that the Prime Minister, when he was informed by the under-secretary of state for external affairs, Norman Robertson, of the first revelations of the Russian spy ring in Canada, stated, according to reports in the press—which have never been denied:

> I do not think the government of Canada can take any action which would cause the soviet government to say that we were prying into their affairs . . .

And, on his thought and decision alone, on such an important matter, he suggested that the man who exposed the treachery should return to his embassy with the papers that were to prove to the people of Canada the almost unbelievable facts, disclosing the endeavours of a communist-ruled country to obtain, through almost any means whatsoever, information that would later aid them in bringing this Canada, one of the greatest parts of the empire, down to the level of the serfs residing, mostly by compulsion, in those countries now controlled by and under the yoke of communism.

Until recently, one Ruth McEwen worked in the office of the Prime Minister of Canada. She is the wife of Bert Hughes, an ex-employee of the film board at Ottawa, and Hughes is an openly confessed communist and supporter of that bestial organization.

The Russian communistic government is holding forth at international conferences with voluble statements about peace and security. I believe the soviet government is simultaneously preparing secretly for a third world war, creating in all democratic countries, and certainly including Canada, a fifth column. In the organizing of this fifth column diplomatic officials of the soviet government have taken part.

Knowing this all to be true and believing that trade unions are one of the finest organizations that form part of the great bulwark of true democracy, I warn this govenrment that the people of Canada are relying on them to do their duty openly and fearlessly in exterminating and purging trade unions of all communistic elements. Bearing in mind that this year the communists of Canada are celebrating their twenty-fifth anniversary of organized activity through the Labour Progressive political party, the name which they now use as a cloak to cover their true identity, let me point out that they are still endeavouring to elect men to this very parliament. The communistic party's name has changed, but their underlying strategy, leading straight to bloody revolution, remains unchanged. Their leaders have stated that, after they have mastered the political strife, a general strike is the gateway to revolution. The democracies advocate freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and, above all, freedom of all peoples residing within the boundaries of a democratic country, but the advocacy of and the willingness to give freedom as known only in democratic countries, surely do not go to the depths of permitting avowed enemies of the state to continue with their insidious work and to continue to contaminate trade unions and labour to such an extent that, even if their contamination be small, used in the manner that it is being used, it can be accountable for the downfall of such a great nation as our beloved dominion. The efforts of the communists in Canada are bearing fruit in retarding the progress of the country, thereby affecting its finances and the finances of this government.

I believe that, through their efforts, the government has been called upon to make expenditures by way of aid in various ways that would not have been necessary if a great many of the minds of our people had not been poisoned with the doctrine of communism. The information divulged by one Pat Sullivan who until recently headed the seamen's union should, in my opinion, have been investigated thoroughly and speedily by a royal commission, and I think it would have been found that the accusations of Sullivan were absolutely correct regarding the guiding hands of the communist party amongst the leaders of the seamen's union. If this fact were established, surely we can make laws speedily and efficiently to meet such a situation. We owe it to all decent members of the seamen's union, as a government composed of men in charge of the affairs for Canada for the people of Canada and on behalf of the seamen's union, the great majority of whom have, I am sure, ideals, ambitions and desires for fair play both to themselves and to their employers.

I know many members of the seamen's union personally; many of them live right in my constituency, men who fought in the last war for democracy as we know it and the principles embodied in democracy as we know them, and men who fought in this war and gave their blood for the same type of democracy. These men chose to take as their vocation sailing on the great lakes and the high seas. This desire is their privilege as real Canadians, but they have the right to protection in order to carry on fearlessly and successfully and follow the class of labour which they select, without intimidation or threats of violence by many heads of the present seamen's union who have openly declared themselves as to the path they are following, communism.

[Mr. Ferguson.]

Only recently an ordinary dispute arose between some of the steamship companies and the seamen's union. A proven, outstanding citizen of Canada was asked to represent the companies as their representative on the marine arbitration board which is to meet in the capital of Canada to iron out disputes between several companies and the Canadian seamen's union. This gentleman, the Hon. J. Arthur Mathewson, K.C., tendered a letter to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), refusing to sit on said board owing to the fact, as he stated in his letter, that it appeared to be established that the persons now occupying the positions of officers of the Canadian seamen's union were not properly elected in a democratic way but were forced into present positions by the manoeuvring of a relatively small cohesive group of avowed communists within the union. He stated that the officers of this union themselves had been publicly pronounced to be communists and that they had never denied the charge and, in some cases, had brazenly vouched for its correctness. Mr. Mathewson stated that the so-called communistic party is not a political party in the same category as political parties generally recognized in democratic Canada. He stated that it was a fifth column and that its subversive activities are continuously and deliberately promoting industrial friction to such an extent that it cannot be ignored.

Mr. Mathewson raised the question as to whether the men purporting to act can be considered, or should be recognized, as the spokesmen for the unlicensed personnel of their ships. Mr. Mathewson, as a true Canadian, I am sure could not conscientiously sit on any board with the knowledge of the personnel of the seamen's union that he has, and I do not believe that this government should recognize or permit to sit on any government arbitration board certain men who now hold executive offices in the seamen's union, because I do not consider that they are in a position or that their frame of mind will give a true and beneficial picture to the members of the seamen's union and the people's representatives here in Ottawa or to the responsible officers of the steamship companies.

I feel confident that it is the desire of the government, the steamship owners and the seamen of Canada to arrive at a mutually beneficial agreement and to carry this agreement speedily into full force and effect; but, with such men as we now find heading the seamen's union, the intent of such agreement could never be carried out. I say that the government should take the same attitude as Mr. Mathewson and refuse to be a party to a communistic infiltrated board. The government should use its labour relations machinery to see that the men who represent the seamen in arbitrary disputes are elected by properly conducted elections and a secret ballot and that every member of the union has been given an opportunity to vote. Let it be known to all labour unions that the government of the people of Canada, with the proof they have before them, will not countenance any person or persons holding office in any union in Canada who have the slightest taint of communism or communistic leanings. We know what communism means and we must act on the knowledge we have. Tomorrow may be too late; we shall have nothing to fear if the situation is faced fairly and squarely now. But I shudder to think, if we hesitate in our duty to the British empire, Canada and the democracies of the world, what the peoples of the democracies will suffer if the encroachments of communism are permitted to expand much farther.

We are promised a new labour code. I make this earnest plea to the minister: See that labour relations machinery is set up immediately that gives our organized workers protection against the bludgeoning, intimidation and constant blackmail to which they are now subjected by Soviet-directed vile communistic organizations in Canada.

Mr. J. P. GERARD COURNOYER (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say a few words in answer to the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), who referred to the decision reported in Dominion Law Reports in the case of Silver Brothers Limited versus the Attorney General of Quebec.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that in an interpretation based upon the standing orders of the house, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) had no right to quote that judgment in support of his contention that the provinces have priority in the field of direct taxation.

I suggest that the judgment which the learned member has quoted and which he was kind enough to send me for perusal could not apply to such a case. Indeed, that case dealt with the Bankruptcy Act and the Special War Revenue Act, whereas the matter which was brought up concerned the two creditors of the company in bankruptcy, that is the dominion and the provincial governments. It dealt with the interpretation of a special statute and not of sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act.

Hence, the only point which I wish to make in reply to my hon. friend is that the learned judges of the privy council have clearly stated, in the judgment which has been quoted, that they did not intend to give priority to the provincial government. Let me read the decision reported on page 676 of the "Dominion Law Reports" for 1932:

(Text):

Now, looking at s. 17 and the way it speaks of the preference, it would not be difficult to hold that it was a rule only applicable in bankruptcy. If that is so, then the matter is ended for bankruptcy is head 21 of s. 91. But let it be assumed that it is rather a natural concomitant of taxation, then the case falls clearly under the fourth head laid down by Lord Tomlin. It runs thus:

"There can be a domain in which provincial and dominion legislation may overlap in which case neither legislation will be ultra vires if the field is clear, but if the field is not clear and the two legislations meet the dominion legislation must prevail."

As a matter of fact, this is the textual reproduction of what has been said by Lord Dunedin as long ago as 1907, in the case of G.T.R. v. A.G. Can., (1907) A.C. 65. Now, here so far as taxation itself is concerned, the field is clear. The two taxations, dominion and provincial, can stand side by side without interfering with each other, but as soon as you come to the concomitant privileges of absolute priority they cannot stand side by side and must clash; consequently the dominion must prevail.

(Translation):

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that in view of this quotation I may conclude that the hon. member, though he be independent, should not have been so independent of the written word as to infer that section 92 should apply without any reference to section 91 of the British North America Act.

(Text):

Mr. MATTHEW MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have never been anxious to take part in any debate, although schooled in politics from my earliest days. I have always endeavoured, since coming here, to get in touch with the different departments in connection with the needs of my constituency but have been continually reminded that I should discuss certain matters in the house. So tonight I shall for a brief period trespass on your time and hope, as far as possible, to avoid repeating any of the matters so far discussed in this debate.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the able budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and compliment him on the manner of his presentation. I think he will go a long way in the political life of this country.

I also wish to pay tribute to his able predecessor (Mr. Ilsley), who had borne the burden of that portfolio in the most trying times in our history. When I think of two able men, former ministers of finance, who broke down under the strain in the days before the war, I am convinced that he is made of good stuff, such as we generally produce in Nova Scotia.

We are glad of the measure of relief afforded in the budget to so many of the taxpayers. Of course all would have been more satisfied if the exemptions had been greater for both single and married people, but we must proceed slowly if the measures of social security about which we hear so much are to become effective. We cannot obtain these measures unless someone pays for them, and money does not grow on trees, nor is it the product of a printing press. All wealth must come from the soil, and only by industry and hard work may we hope to achieve the high aims we have set out in the different pieces of legislation to come before the house.

I was sorry to notice that the financial critic of the opposition was not in good form when he answered the minister. He has always been a genial soul and, I believe, has the respect of all members in this house.

It is amusing to have in the amendment anything relating to the cost of the necessaries of life, after the arguments put forward by the opposition objecting to the proposals to retain controls on certain products for a further period and the dogged determination with which the Progressive Conservative party fought against them.

The subamendment also shows a lack of consistency when each day members of the C.C.F. party are pressing for more social security, such as increased old age pensions, health insurance and other social benefits, which, they must know, cannot be obtained without the people being taxed for them.

I am in favour of a much larger increase in old age pensions, particularly for those who have no one on whom they can depend for any help, because the present pension is utterly inadequate. There are also the blind to whom we must give the utmost consideration. There are mothers with helpless children who cannot care for themselves, and the mothers, not being eligible for the old age pension and being unable to do any work for the support of their children, must depend on charity. Yet I must say that today I am alarmed when I think of the many young people who are well able to care for their parents who endeavour to cast the full burden of their responsibility upon the state. If the opinions of some people prevailed they would make of us a nation of leeches. We have in Nova Scotia a statute which compels children to look after and support their parents and those who necessarily would be dependent on them for support.

I am in favour of lowering the age limit for the old age pension and I should also like to see a contributory old age pension scheme introduced with contributions being assessed against the worker whenever he or she became regularly employed.

There is one tax which is not being cancelled, one about which most if not all the members of the house have received letters, and that is the tax on soft drinks. I think it would be well for the Minister of Finance to consider the removal of this tax as speedily as possible.

Another matter I would urge upon the government is that of continuing the services afforded veterans on Cape Breton island by the D.V.A. hospital at Westmount, not only as a matter of convenience to the veterans, but also to save transportation costs to the government.

I have listened to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who has always been an apostle of gloom, discussing labour conditions in Nova Scotia. With his views I seldom agree, but I am in agreement with his views on the unemployment situation now obtaining in Nova Scotia. Before the outbreak of war there were many young men who were unable to obtain work and who enlisted in the armed forces. Since they were not employed before the outbreak of war, the coal and steel companies were not obliged to hire them, so that they have returned to their native heath and can find nothing to do unless they leave the county. I cannot blame any government for this state of affairs, because we have no industries in the county where they may receive work and the government is not engaged in industry.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South spoke of the many corporations which had left Nova Scotia to locate in central Canada, but surely this cannot be laid at the feet of any government. Rather I think the people who were engaged in these particular industries are to blame, because they found that by selling out their shares in such industries they were obtaining sufficient remuneration to make the sale attractive and did not consider the welfare of their fellow citizens. I do not wish to see our boys and girls leave our shores and go to other provinces to earn a livelihood, and I think it is about time that some of our business men came to a realization of the necessity of establishing some industries in our province to keep our boys and girls at home.

When one realizes the amount of money that was subscribed to the various victory loans by the people of our island during the war years, I think it is about time that some of the leading men on our boards of trade should look into the matter and start some manufacturing industries, so as to help our unemployed obtain work at home. The idea of helping their fellow men should be more of an incentive than the immediate receipt of dividends. But we want some leadership in our unions today, and management and men should endeavour to cooperate in the best interests of all, rather than, as at present, regard each other as enemies.

In Nova Scotia at present we have a coal strike on our hands, and while I do not agree with the method adopted in voting on this strike, yet the government commissioner has stated that the men are entitled to $1.40 more a day. How is this increase to be obtained? Well, in one of three ways or in a combination of the three: (1) an increase in the output per man; (2) an increase in the price per ton of coal; (3) a subsidy from the government. I am glad to know that the trouble is about settled, although I do not know whether a vote has yet been taken by the men. It is primarily a matter for the local government, the company, and the union; but I am glad that the federal government, through its Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), have endeavoured to bring about a settlement.

The government should immediately undertake some essential public works to help relieve the unemployment. One project which has been discussed both in this house and outside it for many years is the construction of a bridge or causeway over the strait of Canso. I have heard of that for many years, but nothing has been done. I feel sure that such an undertaking would meet with the approval of all the members of this house and would provide employment for many men over a period of several years. I have on the order paper a resolution proposing that adequate provision be made for our fishermen, such as wharves and other matters directly concerned with fishing and lumber operations; but since I am mentioning these matters tonight, I shall drop the resolution when the time comes.

Some of these projects I have mentioned are now under way, but there are one or two in which I am deeply interested. One is the construction of a modern wharf in the town of North Sydney, so that the large boats coming to that port may have adequate docking facilities. No such accommodation exists at the present time. We have many large trawlers, French, Spanish and others, visiting this port and taking on supplies, and I am told that each of these boats leaves in that port about $75,000 a year, consisting of payments for food, clothing, oil fuel, coal and necessary repairs. If repairs are required the men making them must work under the handicap of going out in the stream to do the work.

In the town of Baddeck, from which considerable lumber is exported to the United Kingdom, an addition to the wharf is urgently requested to enable these large boats to load, instead of this lumber having to be shipped by rail and taken on at another port, thus increasing the costs to a considerable extent.

The fishermen at North Sydney and Little Bras d'Or are continually requesting that some necessary dredging be undertaken so as to enable them to land their catches on the wharf, instead of having to load them in dories and then unload again at the cold storage plants, thus causing a handling of the catch twice. As you know, sir, this double handling does not improve the fish, so I would impress upon the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to consider these matters at the earliest possible moment in order to bring about a more satisfactory condition than at present obtains.

When we look at conditions in the world, I stop and wonder where we are going and when this chaotic condition will end. Of one thing I am finally convinced. It is this: We have departed so far from the fundamentals of the Christian faith that we are, as General Smuts once said, "milling around like lost sheep without a shepherd." The church, which through the ages has been the greatest force in the world to make men think of the right and best interests of their fellow beings, in many instances has drifted and is still drifting from the truth. It used to be as a great lighthouse to guide us and show us the path to follow to arrive in a safe haven, but I am afraid this light has been hidden to no small extent by the fogs of heresy and unbelief so that many have lost their way. We have sent men to universities abroad for a higher education; they have come back to occupy our pulpits and have taught doctrines which they imbibed from atheistic professors; and, instead of receiving the inspiration of the Holy Spirit in interpreting the word, they are polluting the minds of their congregations with these false doctrines learned in some of these colleges.

I am reminded of one instance in Nova Scotia, in the particular denomination to which I belong, where a young clergyman was ordered to recant or get out of the church. For what reason? Was he teaching false doctrine? No; but because he was telling truths that apparently did not suit the religious convictions of some, particularly the one who presided at his trial.

I cut a clipping from the Globe and Mail on Saturday in which I noticed an advertisement of the services of a United church in Toronto, and at 7 p.m. it reads "Third of a political series—speaker"—I will not mention any names. The subject was, "The Future of the C.C.F. in Canada"; and in the same advertisement—May 18, a Conservative member, presenting Progressive Conservative views.

Mr. Speaker, do you wonder if the judgment of heaven was visited upon us, when the church, dedicated to Almighty God for the saving of the souls of men, should be used for political propaganda? I do not know if any Liberals have taken part in the desecration of the House of God, but I trust not. There are other days of the week and other places where this propaganda may be carried on.

We in Nova Scotia had quite a barrage last fall. After this house adjourned, we had a number of prominent political visitors in Nova Scotia. The first was the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who came down when the steel strike was about over; and I may say, if correctly reported in the press, he brought no soothing balm to help in the difficult situation with which we were faced, but his speech had the same tendency to settle the trouble as the pouring of gasoline would have in quenching a flame. Then we had a visit from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). Later the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) came down to see us. Then we had the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), whose chief contribution was a eulogy of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. Then who think you came next? No less a personage than one Tim Buck, and in my home town we had a visit from the hon. member for Cape Breton South, who told our people of the wonderful contribution his party was making to the progress of government in this country. He stated how they arranged to speak in relays to hinder the progress of the business of this house and how they had succeeded so that the session continued until the last of August. Now, Mr. Speaker, was this not a notable contribution to responsible government?

We have listened day after day to certain hon. members advocating certain social measures for the alleviation of the ills of humanity, and they have laid great stress on the subject of social security. But I believe that their objectives will never be attained in this life, that social security, as they term it, will never be secured until we are covered by six feet of soil.

We have listened to certain hon. members talk incessantly about these measures by which they hope to attain in this world all the blessings that are promised to those who observe the laws as ordained by higher authority. They wish to provide, by legislation, something that can be obtained only by compliance with these laws, and I should like to quote three promises given in the days long ago: first, the promise to Joshua which stated that, if he observed all the laws and turned not aside, he would make his way prosperous and would have good success. Later there was the Psalmist of Israel who said, "I was a young man and now am old and yet never have I seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread". Later there was the one Infallible Authority who stated that we should take no thought for the morrow, what we should eat, or drink, or wherewithal we shall be clothed, that our Heavenly Father knew we had need of these things; but attached to this promise there was a condition precedent that we should seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness and all these things would be added unto us. We are not following these principles today, rather the reverse. If we were, many of the worries that trouble us would disappear overnight.

Strange to say, many of the most ardent advocates of all these social legislative measures are those who once taught other doctrines but are now endeavouring to solve life's difficulties by the advocacy of measures, placing second things in first place, thus putting their finite judgment against that of the infinite. In other words, they are trying to appease the Almighty by advocating good works, which is one of the characteristics of a troubled conscience when undertaken in substitution for first principles. If we wish to bring about that happy day of which Tennyson wrote when he said:

> When the war drums throb no longer and the battle flags are furled,
> In the parliament of man, the federation of the world—

—then we must come back to these first principles.

We listen to some of these people using disparaging remarks about their homeland and always pointing to some other better country. Most of these remarks come from the sandwich party over there. To those born beneath our skies who talk thus, I would say that they should be ashamed of their actions. And to those who have come to Canada and have been adopted into our family, I would say that it is exceedingly bad form for them to engage in such criticism.

The member for Gloucester a few evenings ago quoted a short poem in which the words Canada and home were mentioned. I was reminded of a lecturer I heard some years ago, whose name I have long since forgotten, but the words I now quote have always been fresh in my memory. He said:

What is England to me? There is not a drop of English blood in my veins. What is Scotland to me, though my mother came from the land of the heath and the heather? What is Ireland to me, though my father came from that gem of the ocean and loved it with that patriotic ardor that every Irishman has for his native land? I am a Canadian, born beneath Canadian skies, educated in Canadian schools. I love this Canada as I do no other country, and it is my home.

To me, Canada is the one country, above all others, I love. We have more freedom, happiness and contentment here than in any other country I know of. It is my home and I am proud of it. May I, in closing, quote the words of Montgomery:

Home

There is a land of every land the pride,
Beloved by Heaven o'er all the world beside,
Where brighter suns dispense serener light,
And milder moons emparadise the night,
A land of beauty, virtue, valour, truth,
Time-tutored age, and love exalted youth,
The wandering mariner, whose eye explores
The wealthiest isles, the most enchanting shores,
Views not a realm so bountiful and fair
Nor breathes the spirit of a purer air;
In every clime, the magnet of his soul,
Touched by remembrance, trembles to that pole;
For in this land of Heaven's peculiar grace
The heritage of Nature's noblest race,
There is a spot of earth supremely blest,
A dearer, sweeter spot than all the rest.
Where shall that land, that spot of earth be found?
Art thou a man, a patriot? Look around,
O thou shalt find, howe'er thy footsteps roam,
That land thy country, and that spot thy home.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate which has been going on for two weeks, it is pretty hard to talk about something which has not already been mentioned. Along with other hon. members, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on bringing down his first budget. While it gave considerable joy to his supporters on the other side of the house, I am sorry to say that I was disappointed. I realize that the Minister of Finance who will bring down a budget giving the most social security to the people and who will collect the least taxes will be the most popular man who ever sat in the House of Commons. I also realize that the government—either this one or the one that follows it—that can produce a minister of finance who will do that, will be the one that will stay in power.

I do not wish to labour any of the points which have been raised by the other speakers, but I have had many letters from the constituency of Selkirk asking that I appeal to the government for the removal of the tax on soft drinks, which a great many members have referred to as a nuisance tax. I might say that most of the letters I have received with regard to that tax were from schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, who have the responsibility of the young people. I regret that the minister has not seen fit to do something regarding the removal of that tax.

I have also had considerable correspondence regarding the twenty-five per cent luxury tax. I think the time has come when such things as wedding rings, cutlery, watches and alarm clocks should not be termed "luxuries", inasmuch as they are used by the average family. I had hoped that the minister would have seen fit to revise this list.

Much has been said by previous speakers regarding the exemption levels. I still feel, as I felt last year, that these exemptions should have been raised to at least $1,000 for single men and women and $2,000 for married people. While speaking about income tax, I wish to say that I am very much disappointed that something has not been done with respect to the family unit, more especially on the farms. Of course I realize that there are family units other than the farmer's, but might I take the farmer's unit as an example to show how unreasonable the present situation is. In the interlake country, which is in the constituency of Selkirk, where mixed farming and dairying are carried on extensively, the production of the necessities in the food line other than wheat is the main source of income. Let me take the production of butter, for instance. This is a good example, because the cream has to be shipped to the local creamery to be made into butter, and in order to produce this commodity, the farmer, the farmer's wife and the farmer's family all participate in its production. In the busy seasons of the spring and fall, this work is carried on entirely by the farmer's wife and family, as the farmer is too busy with seeding operations in the spring and harvesting in the fall. Surely it is only reasonable to expect that when the farmer's income has been produced by himself, his wife and family, it should be taken into consideration as a unit and not as the earnings of one man. When this matter was brought up in the house before, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), who was then Minister of Finance, stated that he would have to apply this concession to other groups if it were granted to the farmer. Well, if the farmer is receiving an injustice, then the other person employing his family is receiving an injustice too, and both injustices should be corrected.

At the present time we in this country are in need of butter and pork, and I am going to make another suggestion which I have made on a previous occasion. It is this. When the government plan their programme, and such things in short supply as butter and pork are needed to fill our quotas to the domestic market or the overseas market, would it not be possible and sensible at the same time to do away with the payment of income tax on these items for certain periods in order to encourage their production, so that we could maintain these markets? The producer of cream and the producer of hogs can be compared to the industrial worker who works overtime. He is reluctant to work four hours overtime knowing that he has to give perhaps one-third or one-quarter of his earnings back to the Minister of Finance. The same thing applies to the farmer today. He milks cows before he starts his work in the morning and he milks cows when he has finished his day's work at night. The feeding of hogs is done before and after the day's work. Then, when computing his income tax he finds that by doing his work in this fashion, which is equivalent to overtime for him, perhaps one-third of his earnings is taken away by the Minister of Finance. I am sure that if the tax were taken off such things as butter, hogs—and I give those just as an example—and other products in short supply, for a year at a time or perhaps two years, we would have ample production to relieve the tremendous shortage in the world today. Perhaps it is not the income tax which the farmer has had to pay or will have to pay that he resents so much as it is the idea of working sixteen hours a day and then having to pay the extra earned income back to the Minister of Finance by way of income tax. The suggestion I have made would, I am sure, give the desired result. We would have increased production of the things we need, and the farmer would be satisfied that he was not the victim of unfair taxation.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that you would rule me out of order should I attempt to discuss old age pensions, so I am refraining from doing so. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has on the order paper a resolution, which is found at page 352 of Votes and Proceedings and reads as follows:

[Mr. Bryce.]

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Old Age Pensions Act which will enlarge the scope of the act by providing increases in the pension payable and the income allowable to pensioners and by modifying certain of the eligibility requirements for pension.

I welcome his intentions and hope that he will do most of the things which I have been asking for since I came to the house. I should also like to see the government take into consideration the plight of the blind people. They should have their pensions raised because of the high cost of living.

Mr. MARTIN: The government is taking that into consideration.

Mr. BRYCE: I have great confidence in the Minister of National Health and Welfare; and if he does not come through with what I expect, I shall be greatly disappointed.

I have also had many requests from my constituency, which has a large fishing industry, that the Fisheries Prices Support Act be put into operation to give protection to these fishermen, since the price of fish has been falling, while, with the removal of controls, the price of equipment and gear and the costs of the fishermen have been increasing. If this board could be put into operation to establish a floor, it would give the fishermen some degree of protection.

The farmers who started out to seed this spring were somewhat alarmed to find that the ceilings had been taken off gasoline and tractor distillate, which meant that the prices of these commodities would be completely under the control of the new firms handling gasoline and oil products. I supported the wheat agreement, not because it established a parity price, which it did not, but because it placed a floor below which the price of wheat could not go, and gave a guaranteed price over a number of years. Farmers generally agreed to this price, assuming, of course, that the government would place a ceiling on the things the farmer had to buy, so that his cost of production would leave him some margin of safety. From the events of the last two months, however, it would seem that controls will be taken off most commodities but will remain on a large proportion of the things the farmers produce. As a matter of fact, many controls are being taken off which I should have liked to see kept on for some time yet, especially those controls which would tend to give the farmer and worker some stability. The Canadian housewife also notices how different manufacturers have produced articles of lower quality. Those who profit most from the removal of controls today are the manufacturers and the privileged groups. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, which met in Toronto on January 28 last, unanimously demanded that all controls be removed. A number of agricultural and and labour conferences have taken place since that time. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Congress of Labour, consumer organizations, the United Farmers of Canada and other groups have urged the maintenance of controls in the interests of both the Canadian producer and the Canadian consumer. If the government is to meet the desires of a large majority of the Canadian people, the office workers, the industrial workers, the fishermen and the farmers, the necessary ceilings will be maintained.

With regard to the first two groups I mentioned, the office workers and the industrial workers, they find that prices of clothes, shoes and food have advanced considerably, and the removal of subsidies has also helped reduce their standard of living, causing considerable hardship in both large and small families. The fisherman has the same problems and, in addition, the ceilings have been taken off the materials that go into the manufacture of his nets and gear. While these things now cost him so much more, he is receiving less for his fish. The farmer is alarmed and annoyed at the removal of price ceilings on gasoline, tractor distillate and binder twine. If the government would listen to the people to whom I have referred they would not remove these ceilings; for it will be seen by a review of the situation that when the government removes controls it does not mean that our economy is free, but merely that we go under the control of those who produce the things we require. When farmers' costs rise, and, later, prices of farm produce rise, then these foods cost the consumer more. The result is a rising cost of living and a lower standard of living for the consumer who has to purchase the goods.

I do not wish to be critical of the speech of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), whom I saw in the chamber a few moments ago but who apparently has stepped out for a moment; however, his remarks in regard to interest seemed to annoy me more than I can explain. I should like to quote at some length from the speech of the hon. member, so that no one may say I have misquoted or misunderstood him. At page 2803 of Hansard for May 6, 1947, the hon. member said:

> Fifty years ago the man who retired with a modest competency could get five or six per cent on it and he could reckon on living the rest of his life upon the proceeds. What happens today when he receives three per cent? And he is lucky if he gets that.
> I believe that when we are considering this matter of the low interest rate policy—and I know it is difficult, though it is attractive from the government's point of view—when, I say, we are considering this low interest rate policy I suggest that this very important factor be taken into consideration—it is very important indeed—that there are large elements in the community who are suffering greatly by that policy. One other thing I would like to say in this connection. I would ask whether we can go on freeing other things and leaving the rate of interest tied down tight. Personally I very much doubt it and I think it is a matter worthy of the most serious consideration.

Personally I have always thought money should be lent by branches of the Bank of Canada to the man or woman who needed it for developing the resources of this country, at a service charge. I do not know enough about finance to know just what the percentage should be, but my hon. friend speaks of it being quite easy in the old days to get five and six per cent. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members that when I came to the west, which was only thirty years ago, it was quite common to ask farmers to pay eight per cent on mortgages. Excessive interest and compound interest have caused farmers and home owners more grief and disappointment than anything else I know of. Had our soldier settlers of the first war who still do not own their farms been lent money at a service charge, instead of at five or six per cent, I am sure they would have had their farms paid for by now.

I do not want to labour this point, but in my thirty years in Canada I have seen many people ruined by a high rate of interest. Might I give one instance, that of a man I ran across when I was president of the Manitoba federation of agriculture. I need not give his name, but any hon. gentleman who wants it may have it from me privately. This man came to me with his problem. In 1909 he bought a farm on which there was an outstanding mortgage of $9,300. In 1939, twenty-nine years later, he still owed $3,100 on the farm. During that time he had paid to the mortgage company $29,000. He had receipts for that amount. Here is a man who, for a period of twenty-nine years, paid $1,000 every year. He was paying eight per cent interest, and had it reduced to six per cent in 1937. Here we have an instance of a man who, over a period of twenty-nine years, paid $29,000 to the mortgage company which held the mortgage on his farm. This man reared his family, he sent two boys overseas; he is seventy-one years of age now and still owes $3,100 on his farm. I have seen many cases of this kind, but I shall not put any more on the record. I wish only to show that this sort of thing does exist in western Canada.

A few years ago in Winnipeg I sat in on a debt conference with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), when men of this type were referred to as misfits in agriculture. They said these men were misfits—men who were able to pay their taxes, to rear their families and, as in the instance I have described, to pay $1,000 a year to a mortgage company. Men like this are not misfits in agriculture; they are slaves to agriculture; or, should I say, they are slaves to the mortgage companies which finance them.

We have heard hon. members in different parts of the house refer to the good financial standing of farmers in the prairie provinces who have been able to reduce their debts. But do not let us forget the sacrifices the men and women of this country made when their sons went overseas to win the war. During the war we had controlled prices and guaranteed prices. That is the only time since the last war that the farmer ever came near getting his fair share of the national income. It is a disgrace to think we have to have a war to permit men, such as those I have described, to get enough money to clear off the debts they have been struggling for thirty years to liquidate.

I hope the day will come when men and women with ambition and a pioneering spirit who set out to buy their own farms, or couples who want to build their own homes, will be able to borrow money at a service charge, instead of under the present system, as a result of which men and women spend the best part of their lives working for mortgage companies which do not do anything to earn the interest paid to them.

I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in his seat tonight. However I would again appeal to him to give some consideration to the establishment of a board of live stock commissioners. I have done this before, as have many other hon. members. It is something that organized farmers across Canada have asked for; but they have been turned down for different reasons. Now that the war is over and we are getting back to more normal conditions I think it would be only right and proper for the government to give this matter some consideration.

I remember some considerable time ago when it was discussed the minister defended it by saying that it was difficult to find money for such a board. When I spoke on this subject in the house on the last occasion I suggested that it would be a board similar to the board of grain commissioners. When the minister replied he pointed out the question of the constitutional validity of legislation setting up such a board, because there had been doubts cast on the legality of the board of grain commissioners, and it was suggested that a board of live stock commissioners would be more open to criticism. But if that should be so—and I am sure the minister has given it consideration—the British North America Act should be altered, or amendments brought in to make it possible for the government to set up a board of live stock commissioners.

Perhaps the editorial in the Western Producer of November 1, 1945, sums up the situation very well, when it states:

> Owing to the complexity of modern society as compared with the society of 1867 it is becoming more and more difficult to adjust with efficiency our economic, social and political relations within the conceptions of 1867, plus decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council. Because of an archaic constitution and these decisions it appears that as the Sirois commission reported, nobody knows how to draft an adequate and valid dominion marketing act. But we have to make up our minds as to what we want. Do we want to retain a constitution and a set of relations which make it increasingly difficult to adapt our social relations to modern ideas and the demands of modern conditions or do we want to keep these relations more or less parochially confined? Are we to expand the circle of social activities or keep it stationary?
> It is objected that the suggested changes lead to a greater centralization of political power, which in its turn is a menace to liberty. The changes asked for, however, are required for the purpose of expanding liberty by increasing the power of the individual in improving his economic condition. We must of course realize that there is a risk; but it can be maintained that the gain considerably more than offsets the risk. Care should be taken that organization does not run to arbitrary regimentation, but it can no longer be denied that we must learn to build our civilization or soon there will be no civilization. And this means that we must learn how effectively to organize the marketing of all our farm produce so as to take all the exploitation out of it and make it of benefit to producers and consumers alike, no matter what constitutions may say and obsolescent institutions do. It can be done because there is no real obstacle to it in this democratic country except the will of the people. If we want it strongly enough we can get it.

I do not want to use the board of grain commissioners as an example any longer, but might I just draw hon. members' attention to this, that the demand by the grain producers for a neutral board was met by the establishment of the board of grain commissioners, and although there were objections to the establishment of it, now that it has been in operation for a number of years, I am sure everyone agrees that it serves a good and useful purpose.

In advancing the argument for a board of live stock commissioners, I would say the very same argument applies in connection with live stock to an even greater degree inasmuch as grain is a non-perishable product and samples can be retained to a greater extent than in the case of live stock products.

In the case of grading grain, the grades carry right through to the miller, with the same grades prevailing from producer to manufacturer; but in the case of live stock, the grades the animals are sold on are quite different from the grades the consumer buys. The grade at which the packer buys the hogs from the farmer is entirely different from the grade the packer supplies to the meat board for shipment overseas, and while the meat board controls the quality and grades of the export market, they do not have anything to do with the product going into the domestic market.

Surely the time has come when there should be a neutral board to regulate this business and a board of live stock commissioners would be the right and proper thing for the purpose of regulating, controlling, assembling, transporting, grading, marketing and exporting of live stock and live stock products. As years go on, there are fewer cattle and hogs being delivered to the stockyards across Canada. More live stock is being delivered directly to the packing plants. Perhaps this has been caused by the increase in transportation by truck.

There has been a pronounced trend in Canada toward larger business organizations, and in many cases toward monopolistic enterprise. The meat packing industry, as well as other distributing organizations, have in general followed this trend, and a large part of the purchasing of western live stock is represented by the purchases of three or four packing concerns. Concentration of buying in the hands of a relatively few firms creates a condition of imperfect competition, because markets may be unduly affected by the operation of one or all of these large buyers.

The concentration in the buying of live stock has been accompanied by a weakening of the position of the producer as a marketer. The protection which the producer had in the public market has now practically disappeared. It is my view that the position with respect to the marketing of live stock is simply that buying is now concentrated in a relatively few hands and selling is largely disorganized and ineffective. Under these conditions we cannot expect adequate protection of the producer's interest, nor do I expect those conditions which will make for a sound live stock industry in this country.

Two complaints are brought against the method of marketing: first, it is claimed that the packers buy live stock from truckers at less than the stockyards' price. The packer has complete freedom of grading when buying direct. In addition, direct purchases are made on an off-car basis, while in the stockyards animals are fed and watered before being sold. Second, it is argued that the weakening of the stockyards' system by direct sales is detrimental to the producer. This seems a reasonable argument. Elimination of the central competitive market would probably put producers at a considerable disadvantage in selling to the few large buyers. About ten years ago a royal commission was set up to investigate price spreads. The commission went into many phases of the live stock industry and the report makes interesting reading. It investigated the production, collection, processing and marketing of all live stock products. The findings of the commission were definite and given in detail. I suggest to hon. members that they look up that report.

The conditions we had then are now returning and with different boards set up under the War Measures Act, which will no doubt be discontinued in the future, the time is opportune for the government to do something about this matter. To have a healthy live stock industry, it will be necessary to have the confidence of all Canadian live stock producers, and there is no better way of maintaining the fertility of our soil than by a large live stock population. With a gradual return to normal conditions, farmers will again resort to the feeding of more coarse grains and then market the live stock.

The estimated value of all live stock marketed for slaughter is $346 million for 1946, which is a tremendous volume of business. Hogs, which have helped to swell this amount, are now entirely sold on grade, which means that the farmer brings them to the packer and takes what the packer gives him. What I mean by that is that he gets the standard price of that day, but if he is dissatisfied with the grade, he has no appeal. The system of the meat board has encouraged this as far as cattle are concerned, because the meat board does not deal with live stock on the hoof; to get the protection of the meat board, you must have your live stock graded on the rail. I feel quite sure that the grading of live stock on the rail, as advocated by some people, would be more popular today if it were not so definitely in the hands of the packer and the producer could have some neutral body to appeal to in the case of a complaint.

Another point that could be taken care of by a board of live stock commissioners is that of condemnation insurance. This has been going on for a long time, and while no one begrudges paying fifty cents an animal, or half of one per cent, to insure his animal against condemnation, control of this insurance being left entirely in the hands of the packing industry has been a bone of contention with the farmer for many years. If this were brought under the jurisdiction of a neutral body, such as I have advocated, and an audited statement put in the papers as to the actual condemnation insurance collected by the different packing plants across the dominion, it would give some assurance and satisfaction to the farmer as to how this money is being applied. It seems strange to the farmer or producer that T.B. free areas have been set up over parts of the Dominion of Canada with wonderful results, but we are still paying the same condemnation insurance as we did in 1910.

In closing, might I assure the hon. members that I could go into great detail regarding a board of live stock commissioners, but it has been so often put on the records of this house, not only by myself, but by members of all political parties that asking for a board of live stock commissioners is not political; it is something that 400,000 farmers across the Dominion of Canada have asked for. Surely if they ask for this it is worthy of consideration by the government, and I, in closing, appeal to the minister to give this further consideration. As far as being legal is concerned, I know this government, or any other government that may follow it, has enough brains, or at least enough lawyers, in the various departments, to set up a board of live stock commissioners that will comply, not only with the legal requirements of the provinces and the dominion, but with the British North America Act as well.

Mr. JOSEPH FONTAINE (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have the honour of addressing this house. Up to now, I have refrained from taking part in debates on the advice of experienced politicians. If some of my hon. colleagues feel that the session is delayed by discussion in this house, in all fairness, they cannot place the responsibility for such parliamentary slowness on my humble person.

I must fulfil a pleasant duty in extending to you, Mr. Speaker, the congratulations of the people of my district, who feel happy and honoured in seeing one of their own preside with such tact and distinction over the deliberations of this house. I wish to congratulate also, in my own name and on behalf of my constituents, the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), for the splendid way in which he has discharged his duties as acting Prime Minister and as Canada's representative to international conferences.

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with tradition, I shall in my remarks give first place to the constituency of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. I need not say that I represent one of the finest constituencies not only of Quebec but of the whole country. The population of the constituency of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot is approximately 50,000 about equally divided between urban centres and rural communities. St. Hyacinthe, the seat of the constituency, is located on the shores of Yamaska river which enhances the picturesque beauty of our town, the population of which is 25,000. Its splendid sites, its fine public parks and its spotlessness hold a special attraction for its numerous visitors.

St. Hyacinthe has some 25 different industries which enable our working classes to live in easy circumstances. There are about fifteen religious institutions, including a most modern seminary accommodating more than 800 boarders. As a former student of the seminary, I may say that it is the pride and glory of our people. It is fitting that our fine town of St. Hyacinthe should be called the city of churches. On the other hand, if it is true that industry is flourishing in our urban centres, agriculture in the rural sections is as well developed and ranks among the most progressive in the province. Dairying is undoubtedly the main occupation of our farmers; the greater portion of the milk is sent to butter and cheese factories although a fair portion of our production is sold as fluid milk and shipped to Montreal, 30 miles away.

Market-gardening, which has been one of the mainstays of our farmers, is practised on a large scale. Among other crops, sugar beets are grown successfully. Last year, over 15,000 tons of sugar beets were grown and shipped to the St. Hilaire refinery which is equipped with most modern machinery. May I point out that St. Hilaire is located in the constituency of which my friend the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) is the worthy representative.

There are also throughout the constituency large canneries which have been greatly instrumental in promoting in recent years, the growing of special crops, to the great advantage of our agricultural classes.

The breeding of pure-bred dairy cattle is carried out on a large scale and in order to promote and encourage this important industry it was decided, about fifteen years ago, to establish at St. Hyacinthe an agricultural fair serving the surrounding six provincial counties, namely: St. Hyacinthe, Bagot, Chambly, Rouville, Richelieu and Verchères. Contests are held each fall to help and promote the selection, grading and value of our herds.

When we first launched this huge project, of which I had the privilege to be one of the pioneers and am now vice-president, we received help and encouragement from the Dominion government until our country went to war, at which time, for reasons of superior interests, our grants were withdrawn.

But now that the war is over, that we can look forward to some measure of normalcy, I feel the government should resume this pre-war system of grants.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Hear, hear.

Mr. FONTAINE: I therefore ask the Right Hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to consider including in his departmental estimates items amounting to $5,000 for class A exhibitions and $4,000 for class B exhibitions.

Mr. MARQUIS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FONTAINE: The grants could be applied, according to the society's needs, to the payment of prizes, land improvements and the erection of buildings required by the organization. As a representative of a farming constituency, I strongly recommend the payment of subsidies of this nature, which, in my view, are calculated to foster and promote the breeding of thoroughbred stock, not only in the province of Quebec but throughout Canada. The government would thus give concrete evidence of its interest in the farming community.

Before concluding these remarks on behalf of our farming population, I must thank the government for granting farmers, last session, the privilege of spreading income over a three year period in the computation of income tax. I was glad to support this proposal in the best interests of the farmers of my own constituency. I also warmly supported the government's generous attitude on the taxation of co-operatives. We have quite a number of them in my part of the country and I am sure that the government's attitude towards them will greatly contribute to their advancement and progress.

Mr. Speaker, I also feel it my duty to tender my sincere congratulations to the Hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) for the splendid budget he has brought down. Like his predecessor, now Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), the present Minister of Finance has shown his concern for all classes of Canadian citizens, especially in the lower income brackets. In the best interests of both our urban and rural wage-earners, I shall give my utmost support to the budget now before the house, because of this very generosity of the Minister of Finance towards our low-income groups.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. FONTAINE: The proposed higher exemptions on lower salaries take into account the earned salary and the dependents of our family men. Our country has just emerged from a costly war and our greatest economists themselves are astounded to realize how far we have progressed in returning to a stable peacetime economy. It is proof that the management of our national affairs is in excellent hands when, these results being apparent, the government is in a position to introduce such a favourable budget as the present one.

Mr. Speaker, it is imperative here to indicate that our country is also far advanced on the road to reconversion and the time has come to apply ourselves to the task of building for peace. I have in mind, at this time, the post-war reconstruction programme of which we have been told so much in the many years just passed.

In my constituency, there is a whole series of public works that should be carried out. I shall mention just a few, because I do not choose to list once more the numerous requests I have had the honour of forwarding to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). First of all, there is a dyke to be built at St. Hyacinthe; at St. Damase, Acton Vale and in Notre Dame parish, main sewers need to be installed. While I am speaking of requests, I might as well say that post office buildings are required in St. Pie and St. Cesaire parishes. I know that in connection with some of these public works of a municipal character the delay is due to a voluntary and obstinate lack of cooperation on the part of the provincial government.

Our farming class, as producers, and our working class as consumers, have already greatly suffered from the removal of the milk, butter and cheese subsidies. When the federal government handed back to the provinces, who were clamouring for their autonomy, those two administrative responsibilities, we were expecting that our provincial premiers would be anxious to assume their obligations and continue to pay these subsidies which helped to keep production and consumption in a proper balance.

If, for financial reasons, the province of Quebec is unable to assume the payment of this subsidy, why does the premier refuse the means of doing so, generously offered by the federal government? As a practical farmer, I am in a position to state that, at the present time, the difference between the price of milk sold for consumption and of milk delivered to butter and cheese factories, is far too great. This is why, today, there is a scarcity of butter in the province and in the whole of Canada. I therefore strongly urge, on behalf of my constituents, that the butter and cheese subsidies be restored.

Let us hope that, in the interest of my constituency and of my province in general, the premier of Quebec will soon realize that the welfare of our population must have priority over his own political interests.

I wish also to thank the Hon. the Postmaster General who recently acknowledged the unfair condition of our rural mail carriers and granted an increase on such contracts as were signed before the rise in operating costs. The minister did not hesitate to take this measure of simple justice which was sorely needed by our rural mail carriers. Let him be commended for so doing.

In conclusion, I wish to express my approval of all the social measures brought forth these last few years by the present government, and which have greatly contributed to promote the welfare of our people as a whole. In this respect, it should be sufficient to mention the family allowances. I favour also an increase of the old age pensions as well as all legislation liable to protect our people, and especially our modest and labouring classes, against sickness. I give unqualified support to the resolution presented last year by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) and which appears in his name again this year on the order paper, asking for a pension for crippled and disabled Canadians. The government must not forget that class of our population which heretofore has been insufficiently helped and protected. The Liberal party has to its credit wonderful achievements. Much still remains to be done and the Canadian people place great confidence in this party.

Mr. McLURE: At this late hour I am reminded of the words of a great philosopher who was also a great speaker, and who said he had not come to make a speech. It was the great Marc Antony who was paying a visit at midnight to the beautiful Cleopatra. He looked in and saw her reclining on a couch and he said, "Oh, my beautiful Cleopatra, I did not come at this late hour to make a speech". I am not going to make a speech now; I simply wish to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

It being seven minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 23, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATEMENT AS TO HOLIDAY FOR STAFF ON VICTORIA DAY

Mr. SPEAKER: Some hon. members having inquired whether the staff of the house would be given a holiday tomorrow, I have prepared the following statement.

There is no doubt that the staff of the House of Commons is entitled to a holiday tomorrow, but I have to consider the convenience of the members who intend to do some work in the building on that day. Such offices as the library, reading room and the post office, which are open on Sundays during the session, can hardly be closed. Mails will come regularly and will have to be sorted. Members preparing public statements might need to consult authorities or read newspapers. Apart from that all the clerical branches will be closed. As no doubt a great number of visitors will come into the building, we shall have to keep the constables and guides on duty. A couple of messengers will also have to work. The main dining room will be open until after luncheon, and the cafeteria will do business as usual. All the other members of the staff of the House of Commons, except the cleaners who will be employed from 6.30 to 8.30 and 9 a.m., will be on holiday. I am, however, in the hands of the house, and if hon. members decide that all the offices, except the constables, be closed, I will act accordingly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Chair? I think you asked for the guidance of the house with regard to holidays tomorrow for the House of Commons staff. I am seated a long way from you and I did not hear all that was said. I should just like to say that I hope Your Honour will give as wide an interpretation as is possible to the suggestion that was made.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Third report of standing committee on external affairs—Mr. Bradette.

EMPIRE DEFENCE

SUEZ CANAL—INDIA—PALESTINE—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson), the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely

(1) the proposed dissolution and scuttling of the British empire by giving up the empire defences and the military bases in the Mediterranean, Suez and in the middle east to the United States as a United States responsibility, and withdrawing the empire defences of these bases to East Africa;

(2) The abandonment of the Suez canal and India and the situation in Palestine; inasmuch as on this 75th day of the session this house has not had any opportunity of discussing these very important matters which relate very materially to the future defence of this country as a member of the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon. member knows, it is possible to accept a motion for the adjournment of the house when an hon. member has no other opportunity to discuss the matter which he believes to be of urgent importance. Since we have now before the house the debate on the budget it is possible for hon. members to discuss the questions which the hon. member for Broadview believes to be of urgent importance. Therefore I see no reason to accept the motion to adjourn the house to afford the hon. gentleman an opportunity to discuss this matter.

Mr. CHURCH: With great respect to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I say we have had no opportunity to discuss this matter this session. The empire is being given away every day, and we do nothing about it. A member has always had the right to refer to the urgency of a matter he seeks to bring up at this stage. This is the 75th day of the session, and we have not had a chance to discuss these things. The ruling given before by Mr. Speaker Black on the question of urgency was only an opinion, which is not binding on the house now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motions.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to appeal from your ruling, Mr. Speaker. There has been no opportunity to discuss these matters. I have been here a long time, but I have never seen this ruling given before.

EMPIRE DAY

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) suggested that today we might recognize Empire day, which is the day before May 24. It seems to me this house might very well accept that suggestion. Therefore I suggest that we follow the precedent set by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself on May 23, 1944, when he asked the house to rise and sing God Save the King in recognition of a very great day in the annals of the empire.

(The members rose and sang God Save the King.)

VISITING FORCES

UNITED STATES—DISCIPLINE AND INTERNAL ADMINISTRATION WHEN IN CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 253, to make provision with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada and with respect to the exercise of discipline and to the internal administration of such forces.

He said: During the war there were provisions under the War Measures Act facilitating the exercise of disciplinary and administrative powers by the commanders of United States forces that might be in Canada on the invitation of the Canadian government. Those provisions expired on April 1 when the orders in council, other than those appended to the so-called omnibus bill, were repealed. This is a bill to make provision for the exercise of some disciplinary and administrative powers by commanders of such United States forces as may be in Canada on the invitation of the Canadian government, but without in any way excluding the jurisdiction of our own courts of justice.

Mr. CHURCH: Might I ask the minister what are visiting forces doing in this country? We are part of the British empire; what are they doing here without the consent of Britain and the dominions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: These forces are visiting Canada as an autonomous unit of the commonwealth of British nations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNITED NATIONS

ACCESSION OF CANADA TO CONVENTION ON PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the accession of Canada to the convention on the privileges and immunities of the united nations and to grant to the united nations and any specialized agency of which Canada is a member and which is brought into relationship with the united nations, to their officers and to the representatives of their members, the legal capacity, immunities, facilities and privileges necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes of the united nations and of its specialized agencies.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been informed of the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask how many agencies it will cover?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. gentleman asks how many of the specialized agencies of the united nations it will cover. It will cover all the specialized agencies of which Canada itself may be a member.

Mr. CHURCH: There are about four hundred of them, I think. No wonder there is a scarcity of housing in Ottawa, with twenty-four countries to be represented here.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $46,723,000 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1947; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $46,723,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways and for the issue of securities guaranteed by the dominion of Canada in respect of such refunding to an aggregate principal amount not exceeding $200,000,000.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

EMIGRATION

CANADIANS LEAVING FOR YUGOSLAVIA—POSITION OF NATURALIZED CITIZEN LEAVING CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on May 20 several questions were directed by hon. members to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and to me concerning the emigration to Yugoslavia of certain residents of Canada. As all the questions are related, the Prime Minister informed the house on May 21 that I would make a comprehensive statement on the subject.

The first suggestion that a group of Yugoslav nationals might leave Canada for Yugoslavia was made by the chargé d'affaires of the Yugoslav legation in Ottawa in a letter, dated March 5, 1946. In this letter he stated that there were a number of Yugoslav nationals who wished to return to Yugoslavia when transportation facilities became available. He also raised the question of export permits for various Canadian products on behalf of the nationals concerned. The chargé d'affaires was subsequently advised of the export regulations then in force.

In June, 1946, passports were granted to four Canadians of Yugoslav origin for the purpose of proceeding to Yugoslavia. The passports were granted subsequent to a written request from the chargé d'affaires of the Yugoslav legation in which he stated that the applicants wished to proceed to Yugoslavia to make arrangements for certain Yugoslav nationals or Canadian citizens of Yugoslav descent who "were planning to return to Yugoslavia for the purpose of lending their skill and assistance in the reconstruction of the country."

Subsequent to the return of these persons to Canada a good deal appeared in the Yugoslav-Canadian press about the return of Yugoslavs and Canadians of Yugoslav descent to Yugoslavia and it appears that funds were collected in connection with the proposed emigration.

In regard to the export of capital the regulations of the foreign exchange control board provide as hon. members know, that persons leaving Canada for permanent residence elsewhere are provided with sufficient foreign exchange to pay their passages and reasonable expenses en route. They are allowed to export personal and household effects, and their remaining cash assets up to a maximum of $25,000 each are transferable in Canadian funds.

A proposal was made by the Yugoslav chargé d'affaires under which the resources of the emigrants, within the policy stated above, would be pooled through a central organization known as the Council of Canadian South Slavs. This body, instead of withdrawing the funds from Canada, would use them to make bulk purchases in Canada of goods suitable to trades in which the emigrants would engage upon their return to Yugoslavia.

This proposal was approved and bank accounts were established by the Council of Canadian South Slavs under the supervision of the foreign exchange control board. Although up-to-date figures are not available at present, deposits to the accounts have amounted to approximately $1,000,000.

In this connection export permits have been granted by the Department of Trade and Commerce for the export of material from Canada to Yugoslavia to the amount of $345,918. Some permits were granted to individuals direct; other permits were granted to Canadian manufacturers who apparently received orders for direct shipment.

Settlers' effects are not under export permit control. A farmer leaving Canada, therefore, would be free to take his farming equipment without the necessity of an export permit and, in a similar way, a mechanic would be free to take the tools of his trade. Undoubtedly the total value of settlers' effects would be considerable, but it is difficult to estimate the exact value involved.

It is also difficult to estimate the total number of persons leaving Canada under the auspices of the Council of Canadian South Slavs since passports would be applied for by the individuals concerned, if they are Canadians, and Yugoslavs would travel on Yugoslav passports. There is, of course, no regulation or law which prevents a Canadian or an alien leaving Canada of his own free will. The legal position of an alien leaving Canada is governed by the Immigration Act which provides that an alien acquires Canadian domicile "only by having his domicile for at least five years in Canada after having been landed therein". He loses his domicile by "voluntarily residing out of Canada with the present intention of making his permanent home out of Canada and not for a mere special or temporary purpose."

Thus a Yugoslav citizen, regardless of the length of time he has lived in Canada, will lose his right to reenter Canada if he goes to Yugoslavia with the intention of making his permanent home in Yugoslavia. Should he change his mind and wish to reenter Canada, he would have no right to reenter Canada and would have to apply for admission as any other prospective immigrant.

Moreover, if he should be readmitted to Canada, he could not count his previous stay in Canada for the acquisition of Canadian domicile. In order to become a citizen of Canada, he would, after his return, have to remain in Canada for five years.

The legal position of a Canadian citizen by naturalization leaving Canada is governed by sections 20 and 21 of the Canadian Citizenship Act. Section 20 reads in part as follows: "A Canadian citizen, other than a natural-born Canadian citizen . . . ceases to be a Canadian citizen if he resides outside Canada for a period of at least six consecutive years," subject to various provisos. Section 21 provides inter alia for cancellation of citizenship by order-in-council if a naturalized citizen "out of Canada has shown himself by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty."

It is important to note that a warning appears at the back of the current Canadian passport, which reads as follows:

> Canadian citizens by naturalization certificate or citizenship certificate should bear in mind that unless under the laws of the state to which they originally belonged or by the provision of a treaty, they have ceased to be subjects of that state, their certificates have no effect within its boundaries nor can the good offices of His Majesty's representatives be extended to them there.

If, therefore, any Canadian citizen by naturalization who goes to Yugoslavia is, under Yugoslav law, a citizen of Yugoslavia, the Canadian government will not be able to grant him any measure of protection as long as he remains in Yugoslavia.

The group, which is now assembled in Montreal, have satisfied the various regulations applicable to their movement to Yugoslavia both in regard to themselves and to goods purchased by them. No doubt they are aware of their possible loss of status under Canadian law but they are free to go to Yugoslavia or to any other country if they so wish.

On May 21 the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) asked whether I would take steps to see that the Canadian passports carried by the expatriate Yugoslavs now in process of returning to their homeland be protected in such a way as to prevent their alteration or transference to other persons, and ensure that each Canadian passport issued to this group will be easily identifiable on its reentry to Canada. I can assure the hon. member that every effort will be made to guard against the misuse of these Canadian passports.

Allegations have been made in the press that improper methods have been used to persuade residents of Canada to return to Yugoslavia or to contribute to the funds which have been raised to finance the return of other residents of Canada. Should any evidence come to hand as to the methods used in these or any other cases which would warrant action by the government, it will not hesitate to take such action.

Mr. CHURCH: Are the Yugoslavs being given priorities in shipping? If so, with what companies, when Canadian citizens can get no shipping at all?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Any arrangements that have been made for transport were made by themselves or through persons other than agents of the Canadian government.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there a reciprocal provision whereby people may bring assets from a communist controlled country to a democratic country such as ours? It seems to me that we are giving them certain privileges which they would not grant to their own citizens who might be coming here.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think we have to judge our regulations and laws on their merits, and not on their conformity or otherwise with laws of other countries, some of which our people would not readily accept.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that the public would not expect this government or the government of any democratic country to be too soft with people who are known as communists and who would revolutionize our system of government.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would point out that these are general regulations. There are no special regulations made for any special class of resident of Canada. The regulations are general and I think they have to be judged on the basis of whether or not they are proper for the Canadian people.

Mr. FERGUSON: Our esteemed minister of immigration (Mr. Glen) is unfortunately in hospital, but I should like to direct a reminder to his department to remember, when Yugoslavs wish to enter Canada as immigrants, the action of the Yugoslavs now leaving who are exporting all they can from this country.

NEWFOUNDLAND

DELEGATION TO CANADA—TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I notice in this morning's Ottawa Journal that a delegation from Newfoundland is bound for Washington to discuss a trade agreement between that country and the United States. First I should like to ask when the conference is to be held in connection with that country joining the Canadian confederation. Second, if they make a trade agreement with the United States will it interfere with the conference on confederation and preferences?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Within the last twenty-four hours June 25 has been fixed as the date for the opening of the meeting between the representatives of the assembly in Newfoundland and the representatives of Canada. Of course this government would not like to make any comment upon any action that is being taken with respect to trade agreements by the government of Newfoundland. It may very well be that the existence or non-existence of agreements will be matters to be considered at the conference, but this government would not presume to volunteer any advice or voice any criticism as to what is being done by another government.

Mr. GRAYDON: How many will compose the Newfoundland delegation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have not been informed of the composition of the delegation.

CABINET MINISTERS

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT AS TO SALARY AND TAXABLE INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I should rise on a question of privilege in order to correct a report respecting the salaries of cabinet ministers which appears in the Montreal Gazette of this morning. After referring to the Prime Minister's salary, the report continues:

The other cabinet ministers get a total of $18,000 each, of which $10,000 is for the post of minister, $2,000 for motor car and $6,000 sessional indemnity, all of the latter being free of income tax.

The correct position of course is that all of the latter is subject to income tax.

IMMIGRATION

POLISH CITIZENS—REPORTED CANCELLATION OF CANADIAN BOOKINGS ON "AQUITANIA"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Can the Minister of Labour inform the house if any passages booked by Canadians coming to Canada on the Aquitania have been cancelled in favour of Polish immigrants who are en route here?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have no knowledge of the matter, but I should say that the arrangements would be made by the British government.

DEFENCE RESEARCH BOARD

REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIVE FROM NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he will consider increasing the personnel of the interim defence research board to include a member from Nova Scotia.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Consideration is being given to the membership of the defence research board in order to give adequate representation to all parts of the country and the various interests that should be represented on the board.

Mr. GRAYDON: You must be in a bad way with the by-election down there.

SUGAR

PRESENT STOCKS IN STORAGE—QUESTION AS TO INCREASE IN RATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of a press statement today regarding sugar stocks in storage in Canada. According to the report these stocks are very large. The question I wish to ask is this: In view of that situation has consideration been given to increasing the ration by approximately four pounds per person in order to take up the surplus?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the press report and no doubt my hon. friend had not been able to send me notice of his question. I doubt whether the surplus is as great as the newspaper report would indicate, but in any event I shall look into the matter and make a statement to the house early next week.

MEAT RATIONING

INQUIRY AS TO SUSPENSION FOR JULY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. B. BARRETT (Norfolk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that July 1 this year falls on a meatless day, will the government consider suspending this order for that day to meet the anticipated heavy demand for food arising from the expected inflow of tourists?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I have a similar question from the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson). I shall look into the matter and see whether anything can be done.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, May 22, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege last night of moving the adjournment of the debate. I want to say for the benefit of hon. members that I have waited for some considerable time for a member from my province to speak on behalf of that province. As they have not seen fit to do so I believe it is my duty to say a few words at this time. I feel that if any member from my province had spoken what he would have said would have been more favourable to the government than what I am about to say.

After I moved adjournment of the debate last night some of my friends on both sides of the house said to me, "Well, we will hear tomorrow all about that car ferry, freight and truck traffic, transportation and the non-fulfilment of the confederation pact." At first I felt that this was a rather embarrassing suggestion, but on second thought I realize it is a compliment, whether or not it was intended as such. If I had time—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members to moderate their voices. It is nearly impossible to hear the hon. member who has the floor. I suggest that those who have important conversations to carry on might use the lobby.

Mr. McLURE: Or let them go to their rooms, Mr. Speaker, and have their usual sleep. If I had time this house would surely hear about the government's neglect in fulfilment of our confederation pact, but another time is coming, and before this house rises, even if it is in September or October, I shall have my say on that subject. I am not afraid to demand from this government or any other government or any other party the rights that belong to my province as a province.

I have noticed, Mr. Speaker, as you have noticed, that as soon as hon. members rise to speak in this debate a great many members hike for the nearest exit as if somebody had called out "All ashore that's going ashore". I have kept a partial register of this and I have found that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had a full house, and in my humble opinion he deserved it, whether he pleased them or otherwise. But as hon. members on different sides began to debate the budget the attendance petered out from a full house to a score of deuces and one queen. I have kept a register of attendance when the hon. members were speaking and on a great many occasions there was barely a quorum in the house. But what is the difference, Mr. Speaker? We are all speaking to Hansard, to our constituents, so after all we are all on a par. As I look at the government side today I am grateful for a better attendance than most hon. members have had, and I would say thank you to them for that. I will say this, that if there were no Hansard reporters in this house I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I could fill this chamber in the next ten minutes —if there was no record to go to the country of what I should say—and that is true of a great many others.

In this budget debate I have not missed one sitting of the house. I have listened to all the speeches on the maritimes except the one delivered by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and I could not help being absent on that occasion; I was called out of the house. Some of the speeches I am not in a position to understand fully, and I regret that very much indeed. When hon. members speak in that classical language, French, unless they go slowly and carefully, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) do, I am at a loss to understand what they say. While I was born in a French settlement in Prince Edward Island, known as North Rustico—and I was proud to be born in that settlement—I always held it against the French people there that they wanted to learn English but we were not privileged to learn French. However, the other day on happening to meet one of the French members of the redistribution committee I interpreted to him what I wanted to make known with regard to Queens county. I said this to him, "Ne touchez pas Queens."

During this debate, and especially within the last couple of days, I have felt elated, Mr. Speaker, that the maritimes are being recognized, so well recognized that I am almost envious that we have not a by-election pending in the province of Prince Edward Island. When the government realize that they have a long overdue by-election on their hands they seem to sit up and take notice, to warm up to the fact that the maritimes are a part of Canada. But I do not give the entire credit to the by-election. I believe that hon. members who have spoken so ably on the unfulfilled obligations of the government to the neglected maritimes have exerted a great deal of influence. I refer to such hon. members as the member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Stanfield), the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Kirk), and there have been a great many others. I did hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges), with all his eloquence, would have spoken on the rights of the maritimes in this debate. I do wish to say that it afforded me real pleasure when the hon. member for Davenport (Mr.

MacNicol), a constituency of that great province of Ontario, climaxed his efforts by his interest and factual information regarding the neglected maritimes of this dominion. It was a grand and glorious feeling for me when he spoke about the best bit of red earth in the world, my province. It was an assurance to me also that my efforts to keep the island on the map have not been in vain. All this, Mr. Speaker, is a preamble to the subject that is before us for debate at this time, one that is important to us all whether we are in private or political life, and that is the subject of the budget.

In introducing the budget on April 29 the Minister of Finance informed the house that it was his first. Political history records the fact that it is either the making or the breaking of the man who first delivers the budget. At this time I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance on playing first fiddle. Since his debut in political life seven years ago the hon. gentleman has played many parts in government. He played second fiddle to the ex-minister of finance (Mr. Ilsley); second fiddle to the ex-minister of defence, Hon. J. L. Ralston, and to another ex-minister, General A. G. L. McNaughton. Then through the strategy of the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case), he became minister of defence. On Tuesday, April 29, we found him calling the tune and playing first fiddle. At that time it was interesting to note how the Prime Minister smiled upon him as he called him to the second fiddle seat in the front row, and when the Minister of Finance in his address would draw a long bow with a high note how the Prime Minister beamed upon his protege with the nicest of Virginian smiles!

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance told us that a great day is coming. What the people want is the present day to be great. They are not willing to buy futures even on a 29 per cent profit margin. A few days prior to the minister delivering his budget speech I looked at a picture of him in the Globe and Mail. I do not believe he had a moustache at that time. There I saw a man in comfortable attire, shirtsleeves rolled up to the biceps, earning his $18,000 annual indemnity by the sweat of his noble brow. It reminded me of the words of a great British Prime Minister who said, "sweat and tears" —sweat for the Minister of Finance but tears for the taxpayers of Canada.

According to the minister he laboured hard and well to make us believe that his first budget held out more money for all, higher wages for all, higher profits for all, lower taxes for all, lower prices for all, higher production for all industry with floor and ceiling prices to protect producers and consumers. Oh, what a hope! But notwithstanding all this clanging of tambourines and idealistic verbiage, when the searchlight is turned on the budget it reveals at the same time the nigger in the woodpile of hope for better things. By this budget will come stifling of private enterprise with less production, more jobless men—and it is reported we have thirty thousand of them in the maritimes at the present time—more discontent and general dissatisfaction throughout the entire country.

Having listened attentively to the minister's budget from the first to the last I wondered who prepared it—I knew who delivered it, and in my opinion it was exceptionally well delivered. But I noticed particularly the high praise given to the budgets of other years—and I wish the ex-minister of finance were in his seat. Then I wondered why the change of ministers in the financial department. Had the previous minister become over popular, or had he lost caste with the taxpayers of Canada to the detriment of this government? That question I shall leave for hon. gentlemen to answer.

When the budget was finished I thought of an old quotation from scripture which is heard frequently. It will be found in Genesis, chapter 27, verse 22:

> The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You have it wrong. Read your bible again. "The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hand is the hand of Esau."

Mr. McLURE: Mr. Speaker, I should love to correct the hon. gentleman; I know he has religious ideas, but he is mistaken in correcting me.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Get me a bible.

Mr. McLURE: Most of us considered it was a typical budget of other years funnelled through a younger minister in a government effort to eliminate some of the bad taste of other drastic budgets; for instance, failure to increase exemption for both married and single persons. We all believe the government owes every man and woman, if physically fit and capable of doing so, an opportunity to earn a living. The lower paid or salaried people in the country are earning only a bare existence and are paying their full share of taxation to the revenue department through hidden taxes. They should not have to pay an income tax on top of what they are already paying. To my mind these things are proof sufficient that the ex-minister of finance had his hand on the gearshift even if he had to reach over from the back seat.

Let us look for a moment at the budget. The minister boomed his surplus of $352,144,000 as a great feat, the greatest in eighty years. But, Mr. Speaker, I have my doubts whether the minister himself believes it, because later in his wonderful speech he issued this warning to all of us—I quote from Hansard at page 2548:

> We should not, however, be led into false optimism, nor should we jump to the conclusion that our present tax structure is much more than adequate to meet all our future requirements.

Suppose we look for a moment at this financial monstrosity, the budget. In the fiscal year 1946-47 government expenditures were $2,632 million in round figures. The revenues from taxes and departmental incomes were $2,610 million or $2,612 million. Actually there was a deficit of $20 million or $22 million. How then comes a surplus?

You have heard, and it will not hurt for me to repeat it, that the government sold war assets for $372 million, which no doubt had cost the taxpayers over $1 billion or probably $2 billion, and this $372 million was called a revenue. But I will bet you the Minister of Finance earmarked it as non-recurring revenue.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was classified as expenditures when the stuff was paid for.

Mr. McLURE: They took into account the deficit of $20 million and called the balance, $352 million, a surplus. I wonder if any chartered bank would call it a surplus. I wonder if a business firm would stand before a banker whom it owed and declare a surplus shown in this manner.

This whole budget, to say the least, is questionable bookkeeping. Or suppose a manufacturer resorted to the practice of selling part of his plant equipment to show a yearly profit. Governments may resort to this kind of accounting, but I do not believe the country will swallow the bait.

To submit a budget surplus by the methods I have outlined, and announcing a forecast surplus for the next year of $190 million or $200 million, is in my opinion an insult to the intelligence of the taxpayers at a time like this, when the country is groaning and staggering under its present load and crying for relief.

The minister, in bidding for a popular budget, hit right out with high income tax. He should have raised the exemption on single taxpayers to $1,200, on married taxpayers without dependents to $2,000 or thereabouts, and married taxpayers with dependents to $2,500. No tax relief for the married women who work! Evidently the government do not want women any more, even if nurses and school teachers are now scarce. No assistance to new business, and very little to old established firms.

Business in general must be disappointed with this budget. Canada and Canadians fought a great war in the name of freedom and in the defence of the dignity and morale worthy of ordinary men. Supposedly we are back now to peace time. Why should this government now deny to our citizens the privileges and responsibilties of running their own businesses? What freedom it would be to businessmen if they could now run their own businesses. They look forward to the casting off of the unbearable bureaucratic shackles.

No relief for business, no relief for farmers, no treaties for fishermen! This budget will continue to strangle agriculture and strangle industry, and it will strangle the treasury of many millions of dollars more of the taxpayers' money. This budget appears to me to be the essence of the economic muddle in which the government finds itself today. It strikes at the very root of the effort to get production established by private enterprise.

The first and most vital task that the government should perform and that they should now perform is to clear up this economic mess resulting from years of socialistic incompetence, maladministration and reckless finaning. That is the task that the government should apply its efforts to, and this would restore confidence both at home and abroad in Canada's march forward.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether I would term this an election budget, but it has all the earmarks of a leadership budget—page the hon. the Minister of Finance. A Liberal newspaper in my home town, Charlottetown, commenting editorially on this budget, said:

> What a budget, and they were so mean with little Prince Edward Island.

That has reference of course to the provincial agreements. Another million or two would have been just chicken feed, but we had to scratch for every nickel we received.

There was one peculiar thing about this budget. Before it was delivered there did not seem to be any secrecy about it; there was no secrecy about the terms of the budget. For instance, the Minister of Finance, before he delivered his budget, announced that there would be a surplus of over $200 thousand.

Mr. ABBOTT: Million.

Mr. McLURE: Million.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Read a little more carefully.

Mr. McLURE: Let me hear that voice again.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Read a little more carefully. If you are going to read you might as well read correctly.

An hon. MEMBER: You read too.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I speak every single word. I don't read.

Mr. McLURE: For instance, the Minister of Finance announced over a month ago that there would be a surplus of over $200 million.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That is right, $200 million.

Mr. McLURE: You are listening, are you? The leader of His Majesty's opposition foresaw, some sixty days prior to that, a thirty per cent income tax reduction, which he announced. My leader must have had some inside information; whether he was in collaboration with the Minister of Finance—

Mr. ABBOTT: I can assure my hon. friend as to that; there was no collaboration.

Mr. McLURE: —it is not for me to say, but he was only one per cent higher than the minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: No one was more surprised than the leader of the opposition.

Mr. McLURE: However, the minister has boasted about his record as surpassing that of all the finance ministers in the past eighty years.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no. I am sure my hon. friend wants to be fair. I did not boast that my record was better than that of any finance minister in the last eighty years. That is the last thing I would want to do.

Mr. McLURE: I would not desire to accuse the minister of boasting, but he compared his record to the record of the last eighty years.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not my record.

Mr. McLURE: That reminded me of a story. The district attorney in a court was having trouble with one of his witnesses, a rather pugnacious gentleman. The attorney asked, "Are you acquainted with any of the jurymen?" And the witness replied, "More than half of them." Then the district attorney asked, "Are you willing to swear that you know more than half of them?" The old witness looked at the jury box and replied, "If it comes to that, your honour, I am willing to swear that I know more than all of them put together." Thus said the Minister of Finance.

With further reference to the secrecy concerning this budget I may say that a month before it was brought down I was told on what now appears to have been good authority that furs and fur farming were to receive a real walloping. Well, when this budget was brought down on April 29 last it left an aching void in the hearts of furriers and fox ranchers from one end of Canada to the other, notwithstanding the fact that all the information concerning this great conservation industry had been laid before the minister, showing that its condition was such that only most heroic remedial measures could restore it to prosperity. Naturally one of these measures would be the removal of the processing tax and the over-all sales tax. Then manufacturers and retailers would be encouraged to feature silver fox and mutation fox, which are without doubt the most beautiful of all furs in the world, and have been so regarded for over half a century. Only a very small proportion of the women of America have ever been able to purchase silver fox furs, though a great many of them desire to own a scarf, a stole, a cape or a coat. The fact is that the government have taxed this fur practically off the market. In 1945 I endeavoured to get the then minister of finance to see that his tax policy was about to strangle this great conservation industry with a twenty-five per cent processing tax. At that time this tax was cut to ten per cent. Then came the blow that killed the industry, that obnoxious, I was almost going to say cursed tax, of eight per cent over-all on the finished fur article, making the last state a great deal worse than the first.

If time permitted I should like to show this house, as I did in 1945, that by this over-all sales tax, and the processing tax, the total tax on all furs had been increased from about five per cent on the meanest kind to as high as sixty-five per cent. The governments of both Canada and the United States have allowed enormous quantities of outside furs to be brought into these countries—how is my time, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has just about one minute left.

Mr. McLURE: Since I do not speak very often, Mr. Speaker, I crave the indulgence of the house and ask for a short extension, even though hon. members want to vote today.

Last year the United States imported over $300,000,000 worth of furs, and this did not include silver fox and mutation fox. About $100,000,000 worth of furs were imported from Soviet Russia; and while the bulk of these furs went to the United States, a great many millions of dollars worth seeped into Canada. This heavy taxation and these importations took away the demand for our furs, and the only remedy for the situation in Canada would be to take off the processing and sales taxes on silver fox and mutation fox, and perhaps also on mink, though ranch mink is allowed free entry into the United States while silver fox from Canada must pay an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent. The strongest and best kind of government is one that is willing to protect its own people. Let us have some reduction in taxation in regard to this industry.

I wish to mention another matter that has been impressed upon me by the people of Prince Edward Island, and particularly the people of the constituency of Queens; that is the taxation on soft drinks and chocolate bars.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he has exhausted his time, and unless he has the unanimous consent of the house I shall have to ask him to resume his seat.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Proceed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McLURE: I shall not take very long.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has not unanimous consent I shall be obliged to ask him to resume his seat. I suggest that he conclude in a few words.

Mr. McLURE: Following the representations made by youth organizations, hospitals, churches, schools and the children themselves, one would have anticipated that this obnoxious tax would be abolished, but no. The government claim they are giving the children real money. It is a case of the minister of welfare handing out the baby bonus to the children, and the Minister of Finance coming around the corner and swiping the children's candy and soft drinks. Here again it is the voice of Jacob but the hand of Esau. There is also the jewellery nuisance tax. There is no change because, the minister says, this tax is bringing in something like $25,000,000. In these taxes surely such essential articles as alarm clocks, watches and tableware might have been exempt. Here is an example of the taxation. On a $20 watch at the factory the government gets $11.60, and on an alarm clock costing $2.50 at the factory there is a tax of $1.45.

Then, there are two conflicting reports with regard to the dominion-provincial agreements.

[Mr. McLure.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired, and I would ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I do not make a practice of referring to personal notes in the house. However, I have received a personal note from a dear friend of mine saying that I had made a mistake in a biblical quotation. I find that the quotation in the bible I was brought up on, the old Presbyterian bible is—and my hon. friend was correct:

The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

The bible of my very dear friend of another faith in this house—and in which I was not brought up—contains these words in Genesis:

The voice indeed is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take part in this debate, even at this late stage. I have had the privilege of listening to others, and in what I shall say I shall try not to repeat what others have said.

The last few minutes, when we have had to listen to the woes and the wails and the painting of that dismal future for Canada, have been most painful. I do not think anything can be more destructive than the wails and woes such as we have heard from the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. McLure).

Before approaching my main item, may I compliment the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) who painted such a rosy picture of his constituency. From his speech one could tell that nature was close to his heart. I am sure the people of his constituency are behind him, heart and soul, when he tries to do something for them.

May I express a vote of thanks, too, to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Smith) who, along with others has been trying to bring about dominion-provincial meetings so that his constituency might receive the benefit therefrom.

I should like also to compliment that grand old man from Brandon (Mr. Matthews), the daddy of the house. When I heard him making his colourful speech I knew he had his people at heart. No wonder he has retained his seat for such a long time.

I would compliment, too, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) upon his fine speech.

Today I speak as a back-bencher, one who is not in the $18,000 brackets which have been mentioned. I am going to speak on my own behalf, not on behalf of the party; and in doing so I shall express my own opinion. I shall not be over-critical of any party in the house, for the simple reason that as a back-bencher, whether my views are good or bad, I do not suppose they will be taken anyway.

The former minister of finance worked under terrific strain during wartime, and he has now given way to a younger man, a man who must work very hard, with his shirt sleeves rolled up, as was pointed out by an earlier speaker. Having been reeve of a municipality for a number of years I can join hands with him in my knowledge of the terrific strain to which he must have been subjected in carrying out his financing. I maintain that the whole process of financing is based on a system of debt. This afternoon I shall attempt to make my opinions as clear as possible. As chairman of a school board I found that the board had to borrow money from the bank to carry on its year's activities, and had to pay a terrific amount of interest on the amount it borrowed. The municipalities, in turn, had to borrow money from the bank to carry on their activities for the year. Provincial and dominion governments must do the same thing.

Just to show the inconsistencies in connection with getting money, let me point out one or two things. To get money when you need it and to get it when you do not need it are two different things. The first year I was reeve of a municipality of 4,000 people our credit stood at $8,000. We were in dire need of money at that time—that was back in 1936—but we were refused it, because it was said that our credit was not good. It was pointed out to us that some of our taxes were outstanding. We had only $8,000 to operate our schools, for which the sum of $30,000 was required. After seven or eight years of good financing we reduced the municipal debt by $229,000. We bought a drag line and other modern road equipment, and also built 400 miles of road. In the last year we could have got $50,000 credit at the bank, but we did not need it then. What I have stated illustrates that money is plentiful when it is not required, but when one is in dire need of it he cannot have it.

Anyone who will read the little red book will see that I am set down as an implement dealer. It happened that I was following that occupation for a few months prior to my coming to Ottawa. But during the greater part of my life I have been farming, and it is on behalf of the farmers I should like to say a few words today.

There are two classes of farmers. There is the grain grower, and there is the other farmer who produces live stock in addition to his grain crops. I have not much sympathy for the man who is just growing grain, because I know that on the western prairies they simply sow their seed in the spring and take off their crops in the fall, year in and year out, with the result that the land becomes lighter and blows away. They are robbers of the soil. The men whom I want to defend are the dairy farmers and the hog raisers. These men really work for a living, milking their cows, raising hogs, and so on. They must farm 365 days in the year. They cannot just pull out in the fall, go to California and return in the spring—they must stay on the job. The animals must be fed in the morning, the cows must be milked, then fed again at dinner time and at night. The daily chores of such a farmer run from six in the morning until ten o'clock at night.

I have a letter here from the secretary treasurer of the municipality in which I reside which shows the extent of the benefits derived from the dominion-provincial conference. This municipality is going to get six mills on the general assessment. School taxes vary from 35 mills to 61 mills, and in most cases it has been a great help. In the case of a property worth $3,000, there will be a reduction of $18 in the school taxes alone, or approximately 30 per cent.

An hon. member has mentioned Mr. Krug. I have a letter from him which reads in part:

> Your ideas of using the Bank of Canada to finance public indebtedness and the private banks to finance private activities are similar to my own views.

Let us not have any more of this funny money story we hear so much about. The Bank of Canada should be used for the benefit of the people of Canada. Some people will say, "Oh, something for nothing." This is the funny money story that crops up and which we hear so much about. Let me say here and now that it would be the same kind of money as I hold here in my hand.

An hon. MEMBER: How much is it?

Mr. SINNOTT: This happens to be one dollar.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are taking no chances?

An hon. MEMBER: Are you going to table it?

Mr. SINNOTT: Our Lord said that the law of life is work, that if a man will not work, neither let him eat. Our colossal debt of $13,079 million is getting to the point where some people cannot even figure it. The interest charges on that debt amount to $437,517,000. Much could be accomplished if that interest were put to better use. I am going to urge our young minister not to depend upon his old advisers who cherish the philosophy of a debt-creating system. He should get down to brass tacks and see what makes the clock tick. I am sure that if he uses his ability along those lines the people of Canada will certainly appreciate it.

I should like to say a word about the miserable old age pensions. I ask any hon. member to try to live in Ottawa in decency on $30 a month. He will find that you have to pay from $15 up to $25 for a room in which to live. What money have you left to live on? A pension of $60 a month is not too much for our aged people. This could be paid under a contributory system. The Bank of Canada could be used to create the necessary credit. I do not believe in giving out something for nothing; the people should learn to save and contribute.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Why use the Bank of Canada?

Mr. SINNOTT: We will have to help them out because we could not expect them to save all the money themselves. If we created this money through the Bank of Canada and gave the aged people a decent monthly allowance of $60 we would be creating a market for much of our production right here at home. I hope the Minister of Finance will take a little advice from a back-bencher and see that this is done.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I have but one purpose in taking part in the present budget debate. I am compelled to voice the intense disappointment of the citizens of my riding and Canadians in all walks of life at the financial sleight-of-hand displayed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in his first budget address. To say that the minister made a clever speech is unhappily true. His voice was strong even though his arguments were a bit weak. The applause from the back benches of the Liberal party was vociferous if a bit forced. The congratulatory press releases of the next day covered up the obvious and growing decay of government statemanship with clever facades of impressive statistics.

The minister's speech reminded me of nothing so much as a conducted tour of a district under the arrangement of the local chamber of commerce. Such tours invariably show the credulous tourist the respectable scenes of the community. He is shown the great public and industrial buildings, the main streets and the landscaped homes of the thriving local aristocracy, all telling the story of material success and accumulating wealth. But the guide shields his visitors from even a glimpse of the local slums, from the unkempt and undernourished children and from the garrets of poverty on the other side of the tracks by whose degradation the outward glittering facade is usually able to be maintained. Such a guide was Canada's Minister of Finance in his economic report to the nation three weeks ago. To the House of Commons he said, and I quote from page 2543 of Hansard of April 29:

> Today we see a Canada enjoying a degree of prosperity never exceeded in living memory. We look forward to a year of high production and incomes. Indeed, we would appear to have ample excuse for self-satisfaction and easy optimism.

Those were the minister's words.

Mr. ABBOTT: Go on and read what I said after that; read the whole text.

Mr. PROBE: I have read it. I do not doubt that is the view to be seen on the minister's side of the tracks. To his sightseeing colleagues on the treasury benches such a picture is reasonable, because the federal books shows an apparent surplus of $352 million in government operations for the fiscal year just concluded.

The annual reports of big business to shareholders show that industrial companies have had a similar money experience: from the 1946 balance sheet of Monarch Knitting Company, showing a 309 per cent increase in net profits over 1945; from Orange Crush Company, a 448 per cent increase; from Building Products Company, a 256 per cent increase; from Moirs' Chocolates, a 226 per cent increase; from International Paper, a 265 per cent increase; from major corporations everywhere, equally staggering reports of golden harvests in practically all lines of business, thanking the government no doubt for past favours, but holding out sticky hands for more and yet more concessions by way of relaxed price controls, of bigger export guarantees, double depreciation, lower income tax rates, and removal of checks on excess profits.

And the minister, having heard the perpetual clamour of the lobbyist for bigger and better profits, and perhaps planning strategy for the inevitable election, the only type of planing which has merit in the eyes of laissez-faire governments, trots out his carefully groomed budget for our inspection. Well, let us look at it. Here is his forecast for the next year:

Sales tax up $27 million; excise duties and other excise taxes up $13 million—thus far an increase of $40 million. Definitely no relief there to the people who pay such taxes.

Excess profits taxes cut by $279 million. There is a nice fat incentive melon to the overworked coupon clippers.

Personal income taxes down $70 million, with no change in previously announced exemptions. There is another load cut off the weary shoulders of income taxpayers, with tax relief given, as usual, under capitalism, in inverse ratio to need.

Of course the minister informed the house that over half the people of Canada are now receiving so little pay that they pay no income tax anyway; and that in spite of an exemption figure which is below the cost of living. Families in the low income brackets do not cheer the 1947 budget.

But a few of those who have better than average incomes do quite well by themselves. Not the single man getting $800 yearly, whose need for incentive to produce more is valued at $6 for the next year since he will save only $6 next year on income tax. That saving will not give him a net balance after the rising costs of room rent, food and clothing are considered.

But a single man now getting $3,000 yearly will have $173 annual tax relief. He needs $173 to whip up his incentive. And one getting $10,000 a year will have $785 more relief than in 1946. It seems to take a bigger bonus in the view of the Minister of Finance to create an incentive to the $10,000 a year bachelor to work for that brave new world!

On the minister's side of the tracks such lopsided tax relief is not only fair but necessary! A married man with two children will, if he is now getting $150 a month, save $10 a year. Remember, the Minister of Finance puts such a man in the upper crust of Canada's salary scale. Maybe fear of starvation should be ample incentive for such a man! For him a tax reduction of eighty-three cents a month, to lay away for the rising cost of shoes, or enough to pay the increased cost of less than half the milk his children need—if they could afford to eat those things they should be eating.

Of course a married man with wages of $250 a month gets $83 a year cut from his income tax, or enough to allow him to pay his landlord $7 a month more rent, now that rental ceilings have conveniently risen to absorb the tax relief. You can trust a good landlord to cooperate!

The married man with two children and a salary of $10,000 a year gets approximately $2 a day relief from his tax burden.

And so it goes. The higher your income, the higher is the value the Minister of Finance puts on incentive. The higher your income, and the less your need, the greater the relief from income tax. To continue to quote from Scripture, as has been done so conveniently this afternoon, "For whomsoever hath, to him shall be given,"—by all versions.

And what about the minister's plans for increased incentives to the corporations whose profits I quoted a moment ago? Where in the past fiscal year corporation and excess profits taxes of $688 million were taken away from the industrialists, next year will see only $470 million returned to the people of Canada from this source. A cool incentive of $218 million to big business! Not a bad year's work in the lobbies for free enterprise! The minister is helping to reconstruct post-war capitalism with a vengeance, and as always, at the expense of the underfed and the under privileged! For a single year, Canadian corporations get tax reductions amounting to more than six years federal payments of old age pensions at the current rate. Nothing stingy about that scale of relief for rugged industrialists! But the needy pensioner still waits for government action! And still the Tories are not satisfied! The incentives I have mentioned are still not enough for the family compact!

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), in his role as spokesman for the Progressive Conservative party on the budget, demanded that the government take steps to return government interest rates from their present three per cent to the good old five and six per cent of the Tory-dominated finance rates of world war I. Strange how the Conservatives babble away incessantly about government economies, and then one of their most respected front benchers demands interest rates that would raise Canada's self-imposed subsidy to parasitic money-lenders by another $437 million yearly. This one request by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario would build up a $875 million present annually from Canada to the great financial institutions and the so-called middle class pensioners for whom my hon. member the financial critic for the Progressive Conservative pleads so eloquently. I wonder whether he will ever plead as sincerely for the expenditure of an equal amount of Canadian money for a universal old age pension scheme for all Canadians, to include those who live on the other side of the tracks as well as his beloved middle-class pensioners. They have to face the facts of life more insecurely equipped than do the coupon clippers who would make every day a day for Christmas giving to themselves.

I regret to state, Mr. Speaker, that, in my view, so far as the post-war period is concerned the economic action of the government has been one of gradually yielding to the wishes and the policies of the Conservative party. The Liberals, yes, and even the Tories on occasion, in debate and in their election literature so often talk the language of a planned economy as advocated by the C.C.F. They do this on the hustings because they are astute enough to know that economic planning is what Canada must have and what Canadians will vote for, but after every election to office the great betrayal is shameless and persistent. This budget gives relief to the rich once more, and it leaves at least the majority of Canadians worse off than before by its failure to eliminate or reduce hidden taxes, the more vicious because they are concealed taxes. I refer to the sales, customs and excise taxes. In his address the minister said that over half the Canadians were too poor to pay income tax; yet these same poor people bear the heaviest tax rate of all our citizens, with the hidden indirect tax of eight per cent, the sales tax and the excise tax. For those who need tax relief most the minister has done nothing in the budget. Not only are these low income families unable to get the meagre benefits of income tax reduction because they have no taxable income, but this coming year the full impact of rising rents, higher costs of food and of clothing, the unnecessary removal of the various subsidies on milk, butter, coal and so on play havoc with the pay cheque of the family.

Let me state this in another way. It is primary economics under any modern government that is not a malevolent dictatorship for public revenues to be levied in accordance with ability to pay, and that the greater the tax needed, the more steeply graduated must be the rates. No such economic policy is at work in the minister's present tax structure; in fact it is quite the reverse. Even in the field of corporation tax the Liberal policy is content to levy a uniform rate on great and small operators alike. Where does the accepted principle of ability to pay rest in the minister's calculation, in this instance?

By the British North America Act of 1867 the powers of provincial governments were limited to the right to collect direct taxes such as those levied on incomes or estates. These taxes cannot be concealed in the cost of living or in the cost of production. In their payment the taxpayer is always acutely conscious of the fact that he is paying taxes and of the amount that he is being taxed. By the same act the dominion government was empowered to levy either direct taxes such as the income tax, or indirect taxes such as the customs, sales or excise tax. Until 1917, during world war I, the dominion remained out of the field of direct taxation, confining its tax powers to those which the producer or importer could usually pass on to the ultimate consumer by concealing the tax in the price tag.

These taxes being hidden in the price tag, were not so glaringly evident to the consumer and, being unknown taxes, were not unpopular. He became critical of the income tax only when his income became taxable, but accepted the more regressive sales tax because he was unaware that, regardless of how low his income, heavy taxes were, in fact, being charged against him, but concealed in the prices of the necessities he bought.

As late as 1930, one-third of all taxes in Canada were of the hidden variety, and just barely one-fifteenth of all taxes were levied on income or inheritance; or, in other words, only one-fifteenth of municipal, provincial and federal taxes were based on ability to pay. It is through this economic sleight-of-hand of dominion ministers of finance, by which they weave sales taxes, excise taxes and customs duties into the cost of living that they pick the pockets of the low-income citizen of Canada.

Every time he buys a can of corned beef for his lunch pail, or the overall for his back, or the paper with which he shapes his smoke, or the tools with which he earns his meagre income-tax-free pay cheque, or when he turns on a light switch to find his weary bed at night, this consumer, who is free from direct tax, still pays a more onerous tax than does his neighbour in the fashionable suburb.

When he buys soles to repair the shoes of his children, or he pays for the cloth his wife uses to patch the holes in the inferior quality clothes that business ethics condone, he pays generous profits to unbridled enterprise (plus customs duty on the imported portions), plus the eight per cent sales tax to the Minister of Finance, plus a 50 per cent to 75 per cent collection fee on the tax, also concealed in the extra mark-up, and too often a 1½ per cent to 2 per cent per month finance charge due to recent sickness or unemployment having caused bills to accumulate.

Even the chocolate bar and the pop bottle pay their regressive tax of 20 per cent to 40 per cent to help create the surplus of the Minister of Finance. The soda-fountain courtships of Canada's glowing-cheeked adolescents are halted till the tax collector gets his two cents a bottle. With the price difference between the drugstore soda and the barroom beer so little, it is small wonder that I have had nearly three hundred letters from youth groups of Regina and elsewhere drawing attention to the moral danger implied in the minister's sales and excise tax policy, as well as to the disproportionate share of Canada's tax burden charged against the teen-age habits of our youngsters. It is refreshing to me that Canadian youth is more keenly alert to the injustice of regressive taxation policies, and more vociferous in protest, than are adult citizens who may be below the income tax exemption; for the latter, quite aware that they pay little or none of the direct income taxes to which their better-off neighbours are liable, remain complacent about the hidden taxes, even while they are bewildered as to the real reason why their wages never quite stay ahead of living expenses.

I will make a wager with the Minister of Finance that if he would make it compulsory for the next six months for every sales tag to show the amount of the price covered by hidden indirect tax, either he would be compelled to bring in a proper sales tax in the next budget, or the Liberal party would go out of existence at the next election.

But so long as the tax may be hidden from the consumer, sufficiently to prevent widespread political repercussions, the degree of impact of the tax burden is to the Liberals of as small concern as it was to the despotic Bourbons of France 200 years ago.

A sales tax that nets the government eight per cent at the point of collection becomes a tax of 12 to 14 per cent to the consumer by the time the wholesaler and retailer have added their mark-up. So that when the government estimates receipts from excise taxes and duties of $490 million; customs duties of $230 million, and sales tax of $325 million, these hidden taxes totalling $1,045 million will actually cost Canadian consumers, because of the inefficency of collection procedure, from $1,500 to $1,800 million for 1947. This is one important view of Canada's budget which the minister neglected to show our people, and which I feel must be shown to complete the scene.

Since levy of indirect taxes is not based on ability to pay, Canadians will in 1947, for each family of five persons, pay an average of $600 to $720 in higher cost of living, due to indirect taxation, with the greatest tax impact on the small wage consumer. From any married wage-earner this takes away in hidden taxes several times what the government pays back in family allowances, more decently to feed, clothe and shelter his children. The sales tax becomes a tax burden in inverse ratio to the income of the family.

In his failure to lighten the heavy hidden load of sales tax, the Minister of Finance has been grossly unfeeling and unfair in his responsibilities of office. His loyal colleague, the would-be Liberal premier of Saskatchewan, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) indulges in spasms of double talk on this subject. In Saskatchewan, in days that were happier from the point of view of the political aspirations of the hon. member for Rosthern, a Liberal government once imposed a two per cent sales tax in the name of education. This tax, despite the limited tax resources of my province, has twice been modified since the C.C.F. government headed by Premier Douglas took office in 1944. Out in Saskatchewan the hon. member for Rosthern has waxed eloquent for the complete removal of a tax which his Liberal colleagues of recent memory themselves imposed. Then in Ottawa the same hon. gentleman, blandly or blindly or both, supports the continuance of taxation far more regressive and at least seven times as costly to the consumer, by a government having constitutional power to secure revenue from all manner of means denied to one of the poorest provinces in the Dominion of Canada. What an obvious faux pas in logic by a would-be premier.

And note how the other Liberal member from Saskatchewan tries to sugar over the indefensible position of the federal government. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is, in my opinion, one of the cleverest debaters of the Liberal party, speaking on May 12 highlighted his party's spoken promises in contrast to their fiscal deeds in these words, as reported at page 2961 of Hansard:

> And I might go further and say that all forms of indirect taxation in Canada today were brought into being in the first instance by a Conservative government. It is true that some have been maintained in part by the Liberal governments which succeeded those Conservative administrations, but in only one instance has there been an increase in one of these indirect taxes. That was the instance referred to a moment ago by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), when he said I might have gone a little further. Yes, I might have gone a little further and said the sales tax was increased by the present government in the budget of 1936, in order to take care of the costs which had been placed against the people of this country while the previous government was in power. The intention of the government was—

These are the salient words.

> —to reduce that taxation, just as it had done in other instances. But, Mr. Speaker, we have been through a war which lasted for six years. During those six years the cost of carrying on government was greatly increased, with the result that up to the present time it has not been found possible to reduce that particular form of taxation.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Is that not true, that we had gone through a war?

Mr. PROBE: The Liberal government put the tax I refer to back on again in 1936 or 1937. We have here in the speech of the Minister of Agriculture just another example of the Liberal pot calling the Tory kettle black. The record of both Liberal and Conservative governments since world war I emphatically belies the sincerity of speakers of both the old-line parties. In this debate, both Liberals and Conservatives say they have a genuine concern to lower regressive indirect taxation, which, not being based on ability to pay, is doubly and trebly unjust to low-income Canadians. But their actions, when they were in power after 1920, give the lie to these professions of concern.

Here is my proof for saying that neither Liberals nor Conservatives have a record in office which can be trusted in the field of regressive taxation. I am going to give figures from the Canada Year Book, 1938, at page 836. On this page there appears a statement of sales tax changes from 1920 to 1938.

In 1920, on May 19, there was placed on the statutes a domestic sales tax of one per cent on sales by manufacturers, one per cent on sales by wholesalers and one per cent on importation. In June of that year the rate on sales by manufacturers to retailers or consumers was raised to two per cent and the import sales tax was raised to two per cent on importations by retailers or by consumers; that is, by the end users.

In 1921—and we are coming now to the government of the present Prime Minister—1½ per cent was the rate on sales by manufacturers to wholesalers, 1½ per cent on sales by wholesalers, three per cent on sales by manufacturers to retailers or consumers, except lumber, upon which the tax was two per cent on all domestic sales; and the import tax had gone up proportionately to 2½ per cent to manufacturers and wholesalers, and four per cent to the retailer or consumer.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): May I correct a slight error. In 1921 the Liberal government was elected in December.

Mr. PROBE: I thank the minister for the correction. We will then admit that these figures I have given thus far are during the Conservative regime, because in the next year, in 1922, when the present Prime Minister was in office, the sales tax, which was 1½ per cent under the Tory regime, or the Union regime the year before, now became 2¼ per cent on sales by manufacturers to wholesalers, 2¼ per cent on sales by wholesalers, and 4½ per cent on sales by manufacturers to retailers or consumers, except lumber, on which the tax was now raised just one per cent on all domestic sales; and the import figure now had risen to six per cent on importations by retailers and consumers.

In 1924 it had become six per cent on sales by manufacturers or producers, with three per cent on a restricted list, and six per cent on importations. In April, 1924—I presume there was an election in sight; in fact, there were several in the next two years, in 1925 and 1926—the list was reduced somewhat: five per cent on sales by manufacturers and five per cent on importations. That lasted for three years, until 1927, after the Meighen regime, and now the present Prime Minister was back on the throne. It was reduced in 1927 to four per cent, reduced in 1928 to three per cent, reduced in 1929 to two per cent, and reduced in 1930 to one per cent. He had brought it back to where it was just before he came into office.

In 1931 my hon. friends under the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett took office, and immediately swatted it up to a nice four per cent on sales by manufacturers and four per cent on importations. In 1932 it went to six per cent in each case, and in 1933 a distinction was made in the case of light articles manufactured by the blind, which were rated at half the tax for other manufactures. There was no change until 1936 when my Liberal friends came into office again, and in 1936, at the time when regressive taxation had its most burning effect on the pocket-books of low-income and relief people, the Liberal government raised that sales tax from six per cent to eight per cent on sales by manufacturers, and eight per cent on imports.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the statements that have been made in this House of Commons by members speaking for the government, and by members speaking for the Conservative party, are belied by the actions of their governments when they were in office.

My remarks at this time have been confined to regressive taxation; but, before closing, I should like to record my support of the remarks made on the budget by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay), who spoke on the irrigation needs of my area; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), who dealt with a more progressive trade policy, and the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton), who analysed the implications in regard to agriculture contained in this budget. At some other time I hope to refer to the record of the government in the field of public housing.

In closing, I must pay tribute to the leader of the C.C.F. party, the statesman representative from Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), for his broad knowledge of both domestic and international matters and, above all, for his unflinching adherence to decent social and economic principles. Were my leader's principles implemented by a Canadian government acting for all sections and classes of our citizens instead of for a privileged Canadian economic aristocracy, the C.C.F. subamendment moved by the hon. member on Tuesday, May 6, would have been unnecessary. That amendment was in these words:

That the following words be added to the amendment:

"(d) fail to raise the income tax exemption levels; and

(e) fail to make any provision for the more than half of our population who are compelled to live on incomes below the present exemption levels."

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my principal reason for participating in this debate this afternoon is to establish clearly and definitely the position of the Social Credit group in relation to the Progressive Conservative amendment and also in relation to the C.C.F. subamendment. In doing so, I shall present concrete reasons for the stand we intend to take. Before proceeding to do that, however, there are certain other observations I should like to make.

The budget debate opens the door wide and presents an opportunity for the discussion of a broad category of subjects. We have heard some speakers deal almost entirely with matters of local consequence; that is, those directly affecting their own constituencies. We have had many speeches dealing with matters of a national character, and also many referring to the general international situation. At first I was tempted to concentrate my remarks upon two or three matters which are the primary concern of my own constituency. While sorely tempted, for example, to devote my full forty minutes to one major local problem, namely the Red Deer post office and customs building and the inadequacy of service resulting from the deplorable condition of that building, I shall reluctantly defer consideration of that matter. But should it be necessary later, during this very session I shall devote forty minutes to that subject and direct my remarks to the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand), the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). I hope I may not have to do that. Then, too, it is difficult for me to resist the temptation to devote my full forty minutes to a second vigorous protest against the contemplated joint action on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways, with the blessing of the board of transport commissioners and the governor general in council, to abandon 64½ miles of railway in the Red Deer district, and thus, among other things, reduce land values in that area, virtually ruin several villages and hamlets, adversely affect our mail service, increase the cost of grain, live stock, coal and lumber marketing, contribute toward unemployment, cripple certain small private businesses, and provide cause for increases in municipal taxation. My opinions and the opinions of those directly affected by this retrograde action will certainly be made known to this house before the day of prorogation arrives.

I should like now, Mr. Speaker, to refer to just one or two speeches which have been made in this house during the past few days. First, I should like to refer to page 3310 of Hansard. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) was speaking at the time. I am not referring to this because he happened to be the speaker but because he seemed to reflect a view held by a great many members on the other side of the house. Referring to dominion-provincial relations, the hon. member said:

In a country as great as Canada, so immensely rich in lands, forests, fisheries, minerals and other natural resources, with a small population of not quite 13,000,000 inhabitants, we do not want, as was suggested by the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche, to go back to the conditions which prevailed in 1921, for example, or in 1930, or even to the conditions which prevailed from 1937 to 1939, because, if we remember well, the last economic crisis was sunk in the rivers of blood of the last great war. We do not want to see again in this country thousands of Canadians on direct relief, or living in a state next to starvation merely because of the lack of proper provision in the constitution of this country, or the lack of collaboration between federal and provincial powers, or, in other words, because of the blindness, the short-sightedness and the foolishness of men.

Let me assure the hon. member, to start with, that I for one certainly do not wish to see those conditions occur again; but I think in the latter part of that statement, instead of saying "or in other words", he should have said simply "because of the blindness, the short-sightedness and the foolishness of men." The thing I want to point out is this. I fully recognize that we desire a complete understanding and working agreement between the dominion and provincial authorities. In my opinion it is certainly necessary that we develop a proper concept of a working federal democracy, with the restatement and redefinition of rights, authorities and responsibilities of all governments. But—and I lay emphasis upon this—if the hon. member for Bonaventure and those who think as he does with respect to this matter believe that the mere transfer of authority from the provinces to the dominion will, in itself, prevent unemployment, prevent business stagnation, or prevent another war, then I say the hon. gentleman is in for a rude awakening. I assert that with that we must have certain fundamental changes in those economic and financial policies which, as they now stand, contribute to unemployment, relief, crushing taxation and debt, trade wars and military wars. It does not matter who administers the dose of poison; the results will be the same in either case.

A number of members from the maritime provinces have laid a good deal of emphasis upon conditions facing them and their people in that part of Canada. I congratulate them upon the energy and sincerity they have displayed in presenting those problems. As one whose paternal ancestors were for six generations rooted in the soil of Nova Scotia, as one who has travelled rather extensively in that part of Canada and has, I believe, an appreciation of their problems, I do not hesitate to join them in their plea for simple elementary justice.

Many of the problems of the maritimes are similar to those of the great west. The maritimes are faced with an unfair freight rate structure; so are we. They are faced with lack of secondary industries and all that means, and so are we. They have their coal problem, and we have ours. They are faced with the fact that in Canada we find financial centralization in the two central provinces, which has mitigated against the proper development both of the east and of my section in the west.

I say to members of parliament from central Canada, you have the political strength here; but you must also have with that the understanding and the sympathy necessary to make possible the solution of those maritime problems, and also the solution of many of our western problems.

In that connection an hon. member from the maritimes stated only a few days ago that his people are beginning to look south. I say that in the west many of our people are looking south. Many of them—and I presume this is also true of the maritimes—have gone south, because of a lack of what they regard as proper opportunity in those parts of Canada.

In my estimation that is a dangerous trend, dangerous for Canada. I say certainly that if the solution rests within our power, then we must find it and apply it. I was astonished the other day to hear an hon. member refer to the 30,000 unemployed—and I am not sure whether they were in Nova Scotia or in the maritime provinces.

An hon. MEMBER: The maritimes.

Mr. SHAW: Even as applied to the maritimes, it is still an astonishing situation for us to view at this time. If one makes allowance for unemployment resulting from strikes, we are still left with a most astonishing situation.

I well recall two or three years ago, and more particularly just before the last election, when we had showered upon us those grandiose promises with respect to full employment. I am reminded of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), who, not long before the last election, wrote in these words:

> Full employment is the declared policy of the government, and I for one am confident that as a nation we have the capacity to obtain that objective and to maintain it.

I cannot read those words with the same fervour with which the minister would utter them. Nevertheless, what he said is perfectly clear. And commenting editorially upon those words of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the publication in which it was found said this:

> Full employment is the declared policy of the government which means that work must be found for all; as the public welfare is the government's first responsibility.

In even more specific language, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is reported as follows in the same publication:

> 1. Full employment is the avowed and declared policy of the government.
> 2. Most intensive studies and plans have been instituted in order that this objective may be attained.
> 3. —

And this is the most important one.

> —the most informed economic advisers are of the opinion that a policy of full employment is one within our capacity to achieve.

And that was written under this title, "What can be done in the name of war must be done during peace," and the subtitle is, "Public welfare must come first."

Mr. BENTLEY: Is that a Liberal speech?

Mr. SHAW: Yes, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. MARTIN: Is the hon. member aware that there are more men employed today, by a million, than there were in 1939?

Mr. SHAW: I am fully aware of that.

Mr. MARTIN: Refer to it, then.

Mr. SHAW: But it is not full employment, or at least not my idea of it, when we find 30,000 men in a small area seeking employment, and even having to migrate out of that area in order to live.

Mr. GRANT: That is wrong.

Mr. SHAW: The minister said that what they want is security. I agree. He said that they want a job to go to and nothing short of this must be provided, and that full employment is the pivot of the government's postwar plan.

I could fill the pages of Hansard with similar quotations emanating from cabinet ministers and other members of the Liberal party. I say to members of the Liberal party in whose constituencies unemployment might exist, you must be prepared to take whatever the unemployed are prepared to hand you; because you gave them those definite assurances. They cannot be expected to accept the excuses which some persons are so capable of manufacturing. Today labour enjoys its security, or semi-security as the case may be, only while engaged on the job, and only while in receipt of a pay cheque. I think it is recognized that if you stop that job, you stop the pay cheque, and you take from the individual everything, including his freedom.

Once you relegate the worker to that position he might well accept all that the anti-democratic or the subversive elements in the country or the community might be prepared to offer him. When the discussions respecting full employment were taking place in the house, and at the time of the last election, we made it clear that as an objective full employment was not necessarily the desirable thing. We contended that full employment, so long as it was useful and so long as it contributed to production so necessary to the life of the country, would have our support. But we also emphasized the fact that the only conditions under which full employment could be guaranteed would be those under which one would have the right to pick a chap up by the nape of the neck and throw him into any spot where you might find any kind of work for him. We find today a movement of persons out of the maritimes. I say they are migrating by virtue of economic compulsion. They have little opportunity of even surviving should they remain there and should conditions be permitted to exist under which they cannot find a useful type of employment.

I was interested in an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of April 18 with respect to this question of full employment. If my memory serves me correctly, the Ottawa Journal was one of those which gave a good deal of emphasis to the desirability and the possibility of full employment. Since that time, they have had either a change of editor or a change of heart. This is the editorial in part:

> "Full employment" in other words, is a phrase that should not be used in a democratic state, this for the reason that it is something which can be practised only in a totalitarian state. Under a totalitarian regime, where men are told where to work, and when and at what, workers can be moved in the mass from one area to another. Under a democratic regime that can't happen. Because it can't happen, loose "full employment" talk does harm—may in come cases be positively mischievous.

I mention that for two reasons. First, you guaranteed them full employment; you built up their hopes and you have not given it to them. Second, we cannot have as our ultimate objective full employment when that involves the necessity of an individual engaging in useless employment in order to secure his income. I should like to devote more time to that, but there are a number of other matters to which I wish to refer.

Referring now specifically to the budget and taxation, I think to anyone who is at all observant there is ample evidence of the inadequacy of the tax reductions indicated in the budget. I know that to those whose taxes were reduced such reductions are welcome. However, there is one aspect which I wish to emphasize. Under the stress of war the government of Canada imposed a great variety of taxes, including sales tax and nuisance taxes, upon our people. Canadians accepted them because of the war and because of the requirements of war. However, no attempt is now made to make substantial reductions in them. In my estimation there is nothing in the budget designed to reduce the cost of living for hundreds of thousands of Canadian people. Nothing is to be found in it which will permit a higher standard of living for those persons who were forgotten by the income tax reductions. There is a tremendous surge of criticism in this country with respect to the action of the government in imposing certain conditions because of the stress of war and then persisting in continuing those conditions after the war is over. If my memory serves me correctly the Income War Tax Act was introduced during another war, and assurance was given then that it was only for the duration of the war and only to meet very special conditions which had come into being as a result of the war.

In his budget the minister estimated government expenditures in excess of $2,000 million. As compared with 1946-47, this shows an approximate average percentage of reduction of nineteen per cent for the present year. I should like to compare that with 1939. If the figures which I have worked out are correct, for each dollar spent by the government in 1939 they now contemplate spending $3.80. The Canadian citizen finds himself in this position: for every dollar which he earned in 1939 he is now receiving approximately $2.80. The important aspect is that government spending has increased at a much more rapid rate than the national income.

The disturbing aspect of the whole thing is that while the national income may slip to lower levels, even to depression levels, government spending to a substantial degree has become fixed and will remain close to its present levels. It is recognized that, should a recession come in any pronounced degree, the government might resort to borrowing and debt redemption might not continue during such a period. In my estimation the real burden of the debt is the interest on the debt and the government feels morally bound to make those payments. We are already paying between $400 million and $500 million a year in interest. With a recession, with recourse to greater government borrowing, the burden of those interest charges might reach crushing proportions within this country. Interest is now taking between twenty and twenty-five per cent of all government collections. That is a tragic situation and, unless we adopt some other policy, we may find such conditions as would block Canada in any attempt she might make to have continued stability within the country.

I know that this house gave very little attention to the amendment moved by my leader (Mr. Low) to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In that amendment he advocated:

> The use of the national credit to meet at least some of the financial requirements for essential services; and, as a guarantee that this country shall not again be subjected to financial depression, to make available to each and all Canadian citizens a proper portion of purchasing power which shall not first pass through the usual channels of industry, this on a basis calculated to maintain a balance between effective purchasing power in the hands of consumers and the aggregate of the prices of goods available for sale.

I think it is becoming more obvious that in that rests a solution to many of the great financial problems which face this country today and which will face this country in far greater degree, I can assure you, sir, within the next two or three years.

[Mr. Shaw.]

I should like to refer to the statement made by the minister with respect to the revision of the income tax law. I have not as yet heard any reference made to this matter, but to me it is one of the important aspects of the budget. Referring to this, the minister said, as reported on page 2557 of Hansard:

> We have been busy during the past year upon the rewriting of our basic income tax law in an effort to improve its arrangement, to make it clearer and simpler, and to remove ambiguities and anomalies. Hon. members will, I think, be particularly pleased with the extent to which it will be less dependent upon the exercise of ministerial discretions.

The minister then stated that it was his intention to introduce, during this session, a bill embodying this general revision of income tax law. May I say I believe that every thinking member of this house—I am going on the assumption that they are all thinking members—realizes the absolute necessity of a revision of the Income War Tax Act. I submit that, above all else, that act must be so constructed as to prevent the possibility of the extension of special privileges through interpretation. It is my conviction that, as the act stands today, there is every possibility of special privileges being extended to certain persons because of the regulations and more particularly because of the interpretations.

It should be borne in mind at all times that, even if the act is made perfect, its successful operation will depend upon two other things which I wish to mention. In the first place, it is my contention that adequate finances should be provided in order to properly staff the income tax offices. It is my opinion that you cannot possibly secure or hold the services of competent men unless you are prepared to pay them sufficient to make these positions attractive. I believe that if the facts were known we would realize that competent men are walking out of these offices almost every day. It would be interesting if the minister would table figures with respect to the labour turnover in the income tax offices.

In the second place, unless they establish salary schedules in these offices and adhere to these schedules they are going to strike a blow at the morale of the personnel in the service of the Department of National Revenue, and I lay special emphasis on the income tax division. We all know that appointments to the national revenue department are not made through the civil service commission. I personally think that is wrong. I know that, as the civil service commission is at present constituted and with its limited authority, it works under tremendous handicaps. There is altogether too much opportunity for interference in their deliberations. In fact, once before I brought evidence before the house to show that the commission had made appointments of persons who, to use a crude expression, were kicked out of the service because they were not acceptable to the person who happened to be in charge of a particular branch.

I want to emphasize this, too, that if there is any department of government where the door is open to the charge of political patronage, that department is the Department of National Revenue, and I say that because they ignore the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Let me make it perfectly clear that I am not making any charge. I am not saying that is the case, but I am saying the door is wide open. The employees they now have in that department must feel most insecure, and they can be made to feel much more insecure if they realize that their seniority and their ability are being ignored by the department. I do not care to say more about that at the moment except this. When the time comes for a revision of the Income War Tax Act, I say, by all means refer it to some committee of the house for careful examination. I would go a step farther and say, refer to that committee also the Excess Profits Tax Act. I should like to know something about some of the decisions made by the board of referees in determining standard profits. I should like to see that act and that specific section of the act considered by any committee of this house at the appropriate time.

Since my time is fleeting rapidly, I must leave out a number of matters to which I was going to refer. I come directly now to the amendment and the subamendment.

The hon. member for Peace River has already pointed out that, if the rules of the house did not forbid it, this group would move an amendment as soon as one of those now before us is disposed of. Our amendment would have been more constructive than either of those we are now considering. However we find ourselves in substantial agreement with the criticisms contained in both the subamendment and the amendment. Let me hasten to say this. I wish to make it abundantly clear that, while we are in substantial agreement with what is contained in the subamendment and the amendment, we are not subscribing to all that was said by the sponsors of these amendments. In fact we would be the first to condemn certain things that were said, such as the reference of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) to the fact that interest rates were too low. I quote that only as an example.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The hon. member is one of the fairest men in this house, and I want to ask him this question. Will he be good enough to read what I said about interest rates? If he does he will find that all I said was that I questioned whether low interest rates were a panacea for everything. I pointed out that they bore hard on certain elements in the community. But as for advocating higher interest rates the hon. member will find that I did not do that at all.

Mr. SHAW: I should not like to attribute anything wrongly to the hon. member. What he said was:

> Fifty years ago the man who retired with a modest competency could get five or six per cent on it and he could reckon on living the rest of his life upon the proceeds. What happens today when he receives three per cent? And he is lucky if he gets that.
> I believe that when we are considering this matter of the low-interest rate policy—and I know it is difficult, though it is attractive from the government's point of view—when, I say, we are considering this low-interest rate policy I suggest that this very important factor be taken into consideration—it is very important indeed—that there are large elements in the community who are suffering greatly by that policy. One other thing I would like to say in this connection. I would ask whether we can go on freeing other things and leaving the rate of interest tied down tight. Personally I very much doubt it and I think it is a matter worthy of the most serious consideration.

If the hon. member says that he did not intend that we would have to increase interest rates I am prepared to accept his word, but I read what he said very carefully and drew that conclusion, and I think the house drew the same conclusion from his remarks.

To turn again to the subamendment and the amendment, the hon. member for Peace River placed quite fully before the house our views on hidden and indirect taxes. No government speaker has in the slightest degree shown why there could not have been at least $50 million reduction in these taxes for the coming year. Such a reduction would have been quite possible without endangering Canada's financial stability or without running the year's operations into a deficit, even if the government persists in running affairs under the present antiquated financial arrangement. We would consider this a good start on the road of progressive tax reduction; this country would have witnessed an almost immediate reduction in the cost of producing goods and services, and the cost of living would have been eased considerably. The government cannot successfully claim that it is concerned about the welfare of the Canadian people in the light of its failure to do what obviously it could have done to tackle the high cost of living problem. Therefore we support clause (a) of the Conservative amendment.

It is our opinion that the best way to encourage the development of our natural resources is to take whatever steps are necessary to provide a ready market for the production from these resources at prices that will return to those engaged in mining, agriculture and so forth, a fair margin of profit over the years. The best market that we have for our goods is the one that is most neglected—the home market. It is quite obvious that there is nothing in the budget designed to expand and develop this internal market, and therefore our mining, lumbering, fishing, and farming interests are forced to scramble for foreign markets with all their uncertainties and problems. Therefore, with the second part of the Conservative amendment we must agree.

With regard to dominion-provincial relations, the leader of this group placed our position squarely on record in the debate on the address. Certainly this government has failed utterly to achieve unity in Canada and to secure the cooperation of all the provinces in working out a programme of social security, health, and public investment. It is quite evident that the concept of federal democracy held by the Liberal government is not one which makes for united effort toward a new order in Canada. Most of the provinces resent and fear the strong centralization tendencies which they have seen in the Liberal government. Most of them view with considerable anxiety the trend toward international centralization and the surrender by this government to an international authority of portions of our sovereignty, which action is bound to affect the rights and autonomies of the provinces themselves. The dominion-provincial conference machinery should be well on the way toward a complete restatement of the rights and authorities of the various governments in this country. Instead of that, what do we find? Ill feeling, division, and lack of united purpose. Under the circumstances, therefore, we must agree with the third part of the Conservative amendment.

And now a word about the C.C.F. subamendment. This simply adds two further parts to the Conservative amendment. With regard to the first, this group has consistently advocated increasing the exemptions under the Income War Tax Act. We think another step should have been taken this year. There is no reason why at least another $50 million could not have been taken off the taxpayers in the lower brackets, because it is perfectly clear that at the end of this year the government will come through with another handsome surplus, one which they have no right to accumulate so long as the people are carrying the heavy burden of taxes which they are carrying. If we look at the matter from the purely orthodox point of view, something most certainly could have been done to relieve the people of the burden of this terrible tax. If the government could be persuaded to adopt an honest financial system, there is not any question about our being able to increase exemptions to $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 to married ones in this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. SHAW: If I could have just about one minute I could finish my remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SHAW: In fact it would be made easier by adopting what I shall call the honest financial system, but it could be done under the present one. This we are prepared to prove beyond all shadow of doubt.

The second part of the C.C.F. subamendment needs little comment. We find ourselves in agreement with it, because, as I have already stated, this budget has meant nothing at all to the larger half of our population who are exempt from income tax imposition. It is a disgrace and a reflection on the intelligence of the people of this day that half the population should have to pay the price they are paying for the goods they must have out of incomes that are so low that they do not come above the $750 and $1,500 exemption levels. This great group of Canadians could very well have been assured reasonable security through the retention of subsidies on milk and butter and some other essentials of living. They would have been assisted materially had this government tackled the problem of indirect taxes as I have already shown that they could have tackled it. We find ourselves, therefore, in support of both the subamendment and the amendment and shall vote accordingly.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES RESPECTING MUTUAL INTERCHANGE OF PATENT RIGHTS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wonder whether I could have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions for the purpose of tabling a certain agreement evidenced by an exchange of notes? I should have done it at three o'clock, but I did not have the document before me at that time It is an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States recording an agreement for the mutual interchange of patent rights in connection with RDX and other explosive compounds which were developed during the war years by our honorary council for scientific and industrial research in Canada; and by the office of scientific research and development in the United States. Those that were developed in the United States were registered first in Washington; those developed in Canada were registered first in Ottawa, but the agreement is for the use without royalty by both governments of the whole process evidenced in this series of patents.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that this is a further step in the defence collaboration between Canada and the United States.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is a continuation of the close collaboration that there was in this scientific field during the war years.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

WORKMEN'S CIRCLE OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 180, to incorporate Workmen's Circle of Canada—Mr. Croll—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I may remind hon. members that this bill received its second reading and was referred to the committee on banking and commerce and has been reported by that committee without amendment.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN COUNCIL OF THE GIRL GUIDES ASSOCIATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 206, incorporating the Canadian Council of the Girl Guides Association—Mr. Ross (St. Paul's)—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the committee that this bill was referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills and was reported from that committee without amendment.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NURSES' ASSOCIATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 171, to incorporate Canadian Nurses' Association—Mr. Benidickson—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1 —Incorporation.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: I did not speak on the second reading of this bill, Mr. Chairman, but I think many hon. members will envy me the privilege of being sponsor of the incorporation of an association whose merits are so well known as those of the Canadian Nurses' Association, as it has existed for some thirty-five years. The members of the association are the members of the various provincial associations, who, under the laws of the several provinces, become registered nurses. That group consists of 24,000 people and, after its long history, these people have decided for certain purposes that they would like to have incorporation by the federal parliament.

They publish a newspaper known as The Canadian Nurse, and in the course of their development there will be the acquisition of certain property. It is felt by the members that the time has come, after an existence of thirty-five years, when personal liability on the part of their officers and so on should be eliminated and they should have the right of incorporation.

The purposes of the organization are analogous to those of many other professional societies such as the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Medical Association, the national association that has been formed by engineers in the various provinces, and so forth. I could give other illustrations.

I should like for the record to indicate the objects as set out in the bill, which are those that constitute the background for the present formal incorporation in the Canadian parliament:

(a) to dignify the profession of nursing by maintaining and improving the ethical and professional standards of nursing education and service;

(b) to encourage its members to participate in affairs promoting the public welfare;

(c) to promote the best interests of the nurses of Canada and to maintain national unity among them;

(d) to encourage an attitude of mutual understanding with the nurses of other countries.

The common and general terms under section (e):

(e) such other lawful acts and things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects.

There is in the proposed charter nothing which in any way interferes with or encroaches upon the provincial associations that have been incorporated in the different provinces, or with provincial legislation. As a matter of fact, a prerequisite to membership in the national organization is acceptance under the provincial laws into the provincial association.

We all realize that the provinces are jealous, and properly so, of their jurisdiction, their provincial autonomy and the protection of civil rights within each province, and I simply wish to assure hon. members that, if each province decides that a nurse may be accepted within the regulations of that provincial organization, such nurse will in turn become a member of the Canadian Nurses' Association and receive copies of the admirable paper put out by this organization, which in turn will help to achieve the objectives I have enunciated.

Mr. CHURCH: I rise not to oppose but rather to support the principle of this bill, but I should like to point out certain aspects of the matter with which it deals. The promoters are all good people who are a credit to their profession. It took the medical profession of Canada nearly thirty years to form the Canadian Medical Association, and I know something of the difficulties that beset such organizations. I know something about the questions that nurses have to cope with, having been chairman, with the late Mr. Thomas Bradshaw, of the hospital commission in our city.

One difficulty of a national nurses' organization relates to contracts between employer and employee, property and civil rights within the province, and things of that sort. The situation in regard to nurses has undergone a complete change. If you applied for a registered nurse tonight in Toronto you would find it almost impossible to get one, that is to say, someone who has taken the course. Moreover, hospitals have a great deal of difficulty in providing rooms. One floor in the big hospital in Toronto has been closed. The city provided the site for that hospital, and has very largely to help to maintain it with capital and per diem allowances. There have been large capital expenditures in connection with every hospital in the city; just the other day there was a capital expenditure of $250,000 in connection with a smaller hospital.

During the war a great many nurses went into the armed forces, and there grew up a type of nurse called a practical nurse. What is a practical nurse? The common definition is that a practical nurse is one who has just learned by experience, without having had very much training. They might have been employed as maids, or in any one of a number of other occupations, but they turned themselves into what they called practical nurses and charged $6 a day. Well, think of three practical nurses, each receiving $6 a day, together with free room and board and all the rest of it. No working man can afford to pay that.

Then I want to point to the good work that has been done by the St. John Ambulance Corps and the Victorian Order of Nurses. I have no objection at all to the principle of this bill. I had a talk with the minister of health about it. I understand that he was somewhat opposed to it, but I do not know because he never told me; one of the members of the committee told me. Did these people, as promoters of this bill, ever consult the hospitals? Every qualified nurse is on a register, of which there are five or six in our city, and most of them are connected with a hospital. The promoters of this bill never consulted the hospitals, and as far as I know they never consulted the medical officers of health of the municipalities or the provinces. Formerly the provinces did not pay very much attention or give much of a per diem or capital to hospitals, which were maintained largely by private organizations of one kind or another, and most of them with capital aid and maintenance of cities and towns. The city of Toronto made a grant of so much a day for each patient; I think it used to be fifty cents, then $1.50, but now I understand it has gone up to $2 or $2.25, and in addition they have had, in the case of Toronto, to make large capital grants to all hospitals. Here in this parliament we used to spend only about $200,000 on the health department. Before the war that went up to about $475,000, and now they are trying to expand it still more. So far so good, but of course it is impossible for this government to give anything to hospitals by way of maintenance or capital expenditure. The time has come when it will have to. The situation is serious for the working man, because he cannot afford to pay for this nursing service and hospitalization. For that reason the work of the St. John Ambulance Corps and the Victorian Order of Nurses is important. A medical doctor sees the patient, and then a qualified nurse comes once a week to look after him, at a charge of only $2. The Victorian Order of Nurses also did a great deal of good work during the war.

While I do not object to the principle of this bill, I think it might have been left over in order that some correspondence might be had with the federal, provincial and municipal medical health officers and with the provinces and the hospital authorities, because this is a matter concerning relations between federal and provincial authorities, which should be the subject of a dominion-provincial conference. It is one of the most important things we have to consider, because one of the first duties of a government is to look after the health, wealth, happiness and prosperity of our citizens. I do not oppose the bill; I have been told that the provinces have consented to it. But the provinces are not the hospitals, and I think the hospitals and also the medical officers of health and the medical schools should have been consulted. In addition to that, I notice that some of the incorporators come from other provinces. I want the bill surrounded with proper safeguards, and I want it understood that if this resolution passes it will not interfere with the St. John Ambulance Corps, the Victorian Order of Nurses or any nurse who is prepared to make her services available.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am so glad the hon. member for Broadview is 100 per cent behind this bill. The province of British Columbia appreciates his cooperation and support. I think the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) made an able presentation. I happen to be an ex officio member of the nurses' association of British Columbia; and I hope that some time the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the hon. member for Broadview, both of whom have an unenviable status, will come out and get to know the members of that association as I know them.

If there is to be any talking out in connection with this bill I give warning that I will talk out every bill introduced from every other province during the present session. I would only disagree with the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River on one point, and that is when he compares the high standards of members of the bar and of the medical profession with those of the nursing profession. I want to assure my hon. friend that neither he nor any other member of his profession can ever hope to attain such high standards as those maintained by the nurses in Canada.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: I should like to say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley that the hon. member for Broadview has, in fact, been very considerate. He spoke to me before the house met this evening; he had some queries as to the status of the St. John Ambulance Corps and practical nurses, and I want to assure him and all other hon. members that there is no intention to interfere in any way with the status of those organizations or persons. I also want to say that the nurses are organized provincially, and that each provincial organization has seen the proposed constitution and has approved it. My hon. friend has also indicated some connection in an ex officio capacity with the nurses' association. I want to say it has always been a matter of great pride on my part that my mother was a member of the nursing profession of Ontario.

EVELYN FLORENCE ESSON PUGH

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg, for Mr. Maybank) moved the second reading of Bill No. 207, for the relief of Evelyn Florence Esson Pugh.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all suggest that no doubt divorce legislation is farthest from the mind of the hon. member who is moving second reading, in the absence of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank). I am sure the hon. member would be the last to wish to have his name associated with this, and the following bills.

It is not my intention this evening to speak at length about divorce. I would point out, however, that on June 21, 1946, the then minister of justice, in an effort to find a solution for this vexed problem which has been drawn to the attention of both houses on many occasions in recent times, had this to say, as reported at page 2713 of Hansard for last session:

> I have suggested to hon. members of parliament concerned with this that there might be some other solution that would not set up divorce as a matter of right but would largely relieve parliament of the inconvenient features of the practice now going on. The courts of the province of Quebec pronounce decrees of separation for adultery. If parliament were to say, "We will not consider an application unless it is supported by a decree of separation based upon a finding of adultery," then the committee of parliament would not have to go beyond looking at the documentary evidence.

Since then I cannot recall having had any report from the then minister of justice, who is now Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), with respect to his investigation as to the possibility of the solution he suggested should be advanced at that time.

Perhaps at some stage in the debate, or on some similar situation—and I raise the matter now because we have almost reached the end of the time alloted to private members—the Secretary of State for External Affairs would give the house some ideas as to the results of his investigations.

There was one further matter I wished to bring to the attention of the house. I had hoped that the minister, in collaboration with the former minister, might have reached some solution, because upon looking over the statutes for last session I find that almost a third of the space in that volume, which I now hold in my hand, deals with matters in which the average individual finds little interest. I refer to the 289 acts dealing with divorce at that session. From the point of view of the cumbersome nature of the statutes themselves, and indeed from every other possible angle, it seems to me desirable that something be done to find a more satisfactory means of dealing with a problem which in recent years has become so vexed.

I am told that divorce applications at this session of parliament may reach an all-time high. While last year there were 289, if my memory serves me correctly there are at this session already before the senate no fewer than 406 applications for divorce. I would suppose that before the close of the session those bills will have reached the House of Commons, and it will be expected that they will become law.

I have no desire to raise my voice unduly in this matter, nor have I done so during the years, but I earnestly implore the government, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to do something in this matter. Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs would speak to us concerning the possibilities which at that time he considered were bright, but which, upon further investigation, he may have found quite different.

I would close my remarks by asking someone in the government to take this matter up, to see if there is not some slim ray of hope whereby parliament may be relieved of this vexatious job which has been entrusted to it under the present laws of the dominion.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have watched the grave defects in this type of legislation, which we find in great abundance after every great war. The wives and children deserted are the ones who suffer. I suggest that during the recess the government or state should give consideration to that feature of the problem.

I believe that the Anglican Bishop of London, England, is expected to visit Ottawa shortly. Over there, for the first time in 350 years, they are about to change the divorce laws. A royal commissioner was appointed by the Archbishop of York, and some changes have been recommended. I hope the government will study that report. The right hon. the Bishop of London, Doctor Wand, recommends "reconciliation" and "forgiveness" as part of the programme. Reconciliation, he says, is a most important remedy and forgiveness is a healing force.

As I have said before, I believe county court judges could handle divorce more effectively, with cheaper divorces resulting. Judges of the high court are sick and tired of it. Before Christmas and before June, three or at times four judges must try divorce cases in the city hall at Toronto, to help clean up the list. The wives and children are the ones who suffer in these cases, and I hope something will be done about the matter. A civil registration system is also a remedy. Under Roman law marriage was a contract.

The royal commission in England was presided over by the Archbishop of York. I hope the government will study the report to see if the state cannot do something to relieve the great social wrong done the wives and children who are left very largely as a charge on the municipality and on their friends.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, if we were to allow ourselves to think of this list of homes broken up through misunderstanding we might come to the conclusion that it is a disaster for home life in Canada. But when one compares this list with the list of fine Christian homes in this country, he finds it is only a small percentage. I know of homes where young men were married before they went overseas. They came back, bought their homes and called in their minister who dedicated those homes. Those are happy homes.

I think we should emphasize strongly the outstanding number of Christian homes which are telling their own story through what they are sending out by way of clean character in our young men and maidens.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a word apropos of what was said by the hon. member who introduced the subject this evening. Anyone who has given thought to the subject must come to the conclusion that divorce has reached enormous proportions in this country. But I differ from the first speaker this evening when he endeavours to lay blame on the dominion government, either for the method in which divorce proceedings are carried on, or for the divorce actions themselves.

It is true, as he said, that the statute books are thick. I do not know how many members understand just how carefully the committee of the senate investigates every case which comes before it. I do not know of any court in this land which is giving more consideration — and serious consideration — to divorce, than is the senate committee. I am surprised to hear hon. members suggest that bills are being passed through parliament without any thought. Let us be fair in regard to the matter. Any hon. members who are in doubt can go over and see for themselves how carefully this work is done. There are those who speak about giving the senate more work to do. I am not a bit alarmed about the work they are doing.

All this does not touch the problem of divorce. This is one of the most serious problems facing this country. It is a problem which will have to be faced by the people of Canada, by the churches and by the provincial governments. I rose in case any thought was in the minds of hon. members that what we were doing here was condoning divorce or that no consideration was given to divorce bills coming before the senate committee. I think everyone will agree that as between the courts of this land and the senate committee there is more fairness, justice, consideration and investigation in connection with the work of the committee than in connection with the work of any courts in this country.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have listened most attentively to what has been said by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). It would be quite illuminating to have a list of petitions for divorce which have been presented to the senate and the number of petitions granted. I am ready to give the benefit of the doubt to the hon. gentlemen of the senate, but what seems strange to me is that very few of the applications are turned down. Some day I may ask a question about the matter and the answer may be a surprise to us.

When these matters come before the civil courts the judges question the witnesses and these investigators who are paid so much to look through keyholes and who always give the same evidence. They have a hard time before the courts; but, according to the reports of the senate committee, their evidence is always the same. It is only about two or three pages long; the same questions are asked and the senators seem to take for granted that the application—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that he should use the words "other house" or "members of the other house."

Mr. POULIOT: I did not understand what Your Honour said.

Mr. KNOWLES: Refer to it as the other house.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes, the other house.

Mr. KNOWLES: Call it anything you like, but not the senate.

Mr. POULIOT: If I use the expression "other house" I know hon. members will understand what I mean or whom I mean. I wonder if the gentlemen of the other house could not at times take a more conciliatory attitude instead of listening so attentively—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They should look through the keyholes themselves.

Mr. POULIOT: —to what is said by the investigators? I wonder if they could not try to do something to bring together those who may have differences that are really not as bad as described by the lawyers? That is done by the judges. They try to bring married couples together who have some differences, and quite often they are successful. Then the committee of the other house can do nothing with regard to the children because the rights of children are supposed to be civil rights. Therefore, when a divorce is granted the children become like orphans of the storm, which is very sad and pitiful. I admire the earnestness of my colleague in expressing the sincere wish that we have fewer cases of this kind, and in that we have the support of all the churches. I hope the churches will join together in trying to bring about a satisfactory solution of this matter.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

OTTAWA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. W. M. BENIDICKSON (Kenora-Rainy River) moved the second reading of Bill No. 241, respecting the Ottawa Electric Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

PROVISION TO MAKE INFORMATION AVAILABLE TO SENATE AND COMMONS

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my remarks on this bill will be brief. Subsection 1 of section 81 of the Income War Tax Act, reads as follows:

No person employed in the service of His Majesty shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto, any information obtained under the provisions of this act, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under the provisions of this act.

This is the section which has frequently been referred to in this house, particularly by successive ministers of national revenue, when replying to questions that hon. members have asked or have placed upon the order paper seeking information with respect to income tax returns. I have in mind in particular advertising by large corporations, about which some of us have inquired as to whether or not it was allowable as an expense for income tax purposes, and other questions of a similar nature.

In order to get around this iron curtain of secrecy, it seems to me that there should be a provision to make it possible for hon. members to ask questions and to get answers from the minister concerned, and for that reason I am suggesting the addition of certain words to the subsection which I have just read. In fact that is what this bill does. It simply adds these words:

Provided that nothing in this subsection shall operate to prevent a minister of the crown from communicating to the Senate or to the House of Commons any information obtained under the provisions of this act.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me correctly, a similar bill was introduced by my hon. friend last year. My remarks like his will be brief. I feel that I shall have to oppose the bill because I do not think the amendment he suggests is in the public interest. I had not expected that this bill would come up this evening and the objections which I have to the amendment I would want to elaborate at some length. Perhaps my hon. friend and the house would have no objections, therefore, if I were now allowed to move the adjournment of the debate. I so move.

On motion of Mr. Abbott the debate was adjourned.

AERONAUTICS ACT

PROVISION FOR SEPARATION OF AIR LINES FROM RAILWAY OWNERSHIP

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to help the government carry out its own policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to notice that my helpfulness is so deeply appreciated on the opposite side.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is noted for the first time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Look a gift horse in the mouth, gentlemen.

Mr. KNOWLES: Back in 1944 the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), then minister of munitions and supply, announced the government's intention with respect to a civil aviation policy with particular reference to the post-war period. One of the cardinal features of that policy was contained in these words which I quote from the speech which the minister made in this house on March 17, 1944:

Steps will be taken to require our railways to divest themselves of ownership of air lines, to the end that, within a period of one year from the ending of the European war, transport by air will be entirely separate from surface transportation.

That statement of policy was later incorporated into law by chapter 28 of the statutes of 1944-45, by adding a clause 14 to the Aeronautics Act. That clause provided that all licences then in effect under part 3 of the Transport Act, 1938, or under part 7 of the air regulations, 1938, should cease to be valid "one year after the termination, as fixed by order in council, of the war in Europe—"

Mr. SPEAKER: I must inform the hon. member that on the second reading he must not refer to the clauses of the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not referring to the clauses of my bill, Mr. Speaker. I am discussing the principle of the bill, and I am reading from a clause of the statutes of Canada. The words I was just now reading appear in the statute, not in my bill; in fact, they are the very words I seek to have altered. That is the whole purpose of my bill. I will finish reading the clause: "shall cease to be valid one year after the termination, as fixed by order in council, of the war in Europe which commenced on the tenth day of September, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-nine".

There was another clause in that same statute of 1944—the act was passed in July of that year—which provided that, from the coming into force of that act, licences to operate commercial air services could not be issued to any company that provided transportation by means other than by air. That was clause 12 (2). In other words, the government's policy was put into statutory form by the bill that we passed in the session of 1944. Some of us waited for some considerable time after that for that policy to come into effect, and finally in August, 1946, I questioned the minister about the matter and asked when it was going to be put into effect and was told by him that the policy had been changed. When I first asked about it I was told about an order in council that did not exist, but we have been over all that ground before and I shall not cover it again. I want to read this one passage from what the minister said in this house on August 17, 1944:

Mr. Howe: I said that the date of applying the policy had been advanced one year by the government; and I was giving my own opinions, as minister responsible for the services, that the policy announced on that date was not the policy which would give best service to the public in the area. That is my own opinion. The government policy has not been changed, and will not be changed, naturally, until the act is changed. The House of Commons must approve any change of policy, because this house passed the act which established the earlier government policy.

My contention, Mr. Speaker, is this, that the house put into statute form the policy which the government had announced in March, 1944. That policy called for divesting of the ownership of air lines from railways within one year after the end of the war in Europe. That was the clear understanding of the minister himself, as he so stated. It is down in black-and-white in Hansard that that meant one year after May 8, 1945. Subsequently, it has been contended by the government that legally, for the purposes of this act, the war is not yet over in Europe and will not be over until an order in council has been passed fixing the date. That, in other words, puts off as a movable feast the time when this policy is to be brought into effect.

The purpose of the bill the second reading of which I now move is to bring some finality into this matter and make it clear whether this policy is to be put into effect or, if not, whether it is to be changed in the proper way, by an amendment to the Aeronautics Act. Hence the only change that Bill No. 21 makes is to take out those words to which I have referred as a movable feast and put in a definite date, namely, December 31, 1947. The effect of inserting that date in clause 14 would be to make that the final date upon which the government's policy announced in March, 1944, shall be brought into effect.

I contend that this whole question of our air services, particularly in relation to the development of the great new frontier in the northern part of this country, is an extremely important one. I contend that what is involved in it is not just a matter of the relations between private air lines and the publicly-owned system, but there is involved the whole question of whether we are to develop our northland in an integrated and responsible way. For that reason I feel that we should move on to some clear-cut position with respect to our civil aviation policy. It is for that reason I present this bill to the house. If it passes it will take us out of the present position which leaves the implementing of the government's policy as a movable feast changing from year to year, and inserts instead a definite date for its achievement.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): My hon. friend opened his remarks by saying that he was trying to help the government. Perhaps I can be equally kind to him and say that the government has no particular objection to this bill. The purpose that the bill attempts to achieve has already been accomplished. All the fifty-three licences granted under the Aeronautics Act of 1938 have in fact been cancelled and reissued.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOWE: Some two or three weeks ago I tabled in this house a voluminous report of the air transport board made after a study and examination at public hearings of all the fifty-three routes. I also tabled the order in council approving the reissuing of licences for several of the routes, and the air transport board has from time to time issued licences for routes not covered by the first mentioned order in council.

The board of transport commissioners was formed in 1944. Its purposes were set out at that time. It was to act not only as a judicial body to adjudicate on disputes in the field of aviation, but also as an advisory body to assist the minister in determining aviation policy. Pursuant to its second function, it made an exhaustive study of all existing air routes in Canada. Hearings were held in all the principal cities, and the facts bearing on all the licences then outstanding were reviewed. The net result was that the board recommended that routes be divided into two classifications. The first classification includes routes that require extensive equipment and expensive aids to navigation, demand accurately scheduled services and, in short, require a long pocket-book for their operation. The routes so designated were the following:

In the province of Quebec, a route from Montreal to Quebec city, Chicoutimi, Forestville, Mont Joli, Baie Comeau and Seven islands, with a possible extension to Port Menier on Anticosti island.

In northwestern Ontario and Manitoba, from Winnipeg to Red Lake, Ontario, Kenora, Sioux Lookout and Pickle lake.

In northern Manitoba and northeast Saskatchewan, between Winnipeg, Dauphin, Le Pas and Flin Flon, in coordination with and using the same kind of equipment as required for the route in northwestern Ontario.

In Saskatchewan, from Regina, connecting Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Prince Albert and North Battleford.

In Alberta and the Northwest Territories, from Edmonton to Fort McMurray, Fort Smith and Yellowknife, and to provide a direct air service to Vancouver from the Northwest Territories; a route from Yellowknife to Prince George, British Columbia, via Hay river, Vermilion, Peace river and Grande Prairie, Alberta; and third, to connect with the Yukon and Alaska, a route from Edmonton via Grande Prairie, to Fort St. John on the northwest staging route.

In British Columbia and the Yukon, from Vancouver, up through the centre of the province, to Prince George and Fort St. John, and thence up the northwest staging route to Fort Nelson, Watson lake, British Columbia, Whitehorse, Mayo and Dawson City, Yukon Territory.

On the coast of British Columbia, from Vancouver, connecting to Nanaimo and Port Hardy on Vancouver island, Sandpit on the Queen Charlotte islands, and Prince Rupert on the mainland.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister permit one question about these routes?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: In view of section 12 (2), which says that the board cannot issue these licences to railway companies unless the governor in council is of the opinion that it is in the interest of Canada, has that opinion been expressed in all these cases?

Mr. HOWE: I was just coming to that. After a very careful canvass of the situation, the conclusion has been reached that the services along the routes which I have just mentioned should continue to be furnished by Canadian Pacific Air Lines, which is in fact, at the present time, the only available carrier that is willing and able, and can adequately serve the present and future public convenience and necessity along the routes described.

Pursuant to that finding of the board, a recommendation was placed before the governor in council and an order in council was issued confirming the finding of the board. That order in council was tabled in parliament some weeks ago. That is the action which has been taken with seven of the fifty-three routes. The other routes were of a different nature. For the most part they require to be operated on skis or on floats and demand less accurate scheduling than the routes I have mentioned. These latter routes were separated from the Canadian Pacific and have been issued to other applicants. Time does not permit me to detail a list of the operators that have been confirmed on the secondary routes; but I may say that, in general, all companies wishing to enter into the business of commercial aviation in this country have been allocated terrorities which the board believes will permit earnings sufficient to maintain their operation and return a profit. In proof of this, I may say that, generally speaking, commercial air lines other than the T.C.A. in 1946 returned a substantial over-all profit to the operators and, I believe, gave excellent service to the persons in the territory which they served.

For the first time in Canada we have a stable aviation industry, an industry that is amply self-supporting, and one that offers opportunity to the returned man to establish himself in a profitable business.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but the hour for public and private bills having expired the house will resume the debate which was proceeding before six o'clock.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. H. W. TIMMINS (Parkdale): Like those who have preceded me in this debate, I should like to add a few words of commendation to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in respect of the presentation of his budget. It was the first budget to which I have listened. It was a comprehensive budget presented with clarity and brevity—perhaps too much brevity; but it was done in excellent style. Those of us who listened to it could comprehend it as he went along. The budget was presented some time ago, in fact, on April 29 last. Perhaps the house will bear with me if I, as a newcomer, make a reflection in respect of the fact that almost a month has gone by since the budget was presented to the house. A number of hon. members have spoken since that time. Some four months of the year had gone before the budget was brought down in 1947. As a matter of fact, the minister budgeted for an expected surplus of some $190 million. Taken all in all, a great part of the year has gone by and there is not much that can be done about the matter of taxation of the people for budget purposes in 1947.

Possibly all that has been said could have been said by seven or eight members from each of the parties because, in addition to the budget which is the means by which parliament gets the taxes to run the country during the year, we have also to deal with the estimates which provide the procedure for spending the money. Since we are expected to protect the people in respect of the spending of money during 1947, and since it is in the interest of the national economy and of the reduction of the national debt that we should deal rather extensively with the estimates, the extra time taken on the budget time might well be spent in dealing with the estimates in a proper way instead of rushing them through at the end of the session.

Those of us who are newcomers here expect some leadership from the treasury benches in stream-lining the work of the house so that it may be got through in proper time. After all, the people do not expect us to be professional politicians. They do not expect us to come here to make our living as members of parliament. They expect us to be responsible businessmen and citizens apart from our duties here. If I might make the suggestion, it was rather late in the session for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to bring down the legislative agenda which is yet to come before the house, as he presented it to us on Wednesday last. Perhaps I am the only one in the house who does not know it, but I should like to know whether there is not in the house some steering committee that could steer the legislation through the house in order that we might expedite matters and make some progress.

To get back to the budget of 1947; I should like to take a quick look at that budget and consider some features of it. As I say, it was presented with clarity. It appeared obvious, from the minister's remarks, that we had a surplus of $362 million in 1946. When we looked into it more carefully, however, we found that there was no surplus at all, that there had been a special sale of war assets and other moneys had been received, so that $372 million had been acquired. As a matter of fact, taken by and large, there was not a surplus at all, but a deficit of $10 million. There is no use wasting time in talking about a matter that is past, but the fact is that the people of Canada came to think there was a surplus, whereas in reality there was not a surplus in 1946.

I had the temerity to read the budget speech of the former minister of finance in 1946, and one of the things that impressed me in that comprehensive budget speech was that he emphasized the dire results that would ensue if there was failure to implement the agreements between the dominion and the provinces. He emphasized the unfortunate position that industry would be put in. The then minister of finance made considerable reductions in connection with the excess war profits tax. He seemed to understand the impact of that tax in peace time and I believe he was acquiring a peace-time complex, which the present budget does not indicate.

Among other things, the present Minister of Finance touched upon the importance of dominion-provincial relations. He said, as reported at page 2547 of Hansard:

> The modified formulae for determining the amount of the annual payments to be made to the various provinces were the product of a most intensive study.

Further on, he said:

> Nevertheless, we do not ask any province to accept a tax agreement unless it believes such agreement to be in its own interest as well as that of the country as a whole.

That may be the feeling of the Minister of Finance, but I do not think it is the feeling of the country. I believe the country intends that there shall be leadership in this matter, which goes to the very root of unity. It is the most important matter that has been before the house last year and this year. I do not care what party one belongs to, we have to deal with the question, and it is not enough for the minister to say that a province can in its turn come in, or, if it does not wish to come in, the question will be left to it, in its best interest and in its decision, whether to stay out. That is not the point at all. We all know deep down in our souls that all provinces in the course of time have to come in and work with the dominion in respect of these agreements if we are to have a proper economic system in Canada which will work not only this year but in the years to come, and if we are to have the kind of social security the people demand. I leave that thought with the minister and he will hear from others besides myself. This conference has to be called, and it is only a question of time.

The minister says, as reported at page 2560 of Hansard, that he forecasts revenues of $2,450 million and expenditures of $2,100 million. My comment on that is that we are not getting very far away from the war-time budgets when we get a budget giving us this figure of $2,450 million.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend realizes that is before the reductions in taxes which I proposed.

Mr. TIMMINS: I appreciate what the minister says in that regard.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is at existing tax rates.

Mr. TIMMINS: I quite agree, but I say that we are too close to war-time budgets because, after all, the government says we are to have some social security measures and I presume we shall in the course of time. There is only one class of people who will have to pay for that social security, and that is the same old taxpayers who are carrying the load now. Therefore the sooner we get back to a peace-time budget and back to taxation that the people can pay, the better for all concerned.

The minister also announced in his budget an average rate of reduction of about twenty-nine per cent in 1947. Perhaps I am wrong; perhaps he did not say twenty-nine per cent in 1947. At any rate, he must have been reading "Alice In Wonderland", because the reductions in taxation do not start until the 1st of July, 1947. They are only for half a year, so that the average reduction to which he refers, in the year 1947, comes to only about 14½ per cent. You must call a spade a spade because that is the size of the reduction.

Further, the reduction of income taxation in 1948 is only a forecast. It is subject to a good many exigencies, some of which the minister has more or less indicated. There may be an unfortunate trade balance with the United States which may not allow the government to bring in the reductions.

Mr. ABBOTT: That will not increase the income tax. This will be the law in 1948 unless parliament changes it.

Mr. TIMMINS: This is only a forecast on the part of the minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: No. It becomes the law once this budget is adopted.

Mr. HOMUTH: It would not be the first time this government has changed its mind.

Mr. TIMMINS: I take the words of the minister himself that many other elements enter into the income tax for 1948, and I take it that those are factors which will influence the government on the question whether or not we shall have these reductions in 1948.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is made perfectly clear in the budget speech that the tax reductions apply to 1948 and the latter half of 1947, and the only uncertain element in 1948 would be what the taxes would yield or what our expenditures might be. There is no question about the reduction.

Mr. TIMMINS: I am not debating the question with the minister. I say there may be exigencies which may prevent the minister from getting the taxation he finds necessary in order to carry on for the coming year.

Mr. ABBOTT: To get the revenue; not the taxation.

Mr. TIMMINS: In the speech from the throne we read these words:

> Once suitable financial relationships have been arrived at with the provinces, my ministers have undertaken to seek, in a general conference or otherwise—

And I emphasize those words "or otherwise".

> —to work out satisfactory arrangements with the provinces in regard to public investment and social security measures.

The idea seems to have gone out that, once these tax agreements are entered into with the various provinces, as a matter of course social security measures are tied up with them, and that if some of the provinces hold out, social security is not going to come to the Dominion of Canada. Well, I have a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of April 23, 1947, containing the report of an address at Hawkesbury by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), in which he said:

> "Hawkesbury as a thriving industrial centre," said Mr. Martin, "has a vital interest in the social security plans of the Liberal government. If they are carried out as we hope they will be, these plans will bring to the families of this community a greater degree of security and a greater chance of happiness and well-being than they have ever had before."

From that speech one would think that the Liberal government had a social security plan which would be brought in, and that it was just around the corner.

I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the house to refer to some things that have been said by the various provincial premiers with respect to this matter of social security and these agreements. In the first place, the minister himself made it clear, when he spoke to the board of trade in Toronto some months ago, that the dominion government alone could not possibly assume the responsibilities which are involved in the social security and public investment proposals unless it had these great fields of income and corporation taxes and, further, that there would be further responsibility upon the various provinces in respect of the raising of funds for these particular services. Then on Monday, May 12, we had the pronouncement that the province of Nova Scotia was preparing to sign an agreement; but it was made clear that the premier of that province was approving that agreement on the basis of expediency. He pointed out in no uncertain terms that there were a great number of problems still to be dealt with. For instance, this report states:

Although Nova Scotia was taking steps to enter an agreement, Premier Macdonald saw many contingent difficulties and criticized federal authorities for approaching the problem in a manner which, in many respects, had been "unwise and unsound."

"I say that the idea of separate bargains with the provinces is wrong, and that great matters of this kind should be settled at a general conference between the dominion and all the provinces."

"The proposals of the dominion government in their latest form leave much to be desired and the methods followed by the dominion government leave even still more to be desired."

That is what the Premier of Nova Scotia had to say. Previously, on February 7 of this year, the same gentleman is reported as follows:

Premier Macdonald said his government's non-acceptance of the offer was "a matter of principle." He said Nova Scotia had two major objections, the first being Ottawa's insistence on retaining minor tax fields such as amusements and pari-mutuels. "You might as well do away with provincial governments if you leave them no power to levy taxes."

On a previous occasion the Premier of Nova Scotia said:

If the process of the dominion invading provincial tax fields were allowed to go on, "what is the end to be?" he asked. Can anyone deny that, if most of the revenues which the provinces are to enjoy are to be paid to them by the dominion, the time may not come—indeed, is it not likely that the time is sure to come—when the dominion will begin to say what use the provinces shall make of these revenues? When that day comes there will be an end to provincial autonomy.

Then this is what the Premier of Alberta had to say. I grant you that these tax agreements have now been signed, but the fundamental principle, the fact that in order for us to have unity in Canada we must have an economic system that will work this year and in the years to come, still has to be dealt with. The point I am trying to make is that it can be dealt with only by the parties concerned sitting around the conference table with the dominion, working all together in the interests of the dominion in order to bring about economic and social security agreements which will be for the benefit of the whole country. Of course the province of Alberta has already consented to sign an agreement, but this is what Premier Manning had to say:

The government desires to make it abundantly clear that such an agreement is in no sense a solution to the problem of dominion-provincial relations.

The proposed agreements do nothing more than provide for a redistribution of certain tax revenues under a formula which is neither scientific nor related in any way to the actual financial needs of the respective provinces. . . .

It leaves unsettled the whole question of constitutional reforms which are necessary in the light of modern circumstances, and does nothing to clarify the ambiguity that exists as to the lines of demarcation between dominion and provincial jurisdiction and responsibility.

. . . before the problem of dominion-provincial relations can be satisfactorily solved, agreement must be reached between the dominion and all of the provinces on a basis which is voluntarily acceptable and on terms which all parties to the agreement regard as reasonable and proper.

Any formula which fails to produce this broad measure of voluntary agreement falls short of that which is required to underwrite the stability of our national economy, irrespective of what temporary financial gains accrue to individual provinces.

I do not believe the matter could be better stated than in the words of the Premier of Alberta.

Then we in the house remember that on March 17 last the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when we might expect the conference to be convened. Referring to the correspondence with the premiers of the provinces, which he said contained several communications relating to the circumstances under which the conference should be reconvened, the Prime Minister replied:

The conditions set forth there have in the mind of the government not as yet been fulfilled. I am therefore not in a position to say at the moment when the conference will be reassembled.

I do not know what the mind of the government is, or whether or not it is going to change its mind. The people of Canada, no matter what their political proclivities may be, no matter to what political party they may belong, believe that there is a duty and responsibility upon the government and the treasury benches to call that conference, and to call it as quickly as possible, in order that these problems may be solved.

The first meeting of the dominion-provincial conference took place in August, 1945. The last meeting was on May 3, 1946, when the conference adjourned sine die upon motion of the then minister of finance. Mr. Macdonald, the Premier of Nova Scotia, was one of the most forceful among the premiers in stating that the dominion-provincial conference should be called again, as he put it, as a matter of principle and equity.

If I may refer to the correspondence on dominion-provincial relations tabled in the house, and particularly to page 30 thereof, one finds that the Premier of Nova Scotia is writing the Prime Minister under date of December 5, 1946, and, among other things, states:

> The government of Nova Scotia emphasizes its strong conviction that a general conference between representatives of the dominion and all of the provinces is the only proper forum for discussion of matters so grave and so important as this.

The fact of the matter is that it has been suggested that social security plans are tied up with the signing of these agreements. I am sorry the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is not in his seat at the moment, because I did wish to say that, so far as I can find, there are no social security plans under way at the present time. The government has no social security plans to bring down, and we are left entirely in the dark.

Last week the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) asked some questions of the Department of National Health and Welfare, one of which was as follows:

> What expenditures have been incurred annually by the dominion government since March, 1943, in connection with planning and organizing a national health programme?

That is one of the things about which there has been a good deal of talk, and many speeches, throughout the length and breadth of the country. The answer to that question is as follows:

1943-44	$ 837.42
1944-45	1,958.03
1945-46	394.44
1946-47	478.21

We are getting pretty close to home. But, as a matter of fact, $478.21 in 1946-47 for planning for national health services and national health insurance does not give us much hope that there is anything around the corner in respect of national health. So I am saying to the government and to the Minister of National Health and Welfare: let them take the house into their confidence in respect of this matter of national health insurance that we hear so much about.

In fairness, I should place on record the remainder of the answer that was given. I read again from the return filed:

> The above does not indicate the amount of careful study and thought which has been given to this subject by many officers of the department.

Well, we have all been giving it study and thought.

> Their salaries are not included in the above figures, as it is impossible to estimate the proportion of their time devoted to this work. A full-time officer is now giving his attention to studies in this field.

He must have just started, because his salary is not reflected in 1944; indeed it is not reflected in the last four years:

> And the entire research division of the department concerned, consisting of approximately ten persons is at his disposal.

The fact is that if the government started a health insurance plan tomorrow they probably could not bring it into being—so I am told—in a matter of some five years or more. We have not the hospitals. We have not the hospital beds in any of the provinces to take care of any health insurance plan.

Only the other day the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) was despairing of the hospital facilities in his constituency. So it is in Ontario, as I know of my own knowledge, and so it is throughout the Dominion of Canada.

The only real progress that has been made in respect of preparing for hospitalization has been in Ontario, where the premier has offered $1,000 per bed to any hospital in respect of any beds which may be made available from now on in hospitals, thus leading the way for health insurance, or whatever health measures may develop in the years to come.

In the United States they are dealing with this problem more effectively. We read that within the last week Mr. Truman brought down his policy in respect of health insurance, and the first thing he did was to have congress vote a sum of $3 million to prepare plans for hospitalization facilities to be made available. In addition to that, he has asked congress to vote another $75 million to prepare institutions to work along with the plan.

We have nothing of that sort in Canada. I know of nothing planned up to this time in respect of health insurance. So it hardly lies in the mouth of the government to say that, as soon as these tax agreements are settled, they are going to deal with matters of social security. The people think it is right around the corner. I am saying just as loudly as I can that I cannot see it just around the corner; and I do not believe the people of Canada can, either.

As a matter of fact, the Ontario Medical Association seem to have stolen the ball in respect of this matter of health insurance.

Last week they met and prepared plans for bringing in a plan for Ontario which, in the long run, will be the forerunner of whatever health insurance plan may later develop in Canada. They got started a week ago, and the best brains among the medical men of Ontario are going to bring in a plan which they feel will be workable. As I have said, they seem to have stolen the ball in respect of planning for health insurance.

We had expected that something would have been done in the budget in connection with relieving indirect taxation. From time to time during the debate a good deal has been said on this subject. People may have forgotten that we have such things as amusement taxes, telegram taxes, telephone taxes, taxes on railway tickets, a sales tax, a luxury tax on jewellery and a tax on toilet articles. On Monday last the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said in the house that the budget provides as far as posible for indirect taxation only on articles that are not necessities. There are taxes on tooth paste and shaving cream, and I think we have long since come to the conclusion that these articles are not luxuries. Yet we have been paying a high luxury tax on them.

It is my opinion that a start should be made toward reducing these taxes. If it is ever going to be made, this is the time to do it when national production is up and when money is freer than it has ever been in my lifetime. This is the time to start to reduce some of these indirect taxes. It has been said in another place that the budget is a hodge-podge of levies, unrelated to levels or any discernible economic theory, as the Minister of Finance has demonstrated by failing to do anything about it.

In an effort to find out how these various taxes came into effect, who was paying them, how much they were paying and so on, I made it my business to try to find out how much the married women of Canada were paying in taxes. We have heard a lot about the married women in business paying taxes, and there should be some relief for them, having regard to production. I inquired of the Department of National Revenue as to what taxes had been paid by married women in 1946, but they were not able to give me an answer. Then I made the same inquiry in respect of 1945 and I could not get an answer. Then I asked this question:

How many married women in the Ottawa taxation area paid income tax in 1945 in respect to salaries alone (as contrasted from those who paid income tax on investments), and what was the aggregate of the income tax so paid?

[Mr. Timmins.]

Here is the answer I received.

Statistics have not been assembled in a form to answer this question definitely either for the Ottawa district or the country as a whole but, as indicated in a reply to a previous question, arrangements have been made to gather such statistics in the future. However, as a partial reply, the department estimates that there were approximately 110,000 married female taxpayers in all Canada in the year 1946. Their salary or wage income is estimated at $148,000,000 and the tax payable on this income in 1946 is estimated at $18,500,000.

I made it my business to follow that up in order to find out upon what basis this return had been given. I found that there were no records with respect to this matter. I found out that there are no statistics in Canada from which to give me that answer. The fact of the matter is that statistics have not been kept, and the minister who taxes the women of Canada has really no concrete material before him when he places that tax upon the married women. Speaking for myself and with some knowledge of business, I think it has been a mistake that the tax was not ameliorated with respect to married women.

As we know, a woman in business has an exemption of $750 and her husband has an exemption of $1,500. If the married woman earns more than $250, as between $250 and $750 the difference is deducted from the husband's exemption. If she makes as much as $750, the exemption of her husband is reduced to $750. We all know that the married women in business are doing their share. Probably your stenographer in the parliament buildings is a married woman. I know that my stenographer in my business is a married woman. There are nurses, teachers and stenographers who are carrying on their work in the Dominion of Canada, and it seems to me that some start should have been made in 1947 with respect to relief in the interests of production in Canada, which, after all, is one of the problems that we have to face. We must keep up production in order to maintain the supply of goods, and in order that in the course of time the price of goods may be reduced and that we may be able to get back to the economy of normal times. I think we might have had some leadership in respect of that, particularly since the minister has told us in his budget that he is budgeting for a surplus, I think he said of an estimated $190 million. He tells us that that is to take care of the agreements with the provinces.

Mr. ABBOTT: And to take care of debt reduction too.

Mr. TIMMINS: And to take care of debt reduction too. It is perfectly obvious that in 1947, having regard to the start that has so far been made, there will be no dominion-provincial conference called. Since the provinces which have not signed agreements have balanced their budgets for 1947, I presume that the minister could almost put out his hand and find this surplus which he is to have for the year 1947. As a matter of fact, it may not be too late yet to take action with respect to some of the things that people have been clamouring for—after all, we are only the representatives of the people—things like soft drinks for the kiddies. Perhaps the tax on soft drinks could be relieved with the surplus the minister will have in his hands by the end of the year.

I obtained a return from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) with respect to taxes on soft drinks in 1946, which states that something like $17 million was secured. There was a tax of one cent a bottle and an additional tax of twenty-five per cent. I think the minister, with a surplus in his hands or with a surplus staring him in the face, could have done something about that, as well as the tax on chocolate bars. In the same way, something might have been done to relieve taxation upon married women.

I should like to turn for a moment to housing. When the Minister of National Health and Welfare was speaking in Hawkesbury on April 23, he had something to say about housing, and I quote:

> Under the National Housing Act we have provided more than $400,000,000 to assist Canadians in building homes. It is expected that 80,000 new homes will be completed by the end of this year.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. TIMMINS: Might I have just a moment?

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. TIMMINS: During the last few weeks I asked the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) for a statement as to what survey was being made by his department in connection with housing, and he advised that a survey was going on all the time. The minister must know of the critical situation which has developed in Canada at this time in connection with housing. I should like to point out to the minister that home building this year shows an increase of only 8·8 per cent over last year, whereas industrial building shows an increase of 116 per cent. I think his survey should show him that, as a matter of fact, we are going behind in house building in 1947. We are not going to have as many houses as we had in 1946. This is a national problem. A crisis in respect of housing has developed and is with us now, and I am asking the minister, what does the government propose to do about it?

Mr. T. V. GRANT (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal I can refer only briefly to what has been said by the last few speakers. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Timmins) seems to have become converted to a policy of social legislation, because he devoted from half to three-quarters of his time to social legislation and said that the government was very slow in bringing it down. In that respect he was somewhat different from the hon. member who preceded him, who said that the family allowance was a brazen bribe to the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), in speaking this evening, spent a good deal of his time in talking about the maritime provinces. That is an old political trick, getting away from one's own part of the country and going to the other end to talk about unemployment there, when there is none perhaps in his own part of the country.

I listened to the Tory member from Queens (Mr. McLure). I could not catch all he said today, but I read in yesterday's Hansard how he began his speech last night. He referred to Marc Antony. I am not going to read to the house what he said. I would not want to repeat it because I am afraid we are getting on our hands in this house a case of senile perversion. Old fools are the worst fools.

He said that he was speaking for the province of Prince Edward Island. I want to remind the house that the hon. member was speaking for the Tories of Prince Edward Island, the minority and a very small minority of the people of Prince Edward Island. The hon. member also said that he hoped there would be a by-election in Prince Edward Island. I would remind him that if there is a by-election there it will not be a dual one like the last one he ran in, and he will not be able again to hold on to the coat-tail of another member to get into this house. That is how he got in at the last election, and he cannot deny that. His speech today bears out what appears in his biography in the Parliamentary Guide, which says that he was at one time a commercial ambassador. Well, all I have to say is that he made a commercial speech today.

I did think he was not fair in speaking about the fur business, because he gave the government no credit for saving the fur situation in Prince Edward Island this year. The government this year gave the fur men in Prince Edward Island a guaranteed price equal to the average price over the last three years, and saved the fur business of Prince Edward Island. My hon. friend and a few other men like him put the fur business on the rough in Prince Edward Island. As he was speaking, I was just thinking that the Tories must have had a bet among themselves as to who could make the most ridiculous speech and, after listening to the hon. member for Queens, I would say that he won the bet.

When a doctor is called out to see a patient he keeps an open mind until he arrives at the bedside. That was the state of mind I tried to maintain the night the budget was presented to the house. My diagnosis of the loyal opposition, in their reaction to the budget, is one of shock, shock from bitter disappointment, shock from shattered hopes. I noticed that one or two of them, notably the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), who is of my own profession, seemed to retain their normal demeanour in the house on that occasion, and I decided that I would leave the treatment of his colleagues to him. I think he has made a very good job of it. Of course time is a great healer, and I notice that some of our hon. friends opposite have been coming back to life in the last few days.

I should like in that connection to rededicate a few lines to the hon. member for Lanark:

> He listens earnestly to tales of grief,
> Forgets himself, that he may give relief
> To bodies suffering, or tortured minds,
> In service to all men, his pleasure finds.

I have thought from the first, Mr. Speaker, that this budget did not need any defence. I suppose that some hon. members on this side of the house rose to speak on the budget in order to make their first speech. I noticed that one of the most sensible Conservatives in the house, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) overran his time, and he did not mention the budget at any time during his whole budget speech, which made me think that he had nothing at all to say against the budget.

This budget reduces taxation and shows a large surplus, and those are the two chief things about any budget. When we find taxation reduced and a substantial surplus we are generally satisfied that everything else is fairly good. But the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), the financial critic of the opposition, seemed to be affected much more than the rest of his colleagues, and he made a confession to the effect that if his party were in power the people of this country would have to pay a higher rate of interest on mortgages and notes of hand and so forth which they owed to these rich people. He also said that if his party were in power there would not be any surplus, or words to that effect. That is about all that I could gather from his speech.

Every hon. member who has spoken in this debate has congratulated the young Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), not only on his budget, but on the splendid manner in which he delivered it, and I wish to join with others in extending my heartiest congratulations to him. I also wish to congratulate every member of the Liberal party, back benchers and myself included, upon the way we stood behind our leader through thick and thin because we knew he was right, and so I want to congratulate the whole Liberal party as well as the Minister of Finance on that wonderful budget. I also congratulate the Liberal party on the fact that today Canada is more prosperous than ever before. That has been admitted by almost every hon. member. Canada is the third trading nation of the world today. I remember that in 1930 Canada was the fifth trading nation of the world.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): What government was in power then?

Mr. GRANT: The Liberal party; it went out in 1930. By 1935 Canada was the eighth trading nation of the world.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): What party was in power then?

Mr. GRANT: The Tories. The excuse they gave was that there was a world depression. That is why Canada went down to eighth trading place in the world. If Canada went to the eighth trading place some other nations took her place. They must have been prospering. Another nation took her place and she went down to eighth place, et cetera. Today, under a Liberal government, she is the third trading nation of the world. Canada is a country of something over ten million people. There are countries that have hundreds of millions of people, and yet we are the third trading nation of the world under a Liberal government.

We hear many wails from all parties on the other side of the house about prosperity. Do they ever look at the reports of the bank presidents of Canada? These reports show that, in spite of all the money people put into victory bonds to win the war, they have twice as much money in the savings bank now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Including the C.C.F.

Mr. GRANT: Yes, including the C.C.F. They have twice as much money in the bank today as they ever had before. How does that come about in a country that some people are wailing about? Sometimes they forget and say that we are the most prosperous country in the world. Where did the money come from for the people of the country last year to buy more insurance than they ever bought in any other two years? Last year the people of Canada bought $1,777 million worth of insurance. Where do they get the money? Bennett did not send it to them. We are now told by our Tory friends, who have become socialists themselves, that we have turned socialist. If my hon. friend makes another speech like the one he just made he had better go over with the C.C.F. It was not since the C.C.F. were created in Canada that we had social legislation. We had social legislation in 1923, the Combines Investigation Act; the Old Age Pensions Act under a Liberal government in 1927; the fair wage and eight-hour day in 1928; the Farm Loan Act in 1926 and the Family Allowances Act in 1944, of course, and unemployment insurance and scores of other social legislation before our hon. friends of the C.C.F. party commenced to function.

Last year the Tory member for Queens talked about the unemployed and jobless in Prince Edward Island. I said in the house afterwards that there was no unemployment in Prince Edward Island with the exception of some returned soldiers who had recently come home and were not yet rehabilitated. Well, there was an awful noise about that in Tory circles. The leader of the opposition on the island got up in the legislature and said that I was an outlaw, or words to that effect. I had said that fishermen were banking money down there. He said, the idea of fishermen banking money; the idea of a man talking like that in Ottawa. Well, I leave it to him. That is Tory mentality.

Mr. KNOWLES: Question.

Mr. GRANT: The hon. gentleman talks enough in the house. The hon. gentleman is very proud. He knows what Pope said about pride. He said:

> Of all the causes that conspire to blind
> Man's erring judgment, and misguide the mind,
> What the weak head with strongest bias rules,
> Is pride, the never-failing vice of fools.

The Guardian newspaper, which was at the time I think somewhat under the influence of the Tory member for Queens, came out with an editorial, and of all the lacings a man ever got for saying that Prince Edward Island had no unemployment I got it. That was a year ago. I am going to take time to read another editorial, because my hon. friend said that Liberal papers sometimes find fault with the government. This is from the Tory Guardian newspaper of April 17, 1947. It was nine months after I made my speech. The heading of the article is: "Our Island Prosperity" and reads as follows:

> Annus maribilis well describes the past year as the prospects for the coming year. We have been free from catastrophies due to nature or man's making, and have enjoyed ideal weather, social, health and business conditions for almost eighteen months,—

That goes back a year before I said there was no unemployment.

> —and are still going strong in this respect. Mr. R. P. Hartley, superintendent of the federal maritime insurance commission, with headquarters at Moncton, reports that conditions here are the best in the maritimes, with the prospect of having to import labour to help out when the $4 million wharf contract at Borden begins at an early date. Returned men have been largely absorbed in farming and fishing and other industries, while construction work, which is exceptionally busy, is taking up any employables available.

This is the place where our hon. friends over there say there are 30,000 people unemployed. It continues:

> The farmers have benefited extensively by the deal in potatoes with the British government which will net them some $8,000,000 gross on last fall's potato crop. There are some doubts about next year's market for lobsters on account of the powers that be in Europe claiming that that delectable crustacean is more of a luxury than a necessity and its importation should be discouraged. However, at the recent fisheries conference here, taken part in by the Minister of Fisheries, Ottawa, and the Minister of Fisheries, Quebec, hope was expressed that any such embargo would be delayed for the coming year at any rate. The loss of the European market would necessitate the development of a more extensive outlet in Canada and the United States, and may entail the greater use of air express for the purpose. Which reminds us that air training and air traffic have become thriving industries in the province. One of the two new headquarters of the R.C.A.F. for the maritimes has been transferred to Summerside airport, and extensive building operations to provide homes for the officers and crews will soon be underway. Plans are also under consideration for running a new car ferry between West Point and Buctouche or alternatively between Summerside and Pont du Chene, to take care of the summer auto traffic between here and the mainland. This will be in addition to the Borden-Tormentine car ferry and the Wood Islands-Caribou, Nova Scotia ferry which is developing a steadily increasing trade and traffic with Nova Scotia and Cape Breton; while the Clark Steamship service promises to be in greater activity than ever in the development of trade between Newfoundland and here. Altogether prospects were never brighter than at present for continuing and expanding prosperity in the garden of the gulf.

That editorial appears in one of the strongest Conservative papers ever published in Canada.

The opposition say that our people are overtaxed. Well, if they are overtaxed, why are they buying so many victory bonds; why are they depositing so much of their money in the banks, and why is it that, whereas almost everyone had to mortgage his farm while the Tory government was in power, there is hardly a mortgaged farm in Prince Edward Island today? And that improvement has come about since 1935. I know what I am talking about. I am not like the fellow who said that there were 30,000 unemployed in the maritimes, the fellow who did not know what he was talking about. We had two or three major strikes on at the time and minor ones as well, and he was adding them to the list of the unemployed, and very likely adding the school children as well.

Let me mention one nuisance tax, an old Tory tax. I refer to the sales tax. We say that our dollar is at par, but it is not at par when you consider the sales tax. You cannot go out with a dollar without somebody getting eight cents out of it in the form of sales tax, and ultimately the consumer finds that he pays twenty cents out of the dollar through that confounded nuisance Tory sales tax. I say, as a Liberal government, let us as soon as possible get rid of that Tory sales tax.

I should like to say a word about the mail couriers while I am on my feet if I have the time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GRANT: We have heard an uproar in this house from our Conservative friends opposite about the terrible plight of the mail couriers. They say the condition of these people is a scandal. That is what they said a short time ago, and I believe they were expecting a general election at that time, because the same thing took place in the last session before the 1930 election. At that time Mr. Guthrie of the Tory opposition went so far as to move an amendment to the Post Office Act to provide that mail couriers should be placed in the civil service of Canada, knowing that it could not easily be done. That was the last session before the 1930 election and, as I say, it was Hugh Guthrie who moved the amendment. Our hon. friends opposite made speeches then exactly the same as their successors have recently been making on the same subject, but I notice that it was the younger members who spoke. The old shell-backs who were here in 1930 did not speak. It was the younger members who put up the howl about the mail couriers, and they shed tears, just as their predecessors did in 1930. In 1930 that amendment was moved to the Post Office Act, but it was voted down. Then the election came on and every mail driver received a letter signed "R. B. Bennett", stating that if the Conservatives were put into power the mail drivers would be put in the civil service. In that letter they stated that they had moved in the house the amendment to which I have referred and that it had been voted down by the Grits.

I read that letter and I may say that it was dangerous to meet a mail driver on the road at that time. That was the time my hon. friend over there, the Tory member for Queens, was shouting on the platform, "Look at your milk cheques". Yes; I saw the letter which these mail couriers received. But what happened afterwards? As soon as the Tories got into power, the mail couriers began to ask that they be put into the civil service. The Tory government then said, "We will have to do something with those fellows", and they threw almost all the mail contracts out for tender in a body. Times were getting so hard that the people were starving and could not get a dollar. Bennett spoke then of sound money. He said, "This is sound money you are getting", but it was so sound you could not smell it. Well, these men lost their contracts or got them at a much reduced figure. I know a man who had a contract for $1,100; when it was advertised he put in a tender for $450 and got the contract again, and it remained at that figure until we raised it to $1,100 two or three years ago.

That was what the Tories did to the mail couriers, and here they have tried to start the same thing again this year, but it did not work because some of the older fellows said, "You had better drop that; the mail couriers have good memories".

Mr. FRASER: They are not getting a fair deal yet.

Mr. GRANT: You are not getting a fair deal either.

Mr. FRASER: I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. GRANT: One of the best poems that Bobby Burns ever wrote was the one we all remember so well, in which he portrays the God-given gift of seeing ourselves as others see us.

About a month ago I went into Fisher's store to buy a few articles and they amounted to $3.35. The man gave me a slip and when I went to the girl at the cash register she said, "Three seventy-five please". I replied, "No, it is $3.35. Whatever may be on the slip there, it is only $3.35". She then called the man over and pointed to the figures and said, "What's that?" He replied, "That's $3.35". So she took her pencil and corrected it, changing the "7" to "3", because it was really $3.35. The man had written the $3.35, and of course he recognized his own figures. Now this woman did not know me from the man in the moon, nor did I know her, but she said to me, "That man has been here for eleven years now and no one can read his figures but himself". I said, "He would make a good member of parliament, wouldn't he?" She said, "That's all he would be any good for".

Mr. JOHNSTON: You should have become indignant and walked out.

Mr. GRANT: Almost every member who gets up on the opposite side talks about chocolate bars. Let me say this, particularly to my Tory friends. When they were in power between 1930 and 1935 you paid five cents for a chocolate bar, but you would get only one chocolate bar for a bushel of potatoes in Prince Edward Island. You would get one chocolate bar for a bushel of potatoes and three cents over. Potatoes were then eight cents a bushel. Today, with chocolate bars at eight cents each, you can get twelve chocolate bars for a bushel of potatoes in Prince Edward Island. You get ninety-six cents for a bushel of potatoes, but of course they are the best in the world.

We hear a lot of talk from our C.C.F. friends about free enterprise. I may say that the C.C.F. party are the only people who lose money in Prince Edward Island. Every time they run an election they lose $200. They are very much opposed to free enterprise, but I should like to ask my hon. friends: Where would we be tonight but for these electric lights? In the dark, I suppose. Our socialist friends condemn free enterprise, but would we have electric lights tonight in this house, or would we have a telephone system, would we have the radio and the automobile, all inventions of free men, had Henry Ford, Bell, Marconi, Edison and all such men been taken by a socialist government when they were eighteen or nineteen years of age and told to go to work for the government? Do you think they would have invented those things after working hours? Of course not.

I did not write out a big speech to read in this house. I don't like that stuff. We are Liberals; we say so, and we talk that way. We hear a great deal from the Conservative party opposite about the little man. It makes my blood run cold when I hear the Tories talk about the little man. They are the people of the big interests, the men who care no more for the little man than that one of their number who said that family allowances were a brazen bribe to the people of Canada; yet only the night before last we heard them talk about the little man. I say, beware the Greeks when they come bearing gifts.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I have exhausted my vocabulary and have said enough. I do not want to take any more time, because I should like to see a vote taken tonight. Therefore I shall now resume my seat.

Mr. R. J. HENDERSON (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I think I will try to shift the scene of combat from the little island province back to my inland province of Ontario and my own constituency.

Mr. LOW: Tell us about the Grits.

Mr. HENDERSON: We certainly enjoyed the humorous and witty address of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Grant), and I hope my remarks may be of the same high order. As a matter of fact, after the terrible flaying we poor Progressive Conservatives were given by him, I do not know whether I should proceed. In any event, in starting my remarks I wish, along with the other hon. members who have spoken, to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on his excellent presentation of the budget. I did enjoy his voice, the clear tones in which he spoke, and the good, clear, sensible, whole-hearted manner of presentation, which was indeed a revelation. That was the third time I have been privileged to listen to a budget presented in this house, and I must say that this year the presentation was par excellence.

We have been hearing some excellent addresses on the issues of the day, and if some—the last speaker excluded—have wandered from the subject matter of the budget, they were just taking advantage of the latitude allowed at this time to speak of matters of public concern as they affect their own provinces and perhaps their own constituencies. In doing so, they have rendered us an invaluable service. They have made an indelible impression upon us, and I can assure you, sir, that we are learning to know our Canada better. It is not possible for all hon. members to travel across this fair dominion to learn about our country as we might, since home associations or business connections make travel impossible for many; but by sitting here from day to day and listening to these excellent word pictures by various hon. members from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we are able better to grasp the great possibilities and advantages of our country and to learn to appreciate it better.

Since practically every matter of vital concern has been fully discussed from time to time, I fear there is little left for me to bring before my elected colleagues and fellow members of this house; but from these addresses we learn that Canada is a very difficult country to govern, since apparently each province has its own problems which are different from those of all the other provinces. To begin with British Columbia, for instance, the oriental question is theirs, and apparently it is one of grave concern. Next we come to the province of Alberta, which seems to be in good circumstances and with few complaints other than dissatisfaction with the budget tax limitations. Then there is Saskatchewan, with their control removal spasm, exhorting this government to restore the controls already removed. Manitoba has dissatisfaction with the wheat board and a desire for a live stock board. Ontario—I do not like to mention this, but I am afraid I must—has its housing needs, and a great shortage of nails. In Quebec there is redistribution and the proper wording of petitions. New Brunswick apparently has its potato difficulties and harbour needs. Prince Edward Island as usual needs that new boat, and Nova Scotia has the question of its marshlands and the development of industry. All these matters have been ably presented by various speakers from these provinces across the dominion. On the whole, however, the picture is not so gloomy, since the better conditions seem far to outweigh the others. Nevertheless it has been a great pleasure indeed to hear hon. members extol with pride the virtues of their particular provinces or constituencies. Pride in our country leads to patriotism, and in patriotism we Canadians are certainly not lacking.

Since this is the budget debate, I consider it my duty to say a few words by way of constructive criticism, as to the way in which the budget affects my constituency of Lambton-Kent and the other constituencies bordering it in southwestern Ontario. It is true that we are very much agricultural, with mixed farming in the lead; but manufacturing does occupy an important place in our economy and has contributed its quota to our peacetime requirements as it did to our all-out war effort. Our manufacturing towns of Wallaceburg, Dresden and Petrolia, as well as our well-contained villages, all have their industrial concerns which have peacetime pursuits, and as a result we suffered no great hardship in our reconversion from war activities to peacetime production.

Our urgent urban necessities are the same as those of all other urban centres, namely more houses of low rental appraisal value, and particularly a reconsideration of rental controls, so that bona fide and needy owners may occupy their own premises, at least on compassionate grounds. One of the most contentious matters of concern to be drawn to my attention is that of the owner who has purchased a home on the solemn promise but unwritten pledge of the tenant to vacate in favour of the trustful purchaser, only to find the promise broken and the purchaser unable to occupy the home which is rightfully his, with no alternative but to wait and see. Rental controls are here for the time being, and owing to the great housing shortages and needs this is one of the few necessary controls. Nevertheless it is having its retarding influence on property transfer. Many of our aging farmers in my locality, unable to carry on the many arduous tasks so essential to successful farming, have disposed of their farms because their families have become urban conscious. They have left the old homesteads and, since efficient labour is impossible to secure, these fine old people now find the dream of their lifetime frustrated; a dream whereby they might spend their declining years in their neighbourhood towns or villages gone, as it were, with the wind. They must plan otherwise.

It is true they no doubt are encouraged from time to time with some reassuring news, and the news in particular of recent vintage wherein the Minister of Finance, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), although making no definite commitment, did assure us that the matter of rental controls, wherein they did create hardships, was under careful consideration, and an announcement of their deliberations would be made later; we trust in the very near and immediate future.

Another matter of immediate concern and one of great importance to the farmers of my region is that of competent and efficient help for our sugar beet producers. The weather and elements in this year have been decidedly against all agricultural spring sowing and planting. Owing to the lateness of the season, for oats, barley and other spring grains, a larger acreage of sugar beets might be available if proper encouragement were only given. Sugar is still in short supply, and no doubt will continue so for some time to come.

In the Lambton-Kent area the growing of sugar beets is in keen competition with the growing of corn for husking purposes, tobacco, beans, tomatoes and other canning vegetables. But since corn, beans, tobacco and tomatoes require and do better on the lighter types of soil, sugar beets do best on the heavier well-drained clay soil, of which there are large areas available.

It is true we have two well-equipped factories, one at Chatham with a daily capacity of 2,800 tons of sugar beets, and one at Wallaceburg with a daily capacity of 2,500 tons. Our greatest difficulty has been to find an acreage sufficient to keep both plants busy. Our experience of the past, to the detriment of the trade, has been to operate these plants year about alternately. With proper encouragement we certainly could stimulate this industry to its full capacity.

It was one of the commitments of this government, when Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom entered into the combined food pact of 1942, that each country would encourage and enlarge upon the domestic production of sugar, thus reducing the necessary shipments by sea from southern islands and warm countries which formerly supplied a large percentage of our requirements, and I am informed that British production has been more consistently maintained that that of either Canada or the United States.

With the introduction of many labour-saving machines, as yet more or less in an experimental stage, and with the announcement by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) of a definite assurance of efficient help and labour to overcome the acute labour shortage in this field of industry, I feel certain our farmers will respond favourably; and what has become a diminishing industry will again flourish and add its quota to our national economy.

I have a definite assurance that the sugar beet growers, through their well organized growers and marketing association, have secured a satisfactory contract with the Dominion Sugar Company for 1947. And this favourable cash crop in their system of crop rotation will again become one of stability, and, might I add, if our farmers were definitely assured of a fair deal by all concerned, one of great popularity.

As a warning, however, to the several government agencies and manufacturing concerns, our farmers are organizing for mutual protection as they never organized before. This has been recently evidenced by our sugar beet growers association, which has a 100 per cent organization and a 100 per cent membership of all grower-farmers concerned. To show that they are sincere and united in their demands, they recently refused, to a man, to enter into a new form of contract as offered by the company. This contract was on a fifty-fifty basis, but failed to meet with their approval. It was presented to them in the form of an ultimatum. They could sign on the company's terms by the 1st of April, or the company would close its factory. The farmers would not sign, not one of them. They stuck to their guns, and the company came to their terms. For this year, through government susbidy, and this good contract, they will receive the highest price in the history of this industry for their crop.

They have not done too badly in the past, as the following return for the 1946 crop will illustrate. In Harwick township the over-all average for sugar beets was $275.95 per acre in 1946. In Chatham township, in respect of one man with sixty-two acres, the net return amounted to $8,992.91. In Chatham the amount was $268.25 per acre, and in the Lambton area there was an over-all average of $160.50 per acre. In the area in which I reside the over-all average was not so high because of extremely warm weather in the months of August and September, the growing season. We had an over-all average of $100 per acre.

These returns and high crop yields, I would ask the house to notice, have been attained by growers who came here in the past as sugar beet working immigrants. They saved their earnings; they purchased farms of their own, and are now excellent Canadian citizens. They have attained this high degree of success by hard work, careful planning and noble and whole-hearted sacrifice on the part of themselves and of their families. Their success is an inspiration, and it clearly demonstrates what wonderful opportunities this Canada of ours offers to all those who wish to embrace them, in the field of endeavour they have chosen. It is desirable indeed that this new corps of sugar beet workers who are to be admitted this year into Canadian citizenship will measure up to the standards of those who have been admitted under similar circumstances earlier in this century, and, if such is the case, the future of this important sugar beet industry in southwestern Ontario, and all other growing areas, will be definitely assured.

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude this brief address, and in order that I may not digress too far from the budget aspect of my observations, I wish to place on record a protest, if one may call it such, against the tax, the old Tory tax we heard so much about a while ago. Nevertheless it is one we say is discriminatory. I refer to the eight per cent sales tax on domestic electricity, and more particularly to the eight per cent sales tax as it is levied on both natural gas and manufactured gas as used in our homes for cooking, water heating, lighting and space heating.

I wish to refer more to the tax of eight per cent on our gas bills than the eight per cent tax on domestic electricity, because our hydro bills are much smaller since we use electricity in our homes for lighting and cooking, but not yet to a great extent for space heating. A brief in the form of a protest has been submitted to the Minister of Finance by the Canadian gas association and, in order that I may bring it to the attention of this house, I will now quote some of its major denunciations as outlined. The Union Gas Company, the one with which I am intimately acquainted and one which no doubt is representative of all other gas companies in Canada, has tried to give us excellent service and, we feel, a square deal. It is true that it recently had to raise its rates, justifiably, we believe, because as yet they are by no means prohibitive. It serves a great area in southwestern Ontario, including the cities of Windsor, Chatham, London and Sarnia. It has its headquarters at Chatham, and its lines serve all the towns and villages and a good many of the rural areas. It has a goodly sized number of maintenance men, and it pays good wages and expends huge sums on meters, pipes and other equipment.

Natural gas as a fuel is very popular where it is possible to acquire it. Its use is not general throughout Canada, but it is used extensively in southwestern Ontario and parts of Alberta. Compared with manufactured gas, natural gas is in a class by itself, because it has heating units of 1025 B.T.U. per cubic foot, whereas manufactured gas has only 450 to 530 B.T.U. per cubic foot. It will be seen that natural gas has heating qualities which are practically double those of manufactured gas. Natural gas in southwestern Ontario is in diminishing supply because the producing wells are slackening off. The Union Gas Company of Chatham, having expended huge sums for exploratory purposes without success, have now entered into an agreement with the Panhandle Gas Company of Texas whereby they may import 5½ billion cubic feet annually and thus assure their customers of an adequate supply for all purposes for twenty years to come.

This twenty-year assurance is something which no other concern dealing in fuel, solid or otherwise, can give, and we believe that every encouragement should be given to the natural gas industry because fuel is one of our definite requirements, regardless of the cost. This was made more definite by a recent announcement of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) as to the limitations in the use of fuel oil for heating requirements in the future. It demonstrates the fact that Canadians are frantic as to fuel necessities, and when this natural gas company comes forward with a definite assurance of a twenty-year supply we feel that there is due to it, not only worthy praise but definite encouragement.

Let us face the fact, which is an old slogan. In September, 1939, the Special War Revenue Act was amended whereby users of domestic electricity and gas were subjected to the eight per cent sales tax as a special war levy. That was enacted so that gas and electricity might be diverted, wherever feasible, from domestic purposes to war necessities and, as such, all users submitted cheerfully and cooperated fully. But now that the war is terminated, we feel that this tax should have been eliminated in the budget presentation. Such is not the case, and we feel, rightfully so, that it is discriminatory because other special war levies such as the war exchange tax have been repealed, as has the twenty-five per cent excise tax provided by the Special War Revenue Act. Income war tax rates, both personal and corporation, have been reduced, as have excess profits taxes, personal and corporation. This particular tax has been retained, we believe not as a special war revenue tax but for revenue purposes only.

Let us face some further facts. What are the implications behind this adherence? According to the latest submissions, there are some 720,000 residential gas consumers being served by the several gas companies across this dominion. The annual gas bill paid by this great army of residential users is some $24,000,000, and the total sales tax as levied, which is collected by the companies at no expense to the government and turned over to the public treasury, was the tidy sum of $1,915,886, or practically $2.000,000, a total of $12,000,000 in the six years of its existence. While actual figures are not available, there is no doubt that a substantial proportion of this sales tax was levied on householders who use gas for the same purposes that others use solid fuels which are free from the sales tax.

Let me give an example of how this tax adds to the cost of living of a residential owner of a seven-roomed house in Ontario from January until December of 1946. The total gas bill would be $139.60, and the special war tax of eight per cent would amount to $11.15. This means that there is a war levy of practically $1 a month on many who can ill afford to pay it. In Manitoba, where the climate is much colder, these cold facts apply. The gas bill for a modern equipped house would amount to $284.79 and the special war tax for 1946 would amount to $22.85. This means that practically $2 a month was levied as a tax in order that these home owners might enjoy their own fireside comforts and cook their own sustaining meals. Therefore it is respectfully submitted that this tax should be removed for the following reasons: first, the sales tax on gas was imposed as a special war levy in September, 1939, and the war emergency no longer exists; second, since no sales tax is levied on solid fuels which are used in dwellings for the same purpose for which gas is used, the levying of a sales tax on gas is more or less discriminatory.

May I again exhort this government: first, to reconsider rental controls where compassionate grounds are certain; second, to encourage and foster the sugar beet industry and, third, to eliminate this discriminatory eight per cent sales tax on gas and domestic electricity since, in the face of the big surplus we have this year, it appears small, unusual and inconsistent.

Now, may I digress further, since I have a few minutes of my time still left? I should like to say a few words in connection with the Old Age Pensions Act. An amendment is to be introduced, and I must say that those eligible and in need of the same have been hopeful that something in keeping with the present-day cost of living requirements would be contained therein, but I fear they are to be disappointed. We are all agreed that the present payments with the means test applied are very small and meagre indeed. In my community, and generally throughout Ontario, the total pension is $28 a month. This is forty per cent higher than the pension of $20 a month paid during pre-war days, but the cost of living index has risen in proportion with the increase in pension, and the pensioner finds himself or herself more or less an unwanted person among his or her relations or elsewhere.

Many children of the present age are more or less negligent of their parents and shirk their responsibility. There was a time before the war when the $20 a month pension was an entry-ticket to many homes. I have known families to keep pushing these older parents around from one to the other with no welcome from any of them, but just as soon as the pension was secured they vied with each other and sometimes quarreled to see which one would get them and take them in.
