

PLEBISCITE AND LIQUOR TRAFFIC

There is No Immediate Prospect of Many of Those in the Business Retiring as a Result of the Vote.

A glance into the down-town saloons and liquor houses did not reveal any astonishing amount of depression on account of the "sweeping victory for prohibition," over which the supporters of the plebiscite are now jubilating.

As yet no vendor is making a wild scramble to get rid of his business at a ruinously low price. Whisky is still firm at 5 cents and the demand is equal to the supply.

The after-election crowds thronged the barrooms yesterday. They, if any, displayed the only evidences of prohibition's victory.

The general opinion among liquor dealers is that the vote amounts to nothing. They say that the question was not one of prohibition and that a large portion of those who marked their ballots "Yes" were in reality maintaining with the express idea of putting the Ontario Government in a hole.

The difference between the total vote polled and that which would have been the result of how little the people thought of it.

William Mars, when seen by a World reporter, said: "The vote on the question is not one which can satisfy the Government that the people want prohibition."

"The result of the plebiscite vote has not disturbed my slumbers," said W. J. Wilson, of the firm of Purse & Wilson, King-street east. "The vote was not decisive."

Mr. M. McConnell has a large stock of various kinds of intoxicating liquors, but has made no reductions in price because of Monday's voting.

"Effects of the plebiscite on our business," said E. J. Sullivan, of the "Leader," with a merry laugh. "Well, the prospect of prohibition seems to make me chrier."
