As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) well pointed out, every member of this house, as every citizen in Canada, should be and is interested in seeing that we have honesty in our elections. That is a matter that goes to the very root of democracy, as the member for Rosetown-Biggar pointed out. He went a good deal farther than that, indicating that this was the kind of thing which might perhaps be called a parallel to the disfranchisement of citizens generally and which, as he suggested, might lead to dictatorship. These are things which the average citizen and members of parliament must guard against with great jealousy, and the launching of this motion has brought to the house again the necessity for cleanliness and purity in our public life and in elections in Canada.

I was greatly surprised, indeed alarmed, to hear of the evidence which had been brought in affidavit form and otherwise by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It indicates a situation which I can see, by his attitude, that the Prime Minister and others are anxious to clear up. This party takes the stand that matters of this kind must be cleaned up in the public interest, and we take that stand unequivocally.

I was interested in what the Prime Minister said in one of his asides, with reference to the historic constituency of North York, where he exhumed one of the old election corpses to bring it before the house, saying that there were some bus loads of people brought from Toronto, although he did not make it clear how they voted. Those who came by bus loads did not all vote for him. In any event I was pretty young at that time and was not able to take the keen interest that I do now in elections. It would be strange indeed, however, if all the wrongs were on one side, if all the sinners belonged to one political party, even in North York. I do not want to criticize the Prime Minister unduly for bringing up this matter, but the man against whom he ran in that election, and who perhaps was indirectly spoken of by the Prime Minister—I do not believe he meant it in that way—has passed away and he may be said to have left an excellent record in public and private service in Canada.

I wish to associate myself with those who have spoken in the interests of cleaner elections for Canada, and I suggest to the government that they should do all that lies in their power to go to the very root of the difficulties which have been brought before the house, to see that an example is made of this instance and to ensure that if such things occur in the future they will be dealt with to the full extent of the law.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say at once to my hon. friend that I cannot imagine by what construction of thought he has brought in a reference to a former member of parliament who ran against me. I made no reference whatever to any individual, and the last thing I would wish to do in this house, a thing that I have never done at any time, would be to reflect upon one who has passed away and is not in a position to answer for himself. I made reference to something that had been done by a political machine, and my hon. friend knows as much about political machines as I do.

Mr. ROWE: That is a great compliment to him.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the Prime Minister that in this, as in many other things in this house, I am listening at this moment to the voice of experience.

An hon. MEMBER: Listen to it and you will get somewhere.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I would point out that the chief electoral officer has all the jurisdiction that is necessary to control this election, and if there have been such irregularities, as the hon. member who has moved the motion (Mr. Coldwell) has indicated, the writs should be cancelled or postponed and registration verified by the chief electoral officer and his deputies in the island of Montreal. With regard to the allegations made by the mover of the motion concerning the telegraphing of votes, people being left off the lists, and dead voters, that is something that has gone on in almost every election that I have known of, because elections, as has been said, are not won with prayers. Registration cards should be produced by the voters. I suggest that anyone who cannot read or write should not be on the list.

In 1934 the then member for St. Lawrence-St. George headed a committee which revised the electoral law of the country, and many of the matters that have been referred to by the mover of the motion, which were prevalent throughout Canada, were thoroughly investigated. In 1930 in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George and west centre Toronto, some of these very things now complained of went on, and the particulars appeared in the daily press for a month after the elections. In Britain they have recognized, apart from two or three elections in Scotland, the principle of allowing a candidate representing the same party in a constituency to be elected for the duration of the war, but that practice will be prevented in Canada so long as anyone is a British subject and can deposit $200, an election will be held.

I submit that the chief electoral officer has absolute power, he is a thoroughly competent official and if there are irregularities as alleged, the election could be postponed. The government has the power to suspend the election for thirty days or to cancel the writs until this situation is cleared up, if after investigation the complaints are justified.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does not the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar feel that the matter has been sufficiently discussed to justify his withdrawing the motion now so as to enable the house to get on with its regular business?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to withdraw the motion. The purpose has been served, but we shall ask in a few days what steps the government has taken.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I am not going to prolong the debate at any great length, but the matters that have been revealed this morning and which look rather damaging are the sort of thing that makes politics dirty. They are the sort of thing that makes democracy weak. Matters of this kind should be looked into with all sincerity and with a good purpose in view, and I do not think the purpose is served by merely blaming some enumerator who may not have carried on his work well or may eventually be proved to have padded some lists. I am inclined to think that where there are election corruptions the blame may be attached to some huge political party machine, and I suggest that in dealing with matters of this kind there should be such punishments as fit the crime. If we are to have honesty in our electoral system, then penalties must be imposed for breaking the law.

The Prime Minister has referred to this matter and has expressed his alarm and more or less indicated that it does not matter whether it is a Liberal candidate, a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, a communist or any other candidate that is running. I am inclined to think that the responsibility should not always be attached to the candidate, but rather to the machinery that is behind, operating in these electoral campaigns. The matter brought up this morning casts the suspicion upon every member sitting in this house, not only from Montreal and district but from every other large metropolis in Canada, whether he is eligible to sit as the properly elected representative of the people.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has suggested a way in which this matter can be dealt with, but I am not so sure that it goes far enough. I am wondering whether a thing of this kind should not be investigated more fully by the privileges and elections committee of this house.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is not time.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member interjects that there is not time. But a matter of this kind is serious enough to warrant postponing the by-election. It is serious because it is an encroachment upon our whole democratic system.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. HANSELL: It might suggest a doubt whether the government was sitting there by reason of corrupt electoral practices. I am not saying it is; of course not, but this matter is tremendously serious, so serious as to justify postponing the by-election until there has been a thorough investigation. And when that has been done, those found guilty of corrupt practices should not simply be allowed to run away, laughing up their sleeves. The strength of a law is to be found very often in the penalties it prescribes. Where there are no penalties and no punishment the law is often weak and ineffective.

The matter of registration cards has been brought into the discussion. I am not going into that in detail, but I do believe that a registration card should be shown before a person is permitted to vote.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That would not do any good; you can get a bushel of them.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member says it would not do any good, and I am inclined to think he is right. These little registration cards that we carry around in our pockets signed by somebody that nobody knows as deputy registrar, I am inclined to think are not worth very much. I believe a registration card should be issued under seal and be a document of value.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not blame you, Mr. Speaker, for calling me to book. I know that was out of order. When the plebiscite was discussed we brought the same matter up and were told that we could not use registration cards on that occasion.

I will close by saying this. If our democratic system is to survive, our electoral system must be so framed that corrupt practices will be rendered well-nigh impossible, and until that is done we have not a democratic system at all. We are told that our boys are fighting to preserve democracy. Well, we had better get democracy here at home first before we talk in those terms, and if our democratic system is to be preserved, our electoral system must be safeguarded in every way so that corrupt electoral practices will become practically unknown.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): May I say a word to reassure the hon. member. The act provides penalties. Rule 11 of Schedule A to section 17 of Special Election Instructions says:

> Enumerators who, wilfully and without reasonable excuse, omit from their list of electors the name of any person entitled to have his or her name entered thereon, or enter on the said list the name of any person who is not entitled to have his or her name entered thereon, shall, in addition to any other punishment to which they may be liable, forfeit their right to payment for their services as enumerators.

Then section 70 (4) says:

> When it is made to appear to the chief electoral officer that any election officer has been guilty of any offence against this act, it shall be his duty to make such inquiry as appears to be called for in the circumstances.

And he has further powers to intervene and incur such expenses as may be necessary for these purposes. Then subsection 5 provides:

> The chief electoral officer shall have the like powers in the case of any offence which it is made to appear to him to have been committed by any person under section 17.

That is the section dealing with the enumeration. So that there are penalties provided by the act, and I can give the hon. member the assurance that all the facilities of the Department of Justice will be at the disposal of the chief electoral officer to see that prompt and appropriate penalties are meted out to anybody who may have violated the provisions of the act.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself without any reserve with what has been said this morning by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). There is no doubt that elections, if we are to be a free and independent democracy, must be carried on honestly.

We have heard reported to this house this morning by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) what I take it at the moment are allegations, and I believe ex parte.

Mr. COLDWELL: Supported by affidavits.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Quite right, but which have not been put to any test. Whether the allegations are correct or not remains to be seen. I recall to the members of the house the words of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to which we have just listened. I fear that what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said this morning will be taken as gratuitous insults. He had his opportunity of making une amende honorable, and I am very sorry that he did not acquit himself as one might have expected.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member says that I have not made honourable amends for what I have said. I produced certain evidence here this morning, and if the minister intends to defend electoral corruption in the city of Montreal, he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member evidently cannot stand to be taken to task even according to the rules of the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not intend to be insulted.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not intend to defend what is wrong.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not intend to be insulted by anyone, least of all by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche).

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not desire to defend anything that is wrong. If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is so deeply bitten by the necessity of defending what is right, then I should remind him that red warfare is being carried on in other places in this world—

Mr. COLDWELL: For democracy.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes, for democracy—but where is he?

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. gentleman has asked me the question, where am I. I am in this house doing my duty as a loyal member of his majesty's parliament and I intend to continue to do my duty here.

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is very good to hear, Mr. Speaker; now may I carry on. I have the honour to represent the honest and proud county of Outremont—

Mr. COLDWELL: I have not said a word about it.

Mr. LaFLECHE: —which is a county within a cluster of equally honest and proud constituencies. I want to make it very clear that I have never had any knowledge of this practice that is termed telegraphing, nor have I heard the slightest suggestion that it has been carried on. I want to make that definite statement so that the matter may be crystal clear. I want to express very deep disappointment that any hon. member of this house should have seen fit to allow it to appear, through his words, that a whole cluster of constituencies has been tarnished by this so-called practice of telegraphing; and moreover it is repugnant to all men that this brush should be applied to a particular locality in this country.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): I would not have said anything during this debate if the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) had not interjected his remarks about Montreal. I happen to know something about this riding, as I ran against the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidate in 1940 who is running there. I have discussed the present campaign with him. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has explained exactly what has been going on in the Cartier division. However I would suggest to the hon. member that something more than a registration card should be demanded by way of identification. I was able to purchase registration cards quite openly in the city of Montreal, and I see no reason why other people would not be able to do the same thing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is introducing a subject which is not before the house in this debate.

Mr. ADAMSON: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar brought up the question of registration cards and suggested that these should be used for the identification of the voters in this electoral district. Your Honour allowed that as perfectly permissible. Now I am merely pointing out that in my opinion that is insufficient because registration cards can be bought in Montreal, as I have bought them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is introducing another subject. Under standing order 31 the debate on the motion before the house must deal with one matter only and no other matters may be introduced. The hon. member is now saying that registration cards may be purchased in Montreal. That is a matter which is not before the house and which is not relevant to the motion under discussion.

Mr. ADAMSON: The only statement I wished to make was directly in connection with what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had to say with regard to the identification of voters in this division. I wanted to suggest that something more than registration cards should be required. That was the point I wished to make, and that was all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar shall have leave to withdraw the motion?

Motion withdrawn.

ONTARIO ELECTION

INQUIRY AS TO ARRANGEMENTS FOR VOTING BY MEMBERS OF RESERVE ARMY IN CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Have any arrangements been made between the Department of National Defence and the provincial authorities of Ontario to enable Ontario voters in the reserve army who may be at camp on election day to exercise their franchise in the forthcoming provincial contest?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): This matter was brought to the attention of the department yesterday by the district officer commanding military district No. 3, at Kingston; and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) also sent me a note asking about the matter and referring to an article in this morning's newspaper. On inquiry I find that the department communicated immediately with Major Lewis, who is clerk of the legislative assembly and, I am told, chief electoral officer, to ascertain from him what arrangements he had made, because it seemed to the officers concerned that the arrangements would have to be made by those who were in charge of the election procedure and machinery. No reply has been received as yet, and I can only say that the department has already indicated to Major Lewis that in connection with matters affecting the election officers will cooperate just as far as that possibly can be done. However, I think the arrangements for voting would have to be made under the direction of Major Lewis.

Mr. GRAYDON: Under the present arrangement it looks as though quite a number of Ontario citizens will be disfranchised, unless something is done in connection with this matter.

Mr. RALSTON: We realized that when the matter was brought to our attention by the officer commanding military district No. 3, and we communicated with Major Lewis.

Mr. TUSTIN: From my constituency alone I think perhaps six or seven hundred men will be going to camp next Sunday, and they will be in camp at the time of the election.

Mr. RALSTON: I still point out that it is a matter primarily for those in charge of the election machinery to arrange, so that these men may exercise their franchise perhaps by voting at advance polls, or by proxy, or in some other way.

[Mr. Speaker.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT SOREL PLANT OF MARINE INDUSTRIES LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Minister of Labour make a statement to the house concerning the strike at the plant of Marine Industries Limited at Sorel, Quebec, and inform the house as to what steps are being taken by the government to settle the dispute?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): There is a strike at Marine Industries Limited at Sorel, which has taken place against the advice of the men's leaders. It has to do with the application of the cost of living bonus, and it was a spontaneous affair. As soon as we heard of it in the department, one of our senior industrial relations officers was dispatched to Sorel, and I am hopeful that the men will be back at work in a short time. I would add that the matter is in the hands of the war labour board, and nothing will be done until these men go back to work.

APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS ON WELLAND SHIP CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have a further question to direct to the Secretary of State. I have received some complaints relating to appointments and promotions in the operating and administrative departments of the Welland ship canal, coming from representatives of certain ex-service men. I am going to hand the correspondence over to the minister with the request that before the house adjourns he will be good enough to investigate the matter and, if possible make a report upon it.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): If the leader of the opposition will forward to me the correspondence he has I shall be glad to look into the matter and advise him.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF OFFICE AT MONT LAURIER, QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle): Has the government reached any decision following the request I made on the floor of this house on July 6 for the setting up of an impartial and thorough investigation into the administration of the office of the wartime prices and trade board at Mont Laurier, county of Labelle; and, if so, what is its decision?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): It is my intention to recommend to the government that a commissioner be appointed to investigate the charges which the hon. member, on his responsibility as a member, made on the floor of the house.

PRIVILEGE—MR. WEIR

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, I feel bound to rise to a question of privilege, as the result of a Canadian Press dispatch in the Winnipeg Free Press of July 17, in the following words:

> Ask Board to Control Grains
> Otawa, July 17 (CP)—The House of Commons agriculture committee, during a heated meeting in camera, approved yesterday a motion by E. E. Perley (Prog. Con., Qu'Appelle) that the Canadian wheat board be authorized to handle all oats and barley on a pooling basis according to grade, it was learned last night.
> The meeting approved a report to be submitted to the house, which will recommend additional encouragement to essential foods production.
> Mr. Perley, supported by P. E. Wright (C.C.F., Melfort) and Robert Fair (N.D., Battle River), urged the committee to recommend a changed system of allocation of railway cars so that pool elevators in Saskatchewan would receive better treatment. The members claimed there was discrimination against these cooperative elevators.

I tabled the reports of the committee on agriculture and colonization this morning, and I wish to say, first, that I did not give out any report of the meeting referred to in the press, or disclose the contents of the committee's report to any member of the press. In fact, no member of the press ever approached me with respect to it. Second, the report which I tabled to-day, which is the committee's report, does not recommend that the Canadian wheat board be authorized to handle all oats and barley. Third, the meeting, while held in camera as are all committee meetings when considering draft reports, was not a heated meeting, as the dispatch implies. Fourth, according to a letter from the chairman of the wheat board, and read to the committee, no complaint had been received that the distribution of cars was unsatisfactory until June 18, following his appearance before the committee; and that since then several conferences had been held in an attempt to bring about a more satisfactory and workable system. Otherwise the report and records of the committee will show exactly what took place.

WHEAT

ALLOTMENT OF FREIGHT CARS TO WESTERN CANADA —LABOUR—AVAILABILITY OF ELEVATOR SPACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce by reason of the approach of the new crop season. My question has to do with what is being done with respect to the proper allocation of freight cars, particularly in areas in the prairie provinces where all or part of the threshing was not completed last fall, with the result that many of the farmers in those areas are unable to dispose of their wheat. I believe I should give the minister an example setting out the situation in one particular area, namely, Davidson, Saskatchewan. During the past twelve days only ten cars have been loaded at Davidson. There are 125,000 bushels of wheat to be marketed on the fifteen-bushel quota. Those who did not get threshed until this spring have been able to market very little, and it is going to be a great hardship on them if they cannot get their quota on the market before the new crop comes in. I am informed that in other areas where marketing has taken place, cars are still being received. My question is this: What is being done in this regard to assure an equitable and fair allocation of cars, and in particular is preference being given to areas in which farmers were unable to sell wheat last fall, because of the lateness of the threshing season, or in which threshing was not completed until this spring?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question has to do with a situation which is causing us very considerable concern at the present time. I refer to the matter of the aceptance of farmers' quotas in western Canada. A great deal of the difficulty at first was that of transportation. That has been a serious situation, and has developed to the point where at the present time there are some 4,500 railway cars loaded with wheat at Fort William waiting for emptying. Including that 4,500 there are a total of some 13,000 cars at Fort William and elsewhere loaded with some 18,000,000 bushels of wheat. This situation, as I say, was at first a transportation difficulty. Recently however it has developed largely into a matter of labour. The ability to get labour at the head of the lakes is the difficulty. My department, the Department of Labour and other branches of goverment concerned have, obviously, been giving this matter anxious and serious attention. I am informed that the labour situation looks as if it will reach an early solution.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is selective service doing about it?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): In addition to this situation, and arising out of it, there is the question of accepting wheat from the farmers at many points in western Canada where elevator space is not available. This is a matter which is in the hands of the wheat board, and one which has been receiving its close attention. So far as possible, they are arranging for the placing of cars at these particular points, to move the wheat.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): May I ask a supplementary question? The minister says the wheat board are arranging to have cars placed. But may I point out we are only about two weeks away from the end of the crop season. In some cases there are elevators without any space for grain to-day, and there are other elevators which have some space, but only for certain grades. In those instances it will be impossible for farmers to deliver the balance of their fifteen-bushel 1942 quota. In such cases where through no fault of his own, but rather because of lack of space in the elevtaors, the farmer has been unable to deliver his 1942 quota, will the minister undertake to see that that farmer's 1942 quota is added to his 1943 quota, after August 1, if he has been unable to deliver up to that time?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I can give the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) and all interested the assurance that where the difficulty does not arise from the farmer's own reluctance or where, for reasons beyond his control, a wheat producer is unable to deliver all of the fifteen-bushel quota of this year's crop, arrangements will be made to enable him to deliver the deliverable portion after the end of this month, the end of the crop year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will anything be done to see that the farmer is given an opportunity to get some advance on the grain he is forced to hold?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is a matter of government policy; it is being considered.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Some time before the house adjourns will the minister make a statement as to the basis of allocation agreed upon in connection with the distribution of cars? When the agriculture committee were discussing this matter the whole question was under consideration but no plan has been definitely worked out.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This is a matter of considerable interest. I may say that when the wheat board officials were before the agriculture committee the statement was made by the chairman of the wheat board that as far as he knew there were no definite criticisms or charges of discrimination with regard to the allocation of grain cars.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That has been denied since.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No. Shortly after that there were criticisms or possibly charges of discrimination received from parts of western Canada. Meetings were immediately called by the wheat board, I believe with the Saskatchewan pool, the Alberta pool and the Manitoba pool elevators for the discussion of this matter, and an effort was made to arrive at some mutual understanding as to the allocation of cars. My information is that at the last meeting each of the three organizations to which I have referred offered a separate and distinct plan. There has been no unanimous agreement arrived at as yet.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If a plan is formulated before the house adjourns, will the minister acquaint us with its terms?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Certainly.

REPRESENTATIONS OF POOLS RESPECTING HANDLING OF WESTERN WHEAT CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Not long ago representations were made to him by the three western pools. I believe some of the representations in their brief were embodied in the report of the committee on agriculture, tabled in the house to-day. Will the minister give consideration, or is he giving favourable consideration, to the representations by the pools with respect to the handling of the 1943 crop, and the balance of the crop of 1942?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, naturally, these reperesentations have been receiving the earnest consideration of the wheat subcommittee of the cabinet.

REDISTRIBUTION

REPRESENTATIONS OF PROVINCES WITH RESPECT TO POSTPONEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the session a certain amount of leniency is shown to hon. members in connection with the application of the rules of the house. In view of what we have been listening to this morning before the orders of the day were called, may I be permitted, even though I may not be strictly within the rules of the house, to ask a question of the government? Have any representations been made to the federal government by any provincial authority, outside of the province of Quebec, with regard to the deferment of the redistribution to be based upon the last decennial census? If such representations have been made, will they be tabled before the session is brought to a close?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend's question can stand as a notice and I shall make a reply later.

CANADIANS IN JAPAN

INTERNMENTS—CONDITIONS AND RESTRICTIONS AFFECTING CIVILIANS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A week ago to-day the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) asked for some information with regard to Canadians resident in Japan in order to be able to compare the conditions under which they live with the conditions under which Japanese live in Canada. The matter has been looked into carefully by officials of the Department of External Affairs, and I should like to make the following reply.

Of the 1,000 Canadian civilians known to be in Japan and Japanese occupied China, 163 are known to be interned. Others are detained in certain areas and the remainder are at liberty, but the number in each category is not known. Inquiries have been made through the protecting power as to the nature of the restrictions on movement of Canadian nationals in Japan and Japanese occupied territories, but definite information has not yet been obtained. So far as is known, Canadian civilians in the far east have not been forced to work. I may say to my hon. friend that there are a number of reports in the Department of External Affairs which have come from officials of the International Red Cross. If he or any other hon. member of the house would wish to look over those reports, they will be made available to them at the Department of External Affairs.

CANADIAN ARMY

REPORT ON FIRE IN REGINA MILITARY BARRACKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he has received a report on the fire in the military barracks at the exhibition grounds, Regina, which did some $250,000 damage? When the minister receives it, will it be made available to hon. members?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I received a preliminary report, but I do not remember about any subsequent report having come to my attention so far.

PRIVILEGE—MR. FAUTEUX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (St. Mary) (Translation: I wish to raise a question of privilege. It is reported in the July 19 issue of the newspaper Le Devoir that the leader of the Bloc Populaire, the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond), has made a statement to the effect that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) achieved a constitutional coup d'état in postponing redistribution until the end of the war. The hon. member for Beauharnois suggests that the province of Quebec should send an emissary to Westminster.

I wish to protest against the use of the expression "constitutional coup d'état" and to tell the hon. member for Beauharnois how unfortunate it was that at the time that resolution was passed not a single member of the Bloc Populaire was present in this house to vote against the measure.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

FARMERS' CREDITORS

CONSOLIDATION OF ARRANGEMENT ACT OF 1934 AND AMENDMENTS

The house resumed from Monday, July 19, consideration in committee of bill No. 132, to facilitate compromises and arrangements between insolvent farmers and their creditors —Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I wish to say that this question of farm debts bids fair to remain, as it has been since 1935, a political football. I am not unmindful of the fact that one provincial government in this dominion obtained power by promises of what it would do if put into power in that province: I refer of course to Alberta. If the farm debt question was not regarded as a vote getter, much of the talk which we have heard on this bill would never have taken place, and I feel confident that the vast majority of farmers in western Canada will appraise at their true worth the adulatory remarks which have been made with respect to them by certain hon. gentlemen connected with the Social Credit and Cooperative Commonwealth Federation parties. I was astounded at the lengths to which some hon. members have gone in fulsome praise of all farmers in western Canada. One hon. member was so good as to say that all of them were honest, efficient and industrious. I recommend to those hon. gentlemen that when they go back to their constituencies they talk with some of the farmers there about their neighbours. They know very well, and the records prove, that such a statement is wholly false in fact. I for one do not believe, speaking by and large, that farmers as such are any more honest than lawyers—that is, members of my own profession—and I do not believe that all lawyers are honest. The same is true equally with regard to preachers—

Mr. McIVOR: I question that statement.

Mr. REID: You would not be willing to debate it, though?

Mr. EDWARDS: —and teachers, and business men, and insurance men; not all of them are honest. Fortunately we have laws of general application which take care of the dishonest, the lazy and the unthrifty, and where such laws are not applicable, nature often steps in and takes care of the situation. I suggest that hon. members approach this problem with a practical sense of its implications, and of the damage which may be done to those who do not now and never will claim the alleged benefits of this legislation.

Circumstances do arise in which by reason of unpredictable conditions, special legislation is necessary. This condition arose so far as agriculture is concerned in western Canada in the late 'thirties, when the then leader of the Conservative party, a man whom I delight to honour as my predecessor, the hon. member for West Calgary, and a former prime minister of this dominion, introduced and passed with the approval of this house a farmers' creditors arrangement act to take care of those special circumstances and conditions—conditions whose effects were spread not only over the west but all through agricultural Canada. The act as then passed was made of general application. It was designed to help whom? Everybody? All farmers? No; only those who could satisfy a tribunal, set up for the purpose of adjudicating thereon, that they were unable, through circumstances beyond their control as efficient, industrious and honest farmers, to meet their debts as they came due. That act has been in operation for nine years in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and despite that fact, despite the fact that the door was wide open to any and every farmer who felt that he could comply with the simple conditions set forth in the act, despite the availability of these boards and the simplicity of the procedure, less than ten percent of the farmers have availed themselves of the privilege or opportunity presented by this legislation.

Now, why be so much concerned about the ten or at the very outside fifteen per cent of your farming population being unable to meet their debts as they become due? Have we similar special legislation with regard to other sections or classes of the community? The answer is definitely in the negative. I suggest that the fact that the other provinces of Canada took early steps to have the act removed from application to their provinces should make us pause and consider. The fact that, as I now understand, there are so few applications before the boards at the present time should give us reason to pause and consider whether or not this legislation should be passed at all. I may say quite frankly that but for the limitations in the bill as to the debts to which it will apply, I for one would not support the passing of the bill. I believe that in our attempt to help ten per cent, or fifteen per cent at the very outside, of our farming community in western Canada, we may do irreparable harm to the other eighty-five or ninety per cent of the farmers of the west, and it is on their behalf that I am prompted to speak as I do this afternoon. All the implications of this bill will be felt in our post-war period so far as the vast majority of our farming population is concerned.

As the member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) so well said last night, and as the premier of Manitoba eloquently and logically stated in the address which the hon. member quoted, credit is based upon confidence. That is the keystone of the arch, not only of commercial and industrial but of agricultural relations and in all our business relations generally. It is not difficult for you and me to find out what our credit is. If you have any doubts about that, ask your friend, ask your neighbour how much he will lend you.

I do suggest that credit and confidence are based on knowledge, character and past dealings, and if we are dishonourable, if our record is bad, then our credit as such is gone. If it is to be bruited abroad that a first mortgage or an agreement for sale has no validity in a court of British justice, by reason of an act of this parliament interfering with contractual obligations, then I for one would not want to invest my money or my savings or earnings in any venture founded on real estate security in the province of Alberta.

The implications of this bill go farther than one individual case. I dare say we are all aware that in years gone by people have invested their money or saved it by buying life insurance, and they look to those policies to provide for them, for those whom they love and who are dependent upon them in their later years, or when they are gone and yet I know, as does everyone here, that the insurance policy which is to be a protection for me in my old age, and for my dependents, cannot be paid, it cannot be matured unless the mortgages in western Canada are paid with interest. I wonder how many of us would be in favour of this legislation if there were introduced concurrent legislation to provide that the life insurance companies, which are the great repository of trust funds in Canada, were to be relieved of their contractual obligations, to pay your wife or your dependent children, or yourself in your old age, the amounts stipulated for in the contract.

I say therefore that this legislation has a much wider implication than the province of Alberta, or Saskatchewan or Manitoba. I for one would like to believe that the insurance companies with whom I have been depositing my premiums from year to year were spending some portion of that money in helping responsible farmers, business men and industrialists in the province of Alberta; and yet I would be the first to rise and condemn them if under existing legislation, or legislation as we have had it in that province for the last ten years, any insurance company had invested my life savings in a first mortgage in Alberta, or in an agreement for sale, or even in provincial government bonds. I am sure that upon a realization of that fact the same criticism would fall from your lips. This is extraordinary, exceptional legislation. It interferes with contractual rights and obligations, regard and respect for which go to the very roots of our economic system in the English-speaking world. This is essentially class legislation, and as such should be viewed not only from the standpoint of the comparatively few citizens of the class who will benefit, but from the effect which it will have on the rest of the class, on the rest of the farmers who constitute the vast majority of the people of western Canada, and upon our citizenry as a whole.

Confidence is the basis of all credit. Without credit western Canada would not have developed as it has in the last thirty years, and without credit western Canada cannot hope to keep pace with the rest of the dominion in the post-war years.

Coming to the farmers of western Canada themselves, while I do not and have not acted for many years for any so-called investment companies, mortgage or life insurance companies, I did have in the earlier years of my practice, in the years succeeding 1920, from 1921 to 1925, considerable to do with mortgage foreclosures. I did act for one mortgage company and that experience served to confirm me in my belief in one thing, and that is the absolute impartiality and fairness and essential justice of our courts in dealing with mortgage foreclosures. I foreclosed from one hundred to one hundred and fifty mortgages in that time. That is a conservative estimate. In no instance was the foreclosure opposed. In no instance was there by any stretch of the imagination one dollar of equity in the land for the borrower. In every instance the mortgage company took losses varying from a few hundred to several thousands of dollars.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Where had the farmers' equity gone?

Mr. EDWARDS: The farmers' equity had gone, if you will, "with the wind". In many instances the farmer had abandoned his land. It was my usual practice to make inquiries of the secretary of the municipality, the school board or the reeve of the municipality in regard to the character and ability and industry and thrift and honesty of the farmer whose mortgage was being foreclosed. In no instance that I can recall was there any protest by any neighbour or by any responsible man in the community as to the impropriety of the proceedings which had to be taken. It is not surprising to know that that mortgage company is no longer in business. It failed—and there is no legislation to take care of it.

My second observation is this. I have amongst my clientele numbers of elderly people, retired farmers, if you will, men who sold their farms because of age or infirmity. One of the most distressing things to me is to find an old couple who have spent their years in developing and paying for a farm in Saskatchewan, in one instance, in Alberta in another, now living on relief and charity by reason of the application of this act, which wiped out their equity in their farm and left them without a roof over their heads that they could call their own. They are now dependent on the bounty of the province. In the one instance that comes most vividly to my mind a farmer came in from across the line, not a Canadian citizen, and bought this farm for $2,000 cash and a promise to pay the balance, not in cash but in so many thousands of bushels of wheat in succeeding years. And now he carries on secure in his tenure on a farm on which he has lived for only four or five years. He has changed his method of farming and gone into live stock, cattle and hogs, and lives in comparative luxury on the farm which the farmer and his wife homesteaded while they exist in homeless penury.

It works both ways. There are not a few farmers in Saskatchewan and Alberta who would gladly sell their farms but for this act and similar legislation that has been in existence in the province. Now, perforce, they will not sell unless they get all cash. Young men are growing up in our province to-day who would willingly and gladly buy a farm and establish a home, but they cannot do it because they cannot get the credit. Their neighbours, men who have known them all their lives, older men, say: I cannot sell to you for fear of this very legislation. The result is that we are doing the very thing that some hon. gentlemen who spoke last night deplored. We are creating a condition in those western provinces which can lead to nothing but a population of tenant farmers. I could name a dozen men to-day in good districts in Alberta who would gladly sell their farms but for this and similar legislation. But now it is "all cash or nothing". And why? Because the farmer who owns his land says: This farm is all I have to take care of me, and you may make an agreement to pay me one-third of the crop up to five or ten thousand, or whatever the case may be. But to-morrow or next year you may walk into the debt adjustment office and take advantage of this legislation, and I shall no longer have my home or security; the payments on which I was relying to keep me in my old age will not be forthcoming, so that I prefer not to sell, and I shall rent my farm instead, as so many other farmers have done and are doing. The same thing is true in connection with the lands which have been foreclosed in years gone by; no mortgage or investment company will lend money on farm mortgages or discount agreements for sale, for the very reason I have mentioned. What is the foundation of all credit? It is confidence.

I commend the minister for the legislation he has introduced. I commend him on the limiting clauses which are contained in that legislation for, as I see the prospects ahead, with the prosperity we have in western Canada at the present time, with the record now before us as to the reduction and liquidation of farm debts and obligations, in another three, four or five years this legislation will go into the discard, because no longer will it be necessary. Then I trust that the confidence of the investing public in western Canada will be restored and that we shall go ahead side by side with our sister provinces, participating to the fullest extent in the prosperity which I believe lies ahead of this the finest country in the world.

Mr. HANSELL: I think I can say I take just a little pleasure in following the hon. member for Calgary West. The hon. gentleman has made one or two very singular statements. To me he seemed particularly interested in the welfare of insurance companies and other financial institutions, and I wondered if he had forgotten that the legislation we are now discussing is supposed to be designed to settle debt, not to protect any investment funds he may have in the form of premiums deposited with insurance companies. The unfortunate thing about his exposition this afternoon is that evidently he is in a happier position than many others, in that he has some little investment in the form of life insurance premiums. As I understand it, this debt legislation is designed to protect the unfortunate farmer who never in the wide world will be able to build up any security for his old age in terms of insurance.

The hon. gentleman said that he has never represented any financial institution. Well, I should say that he could not have done a better job of representing them than he did in his speech this afternoon. I believe the hon. gentleman should have thought a little more deeply than evidently he has been thinking in the past. He had a good deal to say about the credit of Alberta; in the first place he had a good deal to say about confidence. The very word "confidence" is a misnomer unless we are told in what we are to have confidence. The hon. gentleman was speaking as though the investment corporations had no confidence in the Alberta government. Well, I am not going to say whether they have or have not; if the hon. gentleman wishes to speak in those terms, that is all right with me. While he was speaking, however, I rather fancied that he imagined himself on the opposition side in the Alberta legislature. The hon. member for Acadia reminds me to ask the hon. gentleman whether he has ever read the report of the Bank of Canada following the investigation it made into the Alberta situation a few years ago. I have not the exact words before me, but that report placed almost the entire blame for the loss of credit upon former administrations in that province, particularly those administrations under the Liberal regime. However, I shall not now bring up that old stuff. I should like to know, however, in what the hon. gentleman means we should have confidence. Surely there is not a mortgage company which would not have confidence in an agricultural policy which gave farmers adequate prices for their produce. I suggest that the hon. member's thinking is a little shallow there, and I believe he should go a little further under the surface.

Let us look at the matter in this way. If in Canada there could be an agricultural policy which would keep agriculture solvent, therein would lie all the confidence of which any investors would ever have need. I suggest that if in the past the Alberta government took certain action to protect the farmers, it was not because it had any grievance against the mortgage companies or lending institutions, but because this Ottawa government, which is responsible for national policy, never had a national agricultural policy that kept agriculture solvent at all times. I think the hon. member should look at matters in that light, instead of playing politics to the gallery. Let me remind the hon. member of this: If agriculture in Alberta had been solvent there would have been no need for the government of that province in days gone by to tackle so vigorously the debt situation as it existed there. The only reason they tackled it was that the farmers were being driven off their land and out of their homes. Surely the sanctity of a farm home is as sacred as some sort of financial scheme. That is the way we must look at the operation of the present fiscal policy of the country.

We have no quarrel with the lending institutions. They are all well and good in their proper place. Our quarrel is with a bad financial policy, with finance itself, with monetary arrangements which have existed and continue to exist. I believe I can say that, after all, the basic trouble of practically all our problems, even to the extent of our international problems, is one of finance.

Since the hon. member for West Calgary has mentioned Alberta, may I point out that ever since it took office in 1935 the Alberta government has laboured hard and battled well to alleviate the most distressing agricultural debt situation one could imagine. As early as 1937 the government of that province passed what was known as the Credit of Alberta Regulation Act. This was basic legislation which, we believe, would have enabled the government of Alberta to deal with the debt problem. But what happened to this legislation? It was immediately disallowed by the central government here at Ottawa. Following that the Alberta government passed a measure known as the Reduction and Settlement of Debt Act. This act would have established a basis of settlement for all outstanding debts. But what happened to that legislation? It was declared by the courts to be ultra vires of the province. Then came what is known as the Home-Owners Security Act. This was passed because, under the stress of world conditions and, shall I say, a falsified financial system over which individuals had no control whatsoever, many were forced to mortgage their homes, and were then in danger of losing them. Surely it should be recognized that there can be no sanctity of contract which does not also recognize the sanctity of human life and homes. Surely the sanctity of homes has as least as much value as the consideration of a faulty money system. This act, too, was disallowed by the central government at Ottawa. If it had been allowed to stand it would have brought debtor and creditor together to seek an equitable basis of settlement through the medium of a debt adjustment board. The farmers of Alberta would not have been faced with the present situation had that act not been disallowed.

That is our contention, and has been from that day to this. The argument has gone on as to whether or not the debt adjustment board had the right to settle debts. This issue was thrown out, not only by the courts of Canada but by the privy council. This, Mr. Chairman, is the record of a great battle against a great power. And I will say this, that the late William Aberhart started the battle for the emancipation of the people from slavery and debt. That battle is not yet won, but, may I say to the committee through you, Mr. Chairman, the battle is not yet lost, either. We are going to continue to fight on against a faulty money system, a financial power which, after all, is the greatest power and enemy of the people in the world.

I believe I should say that the responsibility in connection with farm debt does not lie altogether upon the shoulders of the farmers. It seems to me that the lending institutions must bear their fair share of the responsibility. The farmer is no more responsible for the weather, for the drought, for the grasshoppers, for the hail or for the frost than is the lending institution. But of course the lending institution must be protected in some way or another, while the farmer is left to do the best he can, under conditions of uncertainty.

I hold in my hand a brief entitled "Abuses of Arbitrary Debt Adjustment," put out by the Dominion Mortgage and Investments Association. I believe it was referred to a few days ago. In this brief we find set out a number of examples, and I should like to read only a few words for purposes of illustration. This is what I find at page 7:

> A loan of $800 was made on a quarter-section (160 acres) in 1928. In the 12 years prior to the Board of Review hearing, the borrower paid $131 to the mortgagee and $31 on account of taxes, an average of $13.50 a year. At the end of 12 years, in addition to the $800 which had been loaned him, he owed $119 for insurance premiums, etc., $623 interest and $366 tax arrears. If he had had no mortgage he would have still gone behind more than $200 on his taxes alone.

Before going further I would point out that the lending institution lent the money to this farmer. Surely they would know something about him, the location of his farm and whether or not it was productive. But notice what happens. The brief goes on to state:

> Neither the amount of the loan, the interest rate nor anything else in connection with his mortgage has any material bearing on this man's difficulties.

Well, that is all right; we agree with that statement. I believe it would be true in almost every case. Perhaps farmers have been treated fairly well; perhaps mortgage companies have attempted to settle debts equitably, so long as they were protected and did not lose any money. I am not saying they did not. So that phase of the brief is quite all right. But notice this part:

> The facts speak for themselves. Evidence tendered showed that the debtor was an inefficient farmer unable to manage his farm or personal affairs.

Yet the lending institution lent money to this farmer. Surely they should have known something about the farmer at the time. Then it goes on to say:

> His land is admittedly poor and low grade.

Did the mortgage company not know that before they lent the money?

> As a productive self-contained unit it is never likely to produce sufficient to maintain this family, let alone pay off any debt or taxes.

Yet the lending company lent the money.

> It has, however, a value of at least $1,100 as an adjunct to an adjoining farm.

It would appear from that simple statement that just so long as the lending company is secured, it is not very much concerned about the welfare of the farmer or the question whether or not he can pay his debts. If it had been, it would have safeguarded its interests before it ever lent the money. When companies do that sort of thing surely they have some responsibility if it works out that the farmer, doing the best he can with poor land and gambling against the price of wheat, frost, drought, grass-hoppers and all the other things that enter into the uncertainty of farming, cannot meet his burden of debt.

The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has handed to me a Bank of Canada report on the financial position of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, 1937. This is what that report says in respect of Alberta on page 34:

> After making full allowance for the rapid economic development of the new province, and the legitimate cost of facilities provided by the government to aid and stimulate this development, it remains the case—in our opinion—that the 1905-22 period was characterized by waste, loose administration, and incurrence of debt to an extent which could not be justified even when allowance is made for the optimistic spirit of the times.

That period of the provinces' history was governed by a Liberal administration. I thank the hon. member for Acadia for handing me that report. The hon. member for Calgary West can think over that should he ever be suffering from insomnia any of these nights.

I should like to say something that perhaps has been said already. I am at a loss to know why the Minister of Finance has evidently ignored the recommendations of the debt conference which was called by the three western provinces. The premiers of these provinces met together and forgot politics. Mr. Bracken who was then premier of Manitoba, Premier Aberhart of Alberta and Premier Patterson of Saskatchewan, forgot their political differences and joined hand to hand in a debt conference. They arrived at certain conclusions and they presented a draft bill. Those premiers subsequently came down and interviewed the government, but so far as this present legislation is concerned it would appear that their representations have been entirely ignored. Since we are in committee I would ask the minister to tell us why he ignored the recommendations of that conference of premiers. In addition to that, farm organizations have submitted briefs of one kind and another, but evidently they have been ignored in this legislation.

This whole situation will never be cleared up by simply passing debt legislation of this kind; the whole debt problem will have to be tackled in a different way. Last fall a conference was held in Winnipeg on post-war reconstruction, and one paragraph of the resolution dealing with private and industrial debts reads as follows:

Therefore, be it resolved that all agricultural mortgage debts be taken over by an agricultural credit bank operating under a national monetary authority, on the following basis:

(a) The principal amount of debts to be reduced to the original indebtedness less all payments made in excess of three per cent. The farmer will be required to pay this to the agricultural credit bank in equitable instalments on a crop or production share basis.

(b) The agricultural credit bank will repay creditors on equitable terms which will ensure that individuals incur no loss and corporations can meet their liabilities in full.

If something like that were done, the hon. member for Calgary West would need to have no misgivings that any insurance company, mortgage company or any other lending institution would go broke.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Or run away with the premiums.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Bow River says, "or run away with the premiums." I think the debt situation ought to be tackled in some such way, and I believe it can be. What the government is attempting to do is to tackle the debt situation under the present fiscal policy of Canada.

I am disappointed that this bill was not referred to the banking and commerce committee. Perhaps as a private member I should take a little blame for that, but I think the minister could have initiated the matter. I see no reason why the bill could not have been sent to that committee. Some while ago the government found this debt situation left on their doorstep; they had to wrestle with it, and what did they do? For week in and week out the members of this house were urging that legislation be brought down, were asking when it would be brought down. We were told it would be brought down when the appropriation bill was passed, and it is brought down in the dying days of the session. There is no reason why a bill of this kind could not have been brought down earlier and referred to the banking and commerce committee, which would have had an opportunity of calling witnesses from the western provinces, from agricultural organizations and from mortgage companies too. They could all have placed their cards on the table face up. Then the banking and commerce committee could have reported to the house, and I have no hesitation in saying that the recommendations made would have fitted the situation—that is, if they had reported correctly upon the evidence submitted. The result is that we are not informed of the briefs which were submitted. The premiers have come down and spoken to the government; the government have said, "Thank you, gentlemen, you can now go home." But we do not know what their submission was.

Mr. HLYNKA: They went home.

Mr. HANSELL: They went home, anyway.

I think something of that kind should have been done. I do not know what the rules and regulations of the house are on this point, but if there is any possibility of it, I believe the minister would do a service to his government, to the country, and particularly to agriculture and lending institutions, if he would have the bill go to the banking and commerce committee, which could fully investigate the whole matter, whose proceedings would be known to all hon. members and to the country; have them report accordingly, and have a bill based on the work of the committee placed before the house. I recommend that. I have nothing to add at this particular stage of the debate.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): The short-sighted policy of the government has led them to another breach of right in introducing this measure. In spite of our constant protests, they have called and keep on calling farmers to serve in the armed forces. It is not at all surprising that they must now have recourse to extraordinary remedies in order to save what can still be saved of our agricultural economy sabotaged by the present administration which must bear the blame. Moratorium and delay are synonymous. Postponements never did cure an evil, but on the contrary, always made it worse. The government says: let us put off until to-morrow the action which must be taken. It is difficult to face duty squarely. Mr. Bennett established a moratorium in peace-time. Why should we not have our own war moratorium, thinks the government.

This arrangement act which they criticized, they adopt it to-day as their favourite child. Thus you see how far an unwholesome and hypocritical policy may lead. In the past few years, we have witnessed the worst contradictions and the repudiation of the most sacred promises. At present, we witness the desperate attempt of an administration which has placed agriculture in a deplorable position because it always rejected the amendments which I moved so often asking that farmers be given complete and final exemption from military service. The government is doing even worse than that. They pay the western farmer to reduce his production and rudely tell the mortgagee who has a right to complain: Evil rich man, you can just wait and pay me your taxes.

Thus the phantom government which presides over the destiny of the country speaks to the people they administer. In fact, Mr. Chairman, it is not Ottawa which governs here, but London and Washington. Yet Canada, an agricultural country, supplies Britain with innumerable quantities of food, just as she exports enormous stocks to the United States. The remainder of agricultural manpower is mobilized for those purposes, while rationing spreads its tentacles over our civilian population and our army. In spite of all the sacrifices made so far by Canada, when the Prime Minister of the country wishes to tell the world that thousands of our countrymen are shedding their blood in Sicily, he must ask permission of London, and London flatly refuses. He secures this signal favour only by kneeling at the feet of Mr. Roosevelt. The government will, nevertheless, keep on sending our youth, our food, our munitions and billion dollar gifts to that mother country which is scandalized by the heroism of our soldiers.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. What have my hon. friend's remarks about gifts of millions of dollars to Britain, and sacrifices in Sicily, to do with the bill which is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is well taken. Surely there is enough scope within the orbit of the bill at present before the committee to enable an hon. member to keep away from the questions and problems the hon. member is bringing before the committee at this time.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I believe the hon. parliamentary assistant who raised a point of order did not grasp my remarks at all.

Mr. ABBOTT (Translation): I grasped them very well.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): My remarks have a bearing on the bill before us. We are now discussing a moratorium bill concerning agricultural mortgages. Under this bill, I have a perfect right to deal with considerations which other members are allowed to bring up in the house. At any rate, I have just about finished my remarks.

As far as we are concerned, in these supremely humiliating circumstances, we shall have to face scarcity, perhaps even famine which already threatens us, for lack of a sufficient harvest in Canada.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

Mr. ABBOTT: The same objection, Mr. Chairman. This has nothing to do with the bill which is before the committee. Whether or not we are faced with a famine can have no possible relation to the clause we are considering.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, who is an experienced parliamentarian, ought to know that he should confine his remarks to the bill under discussion, and I trust he will abide by the ruling of the committee.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, since I am addressing the house in my mother tongue, I would ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance to be so kind as to speak French the next time he raises a point of order.

Mr. ABBOTT (Translation): With pleasure, Mr. Chairman. The remarks just made by the hon. member have no connection with the bill which is before the house.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I was discussing a few moments ago the threat of scarcity and famine with which we are faced. I respectfully submit that in discussing the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act I have a perfect right to deal with these questions. I believe, moreover, that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has not at all grasped the essential points of my remarks. I was saying a while ago that we shall be face to face with famine. Then it will be the valley of humiliation, not only for the leader of the hon. member who has just raised this point of order, but also for all the true Canadians in the population of the country. As for the others—and this is my last word—history shall hold them responsible for having sacrificed our fatherland in adventurous undertakings which already cast ridicule upon our country and undermine its very social and economic foundations.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order. The last words of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains certainly have nothing to do with the subject under discussion. It is my duty to see that the rules are enforced. I am convinced that the hon. member himself knows that the remarks he has just made have no connection whatsoever with the bill now before the committee.

Mr. ABBOTT (Translation): He knows it full well.

Mr. CHURCH: Representing a province which is both industrial and agricultural, I wish to say a few words on the inequality of this proposed national policy for debt reconstruction in Canada, growing out of the principle laid down in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which was passed by parliament in 1934 during the period of depression and drouth. The government of that day adopted a courageous course in an endeavour to help the farmers on the prairies, and in 1938 all the provinces were excluded with the exception of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

I have been a critic of the loan companies, insurance companies and mortgage companies in this country, and when I saw the amendments that were introduced in 1938 in connection with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and saw at the same time that war was almost inevitable, I predicted that the provincial debt legislation would be upset on appeal to the privy council. That prediction was fulfilled, as everyone knows.

What I object to with regard to this whole question is this. It would be far better for the government to adopt a truly national policy of debt readjustment to protect the equities not only of the farmers of western Canada but of other classes of the population. A policy of debt reduction and the conservation of equities, as well as the readjustment of differences between mortgagors and mortgagees, would be a truly national policy if it brought within its scope all classes from coast to coast including farmers, fishermen, industrial workers and the white collar workers in the cities and towns, and market gardeners. Ontario seems to be the forgotten province of confederation. It is a large agricultural province, as well as a large industrial centre, but it has been entirely overlooked by the government in the matter of debt readjustment.

The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has been administered in a haphazard manner by the various boards throughout the country, so that there has not been equality in the attempt to relieve the burdens of those who have been suffering from debts. When the war began I had a motion on the order paper in which I proposed a national moratorium in Canada, and I suggest that it would have been far better as a means of protecting the equities of the Canadian people, because the system which we are now considering protects the equities of some and ignores the equities of other classes. I proposed a truly national policy of debt reduction instead of the system we have here, which is one of state socialism for a section of the community and not for others. This is a federal measure, and if we are going to conserve the interests of some people in Canada we should do the same for the whole population, in a real national policy, including those engaged in industrial pursuits. It should apply particularly to the primary producers—lumbermen, fishermen, farmers and those engaged in the industrial life of Canada. The bill before us, however, does not aim at anything so equitable.

It is proposed that certain judges shall take charge of the administration of this bill when it becomes law. This, I suggest, will prove as fatal as the mistakes that were made under the original Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. The purpose is to rescind the 1934 act, which now applies only to Alberta and Saskatchewan; the explanation given in the explanatory note is that it is intended to consolidate and re-write the act so as to make it applicable to certain classes of farmers, namely, those on the prairies, and to include Manitoba in the new debt adjustment scheme.

In the past I have also made certain proposals, which I thought would prove of benefit to the Canadian people, with regard to the shark loan companies. I suggested that there should be a national moratorium on all equities and that the rate of interest should be fixed at 5 per cent or less, or in any event that there should be a lower rate than those which were being charged. Just consider the lot of our industrial workers in the cities and towns. What is going to become of these people at the close of the war? They are going to lose their jobs altogether, their equity will be gone, and during the period of conversion from war-time to peace-time standards over a number of years there will be a large number of Canadian workers without employment. We know what happened after the last war. At that time nearly 600,000 people from the farms and from various occupations in the cities and towns of Canada found it necessary to migrate to the United States to look for work. I am afraid the same thing will happen after this war, but the situation will be more serious. The government, therefore, should try in a national scheme to preserve the equities of all our people and not just those of a particular section.

I quite appreciate the condition of the farmers on the prairie. They have had to face long years of drought and depression, and two wars, and they have seen the prices of their products fall to an alarming degree; wheat had gone down from $1.50 to 34 cents or thereabouts, and they have had to pay high prices for the things they have had to buy. I deeply sympathize with them, and so did the Conservative government in 1934 when they brought down the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to meet the condition that prevailed at that time of depression and drought. That act had been weighed in the balance and found wanting, but I do not think that the new proposed measure will help matters very much.

I have received a number of pamphlets from mortgage and loan companies, and I admit that there is a degree of justice in some of the statements they make. I quote:

> The debt legislation suggested by the governments of the three prairie provinces is so drastic in character that it would completely destroy western farm credit and would mean that for all practical purposes there would be no such thing as a farm mortgage.
> There is need for curtailment rather than an extension of farm debt legislation. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed in 1934 as a temporary measure to meet a temporary emergency, but the emergency has passed and the position of western farmers has improved very materially. Cash income of Manitoba and Alberta farmers is greater than in the prosperous 1926-1929 period.
> The farm debt situation is greatly exaggerated in some quarters in western Canada. Half of the farms have no mortgage debt and only a small percentage are burdened with debt. Deserving borrowers already have ample protection from harsh creditors and there is no danger of a flood of foreclosures.
> The real owners of farm mortgages held by a savings institution such as a life insurance company are the policyholders. There are far more policyholders than there are borrowers on a mortgage and this is true not only for the country as a whole but for western Canada itself. Unnecessary losses brought about by debt legislation come out of the pockets of policyholders.

Let us not forget that some of the mortgages are held by private persons, widows and others. I have no objection to the principle of the bill, but, I repeat, there are other people in Canada who need similar assistance. Our industrial workers will suffer when this war is over, if not before. But the owners of real estate are also faced with a problem and there is no similar protection for them. Nearly everyone in this house has real estate of some description. In our cities and towns to-day no one wants to own real estate because there is no protection for the owner. The minister comes along and appoints a rent controller and makes it impossible by the regulations he passes for any man to administer his property as he should from the commercial aspect. He cannot get any real revenue from it because he is hemmed in by controllers and subcontrollers. Why is his equity also not included in this bill? Some of the mortgagees in the cities and towns are charging 6½ per cent and we know that for years the shark loan companies have been charging two per cent per month and sometimes three per cent. They have also asked for chattel mortgages and bills of sale as collateral, and have been in effect a lot of tax collectors. What chance has the industrial worker, the urban or suburban worker, and the market and truck gardener?

This pamphlet, "The Prairie Farmer and His Debts", says at page 9, that the borrowers need a sound mortgage law. If I had my way I would have a sound mortgage law under which the rate of interest would be four and a half or five per cent, with a national moratorium for everyone for the war period, if necessary, because everybody wants to pay his debts. But some of these mortgage companies are charging six and a half per cent, and that should be impossible to-day. Speaking of the legislation which has been proposed to the dominion government for the adjustment of farm debts in the prairie provinces and its defects and dangers, this pamphlet says:

> If enacted, it would destroy western farm credit. It would also have very far reaching effects on existing farm mortgages in western Canada. For all practical purposes it would mean that there is no such thing as a farm mortgage. Present and future mortgages and agreements for sale would be nothing more than a promise to pay—

They mean it will become a scrap of paper, no doubt.

> —the amount and conditions of payment to be determined by a non-judicial tribunal from whose arbitrary decision there will presumably be no appeal as is the case under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.
> The effect of the legislation would be to make all contracts with western farmers one-sided. A mortgage or other written contract would have little meaning. There would be little point in making a loan to a farmer by way of a mortgage or in selling a farm under an agreement for sale. The creditor or vendor would be bound, but the debtor or purchaser would not. No matter what contract was executed by the debtor, the creditor would have no security though he will have parted with his money or property. Such legislation would make mortgages a nullity and would in fact abolish mortgages by removing every vestige of the legal rights which have always characterized them.
> Western farmers themselves would suffer from such legislation. Farmers desiring to retire would hesitate to sell their farms, except for all cash or with very substantial cash down payments. The risk of doing so would be too great for the amount and terms of payment would be uncertain. Would-be purchasers, except those with substantial capital, would be unable to buy farms. This, in fact, is very much the situation which prevails to-day though existing debt legislation does not apply to new contracts. The reason for this is the fear that the legislation may be changed to apply to new as well as old contracts. It is now apparent that this fear is justified, the proof being the legislation which has been proposed to the dominion government. This proposed legislation would place restrictions on the rights of creditors under all contracts whether existing or future.

I say in all fairness to the workers of this country that there should be equality of treatment between the urban and suburban workers and the workers on the farm, instead of letting one man's equity be wiped out while the other man's equity has the protection of a statute. That is not a fair proposition. There should be equality of treatment. That was one of the weaknesses of the act of 1934, and I raised this very question when our own government was in power. I said that it was most unfair and unequitable to the industrial workers in our cities and towns that they should not be given the same equality of treatment as was afforded to the farming population—and in 1935 fishermen were added—under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. But the industrial workers are given no such relief.

Mr. WOOD: This legislation does not apply particularly to Ontario, because we freed ourselves from it back in 1938, and I am sure it is a good thing for agriculture that we did; for I consider this bad legislation. After all, Canada is a young country and we would do well to look very carefully at this type of legislation which more or less legalizes dishonesty. We are trying in this young nation to develop a character for honesty and traditions of good citizenship to hand down to posterity, and I sometimes wonder what they will think of legislation of this type which does not honour contracts. I make my appeal not only from the point of view not only of the good of the nation but also of the good of the honest-to-goodness farmer who many find himself deprived of credit because of the record established by those who have taken advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. No doubt some good has been accomplished by the act, but we have paid very dearly for it. When someone has been kind enough to lend his substance, an honest effort should be made to repay the loan, and I do not see why a loan should not be repaid to a mortgage company just as much as to an individual. Unfortunately one can hardly speak of financial institutions if one comes from Ontario without being branded as a defender of the big interests. Let me say that I have no interest whatsoever in any loan company. I am thinking only of the welfare of the honest-to-goodness farmer who may need some credit in the post-war period, and from his point of view I say that this legislation in the main has been bad legislation.

The Minister of Finance is to be congratulated upon having removed from the act some of the vices which brought discredit on agriculture. I yield to no man in my desire to serve the agricultural industry. But we must take a long term view of it. We as farmers cannot be continually branded as people who refuse to assume our obligations if we expect to retain our dignity and self-respect. I say that this legislation was a great handicap to the prosperity of agriculture in Ontario.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for Macleod. He felt there should be some way of tackling this debt problem. I say frankly that the only way of tackling the debt problem is by sacrifice, thrift and honesty, and restoring the loans to those who have been kind enough to lend of their substance. There may be those who through unfortunate circumstances get into a position where they cannot pay, but it must be remembered that the loans which have been made to agriculture created assets in those farms if the money was wisely spent, and those farms should in consequence have increased in value.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for North Battleford. She mentioned the case of a man who had homesteaded on a farm and had raised fourteen children and afterwards became insolvent and could not retain his home. But, after all, that person had the use of that land, and is there any hon. member who would not exchange one hundred acres of land for fourteen children? I think he did get some value after all, because while he was on that farm he raised fourteen children. We must look at both sides of the question if we are to be fair.

I read the remarks which the hon. member for Yorkton made on this bill. He said that debt is the natural result of the capitalist system, and that under this system the reward of capital always comes first, and the reward to labour has to take care of itself. Well, Mr. Speaker, what is capital? As I see it, the difficulty in many of these controversial questions is that it depends on whose ox is being gored. After all, capital is nothing but stored up labour; and if the nation is to be served by capital it is necessary to put that labour to work, whether it is in the form of money or in any other form. After all, it is necessary for this country to be developed, and it is necessary that this stored up labour be used. The unfortunate thing is that as long as this world is peopled by human beings there will be envy and jealousy. The man who made sacrifices, who in his early days went without things; the man whose father or grandfather pioneered with the idea of making the world a better place in which his descendants might live, now is looked upon with envious eyes by those who think he is travelling rather an easy road, when the very people who criticize him very often are the ones who would refuse to make sacrifices themselves in order to store up some of this labour, to put themselves in the position of a creditor instead of that of a debtor. This may be hard language to use to hon. gentlemen across the way, and I should be rather reluctant to make these statements but for the fact that on almost every measure that comes up in this house we have to listen to pious, hypocritical expressions in regard to honesty and dishonesty; and then it turns out that they want some back-door method by means of which dishonesty may serve their purposes, when they have not enough stamina to make the sacrifices that have been made by others. These things may serve their own purposes, but they do great harm to the industry of agriculture.

I am satisfied that the farmer himself can usually handle his own problems. I do not understand why in the western provinces so many of these loans have come into the hands of the large corporations. Surely there are individuals who have saved money. Why do they not lend to their neighbours as we have done in Ontario? By virtue of their sacrifices the pioneers in this country accumulated funds which they were able to lend to their neighbours, and the honesty and integrity of those neighbours had a great deal to do with maintaining the credit of our people. If that honesty and integrity are destroyed, then your credit is destroyed also.

The remarks of the hon. member for Calgary West were refreshing and, I think, timely. He said some things that needed to be said. I am not so far removed from the pioneer stock. I happen to be the grandson of an old pioneer who left a comfortable home in the old country to settle in Canada. If he had been looking out for his own interests I would not be enjoying the privileges that are mine to-day. Perhaps I am reaping the benefit of that stored up labour and energy which my grandfather was prepared to sacrifice in order to accumulate, but I think that point ought to be emphasized. I will admit that I was born in the horse and buggy days, but I have seen some of the virtues of those pioneers. Let me tell my hon. friends across the way that those who have achieved success have not done so by taking advantage of some of these legalized back-door methods of practising dishonesty.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is that the way you describe this legislation?

Mr. WOOD: That is how I describe anything that legalizes dishonesty. It must be remembered that this measure originally was passed in 1934, and it is not possible to correct all the errors and irregularities of society at once. I am glad the minister has taken steps to insert some provisions in the bill which will ensure a certain amount of fair play on both sides, so that the credit of the farmers may be established and the dishonest farmer may not take advantage of this measure. I do not want to be understood as saying there is any more dishonesty among farmers than among any other class; as the hon. member for Calgary West has said, farmers are as honest as any other group, but after all they are only human. I know there is the odd farmer who will put his small apples in the bottom of the basket. I have known farmers who would paint up the crack in a horse's hoof when taking it to market, or who would put a little oil on a spavined horse. There is no doubt farmers are just as astute in their own business as any other class, but in the main I think they will compare favourably with any other group of men in the country. I live in one of the smallest townships in Ontario, in which there are two hundred farmers; and in spite of all the difficulties they have had to face, in the last year they subscribed $125,000 to the victory loans. They know their business. When they want a harness they tell the harness maker just what they want, and see that they get it. He does not sell them just whatever he has hanging on the peg; they get the kind they want or they do not do business with him. That is the sort of people I represent, people who pay their debts. I am aware of only one case among those two hundred farmers in which the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was taken advantage of, when it was in existence in Ontario.

I should like to comment for a moment on some of the homely virtues which I think we should endeavour to restore. In the early pioneer days individualism predominated, with the majesty of hard work and the glory of accomplishment.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What has that to do with this section?

Mr. WOOD: I could not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was merely asking what that had to do with this section. A short time ago, when one hon. member down in this corner was speaking, unfortunately in a language which I could not follow, the parliamentary assistant complained that he was not keeping within the ambit of this section.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not within the ambit of this section; he was not keeping within the ambit of the bill. What that hon. gentleman was saying had no relation at all to the bill. I was not criticizing his language because it did not apply to the section.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not think what the hon. member for Brant is saying has any relation to the bill, either.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is about as relevant as some of the speeches we have heard from across the way.

Mr. WOOD: If that remark had been made by anyone but the hon. member for Weyburn I would take it in a kindly way, but I do not think there is any hon. member of this house who has taken up more time in discussing the matters that have come up in this chamber. Personally I try not to speak unless I have something to contribute. The hon. member speaks on everything. I do not know how one man can have such a general knowledge. I would rather know one or two things well than attempt to express my opinions on a great many things and make the job of it that the hon. member does.

In regard to the payment of debts, I believe that the majesty of hard work and the glory of accomplishment still applies to this type of legislation. Sometimes I think we are wandering a long way away from that. I believe that if by accident some hon. members who have spoken were placed in a position to form a government it would be a most unfortunate thing for those people who still believe in honesty, integrity and in paying their debts.

I have other observations I should like to make in this connection, but I shall be content with making an appeal, not for that 10 per cent who go into bankruptcy through this legalized method of getting out of assuming their obligations, but for the remaining 90 per cent of the people. I have in mind the post-war period when farms will be for sale and when, if hon. members have their way, credit will have been scared away from agriculture.

I am happy to know that the minister has afforded this opportunity to the three prairie provinces to get out from under their difficulties. It would be to their advantage to accept it. I believe it was only a week or so ago I placed on record the figures supplied by the farm loan board showing payments from 1938 to 1943. Perhaps it is because we have not had the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act functioning in Ontario, but the fact remains that we have made the greatest contribution toward the payment of loans in Canada. For every dollar paid in 1938, $1.73 is being paid in 1943, and not only that, but about two and a half times as many payments are being made.

As I pointed out the other day, Alberta is not doing nearly so well. Where they paid $1 in 1938, they are paying only 84 cents to-day. One point came to my mind when the hon. member for Macleod was extolling to the house the virtues of the Social Credit government in Alberta. Perhaps it may be indiscreet of me to refer to the late premier of that province, but I read with interest his will, and I found that of an estate of around $33,000 only $1,500 was invested in his own repudiated bonds. It did not look very consistent, to my mind. Probably that has no bearing on this matter, but I thought it well the country should know that apparently he did not have even his own money invested in his government, of which he was premier.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. WOOD: I admit it has nothing to do with it, but it is a fact that the people of Canada might like to ponder, especially with these new schools of political thought being placed before the public. They might come to some understanding as to what the future would have in store for them, if these new political ideas were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN: A few minutes ago a point of order was raised, one upon which I did not have to render a decision. However I would point out to the committee that yesterday the second reading of the bill was moved, at which time there was a fairly general discussion. When we are debating the second reading of a bill a general discussion is allowed. Then in committee we called section 1, short title. Again there has been a general discussion, which lasted well over a day. I would express my personal opinion, one which is founded upon an experience of some years in the house, that the discussion on this section should be more to the point, and on the bill itself. In making this observation, of course, I do not cast any reflection on hon. members who have spoken or who will speak. I am not rendering a decision; I merely express an opinion. I know hon. members will accept it as such, for what it is worth. I have before me a long list of speakers, and I believe the hon. member for Wetaskiwin is next.

Mr. JAQUES: I shall require only a very few minutes to say what I have to say. My experience, both as a rancher and as a farmer in western Canada, goes back over forty years. As I represent farmers and small business men, I thought I should like to say a few words on this debt bill.

I have not heard all that has been said in the debate, but one peculiar feature which has occurred to me—possibly I am wrong—is that this government bill is receiving rather less support from the government side than from the opposition side of the house. Some hon. members seem to doubt the necessity, the wisdom or even the rightness of government protection of debtors at this time. I do not know what prompted the Minister of Finance to take this action, but possibly it is the view that a healthy agriculture transcends the mere relationship between debtor and creditor, and that the very existence and future of the state depend upon a healthy and thriving agriculture.

I do not know whether this further thought has occurred to him, but it has occurred to me—and I am not blaming this government more than others—that parliament, all parliaments, are at least partly responsible for the state of affairs with which agriculture finds itself faced to-day. My mind goes back, not 1,900 years, as someone suggested the other day, but at least to the years immediately following the last war, when things were very prosperous, and the agriculturists felt justified in expanding their operations and in borrowing money for that purpose. Then, when they got things going nicely, suddenly the bottom fell out of everything. Prices went down to nothing. I have occasion to remember that, because in the winter of 1919-20, the longest on record in Alberta, either before then or since, I brought a bunch of cattle through without loss. I was quite proud of that achievement and looked forward to a worthwhile reward. But when I went to market I found that cattle which had been worth in the neighbourhood of eight cents a pound were being offered at one cent a pound. For no apparent reason—I certainly did not know the reason then—the price of cattle, and in fact all other agricultural prices, had utterly collapsed.

Mr. EVANS: When did the hon. member sell them?

Mr. JAQUES: In the fall of 1921. I remember being in the stockyards of a small local town in which 700 head of cattle had been delivered for sale that afternoon. One cent a pound was the best price at that time.

Again in the early thirties prices were very low. I can well remember the winter of 1930-31 when eggs sold at three cents a dozen delivered. A dozen eggs would buy one bootlace. As someone said this morning, cattle did not pay for the cost of the freight, and wheat fell to twenty cents a bushel. At that time I did not have a very clear idea of the basic reasons for this collapse. I regarded it, as now do so many hon. members of this house, as something inevitable, something in the nature of an act of God, like the weather, like a hailstorm or frost. But I have since spent the greater part of my time studying the reasons for these extraordinary differences in price levels. I know now that they are not due to natural causes, that they are artificial. In my opinion they have been deliberately brought about. I am not blaming this government any more than any other, but I do submit in all seriousness that governments and parliaments have allowed money control to get into the hands of men who are responsible to nobody but themselves, and they have manipulated it to their own great advantage. Let me read one quotation as follows:

> The volume of credit in this country—
> In Great Britain.
> —is to a very large extent in my hands, and is related to the enterprise of the country and therefore to the encouragement or discouragement of enterprise.

And again:

> Yes, I reduced credit and the purchasing of the public by 63 million pounds in the last twelve months for the reason I believe to have been sound. I am not prepared to make any suggestions how the bank could check the increase of unemployment. The bank was not unduly worried in 1925 by the possibility that the return to the pre-war gold standard would unduly interfere with British industry.

If anyone feels inclined to dispute the authority of that statement, let me say that it was made by Mr. Montagu Norman, the governor of the Bank of England, in his evidence before the Macmillan committee which I believe sat in 1930. But there is another authority, perhaps an even greater one. I quote from British Hansard of the House of Commons of April, 1932, as follows:

> The price of gold has risen since then by more than 70 per cent. That is as if a 12-inch foot rule had suddenly been stretched to 19 or 20 inches; as if the pound avoirdupois had suddenly become 23 to 24 ounces instead of—how much is it?—16. Look at what this has meant to everybody who has been compelled to execute their contracts upon this irrationally enhanced scale. Look at the gross unfairness of such a distortion to all producers of new wealth, and to all that labour and science and enterprise can give us. Look at the enormously increased volume of commodities which have to be created in order to pay off the same mortgage debt or loan. Minor fluctuations might well be ignored, but I say quite seriously that this monetary convulsion has now reached a pitch where I am persuaded that the producers of new wealth will not tolerate indefinitely so hideous an oppression.

Does anyone care to question the authority or the validity of that statement? Nobody does. Those are the words of Right Hon.

Winston Churchill when he was speaking in the House of Commons as a private member in 1932. I do not know anything about agriculture in eastern Canada because I have never lived here except as a member of this house, but I do know something about farming generally in western Canada, and particularly in Alberta. I realize that this state of affairs has created a hardship not only for the debtor but also for the creditor. As the hon. member for Calgary West said, it has led to a loss of confidence as between the borrower and lender. But I do not think any good purpose is served by the creditors accusing the debtor farmers of dishonesty, incompetence or laziness. From a lifetime experience I am positive that the dishonest, incompetent and lazy farmers constitute a tiny minority. I think harm can be done by criticizing too strongly the creditors. Both sides have been victimized by a state of affairs which has no business to exist, and never would have existed if the government and parliament had exercised the right which has been vested in them.

This problem goes beyond the mere state of health of our farming industry; it affects the foundations of parliament, yes, of democracy itself. Nothing is more certain that unless parliament can bring about conditions satisfactory to the majority of the people, it will be only a question of time before the people will lose confidence in parliament. A great many people to-day have not the confidence in it they should have. Therefore I should like to impress upon hon. members as well as upon the government the absolute necessity of looking at the problem beyond the point of view of the debtor and the creditor. You can bring in temporary measures of relief for the assistance of both the creditor and the debtor, but that is not a cure; it is just a drug. I agree with the hon. member for Calgary West when he speaks of the confidence which must be restored. The confidence of the borrower must be restored if the people are to undertake to produce the wealth of this country, or the food, if you like. If they are to mortgage their future for this purpose, they must be assured of this, that if they borrow a dollar when wheat is a dollar a bushel they can repay the loan with the proceeds of one bushel of wheat, not of three or four, as the case has been in the past. Until that is done I see no remedy for the plight of the farmer. It can be done, and I say that if parliament is to endure—yes, if democracy is to endure, it must be done.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I had not intended to take part in this debate until I heard the speeches of the hon. members for Calgary West, Broadview and Brant. In view of the sentiments voiced by these hon. gentlemen, I feel that I must take issue with the views they have expressed.

First, however, may I compliment the minister upon the excellence of the bill which he has presented to the house. He has had a difficult task and he has done it well.

We have in the west many of the best farmers to be found anywhere. They come from all parts of Canada, from many sections of the United States, and from various countries of Europe. They left comfortable homes to pioneer and build up new homes in the west. Persons who will do that kind of thing make the best farmers and the best citizens. When they came to the prairie provinces they brought with them modern and up-to-date ideas; they discarded such methods as experience proved obsolete or undesirable, pooled their best ideas and put them into practice. I repeat that some of the best farmers to be found anywhere are in the prairie provinces.

Many of the best farmers on the prairies are most in need of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. During the last war western farmers were urged to increase their holdings and produce more in the war effort. The good, the efficient, the patriotic farmers responded to that appeal, increased their holdings and went into production on a very large scale. For this purpose they were compelled to borrow money.

During the last war there was a great deal of inflation. These farmers extended their holdings and bought stock and property of one kind and another at the height of the inflation period. When the war ended and the crash came they suffered heavy losses. I remember very well in the fall of the year farmers buying, some ten, some a hundred, some several hundred head of cattle to put in feed lots and feed during the winter. They bought them at $75 to $100 a head for feeders, fed them grain during the winter, and were very lucky to sell them at $25 and $30 a head in the spring. It is that kind of thing which has wrecked the fortunes of many farmers in the prairie provinces.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is what destroyed their confidence.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): That destroyed the confidence of many western farmers.

Again, during the depression, prices of farm products were very low for a number of years. The price of wheat fell to twenty cents a bushel, barley to ten cents a bushel, 3 C.W. oats to eight cents a bushel. But the farmers stayed with it; they hoped that the following year they would be able to do better than they had done in the preceding year. The best farmers continued to do intensive work on their farms, in the hope of getting better returns in the future. So, that, again, it was the best farmers who suffered, those who did the hardest work and put the most in the soil, because they got very little returns. This was due not to low prices alone, but to drouth, grasshoppers and pests of various kinds.

Mr. FAIR: Including the mortgage companies.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): These were causes which made the farmer lose out and lose heart.

As I have said, there are no better farmers in the world than we have in Alberta, but in many cases it is the best of our farmers who were driven to the wall by this state of affairs. It is many of the best of these farmers who should have an opportunity of benefiting by the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. There is a Canadian Bankruptcy Act which is quite suitable for manufacturers and business men in all lines of industry other than farming. It is not suitable for the farmer, and I wish to point out why. The manufacturer or the general business man has his home and his place of business. If he becomes involved and his business is mortgaged he may lose it, but his home generally remains untouched; it is preserved under the exemption provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not in Quebec.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Under the general bankruptcy law his exemptions are protected.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be so in Alberta, but in Quebec his home is not exempt.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): The hon. member should look up the act.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I have had a lot of bankruptcy experience.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): When hard times come, when a depression hits the business man, he can close down his plant or a part of it. While the plant is closed down, it is not eating oats or otherwise costing him a great deal of money to maintain as a going concern. It is different with farming. His home and his outbuildings constitute a large part of his plant, and when he goes into bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act his home goes as well, for the reason that it is mortgaged and he cannot get the benefit of the exemptions under the Bankruptcy Act. In 1934 the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett introduced this legislation into this house and he deserved a great deal of credit for that. It was a splendid idea. The object was to keep deserving farmers on the land and it extends only to deserving farmers, because no farmer can get a compromise unless he deserves it. It has worked splendidly in keeping such farmers on the land and I submit that the act should be continued. Many farmers who are discouraged by the burden of debt, if they can get relief as regards a certain portion of that debt, will be able to carry on, because it will give them a great deal of encouragement and make for better morale among the farming community.

As I said before, the minister has introduced an excellent bill. The act introduced by Mr. Bennett has been tried out and its weaknesses have become apparent. They have been strengthened and the present bill is highly desirable, improving the old act to a considerable extent.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Before we go through the sections one by one I think the minister ought to make a more elaborate statement than he did yesterday. In moving the second reading of the bill he gave a terse statement outlining the terms of it, but most of us expected that before the debate was concluded he would make a more general statement. I think it would help if, before we begin to go over the bill, he would make such a statement as I suggest.

Yesterday I called attention to the fact that a draft bill was presented to the government by the western debt conference. That document was contained in sessional paper 335A. Those submissions are signed by Mr. Lucien Maynard, Attorney General of Alberta, Mr. J. W. Estey, Attorney General of Saskatchewan, and Mr. Garson, Premier of Manitoba. When some hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member for Calgary West, wish to give the impression that members in this corner are trying to legalize the dishonesty by asking for legislation that will allow some people to get out of paying their just debts, I would point out that the proposed debt legislation submitted to the government on March 15 was drawn up by responsible individuals, and two of the men who signed the submissions are prominent leaders of the Liberal party. Those submissions, therefore, ought to have been given and, I suppose, were given, some serious consideration; but no statement has been made by the minister or by any other member of the government as to why the submissions were not acceptable to the government.

As I pointed out yesterday, there are five serious omissions: (1) The transfer from the board or tribunal to the court; (2) failure to include any clause guaranteeing the farmers' equity and making provision for the maintenance of himself and his family; (3) the insertion of a crop-failure clause in the legislation; (4) provision that there might be a revision of the board's decision from time to time; and (5) that a farmer might come within the purview of this legislation irrespective of when his debts were incurred. None of these important principles are involved in the legislation. There is involved in it something that seems to be a direct concession to the representations of the creditor class, namely, the right of appeal to the appeal courts of the three provinces.

On its face, the bill looks like an affront to the debt conference, to the three prairie provinces who participated in it and to the farmers' organizations that were represented. I would hardly think that the minister, speaking in this case for the government, would merely wave these proposals aside without giving this committee some reason why it was impossible for the government to accept them and incorporate them in this bill. I feel that the reason why these proposals are not in the bill is that the pressure from other groups was too strong. If the minister has some good reasons why these proposals were not incorporated in this legislation, he ought to give those reasons to the committee in fairness to himself, to the committee and above all to those of that debt conference who took so much trouble to formulate the proposals and to place them before the government. The minister would help the discussion if he would tell us why those proposals were not included in the legislation now before the committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the request is a reasonable one. Three governments did join in the presentation to the government and represented that a new type of legislation should be enacted by this parliament; I mean new in the sense that it had never been enacted in any province of the dominion, or in the Dominion of Canada or, so far as I can find, in any other country in the world. The main new feature was this, that instead of recognizing the emergency aspect of the debt situation in western Canada and framing legislation with a view to meeting that temporary emergency, it was proposed for the first time that the boards to be set up, which would continue to function through the years, should deal with debts whether incurred in the past or to be incurred in the future, and that these boards would have the power to write down debts without obliging the debtor to divest himself of his assets. That is a right which no other person in the Dominion of Canada has. It is a right which the farmers of eastern Canada do not want. It is a right which business in eastern Canada would not ask for. And as to its being an affront to the western governments and the western debt conference, my only answer is this, that this government must take its responsibility and this parliament must take its responsibility for enacting legislation of a type which they can defend and for what they can answer to the electors.

Bear in mind that the main feature, the startling feature, of the proposal which came from the debt conference in western Canada was this, that instead of proceeding on the principle which underlay the debt adjustment acts of all the provinces, which had a date limit in them, a date limit which was moved, I believe, in three acts, perhaps under pressure—I do not know—instead of having a date limit and regarding this extraordinary legislation as being emergency legislation to meet a temporary situation, the western governments for the first time requested this government to do something which none of them had ever done, and that was to set up open-ended legislation which would allow debt adjustment boards to sit for all time to come and whittle down and reduce the debts through the years and decades and centuries regardless of whether there was any emergency or not.

When that proposal was presented to me I took a very serious view of it, and I can assure hon. gentlemen that I did not communicate with the mortgage companies or with any lending institution. I simply searched in my own mind for some principles by which to test it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Did they communicate with the minister?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not then. Later they did. I gave them an opportunity to make representations, and I told the representatives of western Canada that I was going to give them an opportunity of making representations.

I searched in my own mind for some principles to go on. I think the fundamental difference between the two types of legislation that are contended for in this house, the fundamental difference of view is this: Is farm credit worth preserving or not? There are some people who think it is not. I have had persons who in talking to me said it was not, that it did not make much difference whether the farmer could borrow money from private lenders in the future, that credit had been bad for him in the past, and that he does not need credit, should not have credit, but should be obliged to pay cash for the land and other things he wants to buy. But no one in this debate—and I have heard a wide variety of opinions expressed and all schools of thought here—not even the wildest-eyed speaker, has gone to the length of saying that the farmer should be deprived of his credit standing. But I am satisfied that if we were to set up boards and let it be known that we were setting up boards which would have the power of reducing debts at their own discretion, regardless of the security taken, regardless of the ability of the debtor to pay—if we were to do that, people would not lend farmers money at all. Why should they? I have had some arguments about that. I have said: Well, perhaps they would size the farmer up and say that man is a good fellow, an honest man who will pay if he can on account of his moral qualities. If he has high moral qualities, some people would take a chance on him. Some individuals might lend him money, but certainly no trust funds would be lent under a law like that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Was not one of the principles in the draft bill that the farmer's ability to pay should be taken into consideration in making adjustments?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, certainly, it should be taken into consideration, but bear in mind what the lender is lending on—not on the security of property, as in the past. In the past he has been assured that if the value were there the value would be pledged to the extent of his security. But he is lending, not upon property, but upon the discretion of a board, upon what the board thinks about it. He naturally does not know what kind of members will be appointed to the boards through the years. Perhaps you could get a high calibre of board; perhaps you could not. There is a tremendous difference in the judgment of the members of these boards, and the result is that he would not have any solidity to his security.

If hon. gentlemen think, and they may, that is not a worth-while objective to strive for, to preserve a system under which there will be some credit extended on the security of land; if they do not think that is worth while, I do not know that I have a great deal of fault to find with their position. Perhaps they would set up some system whereby the state would lend money. I am sure that if that system were set up many bad loans would be made under the pressure of agitators. Nevertheless they may think that is a better system. But I frankly say—it may be background or the way I was brought up or something like that—I believe that people should pay their debts if they can. I believe that when they sign a note or sign a mortgage the security they give should be applied to the satisfaction of the first charge on the property. That is what I think should be done.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does the minister think that Mr. Estey and Mr. Garson do not believe that credit should be maintained and that people should pay their debts?

Mr. ILSLEY: I disagree with Mr. Estey and Mr. Garson and Mr. Maynard on that feature of their presentation. I agree with them on some things, but I disagree with them on that, and I venture to say that the great majority of the members of this house, if we were to have 245 members of this house here, would agree with me instead of with the representations that were made in that regard.

Mr. QUELCH: May I ask a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have been asked to make a statement and I want to make it.

Mr. QUELCH: Only one question.

Mr. ILSLEY: You have no idea how many questions I have been wanting to ask and refrained from asking.

There are two possible principles of any legislation that could be introduced into this house. One principle is this, that you should set up a board that would do a thing which has not been done by anybody else, which was never done by any province, which was never done by the dominion, and never done, I believe, by any other country, and that this continuing court, for that is what it would be, would place the security of creditors at the mercy of boards so that a creditor would never know whether you could apply his full security to the satisfaction of his debt or not, but would have to rely on the discretion of the board as to whether his full security could be applied for the satisfaction of his debt—and that to go on throughout the years continuously. The other principle is this, whether you should confine the character of this legislation to what it was in the beginning, emergency legislation.

We stuck to the original principle of this bill. It is based on the theory that in the twenties, probably in the teens before, when there was a great demand for land in western Canada, and when very high prices were paid for land in western Canada, higher prices than the farmers could pay as subsequent developments showed, these mortgages were put on and these agreements for sale were outstanding. Then, when the thirties came along it was discovered that the farmers simply could not get out of debt, so that something had to be done.

Under the old legislation only the debts that existed before May 1, 1935, could be adjusted; no debts incurred after that date could be dealt with by the board, except by consent. That was very unsatisfactory. It meant that a farmer would go before a board of review and that part of his debts could be adjusted, while part could not. We changed that and said that if two-thirds of his debts were incurred before May 1, 1935, then all his debts could be adjusted up to date, whenever they were incurred.

That is one thing we have done. We might have left it there, but we realized that there was a great deal of inconsistency in the treatment individual farmers received at the hands of these boards of review in the years 1935, 1936 and 1937. I think those were the years when there was the greatest difference in the treatment, as compared with subsequent years. Up to about the end of 1937 they did not get very many concessions from the boards of review, but were debarred from making a second application. As a result, some of those people are still weighed down with those old debts, so that by this legislation we have allowed them to come in again and make a second proposal. That applies to those whose compositions were made not later than the end of 1938. We gave a great deal of consideration to the date we should fix, and we thought December 31, 1938, was late enough. We had considered for a while making it the middle of 1937, but we thought we would err on the other side and bring it down to the end of 1938. Mind you, the creditor cannot reopen the matter, but the debtor can. When I hear hon. gentlemen talking about this legislation having the mark of a surrender to the mortgage companies, I can point out feature after feature of this legislation certainly not in the interests of the mortgage companies, narrowly considered. I wish to say that the mortgage companies are not suited with this legislation. They never saw it before last Saturday, and their reaction to it has been anything but favourable. However, I think the legislation is reasonably just, if we accept the principle that this is emergency legislation and not continuing legislation to meet both past and future debts. I do not see how we could justify that; I do not think it would pass this house and, if it did pass this house, there are other places I do not think it would pass.

Let me mention some of the features that are unfavourable to the companies. It must be great political stuff in western Canada to talk about these companies; I never realized that it was such good political material until yesterday. Here is the hon. member for Acadia, for whom I have a great deal of respect and who argues in a fairly consecutive sort of way in this house, particularly on financial matters. Yesterday he could not help calling the mortgage companies bloodsuckers. Well, Mr. Chairman, what is this forum? Is it a place for the discussion of principles, or is it a place for making political speeches? I do not have any brief for the mortgage companies, certainly, but I do not believe in the abuse of any class of Canadian citizens or Canadian institutions. I want to say this, and it was brought out by the hon. member for Calgary West. It must be remembered that the insurance companies, which are the heavy lenders on these mortgages, are the trustees of the savings of the people. There are millions of small policyholders in this country, and the money these insurance companies are putting out is the money of these policyholders. That is all brushed aside, however, as though the policyholders were in the bloodsucker class too; as though they were not worthy of consideration, and as though the ordinary principles of British justice should not apply to those people because they are not western farmers. I must express my dissent from that sort of approach to the discussion of these questions. We must try to work out something here which will be fair and just, which will recognize that all classes of individuals and institutions in this country have certain elementary rights based on what we call British justice.

Let me point out some of the features of this legislation. Had we been trying to please the mortgage companies, certainly we would not have provided for the reopening of those cases which were adjudicated between 1935 and the end of 1938, and certainly we would not have provided that the farmer could reopen them while the company could not. We would not have inserted the section about appeals, to provide that the companies cannot possibly recover any costs on appeal, except where the debtor brought a clearly unreasonable appeal. We were very careful in drafting the section on appeals to make it as far as possible a section which would not favour the wealthy litigant, or the litigant who had funds with which to carry on his appeal.

This legislation must be taken in conjunction with the order in council which, as the hon. member for Swift Current pointed out, is an integral, essential and most important feature of the debt legislation of this parliament, passed under the War Measures Act. That order in council, which we intend to continue for the duration of the war, carries out the essential provisions of the Saskatchewan debt adjustment legislation, which in proper cases enables debtors to secure postponement of foreclosure proceedings which would put them off the land. That must be taken in conjunction with this legislation. We have transferred this matter to the courts. I have not very much to say about that. I agree with what the hon. member for Peace River said yesterday about the courts as compared with the boards of review. I do not know that I would put it just on the grounds he did, that the courts will work for the debtor to a greater extent than the boards did, but I think the courts are a better forum than the board. We have had these boards now since 1935. I have been the minister responsible for their operation and I never knew what control I had or did not have over the boards. They were judicial, but not wholly so. They were administrative boards, and it seemed to be assumed by a great many persons in the country that if they got what they considered a raw deal at the hands of these boards, they could appeal to the minister, who could step in and change it just as he would be able to overrule an administrative official. I never knew whether I could or could not do that. These boards were headed by supreme court judges of the provinces, and there was always pressure of this kind and the other to appoint a man of this type or of that type to the board, so that he might give this type of decision or that type of decision. Of course the government has to take that responsibility, but it is disagreeable to have to make choices of that kind all the time, between this suggested appointee and the other. Now there is no doubt that the operation of this measure is not in any way under the control of the minister. It is within the courts; it is a wholly judicial procedure. We have tried in this measure to lay down principles for the guidance of the courts, as far as that could be done; but, once we have done that; once we have made the best possible selection of appellate judges, the legislation will have to take its course, and I think that is a very much more satisfactory way to have it.

I do not believe there should be the power for debtors to get adjustment after adjustment. There must be some finality in this matter. That is a different subject from the one I mentioned before, the power to come in with future debts. But it seems to me that one adjustment is enough. It seems to me that if we were to go on the principle that there are to be repeated adjustments, then repeated adjustment in favour of the creditor would have to be granted, too. We did not do that for the period between 1935 and 1938. We made it one way, because the whole act is based upon proposals by the farmer. But if we were to allow or to lay down the general principle that the farmer can go time after time for adjustments, it seems to me only fair that the creditor could do it, too. And that would not be good for the farmer, let me tell you.

There are some features in this measure with which I shall deal as the sections are reached. But I must point out that great care has been used in the drafting of it. I am satisfied that this is as far as we could go. I do not agree with the extremists, who have expressed their views either on one side or the other in this debate. I think something should be done to lift this load of old debt which proved too heavy to enable the farmer to cope with the adversities of the thirties. I think something should be done to enable those situations to be dealt with, and that emergency to be cleared up. In other words, I think we should stick to the emergency character of the legislation, and stick to the essential principle of the legislation; but we should keep it so that it will be more workable. We have made a number of changes to overcome the result of decisions by courts which have been in favour of the creditors. That will be seen, as we go through the sections of the bill.

There are a number of remedies of that kind. I must repudiate the idea that we have been dictated to or that to any considerable extent we have been influenced by either one faction or the other in this matter.

No one could listen to the speeches in the house without seeing at once the wide variety of opinions held, even among ourselves. And that wide variety of opinion exists throughout the country. Certain hon. members have read letters from farmers who have had a hard time. Well, I could read letters from women, widows, who have sold farms and taken mortgages, and then been taken in before the boards and had their mortgages cut away down by boards of review under conditions which, to my mind, would appear entirely unjust.

I believe that what the hon. member for Calgary West has said is true. This is legislation of a continuing character, and applying to most debts. But I believe it can be said truly that a man in his advancing years will rent his farm to a young man rather than sell it. That is the condition, unless that man can get practically the full cash price. In other words, I think it hurts credit, and it would be a bad thing to adopt legislation on any different principle.

Mr. FAIR: One fundamental principle has been entirely ignored. I believe we have every justification for asking that these appeals be of a recurrent nature. I have particular reference to prices for farm production. Looking back over the years I can remember wheat at $3.60 a bushel, and I also know of some farms which were bought in those days. Then, looking ahead twelve or thirteen years later than the period I have mentioned, I remember wheat selling for twenty cents a bushel in western Canada. To-day we have no assurance of any guaranteed price for wheat. Until that is guaranteed, or until some provision is made under which the products of the farm can be sold at a profit, then I say the farmers are entitled to the protection for which they have asked through the medium of appeals from time to time for the adjustment of their debts.

Mr. QUELCH: I believe the minister thought I had been somewhat extravagant in one of the terms I have used. But he must remember this, that I lived on the edge of the drouth area. I have seen the farmers who came to that area, and lived on those farms for perhaps twenty years. Then I have seen them driven off their farms by the mortgage companies. The treatment they have received in the past has been merciless. I fancy that if the minister had seen what I have seen out there, he would probably appreciate the reason why I used those terms. That is why in the past provincial governments were forced to take action. They had to take action to prevent that sort of thing from taking place. I have heard it said that interest rates are high on account of the type of the debt legislation, and the manner in which it operates. But those high rates of interest were in existence long before debt legislation was introduced in 1907, 1908 or 1909.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the risk?

Mr. QUELCH: The hon. member refers to risk. I say that when you obtain a high rate of interest you must not squeal when you lose. You are charging that high rate of interest in order to take care of your risk. Those mortgage companies were charging 8, 9, 10 and even 12 per cent in those days, and if they lost something on their investment they certainly had no right to squeal, because they were getting their high rate of interest. If the mortgage companies had been prepared to lend money at 4½ or 5 per cent, I would have agreed that they perhaps should have had better security. But any concern which considers itself justified in charging 10 or 12 per cent interest had no right whatsoever to squeal if it lost on its investment. That is all part of the game, and part of the gamble.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, before the section is passed, I believe it would be well to say a word or two with respect to this measure, perhaps by way of summing up. I listened to the words of the hon. member for Calgary West. He took the orthodox stand of those who must protect credit, just as the minister did. I think the minister will find there is no hon. member in my party, or perhaps in any other party in the house, who does not agree that there must be a protection of credit. I believe that would be accepted by everybody. The difficulty lies, however, in taking the whole thing out of the farmer.

It has been brought out several times by various speakers to-day and yesterday that there is an extremely unsatisfactory agricultural policy in Canada. The debt situation is largely the result of that policy. And we are looking to debt legislation to adjust or to make amends for the flaws produced by or the evils resulting from that agricultural policy.

I shall spend only a moment or two in a discussion of that policy. I have referred to it once before, in the discussion with respect to wool. I do not propose to repeat what I said on that occasion, but somehow or another the minister has to have somebody teach him that there is something radically wrong with the whole agricultural policy of Canada. And if someone does not get it into the minister's head, then I am telling him that he is going to wreck the country. It will be altogether too late to talk about it, when the thing is accomplished. I shall point out briefly to the minister the chief flaws in the agricultural policy of Canada.

In the first place there simply must be a scaling down of agricultural debt. I am not in favour of mortgage companies losing their money. I am not in favour of seeing lenders lose their money. But what are we to do? Obviously, the sensible thing is not to let the farmers be ruined on the land. What is to be done? I am informed that in the United States and in New Zealand they are adopting a systematic, comprehensive scheme of scaling down debts. Just how that should be done will cause some doubt, but I believe that ultimately the Dominion of Canada will have to step in as a nation and absorb the shock. If the Dominion of Canada, as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) suggested yesterday, allowed men by the tens of thousands to come in and settle in the Palliser triangle and then, when those men have accumulated debts, washes its hands of responsibility in the matter, then obviously the Dominion of Canada is failing in its responsibility to the people it had brought into the country.

What is to be done about it? Suppose a man comes into the country, as I have seen men do, with $20,000 and invests that money in a piece of land in the Palliser triangle after there have been years of good crops and without knowing how uncertain the weather is in that area; what is to happen when he has four or five bad years and his debts accumulate and become unpayable as they inevitably will? What would the minister's stand be in connection with that man who has brought $20,000 into the country to invest along with five, six or seven years of his life? Must that man lose everything? Is that the stand the minister takes? If it is, then he is taking a most extravagant stand, one more extravagant by far than that taken by the hon. member for Acadia.

The question the minister will immediately ask the member for Lethbridge is, "Should the person who lends that man another $20,000 on his land lose his money?" My answer would be that it is not right that either of them should lose his money. But certain it is that the man who came into the country with $20,000 and invested it in a piece of Canadian land has a right which this country ought to protect. If it does not protect that right, then the government is destroying the credit of the country in another way. If the minister asks where he is going now with his agricultural policy, let me say that the time may come when they will pretty nearly have to hire men to go farming on the land.

Mr. CRERAR: Would my hon. friend apply that principle to the man who invested $20,000 in a mining venture and lost it? Should the state reimburse him?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would say that perhaps there is a little difference between a mining venture and an agricultural venture. Nevertheless I believe the time is rapidly coming when men are beginning to argue that the government should guarantee them protection before they put their money even into a mine. That is being done at the present time. The government has already found it necessary to guarantee loans for the development of mines, to pay for the development of mines and to allow concessions in taxation. The government has had to resort to a great many expedients to encourage private capital to go into industry. Farming is an industry, and the government must do something like that to guarantee a man his security in farming. I doubt very much if in 1935 Liberals would have favoured the creation of as many crown companies as the Liberal government has established in Canada to-day. I doubt very much if in 1935 the Minister of Finance would have favoured the various advances of money which have been made by the dominion government to different companies to encourage them to produce war needs. A new concept has grown up with the years. The new policy is the result of the new concept. The new policy when applied to farming will result in an altogether different way of treating the farmer. I wonder if the Minister of Mines and Resources is answered; does the minister feel that his question has been answered?

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry; my colleague was speaking to me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have been answering the minister's question for the past three minutes and I was just wondering whether he considered it is answered.

Mr. CRERAR: I got part of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe it is answered. If it is not, the minister can ask me another. The point is that we have reached the place where we must realize that in order to secure the state we must do things which have not been done before. The United States has found it necessary to scale down debts, and I would not be surprised if the United States treasury has reimbursed those who have lost in the scaling down. I would not be surprised if the Dominion of Canada should find it necessary to do a similar thing. I am not in favour of having the mortgage companies lose their money. I am not in favour of the people who have placed their savings with the life insurance companies losing their money. No member of the Alberta legislature or of this Social Credit party would favour that. I doubt if there is one member of the party who could be found to subscribe to that view.

What Social Crediters found in Alberta was an impossible situation. They found that the claims of the money-lenders and the claims of the human element were in conflict, and as a result of that conflict the human element was being destroyed, just as the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Ross) so well said. I think he did his province a service this afternoon. He is a man who has come in contact with reality. I am not saying that the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards) was extreme in his views because he represented one point of view. But the hon. member for Calgary East showed quite clearly that he realized there was another point of view, and that the two points of view must be reconciled. How to reconcile them is the problem. The only way they can be reconciled as far as I can see is to have a scaling down of debt. This will involve the advance of money from the dominion treasury to reimburse in some measure those who may be caused to lose money.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just before the committee took recess I was discussing the faults in the agricultural policy as it is at present applied in Canada, and pointing out to the minister that one reason why we encounter so much difficulty in drafting a bill of this sort is that we are trying through the bill to rectify abuses which develop naturally through a faulty agricultural policy in the country, and I said that it would become necessary, in order to adjust the onerous debt situation which has developed in western Canada, for the dominion government to step into the picture and absorb the shock, actually reimbursing in considerable measure those who have lent the money, and also reimbursing in considerable measure those who have borrowed, to overcome a situation which is otherwise intolerable.

So that the stand of the Social Credit party may be made completely clear on this matter, and for the minister's use, I am going to read a passage from a booklet recently published and issued from Edmonton just prior to Premier Aberhart's death. This little booklet is called "Prepare Now: A Suggested Policy for Post-War Reconstruction". On page 43 of this booklet I read as follows:

> All agricultural mortgage debts to be taken over by an agricultural credit bank operating under the national monetary authority, on the following basis:
> (a) The principal amount of debts to be reduced to the original indebtedness less all payments made in excess of three per cent. The farmer will be required to pay this to the agricultural credit bank in equitable instalments on a crop or production share basis.
> (b) The agricultural credit bank will repay creditors on equitable terms which will ensure that individuals incur no loss and corporations can meet their liabilities in full.

I propose to deal briefly with what is suggested there, elaborating in some measure. It will be noticed that the principle laid down is that the interest rate should not exceed three per cent. I believe the minister in his bill and in the operation of the bill should have in mind the idea that the interest rate should not exceed three per cent. We have heard mention made of exorbitant rates such as eight, nine, ten and eleven per cent. All such rates are deleterious to the country and will result in hardship and destruction of our vital resources. If the original loan to a given farmer is allowed to stand and the lender allowed interest at the rate of three per cent from the time when the money was lent, and the debt is taken over by the agricultural credit bank and provision made that the lender shall receive his principal with interest at the rate of three per cent, the lender, I think we shall agree, will not suffer seriously by such an arrangement and the farmer will be required to pay this to the agricultural credit bank in equitable instalments on a crop or production share basis. We have found in Alberta that a satisfactory way of dealing with agricultural debt is to allow the farmer to pay a certain portion of his crop each year. If he does this, he does not have the anxiety of having to sell the crop, turn it into money and pay the money. The person to whom the money is owed knows he is getting a certain percentage of the crop, and he knows that is fair; he feels much better about it, and the farmer feels much better about it. The first thing you know, the debt is beginning to be liquidated. This principle is suggested in what I have read. It goes on to state:

> The agricultural credit bank will repay creditors on equitable terms which will ensure that individuals incur no loss. . . .

The hon. member for Calgary West, with an arrangement like that being worked out, would have no cause to worry about the money which had been put into life insurance companies. Any life insurance company which had lent money to a farmer would be guaranteed the money it lent him together with three per cent interest, which would certainly enable the company to discharge the obligations to the people who had insured their lives with it. Probably that little passage will help members of the committee to understand what I meant when I said that the government would step in and reimburse, not necessarily permanently, probably just temporarily—for twenty years or so, the idea being that ultimately the government would recover its money, the farmers would get out of debt, the people who lent money to the farmers would get their money back, and the country would be restored to a sound, healthy condition with respect to debt.

I mentioned a minute ago the question of refunding. I see no reason why the minister should not adopt the policy of refunding to enable farmers to borrow at low rates of interest the money with which to discharge their obligations over a long period of time, say twenty or thirty years, which would enable them to get out from under their indebtedness and would enable the people who have lent money to the farmers to recover their money without too much hardship and inconvenience.

The matter of price must be taken care of, and the minister has not made allowance for that in drafting the bill. As the hon. member for Battle River pointed out, prices simply must be guaranteed from year to year, so that farmers will know where they stand and the people who are lending the money will know where they stand; otherwise the credit which the minister was so anxious about will be lost. If the lending companies come to find by and by that, no matter how good a farmer a man may be, if they lend money to him and prices go down they lose their money, they will certainly lose confidence and the country will lose credit in spite of such legislation as this. There can be no question about it. So that this bill will not protect the credit of the country, even though the minister believes it will.

Just to show the minister that prices in Canada are not where they ought to be, may I quote briefly from a statement made at Brandon, Manitoba, on June 24, and reported by the Canadian Press:

> William Bryce, of Dugald, Manitoba, urged the cost of production plus ten per cent for farmers, the same as industry, in his presidential address to the Manitoba Federation of Agriculture meeting here yesterday.

Farmers all over the country are beginning to talk about being paid on a cost-plus basis rather than on a cost-minus basis as they are being paid at the present time. May I tell the minister that no matter how carefully he drafts this bill, unless he looks after the matter of price in the agricultural economy of this country he cannot possibly sustain the credit of the farmer.

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. member tell us how he would establish cost of production on the farm?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member has asked a pertinent question. I would say that probably in Canada the thing to do would be to start with wheat. I fancy our whole agricultural economy is built around wheat. The cost of wheat, the price at which it ought to be sold, could be determined, I believe, by a group of experts similar to those now working on the wartime prices and trade board. Three years ago a good many things which now look thoroughly feasible would have seemed impossible, and I think the hon. member for Maple Creek will agree with me that a group of men such as Donald Gordon has in his employ could determine after a while the price at which wheat should be sold.

Mr. EVANS: It might be pretty cheap.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It should not be cheap. If they determined a price for wheat which was cheap they would be cheap themselves, because the whole country would be based upon a cheap economy. In fact, that is the trouble with us now. The price of wheat, I should say, should be between $1.25 and $1.50 if it were set where it ought to be to enable the farmers to carry on year after year and to build fences when they break down and barns when they are worn out. Then, having wheat as the pivotal point, they could set for other primary products like barley, oats, rye and other commodities, such prices as would enable the growers to produce those commodities as economically as they could produce wheat. Does that indicate to the hon. member how he ought to proceed? This could be done with regard to all the various agricultural commodities. A fair price could be determined for them. In a general way this ideal should obtain. The object should be, in the economy of any country, to enable the people on the farms to buy from industry the products they need and to enable those engaged in industry to buy from the farms their own requirements. With that general idea in mind, and with the technique I have indicated, I am sure that any group of experts who went to work seriously on the problem could determine fair and profitable prices for all primary products, and then arrive at the prices of the secondary commodities by a similar device. I am not discussing that matter to-night, but I have shown in a general way how one could proceed.

I believe there are just two other matters the minister should bear in mind. First of all, he should see to it that the farmers get credit where they need it, the credit which they cannot now obtain; and he should make ample provision for stability of prices and of markets for the next three years. If he would do that, there would not be very much difficulty about the bill he has introduced. I am not sure that there would be great objection to it in its present form if the inequalities and injustices that are inherent in the whole agricultural economy were removed.

I believe that the hon. member for Acadia took a sound position. He said that the bill was deficient in at least three respects, in a general way. First, the boards are done away with and courts substituted. Although there is disagreement among the members regarding the desirability of boards as compared with courts, in my opinion the boards have done very good work. We found in Alberta that there was not much complaint on the part of the farmers with reference to the work of the boards, and I am not sure that the loan companies suffered much at their hands. I believe also, as the hon. member for Battle River has emphasized two or three times, that the debt situation must be dealt with on the basis of its being recurrent. In southern Alberta, south of Calgary, there is drouth this year. The hon. member for Medicine Hat the other day brought this fact to the attention of the house. That drouth will cost hundreds of thousands of dollars to farmers all over that country. The farmers are not responsible for it; there is nothing they can do about it. The farmer put in his grain in perfectly good faith, but he will not have anything to live on this year, or at any rate very little, and debts will accumulate. Even the Minister of Finance, with his orthodox mind, would hardly blame the farmer for the debts that will accumulate in consequence of what has happened this year through an act of God. It is that very thing that creates the situation for which there must be a remedy, some means of absorbing the shock. To go to that part of the country and tell the farmers that they should absorb the whole shock of that terrible drouth from Calgary south, is to make oneself ridiculous. The minister sees, I believe, that what the farmers are suffering from all over the three western provinces is a long period of years in which incidents similar to this drouth have impaired the economic stability of the farmers and thrown them into debt. The debt situation therefore must be dealt with as a recurrent problem; and when the minister says that he does not believe there should be more than one or two decisions on the debt question, I reply that he is out of contact with realities. In fact, he made the statement that there was to be only one proposal. Well, one is not enough. Hundreds of farmers in southern Alberta alone this year will have to have a readjustment from the adjustment they made last year. How else will they meet the situation which will develop as a result of the drouth which destroys their crop? Surely the debt situation must be dealt with as a recurring problem.

There is injustice also in requiring that the debt should be such that two-thirds of it had been contracted prior to May 1, 1935. From what I have said I think it must be clear that the question of debt is one that is likely to come up at any time. The terrible hail storms that sometimes sweep across that section of the country will put the farmers in a position where they cannot discharge their obligations. If they contracted debts when the stores gave them credit, how will they discharge those debts if next year there is frost or a drouth? How will they adjust themselves? We have had many experiences of that kind in Alberta, and therefore we know that some of the things the minister has said are more or less doctrinaire and are not the result of facing realities.

I would say that there are three main flaws in the bill which should be remedied to bring it up to that standard which would be thoroughly acceptable to the people in the west.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: This bill is for the purpose of facilitating compromises and arrangements between insolvent farmers and their creditors. But is it possible to do anything for those who are insolvent, or is the definition of the word "insolvent" to be extended and given such a wide interpretation as to take in those who merely want readjustment of their debts?

Mr. ILSLEY: They must be unable to meet their debts as they fall due; otherwise they do not come under the legislation. We would not have the jurisdiction to deal with the others, because the basis of our jurisdiction is that section in the British North America Act which gives this parliament jurisdiction over bankruptcy and insolvency.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In the draft bill presented by the debt conference there were one or two things which were asked for, which seemed to be basic but which apparently have been entirely neglected in the bill before us. In paragraph 15 they point out particularly that they want the boards to protect the farmer's interest, to evaluate the farmer's interest in the farm land as represented by the amount of money, principal and interest, which he had paid, and, second, the amount of cultivation and improvements he had made and the labour he had expended in bringing the lands into an improved condition. That is one thing I wish to bring to the minister's attention.

Another point is this. In protecting the farmer's interests they want to base the adjustment on the ability of the debtor to pay, and I believe that has been taken care of. They say in paragraph 15 (3):

15. In exercising its jurisdiction and powers to formulate a plan of settlement and without limiting its discretion in any way the board may consider and determine inter alia the following matters:

(3) The cost of maintenance of the debtor and his family at a reasonable standard of living and the current expenditures reasonably necessary in the operation of his farm.

I think that is fundamental, and if this bill is to be an effective instrument, those things should be taken into consideration. A number of the other proposals made have been incorporated in the bill.

The minister this afternoon argued that if revisions or adjustments as asked for by the debt conference were provided for, it would destroy farm credit and cause tenantry in this country. I would point out to the minister that when agriculture or any other industry suffers the losses which were suffered by the farmers of the west whom this bill is supposed to protect, someone has to take the losses, and where such loss is suffered credit is bound to be destroyed, and to accept this proposal would not prevent that.

As regards tenantry, the records show that it is increasing rapidly in the west, and the reason why it has increased more rapidly over the past few years is that it has not paid the creditor to foreclose on the farm because he could not go in himself and operate the land and make any more profit out of it than the farmer did. About eighty per cent of the farms of my province are already mortgaged, and if prosperous times should ever come to agriculture again, there would be so many foreclosures that tenantry would be widespread.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a very slight amendment to be made to paragraph (i), which I shall ask my colleague to move.

Mr. GIBSON: I move:

That subsection 1 of section 2 be amended by adding after the word "assumed" in line 39, the words "or otherwise incurred".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Paragraph (e) says:

(e) "creditor" includes a secured creditor and any person to whom a farmer owes any debt and includes the crown, as well in right of any province as in right of Canada.

Is there any necessity to include municipalities or are they already covered? I notice in paragraph (f) at the top of page 2 of the bill, "or any municipality or other person." Should "municipality" be included in the definition of "creditor?"

Mr. ILSLEY: The word "person" includes "municipality" by the ordinary principles of interpretation. It is not necessary to name the municipalities expressly, but it is necessary to include the crown by express words.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): "Person" would cover "municipality?"

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Referring to paragraph (f) which defines "debt," there has been, as the committee knows, some difficulty under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and some cases went before the supreme court of Ontario a few years ago. Since then, cases have arisen in Saskatchewan in which it was declared that there was an absence of privity of contract, and some cases were thrown out on that ground. Mr. Dunning then brought in an amendment in 1938 to meet that difficulty, but cases have been thrown out since. Has provision been made for that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That has been provided for.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Paragraph (h) defines "farmer." Apparently this definition has been copied word for word from the old act, and our judges in Alberta have held that a rancher does not come within the meaning of "farmer" as defined in the old act. We have a great many ranchers in Alberta who, I submit, should have the benefit of the act. I presume the minister would have no objection to an amendment making the definition broad enough to include ranchers.

Mr. ILSLEY: I just followed the time-honoured language which is used in the Bankruptcy Act and in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I do not think I would like to broaden the definition.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the definition of "farmer" should be broadened to include men who, while not actually residing on the farm, are operating the farm and making it their chief occupation. They pay all the expenses and taxes and hire the labour for the farm. I think that class should be included in the definition.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would ask the minister whether the definition of "farmer" as it now stands would cover a person who had been engaged in farming but is now retired from the farm and relies mainly upon his returns from the farm for his support. Personally I think the definition, as was pointed out by the two hon. members who have just referred to it, is not sufficiently wide to cover the various situations that have been found to arise since the definition was first incorporated in the original act. I would suggest to the minister that ranchers be included within the ambit of the expression "farmer." There are many who are engaged in ranching, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary East, who, I believe, are entitled to be included under the act but have been excluded under the judgments to which he made reference. If my memory is correct, the definition has been held inapplicable to the case I mentioned, namely, persons who at one time or another have been farmers but have retired from the farm and are farming it indirectly under lease. Such a person does not come within the definition as it now is and has been since 1934. I would suggest that the experience of the past nine years has amply demonstrated the need for the inclusion of these two classes, and I believe the definition should be widened accordingly.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary East in regard to the definition of "farmer". I think it was found necessary, either under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act or the wheat acreage reduction scheme, to change the definition of the word "farmer" so that ranchers would be included. I believe a rancher was defined as a man with so many head of stock per acre, or on some similar basis, and I believe the minister will find that this definition must also be changed. There will be a great deal of dissatisfaction if it is left to include only those whose main occupation is farming or the tillage of the soil. I believe some qualification will have to be made so that ranchers will be included, perhaps so many head of stock for each acre of land or something like that.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the case for bringing ranchers under the legislation? My hon. friend assumes that ranchers should come under it, but what is the case for making it apply to ranchers? The great complaint from ranchers recently has been in connection with the excess profits tax.

Mr. JOHNSON (Bow River): The situation is quite clear in some districts, particularly in the southern parts of the prairie provinces. You may find the case of a man who has been farming and who has changed over to ranching. If a farmer is in that position, he has every right to come under this legislation. Of course, if you are going to have it apply only to those who are bankrupt now, instead of making it a debt adjustment act, this definition may be all right, for those who are going to be sold out will be sold out anyway. If it is to be a debt reduction act, however, to assist these ranchers and farmers, the definition must be widened to meet the case.

Mr. QUELCH: It all depends upon how you define a "farmer" and a "rancher". As the hon. member for Bow River says, under the Wheat Acreage Reduction Act anyone with more than fifty head of stock, or more than two head of stock for every acre of wheat, was called a rancher. The minister is not going to suggest that a farmer with fifty-five head of cattle will be very much worried about the excess profits tax. During the years from 1932 on, when stock was selling for as low as a dollar a head, many of these small ranchers got into serious financial difficulty, and it will take a number of years for them to get back on their feet. When we come to section 7 I intend to refer to a point which will very much affect the ranchers; that is, in connection with the deadline of 1935. The ranchers who had to sell off their stock in 1937, in order to become eligible for feed under the dominion regulations, certainly need help to-day. Many of those ranchers were out of debt in 1935; then when the drouth hit them they had to sell most of their stock and take whatever they could get for them. Now they get no consideration at all under this measure. However, that will come up when we reach section 7. I am only pointing out now that many ranchers have suffered heavy financial losses, and certainly I think at least the small rancher should come under this legislation. I believe the minister was referring to what one might call the business rancher or the syndicate rancher, but under the provisions of the Wheat Acreage Reduction Act a farmer with over fifty head of stock is called a rancher.

Mr. ILSLEY: It seems that the courts of Alberta have decided that a rancher is not a farmer within the meaning of this measure.

Mr. QUELCH: How is a rancher defined?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. I did not know the courts had made that finding, but I have the word of the hon. member for Calgary East for it, and that is confirmed by the official in charge. Certainly the definition in the wheat acreage reduction regulations would have no bearing at all on the case. I am not familiar with the decisions of the courts of Alberta, but this measure is designed to assist persons whose principal occupation is farming or the tillage of the soil. I do not know the difference between farming and the tillage of the soil; I questioned that when I was going over the bill, but I was informed that this language had been interpreted by the courts, that it is the language of the old Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and that it is the language of the Bankruptcy Act. It is the standard definition of a "farmer".

Mr. QUELCH: What is that definition again?

Mr. ILSLEY: A farmer means a person whose principal occupation consists in farming or the tillage of the soil. That is what a farmer is within the meaning of this measure and, I am informed, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act as well, and that has been the case since the old act was brought in. I suppose there comes a stage where a person's principal occupation is not farming or tilling the soil at all. He does not touch the soil; he just turns cattle out to graze. If that is his principal occupation he is a rancher, I suppose; he is not a person whose principal occupation consists in farming or the tillage of the soil. This legislation does not extend to him, and never has extended to him.

Mr. QUELCH: Surely this definition should be a rancher or tiller of the soil, because it is very hard to imagine a farmer who does not till the soil but you could have a rancher who did not till the soil, though I think the majority of them do till a certain amount of soil. You hardly need to say a farmer or a tiller of the soil, because I think all farmers do till the soil.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under this legislation a person whose principal occupation was not farming or the tillage of the soil would not be eligible for the benefits of the legislation. He would be regarded as a person in a different kind of business, and why not? It is just a question of where the line should be drawn. We cannot extend this measure to include everybody; it has just applied to those whose principal occupation consisted in farming or the tillage of the soil.

Mr. QUELCH: Then I think the measure should definite the difference between a rancher and a farmer. We ran into that problem with the Wheat Acreage Reduction Act. Many farmers were denied the bonus on the ground that they were ranchers; finally the Minister of Agriculture stated that the regulation was ridiculous, and he wiped it out. Now ranchers are eligible for the wheat acreage reduction bonus. If a rancher can be eligible for the wheat acreage reduction bonus, he must be a tiller of the soil; therefore he should come under this legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: But that is not his principal occupation. If his principal occupation is the tillage of the soil he comes under the legislation.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I do not think the minister understands the situation in the ranching country. Most of the foothills country is ranching country, and the chief occupation of the people there is raising live stock, cutting hay, looking after cattle and sheep, and so on. They do a certain amount of farming; they grow coarse grains for their cattle, but their chief occupation is ranching and not tilling of the soil. There is also a great deal of ranching done in the dry areas, where this legislation is intended to apply. I submit that it should apply to them.

A few moments ago the minister raised the objection that the farmers were kicking against the excess profits tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: The ranchers.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Yes, the ranchers. The cattle raisers have had a strenuous time during the standard period which forms the basis of the excess profits tax. None of them were making money at that time. They could not. Now when they come to pay the excess profits tax it hits them so hard that they are complaining. And they have just ground for complaint, because everything they make is being taxed away from them. They have no chance to pay off their debts incurred during the strenuous times through which they have passed.

This afternoon I referred to the fact that during the years of depression the ranchers were hit very hard. Very often cattle were sold at a dollar a head, as one hon. member said a moment ago. One could buy the best of feeding cattle for a cent a pound on the prairies at that time. The ranchers were losing money. But they stayed with the game, borrowing money, for the purpose of trying to carry on.

When this standard was fixed for the excess profits tax it was fixed so that the ranchers are having everything taken away from them that they made. They have no chance in the world to pay off their past debts. I submit that this measure should certainly apply to ranchers, as much as to farmers.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Would the minister consider expanding the definition of "farmer" to cover farmers who retire but who still own their farms, and supervise the operation of those farms? The minister will recall that the debt conference suggested this definition for "farmer":

"Farmer" means (1) a person whose principal occupation consists in farming or the tillage of the soil; or (2) a person whose principal occupation was farming but who has retired therefrom, and is not engaged in any other occupation and has either leased his farm property or sold it under an agreement for sale or transferred it and taken a mortgage thereon for purchase money on which payments are owing to him. "Farmer" includes the legal representative or representatives of a deceased farmer.

It seems to me there might be some argument based on that paragraph. A great many people up in years retire to the little towns and rent their farms, or operate those farms by having a hired couple or a hired man on them. Under the present definition they would be barred from the benefits of the legislation. Would the minister give some consideration to extending that definition so as to include them?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are investors. They have an investment. They are not on the farm, nor are they engaged in farming.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But their livelihood comes from the farm.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what my hon. friend says, and he also said that that applied to mortgage companies. But we must draw the line somewhere. The object of the measure is to keep efficient producers on the land, and I do not think it should be extended to persons who are not producing, but who just have their money invested in farms.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They have more than their money in those farms. They probably have the work of a lifetime in them. The definition states distinctly "whose principal occupation was farming but who has retired therefrom". That is, a man has a farm in which over a number of years he has built up an equity. Debts accumulated during the bad years. Surely he has as much right to an adjustment as the man who is still young and is on the farm. His livelihood comes from that farm. It represents his toil and his work of a lifetime. Surely he has the same right to benefit from the legislation as he would have if he were still young enough to operate the farm actively. This is not an investment. This was not surplus money put into an investment, at all. It represents the toil of a man's lifetime. Now he depends upon a return from that farm to maintain him and his wife.

Mr. FAIR: I think I could point out several instances where a man's sons have joined the army, where the man himself might not be able to operate power machinery, and for that reason he has had to have his work done by hired help. What would be his position?

Mr. ILSLEY: He has to be a farmer, if he is to benefit. If his principal occupation consists in farming or tillage of the soil, even if it be by a hired man, he is still a farmer.

Mr. FAIR: Even though he does not live on the land? Let us suppose he moved to a small town.

Mr. ILSLEY: He does not necessarily have to reside there physically, so long as he is operating the farm. If he does so, he is a farmer. If he is directing the operation of the farm, through a hired man, and that is his principal occupation, he comes within the definition of a "farmer."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If he has leased the farm?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. If he has leased the farm he is not running it. The lessee is running it.

Mr. FAIR: With respect to farmer-ranchers, may I say we have had a lot of trouble under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the wheat acreage reduction legislation. It might be pointed out that a number of farmers have a section or two sections of land, that they are farming 500 or 600 acres of it, and at the same time running a number of cattle or horses. Because they have those cattle or horses, even though they farm 500 or 600 acres an attempt is made to debar them from the benefits of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and from the wheat acreage reduction legislation. How do they fare in this case?

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand the hon. member is asking just where the line is drawn between a farmer and a rancher?

Mr. FAIR: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it is just a question of fact as to whether his principal occupation consists in farming and tillage of the soil.

Mr. FAIR: But it is fifty-fifty.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is just one of those things the tribunal has to decide.

Mr. QUELCH: The bill submitted by the western debt conference evidently recognized that difficulty, because their definition reads this way:

A person whose principal occupation consists in farming or tillage of the soil; or in raising for sale or market any live stock or dairy products.

Apparently they put that in there to cover this very thing.

Mr. EDWARDS: I should like to support the contention advanced here in regard to the definition of the word "farmer." That has caused a great deal of heart-burning and dissatisfaction on account of its ambiguity. I do not know why we should pass on to a judicial tribunal the difficulty of interpreting an act which is not clear, and which is in fact ambiguous to ourselves. We ought to make up our minds who is to have the benefit of this legislation. I believe there have been one or two cases before our courts in which decisions have been made in connection with entitlement. Mention was made of this by the hon. member for Calgary East. As I recall, one rancher was being questioned on this matter. As everyone from the foothills knows, every rancher does have some land under tillage. A rancher may have far more land under tillage in connection with his ranching operations than would the ordinary farmer. That is common knowledge and common observation. There can be no gainsaying the fact that the ranchers as such suffered more adversely, if that were possible, than did the ordinary grain or wheat farmer in the depression years which are the occasion for this legislation.

I should like to second with all the force of which I am capable the suggestion of the necessity and desirability of giving a proper interpretation to the word "farmer," so that it will include those whom we commonly designate and who delight to be known as ranchers rather than farmers.

Mr. FAIR: The hon. member for Calgary East has some good friends in the position of the man I described a few minutes ago, who happens to be a neighbour of mine. The hon. member for Calgary East has, I think, succeeded as a lawyer in that little community there on account of the fact that he understands farming conditions, and possibly on account of the number of his very good friends. I would hate to see this section go through without some provision being made to include the ranchers. These people suffered during the years from 1930 to 1939. The Minister of Finance says that the excess profits tax is giving more trouble than anything else at the present time, and I submit that these people are suffering a great injustice in having to pay an excess profits tax when they should be using this money to pay off the debts they incurred during the depression period. I hope the minister and his advisers will see that some provision is included in this section to include ranchers.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister has said that the meaning of this definition would be decided by the court. The definition is:

"Farmer" means a person whose principal occupation consists in farming or the tillage of the soil.

I assume that the minister means that the court will decide that after hearing all the facts of the case. I am concerned over the word "occupation." In deciding whether a man is a farmer or a rancher, will the court use as a basis the man-hours employed in cultivating the land or caring for the stock, or will it use the financial report in connection with the cultivation of land or the sale of stock. I can conceive of considerable difficulty if you are going to base it on the financial report, especially when there is only one proposal allowed under the measure. One year a man may have a financial return showing that his major income came from the raising of stock—he would be classified as a rancher. The next year stock prices might fall and his major return be from his farming operations—he would be classed as a farmer. On the other hand, as has already been pointed out, as a rancher he will necessarily have to have a large acreage under cultivation. I think the minister should make clear the difference between the terms "farmer" and "rancher" in order that there may be no misunderstanding.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think this is a change that should be made hastily in committee. Perhaps the section could stand and I will give consideration to the suggestions that have been made. Perhaps we could pass the section with the exception of paragraph (h).

Section stands.

On section 3—Clerk of the court to be official receiver.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Some judicial districts are quite large and it may be impossible for the clerk of the court to handle all the cases. At the present time there are three or four official receivers in some districts. Is it the intention to have several official receivers and, if so, will they all reside at one point or will they be scattered at strategic points?

Mr. ABBOTT: If the clerk of the district court feels that he can handle the cases in that district, he will be the official receiver. It is the intention to appoint official receivers, if necessary, in the outlying points when there is a demand for these services and when it is felt that the locality is too remote from the place where the court sits and where the clerk of the court would be located. That is the reason why power is taken in subsection 2 to appoint official receivers in addition to the clerks of the court or in substitution thereof.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Subsection 3 sets out the functions and duties of the official receiver. Under the old act I believe the official receiver had the power to formulate a proposal after consulting with both the debtor and the creditor, and placing the matter before the board of review. I am not clear whether under this bill he will have the power to formulate a proposal, or whether he merely receives a proposal filed by the debtor, which has been formulated by the debtor and his lawyer or his representative.

Mr. ABBOTT: Under the existing regulations the official receiver is empowered to assist the debtor in preparing the proposal. It is not contemplated that there will be any change in the regulations put into effect under the new legislation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He will be able to assist under this measure?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Jurisdiction on assignment or petition.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The western debt conference urged that instead of a single judge there should be farm debt boards. They suggested that:

> The board shall consist of a chief commissioner and two commissioners who shall be appointed by the governor in council. The chief commissioner shall be a judge of the court of the province invested with superior jurisdiction in trials in the province, and one commissioner shall be appointed as a representative of creditors and one commissioner shall be appointed as a representative of debtors.

I think that would prove more satisfactory than placing this entirely in the hands of one official. It seems to me it is giving too much power to the one person. I believe the wishes of the debt conference should be recognized and granted, and I should like to know why they have been disregarded in this respect.

Mr. ABBOTT: That matter was fully considered when the bill was under consideration, and it was decided to get away from the idea of boards and to use the machinery of the courts. For that reason the initial court is the district court, with one judge, and the appeal is to the special appeal court set up under the bill. As I say, it was decided after careful consideration to discard the system of boards. That is the fundamental feature of this new bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know whether the rules of the committee will permit me, but I happened to be out of the chamber for a few moments, and it seems to me that section 2, subsection 1 (d), definition of "court of appeal", is unnecessary under the bill. I would suggest, in order not to cause lawyers any sleepless nights over an unnecessary provision, it might as well be deleted from the measure.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out that section 2 has been carried.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): With unanimous consent.

Mr. ABBOTT: Just to answer my hon. friend's point, at first it would seem as though a definition of "court of appeal" would not be necessary, but in section 26 of the bill a reference is made to "the court of appeal of the province in which the appeal court has jurisdiction," and it provides in substance that the appeal court under this bill shall exercise on any appeal all jurisdiction, powers and authority of the court appealed from and of the court of appeal of the particular province in which the special appeal court under this bill is sitting. So that I think the insertion of a definition of "court of appeal" in the interpretation section is necessary.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, I agree.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not want to labour the point, but I believe that the removal of the power from the board of review to a court is a retrograde step. We listened yesterday to a good deal of tub-thumping about British justice in Canadian courts—which, of course, is not at all the point in question. The judge is competent to deal with the legal aspects of a case; but there are aspects other than the legal one, as is shown by the fact that later on you will have land appraisal, and men who have some idea of the value of stock and of the value of buildings, some idea of the implications of farm transactions, and it is doubtful if you can get a judge who will have the necessary background to deal with all the implications of the financial arrangements between debtor and creditor. It seems to me that a system whereby there was a representative there for the farmers, presenting their case, interpreting some of the data placed before the judge, who in the light of the evidence presented to him would then interpret it from the legal viewpoint, would make for a much more sympathetic hearing and a much better understanding. I do not think any reasonable argument has yet been advanced by the minister or any other member of the government for transferring these powers from the board of review, on which there will be farmer representation, to a court. After all, the board of review was not some irresponsible body, as one may have gathered from the minister's statement this afternoon; the board of review is a quasi-judicial body presided over by a judge, with someone there to interpret the facts from the farmer's point of view and present his case in a sympathetic manner. I think we would be very well advised to include that feature in the legislation.

Mr. FAIR: I think the hon. member for Weyburn has made a very good point. I think experience over the years, and particularly the experience we have had with different boards administering government policy under war restrictions, has shown us that as a result of lack of farmer representation, many grave mistakes have been made and grave injustices done to the farmer. While we shall have the benefit of judicial interpretation of points of law, I think we should also have the benefit of other representatives as we had under the old board.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Proposals by farmers in Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to know whether the minister thinks that under this section power is actually given to reduce debts, to alter the terms of payment and to reduce rates of interest. It will be noticed that all the section says is that the farmer "may make a proposal under this act for a composition." "Composition" has already been defined as "a composition in satisfaction of debts". The court may make a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement either before or after an assignment under the Bankruptcy Act. I am not a lawyer, and I wish to ask the minister if in his opinion and in the opinion of the Department of Justice who have been advising him, that provision grants to the court full power to reduce debt, not merely to extend it over a period of time, not merely to postpone it or to make some arrangement about payment, but to reduce it, to alter the terms and reduce the rates of interest. I noticed in the proposed legislation which was placed before the government by the debt conference, under section 9, subsection 2, they state:

> Without derogating from the generality of subsection 1 and regardless of when the debt was incurred or whether the debt is secured or unsecured, the board on formulating the plan of settlement may:
> (a) alter the terms of payment of any debt;
> (b) reduce the principal and/or interest of any debt;
> (c) reduce the rate of interest on any debt.

These powers are specific. I am a little afraid regarding the powers in section 7 when the court is only authorized to make an extension of time and a scheme of arrangement. If the minister is convinced that that terminology does give them power to reduce debt and to reduce the rates of interest, of course I am prepared to accept his interpretation, because he is in the legal profession. Certainly to me it looked like vague language and does not look as though strong powers are given to a board that is supposed to do what this bill proposes.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think my hon. friend is not on the section at which he should raise this point. Section 7 simply sets out the conditions under which a farmer may make a proposal under this, and I think the question to which he has referred, as to the powers of the court to formulate a proposal and to reduce debt, could more properly be discussed under sections 15 and following, under the heading, "Formulation of proposal by court". Perhaps if he does not mind, we can let his question stand until we reach those sections.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to ask why the minister deemed it necessary to have that date line of 1935 in there. Take, for example, a stock man or a farmer with a certain amount of stock who managed to struggle along fairly well until 1935; then, owing to drouth and heat and rust in 1936 and 1937, he was forced into debt and went through the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act procedure. Are we to refuse the right to that farmer to make a proposal? Surely it does him more credit that he was able to struggle on until after 1935 without going under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Why should we say, because he was forced to go through the act in 1936 or 1937, on account of a severe drouth hitting western Canada, he shall not be allowed now to make a proposal?

Mr. ILSLEY: He could not have gone through the act in 1937 unless he had debts incurred prior to May 1, 1935, and then there was no power to make any order in respect of debts incurred after May 1, 1935. Such inquiries as I have been able to make would indicate that the great majority, indeed the overwhelming majority of cases requiring relief are cases where the debt was incurred prior to May 1, 1935; that there was not much placing of mortgages on property subsequent to that date. We went through a great many figures and examined the records of a great many cases, and we found in those cases examined that in Saskatchewan 72 per cent of the debt was incurred prior to May 1, 1935, and for the three prairie provinces, 73 and a fraction per cent of the debt was incurred prior to that date. Therefore, while we thought at first that the percentage should be 75 per cent, we decided that it would be perhaps a little better to make it 66⅔ per cent, so that we stipulated that two-thirds must have been incurred prior to May 1, 1935, and the definition of debt incurred prior to May 1, 1935 is that interest accrued since is included in that. That was a point which had never been decided by the courts, although it had been raised. It had been contended under the old act that interest accruing after May 1, 1935, could not be adjusted except by consent, because it was a debt accruing after May 1, 1935. That point is cleared up by this bill, and debts incurred prior to May 1, 1935, for the purposes of this bill, include interest accrued since. My inquiries and the record of the cases dealt with under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act show that the great majority of cases are cases of mortgages placed on the land, I would say, in the twenties or the teens, certainly before May 1, 1935.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In subsection 1, does that mean that if a farmer did not make a proposal at all, he can come in under this, provided the debt was incurred prior to that time?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. To qualify, two-thirds of the debt must have been incurred prior to May 1, 1935.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Whether he made a proposal or not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That was my understanding, but it was suggested to me that it was not so.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member's understanding is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I cannot understand why the debt must have been incurred prior to May 1, 1935. It seems to me that that is going back a long way. The cut-off date should be 1938 anyway. This will be a great hardship on some of the farmers, because there was a depression in 1937 and 1938.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was not the period when the debt was incurred. The great bulk of the debt was incurred before 1935. This is the date in the old act, and if that date is moved down, as has been suggested by some in this house, and outside the house, it certainly unsettles confidence in the finality of this legislation. It is an advertisement to the public that under pressure they will be moved down and down. That is what happened, I am told, in connection with the debt adjustment acts of western Canada. While it was provided that the debts must have been incurred before a certain date, later on that date was advanced; it was moved further ahead to another date. Undoubtedly that would happen; there would be pressure developing here, and if we changed our act from an act to clear up an emergency it would become a continuing act. That is what hon. gentlemen have been asking for, but that is the kind of act which I would not approve and I do not believe that parliament would approve it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It need not necessarily become a continuing act, being extended every year. But the fact is that in 1937 and 1938 there were difficulties. Those were hard years, and by making 1935 the fixed date you are cutting out the difficult years over which the farmers had no control. You are making it impossible for those two years to be covered by this legislation.

Mr. ABBOTT: It does not eliminate those two years if two-thirds of the farmer's debt had been incurred prior to May 1, 1935, if he did not make any further borrowings after 1935 and the arrears of interest accumulated. That comes within the definition of debt incurred prior to May 1, 1935, and he can take advantage of the provisions of the legislation.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister states that the date in the old act is 1935, but they did not visualize then the type of drouth we had later. Furthermore, it must be remembered that at that time we also had a wheat board act which set the price of wheat at 87½ cents, and after that it went considerably below that figure. The farmers had a lower price plus a drouth, and there was a serious condition in the west. Many farmers did go into debt who had been able, I would not say to keep out of debt, but at any rate to keep going prior to that time. But many increased their debts in 1936, 1937 and 1938. When the act was formulated the date was set at 1935; but that is no argument, for the simple reason that the conditions which prevailed in 1936 and 1937 were not then anticipated. In 1936 and 1937 we had one of the most serious drouths on record in western Canada, and in addition to that the price of wheat dropped from 87½ cents to 70 cents.

Those two factors should be taken together, because they had a disastrous effect on western Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the percentages, I said that the average of the debt, from the cases examined, was divided in the two proportions I mentioned; 73 per cent or thereabouts was incurred prior to May 1, 1935, and the rest of it was incurred since. I am assured from inquiries I have made that, in the great majority of cases, with that two-thirds figure the persons who are really designed to be benefited by the legislation will come in. It must be borne in mind that under the old act there was no power in the board to adjust any debt incurred after May 1, 1935, but under this bill all debts down to the date of application, whether in 1943 or 1944 or 1945, may be adjusted, provided two-thirds of the indebtedness was incurred prior to the date in the old act. I am averse to changing the original date, because I know it gives the appearance of instability to the whole thing if we do.

Mr. QUELCH: In 1937 the government passed certain regulations under which the farmers had to reduce the amount of their stock to three or four head per family in order to get feed or relief, and a large area was affected by those regulations. Farmers who, prior to that time, had been able to carry on, by selling cream to the stores, found themselves in the position where they had to sell their live stock, and they received at that time only three or four dollars a head. After they had lost their dairy cattle they were no longer able to buy at the stores and they went into debt, so that from 1937, 1938 and 1939 their debts increased considerably. Those farmers will not be helped, except where two-thirds of their debts were incurred prior to 1935.

Mr. ILSLEY: Had they no debts incurred prior to May 1, 1935?

Mr. QUELCH: Some had, but some were able to carry on. I would not dare to say how many did, but even if there were only a small percentage whose debts were incurred prior to 1935, they are entitled to justice the same as anybody else. I do not see why they should be excluded, no matter how few they may be. Why leave the date at 1935?

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the hon. member for Acadia agree with me that farmers who incurred their debts to local merchants in 1937 or 1938 have no desire to have that particular type of debt cut down? When better times come they wish to pay the merchants who carried them through that period. Does my hon. friend not agree with that?

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. QUELCH: I would say that every farmer would like to pay his debts in full. Generally speaking, the farmers are every bit as honest as every other man, but when a man finds himself in a position where he cannot pay his debts, if he comes under the measure, store debts will have to be cut down with other debts.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The point is not whether a man wants to get out of paying his store debts. The point is that if the farmer is insolvent, if sixty per cent of his debts were incurred before May 1, 1935, he cannot come within the benefits of this legislation. If only sixty per cent of his debts were incurred prior to May, 1935, he may not get the benefits of this legislation; that means he cannot pay his store debts at all. What will happen is that proceedings will take their normal course and he will be foreclosed. In view of this limitation, I think the minister should tell us the number of farmers in the three prairie provinces who will come within the ambit of this bill. Has the minister any figures on the number of farmers, two-thirds of whose debts were incurred prior to 1935? This bill will exclude thousands of farmers, because, as has already been stated, 1937 was one of our worst years in Saskatchewan. Agriculture in Canada was at an all-time low, and in Saskatchewan, besides low prices, we had adverse weather conditions. Farmers had to get rid of their live stock except for a few head. They were required to do so in order to get relief and comply with the regulations. During that period taxes and store debts piled up, and I presume seed grain advances will also be included when the court comes to compute the farmer's total obligations. If seed grain advances are included with tax arrears, debts to the storekeeper, debts to the implement company, how many farmers in western Canada will be able to say that only one-third of their debt was incurred since 1935? I think this section will exclude thousands of farmers. That is the point we ought to be taking cognizance of. This bill will not meet the situation of the insolvent farmer unless two-thirds of his debt were incurred prior to May, 1935. There will be many farmers, sixty-five per cent of whose debt was incurred prior to 1935 who will be left out in the cold.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just consider the situation of these farmers. They have had up until the present time to apply, and presumably they have not applied. We are now in 1943. Moreover, they have the benefit of an order in council giving them the right to apply for postponement of foreclosure proceedings.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Good for the duration of the war.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and that meets the present situation at least. I do not know what will be done in the future. We never know. But there are two things that must be borne in mind. These persons have had nine years of this Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in which to make application. If they have not done so, I do not think there will be very many of them apply now, except perhaps those who had their debts adjusted in 1935, 1936 and 1937. Perhaps some will come in, because they have not had the option of making a second application for a proposal. Those who did not make application have let this go for nine years, so that I do not think there will be many of them. If we strike some sort of percentage, it may exclude some, but this will take in most of them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is it not possible that the reason why many of them did not apply was that the boards could not deal with any debts except those incurred prior to 1935? The very debts that are most embarrassing and that the farmers are most concerned about could not be dealt with under the old act and cannot under this bill unless two-thirds of the total debt were incurred prior to 1935.

Mr. ILSLEY: That may be the case, although I do not know that it is.

Mr. FAIR: I wish to bring a matter before the government for action upon it before this bill passes. With respect to farmers who may have their debts adjusted or have a proposal made and agreed upon, is there any assurance that they will be guaranteed the cost of production for the products they raise in order to enable them to pay off their debts?

The CHAIRMAN: I am not going to tolerate a question of that kind at this stage of the deliberations of the committee. Surely we cannot discuss economics now after we have deliberated the principles of this bill for two days.

Mr. FAIR: Unless they are guaranteed the cost of production, they will be unable to carry out their contracts and we shall have to have another debt act in the very near future. If the farmers are to be in a position to pay off their debts, they must be guaranteed the cost of production just the same as other industries are.

Mr. POTTIER: Ask them to pay their bills and there will be no trouble.

Mr. FAIR: If the hon. gentleman would speak up for himself, we could perhaps hear him, but I could not.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Representative of deceased or mentally incompetent farmer may apply.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have particular reference to subsection 3 of this section which I believe is not properly worded, in that in line 24 the word "may" appears. I think it should read "shall," for the following reasons. The section as it now stands reads as follows:

> If the court is satisfied that a member of the family of the decedent or of such farmer resides and will continue to reside on the farm of the decedent or of such farmer, who intends and is able to operate the same, the court may, ex parte . . . grant such application.

The section as it now stands with the permissive "may" therein will, I submit, hold out hopes that farmers who live on the land following the death of the owner would have the right and the opportunity to come under the provisions of this bill. The use of the word "may," being permissive, means that a discretionary order will be made which will, if the ordinary rules are followed, not be altered on appeal. As the bill is drawn, I think the result will be that a land court jurisprudence will be established, and we shall find ourselves in the position that each district court judge will determine applications from the sons and daughters of deceased farmers according to his own whims and wishes. Provision for appeals is to be found in section 24, which provides:

> An appeal may be taken from any judgment or order of the court made in any proceedings under this act pursuant to a proposal, including an order approving or confirming a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement or declining to formulate a proposal, to the appeal court in the province in which the court has jurisdiction, and shall be asserted, heard and decided according to the ordinary procedure governing appeals from judgments or orders of the court to the court of appeal in such province, subject to any special rules of practice and procedure relating thereto made under this act.

The ordinary rule is that a discretionary order is not reversed on appeal. The fact that the district court judge may make an order shows that the order he may make will be discretionary; and where he refuses the right to the sons or daughters, as the case may be, of a deceased farmer, their right will not be altered on appeal in view of the fact that the ordinary principles of law will apply. I suggest to the minister that the right should be absolute; that where a member of the family of the deceased will continue on the farm, and intends and is able to operate the same, he should enjoy the right to apply under this bill. Therefore I suggest for the minister's consideration that the permissive word "may" be deleted and the mandatory "shall" substituted therefor.

Mr. ILSLEY: The intention was that the court shall, upon such terms and conditions as it deems fit, by order grant such application, and may do so ex parte. That was the intention; the word "may" was directed to the words "ex parte", but I will admit that it is not worded in such a way as to carry out that intention.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then would there be any objection to changing it to "shall"?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am quite willing to take out the words "may ex parte" and substitute "shall." The word "shall" does not go with "ex parte" very well, so that I am quite willing to make the change.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move that subsection 3 of section 8 be amended by striking out the word "may" in line 24 and the words "ex parte" in line 25 and substituting therefor the word "shall."

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not wish to speak to this amendment, but there is another matter—

The CHAIRMAN: Let us dispose of the amendment first.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does the Minister of Justice not think that would involve the giving of notice to other parties concerned, that it would make such an application other than ex parte?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have considered that. The section provides that the court has to be satisfied that a member of the family of the decedent or of such farmer resides and will continue to reside on the farm, and I would imagine the judge would very often require some notice to be given to someone before he would declare himself satisfied that this was going to be the case. I think in most cases the judge would want someone to get notice that he had that application before him, to give an opportunity of contesting the fact that there was a member of the family who would be likely to reside there.

Mr. GRAHAM: It will be recalled that there was an amendment after 1934, and so far the application under the act has been ex parte.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. There is nothing here that would require notice to be given, except that the judge must make a finding on a question of fact.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Is not the rule of law that if it is not stated to be an ex parte application, it is not an ex parte application?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not intended that it shall be obligatory upon the judge to require notice; I think that can be taken care of very well in the regulations. The bill as drawn showed that it was the intention to have it even an ex parte application, and it is only on account of the objection raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre that we are substituting the word "shall". I do not think we should go so far as to say "shall ex parte".

Mr. GRAHAM: Could you say, "shall on an ex parte application"?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think so; I do not think the judge should be precluded from requiring notice if he has any doubt about the fact he is required to find. I think it should be provided in the regulations, however, that an application of this kind can be made ex parte, unless the judge decides that notice must be given.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not know whether other hon. members had the same understanding, but when I first read the bill I contemplated that the personal representative or the immediate member of the family would reside on the farm and carry on operations. As this section is drawn now, it is only necessary to have a member of the family residing on the farm and carrying on operations; yet he might have no jurisdiction or control over the estate of the decedent or the insane person. I should think the personal representative, or the executor or administrator, should be the person to reside on the farm.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Would it be possible that the personal representative might be the wife of the deceased farmer, who might want her sons to carry on the farm?

Mr. GRAHAM: Or a trust company.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, or a trust company. When this amendment to provide for deceased farmers first came in, it was brought to the attention of Mr. Dunning at that time because there were many cases where farmers had died, and where their widows had sons who were not old enough to inherit the farm or to carry on the farming operations, and therefore did not come within the benefits of the legislation.

Mr. EDWARDS: Why make it insistent that a member of the farmer's family should continue to live on the farm. All he has to do is merely live there.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Preservation of property.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have been comparing subsection 2 of section 10 with section 33, which makes it impossible for the farmer to sell, after he has had a composition. This, I take it, is to prevent his selling prior to the composition being filed in the court.

Mr. ABBOTT: Prior to its being approved.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He has no possibility of refusing the composition, has he? The farmer has no option in the matter. Once he has made his proposal, and they make a composition, he has no opportunity to refuse?

Mr. ILSLEY: He cannot refuse it.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Stay of proceedings by creditors.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is something in connection with this section on which I should like to secure some information. Is it intended that under this any person who is the creditor of a farmer in respect of whom a proposal has been made shall be, without leave of the courts, denied the right to take judicial or extra-judicial proceedings to recover the debt? I have this in mind: After the proposal has been made and has been approved, we will say in respect of a farmer who purchases live stock under a lien note or conditional sales agreement, and fails to make payments, is the creditor who was not a party to the proposal to be debarred from taking proceedings?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it ties him up. He cannot take any proceedings, because the farmer has filed the proposal, and that stays proceedings by all creditors, whether secured or not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But that is not the point I have in mind. After the proposal is accepted, what happens? Let us suppose the proposal is made in 1943, and that in 1944 the farmer buys certain necessities such as machinery and live stock, under a conditional sales agreement. Is that creditor to be debarred from his rights, even though he was not connected in any way with the proposal?

Mr. ABBOTT: Does my hon. friend mean after the proposal has been confirmed by the court?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: Sections 10 and 11 do not apply in that case. These sections, as I understand them, are only to cover a case while a proposal is pending and prior to acceptance and confirmation by the court, or the formulation of the proposal by the court. There is the same provision in the Bankruptcy Act and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, preventing a creditor from taking proceedings without leave of the court, while a proposal for composition or arrangement is pending.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Meeting of creditors.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is this to be considered a review of the case, where the official receiver shall call together the creditors, for discussion, and the debtor would not be present?

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend will see in another section, the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act apply to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, except in so far as the special provisions of the act vary the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. This section simply says that the official receiver under this bill will perform the duties and functions required by the Bankruptcy Act "to be performed by a trustee". So that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act relating to creditors do not apply in respect of farmers who avail themselves of the provisions of this bill. And the official receiver assists the debtor in formulating the proposal, and arranges to call together the creditors to consider the proposal and decide whether or not they are willing to accept it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Why would the debtor not be there?

Mr. ABBOTT: He would be.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It does not say so.

Mr. ABBOTT: It does not have to say so; he would be there.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 and 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Proposal by court in certain cases.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to ask a question with respect to the powers of the board. Again, it seems to me, the phraseology is quite vague. The section states:

On the written request of a creditor or of the farmer, where the official receiver reports that the farmer has made a proposal but that no proposal has been approved by the creditors or where the court has refused to approve a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement submitted to it by the official receiver pursuant to a proposal, the court shall endeavour to formulate an acceptable proposal to be submitted to the creditors and the farmer.

May I emphasize the words, "to approve a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement". Does that give the powers asked for by the debt conference? They asked that they may have power to (a) alter the terms of the payment of a debt, (b) reduce the principal of the debt and (c) reduce the rate of interest. Does this grant that power?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it does. The words are the same as in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which has been in force since 1934, and there is no doubt of any power to approve an arrangement whereby principal may be reduced, interest may be reduced and terms may be altered. I have forgotten the words the hon. member read, but that can be done.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—How court to base its proposal.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This is the only section I can find which sets out any principle to be used as a basis for making this composition by the court. It states:

The court shall base its proposal upon the present and prospective capability of the farmer to meet his debts as they become due and the productive value of the farm.

It will be noted that it is based on two things: first, the ability of the farmer to meet his debt and, second, the productive value of the farm. It seems to me that two vital principles have been left out, principles which ought to guide the court in making this composition. They were both mentioned in the proposed bill submitted to the government. The first was that there should be something there to provide for the preservation of a farmer's equity. The minister made a strong speech this afternoon about retaining confidence. He pointed out that he did not wish to have legislation that was wide open, because creditors would not be prepared to advance money unless they felt they had some security behind the money they advanced. Well, there are two sides to that question. When a creditor lends money to a farmer he is entering into a business partnership. One man is doing a piece of work with his machinery and his farm; he is putting up the best years of his life. On the other hand, the creditor is putting up some money. If, in the passing years, owing to circumstances beyond the control of both parties, there are no proceeds, what happens? While the equity of the one partner is maintained, the equity of the other partner disappears. If the minister will go over the many cases which can be submitted, he will find that whereas a farmer may have worked for twenty years, may have paid a considerable amount of money in interest, may have put in years of hard work, may have improved his equipment and buildings and increased the number of acres broken, yet at the end of that period his equity has actually shrunk, whereas the equity of the other person is maintained, if not actually increased. The money he invested may have been invested during an inflationary period when the purchasing power of his dollar was much less, and he may be foreclosing at a time of deflation when the purchasing power has greatly increased. The result is that his equity has greatly increased.

It seems to me that one of the weaknesses of this bill is to be found in this section. No provision has been made for attempting to assess the farmer's equity. If these two partners, the creditor and the debtor, are both to suffer a loss on account of bad prices and adverse weather conditions, the loss ought to be shared between them rather than have one party accept all the loss and the other party have all the security. I am in favour of the proposal which was made by the debt conference. They proposed that one of the principles underlying the adjustment of these debts should be:

15. (1) The value of the farmer's interest in the farm lands as represented by the amount of money, principal and interest paid by him to the vendor, mortgagee, encumbrances, or other creditors in respect of the land, and the amount of cultivation, improvements or labour made or expended by him in bringing the lands to their present productive capacity.

I think that ought to be recognized in making the adjustment. The second vital principle which it seems to me has been overlooked was also suggested by the debt conference. It reads:

(3) The cost of maintenance of the debtor and his family at a reasonable standard of living and the current expenditures reasonably necessary in the operation of his farm.

The farmer is not in the same position as a business man. The farm is not only his instrument of production; it is his home. There are cases where a business man may have his home in his place of business, but that is not the general rule. If, as a result of this business arrangement, he finds at the end of a period of years that the partnership has lost, one partner will get the business, but the other will lose not only the business but his home and the place where his family resides. I think the debt conference made a worth-while suggestion, one worthy of the minister's consideration. They suggest that in any proposal which is made in arranging for the payments to be made by the debtor, sufficient should be left to take care of the farmer and his family. If they cannot stay on the farm as efficient producers; if he cannot maintain his family at a reasonable standard of living, it will be impossible for the farmer to fulfil his part of the obligation.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does my hon. friend not think the judge will know that as well as he?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): My hon. friend knows better than that. If the judge will know it without anybody telling him, why is section 16 in the bill? Why does it say:

> The court shall base its proposal upon the present and prospective capability of the farmer to meet his debts as they become due and the productive value of the farm.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do not the words "prospective capability" cover the very point brought up by the hon. member for Weyburn? Surely that would include a reasonable proposal based upon the farmer's ability to pay under the circumstances in which he finds himself, not only in that year but during the years the proposal might run.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It deals with the farmer's ability to pay; it does not guarantee that in the proposal the farmer's equity will be preserved.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am speaking about the other point.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It does not guarantee that in the proposal; it does not say that there shall be sufficient allowance for the farmer and his family; that is not considered in the compromise proposal under which the farmer has to pay an amount to the creditor which may make it impossible for him to maintain himself and his family. Under those circumstances the terms of the proposal would be such that he could not fulfil them.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would be a very stupid judge who would do that.

Mr. ABBOTT: The suggestion put forward by my hon. friend attacks the whole basis of fixed money obligations. He has suggested that a man who is a creditor in a certain amount has an equity in the property. He has not any such thing. He has a claim against the property, which may or may not be secured—if it is in the form of a mortgage it is secured—but he has no opportunity to participate in the increased value of the property. My hon. friend is suggesting that he should participate in the losses. In other words, in the case of a fixed money obligation, the creditor puts up, say, $2,000; the debtor borrows that and the obligation is secured on the real property. He puts in a lot of sweat and work over a period of years and for one reason or another the property depreciates in value. The creditor has had no opportunity to participate in any increased value. In other words, my hon. friend has asked that the creditor should transfer to the debtor a portion of the debt. That is what it amounts to. It attacks the whole basis of obligations fixed in terms of money. You may as well say that if a man promises to pay $200 or $300, his legal obligation to pay will depend upon whether or not he is successful in operating a particular property or business in connection with which he has borrowed the money.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What about his physical obligation? The parliamentary assistant has stated that there is a fixed monetary value.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say anything about fixed monetary value; I said that his obligation was expressed in terms of money.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That obligation is fixed under the proposal as a payment of so much a year. He may have to pay $100 a year, which is his fixed money obligation. It is quite true that the creditor may not participate in any increased profits and that the hon. member for Weyburn is expecting him to participate only in the losses, but the minister is not taking into consideration the fact that once the money obligation is fixed and a condition then comes about over which the farmer has absolutely no control, it may be physically impossible, on account of hail or drouth or something else, for him to carry out that obligation. Then his contract is broken and he cannot possibly help that. The proposal cannot be changed; there cannot be any revision of the proposal, because only one can be made.

Mr. GRAHAM: Read section 29.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That covers the annulment of a composition, which brings up an entirely different point. I shall have something to say about that when we reach the section. When the court is to base the proposal upon the present and there is to be only the one proposal allowed, I think the obligation should be elastic enough to overcome a condition for which the farmer may not be responsible.

Mr. QUELCH: I think this section is altogether too vague. It has in the past and will no doubt in the future be interpreted in many different ways and may easily destroy the efficiency of the farmer. In the bill presented by the western conference, section 15 reads:

> In exercising its jurisdiction and powers to formulate a plan of settlement and without limiting its discretion in any way the board may consider and determine inter alia the following matters. . . .
> (2) The ability of the debtor to pay and to that end to arrange the payments of his creditors in such amounts and at such times as the debtor may reasonably be expected to meet, having regard to his present and prospective capability to perform the terms and conditions of the plan and having regard to the productive capacity of his farm;
> (3) The cost of maintenance of the debtor and his family at a reasonable standard of living and the current expenditures reasonably necessary in the operation of his farm.

In Alberta the importance of this was realized to such an extent that it became the law of the province, and the first charge against a farmer's production was the amount of the crop which was necessary to carry on the farmer's expenses for the current year. If a farmer is not allowed a sufficient amount from the revenue of his farm to meet these expenditures, he cannot carry on efficiently, and once he has gone under this bill his credit is practically destroyed. It surely must be the aim of the government to allow the farmer to carry on efficiently, and yet this clause as it stands may easily be interpreted in such a way as to allow him just enough to pay certain expenses, without taking into full consideration his costs of living for the family. I had a certain experience years ago, and I do not mind mentioning it, back about the years 1933 or 1934, right in the heart of the depression. A collector was trying to collect a certain bill which at the time I could not pay, on account of crop conditions, and he started to lecture me. He said, "The trouble with you British is you are not satisfied to reduce your standard of living. Central Europeans make better farmers than you do; they are willing to reduce their standard of living down to practically nothing." Is that what we want to do in western Canada—put our farmers there on the plane with the peasants of central Europe? That is what will be done by the bill under this clause; not sufficient provision will be made for the farmer to maintain his farm in a decent state and, in addition, pay the expenses of his family. It is not necessary for me to say that when the collector took that stand we rapidly parted company.

Mr. ABBOTT: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Who does he think should pay these costs to which he is referring?

Mr. QUELCH: I think the farmer should be allowed to pay these costs out of the revenue of the farm.

Mr. ABBOTT: At whose expense?

Mr. QUELCH: At no expense; at the cost of the farm. The creditor would have to take less for a year; the debt would be postponed. For instance, if a farm is a total loss, you might say, at whose expense? Well, it is at the expense of the farmer, because that amount is not wiped off the debt; it just means the payment he has to make is postponed until the future. It is always at the farmer's expense until he has to default.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is a question I should like to ask in connection with this particular section in order to be in a position to discuss intelligently the meaning and effect of the section, which, I may point out, is identical with the words of the present section 12, subsection 8, of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Under that section there has been a board which writes off the principal and interest in connection with secured and unsecured debts which have come under the jurisdiction of the boards of review. If the information was already given, I confess that I was not present at the time it was given. I should like to have a statement from the minister showing the total amount of the write-off in secured and unsecured debts in each of the years from 1935, when the act came into effect, until the present time, and what is more important, the percentage of reduction in principal and also in interest during those years. This section has been interpreted by the courts of appeal in the various provinces, not directly but indirectly, through appeals which have been made to the several courts of appeals from orders which have been made by boards of review. As I read over this bill as a whole and this section in particular, I think it actually aims at doing what the land court act of Manitoba endeavoured to do, a statute which was passed on April 17, 1939, but did not come into effect on account of the oncoming of the war. The general purpose of this act, as stated in section 133, is:

> . . . to retain all honest, industrious and efficient farmers in the use and occupation of their farms as efficient producers and to make such orders that, after allowing for all normal current expenditure and providing for the maintenance of themselves and their families in a reasonable standard of comfort, such farmers may be reasonably expected to meet their liabilities as they become due, and to protect in so far as possible the rights of mortgagees and vendors of farm lands.

That, I submit, is exactly what has been done under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act—I speak now of Saskatchewan during recent years—in its administration. It is impossible for any judge or any board to foresee what the prospective capabilities of a farm may be. Eventualities will arise. I think it was the hon. member for Weyburn who mentioned the possibility of drouth or hail. I bring that up in connection with this item, for the reason that, for some years now, the boards of review have been making orders which provide that in any one year, irrespective of the order that has been made, if climatic conditions or drouth, frost and the like make it impossible for the farmer to make the payments provided for under the order or the proposal, the sheriff of the judicial district in which he resides may make an order the effect of which is that for that year the order made by the board of review need not be lived up to. That provision has been declared beyond the powers of the board of review.

Mr. GRAHAM: May I ask, is it not only the delegation of the powers that is so declared?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes; that is true. I was not going into the details. What was actually declared to be beyond the powers of the board of review was the delegation of that right to the sheriff.

In making regulations effectually to carry out the provisions of section 16, I suggest to the minister that provision be made in these regulations to permit of the delegation of that power to be made by the district court judge to the clerk of the court or the sheriff of the judicial district. I do not know how this section could be worded in order to cover what the hon. member for Weyburn has in mind with respect to prospective capabilities, but I feel that, with a district court judge being in charge of the administration, every consideration will be given to farmers who are efficient, farmers honestly endeavouring to carry out their obligations. It might be that the section could be widened to cover what the hon. member who has just spoken has in mind, but I think the section as it now stands will cover these eventualities, provided that what I mentioned the other day is done, namely, that a judge is appointed as an appeal court who has a complete grasp of the debt situation in the western provinces and who is, therefore, in a position to establish jurisprudence fair alike to the farmer and to the creditor, always having in mind that the primary consideration of this legislation must be the keeping of efficient and honest farmers on the farms, farmers who have found, owing to conditions over which they have no control, that at certain times they are unable to meet their debts in full.

I think we should have the regulations, and I mention that at this time. The regulations will be as important as, if not more important than, the wording of the bill, and I should like to see those regulations that are to direct the administration of this bill, to the end that we may see to what extent the court may go and the considerations it shall take under advisement in determining the question as to the present and prospective capability of the farmer to meet his debts as they become due, and the productive value of the farm. Have the regulations been made yet? If so, I should like to have them brought before the committee. They would go a long way toward clarifying what I believe are the doubts of the hon. member for Weyburn and other members who have spoken. If the regulations are wide enough, this section is wide enough; if the regulations are narrow, this section can be interpreted narrowly.

On section 18—Representations to be considered.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to have an answer to the question I have asked regarding the regulations and also in regard to the write-down of debts during the years in question.

Mr. ILSLEY: The regulations have not been prepared, and I do not anticipate they will be prepared until there is some consultation with the judges in some way. I do not know just what form that consultation will take, but there will have to be some consultation. At any rate, the regulations are not prepared.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it intended to change the regulations that have been in effect?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; they will have to be changed. The regulations at present are adapted to the boards of review. As the hon. gentleman has said, section 16 is in this form in the old act; it just repeats the language of the 1934 act. It was thought better to stick to that language, because it has worked well and I do not know that there has been very much dispute as to what it means. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that it had been held that there could not be a delegation of a right to suspend payments, the right to make a finding that would suspend payments. The justice department is of the opinion that suspension of payments, in the event of crop failure or of some similar circumstances, can be provided by a ministerial finding by an officer of the court of certain facts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Just what does the minister mean by that statement?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not too clear as to just what the clause was that was held ultra vires, beyond the powers of the boards of review, but I believe the principle of it was this, that the payments would not be made if a certain state of facts came into existence in a certain year. I really cannot discuss it. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would know what was decided there.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There was no power of delegation to determine that in any particular area there should be a suspension of payment by reason of crop failure and the like.

Mr. ILSLEY: What the officers of the Department of Justice have in mind is something like this. A proposal might be drafted in such a way that, if there were a crop failure, payments would be suspended. Then there could be a finding of fact by the court that there was a crop failure, in which event the suspension would take place and the necessary action could be taken by an officer of the court. They say that under a properly drafted proposal that contingency could be provided for.

Mr. GRAHAM: From my point of view, and, I am sure, even from the point of view of members on your extreme left, Mr. Chairman, the important thing is that the bill presupposes that a proposal may contain a clause dealing with crop failure or other disasters that come during the currency of the proposals, and it is not an important matter for us tonight to know just how that will be accomplished. I am pleased to hear the minister indicate so clearly that the intention is to find a reasonable means of permitting that in the proposal and to get over the question of the legality of the manner in which boards of review were dealing with that particular question.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act many of the adjustments that were made called upon the farmer to pay fifty-five per cent of the principal, and the balance of interest was due in the tenth year. Is there anything in this clause which would prevent that kind of thing from being done?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing to prevent it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act some of the proposals that were brought forward required the farmer to pay fifty-five per cent of the principal in the tenth year, and the interest that was due in that year—that was the final year—had to be paid in that year. Has the minister before him any of the proposals formulated by the boards of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not that information before me.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That provision was in many of the adjustments, and when the farmer sees that burden at the end of the tenth year of his operations he decides it is almost useless to carry on, particularly when the control of his production is left in the hands of his creditors. Such an arrangement might be possible under this bill, and I was wondering whether anything could be done to prevent that.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be left to the courts.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And the only thing the farmer could do would be to appeal?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Section 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Court may decline to formulate a proposal.

Mr. FAIR: This section reads:

> The court may, by order, decline to formulate a proposal in any case where it does not consider that it can do so in fairness and justice to the creditors or the farmer or where it finds that the farmer has not acted in good faith in his conduct in relation to the creditors in the management of his farm or the disbursement of his income.

Who is to be the judge of whether the farmer is managing his farm efficiently or otherwise?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing about efficient management in the section. The court is the judge of whether the farmer has acted in good faith in his conduct in relation to the creditors in the management of his farm or the disbursement of his income.

Mr. FAIR: There are many different opinions as to what is efficient management of a farm. Quite a number of farmers work their land, one in one way and others in a different way, and they raise different kinds of live stock. What sort of judge will be able to say whether the farmer is managing his farm efficiently?

Mr. ILSLEY: The section does not use any language such as the hon. gentleman has used. The court has to determine whether the formulation of a proposal can be made in fairness and justice to the creditor or the farmer. The other thing the court has to decide is whether the farmer has acted in good faith in his conduct in relation to the creditors in the management of his farm or the disbursement of his income. These are matters which can properly be left to the court.

Mr. FAIR: It is quite easy to judge whether he has acted fairly in the disbursement of his income. But to judge whether he has managed his farm efficiently is a different proposition, and I am afraid that some judges will not be competent to decide that question.

Sections 20 and 21 agreed to.

On section 22—In case of refusal.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: This section reads:

> If the creditors or the farmer decline to approve a proposal formulated by the court, the court may, nevertheless, by order, confirm the composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement therein proposed or as amended by it, and, upon such confirmation, it shall be binding upon the creditors and the farmer.

This means that the farmer is entirely at the disposition of the court.

Mr. ABBOTT: So are the creditors.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes. So are the creditors. If the judge happens to be one who has done some farming in the last few years and knows what adversity is, he may have some sympathy for the farmer. But let it be clearly understood that once the farmer makes a proposal and it is confirmed by the court, the farmer has no opportunity for refusing it.

Mr. ABBOTT: He has an appeal.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Other than an appeal.

Section agreed to.

On section 23—Appeal courts in provinces.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with this section, when I spoke the other day I said that in order to have an effective administration of this bill there was one important thing, namely, the identity of the judges who are to be appointed as an appeal court in each of the three provinces. The other important thing is, of course, the regulations which will effectuate the carrying into effect of this bill. But, however complete the regulations may be, and I regret that we are not to have them before the house and the committee, and however complete the provisions of the bill may be, we are entering upon a new system of land court jurisprudence where the ordinary rules of law will be insufficient to guide the appeal court with respect to the capability of the farmer and the productive value of his farm and in deciding whether the farmer has acted in good faith in his conduct in relation to his creditors in the management of his farm or the disbursement of his income. It will depend in large measure on the breadth of vision and the training and the confidence enjoyed by these men in the provinces where they are appointed. I would ask the minister who these judges will be, and if a decision has not been made thereon as yet, will the parties most affected by this legislation be consulted—the farm bodies, the loan corporations, and the attorneys-general particularly of the three western provinces? I think there is no more important matter than the identity of the judges who are to comprise the courts of appeal. If this legislation is to be administered in the light of the strict application of legal principles, I doubt whether it will be successful. But if men are placed in the position of judges of appeal courts in the various provinces who are able men with experience and wisdom and appreciation of what conditions have been in the west and may continue to be in the future, there can be built up a body of jurisprudence that will make this legislation effective and assure to our farmers a continuation of efficient production and assure payment in the future to those who have advanced their money. I therefore ask who the judges will be.

Mr. GRAHAM: I agree largely with what the hon. member for Lake Centre says. But, as he knows well the judges of the appellate division in Saskatchewan, would he care to assist the minister by recommending particular judges?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have never been in a position where I could make any recommendations.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has asked an important question. I do not know whom we are going to appoint; no consideration has been given that matter by the government. I have a few ideas, but they are in an incomplete state. By that I mean that naturally I have given a little thought to the question, but have come to no decision, even in my own mind. I cannot give any undertakings about consultation. The appointment of these appellate judges is a matter for the government, which must assume responsibility. In appointing judges who will really constitute a new dominion court or courts, I do not think the government should give any undertaking as to consultation. If I were doing it, I could not quite see myself going to either the mortgage companies or the farmers' organizations and asking whether they thought such-and-such a judge of the supreme court would suit them. I could not quite see myself doing that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Or to the attorneys-general?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a little different thing. I might do that, but I should not like to give any undertaking.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I think this bill would be immeasurably strengthened if sections 23 to 27 were struck out, this whole provision for appeal to the appellate court. Every appeal that is permitted is bound to increase the expenses of the litigant. Here is a farmer who finds that he cannot meet his obligations when they become due. Before he can file a proposal he must have some assistance, for very few farmers are in a position to set out their affairs in documentary form. Therefore the farmer must hire a lawyer to prepare a brief, which of necessity costs him money. The lawyer acts as his representative and presents the brief to the county court clerk, who is the official receiver. Then it goes to the district court judge. If that judge gives a decision which to the creditor seems unduly generous to the debtor, all the creditor has to do under this section is to appeal. That means the farmer will have to hire the lawyer over again.

Mr. ABBOTT: He does not have to.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Surely the hon. member is not suggesting that the average farmer could appear before the appellate court himself, or that he should merely let the matter rest with the appellate court on the basis of the written decision of the district court judge.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think in most cases he would be better off if he did; I think he would get along better.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If that is the minister's opinion may I make the suggestion that if there is to be an appeal, no counsel be allowed to represent either party before the appellate judge. Let the appeal court decide entirely on the basis of the written brief submitted by the district court judge, and let no counsel appear for either side.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think you can deny litigants the right to counsel.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Certainly not; therefore the people who will be able to be represented by counsel will be the creditors; the debtors either will have no representatives there, or they will have to pay legal advisers to go to where the appellate court sits and make their representations, which will mean an additional expense of perhaps several hundred dollars. If the debtor is not in a position to make that expenditure, it means that he might as well throw up his hands in the first place.

Mr. ILSLEY: When these farmers appeared before the boards of review did it cost them several hundred dollars? I did not know that it did; I thought they went there and told their story, and I think that is what they will do when they go before the county court judge. If they have to go before the appellate judge I am quite sure he will listen to them and give them full justice.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am quite sure he will listen to them, but everyone who is familiar with court procedure knows that the case will be much better presented if the debtor has someone there who is familiar with the law, who can present his case in a much better manner. Consequently he will be handicapped if he has not a legal adviser. This will mean for him and his representative a trip from whatever part of the province he may live in all the way to the appellate court and an appearance there, waiting for his case to come up, with all the expense involved, which will amount to a considerable sum. Then all that is provided in this bill is section 37 under which, if in the opinion of the court there was no reasonable ground for the appeal, the one party may be required to pay the costs of the other party. I should think the chances of that section being brought into effect would be fairly small.

This is what it is going to mean. The farmer will realize that he faces the possibility of two cases, one before the district court judge and the other before an appellate court judge. The likelihood is that, if the first decision is appealed, the debtor will simply throw up his hands, unless he is in a financial position to hire somebody to plead his case. So that I think the minister would be well advised to do one of two things. Of course I should like to see this provision wiped out entirely; but if the minister is going to insist on retaining the right of appeal, either the written brief of the county court judge, outlining the facts upon which he based his decision, should be the only thing before the appellate court judge or, if legal representation is permitted from both parties, the government should be prepared to supply legal advisers to appear on behalf of either party if they request that the services of such advisers be made available to them. What you are doing at the present time is making this class legislation, discriminatory legislation, because one party cannot afford to make the best possible representation to the appellate court judge and will be handicapped from the very beginning.

Mr. QUELCH: I criticized this provision when I spoke on second reading, because it is placing an expense on the farmer that certainly he will not be in a position to meet, at a time when he is forced to come under the provisions of this legislation. The minister suggests that a farmer might be better off to go without counsel. He knows very well that many of the farmers who are foreigners have a great deal of difficulty in making themselves understood, and even with a lawyer it is hard for them to make their position clear. On the other hand, as the hon. member for Weyburn suggests, if it is better for the farmer to appear without counsel, then make the ruling that both parties, the creditor and the debtor, shall appear without counsel. Someone has said that the provincial government provides counsel where required. Does that cover an appearance before the appeal court? Whether or not that covers the point, this is the responsibility of the federal government, and there is no reason why the provincial government should have to provide counsel in connection with a federal act. I think provision should be made for counsel for these people. I do not know what the legal term is; in the army we called them soldiers' friends when free counsel were provided for soldiers. I think under this measure there should be what one might call farmers' friends, to provide free counsel for these debtors. Allow a rate of so much per diem for all counsel appearing on behalf of the farmers; then lawyers would have to take it and be satisfied with it, even if it were not the normal fee. I do not think any lawyer could very well turn it down; if that were the rate set, he could hardly refuse to take it on the ground that the fee allowed was too small. I think a great injustice will be done if this provision is left as it is now, because it will mean that the farmer will be without counsel, while the creditor will have counsel, and the dice will be loaded against the debtor.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not so in Alberta, because by provincial legislation the farmer is furnished with legal assistance.

Mr. QUELCH: The federal government will be evading their duty, and relying upon the province to do something that the federal government should do.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why does the hon. member say that it is the duty of the federal government?

Mr. QUELCH: Because it is a federal act.

Mr. ILSLEY: But it does not follow, by any means, that it is the federal government's duty to furnish assistance to one litigant.

Mr. QUELCH: I say it is still the federal government's duty, because the farmer is in that position on account of the failure of the federal government to introduce a sound agricultural policy.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a little far-fetched, I think.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not think it is.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not at all; it is very proper and vital.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps we should start on that again and talk about parity prices for a while.

Mr. FAIR: I was going to point out to the minister that the Liberal government is not the only one that permits farmers to be ruined by ruinous prices.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It seems to me the minister's statement that he hardly thought it was a federal responsibility because the province of Alberta had made provision for providing counsel—

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say that.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Can we stick to the section?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We are sticking to it. If we are not, then I do not know what we are talking about.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We are stuck with it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes; that is true. It is an unfortunate fact that we are stuck with it. The very fact that Alberta has provided counsel does not relieve us of the responsibility of providing counsel for the other provinces, as a federal responsibility.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say that because Alberta had done this it was not a federal government responsibility. I challenged the proposition that it is a federal responsibility, for other reasons entirely. The dominion parliament comes into this, because only the dominion parliament can legislate in respect of insolvency and bankruptcy. That is the reason why the dominion parliament is involved. This parliament sets up courts. And then it may very well be argued that it has discharged its responsibility. If a provincial government wishes to assist one class of litigants, because their conditions are not as affluent as those of another class of litigants, then I do not see why that is not the responsibility of that province. And that is what they have done in Alberta.

My parliamentary assistant suggests to me that it may be a matter of property and civil rights. These persons are not part of the court. Our courts, which we are setting up, consist of district court judges and an appellate judge. We make the rules upon which they decide cases. Then, if for social reasons, or for reasons which commend themselves to the government or the legislature of a province, that government or legislature wishes to assist one class of litigants, or give them assistance that they do not give another class, surely that is not a matter pertinent to the setting up of a court, or a matter pertaining to bankruptcy or insolvency. I would say it is a matter of provincial policy. I do not know why, because I have not given it much consideration. But the alacrity with which the hon. member for Acadia bounded in to say it was a matter of federal responsibility prompted me to examine his proposition; and I am not convinced.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the minister admit that in one case you have a bankrupt litigant, and in the other case you likely have a corporation or a mortgage company? In this instance the debtor is bankrupt, to start with.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He will be, after this.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He does not come under the legislation unless he is bankrupt.

Mr. ILSLEY: Insolvent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Well, that is practically the same thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He cannot pay his debts; it is the same thing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to make a suggestion at this point in regard to the sittings of the appeal court. Very much has been made this evening about the cost of proceedings, and the difficulty of securing justice unless both sides are represented by lawyers. Under those circumstances a suggestion in regard to the sittings of the court might not be amiss. No doubt those sittings will be fixed by regulations.

Under the present administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act it is seldom that either side is represented by a lawyer. As a matter of fact, the corporations are generally represented by their officials and, so far as the farmer is concerned, it is only in the exceptional case where he is represented by counsel at all. As a matter of fact, the experience of counsel appearing before the board was that the farmer was better off without representation by counsel.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, and that answers the argument hon. members to my left are always raising, to the effect that lawyers will act only when they receive payment.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I did not say that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the suggestion being made all the time.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And it is pretty nearly right, too, is it not?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, it is not pretty nearly right. All I have to say to the hon. member is this, that if any man in this country has a just action or a just cause of defence, there are lawyers in every province who will undertake his case in order to see that justice is done. Let me say that. It is all very well to regard members of the legal profession as the big boys who represent the big corporations. But the record of the legal profession needs no defence by me to-night. What I have said is merely by way of answer to certain statements made from time to time.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Moose Jaw declaration will have to be revised on that score.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My suggestion is this: In Manitoba the appeal court for the province sits in Winnipeg; in Saskatchewan it sits in Regina, and in Alberta it sits in Edmonton and Calgary. It might be costly if the appeal judge were to sit at the seat of the appellate court for the province. My suggestion is that provision be made in the regulations from time to time that at stated periods he shall sit at certain judicial centres. There are twenty-one judicial centres in Saskatchewan. I do not know the number in Alberta and Manitoba. In this way the farmers would have the opportunity of appearing personally, if it were necessary for them to do so. A farmer could be present without any unnecessary cost, and he would have an opportunity of hearing personally the arguments advanced by the other side. I feel on the other hand, that unless such a system of sittings is established it may very well be that the cost to the farmer will be prohibitive.

Mr. ILSLEY: I had in mind that the judge would travel and sit at the various places in the province. In fact that was one of the reasons why the court of appeal was one judge, rather than a full court. It would be expensive if the appeal were to the court of appeal of the province. This was suggested in another place two or three years ago, but I opposed the proposal, and that led to the falling by the wayside of certain legislation. But with one appeal judge I do not see any reason why he should not travel.

Section agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

358. Departmental administration, $408,123.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

183. Customs and excise divisions—General administration, $1,033,725.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This is not quite fair, because it was understood last night that a number of these departments would be left. It is now proposed to bring in more.

Mr. MacNICOL: The agreement was that four would be introduced to-night and one left.

Mr. CRERAR: The understanding was that we would call the other departments to-night and leave one open.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That was not the understanding I got. I must say that when these statements are not made loud enough we cannot hear them at this end of the chamber. I think a member of parliament has a right to hear what is being said and it should be spoken loudly enough that he could hear it. I am strongly opposed to introducing more departments until the others have been taken care of. There are matters that could have been discussed all during the year, and we have not had a motion to go into supply so that we could deal with serious problems. I think there ought to be one or two departments left, because there are plenty of other items to be considered.

Mr. DUPUIS: I agree with what the hon. member for Lethbridge has said. At this end of the chamber it is most difficult to hear what is going on. However, I was sitting in another seat last evening and heard what was said, and it was as stated by the minister. I think the hon. member for Lethbridge should allow this item to be introduced, but in future I think the chairman or other hon. members at the other end of the chamber should speak more loudly, so that we may not be precluded from hearing what they are saying.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe I have a fairly strong voice, and this is the first time I have been asked to speak more loudly. I always speak in a fairly strong tone.

Mr. POULIOT: You have a powerful voice, Mr. Chairman.

Item stands.

Mr. CRERAR: We should like to introduce one more department, which was the understanding last night.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will be good enough to sit down while I am on my feet.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If you want to get another department introduced, perhaps I can assist you; otherwise, we may object.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

324. Departmental administration, $96,826.

Item stands.

Mr. CRERAR: So that there may be no misunderstanding, I may say to my hon. friends that there is another department, the Department of National War Services, still to be brought into supply, so that they may make a motion if they so desire.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. POULIOT

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN" OF JULY 17

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a double question of privilege, the first one in English and the other in French. In the Ottawa Citizen of July 17 the daily columnist wrote thus:

The development of the day indicated that the terrible-tempered Jean-François Pouliot is on the rampage.

I do not object to this, sir; it is a matter of opinion. Then he goes on, making three factual errors in two lines:

Mr. Pouliot opposed the government candidate in Saguenay last winter. . . .

The first factual error is that I opposed no one of the candidates who ran in that county last fall. I opposed no one; I supported one. Then he states that I opposed the government candidate. There was no government candidate there; the government did not give its support to any one of the four candidates in that election. Finally, he mentions Saguenay as the name of the county, when the name is Charlevoix-Saguenay. Then he goes on and says that I aided Mr. Dorion, who was elected as an independent. That is true, and he proved to be one. Then he goes on:

Now, it seems, he is out with a new candidate from Stanstead.

Here is the point I object to, a little further on:

This Stanstead election will be very much of a group affair. There is a racial aspect to it as well.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if the independent candidate who has been chosen by the people of Stanstead were running on a racial issue I would surely not support him, and my record in the house proves very well that I have never indulged in any religious or racial controversies of any kind—either in the house or outside of the house.

Now I turn to French. In Le Devoir of Monday last, July 19, I see a report of what has been said by someone.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, the Monday issue of Le Devoir contains a summary of a speech delivered by one Philippe Girard, whom I neither know nor wish to know. The summary of that part of his speech which refers to me is as follows:

Mr. Pouliot has done very good work in Ottawa;—

[Mr. Crerar.]

That is not what prompts me to rise to a question of privilege.

—now, he has been ordered by his leader—

No order has ever been given to me by any one. I have been glad to oblige my colleagues whenever the opportunity to do so arose. Whoever claims that I have received an order from any one in connection with the Stanstead election is uttering a falsehood.

In the second place:

—to go to Stanstead in order to divide the Canadians—

That is another falsehood. I have never sought to divide the Canadians. I have always advocated harmony between French and English speaking Canadians, between the Canadians who are Protestant and those who are Catholic and even those of the Jewish faith.

A third falsehood is this:

—and he has selected as independent candidate Mr. Martin, who, four days previously, had told Mr. Choquette that on no account was anything to be done to divide the French Canadians.

It is odious for a man to utter such falsehoods in public. It is not true at all that I have selected Mr. Martin. I have never selected any one. I have no more selected Mr. Martin as independent candidate in Stanstead than I have selected Mr. Dorion as independent candidate in Charlevoix-Saguenay, but, for one thing, I am sure that Mr. Martin, like Mr. Dorion, will be elected in Stanstead against any opponent.

JAPANESE TREATY ACT

REPEAL OF STATUTE OF 1913

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 137, to repeal the Japanese Treaty Act, 1913.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the minister explain?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A treaty of commerce and navigation was signed between the United Kingdom and Japan on April 3, 1911, and it was adhered to by Canada. The Japanese Treaty Act, 1913, was adopted in that year, declaring the treaty to have the force of law in Canada. A notice, in accordance with the terms of the treaty, to put an end to it was given on July 26, 1941, and according to the terms of the treaty this notice would have become effective on July 26, 1942. In the meantime war was declared between Japan and Canada, and according to the principles of international law the effect of the treaty came to an end with the declaration of war. But the statute is still on the books, and this is a one-line bill to repeal the statute which gave force of law to that treaty in Canada in 1913.

Mr. CHURCH: Have similar trade treaties with Italy, Germany and other axis powers been repealed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not to my knowledge that there is any legislation giving the effect of law to treaties with Germany and Italy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Later this day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. GRAYDON: No one has had a copy of the bill. I would think it a most unusual request to ask hon. members to deal with any legislation where a copy has not been provided for them, and I object to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is only one line.

Mr. GRAYDON: The principle is the same, surely, whether it is one line or a hundred lines.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Later this day.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FOURTH VICTORY LOAN

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Were any subscriptions to the fourth victory loan made by "individuals" or "non-individuals" residing or having their head offices outside of Canada?

2. If so, how much was subscribed, (a) by these "individuals"; (b) by these "non-individuals"?

3. In what countries did they live or have their head offices?

Mr. ABBOTT: I spoke to the hon. member who asked this question and explained that to give a complete answer would involve an examination of 2,669,000 application forms in respect of the last victory loan. I understand that under the circumstances he is willing to drop the question.

Mr. HAZEN: The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance spoke to me about the difficulty of answering this question. If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister will agree with me when I say that we do not want our war loans to be made outside of Canada to any greater extent than necessity compels, and that some method should be devised of keeping track of these loans and knowing where they are being made. If the question results in some system by which a record can be made so that we shall know who are taking up these loans, I think it will have furthered its purpose.

Question dropped.

Two of the latter holes were drilled through gravel overburden only and three were abandoned due to broken augers. An interim summary report by the company on its work to January 31, 1943, was tabled in the House of Commons on April 14, 1943.

Mr. S. C. Ells, engineer of the Department of Mines and Resources, was on the ground as an observer.

REDISTRIBUTION—REPRESENTATIONS OF PROVINCES WITH RESPECT TO POSTPONEMENT

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before we leave questions, Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was asked by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin):

Have any representations been made to the federal government by any provincial authority, outside of the province of Quebec, with regard to the deferment of the redistribution to be based upon the last decennial census? If such representations have been made will they be tabled before the session is brought to a close?

I would make the following reply to the hon. member. I am informed by the Secretary of State's department, which has communicated with other departments of the government, that the only representations received from any provincial government other than Quebec are contained in a letter from the premier of Saskatchewan, which letter is dated June 22 and which I table herewith. Representations similar to those of the premier of Saskatchewan in the correspondence tabled herewith were made to me personally by the premier of Manitoba, Hon. Stuart Garson, on the occasion of one of his visits to Ottawa.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

FERGUSON SHIPBUILDING YARD—CESSATION OF WORK ON PARTLY COMPLETED TUGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. On July 12 I sent notice to the minister that I intended to ask a question with reference to the Ferguson shipbuilding yard in Nova Scotia, where work had ceased on two tugs which were partly completed, though ninety-three per cent of the material necessary for the completion of those tugs was in the yard. My information now is that some eighty skilled men at that plant are not working and that the yard is not being used. The minister stated that these partly completed tugs were to be shipped to Montreal, together with the material for their completion, but that has not been done. The minister's statement to the effect that the total expenditure there would be some $60,000 for each tug was incorrect; the target price set for each of these tugs was some $275,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I have waited since July 12, thinking the minister might be back any day, but now I would ask the parliamentary assistant to check up on this matter, which is serious and important, and to make a statement on the situation there some time before the house rises.

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply): I shall be glad to look into the matter to which the hon. member refers and to see that he gets a reply before the house rises.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

CARTIER BY-ELECTION—ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES—STATEMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I should like to make a statement in connection with the matter raised yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and which was discussed in this house.

There has not been time thus far to make a sufficiently lengthy inquiry to determine the accuracy of the various affidavits referred to by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and into the material he adduced to support his statement relating to the enumeration carried on in the constituency of Cartier-Montreal. The government has felt, however, that it has a duty to take immediately such steps as should serve to remove all doubt and allay all suspicion as to the fair and honest conduct of the election to be held on August 9. It is essential that such steps be taken without delay.

The present returning officer of the constituency was appointed on September 29, 1938. He consequently acted in the election of that year in which the late Mr. Bercovitch was returned as a member of this house. It is true that Mr. Bercovitch ultimately received an acclamation but of course that could not be safely anticipated, and the result was that the returning officer was required to perform practically all the duties requisite to the holding of an election, just as much as if an election had actually been held. The same returning officer acted in the election in 1940, and also in connection with the vote taken on the plebiscite. The chief electoral officer advises me that no complaint whatever was received as to the manner in which he carried on his duties on any of the three occasions.

However, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar indicates that in this election the present Liberal candidate is the uncle of the returning officer. To avoid any suspicion, however unwarranted, that this might give rise to, the chief electoral officer suggested that the assistant chief electoral officer, Mr. Donald Stewart, be appointed at once as supervisory officer and perform the necessary supervisory duties in the constituency until after the election has taken place. The government immediately accepted the suggestion, and Mr. Stewart will assume, in the name of the chief electoral officer the administrative control of the by-election.

The chief electoral officer has also recommended that it would be inadvisable to have a completely new enumeration. There are two principal reasons for this: In the first place it would inevitably delay the election beyond the time fixed for the return to the writ. But a much more serious objection is that enumerators' cards are delivered to each voter at the time the enumeration is made. These cards in most instances are taken by the elector to the polling booth for presentation to the deputy returning officer. It would consequently, in order to avoid confusion, be necessary in the event of a new enumeration to endeavour to collect in all the cards which are presently issued. This would be a very lengthy and in many cases an impossible task; but, unless it were done, it would result in a wide measure of confusion.

The material tabled by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar refers to only a limited number of subdivisions—approximately ten out of a total of 169 in the riding. He stated that this was the result of a very limited check. The government has felt, however, that in view of the conditions disclosed and the allegations made a thorough and complete examination of the whole riding should be made immediately.

In order to effect this and allay any possible suspicion, the chief electoral officer has recommended the appointment of supervising enumerators who will make a thorough house to house check up of the enumeration in each polling division. These supervision enumerators would consist of two for each division.

All members are aware that under the provisions of the Elections Act the returning officer shall give notice to the candidate who at the last preceding election in the electoral district received the highest number of votes and also to the candidate representing at that election a different and opposed political interest who received the next highest number of votes. Unfortunately that rule cannot be applied in this riding as the candidate receiving the second largest number of votes is now serving in the forces overseas and he did not represent any cohesive body of political opinion. The action which it is proposed to take in the emergent condition that now exists should not be deemed to be any precedent that could be cited as in any way abrogating the general rule hereafter unless, of course, where the circumstances are identical with the emergent situation presented in this instance.

The fairest and most advantageous method would, however, under the existing circumstances, appear to be that one of the enumerators should be nominated by the government candidate, and those representing the opposed political interests should nominate one and, as there are two opposition candidates, each should nominate one-half of the opposition enumerators.

Each supervising enumerator will be sworn to the faithful performance of his or her duties on the special form prescribed by the chief electoral officer. They will commence their duties on Thursday morning, July 22, and complete them by Saturday night, the 24th instant.

Whenever such supervising enumerators discover that unqualified or fictitious persons have been included on the enumerators' preliminary list which has been printed and distributed, it will be their duty to prepare an affidavit in form 13 of the Dominion Elections Act and swear such affidavit before the appropriate revising officer. The affidavit attacking the qualifications of the elector in question shall be dealt with by such revising officer during his regular sittings for revision which are scheduled to be held on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday next at places already advertised by the returning officer Whenever in the case of the house to house check-up it is discovered by the supervising enumerators that a name of a duly qualified elector has been omitted from the list, it shall be their duty to prepare and subscribe to a sworn application in the form No. 15 of the Dominion Elections Act on behalf of such elector and deliver the same to the assistant chief electoral officer who in turn will present it to the appropriate revising officer.

In the event of any disagreement between the supervising enumerators with regard to inclusion of a name on the list of electors, it is to be reported to the assistant chief electoral officer who shall decide the matter.

Arrangements have already been made for the appointment of additional revising officers for each revisal district by the ex officio revising officer and such additional revising officers will sit in the revisal offices already set up by the returning officer.

The chief electoral officer advises that if the above mentioned steps are taken forthwith, in his opinion any and all inaccuracies on the enumerators' preliminary list can be dealt with by the revising officers as prescribed in the elections act and the finally revised list for each polling division, when reprinted, should accurately set out the names of the electors who are duly qualified to vote at the pending by-election.

Time has not allowed the necessary investigation into the culpability of the enumerators who prepared the lists which were referred to by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It is, of course, possible that in some instances the fact that they receive seven cents for each name enumerated proved too much of a temptation to be resisted. But while this may afford an explanation it does not in the least provide any justification.

The house can be assured that the investigation will be thorough and complete and that the penalty clauses in the elections act will be applied. Four enumerators have been discharged and payment of their remuneration withheld. Pitiably small, you will say—and it is. But in fairness to the returning officer it must be stated that under the act this is the limit of his jurisdiction.

However by subsection 18 of section 17 of the elections act it is provided that.

. . . "any enumerator who, wilfully and without reasonable excuse, includes in any list of electors prepared by him the name of any person whose name he has not good reason to believe should be included, or omits to include in such list the name of any person whom he has good reason to believe has the right to have his name included, shall be guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction as in this act provided."

This section must be and will be applied by the appropriate officers of the law against any whom investigation reveals are guilty of its breach.

Confidence in the honest and correct functioning of electoral machinery is fundamental in a democracy both in peace and war.

The steps which I have just outlined should remove any doubt and allay any suspicion from the minds of those who wish to see the elections in this country conducted fairly and honourably. Every step is being taken by the government to ensure that this result is attained.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask the Secretary of State two questions, with a view to clarification of the statement he has made. First, are the new arrangements for the supervision of enumerators, which he has given in some detail to-day, possible under the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act?

Mr. McLARTY: I am advised by the chief electoral officer that provision is made that in the case of emergency the chief electoral officer may take such steps as may be necessary to remedy the situation.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has spoken about representation in respect of enumerators, by parties other than those which would normally have representation. He speaks of those who are in the field. I presume until the actual final nomination has taken place, no one is officially in the field so far as the election is concerned.

Mr. McLARTY: That of course is quite true, and a fact which presents an additional difficulty. But under the circumstances we are trying to make the best of what might be regarded as an unfortunate situation, and we thought that this was the only fair way in which we could do it and see that representation was given to the opposing parties. If they were appointed by the same individual it would certainly be open to the suspicion that perhaps this is not as fair as it should be. This was the only solution we could find which seemed to present the possibility of being fair. If it were otherwise, of course, we could not have the enumerators because until August 2, we would not know definitely who would be candidates.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I be permitted to thank the government for the quick and what would appear to be the adequate action taken by it in this matter. I should like to ask only one question: Has the minister or the government given any consideration to a matter referred to yesterday, namely that of having voters produce their registration cards before voting?

Mr. McLARTY: Some thought was given to that, but it was felt that it might produce a great deal of difficulty. I recall, as no doubt my hon. friend does, the debate we had in connection with the plebiscite, when the necessity of producing registration cards was discussed. I believe at that time his leader took a definite and final stand against the necessity of doing so. It seems to me that while we are taking all these steps to meet an emergent condition, we should not try to make any new law. If a provision such as that is to be inserted in the Dominion Elections Act, then it should be nation-wide, and not limited to one particular constituency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member will recall that yesterday the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) took strong exception to having registration cards produced. He gave reasons which, while they did not appeal to the house, would I am sure help to nullify the value of the suggestion made to the effect that registration cards should be produced.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the Prime Minister that that is an unusual basis for his observations, because the hon. member for York West actually pointed out that registration cards could be purchased in certain areas in Canada. I should hope the Prime Minister's position would not be interpreted—I know he does not wish that view to go out, and that is the only reason I raise the point—as recognizing a condition of the kind which would make it impossible to carry out the proposal of the hon. member for Vancouver East in connection with voting arrangements.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just said I did not think the statement by the hon. member for York West had appealed to the house. It certainly did not appeal to me. The hon. member being a member of a political party in the house, and having raised that point, I fear had the government gone ahead and required the production of registration cards, there are some persons who would immediately have placed a wrong interpretation upon the government's action in so doing.

CANADIAN ARMY

HOME DEFENCE PERSONNEL—AGRICULTURAL LEAVE—PRISONERS OF WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I gave notice to the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence that I intended to ask a question to-day in connection with the indicated shortage of farm man-power for harvest purposes. Having regard to the many thousands of men whose services could be utilized for farm purposes during the harvest season, these men being in the home defence army, what changes, if any, are contemplated in connection with the procedure whereby service men may secure leave? To-day the procedure is so involved as to render very difficult the possibility of men, who could render a real service on the farm during the harvest season, securing leave. I believe agriculture generally would like to have a statement so that the position may be clarified.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I had notice of what my hon. friend asked yesterday, and I am going to give the house a brief outline of what has been done. I want to correct the expression which has been used so frequently in this house and elsewhere. My hon. friend speaks of the men in the home defence army. There is no such thing in Canada as a home defence army. There is the active army in Canada which has in it a certain number of personnel who have been called up for service in Canada and the territorial waters thereof, but there is no such body of men which could be taken and posted to home agricultural work. The active army includes general service men as well as the home defence men, so called. They are all intermingled in the different units. These home defence personnel are part of the active army in Canada and are to-day serving on the coast defences, on the searchlights, on the anti-aircraft guns all over this country. I indicated in my speech to the house that there were in numbers about a division on anti-aircraft work alone. So-called home defence personnel are in the establishments in Newfoundland, in the Bahamas, in the West Indies, in South America—that is to say in British Guiana—in Alaska and in Labrador. My hon. friend talks about a home defence army which might be turned over to agricultural avocations. As I have said, there is no army made up of these, so-called home defence personnel. They are all mixed up together in the different units. To pull these men out would mean completely breaking down of units which are now engaged on duties which the chiefs of staffs, in collaboration with the chiefs of staffs in the United States, have indicated are necessary in order that we may be prepared for what eventualities may arise.

The question of the size of the army is always a matter for consideration and is always under review, but let no one think that somewhere there are men who are just simply walking around doing nothing. The home defence personnel are either on operational duties in Canada, both on the east and west coast—there is one group of men located at vulnerable points in central Canada —or are part of the home war establishment which is servicing the army in Canada and also servicing those men who are training in the training centres as reinforcements for overseas. That is a little different picture from what is perhaps in the public mind. I expressly pointed out the other day that in the training centres, not as home defence establishment but for reinforcements overseas, there are something like fifty or sixty thousand general service personnel. The members of this home defence personnel are needed to replace general service men in the various operational units in order that these general service men may either be retrained for some particular arm of the service for which overseas reinforcements will be required so that they may be sent directly overseas if they are already trained in a suitable arm.

When I spoke on the war appropriation I indicated that the army programme requires that the general service men who are here be made available for overseas. As I told the house when speaking on the defence estimates, one of the purposes of calling men up at the present time is so that they may release the general service men from their duties in Canada. I want to make that clear; I want to emphasize it if I can, because there does seem to be an impression throughout the country that somehow or other there are home defence men who are just standing around not serving any useful purpose. I say that they are serving one of the purposes for which they are particularly required. They are taking the place of men who are going overseas and they are necessary so long as the defence requirements of Canada are to be maintained, as at present advised.

I sympathize with my hon. friend when he says that there are a number of regulations with regard to leave for compassionate purposes. There is the compassionate leave provision whereby a man may get leave provided undue hardship exists on the particular farm in connection with his own family. That provision has been in force and has been invoked by national defence headquarters which have had to deal with many applications. The other agricultural leave was the subject of a circular letter dated July 5, 1943, which I shall table The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr Cruickshank) asked me about this some time ago and I sent him a copy of this circular. It provides for agricultural leave for harvesting somewhat along the same lines as the leave which was provided for seeding.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does it provide the procedure?

Mr. RALSTON: It provides the procedure as well. I will table a copy for the information of my hon. friend. Hon. members may hardly credit this, but for at least four days, or perhaps longer, we have been having discussions and conferences with the Department of Labour and national selective service in an endeavour to meet this situation from the army, either by way of further leave or by way of detachments. Proposition after proposition and suggestion after suggestion have been made and gone over and found to be impracticable from one point of view or another. Only this morning I gave my approval to a plan which I think will work and which is just now being vested with the Department of Labour. I think it will assist the situation materially. I am not going to state its terms because there have been so many conferences and discussions with regard to it that I prefer to see it definitely settled before anything is said.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Would the minister put that letter with regard to agricultural leave on the record?

Mr. RALSTON: It is a page and a half of single typing and I did not want to take the time. I will supply every hon. member with a copy if desired.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister could give it to Hansard.

Mr. RALSTON: If the house is agreeable, I will place it on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. RALSTON: The letter reads:

G.O.C.-in-C., Atlantic Command,
G.O.C.-in-C., Pacific Command,
All D.Os.C.,
Commander, Petawawa Military Camp,
Commander, Camp Borden Military Camp.

Agricultural leave—harvest, 1943.

It has been decided that harvest leave may be granted to such personnel of the army as can be spared, subject to the following conditions:

2. Harvest leave may be granted under the conditions outlined below to personnel of the Canadian army (including members H.D.) serving in the following formations and units:

(i) Personnel on the strength of H.W.E. district depots. The number granted leave to be at the discretion of the D.O.C. concerned.

(ii) Other personnel on the strength of district depots less those awaiting dispatch to basic training centres and those awaiting allocation after completing advanced or trades training.

(iii) Personnel of veterans guard of Canada who have completed individual training and who can be spared from the duties on which their units or detachments are employed.

(iv) Personnel of units employed on operational duties less those earmarked for overseas service. Number granted leave to be at discretion of the G.O.C.-in-C. and D.O.C. concerned, but not to exceed 5 per cent of the strength of the unit concerned. Such personnel must have completed individual training before being granted leave.

3. The general conditions under which leave for harvesting may be granted to such personnel are as follows:

(a) Leave will not exceed six weeks duration and may be cancelled at any time.

(b) Pay, subsistence, travelling allowance, or other allowances of any kind will not be issuable during this special leave.

(c) Soldiers will not be entitled to medical or dental attention, hospitalization or compensation due to illness, injury or death while on leave.

(d) Only soldiers who have experience in farm work are eligible.

(e) Harvest leave will be limited strictly for the purpose its name implies.

4. (a) The provisions of R.O. 1935, para. 7 (a) are not to be applied for the grant of harvest leave to personnel in operational units who are ineligible for harvest leave under the provisions of this order.

(b) The provisions of R.O. 699 (2) and (3) will not be prejudiced by the granting of this leave.

5. The period during which personnel will require such leave will vary considerably in different parts of the country, depending on the advance of the season and weather conditions. However, all personnel must be returned to their units not later than 31 Oct., 43.

6. The number of men granted leave at any given time will be at the discretion of general or district officers commanding concerned, who will ensure that the number who may be granted leave is limited so that the strength of units will not be unduly depleted.

7. (a) Application will be made by the soldier concerned to his commanding officer, who, if he approves, will forward same for decision to the general or district officer commanding concerned.

(b) The conditions governing such leave are to be issued in writing to the soldier before proceeding on leave, and the address where he is to be employed is to be entered on his furlough form.

H. F. G. Letson,
Major-General,
Adjutant-General.

As I say, I prefer not to make an announcement about this further plan, which my officers have been working on, until it has been definitely settled. I have mentioned compassionate leave, and I have mentioned agricultural leave, and I have mentioned the further consideration which has been given to the matter in an endeavour to meet the situation as far as possible by providing such men as we can spare for the purposes of harvest activities. Demands have been made on the army such as have been made on no other organization in the country. There has been no such demand made upon industry, comparatively speaking. The army seems to have been considered an inexhaustible pool from which men may be obtained. Those men who are not located on the east and west coasts are in the training centres where they are necessary in order that we may have reinforcements to send overseas. Therefore it would be difficult to supply detachments of men in the central part of Canada.

I think I should mention further that we have cooperated with the Department of Labour in connection with supplying prisoners of war for special agricultural work. The house should not be surprised if it hears of the odd escape of a prisoner of war. I hope that questions will not be asked in the house about it and that it will not be regarded as a major international incident. That has almost been the attitude in connection with some prisoners of war who have temporarily escaped in the past. We feel that the situation is such that we have to do the best we can with the facilities which we have for guarding. Men are now being provided at places where it is not so easy to guard them. Where you must have one man for one prisoner you will not be saving anything in man-power. So that we have to do the best we can. In some cases the Department of Labour is assuming responsibility, and in some cases we are assuming it.

The house will be interested to know that as of June 3 there were 5,450 men on leave from Canadian active army for agricultural assistance, either by way of compassionate leave or agricultural leave. That is not counting all the men who have been granted leave in the districts without reference to headquarters, or the men granted leave under the 5th of July circular.

Mr. ADAMSON: With reference to the statement made by the Minister of National Defence regarding prisoners of war, I appreciate the difficulty he is going to run into. May I suggest that he give some comparison with the number of prisoners of war that we have been able to get out of Germany. Only one prisoner of war has actually escaped from Canada, and that is a very creditable record.

Mr. RALSTON: That prisoner of war did not escape from camp—

Mr. ADAMSON: No; he did not escape from camp.

Mr. RALSTON: —but from the train.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister might give a statement as to the number of Canadian prisoners who have escaped from occupied Europe.

ONTARIO ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of National Defence for the Army a question. It relates to the disfranchisement of two thousand men of the reserve army in military district No. 3, Kingston, although many men of the reserve army belong to No. 1 or No. 2 district, and in other parts of Ontario. The minister made a statement yesterday about this matter. These men and others are sure to be disfranchised on the 4th of August unless the minister takes action to postpone their departure to camp beyond next Sunday, July 25. Nomination day is only two days afterwards, and I suggest that there should be a postponement of the camp for a week and then the soldiers can vote by proxy or at an advance poll. I should like to know what the minister has done. I do not want to move the adjournment of the house to discuss the matter, but two thousand soldier civilians in the reserve army are surely going to be disfranchised unless the camps are postponed for a week.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this matter was brought up yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and I intimated then that I would have an examination made of the act to ascertain whether or not these men came within the provisions of the act in regard to soldiers voting. The advice that I have received is that the act does not cover them. Therefore it is simply a matter of the men losing their votes or having the Department of National Defence make some adjustment in the absence of any provision in the act.

We have gone into the matter very carefully. You cannot simply postpone a camp of 2,700 men for a week after they have made all their arrangements with their employers and their domestic arrangements. It is not that the department has any hesitation about postponing the camp. We would gladly postpone it on twenty-four hours' notice, but we have to think of the business men—and there are a great many business men in the reserve army—who have made arrangements to leave at a particular time. We have not had one request from any business man or from any man in the ranks of the reserve army with regard to postponing their departure for the camp. Nevertheless there have been requests on both sides, and I do not want to be a party to anything, if I can possibly avoid it, which will make it more difficult for the men to exercise their franchise at an election, dominion or provincial. We have gone into the matter fully. In regard to the suggestion that we postpone the camp, we cannot postpone it so as to make it extend beyond the original termination date which is I think August 18, for the reason I have mentioned, namely, that the men have made their arrangements with their employers and their domestic and personal arrangements with regard to leave, and we therefore have to have the camp within the dates fixed because everybody has made his arrangements accordingly. If we delayed the opening of the camp until after the time for voting at the advance polls—it is not a vote by proxy but an advance poll vote—we would have to wait until after July 31, because we are advised that the advance polls will not be ready until after July 31, and that would leave one bare week before the termination date for the men to get to camp, do their training and leave to go back home. Instead of that we have decided to open the camp on the day fixed and to readjust the syllabus of training, taking into account a week-end and doing intensive training on Saturday and Sunday, which was not anticipated, in order to put in nine days' training and complete the adjusted syllabus of training on August 3, when the men can leave the camp and be back home in time to vote.

Hon. members will understand that every man who is going to a reserve camp does not have a vote. There are many boys of from seventeen to twenty-one years of age who go to the camp. In addition therefore we are giving consideration to seeing if we cannot have a special syllabus for the remainder of the days which were to be spent in the camp, for the benefit of them and any others who may want to take advantage of it. In the result this adjustment means that the men can carry out the business and domestic arrangements which they have made with respect to leave; they will still be able to vote and they will be able to complete the adjusted camp training which will be prescribed.

Mr. GRAYDON: The changes that have to be made with respect to the national defence department apparently arise from the fact that the Ontario Elections Act does not provide any means by which a vote can be taken in camp.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: There is no provision in the Ontario Elections Act for voting by the reserve army. It is only for men who are on active service, and the Ontario election authorities have ruled that the reserve army is not included.

DISTRIBUTION OF PROXIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have another question, not exactly on the same subject but on one similar to it, with respect to the distribution of proxies to the men in the army camps outside the province of Ontario. Has the Department of National Defence made any arrangements with the commanding officers of the different units to see that the proxies are distributed and put into the hands of the Ontario voters in the various camps across Canada?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Instructions went out to all commanding officers to cooperate fully with the election officers in this matter. The election officers have been in touch with the adjutant-general, who has charge of these matters at national defence headquarters. I cannot say what instructions have gone out to the individual commanding officers but I do know that instructions went out to all the districts along the lines I have mentioned, that they cooperate fully and give any assistance they can in respect to the holding of the vote in the camps for men who are entitled to vote in the Ontario elections.

Mr. GRAYDON: The department does not undertake to see that the proxies are placed in the hands of the men? Is that left entirely to the Ontario election officers?

Mr. RALSTON: I would not say that. I cannot tell my hon. friend what arrangements are made. Perhaps we are talking at cross-purposes. I do not think there are proxies for soldiers in Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, for voters who are outside the province of Ontario.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, that is right. I think the arrangement was that the proxies should be placed in the hands of the commanding officers of the different units and the men are notified that the proxies are there. I do not want to be bound by that, because I have not gone into it in detail, but I can assure the house that the adjutant-general has issued the fullest instructions possible to see that the army cooperates in order to enable the men to exercise their franchise in the Ontario election.

Mr. CHURCH: Nothwithstanding what the minister says, some of the soldiers will not be able to vote at an advanced poll or by proxy unless they get leave to do so, and the fares are prohibitive.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is making some charge, I think, and I should like to hear what he is saying. I do not want any mistake about this. The army is cooperating fully with the election officers in this Ontario election, but the army is not taking the responsibility of seeing that the votes are polled or that the proxies are used. If the men do not want to use them the army does not propose to press the men to use the proxies. But the army does provide whatever facilities are asked for in order that the men may exercise their vote.

Mr. GRAYDON: The army at least should see that the proxies are placed in the hands of the Ontario voters whether they use them or not.

Mr. RALSTON: They may do it, but I take issue with my hon. friend. It seems to me that if the Ontario voter is advised where the proxy is, and there is a convenient place from which the proxy may be obtained, the proxy should not necessarily be placed in the man's hands by the army officers.

Mr. GRAYDON: I disagree on that. If there is real cooperation in getting these votes polled I think the proxies should be placed in the hands of the Ontario men.

Mr. RALSTON: Then there would be a charge that the army used particular care to see that the proxies got into the hands of certain men and not into the hands of others. If the proxies are placed in a convenient place and all the men are notified that they are there, every man has a right to go and get his proxy just as a man goes to a poll and asks for an opportunity to vote.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

REFERENCE TO LANDING OF FIRST SQUADRON IN SICILY

On the orders of the day.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for Air, and there is no controversy about this. Has he seen the report that the first squadron of the Royal Canadian Air Force has landed in Sicily, the city of Windsor squadron? I am very proud that my roommate, James Sinclair, is adjutant of that squadron.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): I saw it in the press.

JAPANESE TREATY ACT

REPEAL OF STATUTE OF 1913

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 137, to repeal the Japanese Treaty Act, 1913.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Before the bill gets second reading, may I say that I am in favour of it. So far as I can see, it is a matter of routine, the purpose being to repeal this act in consequence of the contingencies of war and the fact that Japan and Canada are now at war with each other. While this treaty on commercial and navigation agreements between Canada and Japan is to be repealed, I am a bit concerned that there is no evidence of any action whatsoever along this line between Russia and Japan. Of course, I know that we cannot altogether expect that, because Russia and Japan are not at war with each other. This fact is not fully realized. We think too often of the united nations, the allies, as being the British empire, the United States, China and Russia, the big four, the united nations fighting against Hitler and Mussolini. It is true that the united nations are at war with Germany and Italy, but it is not true that the united nations are at war with Japan, because Russia is one of those united nations. I do not wish to minimize the fact that the united nations are united in their efforts, but it is not true to say that they are united in their war against the axis powers. They are united against Hitler and Mussolini.

I bring this up at the moment because not so long ago Russia and Japan renewed their previous fishing treaties giving to Japan certain rights to occupy certain islands. I did not know that this bill was coming up this morning and therefore I have not my clippings before me, but I read recently that these islands are being used by Japan as weather stations which would assist her in waging war against the United States in the Pacific. I am very much concerned about that, because most members of parliament have received numerous requests from organizations and individuals, sometimes letters written personally and at other times circular letters, urging for instance that a second front be started against Germany in order to relieve the pressure that Germany was putting on Russia. We have received petitions signed by hundreds of people to open up a second front, to do this, that and the other, but never once have I received any communication from anyone asking that we urge that pressure be brought to bear upon Russia to assist us in respect of her relations with Japan.

The fact of the matter is that we do not know what is going to happen in the future in connection with Japan. Before the war is won I am quite certain that Japan will be our greatest enemy. I simply make these observations. I am not altogether satisfied about the alignment of nations in waging war in the Pacific. I say this now because there will be no other opportunity this session for us to express our views in this regard. So far as the bill itself is concerned I am in full agreement with it.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not unusual, although not very often practised, to pass a bill of one clause, such as this, without reference to the committee of the whole. I quote from Bourinot at page 529:

> It has not been uncommon in the Canadian houses to pass bills without reference to a committee of the whole. This has been almost invariably done in the case of the appropriation or supply bill and not unfrequently in the case of other bills, also founded on resolutions passed in the committee of the whole. Instances are also found in the Canadian journals of Commons bills, not based on resolutions, as well as of Senate bills, having been passed without reference to a committee of the whole. . . .

Is it the sense of the house that, after the second reading, I should put the motion for the third reading of the bill?

Mr. GRAYDON: It occurred to me that if it was necessary to bring in this bill at this particular session, having in mind the fact that we declared war on Japan some time in December, 1941, there must be some reason why such a bill was not introduced at the last session of the house. I was wondering what the reason might be. Perhaps the minister can explain.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I believe I can very readily satisfy the hon. gentleman. First, I should say that the treaty provided that the subjects of the high contracting parties would have rights equal to those of their respective citizens in the two countries concerned, and that the treaty would not apply to the dominions unless they adhered to it. This dominion did adhere to it. That became then a contractual situation between Canada and Japan. That contractual situation ceased to exist when war was declared, but the form in which the statute was passed in 1913 declared that the treaty would have force of law in Canada, so that even after it ceased to have contractual effect it had statutory effect, and it was dealt with under the War Measures Act by the defence of Canada regulations. But the War Measures Act provides that whatever is done under it will come to an end with the cessation of hostilities, so that this is necessary to repeal the statute, to prevent it from operating after the cessation of hostilities.

Mr. NEILL: If it is necessary and advisable—I suppose it is from the minister's remarks—to pass this bill, would it not be equally appropriate and applicable to dissolve or repudiate the terms of the gentleman's agreement?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The treaty itself provided that it would come to an end twelve months after notice of repudiation given, and that notice was given in January, 1941.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. gentleman does not get my meaning. I understand about the treaty all right. I say, why does he not take similar action as regards the gentleman's agreement with Japan—another subject altogether—by which 150 of them are allowed in every year, and which, I suppose, is still the law?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That came to an end, by virtue of the principles of international law, with the declaration of war. The only reason for this bill is that in 1913 they did not merely ratify the adhesion to the treaty; the statute of 1913 said in terms that the treaty would have force of law in Canada. So that even after the treaty disappears there is a statute saying that these provisions have force of law, and that is what we want to do away with by this bill. We did do away with it for the duration of the war by the defence of Canada regulations, but the defence of Canada regulations will expire with the cessation of hostilities, and we do not want a statute to be in existence saying that the Japanese have rights equal to those of Canadians in this country as soon as hostilities cease.

Mr. NEILL: Will not the gentleman's agreement be revived after the conclusion of the war—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope not.

Mr. NEILL: —by virtue of its not having been repealed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, no; it would require another arrangement, and I hope that, if any arrangement is made, it will be the kind of arrangement which even hon. gentlemen representing the Pacific coast will be satisfied with.

Mr. NEILL: I too hope so, but I doubt it.

Mr. GREEN: There seems to be a certain amount of confusion with regard to this very simple bill. Hon. members will recall that when we were discussing the Department of External Affairs—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I rather think that the house should go into committee, because all these speeches are out of order.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Act repealed.

Mr. GREEN: As I was saying, there seems to be a certain amount of confusion developing with regard to this very simple bill. I hope that there will be no misunderstanding about it in the house, because it is of considerable importance in the province of British Columbia.

The other day, when the Prime Minister's estimates were under consideration, I raised the question of this Japanese Treaty Act, and pointed out to the Prime Minister that, because that act still stood on the statute books, certain legislation of the province of British Columbia which dealt with the Japanese was ultra vires. There was a case some years ago which went to the privy council concerning this British Columbia legislation, and the decision then made was that the provincial legislation was ultra vires because it conflicted with this Japanese Treaty Act. Now the war has come along, and the treaty as a treaty became of no effect upon the war breaking out, yet the act still stands, and so long as it stands on the statute book the provincial legislation is ultra vires and no similar provincial legislation can be enacted. For that reason there is considerable anxiety about getting the act repealed, and I am very glad that the government has brought in this repealing bill.

The Minister of Justice has just said one thing which I should like him to explain a bit further, and that was that this bill, when it is passed, will have no effect until after the war. I do not quite understand how he arrives at that conclusion. My understanding would be that if the bill is passed, if it becomes law, the Japanese Treaty Act is repealed at once, wiped off the statute book, and the provincial legislature is free to take whatever course it sees fit. I wish the minister would clear up that point.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member is perfectly right. The repeal will take effect immediately. What I attempted to say was that the repeal during war was not necessary to deprive Japanese subjects of the rights the statute provided, because they were already deprived of them by the defence of Canada regulations. But the repeal will take effect at once and it will not be necessary to refer to the defence of Canada regulations for this purpose. I merely wished to explain that since the outbreak of war this statute had not been effective with respect to Japanese subjects because they were specially dealt with under the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni mentioned the gentleman's agreement, which is commonly known as the Lemieux agreement. I think the Prime Minister has explained to the house on at least two occasions that the Lemieux agreement has been abrogated by reason of the fact that there is war between Canada and Japan. I should like the Minister of Justice to make clear whether or not that is the case. Incidentally, within the last week the Prime Minister has tabled the correspondence and exchange of notes which took place between Canada and Japan constituting this Lemieux agreement and the subsequent agreement of 1929, so that it is all now on the record and open to the public.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes: it is my understanding that all treaties or contractual relations between Canada and Japan came to an end with the declaration of war after Pearl Harbor, and that there will be no contractual relations or treaty relations unless and until new commitments are entered into by this country.

Mr. CHURCH: I only wish to say a few words on the preamble and the enactment of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. There is no preamble to this bill.

Mr. CHURCH: In the first place, in clause 1, the policy of the government illustrates the general trend and policy of the government in dealing with these empire matters. This treaty is known as the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation. It was signed by the United Kingdom and Japan, as the explanatory note states, on April 3, 1911. That treaty was binding on Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the whole empire. What happened? Two years later Canada passed a separate statute, as stated in the explanatory note, declaring that the Japanese Treaty of Commerce and Navigation signed by the United Kingdom had the force of law in Canada, and it was assented to on April 10, 1913. While I have no objection to this bill, I wish to say that war is war, and a declaration of war by Great Britain is binding upon Canada. I do not think the minister has considered this part of the argument. China is not at war with Japan. Japan is not at war with Russia. These matters will be regulated by international law and agreement, and for us in Canada to take a separate stand from Great Britain in connection with this treaty is something I cannot understand. I do not think it is the right action to take. No doubt when war was declared upon Japan by Great Britain and then Canada, the question arose as to whether this treaty was binding any longer on the other parties to it, New Zealand, Australia and the other members of the commonwealth. I should like to ask the minister whether Australia and New Zealand, who were parties to the original treaty of commerce and navigation signed by the United Kingdom, have taken similar separate action, as in this bill, to declare that the treaty is repealed as far as those dominions are concerned. Why was it necessary to take this separate action, in view of the fact that a declaration of war by Great Britain against Japan binds Canada and all the other dominions, in connection with all treaties of navigation and commerce and all the rest of it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall not reply to all that the hon. member has said, but I should like to make the reservation that the fact of my not replying does not mean that I agree with his views of the international relations of this country. I wish to point out to him that the plenipotentiary who signed this treaty for the United Kingdom was Sir Edward Grey, and Sir Edward Grey put his signature to a document which said in terms that it would not apply to the dominions unless on their own behalf they chose to adhere to it. Canada did choose to adhere to it, and Canada afterwards passed a statute making it law in this country. When war was declared by Canada on Japan, the treaty to which Canada had adhered and which would have had no effect upon Canada if this country had not adhered to it, was thereby abrogated and came to an end, but the Canadian statute remained on the statute book. The purpose of the bill is to remove that statute and to remove the effect thereof as to the people of Canada. As to whether anything like this has been done in Australia or New Zealand, I am not informed.

Section agreed to.

FARMERS' CREDITORS

CONSOLIDATION OF ARRANGEMENT ACT OF 1934 AND AMENDMENTS

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 20, consideration in committee of bill No. 132, to facilitate compromises and arrangements between insolvent farmers and their creditors —Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 24 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

On section 28—One proposal only.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think some consideration should be given this section, because I do not believe it is fair to the farmers to have them limited to only one proposal. I can see the possibility of circumstances recurring from year to year that may make it desirable to have these proposals revised. When the representatives of the west presented their proposals to the government they strongly recommended that provision should be made in the bill for revisions from year to year. They suggested this provision:

> After the expiration of one year from the filing of a plan of settlement and prior to the expiration of five years from the date of such filing, a debtor may apply to the board to revise the plan of settlement and upon satisfying the board that the plan of settlement is unreasonable, inequitable or unworkable, or that conditions exist which justify the board in so doing, the board may thereupon revise the plan of settlement upon such terms and conditions as the board may deem advisable.

I think that recommendation was gone into very thoroughly by the three western provinces, who have had a great deal to do with the administration of legislation of this kind for the last eight or nine years, and we should not pass it by lightly without further consideration. I trust that the minister will see the reasonableness of the argument, and permit further revisions to be made.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If there is to be equality as between the rights of the debtor and those of the creditor, there is much to be said in favour of the proposition that within a period of five years a further opportunity may be given for application under the act by a farmer in respect of whom an order has been made. Under section 33 provision is made that where any debt secured on the land owned by a farmer or under an agreement for sale has been reduced under any composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement, and within five years the farmer sells at an increase in price over and above the price determined at the time the order is made, then a judge may allow the sale to be made, but subject to the provision that the creditor may be reimbursed by some additional amount dependent upon the increase in the value of the property. So that we have this position: not only is the present and prospective capability of the farmer to meet his debts as they become due to be taken into consideration under section 16, but the creditor gets a second chance within a period of five years.

Mr. ILSLEY: Only in the event of a sale.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is perfectly true.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman wish to limit the debtor's second chance to the case of a sale?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, naturally I do not argue that. It is suggested that the purpose of this legislation is that of assuring a solution of the debt problem. Land may go down in value, drought may come and within a period of five years any number of difficulties may develop. Under those circumstances, if on the one hand the creditor is to receive benefit through an increase in price, evidenced by the price he may receive on the sale, then I suggest the minister should answer the argument of and the recommendation by the hon. member for Bow River, that the farmer have the privilege of making a second application.

The three western provinces have given serious consideration to this matter. The attorneys-general of those provinces have for a considerable period of time studied the subject of debt legislation. Farm bodies have done the same. They must have considered all the points considered by the minister and the government when bringing this matter before the house. Those groups have felt it most important that a provision should be made whereby within five years of the date of the coming into force of the act a proposal might be revised, upon application of the debtor. Would the minister state why that suggestion in the draft act was not accepted, and whether the government is adamant in its opposition to any suggestion to the effect that some provision should be made for a further application within a five-year period.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think there is any virtue in the five-year provision. If there are to be repeated applications by the farmer to write down the debt, on the theory that from time to time the debt should be adjusted to the value of the land, or adjusted to meet other circumstances, we should have an entirely different kind of act. If that were done it would be only fair for the creditor to take advantage of such increase, and be placed in the position of coming in again himself. If, for instance, the value of the farm land increased from $30 to $60 an acre, owing to inflation or for some other reason, he should have that privilege.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thought we had guarded against that.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have done everything possible to guard against it, and I should hope that nothing of that kind would occur. But if it did occur, I do think the hon. member would say that creditors should have the right to come in and change the arrangement after it had once been adjusted downward. It has never been suggested. There is no finality so far as the farmer is concerned under those circumstances.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The measure should operate fairly. If a creditor has a right, then I think it should be acknowledged. I do not think we should bar him from the advantage of an increase, any more than we should bar the farmer from a fair adjustment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not be prepared to accept that right, on behalf of either the debtor or the creditor—because I am sure we would have to accept it on behalf of both. Farmers would not like that provision—the ones who availed themselves of the act. They would like to know that their obligation is fixed. I admit that in section 33, in the event of a sale only, we are making an exception to that rule. That would be where there is no doubt about the value, because it is checked by the sale. I shall speak about section 33 when I come to it, and shall propose some amendments, setting out my reasons for doing so. I propose also to give some instances of what has happened, which I believe will be interesting to hon. members. But as to the proposal that there should be repeated adjustments, I must express my dissent. I dealt with that point yesterday. The principle of the act is to keep the farmers entitled to the benefit on the land, as efficient producers. When a farmer sells the land, that principle of course is abrogated; it no longer applies. That is a different question entirely from the question whether or not a farmer who does stay on the land for a great many years should from time to time—once, or more than once; I do not see any particular virtue in the suggestion that it should be once—make application. That deprives the act of any fidelity, and it would have to apply both to the creditor and to the debtor. I do not think we could do that. It verges a little on the partnership argument, namely that the lender is a partner. He is not a partner at all. The land goes up in value, and he can get only so much back in dollars. If the land goes down in value, in the absence of extraordinary legislation of this kind, he is entitled to get back the number of dollars he lent.

Last night my parliamentary assistant pointed out that the principle underlying the lending is that the lender assumes a fixed monetary obligation that is wholly inconsistent with the principle of partnership. The principle of partnership works sometimes to the advantage of the lender, and sometimes to his disadvantage. The bondholder has certain disadvantages and certain advantages. The shareholder has certain disadvantages, and certain advantages. But the bondholder is not a shareholder, nor is the lender of money on security a partner.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The basis of adjustment will be the judgment of the court. The court will decide the ability to pay. He may spread his proposal over a number of years. In that period of years there might be a drastic change in ability to pay.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On that basis I think this section should be amended.

Mr. QUELCH: I would be opposed to the idea that the creditor should be allowed to make a proposal, and for this reason. The farmer is allowed to make a proposal because owing to conditions in the past—not in the future—he has been unable to make his payments; therefore a new adjustment is allowed to compensate him for his loss in the past. If conditions improve he will then probably be glad to make his payments in the future, under a new agreement, and no new proposal is necessary on the part of the creditor. It is wholly a matter of ability to pay. In addition he would be compensated for any loss incurred in the past as the result of low prices and drouth. So long as the farmer can pay, and has no difficulty in paying, there is no need of a proposal being made. The same applies to creditors. So long as the farmer can make his payment there is no need for a creditor to make a proposal.

Mr. ILSLEY: His ability to pay in the future may increase as well as decrease.

Mr. QUELCH: One thing is certain: if prices increase in the future, they will go down again in a short time, and, judging from past history, the downward trend is more likely than the upward trend. If we say that the right level is parity price, we can go back through history and find that the price goes below parity more than above it.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words with respect to section 28. We have just considered section 27 which states that a decision of the appeal court shall be final. Section 28 says:

No farmer shall be entitled to make more than one proposal under this act.

There has been a long discussion on this bill. Away back in 1924 and 1925, when the prairie provinces were urging free trade, and all that kind of thing, I proposed to aid them all along the line by protection and The Safeguarding of Industries Act, for the benefit of the prairie farmers. It affected not only their property, but the marketing and production of their crops. During the past fifteen or sixteen years many advanced protectionist measures have been passed, some of them dealing with farm debt, others with the farms themselves, the appliances used on the farm, production, distribution and marketing of the crop and so on. When the prairies veered around to protection, after seeing the great injury which had been done by the opposite policy, I pointed out that there should be a national policy to apply protection to all Canada's ills. I am not opposing adequate measures to take care of this problem of farm debt on the prairies and the hardship caused thereby; my point is that any measure should have a greater scope and be reciprocal and apply aid to all Canada to protect equities. A measure such as this should not be brought in during the dying days of parliament when it cannot receive the consideration it deserves. It has to go to another place and we do not know how it will fare there. In my opinion it might be well to let it stand over for a year. This measure is onesided; it is not reciprocal.

A proper national policy of protection would benefit not only the market gardener and the farmer, but the artisan and the industrial worker. Then it would be worthy of the name of protection. A measure such as this ought to be applied to all. On April 17, 1925, I said that protection is a great economic question of principle and of patriotism, and of life and death to Canadians. The big interests, who seek to grab all the benefits of protection for themselves, are its worst friends, and do the great movement little good. It should not be a manufacturers' question, or a banking question, or a grain growers' question, or a combine question, or a monopoly question at all. Protection should be brought up to date to meet changed conditions, and extended. Protection will make for a better Canada, and a happier and more contented people, with work plentiful; it will make Canada a country fit for heroes who have fought for Canada to live and die in, instead of being driven to join the exodus.

Instead of a measure of protection to cover our fishermen, our industrial workers in the central provinces, and our farmers on the prairies, and the Pacific toilers and the equity in their homes, we have a one-sided protection measure. I say that this will only cause untold hardship for those who will have to help pay for it. This bill is only half-baked to begin with. They talk about fifty per cent of the farmers on the prairies having no debt on their farms, and we must not forget that there are many widows and others who have invested their money in farm mortgages on the prairies while others have taken out insurance policies or have bought loan or trust company bonds. Their security in these companies may be wiped out. If this principle is to be adopted it will cause wide differences of opinion and disunity in Canada.

I have no objection to attempting to relieve this very serious state of affairs to which my hon. friends to my left referred yesterday, but I plead for equality of treatment to other native industries and the industrial population. This is a form of state socialism—for some, and not for others. If you are going to adopt it you might just as well say that there will be no proper protection for the policyholders in these insurance companies, whose assets will go down and may be seriously affected. In the dying days of parliament we should not pass this measure. During the last few days of the session we cannot give a matter like this proper consideration. If they are going to ask for more than is in the bill, or for more than is proper, it will only cause trouble. I doubt whether some of the clauses of these measures are constitutional in view of the decision of the privy council, on provincial farm debt matters. It will cause wide differences of opinion in the other provinces of the confederation.

You, Mr. Chairman, were once the head in Ontario of a fine municipality in an agricultural community, and you know that people in Ontario consider that province the forgotten province. We have not received the same treatment that others have. I think the government should consider widening this bill, or possibly let it stand over for a year and then provide a wider measure of relief for those who are not covered at all and for those who should be covered, so as to have real national protection to the real estate of all our people and the holdings or the equities in their homes.

Mr. SHAW: What provision is being made to prevent a recurrence of what occurred during the early days of the first act? When the first settlements were made the reductions were quite low and the argument was advanced that as this was a new thing, the boards of review would have to proceed with great caution. Later, after some experience had been gained by the boards of review, the reductions were approximately doubled. No provision was made for a second appearance before the board and a great deal of bitterness developed among the farmers. I recognize that under certain conditions many of those farmers are going to have an opportunity of having their debts considered, but if these courts proceed with caution at first and then, after gaining some experience, become more generous we are going to have a repetition of what happened before. Many of the farmers felt that they were unfairly discriminated against.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would expect that there would be some consultation between the appeal judge and the district court judges before the act came into operation to try to decide upon some of the principles which should be applied. That is not usual in judicial procedure, but I do not see why it could not be done. From the experience of the past nine years in the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act the judges realize the importance of consistency in decisions, which was not the case under the boards of review. The hon. gentleman knows that it is because there was not consistency that we are permitting a second proposal. Only one proposal is provided for under this bill, but there is really a second proposal for those who had their cases adjusted up to the end of 1928.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister knows that the mortgage companies were opposed to the boards and wanted the substitution of the courts. They evidently felt that they would get a better deal with the courts. Does the minister think that the farmers will get the same type of sympathetic consideration from the courts as they have been getting from the boards?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether it will be the same type, but I think there will be sympathetic consideration of their claims, for the reasons stated the other day by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Sissons). I do not see any reason to expect otherwise, but I would expect more consistency than there has been under the boards of review. I do not want to attack the boards of review, and I am not doing so, but it is well known that the principles applied in the early part of the nine-year period were different from those applied in the latter part. There has also been some difference in the treatment of these cases by different boards; some boards have acted differently from others. I do not think this has been because of a lack of sympathy as between the boards. I think that the care and thoroughness with which they dealt with the cases has varied somewhat from board to board, and that leads to a bad result. If a farmer has gone before one board and has been able to get a big write-off, knowing well that he would get a small write-off from another board, and another farmer goes to another board and gets a less favourable decision, you get a situation which gives rise to charges of discrimination. That is not a particularly good system. I do not know what the facts are about all these cases, but I do know that there has been quite a volume of complaints about particular decisions.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister says that there will be less inconsistency when the courts deal with these cases, that there has been inconsistency in the decisions of the boards. There may be more consistency by the courts in dealing with technical and legal aspects, but the trouble with this legislation, and the reason I am so much opposed to the courts handling it, is that the courts will have to be more than legal interpreters; they will have to be experts on farm management to decide on the ability of the farmer to pay and on the productive capacity of his farm. Most men on the bench are no more competent to decide these two questions than are men you might pick off the streets. One of the reasons why the boards of review were so inconsistent in the early stages was that they had had no experience in that work, but years of experience in handling these cases gave them more information and a better insight into farm management. That is why in later years their decisions were much better. The minister has not advanced any reason why the courts will be any more consistent in their decisions. It is true that in dealing with technical and legal aspects they may be, but when it comes to deciding on a farmer's ability to pay and on the productive capacity of his land, I think the courts will have to do what the boards of review did—just feel their way by an experimental process of trial and error. They will be just as cautious as the boards of review were at first, but as they get more experience in farm management they will be able to make more equitable adjustments. In view of that fact I think the minister would have been well advised to provide, as proposed in the draft bill, a probationary period of five years, not that there should be adjustments from time to time and no finality but that in this probationary period of five years of experimentation the farmer and creditor would be able to see how the arrangement was working out, and if it was not working out satisfactorily the matter could be reviewed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that would have a good effect at all. I think if the judges approached the question with the idea that they were instituting a probationary settlement, then to begin with the settlement would not be as good or as careful. I think the fact that there is to be finality about the settlement imposes on the judge an obligation to take care which would not exist if the settlement were to be a mere preliminary or probationary one. The creation of an appeal court is a factor making for consistency which does not exist in the present system. I do not want to be misunderstood as criticizing the present boards of review, because they have done a lot of very fine work, but there is something in what the hon. member for Lake Centre says, that when administrative boards have the final say, they are likely to be a little more dogmatic—I was going to say arbitrary—than when there is an appeal from their decisions. It is a criticism of a lot of our war-time controls, and there is something in it. It is probably a human quality to be decisive and at times dogmatic and, with some persons, arbitrary, if there is no appeal from their decisions. The fact that a minister of the crown has over him the government, that he cannot just say yes or no and tell everybody to take the consequences, but that there is a government which in the final analysis can overrule him, has a beneficial effect on the minister. Sometimes it slows him up and in time of war one sometimes wishes that his voice was the only voice. But I think consistency in his decisions is probably assured to a certain extent by the fact that there is a superior body over him.

Mr. SHAW: Is there any time limit on this appeal? Suppose the farmer has had an adjustment and must make an appeal say within a period of one year—I do not know what the limit may be—the chances are that during that one year the amount of experience gleaned by the court would not be considerable. But there is not only that consideration. Would the appeal be made on the basis of conditions which prevailed when the first adjustment was made, or on the basis of conditions at the time of the appeal? I could understand that if say at the end of three years the appeal court has to take into consideration the conditions that exist at the end of the three-year period, the appeal might be beneficial, but I cannot see how an appeal under this act will offset any of the difficulties that may develop as a result of the court's probably not having sufficient experience to decide on the productive capacity of a particular parcel of land. I think it is in that respect that the real difficulty is going to develop.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the main question always—what is the productive capacity of the land? That is the reason why there are sections later in the bill which provide for the appointment of appraisers to assist the judge.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Will they be from the soldier settlement board?

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not know. We may select them from there.

Mr. SHAW: Is there any time limit for the appeal?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The time in which the appeal must be asserted will have to be fixed by the rules.

Mr. QUELCH: When the appeal is finally made, will conditions at that time be the governing feature, or conditions when the proposal was made?

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be the conditions at the time the proposal was made.

Mr. QUELCH: Could not that be changed so that the conditions at the time of the appeal should govern?

Mr. ILSLEY: The court has the evidence before it that was taken below, and that is the evidence on which the appeal will be made.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And no other evidence will be taken?

Mr. ILSLEY: They have power to take new evidence, yes. I do not think the appeals will be long delayed.

Mr. QUELCH: After a proposal is made, if we had four or five bad years, would it be possible for the farmer to make an appeal and have his case judged on conditions existing at the end of that bad period?

Mr. ILSLEY: The probability is that he will be obliged to appeal. The creditor would be obliged to appeal within about sixty days or something like that. A longer period would be unreasonable.

Mr. SHAW: Then in effect the bill really does not take care of the situation that develops under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is not designed for that.

Mr. FAIR: Has the minister considered the advisability of having a representative of the debtor and a representative of the creditor sit with the judge in cases where an appeal has been taken from the first court?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That has been considered, but it is not consistent with the theory of a court; and that is, I think, one thing wrong with the present system. If you had sitting what one might call a court of three persons, one of whom considered it his duty to fight for the debtor and another his duty to fight for the creditor, you would not have a judicial body. I do not know that they did that. They probably acquired a judicial outlook on these boards, but there have been instances where a pretty forceful person got on, representing one side or another. The theory of the act is that that is a bad court. Judges do not represent either plaintiff or defendant, nor do they have anyone sitting with them in judgment representing either party. The persons who represent plaintiff and defendant are advocates who appear before the court, and that is the place where such persons ought to be.

Mr. STIRLING: It is one o'clock and past, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Will the judge have any expert on farm management to advise him?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 28 carry?

Section agreed to.

On section 29—If farmer defaults.

Mr. FAIR: Could we have an explanation of this section?

Mr. ILSLEY: These provisions were in the old act. If the farmer defaults, and if the default is not due to causes beyond his control, the court may on the application of a creditor annul the composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement, and the farmer may be put into bankruptcy. That has been in the law all along. If the default was due to causes beyond the farmer's control, the section does not apply. He cannot be put into bankruptcy. The explanatory note covers it pretty well. The last subsection relates to the province of Quebec, stating what court shall have jurisdiction there.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This section is important, by virtue of the fact that it will influence the whole proceedings and conduct of the case in the years following the filing of the proposal. What kind of regulations are passed under this legislation covering that period of time will largely determine to what extent the legislation will be a success. As I understand it, after the proposal is drawn up and filed by the court and accepted by both parties, if the farmer finds that because of conditions beyond his control—because of crop failure or depressed prices—he cannot meet the obligations, the creditor may make application to have the composition annulled, but if the court feels that it is not the farmer's fault the composition will not be annulled. I should like the minister, however, to let us know what will happen. Will the court merely extend for one year the terms of settlement, or will he virtually make a new proposal to extend further the terms of payment? What has the minister in mind in this section? It gives tremendous powers to the court, and they are not very clearly defined. In the draft act which was recommended, part II, section 24, some sort of crop failure clause was suggested. Again, of course, the minister will not agree with me, because he takes the position that there is a fixed money charge and that the capital invested entitles the investor to a fixed return, and, failing that fixed return, the right to take over the property which is the security for his loan. We do not take that position at all; we feel that in a year in which the farmer had a crop failure through no fault of his own he has already taken a loss—the money he has put into seed and all the work he has done. The investor ought to be prepared to accept some of that loss, and if not that, ought at least to be prepared to postpone the payment for that year, and the terms of the contract should be extended one year further. If the government had accepted the proposal in section 24 of the draft bill there would be some provision of that sort, and it may be that the minister has in mind putting it in the regulations.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the minister elaborate on the powers a judge will have? Will the judge have power to extend the settlement another year? Will he have power to waive the interest for that year, or will the interest and principal be piled up for that year and two payments be required instead of one in the year following?

Mr. ILSLEY: The rights of the parties are these, that if the farmer defaults, the creditor may enforce the confirmed proposal. Of course he cannot take foreclosure proceedings under the order in council for the reduced amounts, or he cannot proceed without the leave of the court. At least the court has power to postpone or stay these proceedings under the order in council passed under the War Measures Act, and the rights of the creditor are determined by the proposal. In that event, I suppose, what would happen in practice would be about what the hon. gentleman says, that the amount would not be paid that year but would accumulate against the property for subsequent payment.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): At the top of page 10 it says:

> . . . no such composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement shall be annulled by reason of the default of the farmer in carrying out the terms thereof except as provided in this section.

That is, except where it is not beyond his control, or it is his fault. In a case where the judge is convinced that it is not the farmer's fault, will he have power under this section to extend the terms of the settlement or make some adjustment at that time?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the judge would have no power of that kind, because the rights of the parties are already determined by the confirmed proposal. Those could not be altered by the judge without a new proposal, which cannot take place. The creditor has the right to enforce the proposal even though the farmer makes default.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Even though it is not his fault?

Mr. ILSLEY: Even though it is not his fault, yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the minister explain these words? It seems to me it says very clearly that he can. If so:

> . . . no such composition, extension of time, or scheme of arrangement shall be annulled by reason of the default of the farmer. . . .

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes—except as provided in this section.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, except where it is the farmer's fault. Now where it is not the farmer's fault I take it this section means that the court would have the right to extend the terms of settlement.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it does not mean that. Under the Bankruptcy Act, if a farmer makes a composition with his creditors and defaults, then he may be put in bankruptcy for any default. That would be the law all over Canada with the exception of the western provinces; that is, the composition would be annulled as a result of the default of the farmer; but under this section it cannot be annulled unless the default came about as the result of the fault of the farmer—as a result of forces within the control of the farmer. If it comes about as a result of causes within the control of the farmer it can be annulled here. In that respect it is more favourable to the farmer in the three western provinces than it is in other provinces.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But the minister says it cannot be annulled. It merely means that the proposal cannot be annulled; the terms of the proposal still must be enforced.

Mr. ILSLEY: They can be enforced, yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But under the order in council which is good only for the duration of the war, the court would have power to postpone payment?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But not under this legislation?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Section agreed to.

Sections 30, 31 and 32 agreed to.

On section 33—Farmer may not sell in case of reduction of debt, except with leave of the court.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to move an amendment to this section. The three main features of the amendment are: first, that the provisions of the section shall not apply to compositions, extensions of time, or schemes of arrangement which have been approved by the court or confirmed by the board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934. The section as it stands would unsettle certain settlements on which the farmer probably has the right to rely. It will apply only for the future; it will apply only to compositions, extensions of time or schemes of arrangement approved by the court under the act now before the house. That is the first change that is proposed in the section. The second is that the period of five years be reduced to three years. The third is that such additional amount as the court thinks should be paid for the benefit of the creditors is to be paid into court instead of directly to the creditors. There is a fourth; that is, that the amount is not to be payable to one holder of the security on the said land, or to the vendor or assignee of the vendor under the agreement for sale, but is to be applied by the court for any holder of security on the said land, or the vendor or assignee of the vendor under the agreement for sale.

The need for this section is indicated by experience. I have before me a list of cases in which the dominion government was the secured creditor; I suppose there are hundreds of cases like this in which private mortgagees or vendors were the secured creditors. I have not gone over those at all but have had selected, I think at random—I am not just sure on what basis they were selected—eighteen cases in which the crown was the creditor, through the soldier settlement board. This is what happened in those cases; I shall take perhaps the most outstanding one, though it may not be. The original debt was $6,586.59. The date of reduction of the debt was May 9, 1938. The reduced debt was $3,500. On October 20, 1939, less than eighteen months later, the debtor sold the property for $6,850. Hon. gentlemen will take note of what happened there, and I would ask them to put themselves in the position of trustees for the taxpayers of Canada. As holder of the security on that property the soldier settlement board were compelled to reduce the amount of their debt against that farmer by $3,000, from $6,586.59 to $3,500; they were compelled to do so under the provisions of an act the object of which, as stated in the preamble, was to retain the farmer on the land as an efficient producer. Within eighteen months that farmer who was thus enabled to remain on the land as an efficient producer sold the property for $6,850. Of course the crown took that loss of $3,000 and the farmer got the benefit of the difference.

The theory of this section, the principle underlying it, is that if something definite of that kind takes place, showing clearly that the court erred, that the purposes of the act were frustrated and that there should not have been any such reduction at all, the farmer should make some of that money available for the satisfaction of the persons who had security on the land. The section therefore provides that the farmer cannot, within three years after this settlement—which, it must be borne in mind, is made for the purpose of keeping him on the land as an efficient producer—sell the land without getting leave of the court. The court may impose conditions, one of which may be that such sum as the court thinks fit will be paid into court for the benefit of those who have security on the land.

That is one case. There is another case on this list in which apparently the farmer sold the land within six months. The original debt was $4,236.27. The date of reduction was May 5, 1939. The reduced debt was $2,000. On November 7, 1939, he sold the land for $3,040. Under the proposed section it would be necessary if he changed his mind about staying on the land, which was what happened in this case, to come to the court and say, "I am going to sell this land, for which I am going to get $3,040. Your $4,000 was cut down to $2,000. I want to know on what terms I can sell the land," and the terms may include the condition that some part of the money be paid into court for the benefit of those holding security on the land. Those holders of security might include municipalities who had taxes owing, or anyone else who had an interest in the land.

The proposed legislation is based to a large extent on a section of the New Zealand act which is very much like this. I have no information as to subsequent legislation in New Zealand, but in 1936 they passed an act which had an emergency application, just like the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. It enabled farmers and others to apply within a limited period, within a year or two, for a reduction of their debts, and it provided that if anyone sold the land before January 1, 1941, which was about four years after the expiration of the act, they must do this very thing. I have the provisions of the New Zealand act before me. I do not say that we are doing this because New Zealand did it; we are doing this because one of the features of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act that has always shocked a good many people is that debtors could go to a board of review, sometimes with a sale in view, and avail themselves of the provisions of an act designed to keep efficient producers on the land, in order to get a substantial write-down of their mortgages. Then, shortly afterwards, they could sell the land for an amount very considerably in excess of the sum to which the debt was reduced.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has that been a common thing?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has happened a number of times; one hears about it here and there. As I say, I have just gathered up some of our own. I have eighteen cases where land was sold within three years.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. QUELCH: Have they reference to soldier settlers?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not think it is fair to compare soldier settlers with civilians, because in many cases the soldier settlement board have voluntarily made concessions. Very often the soldier settlement board have made a proposal for a reduction. They treat the soldier differently from the way they would treat a civilian, and rightly so. I should like the minister to give the facts in connection with some civilian cases. Probably that would give a different picture.

Mr. ILSLEY: These were all proceedings under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes; nevertheless the soldier settlement board may make a proposal. I know of many cases where the soldier settlement board itself has voluntarily made a proposal granting a soldier a very large reduction.

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister referred to two sales, one where the farmer sold the land for $6,850 and the other where it was sold for $3,040. Were they sold for cash, or on time? If they were sold on time, is there any possibility that the man who bought the farm would himself be back to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act administrators in another five years looking for an adjustment?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether these were sold on time or not. But if they were sold on time, of course that is a matter the court would take into consideration.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is not the same at all, if it is on time.

Mr. FAIR: We are told there is a sucker born every minute. Some of the people who purchased this land were possibly among them. I do not care how poor an article one may have for sale, if he is a good enough salesman he can always sell it for more than it is worth. I believe many of the parcels of land which were bought by soldier settlers might be put in that class. The arguments which have been made by the minister, or which he has attempted to make, cannot be seriously considered in this instance. If under this section a creditor is to be given the benefit in the actual or apparent value of a property in which he has an interest, will that same creditor in respect of a property which deteriorates in value stand a similar share of the deficiency?

Mr. ILSLEY: The creditors are not given the benefit of the increase if the man stays on the land. If he does not stay on the land and sells the propery, it might be argued that there should be a provision that if he sells for less than the secured value, the reduced security, he should have the right of having the land revalued downward. That might be argued, of course; but I would point out that that would be entirely unworkable. To begin with, I do not think it would ever occur, because I do not know why he would be selling it then. He would not be getting anything out of it.

Mr. FAIR: In order to get some share of the money he put into it he may be compelled, before his equity is still further reduced, to dispose of it. I know of case after case where a man has had to get rid of his holdings.

Mr. ILSLEY: But if he sells it for less than there is against it, he does not get a dollar out of it. I should think that would never occur. Moreover a provision like that could be easily evaded. He would just need to make a sale to a friend, at less than the amount, and automatically have it written down. That would make it entirely impossible from the point of view of administration. I do not, however, rest my contention on that point, but rather on the point that it would never occur. If we had a provision in here that in the event of the security being reduced from $6,000 to $3,500, and it were sold for $3,000, he could have the security written down to $3,000, what good would it do? He would never apply, because he would not get a dollar out of it anyway.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I think this is a most vicious section. The minister's whole argument is based on the supposition that these debts ought not to be written down below a hundred per cent of the value of the farm.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is not so at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister cites the case of a man who has $4,000 against the farm, and sells it for $3,000, and he seems to think that that is a scandalous thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say it was scandalous at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): When he sells it for $3,000, what is happening is that there is a $2,000 debt, and a $1,000 equity. This section provides that with respect to the other thousand dollars the creditor shall come in and get the whole or part of it. If they can convince the court that they have a claim, that may be done. But what about the farmer's equity in that land?

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member want me to asnwer?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He is the man who originally puts the money up to buy the farm. In all probability he put down a cash payment. Then he worked the land, cultivated it and placed the buildings on it. But the whole assumption under this section is that an arrangement must be made to make sure that the farmer never gets more for the land than is actually against it in debt.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And if he does get more, the creditor will have recourse in the courts.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; let me put my hon. friend straight on that. In the case where the debt was reduced from $4,000 to $2,000 and the land was sold for $3,000, it may be that the court had in mind that the $3,000 was the value that it was putting on the land, and that $1,000 was being allowed as an equity. If it were sold for $3,000 the court would proceed on the basis of the valuation of the land on which the court had proceeded originally. But suppose it was cut down to $2,000, on the basis of the land being worth $2,500, and it was sold for $3,000, also taking into consideration any improvements made—all those things must be considered by the court. It enables the court to compel the payment of part of the amount into court; it is not necessarily the whole thing. The section does not impose any obligation on the court at all to do anything, except what it feels in its discretion it should do. In respect of the first case I cited, namely a sale for $6,850 within eighteen months, of land on which the mortgage was reduced to $3,500, certainly the court could not have had in mind a valuation of $6,850 or anything like it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It might have had.

Mr. ILSLEY: That has not anything to do with the value of the land, necessarily.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): The land may have been improved in value. The improvements may have been by way of clearing the land. For instance, it may have been brush land, and the cost of clearing would be about $15 an acre. It may be that there was a growing crop sold with the land.

Mr. ILSLEY: All those things must be considered, and they are so treated in the section. Let me read the proposed section.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): The value may have been fair enough when it was made.

Mr. ILSLEY: All those things are to be considered by the court, and it is so stated. This is the proposed section:

33. (1) Where any debt secured on the land owned by a farmer or owing or payable by a farmer under an agreement for sale of any land has been reduced under any composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement approved or confirmed by the court under this act, the farmer shall not, except with the leave of the court granted upon such terms and conditions as the court thinks fit, sell or otherwise dispose of such land or any part thereof or his interest therein within a period of three years after the date on which the composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement was approved or confirmed.

(2) The conditions imposed by the court upon granting leave to any farmer to make any such sale or other disposition may include a condition that such portion of the selling price or other consideration, as the court deems equitable, having regard to all the circumstances and in particular to any improvements made to the land since the date of such approval or confirmation, shall become payable into the court in such manner and within such time as the court directs, and shall be applied by the court for the benefit of any holder of security on the said land or the vendor or assignee of the vendor under the agreement for sale.

Mr. SISSONS: I desire to commend the minister for the amendment suggested to section 33. I still think that the bill would be a better bill if section 33 were wiped out, but it is a good bill even with section 33 as amended in it.

An hon. MEMBER: Good for whom?

Mr. SISSONS: Good for the farmer. I would much rather have this bill with section 33 as amended in it than have no bill. I would commend that attitude to my hon. friends in the Social Credit and Cooperative Commonwealth Federation groups. Already there has been raised in this house the suggestion that the minister should drop this bill, and in view of the attitude taken by hon. members opposite I have been fearful that the minister might be persuaded to withdraw it. My hon. friends say that they are serving the interests of the farmers of western Canada, but I would point out that there is an even greater danger than the minister dropping the bill; I do not think that will happen, but shots have been fired in this house against the bill and it may result in the bill being killed in another place. I want to tell the Social Credit and Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members right now that they will not be able to evade their share of the responsibility if eventually this bill is killed by parliament.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We have no representative in the other place.

[Mr. G. H. Ross.]

Mr. SISSONS: If this bill is killed before it passes both houses, my hon. friends will have something to answer for to the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The other place will have to answer for that.

Mr. SISSONS: My hon. friends will have to answer. The farmers of western Canada have prayed for release from their debts; they have prayed to be forgiven their financial obligations, and in future they might very well pray to be saved from such champions as the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) and the members of the Social Credit group.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member for Peace River is very much concerned that the representations made by members in this corner of the house may result in the withdrawal or defeat of this legislation. I may tell him in the first place that the only member of the house so far who has asked for the withdrawal of this legislation is the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards).

Mr. EDWARDS: I asked for no such thing.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member must have changed considerably.

Mr. EDWARDS: I asked for no such thing. I ask the hon. member to quote anything I said. I note that some of the observations of the hon. member who now has the floor are not in Hansard.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If any observations that I have made are not in Hansard, it is because the reporter did not get it. I did not check Hansard. I am not in the habit of doctoring Hansard.

Mr. EDWARDS: I merely stated a fact.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What is the fact, may I ask?

Mr. EDWARDS: I stated that an observation that my hon. friend made yesterday afternoon when I had the floor does not appear in Hansard to-day. It was the occasion for my including in my general observations in regard to integrity and honesty, the preachers' profession.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I say that if that very profound observation to a none too profound individual is not in Hansard, it certainly was not because I took it out.

The CHAIRMAN: I should like if possible at this stage to have the discussion kept within the limits of the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I shall be glad to do that. The hon. member for Peace River is much alarmed lest any opposition to this legislation may result in its defeat. I want to tell him that he can be absolutely certain that legislation that is as favourable to the creditor class as this is will go through.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman surely does not say that the creditor class is helped by this legislation. Suppose we had no legislation and a creditor in the western provinces had the same rights as a creditor in the other provinces, would he not have much wider rights than he will have as a result of this legislation? This legislation gives nothing to the creditor class; it takes away from them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This legislation takes the power away from the boards of review and gives it to the courts. Apparently these boards of review have been much too sympathetic and much too generous to the debtor class, according to what has been said by many in this house and outside the house. I think the strongest objection that has been taken by various members is that the boards of review have been so generous, or as the minister says, so inconsistent.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman continues to say that this legislation was brought in because the boards of review were too favourable to the debtors. That is not the reason for the legislation, and the hon. gentleman should accept the reasons I have repeatedly given. That is not one of them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am stating that the effect of this legislation is to take power away from the boards of review and give it to the courts. If this legislation were not here, the boards of review would continue to function. The minister has been arguing all along for finality. There is to be no revision once a proposal has been filed, as far as the farmer is concerned. If the farmer is not able to meet the terms of the composition, there is to be no revision; there is to be no adjustment; he goes into bankruptcy unless he gets a postponement. The only group that can get a revision—that is what this amounts to—is to be the creditor group, in the event of the debtor selling his farm for more than the total amount of the debt against it. In other words, the only place where the principle of finality is to be dispensed with is the place where the legislation might work out in the interests of the farmer debtor. The principle for which the minister has been contending for two days is being violated by this section.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want finality where the parties concerned abide by the intent and spirit of the bill. This bill provides for finality where the man stays on the land for three years after the settlement. The object of the legislation is to enable him to stay on the land as an efficient producer. If he does so, there is every finality so far as he is concerned and so far as the creditor is concerned. But if he does not, if he gets a write-down so that he can stay on the land and then, as many have done, sells his land for a very considerable increase in value and gets off the land, he should come back to the court and say, "That was not the basis; I have changed my mind, I want to sell the land." The court may then impose a condition having regard to all the circumstances. That is the spirit and intent of the legislation, and I argue for that.

I point out another consideration, perhaps not strictly on this point, and that is that there is a considerable class who will take advantage of this, and the largest class, I take it. There is a second chance for the debtors who had their proposals confirmed before January 1, 1939—not all of them but those who come within the other conditions of the legislation. But the creditor does not have a second chance.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There may be circumstances under which the land is being sold not because of the choice of the debtor at all. The debtor may die and his widow be unable to carry on the farm; having no grown-up son, she is compelled by economic circumstances to dispose of the land. In that case she will take the case to the court and have to give the creditor whatever opportunity he can avail himself of to get part of the proceeds when she is disposing of her farm.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct, and I do not see anything wrong with that at all. I have a different point of view from my hon. friend. It may be my background, my environment or something like that, but I have seen people who take their savings and invest them in a mortgage on a neighbouring farm, say a mortgage of $2,000. Sometimes they had worked hard to accumulate those savings over a period of years. It would seem to me that if the farm were sold for three or four or five thousand dollars the person who lent his savings on the security of a mortgage should get back his $2,000 if the farm is sold. I do not see any reason why he should not. To propound these new partnership theories, this theory of heads I win and tails you lose, seems to me to take away the whole foundation of our present contractual system. Some hon. gentlemen opposite would like to write out of contracts the contractual feature. I cannot as Minister of Finance agree with that. The dominion government has to live up to its contracts; each one of us individually has to live up to his contract, and apart from recognizing the emergency feature here and going as far as is necessary to meet it, I cannot agree to go any farther.

If a man comes in under this legislation, which is designed to keep him on the land as an efficient producer, and has his mortgage written down from $5,000 to $3,000 and his estate is able to get $5,000 for the land, my hon. friend thinks it is a terrible thing that the creditor should be paid off the full amount of his mortgage. What is there wrong about that? The money was advanced on the land. There was a contract to pay back the amount of the mortgage. What social value is impaired there? What harm will it do to the nation? The mortgage, we will say, had to be written down to keep the farmer on the land, and the farmer stayed on the land until he died, perhaps a year or two afterwards. Then it turns out that the land is worth a whole lot more than the mortgage. Why should there be anything wrong about the present owner of the land being obliged to go back to the court and get permission to sell on terms that will preserve so far as possible the contractual feature in the contract?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister asks what is wrong with the illustration he gave, and I notice that he got support from the hon. member for Rosedale. Their outlook is identical, and the minister will, I am sure, be relieved on that score. The minister states the case of a man whose debts are $5,000. The man has probably paid back in principal and interest thousands of dollars already. Then he has his debt written down to $3,000 by the court, which recognizes in that adjustment the value of the farm and that the farmer has already paid back large sums of money and has worked on the farm to break it and clear it and has some equity in it. Now, says the minister, if that land is sold by the estate for $5,000, why should the farmer's widow or his heirs get $2,000? That is what it amounts to. Why should the creditor have to put up with $3,000, he asks, when there are $5,000 of proceeds? Why should not the wages of money come first? Why should not the wages of labour simply be written off? That is what the minister is saying. The minister is saying that the wages of capital are the only wages that are to be sacrosanct, that the only contract is a property contract, and that the money that has already been paid out by the farmer and his family and all the work they have put in on the farm are not to be regarded at all. That is his whole assumption. If the proceeds from the farm amount to $5,000 the creditor should take it all, and the man's family who have already paid in so much and have done so much work on the farm go without anything. What is wrong with that, the minister asks? There is a great deal wrong with it. There is a complete failure to recognize the farmer's equity and the hard work that has been done by hundreds of farming people all across this country. If the minister is going to argue along that line there is no common ground upon which we can argue, because in his eyes the only sacred thing is the obligation to the people who have invested their money. We are trying to get the minister to recognize that when there is a loss, as there has been a loss in western Canada of millions of dollars because of the depression and drought, that loss must be shared equally by both sides, and the labour that the farmer has put in and the payments that have already been made by him warrant him in having some return from the proceeds of that farm. He has as much right to it as the creditor.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just want to say to my hon. friend, who comes from the old country like myself, that one thing that has made the British people great is sanctity of contracts. My hon. friend has the thing in reverse. He is trying to tell the house that the man who lends his money is a scoundrel and that the chap who will not pay back what he owes is a hero.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was always taught, as I am sure my hon. friend was, that if you borrow money and spend it foolishly you must pay it back just the same. I think that is fundamental.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And you would apply it to the farmer in this case?

Mr. MITCHELL: I certainly would. If he gets a mortgage for $6,000 written down to $3,000 and then sells his farm for $6,000, a part of those proceeds belong to the person who lent him the money. To destroy thrift is to destroy civilization. I know hundreds of working people in communities all over this country who have saved a few hundred dollars by hard work and thrift and are lending it out, and we must have regard for these people and their savings. I am not talking of the big loan companies but of the hundreds of working people one meets in every community. In fairness you must have some regard for the other fellow. Of course we all know that through hard circumstances a person may at times be unable to meet his obligations.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In the cases handled under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act by the boards of review, what percentage of the mortgages are held by individuals?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have no record.

Mr. FAIR: There is something we are losing track of and have continued intentionally, I believe, to lose track of, and that is that there is no guaranteed cost of production in our economic system.

The CHAIRMAN: I have already given a ruling on discussion of that kind. There was a long debate on the motion for the second reading of the bill, and that point has been brought up at least a hundred times. I do not say that to depreciate the importance of the point the hon. gentleman is raising, but I think the committee should now confine itself strictly to each section as it comes up for consideration.

Mr. FAIR: The minister has brought forward several arguments to substantiate the case he is trying to make, and I have an equal right—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: I must insist upon my ruling. The time has come when hon. members should observe the rule and confine themselves to the section before the committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 34—Powers of director of soldier settlement preserved.

Mr. FAIR: Will the minister explain this clause?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is self-explanatory. It does not interfere with the rights which the director of soldier settlement has under the legislation governing his operations. He has certain powers of rescission which I believe were carefully framed and debated in the house, and he is not subject to the limitations of this act.

Mr. PERLEY: I do not think we can object to this section, but I submit that it should be cut out altogether. Certainly the soldier settlers are not getting a square deal. Within the last week or ten days there has been evidence of one or two of them having been closed out, and a number of agreements have been cancelled in the last year or since the war broke out. In my opinion this should be cut out altogether and the soldier settlers should be allowed to come in in some other way, so far as this is concerned.

Mr. DONNELLY: Under the Soldier Settlement Act the soldier settler is allowed to take advantage of this act to have his debts adjusted, is he not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; he can do so. Debts due the crown are subject to adjustment under the act, and that would include debts due the soldier settlement board. This section means that if he makes default the director of soldier settlement does not have to put him into bankruptcy and go to the courts. Under the proper legislation he can exercise his power of rescission with respect to any rights or remedies he has in relation to the soldier settler.

Mr. DONNELLY: The soldier can have his debts adjusted?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand that if there has been any arrangement by the soldier settler under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, any act done or adjustment made is hereby rescinded, and that the director can now carry out arrangements under his own power.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not what the section says.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It says:

> Nothing in this act or in any composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangements approved by the court or confirmed by the board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, or approved or confirmed by the court under this act, relating to the debts or affairs of a purchaser of land, or of an assignee of a purchaser of land, under agreement for sale from the director of soldier settlement, shall be deemed to limit or restrict the powers of the said director. . . .

The interpretation of that would be that if there has been some adjustment under the old Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act this section at once does away with that and allows the director to carry on.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has left out of account the last two and a half lines:

> . . . if the purchaser or assignee defaults in carrying out the terms of the composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If he defaults or has defaulted in the past?

Mr. ILSLEY: Default would be a continuing thing. If he has defaulted in the past and the default continues, the continuing default will be covered by the words of the section.

On section 36—Certain provisions of R.S., c. 11 not to apply.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there any particular reason why these gazettings should not take place?

Mr. ILSLEY: To save expense.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What does it cost for the gazetting?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is another reason, and that is to speed up the work. I do not know what the expense would be.

On section 38—Personal representative of person appointed may apply.

Mr. ILSLEY: To make this section comply with the amendment we made last night, the words "may, ex parte," in line 29, should be struck out and the word "shall" substituted therefor.

Mr. MULOCK: I so move.

Sections 39 and 40 agreed to.

On section 41—Governor in council may make rules and regulations and establish tariff of fees.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask the minister whether, in the formulation of the rules and regulations governing the administration of the act, organized agriculture will be given the right to have some say?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give any undertaking to that effect.

Mr. FAIR: Would the minister suggest to those making the rules and regulations that such a right be granted?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should not like to give any undertaking that organized agriculture will be consulted. If consultation is to take place, there are many interests that ought to be consulted, to be fair, and the governor in council will have to take the responsibility for the rules and regulations, just as they do with any other acts, responsibility for the performance of which is vested in the governor in council.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): These rules, I imagine, will provide the machinery under which the land appraisers will operate. Will they be responsible to the various district courts, or will they be responsible directly to the minister here and the administration set up in Ottawa?

Mr. ILSLEY: They will be responsible to the minister.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In other words, then, if the district court judge wants some information regarding the value of certain land, its productive capacity and so on, he will communicate with the administration here; is that the idea?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, I do not think so. Some arrangement will be made so that he can call in these appraisers. Facilities will be available; persons will be appointed by the governor in council and will be available for assistance to the judges.

Section 42 agreed to.

On section 43—Rate of interest.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister give consideration to making the rate of interest four per cent instead of five?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that there should be such a great reduction as that. It is only in the cases where the rate of interest exceeds seven per cent that this section applies. This is taken from the old act; it is to apply to those high rates of interest where the interest rate collectible is more than seven per cent; then, by tendering the money, the mortgagor can get it down to five per cent.

Mr. PERLEY: I want the minister to consider reducing it to four per cent.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Does that mean that all interest rates will be cut down to five per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it does not mean that at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I think the minister ought to give some consideration to a provision, either this section or another, dealing with the question of interest rates. This deals only with the case where the farmer has been paying more than seven per cent; he is now given a new proposal under which the interest rate will be five per cent, but if he has been paying six or seven he may continue to pay six or seven. The minister will agree that a study made of western conditions by the Sirois commission showed that agriculture in the west cannot pay a return of six or seven per cent. One of the things which has ruined western Canada, as has been said repeatedly by those who have examined conditions there, is high rates of interest. Over a period of years one of the reasons that farmers have been under such a burden of debt is the high rate of interest, compounded year after year. The minister would be well advised to consider fixing a maximum rate. If he is not prepared to cut it all to five per cent, he could set a maximum of, say, six, but as it is now it really means that if a man pays seven he will keep on paying seven, and if he pays six he will keep on paying six. I do not think that on back debts the average farm to-day will support six or seven per cent interest. What a number of hon. members who keep acting as though we were trying to deprive somebody of his just due do not realize is that you cannot get blood out of stone, that if the farm does not produce a crop you cannot get a return from it, and in a country where, at least in some parts, the average of crops is only two or three good crops out of five, a farm will not support a family, meet running costs, and pay a high rate of interest on debt, particularly on a back debt which has piled up in addition to more recent debt. The minister would be well advised to consider a provision that in these compositions there will be a maximum rate of interest, and that that maximum should be not more than five per cent. I would go even lower, but I think five per cent is the very most that the average farmer's farm will support on back debt.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Why does the minister consider that some should pay 7 per cent and others have their rate reduced to 5 per cent? Why have two rates of interest? I know that some have paid it over the years, but we are now making an adjustment, and surely when the minister is permitting some to come down to 5 per cent, all should be brought down to 5. I agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that probably the rate should be down lower than five in order to make it possible for the farmer to pay, but since the minister has the rate here at 5 per cent I suggest that all should be cut to 5 per cent, because, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Weyburn, it is just impossible for the farmer to meet contractual obligations if they are too onerous. It is useless to put an impossible proposition before a farmer and expect him to live up to it. You may sell his land and put him off the farm, but you will not make him pay, because payment is utterly impossible. In all fairness the minister should cut the rate of interest to 5 per cent; that should be the highest rate.

Mr. ILSLEY: The rate of interest charged by the Canadian farm loan board on first mortgages is 5 per cent, and on second mortgages, I believe, 6 per cent. Something depends on risk when one is trying to ascertain what is the appropriate rate of interest. This section merely provides that a person can get his interest on an existing mortgage down to 5 per cent if he is in a position to tender the mortgagee the value of the mortgage.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He would have to tender him everything?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Back payments of principal and interest?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. I do not know of any use to which the section has ever been put. I do not know that we would be justified in putting the rate any lower. We might, perhaps, put the penal rate in there; that is what the 4 per cent would be, because it would just be punishing the mortgage company for not releasing a mortgagor when he is tendering the principal and interest.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You could bring it down to 5 per cent without any penal provision.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, 5 per cent is the rate in the section. It is the rate of interest charged by the government itself—the Canadian farm loan board. Answering the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I do not think there is any necessity of changing the terms of the section. The hon. members for Weyburn and Bow River have raised another point, as to whether we should give a statutory direction here to judges that they would have to reduce the rate of interest to 5 per cent on mortgages in all cases before them. As a matter of fact, in practice the boards of review in Alberta and Saskatchewan, I believe, have been pretty generally reducing the rate of interest to 5 per cent in the case of applications to them. I think that is the case in Saskatchewan, and it was the case in Alberta; perhaps it is now.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Why should not this conform with that practice?

Mr. ILSLEY: This does not give them any direction one way or the other; neither did the other legislation give them any direction one way or the other. The theory of the legislation is that they will do what is appropriate to the individual case. However, the boards in Saskatchewan did take the view that in no case should anyone who could qualify for an adjustment pay more than five per cent. In many cases they did not think they could qualify for an adjustment, they were not entitled to any relief, they could carry their existing obligations without much trouble; in those cases I do not think they granted any relief. But where a case was made for not being able to meet their obligations and a board did make an adjustment of interest, they adjusted it down to five per cent. I think it is a matter for the tribunal, rather than for a statutory direction. I am afraid that a statutory direction would be too rigid. Maybe the proposal went farther; maybe it was that all interest on farm mortgages should be reduced to five per cent. That is a matter of amendment to the Interest Act, and very large considerations are involved. I do not think we should take that up now; I do not believe it really belongs in this measure.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But the dominion government is the proper authority to state what the rate of interest should be.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, we have jurisdiction over interest.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And it would relieve the judges of that responsibility if we definitely stated in the act that the rate of interest on mortgages should be five per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: What about the rate of interest on second mortgages; should it be higher?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That would depend on the circumstances. I hardly thnk it should be higher, but we are speaking of first mortgages in regard to this legislation, and there is no question that it is the responsibility of the dominion government to state what the rate of interest shall be. I believe in this case we should accept that responsibility and relieve the courts of the necessity of deciding on that fact.

Mr. LECLERC: Can the minister tell us how much money the farm loan board has made or lost in the prairie provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry I have not the records of the Canadian farm loan board here, but in any case we are not dealing with the farm loan board in this legislation. I can tell the hon. gentleman, and I want to place this on record, the amounts by which secured debts have been reduced, and the amounts by which unsecured debts have been reduced, in each of the years of operation of the act. It is quite a table. This was asked for last night by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and with the consent of the committee I will place it on Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: By leave of the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. ILSLEY: The table is as follows:

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the minister say just what objection he would have to doing away with this long involved statement in section 43 and simply saying, "in all compositions filed there shall be no interest rate charged higher than five per cent"?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is a matter that should be left to the courts. A big cut in the principal might mean the rate of interest should be higher than five per cent. If the courts wished to evade that provision they could do so; they could leave the principal high and make the interest low, or they could make the interest high and the principal low. It would not accomplish a great deal, and this is a case in which the court should do what is appropriate to the individual case. I think that as a general rule in cases that qualify they do make it five per cent. People feel better about five per cent, no matter what is done about the principal. The security differs; some are first mortgages and others are second mortgages and I do not think it would be quite appropriate to say that the rate of interest should be the same on anything regardless of the risk assumed by the creditor.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was not suggesting that the rate should be the same in all cases; I was suggesting that we should say the rate should not exceed five per cent, and there would be no objection if the rate were made four per cent in some cases. There should be some limit, because undoubtedly the difficulty will not be merely the matter of adjusting these debts. In the years that lie ahead, when the farmers are trying to meet the terms and obligations set out in these compositions, if the rate of interest is too high it will not be possible for them to do so, and as a result this parliament will be required to pass another act of this kind perhaps five years hence, or a great many of these farmers will be in bankruptcy.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not mean very much to lay down a rule about one feature of the settlement. I think we have either to leave it all to the courts or not deal with it at all, and the scheme of the act is to leave it to the courts and let them do what is appropriate in the individual cases.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister has already stated one principle, when he dealt with the seven per cent provision.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that does not apply to anything in the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I do not know why it is in here, except that it was in the old act and it has been carried into this act. This provides that if anyone, in any part of Canada, whether or not he has availed himself of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, tenders to the holder of the mortgage the full amount due the mortgagee, if the rate of interest on the mortgage exceeds seven per cent, after the tender of that amount the mortgagee cannot charge more than five per cent. That is all the section says. It is to enable mortgagors who are unfortunate enough to have mortgages on property with a very high rate of interest to get out of paying the high rate of interest if they can raise the money somewhere else.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does this apply to persons others than those coming under the act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There is a confusion of thought or language here. This is in the act, but it applies to others than those coming under the other provisions of the act.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Last night it was proposed that the provisions of paragraph (h) be broadened to include ranchers. I now propose that paragraph (h) of section 2 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

(h) "farmer" means a person whose principal occupation consists in farming, which term includes stockraising, dairying and the tillage of the soil.

I think probably that is all right.

Mr. MULOCK: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: The old Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act of 1934 contained a preamble, and I think this bill should contain a preamble also. Therefore I propose that the following preamble be added to Bill No. 132, and I would invite the careful attention of hon. members of the committee to this because I think it exactly describes the intentions and purposes of the bill. If anyone has any other views I should like to have them:

Whereas in view of the depressed state of agriculture in the three prairie provinces during the period immediately following 1929 the present indebtedness of certain farmers in that area is beyond their capacity to pay: and

Whereas it is in the national interest to retain such farmers on the land as efficient producers and for such purpose it is necessary to provide means whereby compromises or rearrangements may be effected of debts of such farmers, and also to simplify the operation of the Bankruptcy Act with respect to farmers generally.

Mr. MULOCK: I move accordingly.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that expresses the purpose and intent of the act, and I believe it should be in there if for nothing more than the guidance of the courts, to a certain extent. I find that the New Zealand act has a long section indicating the general purposes of the act and I think it is a mistake to leave this out.

Mr. SHAW: Is the preamble included when these bills become statutes? Is not the preamble dropped when they are bound? What is the value of a preamble; does it have any value to the bill itself?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is some guide to interpretation. It is published in the statutes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I understand that when the court is interpreting an act it does not consider the preamble.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it does consider the preamble.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the New Zealand act deal only with insolvent farmers?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It takes in others as well?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is a very basic difference, I would point out.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the house, but I feel there are one or two things which should be said before the bill is given third reading. In its present form we do not feel this measure will be sufficient to deal effectively with the problems of western Canada. We have spoken at some length on the debate on second reading, and there has been considerable discussion in committee of the whole, on which occasions we have pointed out what we considered to be the main deficiencies. Very briefly I enumerate them:

1. We object to the section which states that two-thirds of the debt of the farmer must have been incurred prior to 1935 in order that the farmer may be in a position to make a proposal. We say that that date should be put forward at least to 1939.

2. We object to the sections which fail to provide legal counsel for farmers when they come before the courts, or when they make appeals.

3. We object to the bill on the ground that it fails to treat farm debts as a recurring problem.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The western debt conference represented not only the three provincial governments in western Canada, but represented also the majority of farm organizations in the west. By no stretch of the imagination can it be said that the western debt conference dealt with this subject as a political football. I would ask the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards) if he would suggest that the premier of Saskatchewan, or the Liberal government in that province, dealt with this matter as a political football. I would ask him whether the premier of Manitoba dealt with it as a political football. And if neither of those two did, then I think we must agree that the premier of Alberta did not deal with it in that way.

As a result of the deliberations of that conference a bill was submitted to the federal government on March 15 of this year. It is our submission that that bill deals far more effectively with western debt problems than does the one before the house. It has been suggested that if this bill were brought in line with the one suggested by the conference there might be some opposition in another place. I would ask this: Why should we allow any archaic body to set aside the will of the representatives of the people of Canada?

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) I move in amendment:

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole, with instructions that they have power to amend it in such respects as will make it conform with the terms of the proposed "Act to Provide for the Adjustment and Settlement of the Debts of Farmers" submitted by the western debt conference to the dominion government on March 15, 1943.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it necessary for me to debate at length the details set out in the amendment. The objections stated by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) cover my objections also, and therefore I am pleased to second the amendment.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out the following features of the amendment, which I have not seen until this moment. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) takes three objections to the bill. The first is that it should not be confined to those, two-thirds of whose debts were incurred before May 1, 1935. The second objection is that the date should be January 1, 1939. That is really one point, namely that the date should be moved from May 1, 1935 to January 1, 1939.

As I said in the debate, I believe the present provisions of the bill will provide for the overwhelming bulk of the cases. I believe experience will show that in that respect I am right. I do not anticipate that there will be any rush to the courts by the farmers of western Canada, under present conditions, to avail themselves of the provisions of the bill. I believe that those cases in respect of which relief is really required will be embraced within the provisions of the bill, which confines such relief to those, two-thirds of whose debts were incurred before May 1, 1935.

I would point out, however, that even if some person who should have relief cannot come under that provision, he has the protection of the order in council. I believe the situation is such that we can see what the experience is under the bill as at present drafted. That really is one objection, that the date should be moved from May, 1935, to January 1, 1939. I have nothing further to say as to the reasons why I prefer to retain the date of May 1, 1935.

The second point, which was described as the third point by the hon. member, is that the bill fails to recognize the problem of debt as a recurring problem. That is inconsistent with the hon. member's first point, because it really means that there should not be any date at all, and that debts, whenever they are incurred, should be taken into account in qualifying an applicant for eligibility for relief. There is an inconsistency in those two positions. I suggest the hon. member should have put his case in this form: "I urge point No. 2; but if that cannot be done, then in the alternative I urge point No. 1." That is the only way in which the hon. member could make his contention consistent.

In regard to point No. 2, namely, that the debt problem should be regarded as a recurring one, several times in the course of the debate I have stated the reasons why I do not think this parliament should adopt the principle that debts, past, present and future, should be reducible by tribunals without applicants being under any obligation to divest themselves of their assets. I have pointed out that that is not the case with regard to the other provinces. It is not so with respect to any other class of Canadians, nor does it apply in any other country, so far as I have been able to ascertain.

That was not the principle of the debt adjustment act of the western provinces and it was not the principle of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. It would be a very serious principle to adopt. If we were to adopt that principle for western Canada, we certainly should adopt it for eastern Canada. There is no reason in the world for making that a sectional feature of our legislation. There is reason for making the present legislation sectional because it recognizes a prairie farm emergency which has passed, but the results of which have not been obviated.

If we are to lay down the principle that when the farmers of Canada borrow money they are not obliged to pay it back, even though they have security out of which to pay it back—if some court or tribunal says that they do not have to pay it back—if we are to lay down that principle, it must be a universal principle applicable all over Canada. If it is applicable to farmers, I think there are other occupations to which it should be applicable. It would be a serious step for this parliament to take.

Summing up the hon. gentleman's argument for his amendment, the only consistent way in which he could put it is that we should treat debt as a recurring problem. I have stated the objections to that, and I think they are serious. He could even have gone on and said, "I think your date is wrong, it should have been January 1, 1939, instead of May 1, 1935." That is a matter of judgment, but I think experience will show that the legislation as drafted reasonably meets the situation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has made no reference to the fact that the amendment may increase the expenditure. If any hon. member wishes to speak to the question of the relevancy of the amendment, I should like to have his opinion before I rule.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think it is out of order on two counts. First, it makes an alternative suggestion which has no reference at all to the basic principles of the bill. It is an entirely new act that is being placed before the house; it is sending something indefinite back to the committee of the whole. In the second place, it may or may not involve additional expenditures, and if it does it would be out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I agree with the Minister of Pensions and National Health. It will be found in the third edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 506, that I gave a ruling on August 3, 1940, to a similar amendment to a bill of a like nature. I quote:

> The Bill No. 118, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, was again considered in committee of the whole and reported with amendments.
> Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) then moved,—That the said bill be now read the third time.

Mr. Douglas (Weyburn), seconded by Mr. Coldwell, moved in amendment,—That the said bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power to amend it by adding a provision that the wheat board shall make an advance payment to the farmer in respect to that portion of his wheat crop which he is required to store on his farm.

Mr. Speaker ruled the amendment out of order as its effect would be to change the principle adopted on the second reading of the bill and it requires a payment by the government which an honourable member has no right to propose.

In this case the amendment does change the principle adopted on the second reading, and it may require additional revenue to be provided by the government. Citation 551 of the second edition of Beauchesne provides:

It is a fundamental principle that no resolution or amendment to increase a charge upon the people can be moved with the Speaker in the Chair; it must be initiated in committee by a minister acting on behalf of the crown.

First, the amendment changes the basic principle of the bill as it passed this house on the second reading and, second, it implies that it may cause an increase in expenditures by the government which must be moved by a minister of the crown on the recommendation of the governor general. Therefore I rule the amendment out of order.

Motion (Mr. Ilsley) agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL PHYSICAL FITNESS ACT

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNCIL FOR THE PROMOTION OF PHYSICAL FITNESS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to provide for the promotion of the physical fitness of the people of Canada, the constitution of a national council on physical fitness to carry out such purpose, the establishment of a special account in the consolidated revenue fund out of moneys appropriated by parliament and the disbursement from such account of moneys required for the purposes of the act, including grants to the provinces under agreements that may be entered into.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think perhaps that this is as appropriate a time as any for the minister to make a detailed statement with respect to the provisions and objects of the legislation to be founded upon this resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be pleased to make a brief introduction by way of explaining this resolution, which is antecedent to a bill which has been on the Votes and Proceedings in the possession of hon. gentlemen for several days. The bill is printed and ready for distribution. This legislation is based upon a recommendation by the select committee on social security which was submitted to the house a few days ago. It is the result of careful consideration by that committee. Excellent evidence was given before the committee by gentlemen from the universities of McGill, Toronto and McMaster, and also by one gentleman who is interested in this work in a practical way in British Columbia.

Hon. gentlemen will recall that before the war there was a pronounced movement on the European continent in favour of such measures. Czechoslovakia and the Scandinavian countries had national fitness programmes. This matter was brought forward by the League of Nations in 1936, and in 1937 the British government sent an official commission to Europe to investigate the various systems in effect. In 1937 the health committee of the League of Nations sent representations to the various members of the league asking that they set up national bodies to deal with physical fitness. Those representations were duly conveyed at that time to the government of Canada, but no action was taken before the war. Schemes such as this are in effect in Australia, and to a certain extent in Great Britain and the United States of America.

The proposal in the bill, which follows the resolution, is to establish a national council of physical fitness. The grant proposed to the provinces is $225,000 on a fifty-fifty basis, and $25,000 for national administration. It is proposed that each province shall have a member on the council of physical fitness, and the national director will be the only paid official. The others will be entitled to their expenses when attending meetings dealing with the programme. The programme is not one of compulsion or coercion in the slightest degree; it is one of cooperation. In the first place there will be cooperation with other departments of government. The Department of Labour is now carrying on vocational training and has a recreational scheme under its selective service wing. There will also be cooperation with the provincial governments and with voluntary agencies and individuals who are carrying out work along these lines.

It is apparent to everyone that in the last two or three years in particular we have had brought home to us the fact that the standard of physical fitness among our people has not been as high as we should have liked it to be. The figures with regard to enlistments have brought that fact strongly home to us. Voluntary organizations have been doing wonderful work in Canada in recent years along these lines. Some of the provinces have been doing work on their own, especially the two farthest west provinces, Alberta and British Columbia. As I say, these provinces have been giving consideration to this problem.

It is not a very comprehensive measure but at least it is a beginning; perhaps tall oaks may from little acorns grow. The legislation is non-contentious and non-controversial and has had wonderful support in the committee on social security. I hope that it will receive the same support from hon. members in the house.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the scope of the motion of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is a most commendable one. But to carry it out efficiently is another matter. In Canada we are naturally a hardy people, but the war has brought to light great defects in our physical education and our educational system generally. The resolution means that Canada at last will now have to embark on a system of national education concurrently with the provinces. National education goes back to the days of Thomas Arnold in 1840, when a great campaign for a revival of learning was conducted by this authority on education. He believed that book learning came last and that what came first was love of country, service and sacrifice to one's fellows, patriotism and the protection of one's country, and that Christian principles and physical fitness were second. He, as I said, placed religious and moral principles first, gentlemanly conduct and patriotism second, and intellectual ability last.

There has been a great change in thought of the people of the British empire as a result of the war. The war brought to light that a large number of our young people were not physically fit; it showed the need of a national movement to promote physical fitness among men, women and children, and our whole system of education from elementary schools to the universities seemed to have been lacking and deficient.

I think this resolution would be better if it provided that grants should be made to the municipalities instead of to the provinces. The money in turn could be distributed among boards of education, public and separate schools, primary and secondary schools and the universities. Some provinces have a different system of distribution from others, so that I think it would be better to make the grants directly to the municipalities. But certainly the physical fitness movement should be national in scope. Everybody is familiar with the sight of several hundreds of spectators watching a small group of players in some particular sport, but the universities have changed all that and established an extra-mural curriculum under which every student will have to take some compulsory training in physical exercises and sport. The result is that at McGill and Toronto universities ninety-nine per cent of the students will now be taking compulsory physical exercises and taking part in extra-mural sports, the only exceptions being those who are excused on a doctor's certificate.

I think this department should also promote, foster and encourage all kinds of sport. We have had no national policy on sports since the war began, no well thought-out plan in relation to the war. We are now entering the fifth year of the war, and the government should, before parliament adjourns, issue a considered statement in relation to the function of sport in view of the new rules and regulations of national selective service and the further reduction in railway travel for non-essential purposes. Such a statement should cover amateur sport, to which we owe so much in this war, as shown by the great numbers of amateur sportsmen who have enlisted and gone overseas, some of whom have been killed. It should also cover professional sport; the joint military forces schedules of sport contests, and their military leagues, and the wide travelling of some from coast to coast that is involved; also national civilian and military contests of all kinds. Will anything be done in war time to reduce the cost of tickets to some of these contests and scheduled games? I believe in the promotion of sport and should like to see it made a part of this important resolution. Canada has excelled in this war, as it did in the last, largely through sportsmanship of all kinds and branches. Our young people rushed to the colours, and the first to go were those who had had cadet training and the best of those who had engaged in all sport. It was a retrograde step to abolish cadet training. Then there were those who enlisted early in the war who had taken part in sports and all kinds of games. I have been a warm supporter of sports, but now that we are in the fifth year of the war there should be a national statement from the government to clear the air as to what shall be done to finish the war and then what shall be done afterwards.

True it is that the secondary schools have promoted physical fitness by physical exercises and sports and games. They have coaches in every branch of sport who give their time free and their money and lend their cars for this purpose, teaching the young people how to play up and play the game, how to play for the love of the game and develop the team spirit. What has been done in the primary and secondary schools of this country and universities and by sports clubs in the last ten or fifteen years has been most commendable, and I hope the minister will not be unmindful of the very important work that has been done along these lines by the secondary schools, by the public and separate schools and private schools and universities. I am a warm supporter of amateur sport, which should be continued throughout the war. As to professional sport, professional baseball is played mostly by Americans, but the Toronto team has given splendid leadership in the Toronto district. The work of the Toronto baseball club has been most commendable. They admit soldiers free to all the games. Our football, hockey and other teams have also done excellent service at home and overseas in the war, and should be continued in the usual way. Some small abuses have crept in; for instance, those in some of the forces are transported from Vancouver to Halifax to play in possibly only one game. The government promised a statement on this matter of national sport in relation to the war long ago, and I hope they will look into the whole question. I believe the people of Canada will support the government in continuing sport for sport's sake during the war.

Some people say we are fighting this war for two purposes: One is to defend Christianity, and they do not tell the youth of the country what Christianity is; and the second is to protect the British empire, without telling you what the British empire is and what it has meant down the ages. The teachers in our schools are excellent, but rules and regulations hamper them.

We have always been fond of games, and I hope there will be a united effort from coast to coast to make this national physical fitness campaign a success. The medical profession has urged it for years. Physical fitness has always on a large scale been an important part of the work of secondary schools and universities, and of our community clubs. A school should not be judged by examinations only in studies, but by patriotism and service for others.

As I said before, I think the funds, instead of being distributed to the provinces, should go to the municipalities and boards of education, urban and suburban. It is well known that there has been a heavy burden on the taxpayers for education. The tax rate in the city I come from is high. We have a tax burden of $12,000,000 a year now, and in this work the municipalities should receive some federal assistance. After all is said and done, one of the mistakes of the fathers of confederation was not to give the dominion and the provinces concurrent jurisdiction in the matter of education. The result has been that medicine, science and all these other things that are so essential to physical fitness have had little or no support from the federal government, with the awful cost to our man-power in the war.

I commend the minister generally and I hope that before this part of the session is over, there will be some statement regarding national sport, along the lines I have suggested, to clear the air for the remainder of the war and after it.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have no desire to take up much of the time of the house at this stage of the resolution, but I believe that the people of Canada generally will agree with the objects that lie behind it. As to the means by which they are to be achieved, that may be another matter. In any event, that will be made apparent at a later stage when we are discussing the bill.

The minister referred to physical fitness as disclosed by the examinations that took place as men and women entered the various armed services of the country. That was a revealing bit of statistics and one which no doubt had a considerable bearing and influence upon the committee that dealt with this particular subject. The fact that the social security committee largely agreed with, and perhaps were unanimous in bringing in, such a bill indicates I believe the necessity for parliament keeping abreast of public sentiment on health matters generally.

Most of us who have observed public movements in this field know that the people are conscious of health measures, and we know that this movement has been considerably accelerated in recent years. One only needs to note that there are large numbers of people in Canada to-day who are reading those columns that discuss the health of the individual. In addition to that the insurance companies, who are of course interested in rates of mortality, have taken it upon themselves, in their several private capacities, to acquaint the public with certain important features of public health. All these matters have received the conscious consideration of the public and what we have before us is a logical move in the direction of certain definite ends which the public has in mind.

One of the things which of course this government as well as the country will have to take into earnest consideration is that part and parcel of any physical fitness scheme is the question of nutrition, in which both the minister and his department are interested, and that involves the question of the means by which our citizens of all classes shall have the right in the years to come to a sufficient income with which to purchase the proper kinds of food in order that their health may be preserved. I do not think that this resolution should pass without some reference being made to that particular point, because I am convinced that some at least of our difficulties come to us from those days when the country was not as affluent as it is at the present time. In my part of the country I had a good deal of experience with men and women who found it necessary to go on relief. Those are days which none of us want to see again.

I would emphasize that hand in hand with any solution that is proposed for the whole problem of physical fitness is the corollary of full employment and a full pay envelope. Without that, it seems to me that all our physical fitness programmes will fail of their effect. If that is not seen to, I am afraid for the success of any programme the government contemplates. We as a nation must find a way to succeed so that we shall never see again a condition in which our citizens are deprived of the means with which to obtain proper food and all the other factors that enter into what constitutes physical fitness.

I bring that to the attention of the minister because I appreciate that no programme, no matter how good it may be on paper, no matter how much the government may wish for its success, can succeed in the future unless the people are able to get the necessary food and to pay for it. They must be able to maintain that standard of living which all of us would like to see them have. But there is another reason why a measure such as this should be introduced. The question of physical fitness suggests the question of relief or the dole, and we all know that the mental very often controls the physical; because men and women who find themselves in conditions that make for despair cannot be physically fit. I therefore make this plea to the government in the hope that in the days ahead of us we shall not only plan for a programme such as that which the minister now envisages in this resolution, but shall make it possible to provide the means whereby such a programme can be properly carried out. Without those means I do not think that success can be attained.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): I must congratulate the committee upon the work they have done and the minister upon the services he has rendered the country. In my opinion a great deal can be done by way of radio and the opera. A great deal can be done by following the guide which the insurance companies give in the requirements they lay down for their policyholders. There is very little that can be done through the administration of drugs. We shall never revolutionize the world by administering drugs, and I may say that one thing I have always tried to avoid if possible is giving people medicine. The great thing is to give them the proper foods. We should think of drugs as a specialized kind of food which the patient needs at a particular time. Do not draw a line of demarcation between foods and drugs, but give the patient what is necessary for his health, of whatever type it may be, call it drug or food. It can easily be worked out by the doctor in charge.

I like what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) said in regard to finance, but I would point out that the people in this country who have sturdy constitutions are not those who were raised on high finance. There is a saying, blessed is the man who has tasted poverty in his youth. I think that is very true, and I would be sorry to see our young people getting any more money than they have. Instead of raising standards of living, if that means simply giving them more money, we should lower the standards. Think of the people who have died in various towns. The great majority of them have not passed on as a result of Marasmus. Many of them are fellows who could hardly get into their seats; they are the ones who sacrificed themselves on the altars of Bacchus or Vulcan. They are the ones who have disappeared.

The work of the committee should be guided largely by the method of living instead of placing too much emphasis upon giving drugs. If methods of living are guided the nation's health will be greatly benefited.

I appreciate very much the work which the minister is carrying on. We expect great things from this social legislation programme.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): For years this group has pointed out the need for some such measure as is introduced by this resolution, and it is greatly to be regretted that a few years ago the nation's health was not deemed worthy of action of this kind. It is disgraceful that there had to be a war to bring out the records of the standards of Canada's health. That health standards were low was generally known, but something prevented action. The excuse that it was a provincial matter and that there were provincial departments of health to look after it is now proved to be an empty one. We cannot but think how much good would have been done if in 1930 an expenditure had been undertaken to help Canada in those years of stress.

I am sure the minister will receive with regard to this measure the cooperation which he has asked of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group. What he is proposing is very much in line with the policy we have advocated since the inception of our party. It is to be hoped that this programme will be enlarged, that it is but the beginning of something greater and better. I am sure the minister will find that people throughout the dominion will gladly cooperate with him for the estimable ends at which the resolution aims.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Anyone who wishes to see Canada a great nation cannot help but support the principle and the ideas involved in the legislation contemplated by this resolution. It is a self-evident fact that a great nation must be a healthy nation, and I agree entirely with all those who have expressed the sentiment that legislation of this kind is long overdue. But I also agree with those who have suggested that the question of health is not merely a matter of dealing with the physical deficiencies which exist, but as is the case with all problems which are considered in this house or elsewhere, it resolves itself down in its final essence to where we always arrive at—the question, what are we to use for money? That is the point I wish to leave with the house in the consideration of this question.

I do not think governments need to point out to individuals the necessity of raising their standard of living and improving their standard of health; these things occur naturally to individuals; and if circumstances are such that they can avail themselves of what is needed to raise their standard of living to what it ought to be, the people will do so. A question which has always arisen before the war is, what are we to use for money? I wish to point out to the house that until every party represented here tackles the question of money, it is idle to talk about solving any problems. When the war is over we shall have a tremendous debt to take care of. The interest on the war debt alone will probably amount to a sum equivalent to what the government was spending for all national services; and if the people are to be expected to pay interest on a debt which I consider is unreal and fictitious and take care of all the other debts which have arisen and endeavour to solve all their problems by means of the monetary policy which was in vogue prior to the outbreak of war, these problems will be absolutely impossible of solution.

Therefore, on behalf of the Social Credit party, I wish to say that we are not only in sympathy with and have always advocated the highest possible standard of living that was physically possible in this country, but have invariably accompanied our policies with concrete proposals as to how to bring this about. I am not going to enter at the present time into a discussion of monetary policy, but I wish simply to suggest that, unless that problem is tackled, we may as well forget about trying to raise the standard of living and promote health. Solve the money problem, and all other problems will automatically take care of themselves.

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): I suggest that if we wish to promote the physical fitness of the Canadian people, members of parliament might in the first place set the example. I know it is easier to teach twenty persons what is good to be done than to be one of the twenty to follow our own instructions. But my first suggestion is this, that we install in this house a proper air-conditioning system, and, in the next place, install a proper ventilating system.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is for the Department of Public Works.

Mr. HAZEN: If we get along that far, we shall have made some progress in the physical fitness of the people of this country, and then, with that example before us, we may proceed somewhat farther. We might, in fact, take steps to have the ventilating system in our various committee rooms greatly improved.

I might make other suggestions, but I do not wish to take up the time of the house now, and I think, with these brief observations, I shall let the matter stand as it is.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member has made a good contribution, at that.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver Centre) agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 138, to establish a national council on physical fitness.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre) moved that the bill be read the second time.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before the bill is read the second time, I should like to ask the minister if it has been distributed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In the first place it was in Votes and Proceedings, No. 110, as a result of the report of the committee. Then it was printed two or three days ago, and should have been distributed by now.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not on our files.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was also going to raise an objection to giving second reading to a bill which has not been distributed, but I must confess that I thought there was a little distinction in this case, because the bill did appear in Votes and Proceedings, and I thought perhaps that was sufficient notice to most hon. members.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the government given consideration as yet to the appointment of a national director and, if so, has it come to any decision?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; as yet not the slightest consideration has been given any particular appointment.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the government any special factors in mind in connection with an appointment of this kind?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The most pressing desire would be to get the best qualified man we can find in the Dominion of Canada. There are some very fine specialists in this field, some attached to universities and others in other capacities, who have devoted most of their lives to the study of physical training and physical fitness in all its aspects.

Mr. GILLIS: What will be the qualifications necessary; will he have to be a medical man?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, not at all.

Mr. GILLIS: A specialist in physical culture?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister explain where the provinces come into this scheme, if they do come into it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The basis of the bill is cooperation with the provinces, and a contribution by the provinces of fifty per cent of the total. The federal government makes available $225,000 for distribution to the provinces and $25,000 for the central direction of the scheme; that is, for the expenses of the director and his staff. This money will be allotted to the provinces on the basis of population, with the idea that they will contribute fifty per cent of the total cost. The administration will be left largely with the provinces, in some of which there are now excellent schemes under way. This is intended rather by way of guidance and assistance to the provinces in carrying out these schemes.

Mr. STIRLING: Have the nine provinces indicated their willingness to work in with the scheme as it is laid out here?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): About nine months ago, I think, we had a conference with the various provincial ministers of health, and none of them said his province would not come in. My recollection is that six or seven of them indicated their definite willingness to participate. At that time the scheme was in a fairly rough state; the bill was not in its final state as it is now.

Mr. STIRLING: None of the provinces has taken legislative action as yet?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not so far.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Constitution of council.

Mr. GRAYDON: With respect to this council of not less than three and not more than ten members, which is to be appointed by the governor in council, will these appointments be made for geographical reasons, or on the straight basis of qualification, or how will this number be made up?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On a geographical basis, one from each province, nominated by the province. The advisory council will be nominated by the provinces and the director will be named by us.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it fair to suggest to the minister, even in these non-partisan days, that the matter of political parties should not be specially considered when appointments are being made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think any of the provinces would make recommendations on that basis.

Mr. GRAYDON: This legislation calls for anywhere from three to ten members of the council, which would indicate that perhaps all the provinces may not have representation. How will the minister create the necessary machinery?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It would be quite possible that not all the provinces would come in at the start; we might have six or seven of them come in. I cannot say as yet, until they are approached in regard to the actual bill. However, my hon. friend may rest assured that the representation will be as fair as possible, and that if all the provinces come in they will all be represented on the council.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the maximum number of ten include the national director, or will it be exclusive of him?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Inclusive, I understand.

Mr. CHURCH: Would it not be far better to have the bill lay down a standard form under which provinces or municipalities could get aid from this fund, instead of setting up a cumbersome department here in Ottawa to duplicate the work done by the provinces, the municipalities, the boards of education, the universities and so on? Would it not be far better for the government to lay down a standard rule under which these grants would be made available, with a federal council administering the regulations and meeting once in a while? I think it would be far better if the funds were handled in that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If the hon. member looks at section 7, he will see that it provides:

> Where a province establishes an organization for the purpose of cooperating with the council in carrying out the provisions of this act. . . .

While standards will be set up, it will not be done by way of compulsion but by way of coordination and cooperation, and the provinces themselves will establish these organizations. We have had offers of cooperation from hundreds of organizations all across Canada, of which I might mention a few: the Canadian physical education society, Montreal; the Quebec physical education society; the New Brunswick physical education society; the Manitoba physical education society; the British Columbia physical education society; the Canadian youth hostel association; the national council, Y.M.C.A., Toronto; the national council, Y.W.C.A., Toronto; the Canadian camping association; the Greater Winnipeg association of physical education, and very many others in Toronto, Hamilton, and many other districts across Canada.

[Mr. Graydon.]

On section 4—Duties and powers of council.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am just wondering in what ways, other than the granting of money, the council can assist in promoting the physical fitness of the people of Canada, as outlined in this bill. Possibly this is not the section on which I should refer to financial assistance, itself. But I would point out that $225,000, if divided equally among nine provinces, would give only $25,000 to each one. If it is divided on a per capita basis, the province with the smaller population would receive very little indeed. I am just wondering what the council will be able to do in the promotion of physical fitness in, say, a province like British Columbia, with the small amount of money which would be available for that province. Has the minister any note as to the amount to which British Columbia would be entitled?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The essential function of the national council would be to give guidance and direction, and as far as possible to have a uniform programme. There would not be any definite emphasis laid upon that.

Then, in regard to the amount of money, it was felt that this was at least a beginning. Australia voted £20,000. For a beginning this will at least enable us to see how fruitful the field may be. Of course, while more money could be expended, it is better to have the scheme in operation, so that we may take note of its possible weaknesses and strengths before we embark upon a more comprehensive programme.

Mr. MacNICOL: I note that section 4 (a) refers to assisting in the extension of physical education in primary and secondary schools. Would the provinces have to give their consent?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is taken for granted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then, paragraph (d) refers to the organizing of activities designed to promote physical fitness. Would there be a special school established somewhere, for the special purpose of training teachers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under whose direction would the school be?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Under the provincial authority. Any organization carrying out this work in the province would be under the direction of provincial authorities. Our function is to coordinate and cooperate as much as we can.

Mr. MacNICOL: Each province would establish its own schools?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then, under paragraph (e) there is a provision for cooperation in the amelioration of physical defects. I like that paragraph very much. There are many young people throughout Canada who are handicapped on account of physical unfitness. Some suffer from crippling defects and deformities. Would they receive the benefits of this section?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As far as they could be benefited by physical exercise. There are two distinguishing features, the first of which is medical care, and the second, physical exercise. These were pointed out to the committee on social security. It was stated that there were two remedial measures, and those were the two I have indicated. The feature to be applied would have to be decided.

Mr. CHURCH: I notice that in section 4 we find the word "assist". It states:

> It shall be the duty of the council, and it shall have power to promote the physical fitness of the people of Canada and in the performance of such duty and the exercise of such power may
> (a) assist in the extension of physical education in primary and secondary schools. . . .

All that is already done by the schools and clubs. A direct vote would help them more. In addition, any modern parks department has playgrounds, trainers, coaches and all that sort of thing. So have the various aquatic clubs of Canada. I suggest that the council should lay down standard rules by which these various local, provincial and municipal bodies, both public and private, might get grants from this fund to promote physical education of men, women and children on a national standard plan.

In addition to that, this procedure should be correlated and coordinated in industry, with various groups throughout the country which do work along this physical education line. We do not want any more duplication than is necessary, because, after all is said and done, the functions conferred by section 4 are largely provincial, municipal and educational. As I see it, instead of a large organization in Ottawa here with a staff, standard rules should be laid down by which direct aid should be given the provinces, and I hope before we finish this part of the session we shall go into a scheme of physical fitness for the training of the taxpayer, with our heavy federal taxes, for his visit very shortly to the poorhouse and the house of industry.

Mr. GRAYDON: With respect to section 4 (a), which refers to assistance in the extension of physical education, may I ask if this would apply to the ordinary primary and secondary schools, and, if so, whether the school rate would be increased by virtue of any assistance of this kind?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think so. It is purely provincial. The councils or organizations set up by the province may extend certain facilities in existence, or provide new facilities as the needs demand, in order to promote their general physical fitness programme.

Mr. GRAYDON: So that whatever additional cost there might be in connection with a school section would be borne by the province, rather than by the ratepayers in the school section.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It would depend upon the extent of improvements, or the extensions necessary for the purposes of this bill. That would be borne by the province and the dominion.

Mr. GRAYDON: There might conceivably be physical educational facilities which would raise the school rates.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: That being so, I would suggest to the minister that the sooner Ontario adopts the suggestion of the Progressive Conservative party to halve the school costs, the sooner will help be given not only to the federal government but also to that province generally.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would remind the hon. member that this is a non-political bill. Therefore I shall not reply to his suggestion.

Mr. SLAGHT: Having regard to the provisions of section 11, stating that the council shall on or about April 30 in each year, furnish the minister with a report on any activities in council during the last preceding fiscal year, is it not desirable that we should add to that section, or insert an additional section under which the minister would, possibly within fifteen days of the opening of any session of parliament, bring down a report made to him, and perhaps also a report of his own? We find that section frequently in legislation, where administrative matters run over extended periods.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I had foreseen the difficulty mentioned by the hon. member, and with that in mind I have drafted a new section 13, which will be moved at the proper time.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe the minister did not answer my question respecting the allocation of the $225,000. Has that been worked out? And before he answers, might I visualize briefly the work of this committee. I believe there is a tremendous amount of work to be done, and I do not think that directly it will cost the municipal ratepayers in any school district any additional taxation. The moneys allocated by the dominion and the provinces will have to be raised in some way. But even at that, taxpayers generally, through improved health and the better physique of the rising generation, will be getting something for their money. This work has been done on a small scale in Vancouver for a number of years. Anyone who is at all familiar with the work done there will know that it began as an ameliorative programme during the depression, and carried on with very few facilities and very little money, but under capable instructors. The results were really good. I am satisfied that the taxpayers will possibly be getting a more adequate return for their money than they get in respect of many government expenditures.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In a rough way—and these are not official—the division would be something like this:

Nova Scotia	$11,000
New Brunswick	9,000
Quebec	65,000
Ontario	74,000
Manitoba	14,000
Saskatchewan	18,000
Alberta	16,000
British Columbia	16,000
Prince Edward Island	2,000

Mr. MacINNIS: That is, more or less, a division according to population.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Could the normal schools not be included in the provisions of this bill? The normal school is where the teacher is trained who will actually be doing this work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that that would be possible without having it specifically mentioned in the bill.

Section 5 agreed to.

[Mr. Slaght.]

On section 6—Powers respecting contracts generally.

Mr. ADAMSON: One of the things that has impressed me unfavourably about our educational system is that no provision is made in most of our public schools for physical education. Some education along these lines is given in the larger schools; but there are many public schools, and especially schools in our rural areas, without this type of education. Would it be possible under this clause to provide such things as gymnasiums and playing fields? There is a definite lack of space to provide play facilities for the average boy and girl. Even in the rich city of Toronto many children go along without any organized games.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I agree entirely with my hon. friend. It is proposed to have most of those things covered by this legislation.

On section 8—"The national fitness fund."

Mr. ADAMSON: Canada possesses some of the finest national parks in the world—I refer particularly to Banff, Jasper and other parks—but it is practically impossible for the average citizen of small means to visit any of these parks. Is it contemplated that this national fitness fund will make these parks and the great outdoors of Canada more accessible to the average man and woman who cannot afford to pay the prices charged at the Banff Springs hotel or the Jasper park hotel?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There would be no objection to the province taking children to the different parks, as is done in Europe.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Power of minister to refer matters to council for investigation and report.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister any maximum or minimum amount in mind in connection with the salary to be paid to the national director?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We have not given any consideration to that matter, but I shall be glad to have suggestions from my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suppose it will depend upon the man who is obtained?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: That salary would not come out of the $225,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): An amount of $25,000 is provided for administration.

Mr. MacNICOL: He will be paid by the federal government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Sections 11 and 12 agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have a new section to suggest as No. 13.

Mr. MULOCK: I move:

That the following be inserted as section 13 of the bill, and that the subsequent sections be renumbered:

"13. The minister shall, as soon as possible, but not later than three months after the termination of each year ending the thirty-first day of March, submit an annual report to parliament covering the business and affairs of the minister under this act for the twelve months ending on the said thirty-first day of March; and such report shall contain a report of all amounts paid into or credited to the fund and all disbursements therefrom and include the regulations made pursuant to this act."

Motion agreed to.

On section 14—Regulations.

Mr. HAZEN: What kind of regulations will be passed under this bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am sorry to say I have none definitely in mind, but questions will be discussed with the director and there will probably be some developments after consultation with the various provincial councils.

Mr. HAZEN: If we are to have regulations having the force of law that impose penalties, I do not think they should be passed—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They would be purely administrative regulations.

Mr. HAZEN: They should be passed by the members of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They would only be regulations setting certain standards and plans; there would be no regulations imposing penalties, just administrative.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is nothing in the bill with respect to the payment of the men and women who may be engaged in connection with the administration of the measure. I assume that in the absence of anything to the contrary they will be appointed by the civil service commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The director is to be appointed by the governor in council, and any other staff would be appointed by the civil service commission.

Mr. STIRLING: They are to be appointed or employed in the manner authorized by law, according to subsection 10 of section 3.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the civil service.

Mr. GILLIS: As I understand this bill, it merely sets up a national framework into which can be fitted the many organizations working in this field across Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. GILLIS: We are just appropriating the money to set up an administrative machine and these regulations will fit existing organizations into the picture.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is largely the intention.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday July 16, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Justice—

Expenses in connection with the administration of the defence of Canada regulations, $35,000.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lake Centre had asked me for some information concerning Mrs. Mullins, who had been arrested in St. Joseph de Beauce charged with distributing pamphlets which came under regulation 15A of the defence of Canada regulations because they did not bear the printer's name as required by that regulation, I had promised the hon. member that I would have inquiries made, and I have ascertained that Mrs. Mullins and one Mrs. Boucher were distributing pamphlets and that a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at that place reported the matter to the attorney general of Quebec and was instructed by the attorney general of Quebec to procure a search warrant, and having done so, he seized quite a large quantity of these pamphlets bearing no indication of the printer. He thereupon was instructed by the attorney general of Quebec to lay a complaint under regulation 15A, and this was done. The proceedings are under the control of the attorney general of Quebec, as is usual in the administration of justice. These defence of Canada regulations having the force of law are like the provisions of the criminal code in that complaints can be made by any individual. Here the complaint was made on the declaration of the representative of the attorney general of Quebec that this would be handled as an ordinary matter of violation of law. I have not had any subsequent information as to what has been the result of these proceedings. I assume that they are still before the court.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask whether both parties mentioned by the minister are still in custody?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know. The information I had was that both had been taken into custody, and when the report was made to me they had not yet been released on bail. I do not know what has taken place since this report.

Mr. STIRLING: How long ago were they taken into custody?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The investigation commenced on the 2nd of July and the report was sent in on the 9th of July, reporting that a search warrant had been obtained and executed and a charge laid against these two ladies and that they had been apprehended on that charge. The first report was probably made immediately afterwards, but I should not like to be positive as to that. That is the usual procedure. The report bears the date of July 9, 1943.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I cannot allow this item to be passed without some further explanation. This is a serious matter, that a woman under the circumstances disclosed here should have been taken into custody and not given bail on the charges laid against her, of distributing literature not bearing the name and address of the printer according to the provisions of regulation 15A of the defence of Canada regulations, and, second, for being a member of an illegal organization, namely, Jehovah's Witnesses. When people are arrested at a time when we are at war for the preservation of democratic principles, on the charge of distributing literature that consists of Bible quotations, I feel that something should be done about the matter. If this literature were subversive, I could understand the action taken. But there is no denial of the fact that all that this literature discloses is quotations from the Holy Bible, and the offence charged against these women, for which they may be still in custody and unable to get bail, is that they distributed excerpts from the Bible without having the printer's name endorsed on the pamphlet.

Mr. SLAGHT: Is that not a matter for the local magistrate? I am only asking. The hon. member may know that it is not. But I think the time of the house should not be occupied with matters of bail if they are within the discretion of the local magistrate.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is fundamental that the granting of bail rests with the local magistrate. But the administration of the defence of Canada regulations, when the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are used, rests on parliament and the members of this house.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I suggest to the hon. member that that is not quite correct. The members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are police constables. The administration of justice throughout Canada is the responsibility of the provincial authorities in the various districts in the provinces, and the sworn police constables have duties which are prescribed by statute. Any individual can lay a charge and the hon. member perhaps knows —I am told from the experience of the department that this is so—that when these persons who call themselves Jehovah's Witnesses are prosecuted, they choose to make martyrs of themselves and go to gaol; they will not ask to be released. They prefer to make their cause notorious by the manner in which they submit to the measures adopted against them. They will not apply for the relief that might be accorded them on appeal.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On the particular facts of this case, does the minister not think a summons would have been the proper course to adopt instead of arresting this person and allowing her to remain in gaol on a charge like this?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was a matter for the decision of those who were instituting the proceedings. It might be convenient and suit the ideas of a great many people, and it would suit the ideas of a great many who have written to me in connection with this very case, protesting most vigorously, if the administration of justice were something that was controlled from the Department of Justice and no one else had anything to do with it. But that does not happen to be the British North America Act; and while the British North America Act remains as it is, the Department of Justice cannot have responsibility for the decision of a provincial attorney general or his representative that he will proceed by way of warrant instead of by way of summons.

Mr. SLAGHT: You would soon get complaints if you tried it.

Mr. CHURCH: I want to point out one difficulty in the method of dealing with this item. When the war broke out it was found necessary under the regulations of the War Measures Act to have a committee consider the defence of Canada regulations. Those regulations, after an elaborate study by the present minister's predecessor and his able officials, were considered by a committee of the house. The committee met in the dying days of the first session of the war and agreed upon a long schedule of rules and regulations. Every session the committee has been reconstituted. Last year it met, heard some witnesses and made certain recommendations which have never seen the light of day. Those recommendations of the committee were very important, affecting the liberty of the subject in relation not only to the war but to other matters. For some reason or another they were brought in on the day the house closed, on Friday if I remember rightly, and they have never seen the light of day.

I know a good many Jehovah's Witnesses, not personally, but through letters they have written to me, and I consider that they are perfectly harmless. They believe in religion. I say that when an important committee makes a recommendation the House of Commons has a right to consider it. I hope the Minister of Justice will look into this situation from this point of view. As regards the other regulations, there is a great difference of opinion on the part of the public as to whether they are enforced from a judicial point of view along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre the other day. In some cases these tribunals meet. They meet all over the country, star-chamber tribunals; they report to the minister and announcements are made. I trust that in the recess the minister will review some of these cases and see if some decision cannot be arrived at, so that the public will be informed as to what is going on.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not know that this question was coming up or I would have provided myself with the material I intended to use. I wish to say with all the earnestness I possess that the prosecution and persecution of Jehovah's Witnesses under the defence of Canada regulations is a standing disgrace to this country, to the Department of Justice and to the Canadian people. I have on my files a letter reporting an incident that happened in Montreal at a religious meeting where these people gathered for the purpose of performing the rite of holy communion. The place was raided by ten members of the mounted police. The police were asked to wait until after the service, but they would not. They demanded to see the registration cards of those present. There were three women who did not have their registration cards.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where did this occur?

Mr. MacINNIS: In the city of Montreal. As I say, three women did not have their registration cards and they were taken to the police station. Suppose the police were to go into any gathering or any church in the evening and ask the congregation to show their registration cards; how many would be found in any congregation of, say, one hundred who would have their cards? Suppose such a thing had happened when the Roman Catholic church was holding a celebration on the streets of Ottawa not so long ago. How we would make the welkin ring with protests! Any right that is granted to any one religious organization in the country must be granted to all; otherwise we have no religious freedom in Canada. I do not know; I cannot understand, why there should be this continual persecution of Jehovah's Witnesses, because that is what I call it. They may be a nuisance in certain respects, and if they are a nuisance I imagine there is a law to deal with a public nuisance; but it is certainly not the thing to do to declare these people an illegal organization and to use methods such as are being used against them at the present time. I mentioned the other day that the brief presented to the special committee on the defence of Canada regulations last year by the Department of Justice was the weakest thing I had ever seen. seen.

Mr. MacNICOL: Pertaining to this organization?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. There was not enough material in it on which you could shut up a dog, let alone a human being. I would ask the Minister of Justice to present to the house the reasons why this organization is still declared illegal and why it is persecuted by the mounted police. I said at one time that the attitude of the police of any country was a fair indication of the government of that country. For instance, the metropolitan police of London is quite a different body of men from the gestapo of Germany, and the reason is that the government over the metropolitan police is different from the government in nazi Germany. So that we shall get from the police exactly what the government intends that we should get from them.

Mr. DUPUIS: Can the hon. gentleman say after the dinner recess how many Jehovah's Witnesses there are in the country and how many young men of military age have been exempted on account of their conscientious objection?

Mr. MacINNIS: I have no intention of saying anything of the kind. It has nothing to do with the discussion. It is not germane to it.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the minister a question with reference to what was said this afternoon. I do not know anything about the sect called Jehovah's Witnesses, but I was greatly interested in and amazed at what the hon. member for Lake Centre told the committee, and I would ask the minister if it is the fact that anyone distributing religious pamphlets anywhere in any province can be arrested if the name of the printer is not on the pamphlet. I know nothing about the law as to whether the name of the printer should be on a pamphlet, except that it must be on political pamphlets distributed during an election. I was very much amazed also at what the hon. member for Vancouver East said, when he told about some meeting of these people, at which a religious service was going on, being interrupted by members of the mounted police, who apparently went rather rudely through the meeting taking names and asking those present if they had registration cards with them. I did not know that things like that went on in Canada. I know some folks in my part of Toronto who belong to this sect, and, while I know nothing of the sect itself, I have always recognized them as decent, law-abiding people. I have not heard of any of them committing any offence, and I would be much surprised if they did. So that I feel that in this day, with the sun shining above, and a clear blue sky and stars at night, we have got to a fine pass if people cannot worship as they see fit.

I remember that the last time I was in Scotland I went to the Greyfriars church in Edinburgh to see the spot where my ancestors cut their veins, with others who attended there, and either put a quill or a pen into their veins and signed the Solemn League and Covenant. They, too, were being persecuted in Scotland in those days—I have forgotten by whom, and it does not matter—but they would not stand for it. Nor would I stand for any persecution. I have no fault to find with anyone's religious belief or how he worships. That is none of my business. People can stand on their heads or stand in a corner if they wish; I do not care what they do. I had hoped the time had arrived when people could worship as they liked without any interference. I did not know that anywhere in Canada such things were going on as were reported here this afternoon.

I ask the minister if it is true, as the hon. member for Lake Centre says, that people can be arrested for distributing any kind of religious tract because it does not bear the name of the printer. I should also like to know whether, as the hon. member for Vancouver East has said, a religious service in Montreal was interfered with, and rather rudely so, by the mounted police.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member was not here when these matters were being considered on a previous occasion. I gave then some of the information which had been given to me with reference to this sect of Jehovah's Witnesses; it is recorded in Hansard and I do not think I need repeat it.

With respect to the questions the hon. member has put. First of all, as to the application of defence of Canada regulation 15A, it provides that:

> Every printed newspaper, pamphlet, circular, handbill, dodger, or other like document having reference to or containing any comment on a political, social or religious question, shall bear upon it printed in a conspicuous place and in legible characters the name of an existing natural person. . . .

Now, as to whether that would apply to the kind of material that was being distributed in St. George de Beauce, of course I am not in a position to express any opinion. I believe the hon. member for Lake Centre said that he had a copy of some of the material which was distributed. I am quite sure that this regulation, in the manner in which it is drawn, would not apply to a sheet which would contain nothing more than extracts from the bible; that would not be something which would be within the definition of this article. I thank the hon. member for Lake Centre for having sent over this document. I will not take time to examine it now, and even if I did I would not venture to express here an opinion upon a matter which is at present before the courts. But the regulation as it is exposes anyone who violates it to be proceeded against.

With respect to the second question, there was some report in the newspapers at the time and the matter was carefully investigated. It was found that a meeting was being held, but what kind of meeting was not known to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They went there and requested the persons in attendance to exhibit their registration cards. That is something which is provided for by the national registration regulations.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask at how many meetings in that city a similar request was made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister know of any other case?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Where requests were made to people attending a gathering?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, yes. I cannot speak of Montreal, but I know that in my own city of Quebec there have been such cases. At a meeting some time ago the police attended and asked to check the registration cards. At that time, some months ago, the contention was being made that quite a number of people had not registered. That arose out of the fact that call-ups were being made; apparently quite a number of people in the age groups subject to the proclamation were going about their ordinary occupations without having received any call-up, and an effort was made to see whether the registration regulations had been carried out.

With respect to this meeting, I was informed that at the time the police did not know what kind of meeting it was. As regards the defence of Canada regulations which were passed at the outbreak of war, and particularly in respect of this banning of a certain number of organizations which was made in 1940, there was an amendment passed in February, 1943, in which it was declared that it would not be an offence to attend any meeting the purpose of which was religious worship or instruction. Perhaps I had better give the exact language which was inserted in the regulations:

> No person shall be guilty of an offence against this regulation by reason only of his attending a meeting the sole purpose of which is religious worship or instruction.

As the regulation was previously drawn, it could very well be argued that, with respect to Technocrats, the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, Incorporated, the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, the International Bible Students' Society, and Jehovah's Witnesses, the very fact of attending one of their gatherings where they worship in the form which they think is the proper form would be an offence. So that I recommended and had an amendment made that it would not be an offence for members of these banned organizations to attend the meetings for purposes of religious worship or instruction.

The information I got was that this request for registration cards was made by the police in an orderly fashion and that nothing was done there which would not have been done at any other meeting where an attempt was made to see if those attending it were provided with their national registration certificates.

Mr. MacNICOL: Were those at that meeting who did not happen to have their registration cards with them arrested and taken away?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know what was done, in fact, but they would be liable to be dealt with in that way, just as any member of this house would.

Mr. MacNICOL: I carry mine with me.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have mine, too. That is the provision; whether or not it be a wise provision—

Mr. GRAYDON: This is quite a testimonial meeting in itself.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —it is provided by the regulations that one can be stopped by a peace officer at any time, anywhere, and asked to show his registration card.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe in regulations being adhered to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the regulation. At the time it was made it was necessary. Whether or not it is still necessary may be a matter upon which opinions may vary, but it is still the regulation. With respect to the activities of these Jehovah's Witnesses, the other day I stated that tens of millions of their tracts and pamphlets have been put out from their Watch Tower head office in New York. Their teaching is that all these organized religions are agencies of the devil. They do not call their sect a religion, but they believe the organized religions are agencies to maintain the devil's embrace on the human race. They understand from the bible that it is wrong to go to war, and they are conscientious objectors.

Mr. MacNICOL: They do not vote, either, do they?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know whether they vote, but they will not salute the flag; that, according to them, is an act of idolatry. At the present time—and the same situation is still continuing—they are detrimental to the war morale of this nation. Only this morning the commissioner received a report of a complaint made by Mr. Justice Embury in Regina about the activities of the Jehovah's Witnesses there, who are persuading the young men to go before the boards and claim exemption on the ground that they should not fight because it is wrong and contrary to the teachings of the bible. A declaration at this time which would be construed by them and by the public as a recognition of their legality by this parliament would, in my opinion, be detrimental to the morale of this country.

The administration of the regulations, as I said this afternoon, like the administration of the criminal law can be set in motion by the attorneys-general of the several provinces of Canada, and the Department of Justice cannot hold itself responsible for the form of procedure adopted in the respective provinces. What this parliament could do; what the government of Canada could do, would be to repeal these provisions, and then the provincial authorities could not proceed upon them. But while the provisions are there, we cannot be held responsible for the manner in which the provincial authorities proceed upon them.

After the committee rose for the dinner recess I had the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police communicate with the authorities who had directed the institution of these proceedings against Mrs. Mullins. The information now given me is that she was arrested on the 8th of July; was offered bail on the 9th and refused; was released on her personal recognizance without bail on the 19th, because there was a further adjournment to the 26th for the hearing of her case. The further information was given the commissioner that, as he understood it, the attorney-general was going to file a nolle prosequi on the 26th. That I do not know, but it might very well result from the fact, if it is a fact, that this pamphlet contains nothing but extracts from the Crampon version of the Bible, which is one of the reputed French versions authorized by the Roman Catholic church. It is the one upon which I took my oath of office before his excellency and upon which I took my oath of office before the Clerk of this house, which volumes were fittingly inscribed and which I intend to hand down as precious documents to the members of my family. It may very well be that when the attorney-general saw that there was nothing but extracts from the Crampon version of the Bible he came to the conclusion that his representations had been too hasty. That I cannot affirm; I have not verified that with the authorities themselves, but this is the information the commissioner obtained over the long-distance telephone during the dinner recess.

I understand there was also a charge laid against Mrs. Mullins of being a member of the sect of Jehovah's Witnesses. That is no longer an offence; the sect is banned. At the same time that this other amendment was made I caused this regulation to be amended, because I pointed out that these organizations having been declared illegal, they could not do anything that would have any legal effect; and if before the banning one was a member thereof, there was no way in which he could have legal effect given to his desire to withdraw and cease to be a member. So that the regulation was amended to provide that instead of its being an offence to belong to one of these banned organizations, it would be an offence to act as an officer or member thereof.

Mr. NEILL: What is the number of that order in council?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: P.C. 1266, of February 15, 1943.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister be good enough to read it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Previously the regulation read:

> Every person who is an officer or member of an illegal organization, or professes to be such, or who advocates or defends the acts, principles or policies of such illegal organization shall be guilty of an offence against this regulation.

The amendment changed that to read:

> Every person who acts as an officer or member of an illegal organization or who advocates or defends the acts, principles or policies of such illegal organization shall be guilty of an offence against this regulation.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni will note that we were amending in line with his argument of the other day that intentions should not make one a criminal, that there ought to be acts manifesting participation.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister also give the order in council in regard to having the name printed on documents?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry I cannot give at this moment the original order in council, because it was included in the consolidation of 1942 and is now in existence by virtue of P.C. 8862 of October 13, 1942, but it had been enacted prior to that. I shall get it for the hon. member.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Mr. Chairman, the last time the minister's estimates were before the committee I pointed out that under the defence of Canada regulations he had the power to defend the people of this country from the machinations of the enemy, but that so far as I could see he had in some instances failed to perform his duty. I refer to section 39A of the defence of Canada regulations which states:

> No person shall print, make, publish, issue, have knowingly in his possession in quantity, circulate or distribute any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper, circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication or document of any kind containing any material, report or statement,
> (a) intended or likely to cause disaffection to His Majesty or to interfere with the success of His Majesty's forces or of the forces of any allied or associated powers, or to prejudice His Majesty's relations with foreign powers.

And this is the part I wish to emphasize:

> . . . or to prejudice His Majesty's relations with foreign powers.

A while ago, in one of his great speeches the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Winston Churchill, said:

> Whoever by word of mouth or by written statement attempt to destroy the unity of the united nations, it were better for him that a millstone were hung about his neck, and he were cast into the sea.

From time to time we have had in Canada publications, newspapers, which have published material, articles and statements which, I submit to the minister, would contravene paragraph (a) of section 39A of the regulations in that they prejudice his majesty's relations with foreign powers.

I would refer the minister particularly to several of the editorials which have appeared from time to time in the Evening Telegram of Toronto. I refer specifically to an item published on July 17, a reprint from the Reader's Digest, and headed, "To collaborate successfully we must face the facts about Russia." It is an article by a writer named Max Eastman, and contains the type of material which, in my opinion, will be most difficult for Mr. Wilgress to explain in Moscow. I feel that the relationships between our two nations at present will not stand discriminatory articles of this type, and if the minister were doing his duty he would, under the defence of Canada regulations, prosecute those who fill the minds of the people with trash such as this article undoubtedly is. It contains under one caption a statement which is known to be a direct forgery made by a fascist, and put into the mouth of Mr. Stalin.

I have mentioned the fact that this article is a reprint taken from the Readers' Digest, and printed in the Evening Telegram. There are, no doubt, many people who have a very good opinion of the Reader's Digest. But perhaps it would be just as well to state one or two facts concerning this publication, facts which might not be known to everybody. In the United States right after Pearl Harbor one of the first magazines which was stopped by the United States government from further publication was Scribners' Commentator. This was a magazine which was not allowed to be published any more, on the ground that it was one of the leading fascist publications. It favoured Franco, Hitler and Japan. Its editor was George Egglestone. George Egglestone to-day is a writer for the Reader's Digest. He had an associate editor whose name was Ralph Townsend, who is now in the penitentiary, because he was found to be a Japanese propaganda agent.

Another man named Paul Palmer, who was once editor of the American Mercury magazine, also known before Pearl Harbor to be another pro-fascist magazine, is now senior editor of the Reader's Digest. Yet we have material prepared by editors who are known to be pro-fascist, and that material is republished in Canadian papers. Under the defence of Canada regulations we have the right to prosecute those who deliberately do anything to prejudice his majesty's relations with foreign powers. Nearly all the win-the-war press in the United States have commented on this article by Max Eastman. Even the New York Herald Tribune, a very conservative Republican paper, has taken the Reader's Digest to task for printing this most obnoxious article

On July 1, PM magazine, commenting on the Eastman article, said this:

> Eastman tricks the reader and says that the facts are exactly opposite to what is really the case.

I really cannot understand why the minister has not been made aware of these things, and has not done anything up to this time. As I said before in the house, I was present at that huge rally on June 22 at Maple Leaf Gardens, Toronto. The Prime Minister was there, along with Mr. Fedor Gusev, and many other notable people. The chief speaker of the evening was Mr. Davies, who was recently sent on a second mission to Moscow by President Roosevelt. Just before that great Maple Leaf Gardens meeting Mr. Davies was sent two or three of the anti-soviet editorials which from time to time had been published in the Toronto Telegram. Speaking that evening, he said:

> It is important that we should remember this when we hear German propaganda, which is working artfully in your country and in mine, and all over the world, whispering lies, in their effort to split Russia away from the English-speaking world, and the united nations, and to divorce and destroy the confidence of the English-speaking world in the integrity and good faith of our great Russian ally. And it doesn't excuse anyone, if they circulate these lies and then say they were misinformed. It does the world no good. It's not intelligent. It is not Christian or wise. They should know better and they should not be serving our enemies by circulating these lies.

And he continues:

> Mutual trust, confidence and respect, as between the Soviet Union, Canada and the United States, is of particularly vital consequence to us. That is the simple fact and something we should remember and something some of our responsible citizens should think over.

I would recommend that the Minister of Justice should think over those words, and also that he take cognizance of the article reprinted from the Reader's Digest, which I shall send across the floor of the house to him, for his perusal. I suggest that he should give some statement to the committee regarding whether or not he intends to prosecute.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It seems to me that the Minister of Justice has not made a very good case in reply to the questions which have been asked respecting the particular incident mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I had thought the minister would have had something more tangible to offer with respect to this unfortunate happening. The minister says, first of all, that the meeting was held in Montreal, and that the authorities knew nothing about the fact that it was going to be held.

In the first place, I should hardly imagine it is incumbent upon people holding a meeting, particularly one of this kind, to inform the authorities of their intention to hold it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member must have misunderstood me. I said the information I got was that the police did not know for what purpose this meeting was being held. I did not complain that there had been no notice given to them that a meeting was going to be held.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The fact that the police did not know the purpose for which it was going to be held does not begin to excuse the interruption of the meeting.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, I do not attempt to excuse, nor do I think the police need to be excused for going to any meeting, anywhere, for the purpose of making a check-up on registration cards.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I will ask the minister this question: If the mounted police want to check up on whether persons have their registration cards — and I agree they should do so from time to time — does the minister think a religious service, at which people are joining in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, is a suitable place and time to find out whether they have their registration cards?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not think so; but this meeting was not being held in any building that was recognized as a place of assembly for religious meetings. I would think it would be quite improper for the police to go to any of our churches here in Ottawa that are recognized as churches, that are known to be churches, and attempt to check up during a religious service the possession or otherwise of certificates of registration. But this meeting was not taking place in a hall or church or any building that could be recognized from any exterior sign as being a place of religious worship.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But the fact does remain that various sects and churches have held religious services in places other than religious buildings. As a matter of fact, there are some sects which hold the sacrament in private homes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We used to hold them on the hillsides.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Those of us who are descendants of the covenanters will remember that. If my information is correct, when the mounted police entered the building they were informed that the sacrament was in progress. If they desired to find out who had their registration cards, which was quite a proper procedure, there seems to me to be no reason why they could not have waited until the service was over and checked each person as he came out. That should not have been a difficult thing to do. Instead of that, the service was interrupted. Despite the fact that they were asked to wait until the sacrament had been completed, they refused to do so and insisted upon proceeding with their investigation. I think some two or three women who did not have their cards with them were taken to the police station. That seems to me to be a totally unnecessary thing in a country like ours.

The second thing in the minister's argument which impressed me is the fact that he has not yet, in spite of repeated requests, placed before the house, nor did anyone place before the committee last year which investigated the defence of Canada regulations, any sound reasons why this organization should be banned or declared illegal. The minister said that these people believe that all organized religion is the instrument of the devil. If they believe that—I do not—that does not make them subversive; if they choose to hold that particular theological view, it seems to me that that is their privilege.

Mr. SLAGHT: That was not why they were banned.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am dealing with what the minister said. Then the minister said that they were conscientious objectors. That is not a crime under the law. There are in this country many sects the members of which are conscientious objectors.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Even the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Co-operative Commonwealth Federation are not conscientious objectors as the hon. member well knows.

Mr. SLAGHT: They oppose the sending of single men overseas to defend Britain.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member for Parry Sound may have his word when I have finished, if he wants to say anything about something that has nothing to do with the matter under discussion.

Mr. SLAGHT: We shall see if it has anything to do with it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I suggest that the hon. member save his oratory because he is going to need it in the very near future.

Mr. SLAGHT: I am not a mind reader.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Another reason given was that some of the military service boards have contended that members of this organization have been enticing young men not to join the army, not to render their proper service to the country. If that is true, those people should be dealt with. There is sufficient power under the defence of Canada regulations to deal with any person, irrespective of what organization he may belong to, for causing dissension in His Majesty's forces or for trying to dissuade anyone from joining His Majesty's forces. It is one thing to deal with an individual who is carrying on subversive acts and another thing to ban an entire organization without giving any reason for the ban.

We have asked the minister repeatedly to give the grounds upon which this organization was banned. We have had nothing except statements along the lines of the one given to-night by the minister. I wish to remind the committee that the whole question of the defence of Canada regulations has become an affront to this parliament. Last year a committee was set up to discuss the matter of the defence of Canada regulations. While there was some dissenting opinion with reference to taking the ban off the Communist party, the majority voted in favour of it; but the suggestion that the ban be taken off the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Hutterites was unanimous, or almost unanimous on the part of that committee. That committee represented every political party in this house, with the majority of the membership coming from the government benches. Its report was tabled in this parliament in the dying days of last session, but the minister has chosen to ignore it completely.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And will continue to ignore it unless some one takes the responsibility of getting from this house an affirmative vote approving its conclusions.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am sure there would be plenty of votes in favour of concurrence in that report if the minister would present an opportunity immediately. But even if the house did move concurrence in the report, the minister knows that that would be only a recommendation of the committee.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If there were a recommendation approved by a majority of this house, I do not think there is any minister of any government who would not feel himself obliged by that expression of opinion to make a recommendation in conformity therewith to his excellency.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask the minister if before the close of this part of the session he will give us an opportunity to vote upon a motion for concurrence? If he will, I shall be glad to make the motion.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The minister has no jurisdiction over the order of business of this house. The hon. member has been here much longer than the Minister of Justice, and he probably knows how he should proceed if he wishes to test the opinion of this house, if he really wishes to test the opinion of this house.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister knows very well that the government has complete control over the procedure of this house. If the government want to give this house an opportunity to discuss a motion of concurrence, they can certainly arrange to do so. If they will provide an opportunity, I can assure the minister we will provide a motion. It is a sad reflection at a time when the united nations have been using as their battle-cry the four freedoms of the Atlantic charter, that two of those freedoms, freedom of speech and freedom of worship, should be in jeopardy in this country. Here is a religious sect which has been allowed to carry on its activities in the United States, to carry on its activities in Great Britain, to carry on its activities in the sister dominion of Australia; here is a sect in connection with which a parliamentary committee of this house has recommended that a ban should be lifted from it; yet these people are still having their homes raided, and on April 19 a service which they were conducting was broken up because they could not produce their registration cards. I am sure the minister would not stand for a minute and I would not stand for a minute having the police or anyone else come into the church to which I belong and ask for registration cards while a religious service was in progress. The minister has the responsibility to see to it that any Canadian citizen can attend divine service and worship his God in whatever way he chooses without interference by the authorities on one pretext or another.

Mrs. NIELSEN: With regard to the question whether this house would support by a vote the report of the committee on the defence of Canada regulations, I fail to see how the members of the house could make a decision and vote, for the information which was at the disposal of members of the committee is not at the disposal of members of the house. A great number, I think I am correct in saying, would vote according to the prejudices which for many years they have held. Before any intelligent vote could be taken in this house on the committee's recommendations, I submit that the evidence which was taken in the committee should be available to the members of the house. I sat and listened to the submissions made before the committee and in my opinion there was not a single word taken down in evidence which could not be published before the members of this house and the people of this country. It should be published, and then perhaps we would have a better understanding and be able to vote with a little more knowledge than we have at the present time.

Mr. HANSELL: In speaking to this item I wish to refer to some of the remarks that were made by the Minister of Justice the other day. He said he did not think this house would have voted for the recommendations of the committee. All I want to say on that point is that while the committee made recommendations on the defence of Canada regulations, concurrence in its report was never moved in this house, so that the minister cannot say that he would not have had the confidence of this house had he accepted the committee's recommendations. The feelings of the house were never tested on the committee's recommendations.

The special committee on the defence of Canada regulations formed pretty well a cross-section of opinion in this house, and those members voted for the recommendations and the lifting of the ban on these organizations.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the hon. member permit me to ask what he means by "those members voted for"? He knows better than that.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know better than that at all. I do not know what my hon. friend means. The committee moved its report and it was brought in here. The recommendations that were made in the report were carried by that committee; that is what I am saying—

Mr. DONNELLY: Why did you not move the adoption of the report in the house?

Mr. HANSELL: —so that I say to the hon. member for Parry Sound that I do not know any better than that at all. I am stating the facts.

I want to read what the Minister of Justice said the other day in reference to the question of lifting the ban on Jehovah's Witnesses. At page 4861 of Hansard the minister is reported as saying:

> As to why the ban was originally imposed upon Jehovah's Witnesses, among other organizations, I have only hearsay information about that.

The special committee had expert witnesses from Jehovah's Witnesses. They appeared before the committee and made their submission. They were questioned, and questioned by, shall I say, some champions of the same school of thought as the Minister of Justice himself, and the minister, in deciding whether or not the ban should be lifted, should certainly take into account the evidence which was submitted to the committee and the fact that the members of the committee had an opportunity to question and did question the witnesses. Further on, on the same page, the minister said:

> I have ascertained, however, that this is a very large international organization and the amount of literature that is put out from the Watch Tower on behalf of this organization is something fabulous.

Because an organization is large and international, does that mean for a moment that it is subversive? There are a good many organizations that are international and whose literature is issued in large quantity and has a large circulation, but surely that is no evidence that the institution is subversive.

The minister also said:

> It is also well known that thousands of phonographs with recorded speeches of their great leader, the so-called Judge Rutherford, are being used to further enlighten the people.

Just because they have gramaphone records is no reason why the organization should be considered subversive. By the way, the minister made a slip of the tongue when he said they were being used "to further enlighten the people". I think the people need a little more enlightenment, but if the minister had said "to further confuse the people", it would have made his argument a little stronger. Further on, he said:

> There are also, or there were, very large numbers of motor trucks fitted out with these phonographs and loud speakers to blare to the population at large the merits of that particular doctrine and the demerits of all religions.

Supposing they did, is that any evidence that the organization is against the war effort or that it is subversive? I have a right to say that my church is the only true church and that all other churches are wrong. I have that right because it is embodied in the freedom of religion?

Mr. LECLERC: What is the name of your church?

Mr. HANSELL: I will give you the name of my church, but first let me proceed with the minister's statement. He said further:

> All religions, according to their theory, are satanic missions to establish and maintain the dominion of his satanic majesty over the whole earth.

Supposing they do believe that, what about it?

Mr. SLAGHT: They do not fight.

Mr. HANSELL: There are other people who do not believe in fighting. There are the Doukhobors, and how many people in this house believed in not fighting only a few short years ago? Just because they may believe that all religions that are opposed to theirs are satanic does not make them a subversive organization. I challenge the Minister of Justice to rise in his place and say that that is not the attitude of his own church.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will certainly accept that challenge and deny absolutely the assertion of the hon. member.

Mr. HANSELL: I am pleased that the minister does accept that challenge and that he denies it. I fancy, Mr. Chairman, that his denial will not be the last word that is said upon the subject. I am suggesting—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is difficult to get the last word in this house.

Mr. HANSELL: I am saying that if any religious organization assumes that its own church is the right and proper church, the only right organization, it does not follow that that organization is subversive as far as this country's war effort is concerned. That is the position.

Now, to answer my hon. friend over here who asked me what church I belong to, I am not afraid to tell him; I am proud of my church. The church that I belong to, I may tell him, considers itself neither Protestant nor Catholic. Let the hon. member remember that. That may sound strange in his ears. I am not a Protestant, neither am I a Catholic. The church I belong to is the Christian church, the Church of Christ, the church exemplified in the Holy Scriptures. That is all. I can rise and say that I believe my church is the only church, the proper church, the only right church, the only church that holds the right interpretation of the scriptures, but does that mean that I am subversive, or that the church to which I belong is subversive of our war effort? Not at all. The basis of the minister's decision seems to be, according to what he says here, for he did not pursue his argument further—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Let the hon. member continue and he will find that I added, that I did not suppose it was for those reasons that they had been placed under the ban of the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. HANSELL: I will read further. I wish to be perfectly fair in this whole matter. Someone suggests I am taking up time. I am not concerned about how much time I take up. I can take a lot longer on it if my hon. friend wants me to.

Mr. LEGER: We are used to hearing you talk anyway.

Mr. HANSELL: The minister says: "This doctrine is certainly subversive of organized society".

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is quite unfair of the hon. member.

Mr. HANSELL: I will read further.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If he makes that statement he should say what "this" stands for in the sentence he is citing.

Mr. HANSELL: "This doctrine" is what the minister had just said.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member cannot be fairer than that in reading something which is on Hansard, I will refrain from saying anything more about it.

Mr. HANSELL: Can I do anything more than read the minister's words on Hansard?

Mr. LEGER: You are twisting the sentence.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Read the whole thing.

Mr. LEGER: Stop twisting.

Mr. HANSELL: An hon. member says I am taking too much time and now another hon. member wants me to read the whole thing. I quote:

I do not imagine that was the reason why the regulation was originally enacted but rather because their doctrine is, of course, against war.

That is all right. A religious organization can be against war. I am against war; so is everybody in this house.

Mr. LEDUC: Against this war?

Mr. HANSELL: I continue quoting:

There is no war, according to their theory, that is anything but the machinations of the devil himself—

Well, I will say that.

—and not only that, but their view is that human-made laws have no binding force upon the individual if they happen to contravene what these gentlemen regard as being proper human behaviour.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will you say that?

Mr. HANSELL: I will say that and I will say, besides, that according to the scriptures—and I think these people say the same thing—we are taught to be subject to the powers, the ruling powers, that be. I must be a law-abiding citizen. But I can be a law-abiding citizen and yet put what I believe to be the laws of God above such laws. If I am not law-abiding you have the opportunity of putting me in gaol. Furthermore, as I said the other day, if any individual among Jehovah's Witnesses rises and makes statements that are subversive, he can be dealt with in the same way, and I have nothing against that. He should be dealt with in the same way. But to outlaw the whole organization and to say that they cannot gather together as an organization and worship God freely is something that is absolutely contrary to British democracy. Let me read further:

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): Does it go quite that far?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am informed that it does.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): I did not think it did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The United States supreme court did not find that.

Mr. St. Laurent: Not on the evidence submitted.

Then he goes on. Does the minister want me to read more? These are the words of the minister, and I am saying that it appears to me that the decision not to lift the ban on this organization known as Jehovah's Witnesses, an organization of Christian people who want to worship God in their own way, even though they hold some peculiar doctrines, does not seem to be based upon any factual evidence that they are subversive of the war effort. That is my contention, and I urge the minister that he lift the ban on that organization. That is what I am urging to-night. I do not believe the minister's arguments hold water in the least.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not rise at this time to quarrel with the Minister of Justice or to enter into a religious controversy. It has been my experience for a good many years that whenever you want to divide the people, to separate and disunite them on any subject or for any purpose, the quickest way to do so is to introduce this question of religion. It has been used for a good many years for that purpose. I say I do not rise to quarrel with the Minister of Justice, because I do not consider that the present minister is responsible for the regulations which he has had to defend since coming into this house, and my opinion is that the defence of Canada regulations committee, which was appointed by the house and sat during the last session to consider the regulations and their amendments, fell down on the job. I am not accusing any member of the committee or relieving anyone of his share of the responsibility, because if that committee sat in camera, and deliberated upon this matter for months, bringing their deliberations to a finality in a report, then it was the responsibility of the committee to bring that report to the house and to see that the members of the house were given an opportunity to vote on it. That was not done. I agree with the minister when he says that, as far as the making of the laws is concerned, that is the job of the House of Commons, and to ask him to lift the ban on anything or to change the regulations is to give him a power to which he is not entitled. That is the job of the House of Commons. The regulations were passed by order in council. I do not agree with them, and I am not asking the minister now to take power with which I do not agree. I am laying the responsibility for the ban not being lifted at the doors of the defence of Canada regulations committee.

I believe the time has come for a reexamination of the regulations on this particular question. In 1939, when the regulations were brought out, we had an entirely different situation. The country was going to war. The country was wholly disorganized from the viewpoint of preparation for war. Nobody knew who anybody was; the regulations were laid down as an emergency act, and everyone who might come under suspicion was included in them. That went on until last year, and I think the committee then, with a cooling of the hysteria which existed at the time the regulations were passed, was in a position to survey the whole matter calmly and make specific recommendations to the house. That was not done; the committee shirked its responsibility. I suggest that adoption of the committee's report, which was tabled at the last session, should be moved before this house rises, because when a House of Commons committee comes to a decision based on the views of the majority it should be brought before this house, hon. members given an opportunity of voting on it, and the recommendations implemented.

I am concerned in this matter about one thing, the loss of liberty of any section of our people, because if you follow the growth of nazism; if you examine the history of the rise of Hitler and Mussolini to power, you will find that they did not try to take the people's liberties away all at once; they manoeuvred around; they banned the "tin-hats" and youth clubs in Germany; they limited the powers and gradually destroyed the functions of Rotary clubs and similar organizations, until finally they could set up the full machinery of dictatorship. Having watched the growth of nazism in Europe, I am convinced that unless the people in any country fully understand that they must not allow the liberties of any section of the population to be taken from them, it will be only a matter of time until our turn comes. It is the thin end of the wedge. I do not say that anyone on the defence of Canada regulations committee or in the Department of Justice has any intention of travelling that road, but I am not so sure that there are not other people in this country who would travel it were they given the opportunity.

On this matter of Jehovah's Witnesses, I know many of these people in my own end of the country. I have some as friends and neighbours, and I know they are the best citizens in the community. They practise the brotherhood of man; their creed is "Love thy neighbour as thyself"; they accept their full share of responsibilities; they pay their bills. The only accusation I ever heard against them was that they make a nuisance of themselves; they pass around a lot of literature; they want to sell you a book every afternoon, and that kind of stuff. But we have freedom in this country to do that sort of thing; I am free to tell that fellow to get away from the door if I do not want to talk to him. I believe that to ban them as a subversive element, or an element causing dissatisfaction in his majesty's forces, or as in any way interfering with the war effort, is ridiculous, and it was an absolute mistake to include them under the defence of Canada regulations. Many of the people in question who are convinced that this is the kind of religion they should practise have sons and daughters in the armed forces. I know some of them personally; they are making their contribution. If the father or mother thinks this is the way in which they should worship God, I believe they should be given the opportunity. According to the Ottawa Citizen of recent date, if General Eisenhower's mother were living in this country she would be under this ban; she is a member of this group. In the United States they have not gone to the extent that we have in Canada in measures against this sect. I believe something was done in a restrictive way, but the courts of the United States gave them considerably more freedom than they have in Canada. The same applies to Australia, where the issue was exactly the same as we have it, and to-day they are as free there to carry on as is any other religious group.

I am not quarrelling with the Minister of Justice. He inherited the defence of Canada regulations. When they were drafted the situation was entirely different. Naturally there was a general weeding-out process gone through, but I think that on the basis of conditions to-day the minister would be well advised to review the whole matter, and if he has any supervision or jurisdiction over the defence of Canada regulations committee, he should instruct them to complete the work they started last session by moving the report in the house, which would eliminate this issue now and in the future.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is just one suggestion I should like to make to the minister about the defence of Canada regulations. It arises out of the case which I brought before the house to which reference has been made this evening, the case of Mrs. Mullins, who was charged with two offences, neither one of which was an offence against the regulations, submitted to the ignominy of arrest on non-existent charges, taken into custody and kept in custody for a period of nine days until the matter was brought before parliament and the result of publicity prevented a continuance of that oppression. It is all very well to say that the responsibility rests upon the attorneys general and the law officers of the various provinces. That is true, excepting in so far as offences are concerned under sections 39, 39A and 39C. The defence of Canada regulations were passed under order in council, and the responsibility rests upon this parliament to ensure that they shall be administered with one end in view, namely, the assurance of the security and public safety and defence of Canada during the period of war.

Mrs. Mullins' case illustrates the danger of having these regulations administered direct by the provinces. The defence of Canada regulations carry with them extraordinary powers necessary for the safety of the state and to assure the safety of the state. I advocate that the minister secure the approval of the governor in council to a change in section 39B, which now reads as follows:

> (1) A prosecution for an offence against regulation 39, 39A or 39C of these regulations shall not be instituted except by, or with the consent of, the Attorney General of Canada or of the province . . .

My suggestion is that this provision be made that prosecutions shall not be instituted excepting by and with consent of the Attorney General of Canada or of a counsel directed by him. It is only one case which has been brought before this parliament, but it is one of other cases similar in nature. This woman's position to-day would have been different, I believe, from what it is now if publicity had not been given to her case. No one is more desirous of doing justice than the present Minister of Justice; of that I am quite sure. Therefore I ask that in the interests of justice; in the interests of assuring that there shall be no oppression under these regulations, that prosecutions shall not be continued unless by and with his consent. That will not prevent proceedings being taken by way of summons or warrant, as the case may be, where offences are believed to have been committed, but they may not be continued except with his consent.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. gentleman is making a serious suggestion, worthy of serious consideration. Would he be a little more precise? When would he suggest that the matter should be brought to the attention of the Attorney General of Canada, and not proceeded with further until his consent might be obtained?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is a very proper question. I think the proceedings might be commenced, where an offence is believed to have been committed, by the police authorities or by the agencies for the prosecution of offences in the various provinces, but the continuation of these prosecutions should be determined by the Attorney General of Canada. I think that is the only way in which it will be ensured that injustice such as occurred to Mrs. Mullins shall not be permitted. It is a serious matter to place a person in the position in which she was placed, having committed no offence but being held in custody. There is no way in which she can be recompensed; there is no provision for that. For all time there will be a suggestion that she did something contrary to the safety of the state in time of war, which is a serious matter. As far as possible that sort of thing should be guarded against.

Mr. SLAGHT: Perhaps the real point at issue in this discussion is becoming obscured. I do not imagine that any hon. member would desire to suggest that under the regulations, either by action of the minister or of the mounted police, anyone in this country should be prosecuted, much less arrested, for entertaining a religious belief. We are all past that stage. Such things were done two hundred years ago in the name of religion by enthusiasts who failed to appreciate the Sermon on the Mount, who thought the proper punishment for those who disagreed with their particular religious belief was to burn them at the stake as heretics. I imagine no one would suggest that we in Canada would tolerate any prosecution or persecution, as it has been called, on such grounds. But I wish to point out to the committee and particularly to those hon. members who perhaps feel strongly and who have spoken during this discussion this evening, that nothing in the defence of Canada regulations tolerates the arrest or persecution of any man or woman for a religious belief. I must quarrel with the hon. member who is leading the Social Credit party for the moment, the hon. member for Macleod, who says he endorses the theory that we object to, as put forward by Jehovah's Witnesses, when they declared in Canada in 1941 and 1942 that human laws are not binding upon them if, in their opinion, those human laws, which are the laws of Canada, conflict with their view of divine law.

Mr. HANSELL: Is that not so in peace time as well?

Mr. SLAGHT: Certainly; but I think when my hon. friend reflects upon his assent to that proposition he will desire to inform the house some day soon that he did not mean it. What is he preaching, or what doctrine is he endorsing? He is a British subject, a Canadian; and under the British practice parliament decides the laws that shall govern British subjects. The doctrine of these people which he has just endorsed—and I hope he will soon repent, for I suspect that at times he preaches repentance—is that in their view the law which the parliament of Canada has put upon the statute books to govern the conduct of our citizens, either within or without the criminal law, means nothing to them; that they will defy it, disregard it and break it if it does not conform to their conception of divine law. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is awfully close, let me warn the hon. member, to preaching subversive doctrines either in peace time or in war.

What is his remedy? When these people put that doctrine into effect; when they break the criminal law of Canada and defy the laws that parliament has enacted, he blandly says to our overworked Minister of Justice, Well, just arrest them, because beyond arresting them the state is not concerned with the preaching of that kind of subversive doctrine, particularly in war time. In the committee on the defence of Canada regulations, of which I had the honour to be a member, hon. gentlemen will recall that it was shown that these people held meetings under the guise of propagating and preaching their particular religious doctrine. The amendment which, I am sure in his wisdom, has been made by the minister lessening the severity of their having been banned, takes care of that sort of thing and permits them to hold their religious meetings. As long as they confine themselves to their doctrine or religion, there can be no interference, because they are protected.

I think some hon. members who have spoken to-night have failed to appreciate that the preaching of a religious doctrine is one thing and advising young men in Canada to refuse to serve their country in this time of war is another thing. We met here for five days in September, 1939. We had no chance to consult our constituents; we did not need to. With two or three exceptions the members of this parliament declared that Canada would stand by the side of the mother country in this war. We did so, not from any compulsion because when Great Britain is at war Canada is at war. That old theory was exploded. We came here and said, on behalf of the people of Canada, "When the mother country is at war we seek and propose to stand by her side, and to send our men to help her." It was said—and I think it has been shown to have been correctly said—that the British channel is probably the last line of defence for Canada. And we sent, and are proud to have sent, our young men overseas to the extent of hundreds of thousands, in the three armed forces.

There has been a good deal of heat put on in this debate. An attack has been made upon the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, than which there is no finer force in all the world. There has also been an attack upon our Minister of Justice, who I believe is endeavouring to do the best possible job. I pay tribute to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, with whom I seldom agree, for his ready acquiescence in a refusal—although some of his colleagues did not see the light—to pour condemnation on our Minister of Justice for performing a very difficult task in war time.

But let me just point this out, that the subversive teachings of Jehovah's Witnesses to the youth of Canada were in direct opposition to the request of the government of Canada to the young men of this country to carry out the declared war policy of Canada, and to enlist in the three services for service anywhere in the world. They were invited so to do. The Jehovah's Witnesses said, "No; you should not do it"; and they preached their religious doctrine in support of a subversive policy, in direct conflict with the law of this country laid down by a unanimous parliament.

But they are not the only people in this country who laid down a doctrine, as they had a right to do, a policy which was in direct contradiction of the policy this government enacted. The Cooperative Commonwealth party, among whom I hope I have some personal friends, placed upon Hansard on the 9th day of September, 1939, a solemn declaration of their attitude toward military participation in this war, and they did not do so lightly. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made this clear, and for the benefit of hon. members I may say it is to be found at page 55 of Hansard of that famous war-time session:

> May I say that this is the policy, not only of the majority of our parliamentary group, but of our national council which met for two days this week and which represents the consensus of the leaders of our movement from coast to coast. I propose to place this policy upon the records of the house so that parliament and the country may have a clear idea of what it means. Our statement of policy reads . . .

I shall not trouble the committee with those paragraphs which do not deal directly with the topic under discussion at this time. However, item No. 3 says:

> No military participation overseas.

That is the declared policy of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation at a session when Great Britain's back was against the wall, in September, 1939!

Mr. HANSELL: May I ask the minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSELL: —or the hon. member—perhaps he will aspire to being a minister some day—whether or not he would recommend the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation being declared a subversive institution, and therefore banned?

Mr. SLAGHT: Certainly not, and my hon. friend well knows why. Let me say to him, in parenthesis, that his party, through my good friend, the hon. member for Lethbridge, made a sound and magnificent patriotic declaration that they would have no part of a weakling policy of no participation overseas, and he made it clear. I refer to this matter this evening, not to chide my hon. friends in any improper way, but to point out that if they were to be entrusted with the government of this country, I would ask the people of Canada first to consider whether, with the empire in a crisis, their declared policy, properly placed upon the records of parliament, was a policy that they are not now fully ashamed of.

They are loyal people in this way; they believe in parliamentary institutions and in declaring their policy before parliament. They did not come out after that declaration of their policy was outvoted and re-declare the policy of not standing by the side of the mother country and participating in the fighting overseas. If they had thereafter gone out and preached this kind of doctrine, I am not at all sure, may I say to my hon. friends, that they would not have been in the class that declares that parliament does not matter, if the law of God does not carry their mind to carry out the law of Canada. They did not do any such thing, and I do not accuse them of any such thing.

Just another word with regard to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, with whom to-night I was in practically full accord. I think he took a stand which did his party credit, and I am sorry the other hon. member I am looking at did not take a similar stand, when he wanted to pick and hack at the Minister of Justice. But I do have a little quarrel with the hon. member for Cape Breton South, because it may be recalled that in Hamilton, in March of this year, under the auspices of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, at a Sunday afternoon meeting in a theatre he addressed a group of labour men, and made a statement—and I think it was a pity, because we were still recruiting, and we are recruiting to-day. This statement was not made under the protection of parliament. It was made, I am afraid as a rabble-rousing effort at a Sunday afternoon labour meeting, under the auspices of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. This is what he said, as it was reported in the Hamilton Spectator, and I put it on Hansard and ask him to deny it. I will read his language. This is what he said on that Sunday afternoon:

> The people will have to get rid of the Churchills to attain their ideals.

March, 1943! Great Britain still in dire need! A God-given leader in Winston Churchill, whom a gentleman had no right to criticize! And he says to his Cooperative Commonwealth Federation comrades in Hamilton, "The people will have to get rid of the Churchills to attain their ideals"! Well, that may be the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation ideal, but I do not think you can get any other member, including the hon. member for North Battleford, to abuse Winston Churchill. That hon. member is British, I think. She is proud of Winston Churchill, as we are, all of us, proud of him. And when I charged him with that statement, and challenged him to deny it—and I hoped he might have said he was misreported—what did he say? On April 6, as it appears at page 1914 of Hansard, he said:

> I have no intention of denying it, and under the proper item I shall reiterate and explain it to the satisfaction of the hon. member.

Well, as far as I can recall, that "proper item" has not come along. He has not dared to reiterate it, nor has he attempted to explain it.

Where does that leave him and his party? He did not go to Hamilton by accident. He went to Hamilton on the invitation of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in Ontario. And I have not heard any of the leaders of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in Ontario repudiate that statement. I want to leave in the judgment of this committee whether that condemnation is a slur, a besmirching of Winston Churchill, the hon. member's daring to say to the people of Canada—let me get it exactly right —"the people will have to get rid of the Churchills to attain their ideals." What are the ideals that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation entertain which necessitate ridding the empire of Winston Churchill? The hon. member has a full chance to reiterate and I should like to hear him explain it. He is advertised somewhere in Ontario, I believe in a campaign that is said to be going on there; I believe there is said to be a campaign in Ontario—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): You can tell that when you are speaking to-night.

Mr. SLAGHT: —as being a man of great boldness in the House of Commons. If that is boldness, God forbid that we teach young Canadians to be bold.

Mr. MacINNIS: You do not need to cast any slurs upon the hon. member for Cape Breton South for lack of boldness.

Mr. SLAGHT: I am quoting an advertisement which was paid for by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in the province of Ontario. It is not my language; I would not call him bold.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is wrong with that?

Mr. SLAGHT: Nothing wrong with it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Why are you taking up time with it?

Mr. SLAGHT: Do you not like it?

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, yes.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend for whom I have a high regard has challenged me and said that I am taking up time with this. I will ask him a simple question and I will sit down while he answers it. Will he dare to say to this committee that the people will have to get rid of the Churchills to attain their ideals?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is not the question.

Mr. SLAGHT: All right, I will go on. I rose to point out that we have been under a misapprehension, and my hon. friends across the floor have been under a genuine misapprehension. They are perfectly right to come forward and champion the cause of religion and the right of every man to engage in the religion he likes. But this country is at war, and when you are at war and you use religion as a cloak to urge the youth of Canada to disobey and defy the laws of Canada, then I say that your divine law should not spare you.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman we have heard a typical lawyer's speech. Not having anything to advance against the arguments which were made from this side of the house urging that the persecution of Jehovah's Witnesses be stopped, the hon. member talked about something else. Any good lawyer can do that; every good lawyer always does it when he has not a case. That is the way in which he makes his living. He said that these people were using their religion as a cloak to do things that were detrimental to the war. The hon. member no doubt knows there are sections in the defence of Canada regulations which take care of actions of that kind without having to put a whole religious organization under a ban of illegality, without having to invade churches where people are partaking of holy communion, without having to interrupt their service to ask for registration cards, without having to take people off to the police station because they have not their card. Let me tell my hon. friend that he does not need to look over here for either obstruction or objection to Canada's war effort. If my hon. friend will only look behind, he will see plenty of it.

On every possible occasion reference is made to the attitude of this party. We did take that attitude, but we were compelled to take it on account of the attitude that my hon. friend and his friends took in the years preceding the war. You supplied the enemy with the means of war; you assisted Hitler and Mussolini during the years between 1936 and 1939 to destroy democracy in every part of Europe. How did we know that you were not going to do the same thing again? The people of Britain had to do the same thing; they had to get rid of certain leaders before they could get on with the war As the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) said the other day, it was considered a phoney war until the fall of France. When we arrived here in May, 1940, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said that they, the government, could not get on with production because they could not get the requisite plans and processes from Great Britain. British industrialists had decided to make it a capitalist war, as is being done here.

But that has nothing to do with the question at issue, the question of Jehovah's Witnesses being declared an illegal organization. Why have they been declared an illegal organization in the first place? I submit that the Minister of Justice has not yet put on record a clear statement that would be satisfactory to this committee as to why that was done. My hon. friend has not done that. The special committee on the defence of Canada regulations which met last year heard all the evidence that the Department of Justice brought before it; it heard all the witnesses for the defence of Canada regulations, and as far as my memory goes the committee was unanimous in recommending that the ban on the Jehovah's Witnesses should be raised. My hon. friend was a member of that committee. Why did he not rise in the committee and face those Jehovah's Witnesses? He could not face them with the argument he made here to-night, because that argument was not applicable in the committee. He had to meet them with the facts, but he did not meet them with the facts. But this fact still remains; that is, that no evidence has been placed before this committee that would justify the declaring of the Jehovah's Witnesses an illegal organization. In my opinion it is clear, pure religious prejudice that is maintaining the ban.

Mr. McGEER: I do not want to continue this discussion, but I have been anxious to have something to say about the old age pension system that we have. I must confess that I think that the Communists and Jehovah's Witnesses are getting altogether too much attention as compared with what attention we are giving to our old age pensioners. I just want to say this to the committee—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Old age pensions have nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. McGEER: I am not talking about old age pensions. I got past that before you decided it was out of order. I am speaking about this particular matter. I wish to say to the Minister of Justice that surely the time has come when we should have a set of rules and regulations in this house under which the things that should be debated can be debated and useless debate of the kind we have had to-night not be permitted to take up the time of parliament as has been done.

So far as I am concerned, and I hold just as strong convictions as anyone in this committee, I think it is a mistake to have a ban on communism, and I think it is a mistake to have a ban on Jehovah's Witnesses. I believe the best security against these kinds of isms is to let them come out and expose themselves. I believe we can depend upon the patriotism and common sense of the people of Canada to take care of themselves. But when parliament has made a decision that is an expression of the overwhelming majority of this house, it does seem to me to be an obvious waste of time to repeat over and over again arguments that the overwhelming majority of this house have repudiated, and repudiated with, I believe, the overwhelming support of the people of the Dominion of Canada. Surely the day has come when we can transact the business of Canada along something like the same lines of orderly procedure that is followed in the British House of Commons, and surely this debate to-night is clear evidence of the need of bringing up to date the rules governing debate in this house.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not rising now to answer the hon. member for Parry Sound. As far as what he has said about me is concerned, I am quite willing to let my record stand not only as a patriotic citizen of Canada but also as a law-abiding citizen. I think that when his speech is analysed to-morrow it will not appear so sound as it sounded to-night.

I rise just to ask one question of the minister. It is a simple question. These people known as Jehovah's Witnesses are frightened to assemble themselves together. I wish they could be relieved of that fear and that some publicity could be given to the regulation which permits them to gather together in worship.

There is one other matter. I have said that they were frightened. I have had, over the past year and in the past few days particularly, no end of letters which have been sent unsigned, anonymous letters from these people, and the reason why they are sent anonymously is that these people are frightened to sign their names. Some of them say so. I am not bringing this up because it is an important matter but on account of the principle involved. Why should people be frightened by any regulations? I wish to ask the minister, will he just assure these people that they can write to members of parliament and to their friends on these matters, and sign their names without any fear of coming under the defence of Canada regulations. That is a simple request, and I believe that the minister should assure these people of at least some protection in that respect. I should like an answer from the minister.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I can give no other assurance than that which is provided by the text of the regulations which were published at the time in the Canada Gazette. If that is not enough for them, I do not know that there is anything more that I can accord to them.

Mr. HANSELL: The minister will not even say that they can write a letter and sign their name?

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to make a few comments on certain things the hon. member for Parry Sound said to-night. If the arguments he put forward are logical, I think we might well ask this question: Why is it that the government has not long since placed the ban upon the Doukhobors? I was in British Columbia two years ago, and while I was there the Doukhobors burned down a packing plant because they wanted to force the fruit growers in that community to sell their fruit through their organization. The growers got together and built another building. Before it was completed, it, too, was burned down. While there was not absolute proof that the Doukhobors burned it down, that was the general belief throughout the district, and the provincial police with whom I spoke at the time admitted that the Doukhobors had burned down the building.

I was also told that forest fires which were continually occurring around the district were set by the Doukhobors in order that they would be able to get a job fighting the fire. That kind of action was subversive. I think the Doukhobors have not been prominent in their support of the war effort. Sometimes I become convinced of the fact that this action regarding Jehovah's Witnesses is largely a religious question. Some three years ago a couple of men called at my house on the prairie one morning. I did not know who they were. They asked me whether they could play a couple of records. I thought at first they were salesmen for a certain make of phonograph. We gave them permission to put on the records and they played them. They were two recordings of the man by the name of Judge Rutherford. I want to give the committee the assurance that in those two speeches by Judge Rutherford there was not one word of a subversive nature. The whole of the two speeches was a bitter attack on the Roman Catholics. I do not suppose that is considered subversive. It is intolerable, I will admit. I do not approve that type of attack. But it does make one wonder whether the action against Jehovah's Witnesses is largely on account of their attitude toward the Roman Catholics, instead of their attitude of a subversive nature.

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is a shame.

Mr. QUELCH: You may say that it is a shame, but that question is being asked all over this country. I am asked it from one end of Canada to the other, and I am just repeating the question.

Mr. CRERAR: I was not aware that my hon. friend had travelled all over Canada from one end to the other.

Mr. QUELCH: I have travelled over many parts of Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: I can say this and I have some knowledge whereof I speak. There is not a single particle of evidence to support the allegation which the hon. member made in his concluding remarks.

Mr. QUELCH: I did not make any allegation. I asked a question that is being asked all over the country.

Mr. CRERAR: It was close to an allegation, if it was not an allegation. I think all members will agree on reflection that it is a most unwise sort of statement to make. He raised the question whether the policy of the government so far as Jehovah's Witnesses was concerned was inspired by their attack on the Roman Catholic church. That is the only inference that could be drawn from his statement. I wish to say that that inference has no foundation whatsoever, and I want that to go across this country. The raising of issues of this kind, the planting of seeds of doubt and suspicion is the greatest disservice that can be rendered to Canada at the present time.

Mr. QUELCH: The suspicion is there. I am not planting it.

Mr. CRERAR: I repudiate absolutely the implication in the remarks of the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

Justice—

Expenses in connection with the prize courts, $10,000.

Mr. CHURCH: How many cases have been tried by the prize courts since the beginning of the war?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There was no expenditure last year, and no expenditure the year before, but it is felt prudent to keep the vote there, because it is quite possible that at any moment the prize courts might have to be organized to condemn prizes.

Item agreed to.

Justice—
Sundry services, $5,700.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is for the salaries and cost of living bonus of three temporary employees added to the department to cope with the extra war work.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—
Increased activities of the force due to the war, $6,091,320.

Mr. ADAMSON: In mentioning the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I do so merely because I have had some slight connection with them during the present war. Prior to the war the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were a small but efficient technical force. They had come down from the old Royal Northwest Mounted Police who wore the red coat and rode the horse, the days when the red coat and the horse were symbols of British justice in the great territories of the northwest. Through science they became an efficient and almost international police force whose name was known from one corner of the world to the other. In the beginning of the war there was no force that received such small recognition as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the matter of pay. Their pay at that time was even less than the pay of the private soldier in the Canadian army. They were subject to various restrictions with regard to marriage and freedom in one way or another, and a protest was raised in this house.

The first thing that happened was that they did receive an increase in pay, and first of all, let me say that I consider that increase inadequate, having regard to the work which the force has done. It is a small, highly-trained, extremely efficient force, and the money we expend on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is one of the best investments we have ever made in this house.

It is not luck that we have had no sabotage in Canada. It is not luck that we have not had mysterious fires. It is not luck that we have not had a number of enemy agents loose. Further, it is not luck that there has been so little sabotage in the United States. I merely mention that we were at war for a long period before the United States became a belligerent; and when the history of this war is written, as I hope it will be written some day, and the place of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is properly evaluated, we shall have, I believe, cause to appreciate what this force has done for Canada.

I make these observations now because there are two objections I have to the present set-up of the force. The first objection is that the force, with the present pay and allowances, is a far lower basic rate than the federal bureau of investigation. I think they are doing equally important work as that done by the F.B.I., and the first point I want to bring out is that this force should be paid on the same basic rates as the F.B.I. Equal pay for equal work is an axiom of democracy. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are doing equally important work with the federal bureau of investigation, technical work that requires the highest possible efficiency and training, work that cannot be learned or understood until men have had years of training. They are doing that work and in my opinion are not receiving adequate recompense for it.

The second point on which I disagree with the policy is this. The functions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have altered. In the old days in the northwest territories, when the red coat meant his majesty's justice, that red coat was a symbol, and it was an efficient symbol that justice would be done throughout the length and breadth of this great land. The red coats of the mounted police have, however, been used to an extent which I think is questionable as a show or a parade ground force. These men are too valuable to be used merely as guards and as a show force. They have received training, sometimes going into many areas, and I think their use as guards is undesirable. I am not speaking of the temporary constables with the armband who serve as guards in our public buildings, but I object to the use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as guards of dominion public buildings. Their job is far higher and more important than merely that of custodians of public property. I wish I could say what their job has been during the war, but it has been so important that I should like to see the use of the words "Royal Canadian Mounted Police" divorced from the mere guarding of buildings, from the man who stands in the corridor and takes your pass. In my opinion he is not a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

These are the objections I have to the vote. The vote has been increased and is now $6,091,000. In my opinion that vote should go to the trained men of this force and should not be used to pay the guards of public buildings. I believe such guards should be taken on by the public works department, who have the responsibility of erecting the buildings, or that the guarding of these buildings should be the obligation of the departments concerned. The national defence department takes the responsibility of guarding its own property. I believe that the other public buildings of the government should be guarded by the departments concerned, thus freeing the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to do the work which they have done, without question, with the highest possible regard for the security of the state. With respect to their activities concerned with the apprehension of suspected enemy agents, no suspect receives the benefit of the doubt more freely given than by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. No force takes the trouble, the painstaking trouble, to establish beyond any peradventure of doubt the guilt of the individual who is apprehended. I have very little sympathy with anybody who will say, certainly in the part of the country which I know best, that a man who has been apprehended by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has not received a fair chance.

There is one thing more I want to say about the police. The recent case relative to the registrar in military district No. 2, Toronto, indicates that the force acted with absolute fearlessness, without any suggestion of political pressure, when three of the highest officials in a department of government were apprehended and charged.

I ask the Minister of Justice to promote three objectives in this connection: first, that the force shall continue to be the highly skilled and highly technical body that it has been; second, that the pay of the force should be placed on a level comparable with that of the federal bureau of investigation; third, that the job of being custodians of real estate should be taken away from this great force.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I join with the hon. member who has just spoken in commendation of the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I have had some experience of the work they have done in my own city of Prince Albert, where one of the oldest detachments in western Canada is located. To-day the mounted police need no defender anywhere in this dominion for the magnificent work they have done, particularly during the period of the war. In that connection I wish to mention the work done in the sphere of scientific investigation. In Saskatchewan we have located a scientific laboratory under Doctor Powers. The work which has been done by that department is of so remarkable a nature that it has won the approval not only of the people of my province, but of people outside Canada.

I rise, however, to ask a question of the minister. In view of the fact that to-day the Royal Canadian Mounted Police operates generally throughout the dominion, and that in order to operate successfully, it must co-operate with provincial police forces and also with city and municipal police forces, I suggest, in the interests of a better administration of justice, that some body be set up in this country to operate as a coordinating unit between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the other police bodies. What I have in mind is a body similar in nature to Scotland Yard in Great Britain and the federal bureau of investigation in the United States of America. If such a coordinating corps were set up, the work that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the various police forces throughout the dominion could do would be immeasurably improved. The question I wish to ask the minister is whether consideration is being given to the setting up of such a co-ordinating body.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I endorse all the remarks made by the hon. member for York West about this splendid force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There are a couple of questions I wish to ask the minister before he makes his statement. One is with regard to the cost of living bonus. It is granted to many dominion civil servants, and in view of the work which the members of this great force are doing, and the effect of the increased cost of living especially as regards married members of this force, I hope the government will see its way clear to grant the mounted police a cost of living bonus.

Another question: Is a member of this force who has given splendid service over a period of twenty years or more not entitled either to promotion or to some form of special recognition? It seems to me that when a member has had at least twenty years of service and has a clear record, the department should recognize that service, either by promotion or by some recognition whereby his pay would be improved with corresponding benefit upon his retirement. I trust the minister will make a statement regarding these two points.

Mr. CHURCH: Only a member of parliament who has had some connection with the police commission of a municipality can understand these estimates or the functions which this particular department has carried on for so many years so ably and faithfully.

The details of the estimates for the last fiscal year as compared with those for the year 1943-44 indicate careless methods in preparing the war appropriation bill. For example, for the last fiscal year the Minister of Finance in his budget speech gave the estimates for the mounted police for the fiscal year just closed as $4,147,000, but in the details of that I find that the expenditure was only $3,869,507. I would suggest to the head of the department that there should be some other system—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will allow me, the estimate made by the Minister of Finance was quite correct, but it covered all the expenses estimated to March 31. On the mimeographed sheet that I have distributed appear only the accounts that were actually paid before March 31, and the difference will appear in the supplementary estimates that will be tabled within the next few days. The amount mentioned by the Minister of Finance became due but was not paid before March 31. We had the appropriation to pay it, but we had not received the accounts, and the payments were not actually made. So that the amounts unexpended lapsed, and had to be included in the supplementary estimates for 1943-44, though the amounts are attributable to accounts which would have been paid in 1942-43 if they had been available.

Mr. CHURCH: If the minister had waited until I had completed my statement, I would have said nearly all that he has said. Here are the draft estimates for the last fiscal year, and not one of the items corresponds with the amount actually spent. I am not blaming the head of the department for it; he is one of the most competent men in the public service. My point is that we have had the war appropriation bill before us almost since the beginning of this session. If you go through the various items, you will see that the amounts are sometimes varied on account of the transfer of some items, on account of work not done, on account of a smaller number of people employed, and for various other reasons. They are not really estimates at all. You were prominent in municipal work, Mr. Chairman; I am sure you will agree that in a municipality the estimates almost always check with the actual expenditures.

I realize that the work of the mounted police has gone up by leaps and bounds during the war. Before the war the conditions of work were not very satisfactory to the rank and file of the men, or even to the heads of the department. The commissioner, the headquarters staff and all the others worked for very small salaries for many years. The men in the department suffered as a result of the small pay and poor working conditions, and the work done between the two wars was somewhat hampered by the lack of funds. As I look over the details of these estimates, I find that there were only three small deficits, while on the other hand there were several large unexpended balances, which it is said were caused by the force not being recruited up to establishment, and by the anticipated general organization of the security service being found not necessary. Then I see this statement:

> A realignment of allotments, in order to better control expenditures, was made in the fiscal year 1943-1944 from that submitted for 1942-43. This consisted in 1943-44 in transferring allowances (in lieu of quarters, rations, fuel and light) from "pay and allowances" to "allowances including billeting, messing and provisions".

If we take all the items together, the expenditure for the coming fiscal year is estimated at $6,091,319.40, the exact figures given by the Minister of Finance last March.

There is one other thing I wish to point out in connection with the mounted police. The war has placed tremendous responsibilities and burdens on the civilian police, the mounted police, the home guard and others right across Canada from coast to coast. For the last six or seven years I have urged that the municipalities should be given some recompense for the federal work that is done by the police departments of the cities of Toronto, Hamilton and other places throughout the country. There has been the utmost cooperation between the civilian police and the mounted police. I heard the late Colonel Denison, who helped found this great institution, pay tribute on many occasions to the cooperation that has been given by the mounted police to the civilian services of police throughout all these years. I believe the time has come when the federal authority should recognize the work these municipal police departments are doing in connection with the administration of federal laws. It is the function and duty of the provincial attorneys-general to enforce all federal law. As you know, Mr. Chairman, the provincial attorneys-general have not the proper staff to do all this and enforce all federal laws, so that they just pass the responsibility over to the municipal police. With the tremendous number of acts, regulations and orders in council being passed by this government, I believe the police of the larger cities are entitled to some recognition of the services they are rendering in this regard. In Australia for many years the federal authorities gave subventions to the cities in connection with the enforcement of the federal laws and aided financially this important work. That was done also in New Zealand, and in many of the states of the United States cities and towns were paid subventions for police services in connection with the enforcement of the federal laws of that country.

When you compare the number of men on the civilian police forces with the number they had a few years ago, and take into consideration the tremendous responsibility that is placed upon the civilian police by the federal powers in war to-day, you can understand that in many cases the local police have not sufficient time to attend to their own most important functions and duties and protect the lives and property of the citizens who pay them, with the result that the burden on the taxpayer has become almost intolerable. I do not see why this government could not compensate the police departments of the municipalities for the war-time federal work they are doing. The mounted police come to the city police and want somebody arrested, or want to take out a warrant or lay an information. The local police have to cooperate with them; a court session is held; witnesses are called; police officers are taken off their beats to give evidence, and the municipality is charged with the entire cost, and the upkeep of those convicted. The whole system is wrong. They do not have that system in the old country, and we should not have it here. The government that passes all these orders and regulations should pay for the work required to enforce them. Other cities such as Hamilton, London, Winnipeg and Vancouver have done this federal work free and have had this matter under consideration; the police chiefs' association have urged that some measure of justice should be given the municipalities along the lines I have indicated.

I believe the mounted police now are getting a very fine type of recruit, and I hope that in future the men will have better working conditions and better pay, after carrying on for many years with very small incomes. Better schedules of pay are urgent. I have been acquainted with the work of the mounted police since shortly after the South African war; I have followed their work in Toronto, not only as a police commissioner but as one who has taken a great interest in the mounted police system, and I can tell you that with their small salaries very few of them have been able to make any provision for their old age. The present minister is to be commended for some improvements he has made in the lot of the men of the department, and I hope he may continue to improve in the future the condition of these men and of all ranks in this fine system of the public service. I urge upon him that this matter should be taken up with the Minister of Finance, and with the municipalities, which are bearing the brunt of this work. I see the hon. member for Parry Sound in his seat to-night, and realize that he knows a great deal about the administration of justice in the courts, and the work done by the civilian police in aid of federal power. I believe the time has come when the federal power should pay for the services rendered, and the out-of-pocket expenses, along the lines I have indicated.

Mr. SLAGHT: I desire to join with hon. members who have indicated to the Minister of Justice the worthiness of this course and the fact that the mounted police are underpaid. I know a good deal about their requirements. Before one can join the mounted police force he must have a high type of education. The courses they must undertake are severe. They have to study criminal law; they have to learn how to handle horses; they have to be expert drivers of motor cars; they have to understand ballistics; they have to do laboratory work, and be able to analyse blood stains. This is a course requiring men of a high grade of intelligence.

I believe it was two years ago that hon. members, appreciating the underpayment of the force, expressed themselves strongly, and I believe as a result of their efforts there was a slight increase in pay. If the practice has not been changed—and the minister will know; I am not quite sure—a man who enlists as a constable must serve for seven long years before he can have a raise in pay of a single dollar or a single ten-cent piece. That ought to be changed.

To my mind, the force is terrifically underpaid. That is not the fault of our Minister of Justice, because he has no authority over their payment. It is a matter which must be dealt with by parliament, or on the minister's recommendation. I know he and his predecessor have had to fight the treasury board. They have been loath to make increases.

Mr. REID: Who are "they"?

Mr. SLAGHT: Well, they are a mysterious entity, of very worthy gentlemen. When we advocate a worthy cause, a worthy application for an increase, one concerning which practically all members of the house are unanimous, and we find we get no results, then in my limited experience I sometimes cast a suspicious eye on the treasury board. I make an appeal here and now to that board, through the minister. It would be but common justice to increase that portion of his estimate which comes under the heading "pay" by 25 per cent. Even then it could be suggested that the mounted police are underpaid.

They carry out a terrific number of tasks in peace time and also in war time. They have to see about the enforcement of the Customs Act, the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act, the alcohol legislation, in which they run down stills, and illegal manufacturing of alcohol. They must check the white slave traffic. Those are items which come under their jurisdiction in peace time. But when we add to that the fact that part of the force is the secret service of Canada, corresponding to that magnificent force known as Scotland Yard in the mother country and the federal bureau of investigation under J. Edgar Hoover in Washington, then we realize that in war time their task becomes stupendous.

They have to search every outgoing and incoming vessel in every harbour on both the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts. When we remember the millions of tons of shipping we have sent successfully across the Atlantic ocean, and the fact that these men, in all kinds of weather, have to make sure that no damage will come to those vessels, and with that in mind have to enter the holds and perform the most difficult tasks to see that no sabotage is being committed, we realize that they carry on a wonderful piece of work.

There is a condemnation, as I see it, in the very memorandum furnished to us. It is a condemnation, not of the minister, but of us, as a parliament; because under item 3 we find this:

> The large unexpended balances under allotments of "pay" and "security service" were caused by (a) not being recruited up to establishment.

The reason why they are not recruited up to establishment is that we cannot get the type of young men in Canada who are required for this work to enter the force, on account of the pittance we pay them. And in war time, and at all times, it is incumbent upon this country to see that the force is properly paid.

I would just remind the committee of one factor. Many of these men are married. There is a restriction about marriage without the consent of the authorities. I should like to pay great tribute to General Stuart Wood, the efficient head of this force. The committee will remember that he was selected by us to escort their majesties, and he took charge of their welfare on the trip they made across Canada and into the United States just before the war. He is a magnificent officer, and the same might be said of his inspectors, the higher command, and right down through the line to the last constable. They are a splendid force.

When the married mounted police officer leaves home in the morning, bidding his wife and perhaps his children good-bye, those people at home do not know whether or not he will come back at night. He must perform services in contact with and in suppression of the most dangerous type of criminal any country can produce. He takes his life in his hands every day he dons his uniform and goes on duty.

Therefore I appeal to the minister, and to the treasury board behind him, to add twenty-five per cent to the pay of these men, adjusting it with reason, throughout the entire payroll of this magnificent force.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to associate myself in a most emphatic manner with the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound. All he has said is entirely correct. I believe we could go even further than twenty-five per cent, and still leave a most magnificent and deserving force very much underpaid.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to speak from the experience I have had with the mounted police in Toronto. I believe I could not voice sufficient appreciation of the work they have done, and the efficency of the force in that city. They have great difficulties to contend with, one of which is that they must deal with other police forces, and in those dealings must be at all times diplomatic. Then, they must not go outside the bounds of provincial rights.

I would express my appreciation of the force, from the commissioner down to the constables, and would make special mention of those men who are engaged in secret investigations of one kind or another. They are doing a magnificent job for Canada, although it has very little glory connected with it. Many of these men do not wear uniforms. I believe the only way in which their services can be properly appreciated is by increasing their pay. I agree with the hon. member for Parry Sound, the hon. member for Souris and others who have spoken, that the cost-of-living bonus certainly should be given to the men on this force. Their pay is very small, when one considers the work they do.

Another point is that in Canada this force is the symbol of law and order. The sight of our red-coated mounted police around the government buildings in various Canadian cities is an incentive to law and order. Seeing these men and having a knowledge of the history of the force helps to make law-abiding citizens. Their duties call them all over the country, as far north almost to the north pole; sometimes they have to go out of the country, to Australia or some place like that. As the hon. member for Parry Sound said, those men who are engaged on secret investigations do not know whether they are going to come back. They are always in danger. While the force has a certain attraction for young men, I think the pay and allowances are not sufficient to make young men want to make this their life work. I agree with the hon. member for Parry Sound when he says that a considerable increase in pay should be given these men. The cost of living has gone up some seventeen per cent, and it would not be out of the way to have the mounted police receive a substantial increase. I wish to congratulate the commissioner and the assistant commissioner—I know of some of the work he has done—for having kept up the high standards of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to identify the Progressive Conservative party with the suggestions which have been made for better financial treatment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I am not going into this matter to-night at any length, because earlier in the session I raised this question. I should like to suggest to the minister that the pay and allowances of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be reviewed at once with the object of bringing them up to the standard of service they are rendering Canada in this war-time period.

Mr. GILLIS: There is some information I should like to get in connection with this item. At the latter part of last session the minister brought down a special appropriation to set up what I understood was a security police force. I assume that that would be included in these war appropriations now before us. Before I go into that matter, I should like to take a moment or two to reply to some of the things the hon. member for Parry Sound had to say about me a few moments ago.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That does not come under the police force item.

Mr. GILLIS: Nor did the remarks he made a few minutes ago. It has never been my custom to delay the committee, because I generally try to be as relevant as possible to the item under consideration. On two occasions during this session the hon. member for Parry Sound has deliberately gone out of his way to make a personal attack upon myself without having any evidence to support it. As a noted criminal lawyer he seems to have little respect for the laws of debate in this house. I have deliberately avoided getting into the discussion, because I try to observe the rules of this house.

As I said a moment ago, on two occasions the hon. member for Parry Sound has been permitted to rise in his place in this house and make an attack upon me without any evidence to support it except about four lines that were taken out of the context of a forty-minute speech of mine by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and placed on the record. That is the evidence upon which the hon. member for Parry Sound based his remarks to-night and on a previous occasion. At that time I told him that when the opportunity presented itself under an appropriate item I intended to reply to the hon. member for York-Sunbury. Neither of the hon. members is in the chamber at the moment.

We know why the hon. member for Parry Sound made the remarks he did this evening. It is obvious that he did so for political reasons. If he were as patriotic as he would have us believe, he would not have started a discussion and taken up the time of the committee in order to make the remarks he did. His attempt to-night to discredit the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation and myself in particular was based upon four lines from a speech of mine which were placed on the record by the hon. member for York-Sunbury on March 18, 1943, when he quoted the Hamilton Spectator. I did not reply at that time because I would not have been in order, nor did I reply to the hon. member for Parry Sound when he interjected a similar tirade against me. I did not want to take up the time of the house. But when the same matter is raised three times during the same session I think it is up to me to defend myself.

The basis of the statement by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, which in turn was the basis of the statement by the hon. member for Parry Sound—he had no knowledge of it; he had no idea of what had been said; yet he stood up and tried to mislead the people of this country into believing that a certain thing had happened at a certain time—was a report of a meeting which I had attended in Hamilton. I was invited to this meeting by members of a reputable organization who are just as interested in and perhaps making a greater contribution to the war effort than the hon. member for Parry Sound. I discussed the subject they gave me to discuss, and I made a forty-minute speech,

During that speech I was asked whether I thought the full aims and objects for which the people of Britain were fighting the war would be attained under the present British government. I have my own opinion as to the aims and objectives for which the British people are fighting that war and, exercising that opinion and the right to express it, regardless of what the Hamilton Spectator had to say, I said that in my opinion when the British army was brought back from Dunkirk, battered, practically disarmed, having been caught in a trap which, in my view, had been prepared by the ruling classes of France not only for the British but for the French army, it was the ordinary, common citizen who had rescued his army. That is a statement of fact. I said that I thought the British people were waging a war against the leadership which had placed their army in that position at Dunkirk, and that when this war is over, leadership from the classes in Britain who were making the major portion of the sacrifices would be selected to bring about those changes which I visualize the British people as fighting for and a system which will preclude the possibility of a repetition of a world war in the next generation.

With respect to Churchill, I said that I in no way detracted from his ability as a war leader, but that in my opinion the British people were not fighting for British imperialism in the aftermath of this war, and that when the war was off their hands they would in their own way decide who should write the peace and in what kind of society they would live. Fighting the war and rearranging a country's economy are two entirely different jobs and require men of different calibre. That was my answer. I detracted in no way from Churchill's ability as a great leader in the crisis of war, but I do not now nor did I in the past visualize the restoration of the status quo.

Many hon. members have attended meetings, but they do not assume any responsibility for what some pin-headed reporter may write in his paper. As to this reporter for the Hamilton Spectator, I never saw him, and did not know he was there, and yet the hon. member for York-Sunbury takes as his authority what was written in some obscure paper by somebody over whom I had no control and no responsibility for whatever, and puts that on the records of this house as gospel.

Mr. FULFORD: If the hon. member's remarks were not correctly reported, why did he not write to the paper and correct them? Why wait until now to do so?

Mr. GILLIS: My answer to that is this. There are 625 newspapers circulating in this province and I do not know how many there are altogether in Canada. If you have time to read all the newspapers in Canada and answer all the stuff you see in them about your party, you are not going to do much work in this house. I had never seen the article in the Hamilton Spectator; I have not seen it yet; I never knew anything about it until the hon. member for York-Sunbury put it on the records of this house, and then I went to the library and looked for it, but someone had it and I have not seen it yet.

The hon. member for Parry Sound has endeavoured on two occasions to belittle the members of this group so far as the war effort is concerned. I am not holding any other member of his party responsible for his utterances, but speaking for myself I say that I will put my record at any time on this Hansard or in any journal in this country alongside the record of the hon. member for Parry Sound as a citizen of this country. When it comes to serving this country on the basis of patriotism and being willing to do something for our institutions and their maintenance I will put my record at any time alongside that of the hon. member for Parry Sound.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): You should have heard your friends in that group before you joined them.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not talking about that. I am talking of the attack that was made on me personally in the house, and it has been done three times.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): You are judged by the company you keep.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The company can take care of itself.

Mr. GILLIS: I think I have the floor, Mr. Chairman. I am answering the hon. member for Parry Sound. I hold him responsible for his utterances. I have already demonstrated my desire and willingness to do something for this country in any way that I can and I still have the same feeling I had when I was serving as a young man in the last war. It is all right when you are a grandfather and cannot go yourself to sit back and belittle other people. It is easy to be brave then and urge somebody else to go. I spent my seventeenth birthday in the front line in France fighting for this country, and if I had not been elected as a member of parliament in 1940 I would have been there to-day.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They probably would not take you.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, they would. I would have got over there in some way. I say that such talk ill-becomes a man of the standing of the hon. member for Parry Sound, and if he has not anything more to contribute to this house than that kind of cheap political trickery which has nothing at all to do with the matter under discussion—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The word "trickery" is unparliamentary, and I would ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. GILLIS: If it is unparliamentary, I will withdraw it, Mr. Chairman, but I still think it is rather cheap to rise in the house and precipitate a discussion and bring out that kind of stuff when everyone in the house is trying to conclude its business. I have sat here three times and taken this talk that was entirely uncalled for, and I rise to-night to correct the impression which the hon. member for Parry Sound persists in trying to create. He tries to play up something that has absolutely no basis in fact; does it for nothing but political advantage, and takes the hon. member for York-Sunbury for his authority. I can take any speech made in this house, and if I wanted to pull a sentence out of its context I could read it into the record and make it appear that the hon. member had said exactly the reverse of what he did. It ill-behooves any member of this house in this time of war to go back fifteen years in the history of Canada and discuss matters on the basis of militarism. I could take the record of all three parties; I could take the Prime Minister's statements in 1937 and just prior to the outbreak of war in 1939 and put on the records the opinions that were held at that time. But conditions change, and it is a wise man who changes his mind once in a while. The fool goes on forever in the one direction. I do not find fault with people for changing their minds on the basis of changed conditions. A country that is flexible enough to change its attitude to suit the growth of new conditions is a healthy country. The only kind of people you find fixed and immovable are those like those you find in Europe who are regimented and have a gun held at their heads to make them toe the line.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I had to take up this amount of time, but I am not responsible. I intended to let the whole thing go. But it has been done before, and I felt that the time had arrived for me to say something about it.

The question I rose to ask was this. Toward the end of the last session there was a large appropriation before the house for the purpose of setting up in Canada a body of security police, and the Minister of Justice stated at that time that their pay and allowances would be in conformity with the pay and allowances of the armed forces. This police force was not to be uniformed, and someone was to be brought from the old country to organize it. I should like to know what amount of this appropriation is allocated to that branch of the service.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The security service that was then contemplated was not organized on the original scale. The matter was reconsidered, and it is for that reason that there was allocated out of the war appropriation of last year $1,154,800, of which only $132,682.62 was expended, and for the service on the scale that has been organized and performed in a satisfactory way the amount required this year is $200,000.

There were four or five other questions asked by some hon. members to which I should like to reply, but before doing so I wish to express my own gratification, as the minister responsible for the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to all hon. members who have spoken and who have paid such a high and well-deserved tribute to the faithful and efficient performance of their duties by the members of this force.

Mr. ROWE: Pass that on to the treasury board.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The treasury board, of which I am a member and whose meetings I attended when the matter was considered, did to some degree acquiesce in or consent to the requests I submitted, and since the voting of the supplementary estimates at the beginning of this session an increase has been made in the allowances to those veteran guards who are paid out of this war appropriation. There has been some confusion here. These are not estimates required for pay and allowances of regular members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. With respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police there has been since 1941 an increase in pay and allowances of 30 per cent for the ordinary constables. They were receiving $3.85 a day and are receiving $5 a day. I am not saying that is a sufficient compensation for the valuable services they perform, but one difficulty that has had to be contended with is the ceiling that has been placed on all wages and allowances, and that has been stated as an insuperable difficulty in making any more substantial increases in these allowances. That takes care of the suggestion made by two hon. members, that these members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should receive a cost of living bonus. Instead of receiving a cost of living bonus, there was an increase in the allowances of from $1.60 to $2.25 for the ordinary constables. No increase was made in the allowances of the members of the force who were already receiving as much as $2.25 a day. The superior officers of the force agreed to stay at the rates of their own allowances, provided the ordinary constables were brought to $2.25 a day.

The member for York West has suggested that they are performing work equal to that performed in the United States by the federal bureau of investigation. I fully agree. I believe that all Canadians are proud of the fact that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is quite as efficient as any similar organization in any other country. However, it must be admitted that throughout the whole of our public service in Canada, for work being performed just as efficiently by Canadians as similar work is performed elsewhere by citizens of other countries, the compensation is not as large.

Mr. ADAMSON: The differential is greater in this case than in most of them.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure it is. Members of this House of Commons receive $4,000 as compared with $10,000 received by members of the Congress of the United States, and most members of this house will admit that their devotion to the public service of their country is as great as that of members of the United States congress to theirs. That is one example. Take the work performed by the Chief Justice of Canada and compare what he receives for that work with what is paid to the Chief Justice of the United Kingdom or the Chief Justice of the United States. Take the compensation given to the President of the United States and compare it with the amount that is provided in this country for the Prime Minister, and you will find a substantial discrepancy. Take the work of our supreme court justices, who receive $9,000, while the supreme court justices in the United Kingdom receive £5,000. These are substantial differences. I am not saying it would not be desirable that these differences should disappear, but the whole situation has to be envisaged, and in our public service in this country the amounts of the national income that are given as compensation to those who perform public services are not as large as they are in some other countries.

The hon. member for York West raised a point which I had raised on more than one occasion with the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, namely that it appears strange that members of that force should be performing the duty of guarding public buildings. That arises out of the fact that in 1920 the Royal Canadian Mounted Police absorbed the dominion police force which had been created to perform that service. They took in 150 men who were members of the dominion police, and there are some seventy-five members who are still on the establishment. It may be that it was a mistake to combine the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with the other dominion police force, but the reason is that at that time it was thought it would be preferable to have this dominion police force under the control of the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the matter has not been reconsidered since. Up to 1932 former Commissioner Starnes did some special recruiting for this service of guarding public buildings.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the question been considered whether the departments concerned should perform this task of guarding their buildings? The railways guard their own property and so do the defence departments. Has any consideration been given to that question?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not recently. Prior to 1920 there was a dominion police force that performed the service of guarding public buildings. At that time it was thought desirable to amalgamate the two services and place them under the control of the commissioner, and the matter has not been reconsidered since. That is the historical explanation of the fact that members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are now performing duties that do not appear to us to be of the importance of the duties with which they are usually connected in the public mind.

The hon. member pointed to a recent prosecution which has been instituted in Toronto as evidence that no political pressure has any effect on these servants of the public, and I am glad to have that recognition. I hope it will be possible always to have the same recognition. There should never be any political pressure affecting in any way the performance of the duties which devolve upon this force.

Mr. GRAYDON: Or any governmental department.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Or any governmental department; but when it comes to the administration of justice that is a matter with which I am especially concerned and with respect to which I am particularly cautious that there shall not be even a ground for any suspicion of political intervention.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suggest that the minister spread his caution over the whole governmental field.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The administration of justice takes in a pretty broad field. I hope it will be possible for hon. members to give the same tribute to the other branches connected with the administration of justice. That is something which, like Caesar's wife, must be above all suspicion.

The question was raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre as to the desirability of there being some agency to coordinate the work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the provincial police and the municipal police. The commissioner, whose experience is quite extensive, informs me that in fact there is more coordination between the various police services in Canada than there is in the United States, and that he is satisfied that the coordination here compares not unfavourably with that between the police forces of the United Kingdom. There is always room for improvement, and the hon. member may be sure that this is a matter which is very close to the heart of the commissioner and receives attentive consideration from him.

The statement of the hon. member for Parry Sound that it is seven years before a man joining the Royal Canadian Mounted Police can obtain any promotion or increase of compensation is not quite accurate. There is an increase in compensation with each year of service, but it requires seven years from the time of enlistment before one becomes a full constable with the maximum pay of the full constable.

Mr. ROWE: What is the maximum pay of a full constable?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The maximum pay and allowances of a full constable is $5 a day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one question with respect to coordination that I should like to ask the minister. I was reading the other day that the assistant commissioner, speaking before the Police Chiefs' Association of Canada, pointed out that there was a need of some coordinating body such as I suggested.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; but there is improvement and, I think, from the ground up. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police has established a school which is open to all officers of police forces, whether municipal, provincial or federal, and there are members of municipal and provincial forces attending that school.

There will be other opportunities for discussion, when the civil estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are under consideration, and I feel that perhaps it would not be the temper of the committee to delay this further. If there are matters which I have unintentionally overlooked in my haste to give as many answers as possible, I would be glad to supply them when the civil estimates are under consideration, at some other sitting.

Item agreed to.

Mr. J. T. TURGEON (Cariboo) presented the third report of the special committee on reconstruction and reestablishment and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN ARMY—MECHANICAL AND ELECTRICAL MAINTENANCE IN THE FIELD

Mr. ADAMSON:

1. Have steps been taken by the Canadian army overseas to establish a separate corps, similar to the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers (R.E.M.E.), responsible for all mechanical and electrical maintenance in the field?

2. If so, what steps have been taken in this regard?

3. Upon whose advice?

4. Have similar steps been taken with respect to the Canadian army in Canada?

5. Have the armies of the other British dominions and India formed a separate corps to undertake this engineering and maintenance work?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. A corps of electrical and mechanical engineers has not as yet been formed in the Canadian army. The organization of repair and maintenance services now in effect in the British army consequent upon the formation of the R.E.M.E. has been adopted by the Canadian army. Consideration of the formation of such a separate army unit will await the observations of responsible officers of the Canadian overseas army after experience gained regarding its operation in the British organization. In the meantime, the personnel concerned remain with the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

4. See answer to No. 1.

5. Information available here not sufficiently definite.

FLYING OFFICER GEORGE BEURLING

Mr. COTE:

What steps, if any, have been taken to bring about the transfer from the R.A.F. into the R.C.A.F. of F/O George Beurling, D.S.O., D.F.C., D.F.M., and Bar, a native son and the pride of the city of Verdun, Quebec?

Mr. MACMILLAN: This officer has made application for transfer from R.A.F. to R.C.A.F. Air Ministry have agreed that he may relinquish his commission in the R.A.F.V.R. on appointment to a commission in the R.C.A.F. Effective action to this end is now in process.

WHITEHORSE, YUKON, WATER AND SANITARY CONDITIONS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Has the government been advised of a serious water shortage and bad sanitary conditions in Whitehorse, Yukon Territory?

2. Has the government been informed of proposals made by the United States government for the installation of a water and sewage system in the town of Whitehorse, Yukon Territory?

3. If so, has an agreement been reached in the matter?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes. The matter of water supply and sewage disposal for Whitehorse local community is primarily a responsibility of the Yukon territorial council, but in view of defence activities in the area the Dominion government is interested. It is very difficult to determine the future needs of the community on the basis of present emergency conditions, but in the meantime necessary precautions have been taken by the territorial government.

[Mr. Adamson.]

2. Yes. The United States engineers are constructing a water supply and sewage system for their camp. The lines pass through Whitehorse. Provision is being made for connections which the local community may require on the understanding that no extra expense will be borne by United States for this community service.

3. See answers to questions 1 and 2.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What has been the amount collected by the unemployment insurance branch in the province of New Brunswick from its inception to date?

2. What has been paid out for relief in said province for the same period?

3. What is the administrative cost per week?

4. What is the number of employees in the New Brunswick branch of the unemployment insurance commission?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. $2,242,864.40.

2. The amount of unemployment insurance benefit paid in New Brunswick totals $48,498.27. No federal relief. Provincial relief paid, if any, unknown.

3. The total administrative expense per week, incurred in the operation of the employment service, including the administration of the national selective service regulations and unemployment insurance in the province of New Brunswick, was $4,849.57 during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943. Unemployment insurance operations are integrated with those of national selective service and it is impossible to give a separate figure for unemployment insurance cost.

4. 177, of whom 113 in the local offices of the employment service and unemployment insurance branch located in New Brunswick, and 64 in the regional office of the unemployment insurance commission at Moncton for the whole of the maritimes.

For the reasons given in No. 3, it is impossible to state accurately to what extent those employees are engaged in national selective service work.

EUROPEAN POLITICAL REFUGEES

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has the government reached any understanding with regard to the provision of asylum for some European political refugees?

2. Has the government made any arrangements regarding the procuring of facilities for the distribution of relief to refugees in Spain and North Africa?

3. Has the government made representations to the French committee of liberation regarding the release of Spanish republicans and members of the anti-fascist international brigade now interned in North Africa?

4. Has the government made any representations regarding the release of Spanish republicans and members of the anti-fascist international brigade now interned in Spain?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. I stated on July 9 that the dispersion of refugees now in European neutral countries and the reception of those who might hereafter escape from axis territories must be conducted under international auspices. In April last these matters were considered at the meeting in Bermuda between representatives of the United States and United Kingdom governments. The Canadian government has been informed of the recommendations made by that meeting which, for reasons already given, must in most cases be regarded as confidential. It has not been requested as yet to take specific action.

2. It is understood that responsibility for the distribution of relief supplies in North Africa has been assumed by the United States government. Official arrangements for the distribution of relief supplies to refugees in Spain are administered under the direction of the United States and United Kingdom embassies in Madrid.

PURCHASE OF PROPERTY IN SALTFLEET TOWNSHIP, WENTWORTH COUNTY, ONT.

Mr. McNEVIN:

1. Was any property purchased from Mr. T. J. Mahony in Saltfleet township, county of Wentworth?

2. If so, how many acres were purchased?

3. What price was paid for same?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

ONTARIO ELECTION

ARRANGEMENTS FOR SOLDIER VOTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence, notice of which I have given him. Would he acquaint the house as to the steps being taken by his department, in conjunction with the Ontario authorities, to ensure that the following classes of soldiers will not be disfranchised in the forthcoming provincial election: (a) those in training centres in Ontario who are moved from one centre to another in the province between the dates of enumeration or revision of the lists and polling day; (b) those who will be moved from points in Ontario to points elsewhere in Canada from the date of enumeration or revision of the list until polling day. In the case of the latter class will proxies be given to them prior to their transfer to other points in the dominion? I should also be glad if the minister would inform the house whether proxies have been made available to soldiers who during the past three weeks have been moved from Ontario to other points.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I received my hon. friend's questions only five minutes before entering the house to-day, and I have not been able to make definite inquiries with respect to either the first or the third, because they require some examination and investigation. I think I can say, though, that with regard to those in training who are moved from one centre to another in the province, it is not possible to lay down now what procedure will be adopted, because that depends, as the house will see, first, on the number of men to be moved; second, on when they will be moved, whether in the first or the last part of the week, and third, on the distance they will be moved away from the camp in which they have been enumerated. But I can say I am satisfied steps will be taken to see that they are given an opportunity to vote. That is to say, if they are within the province they will exercise their vote, and if without the province they will vote by proxy. With respect to the second question, as to those who will be moved from points in Ontario to points elsewhere in Canada from the date of enumeration or revision of the lists until polling day, and whether or not they will be provided with proxies, the answer is yes. The hon. gentleman asks whether proxies have been made available to soldiers who during the past three weeks have been moved from Ontario to other points. I have not been able to make any particular inquiries in this respect. However, I think I may say that if the proxies were received in the camps and if the instructions were followed, they should have been made available.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the minister make further inquiry?

Mr. RALSTON: That would mean inquiring at every camp and in regard to every man.

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. DREW IN THE "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF JULY 21

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the statement made in this house yesterday by the minister with regard to certain reserve units in military district No. 3, have any steps been taken to have Mr. Drew retract the reckless and ill-considered statements attributed to him by the Toronto Globe and Mail of Wednesday, July 21?

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. FULFORD: I shall quote in part—

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order—

Mr. FULFORD: I quote:

Gananoque, July 20.—"To-day we see the government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FULFORD:

—"taking another step to cheat the men out of their right to vote," said Mr. Drew.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think the house generally will not wish to have the provincial election brought into the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Who has been doing it?

Mr. FULFORD:

"To-day's ruling that members of the reserve army who are in camp will have no right to vote there is an insult to every member of the reserve army."

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think we can take these remarks as being anything except political, and we may as well—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You have been doing more of that than we on this side.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I am perfectly willing to answer certain questions with regard to the provincial election, and we certainly have heard already considerable discussion in this house which had not very much to do with dominion affairs. Several questions have been asked with respect to the provincial election. No one has objected , and I think they were in the same class as the question just asked by the hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the Minister of National Defence will realize that the questions which have been put to him with regard to proxies and voting and so on are quite proper questions. At least I so regard them, and I think the minister will also.

Mr. RALSTON: They were about the provincial election.

Mr. GRAYDON: They were about the provincial election, but I would point out to the minister that they concerned his department and were not directed to him with the idea of embarrassing anyone in connection with them. I should like to point out that the kind of statement made here, in which reference is made to one of the prominent men in provincial affairs, is one that is totally uncalled for.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is a statement he made.

Mr. GRAYDON: It has no precedent so far as previous debate in the house is concerned.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member showed me this newspaper paragraph just as I was coming into the chamber, and I could hardly credit that a gentleman in Mr. Drew's position would make such a statement. His statement is a direct reflection upon the department over which I have the honour to preside. It has to do with the matter of depriving the men of the reserve army of their votes. It is exactly on a par with what has already been discussed. I only want to say that nothing has been done, that no communication has been had with Colonel Drew with regard to his statement because I have not regarded it as necessary. Public opinion perhaps will be the best answer in that respect, after the announcement I made yesterday concerning the arrangements which had been made for the reserve army to vote.

It happens that one camp in the whole of Ontario had been fixed for a certain date before the date of the Ontario election was known. There have been screams from several quarters, not in this house, and not by men of the reserve army, to the effect that the Department of National Defence had deprived men who were going to that camp of their votes. I think "disfranchise" was one word used and "iniquitous" was another. It does seem to me, after the statement I made yesterday, that hon. members and the public generally and public men like Mr. Drew might accept the fact that we are doing everything we possibly can to make provision so that these men can vote, even curtailing the camp, as I explained yesterday, in order that they may get home in time. I have not called on Colonel Drew to retract his statement, and I do not propose to do so.

CANADIAN ARMY

QUESTION OF EQUAL PAY FOR MEN AND WOMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. When the war appropriation estimates of the Department of National Defence were being discussed the question of equal pay for men and women in the armed services was raised. The minister promised to give this matter consideration. Has any conclusion been reached, and will the minister be able to make a statement to the house before it adjourns?

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 21, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before you call an item, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance which has to do with the war appropriation measure. I should like to remind the minister that some time before these resolutions carry I should like to have a statement from him with regard to sugar rationing in the United States and Canada. This matter was raised on a couple of occasions while the resolutions were being discussed. I do not want him to forget to make a statement to the house before these are passed.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Dominion forest service—Alternative service work camps, $79,000.

National parks bureau—Alternative service work camps, $500,000.

Surveys and engineering branch—Alternative service work camps, $140,600.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Has the previous item passed? The other evening we were discussing alternative service work camps, and there is a further question I should like to ask in this regard. I understand that about a thousand conscientious objectors were moved from the prairies to British Columbia under some arrangement with the provincial government to do forestry work. The report I have is dated April 21, 1943, and I understand these men were to be paid fifty cents per day for the work they did, while the forestry department was to be paid an allowance of $2.50 per day for their board and keep. Are these people still there under this arrangement?—because it seems to me they could render more essential service at this time if they were back on the prairies. I mean right to-day. They could be employed, for instance, in unloading wheat at the terminal elevators. As I pointed out the other night, there is a shortage of man-power for haying; within a few days the harvest season will be here, and without man-power our farmers cannot take off the large harvest we expect in western Canada. Why cannot the thousand conscientious objectors be returned to the prairies where they could be doing much more essential work in the coming days?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The item we are considering is No. 12, and the question asked by my friend refers I think to a previous item already passed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It was under discussion when the committee rose.

Mr. CRERAR: I understood that the item passed at that time, but I have no objection to answering, and this explanation is perhaps necessary. Alternate service is carried on under two different branches of the department. Part of it is under the national parks administration and part under the surveys and engineering branch. The conscientious objectors who were sent to British Columbia over a year ago were sent to do forest protection work. There was a fear, how well justified I cannot say, that incendiary bombs might be dropped on British Columbia forests, as I believe did happen in some of the forests in the Pacific states. It was considered that the protection of the forests against a hazard of that kind was more important than the work that conscientious objectors were doing at that time in the national parks, and they were accordingly sent to British Columbia, to the number of some six or seven hundred.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think the arrangement called for one thousand, and that seven hundred were sent out.

Mr. CRERAR: Between six and seven hundred men were ultimately sent. Some of them have been brought back and placed at other work, largely upon farms because in the past year that policy has been adopted. A few more than four hundred of these conscientious objectors are still in British Columbia, and I am advised that they are cutting cordwood for fuel needs next winter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This item permits I think of a discussion of a problem vitally important to the war effort of this nation which arises directly out of an order published to-day in regard to an increase in the price of newsprint. In my opinion the best use is not being made of the services of conscientious objectors in the production of firewood and of pit-props. I would not bring this matter up now were it not that there is no more important factor in the war effort of this nation than the production of pulpwood out of which paper and paper products are made. There is such a shortage of man-power in the production of wood pulp that during the past year one million cords less were produced in Canada than the production required to meet present day needs, the demands of the United States, Great Britain and other countries of the empire.

This matter comes under the department administration by the minister in that one of the branches with which he is concerned is forest products laboratories, to which reference was made the other day. I know the interest of the Minister in the development of our resources and in ensuring that they shall be utilized to the achievement of the greatest possible war effort on the part of this nation. That requires man-power to be properly allocated to the production of pulpwood, which is one of the greatest industries in this country.

I take this matter up at this time because of its transcendent importance in the relationship of the publishers of the United States of America towards the war effort of this dominion. There has been during recent weeks a pronounced antagonism on the part of the American publishers towards the restriction that has taken place in this country in the production of necessary pulpwood. I find this, and I am sure that the minister is aware that it exists, that a feeling is springing up in the United States that we in Canada in raising the price of pulpwood and in not assuring the full production that is needed by the United States are actually trying to take some advantage of the United States, whose main importations of this product come from Canada. This morning the press carried this notification:

> Ottawa, July 21.—The prices board announced to-night that effective next September 1 the ceiling on newsprint in Canada will be raised $4 a ton to conform with an increase of the same amount being put in effect in the United States.
> The announcement was made jointly in Ottawa and Washington.
> It said that on the basis of cost figures the prices board "is of the opinion that the present proposed increase is inadequate and that further discussions with the American authorities will need to be held."

There was an increase on March 1 of $4 a ton and there is a further increase now of $4 a ton. I sum up the situation as far as the necessity for pulp production in Canada is concerned. Lack of sufficient man-power during last season has resulted in the shortage to which I have already referred of one million cords of pulpwood. Vital war production has been endangered, because paper and pulpwood occupy to-day a position which is unequalled by any other industry in the war effort of the nation. Essential foreign exchange is being sacrificed, and as I have already mentioned, publishers in the United States are becoming antagonized against Canada. This is so important that it requires the very best consideration which the minister and the other members of the cabinet can give to it. I have before me the American Newspaper Publishers' Association bulletin of July 12, 1943, of which I shall read excerpts to place before the house and the country the serious situation in which we shall find ourselves unless we do something to assure that United States publishers receive from this country supplies of pulpwood necessary for paper production. This is what it says:

Regardless of the facts as they are interpreted to various publishers, it does seem that the matter of price is interwoven with the matter of supply from Canada. The Canadians have stated that they will continue to supply newsprint to the United States at the rate of 210,000 tons per month through the third quarter, but they do not indicate in any way what they will do in the fourth quarter. There have been suggestions that the Canadians will reduce the tonnage going to the United States from 210,000 tons in the fourth quarter regardless of what price prevails.

This is the magazine of the publishers' association, distributed for the information of the papers of the United States, and if this idea is allowed to be broadcast, the value of the work of our war information branch in the United States will be greatly reduced, if not nullified. The bulletin goes on:

On the present basis Canadian mills are delivering 210,000 tons to the United States each month, 16,000 tons to Canadian consumers, and 20,000 tons are provided for overseas, making a total of 246,000 tons.

I particularly direct attention to the next paragraph, which indicates the seriousness of this matter, having regard to the importance of this industry and the necessity of retaining the good feeling of the press of the United States:

There are a considerable number of publishers who recognize that the wood supply is the key to newsprint production in Canada but back of the wood supply is the man-power situation. These publishers feel that if sufficient man-power is provided in Canada there can be a reasonably adequate supply of newsprint, but the supply from Canada will diminish unless Canada takes steps to assure a greater wood cut.

I repeat to the minister how important it is for his department, charged with the administration of the resources of this dominion, that this matter receive the serious attention which I am sure he will give it in order that the possibility of ill-feeling being engendered between these two nations shall be avoided.

While United States publishers recognize that it is Canada's own responsibility to fix her man-power policies and execute her war programme, disquieting reports continue to reach United States publishers about a considerable amount of man-power being taken from cutting wood into army service, but these forces, by Canadian law, cannot be sent overseas except on a volunteer basis. In addition, in Canada agriculture or farming is a basis for deferment from military service but pulpwood cutting is not classified as a basis for deferment from military service. In the United States both pulpwood cutting and agriculture are grounds for deferment from military service.

If the policy is pursued by the Canadians of not taking any special steps to maintain volume because of the man-power situation and the supply of newsprint from Canada to the United States is allowed to dwindle it can be seen that the Canadians will be making frequent and periodical visits to Washington demanding further increases in newsprint prices.

That is a strong condemnation of what these publishers believe Canada is going to do, that is, continue to secure rises in the price while not assuring the necessary production.

After all, the volume of production in any business as in newsprint has an important bearing upon cost. If the price of newsprint is to be maintained at a level which will make it possible for American newspapers to operate without losses and have some assurance and security about their supply of newsprint then there must be clarification soon about what Canada will do in assuring a supply of newsprint commensurate with the needs of American newspapers.

That indicates how serious the matter is—that these publishers in the United States who require Canadian production believe or suggest that in continuing to raise the price without having the necessary man-power to assure the production they require, we are taking advantage of them at this time.

I need not point out to the minister how important the pulpwood industry is to Canada. If a feeling of this kind is allowed to develop among publishers in the United States, the adverse effect on the joint effort of these two nations in the war can well be imagined.

As late as 1940 Canada was producing more than fifty per cent of the world output. Our domestic consumption does not amount to very much, but the United States consumption constitutes the major demand for our pulp forest products. So important, however—I again accentuate this—is the pulp and paper industry in this country that the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has said:

From the standpoint of sustaining balance of trade—

And now, of securing the necessary exchange.

—products of forest origin have been more consistent than any other comparable group of commodities, and in the wood and paper group itself, the pulp and paper industry has become the chief contributor.

Mr. CRERAR: What date is that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was stated in 1940. I do not wish to delay the committee by putting on the record the figures through the years, but if the minister wants the information I can give it. It indicates that excepting the non-ferrous smelting and refining industry in 1940 no other industry in this dominion exceeded the gross value of pulp and paper production. When foreign exchange is so important—considering the problem from that angle alone—a very special effort should be made on the part of our country to ensure that this shortage in the production of pulp, which directly affects the supply of newsprint, shall not be permitted to continue.

According to the United States Department of Commerce, forestry branch, the army and navy and essential civilian needs will require this year 15,000,000 tons of paper and pulpwood. It will take two and a quarter million cords of pulpwood to manufacture the paper needed in the United States in 1943 to package food supplies and munitions for overseas shipment, and enormous quantities of pulpwood will be needed for the manufacture of smokeless powder, plastics and many other products that are indicated.

All this adds up to the point I have been endeavouring to make, that with the shortage in man-power which resulted in such a material reduction in production in Canada last year, every available man that can be placed in the industry now should be assigned to it. Recently a survey was made to ascertain the situation and it was found by one of the companies that only 36·9 per cent of the minimum requirements of men were in the bush during the week of July 2. It is impossible to secure the necessary man-power as the situation is to-day. In the United States the production of pulpwood is regarded as of great importance. One of the chief reasons for the reduction in Canadian production has been that while farmers are allowed to go into the woods and work for sixty days in any year, so long as employment does not interfere with agricultural production, during the past few months there has been a grave fear among farmers—the proportion being two in the province of Quebec to one in Ontario—who ordinarily go into the bush during the winter to look after the cutting, that they will lose their rights to postponement by so doing, and the result is that they stay at home during the winter or other slack season. The situation will become even more serious unless action is taken immediately to put men to work in the woods. Entirely apart from the regular demand for wood fibre, the demand is increasing in war production, and as shipping space becomes freer, more paper will be needed for export, even though Britain to-day is reduced to 20 per cent of the pre-war level. Already the allied nations are piling up reserves of paper to send to the countries that are at present occupied, looking to the time when they will be relieved of the axis invaders and occupants, so as to make the free publication of world news possible in order to benefit the people of those countries by restoring them a free press.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

It is essential to the war effort that the United States, Britain and the other countries I have mentioned should have sufficient paper to print the news to strengthen public morale. Five thousand tons of newsprint were recently shipped from Canada to the near east and North Africa for the very purpose I have mentioned. First, we must not lose this valuable trade by our failure to make the necessary man-power available for the purpose, even though it is part-time work and agricultural workers are freed for the purpose. Second, we must look ahead to the post-war period so that this industry shall not be permitted to fall into the position where the United States, our main customer, taking 71 per cent of our production, may turn to other methods in order to supply those needs now filled by pulpwood. More important than anything else—and it is on this basis that I make this appeal—we must not allow American publishers and the American newspaper association to get the idea that we in Canada are trying to take advantage of them in the matter of price. If we do, we may have an adverse press in the United States, and a press that is adverse in the slightest degree, a press that adopts an attitude antagonistic to Canada's war effort, resulting in a tendency to separate us one from the other in our united effort and to arouse suspicions between nations engaged in the common crusade, should be averted no matter what course must be taken in order to avoid it.

I appreciate the opportunity which the committee has given me to place this matter before hon. members in this sketchy manner. I have not desired to take up time with statistics, but I press the point strongly. We must not, we dare not, allow the attitude that is set forth in that publishers' association pamphlet to become general. There is only one way to avoid it, and that is by a proper allocation of necessary man-power. The attitude of American publishers is important to the war effort of this dominion. It is more important than we here can estimate. This is a matter that deserves, I submit, the most serious consideration of the minister and of the government. Once lost, the favour of the American publishers, their appreciation of what we are doing in Canada, will be very hard to regain.

Mr. CHURCH: I am glad to see an awakened interest in the lands, forests and parks branch of the department. For the past five or six years we have not been giving sufficient attention to all that is involved in this item. When these matters came up on previous occasions there was little discussion. There was little more than ten or fifteen minutes of discussion last session on the whole item. May I point out a grave mistake which the government may make in regard to this very important asset. I refer to the natural resources of the north-west territories as far as the Yukon.

The government must consider seriously the activities that are taking place in the great development now under way in that country as a result of the work on the Alaska highway. A large number of Americans have come there and they are interested in the project from the military standpoint, but there is also the post-war importance of the matter to be considered. Our soldiers are now overseas and this territory will be in the future one of the greatest sources of employment and development in Canada. Many of our young soldiers are graduates of our universities in electrical engineering and in various other branches of that great profession. A great many of the young men who are now in Sicily and Africa used to go into this territory in the summer when they were students. The government must not be unmindful of the importance of this to our engineering graduates in the days to come. In dealing with these properties they must not lose sight of that.

In my opinion these various branches of the lands, forests and parks branch of this department will be of great service to Canada, or at any rate they can be made of great service to Canada after the war. Do not forget that these great natural resources of all kinds are going to be a great source of employment for our soldiers after this war; and above all, do not make the mistake that was made in Ontario with the natural resources of that province. From the Ottawa river right through Nipigon, some years ago, financial men came from New York and other places and grabbed the whole territory, the timber, water powers, mines, forests and great natural resources of new Ontario, with the result that valuable resources of various kinds there went for a song. Our mines and their wealth and everything else were underwritten and have been given away for a song, and now we are going to make the same fatal mistake in these great western areas if we are not careful, in regard to the north-west territories and the Yukon. Canada is not going to be any land of milk and honey after the war is over; it is not going to be an easy place in which to live. Those hon. members who wish to do so may go home; this opposition does not consist of only one or two or three hon. members, as a section of the press apparently thinks. There are others here who have taken part in these debates on this item last year all alone, when no one else would do so. This is going to be a desperately poor country after the war. As I say, our natural resources have been given away and frittered away at a rapid rate; you have only to look at the export figures in regard to lumber, timber, mines and pulpwood and everything else which the axis powers have bought to make munitions to be used against our own men, to see how this is done. I say no part of the public domain, whether it is the timber, the soil or the minerals, should be given away in any haphazard way. It is all very well for people to come here from other countries and help develop our resources and water powers, to supply capital and all that sort of thing; our policy in that regard, has been commendable all along the line, but the government should be very careful in what it does with the great assets we have in our natural resources, and use them to develop Canada and aid our empire.

I am surprised at some of the things that have been done this session in the name of the war, things which are not relevant to the war at all. It seems to me the work of this whole department is devoted to only one part of Canada and that Ontario has been given little or nothing in national parks, forests or aid in streams, as was shown last year in the debate on this very item. We are forgotten year after year on this item. In the way this matter has been dealt with by order in council, private negotiations and private contracts over the head of parliament I see signs of the same mistake that was made in new Ontario. I agree with the policy of permitting those with capital to help develop this or any other territory. I do not agree with the policy of giving away our resources, nor do I agree with the way we have surrendered our sovereignty unregulated, to Americans, in this area. We are supposed to be a nation with status dreams, but I have been surprised at what has gone on in this department in connection with the giving away of property secretly, and by order in council, over the head of parliament to those who do not belong to this country. Money is needed and capital everywhere for development, but there is no real protection in giving away the sovereignty of the people of Canada in regard to this property. I wish the minister every success in his work; ever since I have been a member of the house I have endeavoured to help him by offering constructive criticisms, but I point out that these are our richest assets and they should not be further squandered in such a way. After the war all we will have left to fall back upon will be our natural resources, and in future we will have to be very careful to have no more barter or sale or squandering of those resources as we have had in the past.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Lake Centre expressed some concern over a possible shortage of newsprint, and I think, by inference at any rate, argued that the men employed under this vote should be sent to cut pulpwood rather than pit-props and cordwood. I think that is a fair inference to take from his remarks.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think he said that in so many words, did he?

Mr. CRERAR: No, but the hon. member made reference to pit-props and cordwood and urged the importance of maintaining supplies of pulpwood; I think that is a fair statement. I do not take nearly as dark a view as my hon. friend does of the effect on American opinion of any shortage that may arise in connection with supplies of newsprint. I am aware that some agitation has been carried on in this connection by a few newspapers in the United States, but I think the great majority of newspapers in that country recognize the realities of the situation. I have not noticed, and I doubt if my hon. friend has noticed, any serious reduction in the size of newspapers published either in Canada or in the United States. In Great Britain, almost from the early days of the war, the newspapers were reduced in size by more than a half; some of them, I believe, carry only about a quarter of the news and views they carried formerly. After all, it is a question of man-power. You cannot put your hand in a hat and pull out man-power for coal mines, for transporting grain, to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce referred the other evening; for base metal mines, for the army, for the air force, for the navy and for all the multitude of things that require man-power to-day, including agriculture. There is no magic in getting these men.

Mr. GRAYDON: But there might be a good plan.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, hon. gentlemen opposite have talked about plans last year and this year, but so far as I am aware they have not at any time suggested any plan which might be adopted by the government. I can tell my hon. friend that if he can produce a plan it will receive the earnest consideration of the government.

Mr. GRAYDON: We did not suggest any magic.

Mr. CRERAR: There has been a great deal of criticism. I do not object to that, but there have been no constructive suggestions as to how the problem might be solved.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend has not been listening very closely to the debates, or he would not say that.

Mr. CRERAR: I suggest that the leader of the opposition read again his speeches and those of the members of his party, and see what he can extract from them in the way of constructive criticism. The other evening, on another vote, the hon. member for Lake Centre I thought argued that we should not keep these men at forestry work, and moved that the item be reduced to $1. He argued at that time, if I remember correctly, that there was a great scarcity of agricultural labour, and that these people should be sent to work on the farms. To-day the hon. gentleman comes forward with another suggestion, that they should be taken from the work of cutting pit-props and cordwood and put to work cutting pulpwood. Well, I recognize the need for pulpwood, but I think it is far more important to ensure, as far as we can, adequate supplies of fuel for our people next winter. I think that is more important than putting men, who might be doing that work, at the job of cutting pulpwood so that the size of newspapers may be maintained, and I think that would be the judgment of the country.

Under this vote I think I might make this explanation. The Department of Mines and Resources does not allocate these men. That is done now by the Department of Labour, under national selective service. When the problem with respect to conscientious objectors arose much earlier it was recognized, and I believe public opinion supported this view, that they should be put at useful work. Some of them were put to work in the parks. Others were put to work in building a section of the trans-Canada highway, in northern Ontario. That is connected with one of the votes we are now considering. They were given various tasks of that kind. But as the situation developed they were transferred from this work, much of which was considered not particularly essential, and put at more essential work. A year ago they were sent to British Columbia for the purpose of building roads, lookout stations, and the general development of the fire protection service in the forests of British Columbia. Lately they have been sent to agricultural labour. Some of them, particularly in western Alberta, have been cutting pit-props for use in the mines. Generally speaking they have been doing useful work of that kind.

We were asked by the Department of Labour, and prior to that by the Department of National War Services, to supervise the work of a number of these men. So far as this vote was concerned, that was put under our surveys and engineering branch, and they were put to work building part of a section of the trans-Canada highway in northern Ontario. There were 202 engaged in that work at the end of February. That number has dwindled to practically nothing. I note here that 96 have been sent to the neighbourhood of Elmira, Ontario, for agricultural work, and 77 to the Chatham district. So that today there are no conscientious objectors engaged in road construction in northern Ontario. They have been sent to other work, in agriculture. That is the policy which has been followed generally.

It is quite possible that next winter we may have to provide work for a number of these conscientious objectors. Probably they will be employed in the cutting of cordwood, or whatever other useful work they can do. But I doubt if parliament would get much support from the country if we were to say that the cutting of pulpwood to maintain ordinary supplies of newsprint was more important than, for instance, getting out fuel, and that sort of thing.

The hon. member also made reference to the need for foreign exchange, and read an extract published by the bureau of statistics in 1940. There is no question that in 1940, particularly the early part of it, our exchange situation vis-à-vis the United States was one that gave some concern. But that picture has changed altogether and, as my hon. friend probably knows, for the last year or more the exchange problem with the United States has not given the government any worry at all. Indeed there was a time when we thought we were accumulating too much American exchange in Canada. I believe that was the result, largely, of war orders placed by the United States with Canadian factories. The work these conscientious objectors are now doing on farms in Ontario and elsewhere is of first importance.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No one has suggested that the men should not be utilized for the purpose of getting out firewood, or that that was not an important piece of work. I have referred to the expenditure in connection with conscientious objectors, and it is one which runs into a tremendous amount of money. I would ask the minister this simple question: How many cords of wood did conscientious objectors get out in the last year? An answer to that question would tell whether or not this expenditure, running around a quarter of a million dollars, has been justified.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot answer the hon. member's question offhand. I know that as to conscientious objectors under the direction of the Department of Mines and Resources we could get that information. I believe I am correct in saying, however, that there has been a considerable amount of cordwood cut in some of the national parks, for use next winter. However, if the hon. member wants the information I believe I can get an estimate for him.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister said this party had made no suggestions. I shall make one, in connection with this item for the cutting of wood. The first suggestion I make is that the government remove that part of the National Resources Mobilization Act limiting service to the western hemisphere. I do that for this reason. We are bound to see a further reduction—and in my opinion the reduction has not yet started—in the size of newspapers. As the man-power situation gets tighter, and it is bound to get tighter, we are going to see all our newspapers, particularly the big revenue-producing papers, like the Toronto Star Weekly, and the Sunday editions of American papers, greatly curtailed because of a lack of newsprint. That is inevitable; I do not see how it can be avoided. It is like the invasion of Europe; it is one of the things which in my view is bound to happen. We need our pulpwood for direct war purposes. We need our cellulose for explosives. We are faced, as I see it with the problem of having to say to the American publishers, "I am sorry; we cannot supply you with newsprint." Then the American publishers will say to us, "Why have you a home defence army?" They will say, "You could supply us with newsprint if you did not have that army."

The CHAIRMAN: If I may be allowed to interject, the hon. member for Lake Centre thanked the committee for allowing him to make his statement this morning. I do not believe this discussion is in order. The man-power question was dealt with several times in the present session, and if the hon. member wishes to speak on that subject he will have an opportunity when we get into supply. I am sure the Minister of Mines and Resources cannot answer some of the questions put to him at the present time.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am simply answering the Minister of Mines and Resources, who said that no suggestions with regard to man-power had been made from this side of the house. At this time, with a market for every ton of newsprint for advertising purposes, a market more profitable than ever existed before, in my opinion we in Canada are in an inferior position, an intolerable position, with regard to American journals, unless we can say, "We cannot supply you with this newsprint because every individual is doing his utmost, under the same conditions as your men are, to win the war." That is my suggestion and that is all I have to say to the minister.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Could the minister give us some information with regard to this particular item? First, I should like the total number of men in these alternative service camps. I understand him to say that there were still 400 in British Columbia, but I should like to have the total for all Canada. Next, I should like to know if any of the men in these camps are doing work other than that of taking out fuel wood and cutting pit-props. I have in mind particularly whether any work is still being carried on in the national parks. In the correspondence I have had with the men in these camps there is no complaint that they are working too hard; there is no objection to that, but that they feel they are doing non-essential work. I have in mind that they are engaged, I believe, in putting in ski jumps or something of the sort in Banff national park, and in building roads in Prince Albert national park to attract tourist traffic. I agree with the minister that that sort of work is not very essential, and I think the committee will agree generally that these men should be doing more essential work.

I should like some information with respect to the wages and maintenance costs of these men. I understood the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) to say he was under the impression that the men were getting 50 cents a day as pay and $2.50 as maintenance. I could hardly credit that, and I should like a statement from the minister. An amount of $2.50 a day seems amazing for maintenance only, as the army is able to maintain men for $1 or less per day. The lumber companies call for tenders for the board and lodging of their men, and it is usually recognized that this can be done for $1 or $1.25 a day. I think it is a disgrace that we should pay a man only 50 cents a day and then expect him to buy clothing, work gloves, work shoes, overalls and things of the kind which are necessary for this sort of work. If these men are doing a proper day's work, and I assume they are—the government ought to see to it that they do a day's work—they should be paid more than 50 cents a day. If they are working in the field or in the lumber camps or for private concerns they would get much better pay than that. I do not want to see these men coddled, but I do want to see them given fair pay for a fair day's work and not be penalized because of any particular views they may hold.

Mr. CRERAR: My latest figures are for May 31. I wish to make it clear that these are men in the lands, parks and forest branch of the Department of Mines and Resources. On May 31 there were 106 at Banff, 56 at Jasper and 82 at Kootenay. I think I am correct in saying that these men were mainly engaged in the cutting of pit-props and cordwood, although there was one lumbering operation, and of course lumber is a scarce commodity. In Prince Albert there were 11, and in Riding Mountain there were 35. I think the 35 men in Riding Mountain park were all engaged in cutting cordwood. Their remuneration is 50 cents per day, and there is an allowance of 56 cents a day for provisions, which I assume would cover board and lodging. There is an allowance of 6 cents a day for medical and dental services, and 71 cents a day for administration expenses, including supervision of camps and personnel and also repair of equipment and purchase of materials and supplies other than provisions, which would cover axes, saws and that sort of thing. For the period under review the total cost per man was $1.83 per day. Mr. Chairman, which item are we considering?

The CHAIRMAN: We are taking together the three items covering alternative service work camps.

Mr. CRERAR: A moment ago I gave the number of the men in the surveys and engineering branch. The number of men employed on road work in northern Ontario as at February 28 was 202. I think almost without exception these men have all been absorbed into agricultural labour; instead of working on the roads in northern Ontario, they are working on farms. They receive the same wages, 50 cents a day plus their keep. I have not the board and lodging expenses in this case. The straw boss, I assume, the man who looks after a group, also a conscientious objector, is paid 75 cents a day.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Am I to take it from the minister's remarks that all these men are either cutting pit-props or cordwood?

[The Chairman.]

Mr. CRERAR: I think that is correct. There may be some lumbering operations going on in one of the western parks.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How is the cordwood disposed of? Is it sold to private companies for resale to the public, or does the government use it?

Mr. CRERAR: According to my information the cordwood is sold to municipalities and others under tender.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister did not answer the question I asked with respect to the wages paid these men. I do not know where you could hire labour in Canada for 50 cents a day. If these men are just out on a picnic, not doing much work, the government may feel that 50 cents a day is all right, but I cannot imagine that the government would go to the trouble of setting up these camps without seeing that they got a good day's work from the men. It seems to me that if we are facing up to the situation and saying to these men, "You must do some service for the state," a fair remuneration should be paid. If a man has certain views which he feels preclude him from doing military service, he ought to do some kind of service but he ought not to be penalized. We have no right to say to a man, "Under our constitution you have the right to hold certain views, but we reserve the right to punish you for having those views." If we are going to say to a man that he has a right to alternative service, then we have a responsibility to see that he is properly paid for that service.

When I was in Toronto some weeks ago I came across the case of a man who was a Quaker, a member of the Society of Friends. As the minister knows, for centuries these people have been averse to bearing arms. This man was married and he was to be sent to an alternative service camp and paid 50 cents a day. He had a family, and he just did not know what to do. In a case like that the government would be justified in paying a dependents' allowance to the man's wife. Does the government do that, and if not, why not? On what basis is this 50 cents a day being paid as a wage for the kind of work these men are doing?

Mr. CRERAR: This 50 cents a day remuneration was decided upon when the administration of the conscientious objectors was under the Department of National War Services. When these men are called up, if they are able to make a case for themselves as conscientious objectors they are allowed to do alternative service work, as it is described in this vote. It is one of these matters in which public opinion has an important bearing. If a young fellow proves to the tribunal that he is a conscientious objector and then you said to him, "You go and work on this job at $5 a day" there would be a great deal of criticism from the public. It is a question of arriving at what is fair and reasonable. I cannot say definitely whether conscientious objectors who are working on the farm get higher pay than those who are working on government jobs, because, I repeat, the Department of Mines and Resources is simply the agent of another department of the government in supervising the work of a number of these men. When they leave us to go to agricultural labour we have no further supervision over them, and I cannot tell my hon. friend what scale of wages they receive when they are put at other work.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not going to press the point, because I agree with the minister that conscientious objectors come under other departments. But he is an important member of the government, and I would ask him to use what influence he has with the other ministers who are responsible for administering these camps, because it looks to me like a piece of refined persecution to pay men 50 cents a day on this class of work. I agree that there would be a terriffic outcry from the public if you paid them $5 a day, but there is a happy medium. These men could be paid the equivalent of what is paid to men working in the bush, and they should be paid enough at least to pay for their clothing. When talking with some of them I have been told that it takes a lot of overalls and work clothes to do the kind of work they are doing. They should be paid enough so that they will not feel they are being imposed on because of their beliefs. I would ask the minister to consider seriously making some provision for the families of any of these men who are married, because certainly their families should not suffer because they hold a particular point of view.

Surveys and engineering branch—Prince Rupert-Terrace-Cedarvale highway, $5,000,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is this $5,000,000 the expenditure for this year, and what was the expenditure last year on the road, if any? Who are the contractors, and on what basis is the work being done? What kind of contract is it?

Mr. CRERAR: The work was undertaken on the recommendation of the Canada-United States joint defence board when there was great urgency to get this work done. A reconnaissance survey was made by engineers of the surveys and engineering branch of the Department of Mines and Resources. Then firms were asked to tender. As I recall it, there was no public advertisement inviting firms to tender, but all the large contracting firms in Canada were invited to tender, and the basis on which they were invited to tender was unit prices, so much per cubic yard for removing earth, so much per cubic yard for removing rock, and so forth. The work was broken down into various classifications upon which they would tender. Some eight or ten firms tendered. The work was divided into eight sections of from eleven to eighteen miles each, and competitive tenders were received from at least two contractors for each section.

The surveys and engineering branch had a considerable amount of data in their records as to the costs of road construction in country similar to the Prince Rupert-Terrace country. For instance, several years ago we built the Big Bend highway in British Columbia, and later built a road between Jasper and Banff. So that there was a great deal of information in the department to serve as a guide to what fair costs would be. That information was brought up to date so far as possible by ascertaining the costs of clearing airfields where similar work had to be done.

The tenders were received and the work was started about the middle of June, 1942. It was hoped that it could be completed by the end of last year, but the contractor ran into very considerable difficulty. There was difficulty, for instance, in keeping labour on the work. The wages paid were set by the war labour board, but there was competition for labour, as hon. members know. I think the member for Vancouver East is aware that extensive work was being carried on by the United States authorities in northwestern Canada and that it took some time to get labour difficulties ironed out. For one reason it was difficult, even after wages were set by the war labour board, to hold men on the work. In addition, there were serious difficulties in carrying on the work in autumn and winter because of rain and snow. Moreover, a section of the road runs very close to the railway. At any rate, for a variety of reasons of which I have given a few, the work did not make the progress which it was anticipated it would make. Last year there was spent on the highway $2,964,000, that is, for the fiscal year to March 31. The vote we are asking for now, it is expected, will complete it.

I should like to emphasize how difficult it is, under all the fortuitous conditions which exist, to make estimates that are accurate. I asked the director of the surveys and engineering branch, "Do you feel pretty certain that the vote asked for here will complete this work?" He said, "Yes, I think it will, but conditions may arise which will vary it; it might be 10 per cent under or 10 per cent over." But I would hesitate to give even that figure to the committee as a final figure. All I can say is that in the face of very great difficulties the work has progressed and it is expected that some time this autumn the road will be open for, at any rate, fairly light vehicles.

Mr. MacINNIS: I hope the minister will understand that I am not criticizing at all at the moment; I am trying to get information.

Mr. CRERAR: Quite

Mr. MacINNIS: I realize that there was great urgency for the road in this particular area, after Pearl Harbor. The communications between Prince Rupert and the country to the east might, under the conditions which prevailed, have been closed altogether. However, the minister did not tell me who the successful contractors were in the first instance, and if these same contractors are carrying on at the present time.

Mr. CRERAR: I should mention that many of these contractors had to be secured in eastern Canada. Contracts were awarded as follows: section 1, to E. J. Ryan Construction Company Limited, Vancouver; section 2, Rayner Construction, Limited, Leaside, Ontario; section 3, Tomlinson Construction Company Limited, Toronto, Ontario—who have also an office in western Canada; section 4, Standard Paving, Limited, Toronto, Ontario; section 5, MacNamara Construction Company Limited, Leaside, Ontario; section 6, Dufferin Paving Company Limited, Toronto, Ontario; section 7, General Construction Company Limited, Vancouver, B.C.; section 8, E. J. Ryan Construction Company Limited, Vancouver, B.C. Ryans tendered and got two sections.

In regard to the other question asked by my hon. friend: some of the contractors have not been able to complete their contracts. In one or two cases they have given up the contract and it has been taken on for their particular section by one of the other firms, and in one instance, by another firm, the Northern Construction company and W. J. Stewart Limited. I am not certain where their head office is, but I think it is in Vancouver.

Mr. STIRLING: Was the Ryan company one of those who gave up the contract and whose contract was taken over by another firm?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, the Ryan company was one of those. I do not know whether it was the only one or not. It had two sections, and arrangements had to be made, I believe, on both.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understand that after the Ryan company gave up the work, I think for financial reasons, two companies, possibly interlocking companies, known as the Highway Construction Limited and the I. C. Construction Company Limited of Vancouver took over the contract; but I understand that later the contract was sublet to a United States company, the Murphy Company of Washington or Oregon. Has the minister information on that point?

Mr. CRERAR: No, we have no knowledge to that effect.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand now that approximately $2,900,000 has already been spent—

Mr. CRERAR: Up to March 31 last.

Mr. MacNICOL: —and another five million dollars is asked for to complete the work. A year ago, if I recollect aright, we were told that the whole of the work would cost approximately $5,000,000; so that it is running much more than was anticipated.

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that when the work was undertaken it was impossible—

Mr. MacNICOL: Oh, the difficulties were immense.

Mr. CRERAR: —to give anything in the nature of a detailed estimate. Sometimes engineers are optimistic as to the costs of works undertaken.

Mr. MacNICOL: They like to get the work started.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, I will leave that observation to my hon. friend. At any rate the difficulties were almost insuperable, and it is not surprising to me that the actual cost will be substantially higher than the estimated cost. But it was represented that the work was necessary and urgent, and we tried to meet those conditions.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not opposing it; I think it is essential work; I am glad it is going on, and I hope that when it is completed the minister will try to organize the continuation of the road through the mountains so that there will be some connection between east of the Rocky mountains and the coast through northern British Columbia. It passes my comprehension that at present there is no way of getting through from east of the Rocky mountains in the Peace river area to the coast by road or by rail direct.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister said that sometimes engineers are optimistic. I have always found engineers very conservative, but I also found contractors, when government money was concerned, extremely reckless.

Mr. CRERAR: The estimates of cost which we gave a year ago were based on information supplied by engineers. I do not criticize the engineers for that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not criticizing them.

Mr. CRERAR: I made clear at that time the difficulty of making precise estimates of cost, because we were going into an uncharted sea, so to speak, and the work had to be pushed with the greatest speed. Had it taken five years to do it, the cost would have been substantially reduced.

Item agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Employment of persons of the Japanese race and/or Japanese nationals, $2,200,000.

Mr. STIRLING: One piece of employment that comes under this item is the work on the Hope-Princeton road in British Columbia. That is a road the completion of which has been greatly desired for many a long day. At the Hope end the royal engineers sent out in 1862 from Chatham to New Westminster began the making of the road, but there has not been communication through. From the Princeton end spasmodic work has been carried on for many years, and now a road of sorts exists from one end for about fifty miles. There is a gap then of about ten miles through which there is not even a trail. The Japanese have been used in gangs to further this work, and at the Princeton end they have done a certain amount of valuable work in renovating the road as they found it and putting it in usable condition. A party of business men from Princeton recently made a trip all the way from Princeton to Hope and have reported on what they saw. They realize, as I do, and as everyone does, that to provide road machinery at a time like this is no easy matter. The provincial government has supplied some, but it is pretty old machinery and is forever breaking down. Still, progress has been made at the Princeton end. But when they clambered through the gap and came out on the road which ends in Hope they found that the work which the Japanese gangs were supposed to be doing was, to put it mildly, going extremely slowly. Can the minister give the committee any information with regard to the amount of work which it is hoped will be available from these gangs of Japanese labourers, and whether it is possible to hasten progress at the western end?

Mr. REID: Serious allegations have been made regarding the conduct of the men in Tashme camp. As pointed out by the hon. member who has just spoken, a group of board of trade members, hearing reports of what was going on in regard to the work done by the Japanese, made a tour from Vancouver, Chilliwack and other points to investigate the matter fully. There were quite a number in the party and this is what they saw. I quote:

> Out of 800 males in the camp . . . not more than 100 are working at any one time on the completion of the Hope-Princeton road from the coast end.
> "The Japs were sitting on the side of the road. They all scrambled to their feet when they saw a car approaching. There should be at least a good foreman bossing each gang," reported Frank Hall at the dinner meeting here in Chilliwack.
> Speaking of the Tashme camp, Earl Brett declared: "Men were hanging around the corners in town. On the road there was nobody bossing the job. Every gang was sitting down."
> "We only saw one truck actually working," Mr. Hall added. "We saw one shovel in action. That was all the road building in operation."

They give credit to the workers on the other end of the highway where they say good work is being done by the Japanese. As regards the work done at this end of the highway, the men at Tashme camp are having a sit-down strike. In view of the large appropriation, $2,200,000, I think, a full statement should be made as to what these men are paid and how the work is carried on. Not long ago we passed an estimate of $500,000 to provide wages for Japanese to cut wood. About fifty per cent of the Japanese have been removed from British Columbia. In other words we have a total of $2,700,000 for wages for a relatively small number of men. We are entitled therefore to know how these men are paid, what control is kept over the Japanese, and what truth there is in this story, and in the story which has been given publicity in Vancouver and Fraser Valley that only one hundred men out of eight hundred are working and that these Japanese are hanging around the towns with no one in charge. It is a serious allegation, and the committee is entitled to a full explanation.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. CRERAR: When was that report made?

Mr. REID: July 9.

Mr. CRERAR: I think there must be some error in the report. As at July 3, 1943, there were 123 Japanese employed on the Hope end of the Hope-Princeton road and 164 on the Princeton end, or a total of 287 Japanese at work at that time. So that the report that there were 800 working is not correct.

Mr. REID: I did not say that. The report is that out of 800 men only 100 were employed at one time.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know about that. Better progress has been made at Princeton than at the other end. At present 73 miles of road are passable, with some 16 miles yet to be completed. Some preliminary work has been done on this 16 miles. It is hoped that this gap can be brought into fair condition this season. In regard to the wages paid the Japanese, the following classes receive the amounts indicated: Labourers, 25 cents an hour; labour and first-aid men, 30 cents an hour; straw boss, 30 cents an hour; axe men, 30 cents an hour; blacksmiths, 30 cents an hour; driller by hand, 30 cents an hour; carpenters, 35 cents an hour. Cooks receive from $50 to $60 a month with subsistence, depending on the number of men in the camp. The men are charged 75 cents a day for meals and living quarters and $1 a month for medical attention. The 75 cents would have to be deducted from their daily earnings.

Mr. REID: How many men are to be employed? The appropriation is rather large.

Mr. CRERAR: Last year the expenditures to March 31 for administration here and in the field was a little over $8,000. There was spent on the Hope-Princeton road $358,000. I have not the break-down to show how much was spent on each end of the road, but that was the total on the project. There were several other projects in British Columbia. There were the Yellowhead-Blue River road and the Revelstoke-Sicamous road, and a number of these Japanese were taken to northern Ontario to do work in the Schreiber district. The total number employed in all these projects in British Columbia and Ontario on June 5 was 827.

Mr. REID: I still say that the appropriation is a large one, $2,200,000 for roughly one thousand men.

Mr. CRERAR: There has been a general reduction in the number of Japanese employed on these projects. Some of them have gone to logging camps or lumbering operations, and I believe an additional number, though I am not certain of this, were taken to Manitoba to work in the sugar beet fields. At any rate that was the number employed on all these projects as of June 5.

As to the other point raised by the hon. member for New Westminster, quite frankly I do not think we can get out of these Japanese, with the conditions under which they are working, the amount of work they should do. There is no doubt there are certain difficulties in reaching that objective, and those difficulties are rather hard to contend with. Ordinarily, when you have labour employed on a road project, if the men are malingering on the job you very quickly dispense with their services. But we cannot dispense with the services of the Japanese because they are not there primarily to build roads; they are there under a form of detention, and under those circumstances we just have to make the best of it. Taking the projects as a whole I think there has been a reasonable amount of satisfactory work done.

Mr. REID: What provision is made for the keep of those in camps who do not work, do they keep themselves? There are numbers in the camps who are not working. Do they provide for themselves, or are they paid so much for cutting wood and doing chores around their own camps?

Mr. CRERAR: If they do not work they are not paid. They have to be provided with food, and their living conditions have to be up to a certain standard. As I recall now, on a few occasions the Japanese protecting power in Canada, which I believe is Spain, has made an examination of the conditions in these camps for report back to the Japanese government. Quite properly we have to maintain as far as possible the provisions of international conventions dealing with matters of this kind.

Mr. STIRLING: It is obvious that there is no use paying them money if they do not work.

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Item agreed to.

Assistance to national advisory committee for children from overseas, to supplement funds the committee has obtained by public appeal, $75,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are any children still coming to this country from Britain under the government-sponsored scheme which was in operation some time ago?

Mr. CRERAR: No, there have been no children come under the sponsored scheme since the summer of 1940. Some 1,500 children came out under that scheme, in addition to several thousand who came to Canada under private arrangements. Just here I should like to pay a tribute to the Oddfellows of Canada and other private organizations and individuals which have subscribed generously for the maintenance of these children. From these sources over $52,000 has come to the department, of which $30,800 came from the Oddfellows. Not long ago I had the pleasure of having handed to me by the hon. member for Lincoln, the grand treasurer of the order, a cheque for $7,500, as I recall it, which was the third or fourth contribution made to this cause by the Oddfellows. It is a pleasure to pay this tribute to the very fine interest the Oddfellows, particularly in Ontario, have manifested in the welfare of these children.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is a well-deserved tribute.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Item agreed to.

To provide single minimum cost of transportation, ocean and rail, of wives and dependents of members of the Canadian forces overseas, $100,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Under what circumstances is this money expended, and who are entitled to come under this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: Last year $50,000 was released from the war appropriation for this purpose, of which $20,213.83 was spent. Many of our soldiers who have gone overseas have married in Britain; I believe the total of such marriages now exceeds eight thousand. Occasionally some of those soldiers are returned to Canada, and this money is to provide transportation to this country for their dependents. I do not know how much of it will be required.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that a matter of right or a matter of policy or what?

Mr. CRERAR: It is a matter of policy on the part of the government. We have kept a pretty strict control, for which we have received some criticism, over dependents in Canada going to join men of the services in Britain.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the government pay those expenses, in any case?

Mr. CRERAR: We have not permitted them to go. Hon. members may recall that at the end of the last war more than fifty thousand wives and dependents had to be brought back from Britain at public expense. It was not only the matter of the expense; there was also a very serious shortage in transportation facilities. In this war soldiers' wives have not been permitted to go to Britain to join their husbands; I cannot think that there have been any exceptions to that rule. On the other hand, as I stated a moment ago, many of our soldiers married in Britain, and naturally when they return to Canada they want their wives and dependents to come with them. This item is to cover that expense.

Mr. GRAYDON: As I understand it, this vote is to be used to bring the wives and dependents to Canada when members of our armed forces are transferred to this country?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. In some cases they are discharged.

Mr. QUELCH: What class of transportation is provided? Is it tourist on the trains and second-class boat passage for other ranks, and first-class for officers and their wives?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand it is the same rate as applies in the army. The explanation I have states that this is to provide for single minimum cost transportation, by ocean and rail, of the wives and dependents of members of the Canadian forces.

Item agreed to.

To provide for ocean and rail fares and other expenses of Canadian citizens who are being returned from the far east, $100,000.

Mr. CHURCH: This is the first opportunity this session that the committee has had to discuss immigration within the empire.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: Before the session closes we should have a return to a question asked with respect to the government's policy on immigration, not only as it affects those returning from the far east as citizens but also the wives and families of soldiers, and British and other soldiers who would come to this country. It is due the country that we have some announcement before the close of the session. What is the government going to do about the immigration question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CHURCH: I am asking for a general statement before the house closes. You can bang your desks all you like, and go home; but I have the floor and I am entitled to be heard. I have been asking the government since January 27 about immigration, but I have not been able to get an answer. A return was tabled yesterday but only one question was answered. If the minister cannot answer to-day he may bring down his answer on the general estimates before the house closes.

Soldier settlement—Alaska highway, legal and survey fees, fencing and miscellaneous, $13,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Whereabouts on the Alaska highway is this work being done?

Mr. CRERAR: This vote is to cover the expenses incidental to the acquiring of a right of way, and also the acquiring of land for the extension of airport facilities. I believe there have been one or two other items required for the United States government. For instance, there has been the necessity to acquire land for warehouse purposes, for the storage of equipment and that sort of thing. Then there was some fencing, some damage claims and survey costs incurred last year. The appropriation for last year was $105,000. Of that amount $27,890 was spent in the last fiscal year, leaving an unliquidated encumbrance of $77,109. I am advised we will require a further appropriation, in addition to the amount mentioned here. I should like the committee to have a clear picture of what has happened. The amount of around $77,000, to which we were committed, will have to be provided, because the vote lapsed on March 31. That amount will be provided from the general war appropriation. These estimates were prepared many weeks prior to March 31. There were delays in connection with acquiring title to these lands, and having the legal details attended to, and the result was that the payments were not made before March 31.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Why were the payments made under a soldier settlement vote?

Mr. CRERAR: The soldier settlement board had experienced men in this kind of work. They were given the job of acquiring the right of way and getting these additional properties.

Mr. MacNICOL: There have not been any fences erected along the line of the Alaska highway. Does this apply to the supplying of fences north of Fort St. John, where the Alaska highway runs through certain farms for perhaps twenty-five miles?

Mr. CRERAR: Most of this expense is between Dawson Creek and Fort St. John.

Mr. MacNICOL: North of Fort St. John.

Mr. CRERAR: Between those two places.

Mr. MacNICOL: And north of that?

Mr. CRERAR: That would be included in this vote also. North of Fort St. John is pretty much crown land. But between Dawson Creek and Fort St. John there is a fairly well established settlement. In many instances the road is cut through private property. Right of way had to be secured; settlement had to be made and titles cleared.

Mr. MacNICOL: So that it does cover some miles north of Fort St. John?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand that the government built fences, and the money is for the construction of those fences?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

Corps of (civilian) Canadian fire-fighters for the United Kingdom, $957,850.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could the minister tell us something about the origin and organization of this corps of fire-fighters and what work they are doing in the old country?

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): I am proud to be able to speak for this worthwhile corps. Such a corps was asked for by the government of the United Kingdom when the Prime Minister was in England. After discussing the matter at some length with the national fire service of the British Isles it was decided that a corps of 400 men, all ranks, would be organized in Canada and sent to the United Kingdom to assist the national fire service. The need of this corps arose from the fact that there were numerous and terrible bombing raids by the German air force which was committing horrible atrocities upon many of the large cities and the countryside of Great Britain. The corps was authorized by an order in council passed in March, 1942, and the first detachment left Canada in May of the same year. Subsequently, as accommodation was available, other detachments followed, and the entire corps was in the British Isles last year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How many?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Four hundred. This corps was recruited with the assistance of the fire chiefs of Canada, who took a paternal interest in it because of their profession. I saw each detachment as it left Ottawa for the British Isles, and I was struck with the fine physique of the men and with the evident results of the training they had received in Canada. I told each detachment that I felt that they would be a credit to this country.

Mr. MacNICOL: Were they all fairly well trained?

Mr. LaFLECHE: About two-thirds of the men had had practical fire-fighting experience in Canada, and the majority of that two-thirds were members of permanent fire-fighting brigades. A number of men were members of volunteer fire-fighting brigades which are to be found in some of the provinces. The training that these men had obtained stood them and the corps in good stead. Before these men left Canada we took care to make certain that each individual was trained to look after himself and knew of the danger into which he was going. Each man received instructions on gas protection and other matters. The perils of the voyage over and of life in Great Britain were explained to each member of the corps, and felt certain that no member of it would suffer because of ignorance of what the enemy might do to him. When they arrived in Great Britain they were sent immediately to a pool operated by the national fire service and put in a month's training at a school operated by that service. Then followed a period of four months when the men were placed on active service in national fire service stations throughout the British isles. In this way the men obtained practical experience. When all the members had received this training on the ground under the supervision of the national fire service, action stations were allotted to the Canadian fire-fighting corps. The men are now scattered among four stations in Great Britain located at points where the danger is the greatest. Fortunately they have not been under fire very often because, thank God, the raids have diminished. But they have done their duty and have shown the benefits of their training. Friendly competitions have been held between the two services in the laying of hose, raising of ladders and other exercises, and our men have shown that they are fully capable of doing their duty.

Mr. MacNICOL: How are they taken care of if they are wounded, or what is done for their dependents if they are killed?

Mr. LaFLECHE: If the members of this corps are injured or killed, they or their dependents receive the identical benefits as paid to members of the armed forces in similar circumstances.

Mr. HAZEN: What are they paid?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Exactly the same as similar ranks in the army.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I understand that some of these men are conscientious objectors.

Mr. LaFLECHE: They are.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Many of them?

Mr. LaFLECHE: There were some conscientious objectors who were ready to meet the enemy but not to injure or kill him, and a number of these conscientious objectors were admitted to the corps. I should like to emphasize that every member of this corps is a volunteer and there is no distinction made as between the men mentioned by the hon. member and the other members of the corps. As I say, these men felt that they could participate in the war in this fashion when they were not ready to do so with a musket in their hands.

Mr. McCANN: Are the fire-fighters' dependents entitled to the same allowance and pension as the dependents of members of the armed forces?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Precisely the same. They fall under the Pension Act.

Mr. CHURCH: Four hundred Canadian fire-fighters all told is a very small number even for one city, let alone in a country like England. They are a very fine lot of officers. From what provinces do they come? Do the municipalities continue to give them their pay as firemen? What functions do these four hundred men perform in the old country to-day as compared with the days of heavy bombing of English towns in 1940 and 1941, when they surely were needed? Surely there is not the same demand for their services as fire-fighters now. In some of the cities and towns of England I understand that the women's army and the general armies do part of this work and thereby release men for the armed forces. There should be a statement from the minister as to the future of this corps for the rest of the war, the functions they are now performing, the length of the leave given them by their local municipalities and when they will return.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member has asked some interesting questions, and I shall be pleased to answer them as best I can in the order of their sequence. He made the statement that in England women were doing the work of fire-fighters. All glory to the women there and elsewhere who are helping to beat the enemy, but I suggest that, although there are always glorious exceptions, the women's activities in this field in Britain are in the main those of observers. I do not say that they have not been fighting fires, but generally speaking the women in Great Britain are used in this field as observers to watch for the approach of the dastardly enemy. The Canadian boys are and have been for many months stationed in some of the worst spots in the British Isles, those most exposed to possible enemy action.

The hon. member brought up an interesting point when he asked what would be done with this corps between now and the end of the war. That is a matter that has received and is receiving consideration. Some time ago inquiry was made of the proper authorities in Great Britain to survey the situation with a view to our possibly being able to employ their services otherwise in view of our limited man-power. I do not mean to say that we are necessarily going to disband this corps, but I think it is proper to say in reply to the hon. gentleman that should the fire-fighting services of Great Britain advise the Canadian authorities that the probabilities of action of the kind that existed when this corps was formed and sent over have greatly diminished, it may be necessary to consider taking some action with respect to the members of this corps. But may I say that Canada will never forget the fact that these men volunteered for a service considered then to be as dangerous as that performed by any human being in the British Isles, whether in uniform or not. Most of the members of the corps were members of city fire brigades, and with the experience they have gained in Great Britain I have always thought that when they returned they would make splendid fire chiefs in a great many of our cities in the future. A total of 107 municipalities supplied the 400 members of the corps.

Mr. HATFIELD: From what provinces?

Mr. LaFLECHE: They came from two municipalities in Nova Scotia, one in Prince Edward Island, 4 in New Brunswick, 14 in Quebec, 63 in Ontario, 4 in Manitoba, 10 in Saskatchewan, 4 in Alberta and 5 in British Columbia. So that it can fairly be said that this is a national corps.

Mr. CHURCH: Who is in charge of them in the old country? Is it the municipal authorities?

Mr. LaFLECHE: No.

Mr. CHURCH: Who is the commanding officer?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Chief Huff. He was formerly the officer in command of one of the fire-fighting corps of the Royal Canadian Air Force and now commands the Canadian Fire-fighters Corps. We all know that the Royal Canadian Air Force has its own fire-fighting organization, with different ranks. Before that, Chief Huff was fire chief of Brantford, and a very successful fire chief too, as instanced by the great success of his brigade in competition with those from other cities all across Canada and the United States. He has had a remarkable record of success in that regard.

Mr. HATFIELD: How many men from each province comprise the Canadian fire-fighting corps?

Mr. LaFLECHE: From Nova Scotia 5, Prince Edward Island 3, New Brunswick 4, Quebec 30, Ontario 287, Manitoba 27, Saskatchewan 22, Alberta 12 and British Columbia 32.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is it the intention of this department to provide some sort of decoration or recognition for these men when they return to distinguish them as having served in the fire-fighting branch of the armed services?

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I thank the hon. member for that suggestion. He will not feel hurt if I tell him that we have already had the same thought. It is too early just now to give a definite answer to my hon. friend, but I can assure him that the matter will not be lost sight of.

Mr. CHURCH: When men are needed in the armed forces, according to our own ministers, are you going to continue this policy? Did the corps take any equipment over with them? Is the minister aware that in Britain the military authorities have power to summon troops of all kinds in case of fire? As to the four hundred fire-fighters from all over Canada, all good men, I think it is time, in view of our man-power shortage, to revise the programme and give some consideration to the taxpayer.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have already stated twice this afternoon that the matter is under study and that I am awaiting another report from the authorities in Great Britain.

Mr. EVANS: Is it possible for the men in the fire-fighters corps to be transferred to the armed forces if they are physically fit and of military age?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes. Instructions have been issued permitting them to do so, because some have expressed such a desire. I might add that the commanding officer was instructed that he might even encourage such transfers.

Censorship division—
General, $19,000.
Information and records branch, $174,900.
Postal censorship, $1,070,800.
Censorship of publications, $127,400.
Telegraph and cable, et cetera, censorship, $346,970.

Mr. GRAYDON: This item brings to the committee one of the most important parts of the war appropriation resolution outside of the armed services and matters closely connected with the prosecution of the war. Censorship is a subject which has been engaging the attention not only of the government, but of parliament and the Canadian people. Many things must be done in time of war which will definitely interfere with the peace-time freedoms and liberties of our people, and we take that for granted, having agreed to and voted for participation in war. But the public are as jealous as ever of their rights, their freedoms and liberties with respect to interferences which may come to them in the ordinary course of civilian life, and they take a keen and active interest in censorship. The opening of mail, the tapping of telephones, the inhibitions placed upon the press, and now also upon the radio, as envisaged in the latest directive of the board of censors —these matters demand that on an occasion such as this there should be full disclosure of the policy of the government with respect to interference with the rights of the subject in Canada and its relationship to the war effort.

It has been said many times, but it will bear repetition, that so long as the public is satisfied—and it is the duty of the government to satisfy the public on this point—that these inhibitions and prohibitions and other interferences with personal liberty are in the interests of the war effort, the government can rely upon the public to support to the full the measures which are required. Therefore in bringing to the attention of the government certain features of the censorship, I do so in that smaller field, if I may so term it, wherein there is doubt whether the censorship has gone beyond the point required for security reasons and for the prosecution of the war, and has "slopped over", to use a street term, into a field where the rights of the public are unnecessarily curtailed.

The question of censorship, how far it should go, and alleged abuses of it, have been the subject of newspaper comment in various parts of Canada. I have no desire at this time to cite in extenso the comments made by those who are operating in the field of communications—I mean the press itself. But there has been some uneasiness, and it has given rise to expressions of opinion with respect to censorship of which the government must take cognizance. Recently there have been instances in which the press have taken grave issue on the matter of the extent to which these regulations, directives and orders have gone. Fuel was added to the flame when on June 22 of this year there appeared in one of the national newspapers, the Toronto Globe and Mail, a letter which seems to me unusually significant, because it came, not from a member of the public who is unacquainted with censorship and orders, but from one who has a lengthy and comprehensive knowledge of these matters. I wish to read a letter which was written by Doctor W. J. Edmondston Scott, M.A., who is cited as having been a censor in languages of central and western Europe between 1939 and 1942. This is what Doctor Scott has to say:

The forthright editorial on "Scandalous Censorship" in the issue of June 16 shows that the Globe and Mail still ranks ahead of its contemporaries in being "soond" in doctrine and unusually well informed. From an inside viewpoint it would appear that practically anyone who dares express an opinion on any subject, with or without a political flavour, can have his name put on government files, via the inquisitorial censorship, because of a multitude of topics covered by the regulations, rules and memoranda—from the premier's gossip at funerals down to the abuse of soap and towels. Many folks may say they don't care a hoot; but it's a different matter when some day they discover that, whether in search of jobs through employment or national selective or other government agencies, their chances of obtaining work or preferment, or perhaps the boot, may depend upon what information is listed against their names on file.

"Nation-wide indignation," as you call it, cannot fail to be aroused when Canadians learn the facts—especially employers who stand up against any pressure that may be brought against them to suppress information which is in the public interest to disclose; professional men with a regard for truth but whose freedom of opinion is restricted by inspired attacks in the press on public men and the intelligentsia; as well as the labouring classes, whose union leaders receive the same watchful attention as foreign spies.

And what shall one say of women who are carrying more than their share of the burdens of war? They, too, are taking a deeper interest in the problems of war and peace—a fact that needs no comment. Yet this Ottawa racket already visualizes the women of Canada as a potential menace to the principles of democratic government, which the editorial maintains are being openly travestied by ministers who cling to "the delusion that they are Liberals."

The fact is the Liberal government sees the writing on the wall. It has ceased to trust the people of Canada, so the inquisition is now in full swing. So curious was the cabinet last year in the possibility of women organizing or federating their social and political clubs and unions after the war, so as to make their voice heard in the national councils, that a special memorandum, dated May 1, 1942, was issued to examiners which said that:

These are the terms of the censorship regulations:

"All letters observed in the mails containing information regarding women's political activities in all parts of the world and women's activities in connection with post-war reconstruction should be specially submitted to this office and file reference C.11292-38 quoted."

Reread in the light of the editorial, this should not appear as just another sample of petty politics but a deliberate and frontal attack on the rights and liberties of millions of women who are being denied the freedom to express their opinions within the law, unless they care to risk the chances of being later penalized, from what the Minister of Justice has styled the "information in his hands."

Worthless gossip, maybe, but immensely potent for backstairs intimidation. Any argument that the cabinet's memorandum ordering the censors to inquire diligently into the private history of women able to express their political views on paper can be correlated to the government's will to victory is refuted by its post-war character.

I bring that to the attention of the house because it has been so widely commented upon in every section of Canada. It is a matter which has evoked interest, and that interest has arisen largely from the fact that this was not just an ordinary person, who knew nothing about censorship, who was writing. Since it has been placed before the public in many parts of Canada, I put it on the record in order that the government may have an opportunity, and the minister in particular, to show the people of Canada exactly where we stand in relation to the matters therein dealt with.

Throughout the country generally there is a disposition among the people to know what is going on behind the doors of censorship in Ottawa. There is a desire, and I believe a proper and well motivated desire, on the part of the public, if they are to have these regulations and these interferences, to be acquainted with the reasons therefor, and in all fairness they should know to what extent the regulations may properly go. It is not too much to ask, and I urge upon the minister that in his statement in reply this afternoon, to the extent that national security will permit, he open the door and acquaint this house and the Canadian people with the exact situation in the matter of censorship, thus clarifying matters and making for much greater confidence among the people.

It is not greatly to be wondered that the average layman is confused about the whole question of censorship. Most people regard censorship as just one of those extraordinary conditions that one must put up with, and they put up with it cheerfully so long as it is necessary for the safety of the state. But when regulations made by ministers of the crown are so interpreted on certain occasions as to indicate that they go very much further, in the minds at least of certain ministers of the crown, one cannot help feeling that the public may properly be excused if they entertain some fears about the extent to which censorship regulations and orders may be invoked. All hon. members, I believe, will recall that in one particular instance in this house, and it is not so long ago, the Minister of Justice, after an inquiry had been made with regard to the statement of a candidate, a former member of this house, who was seeking office in a provincial contest, expressed his views as reported in Hansard. The candidate in question had made a statement which was allegedly controversial and which allegedly should not have been made against the judiciary of Canada, and a very enlightening reply with regard to censorship came from the Minister of Justice. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) had properly asked a question with regard to the incident. Let me read both question and answer so that there will be no dispute on the point. I quote from Hansard of June 23 of this year at page 3930.

> Since no one else has seen fit to do so I should like to direct a question to the Attorney General relating to a dispatch appearing on page 4 of the Toronto Globe and Mail of this morning. A former member of this house, an old parliamentarian and a lady with a keen sense of humour, is alleged to have stated in Kenora last night that "she had never met a progressive judge" and that "judges are all political heelers or they would not be judges." I am aware of the parliamentary rules, but I want to say that many of these overworked judges have lost their sons in this war, and I think some statement ought to be made in this connection by the Minister of Justice.
> Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Minister of Justice): My attention was directed to this short dispatch just a few moments ago. Certainly it is regrettable that declarations of this kind should be made by or attributed to persons so well known as Miss Macphail, who for a number of years was a member of this house. The statement is as unfortunate as it is unfounded. Declarations of this kind can have no other effect than to diminish the respect of the people for the administration of justice in this country, and as such they are most deplorable. I shall direct the attention of the censors to this dispatch, and see if arrangements cannot be made that publicity will not in future be available for matters of this kind.

The answer given by the Minister of Justice opens up in the public mind a whole avenue of questions, because if matters not pertaining to the war, matters which could not by the widest stretch of the imagination have anything to do with national security, are to be so regarded; if the advisers of the crown are of the opinion that censorship may be extended to that length, then parliament and the country have a right to a declaration by the responsible minister on behalf of the government to show exactly where the public does stand and what the public may expect in the way of further extension of censorship interference. I must confess that in my opinion the matter may well assume serious proportions in this dominion.

I am not going to give any further citations at the moment, but here we have two instances which may perhaps be regarded as examples and illustrations of the sort of thing which may readily occur under a bureaucracy such as the board of censors. I could not wish, nor do I think any hon. member of this house would wish, to take the position that there should not be censorship in time of war. That is something which I think must be approved by this House of Commons. At the same time the question of the care that British people all over the globe have always exercised to see that there shall not be undue interference with the rights of the subject enters into this debate; for in connection with the whole matter of the censoring of news and communications, and all the widespread ramifications over which the board of censors has jurisdiction, we as a people and as a parliament are entitled to know how far the government have gone in unnecessarily interfering with those rights, where the security of the state is not involved. We should know also what is to be the policy of the government in future. What is perhaps more important for us to know is whether the statement made by the Minister of Justice represents government policy. If it does not, I believe the fact of a minister of the crown speaking as he did requires some explanation by the government. If that statement does not represent the policy of the government, then I say the censorship regulations deserve condemnation rather than commendation at the hands of this house. I do not think by any stretch of the imagination this parliament could agree to the proposition that an ordinary statement on a civil matter, which perhaps did not meet the views of the government or certain sections of the people, should come under the censorship regulations.

I leave with the minister those two matters, and suggest that if they are answered satisfactorily it will go a long way toward restoring confidence in the minds of the citizens of this dominion.

Mr. CHURCH: A return was brought down in this house last week with regard to the whole matter of censorship generally. I raised this question when this war broke out. In the last war the gentleman usher of the black rod, Colonel Chambers, a very able man, was the press censor with only a very small staff. At a meeting with the press he laid down certain rules and regulations which applied throughout the war. In doing so he followed the British system, which had existed ever since the present Prime Minister, Mr. Churchill, was a war correspondent in the South African war. What was that policy, which I say should have been continued during this war? Here is what I said on November 20, 1940, at page 276 of Hansard:

I believe the time has come when the press censorship in Canada should be abolished entirely and we should go back to the good old British system, leaving the responsibility for censorship as largely as possible to the voluntary effort of the press. This is what Britain is doing. There are one or two press censors there who supervise things but the press is left largely alone. In my opinion, it would be far better for the Canadian people, and it would make for the dissemination of more reliable information, if that policy were followed in this country. After all, the press has certain duties to the public. It is the medium through which the government of the day can impart information to the people, and I submit that it should not be trammelled, but should be let tell the truth. Truth is the first victim of this war, and self-respect is the victim of neutrality.

But what happened? A large department was established, and we have seen the result; the public of Canada know less about the war or its causes, or external affairs, than almost any other people in the world. I have asked for several returns in regard to this matter, and the last one was brought down on July 14; it was sessional paper No. 341A. I asked:

1. What has been the annual cost of press censorship since the beginning of the war?

2. Who are the press censors, (a) in Ottawa, (b) in Toronto, and what experience have they had for such work?

3. Who appointed them, and what are their salaries, travelling expenses, and all other emoluments?

The answers were as follows:

1. 1939-40	$ 29,614 54
1940-41	73,088 47
1941-42	80,515 70
1942-43	106,645 55*

* (This figure includes cost of both press and radio censorship, which were amalgamated as at July 1, 1942. The approximate cost of press censorship for this year would be $82,000.)

2. (a) Wilfrid Eggleston, chief censor of publications; fifteen years' experience in newspaper work, including nine years as member of the parliamentary press gallery.

I believe he was formerly with the militia department, and wore a uniform.

Fulgence Charpentier, chief censor of publications; fifteen years' experience in newspaper work including ten years as member of the parliamentary press gallery; service with Canadian army, 1918; studied law at Osgoode Hall, Toronto.

Jacques Girouard, censor of publications; six years in publicity and newspaper work.

R. W. Baldwin, censor of publications; sixteen years in newspaper work, including one year as member of the parliamentary press gallery.

(b) Charles S. Grafton, regional censor of publications; twenty-four years' experience in newspaper work; service with Canadian army, 1915-18.

Bertram B. Perry, regional censor of publications; twenty-six years' experience in newspaper work; service with Canadian army and royal flying corps, 1915-19.

He was on the sporting department of one of the Toronto newspapers, I believe.

3. Wilfrid Eggleston—appointed by order in council under authority of P.C. 2882, adopted September 27, 1939. Salary: $15 per diem. (Since August 17, 1942, has been serving as chief telegraph and cable censor without additional remuneration.)

Fulgence Charpentier—appointed by order in council under authority of P.C. 2882, adopted September 27, 1939. Salary: No salary. (Mr. Charpentier has served without remuneration since February, 1940, as chief censor of publications. He fills the joint post of chief censor of publications and editor of French journals of the House of Commons.)

Jacques Girouard, appointed by order in council, under authority of P.C. 2882, adopted September 27, 1939. Salary: $14 per diem.

R. W. Baldwin, appointed by order in council under authority of P.C. 2882, adopted September 27, 1939. Salary: $14 per diem.

Bertram B. Perry, appointed by order in council under authority of P.C. 2882, adopted September 27, 1939. Salary: $10 per diem.

Charles S. Grafton, appointed by order in council under authority of P.C. 2882, adopted September 27, 1939. Salary: $10 per diem.

Press censors receive their actual and necessary travelling expenses when absent from the office in the discharge of censorship duties.

I think the time has come when the whole system should be revised. I fail to see the value of any censorship of publications, or what it has accomplished. Every department of the government issues dozens of booklets. As we all know, members of parliament receive such batches of pictorial papers and booklets filled with pictures that the waste-paper basket has come to be the most useful piece of office furniture we have. Just the other day we received a very beautiful booklet concerning the new $29,000,000 building in Montreal, showing the mural work and all that sort of thing. I hope my hon. friend will not get out a booklet like this about Christie Street hospital—this one on the Montreal station, with its mural work, cards and pictures and friezes of scenes down through the middle ages. The censors have not interfered with it, and it is full of gorgeous pictorial decorations from end to end. One picture is just like an opera, or like a musical comedy company giving a performance of Gilbert and Sullivan. Yes, this gorgeous affair, at a cost of $29,000,000, with mural exhibits just to remind us of the Greeks and Romans.

What censorship is there of these American publications? If one goes over to Niagara Falls or Fort Erie, what does he see? On all the news stands he will find booklets and weekly and monthly publications of all kinds about the mother country and all that kind of thing. If there were proper censorship a lot of them would not be allowed to come in. It was not allowed at the time of the last war, under the old chief censor of those days. And I can tell you this, that as far as this extensive press censorship is concerned I have had to oppose this policy from the start.

I realize there has to be a certain amount of postal censorship. I believe I have sent about half a dozen complaints from people to the minister's department, and he has looked after them very well. But with respect to these publication censors, and their travelling expenses to go round the country, that is quite unnecessary. Only a few days ago news came in from Sicily. That news was censored. The same applies to the north African situation and Canada's part in the desert victory, as I pointed out last spring. Instead of leaving it to the press and the gentlemen of the press—well, if the press did not report other proceedings better than in some cases they report the House of Commons, we might just as well meet in secret. However, I have confidence in the press of the country doing its duty splendidly in this time of war, as they have in the past. Sometimes the House of Commons is itself to blame for not receiving a better report. In these days it is overshadowed by the war.

I appeal to the minister to curtail these affairs, and to consider going back to the old censorship policy. Then, as to pamphlets and booklets, hon. members are getting sick and tired of all these picture books they have been receiving. They would be all right to distribute to the kindergarten or to the elementary schools.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand a number of people, who were formerly employed as censors with the duty of censoring letters in the Post Office Department, have been let out. Their services have been dispensed with. Has there been any change in the policy with respect to the censoring of letters? It has occurred to me there must be some change in policy, in view of the fact that the services of many of these people were dispensed with not very long ago.

I have a question with respect to the censoring of letters addressed to members of parliament, a matter that has been discussed in the house on several occasions. I bring it up again now because not long go I received a letter addressed to me with the letters "M.P." added, and directed to the House of Commons at Ottawa. It had been opened by the censors. If my memory serves me correctly this letter came within the last two weeks, after we had been given some assurance that the procedure was to be remedied. Have any instructions been given to the censors respecting mail addressed to members of parliament? If so, what were those instructions? I would have no objection if the letter had been sent to me at my place of residence, without the letters "M.P.". But I do object strenuously to the censoring of letters addressed to me as a member of parliament at the House of Commons in Ottawa.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have attempted to take some notes as hon. members have spoken, and I ask nothing better than to speak as openly as public security will allow, with respect to this matter of censorship. I am indebted to the leader of the opposition for placing his position so clearly before the committee. I can only trust I shall be able to state the case for censorship as clearly as he voiced—I shall not say his opposition, but his demand for the reasons why certain things have been done. I believe he has asked a fair question.

Before turning to the points mentioned by the leader of the opposition, however, I shall deal with what was said by the hon. member for St. John-Albert, who has asked whether any change has been made in the policy governing censorship. His question is asked because of something he has observed in, I presume, the city of Saint John, New Brunswick. My reply is that there has been no fundamental change, but that there have been, and possibly in the future there will be, changes in degree of application of the rules of censorship. That degree is precisely in proportion to what is deemed by security officers in Canada, the United Kingdom, the United States and perhaps elsewhere as sufficient to meet the needs of safety. What the hon. member has observed would seem to illustrate the point that, having regard to the volume of mail leaving that city, or for other good and sufficient reasons, there has been occasion for decreasing the number on the staff.

Mr. HAZEN: Is that the only city in which there has been a decrease in staff? I thought perhaps it had occurred in other places.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The situation is a changing one. The hon. member for St. John-Albert has observed quite correctly in his own locality a change in the degree of application of the policy, rather than a change in the policy itself. He has asked whether similar changes have occurred elsewhere. The answer is that they have. And they may change again to-morrow. To-morrow, for reasons which we cannot see to-day, it may be necessary to apply the rule more widely.

The other question raised by the hon. member has to do with letters plainly addressed to members of parliament. I have already apologized to two hon. members, because it is against the written instructions for outlying censors in Canada to open letters addressed to members of either house of parliament at Ottawa.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have any instructions been given that letters directed to members of parliament, and originating with members of the armed forces, shall be opened? Is the commanding officer of the company thereafter advised of the information contained therein?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall come to that point in a moment. I had only reached the point of making a distinction between letters which are censored by the organization we are discussing this afternoon and the censorship overseas over which we have not the slightest control, the regimental or unit censorship of letters posted by the members of a particular unit.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Or in Canada.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I illustrate? Like many other hon. members, I have a member of my family overseas. Each one of his letters addressed to me and clearly indicating the address is censored. At first I was a little bit hurt, but I ascertained that these letters were being censored overseas. When I learned that, any bitterness in my mind disappeared because I realized that I had no business to know of intimate matters relating to military operations overseas.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am referring to letters originating in Canada where there is no military censorship in the units.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member means letters addressed to members of this house and clearly indicated as such? If there is a censorship of such letters by the censorship we are discussing this afternoon—I cannot speak for any other—it would be against the written instructions issued to the censors. I can only apologize again to any hon. gentleman who has received such letters. I have apologized to one of the Vancouver members, as I did to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). If the hon. member for Lake Centre has been so treated, then I apologize to him. I wish to say that it is no action on my part which has resulted in these letters being mistakenly censored in Canada; what happens overseas is beyond us. Let me emphasize again, that the instructions to censors not to censor mail addressed to members of parliament are in writing.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there a directive dealing with letters addressed to members of parliament? If so, is there anything in the way of national security that would prevent the minister from giving us the details?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It is being looked up, and I intend to read it into the record. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) remarked that he would prefer to go back to censorship as it used to be. So far as I know the censorship we now have, the censorship we are now discussing, is a continuation of the censorship which was instituted at the beginning of the war. I think it is timely to say that the censorship exercised in the United Kingdom and the United States, and possibly in other united nations, could not be carried out unless we had a censorship such as we have in this country. I trust that careful attention will be given to this fact. Censorship as practised in Canada is a part of what might be termed joint censorship carried out as well by the authorities of the United Kingdom and the United States. Many of the things we do, although not everything, are done at the request of the United Kingdom or United States authorities.

I should like to say something about the statement made by the leader of the opposition. I have no idea of attempting to cut corners in making any explanation, but I believe that the exact position of censorship as we carry it out in Canada can be summed up in a few words. Our censorship is exclusively concerned with matters affecting the prosecution of the war. We are not concerned with anything which is not involved in the winning of the war. That is the official statement I have the honour to make to this committee. Censorship is an operation of war, nothing else. The Minister of Justice did not bring to my attention the incident which was referred to by the leader of the opposition. I assume that the reason for this was that upon reading Hansard and the regulations, he discovered that the matter was not subject to censorship.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Minister of Justice was wrong?

Mr. LaFLECHE: As I may be wrong fifty times to-day, and as I was wrong the other day.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is a strange statement for the minister to make, to say that one minister is wrong and then to put forth the supposition that perhaps he is wrong himself.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Not in this particular case.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think we ought to have some clarification of that.

Mr. LaFLECHE: If I am wrong, it is for my good friend to find me out. I was in the house at the time, but I was not fully seized of what was happening. There was some confusion. At any rate I may say that what occurs along such lines in Canada is that purely civilian matters are not a matter of concern to censorship.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There is no particular item covering the censorship of radio broadcasting. Has the minister anything to do with that, or is it under the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. gentleman will realize that we have been all over the field. The censorship which we are discussing now deals with the press and publication over the radio, radio broadcasting.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the minister indicate the basis of radio broadcasting censorship? I understand that each local station is held responsible for the broadcasting sent out. I do not believe all broadcasts are sent to censorship; I believe each station is held responsible, and this seems to be working quite satisfactorily.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Did I not quite grasp the question? The radio broadcasting censorship is carried out by the censorship we are now discussing. The rule is very much as the hon. gentleman mentioned. For anything that might hinder the successful prosecution of the war we hold the local manager of the broadcasting station primarily, and finally if you like, responsible.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is not necessary therefore for the broadcasting station to submit manuscript if the local manager is satisfied?

Mr. LaFLECHE: If the local manager wants to take the risk.

Mr. HAZEN: I receive letters from time to time from the maritime provinces on which the name of the place of origin has been obliterated from the postmark. Does that come under the minister's department?

Mr. LaFLECHE: That was not an act of the censorship we are now discussing.

Mr. HAZEN: Would the minister be prepared to tell us how many people have had their services dispensed with in connection with the censoring of letters during the last two or three months?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The best answer I can give at the moment is about thirty.

Mr. GRAYDON: A number of members have been calling "carried." The minister no doubt wants an opportunity, and I do not want him to overlook it, to explain the situation with respect to Doctor Scott. It is a matter which I think cannot be left unexplained by the minister. I know he has no desire to do that. I would not have raised the matter simply to leave it on the record, because it is too serious to leave on the record without its being dealt with by the government in such a way as either to give credence to the letter which was written, or to deny it. It is a matter of great importance and one which the minister should not overlook.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Again I must express thanks to the hon. leader of the opposition. While we are all anxious to conclude the business of the house as quickly as possible, I would not want the item to pass without my saying something on this case, which to me has some elements of sadness. May I say first of all that Doctor J. W. Edmundston Scott left the employ of censorship in August, 1942. Therefore I did not know him; at least I do not recall ever having met the gentleman, and what I say must be taken from reports I have received. I am grateful for the persistence of the hon. leader of the opposition in reminding me of this case. I should like to lay at rest definitely the thought which has become fairly widespread that "all letters observed in the mails containing information regarding women's political activities in all parts of the world and women's activities in connection with post-war reconstruction should be specially submitted to this office and this file reference quoted." May I say definitely in respect to the matter that the origin of it was not in Canada. It came from abroad, from a power with which we are most closely associated in this war. The thought did not originate in Canada, and anything done in this connection by our censorship was done by request of an extremely friendly and an extremely dear ally of ours in this war.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean that when we dictate a policy here with respect to censorship, those who are closely allied with us then adopt a similar attitude towards our censorship directives?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am certain that should Canada formulate a request such as this one, the other authorities so closely concerned with us in this war would do as we did on this occasion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there any joint censorship supervision by, say, the three Anglo-Saxon nations, Great Britain, the United States and Canada, or a joint censorship board which governs these directives which the minister now speaks of as being adopted by one country and then by another?

Mr. LaFLECHE: We might request, just as they made requests. But my hon. friend's main point was: Is there a joint body? No. But there is the closest and continual consultation among the higher officers of the three censorships mentioned by the hon. gentleman. It is reported to me that no report whatsoever has been forthcoming in respect to the request we had, and which I have just read. The results of that have been nil. It is reported to me that no report has been made by Canadian censorship in connection with that matter, which dates back now well over a year ago.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean that so far as the directive is concerned this country is simply ignoring it? Either the directive should be put into effect or there should not be any directive.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The directive was put into effect just as any other, but no report concerning it has been forthcoming. It may well be that it does not always follow that our censors throughout Canada will observe in the mails anything of the particular nature. May I make clear, too, that this is not a matter of gossip. Whether it emanates from the lips of a man or a woman, censorship does not care a snap of the finger about ordinary gossip. It is concerned only with matters affecting the war—nothing else.

[Mr. LaFleche.]

Mr. GRAYDON: But there is this man's own declaration that it covers the ambit of women's political activities. What have they to do with the war?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have read it into the record. It may have something to do with the war. I shall not say anything about Doctor Scott. I have already said what I have to say about directives.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask one more question about this item. When a motion for papers was moved in the house by the hon. member for Peterborough West the house took occasion to vote it down. The Prime Minister, after the vote had been taken and the issue decided, made a statement to the house in which he said that the documents which were called for in the motion would then, subject to security considerations, be tabled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He said so before the vote was taken. The Prime Minister made that statement both before and after the vote.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not going to take issue with the hon. gentleman, because in any event his statement is not germane to my argument.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is germane to my recollection, though.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend is trying to anticipate something. I was very innocent in my approach to this matter, but perhaps my hon. frend has something else in his mind. I was attempting only to draw to the attention of the committee the fact that when the vote was taken the Prime Minister said that there would be tabled and produced such of the orders, regulations, directives, et cetera as could be tabled by the government, having in mind considerations of national security. Will the minister give the committee some indication of what has been done and what the government intends to do with respect to that? In my opinion whatever could have been tabled should have been tabled before this debate took place. Actually this motion was on the order paper for some weeks, at any rate almost two weeks, and for one reason or other the minister delayed the passing of the order. Finally it came to a vote. That was the first indication we had that the government was not prepared to table at least some of the documents asked for. I do not think it is quite playing ball with the committee that we should have come to this debate without the government having informed us either that, for national security reasons, no documents could be produced—which statement has not been made—or that such documents have been made available to the members of the committee as are important and indeed vital to a proper and comprehensive discussion of the points at issue. I hope the minister will make a statement on this matter.

Perhaps the minister would indicate to the committee also the underlying reasons applying to censorship of letters which relate to foreign exchange control. I understand that in respect of letters going from here to the United States where foreign exchange is involved, censorship is in full operation, although I do not know to what extent. Will the minister give the committee some details with respect to that? It is a matter upon which the public would like enlightenment, because I have had correspondence and complaints connected with that phase of the censorship regulations.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I remind the committee that there was a motion on the order paper by the hon. member for Peterborough West for about two weeks, and that on three occasions before the matter came to a head, yesterday or the day before, I gave reasons why I was unable at the time to deal with the matter properly. The reason was that there was a gentleman with whom I felt it necessary to discuss the matter and who was not in town. I so stated on these two occasions. I did not hide anything, and I should like nothing better than to get rid of any material which is in question by bringing it before the house. But as I have already said, censorship is an essential arm of the services. Censorship exists only because there is a war. We cannot carry on censorship alone; neither can the allied nations carry out their censorship without the every-day assistance of the Canadian censorship. What we want to do is to find out things about the enemy which are of importance to us; his intentions, his activities, so that we can the better safeguard our boys overseas or on the seas or above the seas. We place a value upon information of this kind perhaps in direct ratio to the degree of desire on our part to know what the German censorship is doing. We feel that if we had all the details of the processes of German or Japanese or Italian censorship we could do a better job and we could ward off dangers to our country and to the people who are fighting our battles.

If you will recall, the motion went to a vote the other day and it was defeated. Immediately afterwards the Prime Minister offered to have the matter gone into very carefully and undertook that the Minister of National War Services should bring down such papers as in his opinion it would be safe to produce to the public. I am still going over some of these papers, although a vast number have been scrutinized already. There are papers which contain no military secrets, but I submit that the mere fact of making them public, as they would be were they tabled, would tell the enemy things about which he would pay dearly to know if the position were reversed; that is, how he is dealing with this business.

There is nothing we want to hide in this particular matter. I should be very glad to discuss these matters with any hon. member, but I would ask, indeed I would implore, hon. members to remember that we are playing with fire. There is no personal desire to keep them from the knowledge of any honest person. The Boche and the Jap—

Mr. GRAYDON: Did I understand the minister to say there is no desire to keep them away from any honest person?

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is what I mean to say.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister making a reflection on the membership with reference to tabling them in the house?

Mr. LaFLECHE: No, I did not say that at all. I meant that to give publicity to them would mean that they would immediately become known to the enemy. I did not make any reflection on any hon. member. I did in terms specifically say what I thought of the Boche, the Jap and the Italian.

Foreign exchange control is really part of economic warfare; it is another means of carrying the war against the enemy to a successful culmination. I am not anxious to make that widely known, but even the less important of our activities may illustrate the thought that by making anything concerning censorship known to the public we are to an extent helping the enemy.

Mr. GRAYDON: One more question before the item is passed. Since the beginning of the war has the minister gathered particulars as to how many complaints he or his department has had with respect to the improper opening of mail addressed to members of parliament at Ottawa?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I can speak only from my own knowledge during the time I have been what I am now. I certainly have not received more than half a dozen complaints, and nearly all of them have been such as have been mentioned to-day—letters addressed to members of this house and opened, against written instructions, by censors at outlying points.

Mr. BRUCE: May I ask the minister one question in regard to the removal of certain items from a letter in which criticism is made of a department, of an individual in a department, or of an organization and sending that information to the person criticized, together with the name of the writer. I was told, I believe by the Postmaster General, in reply to a question some time ago that this was the custom. Is it the custom at the present time?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I know of no such thing, and in view of the stated purposes of censorship I cannot imagine that anything would be noted in correspondence unless it had to do in some way or another with the prosecution of the war. If the hon. gentleman has a case in mind I should very much like to look into it for him.

Mr. BRUCE: I shall be glad to have the assurance that from now on this will not happen again, but I know of a case in which criticism was made having nothing whatever to do with the war, and an extract containing that criticism was taken from the letter, typewritten and sent to one of the departments, and ultimately reached the individual criticized.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I ask the hon. gentleman to let me know the details of that case?

Mr. BRUCE: I will tell the minister privately.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is a very serious matter.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I cannot say whether it is serious or not. I do not know about it.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the face of it, it is.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there a board that does the censoring of broadcasts over the radio? I know there are people at each station who do a certain amount of it, taking it upon themselves to perform that work. Who is the head of radio broadcasting censorship?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The gentleman who looks after radio broadcasting censorship is Mr. Shearer. Radio censorship is similar to newspaper censorship. Great reliance and confidence are placed in the newspaper and in the radio broadcasting station, and I must say that from both we have had excellent cooperation and I feel that our confidence has been well placed.

[Mr. LaFleche.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Are the broadcasts censored which are made by panel speakers over the Canadian broadcasting corporation? Are they censored before being released, or are they released on the responsibility of the person broadcasting?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Speakers may submit their manuscripts to censorship, but they do not have to. If a speaker does not and something goes out which is against the regulations, then the manager of the station is held to account. He becomes responsible.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): On two occasions I have directed attention to a charge made by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen in connection with broadcasting, and I have said the same thing myself, with reference to a broadcast made by Doctor Watson Thomson of Winnipeg some time ago in which he made some startling statements of one kind or another. I also asked Doctor James Thomson in the radio committee whether he had any comments to make and he said he had none. I am wondering if this is the kind of thing that is permitted. Let me read—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order. My hon. friend is about to read from the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I can read from them now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The report has not been adopted by the house.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No, but under the rules I believe I can read, can I not?

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, the hon. member would not be in order in discussing the proceedings of the committee, whose report has not been adopted.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then I will not read it, though I am not sure about that. However, this man, as a regular speaker over the radio, one of the panel speakers, said some drastic things about the British empire and the British people. He said, among other things, that it was about time that Canada got in line with the other nations, got busy and told Britain where she got off in connection with the situation in India, and a few other things like that, which to my mind were more or less subversive. They were things that should not have been said over the radio in Canada in a time of war. What would we think of Great Britain if they started to criticize the way in which we were handling something in this country? I feel strongly on that question and have expressed myself on it before, but I understand that nothing has been done about it, and this gentleman is still broadcasting. Are we to expect the same kind of thing again? I do not think the charge made by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen with reference to a man of this type, bringing to the attention of the people of Canada such a situation, should go unchallenged. We are entitled to more of a reply than we have received so far.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Of whom was inquiry made?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The general manager.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am sure that my hon. friend has stated all the facts correctly, and that being the case I join with him in condemning any man who speaks against either Canada or any of the nations fighting on our side. Naturally I shall read Hansard, note my hon. friend's words, and ask for a reply.

Mr. JAQUES: I associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for St. Paul's. The general tone of commentator broadcasting in this country is thoroughly subversive, anti-British and anti-democratic, and it is time some change was brought about and some of these people were taken off the air.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This is a most inconsistent attitude. This afternoon the leader of the opposition made a very fine speech and the minister made a very fine statement of policy. I hope that what he said is the policy of the government, that censorship should deal only with matters pertaining to the winning of the war and should have nothing to do with interfering with expressions of private opinion in reference to our internal policy or even empire policies. Now, when these hon. members want to use the censorship regulations to take off the air or to restrict in some way Doctor Watson Thomson or anyone else who expresses views with reference to matters that are of concern to all the people of the British commonwealth of nations, then I say you are defeating the very purpose for which these censorship regulations have been set up. I have not only listened to Doctor Watson Thomson's broadcasts; I have been careful to get copies of them, and to check them over. Doctor Watson Thomson himself is a Britisher, not long out of Edinburgh, Scotland, and he has never said anything derogatory to the British empire or subversive to our war effort. He has expressed opinions which one can hear expressed any day in the week at public meetings in Britain, in the columns of the Times or in Hyde park.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not very familiar with this matter, because I have not listened to the broadcasts or read what was said, but is not this the man who took a little time to deal with the Indian situation; and was it not a fact that many people felt that this was a matter which did concern the war effort? I am only suggesting that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, Doctor Watson Thomson did express his opinions with reference to the Indian situation, as have British members of parliament.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Without knowing anything about it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I imagine he knows a good deal more about it than the hon. member for St. Paul's does; certainly he knows enough about it to be able to discuss it intelligently. It does not matter whether the members of this committee agree with what he said, or whether I agree with it. The fact is that the man has a right to express a point of view contrary to that which other speakers were allowed time on the radio to express, and in my opinion the minister and the government will make a great mistake if they ever tolerate the use of these censorship regulations to muzzle any man merely because the views he expresses do not coincide with their own. I hope the minister will keep to the policy he enunciated this afternoon, under which these regulations will be used to prevent subversive statements or anything that would harm the war effort, but that they will not be used to prevent people from freely expressing their opinions, whether they be in criticism of anyone in this country or even in constructive criticism of other members of the united nations.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—short-wave station, $640,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: I shall be very brief in what I have to say on this item.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAYDON: The applause of hon. members is embarrassing, and does not encourage me to extend my remarks at all. I wish to take this opportunity to mention one matter to the minister in connection with the broadcasting corporation. I believe this item, dealing with the installation of a short-wave broadcasting station, gives me an opportunity to make some observations in connection with one of the factors which go to the root of the whole problem of broadcasting as far as public ownership in Canada is concerned.

Subject to the provisions of the act, the minister has jurisdiction over the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. As a fairly close student of that corporation for some years, and as a member of the committee which last session went rather deeply into the affairs of the corporation, I think I can state to-day, conscientiously and unequivocally, that one of the real difficulties in connection with the broadcasting corporation lies in the tragic weakness of the board of governors of that institution.

I believe the minister will be the first to agree that if there is one thing the broadcasting corporation needs it is public confidence, which is vital and essential to the success of any agency of communication. As long as the present situation is allowed to continue, however, public confidence cannot be maintained in that institution. You hear this on every side, and I am sure I am reflecting a large measure of public sentiment in this country when I make that statement. This afternoon I make a sweeping condemnation of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I condemn them on one ground in particular. After the recommendation brought in by the committee last year, I cannot conceive why the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation did not resign in a body, for in my opinion that would have been in the national interest. In expressing that broad condemnation of the board, I am willing to agree that there may be some good men who would have to take part in any such general resignation, but in all fairness to Canada and to the government I believe it was their duty to resign. I have taken that position previously, and I take it again to-day. If there is one thing above another which the broadcasting corporation should seek at all times it is to maintain and preserve a position of non-partisanship in this country. The people of Canada have a right to demand that there shall not be any shadow of suspicion in regard to partisanship on that board. I am not going to make special mention of the chairman, Mr. Rene Morin, but I will say that I do not think it helped, from the point of view of strict non-partisanship, to appoint as chairman of the board of governors a man who from 1921 to 1926 occupied a seat on the government benches in support of the Liberal party. I do not want to condemn him on that ground alone—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Alone?

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I should withdraw that; perhaps I was a little more careless in my phraseology than usual. In any event I would say that in itself would not be necessarily a ground for condemnation; but considered together with the situation that exists in connection with another member of that board, it makes a combination which I think should call for a complete reconstruction of the board of governors in the interests both of the broadcasting corporation and of our national life. Some three or four weeks ago the newspapers in this city and other places in Canada carried some interesting news with respect to another appointee to the board of governors. I refer to Mr. E. H. Charleson of Ottawa.

Mr. McILRAITH: A very fine man.

Mr. GRAYDON: I expected that would touch a tender spot. If I were in the place of the hon. member for Ottawa West, I would have interjected—but I would have made it more vehement than he has done. I think most hon. members of parliament usually know when they are going to be hit, before they are hit—and that is exactly what happened in this case.

I have never met Mr. Charleson, but I am condemning the system under which a member of the board of governors of an institution supposed to be entirely non-partisan, supposed to cater to the best interests of Canada, one in which public confidence must be maintained at all cost, can be chosen in this way. To say the least, I do not think it was within the bounds of strict propriety, nor do I think it was in the interest of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation itself, or in the interests of Canada generally that a member of the board of governors of that organization should, if the newspaper report is correct—and I have never seen it denied—have been one of those who would preside at the election of officers for the Liberal Association of Ottawa West some three or four weeks ago.

I am the last one who would suggest that there should not be a meeting of the Liberal Association of Ottawa West. That in itself is quite a proper procedure. But I do question—and it is questioned not only by me but by people throughout Canada—the propriety of a man holding a position in an organization supposed to carry the banner of non-partisanship, and at the same time presiding at a political meeting. Yet the government does not condemn this practice in any way. The man in question is left in his position, after having presided at the meeting of the Liberal Association of Ottawa West. To say the least, it was an improper thing to do. And if that is permitted, it would seem there is nothing to hinder any man on the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation doing the same thing.

I want to point out what I have pointed out before, namely that we need a new board of governors for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a board of governors of which there could not possibly be any criticism. Let us have men and women who are outstanding citizens of Canada. May I repeat a criticism I have made before, namely that of a board of nine only one represents labour. Does anyone seriously contend that one out of nine would be a fair representation of labour's claim in Canada? Of course it would not. Not only that, but we must remember that not one member of the board of governors comes from organized agriculture. On other occasions I have asked the Prime Minister if, when making his appointments, he would make sure that a farmer might be chosen. So far that undertaking has not been given. A farmer has not been chosen, although there is a vacancy on the board.

May I only repeat what I have said on other occasions, that in the interests of this national institution we should see to it that the governor takes heed of the public warning I am now giving, namely, that I ask for the resignation of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Let us have appointed to that board those who can command the confidence of the people of Canada. In any event there should be a wholesale resignation, so that there may be a wholesale reconstruction in the national interest, and also in the interest of the government and of parliament.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to inquire if the capacity to campaign in an election is one of the qualifications for membership on the board. I understand that the member on that board who comes from Nova Scotia actively campaigned on behalf of the Liberal party during the last election in that province. In view of the information submitted to the committee by the hon. member for Peel, it appears to me that to a considerable extent the ability to campaign must be one of the qualifications for these men to serve on the board. It would seem that they would have to be able to campaign at least on a political platform, if not over the air.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I agree with every word said by the leader of the opposition with respect to the report. I do not agree with what is contained in the report. It may be that the recommendations in it were carried out last year by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. But I do not see how the government, in view of that report, can still carry on in the same way, particularly when it was pointed out that the independence of the corporation from partisan control is to be assured by its constitution.

We had before us in that committee one of the outstanding electrical engineers on the continent, a gentleman who is professor of electrical engineering at the university of Toronto. Mention is made in the report about keeping the channels open. May I point out the importance of filling up our channels, and of taking full advantage of our opportunities under the Havana agreement. I say that already, through the attitude and the policy of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, many of those channels have been lost to Canada. It is all very well to say that under the Havana agreement we may be able to get them back in the future, but all one has to do is to read the observations of Professor Bayly to see what will happen.

The principle followed by radio stations, and backed by governors, is one of "what we have we hold". We must give more power to the private broadcasting stations, and fill up those channels, or we shall lose them, as sure as we are here. This is a technical subject, and one which could not be discussed adequately in the house. However, this question with respect to channels is most serious, so far as Canada is concerned, and I believe we should employ electrical engineers to make a proper survey for us, so that we may know what we are doing. While the subject is technical, yet I would urge upon the government the importance of preserving to Canada the channels we already have, and that we must guard against losing any more. There is no time to be lost. We have until six months before the expiration of the treaty in 1946. It takes at least six months to get the permits and everything arranged and one cannot build a fifty-thousand-watt station under a year at least, so that there is no time to lose. I commend the reading of the report to hon. members.

Item agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 139, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Government may act as agent.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask if there is any significant or important departure in the provisions of this bill from those in the bill which was passed last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, there is not.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the third reading of a bill as important as this one could easily be deferred until the next sitting of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There have been no amendments offered to the bill, and it is absolutely within the rules to have it proceeded with immediately.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There can be discussion on the bill just the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We have been discussing the bill for the last two months.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am asking that the bill be read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 77 reads:

All amendments made in committee are reported by the Chairman to the house, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report the bill is open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not opposing the ruling, but is there not a rule that provides that the three readings of a bill cannot take place without unanimous consent?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a rule that the three readings should not take place on the same day. But on occasions, such as the end of the session, it has been permitted to give a bill the three readings. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BLACKMORE: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

242. Inspection and investigation, $949,040.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The same thing is happening this afternoon as happened the other night. There is confusion in the chamber and I cannot hear what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN: We are dealing with item 242 on page 29 of the estimates.

Item agreed to.

244. Air and land mail services, $14,081,859.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I draw to the attention of the minister a matter which has been drawn to his attention in previous years, but which perhaps may be drawn to his attention this year with a little more force and conviction. Those of us who live in rural constituencies cannot help but be impressed by the changed situation with which our rural mail carriers have to cope. At this stage of the proceedings I do not wish to do more than register a protest with respect to the whole question of rural mail carriers and also to offer a suggestion which may be of some help in dealing with this matter. Faced with low incomes, many of our rural mail carriers have had to live on perhaps as low a level of sustenance as almost any class of people, and in the majority of cases on a much lower level than any who are directly or indirectly connected with the public service. The rural mail carrier, of course, comes very close to our agricultural population. He is part and parcel of the life of the rural people of Canada. I myself can recall in my early days on the farm having no better friend than the rural mail carrier who came to our gate every noon, and I think all of us who are farmers feel the same way about the rural mail carrier who always came regularly no matter what the weather, in good weather and bad. He was a public servant with whom the farmers and rural dwellers seldom found fault. As a class the rural mail carriers in Canada may be said to have carried out their duties in peace time and in war with credit to themselves and to the department with whom they had contracted, and to the satisfaction of the country generally.

But the rural mail carrier is now faced with rising costs of living and with an inadequate additional allowance. I believe it is something like five per cent which he has been allowed to cover the additional cost of gasoline and matters of that kind entering into his operating costs. Yet he has at the same time seen other branches of the public service—true, technically perhaps they may not be parallel branches; nevertheless they are branches of the public service—receive the cost of living bonus while he is denied that right. I recognize that perhaps from the technical point of view the cost of living bonus would not normally attach to the remuneration received from a contract awarded by tender. Nevertheless I point this out to the minister, and with the sole object of expressing an opinion which is widespread among the rural mail carriers themselves: They feel that they are being treated differently from other branches of the public service, particularly the Post Office Department, in being denied, whatever the technical reason may be, and it may be a good one, the cost of living bonus which is awarded to other branches of the public service. They see the cost of living bonus paid in the one instance and not in the other, and it is difficult for them to understand why this distinction should be made.

I know what the minister's answer will be. But I wish to point out to him that that will not remove the dissatisfaction among the rural mail carriers. I want the minister to make a note of my remarks with respect to one question I asked and that is this: What has been the government's policy with respect to the opening of new tenders or allowing new tenders to be submitted for various routes where the original tenderer has not completed his term of contract but has found himself unable to carry on? I imagine the answer to that question would show a trend which would much more eloquently and adequately show the rural mail carrier situation than any words I could utter in this house.

I am not attempting to leave an impossible situation on the minister's doorstep. No one who has given an intensive study to the question of how to deal with the rural mail carrier situation could fail to recognize that the minister has a problem on his hands. As a private member of this house I have given as much study to it perhaps as most, and I am in a position to say that I have some sympathy with the minister when he attempts to find a solution of the rural mail carrier's troubles. Nevertheless that is not a sufficient reason why there should not be a forthright attempt made to solve these troubles. There have been many more difficult jobs which this parliament has undertaken, and I condemn the government for not at least making an effort to solve the problem once and for all. Surely the fact that the problem is a difficult one should be a challenge to the government to solve it rather than a signal to do nothing about it. I believe that this session should not have been allowed to reach its present stage without the minister having asked parliament to set up a committee of this house to deal with the problem of the rural mail carrier in Canada. I have sat in this house for some eight years since 1935, and whenever a departmental estimate covering the rural mail carriers has been up for consideration, I have seen men on all sides of the house offering suggestions in this committee of the whole, some constructive, some just suggestions, but all offering criticism, and I have seen the minister, whether it be the present minister or his predecessors, always writhing a little under the criticism but not knowing which way to turn for a solution of the problem.

I make this suggestion to the minister. Perhaps it is too late to set up a committee of the house this session, but if he is unable between now and the time parliament meets again to make any more headway than he and his predecessors have made in the past in solving the difficulties of the rural mail carriers, I think he owes it to the rural mail carriers, and owes it to parliament, and I am not so sure but what he owes it even to himself, to ask for the appointment of a special committee of the House of Commons to find ways and means by which the rural mail carriers may be put in a position at least comparable with other government services, not only in the Post Office Department but other departments as well.

Much good could come out of the calling of witnesses and the taking of evidence of the mail carriers and from the broad discussion which could be had by such a committee. At least it would show the mail carriers that we as a parliament were prepared to come to grips with this problem and, if possible, make recommendations leading to a satisfactory settlement of their difficulties once and for all. We owe them that attempt at least. Their situation I feel is a challenge to parliament and to the government which we have failed too long to take up. I make that suggestion in the hope that it will be accepted by the government to bring about an overdue reform in the situation of the rural mail carriers of this country.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to call to the attention of the minister the fact that the hard times through which we passed in Saskatchewan led a good many of our farmers to tender for mail routes for an absurdly small remuneration. It was a question of getting some income rather than no income. Like the leader of the opposition, I think the Post Office Department must consider the changed times and the importance of the service being done by these mail route carriers, and the country should see to it that, in spite of particular emergencies which may force some to offer their services for very small compensation, they should receive fair and reasonable remuneration for the work they do. We expect of them utter honesty and unvarying service in good and bad weather and under all sorts of conditions. I hope the Postmaster General will give most generous consideration to this question of adequate remuneration for rural mail carriers.

One question I should like to direct to the Minister may not come under this item; if it does not, I ask the indulgence of the committee. With regard to the city of Swift Current, as the minister probably well knows, I have been pressing upon the department two necessities. One is the improving of the status of the post office, so that the staff will come under the civil service commission and some provision will be made for those employees who have spent a lifetime in the service of the department. Another is that the city has now reached an importance in size and population which would warrant a carrier house delivery. I would appreciate it if the minister would indicate what attention the department is giving to these oft-repeated requests.

Mr. DUPUIS: I, too, wish to say a word about the position of rural mail carriers. It interests me very much because I have been in touch with many of the representatives of the rural mail carriers' association, and in a measure I am in a position to know their wishes and requests. I can tell the committee from my personal knowledge that the Postmaster General is very much interested in this question and, I am sure, has been trying for many months past to solve the problem. The idea of appointing a special committee of the house to study the requests of these carriers is a good one, if the problem cannot be solved by the department alone. Since the beginning of the war there has been considerable competition in respect of these routes, and it is clear that the tender system, whereby farmers seeking to get some more revenue make bids at too low a price, is not the best system which can be applied if fair and reasonable remuneration is to be granted for the work done. I know of many instances where these men are working at a loss, and it is only fair that carriers should receive sufficient payment to make a little revenue out of the work. I remember the days when I myself was a railway mail clerk and used to meet many of these people. At that time the same problem existed, although it was not then so acute as it is now on account of the war. I associate myself with all hon. members who would contribute constructive criticism and suggestions to the Post Office Department with a view of rendering justice to these mail carriers. I sincerely sympathize with them, and I know the people whom they serve are well aware that they are inadequately paid. This condition should be remedied. I repeat that I recognize the anxiety of the minister to find ways and means of settling the problem, and I am sure he is sympathetic to those who are affected by it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have one question to ask the minister which I think could be answered before six o'clock. I have a letter from the father of a son who is serving in the Royal Navy, and I will read a part of it. He states:

> When we send a parcel to our son we are limited to five pounds because he is in the Royal Navy. I sent him one to-day, and it contained one pound fruit cake, one pound assorted biscuits, a small package of dates and a bit of cheese. I figure he would clean that up in an hour. If he had been in the Canadian forces we could have sent him eleven pounds, at least enough to do him overnight. There may be a reason for it but it looks odd.

Is that correct, that we are allowed to send a parcel of only five pounds to those serving in the imperial forces, either on sea or on land, but that we can send an eleven-pound parcel, I assume at the same rate, to those serving in the Canadian forces? If so, it is not fair, because many of our boys have enlisted in the imperial navy, in ships and other services.

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): I wish to thank the hon. member for Davenport for having brought that matter to the attention of the committee, in order that there may not be any misunderstanding about it. First of all, as regards the rate, the rate per pound is the same. As regards the weight, the statement he makes is correct, but the regulation about weight is not one made by the Canadian government; it is made by the British government.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by the leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Swift Current, and one or two others in regard to the rural mail carriers. This question has been up, when the post office estimates have been under consideration, for a number of years. If I remember aright, we had this problem during the years from 1930 to 1935, at least before the present Postmaster General took office, and apparently it does not matter which government is in power, it has been found impossible, or at any rate there has been an unwillingness, to do anything. The time has come when we should have more equality in employment, particularly in the public service. We cannot expect private employers to attempt any equality in private enterprise unless the government first tries to have equality in the public service. It may be said and it is said that the rural mail carriers are themselves to some extent responsible for the conditions under which they work because they outbid one another for these positions. If they do that, obviously it is done because of their necessity and not from choice. There is no position in the public service, from the Postmaster General down, for which someone could not be found at less money if he had an opportunity to take the position. But that is no reason why there should not be an investigation and some plan worked out by which mail couriers would be given a living wage the same as persons in other employment are entitled to to-day. I hope the Postmaster General will consider what has been said to-day on this question.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer. I believe it was brought to the attention of the Postmaster General when he visited Vancouver early in the year. The postal employees in Vancouver have some grievances, and although my information comes from that city I understand that this condition is general throughout the postal service in Canada, or at least in the larger cities. I have before me the Vancouver News-Herald of January 14, 1943, and a report there bears out the statements made to me in correspondence from post office employees in various parts of Canada.

Their first grievance is that order in council P.C. 32/1905, passed on May 10, 1940, set the quota of the permanent staff at, I believe, ninety per cent of the total staff, but that since that time, on account of changes that have taken place in the staff, the ratio of temporary to permanent employees is about twenty to eighty instead of ten to ninety. The way in which this works out is this. Men who came into the service as far back as 1937 are still temporary employees, still on the lower wage of $85 a month. There may be some cost of living bonus or something within the last couple of years. At any rate that is the condition which prevails. Where there is a possibility or, indeed, a probability, as in this case, that these employees will ultimately become a part of the permanent staff they should be taken into the permanent staff after a period of time, regardless of whether they comprise eighty-five or ninety-five per cent of the service as a whole. To fix an arbitrary number of permanents as compared with temporaries is, in my opinion, wrong. I am not referring to war workers. After an employee is taken into the normal service and has served a year or a year and a half or even two years as a temporary, he should automatically be taken on to the permanent staff.

Another matter with regard to the Vancouver post office is the large amount of overtime that is being worked, but the only overtime that is paid for in cash is, I believe, about thirty hours during the Christmas rush. All the rest of the overtime is paid for by time off, and as at January 1, 1943, the excess overtime in the Vancouver post office was approximately 18,500 hours. If you have a state of the labour market where there is a scarcity of labour so that instead of having to work less time people are compelled to work overtime, it is utterly impossible to compensate for this overtime by time off. I suggest that the government adopt the policy of paying for all overtime in cash in the same way as it is paid for in ordinary employment.

There is one other grievance which I can state better by reading a paragraph in a letter I received from the national treasurer of Canadian postal employees. I quote:

> Our holidays are given on seniority and a junior man (one with less than two years steady employment) may go on his holidays before he has earned his full leave period. After his holidays are over and should he be called to the army, he must refund the money he has received for the days he was on leave that he had not earned. (He is allowed 1½ days per month.) But, and here is the catch, should he have time coming to him for overtime he has worked, well, he gives that for the good of the post office.

It seems to me that if this matter of time works in one way, in favour of the government, it is only just that if the government owes something to the employee, he should be paid. These things are so small that it is amazing to think the post office authorities would allow them to remain as irritants affecting the morale of the civil service. I hope the Postmaster General will take note of what I have said, and I should be very glad if he could make a statement at this time as to the steps that are being taken to remedy some of these complaints.

Mr. STOKES: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a matter that has to do with the service given many of our people who live in rural areas; I am not going to say anything in regard to the remuneration of the mail carriers, because the minister has heard enough about that. Two years ago I understood the department was loosening up a little in the regulations governing the laying out of routes, and were granting the privilege of rural mail delivery to people living on what might be described as dead-end roads. We have in my district several such places with which I am personally acquainted, which are not served by the mail carriers, and I wish to draw the minister's attention to the fact that the inconvenience to which these people are put in having to go some distance for their mail is a much more serious matter now than it was a few years ago. They are short of help; perhaps the children have all grown up and left; there may be only the man and his wife remaining on the farm, and they may have to travel some distance for their mail. With the present shortage of gasoline I believe they have a real complaint, for they are taxpayers just the same as the people who live on the other roads, who are given better service. I have in mind one case in particular, of a man who lives on one of our trunk highways, midway between the village in which the post office is located and the cross-road which is travelled by the mail carrier. This man must either go into the village for his mail or have a box at the cross-road, which is a considerable distance away. I should like to ask the minister if in a case like that it would not be possible for the man to get his mail from the bus which delivers the mail to the village.

Last year when these estimates were under discussion I mentioned the closing of a sub-post office in the city of Belleville, which meant a considerable hardship to a number of people just outside the city limits and some little distance from the city post office, to which they must go for their mail. This sub-post office has been closed now for perhaps a year and a half. I believe it was closed on account of some question over the cost of the building and the remuneration of the postmaster. When we were discussing these matters last year the minister promised to give consideration to this situation, but so far the condition has not been remedied. These are the two items I should like to draw to the attention of the minister.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the present remuneration for a full-time postman in the city of Toronto, say, who has been in the service for some years?

Mr. MULOCK: $1,500.

Mr. MacNICOL: And nothing more?

Mr. MULOCK: The uniform, carfare, boots, raincoat and the cost of living bonus.

Mr. MacNICOL: How many holidays with pay does he get?

Mr. MULOCK: Eighteen days.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is about three weeks?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not going to say anything more about that at the moment, but it does not seem sufficient remuneration for men who have such responsible positions and who perform such arduous duties.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): The question of the remuneration of rural mail carriers has been discussed at some length. Recently some confusion has been caused through a war-time bonus which has been granted to underpaid rural mail carriers, at least to help defray some of the increased cost of operation. I believe that matter should be explained at this time, in order to clarify the situation. Many of the mail carriers are under the impression that if the contract is changed by adding a war-time bonus, the contract is broken and will have to be advertised. That is not my understanding, and I should like the matter cleared up. If they are granted a war-time bonus in order to help meet the increased cost of operation, the contract is not broken. After the war, when conditions return to normal, the carrier may decide whether he wishes the contract advertised or whether he wishes to revert to the original terms. If that could be explained at this time, I think it would clarify the situation.

Mr. SLAGHT: I have a word to say with regard to the rural mail carriers, but before touching upon that matter I should like to pay a tribute to the Postmaster General, who, in my view, in his short regime has fully measured up to the illustrious reputation made by his revered grandfather, Sir William Mulock, in service to Canada.

I believe the department showed wisdom last year, when renewing these rural mail contracts, by increasing in a reasonable and proper way the remuneration paid these mail carriers. In the last five years in my district of Parry Sound I have investigated practically every route and every carrier engaged in this important work, and I believe every carrier in my district has been and still is underpaid in relation to the service he renders to his country. There is a tradition among mail carriers, and I fancy it is not peculiar to my own district, that his majesty's mail must go through. In the winter time, with six feet of snow on the roads, with a twenty-six mile route, when the car will not start and the roads are blocked, though the horses have to be harnessed to the old sleigh, his majesty's mail must go through. We cannot run riot in the matter of increases; but if my memory serves me correctly, in the last year the department had been more liberal in renewal contracts, in seeing that in deserving cases there have been increases. We sometimes forget the service these men render. I should like to add my voice to those of hon. members who have already said that the rural mail carrier is a splendid servant of the country, and that he should receive fair treatment in his contract.

Mr. MULOCK: First of all, the hon. member for Lambton-Kent referred to certain orders in council. I have sent for them, and they will be here in a moment. I shall be glad to give the contents of those orders in council to the committee.

In the meantime, however, if I may, I shall deal with some of the matters raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East. The hon. member first referred to the question of overtime. May I say to him that I was in Vancouver, and attended a meeting with the officials of the department. We met the representatives of the employees' association out there, and discussed with them their troubles and difficulties. They have troubles; in a large measure what the hon. member has said is correct. And there are troubles of a similar nature at other points across Canada.

I had intended making a statement with respect to overtime, and perhaps this would be the appropriate opportunity. I would point out that the situation in the Post Office Department, owing to war activities and the depletion of experienced staff by enlistments and the like, has produced a condition with regard to necessary overtime, because most of the work can be handled by men of experience only. It has, therefore, become necessary to meet this condition, on account of the impossibility of liquidating overtime by compensatory time off.

The action taken under the War Measures Act, after a careful review of all post office difficulties, has resulted in the decision that, for the duration of the war, overtime will be liquidated as far as possible by granting corresponding time off. That which cannot be liquidated in this manner by the end of the month following the month in which the overtime was worked, will be paid for in cash at the pro-rata rate of salary which the employee is receiving, provided that the minimum rate of payment shall be sixty cents an hour.

The classes affected throughout the year are postal clerks, senior mail porters, mail porters, postal garage repairmen and postal chauffeurs. During the Christmas heavy mailing period and on statutory holidays the following would be included: letter carriers, senior letter carriers, letter carrier overseers, postal garage foremen, and senior postal clerks—the latter only when engaged on manipulative duties.

During normal times, if letter carriers work overtime, the situation is taken care of by a revision of the routes, rather than by payment for overtime.

The second matter raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East was the question of allowing leave at the rate of one and a half days per month of service. This applies to the whole service, I am advised, and is regulated for the service by the civil service commission. I shall draw this matter to the attention of the commission.

Then, the matter in connection with the ten per cent of temporary employees and ninety per cent permanent is one which is receiving serious consideration in the department at the present time. As a matter of fact, it has been brought to the attention of treasury board. I believe I have dealt with the three points raised by the hon. member.

Mr. MacINNIS: Replying to a question by the hon. member for Davenport the minister said that the annual salary in the Post Office Department was $1,500.

Mr. MULOCK: Plus cost of living bonus, plus certain clothing.

Mr. MacINNIS: In what category would the employee be who received that salary?

Mr. MULOCK: I understood the hon. member for Davenport was asking about a man who had been on for some years.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understood the salary for a letter carrier was higher than that, that he began at $85 a month, and received that amount while a temporary employee. When he is made permanent I understood he received $1,740.

Mr. MULOCK: The $1,740 is for postal clerks. The range for letter carriers is $1,020 to $1,500.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): As far as the post office service in Toronto is concerned, I should like to sound a note of appreciation of the efficient manner in which the postmaster in that city, Mr. Gibson, has done his work. It will be realized that he has had to work under great difficulties, because the post office at Toronto is at the present time very much overcrowded. Our new post office building is now in the possession of the Department of National Defence, with the result that the post office is operating under a tremendous handicap. Despite that, however, our postal employees are doing a marvellous job. It must be remembered that this is war time, and there is more mail to carry. Our postmen, the fellows on the street, who go from house to house, are always cheerful and always willing to do their best for anyone. If one has any kick about the delivery of his mail, all he needs to do is to inform the postman, and he will look into the matter. I cannot speak too highly of the delivery service we have had under Mr. Gibson, and of the wonderful esprit de corps in the postal service.

There is one improvement I should like to see. It is known that at the present time there are many employees on the part-time list. It seems to me they should be put on the permanent list as quickly as possible, because until that time their position is to some extent insecure. I imagine there are fewer on the temporary list now than there were before, but even so I say that with all the work they have to do in these days they deserve great credit and should be placed on the permanent list.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Carried.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The Minister of Pensions and National Health seems to want to have this carried in a hurry. Apparently he does not want me to sound the praises of the Post Office Department. I will say that these employees deserve whatever can be done for them; because, after all, I do not think many hon. members would want to shoulder on a hot day one of those big mail bags the postmen carry. As the hon. member for Parry Sound has said, it is his majesty's mail, and the mail must go through.

Mr. MacNICOL: What has been the success in connection with the carrying of air mail? I understand it was very satisfactory last year. Would the minister indicate the increase in poundage? What is the tonnage, and what is the revenue?

Mr. MULOCK: I would advise the hon. member for Davenport that the number of pounds carried last year by Trans-Canada Air Lines Limited was 2,308,812; the estimated maximum number of pounds bearing Canadian postage and originating in Canada was 1,771,972; the estimated revenue at $2 per pound was $3,543,944. The estimated profit on operations, allowing a varying amount from fifteen to thirty per cent for write-off for duplications, transfers of mail from one plane to another, United States mail for United States troops, and things of that kind, amounted to $321,573. That was the profit on the operation of Trans-Canada as far as the Post Office Department was concerned. That is quite an improvement over previous years. In 1940 there was a loss of about $1,375,915, and in 1941 this loss had been reduced to $644,762. I am glad to be able to tell the hon. member that the first five months of this year showed a profit of $583,514. Last month the number of pounds carried amounted to 315,452, with an estimated profit for the month of $129,005.

Pensions and other benefits—

246. To provide for the payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties, or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service, or in protecting his majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged; payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $5,000.

Mr. SHAW: Who would be entitled to these compassionate allowances, and what is the method of disbursement?

Mr. MULOCK: This is a blanket provision for cases of this kind which may arise. This item was first inserted in the main estimates in 1924-25. Prior to that, provision was made in the supplementary estimates for specific amounts, but that meant that financial assistance could not be given until the supplementary estimates were passed. This sometimes worked a hardship on those persons to whom relief was to be accorded. By means of this item financial relief can be granted by the passing of an order in council. It was not necessary to use any of this vote last year.

Mr. SHAW: Would this apply only to permanent employees or to all employees?

Mr. MULOCK: It would apply to any employee injured in the course of his duties, whether he was permanent or temporary.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the Postmaster General be kind enough to answer the question I put before the dinner recess?

Mr. MULOCK: The hon. member for Swift Current has been rather insistent about this matter since I was appointed. We have had a survey made of the situation in Swift Current. At the present time it is serviced from the central office. The survey shows that Swift Current is growing steadily and the growth seems to be of a permanent nature. However, on account of the war we have not been making any new extensions where this can be avoided. It is not only a question of finance; it is a question of conserving manpower. However, the matter is being watched, and if efficient service requires that something should be done, the situation will be reconsidered. I can assure the hon. member that he has not been forgotten.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are the post office employees covered by any form of workmen's compensation?

Mr. MULOCK: The provincial compensation acts are made available to the employees through the medium of the dominion act.

Mr. MacINNIS: This does not cover occasional labour?

Mr. MULOCK: No. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent asked me to put something on the record dealing with this question of mail carriers. I would refer hon. members to P.C. 4960, which reads:

Whereas by orders in council P.C. 2311 of the 24th March, 1942, and P.C. 5833 of the 7th June, 1942, authority was given the Postmaster General to negotiate with contractors for the performance of mail services in the dominion, who are operating under contracts not equitable from their standpoint in view of the changed conditions owing to the war;

And whereas the Postmaster General reports that the power thus granted involves the cancellation of each contract so dealt with and the carrying on of the service under a temporary arrangement to cover the period up to the termination of the War Measures Act, at which time tenders must be invited to place the contract arrangements on a regular basis;

That the action taken under the power granted by these orders in council shows that the rates negotiated represent a smaller percentage increase in operation costs than is shown in the cases of tenders invited, and is therefore economically sound;

That from the outset, and since this system has been in operation, many contractors who require increased remuneration to carry on the services have stated they would very much like to revert to their present contract terms after the war;

That the terms of the contracts which have been dealt with have ben very favourable indeed from the standpoint of the Post Office Department, and possibly much more favourable than will be obtained immediately after the war; and

That, after careful study, it is considered that it would be decidedly advantageous to classify any increases granted under this authority as in the nature of war-time bonus, retain the original contracts in operation, and revert to the actual contract terms upon termination of the War Measures Act.

Therefore, His Excellency the governor general in council, on the recommendation of the Postmaster General, is pleased to order and doth hereby order that whenever possible the contracts which have been dealt with or which may be dealt with be retained in full force and effect and that any increases granted under authority of said orders in council P.C. 2311 or P.C. 5833 be discontinued when the War Measures Act is rescinded.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there a complete mailing list available, say in the city of Toronto, which gives the street numbers and so on as revised from time to time? I send out a certain amount of literature as a member of parliament to a great many people in my riding, and I get a certain number of replies. I try to keep my list up to date, but changes are occurring from time to time. I was just wondering if a list were available which people could consult.

Mr. MULOCK: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It might save a lot of trouble if the mailing list were made available, because when a person takes a piece of literature out to a man's address and finds he is not there he has to bring it back and then it has to be mailed back to the sender. I could never understand why the mailing list was not made available to the people. We had an example in Montreal lately in connection with an enumeration containing several wrong addresses, which could have been checked if a mailing list had been available. Would the minister tell me why it is not available?

Mr. MULOCK: Because it is a householder's list; it is addressed to a house, not to an individual.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Normal services—

175. Miscellaneous maintenance and adjustments (war of 1914-18), $20,720.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Following up a question I asked of the minister some time ago, has he received any report on the fire in the Regina barracks yet?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Yes. But I have not the memorandum here. There has been no final report as yet. The fire occurred on May 25, and a board of inquiry was immediately convened. A preliminary report was received, and I think I intimated to my hon. friend generally what was in it. Further inquiries were made by me. On June 16 we received a report that the district officer commanding considered it necessary that the court of inquiry be not pressed to conclude, because some further investigation was being made at the time. I had word about a week ago, saying that the report of the board of inquiry would be in almost immediately.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will it be made public?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think it will be made public, but I would have no objection to showing it to my hon. friend or any other hon. member.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Some time ago I brought to the attention of the minister conditions in the barracks at Saskatoon. While I was west attending the military camp at Dundurn, I had occasion to make inquiry about the barracks at Saskatoon, and I was pleased to learn that there seems to be general satisfaction with the present conditions in the barracks. I think it is only fair that I should express that and the general pleasure of the men in living in barracks since steps have been taken to make them much more habitable. In his reply to me at that time the minister said, as reported at page 3160 of Hansard:

> In connection with the conditions at Saskatoon, I have not had a report of the kind my hon. friend refers to. It might not come to me, but the inspector-general is rigorous in these matters. The depot at Saskatoon is to be amalgamated with Regina and the conditions that prevail there will not have to be borne very long.

I just wanted to know on what the minister based that statement. I was surprised on making inquiries to find that the depot was moved a year ago. Perhaps the minister was misinformed.

Mr. RALSTON: I presume the officer before me at the time gave me that information.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Canals service—
361. Canals — Operation and maintenance, $2,529,992.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask, in reference to the Rideau canal, what it costs to operate, how many employees are engaged in operating the canal, and what tonnage passes through the canal per year?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD: In 1942, 171 vessels and 1,727 tons of freight passed through the canal. The cost of operation was $188,800.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. MacNICOL: What tonnage passed through St. Andrew's locks on the Red river?

Mr. MICHAUD: I have not that information.

Mr. MacNICOL: You cannot send a boat down the river from Winnipeg without its going through St. Andrew's locks. They are north of Winnipeg on the Red river in Manitoba.

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not think it is administered under the canals branch; it must be administered under the harbours board.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the minister has not the information on hand, it will do at another time.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Has any consideration been given by the department to construction of the Chignecto canal in connection with the defence ministries? It is considered by many who have given attention to the matter of the construction of this canal that if it were in existence at the present time, it would be a valuable military and naval asset; it would reduce the mileage and the dangers of transportation on the Atlantic coast and the St. Lawrence. I should also like to know whether there have been any negotiations with the United States authorities with respect to the construction of this canal, along the same line as the negotiations which were carried on with respect to the Alaska highway. I can understand there may be some necessity for secrecy in these matters. On the other hand, it is not likely that it could be built to serve in the present war, but existing world conditions and naval and military requirements would indicate an urgency for the construction of this canal, purely from a military point of view, leaving all to the good the desirability of having it as a commercial transport route. The minister understands, as do hon. members of the committee, that this canal was projected two or three hundred years ago by the early French settlers, and it would have been constructed many years ago if some engineers who were ultra modern but who, as conditions have developed, were impractical, decided that a ship canal should be constructed there to give transportation to vessels and shipping across the isthmus. The isthmus is about fifteen to sixteen miles distant. Could the minister give a statement with respect to this matter, and has he had any conferences with the ministers of defence or the United States authorities?

Mr. MICHAUD: Since I have been in the department, no consideration has been given to this project, and I believe that none has been given to it since 1939; that is, since the war started. No demand that I know of has been made on the department for the construction of this canal for military purposes; none has been made by the United States, and no negotiations have been carried on with the United States since the war began. I believe it would be a good post-war project, for consideration as soon as the war is over.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have received a complaint from employees of the Welland canal, linemen, bridgemen, wiremen, weighmen, and statistical clerks. These men, I understand, are dissatisfied with wages and working conditions, and apparently they have been unable to get satisfaction from the department. They made an application for a board under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and asked the department to concur in the recommendation. I have here a letter dated June 28, 1943 and signed by the deputy minister of transport. It is short, and I will read it:

Dear Sir,

I have your undated letter enclosing an application signed by a number of employees of the operating staff of the Welland canal, seeking the appointment of a board of conciliation to consider grievances concerning wages and the methods of promotion now in effect on the Welland canal. Upon inquiry I am advised that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, under the provisions of which boards of conciliation and investigation may be established, is applicable to industry only, and not to the public service of Canada.

In view of the fact that apparently these employees cannot go before the tribunals set up by the government to deal with the grievances of persons in the employ of private companies and now, I believe, in some crown companies, what procedure is available in the department to adjust grievances? Is there any machinery by which employees can get their grievances heard? There is considerable information in the file which was given to me, but I have had it so short a time that I have not been able to make myself acquainted with its contents, and consequently I am not in a position to judge definitely as to what they want.

Mr. MICHAUD: I thank my hon. friend for having given me the information and read the letter. I gather that these employees are permanent members of the staff or in the position of permanent members and they would come under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission, which has sole jurisdiction over the establishment of their classifications and their remuneration as well. Therefore their claims for increases of wages or changes of classification must be addressed to and adjusted by the civil service commission.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wonder whether the minister and the officers of his department gave consideration to the fact that war conditions have considerably upset normal relations in the matter of wages and working conditions. I think that particularly applies in the civil service, where conditions are much more rigid than they are in ordinary private service, or in places where employees are more free to organize and put forward their claims. Government employees see on every hand other workers improving their position, either by way of increased wages or cost of living bonus, or considerations of that kind, by making application to the various boards which the government has created to adjust their differences, although these government employees themselves cannot appeal to any such impartial tribunal to settle their disputes. Is there any way by which these people can be heard?

Mr. MICHAUD: So far as I am aware, there is none apart from appeal to the authority under which they are working. Those classes of employees who come within the jurisdiction of the civil service commission must appeal to the commission for readjustment of their salaries or remuneration. They can always appeal to the head of the department, but even then the head of the department cannot override the decisions of the civil service commission except by act of parliament.

Mr. MacINNIS: That being so, when they write to the ministers' departments in matters of this kind would it not be a good policy for the head of the department to direct them to those persons to whom they should appeal in order to have adjustments made? There is nothing in this letter except the statement, "I am advised that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act does not apply in your case," and they are left without any direction. I suggest that the officers of the department should direct them and should take a little more human interest in these employees than merely to give them a negative answer and say, you are in the wrong pew and there is nothing more to be said; you had better get out.

Mr. MICHAUD: If letters are addressed to the minister the writers will receive such direction as it is possible to give them.

Mr. GRAYDON: I believe it was the day before yesterday, or yesterday, that I handed to the Secretary of State, with reference to the Welland ship canal operating and administrative staffs, in connection with whom complaints had been made, the correspondence in the matter with the understanding that an investigation would be made. Seeing that the minister whose estimates are now before us is directly involved, I wonder if the Secretary of State has conveyed to him any report that has been made in pursuance of the investigation which he promised to make for me.

Mr. MICHAUD: Not yet.

Mr. GRAYDON: May we expect something before the end of the session? I do not want the government to fall into the habit of allowing things to die at the end of the session, because that is a habit which I fancy is easily acquired. I hope it will not be too assiduously cultivated by the administration.

Mr. MICHAUD: I can assure my hon. friend that the representations in this matter will not die, but that as soon as possible they will be given consideration.

Canals service—

363. To provide for expenses in connection with St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations, $7,500.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this the annual vote, or is it new?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is the annual vote.

Mr. GRAYDON: It has been reduced by 50 per cent.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes. In former years it was larger, having regard to the international situation, but now it has been reduced to the normal amount of requirements.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the reduction from $15,000 to $7,500 the direct result of the fact that war-time expenditures along similar lines are being made in the channel?

Mr. MICHAUD: There are no war-time expenditures on this. It is for metering the flow of water in the ship channel.

Mr. ADAMSON: There is nothing new in regard to the negotiations about developments on the St. Lawrence deep waterways?

Mr. MICHAUD: No.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

365. Marine service administration, $15,500.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have some questions to ask with reference to the loss of the ss. Northholm, near Cape Scott, last winter, into which an inquiry was held.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. MICHAUD: I am under the impression that a return was made on this matter.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know about a return, but the minister was good enough to send me a copy of the court's report, and it is on the strength of that that I wish to ask a question or two. The ss. Northholm foundered some time last winter—I have forgotten the date—with the loss of fifteen men, all of the crew, I believe, with the exception of two who survived, from the number who got away in lifeboats. I ask this question because I believe that someone is to blame for this loss of life in allowing this vessel to go to sea under the conditions that obtained. I have here the questions which the court was requested to answer. I do not know who formulated the questions, but here they are:

Question: Did the master of the ss. Northholm take all reasonable means to save (a) the vessel, (b) the lives of those on board?

It is perhaps significant that the vessel comes first and the lives of those on board come second. The answer is:

The court thinks that more determined steps might have been taken to save the vessel and the lives of those on board, but in the absence of further evidence is not prepared to make an adverse finding in this regard.

Question: What was the cause of the loss of the vessel and the loss of life?

Answer: (a) Insufficient margin of stability and insecure battening down of hatches.

(b) Lack of leadership in getting the men into the lifeboat and away from the ship.

Question: Was the loss of the ss. Northholm caused or contributed to by the wrongful act or default of Frank McMahon the master, Ray Perry the mate, the owners or charterers, or any of them, and if so, which of them?

Answer: The charterers' marine superintendent knew of the improper practice of battening down hatches as was done in this case. Subject to this, and to the answers given to questions 4 and 5, no wrongful act or default was shown.

These are the answers to the specific questions asked, but there is an annex to the report. I should like to put on record a part of this report, because I am satisfied that someone failed to carry out the proper inspection, with the result that fifteen lives were needlessly lost. In the annex to the court's findings it is stated.

The court is of the opinion that with the deck cargo loaded as it was, the ship was not in a fit condition to proceed on the contemplated voyage, and that this was at least a contributing factor to the disaster that followed.

It should be noted that the ship was lost in a sea that was not considered at all rough. It was not a loss at sea on account of a storm; it was, as the court points out, a loss at sea on account of the way in which the cargo was placed on the ship—I do not know the proper term for it—and because the ship was loaded beyond her capacity. The annex continues:

The court is also of opinion, after giving full consideration to all the evidence, to the material filed, and to the theories advanced, that when the vessel left Port Alice she did not have a sufficient margin of stability; that during the passage to Cape Scott such margin disappeared, due to water finding its way through the improper hatch coverings, saturating the deck cargo, and percolating into the hold. This resulted in an increasing list which eventually laid the engine room and stokehold open to the sea, and caused the vessel to founder.

The court, in view of the special features of this inquiry, thought it well to hear certain hearsay evidence which was tendered. In coming to its conclusions such evidence was ignored.

There was great difficulty in getting evidence in the case, because all but two of the crew had been lost, and the evidence of the two members who were saved after a terrible experience at sea, during which three or four others in the same boat had perished from the cold, was rather inconclusive or perhaps incoherent. From what I have read, however, and from the whole of this report I think responsibility should be placed on someone, because someone was guilty of allowing this vessel to go to sea under the conditions outlined in this report. I should like to know what steps the minister is taking to place that responsibility where it belongs.

Mr. MICHAUD: In the first place the hon. member understands that this was a private boat, not a boat owned by the government.

Mr. MacINNIS: It was not a boat owned by the government, but has not the government a certain responsibility, under the Canada Shipping Act, for the inspection of boats, of tackle and all that pertains to boats?

Mr. MICHAUD: I quite agree, but I wanted to establish that point first for the record. Under the Canada Shipping Act there is responsibility for inspection and also for checking the conduct and qualifications of certificated officers, if there were any on board, and there must have been at least one. All these matters have been investigated to a certain point. As to placing final responsibility by the department on any one person, I must confess that we have not yet reached that point. The findings of the investigation which was held, part of the findings of which has been read by the hon. member, have been under consideration; we are in communication with the marine officers on the Pacific coast with a view to clearing up this situation, but we have not yet come to a conclusion as to who is directly, finally responsible for the accident.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

368. Marine service steamers, including ice-breakers—maintenance, operation and repairs, $1,357,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will any part of this money be utilized in keeping open the channel between Tormentine and Borden?

Mr. MICHAUD: This money is for the operating expenses of these boats. They are on regular runs, and unless they are assigned to a particular duty at a particular time they are not required to take special assignments or runs. As to the specific question in regard to the channel between Tormentine and Borden, there is no special schedule or assignment for any boat to do that work. It has been done when required, when any of the ice-breakers were available, and could reach the place.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the channel between Wood island and Cariboo kept open during any of the winter months?

Mr. MICHAUD: No special assignment.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): There was some discussion with respect to the matter of transportation between Prince Edward Island and the mainland earlier in the session. Since that time, has any progress been made with respect to the procurement of a suitable ferry boat or a more adequate stand-by in the event of any serious accident to the present boat? There is no necessity to repeat the urgency for this provision, because the entire traffic from the mainland to Prince Edward Island depends upon this ferry service, which, as everybody recognizes, is inadequate. What progress has been made in the last two or three months with respect to procuring a new boat, or a stand-by for the present boat?

Mr. MICHAUD: It has been impossible to find a suitable boat on the north American continent. With regard to procuring a stand-by I would say we have one specifically assigned to be used as a stand-by to the Prince Edward Island in the event of an emergency. But some progress has been made in developing the plans, if it is built in Canada, of a larger ferry boat which would be the main ferry between these two points. Under those circumstances the Prince Edward Island would revert to the position of stand-by.

Marine service—

369. Construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $1,980,128.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has any effort been made by the department to improve navigation on the Mackenzie river? At this time of the year, and in any event a little later in the season, north of Great Slave lake there is swift water, and it is necessary to pull the boats up the river. This is done by the use of a capstan and a long cable. Down the river there is considerable traffic, amounting to many thousands of tons a year. These are good boats, and passengers find it bothersome to have the ship anchored in the middle of the river and to have to wait until someone goes up the river with the cable, connects it on the shore to the capstan so as to pull the boat up the river. It is about time something was done by the department to improve navigation on that great river. I believe there is no doubt traffic would increase if the service were improved.

Mr. MICHAUD: The only work by way of improvement which has been done in that section in the last few years has been some dredging by the Department of Transport. I understand that the Department of Public Works has done some other work, but I am not familiar with the nature of it.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

370. Agencies, salaries and office expenses, $286,165.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is meant by the term "agencies"?

Mr. MICHAUD: They are the different marine divisions in Canada ranging between Prince Edward Island and Victoria. They are at Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Prescott, Parry Sound, Victoria and Prince Albert.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

371. Maintenance and repairs to wharves, $5,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is $5,000 sufficient to maintain and improve wharves?

Mr. MICHAUD: The major repairs to wharves in Canada are made by the Department of Public Works. This refers to minor repairs to certain wharves from which we derive some revenue. We employ at least the amount of revenue we get from them in making repairs to suit the convenience of those using the wharves.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Where are those wharves?

Mr. MICHAUD: There are about 2,000 across Canada.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That works out to about $2.50 each.

Mr. MICHAUD: About that.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest this item should be cut out altogether, and the money taken out of the ordinary vote for public wharves, which is something like $100,000 for British Columbia alone. This item is a perfect nuisance in this sense: the rule is that any expenditure on a public wharf under $50 is done by the marine branch. If it is over that amount it must be done by the Department of Public Works. This very often results in confusion. Someone will report that a wharf needs repairs. A man will be sent, at an expense of about $100, to look into it. He may decide that the amount required to make the repair is $48.50, and therefore he washes his hands of it and makes a report to the agent of marine. Then, he will send a boat out or perhaps makes an inspection himself, and finds that the expenditure required would be $51.80, and that, therefore, he could not do it. Then it goes back to the Department of Public Works.

The Department of Public Works maintain an efficient staff of competent men, men who are thoroughly familiar with the making and repairing of wharves, and they go round periodically to make inspections. It would save a lot of trouble and bother if this were all under that department. The agent of marine looks at lighthouses, and things like that. It would be much better, and it would save a lot of trouble if wharf repairs were done by the Department of Public Works. Officials of that department make periodical inspection every year or as often as necessary; when they find little repairs are needed, they cannot do them, and they have to be taken over by the other department, with all the red tape and intercommunication involved. I cannot see how anything is a bit better, and certainly the public service is worse off with this arrangement, and we have a good deal of unnecessary trouble.

Mr. MICHAUD: I am glad of the suggestion made by the hon. member, and we will take it into serious consideration. Wharves are looked after by the Department of Transport, although they are built by the Department of Public Works. Lightkeepers are authorized to make minor repairs. They may repair a light when they find it is damaged. In the different buildings there are stoves and heaters which sometimes require minor repairs, and they are authorized to do them up to $50. It may be better to have this done under Department of Public Works, and I shall look into the matter and make a recommendation.

Mr. NEILL: I was not talking about the lights, I was talking about public wharves.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It seems to me that one might as well move that the vote be reduced to one dollar because I think it is silly to have it in here. However, I shall not do that now, but do not let us have it in the estimates next year.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
373. Administration of pilotage, $142,510.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does this cover the great lakes or just ocean ports?

Mr. MICHAUD: Wherever there are pilots.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
374. Life saving service, including rewards for saving life, $43,560.

Mr. GRAYDON: Session after session, as this item has come up, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has taken a very active part in the debate, referring particularly to the need for life saving facilities on lake Simcoe, the lakes of the Muskoka district and the general lake Ontario area. The hon. member has suggested some important reforms in connection with life saving, pointing out, as the minister will recall or certainly as his predecessor will recall, that many sections of the lake must rely for life saving facilities upon what is supplied by metropoltan centres like Toronto. I draw this to the minister's attention and ask him if any such reforms have been made by the government. May I also inquire who have received these rewards during the past year ? I think it would be a matter of national pride and interest to have on the record the names of those who have been rewarded.

Mr. MICHAUD: The government has not yet decided to establish life saving stations on the inland waters of Canada. The only stations we have are on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. We have not the names of those who have received rewards during the past year, because these are made by the humane societies, not by the department. A list could be procured and given to my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister could consider adopting this suggestion. It often happens that those persons who are rewarded do not receive the recognition in the house to which they are entitled.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think the suggestion is a good one and I will see that it is carried out.

Mr. MacNICOL: The particulars of this vote to be found on page 219 of the estimates show four coxswains, four engineers and one second coxswain, or a total of nine men. There cannot be much life saving done with such a small number of men. The city of Toronto has its own life saving crews and equipment. I do not know whether Hamilton has, but I presume it would have similar crews and equipment. To what cities does this vote apply?

Mr. MICHAUD: It does not apply to any city.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where are these nine people operating from?

Mr. MICHAUD: My information is that there is a most efficient life saving station at Toronto operated by the city.

Mr. MacNICOL: I said that.

Mr. MICHAUD: The stations operated by the department are at Banfield, British Columbia; Clayoquot, British Columbia; Bayview, Nova Scotia; and Littlewood island, New Brunswick.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Toronto and other ports on the great lakes have most efficient life saving facilities. A greater tonnage of ships passes through the Soo canal than through any other canal in the world. In spite of the great number of ships that come down through lake Superior to lake Huron and lake Ontario, we do not get a nickel from the dominion government for life saving services. Toronto and other places on the Georgian bay have life saving crews, and I am proud of the work that has been done. Over a period of years loss of life on the great lakes has been quite small when one considers the difficulties of navigation and the lateness in the year, some time toward the end of December, that grain is brought down. It is only on two or three occasions that there has been any loss of life.

Marine service—
375. To provide subsidies for wrecking plants —Quebec and British Columbia, $45,000.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask a question which may not come under this particular item. On page 15 of the Ottawa Citizen of this evening I notice that a special train of twenty cars is bringing race horses to the Connaught track, and that on Tuesday night another special train will be sent into Connaught. The people in my province are told that they must curtail their travelling, but if this matter comes under wrecking I would direct attention to the fact that these race horses are being brought in to Connaught race track.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
377. Miscellaneous services relating to navigation and shipping, including grants towards schools of navigation at Queen's university, $500, Vancouver, B.C., $1,500, and provision to settle claims by the board of trade, London, England, for expenses incurred in respect of Canadian distressed seamen of British ships registered out of Canada, $49,895.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wish to commend this vote, but I must say that $600 in the previous vote for the sailors' institute at Port Arthur is very small.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
380. River St. Lawrence ship channel—Contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, including cost of administration—capital, $989,500.

Mr. MacNICOL: This amount has been reduced by over $1,000,000, with which reduction I am sure everyone is pleased. I have noticed lately that the water in Montreal harbour is higher than in other years, and I would ask the minister whether one of the reasons is the diversion into the great lakes of water from northern Ontario, particularly from the Kenogami river.

Mr. MICHAUD: I am told that the increased volume of water in Montreal harbour this summer is on account of natural conditions, not to any diversion of water.

Mr. MacNICOL: Whoever gave the minister that information has not given him correct information. That is the main reason, but another reason is that at present 1,200 cubic feet per second of water is being diverted from the Kenogami river into lake Superior and that is having an effect on the depth of water in Montreal harbour. Will the minister kindly convey that information to whoever gave him the information.

Railway service—
Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $39,370.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In the Fraser Valley to-day we have to transport haymakers from one district to another and we are not permitted any extra gasoline for that purpose. This is in order, Mr. Chairman, and I want it to be put on the record. It has to do with the railways. I quote from the Ottawa Citizen of to-day's date:

On Tuesday night another special will be sent up to Connaught park. Some of the horses will be vanned up and by Thursday next there will be about four hundred thoroughbreds within the Connaught park enclosure.

In British Columbia a van means a truck, and I feel bitterly that we are not allowed extra gasoline to transport haymakers from one part of the Fraser Valley to another while race horses for Connaught Park can be put into vans and hauled up and down the country.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Order. The discussion must be relevant to the item before the committee, which has to do with official railway cars.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right. I do not particularly care that some people from British Columbia seem to agree that I am out of order on this point, but I feel bitterly that railway cars should be used to transport horses for race track purposes, so that officials of the wartime prices and trade board can play around at Connaught park when the farmers of my constituency cannot get extra gasoline to transport haymakers to where they are needed in the Fraser Valley.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If I am out of order, Mr. Chairman, I will sit down.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. member for Fraser Valley had the floor, and if he is out of order I think the Chair should state why he is out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): I brought to the attention of the hon. member that the discussion must be relevant to the item before us, which has to do with official railway cars and not race horses.

Mr. FAIR: I may possibly be out of order too, but the first items were passed so quickly that I was not quite prepared. In certain small stations a certain amount of business has to originate before the railways will maintain an agent there. There is a rumour that the railway companies are asking the board of transport commissioners to have that amount of business increased. I would ask the minister if there is any truth in that rumour, and, if so, will the people in the district have an opportunity of making an appeal to the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. MICHAUD: I think the hon. member is right in saying that it is the policy of the railways to require a certain amount of business at a station to maintain an agent there, but I could not say whether the railways have made application to the board of transport commissioners to increase the amount of business required to maintain an agent. The department has not yet been informed of that.

Mr. FAIR: In case such an application is made by the railways, would the minister see that the districts affected have an opportunity to present their views?

Mr. MICHAUD: Certainly.

Mr. FAIR: I have one more question in connection with a decision made by the board of transport commissioners in March, 1942. It is in connection with decisions which have been made by the board of transport commissioners in March, 1942, and again recently, opening up the facilities at railway stations, even where elevators are located, allowing truckers to use their mechanical loaders which they have on their trucks, as well as portable loaders.

Mr. MICHAUD: I have no knowledge of such an order.

Mr. FAIR: I just wish to make a protest in connection with this. Farmers and farm organizations have been working hard in order to get the grain act amended so that abuses of the grain trade may be done away with; but if this decision stands and this practice is permitted to continue, I am afraid that a number of old abuses which took years to get rid of will be brought into being again. I am making this plea because I understand that certain companies are sending their agents out to the farm, buying bins of grain on sample, and at a certain price per bushel; there is no guarantee of grade, dockage or weight. They hire these trucks with mechanical loaders or in some cases use portable loaders at sidings to load the grain, and in some cases it has been found that the car leaks before it gets to the terminal so that the farmer loses the amount of grain which leaks out along the way. Several other abuses have been indicated to me. I would ask that this decision of the board of transport commissioners be gone into again with a view to withdrawing from truckers or truck companies the right to use their mechanical loaders or portable loaders at places where elevators are available. I am quite satisfied that a farmer or a number of farmers shall use their own mechanical loaders and portable loaders for their own accommodation; that is a right principle; then the farmers are looking after their own interests.

Railway service—
383. Hudson Bay railway—Construction and improvements—capital, $61,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The Hudson Bay railway has served a useful purpose and in the future will prove much more serviceable. A great many changes are taking place in these days in connection with railway transportation and haulage, particularly in respect of motive power. Would the minister give a little statement as to what is taking place in the development of motive power for the Hudson Bay railway? At the present time it is most important that we should have on all the main railway systems every locomotive which can possibly be handled, but at the same time the Hudson Bay railway needs to be serviced. Developments which have taken place include diesel electric locomotives, turbine locomotives, and things of that kind. What is being done by way of providing the necessary motive power as well as releasing such power as can be made available for other railways?

Mr. MICHAUD: The Hudson Bay railway proper does not own any equipment. All the equipment used on that line is rented from the Canadian National railway system. I do not know of any plans whereby special equipment is being designed or manufactured for that railway. The only equipment which is being used is of the kind required for the moving of freight and of passengers occasionally.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I suggest that we might discuss items 383 and 384 together. I think they are both on the same basis. The minister's remarks do not answer my question. As Minister of Transport he ought to know something about the Canadian National Railways as well. He says that all the equipment is being hired from the Canadian National Railways. I should like to know something about the whole situation. How much freight is going over the Hudson Bay railway at the present time; what are its requirements, and why is $200,000 needed in the current year? I suppose it is to take care of debts. What equipment have we there, and can it be replaced if necessary with other equipment?

Mr. MICHAUD: I just informed the hon. gentleman that we have no equipment on that road. What is being used is the equipment of the Canadian National railways, which operates that Churchill branch. The government built the line, but it is being operated by the Canadian National railways, whose equipment is being used, as on any other section of the Canadian National railway system.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That does not answer the question. I have had so much respect for the minister based upon his administration of the Department of Fisheries that I thought that probably, when he got to this new position, he would be able to tell us all about it, for he is quite versatile. What I wish to know is the position with regard to the Canadian National and the Hudson Bay railways. Does the government operate the Hudson Bay railway, or is it leased to the Canadian National railways? What equipment is used, and is a deficit unavoidable? Are we using the road to the best advantage?

Mr. MICHAUD: I have already stated twice that the Canadian government does not operate the so-called Hudson Bay railway. The railway is being operated by the Canadian National railways on behalf of the Canadian government, and all the equipment used belongs to the Canadian National railways. There are two regular trains each week which operate from July 11 between the Pas and Churchill. One is a mixed train with sleeping and dining-car accommodation, and the other is a way-freight with day coach only. No grain was moved for export during the year, the elevator at Churchill remaining filled to capacity with grain handled in previous years.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why do we put up $200,000 and $61,000?

Mr. MICHAUD: That is for the coming year. I mentioned 1942-43.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why do we need this money?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is to cover any possible deficit for the current year.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have one suggestion to make. Would it not be better if the Canadian National Railways took over the railway and ran it?

Mr. MICHAUD: That is what they are doing; they are running it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then, why do we need to have $200,000 in the votes? Why does it not come out of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. MICHAUD: I thought my hon. friend knew the history of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, I understand it.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. MICHAUD: If the hon. member understands it, why such questions?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why not let the Canadian National Railways take it over and run it?

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the $61,000 not for capital expenditures, included in which are new sidings?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Which are very necessary. I congratulate the people who are operating the railway upon reducing the deficit from $490,000, as shown in item 384, to $290,000. It shows what can be done by the management. It is a good management. I know some of the men at the Pas, and they deserve credit for what they have been doing.

The CHAIRMAN: Items 383 and 384 have been pretty well discussed. Shall the items carry?

Items agreed to.

Maritime Freight Rates Act—

385. To hereby authorize and provide for the payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1943-44 to the Canadian National Railway Company of the difference (estimated by the Canadian National Railway Company and certified by the auditors of the said company to the Minister of Transport as and when required by the said minister) occuring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (upon the same basis as set out in section 9 of the said act with respect to companies therein referred to) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1943 under the tariffs approved on the eastern lines (as referred to in section 2 of the said act) of the Canadian National Railways, $3,350,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The Minister of Transport was formerly Minister of Fisheries, and many times he and I had arguments across the floor as to why we in the central provinces cannot get fish at reasonable prices. I am going to bring up this question again.

Mr. MICHAUD: Because you do not go fishing.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am quite serious; all joking aside. In these days when there is such a scarcity of meat we wonder why we in the central provinces cannot have the railways carry our fish to central Canada so that the people in Toronto, instead of having to pay at the present time 20 cents a pound for codfish, might get that fish at a more reasonable price. I am discussing this matter because the minister has occupied both positions. We have to pay 20 cents a pound and the fisherman in the east gets 2 cents a pound; it used to be three-quarters of a cent a pound.

In certain seasons of the year the people in the maritime provinces have shad, and alewives, which are a delicious fish if you do not mind taking out the bones. The minister knows all about this and he can tell us why we cannot get their fish. We in Ontario, the people on lake Ontario, are doing a very good job. I see the minister representing the Hamilton district coming in. He knows what a good job his people are doing, selling whitefish and getting marvellous prices for it. It helps in our balance of trade. Why can we not get some fish from the maritime provinces? I do not see how anyone can possibly account for the difference between 2 cents paid to the fishermen there and 20 cents charged to the consumer in Ontario. It is a shame that these fish are used as manure. I repeat, I cannot understand why we cannot obtain shad and gaspereaux from the maritime provinces. Cannot the minister do something about getting fish from the maritimes to us in Ontario? The people in the maritime provinces have always complained that we can ship our products there, while they have no opportunity to reciprocate. I am pleading with the minister to give them an opportunity to send their fish to us, because this comes right under the head of railways. That is where it belongs—transportation, refrigeration and so on. Perhaps in that part of the country they do not get ice; the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) will tell me. At any rate we could not ship our ice from Ontario to freeze the fish there. Surely something could be done about the matter. I have brought it up four or five times, and I am trying to do it to-night in a humorous way. We have spent thousands of dollars to get the people fish-wise —not fishwives.

Mr. MICHAUD: Alewives.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This is the first time I have been able to corner the minister now that he has had experience in both departments, and I urge upon him that he do something to make it possible for us to get products from the maritime provinces. We will take their fish, but I do not see why we should have to pay through the nose for them when some of them are thrown away and used for manure. It is a crying shame that something more is not done to move fish from the maritimes to the people of Ontario. That is all I have to say.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am glad the hon. member for St. Paul's has a word to say about the fisheries in the maritime provinces. On behalf of the maritime provinces I express appreciation of this vote, which has appeared in our estimates from year to year. The man who has been responsible to the greatest extent for this vote on maritime freight rates was the late Colonel Gordon S. Harrington, who, I regret to say, passed away two or three weeks ago. He was the person who largely prepared the case and had this recognition given the producers of the maritime provinces so as to compensate at least partly for the discrimination against the maritimes in the handling of freight between that part of the country and central Canada.

I also wish to express again our appreciation of the work of the commission which sat at that time, consisting of Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, from England, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macmillan) and the late Judge Wallace. They brought in this finding, which was adopted by the Canadian parliament and which has been of great benefit to the people of the maritimes. Of course no payments to equalize freight rates could ever compensate producers in the maritime provinces for the handicaps under which they operate in relation to the rest of Canada.

The next item has to do with branch lines in the maritime provinces, two of which are in my constituency of Cumberland. It was unfortunate for the residents of that part of the maritimes served by these branch lines that they were not made part of the Canadian National Railways when so many of the other branch lines were taken over. As it is, the residents and producers along these branch lines have to pay a double freight rate. If these lines had been taken over, as was the case with most of the other branch lines in the maritime provinces, the freight rates would be established on a mileage basis instead of on the basis of these small railway units.

I simply wanted to give recognition to those men who accomplished so much for the maritime provinces, and to express the appreciation of the maritimes to the government for continuing this vote.

Item agreed to.

Government employees' compensation—

387. Administration of the Government Employees' Compensation Act, $24,735.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this the item, together with the statutory item just below, under which the rather extraordinary expenditures in the Montreal district which were aired in the house a short time ago, in connection with Doctor Chartier, would come?

Mr. MICHAUD: Part of it would come under this item and part under the war vote.

Mr. GRAYDON: In view of the revelations made in the house at that time, has the minister conducted any investigation in regard to that matter? If so, I should like to have his report.

Mr. MICHAUD: I have made an investigation, and I find that there was no revelation except the amount of money that was paid to Doctor Chartier for his professional services, which was disclosed at the request of the hon. member. The dominion compensation act provides that federal employees in the provinces shall be compensated for injuries or accidents under the provisions of the provincial laws. The compensation act of Quebec provides that dominion employees come under schedule 2, and the government is directly responsible for compensation to the employees for injuries, medical services and hospital fees.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister gave this explanation on the previous occasion. I was not asking for a repetition of that explanation; what I was really seeking was some report by the minister as to whether or not, after investigating the rather large fees which had been collected from the government by Doctor Chartier, the government had come to the conclusion that the amount was extraordinarily high and, if so, what the government intended to do about it.

Mr. MICHAUD: The inquiry I made satisfied me that though the total amount was large, the fees were paid in accordance with the provisions of the workmen's compensation act of the province of Quebec, and were checked in each instance by the treasury department of the federal government. The amount appeared large because Doctor Chartier operates a clinic in Montreal, and his services were resorted to both by the dominion government compensation officers and the provincial commission in following up cases, in regard to both radiotherapy and X-ray work. Many cases also arose in war industries in the Montreal area during the last two years, and many serious accidents which were followed up by the officers of the department required the professional advice of Doctor Chartier and the members of his clinic, whose charges were in accordance with the schedule of fees provided by the Quebec act. We could not reduce those charges, nor could we dispute them; they had to be paid, and I am told that the officers of the treasury department and of this branch of the service, who have been administering the branch for ten or fifteen years, are satisfied that all the money which was paid to Doctor Chartier and other doctors was in accordance with the schedule of fees, and that it had to be paid in accordance with the provisions of the Quebec act.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no desire to continue the controversy at this time; rather I am desirous of seeing the item passed. I take issue with the minister, however, in regard to the amount which was paid; for despite the casual inquiry which he appears to have made, I must confess that I remain unconvinced that this practice should be continued in the years to come, because I think it is an extraordinarily large amount of money to pay in these circumstances.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

392. To provide for the discharge of commitments incurred prior to March 31, 1943, under authority of vote No. 408, schedule A to the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1942, respecting highway crossings of railways (revote), $23,870.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that this is a discharge of commitments entered into prior to March 31, 1943, and has to do with level crossings; is that correct?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are there many instances in the past year where level crossings have been installed, and where the dominion has to make some proportion of the payment?

Mr. MICHAUD: There are no new undertakings, but there are two projects which had been started and have been completed. One is at Val Brillant, in the county of Matapedia, Quebec, and the other is at Morrison's crossing over the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian National railways, at Fredericton, New Brunswick.

Item agreed to.

Air service—

393. Air service administration, $11,250.

Mr. GRAYDON: Over what part of the air service does the minister have jurisdiction?

Mr. MICHAUD: The civil aviation, or air service, is administered by the Department of Transport. By virtue of an order in council in 1940 the Minister of Munitions and Supply has kept supervision over the air service, although it is administered by my department. It is jointly administered, but the responsibility, through the order in council, is on the Department of Munitions and Supply for the time being.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of convenience and constitutionality, why is there any division between the two departments? My understanding was that the Department of Munitions and Supply had a jurisdiction sufficiently wide to cover all air service. Yet this vote would seem to imply that some of the administration of the air service comes under the Department of Transport. Why is there this duplication?

Mr. MICHAUD: This was done in 1940 when the adminstration of the Department of Transport and the Department of Public Works was placed under the same minister. The Minister of Munitions and Supply, who had initiated the trans-Canada air service, by arrangement with the then minister kept supervision over that branch of the service. Since I have taken charge of the department I have been satisfied with that arrangement, and the Minister of Munitions and Supply and myself have cooperated in administering the service.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a word to say about this service. I suppose Toronto was the first place in Canada which showed any interest in air service. We had McCurdy, and many other people who knew a great deal about flying in the early days. Then, a lot of our lads were in the first war—and I would refer particularly to Bishop and Barker. Then we come to an experimental stage, during which Casey Baldwin and John McCurdy were active.

Now, through their effort, and through the efforts of people in the United States, such as the Curtiss boys, we have a marvellous air force. We have marvellous machines. To-day we hear a lot about the Mosquito, which is being built in Toronto. In that city we are air-minded, and we were air-minded as far back as 1935. We made up our minds we needed an airport. We got busy and made many applications for the installation of that airport. Finally it was installed on Toronto island. That was the logical place for it, so far as civil aviation out of Toronto was concerned. A general election came along, and it appeared that some people were annoyed with that election. The result was that plans for a tunnel between the western gap and the airport were never completed. The reason given was that the airport would not be any good. A project worth hundreds of thousands of dollars was abandoned—and abandoned for political purposes. The result is that we have not got that tunnel, and must use the ferry boat to cross to the island. I charge this government with non-completion of the tunnel. The airport at Toronto island affords first-class landing facilities both for land planes and seaplanes. Toronto was willing to install the necessary sand pumps required to pump the sand. I am making these statements only to show what can happen. Now, to-day, if you want to take an airplane, what have you to do?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Get on the plane.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Oh, that is what the hon. member thinks you have to do. He is always on a plane, as far as I can see.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I may be on a plane, but you are in the air.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): You are in the sky; but probably a little bit later you will be down lower; I cannot tell now. After years of effort our airport was installed, and it is one of the finest in Canada.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): At Trenton, did the hon. member say?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order; let us get on with the business of the committee.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. member is trying to tell me something, and I do not know what he is saying. I think he said something about Trenton, which is a little village near the Trent canal. Yes; that is the place where the Trent canal goes through—and some government or another spent millions of dollars on it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. There are serious-minded members in this committee who wish to get down to the business before it. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to keep hon. members to a discussion of the item.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If the hon .member will leave me alone I will go on with what I have to say. I am talking about civil aviation, and I do not see why the hon. member for Vancouver Centre should get so sore about it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): The item under consideration is air service administration. I think what the hon. member is discussing is the next item which covers civil aviation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I suggest that we take the two items together so that we can make a little progress. We have a lot of difficulty, but we put in an airport at Malton and it is one of the finest in Canada. But there is another wonderful site that could be developed. We must not forget that Canada will be the centre of the air world. Along with the United States, the British empire will be the most important factor in civil aviation, and Canada will be the centre of this air traffic. Toronto, and Winnipeg as well, are going to have no small place in that aviation world. All you have to do is look at the globe and see how close places are when you go over the north pole.

Some mistakes have been made, and one great mistake was made at Toronto. We have one of the finest locations in the world for an airport, but for political reasons an airport was built at Malton. Had this other site been developed a man could go from the Royal York hotel through the tunnel, and take the plane for Montreal or any other place on this continent. Instead of that he has to motor out to Malton over bum roads, or he used to until my leader got after them. I am simply pointing out the mistakes that have been made. We should not overlook Canada's place in the aviation world of the future. At one time the best aviation service you could get was given by the Dutch, and the next best was by the English, but we in Canada will be in a position to give service par excellence, working in conjunction with the rest of the empire.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

394. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder, $257,670.

Mr. SLAGHT: I think this item and the three following items could well be lumped together. I have just this word to say to the minister and also to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, because there is joint administration here. I should like the administration and the government to see to it that at the earliest date possible conferences are arranged between this country, the motherland and other commonwealth nations in order to plan now for a world civil aviation service in the days to come. I think it was yesterday or the day before that some one in the British house, I am not sure whether it was Mr. Atlee, commented on the place that Canada would occupy in future civil aviation. There is no doubt that to a large extent air service will replace marine service, and the empire has been supreme in marine service for a century. We should overlook no steps which would enable us to carry on, in friendly cooperation with our great neighbour to the south. That country has indicated that it is quite prepared to cooperate with the commonwealth in seeing to it that civil aviation is made available throughout the world so that distances may be annihilated and that the peoples of the different nations may travel more rapidly and more frequently. Again let me press upon these two ministers and the government the necessity of communicating with the mother country and other commonwealth nations to bring about early conferences on this important subject.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

Civil aviation division—

395. Airways and airports—construction and improvements, including lighting and radio facilities—capital, $1,512,520.

Mr. HAZEN: How much has been spent by provinces during the last fiscal year on the operation and maintenance of airways and airports? The details shown on page 223 of the estimates show an amount of $1,446,900, but I take it that this is estimated. What is the actual amount?

Mr. MICHAUD: The division of the moneys allotted is not made by provinces; it is made by airports.

Mr. HAZEN: These airports are situated in the different provinces.

Mr. MICHAUD: The amounts are as follows:

Salaries	30,020 08
Unemployment insurance	57,083 00

Mr. HAZEN: I think something else is included there. I was asking for construction and improvements.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is what I gave.

Mr. HAZEN: But it included salaries and cost of living bonus.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is the salaries of the engineers who work on the improvements.

Mr. HAZEN: Are the figures the minister has just given for construction or for improvements?

Mr. MICHAUD: Both; construction and improvements.

Mr. HAZEN: Can the minister give the committee a break-down between construction and improvements?

Mr. MICHAUD: No.

Mr. HAZEN: Surely there is a differeince between them. What did the new work amount to last year?

Mr. MICHAUD: The work I have enumerated was all improvements to old fields. No new fields were constructed under this item.

Mr. HAZEN: What was the total of the figures the minister gave?

Mr. MICHAUD: It was $1,301,606.47.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What are the projects for the current year for which this money is being appropriated? I might point out that this appropriation has the general commendation of the country. A great deal of this expenditure when properly made will represent an asset to Canada for all time. If the minister noted carefully the expenditures for last year, he must have seen that they were mostly made in central and western Canada, and not to any great extent in my province. At the town of Amherst there is a fine airport which should be further improved. The citizens of that town have contributed toward it perhaps to a greater extent than have citizens to any other airport in Canada by providing the land and contributing fifty per cent of the cost of construction. It is true that the minister's department completed some of the work that was undertaken, but still more work should be done to complete that port. I would also point out to the minister the necessity of building more emergency landing fields in my constituency. In the community of Parrsboro there have been a number of forced landings. There is a site available there now at a very low cost indeed. It is a natural airfield, and even if it were necessary to use it only as an emergency landing field, it would prove a safe landing field both for planes of the air force and commercial planes operating in that territory.

There are other airfields in Nova Scotia which I think should be completed. Appropriations have been made for airfields at New Glasgow, for instance, and other places. That work should be completed. As I have pointed out, if this work is properly done, it will not only provide safety for those who fly over the territory, but represent an asset for all time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has this vote anything to do with the airfields at Grand Prairie, Fort St. John, Peace River, Fort Nelson and White Horse?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, those are all war services out of the war appropriation.

Mr. MacNICOL: The votes pertaining to these fields?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Has the minister a list of the projects that are to be undertaken during the current year? If it is too long to read, perhaps he could put it on Hansard.

Mr. MICHAUD: I will read it. It is as follows:

Vancouver	$ 16,000
Lethbridge	12,000
Calgary	14,000
Edmonton	24,500
Regina	19,500
Kenora	19,000
Armstrong	261,000
Kapuskasing	214,000
North Bay	4,000
Malton	12,000
London	14,500
Windsor	120,050
Ottawa	176,000
Dorval	74,000
Moncton	75,000
Old Glory	3,000
General unforeseen expenses	43,665

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): There is no provision at all for Nova Scotia?

Mr. MICHAUD: There is one for Moncton.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That is New Brunswick. Have any proposals been considered or approved by the department for building emergency landing fields as a measure of safety for the air force and civilian aviation?

Mr. MICHAUD: There are about 100 emergency landing fields on the Trans-Canada Air Lines which were built before the war.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Are any under contemplation at the present time to be built, or are there to be any extensions?

Mr. MICHAUD: There is nothing contemplated out of the civil appropriations for new fields this year.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before this item passes I wish to emphasize the wisdom of building a greater number of these landing fields not only to save the lives of the plane operators and passengers but to prevent destruction of the planes themselves, which cost many thousands of dollars. Some of these planes are valuable, running into as much as $500,000. Emergency landing fields are the cheapest kind of insurance for such planes, apart altogether from the factor of safety of passengers and crew, insurance on the lives of these people who fly in these planes, and insurance against property damage.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, before you proceed to the next item, I would move that the committee continue to sit after eleven o'clock. I have discussed this with the leaders of the other parties and they are agreeable to go on until twelve o'clock. I think we could make some progress and better ensure finishing up this week.

Motion agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

396. Airways and airports—Operation and maintenance, including lighting, radio and meteorological services, $1,921,040.

Mr. REID: May I ask if out of this appropriation any money will be expended on the airport known as the Vancouver airport, which is situate not at Vancouver but on Sea island, in the constituency of New Westminster? What is the set-up there? Is the property leased from the city of Vancouver? Under what conditions are all the facilities operating?

Mr. MICHAUD: We have in our estimates $16,000 to improve the lighting at the airport.

Mr. REID: Is a rental paid for that to the city of Vancouver?

Mr. MICHAUD: One dollar a year, I am told, during the war.

Mr. FULFORD: I would ask that the page boys be allowed to go home. They have been here since eleven o'clock this morning, and it is too bad to ask them to stay any later.

Mr. HAZEN: I would ask the minister to give us a break-down of the amount which was expended last year under this heading for repairs and maintenance of aerodromes, aircraft, buildings and equipment. The estimated amount is $340,420, the fourth item on page 225 of the estimates.

Mr. MICHAUD: I can give the complete cost of repairs and maintenance, including the salaries for the work done at six terminal airports:

Mr. HAZEN: What is the total amount, and how many more items are there?

Mr. MICHAUD: The total amount is $413,593.08, including beacon sites, seaplane bases.

Item agreed to.

Special—Deficits—

Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals.

406. Amount required to provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1943-44 to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made from time to time by the national company to the Minister of Finance and to be applied by the national company in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals arising in the calendar year 1943, $475,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not my intention to repeat anything I have said earlier in this session on this subject of transportation to Prince Edward Island; but I believe the time is opportune, on behalf of that province, to plan properly a system of transportation in order to carry out the intent of our agreement with the island when it entered confederation. One clause of the agreement with Prince Edward Island called for a proper system of transportation connecting that province with the mainland. Anyone who travels to that island knows that there is not an up-to-date system of transportation to it. The loss of the ferryboat the Charlottetown, was perhaps a blessing in disguise, though inconvenient at present, in that it gives the government an opportunity to provide a more efficient boat. I have heard rumours, and the transport minister said something about a new boat being built, but has anyone heard anything as to the description of the proposed new boat? I hope it will be constructed with speedy loading and unloading facilities like the ferryboats that connect St. Ignace across the strait with Mackinaw, on the south side. These carry an enormous amount of traffic quite speedily, loading and unloading it. I do not think the ferry that was sunk, the Charlottetown, was as satisfactory as it might have been. I was on it several times and, as far as I am concerned, it could have been more satisfactory from the point of view of loading and unloading automobile traffic. I damaged my car on two occasions, because, as everyone knows, it was difficult going round the decks, the passage being so very narrow, and when you got to the end of the boat you were obliged to back around in order to obtain space to park your car. I hope that the new boat which is being built will provide for rapid loading and unloading of motor cars. I make these observations because, in my opinion, there is no part of Canada more beautiful than Prince Edward Island, no other part that tourists would prefer to motor over. There are just as beautiful parts in every province; every part of the dominion has its own peculiar attractions. But in my judgment this is one province that has not had fair play in the matter of transportation service. Not only should there be proper provision as far as the boat is concerned, but there should be a proper wharf on each side of the strait. I cannot for a moment agree with any statement that the approach is satisfactory on either side of the channel for speedy traffic. I can see how they could be greatly improved, and I am convinced that this is what Canada owes to Prince Edward Island if we are to carry out the undertaking given that province when it came into confederation. I will not give details—this was done earlier in the year—with regard to the amount of traffic moving back and forth. Suffice it to say that the time lost to shippers from the island, and the injustice done to growers there in transportation, warrant our making it possible for the people of Prince Edward Island to obtain more speedy transportation to connect them with the mainland. The mainland is their market. I would ask the minister to interest himself, if it is in his department, in the construction of the boat that is being built, keeping before him particularly the importance of rapid loading and unloading, proper space on the boat for the parking of motor cars, so that it can be done expeditiously, and proper wharfage accommodation on each side of the channel. I repeat, the time has come when we should carry out the undertaking given to Prince Edward Island for a proper system of transportation.

Mr. MICHAUD: I must again assure my hon. friend that every attention has been given the problem which he has so much at heart. The loss of the Charlottetown was accidental during the war, and everything has been done in an effort to find another boat to replace her. It has not been possible, and now we have decided to build one. Those whom we consider the best marine architects in the country have been retained. They have already toured North America to see what has been done in other parts in the construction of automobile ferryboats, combining a railway car ferry with an automobile boat. That is a difficult feat to accomplish, operating the boat in tidal waters, loading and unloading it. Instructions have been given the architects to go ahead, and they have already begun to design the most modern ferryboat that they can for the service between the mainland and the island. That is the best we can do under the circumstances, and I hope our instructions and expectations will be carried out.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the boat; what about the wharves?

Mr. MICHAUD: The wharves will have to be improved in accordance with the construction of the boat, to enable it to operate, but we cannot do very much in regard to the wharves until we know what the requirements will be in connection with the boat.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have plans been submitted to the minister showing the proposed design of the boat?

Mr. MICHAUD: A preliminary sketch has been prepared, and the final report is being prepared now.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are the designs available to be seen? I should like to see them; I know something about accommodation required on boats.

Mr. MICHAUD: Unfortunately I am not in a position to answer in the affirmative. The sketches have been returned to the architects, who will soon have the official final report prepared.

Item agreed to.

National harbours board—

407. To provide for payment to national harbours board of the amount hereinafter set forth, to be applied in payment of the deficits (after payment of interest due the public but exclusive of interest on dominion government advances and depreciation on capital structures) arising in the calendar year 1943, in the operation of the Churchill harbour, $63,400.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to commend the minister, the department and the national barbours board for the splendid work they have been doing since the commencement of the war. With the enormous increase in traffic, the important movements of war materials and so on, there have been some congestion, some delays and many handicaps, but I think the harbours board has done excellent work. I have had some protests from the longshoremen of Halifax with respect to what is called the central dispatching agency. Apparently there is some resentment over the establishment of this agency and the unnecessary expenditure of money. They say a building was erected at a cost of $58,000 and apparently this agency is manned largely by personnel from outside the city of Halifax. They say men are there from Montreal, Vancouver, Toronto and other places; and while they are members of the longshoremen's association, these people believe that Halifax men should be used for this work. They say this system is a hold-up, and ask, "Why should men from Montreal come here to run our waterfront, when we have men in Halifax and throughout Nova Scotia who are quite capable of doing this work? Everything comes here from Montreal, even the drift ice in the spring." I would ask the minister to see that preference in any work of this kind is given to the men who have their homes in Halifax.

Mr. MICHAUD: I regret to say that I do not believe this criticism is justified. My hon. friend must not overlook the fact that to-day Halifax is a national port, and if there is surplus man-power available in Halifax we should like very much to have it made available. At the present time we are short of several men to carry on the work required in that port.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): May I ask if the department and the national harbours board are in continual consultation and conference with the heads of the longshoremen's union; if they are working in complete harmony with them and carrying out their wishes as far as possible? Only by this being done can the best results be obtained. A similar fault has prevailed in many of the war industries; the workmen have not been consulted to the extent they should have been; representatives of the workmen have not been placed on these boards, and so on. I believe that if some other policy had been carried out, we would have achieved far better results in many if not all of our war activities.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Wait until the minister has answered the question, Mr. Chairman; I think it was a reasonable one.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry; I thought the answer had been given.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think it can be stated safely that the officials of the shipping board, the national harbours board and the British admiralty have kept in contact with the heads of the longshoremen's association, and so far as I am aware the relations between the longshoremen and the administrators of the harbour have been good. There is no dispute between the labour men and the officials; there is a real shortage of labour to meet the present requirements of the harbour of Halifax.

Mr. MacNICOL: If this question will require any time to answer I shall forego it, but could the minister tell me what harbours come under the national harbours board?

Mr. MICHAUD: I shall try to name them: Halifax, Saint John, Quebec, Montreal, Chicoutimi, Vancouver, Churchill, Three Rivers, Prescott, Port Colborne.

Mr. MacNICOL: Charlottetown is not one of them?

Mr. MICHAUD: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then I shall not ask anything about Charlottetown under this item, but under what later item may I ask a question about Charlottetown harbour?

Mr. MICHAUD: There is item 410.

Item agreed to.

National harbours board—

410. Advances to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the National Harbours Board Act, to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1943: Reconstruction and capital expenditures—Montreal, $33,700.

Mr. MacNICOL: I cannot ask a question about Charlottetown under this item, because the minister has told me that Charlottetown is not under the national harbours board.

Mr. MICHAUD: We have no appropriation for harbours that are not under our jurisdiction. Perhaps the question could be asked under the public works estimates.

Mr. HAZEN: What item are we on?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 410.

Mr. HAZEN: Did we pass item 408?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

70. Departmental administration, $146,200.

Mr. REID: May I draw the minister's attention to the shortage that may arise of flax for the manufacture of nets. My information is that Great Britain controls the supply of flax, and that Canada has sold her supplies to Britain as far ahead as 1945. The manufacturers are warning the industry that we are likely to be short of flax for nets for the spring of 1944. I do not know where they are made in the east, but in British Columbia they were made by the manufacturers and also by hand by the Japanese, though I am informed that nets made by the Japanese were not as good as those made by the manufacturers. Prior to the war we obtained our supplies of flax from Belgium and France, but those supplies have almost run out. I consider it my duty to bring this matter to the attention of the minister and ask him if the Department of Fisheries is aware of what might occur, and what steps are being taken to see to it that Great Britain releases enough of this type of flax for the making of nets for the spring fishing of 1944. Nets last only from one to three years, and the inferior grades do not last more than one year.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): We have been aware of this expected shortage, and have made a request to the Briitsh government, as a result of which we expect to have the necessary flax.

Mr. HAZEN: I have a question affecting the fishermen of the bay of Fundy, who, during part of the year, are engaged in the fishing of salmon. I have recently had communication with some of those fishermen, and I understand that the price of twenty-one cents a pound has been fixed. That is the amount the shipper, or purchaser, must pay the fishermen; it cannot go below that. There is also a provision that a fisherman may send eighty per cent of the amount of salmon he sent last year to the United States; at least that is my understanding of the regulation. That salmon sent to the United States for sale carries no price ceiling. The other twenty per cent which he must sell in Canada has a price ceiling.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Before the hon. member proceeds further, may I point out that this matter is under the control of the wartime prices and trade board. My department has nothing to do with the fixing of prices for fish.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister should be interested in it, for the sake of the fishermen.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I could not give a proper explanation of what the hon. member is saying. Of course I could give an explanation, but it might not be perfectly accurate, because the matter does not come under my department.

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps at some time the minister would permit me to discuss this matter with him in his office.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Item agreed to.

73. Development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish, $40,000.

Mr. GILLIS: I notice there is a decrease by $22,760 in this item. I should imagine it would be increased. This does not indicate that the department intends to do anything for the development of the deep sea fisheries. Why has the vote been decreased?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is our intention to do more than ever to increase the sale of fish. But at this time we are short, by a large amount, of the amount of fish required. If we were to send our lecturers throughout the country asking people to eat more fish, we might not be able to supply them with the quantity required. We have not enough fish.

Item agreed to.

74. Fish culture, $193,800.

Mr. HAZEN: How is oyster culture developed, and what progress is being made?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This item is for fish hatcheries, retaining ponds, rearing stations, the improvement of water areas, the destruction of enemies, the stocking of rivers and lakes with fingerlings and yearlings—

Mr. HAZEN: No; I am talking about another item, namely, that of oyster culture.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We have not yet reached that item. This is a little more than it was last year, because we employ quite a number of people, and have to pay war bonuses.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has this item anything to do with fish culture in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No, only on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does any item in the estimates refer to fishing in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We have no item dealing with fish culture in that area.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the minister had read Hansard of a year ago or two years ago, he would have known that wonderful fish are caught in that area, in those great lakes in the Northwest Territories. Large quantities of fish are shipped by plane to Waterways, and from Waterways by mail train to New York and Chicago. In one of the lakes some fish had been found to be somewhat diseased. Has anything been done to improve their condition? I am told everything is now satisfactory.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): When I told the hon. member we were doing nothing in that area I was not quite correctly informed. Under our direction the mounted police are doing the necessary work. We have no specific amount at our disposal, because the mounted police give their time to it, and they are paid by the Minister of Justice for that work.

Mr. MacNICOL: For the sake of fish producers, and companies shipping fish from that area, the minister should look into this matter. He will find that the fish from that country are of exceptionally good quality, and that the demand for them is tremendous. It seems strange to me to find that the mounted police have anything to do with looking after the fish in those lakes. I cannot comprehend a situation where the mounted police would have anything to do with the Department of Fisheries, and particularly in that area, out of which they ship eight to ten cars a week to the markets in Chicago and New York. This is splendid business, and if the minister has not yet had time to become familiar with it, then I hope when parliament meets again, and I ask this question about fishing in the Northwest Territories, he will be able to give me a reasonable answer.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I thank the hon. member for drawing my attention to this matter. It is possible that in the Northwest Territories we have not yet found a need for placing fingerlings or other fish culture in those lakes. It is altogether likely that the fish are plentiful, and that there are not many fishermen.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister had better look into the matter between now and next session because I shall be after him.

Item agreed to.

75. Oyster culture, $26,950.

Mr. HAZEN: What progress is being made with oyster culture, and where is the work being done? I should like to have any other information the minister can give. Has this work proven successful so far?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The work is done mostly in Prince Edward Island and the maritime provinces and is proving successful. It is a slow process, taking five years, and we get results only after a certain time.

Item agreed to.

76. Fisheries research board of Canada, $238,000.

Mr. REID: There is an increase of $2,820 in this vote, and I should like to know what this is for. I wish to know also the number of stations under the board and the number of personnel. This seems to be a lot of money compared with what is provided for the other fisheries commission.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This is the scientific branch of the fisheries department, and this vote covers the salaries of the scientists located at the biological and experimental stations, as well as the other employees. We have five main and two substations.

Mr. ISNOR: Where are they located?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): One is at St. Andrews and there is an experimental station at Halifax. There is a substation at Ellerslie on Prince Edward Island, mostly for oyster culture, and there is also one at Grand River on the Gaspe peninsula. There is a biological station at Departure Bay, and there are two substations in British Columbia, one on Queen Charlotte islands and another on Vancouver island. This station does work at different places.

Mr. REID: What kind of work do they do?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They tag fish and carry on experiments as to the number of fish that return to the rivers. They see whether eggs are hatching properly and carry on other experimental work to attempt to prevent the depletion of the fish. There is at Vancouver an experimental station which used to be located at Prince Rupert.

Mr. HAZEN: I notice that $135,000, or over half the vote, is required for temporary assistance. Is this required every year?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Some of the employees are not permanent. It has been that way for some time.

Item agreed to.

80. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing, and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins receivable by Canada under international arrangement and which formerly accrued to Canada pursuant to pelagic sealing treaty, 1911, now expired, $50,000.

Mr. REID: What was Canada's share of the fur catch last year? Have any changes taken place in the working of the treaty since Japan has dropped out, or is a new treaty to be drawn up between the United States and Canada?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There was no fishing last year. Our share used to be fifteen per cent before war was declared with Japan, but now it is twenty per cent under an arrangement with the United States. We expect to have a fair catch this year.

Mr. REID: What was our share last year?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There was no fishing last year.

Mr. REID: What was our share the last year that fishing took place?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In 1941 our share was 14,000 skins, representing a revenue of $212,000.

Mr. HAZEN: How much was actually spent last year?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The amount spent was $74,477.56.

Mr. HAZEN: If there were no seals caught, why should there be any money spent for transportation, dressing and dyeing?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It takes about a year to process the pelts, and this amount was to cover the fur of the previous year.

Item agreed to.

81. To provide for payment of a bounty for the destruction of harbour seals, $15,000.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): How much was spent last year, and what is the amount of the bounty?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The bounty is $2.50 each, and the number of seals was 3,107, the amount spent being $7,767.50.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): How was that amount distributed?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The distribution was as follows:

Nova Scotia	$2,957
Prince Edward Island and Magdalen islands	1,035
New Brunswick	855
British Columbia	2,920

Item agreed to.

Special—

83. To provide for the extension of educational work in cooperative producing and selling among fishermen, $50,000.

Mr. REID: Was this money spent in the maritimes and British Columbia?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: How was it spent; where was it spent, and what were the educational institutions that carried on this work?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The amounts are:

St. Francis Xavier university, Antigonish	$37,000
Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, Quebec.	8,000
University of British Columbia...	5,000

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

183. General administration, $1,033,725.

Mr. REID: Some time ago on the orders of the day I asked a question of the minister regarding the allotment of beer in the various provinces, but on the orders of the day I could ask only a very brief question. The matter has never been fully explained to the public. The viewpoint in British Columbia is that British Columbia has not been fairly treated; that it has not had the same treatment as the other provinces. I understand that when the percentage reduction was made it was made on the sales or consumption of beer, wines and spirits in the previous year, but that the reduction was made on the amount that had passed through bond. The people of British Columbia have maintained that by some means or another Ontario received advance information and was able to get all its supplies through the excise department before the order came into effect, while in the other provinces those who had bought supplies were not able to get them because, although they had bought them from the breweries, their supplies had not been passed by the excise department. In view of the agitation over this question I think a fuller statement should be made by the minister than has been made hitherto, and I would ask him to give an explanation now as to just what the situation is.

Hon. C. W. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): There is really no mystery about the war-time alcoholic beverages order. It was made on the 16th of December and went back to the 31st of October, 1942. It provided for a ten per cent reduction throughout the country as compared with the quantity of beer produced in the year ended October 31, 1942. Every province is treated on exactly the same basis. There is a ten per cent reduction from the amount released to each province in the previous year. In some provinces the sales had been heavy between October 31 and December 16, and that caused a shortage for the rest of the year in those provinces. In some provinces that shortage was more accentuated than in others.

Mr. REID: The reduction was on the sales?

Mr. GIBSON: The reduction is on the amount of beer sold by the brewers in each province during that period.

Mr. HAZEN: It has come to my attention that in some instances Canadian companies that have received orders from the dominion government to supply and ship overseas goods that were manufactured in the United States have paid duty on these goods when they enter Canada. Goods and merchandise that are manufactured in the United States and are purchased by a Canadian company to be shipped to some other part of the world are not subject to duty when passing through Canada to a port of embarkation. Just why these Canadian companies should have paid duty on these goods manufactured in the United States for shipment overseas is a matter that I would ask to have explained. The duties that have been paid in this way have, I am informed, amounted to thousands of dollars. I am not in a position to state how much has been paid, but I believe that at one port in seven months one company paid duties amounting to about $25,000.

The duty imposed by the government of Canada on goods entering Canada varies in amount, as, of course, the minister knows. In the case of mechanical equipment entering this country from the United States, and that is the kind of goods on which this tax has been paid in some instances at least, the duty is about thirty per cent, to which has to be added the war exchange tax of ten per cent and sales tax of eight per cent on the duty paid value of the goods, which makes the tax somewhere about fifty per cent. If duty and taxes are paid on goods of this kind, the cost of the article is increased by at least fifty per cent.

When goods enter this country from the United States a document known as a manifest, which is a notification from the customs officer at the port of entry into Canada to the customs officer at the port of destination in Canada that the goods are on their way, is sent to the customer at the port of destination; and when the goods arrive there, the Canadian company from whom the government is purchasing these goods for shipment overseas, in some instances at least, has gone to the customs house and passed an entry, as it is called; that is to say, paid the duty and taxes on the goods.

The purchaser of the goods is the government—the Department of Munitions and Supply or some other department. The goods come from the United States; they are being sent to Great Britain or some other port of the world outside Canada, and there should be no duty paid on them in Canada because they are only passing through this country. The only reason, it has been suggested to me, why these companies that are selling the goods to the government insist on paying duties and taxes is that their sales are being made on a cost-plus basis, and the payment of these duties and taxes would in consequence increase the amount they would receive from the government.

To give an illustration of the manner in which a transaction of this kind is carried out, a Canadian company—say the General Electric Company of Canada, or the Railway and Power Engineering Corporation—receives an order from the dominion government to supply and ship to some port in Great Britain or North Africa certain goods for which they have the agency and which are manufactured in the United States. The goods are shipped from the United States to Canada in packages marked for the place of destination in Canada, and when leaving the United States are assigned to the military forwarding officer at the port of embarkation, and when they reach the port of embarkation the military forwarding officer sees that they are placed on board ship for overseas. Why under such circumstances should the Canadian company go to the custom house and insist on making an entry and paying duty and taxes on these goods?

The question arises, is a racket being worked in connection with such transactions? I do not know, but I should like the minister to give us some explanation of what is actually taking place. If there is no racket, why do these Canadian companies insist upon paying these taxes which they are not in the ordinary course of events required to pay? I ask the minister for an explantion of transactions of this kind. If there has been overcharging, steps should be taken to see that the money is refunded and that the guilty persons are punished. I do not know if there has been overcharging or not; but the transactions, it seems to me, are open to question, and I think some explanation is due this committee.

Mr. GIBSON: That is very much a matter for the Department of Munitions and Supply to reply to. Normally, when goods are brought into this country for export, if duty is paid at the border when they come in, drawback of the duty is made when the goods are exported. Munitions and supply did, I understand, buy goods on a duty-paid price, and when they came in the duty was paid; when they were exported, whatever duty had been paid would be refundable. Munitions and Supply, when they are now buying goods which are to be exported, buy them and no duty is paid at the border when they come in. The question of cost plus, or profit being made on a duty-paid value, is a matter which came to my attention some time ago and I took it up with the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Of course it is a matter depending on the terms of the contract which the Department of Munitions and Supply make. All we do is collect the duty on the goods which are dutiable, but refund the duty when they are exported.

Mr. HAZEN: In this case that has been referred to, as I understand it these people have gone to the customs house and insisted on paying these duties and these taxes. I should like to know why they did that. Why were they so anxious to pay these duties?

Mr. GIBSON: Because their contract with the Department of Munitions and Supply called for payment of duty when the goods came in. Munitions and Supply were buying the goods at a duty-paid price and the sellers were to be paid the value of the goods with the duty paid.

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot quite understand that either, because there was no duty on them. The goods were clearly marked to be shipped to Great Britain or North Africa or some other place; they were just passing through this country, so that there was no duty on those goods.

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, there was. There is a duty on goods coming into this country and the drawback has to be claimed when goods are exported. Many goods come into this country which we do not know for certain will be exported, and consequently we collect the duty when they come in.

Mr. HAZEN: If they are directed to the officer at the port of embarkation, they would come in and pass right through this country to the port, say Saint John, addressed to the officer in charge of embarkation there and marked for shipment overseas. The manifests, as I understand it, must show—at least, I think they would show—the destination of these goods.

Mr. GIBSON: As I said before, that system has been changed. If these goods are being shipped overseas and are being sent to a border point, they come in without duty because they are going straight through.

Mr. HAZEN: When these refunds were made, to whom were they made?

Mr. GIBSON: They were made to the person paying the duty, but turned over to the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. HAZEN: I think I asked the minister in 1942 the total amount of refunds made under such circumstances, and in 1943, up to the end of last month, the total amount.

Mr. GIBSON: We would not keep records of that. We keep records, but not of the circumstances of all the refunds made. It would be impossible to give an answer to a question like that.

Mr. FULFORD: Has the minister any information whether the breweries are in a position to supply the public with any more beer than they are supplying at the present moment?

Mr. GIBSON: A little while ago we did make some arrangements. There was a shortage in the country owing to the oversold condition that existed between October and December when wartime alcoholic beverages came into operation, and arrangements were made to provide the camps and establishments of all our armed forces with a quota of beer which amounted, I believe, for the remainder of the year to something like two and a half million gallons.

Mr. REID: Equally between all the provinces?

Mr. GIBSON: At the rate of a gallon per man per month, wherever he happened to be stationed. We found that the brewers had a great deal of difficulty in providing that. Some of them could not increase their production, and as a matter of fact I have recently been notified that some of the brewers have not been able to fill the quota they already have, on account of the shortage of man-power.

Mr. HAZEN: Referring again to the matter I was discussing with the minister, do I understand the minister to say that he cannot tell me the amount of goods that were transmitted to England from the United States for which entry was made and duty paid at the port of Saint John?

Mr. GIBSON: We could find it out, but the hon. member asked under the circumstances that they were coming through direct, shipped direct to Saint John for reshipment to Great Britain. I could not possibly give him those figures now. With a great deal of research we could find out what those figures were.

Mr. HAZEN: Would it take a great deal of research? By a strange coincidence I happen to have a copy of a letter which was written on March 9, 1943. I am going to read it in view of what the minister has said. It came to my hands in a rather strange way.

A. L. Hoyt, Esq.,
Collector of Customs and Excise,
Saint John, N.B.

Dear Sir,

Attached please find further report of goods in transit to England from the U.S.A., for which entry has been made and duty and taxes paid at this port.

This report is in accordance with the instructions of the assistant commissioner of customs that all such transactions be reported to him personally. The relative invoice is attached to the report.

Yours truly,
J. L. MacCoubrey,
Computing Clerk.

I would think, in view of that letter, that the figures must be readily available, and I would ask the minister to furnish me with them.

Mr. GIBSON: These are figures which undoubtedly can be procured. But the hon. member is referring to one report.

Mr. HAZEN: A further report is referred to.

Mr. GIBSON: I know. But for every shipment that goes through a report would go in. These would all have to be collected and tabulated.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 12.05 a.m.

[Mr. Gibson.]

PRIVILEGE—MR. GRAYDON

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CBC NEWS BROADCAST RESPECTING WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before motions are proceeded with I should like to rise to a question of privilege. Last night's ten o'clock news bulletin of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation contained an item which reflected upon members of the House of Commons. The news broadcast stated that Canada's largest war appropriation bill, amounting to $3,890,000,000, was given its first, second and third readings within a few minutes during yesterday's session—I believe "ten minutes" was the actual expression used. Such a statement, without an explanatory background, might readily lead Canadian listeners to conclude that insufficient consideration had been given by the House of Commons to this important measure. Actually no legislation of like character in Canadian parliamentary history had been the subject of as close scrutiny and inquiry, or had been as long and thoroughly debated as the resolution upon which this bill was founded.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am glad that government members seem to be satisfied that we have made a good job of scrutiny. It is true that the formal readings of the bill required only a few minutes of the time of the house, but in justice to hon. members in this chamber I think it should be asserted that 44 out of the 117 sitting days of this session have been spent in debating that resolution. I rise to this point of privilege in order that there may be no possible misunderstanding on the part of the public in the matter.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am pleased that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has raised this point. As a matter of fact I had intended doing so myself if my hon. friend had not done so.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not very often get ahead of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is true—and I hope my hon. friend never will.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps this is just a start.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have prepared a memorandum which helps to emphasize what the leader of the opposition has just said.

On February 26 the Minister of Finance moved that the house go into committee to consider the war appropriation bill. On March 3 the Minister of Finance presented a table showing a break-down of the various estimates. Then the resolution was considered in committee on May 13, 14, 18, 21, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28 and 31; June 1, 2, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 28, 29 and 30; July 1, 5, 6, 7, 8, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 21 and again yesterday. As my hon. friend has said, it has been considered during 44 sittings, lasting over a period of nine weeks. I believe that fact makes it quite clear that, as my hon. friend stated, there has been no financial measure in the history of this parliament which has received the amount of consideration—careful consideration—and full discussion that this particular measure has received.

May I point out at this time wherein I believe the error made in the news broadcast arose. As the house is aware, money bills are preceded by resolutions. I have said time and again to the Clerk of the House who, from my conversations with him, holds a similar view, and so states in his volume dealing with procedure in the house, that the resolution was never intended to be more than a notice to the house that a money bill was being brought down, and that it had been approved by His Excellency the Governor General. I have pointed out, and he agrees, that it was never intended that a lengthy debate should take place on the resolution stage of any financial measure. The resolution is intended to be in the nature of a warning to the house that a financial measure is to be considered. Certainly, until recently, this parliament has passed many such resolutions as a formal procedure. However we have begun to adopt the practice, one to which I have objected time and again, and to which I still object of proceeding to discuss at length on the resolution stage the main features of a bill. This session of parliament, or a very large part of it, has been taken up in the discussion of the resolution in question. There was nothing further left to discuss on the bill itself that is why no discussion whatever was required when the bill was presented, and why there was no delay in passing its second and third readings. I hope these points will be made clear to the public, because they are in explanation of why the bill itself, which was based on a resolution, passed through the house as rapidly as it did. The whole subject matter was very fully discussed on the resolution stage.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister has discussed the point in some detail, and I believe I might be justified in adding something further. In order that there may be no misunderstanding on the part of the public, and that we may not have the criticism which from time to time is offered to the effect that large sums of money are passed through parliament with what, to some, is regarded as inadequate consideration, may I add a word with respect to the civil estimates we are now considering. I believe hon. members will agree that the principles embodied in the estimates for civil expenditures and the subjects covered thereby were in most instances dealt with at length when we were discussing the war appropriation resolutions. I believe therefore it would not be in the interests of the country or of parliament that in the discussion of the civil estimates there should be any great measure of repetition.

True, there are some matters which do not come within the purview of the war appropriation, and to these we as the opposition intend to give the greatest care and scrutiny as they are presented. But I think it would be the wish of parliament and of the country that there should be no unnecessary repetition of discussion in a war time period. I make this statement as complementary to that which has been made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Again I should like to thank the leader of the opposition for having directed the attention of the house and the country to a very important matter. I agree entirely with all that he has said. With respect to the ordinary estimates, they have been before the house from the moment the debate on the address was completed. They differ little in any particular from the ordinary estimates which have been voted year after year by this house during the last four years. They relate to the necessary business of government, hon. members have discussed similar items in previous sessions, perhaps not the exact amounts that are here, but the subjects that are indicated, and hon.

members know whether the items have changed in a significant way. Moreover, the government has sought to ascertain from the different parties any particular items in the estimates which any of their members feel should be brought forward for consideration before other estimates are taken up. In other words, if there are any estimates which hon. members who have given special study to the estimates feel should be considered before others, the government will try to meet the wishes of hon. members in that regard. But it is true that the war appropriation bill has dealt with practically all departments of government and there has been on that measure the fullest opportunity for discussion of practically everything bearing upon the various subjects which appear in the ordinary government estimates.

WAR EXPENDITURES COMMITTEE

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. McGregor replace that of Mr. Boucher on the war expenditures committee.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICE ECONOMIES CONTROL

APPOINTMENT OF T. P. MURPHY AS DIRECTOR

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): I wish to table copy of order in council P.C. 5642, of July 16, 1943, naming Mr. Thomas P. Murphy to head the government office economies control.

NAVAL SERVICES

ESTIMATED EXPENDITURES FOR PERSONNEL SUPPLIES AND SERVICES, ETC.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): When the estimates of the Department of National Defence for Naval Services were being considered certain questions were asked and I promised to get the answers in due course. I should like to table these answers in the form of returns to orders of the house. The first question was asked by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen), as reported on page 3519 of Hansard, and the second one was asked by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), as reported on page 3524 of Hansard.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF PROVISO TO STANDING ORDER 28

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That standing order 28 be suspended for the remainder of the session in relation to the proviso that, except by unanimous consent of the house, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

Motion agreed to.

TORONTO SHIPBUILDING COMPANY

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO CONDITIONS AT TORONTO YARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, a copy of which I have already sent to him. In view of the conditions which appear to exist in the yards of the Toronto Shipbuilding company, as disclosed in papers which have been tabled in this house, has the government under consideration the institution at once of a comprehensive inquiry.

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply): I have no knowledge of the hon. gentleman having sent a notice of his question, but I shall see that a reply is obtained.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

FERGUSON SHIPBUILDING YARD—CESSATION OF WORK ON PARTLY COMPLETED TUGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply): I should like to refer to a question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton South on Wednesday of this week. It referred to the cancellation of a contract in a ship yard at Pictou. I have looked up Hansard and I find that on at least two occasions the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) discussed this subject in the house. The first time was during the consideration of the war appropriation resolution and again, I believe, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black). On both those occasions the minister went into the question quite fully and answered the inquiries which were made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I have nothing to add to those statements.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, may I comment for a moment on that answer?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GILLIS: I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant if he has made any check on the matter as I requested on Wednesday.

My question on Wednesday was based on the fact that the statement made by the minister in the house on this matter was incorrect.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I have evidence to support that. The answer given is absolutely unsatisfactory.

WAR CONTRACTS DEPRECIATION BOARD—CERTIFICATES OF NECESSITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I am sorry I have not been able to give notice of the question I am going to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply because I became aware only last evening of the difficulties which certain contractors are having in connection with appearing before the war contracts depreciation board. I do not expect an answer to my question to-day, but perhaps the parliamentary assistant could advise me if there has been any change in the policy of the Department of Munitions and Supply in regard to the granting of certificates of necessity required by contractors when they wish to appear before the war contracts depreciation board. If there has been any change, has it been covered by any departmental letter, circular or directive changing or clarifying the procedure, and are copies of such regulations available for distribution?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I believe I can answer the hon. gentleman's question. A memorandum has been sent out in connection with the whole subject of depreciation, and I shall see that the hon. gentleman gets a copy. It covers the situation very fully.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to thank the parliamentary assistant for his prompt answer.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE BY MAX EASTMAN IN "READER'S DIGEST"

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Since there has been considerable editorial comment in the United States press upon the infamous article written by Max Eastman in the "Reader's Digest" and reprinted in the Toronto Telegram, and since it would appear to be in direct contravention of subsection 1 of 39A of the defence of Canada regulations, would the Minister of Justice, now that he has had an opportunity of reading the article, please give the house some information as to how he intends to proceed or what action he intends to take?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice refers such matters to the law officers of the department for their opinion in view of their experience, and that is being done in connection with the article to which the hon. member called attention the other day.

BUTTER

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—MARKET AND STORAGE FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. Last night's Ottawa Journal carried an extract from the Summerside Journal of Prince Edward Island which states:

> A report received in Charlottetown from Bristol, King's county, said that a carload of butter shipped from the Morell cooperative creamery to the mainland was returned with the blunt statement "No market, all storage filled up!" This butter at last week-end was reported still on the railway siding at Morell, while the creamery management was seeking a market or storage facilities, while tons more were in process of being manufactured.

Will the minister make inquiries and state whether that is correct?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will make inquiries and consult with the acting Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who is officially the acting Minister of Agriculture?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Acting Minister of Agriculture): I know nothing about the question raised by the hon. member for Weyburn, but I shall endeavour to get the information and give it to the house to-morrow if we are so unfortunate as to be still in session then.

NORTH-WEST FIELD FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO PENSION OR OTHER ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the house before it closes to an important matter. The minister of pensions said with reference to the Northwest Field Force that 126 members of the house have written the Toronto committee saying they would like to have this matter discussed. The minister promised that we could take it up on an item in his estimates but it will be impossible to do that now because thirty-six members who wanted to take part in the discussion have gone home. The soldiers of the Northwest rebellion returned fifty-seven years ago. There were 5,000 of them called out and not one of them has cost the country a cent.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is hardly in order on the orders of the day.

Mr. CHURCH: Just a moment please, Mr. Speaker. The minister promised that this matter would be discussed on an item in the house, but now it is impossible to do so because 36 members who wanted to take part in the discussion have gone home and they have asked me to bring it before the house. There are only 250 members of the northwest field force left.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): On a question of privilege, and not in reply to a question that is out of order, I said that this matter could be discussed on item 239 of the estimates dealing with pensions to the men of the Northwest rebellion. The question specifically refers to that item, and I shall be glad to discuss it when it is reached. If the house will give me permission to add one word, the only question at issue is not pensions for these men, because they have the same right to pension as those who served in the South African war and in the great war, but whether we should extend the provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act to men who are now over seventy. The only way in which it could be done would be to declare the rebellion area a theatre of war, and I might point out that we could not do that unless we granted the same privileges to Canadians who served in England and Canada during the great war.

Mr. CHURCH: They said it came up that way last year and it did not. It is most unfair treatment for the veterans of 1885.

[Later:]

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Apropos of the question directed to the Minister of Pensions and National Health by the hon. member for Broadview, I was disappointed that the minister took the position he did, because I think the minister recognizes full well that the hon. member has had for some considerable time a desire to raise this question, either on a motion for adjournment or on going into supply. He was only attempting on this occasion to bring to the attention of the house a matter which had been with him for some considerable time and is of long standing. I point that out to the minister by way of clarification, in case he is under any misapprehension. I know that a great number of people are anxious that this legislation should be introduced by the government this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I did not refuse to give any information to the hon. gentleman. I pointed out what was the proper and correct way to give the information, which would be probably later on to-day on an item in the estimates specifically concerning this very thing. I take the same position as I did a year ago. A committee of this house sat and considered this matter and made recommendations that the matter be considered by the government. I said a year ago that when the Veterans' Allowance Act was amended, as it would have to be later on, we should be glad to give the fullest possible consideration to the representations being made. I may tell the hon. gentleman that I and those who sit on this side of the house are as much interested in the welfare of these old veterans as he is.

Mr. CHURCH: Nothing will be done but talk. There are protests from a hundred places and support asked for it.

DOUKHOBORS

POWERS OF POLICE TO ARREST FOR DISREGARDING NOTICE OF ALTERNATIVE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour has expressed doubt as to the authority of selective service officers to proceed under existing regulations against Doukhobors who fail to answer the call unless a court order has first been secured. The other day the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) asked the Minister of Justice whether a ruling had been requested by his department. The reply was in the negative. Therefore I have suggested both to the Minister of Labour and to the Minister of Justice that I would seek further information to-day.

My question is: Must there first be a court order to bring before a magistrate a Doukhobor who fails to register, and must there be a second court order in order to secure his conviction for failure to answer the call? Should he be convicted of such failure, must there be a further court order to permit the selective service officer to take him to an alternative service camp?

The records of the government show that there are just 350 Doukhobors of military age who have not answered the call. My question to the Minister of Labour is, how many, if any, Doukhobors, have been convicted of failure to register, and how many, if any, have been subjected to the penalty provided, which is $200 or three months in prison?

How many, if any, of the 350 Doukhobors of military age who have failed to answer the call and have failed to register have been convicted? Has the government taken any action against the 2,600 Doukhobors who failed to register at the 1940 registration, which involved a penalty of three months' imprisonment and a fine of $200? I want to emphasize their defiant attitude towards this government, and I do so by stating that I have a communication from the Union of the Spiritual Communities of Christ, of British Columbia. It comes from the centre of the Doukhobor element in my district, and in order that the members may have a verbatim announcement with respect to the defiant attitude of the Doukhobors I ask permission to have my leader read this communication to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman when he was asking his question, but he has taken much more latitude than I think I ought to allow him. Perhaps the leader of the opposition would read the communication and close.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I would seek your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, in this particular instance, if I may. The letter which the hon. member for Kootenay West has asked me to read in conjunction with his statement is dated Crescent Valley, July 7, 1943, and reads:

> In regards to doing alternative service for aiding war effort (to whomsoever it may be) we must repeat in reply that to all true members of the Spiritual Communities of Christ this is absolutely unthinkable. Instead, we consider it our historical obligation to raise our full voice of protest against your insane rush into the fires of destruction Satan has started upon earth. (Signed)—Members of the Union of the Spiritual Communities of Christ.

Mr. ESLING: What is the government going to do about it?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to look into the rather extended remarks of the member for Kootenay West and endeavour to give him a reply to-morrow.

SUGAR

STATEMENT IN RESPECT TO SUPPLIES FOR CANNING IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition asked me to make a statement about the situation in the United States with regard to the supply of sugar in the United States for canning purposes.

Our latest advice from the United States is that all consumers may obtain a general allowance of 10 pounds per head for home canning and preserving. In addition, upon application to a local ration board, and completion of various declarations each applicant may be allowed additional sugar up to a maximum of fifteen pounds per head, thus providing for a maximum possible allowance of 25 pounds per head, as stated by the leader of the opposition.

While this plan has been announced, it is not clear as to just what will happen if a large number of people in the United States do in fact apply for the extra allowance. If the experience is similar to that in this country, the total amounts applied for will far exceed both the amount of sugar available, and the amount required to put up such fruit as is available.

The over-all international allocation of sugar is made by the combined food board, on which Canada is represented. Sugar consumption in the United States in 1942 was 10,610,000,000 pounds, compared with 900,000,000 pounds in Canada. This is an approximately equal per capita amount. Presumably the over-all international allocation will continue to maintain this balance, and each country will have to make its own internal allocation. The amount allocated to any one purpose within Canada—or in the United States—can only be decided in the light of all relevant circumstances, particularly the amount used for other related purposes, such as the amounts used for commercial jam making and fruit packing.

In spite of the anticipated reduction in the fruit crop this year, the amount of sugar allocated for home canning is the same as the amount used last year. There is no justification for an assumption that more sugar will be required. What has happened is that a far greater number of people will participate in the use of sugar for home canning this year—with a consequent reduction in the amounts which heretofore were used by some persons. This is what rationing does.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

CHRISTIE STREET HOSPITAL—VOLUNTARY NURSING AIDES—PROPOSED ADDITIONAL BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. On several occasions I have asked for a return for which the order has been passed, in respect of a question asked on July 14. Is there any reason why I may not have that return made?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I looked into that yesterday and was assured that the return would be ready to-day.

Mr. BRUCE: An order for return with relation to another question was made yesterday. May I have an answer to it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend is very impetuous. An order for return was made by this house yesterday and he expects me to have it down to-day. It affects four departments of government and will be made as soon as possible, but it will not be ready to-day.

[Later:]

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, may I rise to a question of privilege. A few moments ago I asked when I might have answers to certain questions from the Minister of Pensions and National Health. I am not satisfied with the answer given me by the minister to the inquiry with respect to the bringing down of reports in response to questions asked in this house. He said that I was impetuous and that a return would not be made to-day. As the house will very shortly adjourn, I am anxious to have a reply to these questions so that I shall have them available when I discuss the estimates of his own department. I do not think I can be accused of being impetuous. I asked one question on July 14 and it would take an efficient clerk not more than an hour to give the answer. As regards the question I asked for which an order was made yesterday, it would not take half an hour to give me the reply. It would appear to me that in giving answers as has been done there is a deliberate attempt to deny me that to which I am entitled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order and I want an immediate retraction of the word "deliberate." No minister has been more anxious to furnish answers to questions, or information asked for, by means of orders for returns, than I am. This order was passed yesterday. It affects the three defence services and my department as well. It should properly go to the Secretary of State. He should make the return to the house. But I am supposed by the hon. member to make the return this morning. It is an absolute impossibility. I can promise him that as far as my department is concerned there will be no delay whatsoever in supplying the information at our disposal, but I protest against any member saying that a minister is deliberately withholding an order for return. I want that word retracted here and now.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to ask if that term applies—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rose to a point of order. I want a retraction of that word.

Mr. BRUCE: I was referring to the return which was passed on July 14, and which I have not received.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I told my hon. friend that I asked my staff yesterday in regard to that return and was assured that it would be ready some time to-day. As soon as it is ready it will be tabled in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe the hon. gentleman should withdraw the word "deliberately."

Mr. BRUCE: If you say it is unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker, I have no alternative but to withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is a very graceful way of doing it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I realize that it is near the end of the session and that tempers may be a little frayed, but I think perhaps the Minister of Pensions and National Health might have used a happier word himself than "impetuous." I say that in the friendliest way, because I know he has no desire to be discourteous, and I think it would be in order if this were called a tie.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I will call no tie at all with the hon. member for Parkdale, and I refuse to be insulted by him.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO TAKING AFFIDAVITS ABROAD—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to bill No. 74. to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Will the minister explain?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This was a bill to amend the Canada Evidence Act. It provided that affidavits taken by the officers mentioned in the bill would have the same effect as affidavits taken before properly authorized officers in Canada; and the senate has replaced the word "officer" by the word "person".

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the reason for the change?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot say, unless it was felt by the hon. members of that other house that the word "person" being a more general word, and being followed by the words "authorized to administer or take affidavits" was sufficient without further restricting it by giving to such person the title of "officer".

Mr. GRAYDON: It seems to me that under the act no one except an officer would come under the category of "person" in this respect.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not think that anyone but an officer would come under that description. But it is a person authorized to do a certain thing, and whether he is referred to as an officer or as a person is, I think, quite immaterial to the application of the act.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO BETTING, PREVIOUS OFFENCE CHARGED, ETC.—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 107, to amend the criminal code.

He said: I so move because, at this stage of the session, I do not think it would be appropriate to ask for a conference to discuss these amendments which have to do with sections 7 and 8 of the bill. Hon. members will remember the debate we had on those sections and how it was explained that they were introduced at the request of some of the attorneys general of the provinces who found difficulty in curbing as they would wish to do the evil of betting and bookmaking prevalent in their localities. Hon. members of the other house have come to the conclusion, from the situation in the country as they know it, that the amendments are unnecessary. They set up their opinion against the opinion of the attorneys general who are administering justice. I regret it. I should have preferred to see the bill stand as passed by this house. But there will be other sittings of this house, and if in the meantime the opinions expressed by the attorneys general are persisted in from the result of their experience, I shall expect to have the honour at another session to come back before parliament with appropriate suggestions. In the meantime, one of the amendments consists in striking out the clause that has to do with advertising, printing and publishing material likely to assist or likely to be used in connection with bookmaking.

Mr. NEILL: Section 8?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. They struck out section 8 entirely. Though it had been subjected to the proviso that it would not apply to bona fide newspapers, the section in the code as it stood before was found by some of these attorneys general, or their deputies, to be insufficient to prevent the issuing of these tipster sheets which are very frequently put out for the purpose of aiding in bookmaking. The other house has refused to accept section 8. As to section 7, they have taken out the words, "in such manner as to be likely to be used," so that the former paragraph as it stood will remain, with the words inserted, "or outfitted or equipped" and will so read as to define a common betting house as a place open, kept or use or outfitted or equipped for the purpose of facilitating or encouraging or assisting in the making of bets. They have taken out, after "outfitted or equipped", the words "in such manner as to be likely to be used." So that under the provision as it stands, with their amendment, the court will still have to find the subjective intention of the person doing the thing with which he is charged.

I regret that they took that attitude, but at this time I do not think it would be advisable to have a conference over the matter, and I think we may see whether, with the insertion of the words they have left in, it meets the situation complained about by these attorneys general or whether anything further will be necessary at some future time.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Section 7 received the careful and earnest attention of a number of hon. members when the bill was in the committee stage. There was a good deal of debate on that question, perhaps more than on any other single provision of the amendment to the criminal code. If my memory serves me correctly, although I did not take part in the debate myself, it was only after a good deal of careful consideration that the amendments as they then appeared were passed by the committee and by this house and sent to the other place, being finally disposed of in the way in which the provision is now before us. The situation which we are now considering is of course vastly different from that which existed when the bill actually passed this house. I may not be in order in asking the minister to answer a question at this stage, but this amendment having been founded upon submissions made by one, or by several attorneys general of the provinces, may I inquire of the minister whether or not, before resubmitting the matter to the House of Commons for its attention, he took occasion to get into touch with the attorneys general, who in the first instance asked for this particular legislation. I am not in a position to pass seasoned judgment on the matter now before the house. The other place has made certain amendments, but it does seem to me that, after careful consideration by this house of a point which was germane to the whole subject matter of the section, that point has now been removed from the bill. Therefore either the discussion which we had before must go for naught, or we must make a protest. I do say, with reference to this particular change, that before the government finally decided to pass it—and my main object in rising at this time is to point this out to the minister—he ought, before coming to the house now, to have received at least the reaction of the attorneys general to whom reference was made when the bill was under discussion in this house.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Without violating the rules of the house, if there is no further debate, I may reply to the questions asked by the leader of the opposition. Of course, under the constitution, legislation has to be passed by both houses of parliament.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is self-evident.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The other place has refused to acquiesce in the views that we submitted, though the substance of the debate that took place in this house was placed before them. So that I do not think that at this time a conference would be apt to advance the matter, and in my opinion it is preferable to pass the bill in the form in which it has been returned and reintroduce it if the manner in which it has been amended proves unsatisfactory.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think my hon. friend has taken into consideration the question I asked about the reference of this matter, as regards the changes, to the attorneys general of the provinces.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There has been no opportunity to do that since the amendment was made in the other place.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

[Mr. Graydon.]

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

183. General administration, $1,033,725.

Mr. HAZEN: If this is the item covering the matter I brought up last evening, perhaps the minister would make some further statement in that regard. I should like him to tell us, if he would, whether in connection with contracts made by the government on a cost plus basis it has ever come to his attention that duties have been paid in order to bring about an increase in price by the person or company selling to the government.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): No such information has come to my attention.

Item agreed to.

Income tax division—

187. General administration, including authority to create positions and make appointments within the division notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act, $684,300.

Mr. GRAYDON: This gives me an opportunity to bring to the attention of the minister the multitude of complaints hon. members have received since the minister last had his estimates before the committee in connection with the war appropriation resolution, because of the fact that, despite the attempts which have been made to simplify the income tax forms, they still remain exceedingly complex. A storm of protest has risen across the country in regard to this matter. Frankly as a layman I am not able to suggest to the minister how the forms may be simplified further under the present system of taxation. It may be that the system is at fault, but I believe people have great difficulty in differentiating between the normal tax and the graduated tax; and when you have in addition the various exemptions and the compulsory savings feature, it becomes almost a Chinese puzzle to the average man across Canada. In earlier years, before the incidence of taxation became so severe, this matter was not perhaps so serious; but to-day, with the heavy incidence of taxation and so many more of our people being required to make out these forms the matter has become exceedingly important. Many people are not in a position to obtain the assistance of lawyers and accountants; they have enough taken off their cheques and out of their pay envelopes already, without going to any further expense to have someone show them how much they must pay the government. Perhaps that is putting the matter in a very simple way, but I believe that is the way most of the taxpayers of Canada would put it to the minister if they were in this chamber. The whole matter of the incidence of our income tax will have to be given serious consideration by the minister in the interval between this and the next session of parliament. No doubt before this the minister and his assistants have reached the conclusion, in view of the protests that have come from every corner of the country, that some simpler way must be found whereby the people may contribute to the war effort. I am speaking as one who knows very little about accountancy; there are not many experts in that line in this house, but I can say that unless there is some further adjustment of the incidence of this taxation and some simplification of the forms by which taxes are calculated, there will be grave dissatisfaction throughout the country.

At this stage of the session I am not going to discuss this point in detail, but in what I have said I believe I am reflecting the views of hundreds of thousands of taxpayers in Canada who are finding it increasingly difficult to make out these forms. Having in mind the experience of the average person, I have no doubt the minister will find that the inaccuracies and errors in the income tax returns which have been filed this year will amount to a staggering total, and I doubt if the department will ever be able to catch up with those errors and assess the proper taxation. When you make your forms so complex that the average man or woman is unable to understand them, you run into a heap of trouble, which I think the department should make every attempt to avoid.

I bring this matter to the attention of the minister only in order to reflect an ever-growing sentiment in this country. It may be that the suggestions of those of us who are not able to say how these difficulties may be overcome will not be very helpful, but having regard to the broad coverage of our taxation system I am convinced that something must be done to bring about some simplification of it. It is of immediate and imperative necessity that the departments alter the scheme in order that the people of Canada may know how the amount was arrived at, in a simple fashion, and in a manner which will meet the needs of the average citizen.

Mr. REID: First of all, may I compliment the leader of the opposition upon drawing this matter to the attention of the minister. In fact I might doubly compliment him because, despite his being a lawyer, he wishes to simplify rather than complicate forms for the preparation of which most people have had to have legal assistance.

Mr. GRAYDON: And I am not so sure the lawyers know much about them either.

Mr. REID: Yes, I am inclined to believe that, especially when one hears around the corridors of the House of Commons that many members of parliament, including some lawyers, were stuck when it came to answering questions appearing on the income tax form. In these circumstances, I have wondered how the average citizen has fared.

Complaints have been made in connection with the collection of income tax from workers. Much has been said about absenteeism. I am not saying that this manner of collection has been the cause of absenteeism, but I do know it is creating a great deal of indignation among the workers. I am reliably informed—and if my information is not correct, the minister will deny it—that while a worker may be deducted on the basis of his regular earnings, in the event of his beginning to work overtime the deductions are made at the overtime rate. Many workers are reluctant to work overtime, because they say if they do so, and their rate of pay is increased from, we will say, $1 to $1.50 an hour, the income tax deduction is made at the rate of $1.50 an hour. If this practice is now in effect, a change should be made so that taxation will be taken off at the ordinary rate of wages. I am told this practice has caused much discontent, and it may be the cause of a certain amount of absenteeism. I join with the leader of the opposition in the recommendation he has made.

Mr. GIBSON: The leader of the opposition has spoken about the complicated nature of our tax structure. I must agree with him that it is complicated, and that very fact places a great burden upon my department when it attempts to produce forms which make due provision for the sections in the Income War Tax Act. I believe the officers of the Department of National Revenue deserve some credit for the manner in which they have drawn up forms which include all allowances and deductions for which provisions are made in the act. They have made every effort to produce as simple a form as possible, under the act as it stands to-day. In addition they have produced, for those who use the T-1 form, a simplified table for computing the total normal and graduated taxes, and I believe it is of great assistance to taxpayers in working out their taxation.

Of course it does not help them in computing their taxable income. That must be done by completing the form itself.

The question of taxation of workers for overtime is one which has been given serious consideration. It is receiving attention at the present time, and we are attempting to find out if any other method may be adopted for deducting the tax at the source from a man who in one week earns perhaps a considerably increased amount as a result of his overtime work. While it would not affect his total tax over the year, if we could make some arrangement whereby we would take an average tax from his earnings, it would prevent an over-deduction being taken from one payment, and a refund being necessary at a later date.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to press upon the minister the necessity of doing something in connection with what is considered to be an excessive tax on the workmen in the coal mines. The production of coal is an emergency operation, as indicated by the Prime Minister, and known by almost everyone in the country. Householders in cities are not able to get any assurance that they will get coal this winter to heat their houses and places of business. I would not say that in the county of Cumberland any workmen have deliberately stopped work because of this tax. But I will say there is not the incentive to continue to produce, or to exert themselves unduly. They do not feel the urge to work six full days a week, and overtime, to bring about the necessary production, because they feel they are unduly penalized on any earnings they may make over and above a certain amount. I must say I have a great deal of sympathy for them in that point of view. It is understood that miners should not be expected to work more than four days in the week. When they work five or six days a week, and the extra earnings are taxed at what they consider an exorbitant rate, all incentive is destroyed. I would urge upon the minister that he come to some decision in the matter as quickly as possible, and give some concession to the coal miners in order that they may work to the full limit of their capacity.

Mr. GILLIS: The matter now under review was thoroughly discussed with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue. I understand that on the basis of previous representations the department has been considering some modification of deductions at the source. Would the minister care to make a statement in respect of that matter?

[Mr. Gibson.]

Mr. GIBSON: I am glad to be able to say that to-day we are having discussions with representatives of the miners from the maritime provinces. The two officials with me this morning have been at that conference, and will be returning to it as soon as possible. An attempt is being made to arrive at some method of deduction which will provide that an undue deduction will not be made from a man's pay when overtime is included.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Who are sitting in on that conference? Are representatives of the workmen on it?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, the labour union as well as representatives of the Department of Labour and of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am pleased to hear the minister say a conference is taking place with representatives of the miners from the maritime provinces. But I do not understand why only miners from the maritimes are being consulted, when there are miners in other parts of Canada. Their organizations should be consulted too, inasmuch as union officials are being consulted in the matter.

I should like to associate myself with what has been said in connection with taking the tax at the source. I believe that is a cause of much dissatisfaction, especially the feature of it connected with overtime. As has been pointed out, when the deduction is made at the source it is taken at the higher rate of pay, a fact which leads to much misunderstanding. A few days ago, when this matter was discussed at some length under the estimates of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue pointed out that a man was not taxed more because he produced more, and that therefore this factor should not be the cause of absenteeism. I did not know this item was to be discussed this morning, or I would have brought my correspondence to the chamber with me; but I believe I am quite safe in saying that I have at least half a dozen letters from people in different parts of the country, one of them from the maritimes and another from British Columbia, complaining about this situation. The letter from British Columbia pointed out that the writer was penalized $3 more in taxation because he was working overtime. If he had not worked overtime he would have been $3 ahead. The minister may say that a mistake has been made in computing the tax; I do not know, because I have not gone into the case thoroughly. However, there is considerable dissatisfaction when the tax is deducted at the source. The minister has said that a conference is being held to see if this difficulty cannot be overcome. If something can be done it will be worthwhile. As things stand at present the men are dissatisfied, and I believe this is one of the principal causes of absenteeism, not only in the coal mines but in our munitions and shipbuilding plants. If it can be made clear that men will not be penalized because they work overtime, I think a good deal of the dissatisfaction will be eliminated.

I believe in overtime production, but there should be some overtime or production rate paid. I speak without having given very deep thought to the matter, but probably some arrangement could be worked out whereby regular time free of taxation could be paid for overtime, instead of paying time and a half and then deducting the tax. Generally speaking, I think that would be a satisfactory arrangement. I have associated with workers for thirty years and I feel quite sure that there is not one of these men who is not desirous of going back to work longer hours, sometimes under severe handicaps, in order to increase our war production. This applies equally to men working in the mines and in our munitions factories. But they do resent being taxed on their overtime pay. If straight time for overtime was paid without deducting at the source, I think you could increase your production a great deal.

Mr. GIBSON: When I said that we were meeting representatives of the miners from the maritimes, I should have stated that we are meeting representatives of miners from all over Canada. If the hon. member for Bow River will let me have the details of the case in which the man was taxed on his overtime, I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. HAZEN: I am informed that no overtime is paid to the girls and women who work extra hours in the income tax branch. I do not know whether this condition prevails all over Canada, but it does in my own constituency. After working all day girls are ordered back at night. It is true they are paid sixty cents for their dinner, but they receive no pay for the extra time they work. I do not think they are getting a fair deal by being treated in this way. They should receive extra pay for the extra work they do. I should like to know the grounds upon which the government bases its decision that they should not be paid.

Mr. GIBSON: Overtime is not paid to clerical workers in the civil service who are required to work extra hours. In war time it is necessary in some departments to work beyond the hours that are customary in peace time. At the present time we have a heavy rush of work in the income tax branch. Our establishment has been increased, but the difficulty is to get qualified people to fill the positions as rapidly as we should like. There are times when the staffs are required to work overtime, but, as I say, throughout the civil service as a whole no overtime pay is granted to those who work extra hours.

Mr. HAZEN: If they belonged to a trade union they would quickly have overtime pay, probably time and a half. I cannot understand upon what basis you can ask these people to come back and work overtime and not pay them. It is not fair that they should have to work hard all day and then come back night after night and receive no extra pay. What hours are worked here in Ottawa?

Mr. GIBSON: The hours of the Ottawa office are from 8.15 a.m. to 5.15 p.m. We have a very loyal staff and have had no complaints from them when they are called upon to work overtime. They realize that in war time there are extra demands, and they have willingly accepted the situation as it exists.

Mr. ROWE: Are we to infer from the minister's remarks that in these discussions about overtime pay and taxation he was dealing only with priority industries, such as mining? Does he intend to work out a policy of income taxation for miners only?

Mr. GIBSON: It is not a change in policy; it is working out a change in the methods of deduction. It will not affect the rate of taxation at all.

Mr. ROWE: It is not the intention of the government to work out some system under which miners can work overtime, without giving the same consideration to iron and steel workers, fuel wood producers, pulpwood producers and other workers in similar industries?

Mr. GIBSON: We are exploring it now with the mining industry. If we come to some arrangement, we will try it out and if it works satisfactorily we will see if it can be extended to other industries.

Mr. ROWE: To-day there is a great need for increased fuel wood production, yet men in this industry are discontinuing their daily work in the middle of the afternoon rather than continuing and having their extra earnings taken up by the income tax. I urge upon the minister that he give consideration to this matter, not only from the point of view of the miners but from the point of view of the fuel wood producers. I believe that this is now a priority industry, similar to the coal mining industry. This system of deduction interferes drastically with other forest production, and during the last two years the effect has been quite serious. I think in connection with industries such as the iron and steel, coal and fuel wood and many others, a rate of taxation could be struck so that when a man has a total daily wage of $8 with overtime he will not have to pay so much on the last $3 that he considers he will be better off to stop work when he has earned $5. I hope the minister will make this applicable to other lines of production.

189. District offices, $6,354,296.

Mr. ADAMSON: How much of this was for the Toronto division?

Mr. GIBSON: The salaries in the Toronto district amount to $487,340.

Mr. ADAMSON: What territory does the Toronto district comprise? Does it include Hamilton?

Mr. GIBSON: No. Hamilton is a separate office.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is Oshawa a separate office?

Mr. GIBSON: There is no office in Oshawa.

Mr. ADAMSON: How far east does the Toronto district go?

Mr. GIBSON: The next office is Belleville.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

120. Departmental administration, $152,565.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Chairman, there is some information preliminary to the discussion of these items which I think might be useful to the committee. The department secures revenue from various sources, and in the five years from 1937 to 1942 the revenue increased in round figures from $562,000 to $1,065,000. There is a reduction in the estimates this year, over all, of $281,000 odd, and if we eliminated the cost of living bonus, unemployment insurance and war risk insurance, the reduction would be $438,000. The total amount required for cost of living bonus, unemployment insurance and war risk insurance amounts to $502,000 odd.

Mines and geology branch—

121. Branch administration, $29,550.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two in connection with the mines and geology branch, in the hope of encouraging the minister to ask for more money perhaps next session in support of his staff of geologists, chemists and engineers. I recently visited the little plant on Booth street, where I met a number of the engineers and observed the handicaps under which they are working there. I am convinced the time has come when Canada should launch out under the Department of Mines and Resources and determine to develop from our own raw resources the thousand and one different products which we could produce. I am not going to mention any names, but the men I met down there were very bright men, some of them young men, and I just wondered whether our own geologists, engineers and chemists in the minister's department are being properly compensated. There is such a demand in the United States for men with their qualifications that I fear that if our own men are not properly compensated they may be taken away from us, and now is the time that this country requires men of the capacity of our geologists and engineers in the mines and geology branch. There have been marvellous developments of late that we are not profiting from in this country, and I am not sure that they are in the United States to the extent they should, but at all events they are on their way. I hope we will not let them get ahead of us in developing the natural resources of the country.

There are all sorts of developments for the use of the raw products with which this country abounds. Take the minister's own riding in northern Manitoba. There you have one of the finest stands of pulpwood. That would be a great place to develop a thousand and one industries in manufacturing the by-products from the production of pulp which to-day are largely lost. Take plexiglas, for instance, which is being developed in the United States, and many other such materials which we could be developing from our forest products and by-products. The field is unlimited.

I am not going to detain the committee, but I am convinced that if the minister would ask for an appropriation that would enable him to equip his department with a building fitted with the most modern appliances, the department could achieve much more than it is possible for it to do to-day. Down on Booth street they have just a small hydrogenation plant, a very small affair. Why not install an adequate hydrogenation plant there? It would be well worth while when you consider the endless ramifications of fine products which could be developed from our raw resources. I for one will support the minister and the department in asking for an appropriation to erect any plant that is necessary for the purpose. It would have to be infinitely larger than that small building on Booth street. I will support any appropriation that is necessary to man the department with the ablest geologists, chemists and engineers obtainable. They are all good men down there now. One thing I like about the department is that they have such good men in it, but they are working there from motives of patriotism, because if they went to the United States they could command much larger salaries than they are receiving. They deserve credit for staying on the job and helping this country to develop its own natural resources. I am convinced that the Department of Mines and Resources has a golden opportunity to put this country on the map after the war in a thousand and one ways, and I hope that next session the minister will come forward with a request for a real appropriation to build and equip a modern building and give our engineers and geologists and chemists the opportunity of developing the innumerable products that are being developed by different processes elsewhere. I could enumerate forty different lines of production which could be made from our resources in Canada and which are not now being made.

I should like to see our own Canadian processes developed and ear-marked as being the product of Canadian brains. That is all I am going to say on the whole of these items. I am taking them all together and making this short statement covering them all. I hope that these good solid men in the minister's own department will be encouraged and supported to do something in a big way for Canada. But they will need equipment. They have not got it. Hydrogenation is perhaps the most modern process for the development of a thousand and one different lines. Let Canada take its place in the sun, and use its own resources and its own fine men in doing it.

Mr. CRERAR: I doubt if there is any member of the house who has given more thought to, or has endeavoured to inform himself more fully on, the natural resources of this country than the hon. member for Davenport, and I wish to express my thanks to him for the interest he has taken in the work of the department.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is in a class by himself on that.

Mr. CRERAR: There is no doubt that not many Canadians, having regard to the total number of our population, have a full appreciation of the natural resources and the natural wealth of this country. I may say for the information of my hon. friend that in the war appropriation vote there was an estimate for an addition to the buildings of the mines branch. There will be spent on the building at present under construction about $230,000, and it is the best that all the thought we could bring to bear upon it could produce. In addition to that, about $150,000 will be spent for equipment in this particular work. That will add substantially to the facilities which the mines bureau have for carrying on their work.

But there is another part of my hon. friend's remarks to which I would like to allude. We have difficulty of course during the war in getting the personnel to carry on this work. That will be clear to the committee when I say that since the outbreak of war, from the department as a whole—this is as of last September, when these estimates were first put in draft form—202 employees had enlisted in the armed forces; of these, 32 came from the mines and geology branch. There were then on loan to other departments 34 employees, of whom 11 came from the mines and geology branch. So that since the outbreak of war our personnel in this branch, including men who have enlisted and men who have been loaned, and these are among our best, have been reduced by 43. But that is due only to war conditions.

I certainly agree with my hon. friend that the public expenditure in this department could well be expanded. I have in mind particularly a much vaster programme than we have hitherto carried out in geological surveys and in mapping surveys of our country.

Once again I wish to express my appreciation of the interest which the hon. member for Davenport has taken in this matter.

123. Mineral resources investigations, $405,000.

Mr. STIRLING: One of the most desired metals to be discovered in Canada is tin. It has been discovered in a certain form in several parts of Canada. Have any of the discoveries so far shown signs of being of a commercial nature?

Mr. CRERAR: I regret to say that while in a good many places evidences of tin deposits have shown up, little can be said up to the present to give any encouragement to the idea that they are there in quality and in quantity for commercial exploitation. The search however is being continued. About the only sources of tin which we have at present, I understand, are the Sullivan ores of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is any investigation being made in Canada at the moment with respect to the finding of bauxite in this country?

Mr. CRERAR: This question really comes under another item, but I shall be glad to answer it on this. The geological parties which are sent out in our northern areas, where particularly mineral bearing ores are found, as my hon. friend knows, are not only reporting on the geology of the areas they survey, but also report any evidence of minerals which may be found. Of course they are on the lookout all the time for any sort of useful mineral, and consequently they are on the lookout for bauxite, but up to the present time no reports of any bauxite indications have been received.

Mr. FULFORD: I would ask the minister whether, in his search for strategic war metals, some of the older sections of Ontario are not being overlooked. I have in mind the county of Leeds, which is at the very front door of Ottawa—

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member has it very much in mind just now.

Mr. FULFORD: Now and at all times—where iron ore at one time was quite extensively mined, moved down the Rideau canal by barge to Kingston, and thence transhipped across lake Ontario to lake Erie points to be smelted. I may recall that the first iron smelter in Upper Canada was in the county of Leeds. Lead was also mined from time to time, as was also mica. There are large deposits of graphite in the county. There are also iron pyrites for sulphuric acid, and at one time there was an acid plant just north of Brockville. Also there are deposits of silica sand for the manufacture of glass, and recently, in the township of Bastard in the county of Leeds, several silver claims, I understand, have been staked. My reason for bringing this to the attention of the minister is that I often wonder, when one reads of the many millions of dollars which are being invested in the bringing in of new deposits, involving the building of railway lines, the diversion of rivers and streams, and sometimes even lakes being pumped dry, if it would not be quicker and cheaper during this emergency period to reopen some of these older mines, because it is known that in the past these have proved successful.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have the provincial authorities taken any move in that direction?

Mr. FULFORD: I know that a record has been made of all these various deposits, but I know of no recent attempts at development.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have any representations been made from Leeds to the provincial government on that point?

Mr. FULFORD: Not that I know of.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps I may be permitted to take a little part in this discussion between the hon. member for Leeds and the leader of the opposition. In reply to the question of the hon. member for Leeds, any prospects which show any possibilities of development have, I believe, been surveyed; but I would remind the hon. member that the areas of Leeds county and adjoining counties have been fully prospected in years past by prospectors, because of their accessibility, as against the regions farther north, and consequently there is in the department a considerable body of information dealing with the mineral possibilities of these particular counties. There has been a development in fluorspar mining in the adjoining county of Hastings.

Mines and geology branch—
126. Geological surveys, $270,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have said before that this matter of geological surveys is in my opinion only a scratch on the surface of the job that we shall have to do in surveying this country geologically after the war is over. I realize the excellent work that is being done by the minister's department, and particularly by the head of the department, and I congratulate him upon what has already been done, while I emphasize that the amount of work being carried on will have to be tremendously increased, because Canada so far has done hardly more than a scratch on the surface, as I say, in the search for natural resources, particularly minerals. The sums we are spending in Canada and the number of men who are actually utilized for geological survey work are less than those spent and utilized in the small and old country of the United Kingdom. I wish the minister would answer these questions: How many parties are out at the present time? Have these survey parties got as far as the utilization of the diamond drill? I make that point particularly because a great deal of the country to be surveyed for minerals is now heavily overburdened with clay and earth. There is a third question and that is with regard to the rehabilitation of the men who are now being discharged from the army. I suggest that immediate steps be taken to utilize men who have been discharged from the army, who are not absolutely fit, for work on survey parties. I realize that you cannot take a man who has been discharged because of stomach trouble and put him on a survey party but take a man who is not fit enough for the army and give him the life of a survey party, and he is very likely to improve in health. I suggest that some research be done into the utilization of men now being discharged from the army. I think they could be put on these survey parties. I know that you could not take them to the north-west territories or the more hazardous places, but life in the open air in survey parties has rehabilitated more people than probably anything else.

Mr. CRERAR: As regards increasing the number of geological parties, I agree with the hon. member for York West. I hinted a moment ago at some of the difficulties.

Mr. ADAMSON: Man-power, I realize, is a great difficulty.

Mr. CRERAR: It is not so much man-power. We could get the ordinary personnel—

Mr. ADAMSON: It is a question of skilled men.

Mr. CRERAR: —but the difficulty is getting trained personnel. There is no gain in sending out a party at considerable expense to remain in the field for weeks or months making surveys unless you have at the head of it, and probably next to the head, men who know their job. Frankly, our difficulty is in getting the trained personnel. Many of them have enlisted, many are engaged in essential war work of a scientific kind, and consequently we cannot expand these parties during the war. This year thirty parties are in the field and the bureau has done remarkably well to get that number out. On the general question of geological surveys, I agree with the observations of my hon. friend. I do not know who will have the responsibility for this in future years, but I do not hesitate to say to the committee now that when the war is over, just as quickly as trained personnel can be organized to do it, this vote should be at least doubled, and the country's interests would probably be well served by trebling it. There are some other things also that can be done to develop our mining possibilities. It is well to keep in mind that public opinion generally throughout the country has to get a new conception of what our mining possibilities are. Still lingering in many parts of Canada is the old idea that all this vast shield, from Labrador around the south end of Hudson bay to Bear lake, is barren rock. We know now that we may find minerals in almost any part of it, and consequently when you come to ask for increased expenditures for surveys to do the things that are necessary, to obtain information, you come up against a public opinion that is still influenced by the old conception that there is nothing there. It is a slow process, but substantial progress has been made in the last decade and I feel certain that it will receive increasing attention, as it should, when the war is over.

Mr. ADAMSON: My suggestion was that the soldiers in the army who are being discharged—great numbers have been discharged —could be trained in this survey work.

Mr. CRERAR: Some work is being done already in that regard. I think my hon. friend has in mind the training of prospectors and assistants who might go out on geological parties.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is the idea. I do not suggest that they should be skilled engineers.

Mr. CRERAR: Last winter a series of schools, if they might be so termed, were held for several days in important centres under the auspices of the mines branch and the prospectors' associations across Canada, attended by prospectors; and in addition to that Queen's university is devoting some attention to the problem. I repeat, it is not difficult to get the ordinary individual to go out as a canoeman or an axe-man in a geological party. The real difficulty is the trained personnel who can effectively do the work.

Mr. RICKARD: Has any survey work been done on the Ganaraska river at Port Hope? A committee has been appointed to make a survey and I was wondering if any report had been made.

Mr. CRERAR: At the moment I have no information but I will ask the director of the mines branch to look into that question.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CRERAR: I wonder if the committee would mind sitting for a few minutes beyond one o'clock. There are a few items still in this section which I should like to dispose of. The director is busy and I should like to pass them.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is the latest and most unusual reason we have had for speed for some time.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

134. Grant to Yukon council, $60,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it anticipated that because of the developments going on in the Yukon at this time a greater burden of responsibility will be placed upon the Yukon council?

Mr. CRERAR: There has been some increase, though not very much, in the expenditures in the Yukon, but fortunately the revenue obtained by the Yukon territorial council also has increased, so that it has not been necessary to increase this vote. I do not care to make any prediction as to what may be the situation next year, but certainly it is anticipated that this amount will meet the needs for the present year.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words any increased expenditure at the moment is being met by increased revenue?

Mr. CRERAR: That would be a fair statement to make.

Item agreed to.

135. Dominion forest service—General scientific, economic and administrative services, $112,102.

Mr. GRAYDON: What has developed to necessitate the reduction indicated in this vote this year? Are some services curtailed?

Mr. CRERAR: It is accounted for mainly by enlistments from that particular branch of the department.

Mr. GRAYDON: Loss of personnel?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, there has been a reduction in personnel.

Item agreed to.

137. Forest products laboratories, $145,717.

Mr. GRAYDON: Where are these laboratories located?

Mr. CRERAR: The chief laboratory is in Ottawa. There is one in Montreal, more particularly associated with the pulp and paper industry, and one in Vancouver.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Just the three in Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Item agreed to.

139. Land registry—Land registry, seed grain collections, administration of ordnance, admiralty and public lands, $52,511.

Mr. GRAYDON: To what part of Canada do the land registry provisions apply?

Mr. CRERAR: So far as the provinces are concerned, the dominion still has some lands. There are ordnance lands, and admiralty lands, which have come down through the years, and the administration of those lands is carried on by the Department of Mines and Resources. Briefly, any federal lands that are not being specifically used by other branches of the federal government are turned over to this branch for administration.

Item agreed to.

140. National parks bureau—National parks and historic sites services, $975,000.

Mr. KUHL: Inasmuch as the Jasper national park, one of the largest and most beautiful parks in the world, lies within the boundaries of the constituency which I have the honour to represent, I wish to take this opportunity of saying a few words in regard to parks in general and in particular relation to the post-war period. During the present session, both within and without this house, we have had a considerable amount of discussion as to full employment being one of the major objectives in the post-war period. At this time I do not wish to enter into any debate on that issue; nevertheless I do suggest, as I did on a previous occasion, that I can agree with that objective provided we understand what we mean by full employment. If it means that we are going to use machines and our resources of power to the fullest extent possible, and man-power as little as possible, then I can agree; but if it means that we are to put the machines aside and allow them to rust by the roadside, as we did prior to the outbreak of war, and compel men to use picks and shovels and wheelbarrows to do the work we wish to have done, then of course I am entirely opposed to that understanding of full employment. I think Canadians need to learn not so much how to work as how to play. In the past I think far too much emphasis has been placed on the matter of work. Of course that raises a contentious subject, on which there could be much debate, and I am not going to impose my views on the committee now.

Mr. GRAYDON: But it is a good thing to have a job.

Mr. KUHL: What the hon. gentleman means is that it is a good thing to have an income, not necessarily a job. In the past we have suffered not so much from unemployment as "unempayment". We are all constantly endeavouring to get out of a job, and that includes my hon. friend and his associates. It has been the endeavour of man, ever since he has been upon this earth, to get out of all the nature-forced labour he possibly could in order that he might indulge in voluntary activities such as golf, if you like, or mountain climbing or swimming or a thousand and one other things which people do in their leisure time and in which they may expend more energy than in their working hours. I think we as members of parliament ought to be leading our people toward a new attitude in regard to life. The greatest philosopher who ever trod upon this earth said, "I have come that ye might have life and have it more abundantly." He did not say, "I have come that you might have jobs and work."

Mr. REID: But he worked as a carpenter.

Mr. KUHL: Quite true. That was necessary and dignified work; and I, believing in a new economic philosophy, agree that we must all be prepared to do our share of the necessary work that is involved in raising the standard of living to the point to which we wish it raised. In the past, however, people have not refused to do the necessary work, but governments and economists have allowed conditions to arise and to continue under which they have imposed their will upon the people and compelled them to do work which was not necessary or forced by nature. In this day and age, when we have the tremendous advantage of being citizens of the twentieth century, when we are the fortunate recipients of a great fund of knowledge, of science and invention, nature-forced labour could be reduced to the very minimum. I dare say that if in the post-war world we took advantage of all the machines and power production methods available, divided up the necessary hours of work in an equitable fashion, and divided up the hours of spare time, we could possibly get along with a six-hour or a five-hour day, or even a four-hour day. I believe that is a desirable objective. Fundamentally that is the desire of each of us in the House of Commons, as well as those outside. We are endeavouring to free ourselves of nature-forced labour in order that we may have more spare time to indulge in voluntary activities.

That brings me to the point I have in mind in connection with our national parks. In my view our national parks should be one of the means by which the people of Canada can use their leisure time with a maximum of benefit. I think we, as Canadians, shall have to put a good deal more emphasis on the cultural aspect of our lives than we have in the past. I certainly believe we have been putting far too much emphasis on the business and commercial aspects of our lives. True, there must always be a certain amount of business; but it seems to me that we make the objective of our lives one of pure business and commercialism, and in doing so we fail to emphasize the cultural side. There is far too much talk about pure business matters in this parliament. I should like to hear much more discussion of our philosophical attitude toward life, and what we are getting out of it as a nation. I certainly believe that by reason of the way things have been conducted in the past we have encouraged our people to become a lot of muckraking money-grubbers, and that we ought to get away from that idea.

In the post-war period I should like to see a set of economic circumstances in which people collectively will not be obliged to spend their hours behind office desks, or at lathes, or in machine shops, any more than is absolutely essential in order to produce the standard of living we desire. What I believe the people of Canada need, and ought to have, is more time to play. I see no reason at all why, in the post-war period, every individual, regardless of his position in life, should not have at least two months holidays a year with pay.

An hon. MEMBER: Who will look after that?

Mr. KUHL: Machinery.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: And who will make the machinery?

Mr. KUHL: The machines will make the machinery. That is one aspect of our economy which most people who consider our economic problems entirely overlook. They seem to believe that we are still in the eighteenth century, and using a pick, shovel and wheelbarrow. The fact is that we are living in a modern, high-speed, mass-production era, in which production, so far as the limit is concerned, is greatly increased. I am not trying to suggest that we should have an era in which there is no work at all. Naturally there is always going to be a certain amount of nature-forced labour to do, and we should be prepared to do our share of it. If economic circumstances were such that we would not need to do any more than is absolutely essential, the working day could certainly be reduced far below what it is to-day, and the income increased proportionately.

An American naturalist named John Muir said a few years ago something which I believe is apropos of the matter we are now considering. This is what he said:

> The tendency nowadays to wander in wildernesses is delightful to see. Thousands of tired, nerve-shaken, over-civilized people are beginning to find out that going to the mountains is going home; that wildness is a necessity and that mountain paths and reservations are useful not only as foundations of timber and irrigating rivers, but as fountains of life.

I think that is a valuable quotation. And, respecting our national parks, someone else has said this:

> If the British industrialist, for instance, was to search the whole world where else could be found such delightful diversified holiday and health-building possibilities as exist in the national parks of western Canada? No matter what the park visitor's interest may be, he may enjoy himself to the utmost in some of this vast national park area of over twelve thousand square miles. He may canoe in the northern prairie parks following the canoe routes of the old-time traders, or he may camp, fish, swim and just loaf to his heart's content. In the mountain parks he may find more vigorous exercise in mountain climbing, exploring and hiking, or if his interest is in natural history in any of its branches, he may find wild animals and birds in abundance in many varieties.

These are the things to which we should be paying more attention in our national life; and were we to do so, we would be better for it. I resent the attitude of looking at our national parks as a basis for tourist trade. To my mind it smacks very much of commercialism. Our national parks and sites of natural beauty should be places where we could entertain our friends from abroad. We ought not to assess our parks in terms of dollars and cents to be drained from them, or as money we can get from our friends who come to visit us. If they wish to entertain us, by way of exchange for the manner in which we entertain them, well and good. Let us go to visit them, and let them entertain us by way of repayment for what we have done. But in my view we must get away from this idea of commercializing that which should be part of our cultural life.

If I wished to elaborate on this subject there are many other statements I could make, but as hon. members are anxious to conclude the session I shall limit what I have to say. Certainly this is one aspect of our national life which we are overlooking too much. I trust when we reach the post-war period the Minister of Mines and Resources, and his colleagues, are not going to come along and say—if they happen still to be in their present position—that they cannot spend more money to hard-surface the roads of Jasper park or to extend tourist accommodation, because they have not the money. That was the answer we got in pre-war days: "We have not the money." I believe the thought is thoroughly implanted in people's minds that if we can find five thousand million dollars a year for destructive purposes, certainly the same amount of money can be made available for constructive purposes and for enhancing the cultural life of our nation.

I trust that once we reach the post-war period we are not going to be confronted with the statement that no money is available to do these things. The only limitation imposed in war time is that of men and materials. In peace time those same men and materials will be available, no doubt in far greater quantities than they were during war time. As long as we have the physical essentials to put our parks in such condition that they will be most inviting to our friends from abroad, only physical limitations should be imposed and none other. I trust that the Minister of Mines and Resources will keep this in mind when he is considering the appropriations that are necessary for the development of our national parks.

142. Grant to John Thomas (Jack) Miner, $2,500.

Mr. MacNICOL: As a long time friend and admirer of Jack Miner I want to thank the government for conferring upon him the well-earned title of "O.B.E." I know of no one that I was more pleased to hear had received this honour. The minister has been a consistent supporter of Jack Miner and his work and has provided an item every year as a recognition of the great contribution he has made throughout the years. He is Canada's greatest naturalist and has given freely of his own money, his energies and his time to make Canada famous as a great sanctuary for wild life.

Mr. CRERAR: I cordially support what the hon. member for Davenport has said about the achievements and work of Mr. Jack Miner. No honour bestowed in Canada was more worthily bestowed than the one given to Mr. Miner. He has made a great contribution to the understanding and value of the wild life of our country.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not suppose there is anyone in the house who has taken a greater interest in the work of Jack Miner than the hon. member for Davenport. I should like to identify myself with his commendation of the excellent work Jack Miner is doing and has done. Has the government given any consideration to increasing this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: That was under consideration when these estimates were prepared. Speaking for myself, and I think for my colleagues, I may say that we should have liked to increase this vote, but when you come to weigh estimates in the light of the tremendous expenditures that are being made, sometimes the decision must be made that perhaps this is not the proper time to make an increase. I should hope that next year or in later years it may be increased.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps next year.

Mr. GRAYDON: I had it in mind that something might have been lopped off some less necessary civil expenditure.

Item agreed to.

144. Dominion observatory, Ottawa, $97,910.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the work in connection with this observatory been increased to any material extent because of the war?

Mr. CRERAR: No. Generally speaking, the war has affected the dominion observatory perhaps as little as any other department of government.

Item agreed to.

147. Lake of the Woods control board, $8,150.

Mr. GRAYDON: Could we have some idea of the work of the board and its personnel?

Mr. CRERAR: The dominion members are K. M. Cameron, chief engineer, Department of Public Works; I. R. Strome, dominion water and power board. The Ontario members are Doctor Thomas H. Hogg, chairman, hydro electric power commission; C. H. Fullerton, surveyor general, department of lands and forests. The Manitoba associate member is C. H. Attwood, director of water resources in the department of mines and natural resources. The work of the board is mainly to see that the treaty between Canada and the United States regulating the levels of the lake of the Woods is carried out.

Mr. GRAYDON: This amount would not cover salaries; it would be for expenses?

Mr. CRERAR: It does not cover salaries for the members of the board. I understand there is a small clerical staff.

Item agreed to.

153. International boundary commission, $35,300.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who are the members of this commission?

Mr. CRERAR: Under the convention with the United States, the international boundary commission consists of two members. The Canadian representative is N. J. Ogilvie.

Indian affairs branch—

157. Branch administration, $59,735.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I imagine that other hon. members of the house have received representations in connection with the position of the Indians under the national war services regulations, 1940. I have in my hand a copy of a petition which was sent to the Minister of Justice and other hon. members, reading as follows:

> Every Indian of various reservations of Canada and each member of its council are protesting against the compulsory military service act, and the income tax affecting the Indians.
> We are all in favour of helping crush Hitler and those assisting him but we do not want to be forced.
> As wards of the dominion government and under the protection of His Majesty, we are tabling this petition in the House of Commons at Ottawa, on this .... day of July, the year 1943, and pray that every member of the house respect our treaties, as they were respected in the case of the enfranchisement act, in the month of March, the year 1933.
> Our solemn treaties were again respected in the last great war of 1914-18 when an order in council was passed exempting all the Indians in Canada from military service. We ask that the above rights and treaties be respected.

I have here a copy of "The Treaties of Canada with the Indians of Manitoba, the North-west Territories and Keewatin", and at page 69 where the Indian chief was discussing the matter with the governor, I read this:

> Chief: I hope you will not drop the question; we have understood you to say that you came here as a friend, and represented your charitableness, and we depend upon your kindness. You must remember that our hearts and our brains are like paper; we never forget. There is one thing that we want to know. If you should get into trouble with the nations, I do not wish to walk out and expose my young men to aid you in any of your wars.
> Governor: The English never call the Indians out of their country to fight their battles. You are living here and the queen expects you to live at peace with the white men and your red brothers, and with other nations.

Would the minister be good enough to tell the committee what the position of the present government is in regard to these very old treaties which are regarded by the Indians, who were the first settlers, as sacred and binding.

Mr. CRERAR: In reply to the first question I would say that the Department of Justice has given a decision to the effect that as the Indians are British subjects they are liable to military service. That decision was sustained in a recent court action in the province of Quebec. I am not so familiar with the terms of the early treaties that were signed in the years past with the various bands of Indians but I do know that what I have stated is the legal position with regard to their liability to military service.

In regard to income tax, the Indians are not subject to income tax upon income they derive from their reserve, but if an Indian, for instance, passes through university and becomes a medical doctor or an engineer and practises his profession in an ordinary community outside the reserve, he is liable to income tax.

Mr. WOOD: I think one matter to which the department should give consideration is the administration of the Soldier Settlement Act on the Indian reserves. As hon. members are aware, the Six Nations Indian reserve is the largest Indian reserve, in population, in the Dominion of Canada. It is in a purely agricultural country, one of the finest townships in the county of Brant. After the last war many of the Indians who had seen service took up soldier settlement lands on the reserve. The same disaster overtook them that overtook many other soldier settlers, and the result is that to-day the crown holds a mortgage or is the creditor on a number of those farms to an amount far in excess of their value. We were discussing the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act the other day, and here is one place where I think that act might have served a definite and useful purpose in securing the adjustment of those debts, but for some reason or other, whether it was because we did not interpret the act aright, or misinterpreted the Indian Act, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act did not apply to those lands. Many of these farms are to-day abandoned, because it would be impossible for a young man to take over one of these farms at the high prices that were paid for them in the boom years and with the large claim which the crown has against the property, the chattels and real estate. There may be a few who mastered their obligations, but not very many.

Soon Indian veterans will be returning from this war and something should be done to prevent what otherwise might be a terrible disillusionment for the veteran. As it is they will be reluctant to go into any soldier settlement scheme because of the results of the administration of the Soldier Settlement Act on the Indian reserves. I am aware that the administration of Indian soldier settlement comes under a different department from ordinary soldier settlement, but I do feel that every effort should be made to get this thing cleared up as soon as possible. I happen to be familiar with many of these locations and I know that many of them are excellent farms, but the crown holds a mortgage on them far in excess of the value of the property. We shall probably have to rehabilitate our men when they return from the war, and let us not leave a bad taste in their mouths by failing to clear up the present situation. I would ask the minister to give this suggestion serious consideration and see if something cannot be done in the near future to get this matter cleared up.

Mr. CRERAR: It will certainly receive attention. I am grateful to the hon. member for Brant for bringing this matter up. I am not familiar with the details of loans to Indian veterans who settled on the Six Nations reserve, or anywhere else for that matter. I would say, however, that the Indian veterans, whether those on the Six Nations reserve or any other reserve, should receive the same treatment in regard to land settlement as other veterans. I take it that my hon. friend wants me to give him the assurance that the matter will be looked into. I shall be glad to do that at an early day, and perhaps I shall then be in a position to give my hon. friend further information.

Mr. COTE: I have received some representations from members of the Caughnawaga tribe, which is opposite part of my riding on the other side of the St. Lawrence river, to the effect that the Indians did not receive any preferred treatment in the appointment of the officers who are charged with the application of the Indian Act. They say that in the United States an amendment was made to their Indian Act, possibly about ten years ago, giving precedence to Indian candidates whenever an appointment was to be made by the department administering the Indian Act. I should like to know whether any representations have been made in this respect to the minister, and whether it is considered that this would be applicable in Canada, and to what extent. In the second place, it has happened in several cases that grievances have been expressed by some of my constituents concerning the legal status conferred by the act in behalf of the Indians, members of tribes and resident on the regular reservations. A recent grievance arose from a serious accident which took place on a bridge between the reserve and my constituency. My constituent was hit by an automobile driven by an Indian, and apparently, even if he has recourse to the civil courts, a judgment would not help him at all. Had the Indian been hit he would have received free medical treatment and hospitalization, but my constituent will have to meet all his expenses himself, in spite of the legal recourse he has against the author of the accident. I wish the minister would say a few words in this connection, because similar cases frequently occur in my riding, and I should like to have the position settled once and for all.

Mr. CRERAR: As regards the first part of my hon. friend's question, wherever we can find Indians qualified to do work on the reserves they are given the preference. It may be that on occasion you will find Indians who disagree with the manner in which the preference is administered, but after all the officers of the department have to be in the end, I think, the judges as to the qualifications of any Indian for any particular position. At the present time there is a vacancy being filled in the Caughnawaga reserve, and we have asked the civil service commission to restrict the appointment to someone of the Indian race. The position, I believe, is that of caretaker for one of the buildings. This is the policy of the department, and it is a wise one. The great need which exists for Indians everywhere across Canada is to increase their sense of self-respect and self-reliance, and this is one way in which useful influences can be directed to that end.

As regards the other question, about the accident on the bridge, I do not know any of the particulars. My officers tell me that a legal point is involved, and perhaps when that is cleared up further, one of the officers can write to my hon. friend and give him what information we have concerning it.

Item agreed to.

160. Medical—Indian hospitals and general care of Indians, $1,493,980.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before this item is carried I wish to say a few words with regard to the hospital care of Indians. As the minister is no doubt aware, there has been considerable correspondence between the Indian Affairs branch at Ottawa and the hospitals association of British Columbia in regard to payment for the hospital care of Indians in that province. I believe a delegation from the association visited Ottawa some time during the winter and the subject was talked over. The matter was further discussed earlier, I understand, in British Columbia at the annual convention of the hospitals association in November, 1942, and the delegates attending the convention were unanimously of opinion that the Indian Affairs branch had failed to reimburse the hospitals for the work done on a basis which would pay the hospitals for the monetary outlay in caring for Indians. Put briefly, the hospitals association of British Columbia and the authorities of individual hospitals contend that there must be payment of at least $3 a day if a hospital is to be reimbursed for the money expended. The Indian Affairs branch, I understand, will not agree to that, and has been paying in some instances $2.50 and in other instances $2.75, and that difference in itself has become an additional subject of contention.

The position as outlined by the hospitals association on January 13, 1943, is as follows. I quote:

1. Up to the present, each and every hospital which has been called upon to treat Indians has incurred a loss for each patient treated. This condition has been aggravated further lately by an appreciable increase in the cost of pharmaceutical supplies, foodstuffs, general supplies, labour and the enforcement of labour laws, which require staff shifts of not longer than eight hours daily.

2. Hospitals throughout British Columbia refuse emphatically to discriminate on account of racial origin or religious differences, and insist that all patients should receive equal treatment, regardless of creed or race. They further point out that, contrary to the department's contention, the experience has been that often it costs more to care for Indians than ordinary patients, there being a greater need for isolation, pursuant to contagious and social diseases.

3. The average basic cost for general ward patients is $3 per diem and that sum is the very minimum for which the institutions throughout British Columbia could attempt to give adequate care. This does not include extras, such as X-rays and so forth.

4. The position taken by the department that the hospitalization of Indians is cheap does not hold. Experience is all to the contrary, and the hospitals wish to emphasize that it is their duty to protect and improve the health of the Indian, to a degree equal to that afforded other patients. A rate less than that hereinbefore stated simply means that the community at large is made responsible for a cost which is without a doubt an obligation of the department of Indian affairs, whose direct wards the Indians are.

5. Hospital costs throughout the province have been examined closely by various organizations and the provincial government and all local contracts, including the workmen's compensation board, are at rates of not less than $3 per diem plus extras.

I invite the attention of the committee and of the minister to the next paragraph:

6. Unless a revision is made all provincial hospitals will be compelled in the future to refuse the admission of Indian patients to their institutions. This may appear a harsh measure, but as no redress has been forthcoming by the department they are left with no other alternative. Incidentally, every other department of the government of the dominion has recognized the factors hereinbefore enumerated and is paying fees akin to the basic rate outlined, and it is difficult to understand why recognition should be given on the one hand, even when it involves the care of enemy aliens such as the Japanese, and refused to Indians.

A statement, I understand, was forwarded to the minister by the secretary of the British Columbia Hospitals association, E. W. Neel. I am informed, although I cannot vouch for the accuracy of the assertion, that St. Joseph's hospital in Victoria has refused to admit Indian patients. I am informed of that but I do not know whether it is correct.

I have in my hand a statement from Creston, British Columbia, relative to the rates charged by the hospital at Creston for the care of Indian hospital patients, and the share of that bill that has been paid by the Indian department. There are a number of cases here with names given. I will quote a few of them:

January, 1940: Mrs. Susan George, charge for ten days, $25, case-room $5, total $30. The department would not pay case-room but paid $25, leaving the hospital to assume the loss of $5.

January, 1940: Mrs. Alexander Eli. Hospital charges, 3 days, $7.50, case-room $5, total $12.50. The department paid $7.50, leaving the hospital to assume a loss of $5.

December, 1940: Mrs. George, 13 days, $32.50, case and dressings, $7.50, total $40. The department paid $32.50, leaving the hospital to carry a loss of $7.50.

June, 1941: Mrs. B. Frank, 7 days, $21; other care $7.50, total $28.50. The department paid $17.50, leaving a loss to the hospital of $11.

July, 1941: Mrs. Gregory, 5 days, $15, medicine 50 cents, total $15.50. The department paid $12.50, leaving the hospital with a loss of $3.

A number of other cases are given. In May, 1942, the hospital cared for an Indian baby where there had to be an operation. The amount was $12.50. The department apparently refused to pay at all and consequently the cost had to be assumed by the local hospital at Creston.

I have discussed this matter with the department, and the department has assumed, in my opinion, an attitude that is not very enlightening. In a letter from the department to one of the hospitals in British Columbia the position was taken that if the hospitals insisted on the Indian department paying $3 a day, the department would have to reduce the cost by not sending cases to the hospital which formerly went there, or by moving cases from the hospital sooner than had been done previously.

I put these matters briefly before the committee because I think that this is a situation that should be dealt with. One of the stock answers made to the hospital administrators is that, for the purpose of paying these hospital charges, the Indian department has only such moneys as are granted to it by parliament. I submit that this is the time for the minister to ask parliament to grant sufficient money to decently care for the Indians who are given hospital treatment.

I now have under my hand the material for which I was looking. It is contained in a letter to myself from the secretary of the British Columbia Hospitals association, Mr. E. W. Neel, who says:

> The department also states that Indians who are in a financial position to meet all or part of the cost of their hospitalization should be required to do so.

I have no objection to that.

> This may apply to Indians who live outside the reservations and are no longer the direct wards of the federal government but for the hospitalization of reservation Indians who are the direct wards of the government and who form by far the major portion of Indian patients, the hospitals have no option but to look to the department for payment. In view, however, of the department's statement it would be interesting to know on how many occasions in British Columbia the department has recovered from reservation Indians the cost of their hospitalization or through the local Indian agent has notified a hospital that owing to an Indian's financial position, the hospital should look not to the department but to the patient for the payment of the hospital account.
> Only two conclusions can be drawn from the attitude of the department. Either it does not want the same quality of hospitalization given to Indians that is given to other patients whether white or oriental, and this would seem to be indicated from the tone of a letter written by Mr. T. R. McInnis, secretary of the Indian branch at Ottawa on September 8 to the Nicola Valley hospital. In this letter Mr. McInnis stated that "if this branch is forced to pay these higher rates it will certainly not result in increased revenue for the institution concerned as we will have no alternative than to reduce the number of patients hospitalized. It means having to make your patients fit our funds, and we will either keep them out or hurry them out."

I think that is a terrible statement to be made by a civilized government in regard to the hospital care of its wards. This committee should insist that the Indian branch pay the hospitals in various parts of the country for the care of these wards of the government at the rates which are paid by organizations such as sick benefit associations, workmen's compensation boards and so on. Let it be noted that any additional charge which is not paid by the government must be assumed by the citizens of the municipality concerned, and I believe this government has more facilities at its disposal for raising the necessary revenue than are available to the municipalities with which I am acquainted in the province of British Columbia. I have in my hand a copy of the Glace Bay Gazette of May 13, 1943, which carries a news item under the date line of Ottawa, May 12. The headline, in fairly bold type, is, "Better Health Plan for Indian Race is Forecast." It is dated Ottawa; I imagine it must apply to Canada, though from the information I have placed on record so far one would not gather that fact. The article states:

Lo, the poor Indian, who has dreamed away the years, will be transformed into a vigorous builder of a new and greater Canada if official hopes are realized.

Well, I do not know just what official hopes they would like realized, but I trust it is the official hopes of the Indian Affairs branch.

Indian affairs medical officers to-day told the story of a vast experiment in human welfare.

It must have been an experiment which they did not try.

If it succeeds—and the preliminary results make scientists' eyes sparkle—120,000 Canadian Indians will have better health. In addition—and just as important—their outlook on life probably will be changed for the better.

Before we can get a changed outlook on life on the part of the Indians I believe we will have to get a changed outlook on life on the part of the Indian Affairs branch.

From one report, based on extensive studies and written in the light of most modern scientific knowledge, come the following:

What I have read was just newspaper talk, I guess; this quotation is from the hopeful officials in Ottawa:

"It is not unlikely that many characteristics, such as shiftlessness, indolence, improvidence and inertia—

Inertia is not confined only to the Indians.

—so commonly regarded as hereditary traits in the Indian race, may, at the root, be really the manifestation of malnutrition."

Well, whatever the cause, I hope this newspaper article is correct and that it foreshadows a different policy on the part of the department than has been the case in the past. I do not wish to hold up the committee with any further remarks, but I am satisfied that there is a case here which the government cannot refuse to recognize without placing the municipalities in the position that they will have to give inferior treatment to the Indians, or refuse them treatment altogether, or will have to assume a burden that properly belongs to the Indian Affairs branch.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I listened for a few moments this afternoon to the remarks of the hon. member for Brant. In private conversation with the hon. member he told about the Indian reservation that is in his constituency, and I believe that perhaps the Indians living there enjoy some degree of security. Unfortunately the Indians with whom I have come in contact are not in that happy position. I can only say that I consider the condition of the Indians of northern Saskatchewan to be one of the most appalling things of which I have knowledge. Up in those northern areas these people are living under the most degrading conditions. They have been degraded by the vices of the white men without having the white men's advantages. They have been treated as children and in many cases have become as children because of the treatment that has been meted out to them. Of course these people do not vote. Many hon. members do not have Indians in their ridings, but even if they have it is not considered a matter of great importance to them, simply because the Indians have no voting power. Believe me, however, from any humanitarian point of view I believe the time has come when something more should be said about our Indian people. After all, to-day there are numbers of Indian boys fighting in the armed forces of this country. I saw in the newspaper only the other day that a full-blooded Iroquois Indian had been made a general, I think, in the army of this nation. That, I am sure, will give great satisfaction to Indian people all across the country. And it points out the significant fact that where Indian people are given the advantages received by white people, or those of other races, they are capable of developing in the same way.

I know that to-day many people are very much concerned not only with the immediate winning of the war but with the implementing of the Atlantic charter in years to come. We hear references to what is going to happen to Europe, and what sort of freedom they are to have there. Perhaps Canadians, even before they begin thinking about Europe or any other part of the world, should begin to realize that it is necessary for them to do a little housecleaning so far as the Indian question in Canada is concerned. We are hoping at some time in the future to have the implementation of the Marsh report—at least, we are hoping to have some kind of new order in Canada, under which there shall be at least a basis for security for the people of our country. I submit that there is no time like the present for taking into consideration the need for thoroughly reviewing the whole status and position of the Indians. It is many years now since the original treaties were made with the Indians in Canada. In those years we have changed considerably in our ways of thinking. Our whole manner of life has altered, and I cannot but help think the time is ripe, as I said before, for a thorough revision. Perhaps a conference between government officials and the chiefs of Indian groups in Canada should form the basis for a revision of the existing treaties. We shall neglect our duty as Canadians if in these coming years we fail to give the Indian people in Canada the full advantage of Canadian citizenship, particularly with regard to education and health.

I fail to see why Indian children should not be given exactly the same educational facilities as any other children, and that such facilities should be provided by the government. I fail to see why, in the event of a health scheme being instituted for Canada, it should not be wide enough, sufficiently all-embracing, to include everybody. There should be no bar whatever so far as Indians are concerned.

In one corner of my constituency a new scheme has been recently established. This is not for the setting up of an Indian reserve—we already have one or two of them—but rather a reservation for the Metis people. I am wholeheartedly against the idea. I fail to see why these people should not be treated the same way as any other Canadians. Why should they be segregated? Why place them in the same position as Indians, and thereby degrade them to the same degree? We say the official policy of the government is to increase the self-respect of these people and their ability to provide for themselves. I fail to see how the segregation of the Indians or the Metis people will increase their ability to do this. They should be treated as ordinary Canadian citizens, and be given full responsibility and full advantages. If this were done, we should see a great many of them respond in an admirable manner. I would go so far as to say that as many of those Indian children would respond to decent treatment as would any other group of people in Canada. I see no difference in them whatever, except that for many years they have been relegated to an inferior position, and it has worked a most disastrous wrong upon them.

I have had correspondence recently with the minister regarding some Indians who live on the Kootenay agency in British Columbia. I have no idea why they should have written to me, but I have received communications from them to the effect that they are very unhappy about the way in which the timber on their reservations is being handled. In his reply the minister states that this particular band of Indians have refused to give their approval to the sale of their timber for over twenty years. But they do not say that. They have gone so far as to send a petition to the Prime Minister, a copy of which I have here. It says:

> We the undersigned people of the Kootenay Agency petition you as our sovereign representative and representative of the laws pertaining to our well being granted our people by the late Queen Victoria.
> We have demanded an investigation into the underhand methods used by our agent in the disposal of our timber and by unbiased dominion authorities. An investigation has not been forthcoming. We make this appeal directly to you upon the basis of the evidence at a recent inquiry held at St. Mary's Indian reserve on June 2 and 3 by an inspector sent here from Vancouver.
>
> We proclaim our loyalty and our devotion to the furthering of the war effort of our country, and in so doing appeal for public denunciation of the war effort being used as an excuse to rob our people.
> We demand through you the removal of our agent who has no sympathy with nor interest in the life of our people.

This is signed by Chief Eustace, Chief Michael, Chief Luke Sam, and several other Indians, some of whom, not being able to sign their names, have made their mark. They also sent a letter to the Department of Indian Affairs, as follows:

> We, the undersigned Indian people, under the jurisdiction of the Kootenay Indian Agency, petition our Indian Department demanding immediate cessation of timber cutting now in progress on St. Mary's Reserve, pending an immediate investigation of the method used by our agent in disposing of the timber on the St. Mary Reserve.
> We declare that the methods used in disposing of the timber were underhanded and our people were subjected to duress in its disposal.
> A copy of this petition is being sent to the other groups.

The same signatures appear on this letter. On this particular reservation there are vast quantities of timber, which the minister states are over-ready for cutting. I see no reason why the Indians would object to cutting the timber. They are aware of the fact that timber is needed in the war effort. They say they are willing that it should be cut, but they have no use for the agent who, as they say, has no sympathy with or interest in the life of their people. Many agents may carry out the letter of the law and the regulations of the department, but they fail completely to have sympathy with and interest in the life of the Indian people. Such a man is not the right type of man to be in charge of an Indian agency.

I have a store bill received from an Indian woman, with two children, and on this bill I find that she has purchased a little tea, a few dried apples, some rolled oats, 22 cents worth of cheese and a little bit of puffed wheat at a total cost of $5. Yes, $5 for herself and her two children, to live for a month. I lived once on $12 a month, and, believe me, I have not forgotten what that is like. I fail to see how we as a nation can be self-respecting people so long as we condemn any who live within the boundaries of the country to a life as degrading as this.

In his reply to me regarding these Indians in the Kootenay reservation, the minister said:

> We have a right to doubt the statement that the surrender was obtained under duress. As a matter of fact we did not and do not require a surrender or the consent of the Indians to the sale.

He points out that there is an order in council governing this. I still maintain that even if there is an order in council, it is the wrong way to go about the matter. If these people were placed under an Indian agent who was sympathetic with the Indians, and who was willing to be a little more aware of their interests, he could handle the timber situation in such a way that the Indians would be satisfied to sell their timber in the manner required. I am going to ask the minister to make a further inquiry into this particular case, and send the details to me, because I do not think that three chiefs of an Indian tribe, and a great number of their followers, would sign their names to a petition like this if they had a feeling of security and faith in their Indian agent. Whatever the cause is, I do not know, but on behalf of these people I ask the minister to make an investigation and to give me further information in the matter.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for North Battleford has not made a very practical approach to the problem she has been discussing. The difficulties encountered when dealing with Indians are largely psychological due to the fact that in a few generations the centuries-old mode of life of the Indian has been completely transformed. In the case of the reserve at Cranbrook to which my hon. friend alluded, I regret that she did not read all of my letter when she read the petition from the Indians.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I am willing to do so. It was a lengthy letter and I did not want to take the time.

Mr. CRERAR: The letter fully sets out the particulars. The cause of the difficulty at Cranbrook was interference by one or two busybodies who stirred up the Indians to action that was against their own interests. This reserve has a considerable amount of timber. This was examined by competent forestry officials who advised that a certain amount of the timber should be cut in order to realize the most out of it. Anyone who is familiar with timber operations knows that you can leave timber too long; you can leave it so long that it loses all its qualities as lumber. Undoubtedly and unquestionably that is what was taking place on this reserve. We endeavoured to get the Indians to agree to a disposal of part of this timber to an operating company on what the officers of the department considered was a fair basis. Very strict provisions were included in the agreement with the operating company to cover the manner in which the timber should be cut. One provision that I recall was that they could not cut any tree that was less than ten inches in diameter, breast high on the average man. The whole purpose of this was to apply modern and scientific principles to the cutting of timber on this particular reserve. I think I am correct in saying that if these principles are applied there will be for all the years that lie ahead a continuous source of revenue for the Indians from the timber.

Tenders were advertised for, and as I recall the successful tenderer was willing to pay a royalty, or dues, of $3.50 per thousand feet board measure. This would create a fund for the Indians in the reserve. It is true that the Indians did not want to have this action taken, as they had a feeling that their timber was being taken from them. I repeat; they were stirred up to adopt this attitude. It is not difficult on occasion to stir up Indians on matters of this kind. They felt their timber was being taken from them.

Mrs. NIELSEN: The minister has said that someone was stirring up these people. Personally I have no knowledege of the case, but I have the idea that whoever it was, he was trying to help the Indians because he felt that the Indian agent was not dealing in a proper manner. It was not stirring up the Indians at all.

Mr. CRERAR: I am coming to that point in a moment. At any rate the Indians resisted, and as a result the timber was deteriorating and losing its value for the Indians on the reserve. It was not desirable in the interests of the Indians, and particularly with the present need there is for lumber, that this condition of affairs should be allowed to continue. It is true the Indians have sent in a petition to the Prime Minister, with a copy to myself and evidently a copy to the hon. member for North Battleford. It is not very difficult to get Indians to sign a petition on almost anything you want to bring up. As a matter of fact they like signing petitions It is a notorious fact that Indians, generally speaking, have a sort of love for litigation. They think there is something meritorious in being involved in matters of this kind. All this has to be taken into account. My hon. friend has accepted the word of the Indians or of her correspondent as to the action of the agent on this reserve.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Excuse me; I merely asked for an investigation.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend did not accept it, then she should have looked into it more closely before bringing it up on the floor of the house.

Mrs. NIELSEN: How could anyone accept anything until a proper investigation was made? When I have a petition sent to me the least I can do is to ask for an investigation.

Mr. CRERAR: I think my hon. friend should have examined into the merit behind the petition before she brought it up on the floor of the house and criticized the officers of the department. This matter was fully reviewed and it was on the recommendation of the Indian commissioner for British Columbia that this action was finally taken. I think I should say that in the whole Indian administration there is not a more devoted and more intelligent official than the commissioner for Indian Affairs in British Columbia. I do not say that there may not be times when he will make a mistake, but I know that his whole purpose and effort is to serve the best interests of the Indians.

My hon. friend suggests that the matter should be further reviewed. I do not see that anything would be gained by a further review of the case. I am convinced that we have now before us and have had for some time all the essential facts in this case. I have no doubt that in a few months this agitation among the Indians will pass away. They will receive their royalty on the timber. There is also a strict provision that the operating company shall give first employment to the Indians if they are willing to take it. That would be another source of revenue to them, and many of the Indians are particularly good at lumbering operations and the like. As I say, they will have available to them the increment that comes from the disposal of the property in the way I have mentioned.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What has been realized from the sale of this timber?

Mr. CRERAR: Cutting has just started, or it may not have started yet.

Mr. NEILL: Did the minister mention the name of the reserve of which he has been speaking?

Mr. CRERAR: It is in the Kootenay agency, near Cranbrook.

Mr. NEILL: In British Columbia?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I want to support the admirable presentation made by the member for Vancouver East in connection with the hospitals in British Columbia. I am familiar with the brief from which he largely quoted, and so far as I know it is substantially correct. The minister said of a previous speaker that she should have investigated the matter before bringing it into the house, but I think the member for Vancouver East and I myself have investigated this matter thoroughly, and the member for Vancouver East was thoroughly justified in making the suggestions which he does, in which I concur. Very often when the interests of the dominion, and the provinces or the municipalities are concerned together, we expect the dominion to get the worst end of the deal. I do not know how it is, but we would rather stick the dominion government than the province or the municipality. In this case it is the other way about. We are being cheated, to use plain bald language, by the dominion government, which refuses to pay its legal obligations and defies us. That means that we, the citizens of British Columbia, have to pay them. The dominion, and that means the citizens of Canada, have the obligation to take care of the Indians. We do not try to avoid that obligation, and we as citizens of British Columbia are prepared to pay our share through general taxaton. That is the right way to do it, taxed by the government within whose jurisdiction the Indians come, but the wrong way to do it, is to cheat the hospitals and make them get into a state of destitution so that they have to come to the general public for subscriptions —we have had to put up money before. The only alternative is to raise the rates unduly on the white people.

What I direct attention to is the utterly illogical statement, made by one government official, that the reason the dominion government could not pay a rate for the Indians comparable with the rate the white people pay was that there were no more funds and there would have to be less sickness. Those were the words the hon. member for Vancouver East quoted. I do not know how you can bring that about simply because there is no money. We have heard it said that people cannot afford to be sick, and I have heard it said that people cannot afford to die on account of the expense, but it is something new to hear that the Dominion of Canada cannot pay anything but a cut-throat price for the care of its wards in hospital because it has no more money. If that is the case, here and now is the place to remedy that condition. Let the minister say: "In consequence of facts that have come to my attention it will be necessary for me to ask parliament for more money for this purpose," and he would get it. But the statement was actually made by a government official: "There will have to be less sickness." Can you tell me how the Indians are to be less sick ? I myself know the case of one hospital in a town near where I live. They told us: If we did not give this unfair rate we would not get the business. My advice to that hospital board was to refuse to take the Indians in. White people are already lying in the corridors on account of the crowded state of the hospital. What is the alternative? "We will build a hospital of our own," they said. I laughed at that—building a hospital for two or three hundred cases a year. The other alternative was to take the patients out to Nanaimo, fifty-four miles away, over a mountain. The average sick person would have to be taken there in an ambulance, and any one who knows what ambulances cost will appreciate how utterly impracticable that would be when the patient might be only ten days in hospital. They were just trying to run a bluff on us.

The minister said to the last speaker that it was easy for agitators to influence the Indians. That is true. But these are white people who are not concerned at all with agitating. One man referred to, Neill—he is no relation of mine—is described as an agitator. Is anyone who asks that reasonable rates be paid an agitator? What is it the scripture says—"a little more rest, a little more sleep." The average official never wants to interfere with things as they are. Laissez-faire is his sole ambition. When somebody comes along and wants things improved, he is an agitator. All the hospital boards in British Columbia united in supporting this brief, and they asked: Why is the dominion government not paying the same price for Indians as we are paying for our white patients? And now we are told: "You have been stirred up by an agitator." All we are asking is that the dominion government should pay the same rate for Indians as we are paying for our white people. I saw the other day in the paper that the rates in the hospital to which I subscribe, to which I would go if I were sick, have been raised to make up a deficiency in cost. Yet here is the dominion government insisting on Indians going into hospital at a price below the cost. Then they instance some remarkable hospital in the remote north which, with the aid of unpaid nuns possibly, was able to keep its rates down. But we are dealing with conditions as they are in a town where ordinary labour earns about seven or eight dollars a day, and a young boy or girl of sixteen, sixty cents an hour in a plywood mill and where nurses are working on a three-shift day.

It has been said that they are going to put up a new hospital for tubercular Indian patients near Chilliwack, that they can do it more cheaply there. It is sometimes said that the Post Office Department is run at a good profit. Cabinet ministers boast of that, but they do not tell you that half of the expense is paid out of another item and that some of the revenue comes from the stamps on our cheques, which is not revenue but a tax. Public buildings are all paid out of a separate account, yet they say: Look and behold what the post office is paying. If you investigate it, Mr. Chairman, you will find something along the same lines in regard to the hospitals. In estimating costs, they omit capital expenditure. We are not asking for something outrageous; we are not asking for anything more than is coming to us. We do not ask to be put in a preferred position. The men who drew up that brief for the united hospitals of British Columbia say: We want them to pay the same as the workmen's compensation board pays. That board does not pay more than it can help. It was stated to us when we were making representations about the matter that some of the hospitals were satisfied with this arrangement. I am willing to guarantee that none of them are satisfied. They may be quiescent, taking the attitude: "What is the use of our kicking? We are only a small hospital."

The statement has been made that the trouble has been caused by agitators and the dominion government says: We cannot afford to pay any more because we have not the funds. If that is so, the minister is now aware of it, and if he has not sufficient to pay a reasonable rate he should ask parliament for a further vote. I cannot see why individual people in one little community should have to pay for the losses that are caused by the hospital having to take in Indians who may come from twenty miles away. I can see no rhyme or reason in it, and if the minister says that it is because the dominion government has no funds for the purpose, I ask him to bring in a supplementary estimate if necessary for a sufficient sum. That is all we ask for that the dominion government pay the cost of maintenance for the Indians in the hospitals to which they are sent.

Mr. DONNELLY: A committee of which I am a member has been investigating national health insurance and the possibility of putting on a scheme covering the whole dominion. Is it the intention of the government, if such a scheme is adopted, to include Indians? If so, the estimated cost should be noticed; it is just about twice what it is here.

Mr. CRERAR: Replying first to the observation of the hon. member who has just spoken, no consideration up to the present has been given to the matter of including Indians in any health insurance scheme which may later be worked out.

Mr. NEILL: Why not?

Mr. CRERAR: Well, I am not opposing the idea. I am simply stating that up to the present, consideration has not been given to it. It may well be that if we embark on a national health insurance scheme the Indians will be included.

On this question of hospital rates in British Columbia, let me make it clear at once, if the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has the impression that I am guilty, that at no time have I referred to those who brought the matter to the attention of the federal government as "agitators"; I have not so described them.

Mr. NEILL: I did not say so.

Mr. CRERAR: Then I misunderstood my hon. friend.

Mr. NEILL: I said it was represented to the minister that the matter had been gone into and that the whole thing was due to an agitator in British Columbia.

Mr. CRERAR: I did not quite understand my hon. friend. It may be that the department has been too parsimonious with the hospitals in British Columbia. No fault can be found with the hospitals associaton or with individual hospitals for having put before the department and before myself the representations they have made. The demands in respect of medical costs for Indians have been rising steadily. There may be those who say: Well, no matter what the demands are, you should provide a certain standard of medical care for all the Indians across Canada. I recall that this matter was discussed with myself on more than one occasion by the late Lord Tweedsmuir. He made a trip on one occasion to Aklavik, and he thought that our hospital facilities in the far northern country were deficient, that we did not have the proper hospital facilities there. But when we come to administer the funds voted by parliament we try to get the maximum of results. Certainly if we have x dollars for hospital treatment of Indians and the rate is, say, $2.50 a day, you can care for more Indians than if the rate is $3 a day. I am not just now justifying the department. It may be that our attitude to this matter is not wise. But certainly when you have in mind the tremendous demands for the spending of public money in all directions and the need of maintaining some sort of balance in our economy, consideration has to be given to matters such as this.

As I recall, the rates complained of in British Columbia were $2.50 a day. We have, for most of the hospitals in that province, and I think it will apply very shortly to all of them, raised the rate to $2.75 a day. The hospitals association wished the rate fixed at $3 per day, and I shall be glad, in the light of the representations made here by the hon. members who have spoken to the matter, to take it into further consideration. I think this request has come from all hon. members from British Columbia irrespective of their political affiliations. I might point out, however, that in the operation of our own hospitals, in which we have some experience, we managed to carry them on at a figure substantially below the rate we pay the general public hospitals. For example, we have in British Columbia a hospital at Coqualeetza which was brought into operation about August 1, 1941. It is mainly concerned with tuberculosis. From August 1, 1941, to December 31, 1942, a period of seventeen months, there were 457 patients at one time or another, there were 52,253 hospital days, and the per diem cost was $2.08 per day.

Mr. NEILL: Did that include capital expenditure?

Mr. CRERAR: No, I was just going to refer to that. I intended to make it clear that that does not include items of taxes or depreciation or interest on the money invested.

Mr. NEILL: Capital expenditures.

Mr. CRERAR: Referring to another government operated hospital, that at Qu'Appelle, in Saskatchewan, there, 1,349 patients were treated, with a total of 28,114 hospital days, and a per diem cost of $1.33.

Mr. NEILL: For what period?

Mr. CRERAR: That would cover a year, I think.

Mr. NEILL: Which year?

Mr. CRERAR: Well, probably the last year for which we have records. It would be the last audited statement.

Mr. NEILL: What about comparable wages? Has the minister any record?

Mr. CRERAR: We engage the nurses and all other help, and we have to pay them the proper rates in order to retain them. Let me make it clear that I am not putting forward these facts as an argument against the requests made this afternoon on this point. All I wish to say is that in the light of the representations a full review will be made of the matter. At any rate the rate will be $2.75 in British Columbia, and I hope we shall be able to get it raised to $3.

Mr. GILLIS: With reference to the Indian situation in Nova Scotia, I am familiar with it up to about three months ago. I carried on considerable correspondence with the department and met departmental officials. The programme in that province is to concentrate the Indians at two particular points, Eskasoni and Shubenacadie. I am not going to say anything about the merits or the demerits of the scheme. What I am interested in is this. You are making good progress in concentrating them at these two points and you run into the priorities board with respect to the necessary materials to build houses in the areas in which you are going to complete your programme. That was the situation up to three months ago. I do not know anything about it beyond that point. All I want the minister to do is to give me a brief summary of matters as they now stand. Has he developed his programme? Is he getting materials for the necessary buildings in order to complete the programme he has in Nova Scotia?

Mr. CRERAR: That comes under another vote, but I can answer it now. Steps were initiated about two years ago looking to the concentration of Indians in Nova Scotia on two reserves. There were roughly 2,000 Indians scattered over nineteen reserves without proper supervision. Some of the reserves were close to towns and cities and that made it difficult to achieve any real progress with the Indians. They are being gathered together in these two reserves, and that involves the building of houses, schools and teachers' residences, because our aim is to secure teachers who will remain permanently on the reserve and thus acquire influence with the Indians. Tenders have been called for these buildings, and it is not expected that we shall have any difficulty in getting the materials necessary for their construction.

Mr. McCANN: I suggest that if the minister proposes a change of rates in hospital pay they be uniform throughout the whole dominion. Costs for hospitalization are comparable in all provinces, and it would be poor policy to single out British Columbia or any other province and fix one rate there and another rate in some other province.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We seem to be having a general discussion on this item, and I should like to direct a few questions to the minister with reference to a matter of some importance. The first question is what attitude the government has taken with reference to the calling of Indians for military service. The minister knows that there has been some discussion as to the exact status of the Indians in the matter of military service. Sessional paper No. 136J, brought down in the house on Thursday, June 24, contains two letters to Indian agents in Saskatchewan. I should like to quote briefly from these. The first letter is from the general superintendent of Indian agencies to Mr. J. R. Favel, Sweet Grass Indian Reserve, Prongua, Saskatchewan. I quote:

Dear Sir:

I have your letter of December 8 with respect to compulsory service of Indians.

In your letter you have pointed out that you are quite positive that Indians, or anyone who is not enfranchised, are not subject to service.

We are not interpreters of the law here and the only reply I can make to this is that in a letter we received from our branch at Ottawa the following was drawn to my attention:—

"The national war services department has now advised that all Indians must hold themselves in readiness for call for military service (30 days' training). If the Indians desire to avoid this military service, representations must be made by them, individually, when they are called for their medical examination. The representations would then be forwarded to Ottawa and would be considered at that time."

Yours truly,

M. Christianson,
General Superintendent of Indian Agencies.

The second letter is also from the general superintendent of Indian agencies to Chief and Councillors, Little Pine Reserve, Paynton, Saskatchewan. The letter is file No. 302-5. I will not quote more than two paragraphs:

In this connection I wish to inform you that shortly after I came back to Regina in 1940, I brought this very same matter to the attention of His Honour, Mr. Justice Embury, chairman of the national war services board, and he looked thoroughly into the matter of the enlistment of Indians in the Canadian army. His Honour Mr. Justice Embury informed me that he could find nothing in the treaties of Canada with the Indians whereby they were exempt from military service. At the same time he explained to me that the Indians could not be called for military service overseas, but they could be drafted for the army for service in Canada only.

During the last war a number of Indians all over the country were conscripted. At that time the government found that an error had been made and treaty Indians could not be conscripted for overseas service in the army as that promise had been made to them at the time of the signing of the treaties, that is, they could not be conscripted for fighting wars outside of Canada, therefore those Indians who had been conscripted were discharged immediately from the army.

I should like to know first whether that is a correct interpretation, that the Indians can be conscripted for service in Canada, and second, whether they can be conscripted for service abroad. What is the exact legal status of the Indian who is called for service in Canada? As wards of the government, without the full rights of citizenship, does the government contemplate giving them some of the rights of citizenship in view of the fact that they are discharging some of its responsibilities? I should like to have that clarified because a number of Indians have been confused on this question.

I have another question to ask the minister with reference to a matter that was brought up in the house on May 24, as reported on page 2930 of Hansard. I had a question on the order paper as follows:

Has a letter been issued by the superintendent of Indian agencies at Regina, notifying the Indians that only part of the interest accruing from money held in trust will be paid to the Indians during the war?

The answer to that question was:

No. An attempt has, however, been made through inspectors and Indian agents to persuade Indians to forgo temporarily, in whole or in part, the distribution of interest earnings and other moneys held in trust for them.

The minister goes on to explain that the Indians have better opportunities for earning money now, and states that it is not felt that they are in great need of money, some of which is being withheld from them. I have had complaints from Indians in the reserves immediately around Regina that moneys accruing to them from trust funds have been withheld without their consent or consultation with them. That statement may not be correct, but I should like the minister to state to the committee whether or not, in the event of the Indians not agreeing to having this money which is coming to them withheld temporarily, either in whole or in part, it is the policy of the Indian administration to withhold that money on a compulsory basis. When I was in the west some of the Indians told me that they had received this year only about forty per cent of the money which they were accustomed to receiving in other years and that they had never at any time been asked whether or not they would agree to have any money withheld.

I agree with the minister that there are cases where some Indians have more money than they had before. Some of them have sons in the army or some of the women have husbands and are therefore getting dependent's allowance. But there are other cases where the war has not made much difference. I met one man who has a large family and who is operating a small farm, and his expenses are as great as they ever were. His cost of living is higher and the fact that money is withheld constitutes a severe financial problem for him.

These are the questions I should like to have the minister answer, first of all with reference to the status of the Indians in the matter of compulsory military service, and second, whether or not this money is withheld from them without their consent.

Mr. CRERAR: In regard to the first question, the hon. member was not in earlier when I answered a similar question from the other side of the house, but I may briefly repeat the answer. Indians are liable to military service in the same way as any other citizen of the country. The justice department gave a ruling to that effect. They are British subjects and consequently are treated alike in the matter of military service with all other British subjects The view of the Department of Justice was supported by a court decision not very long ago in the Montreal district.

With regard to the second question, it is not necessary to secure the consent of the Indians to the withholding of funds, as for instance the interest on band funds, unless there is some understanding to the contrary. I have in mind the case where some of the assets of a band may be sold. If the Indians gave their consent to the disposal of the assets on certain terms, those terms would have to be observed, but in the cases my hon. friend has in mind consent is not necessary. The officers of the department, who are wholly sympathetic to Indian welfare generally, in the cases cited felt that the Indians were not in need of the funds at that particular time. If $500 is coming to an Indian as the result of a fur catch, for example, and he gets that $500, I venture to say that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the money will disappear within thirty days. It is much better to hold the funds and distribute them to the Indian as his need arises. As a matter of fact that is what is being done in connection with some of the fur reserves that were set up and are now in operation, with the result that in some cases we have been able to pay an Indian family $20 or $25 a month the year round. It is much better to hold back the money and pay it in monthly instalments of that kind than to give the family a lump sum of $240 or $300.

I can assure my hon. friend that it is the desire of those administering Indian affairs to deal equitably and justly, though perhaps at times it must be done firmly, with the Indians under their administration.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I want to make just one comment in reference to the minister's reply. Has the government given any thought to the proposition that if these Indians are to be held to be British subjects and therefore subject to the responsibilities of citizenship, they should enjoy some of the rights of citizenship? It seems to me that if in the matter of military service the government now is going to say that the Indians are British subjects, we should give some consideration to extending the franchise to them and giving them some of the privileges of British subjects. That might not be done all at once, but certainly I think we should not ask them to pay the price and accept the responsibility without giving them some of the privileges.

I fully agree with the minister when he says that where a large sum of money is coming to the Indians it is much better to spread the payment of that money over a period of time; I think that is a very wise procedure. The Indians I have in mind, however, and the ones to whom I spoke, had no such sums coming to them. I remember one man who usually had about $100 or $110 coming to him as the interest on some funds held in trust. This year he was given only about $40. He was counting on that money to buy seed to get ready for spring operations, and $40 was totally inadequate to meet his needs. It seems to me that these matters should be handled on an individual basis rather than under any blanket regulation. There might be certain cases in which the withholding of the money would be the best possible thing for the families concerned, while in other cases it might be a hardship. If the practice of withholding money has been adopted as a general policy I suggest that the department may be working an undue hardship on some of these Indians. It seems to me the cases ought to be investigated and dealt with individually, on the basis of the individual need.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will give me the individual case he has in mind I shall be very glad to have full particulars supplied to him. As a matter of fact generally speaking the cases are dealt with individually rather than en bloc. With regard to enfranchisement, to which my hon. friend refers, a comparatively small number of Indians are enfranchised each year. There is a peculiar thing about this, however; if the hon. member for Brant were here no doubt he could give us some information on it. On many of these reserves where the Indians could be enfranchised they do not want it, and of course there is no compulsion exercised by the authorities. It may be that in the years that lie ahead the question of compulsory enfranchisement, that is, compulsorily making the Indians citizens of the country in the ordinary sense, may have to be considered. My experience and observation, however, give me the impression that many of the Indians who would be quite competent to exercise the franchise would refuse to accept it. This situation may arise from a mistaken idea of their peculiar status. Some of these Indian bands say, "We are allies of Canada; we are an allied nation within the Canadian nation." All I can say is that it has not been the practice compulsorily to enfranchise any Indians, and that as a matter of fact a great many who would be quite capable of exercising the franchise would refuse to accept it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It might be wise to give them an opportunity to avail themselves of it.

Mr. CRERAR: They have that opportunity now.

Item agreed to.

Immigration branch—

169. Field and inspectional service abroad, $80,004.

Mr. CRERAR: May I take a moment of the committee's time to mention that Mr. F. C. Blair who has been associated with the immigration branch for almost forty years has reached retirement age; indeed retirement age was reached a few years ago, but I was able to prevail upon him to remain. I just wish to say that in all my experience with government officials I have known none more conscientious or more faithful in the discharge of his duties. He brought to the discharge of these duties ability of a very high order. I simply wish to pay this tribute to a public official who has rendered long and distinguished service to his country.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, the words so well expressed by the minister find a ready echo on this side of the house. It would have been unfortunate had the services and record of Mr. Blair gone unnoticed, or without tribute at this time. I join with the minister, and express on behalf of this party an appreciation of the services Mr. Blair has so loyally, so industriously and with such capacity rendered to Canada.

On the matter of immigration, has the government given, or is it giving consideration to a policy of immigration for Canada at the close of the war? This is a question which for a considerable time has engaged the attention of people across Canada. We are now in a time of war. We have found that unpreparedness for war has been a costly business, and I think it is only fair to point out that it will be equally costly not only in dollars and cents but in many other respects if, at the dawning of an era of peace, we find ourselves unprepared, as we were unprepared for war. Is the minister in a position to-day to give the committee any indication of what policy the government intends to follow with respect to post-war immigration to Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: Consideration is being given to this problem continuously, as well as to other post-war problems. However, I am sure my hon. friend will recognize that at the present time it is difficult to lay down any definite plans which, it could be said, would be closely followed. We have yet to conclude the war. We have yet to see what sort of peace will be worked out when the war is over. In the light of the conditions then prevailing, and the information that will then be available, more definite decisions can be taken as to what public policy in this regard should be.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope the question of immigration will not be left entirely until the peace treaty has been signed between the warring nations of the world.

Mr. CRERAR: As I have told my hon. friend, the matter is constantly under consideration.

Item agreed to.

Soldier settlement of Canada—

336. Administration of soldier settlement and British family settlement, $542,930.

Mr. FAIR: I believe it is less than twenty-five years since the conclusion of the last war. We have already fought almost four years in this war. From present indications great war No. 1 was only a patch on the one we are now fighting. While we have been trying to rectify things throughout the world, I feel we have failed to improve the conditions of some of the victims, if I may so describe them, of the first great war. I refer to the soldier settlers.

I am sorry we have not been given an opportunity earlier in the session to discuss this matter. Again this year we are following the procedure adopted last year, namely, that of crowding estimates to the value of millions of dollars into the dying hours of the session. I should like to read an address delivered by Sir Robert Borden to the Canadian expeditionary force in 1917, and having done so, I shall inquire whether Canada has fulfilled the promises therein set out, the promises by the then Prime Minister to the men who fought the war of 1914-18. He said:

> You are men actually facing the enemy day and night. You are suffering greatly from fatigue, over-strain, and lack of rest. The marvel of it is that men could undergo such a strain without breaking; but you have never yet broken, and history will appreciate that in days to come.
> You men are about to enter one of the most serious engagements that ever faced the Canadian corps. I cannot, at this moment, give any information as to where this attack will be staged, whether it be successful or not, it is to be borne in mind that it will not be an easy success. . . . We feel confident that you will succeed where others failed; for you have never yet failed in anything you have set your hand to, as a Canadian corps.
> You can go into this action feeling assured of this, and as the head of the government, I give you this assurance; that you need have no fear that the government and the country will fail to show just appreciation of your service to the country and empire in what you are about to do and what you have already done.
> The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of the people at home, and it will always be our endeavour to so guide the attitude of public opinion, that the country will support the government to prove to the returned man its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire; and that no man, whether he goes back or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken with the men who won and the men who died.

Mr. CRERAR: I take it my hon. friend desires to make a somewhat extended speech. In that event I would ask that the item stand so that we may proceed with the Department of Public Works. I understand that the minister of that department has an engagement which he must keep.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

256. Departmental administration, $194,780.

Mr. REID: I do not know whether the matter I have in mind comes under this item; but, if not, I hope the minister will see that my remarks are called to the attention of the appropriate minister. In these days of common-sense dress, especially during the summer time, I do not think our protective staff and others in the building should have to dress as they do during the warm weather. The heavy clothing they must wear is not only uncomfortable but, to my mind, it is not healthy. I believe something has been promised by way of relief for the protective staff, but something should also be done for the elevator operators.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): The protective staff comes under the jurisdiction of the Speaker, and I shall be glad to inform him of what the hon. member for New Westminster has said. We are considering making a change in the uniforms worn by the elevator operators in the building.

Mr. HANSELL: Last year on the orders of the day I asked the Minister of Public Works if anything was contemplated in the way of flood control works on the Highwood river which passes through the town of High River, some distance south of Calgary. At that time we were in what is lightly known as the flood season. Snow collects to great depths in the foothills and in the Rocky mountains throughout the southern part of Alberta, and at certain seasons of the year, especially when the warm rains come, the water rushes down the streams and rivers at such a terrific rate that very often towns are in serious danger of being flooded out. That is exactly what happened on that occasion.

Some debris and stones and wood had gathered in the bed of the river sufficiently to change the channel of the river, resulting in the town of High River being under water. Damage to the extent of many thousands of dollars was done. These floods are of such a nature that this town is not only in danger of suffering great property damage, but they come with such suddenness that there is also a danger of loss of life. Since that time this community has had to face a further danger. Flood conditions were not so bad this year because some little work had been done, and perhaps the rains came at different times or were not so severe and the ice jams were not as great. The attention of the department was drawn to this matter and I asked the department to place an appropriation in the estimates this year to cover this work.

When I got the estimates this year I found appropriations of millions of dollars but nothing for this work. I have interviewed the minister and the town of High River has sent representatives to Ottawa to interview the government. I should like to give credit to the Hon. Senator Riley for what he has done to urge the government to make an appropriation for this particular work. I scan through the estimates and I find the following appropriations for the different provinces:

Nova Scotia	$450,900
Prince Edward Island	45,000
New Brunswick	80,000
Quebec	387,500
Ontario	151,000
Manitoba	20,000
Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories	10,000
British Columbia and Yukon	345,300

Nearly $13,000,000 are being appropriated for public works, but not one penny is being provided for this work in the town of High River. I have never asked this department or the government for very much. I will tell the minister now that when I do ask for anything it will be because what I am asking for is positively and absolutely necessary. I happen to represent a constituency in which there is very little need of federal appropriation, except for wheat acreage reduction bonus or something of that kind. I have very little need to ask the government for appropriations for public works. I do not have any federal government institutions in my constituency except two small customs offices and the regular post offices. Therefore I do not think I am asking too much when I come to the department and state the case of this community which is in grave danger of suffering considerable property damage, if not of being swept out of existence. I do not think I am asking very much when I come to the department for just a few thousand dollars to do this work that must be done on the Highwood river for the prevention of floods.

I hold in my hand an aerial photograph taken by the Royal Canadian Air Force official photographer as his plane flew over the site. I pass this photograph over to the minister so that he may see for himself what the town looks like. The photograph shows only part of the town, but if the minister will look at it very carefully, he will notice under one of the bridges a rushing torrent, with the water mounting almost up to the floor of the bridge. The bridges are still in, despite the fact that the river has overflowed its banks. He will notice, too, that part of the railroad is completely under water, that the highway is completely under water, and that the streets are completely under water. I am sure he could not tell me where the banks of the river are, because it looks as though there were half a dozen rivers in there, but actually there is only one river, the whole town being under water.

There are one or two important features connected with this flood. It is through this town that the main trunk highway leads from the United States north to the Alaska highway. The one hard-surfaced paved highway that links the United States with the Alaska highway to the north runs through this very town of High River, which, as this picture shows, is completely under water.

Another important consideration that I would bring to the minister's attention is that there is a Royal Canadian Air Force training school adjacent to this community. It is not shown in the picture; it is about a mile to the left hand side of the picture. I do not know what the contour of the land is at the air school, but I have been told that the school is in danger at the high-water season.

I know the argument may be: This is not altogether our responsibility; the provincial authorities have some responsibility in the matter. I am not going to deny that, but what I do say is that at a time when floods are so serious it is no use and there is no time to wrangle over responsibility. One thing I am certain of is that this government cannot escape responsibility for floods wherever they may occur in Canada, because floods mean danger to the life of the citizens of Canada.

The provincial government of Alberta have done considerable work this year on this project. I was going to quote from the High River Times a resolution which the town of High River sent on to the provincial government of Alberta commending them for the work they had done, but evidently I did not bring it down with me. The town council of High River passed a resolution and forwarded it to the provincial government commending them for what they had done this year on the project. But this government has done nothing. I understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were willing to make some donation to this work, realizing that their line was in some danger on account of these flood conditions. If a private concern such as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is willing to contribute; if the engineering staff of the department of public works of the Alberta government is at the disposal of the town of High River, and if the town of High River is itself willing to contribute its share to this project, I think it is not too much for me to ask the federal government to bear some share of the financial burden of this work.

We are calling upon our people to do a good deal of sacrificing in these days, and I am wondering now if this government is willing to show the people of this district that it is willing to sacrifice on their behalf. Surely this government cannot escape some responsibility in the matter. As I say, we ask the people to sacrifice, and they do. This community has done its share of sacrificing and of making donations to cause after cause, and in taking its share of victory bonds. I do not want to be too harsh, but I wish to read a clipping from the High River Times of April 1, 1943, written at a time when the town was in danger from flood this spring. I do not want the minister to consider this article too hot. I want him to recognize as I read it that at the time it was written the people of that community were in danger of losing life and property. The article reads:

> Since the outbreak of war this town and district have supported every appeal the federal government has issued. Approximately $600,000 have gone from here for victory bonds.

I pause for a moment to say that was the figure after the third victory loan campaign and it has been very considerably increased by the contributions to the fourth victory loan. I continue the quotation:

> Every other form of financial appeal has been similarly supported. This is a relatively prosperous settlement and the federal government receives substantial contribution from our citizens by way of income tax and an infinity of other taxes.
> The town and district have sent out hundreds of the best young people to the call of the armed services. Now, in the time of community need Ottawa refuses every appeal to preserve what has been built up.
> Yet the consequences of delayed action are likely to be infinitely more costly. If the river is permitted to fulfil its present threats, High River citizens will be in no position to buy victory bonds nor pay income tax nor respond to any requests and demands of the federal government. In fact there may easily be the problem of reestablishment of flood victims, a relief problem far transcending the $25,000 which is asked. In addition both governments may face losses in the whole area of the Little Bow in public roads, bridges, homes, farm lands and so on.

At that particular season, namely the spring season, people in the town of High River and district are really facing reality when the ice jam takes place in the river, and it can easily take place when rains begin to come on the mountains and there is still ice in the river. Flood conditions can be extremely serious. The rush of water is bad. It breaks down dams; it uproots trees, and life is in danger. If any lives were lost in a flood, the government would immediately demand some sort of an inquiry. An inquiry would be made, decisions reached, and apologies made. But apologies would then be too late. If something is not done conditions may be serious in the future. I must be fair and say to the minister that the Alberta government has done considerable work this year, and we trust that the danger of serious damage by reason of flood may have passed by reason of such work, but still more is necessary. I will not delay the committee farther, but I ask the minister to give me and the committee and the people of that community an answer to the effect that his department will consider placing in next year's estimates, in plenty of time, an item of twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars for this work. I know what happens with these estimates. I know that a department likes to place a number of items there; that they go before the treasury board and that the board take out their blue pencils and mark out this and mark out that and mark out something else. I do not know who the members of the treasury board will be next year, whether there will be any change, but I urge the minister to include this item in next year's estimates and impress upon the board with all the determination, persuasiveness and enthusiasm of which he is capable, that the item for this particular purpose shall be left in. Can I get an assurance from the minister that some consideration will be given along this line?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I would be the last man to blame the hon. member for Macleod for explaining the flood situation at High River. If the same condition existed in my riding, probably I would make the same speech as he has just made. I really sympathize with these people, and I have received representations on their behalf from the hon. member and the senator of that district. I am glad that we agree that these damages do not fall under the responsibility of the federal government. We have no jurisdiction over mountain streams or floods. I was most sympathetic when the hon. member spoke to me about this, but I could not find any way to have an estimate placed in the present vote.

Mr. KUHL: The government controls all the money.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Were this department to provide estimates in respect of all damages caused by floods we would have to meet a considerable number of requests. I might point out that in the last two or three weeks there was a flood in the province of Quebec which caused damages amounting to over a million dollars.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, might I interrupt? I am not asking the minister to reimburse the citizens of High River for damage done; I am asking for an appropriation to carry on the work of directing the channel of the river so that floods will not occur again. I believe that, if the minister does not quite understand the situation, his deputies and engineers are well acquainted with the facts. I repeat that the citizens of High River do not ask for any compensation from the department because their homes were damaged, the cellars flooded, the mains broken up; they are asking only for an appropriation for work to be done in the river so that the channel will be safeguarded.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Were I to try to comply with the request, I would have to comply with requests made from other parts of the country where they have floods. My engineers, who understand the situation, inform me that we have absolutely no jurisdiction.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this a navigable river?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No; it is a mountain stream.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a creek.

Mr. HANSELL: It is no creek.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Although I am most sympathetic, I could not commit the department or the government to promising that we shall have an estimate next year for this purpose. I believe certain grants have been made for protection works along rivers; but since the beginning of the war it has been the policy of the government, and it has been demanded by all opposition parties, that civil estimates should be reduced as much as possible. This year there is a decrease of $405,000. I do not feel at liberty to start increasing at this time our civil estimates. It would be absolutely contrary to the policy of the government, and I do not believe I would receive the support of the opposition were we to come in with large estimates for other things at the present time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that a factor which is usually taken into consideration?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That is what I am trying to take into consideration in preparing my own estimates. Perhaps I am wrong. I would rather vote large sums of money to all constituencies, were I at liberty to do so, but I do not think I would receive the support or approval of the house if I tried to change the policy at the present time.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not particularly want to pursue the discussion, except to say that it is very easy for the minister to remark, "That is not my responsibility; we have no jurisdiction over mountain streams." I do not think this could be called a mountain stream. It is a river. I know it is near the foothills. Not only that, it seems to me it is a very easy thing for a minister to assert that it is not his responsibility or that of his government, but that some other government is responsible. The fact of the matter is that, if life is in danger, it is just as much the responsibility of this government as of any other.

Let me go one step farther in that respect. The minister says that since the war began they have to reduce their estimates. That is all right for a tale. It is a sort of fairy tale. Of course we would like to reduce all our expenditures, but where expenditures are necessary they are necessary; that is all there is to it, and this is a paltry amount. It would sound like a lot to the man who is playing a violin with a little tin can attached to the end of it for people to drop pennies in, but $20,000 is a little tiny speck of a drop in the great ocean of expenditures which we in this country are making in these days. The argument about cutting down estimates does not hold water when something is absolutely necessary. I have only asked the minister to reconsider this matter. I am not asking him to put it in these estimates, because I know that will not happen, but I do ask him to reconsider it for next year's estimates, those of 1944.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch—British Columbia—
266. Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $55,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are there any capital expenditures on public buildings?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No. We are spending money only for maintenance, repairs, alterations and salaries.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch—Generally—
269. Experimental farms and science laboratories—replacements, repairs and improvements to buildings, $80,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: What does the item mean by "replacements"? Are any new structures covered by the item?

[Mr. A. Fournier.]

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): There are no buildings to be erected, unless they are in such a condition that we have to replace them. There are some buildings that no longer fill the needs. This is to provide for replacements, repairs, improvements to buildings on various experimental farms, and science laboratories throughout the dominion.

Mr. GRAYDON: There are no new buildings?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch—
270. Flags for dominion buildings, $8,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this for flagpoles as well?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No; just the flags.

Mr. GRAYDON: There was an interesting item in one of the other estimates that dealt with flagpoles, and I hope it is not being duplicated in this department, which the minister says is so economical.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch—
272. Veterans' hospitals—Repairs, improvements and alterations, $60,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is any of this for Christie Street hospital?

Mr. ROWE: A replacement there would be in order.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): There is an amount of $8,500.

Mr. GRAYDON: For Christie Street?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Chief engineer's branch—
Maintenance and operation of graving docks, locks and dams, etc.—
285. Snagboats, $49,745.

Mr. MacNICOL: When this item was up last year I asked the then Minister of Public Works what effort was being made to have the snags taken out of the Athabaska river between Waterways and Chippewyan. That river had many snags in it, roots and butts of trees lying in the water, which caused a great deal of damage to the boats going down it; frequently the bottoms of either the barges or the towboats were damaged. Has the department any appliance on the Athabaska river for removing these snags?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We had the engineers of the department investigate the complaint in regard to snags on the Athabaska river, and after we received their report we had some dreding done which helped to relieve the situation. We have no snagboat on the Athabaska river; the only two snagboats we have are on the Fraser and Skeena rivers in British Columbia. We have received no complaints lately about snags, though we communicated with the different companies operating on the Athabaska river. If the situation warrants any action, I am sure the department will do its utmost to remedy any difficulties.

Mr. MacNICOL: If there is not a vote for removing the snags from the Athabaska river then the department should have one.

Item agreed to.

Chief engineer's branch—
290. Generally, $20,975.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are there any specially large items under this vote, described as "generally"?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The largest amount would be for the Portage du Fort bridge, an interprovincial bridge between Quebec and Ontario, amounting to $3,500, and an amount of $7,000 for the Perley bridge at Hawkesbury. Those are the two largest.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why does the minister build his items in this fashion? I notice that he has an item of only $3,050 for bridges and approaches in Ottawa, but under this general item he has these two larger expenditures. In order that the committee shall be fully informed of the details I do not think the minister should follow a system which, in fact, is not really a system at all.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is a system which existed long before I came to the department.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is scarcely a real answer.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It could not be excused, of course, if it is not a correct practice. The officials have not changed their minds up to now. However, I can give greater detail with respect to this vote.

Mr. GRAYDON: The point which concerns me is that in this general vote there are amounts larger than the amount voted for Ottawa bridges and approaches.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I see an item here amounting to $150 for the Calumet bridge, and—

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has missed my point entirely. I am not desirous of having these small amounts placed on record, but I am desirous of having amounts specified when they are greater than the amounts contained in detailed items. I cannot quite see why the committee is not entitled to have these larger amounts in detail, rather than in bulk form.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Perhaps the leader of the opposition is right in what he says, but there are only two items larger than the item for Ottawa, and they are the ones I have mentioned.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no complaint so far as the smaller items are concerned; in fact I think it is quite proper that they be submitted in bulk; but I still fail to see the wisdom of detailing the item for Ottawa, and then placing these larger items in a bulk vote. I raise this point as a caution to the minister that when he brings his estimates down again—if he has that opportunity—he ought to see that the procedure I have suggested is adopted.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I shall call it to the attention of my officials.

Item agreed to.

Ontario—

295. Port Maitland—dredging—(revote, $12,800), $21,100.

Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $130,000.

Mr. SENN: I notice in this item an amount for dredging at Port Maitland, part of which is a revote. Is this work completed? The summer is fairly well advanced, and I know a dredge was there waiting to do the work. I ask this question because a large amount of material is being removed from the bed of the river, and along the harbour there is a breakwater behind which there is a certain amount of filling to be done. I took this matter up last fall with the department, but owing to the fact that the dredge was not properly constructed to force the dirt over the retaining wall I was told the work could not be done. Has any further consideration been given to the matter?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am informed that the contract will be completed in about a month's time, and this amount is for the completion.

Mr. SENN: I understand that. I think there is enough material removed from the bed of the river to fill it in. At present it is being thrown into the lake. It is essential that this work should be done, namely, that of filling in behind the retaining wall, because there is nothing behind that wall to hold it. It is just standing under its own strength. On the other hand, if it had dirt behind it to keep it from any possible buckling in, it would be much better. I was told at the time that owing to the construction of the dredge which, I believe, opened at the bottom and let the material drop into the lake, it was not possible to do the work. The board of trade and chamber of commerce of the village of Dunnville have been anxious to have this matter looked into.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am informed that we are saving enough filling to make the backfill behind the retaining wall. That will be done.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph branch—

300. Telephone service at Ottawa, $100,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a very large increase in telephone service in Ottawa, largely owing, of course, to war-time conditions. I fancy the increase in the number of lines and the service in governmental departments has increased many times over and above the normal peace-time service. Has the government made any agreement with the telephone company for any special rates, in view of the large number of services installed?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This amount is to pay the cost of the telephone services maintained in the government departments in Ottawa, but it does not cover telephones in the war departments.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the government get a special rate in view of the large amount of service they take?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We have a special rate which is much lower than the ordinary business or residential rate. The residential rate is $3.37 a month; private branch exchange, $3.97; office, $4.84. In September, 1939, we had 1,900 telephones in Ottawa; to-day we have 8,000. Three-quarters of these telephones are used by departments primarily engaged in military matters. Then it has been necessary to make thousands of transfers of telephones within the same buildings and also to new buildings where departments have been assigned space. Under the war appropriation we had an item of $300,000 for telephones. This vote takes care of 2,060 peace-time telephones, whereas the $300,000 vote takes care of the remainder.

Mr. SENN: When I first came to Ottawa the telephones in the members' offices were kept connected during the recess. It is of great convenience when a member comes to Ottawa during the summer months to be able to go to his office and make any appointments he may want to make with departmental officials. But to-day our telephones are cut off and we cannot get our work done as expeditiously. It should not cost very much to leave these telephones connected for the remainder of the year.

Mr. McCANN: The matter which the hon. member for Haldimand referred to is the very matter I wished to speak to myself. Telephone service apparently comes under the Department of Public Works. As the hon. member has said, we are here for approximately six months in the year and those members who are close to Ottawa and have to make visits here during the recess would find it convenient if their telephones were still connected. I suggest to the minister that the matter of telephone service in the House of Commons should be in the hands of the Speaker or the Clerk of the House. I think either one of these gentlemen would exercise reasonable care and good judgment as to what telephones should be left connected.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I join with the two hon. members who have spoken. It has proved most inconvenient for many members when they come to Ottawa during the recess to find their telephones not connected. Does this vote cover the ordinary service charges, or does it cover long distance calls as well?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This is for service only.

In connection with the other matter, if an hon. member expects to spend any time in Ottawa during the recess, all he needs to do is to apply to the Clerk of the House in order to have his telephone connected. In years gone by we spent as much as three or four thousand dollars a year in order to keep the telephones connected in all the rooms.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a feeling abroad that a lot of reckless long-distance telephoning is done by government departments, and I suggest that the minister check in his own department. However, I do not suggest that his department is the subject of this complaint. It is an easy thing to form the habit of calling long distance if the government is paying the bill. The long-distance telephone should not be used with reckless abandon in order to make calls from one end of the country to the other, perhaps not always on government business, although I make no such charge.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Long-distance calls are paid for by each department and we have no control over calls other than those made by our own department. The Department of Public Works is carrying on works and repairs from Halifax to Vancouver and, when emergencies arise, the long-distance telephone is probably used. I do not know that there is any extravagance in this connection.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would it be possible for a person in the minister's department to make a personal long-distance call?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): A list of calls is made up every month and I believe the object of each call must be stated.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch—
Construction, repairs and improvements—public buildings—
Nova Scotia—
502. Shelburne—Public building additions, $7,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister what this public building is used for and why the addition is being made?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This amount is required to provide for the construction of a one-storey brick addition thirty feet long by eighteen feet wide at the rear of the building for the purpose of providing increased accommodation for the Post Office Department.

Mr. GILLIS: Last session I inquired of the minister and the Postmaster General whether it would be possible to get an amount in the estimates to provide a suitable post office building in a town of 12,000 to 13,000 people in my constituency in place of the ramshackle building that is now being used for a post office at Dominion, Nova Scotia. It is a disgrace to the name of post office. The minister stated at the time that it was not the policy, for the duration of the war at least, to do any new construction or make repairs that would involve considerable expenditure. In view of this vote I wish to ask the minister if the departments have changed their policy. If so, does it leave the door open for the redress of the grievance I raised last session in connection with the disgraceful conditions at the post office building in the town of Dominion, Nova Scotia.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is the policy of the department not to build new post offices during the war. We never spend money for post offices without a request from the Post Office Department. They needed additional space in Shelburne, and I have here a letter which formed the basis of our decision. The chief superintendent of the post office service made this recommendation:

> The postmaster at the Shelburne post office finds it increasingly difficult to maintain an efficient and satisfactory service. This is due to the ever-increasing volume of postal business undertaken at this point and the limited working space which the postmaster has at his disposal.
> One of the chief reasons for the increase in the volume of business is due to the strength of army formations stationed at this centre and, in view of the presence of these military units, it is very essential that the efficientcy of the postal service be maintained.
> Last year the Department of National Revenue was good enough to loan to this department a room formerly used by them as an examining warehouse. Recently, however, they were obliged to ask for the return of this room in view of increased customs activities at this point.
> Taking all these factors into consideration it is apparent that there is no alternative but to request the erection of an addition to this building and in this connection I beg to attach a sketch showing the proposed addition.
> As the necessity for this additional space is in a great measure due to the presence of military units, it is felt that the cost of the work of the addition could properly be charged to war appropriation.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not quarrelling with this vote at all. I approve it, but I am trying to point out exactly the same conditions obtain in the post office at Dominion. There is a lack of space, and inefficient service on account of that lack of space, in the building called the post office, a building that is a disgrace to the postal service. I dropped the matter last session after the minister had assured me that it was not the intention of the department for the duration of the war to make any expenditures in that direction. This vote is a departure from that policy, and I am inquiring if the road is now open to having repairs made at other places where they are badly needed, or else does the change of policy apply only to certain parts of the country?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We never make alterations of this kind unless the Post Office Department recommends them and they are helpful to the war effort. I do not know the details of the case my hon. friend has put forward. It has not come to my knowledge.

Mr. GILLIS: It has come to the department's knowledge forcibly on more than one occasion, but not while the minister has held that porfolio.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I shall look into the matter to see if something should be done, but I can give no assurance to the hon. member without having all the facts before me.

Item agreed to.

Chief engineer's branch—
Dredging—Nova Scotia—
507. Canso—To purchase and repair wharf, $26,000.

Mr. GILLIS: I understand that some investigation has been carried on by the engineering branch of the Department of Public Works into the possibilities of building a causeway across the strait of Canso. Is anything being done in that direction? If there is such a possibility, expenditure on wharves might be unnecessary, because a causeway across the strait of Canso would alter the whole present set-up and much of it would be eliminated. Is it the intention of the department to go ahead with the causeway in the near future? Is the matter being seriously considered?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This item is for the purchase of the Whitman wharf at the price of $12,000 and general repairs at the cost of $13,350. This is not a ferry wharf; it is a wharf that belonged to Whitman and Sons. My information is that the Whitman wharf, which serves as the only public wharf at this place to handle freight and passengers, is rapidly becoming unsafe for traffic, and it is claimed that unless repairs are made shortly they will be without docking facilities at Canso. A. N. Whitman and Sons are now unable to maintain their wharf to the standard required for public service. This wharf is a port of call for the steamer plying between Halifax and Guysboro as well as many small coastal steamers carrying passengers and freight. A steamer maintaining a car ferry service between Canso and Arichat has its mainland terminus at this wharf, and the operation of this ferry provides a saving of about sixty miles for cars going to Sydney via the eastern shore of Nova Scotia. Value of freight passing over the Whitman wharf in 1938 was $250,000, and number of passengers, 1,100.

509. Grand river—Final agreed contribution to improvements; the Grand river conservation commission to discharge the crown from all claims whatsoever connected therewith and to undertake to pay to the dominion government, upon receipt thereof, 37½ per cent of net proceeds of any sale of lands and buildings, of any refund of moneys from the Canadian Pacific Railway and of any moneys realized from capital investments, $59,325.45.

Mr. MacNICOL: This amount refers to the cost of the building of the Shand dam, does it not?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Right.

Mr. MacNICOL: Three or four miles north of Fergus. How much has the government contributed as its share of the cost of the Shand dam?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Is the query concerning the amount paid by the government toward this project?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is $769,318.68, or up till March 31, 1941, the figure was $709,993. This is the final payment.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the total amount the government has already paid out?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is $709,993.23. This amount of $59,325.45 is the final payment on the agreement.

Mr. MacNICOL: This afternoon the hon. member for Macleod made some reference to flood-proofing the High river in Alberta. The Department of Public Works will now have, in the flood-proofing of the Grand river, an example of the benefits of flood-proofing rivers. There would have been a large flood this year on the Grand river but for the Shand dam.

Mr. SENN: Unfortunately there was.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Shand dam prevented this spring a flood in the Grand valley which, the press of the valley stated, would have cost a very large sum of money. So that the money expended on this operation, which completes the government part of the Shand dam, is money well spent. The Ontario government have put up just as much. They were to pay 37½ per cent too. The municipalities of Brantford, Galt and the rest went together to pay the remainder. In my opinion the government should compile a circular pertaining to the construction of the Shand dam, its cost, use and benefits, and send it to municipalities which suffer through the overflowing and flooding of other rivers, in the hope that, as an after-the-war work, they, too, may set up an authority much as the Grand river people have done to save themselves great losses. I heard the minister say this afternoon that the overflowing of some river in his province this spring set the community back about a million dollars. A million dollars would go a long way toward flood-proofing any ordinary river.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister give the total cost of the Shand dam? While I am on my feet I may say that the Grand river is naturally flooding worse from year to year as the forest is disappearing; the snows disappear more quickly and the water runs out faster. I am not positive yet that the Shand dam is going to do all that the hon. member for Davenport claims for it. The flood was fairly serious this year. The dam has been completed for only a year or two, and as the hon. member suggested, it will, I believe, be a good thing if the government keep very close tab on what happens in that locality. The Grand river watershed is one of the most fertile places in Ontario. Will the minister state what is the total cost and what the receipts are to be from the Canadian Pacific Railway and other sources?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The cost of the scheme was estimated at $2,000,000, but the real cost is $2,051,516.49. Of that amount 37½ per cent was paid by the Ontario government, or $715,000; 37½ per cent by the dominion government, or the same amount, and 25 per cent by the municipalities, or $500,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: The dam apparently cost $2,000,000, including easements.

509. Port Maitland—Repairs to west pier, $55,000.

Mr. SENN: I would remind the minister that this work is very necessary. The east pier is in equally bad shape.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This amount is to be expended as a result of the winter survey which was made there. We have a vote in the ordinary estimates, and this supplementary is to complete the work.

Item agreed to.

General—
512. War risk insurance—subject to allocation by the treasury board, $270,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Could we have some light on this item? My understanding of war risk insurance was that it was insurance the government was providing which private companies could not provide because they could not assume the risk. I should like to know what the amounts are comprising this $270,000, how they are placed and where, and any other information the minister has on the subject.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The $270,000 is to provide for payment of war risk insurance on properties under the jurisdiction of the department. These properties are valued at approximately $199,067,189 and are insurable for ninety per cent of the valuation, or $179,160,470. The premium is fifteen cents per $100, making a total of $268,740, or, in round figures, $270,000. The valuations are:

Harbour and river works.....	$83,413,834
Public buildings outside Ottawa...	61,184,048
Public buildings at Ottawa.....	47,559,409
Expropriated properties, Ottawa...	731,108
Furniture in rented quarters, Ottawa	1,211,103
Furniture in rented quarters outside Ottawa	2,362,927
Government telegraph branch property	104,760
National Art gallery, works of art..	1,650,000
Canadian War memorial collection..	850,000

The issuance of this insurance was authorized by the War Risk Insurance Act, 1942, and by order in council P.C. 2/8917 of September 30, 1942.

Mr. MacINNIS: If there is a loss under the war risk insurance, who pays that loss to the government?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I will admit I am not conversant with the act. The Minister of Finance put the bill through the house and, when his estimates are up, I have no doubt he will give the information.

Mr. MacINNIS: But this is an item in the minister's estimates and I think he ought to have information on any item of his. It seems strange that the government should insure buildings and pay the insurance itself if there is a loss. Does the government carry ordinary insurance on its buildings?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No.

Mr. MacINNIS: To whom is this $270,000 paid?

[Mr. A Fournier.]

Mr. CRERAR: It comes back to the government. If the government puts insurance on one of its buildings and the building is destroyed, the government is the beneficiary.

Mr. MacINNIS: But how can the government be the beneficiary when it must pay the loss incurred? If the government pays the insurance to itself, where does the benefit come in? I admit I may be dense about this, but I do not think I am the only one, judging from the information I have received.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I will call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the questions asked by the hon. member. I admit I have not made a study of the subject. I know an order in council was passed in 1942 and we are committed to the amount. I would not even say that it is a matter of bookkeeping, because I do not know. I would rather have the Minister of Finance give the explanation.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is a strange situation. Here we have an item of $270,000, and not a minister can tell us why it is there or how it is to be explained.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend should recall that war risk insurance covers not only public buildings, for which this premium provides, but a vast number of private buildings.

Mr. GRAYDON: What does the minister mean by private buildings?

Mr. MacINNIS: Whose private buildings?

Mr. CRERAR: Factories and warehouses in a city like Halifax, and private structures as against publicly-owned buildings. The premiums on all these properties are paid into a fund under the act, and what happens is this. If a government property is destroyed, the government collects the amount from the fund, and in that event the private owners who had taken out war risk insurance under the act would be paying a part of the loss in the premiums they paid.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the minister telling the committee that the government is putting war risk insurance on private property in Halifax?

Mr. CRERAR: No. The private owners pay it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then, if the private owners pay, how is there an item in these estimates for it?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): War risk insurance applies to nearly all private property in the country and the private owners pay premiums into the fund. The government also pays its premiums into the fund. If any damage occurs to a private property, the owners are paid compensation out of the fund, and if we suffer damages in our properties we receive from the common fund the amount of the damages incurred. That is the explanation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This is the government premium for war risk insurance on government buildings?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is more than that.

513. Toronto postal station "A"—Improvements (revote)—further amount required, $9,000.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say a few words on this item. My colleague here has been complaining that I have not said a word all day. I want to point out to the minister the deplorable conditions at the terminal "A" Toronto post office. We have no post office there except a part of the union station, which was to be only temporary, although the receipts are $9,000,000 a year. This policy of continually patching up the terminal "A" postal station is intolerable. The business men are complaining that they cannot get adequate service. The government erected a large post office building on the west side of Bay street and when the war started, they gave it to the ordnance corps. The ordnance corps should move out of this new postal unit, because the city gave the whole of the exhibition grounds to the army, and there are huts also of the Royal Canadian Air Force along the waterfront.

The time has come to stop this patching up in connection with the post office. The post office in Toronto is a public utility and modern conditions should prevail there. Does the government think the Bell Telephone or a gas company or the hydro could do business in a building such as terminal "A"? People cannot get the service to which they are entitled. There is a large volume of business carried on by the post office, and the platform and trucks are laden with postal matters, first-class, second-class and third-class mail. They simply need this new postal building. From the point of view of labour also, especially at Christmas time, the present state of affairs is intolerable. The last time his estimates were up the Postmaster General promised that the army would move out, but they have not done so. Let the army move to the exhibition grounds. The post office cannot do business as it should and the result is that mail is delayed. It is a situation that can no longer be tolerated and I urge the minister to do something about it. Here we have $9,000 for temporary repairs or something of that sort, and in the main estimates $20,000, and last year, $72,000 for repairs to terminal "A." That sort of patching up cannot go on any longer. I ask the Minister of Public Works what he is going to do about the matter. Has he ever visited this property, to see the conditions that exist? Has he ever seen the conditions under which the mail is received and distributed in Toronto, as a result of which the people in the residential districts get only one delivery a day, while the business men down town are also all complaining? The staff and men are splendid. If you mail a letter in Ottawa on Thursday you will be lucky if it is delivered in Toronto on Monday.

The minister was able to construct two wharves at Burlington and another at Oakville, which are not used much except by a few yachts at the latter place, and surely, instead of this patchwork scheme, he could give the citizens of Toronto, who contribute over $9,000,000 in revenue, a little better postal building for service. There should be an order issued to the army to get out of this building, which is in the area of the harbour improvements. The time has come when they should move out. I pass there often and see a great many wagons and trucks going into that ordnance building, while the mail is all out on the platform at the depot. I ask the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General to look into the situation and have the army move out immediately, because the postal authorities, who render fine service, cannot handle the business properly in the fall of the year.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This is a rare occasion, in that the Postmaster General and the hon. member for Broadview agree. I have received representations from the Postmaster General asking that the ordnance branch of the defence department clear out of the Toronto terminal and that the postal authorities be installed there, so that we are advising national defence to erect another building or follow the suggestions made by the hon. member, and vacate the premises. We hope that in the near future the post office will occupy the whole of the building.

Mr. CHURCH: The minister is a lawyer, and there should be an engineer at the head of the public works department. Eaton's or Simpson's would not tolerate that sort of thing. The minister has never visited the property, to see the conditions that exist. I do not believe any lawyer should ever be Minister of Public Works. Eaton's would not have a lawyer in charge of their construction work. A lawyer has to do with legal business, not with public works, and after all this a public utility and service should be the key. The conditions I have seen there at Christmas time are disgraceful, with eight or ten thousand employees handling mail. I ask the two ministers to try to clean up the situation before the fall.

515. To provide for claims and other expenses in connection with unemployment relief projects, $45,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that these must be overdue accounts from some previous period, because I cannot quite conceive that in 1943 we would want to appropriate any money for unemployment relief projects.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Donnelly): Shall the item carry?

Mr. GRAYDON: No, Mr. Chairman. I am going to suggest that in spite of your desire for speed, at least the minister be given an opportunity to reply to my question.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): This is a carry-over. We had some dispute over the claims of two companies in Quebec who had the contract for the construction of the section of the Quebec intercepting sewer undertaken in 1939 as an unemployment relief project and completed in November, 1942. In full and final settlement the contractor Marcotte is to receive $32,098.25, and the contractor Auclair is to receive $12,901.72. When it came to settling the balances there was some difficulty. Now our engineers and their engineers have made a valuation and these are the amounts we believe should be paid.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is no such project going on at the moment?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No; it is complete.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

87. Departmental administration, $162,853.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to say a word in regard to the request made by the hon. member for North Battleford that the minister take notice of the publication in the Toronto Evening Telegram of an article by Max Eastman, which had been published previously in the Reader's Digest, and her suggestion that action be taken under the defence of Canada regulations. I am at a loss to understand how a request of this kind could be made logically by one who has been demanding in this house from time to time freedom of speech and freedom of the press. I just wish to say that there is no newspaper more loyal to the institutions of this country and to Canada as a whole than is the Evening Telegram, and I hope the minister will disregard the request of the hon. member for North Battleford.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I can only say that this article has been referred to the law officers of the department, whose experience in these matters has been long and varied. As yet I have not received any report from them. I am sure they will take note of the hon. member's testimonial to the loyalty of the Evening Telegram.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope the minister is not taking too seriously any suggestion that the law officers of the crown are likely to find anything unpatriotic or disloyal in regard to the Telegram. I suggest that the minister should not have been too serious when he spoke of referring the matter to the law officers, having in mind the situation as he knows it to exist.

90. Expenses of litigated matters, $25,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of what does this item consist? Does it include matters taken to the privy council, and other matters in which the dominion is involved?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The expenses incurred in litigated matters are usually paid directly by the departments concerned, on taxation of the accounts by the officers of the Department of Justice. But there are some cases where no special department is interested in the litigation, and where the Department of Justice itself has to provide the costs incurred. Such, for instance, might be a reference to the supreme court on a question of general interest to the bench, and to the profession throughout Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am thinking particularly of the case which went to the supreme court by way of reference, in connection with the authority of the wartime prices and trade board to make certain administrative rulings.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In that case the accounts would be taxed in the Department of Justice, but would be paid directly by the department concerned. When it is something which concerns a special department of government, the law costs incurred are paid by that department, on accounts taxed by the Department of Justice.

91. Annual contribution to the Canadian law library, London, England, $500.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has this item been in the estimates for some time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It has been there for a few years, and covers books that their lordships and the lawyers attending before the privy council are apt to require in the course of dealing with Canadian cases. It was formerly under the supervision of Blake and Redden, who were solicitors in London. I do not know just what is being done since the outbreak of war in that connection. However, the item was not fully expended last year. There is no doubt that there will be plenty of occasion for supplementing the library at the disposal of their lordships and the lawyers attending, in connection with Canadian matters.

Exchequer Court of Canada—
93. Administration, $36,004.

Mr. GRAYDON: The question of judges' salaries is one which has been discussed before on many occasions, and I do not wish to labour it at this late date in the session. Is there still a provision whereby, upon a judge retiring from the bench, he is entitled after retirement to the regular allowances and salary he received while on the bench?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That provision exists now only with respect to county court judges. I believe it was in 1920 the act was amended as it applied to supreme court judges. No rights were taken from the judges then on the bench. That is to say, the new provision contained an arrangement whereby, when they retired, they could take either the pension to which they were entitled under the old law, or that to which they would be entitled under the new law. Under the old law there were certain conditions under which judges could retire with the full amount of salary to which they were entitled. Under the new law the maximum is sixty-six and two-thirds per cent. But there are some cases where a judge may still retire and get more than sixty-six and two-thirds per cent of his present salary, because he is entitled to the amount of his salary at the time the new act came into force. Not very long ago there was a chief justice in receipt of a salary of $10,000 who, upon retirement, was entitled to $8,000 instead of $6,666, because, when the new law came into force, his salary was $8,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Without attempting to resurrect an age-old controversy, if I may so describe it, as far as judges' salaries are concerned, I would say that particularly at this time I believe it is the duty of the opposition to raise this question, and to place it squarely before the government. My point is this. In view of the position taken by the Minister of Finance, one which has been taken almost irrevocably this session, and also having in mind the position taken by some provinces and not by others with respect to the payment of old age pensions in Canada, it does not seem either equitable or just to have a situation existing such as that described by the minister with respect to a few—and I have in mind old age pensions for judges, because they get them until they die—and at the same time find that the government still declines to call a conference and have some uniform increase of pension and lowering of age at which pensions can be paid to that deserving body of citizens, the old folks in Canada.

I desire to go no farther to-night in the matter, but I must point out to the minister that the contrast is brought clearly to one's mind when an estimate of this kind is before us. While this is not within the jurisdiction of the minister whose estimates are now before the committee, nevertheless, if parliament stands for one thing more than for another, it is for the hearing and remedying of grievances for the whole country. It seems to me that parliament is not justified in passing an item of this kind unless—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, now, all right; I know the minister is going to say that in so far as—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: But there is no vote here, no appropriation. Everything paid in respect of pensions is paid by virtue of statutes which came into force before this parliament was elected. There is no vote here for pensions to judges.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think that affects my argument, because judges' salaries are paid; and upon judges' salaries—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; there is no vote for judges' salaries.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the chairman this question? We have passed item after item on which we find the statutory mark.

Now, whether it may be by statute or by estimate, I am not prevented in this committee from discussing a matter so important, and which shows such a vivid contrast between one section of our country and another. If the minister or the government takes the position that I am not permitted to contrast a situation between one class of our people and another class, then I challenge the right of the government and the right of the committee to deny me this opportunity to speak.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well—

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has had his say, and he may have it again after I have finished. But I must point out that this is a matter which is considered very seriously by many people in Canada. There are many hon. members in the house who, if they would express themselves freely, would agree with me that this situation is not a comparable one. It is a contrast in the treatment of one class of citizens as opposed to the treatment of another class. If we expect a new order to come when this war is over, surely we must prepare for that new order. I do not think you can prepare for it unless grievances and differences such as this are pointed out from time to time. When I say that I do not cast any reflection upon the vote or upon the statutory provisions being made for these people, but I do say that if we are going to make provisions for one section and class of our citizens we have a perfect right to ask this parliament, and I think this parliament ought to be asked before it rises this session, to cure the difficulties and the grievances which the old people of Canada have with respect to old age pensions. I think this is a matter which must come before this committee eventually, and I bring it up now on account of the differentiation which seems to be existing here.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I was not attempting to prevent the leader of the opposition from making a speech; I simply wanted to point out that there is nothing for judges' pensions or for judges' salaries in the estimates in the Department of Justice. There is an item in the estimates of the Minister of Finance which deals with old age pensions and which will afford a full opportunity of discussing the matter. These are statutory items which are a charge on the consolidated revenue. They appear in the estimates for the information of hon. members. They are not required to be voted at any session, and they could not be taken from those to whom they are payable by statute without an amending statute.

Mr. GRAYDON: With great deference to the minister I submit that when a statutory item appears in the estimates and which is germane to the departmental work, we have a perfect right to relate our observations to it.

Mr. CHURCH: There used to be two judges in the exchequer court, and I was wondering if the work of this court has decreased on account of the war. Then there is the admiralty branch with divisions throughout the country. What number of cases has been tried as compared with before the war?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have not the statistics as to the cases, but I may say that expropriation cases have increased considerably in number since the beginning of the war on account of the acquisition of so much real property for war projects.

Item agreed to.

95. Payments of gratuities to the widows or to any dependent children, of judges who die while in office, $15,000.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to call the attention of the Attorney General of Canada to the fact that a bill has been brought before this house for the past three or four years having to do with the functions of the judges of this country. The judges of the supreme court and county court are under the jurisdiction of the attorney general and the Minister of Justice, jointly with the provinces. Part of the work is provincial, but the appointments are federal. We are voting $2,040,600 for judges' salaries, the particulars of which will be found on page 92 of the estimates. I repeat that there has been a bill brought before this house each session for the past five years to provide that judges shall not be allowed to leave their judicial duties in order to do outside executive work.

There has been a great increase in the number of commissions appointed, and high court judges, supreme court judges and county court judges in Ontario have been taken from their judicial duties during the terms of court. This has seriously interfered wtih the administration of justice. In connection with county court work in the county of York there used to be three judges, but now there are eight or nine. Some of these might be termed "blackout" judges. Some of these judges are doing rental work, while others are acting on various commissions. The result is that they have to go down to the county of Peel, or to the county of Dufferin, or down east to the county of Ontario and bring judges up to Toronto to do some of the work these other judges have been appointed to do.

I say the policy is all wrong. These judges should not leave the bench to act on commissions and usurp the powers and functions of parliament. These judges are asked to conduct royal commissions appointed under the federal inquiries act or under the provincial inquiries act. For many months a judge has been conducting an inquiry into a school in Toronto, and another judge has had to be brought in to do this work. Last session the minister said that during the recess he would give consideration to the matters set out in this private bill. In the trial division of the high court of Ontario they have twelve judges, and it is well known that some of them are not able to perform their duties. They are all good men; but that is not the point; the point is that when a judge is not available the cases must be put over.

I believe the number of cases in court have declined on account of the war. The minister, along with the attorneys general of the provinces, should lay down some conditions and terms to govern the conduct of the business of our courts. I realize that the administration is a provincial matter, but there should be some joint relations between the federal and provincial authorities along the lines I have stated. The leader of the opposition is a lawyer, and he can tell you how this seriously interferes with the administration of justice. Cases are put over from the assizes and many times the accused must be detained in custody.

Mr. GRAYDON: In the early stages of this session I asked for some information with respect to deferred or delayed or reserved judgments. I believe on that occasion the minister said that this was a matter which the provinces would normally handle rather than the Department of Justice. I would deal with this matter at much greater length were it not for the fact that the session is fast drawing to a close, but I wish to say that I regard some of the instances with respect to reserve judgments as nothing short of a national scandal. This is a situation which this government and the Department of Justice ought to take some powers to remedy. I do not know whether the provinces are operating in such a way as to be able to control the situation; but when a judge who is in normal health and who may not have a great deal of work to do leaves a litigant in an uncertain position for a year, if it went any longer than that it would be very difficult from the point of view of those who were suing and those who were being sued.

I have been making some inquiries. I do not wish to make charges against any specific judge; but there have been cases such as the hon. member for Trinity cited when this matter was under debate in the house before, where a judge had delayed judgment so long in a particular case that first of all the opposing counsel died before judgment was delivered; then the plaintiff passed away, then the defendant, and finally the judge died, the only one left in the case being the hon. member for Trinity who was acting as counsel for one side. Such cases are not frequent, I admit, throughout Canada, but there are just enough cases of prolonged reserved judgments to bring the judiciary in some parts of the country into disrepute. That is the reason for my rising.

A month or so ago a farmer came in to see me. He had heard that I had said something in the house about reserved judgments, and he asked me, "Would you think thirteen years was long enough for a judge to make up his mind and give a judgment? I had a case that was tried in 1930, and while it was not a very important case it was important to me, but a judgment has not yet been handed down." I did think that thirteen years was a long period for the normal working of a judge's mind, and I bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice to prevent a scandalous situation from arising. To be frank, I think there is no excuse for a judge who is attempting to carry out his duties faithfully in war time to reserve judgment for an extraordinary length of time. The legal profession has a duty with respect to that, but lawyers generally are so anxious to please the judges that they do not press them too much. I am not interested in pleasing any judges in Canada; I think it is our duty in parliament to mention this matter, and then I am going to leave it with the minister to consider during the recess whether some check-up can be made in cases where there are inequities and injustices to litigants as a result of long delayed reserved judgments. Some kind of penalty should be imposed on judges who are not doing their duty in this respect. I am not so sure but that one penalty that would bring a recalcitrant judge to time would be this, that if a certain length of time had passed without judgment being given, the case be reheard and the costs on both sides and the court costs be borne personally by the judge. Something must be done to penalize the judge who does not discharge his duties within a reasonable time. If a member of parliament leaves a letter unanswered for a week and a half he is in trouble and perhaps a cabinet minister is in trouble if he leaves a letter unanswered for a couple of days. He may be subject to press comment and even a public indignation meeting if he persists in such conduct, but so far as judges are concerned they seem to have a certain privilege which personally I do not think they should have, because just as much responsibility rests upon a judge as upon any other of our citizens.

Having said that, I wish to add that in the main we have a judiciary which is beyond reproach. I think we are very fortunate in that respect, and it is only for the purpose of perfecting that splendid system we now have that I ask the minister to evolve during the recess some plan by which we shall be able to satisfy a group of litigants in Canada who are very much dissatisfied with this feature of the present system.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I must say a word in reply to the leader of the opposition, because I cannot let the public remain under the impression that the Department of Justice is failing in its duty because judgments are not handed down as rapidly as they should be handed down. The federal government has no jurisdiction in that matter. Judges are appointed for life and can be removed only on a joint address of both houses of parliament. The administration of justice is a provincial matter, and property and civil rights are also within provincial control.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not condemning the minister.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; but the impression that would be gathered from the speech of the leader of the opposition would be that this government was derelict in its duty in not having judgments rendered promptly by all the members of the judiciary. I have been in office for something over a year and a half, and in that time only two specific instances have been brought to my attention. In an extreme case, of course, I could bring the matter before parliament, but in both these instances I could do nothing but communicate with the chief justice of the court of which the judge was a member, point out to him how detrimental it was to the respect of the community for the administration of justice to have such delays occur and ask him to point out to the judge in question that he was doing a serious disservice to the people of Canada by thus bringing some discredit upon our judicial system. In both instances the chief justice replied to me fully appreciating the viewpoint I had expressed and told me that he had brought the matter forcibly to the notice of his colleague. In one instance, only to-day, I wrote to a litigant who had written to me on July 17 with respect to something about which he had written me earlier, in March. In March I had taken the matter up with the chief justice of the court concerned, who had discussed it with his colleague, who was then on circuit, and his colleague had promised that upon completing his circuit he would immediately consider the case very carefully and hoped to hand down a decision by the end of June. I passed this information on to the litigant, and on July 17 I received a letter from him that June 30 had gone by and no judgment had been handed down yet. I communicated again with the chief justice.

Mr. GRAYDON: When was the case tried?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Considerably over a year and a half before. If it had been only a matter of a few weeks I would not have intervened.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was the judge sick in the meantime?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; the judge explained that he had thought it would be in the interests of the parties—there were two lawsuits, and the defendant in the one case was the plaintiff in the other—if he allowed some time to go by before he disposed of the cases. It so happened that the judgments were handed down on the very day on which the litigant wrote me his last letter. When I wrote to the chief justice I got back a letter from him saying that the judgments had been handed down that very day. So that only to-day I had to pass that information on to the litigant and say that we had done our best.

Mr. GRAYDON: You had got results.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We do get results. If litigants would bring cases to the attention of the Minister of Justice, although he has no power to do anything unless it becomes a situation where he could bring the matter before parliament, his intervention with the chief justice of the court concerned will bring results. I invite the lawyer members of this house, when they have knowledge of such delays, which are talked about and which become gossip in the locality where the litigants reside, to bring the matter to the attention of the department. I am not so much concerned with the immediate service they will be rendering the parties in the case as I am concerned with the respect of the people generally for the administration of justice, and the bringing of the concrete facts in these matters, so that they can be dealt with as concrete facts, to the knowledge of the department will be rendering the public generally a service. I may add that I never fail in any of these letters to say that this is something which each session is brought up in the house, and that the time will come when names will be pronounced in the house, if there is no improvement in the situation, and that it would be to almost the everlasting discredit of any member of the bench to have him complained about by name in a debate of this kind.

Mr. GRAYDON: I fancy that this will meet the situation, if it receives sufficient publicity throughout the country, that the Minister of Justice is prepared, in the case of a long delayed and reserved judgment, to take that sort of action. I think it will meet the situation I have described in at least ninety per cent of the cases.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think it will.

As to the question of the hon. member for Broadview, I also deplore the necessity during these critical times of having to invite some members of the bench to take on other duties. But I was expecting—perhaps I was too hopeful—that with respect to the situation in Ontario I might be complimented to-night, because I am rather proud of what has been taking place with respect to the high courts of Ontario over the last few months, and I have received from a number of members of the profession flattering letters as to the excellency of some of the recent appointments to the bench and the splendid way in which those appointees are carrying on their judicial duties.

Mr. GRAYDON: That must not be regarded as a reflection on the old appointees, who are also, some of them, very good.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Quite, but there are some weaknesses.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course that occurs in governments just as it does on the bench.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It occurs everywhere. There were only twelve apostles, and one of them did not appear to be so good.

Mr. GRAYDON: The percentage in some governments is usually higher than that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member for Broadview was complaining about the possible postponement of some of the assizes in Ontario. There is no high court trial judge of Ontario engaged upon any commission work, nor has there been, to my knowledge, since I came into this office. There is room for improvement in most of the courts of Canada, and there is a serious impediment in the constitutional provision of the British North America Act, that unless a situation becomes such that you appoint a committee and have that committee find a judge incompetent, he cannot be removed. Unfortunately, there are throughout Canada in various places some judges who have performed excellent service in the past but have reached an age when their services are much less valuable to the country than they were, and where younger men appointed in their place would be much more effective than such judges are proving to be at this time. That also is something which has been discussed a great many times in this chamber, and with respect to which no proper or convenient solution has been reached.

Mr. MacINNIS: On various occasions when these Department of Justice items were before this committee I have tried to get some information with regard to this item. I must confess that I have never been satisfied with the information I have been able to get. I wish to ask the minister three or four questions in regard to this item. First, I should like to know how much was paid out last year and to whom. Second, is a payment under this amount made to the same person or persons more than once? Third, what factors determine the granting and the amount of a gratuity? Fourth, is any investigation made as to the necessity of paying a gratuity?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This item is to provide a fund out of which there may be paid by order of the governor in council a gratuity equal to two months' salary to the widow or other dependents of a judge at the time of his demise. It is not an annual or repeated gratuity; it is one amount, not exceeding two months' salary.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have a fairly good idea as to what the item is. What I wish to know is, what are the factors which determine whether a gratuity is paid or not? Is the gratuity paid regardless of the economic circumstances of the widow or family concerned? As a matter of fact I consider it is class legislation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, no.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not see any reason why the widow of a judge should be singled out for a gratuity any more than the widow of a fireman or a miner or a longshoreman. I do not know just how much is paid. Taking the $15,000 which is in the estimate, and the same amount appears each year, it is sufficient to provide, at the current rate of the old age pension, pensions for a whole year for sixty-two people, and before the old age pensioners would get it they would have to be paupers. Is any investigation made as to the necessity of granting a gratuity? If there is not, why is it granted?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member says that this is class legislation. It is class legislation just as there is class legislation providing for every member of the civil service. When there is no pension a gratuity is provided as a rule for the widow or the dependents of every member of the civil service. I believe that originally the provision was for dependents who found themselves in such circumstances that it was very difficult for them to provide for the funeral expenses and the cost of the clothing used in mourning on the death of the head of the family. Since I came to the department, no case has been submitted where the officers of the department have not prepared a recommendation to council for the payment to the widow or other dependent of the deceased judge of an amount equal to two months' salary. According to the report of the auditor general at page 129, the amount expended in 1942 out of the $15,000 was $7,166.66.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister says that this is similar to the amount paid to civil servants who are not covered by insurance or some other form of protection. I understand that all civil servants can and do come under the Civil Service Superannuation Act and that they provide for themselves in that way. Before these items have been disposed of, we shall have a discussion about provision for people who are in very needy circumstances, and I simply wish to prepare the government for the fact that if we can find money for payments of this kind, then there are a great number of very needy people, needy widows, whose husbands did not receive salaries as high as those of judges, who will get nothing when the head of the family passes.

Mr. CHURCH: Bill No. 105 relates to the judges of Canada, and I would point out that they are federal as well as provincial officers. It proposes that these judges shall fulfil the functions for which they have been appointed and not go on commissions.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The item under discussion has to do with gratuities to widows or dependents of judges. The bill which the hon. member is discussing is not relevant.

Mr. CHURCH: I was dealing with the $2,000,000 item when I was interrupted.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I must call attention to the fact that the item of $2,040,600 was not called and does not need to be called.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member to abide by my ruling.

Mr. CHURCH: Your ruling is correct, Mr. Chairman. I just wish to point out one fact, namely, that these judges who are leaving their judicial duties and going on commissions are interfering extensively with the administration of their courts—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: —and in the second place, that when the judges are appointed they are supposed to follow the decisions of the privy council or the court of last resort, and they do not do this. They have to take an oath of office but they are not following those decisions. Last year I called attention to both these matters. There are one or two judges who appear to follow the decisions of the privy council or the court of last resort, and they ought to, because they are bound by those decisions. I would ask the minister to look into this matter. The judges are federal officers, but they are provincial officers as well. They are sworn to do their duty, and they are not doing that duty when they fail to follow the decisions of the privy council or the court of last resort. I want to find out what the minister proposes to do about it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the minister proposed to do anything about it, he would have first of all to have the British North America Act amended, and he does not propose at this time to suggest any other amendment than the one that was dealt with in the resolution recently passed by the house.

Mr. CHURCH: We are getting to the stage they have reached in the United States. There, if a man becomes a lawyer, the next day, after he is called to the bar, he is called judge, because if he is not a judge to-day he hopes to be a judge to-morrow. I suggest that some survey should be made and that there should be some coordination of the work in Ontario and in the other provinces throughout Canada.

Penitentiaries branch—

96. Branch administration, $116,113.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In 1936 a commission was set up to investigate the penal system of Canada and it submitted eighty-eight recommendations. Would the minister make some statement as to what was done about their report. I quote from the report:

3. There should be a complete reorganization of the headquarters administration of Canadian penitentiaries to include giving effect to the recommendations in this report as to the retirement of certain officers.

4. A prison commission, composed of three members, removable only for cause, should be appointed with full authority over the management of penitentiaries, empowered to appoint staff, and to act as a central parole board. The commission should be responsible directly to the Minister of Justice and to parliament.

6. A planned reconstruction of the personnel of the penitentiary staffs throughout Canada should be effected in order that officers who have special training will be enlisted in the service.

14. There should be a thorough and complete revision of the penitentiary rules and regulations based on the principles contained in this report, with special regard to:

(a) the protection of society;
(b) the safe custody of inmates;
(c) strict but humane discipline;
(d) reformation and rehabilitation of prisoners.

16. A complete revision of the methods of classification of prisoners should be made, with provision for a thorough medical and psychiatric examination of prisoners.

19. Separate institutions, based on the principles of the English Borstal system, should be established to permit of special treatment being given to young offenders between sixteen and twenty-one years of age. There should also be a classification centre and three grades in each unit, each grade to be separately located and not contiguous to another. Two units should be established at once, one in the province of Ontario, and one in the province of Quebec, with a further development of the scheme in the prairie provinces, the martime provinces, and, in a modified manner having regard to the population, in British Columbia.

33. Provision should be made for more outdoor physical exercise, on the principles suggested in chapter VIII of this report, with recreational games permitted according to the age and classification of prisoners. Further provision should be made on the same principles for more indoor recreation.

37. A complete reorganization of the educational system should be made in accordance with the recommendations contained in chapter VIII of this report, with special consideration for the young offenders, more frequent library privileges, and a simplified system of book distribution.

62. The interest of the public should be enlisted in an organized manner, having regard to the vital importance of the prevention of crime by reducing juvenile delinquency, and the assistance of social service agencies and churches and schools in cooperation with the home should be organized to this end.

Thousands of children across Canada are permitted to roam the streets without adequate provision being made for their healthful recreation. Hon. members will observe that this item costs the taxpayers over $3,000,000. Some mention was made of provision for old age pensions, and the Minister of Finance is asking for just about $31,000,000 to provide for the 180,000 old age pensioners of the country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Is this matter of old age pensions going to be discussed on each item of my estimates? I wonder if there has been any rumour of what is being prepared by the Minister of Finance to form a part of his statement when his estimates are called. It would seem as if there were considerable anxiety to get this on the record before the Minister of Finance gets into the house. I must object to the matter of old age pensions being discussed on this item, which has to do with penitentiaries.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think the Minister of Justice is the one who should be called to order for rising to make a speech saying what the Minister of Finance is going to do. I merely compared the appropriation now before the committee with an item which will come up later on, and I wish to suggest that the spending of more than $3,000,000 of the money of the taxpayers of this country in connection with our penal institutions involves a very large sum of money. I believe this house should give consideration to the recommendations that were brought in by the royal commission, which was composed of eminent Canadians. The chairman of that commission was Mr. Justice Archambault, of the superior court of Quebec, and the other members were Mr. R. W. Craig of Winnipeg and Mr. Harry Anderson of Toronto. Unfortunately Mr. Anderson, who had been a student of criminology for many years, died before he was able to participate in the work of this commission, but his place was taken by another eminent Canadian, Mr. J. C. McRuer, and a very large sum of money was spent in connection with the work of this commission. I believe the commissioners are to be congratulated upon having made such a careful study of this important question. The minister might have allowed me to finish my remarks without getting so excited and making a speech in regard to what is to be done with the old age pensioners. The commission made reference to a statement by the lord chief justice of England, Lord Hewart of Bury, when he was addressing a discharged prisoners' aid society in England, in 1936. He said:

It would be grotesque and silly to imagine that the duty society owes to them is completed when imprisonment is ended. It is then that the real struggle begins. How often have I heard it said of men and women that their real punishment begins on the day they go out of prison.

When you think of the number in prison who might very well not be there and of the number outside who might very well be in, there is no great difficulty in ascertaining the kind of duty which society owes to those who are unfortunate to be inside. I often wonder when I see prisoners in the dock or in a penal establishment, whether the people outside the prison are really worth the sacrifice which they compel the people in prison to make.

No doubt prison with all its appalling faults is necessary until we can find a better substitute. But at least society does owe to those unfortunate persons—some are no doubt wicked—but all are unfortunate—the duty of helping them as far as may be.

Then in the recommendations the commission said:

The interest of the public should be enlisted in an organized manner, having regard to the vital importance of the prevention of crime by reducing juvenile delinquency, and the assistance of social service agencies and churches and schools in cooperation with the home should be organized to this end.

It was also recommended that special efforts should be made in connection with rehabilitation. There is one matter which was not discussed by the commission but which I think is timely now, when we have a very large population in our penitentiaries. Many of these are able-bodied men and women, but to-day they are not making the contribution they might make. It is in their interests that Hitler should be defeated and that the united nations should have the benefit of every ounce of energy that can be thrown into the conflict. I submit that if the recommendations of the royal commission had been acted upon, the penitentiaries of Canada would be organized to-day in such a way that the man-power now going to waste in those institutions might be devoted to some useful purpose. I should like the minister to make some comment with regard to the recommendations which were brought down by that commission.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to the report of the penitentiaries commission I must repeat what I said when the estimates were before the house last year. It will not be possible for me to take the responsibility of recommending the expenditure required to implement this report while this country is at war. The recommendations which do not involve large expenditures of money have been vey carefully considered, and most of them have been implemented to the degree to which that could be done without large expenditures of money. Again I have to come back to the British North America Act. Most of these high-minded gentlemen who talk about reforming the man who is so unfortunate as to be sentenced to some period of detention overlook the fact that ninety-five per cent of those condemned to detention are in no way under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice or any other federal department. They are serving sentences of less than twenty-four months in the common gaols, of which there are a great many throughout the country. The Department of Justice has no jurisdiction over them other than to recommend to his excellency, in appropriate cases, some degree of clemency. To carry out the social schemes or projects that are put forward by high-minded, public-spirited citizens would require a system under which the control of the gaols and penitentiaries would be under one authority. That does not exist and cannot be brought about under the British North America Act.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not satisfied with the explanation the minister has given. Would he be good enough to tell the committee how many people are in our penitentiaries now, and what provision is being made so that those confined in these institutions may make some useful contribution to the war effort?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The value of the production of penitentiary labour has more than doubled in the last two years, and a constant effort is being made to increase further the economic value of the work performed in the penitentiaries. All those who are connected with the administration of the penitentiaries realize, as I do, that merely employing the men so that their time passes must have a depressing moral effect upon those so employed, and it has been our constant endeavour to have them produce something which would give some tangible result for the manual labour performed. Prior to the war there was serious objection from labour unions and industry generally to allowing articles produced in the penitentiaries to come into competition with the products of free labour. Since the shortage of man-power has arisen, however, and since there has grown up such a large demand by departments of this government for various manufactured articles, we have found that without clashing with the labour unions or private industry we can make use of everything that can be produced in the penitentiaries.

As I say, there has been an increase of more than 100 per cent in the dollar value of the articles produced. In 1942-43 the value of the production of the penitentiaries, over and above that which was consumed in the institutions themselves, amounted to $382,008.20, of which $102,099.10 went into things we were able to do for the military forces. There has been a satisfactory decline in the population of the penitentiaries since the beginning of the war. At the present time that population is 2,980, while in 1938 the average was 3,618; in 1940, 3,736; 1940-41, 3,654; 1941-42, 3,380; 1942-43, 2,980, compared to a penitentiary and prison population of something like 75,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: So far as I can see, these figures are not the least bit impressive. Here we have 2,980 men who are each making a contribution of something over $100. The taxpayers of this country are spending over $3,000,000 to maintain these institutions. There is a very serious shortage of man-power all across Canada, and I think something could be done to have the inmates of these institutions make contributions greater than the amount the minister has stated. If it is double what it is last year, that would make the situation all the more serious a year ago.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not at all satisfied with the results which have been obtained, although they are 100 per cent greater than heretofore. In addition to that, there was agricultural produce valued at $167,884. That, again, is not as much as it should be, in my opinion, with that amount of man-power available, and the area of agricultural land under cultivation. However, there is a substantial increase. Both in the agricultural and in the industrial fields there have been encouraging increases, and this year we are obtaining a revolving fund of some $200,000 for the purchase of raw materials which will enter into goods of various kinds ordered by the Department of Munitions and Supply for the military forces. There is a considerable increase there, and we will not have any excuse for not increasing it further, because at the present time we are not in any way clashing with private industry.

Penitentiaries branch—

97. Operation and maintenance of penitentiaries, including administration, construction, purchase of land, supplies, equipment and live stock; maintenance and discharge and transfer of convicts; compensation to discharged convicts permanently disabled while in penitentiaries, $2,914,779.

Mr. REID: There is a matter I should like to draw to the minister's attention in connection with the penitentiary at New Westminster. This penitentiary was established many years ago when coastal development was in its infancy. In those days it was not visualized that the New Westminster and Vancouver areas would have developed to such a great extent. The result has been that to-day we find the penitentiary almost in the centre of a modern city. The penitentiary at New Westminster divides the city in two. I am informed that from time to time reports have been made with regard to the location of that penitentiary, and in days past there was a recommendation that a new location should be found for it. To-day the main thoroughfare passes it, and since there is a total of only something like 130 acres in connection with the institution, it is difficult at times to keep the men gainfully or usefully employed in the grounds, owing to the fact that those grounds have been worked over for many long years.

I believe the time is now opportune for a survey for a new location. Will the minister be good enough to undertake such a survey, having in mind the purpose of finding a new location, so that at the end of hostilities under, shall we say, a rehabilitation scheme, a new site may be developed. It is very easy at the present time to obtain 500 or 1,000 acres of land close to transportation facilities, areas which to my mind would be far more suitable for penitentiary purposes than the present site.

I have been given to understand that the city of New Westminster would be glad to enter into an arrangement with the penitentiaries authorities or the dominion government in connection with this land, because, if vacated by the penitentiary, it would make a valuable piece of residential property. The present site of the penitentiary is not a proper one, because it is encircled by the city of New Westminster, and divides that city in two. I would ask the minister to give serious consideration to a survey, so that, following cessation of hostilities, a new penitentiary might be built on a new site.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As early as 1878 reports were placed on the files of the department pointing out that a mistake had been made in the selection of that site. The matter has been referred to at various times since then, and was again given serious consideration in 1920. In 1923 various sites were considered by the late superintendent General Hughes, with a view to establishing another penitentiary for British Columbia. Since then, the matter has been referred to from time to time in reports to the minister. Our officers are of the opinion that it was not a proper site, and that it is not suitable for many reasons, and among them are those stated by the hon. member. It is in the heart of the city of New Westminster, and the area is not large enough to permit of the agricultural work it is deemed advisable to have done by persons confined in the institution. Certainly at an early date this matter will have to be given serious consideration with a view to finding another site.

There is, of course, the fact to be considered that the buildings on the site have a book value of about $808,000, and an expenditure of more than that amount would be required to provide elsewhere the penitentiary accommodation which we must have. However, I can assure the hon. member that the matter cannot long remain without a change being made.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—
318. Land services, arising out of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, enforcement of federal statutes generally, and other incidental expenses, $6,009,545.67.

Mr. SHAW: A few days ago, when we were discussing certain estimates with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, many members made some fine comments with respect to this famouns force. I shall not go over the things that were said then, but I wish to associate myself with those remarks. I am particularly concerned about one aspect of this item, the pay question. It is true that not long ago increases were authorized for certain ranks, and I know these were appreciated, but we must also recognize the fact that, since these increases were granted, the rate of taxation has increased materially. I am of opinion that some of these men are in a more difficult position to-day than they were prior to the increase.

This matter was brought forcibly to my mind not long ago when a constable who has been with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for approximately twelve years showed me his pay cheque. The amount of the cheque was $82.50, with taxation deductions at the source of $30, leaving a cash income of $52.50 for the month. I realize that certain allowances in the way of uniforms and billeting are made in the case of the single constable, but I wondered how we could expect a constable of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who is not permitted to engage in any other type of remunerative work, to carry on his duties when his net cash income for the month is only $52.50. We expect these men to be the personification of honesty, and I am not saying that they are not, but when you leave a constable with a net income of that amount you are developing a feeling in him that he would probably like to commit an infraction of the regulations and engage in some work during his spare time to supplement that $52.50.

The minister stated the other night that, while there is a ceiling on wages, we should not permit that to stand in the way when a situation such as this develops. When we consider the allowances granted to these men the salary may appear to be quite substantial, but we still cannot get around the fact that we are leaving them, members of the permanent force, single uniformed constables, with a cash income of $52.50 a month. It is not proper, and I think further consideration should be given to this matter.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—
Pensions and other benefits—
320. To compensate members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for injuries received in the performance of duty, $11,749.16.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is one item that is worth while being included.

Item agreed to.

SECRETARY OF STATE

Office of the chief electoral officer—
34. Salaries and expenses of office, $16,692.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask a question which no doubt the minister expected to be asked at this time, in connection with the Cartier by-election. Is the returning officer of that electoral district still being retained, or has there been any removal from office?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): There has been no removal. There is no evidence against him under the elections act upon which he could properly be removed. The only suggestion against him is that after he was appointed returning officer in 1938, his uncle decided to run for the constituency in 1943. The assistant chief electoral officer is there in a supervisory capacity.

Mr. GRAYDON: The returning officer has not seen fit to resign himself?

Mr. McLARTY: No; he has not, and I do not think there is any obligation upon him to do so. There is no criticism of him. In the two instances that came to his attention he acted immediately.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is just a question of public confidence, and I am raising it only on that basis.

Item agreed to.

Civil service commission—
35. Salaries and contingencies of the commission, $458,404.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has anything been done by the government toward appointing a commission or committee to take the place of the Coon advisory committee, whose report seems to have been buried so deeply in the affairs of state during the last few months?

Mr. McLARTY: That committee was appointed by the treasury board and I am afraid I have no information which would enable me to answer the question.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister or his department in contemplation the setting up of a committee to deal with civil service matters, having in mind the situation which was dealt with by the Coon committee earlier in the year?

Mr. McLARTY: No steps have been taken along that line up to the present time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister expect that there will be any taken?

Mr. McLARTY: I would not want to anticipate, because that would be a matter to take up with treasury board.

Item agreed to.

Public printing and stationery—

254. Distribution of official documents, $48,015.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would it be possible to meet the convenience of members of the house by an earlier printing of the bound volume of Hansard? I do no want to press the minister with regard to this on account of the pressure of work on the printing bureau at the present time, but perhaps he would bear it in mind because members are anxious to have the revised edition and index as soon as they can. There might also be a little more speed with respect to the printing of the statutes, which is an even more important matter. It seems a long time to members after they get home before the statutes are finally bound and available.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be very glad to take the matter up, and if there is any possibility of expediting publication of both Hansard and the statutes, I shall endeavour to see that it is done.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the government reduced the number of "Canada Year Books" that are printed. A number of people who are in the habit of purchasing the volume each year have written me that they are unable to get it.

Mr. McLARTY: Yes; the economy control took charge and the number printed was reduced.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): On what basis are they distributed? Is it first come first served?

Mr. McLARTY: Certain public officials get them and there is a distribution to certain departments. If there are any left over, it is pretty much a matter of selling them on application.

Item agreed to.

Public printing and stationery—

255. Printing and binding official publications for sale and distribution to departments and the public, $50,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the government get the cost in all these cases?

Mr. McLARTY: Not necessarily. The Canada Gazette until this year carried itself pretty well, and, generally speaking, the government does get the cost. It is charged up to a particular department if it is departmental printing. Hansard, except for sales to the public, would not carry itself.

Item agreed to.

325. Naturalization branch, $64,460.

Mr. McLARTY: I should like to make a brief statement in connection with this item. When the war appropriation estimates of the Secretary of State were before the committee, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar raised the point as to whether a naturalized Canadian leaving Canada for the United States and taking his first papers in that country lost his Canadian citizenship. At the time I had not read the exact terms of the declaration of intention which he is required to take, but since then I have. He does not renounce his allegiance to the British crown. It simply says that as and when his final papers are granted he will. Consequently there is no loss of Canadian citizenship until the final papers are granted.

Mr. HLYNKA: Would it be possible for the minister to bring about a change in the requirements for naturalization with respect to the language qualification? It may seem strange to suggest that anyone who speaks neither English nor French should ask for a naturalization certificate, but a great many thousands of our people—I brought this to the attention of the Prime Minister on one occasion—came here from various countries of Europe twenty-five, thirty, forty or fifty years ago, and starting in as pioneers made Canada their home. That is particularly true of the western provinces. We have there people of Ukrainian, Polish, German and other origins. Wherever these people have settled in blocks it was impossible for them to learn the English language, because they never came into contact with the English-speaking people. Surely any pioneer who has lived here for twenty years or more and has a son or grandson in our armed forces in this war should be accepted as a citizen of this country and be granted a naturalization certificate if he applies. I receive tens of letters weekly from people in western Canada of various origins who have not had an opportunity to learn the English language and who were refused naturalization certificates when they applied, because of language qualification. Later, when they apply for old age pension—and some of them really need that assistance—they are refused it because they do not possess a naturalization certificate. I would appeal to the minister to consider this feature of the naturalization requirements with a view to bringing about some change, perhaps stipulating a knowledge of some other language, or some other requirement, so that these people who have settled as pioneers on the prairie provinces may be eligible for Canadian citizenship. I say that in all seriousness, because it seems unfair that these people who have devoted their lives in the upbuilding of this country should be refused naturalization certificates and, in consequence, some of them be refused the old age pension. I appeal to the minister to give this matter serious consideration.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be very glad to do so, but may I make a practical suggestion to the hon. member for Vegreville? As he knows, naturalization is one of the subjects considered by the committee on the defence of Canada regulations, which has not yet brought in its final report. It might be opportune for the hon. member to submit that matter to the committee for consideration at its next sitting.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CRERAR: Before we proceed with the next item I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), that the house do not adjourn at eleven o'clock. I have spoken to the leaders of the other groups and they are agreeable to this motion.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

348. Dominion bureau of statistics—Statistics, $1,078,515.

Mr. ISNOR: I desire on this item to bring to the attention of the minister a number of, shall I say, complaints which have reached me from retail merchants, not only in Halifax city and throughout the province of Nova Scotia but in other portions of the maritimes. In peace time there would not be the criticism which I propose to offer, but on account of reduced staffs in retail stores, particularly so far as office help is concerned, merchants find it exceedingly difficult, not only to meet the requirements of this branch of the government, in compiling returns at the end of each month, but to make the further returns which are required by the wartime prices and trade board at the end of each month, with respect to the amount of stock they have on hand, the sales they have made, and a large number of other items, which mean additional bookkeeping. More than one merchant has told me that it takes practically the entire time of one clerk or other member of his office staff to prepare the necessary returns which are required by three branches of government. I refer to the bureau of statistics, as regards returns for their particular records, the wartime prices and trade board at the end of each month, and the income tax office in connection with the same items, namely, the amount of stock which they have on hand at the beginning of the year, the quantity of purchases made for each month and for the entire twelve months, the gross profit, the estimated cost of the goods, and the net profit. All these items must be supplied by each and every individual making his return to the income tax office, and in addition he is obliged at the end of each month to make returns covering not all but a number of these items. Further than that, there is the monthly return to the dominion bureau of statistics with regard to trade matters.

Within the last two weeks the wartime prices and trade board sent out a form compelling merchants to give a survey of their business for the years 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942, covering a large number of items. It is not so much the firms with up-to-date methods of bookkeeping as it is the large number of small merchants who are finding it exceedingly difficult to meet the requirements of these government bureaux in this respect. I could place on record the type of form which is required. Perhaps it is a good thing to have the statistics on file to advise merchants from month to month as to increases or decreases in the particular section of the country where they are doing business, in comparison with the rest of Canada. But I would point out that returns should be simplified in every way possible, and I base that contention largely on the fact that man-power at this time is extremely scarce, and that additional restrictions affecting retail staffs have recently been brought into effect by selective service. I ask the minister to give consideration to the elimination of at least two of these forms and the bringing of returns under one heading in as simplified a form as possible. Since I have already gone over some phases of this matter with the minister and some of his officials, I do not need to enlarge further upon it.

For instance, the monthly return—and this is every month—calls for the following information from every retailer: net sales, inventory of merchandise beginning the first of the period; merchandise purchased for the month or for that period; net cost of merchandise handled; inventory of merchandise at the end of the stated period; net cost of merchandise sold and gross trading profit.

To be quite frank, I do not see what gross profit or net profit means to the bureau of statistics, because that particular information should not be of very much concern to them. I appreciate why it is of interest to the income tax office, because it is on that return that the retailers must pay their taxes; but this could be eliminated to a marked extent and thus make it a little easier for the retail merchant to carry on in a manner in keeping with present conditions

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can quite sympathize with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) because personally I have had practical experience in connection with the point he raises. However, the difficulty is particularly marked at the present time, much more so than in peace time. I am informed that the complaints in times of peace are very moderate. This situation has been greatly aggravated by the war and by the necessity of securing increased information during this period. A good deal of criticism is made of the bureau of statistics, but on the bureau of statistics has been placed during the war the responsibility of collecting information which is not generally collected for the benefit of various branches of the government. The wartime prices and trade board use the bureau of statistics to a great extent for securing the statistics which they regard as vital to their work. I shall bring to the attention of my officials the comments made by the hon. member.

Mr. ISNOR: So far as the records of the bureau of statistics or of the wartime prices and trade board are concerned, of what benefit is the last item, namely, net profit made by the merchant?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That information is required by another branch of government. I am not sure of the special reason why they want to know the net profit made, except that it is necessary for the general information they require on the financial state of the merchants of the country.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

101. Combines Investigation Act, $30,250.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sorry to have to discuss at this stage of the session the matter I have in hand, but so far there has been no other item under which I could bring it up earlier. It has to do with the effect of an alleged combine upon the employment of a gentleman in Toronto, Mr. Robert Stuart. On August 1 of last year, as reported at page 5176 of Hansard, I made reference to this matter. At that time I stated that this gentleman was an experienced salesman of electrical equipment; that he had been employed by several electrical companies one after the other, each of which had sought his services; but that in due course, owing to what he alleges was a combination of these companies to control sales territories and sales, his services were dispensed with, and he alleges that the companies agreed not to reemploy him. On hearing the information I gave at that time, the minister said that the matter would be looked into and that, if the facts were found to be as claimed by Mr. Stuart, an investigation would be held. It appears that on August 18, 1942, Colonel the Hon. W. H. Price, ex-attorney general of Ontario, acting as solicitor for Mr. Robert Stuart, wrote the minister a letter which I feel I should read:

The Hon. Humphrey Mitchell,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

On August 1st, 1942, in the House of Commons when item 102 "Combines Investigation Act, $45,475," was going through committee, Mr. John R. MacNicol, M.P., brought to your attention a case of a gentleman, "R.S." I am attaching Hansard page 5176 which sets out what happened. The gentleman referred to was Robert Stuart, of 1 Brandon avenue, Toronto. Mr. Stuart has asked me to draft for him a declaration covering the facts of his case. I am enclosing that declaration, so that you will have it before you for consideration.

Mr. Stuart has been placed in a very bad position on account of the discrimination practised against him. He is a man now fifty years of age, and cannot get new types of employment readily. On a number of occasions he has made complaints to the companies involved, and I believe has brought the matter to the attention of the authorities. You will agree that a man like Mr. Stuart is not financially able to attack large companies who have discriminated against him. On that account the matter has dragged along without him getting any redress. Probably under these circumstances, with these facts before you, you will be able to investigate his case in such a way as not only to give him redress, but improve the situation which apparently still exists. He knows that he cannot get employment where he had it before, notwithstanding that he was successful as a salesman, and in great demand. There should be a remedy for a situation of this kind.

Enclosed with the letter was an affidavit which I shall not take time to read, since the Minister has a copy of it, giving the names of the various companies and setting out the various facts which Mr. Stuart claims to have information and affidavits to prove. I shall read just the last paragraph of this affidavit:

The above information has come to me from various sources in my capacity as a salesman, and I now say that this combination of companies are a combine to fix prices and eliminate competition. In carrying out this plan they agreed not to employ me, and they did not employ me because it would interfere with their plans. I have suffered very greatly on this account, as these companies cover the whole range of my sales efforts. They are practically the only companies in Ontario from whom I can receive employment. I therefore request that the Department of Labour take such steps as will enable me to obtain employment and at the same time put an end to the electrical ring.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath, and by virtue of The Canada Evidence Act.

To that letter and affidavit the minister replied, under date of September 9, 1942:

Dear Colonel Price:

I have had careful inquiries made into the subject matter of your letter of August 18 and the declaration of Mr. Robert Stuart which you enclosed.

It appears that Mr. Stuart's submissions relate in the main to his past connections with certain electrical equipment companies. Remedy for the personal injury alleged would appear to be a matter of civil law. This, you will understand, is not a matter which can be considered under the Combines Investigation Act.

In addition, Mr. Stuart makes certain allegations with respect to the operations of certain companies engaged in the sale of transformers. The transactions which he describes are said to have occurred a number of years ago. The electrical supply industry is now subject to the control of the wartime prices and trade board, and the sale and supplying of transformers and related goods are, by order, under the direct supervision of the administrator of electrical apparatus and machinery. There does not appear to be ground for proceeding now with investigation under the Combines Investigation Act into these alleged transactions of a period in which the circumstances differed so greatly from those now prevailing.

I have a word to say in reference to that. I know this gentleman. He is a highly reputable and excellent citizen. The affidavit signed by him, and prepared by his legal adviser evidently reveals a situation in which he is barred from obtaining employment. That, of course, is wholly and manifestly unfair, and, in my judgment, an infraction of the man's rights.

Investigations made recently in the United States before a senate committee reveal that a large number of companies in that country have been carrying on under a combination. The lines covered by those various combinations include companies manufacturing magnesium metal, and materials made from it, zinc, rubber, gasoline, electrical equipment, plastics, dye stuffs, tungsten, carbide and some others. The one to which I am referring particularly is electrical equipment.

After a most exhaustive investigation into these various combines, the assistant attorney general for the United States appeared before the senate committee and made this statement:

Mr. Arnold: I appear before this committee to present a bill to correct those pressing patent abuses which have so disastrously affected our war effort. Through these abuses a vital segment of American economy has been strait-jacketed into a foreign cartel system, and the free flow of strategic materials vital for war and for internal security has been impeded and delayed.

This committee has a peculiar responsibility —it has investigated the patent system at a time when it was never more important that we have full and unhampered production and that American business be entirely free of either old or prospective commitments to cartels.

The assistant attorney general asked for prohibition of combines of that kind. I am asking the minister again to read carefully Colonel Price's letter of August 18, and Mr. Stuart's affidavit which came with it. If the minister has not a copy, I shall send him this one. I would ask him then to read his own reply. Then I would suggest that he send an investigator to Toronto, to see Mr. Robert Stuart, and obtain from him proof of his statements in the affidavit. If the minister's investigator finds that those charges are substantiated, then I suggest that the minister have some action taken to see that this man gets fair play. He is entitled to it, as a British citizen.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to do that.

102. Fair wages and conciliation, $134,702.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is one matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. I should have liked to have more opportunity to go into it more comprehensively, but perhaps my purpose will be served if I leave with the minister the suggestion that he go into the matter and see if something cannot be done to rectify what would seem to be a grievance held by Montreal aircraft lodge No. 712 of the international association of machinists. The minister will recognize the situation I describe. It has to do with three Montreal aircraft companies, namely, Vickers, Fairchild and Noorduyn. This is a union which represents a large number of employees in those three aircraft plants. During last year and into this spring the whole matter of the levelling out of wage scale in the aircraft industry in Montreal and in other areas has been under consideration. This union is one which can be recognized as a good example of an association of employees which is trying to play ball with the men they represent, with the government and with the public. That is no reflection upon other unions, because, after all, I think that, if one takes them by and large, he will find that the labour unions of Canada are prepared to play ball, not only just as well as other sections of our country but in some cases, if I may say so, just a little better. I believe in this particular instance the minister will realize at once what the officers of this union had to go through until this spring, when their case finally was heard by the new national war labour board.

It was not an easy thing to avert some action by employees in these plants, but they did hold off a strike, or other precipitate action, on the understanding that their waiting until the decision was given by the national war labour board would not be prejudicial to their case. However, in bringing down its decision, the national war labour board was unable, under the terms of the reference, or on account of its jurisdiction, to make an award which could operate retroactively. This placed the union and its officials in a difficult position, and one which those belonging to the union find it difficult to understand.

At the same time it seemed unfair to my mind to penalize the union by virtue of the fact that retroactivity was not possible under the ruling of the national war labour board. I do not intend this evening to enter into any lengthy discussion, but I wish only to leave with the minister the suggestion that he investigate this situation and, if possible, make the award retroactive to the time negotiations were commenced, or when the complaint was first laid.

The minister may say that he cannot do that, in view of existing legislation. I would ask him to review the situation with respect to the legislation, and if he finds it is impossible to do anything with existing machinery, to consider seriously the question of providing machinery by which a remedy could be effected. I shall leave this matter with the minister for his consideration. I should have liked to discuss it in greater detail, but the lateness of the session, and of the hour, does not permit my entering into any lengthy discourse on the merits of the case. I should like the minister to undertake an investigation of this and to see if some remedy and perhaps some restoration cannot be brought about.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have been in close touch with this organization in Montreal, namely, lodge No. 712. I came in contact with it when I was chairman of the industrial disputes inquiry commission, and I think the union itself will admit that we made a distinct contribution to the working of that organization in Montreal. It must be remembered that they are not a low-paid category.

Mr. GRAYDON: They are not paid the existing rates in a similar industry.

Mr. MITCHELL: Their rates are as high as the railway rates.

Mr. GRAYDON: They are not paid as high as those paid by Canadian Car and Foundry.

Mr. MITCHELL: They are, but I am not arguing that point. I appreciate my hon. friend's interest in this matter. The national war labour board, under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice McTague, were generous in the adjudication of this dispute. A request was made officially to me for an amending order which would permit the establishment of the maximum bonus in the aeroplane industry in Montreal. The total amount to be payable over a twelve month period was estimated to be $7,500,000. When I was chairman of the national war labour board I felt that that board should recommend and adjudicate on matters of wages brought before it by labour organizations and employers. I think myself it would be unwise—my hon. friend will understand—for the government to interfere in the affairs of the board which in my judgment are rendering a distinct service to the working people and employers of this country.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister must have heard me wrongly; I suggested no such thing.

Mr. MITCHELL: I understood that.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand that the decision of the war labour board was that it should only go that far; that the legislation under which it operated prevented it from going any farther.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I gathered aright the meaning of the minister's words, the government has passed a set of regulations under which the board is unable to do what it should do with respect to this dispute. The board, under the government's regulations, goes as far as it can, and the government feels it should not interfere in the decision of the board. That seems to me to be establishing a most astonishing situation. That is the sort of thing which indicates insincerity with the men, and I think something should be done about it. I am not satisfied with the minister's explanation.

103. Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $63,200.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not wish to enter into any extended discussion on this matter, but I believe that the treatment which has been accorded to our labouring men who have acted in good faith will not be conducive to happy relations between the government and labour. This is a serious matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: Earlier in the session I expressed sympathy for the hard-working Minister of Labour in the multiplicity of troubles he has to unravel. At that time I said that I wished I could do something to help him. Since then, I have given this matter a good deal of thought and I am going to make a suggestion. Everyone knows that industrial peace is most desirable in peace time, and certainly it is most desirable in time of war. I have always been one who believed that labour should receive a fair return; that the conditions under which labour worked should be of the highest. On the other hand, I have always advocated that the employer should also receive fair consideration. At the present time we are having a number of industrial disputes. We have the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and the industrial disputes inquiry commission to defend the interests of labour. In times of peace these have given good satisfaction, but the question now is whether their procedure is speedy enough. I have always felt, in all my dealings with men, that we should follow the biblical phrase:

Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him.

I have always thought that the quicker an industrial dispute could be settled, the better, and I question whether the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and the industrial disputes inquiry commission can give rapid enough action. I was wondering if the minister or the governor in council would consider the appointment of one or more royal commissioners. These would need to be men with many years of legal experience in labour disputes. There are lawyers in this country who have spent many years in studying and adjusting labour problems, men who have come up from the ranks and who have equipped themselves with a thorough knowledge of labour. I would suggest that such a man should be a lawyer with at least ten years' experience at the bar in order that he be steadied down and have some stability and knowledge of how to deal with labouring men and companies from experience when there is friction between the two. I am going to ask the minister to consider this matter, because I believe this would offer means of settling industrial disputes immediately. The industrial disputes royal commissioner could be sent from his own department; he would be a permanent official, and could assist in settling the dispute immediately. It is imperative that the least possible amount of labour be lost through disputes.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am fairly well acquainted with the background of these disputes, because I went over them quite recently. I did not raise the matter to-night, because I did not think it would be proper under the item we are discussing. As a matter of fact, I do not think it properly comes under the estimates that are before us to-night, except possibly that a question of this kind might be considered under Department of Labour administration. However, I am not going to continue the debate, except to say that it has been a habit with the Department of Labour to continue over a long period the adjudication of industrial disputes. I could mention half a dozen or more disputes that went on for months and probably years but since the national war labour board was set up there has been considerable improvement. In this particular case, however, I believe that an injustice has been done and that some means should be provided whereby such injustices could be rectified. I do not think it is a matter that the minister can do himself. It would only lead to endless trouble if the minister undertook to interfere and make decisions on his own. The proper procedure for the department, if the machinery is not working properly, is to set up machinery that will work properly, and the minister would act only when the matter was brought to his attention either in or out of the house. I am satisfied that these workers should have received their settlement to a date farther back than was set.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Could the minister assure the committee that the problems of which the labouring people concerned complain in a pamphlet called "Crisis in Steel" prepared by C. H. Millard, have been taken care of so that they are on their way to being cleared up? I have read the pamphlet with considerable care, and although I do not wish to go into the matter at this late stage, I believe that it is the duty of this committee to have an assurance from the minister that the difficulties discussed in the pamphlet are being cleared up.

Before the minister makes any reply, I might point out that this is one of the problems which I had in mind when I said some time ago that I feared this house was going to leave its duties and go home before it had done the things it should do here. I think the hon. member for Davenport spoke wisely when he spoke of the danger of creating friction between the government and labour at this time. We seem to be succeeding very well in the war, but let us never forget for a moment that we can lose this war and lose it disastrously if we provoke labouring men in this country to action which they might justifiably consider they were entitled to take in their own self-defence.

I do not believe the government has played square with labour in the past year. I believe the government has been insincere; I believe it has betrayed labour in more cases than one. I am just going to ask the minister now if he can assure the committee that the matters complained of in this pamphlet are being looked after and that a solution of the problem is honestly and earnestly and sincerely being sought.

Mr. MITCHELL: I assure my hon. friend that the matter is being looked into and that it is being honestly and earnestly and sincerely looked into. I have read the pamphlet he speaks of and have also had conferences with the organization concerned, but I think my hon. friend will agree with me that while this is a perfectly free forum, it is not always the best place to settle industrial disputes. If my hon. friends are ever fortunate enough or unfortunate enough to lead a ministry in this country and my hon. friend becomes Minister of Labour, I am sure he will appreciate that the difficulties and complexities of industrial disputes vary greatly; they do not run in one pattern.

I do not wish to take up further time of the committee, so that I will say just briefly that the organization we are continually developing for the settling of industrial disputes has developed, I think every unbiased observer will agree, to a stage where it can hardly be compared with the organization we had three years ago. After all is said and done the national war labour board and the regional boards are experimental in character and like all human institutions they are not perfect. But many of the people who criticize the instruments we are using at the moment I feel sure, when the war is over, will be the very ones who will demand their retention because now there is a place for labour to go to where there was not one before. We have dealt with over 16,000 applications with respect to wages and bonus in the past year through our regional and national war labour boards.

My hon. friend may rest assured that the conference I had with the steel workers was a satisfactory one and that steps are being taken by their organization to make the necessary representations to the national war labour board with respect to their claims. But I do not think it serves any good purpose in the cause of settling industrial disputes to suggest insincerity. I do not think that is good for the country. I believe that the record of this country in handling labour disputes in comparison with others of the united nations reflects credit upon Canada in a big way. There are some exceptions, of course; but, generally speaking, I believe that it reflects credit not only upon the employees but upon the employers of this country. In 1917, when we had a much smaller industrial structure than we have to-day, there were two and a half times as many labour disputes. In 1937, in peace time, there were more man hours lost than there were last year. While labour disputes always make the newspaper headlines, very little is said of the day by day work of the conciliation service of the Department of Labour working in conjunction with the respective provincial departments in ironing out industrial disputes in this precarious and difficult time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I appreciate the minister's frankness and also his statement that the House of Commons is probably not the best place to settle labour disputes. But I think the minister will grant that it is the inescapable duty of any responsible member of parliament, when he sees abuses or what he deems to be abuses to bring them before the high court of parliament.

Mr. MITCHELL: Certainly.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And I am quite sure that the minister will grant that I am only discharging what I deem to be my duty as a member of parliament.

Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—
106. Administration, $5,375,150.

Mr. GILLIS: There are a few words I wish to say on the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act, with particular reference to men coming out of the army. It is not working out as I, at least, thought it would. Until a few days ago I was of opinion that the contribution of the man who served in the armed forces was paid by the government, and that when he came back and went into an insurable employment, if he met with unemployment, he was covered by the act. I find that I was wrong in that assumption, and I have two specific cases with which to support that statement.

In a little booklet put out by the unemployment insurance administration from their office, it says, in section 7, with reference to men serving in the armed forces, that any period spent in the armed forces since July 1, 1941, will count for benefit, "if you establish that you had within one year from discharge ninety days of insurable employment." That is the joker. The two cases to which I refer are those of two men who were discharged from the army, came back, and went into employment in two coal mines which had a disaster. They were not out of the army and employed long enough to work the ninety days called for by the act, having been thrown out of employment by something which was, of course, unforeseen; nevertheless their claim is held up, and while the ordinary employee of these collieries immediately after the accident happened came under the Unemployment Insurance Act for benefit, the two ex-servicemen, by virtue of that particular clause, did not. Their claims went to the board of referees, and they received a decision from the board that because they had not had ninety days in insurable employment they did not qualify for benefit. I bring that to the minister's attention, because it is something which will have to be ironed out. I see a lot of trouble ahead for men in the forces who may run into that kind of situation on account of not having had sufficient time in an insurable employment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): How long had they worked?

Mr. GILLIS: Less than ninety days. One had worked, I believe, thirty days, and the other a little less.

There is something else in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Act which I should like to leave with the minister. I am merely going to provoke his thoughts on these two some of the offices in action. I think they are doing a good job with the staffs they have. These offices were originally set up to carry the unemployment insurance business, and they have inherited the job of selective service; in addition to that, many of them are carrying on the welfare work as applied to men discharged from the army. They are bearing a load which they are not staffed to carry, and steps should be taken to see that these offices are adequately staffed. My observation in going into many of them—and I have been in quite a few, because I do not miss a chance at checking up on them, because I visualize the machinery now set up as permanent machinery which will play an important part in rehabilitation after the war—leads me to think that many of them are being set up on the assumption that they are functioning simply for war purposes. I consider that is wrong. That may not be the intention of the minister or his deputy, but the whole thing seems to be operating on that basis. These offices should be adequately staffed.

Second, many of the men who are carrying that load in the offices and working a sixteen-hour day, although they have been employed there for the past two years and in some cases two and a half years, are still temporary em-points. I refer now to the offices. I have seen ployees as far as the civil service is concerned. It is not a pleasant position for the man who is handling a job of this kind, taking a lot of responsibility, and certainly not receiving wages commensurate with the responsibility of the job, to be also in an insecure position, practically waiting for someone to replace him. Many of the men to whom I have talked take the attitude, "It looks to me as though I am just doing the job while it is rough and tough, on the temporary payroll, and that as soon as the war is over, the returned men will get the preference and the chances are I shall be bumped into the street." That is not a satisfactory position for a man who is doing an important job and laying down important machinery. These men should be appointed permanent employees; they should at least be given the protection which affords them some stability, so that they will know where they stand and where they will be within the next few years. Also I think the staff should be increased. There are many complaints, but as far as the offices I have been in are concerned I do not hold the personnel responsible. There are not enough employees. In the matter of the welfare officers the Minister of Pensions and National Health, I suggest, should push his department to see that in every important unemployment insurance centre a welfare officer is installed. There is quite a load involved in the rehabilitation end. So that the three matters which I should like the minister to check up on are: first, the feature of unemployment insurance which militates against the ex-serviceman, so that the system does not work out as it was intended to; second, permanency of employment for men engaged in the unemployment insurance offices; third, in adequate staff in these offices, so that the system will be built up permanently.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thank my hon. friend for bringing these matters to my attention. As a matter of fact, his first suggestion is news to me, and will doubtless be of interest to the Minister of Pensions and National Health.

I have already had discussions on the question of staff. I was in one of the largest cities in Canada the other day, where 20,000 men pass through the offices in a week—almost a division and a half. I said to the regional director, "Supposing you had to deal with 50,000 men, as you might have to do if the war should end to-morrow, or suddenly." I am trying to take the long view of it, that, whatever government is in power in this country at the conclusion of the war, in my judgment there will be set in motion social services of a kind and character which I believe all hon. members think should be instituted in this dominion, and what we are endeavouring to do is to build a machine which will take that load.

What my hon. friend says about the hard work which is being undertaken by these local employees of the selective service is true. It is also true of the headquarters staff. I sometimes wonder how they have been able to maintain it without a break-down in the last twelve months. A tremendous load has been placed on this organization, and when all is said and done it is a question of organization. What I hope we shall get out of this is a trained corps of experts to deal with the problems of the working men and women of this country. Of course that will take time.

As regards the question of permanency, that, of course, is governed by a general policy in all departments. No permanent officials are appointed to the civil service during the war period.

On the question of salaries, I can assure my hon. friend that I do not regard this as my fault; that I have pressed the civil service commission and other agencies of government charged with that responsibility, in an effort to build up what I consider a proper basis of remuneration for people working in this department. I should like to pay them tribute. I know that to wear the soldier's uniform is a glorious thing, but let us remember that numbers of these people are working sixteen hours nearly every day in the week so as to get this machinery which we have set in motion in the best possible working order. I hope that when the war is over, whoever is Minister of Labour will have an organization which will be prepared to take the load of what I consider necessary social insurance when this time rolls around.

Mr. REID: May I make one suggestion to the Minister of Labour regarding the unemployment insurance offices? Canada is becoming a great industrial organization; the workers are moving onward to that better day, and as one who has examined some of the offices, might I say that I find, regarding the men appointed to many of the offices, too much stress has been placed on office experience as a prerequisite of appointment? I say this—and I say it in no disparaging sense—that if the minister himself were not Minister of Labour, he might find it difficult to obtain a position in one of the unemployment insurance offices, because, when his application was submitted, they would look at the office experience he had had. I suggest that in this country we are drifting to the same state that exists in Great Britain where there is a caste system. Not long ago the civil service in this city thought the educational qualifications of the men were a little too low and so they brought in some men with M.A. and B.A. after their names; but if you look around the city and ask where those men are, you will find that many of them are the biggest duds that ever were appointed. I am not against education. Far from it; the race from which I have sprung has always laid emphasis on the importance of education. But I am more for the practical man, and you will find that in the British House of Commons this very question was discussed not long ago. It may startle many hon. members to know what a labour man in the House of Commons there had to say on this question. Let me quote:

> "As a result of the inefficient and undemocratic system now prevailing", Brown said, "the chance of a boy of 'inferior education' of getting to the top grades in our public service are literally non-existent. A man's educational 'marks' follow him through his career and it is very fortunate that the Prime Minister did not get into the service. His educational qualifications would have kept him in obscurity all his life."
> Mr. Churchill, who was educated at Harrow, one of England's best schools, was "a bad student" and his "educational qualifications very low", Brown declared, adding: "Take Lord Beaverbrook. Like Churchill he could not have passed better than a clerical examination. Yet he is, obviously, a man of amazing drive and capacity and even had he got into the civil service he would have been chucked out."

I have visited many offices and know men who have received appointments, and I can say that many of them have never worked in a factory in their lives. They may be qualified in other ways, but I do not think they are qualified to talk to practical men such as coal miners and mechanics. The Prime Minister has taken an interest in labour men in this country, and I urge upon him that it is not necessary that men should have long lists of degrees before they can obtain positions in any of these offices. What is important is that men with greater practical experience, who have sympathy with the men that come before them, should be appointed. I do not mean, of course, that the men in the offices have no sympathy, but I emphasize the importance of that point. The Minister of Labour is a true labour man, and he has an opportunity to see that more practical men from the factories are given positions in these offices.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The two examples brought forward by the hon. member for Cape Breton South bring to my mind a great many thoughts in regard to returned men. I wonder if the Minister of Pensions and National Health would tell the committee whether or not precautions are taken as rapidly as possible to see that such injustices to returned men are rendered impossible. It seems to me that to make returned men ineligible for the benefits of unemployment insurance because they were in the king's uniform instead of being in the ranks of labour is nothing but a blot on our whole way of doing things. Could we have some word from the minister of pensions or the Minister of Labour in this regard? I am astonished that we should have allowed to develop in the country a set of circumstances under which men are discriminated against as were the two to whom the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred. Can the minister of pensions tell the committee what precautions are taken to ensure that this does not happen?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to discuss that in detail tomorrow when my estimates are up.

Mr. GRAYDON: With respect to the unemployment insurance vote, as I understand it, the offices of the unemployment insurance organization form the nucleus for the national selective service. I endorse at least that part of the speech which I heard of the hon. member for New Westminster. I was just coming into the chamber as he was progressing with his argument. One of the grave difficulties; one of the great complaints that come to me and other hon. members of the house, is with regard to the quality of the personnel, in some instances, chosen by the government in connection with national selective service and unemployment insurance work. It is not fair to make a blanket criticism of all local offices of the organization, but it is important to bear this in mind. If ever there were a place where people of the right type were required to handle work of this description, it is in the offices of the unemployment insurance or the national selective service, because I am convinced that either success or failure depends largely upon the relations that are created between, on the one hand, employer or employee and, on the other hand, the general public. Too much care cannot be exercised by the government in the choice of these men. One fault I find with the government is that all this matter of national selective service, coupled as it is with unemployment insurance offices, started far too late as far as the war effort is concerned. One of the difficulties that the minister now has is to find the right men. Men are not as easy to find as they were at one time. As the hon. member for New Westminster will readily admit, the minister is having difficulty in getting the right type of men for the local offices and the general organization. It is not sufficient for the minister to say that he is having a good deal of trouble on that score because the government's policy, framed as it was, has made it impossible to get the men who normally should have been got at an earlier stage.

I simply rose to endorse the principles laid down by the hon. member for New Westminster. The complaint that is made is that too often the wrong people are attempting to carry on this work throughout Canada. It has been one of the blots on the whole situation in connection with these offices throughout the dominion. Returns have been brought down which show, if one reads between the lines, the difficulty which the minister is having, and it is a difficulty which he need not blame upon misfortune or chance, because the government of which he is a member must, in my opinion, take responsibility for the fact that the work was started far too late and that too little was done in the earlier stages in connection with both national selective service and the organization of these offices which have to do with that end of the work.

I conclude my remarks by saying to the minister that there is much to be desired with regard to the whole question of local offices as far as these organizations go.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thank the hon. member for New Westminster for the suggestion he has made. There is a great deal to be said in favour of it. I agree with him, and in the last six or seven months we have been taking greater cognizance of the aspect of the problem which he has mentioned.

May I say to the leader of the opposition that unfortunately many of the men we should like to get are in the armed services, and the government cannot be blamed for that.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do blame the government in this way, that national selective service started too late. That is the root of the whole trouble.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have made some study of unemployment insurance in Great Britain for many years. I do not say that in any boastful way. When they started in Britain they took in only seven or eight trades. We established our unemployment insurance system in 1941, and I think it was the best and biggest organization job ever done in this country. I believe it will compare favourably with what has been done in any country in the world, in the speed with which the organization was set up and in the way in which it has functioned; I think that statement will meet the approval of impartial observers anywhere. Of course we started on a much larger scale, in conformity with the size of the country, than they did in Britain.

Let me say this, as I have said in other places. People are not fence posts or bottles of milk. You cannot push them around; they are human beings. While engineers and people of that kind have done magnificent things in a material sense, the engineering of men and women is a much more difficult problem than the engineering of material things. As I said earlier, what we hope to get out of this on the whole is an organization of what I might call experts in the engineering of men and women, because, after all, it is only chance that the fellow who is on this side of the desk in an unemployment insurance office is not on the other side of the desk, asking for a job. I think I can say that in the long run we have to sell service to the people of Canada, who are responsible for the creation of this organization.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I, too, believe that the hon. member for New Westminster did well to bring this matter to the attention of the committee. I have had the feeling also that altogether too much attention has been paid to academic qualifications and certain rules and regulations, and not nearly enough to the stuff of which the individual concerned is made. I should like to commend the minister if he is causing more attention to be paid the human element, and not so much to the question of educational qualifications.

Mr. MacINNIS: Since we are working overtime, and there is no pay for it, there is no reason why I should not get into this discussion, though I am not going to take very much time. I agree with the minister that the unemployment insurance commission has done a difficult job at least fairly well. In anything I have had to do with the commission, in anything I have taken up with the chairman, the difficulty has been straightened out very quickly, and infinite pains have been taken in doing so. I think we must agree, however, that to find people not only with academic training but with training in dealing with men and women is not an easy task, and we are not going to get those men and women any more easily by reducing the educational qualifications. What we need is not less but more education; then we shall have more people from whom to choose. These difficulties will remain until the people as a whole have acquired a social way of looking at these matters. I only rose to say that in the short time the commission has been functioning and in the abnormal circumstances which have prevailed, I believe a very good job has been done.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—

107. Government contribution to the unemployment insurance fund, $15,000,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How long do we intend to stay on to-night? It is after twelve o'clock now.

The CHAIRMAN: It is only my personal wish, but there are only two or three items left in the Department of Labour, and I thought it might be the desire of the committee to get through with those.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I just wanted to know where we were going; that was all.

Item agreed to.

THE WAR

PROGRESS OF ALLIED OPERATIONS—PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN FORCES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Since the statement I made a week ago on the military operations in Sicily, the offensive of the united nations has been intensified on a number of fronts. Our main interest at the moment naturally centres in Sicily, where Canadian forces are engaged. Before touching upon the progress that has since been made in Sicily, a word about the other theatres, in which there had been significant developments, may not be out of place.

In Russia, after sharp fighting and heavy German losses, the nazi summer offensive was quickly halted. In its stead, the Soviet army and air force have developed a powerful offensive against Orel. This strategic centre has been under German control for nearly two years. It is one of the most strongly fortified positions of the central front. The battle for Orel is a dramatic reminder of Russia's share in the total military effort of the united nations.

At the other side of the world, in the southwest Pacific, the present month has seen a sustained attack by Australian and United States forces against Japanese strongholds in New Guinea. In the Solomon islands, the United States forces have advanced northward, and are in fact besieging the main Japanese air base in that area. As more stepping stones are wrested from the Japanese, the offensive will be intensified against all the outlying areas north of Australia now under Japanese control.

In the northern Pacific, the Aleutian area has also seen heavier bombings of Japanese targets by United States and Canadian squadrons. Kiska, the last remaining Japanese outpost, an immediate menace to both Canada and the United States, is being attacked whenever weather conditions are favourable. Until the Japanese are driven out of Kiska, we may expect continued fighting in this area.

In the battle of the Atlantic, the arrangement for increased escorts by sea, and continuous cover by air, which have been in effect for some three months, have more than justified expectations.

Coming to the Mediterranean area, two weeks have now passed since the allied forces landed in Sicily. The second week of the invasion witnessed a continuation of the steady advance of the previous week. Town after town surrendered. Within the week, the number of axis prisoners taken increased to well over 50,000. The allied invasion forces extended their occupation from one-third to more than two-thirds of the island. Throughout, Canada's troops took a foremost part in the fighting. Their skill and determination have called forth the commendation of both General Montgomery and General Alexander.

At the beginning of the week, after joining forces at Enna, which is the hub of communications in central Sicily, Canadian and American formations continued to press north. Yesterday an American armoured division captured Palermo, the historic capital and largest city in Sicily. By the capture of Palermo, and the advances of American and Canadian units, large numbers of axis forces have been trapped in the western half of the island. Northeast of Enna, Canadian units encountered strong German resistance. Other of our forces have been taking part in the eighth army's tightening encirclement of Catania. The fall of Catania, which may be expected at any time, will compel the retreat of the axis forces towards Messina and the mainland of Italy. That retreat will lead inevitably to the occupation of the whole of Sicily.

The allied land advances on the island were supported throughout the week by intense allied air activity over the island and the Italian mainland. In these aerial operations, the Royal Canadian Air Force continued to play an important part. A Royal Canadian Air Force fighter squadron—a self-contained Canadian unit of the middle east forces—is now based on Sicily, and for some days has been operating in support of the forward elements of the allied armies. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) is adjutant of this squadron. There are, as well, in Sicily, many R.C.A.F. personnel not included in this squadron, but attached to R.A.F. units. During the week our bomber units, operating with General Doolittle's force in North Africa, participated in raids on Sicily and on the Italian mainland.

A week ago I referred to the officers and men of the Royal Canadian navy who took part in the landing operations in Sicily. Quite a number of these men are veterans of Dieppe and North Africa. They are still continuing to assist in landing supplies and reinforcements at different ports.

General McNaughton, who has just returned to England from the Mediterranean area, has described the assault upon Sicily as the most perfect example of combined operations in history. This statement is, in part, a merited tribute to the rigorous training and patient waiting of the Canadian forces which have served the longest under General McNaughton's command.

A significant development of the past week in Sicily was the establishment of an allied military government of the occupied territory. General Sir Harold Alexander was appointed military governor. In his first proclamation, General Alexander declared that the purpose of the allies was to deliver the people from the fascist regime, and restore Italy as a land of free people. He ordered the dissolution of all fascist organizations. In this proclamation will be found the basis upon which the allied nations aim to effect the liberation of Europe from Axis aggression, and from fascist domination.

A year ago, when parliament adjourned, the united nations had experienced nearly eight months of reverses and setbacks. This continent was immediately threatened from the west. On the east, enemy U-boats ranged destructively along our coast, and into the gulf and river St. Lawrence. As we leave today for our homes, we will carry with us very different impressions. The tide has definitely turned. Everywhere the forces of freedom have the initiative.

While our fears about its outcome have lessened, the war, in a more immediate way, has been brought closer than ever to us. All arms of our fighting services are now in the thick of the conflict. Our fighting men are certain to continue in action on many fronts, until the enemy has surrendered. No one can say for how long that may be. Our men face a terrible ordeal of battle. Until victory is achieved, above all else, they must command a singleness of purpose in our hearts and minds, and the utmost that our country can give in their support.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE OF MAXIMUM PAYMENT FROM $20 TO $25 A MONTH

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I wish to make a brief announcement on pensions for the aged and blind.

Early in the war we had a number of representations made, not only in this house but elsewhere, that the $20 maximum monthly pension payable under the Old Age Pension Act was too low under present conditions and should be increased either by adding to it the cost of living bonus or by some flat increase, say, to $25 per month. On November 14, 1941, I made a statement in this house announcing the government's policy in respect to these representations. In particular, I pointed out that there were substantial variations in cost of living and economic conditions as between the various provinces and in public opinion or social outlook amongst the people of the various provinces as to what is a reasonable amount of non-contributory pension to be paid to aged and blind persons; that several provinces were still paying considerably less than the maximum pension allowable under the act, and there was therefore in such provinces considerable leeway for increasing the average pension paid if the province felt it justifiable; and that in view of the colossal burden of war expenditure which the dominion was having to carry whereas the position of the provincial governments had greatly improved as a result of these war expenditures, it seemed only fair and reasonable that those provinces which felt that a higher pension should be paid should themselves pay it out of their own resources. I, therefore, indicated that if any of the provinces desired to supplement the old age pension paid in that province under our act, we would undertake to amend the regulations in such a way as to assure that such supplementary payments made by a province would not entail a reduction in the pension payable under our act.

Following this suggestion, I went on to say:

> Indeed the government is prepared to consider going further than this. It believes, for the reasons already outlined, it would be impossible to justify an increase in the maximum rate of pension payable if the whole cost were to be assumed by the dominion, and that such cases as appear to present immediate difficulties can be met by the provinces on the basis of established individual need. If, nevertheless, all or substantially all the provinces should make representations to the dominion government in favour of some increase in the maximum amount of pension payable, the additional cost to be shared between the dominion and the provinces on the same basis as the present cost, I can assure the committee that the government will be prepared to give consideration to such representations.

This was the substance of the policy I announced on November 14, 1941. Since that announcement was made, six provinces have provided for the payment of supplementary pensions: British Columbia and Alberta pay supplementary pensions of $5 a month; Saskatchewan (beginning July 1) and Manitoba of $1.25 a month; Ontario (beginning July 1) a percentage of the amount of pension paid; and Nova Scotia (beginning June 1) an amount up to $10 a month, based on the merits of the individual case, with limitation of total income, including allowance, to $365 per year.

These provisional supplementary pensions have gone a long way to help the situation in the provinces in which they are being paid. However, in pursuance of the paragraph of my statement which I have just quoted in full, we have received representations from an increasing number of provinces that the maximum pension payable should be raised, the maximum suggested in most cases being $25. On July 12, I received a letter from a province which brought the total number of provinces making such representations up to eight. Since that time the ninth province has made similar representations.

In view of the unanimity of attitude on the part of the provincial governments which has now been established, the dominion has decided that it should make legal provision for increasing the maximum pension payable under the scheme provided for in the act from $20 to $25 per month. There is not time to submit an amendment to the act in the closing hours of the session. Even if there were, as the whole subject of old age pensions and related matters is being studied by the special committee of the House of Commons on social security, it would probably be desirable to wait until a later stage before a legislative amendment making any permanent changes in the act were proposed. We therefore propose to make the provision which I have mentioned by means of an order in council under the War Measures Act.

This order in council will authorize the dominion to enter into supplementary agreements with the provinces, enabling a special war supplement not exceeding $5 per month to be paid, in addition to the regular pension payable under the act as it stands at present. All the terms and conditions under which the present pensions are payable, including the present sharing of the amount of pensions paid in the ratio of 75 per cent and 25 per cent by the dominion and the provinces respectively, and the provisions regarding maximum total income, will be continued, except for the appropriate adjustment in regard to the provisions of the act covering maximum pension and allowable outside income. In so far as the dominion is concerned, the supplementary war pension need not disturb the supplementary pensions now being paid in several of the provinces; that is entirely a matter for the decision of the provincial governments concerned.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

It is intended that the new provision will come into operation at the earliest practicable date. It will, however, take a few weeks to work out the necessary supplementary agreements with the provinces and to enable the provinces to set up the necessary machinery for handling the payments.

At March 31, 1943, there were 183,601 old age pensioners and 6,374 blind pensioners, or a total of 189,975. If a supplementary war pension of $5 were paid to all such pensioners the total annual cost would be $11,398,500. The dominion's share, on this basis, would be 75 per cent of this, or $8,548,875 in a full year. Actually, however, total cost and the share of the dominion will be less than this, because in a considerable number of cases outside income accruing to the pensioner will not permit the raising of the present pension, at least not by the full amount of $5 per month.

The extra cost to the dominion will, of course, be a charge against the war appropriation.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to make a remark and perhaps ask the minister a question? He spoke of the percentage increase which the province of Ontario evidently had been granting on its own prior to this time as a supplementary pension. I take it that is what the minister meant.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was effective July 1, I think.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, I think that was what the minister said. In his statement the minister mentioned that one province had made representations to the government and then another province had made similar representations until finally representations had been received from nine provinces in all.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GRAYDON: But the minister did not indicate which provinces were the eighth and ninth—in other words, the last provinces to make representations on this score.

Mr. ILSLEY: I could give the order in which they made their representations, if it has any relevancy. Prince Edward Island was the last province, but it must be borne in mind that that province has never found itself able to afford very much in the way of old age pensions and they have not been paying an amount anywhere near to the maximum.

Mr. GRAYDON: Which was the eighth province?

Mr. ILSLEY: The province of Quebec.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): I have received some correspondence from the province of British Columbia and the province of Nova Scotia. The premier of British Columbia wrote:

In view of the circumstances the provincial government approves not only of a minimum of $30 a month for aged persons but of the lowering of the age limit to take in persons of sixty-five years and over.

The Premier of Nova Scotia wrote me as follows:

This province has already requested the government at Ottawa to increase the amount of old age pensions. In addition we have passed legislation at the present session, which gives the department under which the old age pensions act functions the authority to pay up to $30 per month. This, of course, is entirely dependent on what the federal government is doing or will do.

So that the two provinces on the east and west coasts were definite in the representations for a pension of $30 a month.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct. The province of Nova Scotia did not request the dominion government to authorize a maximum pension of $30, nor does that letter say so. The province of Nova Scotia has authorized a supplemental allowance not exceeding $10 a month, depending upon the merits of the case. It is wholly discretionary with the pension authorities of the province. Their request was for an increase in the maximum under the Old Age Pension Act to $25 a month, and the correspondence has been tabled.

Mr. McGEER: I was only quoting from the letter I received.

Mr. ILSLEY: What I have said is consistent with the letter.

Mr. McGEER: I should like to put the complete letters on the record. The premier of Nova Scotia writes from Halifax, April 9, as follows—

Mr. SPEAKER: At this time such a matter cannot be entertained.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister a question by way of clarification. What will this mean for the old age pensioner in Ontario? How much will he or she now receive?

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as someone will be shut off from discussing this question now, should not the whole discussion be left over until the item in the minister's estimates is reached?

BUTTER

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—MARKET AND STORAGE FACILITIES

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Yesterday the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) asked a question based on a news report he had seen that a carload of butter shipped from the Morell co-operative creamery in Prince Edward Island to the mainland was returned with the blunt statement, according to the press report, "No market, all storage filled up." It has been impossible to get all the details in the time that has elapsed since yesterday morning, but some of the pertinent facts are known. This creamery may have shipped the butter and it may have been returned, but if so, the creamery company made a mistake in doing so. They were advised late in April that the dairy products board were prepared to accept all butter offered for sale that might not be marketed elsewhere, at prices set out in the order. All that this company had to do was to advise the dairy products board and it would have been directed where to send the butter and would have received 33¾ cents a pound for delivery in the month of July. So far as my information goes I think there was an error or perhaps an oversight on the part of the creamery in shipping the butter in the manner in which they did.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Can the minister say whether the creamery did get in touch with the dairy products board?

Mr. CRERAR: They did not get in touch with the dairy products board, according to the advice given me.

CANADIAN FORCES

INCREASES OF PAY FOR WOMEN'S SERVICES

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I told the house the other day that I would endeavour to make a statement with regard to the pay of the various women's services in the armed forces. I wish to state that certain increases have been approved with effect July 1, 1943. The basic pay for women will be 80 per cent of that paid men in the armed forces instead of 66⅔ per cent as in the past. Pay for women in all three services will be uniform in the future, and will be increased at the end of four months' and six months' service subject to good conduct and efficiency. That is, pay of the women of the services will start at $1.05 per day and be increased to $1.20 per day at the end of six months' efficient service.

In addition to the increase in rates of pay there will be certain other financial benefits available in future. Women will receive trades pay according to their grouping on the same basis and at the same rates as men. Staff and special duty pay will be on the same basis as in the men's branches of the services. Dependents of women in the services other than husbands and children will be eligible for the same rates of dependents' allowances as the dependents of men. That is, dependent parents or other close relatives may receive the allowance.

In future—this is a point which has had a good deal of discussion both outside and in this house—a woman in the services married to another member of the service will not be debarred from receiving dependents' allowance, with the proviso that the woman's total income including the dependents' allowance is not to exceed $2,100, but that those already in the service who have been married for only a short period or who may marry in the future will not receive dependents' allowance until six months after the marriage date.

In the past it has not been permissible for an officer or man in any of the armed services to have the allowance paid to his wife if she too was serving, although it could be made to a wife employed in a civilian capacity.

The maximum income of $2,100 which I have just mentioned in connection with allowances does not include assigned pay.

The increases at the end of four and six months' good service which I have mentioned are similar to those paid soldiers in the army.

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO AGRICULTURAL LEAVE

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): On another matter, Mr. Speaker, I said I hoped to be able to make some announcement. I am not able to make a statement in detail here, but I can give the outlines of an announcement which will be made in the press as soon as the order is completed. It has to do with arrangements which are being made and authority which is being given with respect to assistance in agricultural operations by certain members of the forces.

Provision is being made to provide assistance in agricultural help, first, by way of compassionate leave, which I think I have already explained to the house and which is applicable in individual cases where there is hardship in connection with a particular farm or family; second, by detailing men from certain units or certain formations in the armed services to do work as directed by the Department of Labour. It has been decided to decentralize as far as possible this activity. Complaints have been made, and I know that sometimes they are well founded and sometimes the delay could not have been avoided, with regard to the time taken to have certain applications come to headquarters and be dealt with and then further representations asked for. What we are endeavouring to do is to place this matter in the hands of the general officers commanding in the two commands and in the districts. We feel that, with the experience they have had, it ought to be possible for them to bring to bear judgment as to the general uniform policy of the department and at the same time to give consideration to the needs as they exist, along with the necessity of deciding on the ground as to the exigencies of the service and whether men can be spared. So that the new provision which is being made for detailing men is to be administered by the general officers commanding and the district officers commanding. The provision is that men will be detailed—not given leave, and that they cannot be detailed from training centres: that is a sina qua non which we cannot forgo. From the operational units men may be detailed up to ten per cent of the strength of the units, and from depots and other formations outside of training centres the percentage is not necessarily limited to ten per cent, but it is as large a percentage as can be spared. In both cases there is a limitation, of course, that it is subject to the exigencies of the service as may be determined by the general officers commanding or the district officers commanding. The detailing is to be done at the request of the director of the dominion-provincial farm labour committee, and I understand he is representing the Department of Labour. The absence which will be provided for will be thirty days. There will be provision for extension if a case is made and if service conditions permit. Pay will be military service pay and allowances, and arrangements, I think, will be made under which, if the going rate in the particular locality is higher than that, it may be possible for the man to get the benefit of that additional rate. That is now being worked out between the Department of Labour and ourselves.

As I say, a fuller statement will be made in the press as soon as all the details are worked out.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What provision will be made for details that are set aside for this task of helping to take off the crop, with reference to the special clothing—overalls, gloves, boots and that sort of thing? Will they be provided with them or given extra money with which to buy them?

Mr. RALSTON: I assume that if army military stores are available, they will be issued with overalls.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the procedure for getting individual leave be the same as before, that application will be made to a man's commanding officer and from there to the district officer commanding?

Mr. RALSTON: To the district officer commanding, not headquarters.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

RECRUITING OF MEN FOR AIRCREW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): There are a couple of questions which I should like to direct to the government if the Prime Minister does not get ahead of me. One is to the Minister of National Defence for Air. Having in mind the minister's previous warning with respect to the anticipated difficulties of obtaining sufficient men for aircrew, coupled with the allegations made in this week's Financial Post that the Canadian air ministry has been battling with army authorities to get priority to enlist category A men for aircrew, will the minister make a statement to the house indicating such changes in the situation as have developed since he last reviewed it for us? I should like also to inquire of the minister as to the steps the government has in mind to avoid this prospective curtailment of the air training programme.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of this question, and perhaps I had better proceed by way of a statement.

In January of this year, as a result of an intensive recruiting campaign carried on last autumn, the R.C.A.F. had a substantial reserve of many thousands of volunteers for aircrew training. These were on leave without pay to be called up later on, or employed in duties other than training for aircrew. In order to permit absorption of this reserve and in order that the period before candidates begin training might not be too long, recruiting for aircrew was not urgently pressed during the months of January and February. During the months of April, May and June there has been a noticeable falling-off in the number of those coming forward for aircrew training. In fact, we have now reached the point where we are obtaining less than half our current monthly requirements. We must state frankly that we are seriously alarmed at the lack of recruits coming forward in a constant stream sufficient to meet our current requirements. In other words, at the present time we are "eating our fat" and not building up any reserve strength. That is the situation. Now, as to the steps being taken—

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister spoke of obtaining "less then half our current monthly requirements." Would he mind telling us just what the monthly requirements are?

Mr. POWER: I am afraid I cannot.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is all right.

Mr. POWER: That, perhaps, would be giving away to the enemy the number of persons whom we propose to train for aircrew during the year, and it would be giving away the battle order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I had in mind that the minister had done it before, but perhaps he had not.

Mr. POWER: As to the steps being taken, we have inaugurated an energetic campaign to recruit aircrew. We are remustering from ground crew within the ranks of the R.C.A.F. a very large number. Last month 761 ground crew were remustered from ground crew to air training. As I have already announced in the house on several occasions, we anticipate that this will be a fruitful source of potential flying men, though I by no means give any guarantee that those remustering will be sufficient to meet our requirements.

It is estimated that there are a very large number of young men of aircrew age and fitness in both essential and unessential industries. Many of these are persons who embarked on an industrial career before they reached the callable age and have since become important cogs in the industrial machine, to such an extent that employers are sometimes reluctant to permit them to enlist, and in some cases have categorized them as key men. An industrial mobilization survey is now being undertaken by the national selective service in all the industrial plants in the dominion. The Royal Canadian Air Force will be represented on this survey, and has hopes that with the cooperation of employers and the patriotic response of these young men, when the priority of need for their services as aircrew over that in industry is pointed out to them, will result in a new influx of recruits for flying training.

Generally speaking, the house can rest assured that every step will be taken and every effort will be made to see to it that Canada continues to supply an important quota to the air training plan and bearing in mind the fact, which has many times been stated in this house, that the field for aircrew recruiting is necessarily a restricted one, by reason of the requirements of age, fitness, mental alertness and motivation, Canada will continue to keep up the flow of pilots, navigators, air gunners, wireless operator air gunners, bombers, to our own R.C.A.F. squadrons and to the R.A.F. squadrons so that they will continue to strike the devastating blows which are shaking the axis powers to their very foundations.

Needless, to say, there is no battle between the army authorities and those of the R.C.A.F. We endeavour to work out our problems in a cooperative way, and the personnel and officers of the army and the R.C.A.F. are constantly meeting most amicably to that end. We may not always agree, but we are not fighting, and we hope by means of cooperation to work out our mutual problems satisfactorily.

Mr. WOOD: With reference to the minister's statement in regard to the obtaining of aircrew, I have on my desk a letter from a young man, a graduate of McMaster university, who is very anxious to transfer from the army to the aircrew. He informs me that he has been making an effort for some time but has not been able to get anywhere. Could the minister advise me of any method which I could recommend to this young man whereby his desire might be satisfied.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend asking me the question? I have no idea about the case. There have been a number of cases of transfer, but my hon. friend and the public will understand that when men have trained for a considerable period for one arm of the service it does not seem to be desirable to have them transferred because they desire the change. If my hon. friend wishes to bring the case to my attention I shall be glad to look into it. Was he called up?

Mr. WOOD: No.

Mr. RALSTON: If he was called up he had an opportunity of joining the air force rather than the army prior to the time he actually reported for medical examination. He could have joined the air force instead of joining the army. Transfers are made even overseas from the army to the air force where men are specially fitted for the purpose or where there are circumstances which in the opinion of the army commander justify the change. Every case has to be dealt with on its merits.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are facilities being afforded, so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, to allow all who are in Canada to be given an opportunity of enlisting in the air force regardless of the manner in which they came into the army?

Mr. RALSTON: No. I am a little surprised that my hon. friend asks that question. Surely the hon. member does not suggest that everyone in the army be given an opportunity, no matter how long he has been in that arm of the service or what position he occupies, to transfer to another arm.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not suggest that. Perhaps I did not make the point clear. The question is one of priority, whether or not the air force is so badly in need of men whom they are not able to get. I wondered what facilities were afforded to supply men from one branch to the other. It is a question of priority.

Mr. RALSTON: It is difficult for the army to enlist, train and post men for general service and then have them transfer to some other arm of the service. It would be only in special cases that this would be done, having regard to the army's own obligations and its own commitments, not only to our partners but to our men overseas. We have to provide reinforcements, and it is these very men whom we expect to provide those reinforcements.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

OUTSTANDING ORDERS FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) kindly give the house a list of the orders for returns and orders for the production of papers which have not yet been tabled this session. I sent him notice of this request so that he would be prepared perhaps to give me some information on this point to-day. There was a question by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) which was passed as an order for return and about which I spoke privately to the Minister of National Defence. Perhaps he might give me some information in that regard.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I did not ask this morning about it, though I did inquire yesterday, and I understood that there was a great deal of information to be obtained. Perhaps the member for Halifax could say.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member was anxious to have as much information as could be obtained before the house rose, and conceivably the minister might see me privately with respect to the matter and give me some information.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall be glad to talk to my hon. friend about it.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): As regards that portion of the question which is directed to myself, the hon. member did give me notice, but I regret to say that between the time of the notice and the present moment no opportunity has been given to prepare the list. However, I shall be glad to prepare one, and perhaps with the consent of the house, without the formal necessity of reverting to motions, I might table it and supply my hon. friend with a copy. Generally speaking, the number of orders for returns this session was 543; answers to 518 have been tabled, leaving 25 outstanding.

NATIONAL PHYSICAL FITNESS ACT

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNCIL FOR THE PROMOTION OF PHYSICAL FITNESS—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 138, to establish a council for the purpose of promoting national fitness.

He said: The amendments are entirely improvements in the drafting of some of the clauses of the bill and do not affect in any vital way the principle. The title is altered so that the act is known as the National Physical Fitness Act. The other amendments are, as I say, improvements in the drafting of the legislation and do not in the slightest degree affect the principle.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

193. Departmental administration, $139,321.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no desire to delay the passing of these estimates; rather am I desirous of facilitating them so far as the national interest permits, but I should like to support what was said yesterday on the orders of the day by the hon. member for Broadview in regard to members of the Northwest Field Force. If I understand correctly the minister's explanation, these men as to pension are placed in the same position as any other soldiers who served in the South African campaign, the last war or, the present war, and I can quite see the minister's position in the technical answer he gave with regard to pensions. I am wondering, however, if there is not something that goes perhaps a little further than what has been actually discussed. These men served as early as 1885, if my memory serves me correctly.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): That is correct.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am wondering whether the difficulty may not arise to a large extent in connection with these men being able to attribute their disabilities to service in that particular theatre of war. That is one question I should like to ask the minister, because it may be germane to the discussion in regard to pensions for these men. It is hard enough to produce evidence of attributability in connection with the war which concluded twenty-five years ago. When one adds the years which have intervened since 1885 I have no doubt these men must find great difficulty in presenting any evidence on which they might base a claim that their disabilities are attributable to war service. That is the first point.

Then the minister raised a point in connection with the war veterans' allowance. As this committee well knows, the basis of a claim for the war veterans' allowance, or the burnt-out pension, as it is commonly called, is that the man must have seen service in an actual theatre of war, and it has been decided that those who saw service in England only in the last war may not properly apply for this allowance. I am not so sure that before long the minister will not have to review that position, but I do not want to bring that subject into this discussion. I do not believe the minister is confronted with an insurmountable difficulty in establishing an actual theatre of war in connection with the Northwest Field Force. It is true that this campaign was not on the scale of subsequent wars; nevertheless it was an important campaign from many points of view. I should not think the minister would find it very difficult to have the northwest area established as an actual theatre of war. In effect it was a theatre of war, because fighting took place there.

The minister has given the technical reasons for not extending the war veterans' allowance to those who served in England during the last war. I am not arguing in favour of that at the moment, because I am afraid I have not always been able to see the distinction, but at least during the last war there was not hand to hand combat with the enemy on land in England. Perhaps the minister and the department have based their ruling in this connection on the fact that England could not be regarded technically as an actual theatre of war. But I take it that veterans of the South African war are entitled to apply for the war veterans' allowance; I believe that was provided in an amendment which was made not long ago. If the South African veterans are permitted to make application for this allowance, it seems to me that the distinction between their case and that of the Northwest Field Force is not very great. Certainly having in mind the number of these older, what we might call senior, veterans who would be involved, I am inclined to think that during the recess the minister might give careful consideration to the matter and if possible permit the war veterans' allowance to be extended to these men, not only by reason of their entitlement but for what I fancy would be another cogent reason, that is, the difficulty that most of these men will encounter in making application for pension in the ordinary way, in presenting proof of attributability to war service. No such proof is required in connection with the war veterans' allowance, and the restrictions on the granting of that allowance are of course much less severe from the point of view of the applicant.

I want to place these points before the minister with great earnestness. There are not many of these veterans left, I think only some three hundred, and in all fairness to them we should take the position that they are entitled to make application now under the burnt-out pension arrangements, in view of the facts I have stated.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have not the slightest fault to find with the remarks of my hon. friend; I think he has stated the position clearly and with accuracy. There would be no objection whatever to meeting this claim except for the implications that would be created in regard to other cases. After all, we have 193,105 men who served in Canada only during the last war. This claim is very small in itself; really it is largely sentimental, because most of these men are entitled to the old age pension and I would imagine most of them are drawing that pension now. The benefit they would gain through coming under the veterans' allowance act would be very small; it would consist chiefly in the allowance to the widow for one year after death.

Mr. GRAYDON: They would be entitled to $40 a month, would they not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There would be a difference in the case of some married men. I think the issue is largely sentimental, and in themselves the financial considerations are very small indeed. It would mean, however, that later on the house would have to be prepared to meet the claims of those who had served only in Canada or England during the last war. It would be a measure of social security, and perhaps it will have to come, but that is the implication in doing this for these few survivors of the northwest rebellion. Personally I am not opposed to it at all. But I do say that the principle of veterans' allowances was that a man's age was shortened because of what he suffered in actual warfare, trench warfare, in the great war. It was considered that he was burnt-out and prematurely aged, and as such the old age pension was extended to him at an earlier age. Well, if that is to be extended for all the veterans of the great war, it is another matter. This request could easily be met, but it would involve a larger issue.

Mr. STIRLING: Is not the difference the fact that there was fighting in the northwest rebellion and that there was no fighting in Canada for the 193,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think there were any conditions which prevailed in the northwest rebellion such as those which prevailed in trench warfare of the great war. There they had conditions which merited special consideration, the same as the veterans of the South African war. But there were no conditions in the northwest rebellion which would induce the introduction of a bill such as that which was passed in 1930, known as the War Veterans' Allowance Act. These men were prematurely aged by the stress and strain and terrible conditions which existed in the war of 1914-18.

Mr. GRAYDON: I raised a purely hypothetical point, without having personal knowledge of the facts to which I alluded, other than by way of inference. These men experienced many difficulties in establishing their claim for pension, in view of the tremendous time which has elapsed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, not the slightest. I do not know of one claim pending to-day. I do not think there is any difficulty at all about that. The whole thing is the suggestion that, having fought for Canada within Canada, they should have the same rights under this act as all other Canadian veterans.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has referred to the fighting in the great war, but I would point out that in the north-west rebellion there was fighting in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There were many Canadians who served during the great war who are not eligible, under the act as we have it to-day.

Mr. GILLIS: While the men who served in the Riel rebellion are certainly entitled to some compensation from the country for the services they rendered, I think that at this time to relate their service to disability from participation in a war is an impossibility. Furthermore, the condition in which these people now find themselves is a reflection on the government of that day. It is rather late to raise the question of pension for men who served during that time. Besides, I am opposed to shelving questions connected with social security by trying to dump them under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. In the past twenty-five years we have shirked our responsibility in the field of social security generally, by trying to handle the whole problem in a disjointed fashion. Under the act as it now stands, service in a theatre of war is not the only qualifying clause. The men who served in Canada or in England, if in receipt of a 5 per cent pension, are also entitled to veterans' allowance. I should imagine that if one were to go over the list of those in receipt of war veterans' allowance he would find as many men on that list, as many men who served in Canada and in England, as there are men who served overseas in a theatre of war.

My experience has been that, by and large, the men who served in a theatre of war are regular pensioners. The other measure was brought in to cover men who suffered disease and disability which could not be attributed to service. I am absolutely opposed to classifying the War Veterans' Allowance Act as an old age pension act. I believe too much of that sort of thing is being done. In many instances war veterans, who come under the war veterans' allowance provisions, are being injured because the provinces and the federal government are using the War Veterans' Allowance Act as an old age pension measure. I have run into cases of the kind on several occasions, and I have no doubt the minister has too. The provincial government pays an old age pension to a wife, for example, of $15 or $20 a month. When the veterans' allowance is granted to the husband, instead of getting the $40 a month to which he is entitled under the act, the amount of the old age pension being paid in the province is deducted. This militates against the soldier, because it is being used as an old age pension.

I think the minister was correct when he said it is generally recognized by medical authorities that a man's life is shortened, by at least ten years, as a result of war service, and certain provision was made under the act to enable the veterans to receive something at the age of sixty. But I do not think it was ever the intention to deduct from the veterans the amount paid by the provinces to other members of a family by way of old age pension. The men who took part in the Riel rebellion were the victims of a faulty system; their position is a glaring example of the lack of interest on the part of past governments, and this is something which will have to be taken care of.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would my hon. hon. friend permit an interruption? He referred to the number of recipients under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. There were 1,841 who served in Canada and England only, out of a total of 24,192.

Mr. GILLIS: The point I wished to make, for the benefit of the leader of the opposition, was that overseas service in a theatre of actual war was not the only qualifying clause.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Correct.

Mr. GILLIS: In my opinion the men who served in the Riel rebellion, and any others in that category, will have to be covered by social security. I believe that is the answer to the question. This procedure of dumping everything into the Department of Pensions and National Health, as we have been doing for the past twenty-five years because there has been nowhere else to go, is bad practice. If the leader of the opposition is interested—and I know he is—he would do well to hold up both hands in support of a social security programme.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is one matter which I believe should be considered, and might best be considered under this item. May I first however refer briefly to what has been said by the minister and the hon. member for Cape Breton South with regard to the inadvisability of dumping into the War Veterans' Allowance Act problems having to do with social security. I should be inclined to agree with both of them, provided there were any immediate possibility of having social security in this country. But what is now happening, and has been happening for years, is that these men who fought, bled and now suffer are being allowed to go without the necessities of life, while Canada waits upon the introduction of a measure of social security. By the time we have adequate social security most of these men will be in their graves, and we shall have committed what in my judgment is a national crime. I have felt ever since these men went to war and returned from it that it was Canada's duty to take care of them. Never mind social security; if we cannot get it, at least let us take care of these men and their dependents.

Another matter I should like to discuss briefly is one which I hestitate to discuss at this late stage in the session, but one concerning which I believe something must be said. On July 12, when the Prime Minister was giving one of his glowing speeches, I rose and reminded him that Canada had not played fair with her returned men. The Prime Minister made remarks which indicated that I was making innuendoes and insinuations which I ought not to make without having sufficient evidence to support my statement. Before we finished the little passage between myself and the Prime Minister I promised that I would bring forth evidence before this session was over in full support of my statement. My words, as reported on page 4622 of Hansard were:

If I have said anything up to the present time which either by implication or by meaning could be construed as offensive or as inappropriate on this occasion, I withdraw it; but I give assurance to the house that at a later time I shall reassert it, because so far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, as one member of parliament I do not propose to neglect my bounden duty to the people who sent me here and to the soldiers who are fighting our war.

First of all, I shall read a quotation from a letter for which I vouch, which I have right here, written by a veteran of both wars. This letter is dated July 13, so that evidently this man lost no time sending it in. I have others, but I think this is probably better by far than anything else I have. I read:

In the first place I should tell you who I am and what authority I have for making these statements. I am a doctor of twenty-two years' experience. I served as a doctor in the last war and did not get overseas because of the influenza epidemic. I also served in this war but did not get overseas.

While serving at the Atlantic coast in various units I saw examined and boarded for discharge many fine young men who entered the active army—they were not draftees. These men were often subjected to rainy, foggy weather, often getting their clothes wet while guarding a coast so that our premier as well as all could rest in peace.

Many of these boys were on active service at the coast two years or more. Suddenly they get a terrible cold, fever and sore throat, tonsilitis or septic sore throat, followed by rheumatic fever or rheumatic arthritis.

May I interject here that even though these boys who are afflicted in this manner may not have seen the heat of battle, they have made a sacrifice for the country which puts the country under an obligation to see that they are provided for. I go on with the letter.

The policy of the army and government has been to date to discharge these men, one month's post discharge pay and to hell with them any more.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is entirely wrong.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This is a statement by a man who has been right through it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He does not know anything about it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not see how a man could know anything more about it than the man who had boarded these men.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am sorry to disagree with my hon. friend.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad to hear the minister say that. I shall go on with the letter.

Our government has taken the stand that there is no pension for service in Canada if disabled by disease.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not correct either.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The letter continues:

I ask you or any person in the democratic world if that is what we are fighting for? Every good soldier does what he is ordered to do. If sent overseas, he goes. If detailed for coast protection—then he does it. Why should any soldier on active service be penalized because his health broke down by service in Canada? I will except all venereal diseases.

I claim that all men are examined by men who are appointed by the military authorities who in turn are acting for the government. I claim that if once accepted and health breaks under the strain of the changed life that the government is responsible. I myself had an attack of coronary thrombosis and have not been able to do any work since. I have talked to ———.

I am going to leave out some names, but I can supply them privately to the minister. I think it is just as well that these names should not appear on Hansard because there will be plenty of malodorous results from some of these things. I continue:

This man has a nose like Major Hoople and shows that he is more interested in something else. He has never had a private practice of his own and has served for too many years. He even refused me a rehabilitation grant. I tried to take a post-graduate course after my discharge so I attended ——— university.

I am leaving out the name of the university. I continue:

Studying is mental work but not physical. I secured my D.P.H. degree (Doctor of Public Health) and I also have my L.G.M.C. All these are no good to me because I thought that I could do work if I removed the night calls.

Apparently this man found himself unequal to the task of carrying on even after he had done all he possibly could to prepare himself. The latter continues:

However, the refusal of rehabilitation was made direct by ———.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is he referring to the rehabilitation grant paid by the army, or to the rehabilitation benefits paid by this department?

Mr. BLACKMORE: All I know is what appears in the letter, and it is not sufficiently definite to enable me to answer the minister's question. I shall place this letter in the minister's hands so that he can examine it. A member of parliament, generally speaking, receiving a thing like this is in duty bound to consider it. I am simply passing it on. If I receive a letter of this sort from a man who looks dependable I think I ought to bring it up.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Has the hon. member brought this letter to my attention before now?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, I did not bring this to the minister's attention, largely because of the lateness of the session. I have brought cases to the minister's attention and although he has shown a lot of sympathy I have felt that he was bound by some hidden hand and I pretty well lost heart about taking things up with him.

I should like to read a passage from another letter for which I am prepared to vouch. This is by a veteran of the two wars. He says:

To-day, as always, you can look around you and see the poverty and rags of these veterans from the trenches. The deaf and disabled refused a pension and their pensions and their job handed out to a non-combatant for political reasons.

I cannot vouch for the statement regarding political reasons. I like to keep free of all offensive things like political struggles. I abhor them, I despise them, but they are there and I can do nothing about them. I am not going to talk about them, but this is this man's statement:

These men never out of Canada are not war veterans.

I do not know that I agree with the writer there.

They were never in the war. Recently there was a job open in Woodstock. The civil service made a big time. They need not have bothered. We veterans know. The man appointed got as far as England, says Ottawa. To England where we went on leave; to England where we went for fun, pastime and amusement; to England where we went when we were sick and wounded. We went. We, the slackers from the trenches. God save England. These men never out of Canada and those that got as far as England did nothing but eat our rations and take our jobs and our pensions. They met us when we were coming back.

Those are bitter words, but let it be borne in mind that they come from the lips of a veteran of the two wars.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is not complaining of this department; he is complaining of the civil service commission.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Possibly, but there are other things that apply to this department. I continue:

The Pension Act states: "That a pension should not be denied the veteran because no disabling condition existed at time of discharge". Just try and get it. His papers come back from Ottawa marked "Application refused" and no reason given except from some previous examination years before. If they did not intend to examine the veteran, why call him before the board, and having given him no examination on what do they base their claim of "Application refused"? You don't know and neither does the veteran, and this way of handling the veteran has not helped in any way, but only filled him with bitterness, and you can expect nothing else from disabled veterans who watch their families grow up in poverty unable to pay their way for the necessities of life, unable to secure employment on account of war handicaps and knowing of the graft in pensions and jobs handed out for political reward while we continue in our poverty, denied justice or assistance from the country we fought for. Is that what you have in store for those now fighting?

This is a lengthy document and I do not propose to read any more from it. I am sorry to say that my own experience of the treatment accorded to many veterans to whose cases I have endeavoured to have some consideration given has led me to sympathize with the remarks in this document. I will not say that the statements therein are entirely accurate but I will say that there is a cheeseparing, niggardly, inhuman way of dealing with veterans of this war which leaves much to be desired. I lay no blame on the men who are trying to administer the act; I am not in a position to blame them. I do not know that I would blame the minister. I think what we have to do is to blame the whole general attitude which seems to fill the mind of the government and seems to fill too many minds in this country—an attitude which endeavours to treat these men just as cheaply and as niggardly as we possibly can and still get by under the act.

I have had experience in my own constituency with men whose treatment simply revolted every fibre of my being. Let me mention one of them. Just this last year he was receiving a war veteran's allowance. I do not think I had better give any details about what this man is doing, because I find that when knowledge comes to be had regarding some of these men they do not get on so well after that. This man is in receipt of a war veteran's allowance. The way in which the inspectors go around and poke their noses into his affairs and watch and scrutinize every little movement he makes for fear he is going to make five or ten cents more than what the act says he can is simply astounding. This man said he had a chance this year—I am not going to tell what the work was—to go and do some very necessary war work in connection with agriculture. He could work in the harvest field—I will go no further. This man could have had about fifteen days' work, but if I remember correctly he had to stop work at five and a half days of work. He was quite able to do the work out in the fields, and the farmer needed him, but he had to stop work at five and a half days, or some of his war veteran's allowance would be sneaked away from him on the plea that he had accepted more than the amount of money which the law laid down as being the limit. I am not going to say that the men who were administering the law were not strictly within their rights, but I say that a government that takes such an attitude and forces its officers to take it certainly has a whole lot to learn.

I think the minister is doing everything in his power to make the act better. I am not complaining against him at all; I want him to understand that. But he knows certainly how many, many things in this country ought to be made right in order to give the men who fought our war last time and the men who are fighting our war this time anything like a fair chance.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that I have said enough to support what I said to the Prime Minister, and I will say no more, except that I hope this house will see that a great deal more generous treatment is meted out to every man who served in the last war and to every man who serves in this war.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not going to make a speech at this stage. I merely want to inform the hon. member for Lethbridge that the instructions issued throughout the Department of Pensions and National Health are that every possible consideration must be given to every individual case. These are the instructions given by the minister, and these are the instructions carried out by all members and staff of the pension board and all the veterans' allowance boards. Every single member of these boards is a veteran of the great war. In the four years that I have been in the department I have found nothing but the utmost desire to administer all the statutes and the regulations for the benefit of the veteran and his dependents.

Mr. KUHL: Within certain financial limitations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There are no financial limitations placed on the Department of Pensions and National Health in administering the act.

Mr. KUHL: You have only so much money to spend.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We get estimates of what is required from our own experts and they have never been turned down. Never has an estimate that has been brought in for pensions been turned down—never. In regard to health, yes, but in regard to pensions, never. Certain principles have been established by parliament, and within the ambit of the statute and the regulations we have never by virtue of financial considerations been denied by any government—this applies to former governments as well as this one—anything we required. I have found in this house all the time I have been here a unanimous desire upon the part of all members to do everything possible for these men. There are bound to be cases of hardship, but when they are brought to my attention every single thing that it is possible to do is done and will be done to provide a remedy.

The amazing thing is this. We have the best pension act and the best war veterans' allowance act, passed by all parties in the house, not only in the British empire but among the united nations as well, and in our preparations for rehabilitation we are ahead of the empire and all the united nations. When the empire parliamentary delegation were here they were immediate in their acceptance of that fact when they saw what we are trying to do. I am the first one to want to remedy any case of hardship. It is not a matter of government but of parliament and the humanitarian heart of this house. If there are any cases of hardship, and I include the cases which my hon. friend has mentioned which had not been brought to my attention before, they will be remedied if I have the power so to do. Anything that we can do for the men who fought the last war and for the men who are fighting this war and their dependents will be done.

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe East): I am not going to make a speech, but I cannot let the statements that have been made by the hon. member for Lethbridge go without a protest. As a veteran of the last war I want to say that his statements are a reflection on the men who fought in the last war and on all those who are administering pension legislation. It is unfair to those gentlemen to say that the administration of this act is niggardly or inhuman or something for which we should bow our heads in shame. Instead of reading extracts from letters which are not tabled, the names of whose writers are not given, if he would take those letters over to the commission, as other hon. members do, and get the other side, he would find that every man employed in the department is at all times most sympathetic and most willing to go very carefully into every case. I regret that circulation throughout the country should be given to remarks which are a reflection upon the administration of this act by a staff who, within the limits of this act which was passed by parliament after it was gone into thoroughly by a committee composed entirely of veterans of the last war, are giving the most sympathetic and generous administration which under the act can possibly be given.

Mr. QUELCH: There is one point I would like to draw to the minister's attention at this time. Under the Pensions Act as it is to-day, soldiers serving in Canada who become disabled are pensionable only if their dependents are in necessitous circumstances. I should like the minister to define exactly what is meant by "necessitous circumstances." Does it mean, for instance, that the soldier is an indigent? The minister will remember that during the sessions of the committee last year we discussed the question of free hospitalization, and it was stated that any soldier who was an indigent could receive free hospitalization. I asked, I think it was, Doctor Miller, to define "indigent", and he said, any soldier with an income of less than $1,000 a year. What I want to know from the minister is, will any soldier with an income of less than $1,000 a year be granted a pension provided he becomes disabled while serving in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not personally aware of the criterion that is being used by the board of pension commissioners. I am aware of the instructions which were given to them after section 11, subsection 3, was passed, and that was to be as liberal and generous as they possibly could in the interpretation of that section. I would have to consult the chairman of the pensions commission, who unfortunately is ill at the moment, with regard to the exact criterion they use in defining necessitous circumstances.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister would admit that if a soldier is indigent he would be in necessitous circumstances, and if that has been defined as represented by an income of less than $1,000, that should be the criterion by which we should judge necessitous circumstances. Have any applications for pensions been refused on the ground that a soldier was not in necessitous circumstances?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that there have been some. The percentage I have not under my hand; I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. KNOWLES: A good deal of the discussion we have had to-day and on other occasions as to whether or not veterans are getting proper treatment really relates to the terms of the act itself. We have been told this morning that the best possible administration is being given within the terms of the act. Has not the minister as the result of his experience realized the necessity, if not the desirability, of making changes in the act so as to make it possible to extend better treatment to veterans of the last war? I have in mind the kind of case of which we receive a great many, and refer them to the department and to the minister. I have a notion that the minister is sympathetic to our point of view. Often, where the pensionable disability resulting from the last war was minor, the amount the man is receiving is not sufficient to live on, and in recent years other disabilities have developed; and to a layman, to the veteran himself, to his friends, to anyone looking at it from a non-medical and non-technical point of view, it seems clear that the man's condition has deteriorated and that really it relates to his services in the last war. When we take it up with the department we get reconsideration, the case is looked into, but in due course case after case is turned down on medical grounds. We go to the minister and we are told that the best has been done within the act as passed by this parliament. Like other hon. members, I have many cases which I could raise here. I will not take the time to do so, but it does seem to me that the time has come for an overhaul of the act with a view of making better provision for the man who really is suffering as a result of the ordeal he went through in the last war, because his physical condition has deteriorated in recent years, and he ought to be receiving that consideration.

I should like to know whether the minister agrees with me, and whether anything has been done looking towards revision of the act along these lines.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In cases analogous to those mentioned by my hon. friend, where a man is in receipt of a pension and has developed secondary disabilities, he can in the case of a married man have the total augmented to $60 a month by war veterans' allowance, that is the pension plus allowance up to $60 a month, but so far as I recall the provisions of the statute itself, I do not think that secondary disabilities, unless caused by war service, are recognized in the assessment of a pension.

Mr. KNOWLES: This whole problem, as to whether these disabilities are caused by war service, is answered technically and medically "no", but to the layman it looks as though it was the result of the man's war service. It seems to me that some redefining of the terms of the act is long overdue.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would like to ask a question or two. First, may I refer to the hon. member for Simcoe East, who got up and read me a lecture.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think it is a fair statement that the hon. member referred to was giving a lecture. Nobody is trying to give a lecture, and I say so having listened attentively to what has passed. I hope we have now reached the stage where we shall avoid repetition. Some statements have been made a dozen times in this committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will withdraw the term "lecture", but I would say to the hon. member who resented the remarks I made, that I find always somebody ready to resent any remark which is made on behalf of people who are suffering. That has been my experience for a good many years.

I want to ask the minister one or two questions for my own information, to see whether I am right. How much is allowed a married veteran per month under the War Veterans' Allowance Act?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Forty dollars a month, which can be increased to $50 with casual earnings added. I think I went into this thoroughly when we were discussing the war appropriation. A single man is entitled to $20 per month plus $5 per month, plus casual earnings of $125 per year, or a maximum from all sources of $480; and a married man, accordingly.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I merely want the figures so I can draw a conclusion from them. A married man can get between $40 and $50, but not more than $50.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Plus casual earnings.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That allows him the possibility of an income of $600 a year. In addition to that, how much can a veteran earn on the side without forfeiting any of his war veterans' allowance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A married man can get $60 per month, plus $125 casual earnings, or a maximum of $845.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That would be the limit? Now, suppose such a man found himself in debt because of an accident, or because of any one of a dozen things which might overtake a married man, and his wife went out and took work at $10 per month, what would happen to him? Suppose he had that $845 coming in and then his wife went out and worked for $15 a month, what would happen to his war veterans' allowance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If the earnings were casual earnings they would be disregarded; if they were permanent earnings they would be taken into account according to the statute.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In other words, if the wife went out and worked for $15 a month he would be likely to lose $15 from his war veterans' allowance? That means that the family will be in an absolutely impossible position financially.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is paid that amount on her behalf and if she gets such income from some other source it is deducted.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then the family will be put in an impossible position. No matter how they scheme, whether they raise chickens and sell eggs or sell garden produce, no matter what they do, their income is absolutely limited from that time forward. I will submit that to any fair-minded man in this country or in this chamber and ask him whether that is a decent way to treat veterans.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I say one word. This is the most generous system of the kind in the world to-day.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then it is certainly high time the world mended its ways.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is my hon. friend's mission, probably.

Item agreed to.

Rehabilitation branch—

199. Veterans' welfare division, $129,744.

Mr. GILLIS: What is the department doing in the way of increasing the number of personnel in the offices of the welfare organization?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We are very much alive to the necessity of having welfare officers in all parts of Canada where they are required, and we are extending the service from time to time. We have now under consideration an extension of the services in my friend's constituency, in Sydney, I believe, and we hope to be able after two or three months to have one established there.

Item agreed to.

Direct payments to veterans and dependents—

200. European war pensions, $37,500,000.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to say a word with regard to section 32(a) as applied to widows who do not come under the arrangements now made under the additional appropriation to provide for those whose husbands might have qualified under the War Veteran's Allowance Act. There are a large number of women in Canada who are in poor circumstances and who are not provided for yet. With regard to section 32(a) and the limitation it places upon certain classifications of widows, women who marry after the time limit was set, to all intents and purposes these women are single so far as the pension regulations are concerned. There was quite a long discussion on section 32(a) before the pensions committee when it sat, revising and bringing up to date the Pension Act, and strong recommendations were made to the minister for the removal of section 32(a), or at least to bring it into conformity with the act as it applies now to the widows of veterans of this war. The recommendation was made that where they were in necessitous circumstances, regardless of that time limitation, they should be given the privilege extended to widows of this war.

One important matter I would bring to the minister's attention is this. Many veterans of the last war who came back suffering mentally were not provided with any kind of institution except the ordinary mental institutions of the country. I had the privilege of visiting one and I felt that it was certainly a lack of foresight on the part of the Canadian government to take men who were not insane in the real sense of the word, but merely suffering from shock, and put them in with mental patients of all descriptions. It is a horrible condition for a man to be placed in after receiving the shock he did while fighting for his country.

Listening to the Minister of National Defence for Air, I thought he made a very kindly statement. He pointed out that this was a shock war and therefore the problem of mental cases coming back will be magnified one hundred per cent. That applies particularly to the boys in the air. He pointed out that great difficulty was being experienced. Many of these boys who are coming back from service over there are in such a condition that it is hard to place them, and as time goes on, if that disability is not taken care of properly, I am afraid that we shall have to build mental institutions in this country. I suggest that the matter be taken into consideration and that proper neurological hospitals be established, with trained staffs to take care of cases of this kind.

I have a suggestion to offer. The statement of the Minister of National Defence for Air has proven conclusively, to my mind at any rate, that from the point of view of medical science, it is not certain what can be done with such cases. I suggest to the minister that as regards the air force boys now returning, every possible means that might be provided to bring relief to these boys should be studied. Two or three cases should be taken as test cases and chiropractic used in order to bring relief. I remember some years ago when the Chiropractic Association of Ontario made an offer to the provincial government. They were prepared to go to the mental institutions of the province in order to become legally qualified to practise in Ontario, and they said that they would make a test, guaranteeing to turn out of the mental institutions a certain percentage of cases as cured. That was to be the test. I do not know anything about it, but the Minister of National Defence for Air proved conclusively to me that so far as those cases that are now coming back are concerned, there is nothing to-day that will bring them relief. The whole matter is in the experimental stage. We should not lose any bets in trying all the facilities we have in order to bring some relief to these boys. I do not know anything about chiropractic, but after experience with many cases following the last war I had a good deal to do with assisting to write the legislation that is now on the statute books of the country. I sat in on the machinery that started the original War Veterans' Allowance Act, and I know that there are many men in Canada in mental institutions, victims of the last war, who should not be there. I sat in on that work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): So did I.

Mr. GILLIS: I know the minister did, and that is why I objected strenuously this morning to the effort to make provisions of this sort an old age pensions act. I know the purpose for which it is intended. In my opinion, institutions separate and apart should be provided for the men who are victims of shock from this war. I visualize a great deal of that in the future.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Every point raised by my hon. friend is receiving the anxious and sustained consideration of the department, both in regard to occupational centres and in regard to special buildings for psychopathic or the like cases. That is all receiving attention, and we have I think the best advice in the world in regard to all these matters. We are conscientiously pursuing the study of these points, looking for a solution.

Item agreed to.

204. Decoration awards—V.C. and D.C.M., $20,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With the permission of the committee I would ask that this item be amended by leaving out all the words after "awards". The reason is that other decorations in addition to those mentioned will be eligible for consideration, and I do not want to limit it.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I move accordingly.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Would the minister mind giving some more information in this connection. I have always understood that the Victoria Cross carried an award, but I did not know that applied to the distinguished conduct medal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to do so. The awards involved are as follows:

(A) Victoria Cross: £10 annuity plus £5 annuity for each bar, payable to ranks below commissioned ranks from the date of the act which earns the award. Navy, Army and Royal Air Force regulations provide for the annuity to be increased to the maximum of £75 including any other pension from public funds where officers and other ranks are incapable of earning a livelihood by reason of age or infirmity occasioned by a cause outside the recipient's control.

(B) Military cross, distinguished flying cross, distinguished conduct medal, distinguished flying medal: £20 gratuity plus £20 gratuity for each bar, payable to ranks below commissioned ranks on discharge, or on transfer to the reserve, or on promotion to commission, provided that they are not eligible for pension. Pension of sixpence a day may be granted in addition to service or disability pension to recipient of decoration at (A) or (B) above, except where decoration was granted for services rendered as commissioned officer.

(C) Conspicuous gallantry medal. Annuity of not more than £20 for petty officers or sergeants, and a gratuity of £20 for lower ratings or other ranks on discharge from or promotion to commissioned ranks.

HEALTH BRANCH

211. Health branch administration, $60,852.

Mr. QUELCH: I understand that a protest was made to the minister some time ago by the united electrical, radio and machine workers of America, union 521, regarding feeding conditions at the Ajax works in Pickering. I believe an investigation was made and conditions were found to be unsatisfactory. Apparently some measures were taken, because conditions improved. Now, however, the charge is made that conditions are worse than ever. I understand the catering is done by George Coles of Toronto, and that this is the only feeding place for a considerable distance. The charge is not only that the meals are poor but that the method of serving the meals is very unsanitary. A month ago something like sixty workers were taken ill with ptomaine poisoning. I think the minister will agree that few things will cause discontent more quickly than poor meals. The union has asked that the government take over the catering at that plant. I understand also that similar conditions prevail at the small arms plant at Long Branch, and I should like the minister to say whether any action is being taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In regard to the second point, two officers of the department are on their way to investigate conditions at Long Branch. I am not aware of the first matter to which the hon. gentleman referred at Pickering, but we will look into it immediately.

Item agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS GRANTS

236. Victorian Order of Nurses, $13,100.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Under one of these items I wanted to ask the minister if the government has given any consideration to granting a larger amount to one of these organizations, the health league or some other, to extend the work which has been done and which greatly needs to be done in reference to the combating of venereal disease. I have seen the results of some private surveys which have been made in some of our larger cities, and if the figures I have seen are correct the increase in venereal disease has been startling. I wonder if the minister has given any consideration to increasing the amount of money made available to meet this condition.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That has been done this year. For the last several years an item of $50,000 was provided for the distribution of arsenicals. That has been supplemented this year by a special vote of $175,000, making a total of $225,000, which I think is the most we have ever voted for this purpose.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The campaign is being carried on by whom?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Under Colonel Williams; under government sponsorship.

Item agreed to.

Health branch—

500. Financial assistance to the provinces under the National Fitness Act, $225,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would ask my colleague to move an amendment to this item.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I move.

That the word "physical" be inserted between the words "national" and "fitness".

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

466. To provide for the replacement of the Gaspe peninsula fisheries experimental station, $45,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister explain this item?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): Our fisheries experimental station at this point was burned.

Item agreed to.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT OF CANADA

336. Administration of soldier settlement and British family settlement, $542,930.

Mr. FAIR: Shall we call it one o'clock, or go on?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps hon. members would be agreeable to the having the house resume its sitting at two o'clock, by unanimous consent, this would enable us to be a little more certain as to the time of adjournment.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at two o'clock.

Mr. FAIR: Perhaps I shall have a chance, after three attempts, to say a few words on this question. Yesterday afternoon, just before the dinner recess, we started to discuss this matter, but the departments were switched, I believe for the convenience of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). At five minutes after one o'clock we were able to get back on this subject and I hope we shall be able to finish it up at this time. As I pointed out yesterday, we are fighting the greatest war in history, but I feel we are neglecting a number of the men who fought in the last war. Since coming to the house in 1935, I, along with the group to which I belong, have continually advocated that something more should be done for the men who went overseas to fight the battles of the last war. I think we all realize that had it not been for those men who fought in the last war, and were it not for those who are fighting in this war, we would not be able to sit here in comfort and discuss the matters we have discussed up to the present time.

The practice, in both the past and the present war, has been to recruit a number of men from the farms—in this war we are recruiting a number of women as well—to take part in the struggle at home and abroad. At the conclusion of the last war there were over 72,000 men who wanted to settle on the land. After quite a sifting out, we were able to settle 25,017 of these men. Those hon. members who were farming at that time will recall that when this settlement took place we had high land prices, high stock prices, high machinery prices; everything that went into the building up of a settler's home was at the very peak. Credit was extended to these soldiers to set themselves up, but on account of the policy which has been followed since that time in connection with agriculture these men have been faced with a condition over which they had absolutely no control.

I think it is now recognized that at the time of settlement a number of grave mistakes were made. A number of men were settled on the land who should never have been settled there. These men might have made a success in some other line of industry, but they were entirely unsuitable to life on the land. Many of them were placed on some of the poorest land in the western provinces. That was a mistake which could not be overcome by the settlers themselves. The total cost of the scheme at its inception was $109,034,331, and the rate of interest was fixed at five per cent. Five per cent may have looked all right to those who settled on the land at the time, but to-day we find that two per cent is considered good enough for those who make compulsory savings under the income tax act.

This and previous governments realized that mistakes had been made and consideration in different forms was given to these settlers. There was a consolidation of the loans and a little later a cancellation of interest charges. Later on there was a revaluation of the land, and then about 1930 there was a thirty per cent reduction in the loans. Still later there was the dollar for dollar bonus which was wiped out by the present government, I think about 1938. Then, still later the settlers were allowed to go before the farmers creditors' arrangement boards to have their debts adjusted. Up to December, 1941, about twenty-two years after the scheme was set in operation, the board had collected, not only from soldier settlers but from civilians and settlers under the British family scheme, an amount of $65,640,518. Up to that time the deductions which I have enumerated amounted to $47,518,215. At that time it was estimated that there could be salvaged from all settlers something like $30,000,000. This would represent an over-all loss of something like $13,000,000. I do not know the exact amount of the outstanding soldier settler loans, but I believe it would be ten or twelve million dollars.

During the period under review, from the inception of the scheme to December, 1941, the cost of administration was $25,910,495. Up to that time only 2,750 settlers had obtained title to their land. A number of others had sold out or got out because they could not see any way of getting title. As at December 31, 1941, 7,360 of the settlers who had been originally settled on the land still remained. Of these, 2,953 had an equity of 67·5 per cent; 606 had an equity of 32·2 per cent; 1,078 had an equity of 16·8 per cent, and 2,723 had no equity whatever. Breaking down these figures still further, we find that 3,801, or fifty-two per cent, had an equity of less than sixteen per cent in their holdings.

Now we come to the cruel part: Because they were unable to make a living; because they had wives and families to support, a number of these settlers enlisted for service in the present war. Many of these men were heavily in debt to the soldier settlement board, but without saying very much about it we find the government hiding behind a smoke-screen which one might call an order in council, and which makes provision that a certain amount of the dependents' allowance which rightfully belonged to the wives and families of men who had gone overseas was to be applied on the settlers' debt to the board. That, perhaps, is one way which the country took of showing its appreciation of the services of these men, and I do not think we should close our eyes either to the smoke-screen or to the government which is hiding behind it to-day. If anyone else had done a trick like that, if we had heard that it was done over in Germany, we would have said, "What an evil bunch of people those huns are." But we find that our present government, in order to take care of the almighty dollar, played a trick like that on our men who went overseas to fight for the second time; the almighty dollar took precedence over the health and happiness and welfare of the dependents of those men.

The order in council I refer to was passed, I believe, shortly after the war broke out. A little later on, in November, 1942, another order in council was passed, which gave the right to settlers who were still on the land to make application for adjustment of their debts. That is contained in the first section. The second section gives the settlers who enlisted in the present war the right to apply for a reduction of interest to 3½ per cent, which is the same rate as that extended to the proposed settlers under the Veterans' Land Act. I am wondering to-day and have wondered for quite a while why we could not have used the Bank of Canada for the creation of credit to finance this scheme and have given those settlers a rate of perhaps one per cent to cover the cost of operation of that account. I pointed out before that it was impossible for these settlers to make good, because they had bought at inflated prices and had continued to produce at below cost of production.

This question has been before the country for quite a while. The soldier settlers on the land are not organized, and because of that, as in the case of a number of other farmers, we find that they are the victims of an agricultural policy or lack of policy which has been in effect under the various governments.

Saskatchewan took the lead last April, and their settlers held a conference at Saskatoon on April 9. They were convinced that they could not make things go; they were not satisfied with their treatment. I shall read some of the resolutions which were passed at this conference. They are four in number, not very long, but rather effective. The first one is:

That we request all soldier settlers to withhold their applications for reduction and amortization under order in council P.C. 10472 and submit instead to the office of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Hon. T. A. Crerar), the following resolution:

"Whereas the majority of soldier settlers, although handicapped by poor crops and low prices, have already paid more than their land is worth to-day, they should now be relieved of their responsibility by the government."

I might say that these resolutions were forwarded to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Here is his answer, under date May 3, to resolution No. 1:

The essence of resolution No. 1 is that soldier settlers be given title to the lands covered by their contracts with the director of soldier settlement, the principle of which is that the Canadian taxpayers should single out a very small fraction of the total number of veterans of the last war for such treatment. Such a policy does not commend itself to the dominion government.

Resolution No. 2:

Whereas it has come to our notice that by order in council the soldier settlement board has been permitted to order deductions made from the pay and allowances of dependents of men now serving in the armed forces, to be applied against land and taxes.

Therefore we demand that the above order in council be rescinded immediately, and that any sums of money already so deducted be refunded.

The reply to that is :

With regard to resolution No. 2, no unfair deductions have been made from the assigned pay and allowance payable to dependents of members of the active service forces. At the present time there are 1,128 persons in the active forces whose dependents or representatives continue to occupy the lands which are under purchase contract from the director of soldier settlement. Of these, 279 have made voluntary assignments of amounts sufficient to meet the terms of their agreements, and in quite a number of cases of amounts which will accelerate payment for their farms. Eight hundred and four made no assignments but their agreements are nevertheless being met. In only 45 cases throughout the dominion are deductions in effect under the order in council to which you refer, but as an offset to such deductions the dependents concerned have the use of the farm and the revenue therefrom.

Resolution No. 3:

That this mass meeting of soldier settlers is opposed to any land settlement scheme for men of the armed forces serving in the present war and instead favours payment of an outright cash bonus to these men instead of saddling them with debt and interest charges.

The minister replies:

Regarding resolution No. 3, it is a matter of record that approximately 60,000 men now serving with the active forces have expressed a preference for land settlement upon their return to civil life. The Veterans' Land Act 1942 contains provision for a substantial grant to the settler upon the fulfilment of reasonable conditions. This seems to be an effective answer to the views expressed by your relatively small group at Saskatoon.

Might I pause here for a moment to comment that, unless an agricultural policy is made effective in this country which will guarantee cost of production to soldier settlers and other agriculturists, the men under the Veterans' Land Act must necessarily go on the rocks. I urge that precautions be taken now to put such an agricultural policy into effect.

Resolution No. 4:

That we condemn the threatening attitude adopted by officials of the soldier settlement board in collection of payments from soldier settlers.

This is the minister's reply:

Resolution No. 4 relates to collection policy, and I am reluctant to believe that threatening tactics are being resorted to in cases where there is inability to pay which results from factors beyond the control of the settlers concerned. In credit operations there are always a few cases where firmness is required in making collections, and in fairness to those who meet their obligations fully and on time the director of soldier settlement insists upon payment by those who are inclined to pay scant attention to their principal creditor.

In conclusion, I wish to observe that resolutions of this character are most unfair to the great majority of soldier settlers and they express a singular lack of understanding of all that has been done by succesive governments to overcome undue hardships which have confronted those who are established under the Soldier Settlement Act. I am quite prepared at all times to make inquiry into individual cases where it can be shown that there has been unfair treatment, but the generality of the resolutions you have submitted makes individual identification impossible. I trust, however, that the foregoing will place some of these matters in a more favourable light.

In commenting upon that reply, I would say that the soldier settlement officials are bound by government policy to make those collections; and as soon as government policy is fixed, I believe the officials, including the director and his assistants, will be only too glad to conform with any policy which may be adopted by the government. In the very near future we shall have a number of the men and women who are serving overseas coming back to settle on the land, so that I suggest that the government take immediate action. These cases of settlers harassed for the last twenty years are sticking up very prominently, and a number of us are witnesses of their cases, and know how they slaved over the last twenty years or more in trying to make their payments but were still unsuccessful. I feel that the government will be removing a cause of complaint among the new settlers by taking care of those already on the land.

There is a part of the reply to resolution No. 2 which I omitted to read. It is as follows:

The average voluntary assignment is $16 per month, and the average deduction by order in council is $14.20. Apparently the backers of this resolution did not take into account that there are thousands of dependents of enlisted men who are occupying rented homes in Canadian towns and cities for which they must pay regular rent. That is one of the purposes for which these allowances are made.

I omitted that, and I may also remark that when the returns were being made in answer to a question which I placed on the order paper, this and some other correspondence was omitted from the list supplied.

Following this, we have another meeting of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, Alberta provincial command. On June 6 to 9, at a provincial convention held in the memorial hall, Edmonton, some more resolutions were passed. I will read resolution No. 1:

Whereas the majority of original soldier settlers who are still endeavouring to carry on under the soldier settlement scheme, have now found it, owing to advanced years and the adverse conditions prevailing in agriculture, particularly the lack of parity prices, increasingly difficult to liquidate their indebtedness to the soldier settlement board;

And whereas the settlers have struggled on through years of drought conditions and low prices unprecedented in the agricultural history of this country and have now nothing to show for their years of toil and struggle but whatever equity they may have in the land which is liable for foreclosure;

Therefore be it resolved that we now petition the government to relieve the soldier settler of any further payments and that they be given the title deed to their land or, failing this, that a parliamentary committee in conjunction with representation from the dominion command of the Canadian Legion, review the whole situation of the soldier settler with a view to alleviating their present financial difficulties.

Resolution No. 2:

Whereas it has come to our notice that by order in council the soldier settlement board has been permitted to order deductions made from the pay and allowances of dependents of men now serving in the armed forces to be applied against land and taxes.

Therefore we ask that this order in council be rescinded immediately, and that any sums of money so deducted be refunded. . . .

[Mr. Fair.]

Comrade R. H. Inglis, Wetaskiwin, Chairman
Comrade S. Bowcott, Edmonton
Comrade J. G. Baker, Camrose
Comrade T. Sneddon, Calgary
Comrade Neil Donald, Barhead

The signatories are, I believe, the members of the soldier settlers committee.

While dealing with resolutions, may I read one which I placed on the order paper on February 15 last:

Whereas veterans of great war No. 1 who settled on land under the soldier settlement board scheme, as well as their wives and families, have in many instances suffered severe hardships because of purchase of land and equipment at inflationary prices, and,

Whereas the present agricultural policy does not guarantee cost of production.

Therefore be it resolved,—that, in the opinion of this house the government should take into consideration the advisability of giving clear title to soldier settlers still on the land who have paid to the board, either as principal or interest, an amount equal to fifty per cent of the original purchase price, and in the case of those who have paid less than fifty per cent, their outstanding debt to be reduced accordingly.

I am quite willing to amend that resolution to place it in line with those passed by the soldier settlers conference at Saskatoon on April 9 and the Alberta command of the legion at Edmonton on June 6 to 9. I feel that if each Canadian citizen were to put up one dollar in taxes, which he would never notice, for it is only a drop in the bucket compared with what we are contributing by way of taxation to-day, and of which I am not complaining, we could relieve these men who went over in 1914 to 1918 and wipe the slate clean. Let us give these men and women, after their twenty-odd years of struggle, something on account of the very great debt we owe them. It will cost us one dollar each to do it; let us do it before it is too late.

We find that in order to keep payments in good standing it was necessary for settlers to pay on their indebtedness 7·1 per cent of total indebtedness each year. In 1925 the average percentage paid was 3·75; in 1926, 5·63. May I point out that those were good years compared with what we have had since—very good years indeed, because in 1926 wheat averaged over $1.40 a bushel. Later on, that average was cut down to below forty cents, without taking into consideration the dollar. In 1931 the average payment was 3·52 per cent, approximately half of what they would have had to pay in order to keep their accounts in good standing; in 1932 the average was 2·79 per cent; in 1933, when prices were forced to very low levels, those men and women were able to pay 2·06 per cent. In 1933 wheat went down to 19½ cents a bushel in my territory for No. 1, and the average grade there was No. 4 tough, which netted us 12½ cents a bushel. Some of these people had to sell feed wheat, and in some cases where carload lots were shipped an amount had to be paid to the elevator company to take care of the freight charges, because the wheat, after being shipped to Fort William, did not sell for enough to take care of freight charges, without speaking of threshing and other expenses. The best grade hogs were sold at two cents a pound, eggs at three cents a dozen, butterfat at nine cents a pound. I ask the government, was it possible under those conditions, over which the government had at least some control, for these people to make a living and keep up their payments; and is it right that now, after all these hardships which have been endured, for the government still to insist that these people pay the last pound of flesh, the last dollar?

During the period when we had these low prices for agricultural products, what was happening to machinery prices? So far as I am aware there was only one year when the price of the farm machinery which these people were compelled to pay in order to produce was lowered, and then it was only about $5 on each implement they had to buy. So that I do not see any reasonableness whatever in compelling these people, who, as I said before, went over and fought so that we may enjoy the liberty we have to-day, being asked to complete their contracts. If they were not able to pay up during the twenty years they have been on the farms, what are the prospects under present conditions of clearing up their debts during the next twenty years? The approximate average age of these men is now, I believe, fifty-four years. Some of them are pretty close to seventy years old, and if we condemn them to another twenty years in the penitentiary, what is the use of their trying to live or eke out an existence? Let us take the humanitarian side of the question into consideration and forget the almighty dollar for once in our lives.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FAIR: There is plenty of time to carry this, Mr. Chairman.

We have waited all through this session until to-day for a chance to place the case of the soldier settler before the house, and if those who are in such a rush to carry this item want to carry it, perhaps they can go home. We can get along very well without them. From April 1, 1941, until March 31, 1943, 253 settlers signed quit-claim deeds and 108 other settlers were served with thirty-day notices. That means that they had to do certain things within thirty days or get out on the road. I do not know whether hon. members want this state of affairs to continue. Personally I do not, and if it is necessary I will pay more than that dollar in order to free these men and women of their indebtedness. I realize that a number are not able to pay more than that dollar; but the way in which money is being spent, if we take into consideration the millions passed in the estimates yesterday and those which so far have been passed to-day, I think we can slide through one more estimate of $12,000,000 to take care of this, if that is the amount. I believe it is below that at the present time.

There are to-day hundreds of thousands of men and women overseas. We are going to have a number of them back in the very near future; and before they come back, if we are not going to blush in shame, then I say, let us clean this blot off our books, because it is a blot that cannot be successfully denied.

This matter has been under the same department for some time. I am going to make a suggestion now and I hope it will be agreed to by the house and by the government. I believe we have officials administering the act who, with some sympathetic instructions from the government, would be only too glad to clear up these acounts and sign over the land to those who are still on it. As regards those who have already lost their land; those who have put in years on the land and finally were beaten, as were a number of other farmers, civilians, I would suggest that these men get consideration. But for those still on the land, let me ask that they be given clear title and also that this matter be transferred from the Department of Mines and Resources to the Department of Pensions.

I believe that in the Minister of Pensions and National Health we have a minister who is sympathetic and considerate, and if we have the matter under his department perhaps we shall get better consideration than we are getting from the Minister of Mines and Resources. I am going to make one more suggestion, though perhaps it will not meet with the approval of the government. I say, take the same minister off the treasury board and put on the Minister of Pensions. In my opinion a number of reforms are coming in this country; but while we have men such as the Minister of Mines and Resources, whose record I have followed for a long number of years, ever since he left the farm, we shall not get for these settlers that consideration to which they are entitled. Perhaps some day

I am going to go a little farther if this situation is not remedied in the near future. I am making a temperate request to-day; and if the Minister of Mines and Resources and the other members of the government could hear some of the remarks I have heard on the trains, in restaurants and in other places, talking with men and women of the armed services, the Minister of Mines would get off the treasury board and use his influence to see that titles were granted to these men and women who have suffered for a long number of years in order that we might have the privileges which the minister and the rest of us enjoy at the present time.

Mr. CRERAR: Had it not been for the last five minutes of my hon. friend's speech I would not have wearied the committee at this late hour of the session by attempting anything in the nature of a reply. The hon. member has certainly been persistent in putting his point of view before the house and the country. I regret that it is an extreme point of view, when we take into consideration the treatment that has been given to the soldiers of the last war who settled on farms in Canada.

In the opening part of his remarks the other day the hon. member quoted a statement made by Sir Robert Borden, giving what Sir Robert—and it was the point of view of the government of that time—regarded as the obligation of the country to the returned men. I believe that on any fair examination of this whole question, so far as the land settlement part of the work done for the returned men of the last war is concerned, they have been fairly treated.

The hon. member identifies himself with the request made by a small group of soldier settlers who met in Saskatoon some time during the past year. They have put forward the demand that they should receive titles to their property and should not be asked to make any further payments, either of arrears or of amounts owing in the future. That point of view has been very strongly pressed by this little group, but I say to my hon. friend that to consider anything of the kind would be a gross injustice to the thousands of soldier settlers who have met their obligations and who are meeting them to-day and are not asking for treatment of this kind.

I know there are some soldier settlers who, notwithstanding all the aid they could be given, would even then probably not make a success of their farming operations; but I may give the committee, since my hon. friend has brought up the matter, one or two illustrations to show how little substance there is in the plea made by the hon. member. One of the soldier settlers, a man who was active in this meeting in Saskatoon—indeed he was one of the chief organizers of the meeting—has had a reduction in his indebtedness, incurred from the time he settled on his farm, of $6,337.98. Not only that, but he is in receipt of a pension—no; I am wrong. It was another case I was thinking of.

Mr. FAIR: I thought the minister was wrong.

Mr. CRERAR: I congratulate the hon. gentleman upon the acuteness of his intelligence. What I was going to say was that last year, in 1942, this settler had 3,150 bushels of wheat and 2,000 bushels of oats. That was his own statement to the administrative office of the soldier settlement board in Saskatoon. I might add that this crop came from 145 acres of land, so that he must have a pretty good farm. Up to April of this year he had not paid a dollar on his obligations for the current year.

Mr. FAIR: What is the name of that man, please?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not going to give his name here. I would have no objection to giving it to my hon. friend privately, but I do not wish to mention it in the house. Furthermore, evidence has come to the attention of the soldier settlement administration that within the last few months, in response to an advertisement, this settler listed his farm for sale, placing on it a value of $6,000, and asking a cash payment of $4,000. That is probably one of the most extreme cases, but those are the facts in this instance, and that is the sort of thing for which my hon. friend is making a plea to-day.

Mr. FAIR: That is not correct.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course it is.

Mr. FAIR: No. The minister is taking a case at one extreme, but he is not going to the other extreme.

Mr. CRERAR: I did not interrupt my hon. friend while he was speaking, but I could cite other cases as well. The hon. gentleman made the plea that these farmers should get at least the cost of production. Well, how is one going to get evidence as to what is the cost of production? Let me give the committee some information as to how this soldier settlement account as a whole has operated. Current payments due from soldier settlers, that is payments coming due in the autumn of 1942 for the period from April 1, 1942, to March 31, 1943, amounted to $983,000 in round figures. Of that total, $841,000 was paid, and I venture to say that this record compares favourably with what can be found on the books of any private mortgage company. It is not correct to say that the government was hounding these people to pay their debts. Proof of that is found in the fact that in addition to the payments from soldier settlers last year on current accounts, they paid over $257,000 in advance against future years. My hon. friend can consult any business house, any rural municipalities, any people who do business in the rural communities of western Canada; they will all tell him that their collections are in better shape now than they have been for many years. In the light of those facts, for my hon. friend to rise and endeavour to give the committee and the country the impression that this government is dealing harshly and hardly with these soldier settlers is wholly misleading. On reflection I think my hon. friend would agree that such criticism is not very wide of the mark.

The hon. gentleman outlined some of the benefits that have been given to returned men. There is no doubt that the soldier settlement scheme was hastily improvised following the last war, and in many cases too much was paid for land, equipment and live stock. It will be recalled that this scheme became operative in the latter part of 1919, and during 1919 and 1920 inflation did its deadly work as far as costs were concerned. Everyone knows the inflated values of land, live stock and farm machinery at that time. From 1914 to 1920 the prices of farm machinery in this country practically doubled.

Mr. GILLIS: Why?

Mr. CRERAR: Because we were in the midst of a serious inflation. I remember that hogs were selling at 20 cents a pound live weight.

Mr. GILLIS: Because somebody wanted to exploit the public.

Mr. CRERAR: No; my hon. friend is quite wrong in it. There was inflation all along the line, in wages, in the cost of goods, in the price the farmers received for their products. While farmers were selling hogs at twenty cents a pound live weight and beef cattle for something like fourteen cents a pound, they were paying $8 a hundred for flour and twenty-six cents a pound for sugar. That was the result of the inflationary spiral that took place at that time and, just as an aside, that is one of the things we have tried to prevent during the present war. I merely mention that to emphasize the fact that the returned men who settled on the land at that time were placed under very severe handicaps, which were recognized later on by parliament and the country. Then, through reductions of one kind and another, and under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, an effort was made to get this whole thing into a fair balance; and on the whole I think that has been successfully achieved.

I repeat that to meet the hon. member's request and wipe off the outstanding indebtedness of soldier settlers would be unjust to those settlers who paid off their debts and to-day have title to their land. Why, during the last year several hundred of these soldier settlers have paid off what they owed on their land and acquired title to it. I can assure hon. members that the government has no desire to deal harshly with any of these men. We recognize what they did from 1914 to 1918 but, after all, governments have to shape their policies in line with the general good. If to-day we took the action urged by my hon. friend and wiped off the existing indebtedness of soldier settlers, it would be a gross injustice to those who have met and are meeting their obligations.

Mr. FAIR: In reply to the minister's argument—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FAIR: It is not carried yet. If hon. gentlemen who are silent most of the time want to go home, that is all right with me; I have a case to present for the soldier settlers, and I am going to present it. The minister says that the treatment given was all right. I am not satisfied that it was all right, and the trouble that exists at present is a direct result of the fact that the treatment was wrong in the beginning. Inflated prices were paid, and as a result these men are still suffering. The minister says that gross injustice would be done to those who have obtained title to their land if these settlers were given clear titles. I must say that the number who have obtained title is not very large. When we look at the figures we find that something like 2,750 altogether got title to the land up to two years ago. That is not a very great figure, out of 25,000, after twenty or more years. A number of those who had got title perhaps did not pay such a high price for their land, live stock and other equipment. Then again, perhaps they had a succession of crops without failures. I know a number of those who have gone under were victims of crop failures, for different reasons, so that I believe that takes care of that particular point.

Again, the minister told us that a number of these men could not succeed, no matter what the conditions were. I will agree with that, because I believe a number of men who were settled on the land should never have been settled there. They were not fitted for farming, and would have made a success if they had been placed in some other line of work.

Then the minister spoke about the organizer of the Saskatoon conference. I am not making any case to-day for the organizer of that conference. I do not know who the man was. I did see some letters in the Western Producer which led me to believe that the minister's statement was not quite correct. I am speaking about this matter in general, and I am not picking out any who are well to do, or any others who are very, very poor. I am talking for those who are on the land at the present time, and also for those who have been on the land, but have been compelled to get off.

Then the minister asked who could estimate the cost of production. Time and again I have pointed out to the government that industry has been able to get statisticians and accountants who could work out the cost of ships, planes, guns and everything else needed for the war. If they were not able to do that, how in the world would we have paid out all the money we have paid out, and have remained satisfied to pay it.

Again, when speaking of cost of production, let me ask the minister this question: Has the government ever estimated the cost of the interest on credits advanced to soldier settlers; and if they have, what is the percentage in excess of actual cost. The minister said that current amounts payable for 1942 amounted to $983,000. That is the amount which should have been paid. Actual payments were $841,000. The minister will not dispute the fact that at the present time we are getting much better prices than we have had for a number of years. In 1942 we had the best crop Canada ever had—and I say "best", because there were not many crops grown in western Canada before I went out to that country.

Another reason is the price being paid for live stock to-day. May I give the minister one more reason, in case he has forgotten it; I have given it once before, but I shall repeat it. During the period from April 1, 1941, to March 31, 1943, there were 253 settlers who signed quit claim deeds, and 108 were served with 30-day notices. I say without fear of successful contradiction that the fear of being driven from their homes has been the cause of many people going to the insane institutions in Canada. We have many there now, and we will have more before this matter is cleared up.

Conditions on the farm, both for soldier settlers and for civilians have been drastic and, to a very great extent, have been ignored because the government is not concerned. If the government cannot find statisticians and accountants in Ottawa, then let them go out and get the information from some of the farmers. I am not seeking either the highest or the lowest cost of production. But we can at least strike an average, and when the average has been struck we should get at least a parity price, or the same treatment as is being accorded to labour at the present time.

I am not complaining about the manner in which labour is being treated to-day. We know it is performing a necessary service, and they are being paid a good wage. Why not use exactly the same means to figure out the cost of production of farmers? I believe the figures I have given the minister will possibly set him right as to the reasons for the 1942 payments being as near meeting current accounts as they did.

During the past years western provinces have enacted debt legislation for the protection of farmers and others. That legislation has always been wiped away—or at least it was, until the measure which was passed the other day. I have in mind the one which took the place of the former Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. That is one more reason which the minister might consider, and for which he must take some responsibility, for having the payments brought up so very close to what they should be in 1942.

He has said that between 1914 and 1920 the price of machinery almost doubled. I tell him he had better check his figures, because since 1920 we have had a far greater increase in the price of farm machinery than we had between 1914 and 1920.

The minister said we were paying $8 a hundred for flour and $26 a hundred for sugar. At the present time we are guaranteed 90 cents a bushel for our wheat. Because of gambling, to-day the price is $1.07 or approximately that, and that price has existed only for the past few weeks. In 1920, when those fancy prices were being paid for flour and sugar, does the minister remember what the price of wheat was? Does he remember that at one time it went as high as $3.60 a bushel? Does he remember that at that time, when the farmers had a chance to pay off some of their debts, the government set up a wheat board to cut down and to control the price of wheat? Did they set up a board to cut down the price of machinery, and other things the farmers are compelled to buy? No, they did not. It was not in their interests to do so. The minister has said that people have acquired titles in the past few years. I think the records will show what number of titles have been acquired. And because my speech was broken the other day I shall read again into the record the speech delivered by the late Sir Robert Borden to the Canadian Expeditionary Force in 1917. I say it is important that this parliament should do its duty to the men of the last war. This is what he said:

> You are men actually facing the enemy day and night. You are suffering greatly from fatigue, over-strain, and lack of rest. The marvel of it is that men could undergo such a strain without breaking; but you have never yet broken, and history will appreciate that in days to come.
> You men are about to enter one of the most serious engagements that ever faced the Canadian corps. I cannot, at this moment, give any information as to where this attack will be staged, whether it be successful or not, it is to be borne in mind that it will not be an easy success. . . . We feel confident that you will succeed where others failed; for you have never yet failed in anything you have set your hand to, as a Canadian corps.
> You can go into this action feeling assured of this, and as the head of the government, I give you this assurance; that you need have no fear that the government and the country will fail to show just appreciation of your service to the country and empire in what you are about to do and what you have already done.
> The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of the people at home, and it will always be our endeavour to so guide the attitude of public opinion, that the country will support the government to prove to the returned man its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire; and that no man, whether he goes back or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken with the men who won and the men who died.

I am trying to bring to the attention of the committee and of the country the duty that we owe these men. In conclusion, let me say:

> We love our nation's heroes dead,
> We very much adore 'em,
> And since they haven't to be fed
> We build grand tombstones o'er them.

These lines are not funny; they are incredibly, bitterly, damnably true. Let us clean up this mess.

Mr. QUELCH: I had intended to speak at some length on this question, but since the hour is getting late and the hon. member for Battle River has spoken at some length, I shall be very brief. The minister stated that the request put forward by the hon. member for Battle River represents only a small number of soldiers, and he referred to the meeting at Saskatoon. I think he overlooks the fact that the legion in annual convention at Calgary passed a similar resolution, and the legion to-day speaks for a large percentage of the soldiers of this country.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not aware that the legion organization had asked for the wiping out of all soldier settlement debt.

Mr. QUELCH: The hon. member for Battle River read a resolution to that effect passed by the Alberta legion. I did not say it was the legion representing all Canada. The minister said also that it would hardly be fair to the soldiers who have paid off their debts if we wiped out or greatly reduced the debts of other soldiers. That argument would apply to all debt legislation; it would be equally true of civilian debts. If the minister's argument is a sound one, we should wipe out the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act; we should do away with all debt legislation. I think one realizes that where a person can pay, he should pay, but where he cannot pay, then a reduction will have to be made. That is in regard to civilian debt. In so far as this soldier debt is concerned, I believe we would have been better off if we had wiped out the whole debt at the start, because the cost of administration has practically equalled the amount of the debt. I think most of us feel dissatisfied with the government's policy regarding soldier settlement. There are only 7,000 soldiers still on the land, 2,000 of whom have no equity in their land. I should like to quote one paragraph from the report of the special committee on land settlement which sat last year. It reads:

> 3. The minister may with the approval of the governor in council appoint a committee of not more than three members to be known as the adjustment committee at such rate of remuneration as the governor in council may fix and allow and for a period of not more than twelve months with powers to review and confirm or reduce the indebtedness of soldier settlers whose agreements with the director of soldier settlement were the subjects of proposals formulated under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act prior to October 1, 1939, or in the case of such other soldier settler as may be recommended by the director, with the objective if feasible and practical of establishing an equity for the settler; provided that the settler is in personal occupation of the land and that such agreements have not been terminated, rescinded or assigned.

The minister is fully aware that there was considerable discussion on that section. I think the majority of the committee were in favour of applying the principles of the new act to the soldier settlers of the last war, so that they might be given an equity of forty-three per cent and have their interest rate reduced to three and a half per cent. I must admit that I am amazed that no provision has been made up to the present time to cut the rate of interest on the old soldier settler debt to three and a half per cent in order to make it conform with the interest charged the settlers of this war. As I said, the discussion at that time was in favour of giving the soldiers of the last war an equity in their land, and I definitely had the understanding that was going to be done. I was amazed when order in council P.C. 10472 was passed, and I received a circular letter, from which I quote as follows:

(b) make application to the director for a reduction of his indebtedness to the director, and the treasury board may on the recommendation of the director confirm or reduce such indebtedness, provided, however, that the recommendation made by the director shall be based upon the amount which in his judgment constitutes the present and prospective productive value of the land; the effective date of reduction if any shall be the standard date in 1942.

Apparently the order in council does not provide for the giving of any equity in his land to the soldier; it merely reduces the debt to its present-day value. As the minister must know very well, if it is considered necessary to give the soldier settler of the present war a forty-three per cent equity in his land, in order that this soldier can carry on, how can it be expected that the soldier settler of the last war, who is now getting along in years, whose equipment, generally speaking, is in poor shape, whose buildings have depreciated, can get along even though the debt is extended for another twenty years? As I say, if the soldier of this war cannot do it with a forty-three per cent equity and new equipment, how can we expect the soldier of the last war to do it with no equity in his land, with worn-out machinery and with depreciated buildings? It absolutely cannot be done. Imagine, how the soldiers felt when it was suggested that their debts should be amortized over another twenty years! They have not been able to pay them in twenty years, and they will not be able to do it in the next twenty years when they are getting that much older.

[Mr Quelch.]

In spite of the fact that the order in council does not make any provision to give the soldier settler an equity in his land, the soldier settlement board is taking a more liberal view of that order in council. But why should the director of the soldier settlement board be handicapped by having to take action which really is not in conformity with the order in council? The order in council does not provide for the giving of an equity, and yet I believe the soldier settlement board is granting a certain equity. The director should not be placed in a position where he has to go beyond the provisions of the order in council.

I am worried about the soldier settler who has no equity in his land. He is getting on in years and he cannot do the work himself. He now finds himself in a position were his farm will not pay sufficient to service his debt, keep him and his family and pay for a hired man to do the work. It has been suggested that such a man should sign a quit-claim and leave the land. Where is he to go? It may be said that he could live on his war veteran's allowance, but I ask any hon. member if he would like to wander around Canada and try to establish himself on $20 a month. It is not so bad if a man is married, for then he would receive $40, but a single man getting only $20 or $25 a month will have pretty heavy going. I think it is high time the government faced this situation realistically. The minister probably considers that this problem will solve itself, because it is only a question of time before these soldiers all die off. But that is not the way to deal with the problem. I am going to make a suggestion to the minister which I think is a reasonable one and will not cost very much money. The government should erect a number of medium priced cottages located in some pleasant surroundings for instance on the Pacific coast and let these old soldiers who cannot work any more live in them rent free. Ownership would not be given over; they would simply be permitted to live there rent free on their veterans' allowances and finish out their lives in peace and contentment.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I know the time is getting late and I am not going to take up any time other than to say that I associate myself wholeheartedly with what the hon. member for Battle River and the hon. member for Acadia have said.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to put one question to the minister. Two or three times when matters like this have been raised we have been asked, "How are you going to compute the cost of producing any agricultural commodity, such as wheat?" In return I ask, "How do they compute the cost of a mowing machine?" There seems to be no difficulty in computing that and determining what the farmer must pay. There seems to be not the slightest difficulty in determining the cost of a suit of clothes which the farmer must buy, or a pair of shoes. How are those costs computed? If a group of men went to work with thorough zeal to compute the cost of producing oats and barley and other farm commodities, I think they would have no difficulty in doing so.

Mr. GILLIS: I have had considerable correspondence in the past with the department on matters of this kind, and I am led to make these remarks to-day on account of the minister's observation that a lot of the difficulty to-day is owing to the inflated prices of land after the last war. We are going through a similar experience now. We have a land settlement scheme and there will be hundreds of soldiers who will settle on the land after this war. I am anxious that we shall not permit those who wish to make money out of the exigencies of war to create a situation similar to what we have now; that land speculators, looking ahead to feather their own nests, shall not be permitted to put their representatives on these boards. Most of the land to-day in western Canada and to some extent in eastern Canada is in the hands of the mortgage companies and banks. If you will note the personnel of the boards that are being set up to administer the soldier settlement scheme you will see that these are the very people who are in on the machinery that is going to administer the scheme. The subject of inflation is conveniently brought in every time that the interests of the common people are affected.

Let us, however, clarify our minds on this subject. I do not claim to be a monetary expert. I have another term than inflation for what is going on. It is profiteering, robbery, some people taking advantage of their country's emergency to make things easier for themselves and to guarantee their future at the expense of the country. Look at what happened in Britain. During the first seven months of the war, prices increased by twenty-five per cent. There was no ceiling on wage rates at that time, but prices of commodities were sent up by those who sought to take advantage of the confusion. Then from December, 1940, until the end of last year wage rates and the salaries of the mass of the people went up as high as thirty-seven per cent in some cases, and during the same period the increase in the cost of living was only 3·3 per cent. So that it is obvious that the run-away in prices during the early months of the war was not caused by any economic disturbance in the wage rates and salaries of the great majority of the people.

I shall not go into details now, but the conditions I have described are to be found to some extent in my own part of the country, and the minister and those who devise the regulations will have to understand that all cases are not the same. There are men on the land to-day who took up the land twenty-five years ago and raised a family of boys and girls who have since grown up. Markets changed, and many of the settlers eventually found themselves unable to discharge their obligations. Some administrative latitude should be allowed to take care of these cases. I would not say that the obligations should be wiped out altogether, but a careful examination should be made of cases where there are hardships and if there are extenuating circumstances, some latitude should be allowed. I do want to urge on the minister at this time that land speculators be not allowed to go in and create a similar situation to what we had after the last war.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

46. Departmental administration, $466,942.

Mr. REID: Even at this late stage of the session there is a matter of importance which I must bring up. I raised the question of honey prices in British Columbia when the minister's estimates under the war appropriation were before the committee, and on the following day the minister was good enough to bring down to the house an answer given to him, I suppose, by the wartime prices and trade board, in which the statements made by the beekeepers of British Columbia were contradicted. I immediately air-mailed the minister's statement out to the beekeepers, and I am taking the opportunity now on behalf of the beekeepers to refute the statements given to the minister, I presume by the wartime prices and trade board. I make the statement that the board have given him wrong information, and I am going to place on the record alongside the statement the minister gave, the latest information I have received from the beekeepers of British Columbia. I received this letter from the British Columbia honey producers' association:

For your information I want to say that the cost of a 14-ounce jar of British Columbia honey before the war was 25 cents. A one-pound jar sold for 30 cents, although the cut rate departmental stores occasionally priced these as specials at 23 cents and 28 cents respectively. Imported honey—mostly sweet clover—from the prairie provinces usually sold in the larger stores at from three to five cents lower after paying transportation charges from distant points to Vancouver.

By the way, there are 5,000 beekeepers in British Columbia.

The letter continues:

Over 90 per cent of our beekeepers must sell their product direct to the public, mostly in 4-pound cans, the pre-war price of which was 80 cents plus the cost of the container. The ceiling price allowed by the wartime prices and trade board for a 4-pound can is 67 cents plus the container.

The cost of beekeeping supplies has increased about 20 per cent. Wages of helpers are considerably higher; yet the British Columbia beekeepers are compelled to sell their honey at a lower price than formerly in face of the increase in the cost of living. Mr. Ilsley ignores the fact that Mexican honey of very inferior quality is being sold to the general public in competition with our own honey. This honey can be bought at many of the chain and departmental stores regardless of the minister's statement that some imports of Mexican honey were authorized for sale or use by industrial users of honey or contractors operating logging camps. I personally interviewed the manager of the Safeway Stores here in New Westminster yesterday, and was shown a 12-ounce jar of Mexican honey, grade No. 2. The price was 24 cents for 12 ounces. The quality was very inferior and, in my opinion, unfit for table use. The sale of this kind of stuff to the public is detrimental to the Canadian honey industry as many people who, owing to the scarcity of sugar, may buy honey for the first time will probably swear off honey for life, after tasting this Mexican stuff. British Columbia beekeepers are rightly proud of the quality of their honey. As you know, their honey displays at the fall fairs of New Westminster and Vancouver were for many years the largest and finest of any in the dominion of Canada. They have consistently secured the highest honours for quality year after year whenever they have exhibited their honey at the imperial fruit and honey shows in England, in competition with not only the rest of Canada but with the whole British empire. The majority of the awards came to British Columbia beekeepers, which can be verified by the report of our agent general for British Columbia, Mr. A. W. McAdam.

Here is a serious statement, and a serious situation. A price is set for honey all over Canada which is far lower than the pre-war price for honey in British Columbia. On top of that, imported honey of a much inferior grade is being imported into British Columbia from Mexico and selling for 35 cents a pound, whereas the price for our local honey has been set by the wartime prices and trade board at only 15½ cents a pound. I am sorry I have not brought a sample of this Mexican honey with me; it is being airmailed to me, as the following letter shows:

[Mr. Reid.]

I am forwarding you a parcel containing two small samples of honey just as I received them from Mr. C. L. Dimock of Smithers, B.C. This is the honey mentioned in my previous correspondence with copy of Mr. Dimock's letter.

The white honey is British Columbia honey produced in Smithers, that Mr. Dimock is allowed to sell retail at 15½ cents in bulk. The dark honey is what Smithers merchants sold, according to Mr. Dimock, for 30 cents a pound.

The other part jar is a sample of Mexican honey purchased by a neighbour from Safeways, Ltd., New Westminster. She says she was determined to eat it, after paying such a high price for the stuff, but that her courage failed her by the time it was half gone and she gladly gave it away. I think you will agree with my opinion that it is unfit for table use.

What is the wartime prices and trade board going to do about it? Here is stuff coming in that is not fit to eat and being sold at 35 cents a pound, while the price of our own local honey has been fixed at 35 cents a pound. I ask the minister to take the statement I have put on the record from the British Columbia honey producers' association back to whoever gave him his information and have them put on the mat. I should like to be there during that interview because I know a little of the subject I am discussing. We have another grievance. The minister pointed out that pasteurized honey can be sold at 1½ cents per pound. That is very nice. But what do you think has happened? There is a method introduced by some honey producers in Ontario called the Dyce patented process of pasteurizing honey, and although the beekeepers of British Columbia have been pasteurizing honey for the past forty years, their pasteurization is just swept aside and they are not allowed to come under the price of 1½ cents. They must use this patented so-called Dyce process. We claim that is a hold-up and that our method of pasteurizing honey should be recognized. I would ask the minister to take these statements seriously into consideration in the light of the conditions that exist to-day and have the matter further investigated.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have the hon. gentleman's statements carefully investigated.

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe East): I suggest that there is a serious defect in the method of procedure by which the House of Commons deals with the items of supply submitted to us for approval. There is no adequate procedure by which we may put ourselves in a position intelligently to deal with the amounts submitted to us for our approval. Year after year, and this year again, I have heard criticism of the government for having the estimates dealt with so late in the session in large amounts. But no matter at what time they are dealt with, the weakness I suggest would still be there. I am going to vote that this item before us be approved by the committee, but I am not in a position to judge whether or not the amount asked for, or an amount somewhat less, might be sufficient to carry on adequately and properly the work of the department. If I were to ask any other private member of the house whether he is in a position to determine that question, he would have to answer, no. The same applies to the vast majority of items submitted to us. How can we know? What method is there, what procedure, by which we can put ourselves in a position intelligently to vote on the amounts submitted to us? True, we can ask the minister questions, and I think all hon. members will agree that the minister now presiding has had infinite patience throughout the session in answering questions. We might ask all the questions we liked and he might answer to the best of his ability with the assistance of the officials in front of him. During the session we can put questions on the order paper or have motions passed for the production of papers and for orders for returns and all that sort of thing. But every private member will agree that these methods are cumbersome and slow and entirely inadequate for the purpose I have in mind.

It is also true that any individual member, if he has initiative and is persistent enough, may dig up a certain amount of information for himself, with regard to the administration of this, that and the other branch. But I do submit that it should not be necessary for a private member, in order to discharge the duty which he owes to those who elect him, to put himself in the unenviable position, if I may use a crude phrase, of poking his nose into the affairs of this, that and the other department. It should not be possible that members of the staff should be subjected to criticism or censure because of the suspicion that they might be supplying to private members information regarding their branch.

It is the right of every private member, more than that, it is his duty, to familiarize himself with the method by which all public money is expended. It is the right and the duty of every private member, by some regularly established procedure, to be able to judge whether or not economies and improvements are possible in the administration of any department of government for which he is asked to vote supply. If I were to ask other private members whether they think that as regards seventy-five per cent of the items submitted to them for approval, they are able to determine whether it is possible that, with care and economy, the amount they were asked to vote might be reduced two, five, ten or twenty per cent, if they answered truthfully they would have to say no. They do not know; they are not in a position to know. Our procedure does not provide any means by which they may put themselves in that position.

This is not criticism of the government. Is it not a fact that when we vote on seventy-five per cent of these items we vote blind confidence, not just in the members of the cabinet—I have a high degree of confidence in the members of the cabinet—but blind confidence that those who are assisting and advising the cabinet, the members of their staffs, from the deputy minister down, at all times and in all things give adequate consideration to the interests of the taxpayers? This is not criticism of the government. If there is a weakness in our system the effects of that weakness will operate no matter what government is in power. Nor is this criticism of the staffs. The most efficient members of the ministers' staffs, the most valuable civil servant, valuable as he may be in carrying out the work of his department, may be, by reason of his background and training, lamentably lacking in appreciation of dollars and cents, just as in private enterprise there are many very valuable employees, highly skilled men, men indispensable to the organization in other ways, perhaps men in charge of sales or of advertising, or research, who nevertheless are likewise lamentably lacking in a conception of the value of dollars and cents, and who must be continually checked up. And private enterprise does not fail to provide that check.

In what I am saying with regard to the estimates, I am not referring of course to the great bulk of our war expenditures. We have the war expenditures committee, and it is supposed to deal with those items. Here I am dealing only with ordinary expenditures. My suggestion is that a method should be adopted by which private members will be in a position to judge intelligently on the amounts of supply submitted to them for their approval. It may be recalled that last session I took occasion, at some length and in great detail, to submit to the house examples from one small department of what I regarded as waste, inefficiency, lack of economical organization and the unnecessary expenditure of money. I do not propose to follow that course at this time. I have not done so this session.

If I were to judge by any morsel of support I have received in this house I should have to come to the conclusion that I was all wrong. But, Mr. Chairman, I was not wrong. I can assert now that the statements I made on that occasion were mild in relation to matters as they were at that time and as they are still, to a very large extent. I am not going to pursue that further; my statement is on record, and it has not been challenged.

I want to suggest now a change in our procedure in order that private members of the house may be able to familiarize themselves with all these matters and be in a position to vote intelligently on every item coming before us. I suggest that immediately the house assembles for the next session a committee be set up, with wide powers of examination, to which the estimates shall be submitted. It may be recalled that early this session the Prime Minister announced that he was considering setting up such a committee, but that before doing so he wished to consult the leaders of the other parties. I do not know whether that consultation took place, or, if it did, what was the attitude of the leaders of the other parties, but for some reason or other that action has not been taken. I should think that, from the point of view of carrying out efficiently the important functions of an opposition, this would be the very thing opposition members would want. This is precisely what we do in connection with most legislation. When an important bill is brought before the house by the government very often it is referred to a select committee. That committee may sit as often as it wishes; it may call as witnesses anyone inside or outside the service, in order to become familiar with every detail and all the implications of each section of the bill. Any hon. member who is interested, even though he is not a member of the committee, may sit in and listen. The proceedings of the committee are printed and made available to all members of the house, and the time of the whole house is not taken up with the matter while the committee is dealing with it. Then when hon. members have to vote on that bill there is no reason at all why they should not do so intelligently and with full knowledge of what they are doing.

That is precisely what I think ought to be done in connection with this other important function of this house, namely the voting of supply which must be provided through the taxes of the people whom we represent. Someone may suggest that this is the function of the public accounts committee. I entirely disagree. Usually it has been the function of that committee to investigate suggestions or charges of maladministration, something culpably wrong; and we all know that the tendency is for members of the opposition to try to produce evidence of maladministration and perhaps exaggerate it, while on the other hand members supporting the government offer a defence and attempt to minimize it. Invariably considerations of political advantage or disadvantage intrude into the deliberations of the committee; they always have and I suppose they always will. I do not think that sort of thing would occur in a committee on the estimates. A critical examination of the estimates, involving as it does possible recommendations in regard to reductions, it seems to me is not the sort of thing which would involve any considerations of political advantage or disadvantage.

I fancy I hear someone say that this is the responsibility of the ministers in charge. It is the responsibility of a minister to see that his department is run with due regard to economy and care, but surely a private member has a responsibility in this regard also. I suggest that we should be put in a position properly to discharge that responsibility. Furthermore, cabinet ministers, especially those newly appointed, have to depend largely on their staff for advice and assistance. I imagine that the primary object of a minister is to have the work of his department carried on as efficiently and smoothly and with as little friction and trouble as possible. I can quite imagine that the recommendations of this committee in regard to changes, reorganizations and so on if made only by the minister might not tend towards smoothness and lack of friction in the working of a department, but I think such a committee would be of very great assistance to the ministers in running their various departments. I think it would be of great assistance to the Minister of Finance. I hope he does not think that instead of being a help such committee would immediately recommend extravagant expenditures. I hope that is not in the back of his mind; I think that would be wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was in the back of my mind, I may say.

Mr. McLEAN (Simoce East): Well, in passing I should like to say to the minister that some things have been said in this house which perhaps would justify that doubt in the back of his mind, but my advice to him, speaking for myself only, would be not to pay too much attention to the attacks on the treasury board that have come from various parts of this chamber. I have been alarmed at the numerous thrusts that have been made at that essential board, made by hon. members, coming from almost every party, and I want to give the minister my opinion for what it is worth. I do not think these attacks represent the considered opinion or attitude of the vast majority of the members of this house; I am sure they do not represent the considered opinion of the vast body of taxpayers in Canada. So far as I am concerned, and I think so far as the house is concerned, in these days of high taxation we should lend all possible support to the Minister of Finance and the treasury board instead of trying to weaken the confidence of parliament and the country in that valuable organization. When I hear demands from every quarter for increased expenditures, with nothing said on the other side, I sometimes fear for the future of this country. Therefore, I hope the minister will not pay too much attention to the attacks that are made on the one organization that is trying hard to protect the interests of the taxpayers.

No matter what may be our ideas in regard to economic and monetary matters; no matter whether the government obtains money through taxes, or by borrowing, or by printing it; whether it is this government, the provincial governments or municipal governments, in these days we must realize that when we spend money, in the last analysis that money has to be paid for in one way, and one way only. It is paid by the labour, by the sweat of the brow of our taxpayers, high and low, or else from the savings of those people which have been earned by the sweat of the brow and accumulated through habits of thrift. We must remember that in each constituency there are thousands of individual taxpayers who for the first time are paying direct taxation to the federal government. What is more, there are thousands more whose direct taxes have been increased to an extent never before thought possible or necessary. When I go back to the people of my riding, and they ask me whether or not it would have been possible to relieve their burdens a little through exercising a little care here or a little care there, a little more economical organization, I have to tell them that I do not know. I cannot give them that assurance. I have not that assurance myself, because the procedure we follow in dealing with estimates is not such that I can secure that measure of information which would enable me to give that assurance.

I know that in view of the colossal amount of money necessarily being spent in the prosecution of the war there are many hon. members who will say, "But after all, the point discussed by the hon. member is very insignificant." Well, I confess I am attacked by that feeling myself. But when I go home I find a most effective corrective when I see the care, the planning, the labour and the energy expended by little groups of people in every community who, loyally and voluntarily, are carrying out the plea of the Minister of Finance to promote the sale of war savings stamps. The sales in each small community are comparatively small, but when taken over the whole dominion the amount is most impressive. I was delighted that in his budget speech the Minister of Finance saw fit to pay tribute to these small groups of workers. Many of these people are overworked and have suffered the headaches involved in the production of munitions and food, under very difficult circumstances. When I see these people, regardless of class, regardless of party and of circumstance, voluntarily and willingly throwing themselves into the sale of war savings stamps and war bonds, I am convinced that the tribute of the Minister of Finance was well merited. I believe we owe to those people the assurance that if there is any method capable of adoption which will result in better administration, in economies here and there to lighten the burden of taxation being imposed upon them, then I think it is our duty so to act in their behalf.

I suggest therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this method be adopted. I believe nothing better calculated to promote economy and efficiency in administration could be done than the appointment of a fairly small select committee, with wide powers of examination, to whom all estimates would be referred for examination and recommendation. Possibly they would not be able to handle all departments in one year, but they could work on one or two. I believe this would be of the greatest assistance to the government, and that it would help to bring about a better and a more economical administration. Nothing could be done more calculated to assure the people of Canada that we are carrying on the work committed to us with the same degree of care, economy and frugality repeatedly urged by the Minister of Finance on the people of Canada. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the government seriously consider the formation of that committee at the next session.

Mr. ILSLEY: I greatly appreciate the remarks of the hon. member, and I should like to hear more speeches of the kind made in this chamber. I have the feeling, as I sit month after month, for five or six months, that the temper of the house is one which favours fairly free expenditures. From every quarter and from all parties we have demand after demand for the pouring out of government funds on one project or another. I stand against a great deal of it, as best I can. My advocacy of the position taken by the hon. member might be considered as professional, in view of my position as Minister of Finance. It gives me a great deal of encouragement when I hear speeches such as the one which has just been completed. But may I tell him that in case he may underestimate the influence of a speech of that kind, he ought not to do so, because, let me assure him, it has influence, and it is good.

With regard to the appointment of a committee to examine estimates, let me say that from my point of view I should not want that committee to have the power to recommend increases in expenditures, because, if it did, it certainly would make such recommendations. For instance, if such a committee were to examine the estimates for the Department of Finance I am sure, if they understood the work many of my staff are doing and the salaries they are receiving, they would recommend increases in salary in many instances. The end would be effected only if there were no power to recommend increases. If such power were given to a committee one would be subjected to pressure from every part of the house to correct this or that situation, and the allegations would be made that certain injustices were being done—and in most cases there would be no injustice.

Mr. REID: Especially if we were drawing near to an election.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe East): The rule applying to all committees is that they cannot make recommendations of that kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: But, within the rules, they can recommend that the government give consideration to the advisability of increases.

Mr. NEILL: It would lead to log-rolling.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, exactly. In that connection I would draw the attention of hon. members to recommendations—a long list of them—pointing out to the government the advisability of an increase here, an increase there and an increase somewhere else. In many instances these recommendations are traceable to political pressure—possibly I should not say political pressure exactly, but to pressure by certain special sections of the population.

Mr. REID: Which would be political.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, which would be political. If that qualification were added, I believe such a procedure would save much time for the minister and departmental officials, and I would not see anything wrong with the hon. member's proposal. From my point of view, however, the condition I have stated would be necessary, and it is one which I believe would be objected to. I think members of the committee would say that in order to make an intelligent report they would have to have power to recommend increases as well as decreases. If they had that power, the reports of such committees on estimates would develop into reports recommending to the government consideration of the advisability of considerably increasing the government's outlay.

Mr. GRAYDON: I listened with a good deal of interest to what was said by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean). I have no desire at this time to enter into a lengthy discussion because I think that would be entirely inappropriate, but I wish to point out to the minister, to the hon. member and to the committee that we get reforms only by exploring the various avenues through which reforms can be accomplished. During both the early and later stages of this session I suggested to the government, and I think this suggestion might be repeated to-day, that this problem which has been brought up by the hon. member and spoken to by the minister, is one of the important problems which face members of parliament and the government in a war-time session such as this.

I think there is a feeling in the country and in this chamber that there are many reforms that could be made and that the machinery of our parliament could be brought up to date and some of the cobwebs swept away. I felt that this problem should have been tackled at the beginning of this session by setting up a committee which would have had as its special responsibility the investigation of how this parliament could more efficiently serve the people of Canada at this particular time. The call for parliamentary reform is an urgent one, and one which needs repetition at the present time. The reform suggested by the hon. member for Simcoe East is one which I think all of us would want to consider most carefully, but he should be commended for having brought it before the committee, as should other hon. members who have made similar suggestions.

I am hopeful that at the beginning of next session the government will appoint a committee to look into the whole problem of our rules of procedure and the organization of our parliament in order that there may be a more effective and better scrutiny of public expenditures.

Mr. REID: Bring it up to date.

Mr. GRAYDON: Bring it up to date. I do not think there can be any real argument about that. It is not a question of finding fault with the government, because the government is operating under a peace-time system, and an old peace-time system. When I made my suggestion at the beginning of the session it was supported by a number of members on all sides, but the Prime Minister took the view that nothing should be done until peace had been declared. But I think we should prepare for peace in times of war. For a number of years I have had the feeling that there is a lot of waste man-power in the House of Commons. This is not the fault of the members generally; it is largely the fault of the system under which we work. Instead of dealing with the matter piecemeal; instead of setting a committee up as an experimental committee to see how it works, I think we should make a survey of the whole situation, our parliamentary procedure and parliamentary machinery. Having surveyed this, having brought down recommendations, we could then go ahead and work out a more effective method of handling our parliamentary affairs which would meet with the approval of the public and make for a better parliament.

Mr. NEILL: I agree with most of what has been said by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean), with the exception of his suggestion about an estimates committee. I am absolutely opposed to that. This matter was brought up some fifteen years ago and at that time I think it more or less had the approval of the Prime Minister, but I opposed it at that time. The general sentiment was such that the discussion was ended then and there; the debate was adjourned and the matter was never brought up again. It is alleged that what he suggested would save the time of the house and of the cabinet, but it would not do any such thing. It would mean that the estimates would be gone over in a committee and then considered again in the house. The ministers and officials would have to attend in the committee and then go through them all again in the house later on. I am not going to be deprived of my right to talk about estimates that affect my district. I am not going to be told that these have been passed and approved or condensed by five or six or ten estimable gentlemen who have taken this action in my absence and without hearing my views. It might happen that something might be brought up in the committee which did not appeal to the members and be voted down on account of the lack of the benefit of the local knowledge of the member. He might not be able to be present at the committee and give the necessary details in connection with the expenditure. As I say, the cabinet ministers and the officials would have to attend in committee and then be here again when the estimates go through the house.

We are always told that our rights are not going to be taken away from us. We are told that we shall be able to bring up any matter in this chamber. Why do this twice? The present system is a protection to the ordinary member. We want to be very careful and not give away any of our rights, because we are losing them little by little. We may have to spend some time in listening to statements by hon. gentlemen which are of no interest to us but which have to do with the district they represent, but they in turn are ready to listen to us. That is our privilege and our protection. We can go home and tell our people that their grievances have been voiced.

Then there is the other side of it. We shall be told that since these estimates have been considered carefully in committee, they should not be discussed any further when they come to the house. I may say that that argument would not stop me, and there are many other members who will not be ready to keep their mouths closed simply because these matters have been discussed by a committee. The fact would be that very many of the items would be of no interest to the members of that committee. We had a good illustration of this the other day when the divorce bills were being considered. They were rushed through at the rate of about ninety-two bills in sixty minutes. We were asked why we wanted to talk about these when they had been carefully studied by a committee of the Senate and a committee of the House of Commons. The same thing would happen in connection with the estimates. We would be told that they had been considered by a committee. It might be that there was a bare quorum in the committee, or that it was getting close to lunch time and they were ready to rush things through. As I say, there would be an exact duplication of what happened in connection with the divorce bills. The estimates will be railroaded through in the same manner. That will be the inevitable result and we, the common members, representing the common people, will be deprived of our right to speak for them. As I say, many years ago this matter was brought up, looked into and turned down.

I am entirely in accord with what the hon. member for Simcoe East has said, but the remedy is not to do it by way of a committee. You would not be curing an evil, you would be perpetrating a worse evil. We who represent the common people would not be heard at all; it would all be done in the committee. Many private members would not have even a chance to be on these committees unless they had party affiliations. A worse evil would be created than if we have to spend a few days extra here listening to Tom Jones talking about something in which we are not particularly interested. The price Tom Jones has to pay for that is that he has to sit and listen to me while I am talking, but that is part of democratic government.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Chairman, I am in duty bound to ask the indulgence of hon. members of this committee while I say a few words about an urgent matter which seriously affects our farming community, and which comes under this item. It has to do with the restriction imposed by the wartime prices and trade board which forbids the ordinary farmer to sell his hogs in cuts on the local market unless he first obtains a licence to do so. I have discussed this matter with some of the officials of the board and recently with the hon. Minister of Finance, who seemed sympathetic. But since the matter has not yet been settled, I think the situation should be made public. But first I want to say publicly how much we appreciate the patience of the Minister of Finance in listening to us, despite the very heavy burden he has to carry and does carry so successfully.

This is a matter which concerns all the rural members representing at least eastern Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes, and I was told just a few moments ago that the same situation obtains in the west. Since the question has not yet been settled, I want to summarize the situation publicly in this house, which has the right to settle this acute question. I am bringing this matter up here on behalf of bona fide farmers who have been in the habit of selling hogs in cuts on the local market once or twice a week. These farmers, on account of the restriction imposed by the wartime prices and trade board, are now prevented from doing so unless they first obtain a licence from the board.

I, jointly with several other members representing rural districts of eastern Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes, have made a fairly complete investigation into the matter, and our findings are these:

The local market business is generally left to the farmers' wives who are in charge of raising poultry, eggs and hogs, which they bring weekly to the market to make money to pay the family's ordinary expenditures. They sell direct to the consumers, who prefer to buy fresh meat from the producers. Since they do not raise hogs in large quantity, they are not interested in selling to the abattoirs, because they have found by experience that the abattoirs have graded their hogs in a lower grade, with a consequent loss of money to the farmers' wives. This is probably owing to the fact that the farmers have not time to specialize in the proper grading of the hogs. So that if the licence is refused them, they will surely abandon the raising of hogs altogether. We are told that the production of hogs by these farmers amounts to approximately 100,000 hogs a year.

It seems clear to us that if the proper means to grant licences to these farmers are not taken, there will be a shortage of 100,000 hogs for local consumption, which the packing plant will be bound to supply to city consumers. It is evident that consumers must be supplied with meat and the only way to solve that problem is to allow these farmers to sell on the local market. In this way the packing plants will have just that much more at their disposal to supply the needs of our armies and those of our allies.

There are many ways of distributing these licences to the farmers. A large poster could be placed prominently in every local market, stating how the licences can be obtained. The clerk of the market or government inspector could be charged with the distribution of these licences.

The farmers are satisfied to collect ration coupons from the buyer. These coupons could be handed over to the clerk of the market or to the government inspector. In this way, not only could we contribute to sending a larger quantity of classified hogs overseas, but we would also prevent an injustice from being perpetrated against these farmers.

That is why I think this question is urgent, and why I have felt it my duty to bring it before the committee, so that it may receive immediate attention with a view to an early solution.

Mr. ILSLEY: As the hon. member says, he has discussed this matter with me on two or three occasions and, I think, with the officials of the wartime prices and trade board. As he knows, one of the great menaces to the success of any rationing scheme is a widely scattered source of supply, and perhaps one of the reasons why it is easier to ration in Britain than in Canada is because in Britain it is easier to control the source of supply. For that reason, generally speaking, our rationing authorities have felt that they must see that the slaughtering was done by large slaughterers—I do not mean very large slaughterers but those who are doing a considerable amount of slaughtering. They are not able to carry that out in deficiency areas. To date they feel that they are pledged to carry out the rule in areas which cannot be called deficiency areas. At least that is my latest information. I would call situations like this to the attention of those members of the house who think the problems of rationing are not difficult in a country like Canada. There are some hon. members who think it would be very easy to put everything under control and make an equitable distribution by rationing, but as a matter of fact nothing is more difficult and vexatious to work out than a rationing system which will work without imposing on the population intolerable burdens of inconvenience and so forth.

All I can say to my hon. friend is that I will bring this matter once more to the attention of my officials and it will be given further consideration. I do not know myself what it may prove practicable to do.

Mr. DUPUIS: There is one feature I should bring to the minister's attention, namely, that on the Montreal market there are two types of people selling goods. First, there are the bona fide farmers who are allowed to sell there freely. Then, there are the pedlars or dealers who go around the county and buy up hogs of different types and grades and, in the guise of farmers, try to sell those hogs on the market. These are the people who were the first to ask to be granted a licence under the wartime prices and trade board. But they are not farmers. I am told by a number of hon. members that many of these traders make a black market, so that the result will be much worse than it is to-day; farmers will suffer injustice, and our war effort will be correspondingly hindered. I want the minister to know that, and I know it personally. I should very much like to see the wartime prices and trade board rectify this injustice, annul a policy which makes for black markets, and grant this concession to the ordinary farmer who sells one or two hogs on the local market.

Mr. QUELCH: I wish to discuss as briefly as possible the proposals which were put forward by certain officials in Great Britain, the United States and Canada regarding an international stabilization of currency and an international exchange union.

The Canadian officials in their pamphlet outline their objective in the following words:

> The establishment of an international monetary mechanism which will aid in the restoration and development of healthy international trade after the war, which will achieve a high degree of exchange stability, and which will not conflict with the desire of countries to carry out such policies as they may think appropriate to achieve, so far as possible, economic stability at a high level of employment and incomes.

The British proposals also outline their objective, in subsection (g) of section 1, in a very similar way.

I have read these proposals through carefully, and I have come to the conclusion that the officials of all three countries were apparently more interested in trying to find a profitable market for the gold of the world, more interested in trying to devise ways and means whereby the gold production of their countries might be utilized to dominate world trade, than they were to reach their declared objective, namely, to find ways and means of bringing about the freest possible exchange of goods as between nations.

I have looked through a number of periodicals, including the Wall Street Journal, the Christian Science Monitor and Foreign Affairs Quarterly, and I find that the majority of their writers seem to take the same view. I will quote what John H. Williams has to say in the last number of Foreign Affairs:

> Not only are the two plans fundamentally similar in their mechanical aspects—

He is here referring to the British and United States plans.

> —but the monetary mechanism provided in both is essentially a gold standard mechanism.

Then, referring to the Keynes plan, he says:

> One can read fairly readily between the lines that these provisions are due not to any great concern about gold on Keynes part but most likely to his recognition of the political requirements of getting his plan accepted. With the British empire the principal gold producer, and the U.S.A. the principal holder it is not likely that any plan which does not provide a market of a monetary use for gold will be acceptable in either country.

If that is true, I think we must admit that a very selfish motive is behind that proposal. It is specifically what might be called a rich nations' proposal, and for that reason personally I am not in favour of it, because I do not think it will achieve the objective laid down at the beginning of both these pamphlets. I hope the minister will give us the names of the Canadian officials who drafted these proposals. Especially I should like to know the terms of the reference under which these proposals were drawn up. Were these officials told to draw up certain proposals whereby we could reach the objective of the freest possible exchange of goods between nations, or were they told to find ways and means by which gold might be utilized as the international medium of exchange? I think that has a direct bearing on the matter.

I believe that Keynes has come to the same conclusion as Williams came to, that he did not think gold was necessary, but in order to satisfy certain people he had to use gold. He mentions in his proposals that the United States, holding as they do large reserves of gold, would probably insist on gold being utilized. I agree with Harold Fleming in the Christian Science Monitor:

> The twist is that they have in themselves little or nothing to recommend them over the ramshackle structure and machinery of pre-war international credit except a couple of fancy names.

And now he can add one more to it and make it three.

These proposals, in my opinion, do not solve the problems relating to a common balance of trade as between nations, and the greatest problem before the war was that of ways and means by which we might bring about an even balance of trade.

In the past there has been a fight for foreign markets, resulting in an unbalanced trade, and I would say that that fight has been largely responsible for the wars of the past. It is true to say that all capitalistic countries have had difficulty in finding profitable markets for their goods, not only internally but externally as well, not because the people who required those goods decided not to buy them, but because the people who required those goods, generally speaking, did not have the money with which to buy them. Consequently, all industrialized nations endeavoured to maintain a favourable balance of trade, or of payments.

I would draw the minister's attention in that regard to a statement which was made by a former chancellor of the exchequer of Great Britain. Dealing with this very matter, speaking before the American Bankers' Association on October 5, 1922, he had this to say:

> For over two centuries British capital—that is, credit—had been lent to other countries; year by year England produced more than she either consumed herself or could exchange for the products of other nations, and she could not obtain a market for the surplus unless she gave the purchaser a long credit. Foreign loans and foreign issues were taken up in England, and the proceeds were spent in paying for the surplus production. British factories and workshops were kept in good employment—

Now, this is the point I wish the minister to notice:

> —but it was a condition of their prosperity that a part of their output should be disposed of in this way.

That is, in order to maintain prosperity in England it was necessary to maintain a favourable balance of payments. He pointed out that that was the policy of England for two centuries before the last war. From the last war up to this one, the United States of America, being a large creditor nation, to a considerable extent refused to accept goods in payment for her credits held abroad. She demanded gold wherever possible, and as a result of that policy accumulated very large holdings of gold. The Wall Street Journal, in commenting on the policy of the United States in the past in its relation to these proposals, has this to say:

> If we want to export things and not import things we must make up our mind either to invest the excess of our exports or lend it overseas, and in addition lend or invest at least part of the interest on the loans and profit on the investment, to say nothing of leaving the capital and principal uncollected.

To a very large extent that is what Britain did before the first great war, because we find that apparently during the sixty years before the last war England lost in the neighbourhood of £4,000,000,000, or around sixteen or seventeen billion dollars, in her foreign trade. Nevertheless, according to the chancellor of the exchequer, that policy brought prosperity to Britain. I would say that it brought prosperity to certain classes of people, for nobody can contend that it brought prosperity to the masses of that country. In so far as the manufacturers were concerned, it did maintain them at a fairly high level of production and to that extent brought prosperity.

I think it may be said that from 1935 to 1939 Canada maintained an average favourable balance of payments in the neighbourhood of $218,000,000. I got these figures from the "Canada Year Book". Apparently she was following the same policy as Great Britain, trying to dump her unemployment problem on the doorstep of other nations instead of solving it internally. Instead of maintaining an effective demand against her internal production, she tried to dump her surplus products abroad and accept as few imports as possible in return, so that the money paid for these exports for which no goods were brought back in return, would help to maintain an effective demand against her production internally.

I merely mention these things in order to draw the attention of the committee to pre-war problems which unquestionably will be intensified at the end of this war. I am satisfied that no form of international bank or international union can solve that problem, because it is an internal problem. Before any scheme of currency stabilization can operate satisfactorily, nations will have to put their own house in order. They will have to find ways and means of maintaining effective demand against their own production and will have to be willing to exchange their surplus production for the surplus production of other nations and thus hold an even balance of trade. No international bank can bring world stability unless the nations are first of all willing to bring about economic stability internally; that is, to accept freely the exports of other nations for their own exports. If the United States and Great Britain hope to give leadership in this matter, then I think they will have to do it by example. What I mean to say is that we cannot expect other nations to be enthusiastic about following the leadership of the United States or of the British empire when at the same time they see in either of these nations millions of people on relief. If, therefore, we are to give leadership we must set our own house in order. I think it will be agreed that during the past decade these so-called democracies were held in a good deal of contempt by the fascist nations. Those nations looked upon these democracies as decadent. While the resources of the fascist nations were appreciating, the resources of the democracies were depreciating, and there is no question that our prestige suffered a severe blow, especially in the middle east. Of course, the great mistake the fascist nations made was this. They condemned the democratic way of life for that situation, whereas they should have condemned the people for not functioning as true democracies within these nations. The trouble was that during that period we were actually under a certain form of financialism which was nothing more or less than a hidden form of fascism.

Let me give an illustration. I know the minister does not like me to use extravagant language at any time and he never hesitates to criticize me if he thinks that I do so. Let me therefore substantiate that charge by quoting one example. I would not quote it now had it not been mentioned by one of the Australian members who took part in the parliamentary discussions here a few weeks ago. He referred to a certain mission. He did not mention it by name, but his reference undoubtedly was to the mission headed by Sir Otto Niemeyer in 1929, which went to Australia to look into matters. On the same mission were Professor T. E. Gregory and Mr. R. N. Kershaw. I find the initials "T.E.", but the hon. member for Wetaskiwin says it was T. E. Guggenheim. At the time this mission went to Australia, that dominion was suffering from an unfavourable balance of trade with Britain, and the mission in question went there to straighten out the nation internally. Let me quote from a book written by the leader of the New South Wales Labour party, Mr. J. T. Lang. The title of the book is, "Why I Fight", and I quote from page 185:

> The mission consisted of Sir Otto Niemeyer, a representative of the bank who had acted in the similar capacity of official assignee in the case of many European countries; Professor T. E. Gregory, of the London school of economics and Mr. R. N. Kershaw, former Australian Rhodes scholar, designated as "liaison officer".

> Extracts from Sir Otto's address make interesting reading after an interval of four years: "It is a serious problem", he said, "the practical solution of which is not rendered any easier by the natural optimism of the Australian. So long as it is generally believed in Australia that there is an unlimited market abroad for Australian goods, and that something will turn up, it will be difficult to face the realities of the position."

The reason why Australia had an unfavourable balance of trade was not that Australia did not have the goods or that Australia was not willing to export those goods in order to balance her trade. The reason was that the importing nations refused to take Australia's production, and therefore Sir Otto said that it would be hard to make the Australians do what they should do, inasmuch as they were optimistic in view of the fact that they could produce a large amount of goods. They did not realize, however, that other nations were not willing to accept those goods. The main power to deal with this problem of unbalanced trade does not rest with the debtor nations but with the creditor nations, and any proposals that are submitted must recognize the fact that the creditor nation is more to blame for this state of affairs than the debtor.

I quote again from page 189:

Submissively the premiers carried a series of resolutions at the dictation of Sir Otto, declaring:

(a) their fixed determination to balance their respective budgets for the financial year 1930-31 and to maintain a similar balanced budget in future years;

(b) that no further overseas loans would be raised until the current short-term indebtedness was dealt with;

(c) that future loans will be for reproductive works only.

These were the steps which the mission assured the conference were essential to "place Australia on the road to prosperity." Time has surely proved them the steps of the treadmill.

In the light of these quotations, I think the Minister of Finance will agree that I do not exaggerate when I say that at that period we were under a form of financial dictatorship, because there was Australia able to produce far more than she needed, but other nations were not willing to accept her production, and consequently she was told that she would have to curtail her expenditures in order to bring about a balanced budget. Well, we know what happened in Australia at that time. Their depression was even worse than the one we experienced.

I cannot say, of course, whether a similar mission came to Canada, but we do know that Sir Otto Niemeyer came to this country. Members of this group asked to have the house informed exactly as to what occurred between Sir Otto and Mr. Graham Towers or other officials of the government, but that information was refused. Apparently the officials of this country are not quite as free in their discussions of such matters as they are in Australia. If we could get as frank a statement in Canada as the people got from those in Australia, I have no doubt that we would find that the same thing happened in this country and that we were dictated to by international financiers.

A further proof of what had been happening in Canada is to be found in the election speeches of the Prime Minister in 1935. The Minister of Finance will remember what the Prime Minister said at that time during the election campaign. He declared that in this house there would be waged a great battle with the money powers. I must admit that I have never seen that battle materialize. I have been optimistic, hoping to see the fight started every session, but nothing has happened. Those are the Prime Minister's words, not mine, and when the Prime Minister said that there was to be a battle between the government and the money powers he had in mind, I presume, certain money powers who were forcing destitution upon the people of the country. Either that, or he was speaking for the sake of the election. If so, that was his fault. But I am giving him full credit for having meant what he said at that time, and I believe he had good cause for that statement.

Of course, we are being told now that never again will such things exist. We are assured that there is to be a new order. I would remind the minister and the committee again, however, that Lloyd George at the end of the last war made speeches similar in every respect to the speeches that are being made to-day prophesying a new order. Lloyd George also talked about a new world and declared that depressions were a thing of the past. There would never be another depression, he said. Well, does anyone doubt that Lyold George at that time was as sincere as the Prime Minister of Canada is to-day? Undoubtedly he was sincere, but he overlooked for the time being the fact that pressure would be exercised on that nation when the war was over. The cry began as soon as the war was over, "We have spent a great deal of money in carrying on the war and now we have to pay for it." And you will find here many people, like the chief architect of depression, the hon. member for Simcoe East, saying the same thing. He will be one of the first to cry out for a general restriction of spending after the war is over, and that will mean one thing and one thing only—another depression.

The only reason why we have prosperity to-day is that the government has become the greatest purchaser of labour and materials in the country, greater than any other institution. The moment the government stops spending at that rate, unless certain other institutions are prepared to take up the slack, undoubtedly we shall go down into another depression. So that I think it is well that we should keep clearly in mind the fact that these monetary proposals actually deal with results and not with causes, and that until the causes are eliminated there must be a dubious future for any form of international stabilization of currency or international exchange union. Therefore, while I wholeheartedly agree with the objectives as they are outlined in the British and Canadian proposals, I cannot agree that there is much chance of these proposals bringing about the things they wish to achieve. While it is true that the proposals admit that a creditor nation has a certain amount of responsibility for an unbalanced trade, the strange thing is that when the experts come to make certain proposals they place the main responsibility upon the debtor nation and not upon the creditor nation. They make certain recommendations to the creditor nation and then immediately state that the creditor nation will not be forced to accept those recommendations. Then they make recommendations to deal with the debtor nation, and the debtor nation has to accept them whether or not it agrees with them. In view of the fact that the debtor nation is not nearly as much to blame as the creditor nation, I say they are putting the pressure in the wrong place, and that is one reason why I say these are undoubtedly the proposals of the rich nations and do not represent the wishes of the poor nations or their ability to deal with these matters. This matter is referred to on page 8 of the British proposal, subsection (g) and on page 14 of the Canadian proposal, section 5, subsection (c), but I do not want to take time to read those provisions.

What is the real situation in regard to the question of favourable and unfavourable balances of trade? A nation can only pay for goods and services with goods and services. An importing nation can give an exporting nation a claim against its goods; that is, a credit, but it cannot force that nation to buy its goods and moreover should not be obliged to do so. A nation should only be required to pay for its imports with its own national currency, because that nation will have to exchange its goods for the goods that were imported, and the only money that will buy those goods is its own national currency. Therefore there is no possible excuse for trying to force any nation to pay for its imports with international currency. I shall give a simple example. If I owe a certain individual $5 I can give him a cheque for that amount, and when I do so I have met my obligation. He now has credit in the bank for $5, but it is not my obligation to see that he spends that $5; I have wiped out my obligation. The same situation applies in connection with a debtor nation. As long as the debtor nation gives the creditor nation a claim against its own production, it should have wiped out its obligation; then it is up to the creditor nation to buy its goods. I will admit that you could have a nation without goods, but I am talking about a nation such as Australia which in 1929 was willing and anxious to export its goods to balance its budget, and was optimistic enough to believe that it could do so. It could not, however, because the creditor nations were not willing to accept those goods. So that if we are to put pressure on any nation, let us put it in the right place, on the creditor nation instead of on the debtor nation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then my hon. friend means that Canada did right in taking Australian wool?

Mr. QUELCH: I would not say there were not other things we could have taken. On the other hand, take a nation in the position of not being able to produce enough goods to satisfy her import requirements; a "have-not" nation. The situation there is entirely different, and no form of international stabilization of currency can deal with it. In that case you must do one of two things; you must move some of the people out of that area, or you must continue indefinitely such measures as mutual aid and lease-lend in order to provide that nation with goods. You might have a joint contribution by all nations on a permanent basis, to maintain that country. That must be done, or the people must be removed from that area until the population is reduced to the point where the resources are sufficient to maintain them. That, however, as I have pointed out, is an entirely different matter.

The London Chamber of Commerce has put forward proposals to deal with this matter; no doubt the minister is familiar with them. Those proposals are very different from the proposals of the experts of the three nations. The London Chamber of Commerce recognizes the fact that the creditor nation is largely responsible. Therefore it maintains that when a nation establishes a credit abroad, that nation should be willing to accept goods in payment of it, and if the nation refuses to accept payment of that credit within a period of seven years, the debt should be cancelled. I should like to quote that proposal, which appears at page 26 of a pamphlet entitled, "A Twentieth Century Economic System," which has been endorsed by the London Chamber of Commerce:

> . . . the primary responsibility for establishing a counter account, by importing from the country to which a sale had been made, would remain with the exporting country. If it did not wish to do so that would be its affair and not that of the importing country, which would have done its part by establishing the necessary credit. The importing country would be entitled to cancel the credit, under a statute of limitations, if it were not used within seven years. The principle is that with which we are all familiar in internal trading: if you have a credit with a shop, you cannot take it out in cash but you clear it when you take goods.

In reply to the minister's suggestion that we should have taken wool from Australia, that is not Australia's affair. Australia is willing to pay with whatever goods she has, and it is up to us to decide what goods we want to take. Having established a credit in Australia, it is up to us to find goods there that we want. If we do not, then we do not get paid; but under a multilateral clearing we would not need to buy goods from Australia; we could buy them from another nation. I shall deal with that later on.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not wish to get into an argument on theory, but Canada is likely to be a creditor nation on current account after the war is over; we are almost certain to be. What is Canada to do? Is Canada to take such things as wool and wheat from Australia, cane sugar from the West Indies, manufactured goods from Great Britain, and so on, or is Canada not to do so? And if Canada does not, how will Canada continue to export? Some of my hon. friend's associates over there are very sure that Canada should not import anything we can make ourselves, no matter at what cost. If that is so, how will Canada continue to export; will we give our goods away? Perhaps that is what is projected?

Mr. QUELCH: The minister asks if we should be willing to import wool. This would not apply in war time, but let us go back to the period from 1935 to 1939. Did all the people of Canada have all the woollen goods they desired? Would the minister suggest that the million people on relief were all warmly clothed and had good woollen coats? If not, I should say we should import wool so that they could be warmly clothed. Would the minister suggest that all the million people on relief had sufficient sugar? Of course they did not, so that I say we could have imported sugar in order that they might have been properly fed. It is the question of an internal distributing mechanism; we have not been able to maintain an effective demand against our production.

Such action as the London Chamber of Commerce proposes would force a nation either to accept imports in exchange for exports or, after a period of time, have that credit abroad cancelled. The interesting point is this, that Maynard Keynes in his proposal recognized the fact that that may be necessary in future; that some proposal such as the London Chamber of Commerce put forth may be necessary. But evidently he did not have the necessary courage to include it in his proposals. However, he does refer to it at page 10 in this way:

> It is not contemplated that either the debit or the credit balance of an individual country ought to exceed a certain maximum—let us say, its quota. In the case of debit balances this maximum has been made a rigid one, and, indeed, counter-measures are called for long before the maximum is reached. In the case of credit balances no rigid maximum has been proposed. For the appropriate provision might be to require the eventual cancellation or compulsory investment of persistent bancor credit balances accumulating in excess of a member's quota.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Apparently he recognized, as the London Chamber of Commerce does, that it may be necessary to cancel those credits if a creditor nation persists in being a creditor nation, and is unwilling to put its own house in order, by importing freely in exchange for its exports.

Immediately after the war the nations devastated thereby will be unable to pay for the things they require. That condition should still be regarded as the responsibility of the united nations, either through lend-lease or mutual aid. Mr. Churchill in a speech which he made some time ago referred to the fact when he said that for the first four years there would have to be a transition period in which they might have to accept goods, without exporting but that after that period Great Britain would demand her share of the export trade. He did not mention anything about import trade, but said that Great Britain would demand her fair share of the export trade, so that Great Britain might be in a position to pay for imports with her exports.

First of all, I would say that this proposal does not make any provision to deal with that matter. They will carry a nation for a short period; that is, they will make supplies of bancor unitas available to these nations which have unfavourable balances of trade. But since they will not be in a position to export, they will exhaust their quota and lay themselves open to pressure from union officials. It does not define what that pressure may be. I think we can all agree that the pressure would be that you would have to curtail your expenditures and exert a deflationary policy, thereby forcing down prices. It must be recognized that that is the form which the pressure would take.

My main criticism of the proposal—and it is a criticism just as necessary as that of an unfavourable balance of trade—is that it would mean a return to the gold standard. It calls for international currency backed up by gold, and internal currency tied to that unit. So that it is a gold standard mechanism. That is the way in which the British scheme is built, and also the American and the Canadian. I should like to point out my objection to the gold standard mechanism. No longer would a nation's standard of living be dependent entirely upon its productive capacity. There would be another limiting factor. When we went into this war and wanted production expanded to the maximum, what did we do? We immediately went off a gold basis. We realized we could not carry out our war effort efficiently if we did not, and accordingly we immediately went off gold. If after the war, we are to make a maximum peace effort, then I am satisfied we shall have to see that no artificial restriction such as a gold standard is allowed to impede the success of that effort. There is nothing new in these proposals whereby international friction may be eliminated, except that it means the loss of sovereignty. I would say this is a beginning. It is a first step toward a form of international dictatorship. And in view of the fact that to-day we are fighting to maintain the democratic way of life, and fighting dictators in enemy countries, I do not think for one moment that the men who are fighting this war want to have an international dictatorship set up.

There is no question that this proposal, if put into effect, would be an international dictatorship. And unless hon. members have read these proposals through to the finish, they will not realize just how they propose an international dictatorship. We find this on page 18 of the British proposal:

> The union might set up an account in favour of any supernational policing body which may be charged with the duty of preserving the peace and maintaining international order. If any country were to infringe its properly authorized orders, the policing body might be entitled to request the governors of the clearing union to hold the clearing account of the delinquent country to its order and permit no further transactions on the account except by its authority. This would provide an excellent machinery for enforcing a financial blockade.

Therefore we are going to build up an international police force, so that any nation which finds itself in the unhappy position of having an unfavourable balance of trade, and which does not follow out the recommendations of the union, will have an international police force sitting on its doorstep to see that it carries them out.

Is that what we are fighting for? Are we fighting to maintain an international dictatorship to determine their own affairs in their own country?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not quite fair.

Mr. QUELCH: I think undoubtedly that is what this proposal means. I am not saying that the people who formulated this proposal realized that. I would like the minister to tell us the terms of reference given when they drew these proposals up. What were the Canadian proposals? Were they told to draw up proposals by which gold could be utilized, or were they told to disregard gold entirely, and bring about ways and means of making trade among nations as free as possible? I am inclined to think that they were told to bring about proposals by which gold could be utilized. The gold standard itself has always been to a certain extent a dictator, because it has meant that, under certain conditions, as the gold left the country the banks were automatically compelled to call in their loans so as to maintain a certain fixed ratio between gold and the money in circulation. There you had a compulsory reduction in the standard of living, due to the operation of the gold standard. That, in itself, is the work of a dictatorship. Surely we do not want to go back to that.

The minister probably remembers that when Australia and the British empire went on the gold standard in 1925, many people were enthusiastic about what the results would be. I wish to quote what Mr. Bruce, the Prime Minister of Australia, had to say in that regard. This is taken from the book, "Why I Fight", and reads:

> It must have a tremendous influence throughout the world, and will go down in history as one of the greatest financial achievements in the empire's progress.

That was the prophecy of Mr. Bruce regarding the gold standard of 1925.

Now, let me quote what happened.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. QUELCH: May I quote one statement by Mr. Churchill?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will speak for a moment, and then the hon. member may have another forty minutes, if he wishes. At one stage I interjected that one statement was not quite fair. The hon. member was quoting from a clause of the British memorandum, and seemed to be arguing that it was for setting up a supranational policing body. It does not say that. It says that if any supranational policing body is set up, this clearing union might assist it. But it does not, in fact, advocate the setting up of a supranational policing body. I am not defending the Canadian memorandum, but when I made my interjection the hon. member shot right off on the Canadian memorandum.

Mr. QUELCH: When he made that statement Keynes suggested that it might take a police force to keep these proposals in effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend has not that right at all. It apparently contemplates or envisages the possibility of some body like the League of Nations having policing powers for the purpose of preserving peace in the post-war world, preventing aggression or something of that kind. It would be necessary for that police force to have power to impose certain sanctions, one of which might be financial in character. If that were agreed to by the nations of the world and this police force were set up, it is pointed out in the memorandum that this clearing union might assist it. That is all that was contemplated in the setting up of the policing force; it was not contemplated that it would police the operations of this union.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not take exception to what the minister said; I simply refer to the last line which states that this would provide excellent machinery for enforcing a financial blockade. If there is a police force, it would provide a convenient way to enforce a financial blockade against those nations which are not doing exactly what the union has told them to do.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is not as dull as all that. He says he agrees with what I say and then he puts an interpretation upon my words which they do not bear at all. He says that financial blockades will be enforced by this supranational policing body. If there is to be such a policing body, that will not be any part of its duties, but it is pointed out in this memorandum that such a clearing union might be of assistance. From there my hon. friend runs off and changes the situation altogether and says that you are going to set up an organization to establish a financial blockade.

Mr. QUELCH: I quite agree with the minister that this proposal does not provide for an international police force; it merely states that if an international police force is established, this union will be a very handy place in which to deposit money for the payment of the force. It then concludes with the statement that it would provide excellent machinery for enforcing financial blockade. I am not saying that they are going to create an international police force for the express purpose of bringing about a financial blockade. But if you have a police force, it will be very convenient to use it for that purpose. In other words, it can be used to bring a certain amount of pressure to bear upon certain nations.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot seem to get it through my hon. friend's head that the police force is not to be set up for the purpose of carrying out the desires of the clearing union. The supranational police force would be set up for another purpose altogether. I am not defending Lord Keynes' proposal because there is no reason why I should, but I do not like to see any proposal twisted.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. QUELCH: I am not attacking this proposal on the grounds that it intends to set up an international police force; I merely mention the fact that it states that, if there is such a force, it could be utilized for the purpose of enforcing a financial blockade.

The CHAIRMAN: I said a few minutes ago that the hon. member had spoken for forty minutes. It is true that in the meantime the Minister of Finance has made a statement, but I do not think we would be within the terms of standing order 58 if we allowed an hon. member all the time he wanted simply because he had been interrupted. Standing order 58 reads:

> The standing orders of the house shall be observed in the committees of the whole house so far as may be applicable, except the standing orders as to the seconding of motions and limiting the number of times of speaking.

It would be almost farcical if an hon. member spoke for forty minutes, and sat down, and then when another member asked a question, to get up again and make another speech for forty minutes. Again I repeat that there are other members who wish to speak on the item before the committee.

Mr. QUELCH: May I conclude my remarks with one short statement? Mr. Bruce had pointed out in 1925 that the gold standard would bring prosperity to the world, and this is what Mr. Churchill had to say in 1932:

> When I was moved by many arguments and forces in 1925 to return to the gold standard I was assured by the highest experts, and our experts are men of great ability and of indisputable integrity and sincerity, that we were anchoring ourselves to reality and stability; and I accepted their advice. I take for myself and my colleagues of other days whatever degree of blame and burden there may be for having accepted their advice. But what has happened? We have had no reality, no stability. The price of gold has risen since then by more than seventy per cent. That is as if a 12-inch foot rule had suddenly been stretched to 19 or 20 inches; as if the pound avoirdupois had suddenly become 23 to 24 ounces instead of—how much is it?—16. Look at what this has meant to everybody who has been compelled to execute their contracts upon this irrationally enhanced scale.

And further on:

> This new House of Commons contains a great number of new and young legislators. I commend this problem to them as the supreme topic of the age.

Mr. JAQUES: I wish to add a few words to those of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. He has made one of his valuable citicisms of financial matters. I should like to tackle this question from a different angle and I want to assure you, Mr. Chairman, that even though I may seem to, I am not wandering from the subject. This is a world proposal, and one cannot very well discuss a world proposal unless he uses a world wide approach. I should like to go back a few months to April 1, when an article was published in the Ottawa Citizen headed, "New authority to guide affairs." It went on to state:

A supranational authority with power to settle questions of immigration, natural resources, treatment of minorities, repudiation of debts, finance and other questions was predicted by B. K. Sandwell of Toronto in an address before the Ottawa branch of the league of nations society.

At that time I brought to the attention of this house and of the government those remarks and I asked if they were not seditious in the opinion of the government. At once I was assailed in the press as a fascist, as a moron, as a Jew-baiter, as one who filled his mind with such rubbish as the protocols of Zion and the A plus B theorem of Major Douglas, and they even went so far as to couple the two together. I was surprised at the notoriety which I had achieved, shall I say so easily, on that occasion, until a few days later when the following was published in the Ottawa Citizen. The dispatch is dated "Washington" and says in part:

Secretary Henry Morgenthau disclosed to-day comprehensive administration plans to stabilize post-war currencies and fix their value in terms of gold. The plans involve:

1. Creation of an international stabilization fund by the united nations and their associates.
2. Fixing the value of currencies in terms of gold.
3. An agreement among participating countries not to devalue their currencies without consulting other members of the stabilization funds.

Both plans entail the establishment of a stabilization fund to be managed by an international bank, vitally important because it would mean that participating countries would lose control over the value of their currencies for world trade purposes. This control would be vested in the bank, not in a parliament or a congress, and if a country wanted the rate lowered or increased it could only appeal to the bank, not take action itself.

When we speak in terms of gold it is well perhaps to ask ourselves who are the owners of these gold reserves the greater part of which are piled up underground at Fort Knox. I suppose the vast majority of the people of this country and perhaps of the members of this house fondly imagine that that gold belongs to the people or, if you like, to the government of the United States, but I am informed on the highest authority that eighty-five per cent of that gold is owned and controlled by private interests. I will go farther and say that it is those interests that are behind this scheme to stabilize world finance in terms of gold.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask who is the highest authority?

Mr. JAQUES: I am not going to give names. I make that statement and I stand by it.

Mr. ISNOR: That is no good.

Mr. JAQUES: I am told by well-informed Americans that anybody in the United States who understands finance understands that as well as they understand anything.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that the gold at Fort Knox is all owned by the United States and is shown in the treasury statements. That is why I asked my hon. friend for his authority for his statement to the contrary.

Mr. JAQUES: I am perfectly willing to stand by that statement, and if it can be proved otherwise, that is all right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. BLACKMORE: You have your chance to disprove it. Come along with your proof.

Mr. JAQUES: I am perfectly willing to let my reputation stand by that statement. The federal reserve system in the United States no more belongs to the government of the United States than the Bank of England belongs to the government of Britain. I say that both governments are run respectively by those banks.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say that the gold was owned by the federal reserve board.

Mr. JAQUES: By the federal reserve system.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, nor by the federal reserve system. I said it was owned by the treasury.

Mr. JAQUES: When I brought to the attention of the house this policy of encouraging Canadians to surrender their loyalty to the crown and give it to this supranational authority, at once I was accused of indulging in such foolishness as reading the Protocols of Zion, which were described as absolute nonsense. I am going to read two of them to see how far they are absurd when applied to this matter under discussion.

Mr. ILSLEY: I must rise to a point of order. When an hon. member gets so far afield as to read the Protocols of Zion I must take exception. That is more than latitude allows.

The CHAIRMAN: There is a rule which is hard to apply in committee against repetition. I would hope at this stage the hon. member would not go over old ground which has been thoroughly covered many times this session. I believe it is the wish of ninety-nine per cent of the members of this house that we get down to business.

Mr. JAQUES: It says this—

Mr. ILSLEY: I object. I do not base my objection on grounds of repetition but on the ground that on an item for departmental administration he cannot read into the record some fraudulent or forged Jew-baiting documents which are called the Protocols of Zion.

Mr. JAQUES: I have not mentioned the word "Jew", but I am going to read this because it is absolutely pertinent to what I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not know that I can rule it out of order, but surely no member at this time would wish to overload Hansard after the thousands of pages we have had on the general subject. I do not want to hurt anybody's feelings, but surely there should be a limit somewhere.

Mr. HANSELL: Might I just say on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that you have been most fair to everyone this session. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin has taken less time than almost any other member of the house. He has spoken only occasionally and then forcefully, in my opinion. He has been waiting for many weeks for this item to come up. This is the last speech he will make this session. He lives and moves and has his being in this particular subject and pays little attention to anything else that goes on in the house. I trust that the committee will bear with him for the remainder of the time at his disposal, perhaps only twenty minutes, and then we can go right on with the item.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is an appeal to sympathy or something of the kind.

Mr. HANSELL: It is the truth.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would be disposed to meet the hon. gentleman along those lines, but we must not get too far away from the rules of the house even on grounds of mercy. We must stay within shooting distance of them. The hon. gentleman apparently was attacked by some paper or editor for some remark he had made in the house and he wants to make a reply to that attack.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. JAQUES: Nothing of the kind. If I like to make myself ridiculous, I do not see why anybody else should worry about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not mind that.

Mr. JAQUES: Then what is the minister worrying about?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am worrying about the infringement of the rules of the house.

Mr. JAQUES: I am not, I believe, in the habit of breaking the rules. I quote:

> We shall replace the free market with stabilized control of foreign exchange by which we can fix industrial values to suit ourselves.
>
> All industry will come to depend upon us, bringing stupendous power to us.
> In our hands is the greatest power in the world—gold: in a few days we can procure from our vaults any quantity we may please.

Having said that, perhaps I may be allowed to quote from a speech which was made in the congress of the United States by Mr. Smith, one of the congressmen from Ohio. Speaking on Monday, April 12, 1943, on this United States plan for stabilization of currency, he said:

> We are apt to be led to believe from the newspaper, radio and other reports that this scheme emanates from a few individuals. Mr. Harry D. White, special assistant to the secretary of the treasury, is being credited as the prime mover of the United States contribution to the plan. Professor Maynard Keynes is being credited as the prime mover of the British contribution to this plan. Now, of course, we would be naive indeed if we were to believe that the officials of our treasury had undertaken this task on their own initiative, or that Professor Keynes, and perhaps a few of his associates, had inaugurated their part of the scheme on their own accord. We may rest assured that back of this move are the most powerful international moneyed interests and financiers of the world. Furthermore, we may be certain that world power politics are playing a prominent role in promoting this movement.
> Upon first sight the Keynes plan and that of Mr. Morgenthau may appear to be quite different from each other. It would not be surprising if this impression had been received by many from reading the brief news dispatches describing the two proposals. . . .
>
> Both drafts embrace the idea of a completely politically managed international currency.
>
> Both contemplate the surrender by the individual countries to the international monetary power of a large part, if not all, of the very heart of national sovereignty, that is mastership over monetary and credit resources.
> Section 8 of the constitution provides that Congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof. . . . If Mr. Morgenthau and the forces back of him should be able to get around this provision of the constitution, then the last vestige of our great charter of liberty will have disappeared. All hope of restoring it would be gone, and the totalitarian state would be complete.

No, I cannot believe that the American people have as yet been beaten into such abject submission that they will allow this to happen.

These are the words of a congressman, spoken in congress. But unfortunately neither the American people nor the Canadian people are permitted to learn the truth of these things.

I was going to quote from a speech made by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill in the British House of Commons in 1932, but the hon. member for Acadia has already put it on Hansard, and the omissions will rather spoil my record. But there is one part which he did not quote. Let me repeat very briefly. Mr. Churchill said that he was moved by many arguments and forces in 1925 to return to the gold standard and was assured by the highest experts, men of great ability and indisputable integrity and sincerity, that they were anchoring themselves to reality and stability, and he accepted their advice. He continued:

I take for myself and my colleagues of other days whatever degree of blame and burden there may be for having accepted their advice. But what has happened? We have had no reality, no stability.

He goes on to say:

The price of gold has risen since then by more than 70 per cent. That is as if a 12-inch foot-rule had suddenly been stretched to 19 or 20 inches; as if the pound avoirdupois had suddenly become 23 to 24 ounces instead of—how much is it?—16. Look at what this has meant to everybody who has been compelled to execute their contracts upon this irrationally enhanced scale. Look at the gross unfairness of such a distortion to all producers of new wealth, and to all that labour and science and enterprise can give us. Look at the enormously increased volume of commodities which have to be created in order to pay off the same mortgage debt or loan. Minor fluctuations might well be ignored, but I say quite seriously that this monetary convulsion has now reached a pitch where I am persuaded that the producers of new wealth will not tolerate indefinitely so hideous an oppression.

"So hideous an oppression." Those are the words of the present Prime Minister of England, and, thinking that those words would be of interest to those sections of the press which had attacked me in such a vitriolic way, I had copies of that speech made and sent them to the editors of Saturday Night, the Sifton press and other papers that had attacked me and suggested that the speech would be of interest to their readers. From that day to this I have never had an acknowledgment, and not one word has been printed. Yes, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill is a great man when he is hurling defiance at the nazis. But when he proves his greatness by acknowledging the mistakes that he made in the past, not a word of it is published. That speech was made in 1932. Some people say, "Ah, but you went off gold in 1929," or was it 1930, "and the depression came after that." Well, Mr. Chairman, when a person has been drugged; when he is a victim of drugs, you cannot cure him by suddenly cutting off the drug; that would bring about a collapse.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They went off gold in 1931.

Mr. JAQUES: That is what happened, but the mischief and the damage had been done. I suffered; I am not speaking because I personally suffered, but the farmers of this country for whom I am speaking were ruined by that policy. As Mr. Churchill said, think of the increased production that has to be exchanged to pay off the same mortgage indebtedness. We have heard a great deal in this house recently about farmers' debts and how lazy the farmers were, and how dishonest for not paying. But Mr. Churchill is, I think, more honest than our critics. He admits his mistake.

I happened to spend the winter of 1930-31 in a small town near Vancouver. The house where I was living overlooked the Canadian Pacific railway, and every freight car that came to the town going west that winter was loaded with the victims of that policy. From the beginning to the end of that winter there could be seen thousands of the victims of the return to gold. I spoke with many of them. They were men just as good as I am, many of them better, and there they were without homes, without food, without money, without clothes, without shelter. It made me think, and I undertook the study of economics. I had time on my hands and I borrowed every book I could find in the Carnegie library, but at the end of six or eight months I was none the wiser. When I returned to Alberta later in the year I came across an article headed, "Money, the basis of exchange"; I read that, and in ten minutes I had the key; and I have been applying that key from that day to this. That is why I take the interest in this affair that I do; and I say that until the control of financial policy is taken away from those who have usurped it, and is returned to governments in trust for the people, there is no hope of lasting peace, happiness and prosperity.

Now let me refer to an article that was published in a well-known magazine by Doctor Ludwig von Mises. We are told at the end of the article that Doctor Ludwig von Mises was recently professor of international economic relations at the graduate institute of international studies in Geneva, previously professor of economics at the university of Vienna, and author of "Socialism". Speaking of international finance between the two wars, he makes this statement:

> The state of things which prevailed in the last decades can be characterized as a complete surrender of the rights of the creditors and of the investors. Every nation successfully made use of its sovereignty to the disadvantage of foreign creditors and investors. Every nation exercised its power to expropriate foreign investments directly or indirectly by discriminatory taxation, to debase the currency, with which loans had to be repaid. The history of international financial relations has, in the last twenty years, been one of almost continual embezzlement. The governments of the debtor countries behaved like swindlers for the benefit of their own treasury and for the benefit of pressure groups within their population.
> The new covenant of the League of Nations will therefore have to include a rigid limitation on the sovereign rights of every nation. Unilateral measures which affect the essentials of the contractual obligations, the currency system, taxation and other important matters have to be rendered unlawful. The debtor countries should not have any rights which are denied to private debtors.
> All these provisions will have to be efficiently enforced by international tribunals—

Mr. FAUTEUX: I rise to a point of order We are here to vote expenses for the wartime prices and trade board and not to listen to theories on monetary systems and international monetary reforms.

Mr. JAQUES: May I remind the committee that we were promised a discussion on this matter of international currency by the Prime Minister in this house, and it is not my fault that I have been driven to the last hours of the session. I have been waiting for two or three weeks for this opportunity and, if the question of international currency is not of interest to the hon. member all I can say is, I find it hard to believe. The whole future not only of Canada but of the world is involved in these very proposals. Let me finish the quotation.

Mr. FAUTEUX: I insist that the hon. member is out of order. It is our duty to put in as much time as is necessary to pass these estimates and vote the necessary moneys to help the government and the country, but I do not think we are called upon to spend so much of our time in listening to hon. members who want to take advantage of the House of Commons as a tribune for the exposition of their political views. I do not think the house is at the moment interested in theories of international finance such as those put forward by the party to which the hon. member belongs.

[Mr. Jaques.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, what item are we discussing?

The CHAIRMAN: We are discussing item 46. On the point of order, the rule is clear with regard to discussions in committee, but I am afraid it would be impossible for me to rule the hon. member out of order. We are not making progress, but I do not think I can rule the hon. member out of order.

Mr. JAQUES: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. To continue this quotation:

> All these provisions will have to be efficiently enforced by international tribunals and by sanctions which the league must apply with a greater measure of success than in the past. Without some kind of international police power such a plan could not be carried out. Coercive measures indispensable in order to make reluctant debtor countries pay.

You can see the beauty of this scheme. First of all, you put the world on the gold standard so as to double and treble debts and then, when private individuals and countries find it impossible to carry out their contractual obligations, why the bailiff will enter the country, and the bailiff will be supported by the international police; and whether members of this house think so or not, let me tell the people outside the house, the people who will have to pay the price and who have been paying the price for the last twenty-five years, that that is exactly what it means, that and nothing else.

I know perfectly well that the vast majority of those who believe in and have worked for the League of Nations are well-meaning people, but unfortunately these things are a little hard to see. I have made it my duty for the last ten years to study this subject, so that I know what I am talking about, and what I have said has been supported by no less a person than the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

I could very easily continue my remarks, but I do not wish to detain the committee longer. My excuse for having spoken at this time is that I believe this is the most vitally important subject that has come before the house this session. My final suggestion to the people of Canada is that they remember Professor Keynes has said that gold has a psychological value. That is true; and the worship of gold is idolatry. It is as old as history, and has always brought ruin to those who have indulged in it. There is no reason why we should return to gold, and every reason why we should not.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to correct one misstatement of fact by the hon. gentleman. He said he would stake his reputation on the statement that eighty-five per cent of all the gold at Fort Knox was owned by private interests and not by the government of the United States. I have sent for the federal reserve bulletin of July, 1943, and the annual report of the secretary of the treasury on the state of the finances for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1942. At page 638 of the federal reserve bulletin I find a table headed, "Analysis of changes in gold stock of the United States," from which I find that in June, 1942, the gold stock of the United States of America was $22,737,000,000.

Mr. JAQUES: In the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, in the United States.

Mr. JAQUES: I do not deny that.

Mr. ILSLEY: At page 594 of the annual report of the secretary of the treasury on the state of the finances for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1942, I find the following item: "Assets. Gold, 1942. $22,736,503,160.69." That is stated to be the position as at the close of the fiscal year 1942, which would be June 30. In other words, the amount of gold owned by the treasury and shown in the annual report of the secretary of the treasury checks almost exactly with the total gold stock of the United States of America, so that the gold there is owned 100 per cent by the treasury.

Mr. JAQUES: May I have your permission, Mr. Chairman, to read a letter which was my authority for the statement I made:

Dear Mr. Jaques,

The answer to your question in your letter of June 8th is very simple and is shown either in the treasury statement or in the statement issued from time to time covering the condition of the federal reserve banks. The federal reserve banks hold gold certificates which are nothing more nor less than warehouse receipts for all but about two billion dollars of all the gold in this country. The amount of free gold is somewhat less than two billion dollars. Against the warehouse receipts for the actual gold, which are held by the privately owned federal reserve bank system, a somewhat lesser volume of federal reserve notes have been issued and are in circulation in this country as money.

I do not have a treasury statement available at the moment, but nobody in America who understands the operation of our monetary system would question my statement.

The per cent actually is much greater than 80.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman prefer not to give the name of the writer of the letter?

Mr. JAQUES: It is signed, "Most sincerely, Carl H. Mote."

Mr. ILSLEY: Who is he?

Mr. JAQUES: I understand that he is president of the Indiana Telephone company. I looked up his record in the American "Who's Who", and apparently he is a man of large business experience.

Mr. ILSLEY: The records are perfectly clear, that the gold stock of United States is owned in its entirety by the United States treasury.

Mr. SLAGHT: I have two points I wish to bring to the attention of the minister and his assistants, and I am not sure whether item 46 covers my first point or whether I should bring it up under item 47, which has to do with bank inspection. However, perhaps it is covered by the administration item. I have before me the Bank of Canada return of December, 1942 and January, 1943, indicating the securities which the chartered banks hold under the item, "dominion and provincial securities". Those two types of securities are merged; they are not broken down separately. The chartered banks, in furnishing the total of the two, could just as well furnish the total of each. It is a matter of some importance, and I bring it to the attention of the minister and his deputy, because this return shows that at the end of last year the chartered banks held $2,201,000,000 of these two types of securities. Some time ago I placed a question on the order paper asking how much of that item represented dominion securities. The answer was that the banks do not separate them, so that I was unable and the house was unable to get the information. I regard it as important, and I would ask the minister to consider requesting the chartered banks, because that is all it means, to break that return in two in order that this house may know how much of dominion securities, whether in bonds or in short-term treasury notes, the private banks of the country hold.

I think my second point is in order under this item; if not, I can discuss it later when we come to the item on page 10 of the estimates, dealing with the interest on the public debt, which this year shows an increase of $56,000,000. I want to request the Minister of Finance and the treasury board, in the financing that is ahead of us, not to go to the private chartered banks to borrow any money whatsoever for the Dominion of Canada, but rather to go to the Bank of Canada. This increase in interest of $56,000,000 would be cut in two; in effect, it would be reduced by, roughly speaking, $30,000,000 if we would borrow the money the people of Canada, both individuals and corporations, are unable to lend us on our victory bonds—either unable or unwilling to lend us—from the Bank of Canada, instead of from the chartered banks.

The committee will recall that with the wonderful organization we had for victory loan purposes the minister found himself in the last fiscal year, after borrowing all he could from the public, short in his budget requirements to the extent of $982,000,000, or nearly a billion dollars. Last session I advocated in committee that, instead of borrowing from the private banks, the minister should borrow a billion dollars from the Bank of Canada. In answer to my suggestion the minister said that, if he did that, it would simply blow the whole ceiling off. His expression will be found at page 4271 of Hansard for July 15 of last year. This is what he said:

> Whatever may be the situation normally, you have now a wartime prices and trade board, which will hold prices down and you can put your money into circulation without forcing prices up. . . .

And I skip a few words there. Then he continues:

> My hon. friend has the most sublime faith in the price ceiling. I wish I had as much faith in the price ceiling without that billion dollars as he has with that billion dollars.

Then the hon. member for York-Sunbury interjected:

> It would just blow up.

And following his lead the Minister of Finance said:

> I wish to tell him that if we put into circulation a billion dollars of new money, it would blow the price ceiling to Kingdom come before you could say "Jack Robinson".

That was his strong and forcible way of desiring to have us realize the evil which he genuinely felt would result.

I wish to pause to compliment the minister upon the administration of the price ceiling. It has been remarkable. It has been the envy of the United States and has received favourable comment in the mother country. The figures under it, when compared with what took place at the time of the last war, are startling. During the last war our present Minister of Finance was not minister. I should like to give, first, the price increases in this country, under another government, from November, 1916, to December, 1917, a period in the last war equivalent to the one through which we have passed. There was no price ceiling during the last war. Then I shall place on record the price increases from November, 1941 to December, 1942, a relative period in the present war, with a price ceiling established. My figures are taken from the dominion bureau of statistics, and they show how our wartime prices and trade board under the present minister has prevented prices from sky-rocketting, as they did during the time of the last war. Since the price ceiling became effective, in the fall of 1941, the cost of living index has risen a total of only 2·5 points. That is the figure up to six weeks ago, and there has been only a very slight difference, if any, since that time. In a comparable period in the last war it jumped 21·2 points.

The following schedule shows the percentage of increase—not the point increase—for leading commodities, and then for all items combined:

	Increase last war	Increase this war
(1) Food	26½ %	5·9%
(2) Rent	7·4%	1/10 of 1%
(3) Clothing	17·9%	1/10 of 1%
(4) Fuel, etc.	11 %	1/10 of 1%
(5) Miscellaneous items (doctor, travel, etc.)	10 %	½ of 1%

Total all items—last war—17·8 per cent.
this war— 2·2 per cent.

That is a tribute not only to our Minister of Finance and his department, but also to the men and women of Canada as well, whose willingness and ability to submit to the prohibitions which have been imposed upon them I ventured to predict last year on July 15. The minister was sceptical about it. He said that the creation of a billion dollars of new money would blow the lid off. His department created $982,000,000 of new money. He got $182,000,000 of it from the Bank of Canada and $781,000,000 of it from the private chartered banks. Where did they get it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I may interrupt the hon. member, I should hope it would suit the convenience of hon. members if we were not to rise at six o'clock, but were to continue right through. If that is agreeable, I would move accordingly.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think it would be better if we took a recess, even if it were only forty-five minutes.

Mr. SLAGHT: No; let us go on.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe we would not be doing our best work if we weary ourselves in that way.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I put the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend object to continuing?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not think it is in the best interests of the house, may I say to the Prime Minister. In my opinion if we took forty-five minutes recess, and then came back, it would be better.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about thirty minutes?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not mind, but I think there should be a recess.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All right; let us recess for thirty minutes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hon. members have been here since eleven o'clock this morning. We sat until one o'clock, and we have been sitting from two o'clock until six o'clock, and I think we should have a short recess.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at 6.30 p.m.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make it quite clear that in my request to the minister I am in no sense reflecting upon or attacking the chartered banks of Canada. The bankers of Canada have rendered and are rendering a great and genuine service to the people of Canada in the development of our natural resources, and this they can continue to do and receive just rewards for their proper services. There is a party in this house which attacks the banks of Canada and proposes to take them over and, as they say, nationalize them if my hon. friends ever get into power. To nationalize the banks in their programme simply means to politicalize the banks and, translating it one sentence farther, that simply means to C.C.F.-erize the banks, and no greater calamity could happen than that the commercial profits of the banks advancing money should be placed in the hands of any political party, even granting that they have no selfish motive. That would be contrary to all proper safeguarding of the interests of the nation.

My point is a simple one and I can state it in a very short time. I am not opposed to interest being paid by individuals or corporations for the use of other people's money that they have hired or that has been lent to them, nor am I opposed to the payment of interest by provinces or municipalities for money that they may borrow. But I am opposed to the Canadian government, which possesses under the British North America Act the sovereign and exclusive privilege of creating money, paying private bankers for the use of our own money. These private bankers do not lend their money to the government; they lend the government's money to the government and collect from the government an interest charge annually, which, of course, comes out of the taxes and the pockets of the taxpayers. It would be a simple matter to discontinue dominion government borrowings from the chartered banks. In his able budget presentation on March 2 of this year the Minister of Finance, as reported at page 845 of Hansard, said this:

> The plain fact is that this year we have had to depend too much on bank borrowing. I was able to say last year that "aside from the increase in treasury bills, there was no new direct borrowing from the Bank of Canada or the chartered banks during the year." During the current fiscal year, we shall have borrowed direct from the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks a net amount of $983 million.

Then he says:

> We borrowed from the banks because we were unable to borrow as much as we needed from personal savings.

I am concerned to know upon what he bases that statement; I am concerned to know who advised him that we had been unable to borrow as much as we needed from personal savings. It will be recalled that every issue of victory bonds made since the war began has been oversubscribed. Was it the officials of his department who told him that if he floated another loan he would not get money from personal savings, or was it the heads of the victory loan campaign who told him that? We all know the bankers of the country were the heads of the victory loan campaign, and they did a fine job. But I should like to know from the minister, if it is not outside the public interest to tell the committee, why he said that we could not borrow as much as we needed from personal savings when every victory loan he has offered the public has been oversubscribed.

In the coming year the minister and the treasury board have budgeted to borrow $2,748 million, which is about half a billion dollars more than they budgeted to borrow last year, and which they did not borrow last year, because they were unable to borrow. We did not borrow last year within $782 million of what we ought to have borrowed from the people, and accordingly we went to the banks for it. If we have the same measure of success with our victory loan this year, we shall have to borrow from the banks between $1,200 million and $1,500 million, because our requirements will be that much greater.

I say to the minister that there is no more danger of inflation in borrowing that money from the Bank of Canada than there is in borrowing it from the chartered banks. When the chartered banks lent him that $782 million, they did not do anything more than make a bookkeeping entry in pen and ink, crediting the Minister of Finance with that amount of money and putting the securities, whether bonds or treasury bills, away in their boxes. At the end of the year the chartered banks were holding over $2,000 million of securities. Why do we carry on in that way? Are we not apprehensive that the debt load we are creating will wreck this country? As I say, in borrowing from the Bank of Canada we are not incurring any greater danger of inflation than if we got the money from the chartered banks.

I want to support that statement with the authority of the Minister of Finance himself. On October 15 he had a carefully considered article, answering questions and elucidating for the people the intricacies of our banking and borrowing system, in Maclean's magazine, and at page 75 he made this statement.

> When the banks lend large sums to the government, they create additional deposits in the process. In the first instance, the new deposits are turned over to the government by the banks when they make the loan. But the government spends these deposits by drawing cheques against them—and they arise in the hands of the public in exactly the same way as if the government had printed more dollar bills to pay its expenses.

And he concludes by saying:

> These bank deposits are the commonest and most important form of money these days and the increase in them produces the same inflationary effects, and must be subject to the same sort of limits, as the issue of money.

That being so, what justification is there to add a further unnecessary load in order to finance our necessary deficit in war time? None whatever. Let me say to the minister that there is plenty of scope for the chartered banks in the other fields of activity in which they engaged. I have prepared, and I am going to take the time of the committee to put on Hansard a statement of the original capital of the chartered banks of Canada—$145 million. They have surpluses in the billions and all their buildings, and they have accessible to lend at five or six or seven per cent some $1,700,000,000 of time or savings deposits which the public have entrusted to them at one and one-half per cent. They have all this and their original capital, so that I think it is as clear as the noon-day sun that the Dominion of Canada must stop borrowing on its own security from the chartered banks of this country when we can borrow equally well from our own Bank of Canada.

The minister might tell us: "I have done a wonderful job in getting down the rate of interest which I pay to the chartered banks." Of course, he has. But while I give him great credit for that, the chartered banks have seen the handwriting on the wall. They know this is a terrific monopoly which they enjoy and which we gave them for nothing, and I believe that I am speaking in their own best interests when I ask them to join with the government and give up this monopoly and this practice of making book-keeping entries, of pretending to lend money to the government, when all they are doing is taking interest from the government and not putting up any money of their own.

The system was well described by the Minister of Finance last year when he said in an able address on July 15 as reported at page 4270 of Hansard:

> Everyone familiar with the working of the banking system knows that, the moment the banks get their hands on additional cash—I mean by that Bank of Canada notes, or deposits by the Bank of Canada which are convertible into Bank of Canada notes—when the banks get those reserves in their hands, powerful forces are set in motion to get the banks to buy securities themselves, to make loans themselves, so that the deposits of the chartered banks will be seven, eight, nine or ten times as great as their cash reserves. That lies at the base of their whole profit-making activities; the way they make money is by lending more money than they have. What they have is their cash reserves; and unless a bank has out several times—six, seven, eight, nine or ten times—its cash reserves, it is not being profitably, or, from a banking point of view, properly conducted.

Mr. HOWDEN: I gather from the remarks of the hon. member that the banks lend credit but actually get back cash. Is that the idea? When a loan becomes due it is repaid to the banks, so that they are getting money they never created.

Mr. SLAGHT: If their loans are repaid, of course they do, and having lent $782,000,000 to the Minister of Finance in the last fiscal year by a stroke of a pen, and with nothing behind it, when the minister pays them back that loan they are getting something they never had. Their business of lending something they have not got would not otherwise be properly and profitably conducted, to use the minister's words.

Mr. HOWDEN: And they do get it back in the end.

Mr. SLAGHT: If they lend money or pretend to lend money they never had, and if the borrower pays that back, they have got back a loan that was just as much a loan as though they had counterfeited a bill. There was no security and no goods and services behind it; there was no gold behind it; there was not a pennyworth of gold in the Bank of Canada behind it, nor is any required to be kept. So that, of course, if they got paid back these loans by making entries in books they did get something for nothing. Mark you, we are not paying back any bonds. Canada will owe billions for bonds, and I am looking to the day when we shall be called upon to pay the capital back on our loans. But what I am pointing out now is this awful burden of interest that is eating us up and costing the taxpayer so much, and which is quite unnecessary in so far as the government of Canada is concerned, because it is given the power to create new money, but it passes that power over as a blessed privilege and monopoly to the private banks.

One more point and I am through. The minister might point out that under the present system, if he had borrowed that $782,000,000 from the Bank of Canada instead of from the chartered banks, on top of the $192,000,000 he did borrow, the chartered banks would have had the privilege, because we would have created that much new money, that much new credit of the Bank of Canada, of multiplying that twenty times. They only have to have 5 per cent, and if they had done that, the spiral of inflation would have run away. The minister borrowed $192,000,000, and instead of the lid coming off, it did not even quiver. The bankers knew better than to take advantage of that privilege and did not take it. All the minister has to do is to pass a statute overnight requiring the Bank of Canada not to lend what they have not got to the government of Canada but only to lend by bookkeeping entries or to extend credit and create new money in so far as the Minister of Finance or the board of governors of the Bank of Canada permit them to do. I do not think that would shake in the slightest degree the foundations of the profitable business which the chartered banks of this country have been enjoying.

Let me ask the Minister of Finance not to invite me this year to feel ashamed because, after blaming me last year for discussing the government's financial policy, he said that I was directly against the financial policy of the government. I do not agree with him in that. I believe that I am enunciating the policy of the Liberal party as laid down by the Prime Minister and in our platform, when the Prime Minister said that public credit should be issued according to public needs, that that was Canada's duty and the policy of the Liberal party. So that if anybody is going to cross the floor, I would have to ask the minister to cross the floor because, when we depart from that policy, we are departing from Liberalism. I say that we should use the Bank of Canada for the legitimate purposes for which it has been created.

Next year is the end of the ten-year period when the Bank Act will be up for revision. It is too late to amend the act this year, and we cannot do it fairly by order in council, but I do press on the minister and his advisers that we wake up next year and put upon the statute books a control of the use of credit and new moneys and put that control back where it belongs, under the guidance of the Bank of Canada, the treasury board and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I would like the committee to bear with me for a few minutes while I prepare to answer some of the statements made by the hon. member for Parry Sound. In the first place he took one of the items in the estimates, an item for the payment of interest, and showed that for 1943-44 it is $36,000,000 more than for 1942-43, and he stated, which was the fact, that in the past year we borrowed some $782,000,000 from the chartered banks and said that, if we had borrowed that money from the Bank of Canada, that is from ourselves, we would have made an interest saving of something like $30,000,000. The rate of interest on the borrowing from the chartered banks is not between 3 and 4 per cent, as that statement would indicate. The average rate of interest paid on the borrowing from the chartered banks is nearer 1 per cent. I cannot say exactly what it is, but I know that on all our deposit certificates we pay three-fourths of one per cent. That constitutes a very large part of our borrowings from the chartered banks; and the rate of interest on treasury bills is less than half of one per cent. So that eight or nine million dollars would be very much closer to the savings which we would make in interest if we borrowed from the Bank of Canada instead of from the chartered banks. It may be said that that saving of eight or nine million dollars is worth while and that we should adopt the system of borrowing from the Bank of Canada in order to effect that saving. The reason why we borrow from the chartered banks instead of from the Bank of Canada except to a very limited degree is, as I have said on several occasions, that borrowing from the Bank of Canada is many times as inflationary as borrowing from the chartered banks.

My hon. friend read from a statement which I made to Maclean's magazine. I tell him that the statement is badly worded; that the words used tend to give a wrong impression, and certainly I never intended to say on that or any other occasion that borrowing from the chartered banks is as inflationary as borrowing from the Bank of Canada. When we borrow from the chartered banks we, of course, increase the volume of money, currency, spending power in the country by the amount which we borrow, and to that extent the transaction is of the same nature as borrowing from the Bank of Canada or issuing what my hon. friend called last year "national currency", because there we are increasing up to that point the amount of currency in the country to the extent of the exact amount which we borrow from the Bank of Canada. Up to that point the two transactions are the same.

Mr. McGEER: Not "currency"; the medium of exchange.

Mr. ILSLEY: "Currency" is incorrect—the medium of exchange. I got mixed. But immediately thereafter the consequences are entirely different. Borrowing from the Bank of Canada sets loose powerful inflationary forces beyond the amount of the original borrowing, forces which are not set loose by borrowing from the chartered banks, and those forces are released in this way. That fact is well understood by hon. members; we have gone over it time after time, but perhaps I should repeat it again. The chartered banks, as part of the normal business of banking which has been carried on in this way by banks for a great many decades, and probably centuries, use their cash reserves as a basis for extending credit, and their deposit liabilities may be in many cases, by law, twenty times as great as their cash reserves. As a matter of fact, however, they are almost always about ten times the amount of their cash reserves; and if banking is to be carried on profitably, banks inevitably do multiply the amount of medium of exchange by something like ten times.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which is wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will come to that. So that if we borrow from the Bank of Canada a billion dollars—we were talking last year about borrowing $1,200,000,000, although I gather that in my speech I talked about it as if it were a billion—under our present law and without restrictions or regulations, the normal development thereafter is for the medium of exchange in this country to go up to perhaps ten billion dollars.

Mr. SLAGHT: Why not change overnight?

Mr. ILSLEY: All right. That is what I meant when I said to-day that that would blow the ceiling to Kingdom come, and so it would. I repeat that. It would do it.

My hon. friend said to-night before the recess, "Ah, the Minister of Finance has borrowed nearly a billion dollars; he has created nearly a billion dollars of additional medium of exchange; yet he has been able to hold his ceiling." I have not borrowed a billion dollars from the Bank of Canada. I have borrowed less than $200,000,000 from the Bank of Canada during the past year. A part of that is not dangerous borrowing, for a reason which I dealt with in my budget speech. But I do not take back a word of all I said as to the effect of borrowing a billion or twelve hundred millions from the Bank of Canada under our present law and regulations. There would be so much medium of exchange in circulation in this country that it would be wholly impossible for us to retain our controls.

Mr. KUHL: That is all in potential.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not understand what that means. But do not let hon. members think the preservation of controls is easy. Do not let hon. gentlemen suppose that putting a price ceiling or a wage ceiling is the end of it. If the economic forces which are being exerted in the country are powerful enough under that price ceiling, that price ceiling cannot possibly hold. Hon. gentlemen may think that by very heavy taxation we can draw the purchasing power back into the treasury; that what we do not get back by taxation we can get back by borrowing, and that to the extent that taxation and borrowing do not do the job, the imposition of controls including rationing will do it. I say to the committee that the whole lot will not do it if you increase the volume of our purchasing power in the country too much. If you get a situation where, figuratively speaking, everyone goes around with his pockets full of money, the goods will be cleared right out of the stores.

Mr. KUHL: That is a straw man.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would, figuratively, be the case, if you issued a billion or twelve hundred million dollars borrowed from the Bank of Canada and let the present banking laws take their course.

On one other occasion I told my hon. friend that I did not want anyone within the sound of my voice at that time to say that the words I used when Maclean's magazine interviewed me meant that borrowing from the chartered banks was as inflationary as borrowing from the Bank of Canada. My hon. friend knows that I never intended them as such, because I solemnly assured him of that. My views are found, I think, most conveniently in my reply to my hon. friend last year, when I made it clear that there is no comparison between the inflationary effect of borrowing from the chartered banks and borrowing from the Bank of Canada, and we think the additional interest which is payable is a reasonable price to pay for avoiding the terrible effects of inflation.

My hon. friend comes back and says, "Well, change the law or the regulations; make it so that the banks cannot proceed on a ten per cent or a five per cent cash reserve basis but," as I understood it, on a 100 per cent reserve basis; that they must retain a reserve up to and equal to the amount of their deposit liabilities.

Mr. KUHL: That would be right and just.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are facing the issue squarely. If they got leave to extend it by ten or twenty times, we would have that much more inflation; we would have Simon-pure 100 per cent inflation. But some say, do not allow them to expand credit in that way. It was suggested by the hon. member for Rosthern when he was in the house, and I believe it has been suggested by one or more members of the Social Credit party. Imagine the situation where the banks had to retain 100 per cent cash to cover deposit liabilities! If they did that—

Mr. SLAGHT: Cash or Bank of Canada credits.

Mr. ILSLEY: When I say "cash", I mean Bank of Canada notes or Bank of Canada deposits. I use the word "cash" in that sense and in no other. Now, if we impose upon them, by law, necessity for a 100 per cent cash ratio, they cannot make money out of loans.

Mr. KUHL: That is the way they claim they make their money.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what they claim. I am not speaking on behalf of the banks. The banks in years past have been wrong, a good many of them, in the claims they have put forward. I do not say that the banks are always right by any means, but I do say that they could not carry on business. How could they?

Mr. SLAGHT: Read their annual statements. For years they made sixteen per cent profit.

Mr. ILSLEY: Please do not interrupt too much. The inevitable effect of insisting upon a 100 per cent cash ratio is, of course, that the payment of interest on savings deposits would disappear overnight and a service charge on current deposits, a substantial one, would have to be imposed. In other words, you would be levying, by this regulation, an indirect tax, and one not in proportion to ability to pay, upon the savings depositors and current account depositors, or on borrowers from banks, or on the shareholders of the banks, or on all three.

Mr. KUHL: The depositor should pay interest to the bank, not the bank to the depositor. He should pay a service charge.

Mr. ILSLEY: No doubt you would have a big service charge if you did that.

An hon. MEMBER: Put it on.

Mr. ILSLEY: What justification is there for doing that? Is there any great reason why that should be done; why we should change our system so that persons using the banks should pay a substantial service charge and depositors be unable to get any interest whatever? This is altering the present system by a queer form of indirect and unfair taxation on a certain class. The taxation that goes on that class at the present time is mostly income taxation and it goes on in proportion to their ability to pay, as properly conceived income taxes always do. What is to be gained by the change? To listen to the hon. member for Parry Sound, one would think that the banks were making a tremendous amount of money; but are they? And if they are not, is there any reason for disturbing the present system? The banks, or most of them, had to reduce their dividends in the summer of 1942, as a result of increasing taxation, they stated. But for whatever reason, they reduced their dividends, to the knowledge of a great many persons in this country, who saw the shares they held in the banks go down in value on the market. The banks charge us, whenever they lend us money, on a great part of the money we borrow—six months money—three-quarters of one per cent. Is that an unreasonable charge? It must be borne in mind that when the government pays out money and that money goes to the banks, the banks have to pay interest on it. When we borrowed $782,000,000 from the chartered banks last year at three-quarters of one per cent and paid that money to contractors, civil servants and others, those who received the money from the government, or most of those who received it, took that money back to the bank. If they took half of it back to the bank and put it in savings accounts and the other half in current accounts and the banks paid one and a half per cent on what was put in savings accounts, then the outlay to the bank, the cost of the transaction, was three-quarters of one per cent; and as a matter of fact three-quarters of one per cent is, as nearly as we can estimate it, the cost to the banks of doing that business. In other words, we consider that the banks are rendering this service to the government at cost. For some reason or another my hon. friend would stop us from doing that. He would take that away from the banks; he would not give them the business, and he would put it in the Bank of Canada and do it in that way. I do not know why. He talks about the great increase in the annual interest charge, an unbearable burden which the people cannot pay. We have budgeted this year for $5,500,000,000. What was the total interest item on that total? It was $214,459,300.63.

Mr. KUHL: What will it be in the post-war period?

Mr. ILSLEY: That depends on how we handle the situation in the post-war period. If we keep our national income up—

Mr. KUHL: If.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, if. If we keep it up, I do not say up to the present level, but if we keep it anywhere near the present level, we shall be able readily to service our debt even if we have two or three more victory loans. Nothing is lost to the country, it must be borne in mind, when you borrow money within Canada, because what is the liability of one set of Canadians is the asset of another set. It is only when you borrow money abroad that such borrowing becomes a real burden to the country as a whole; and while I do not want to see our internal debt go up faster than I can help; while I do not think it is a good thing to have a large internal debt, nevertheless for any member of this house to say that we cannot stand it; that it will crush us; that it is a burden beyond the capacity of the people, that is a mistake. It is not a burden on the people of the country but on the taxpayers of the country for the benefit of Canadians who hold the securities, and when the holders of those securities die, a part of that money goes to pay succession duties, and so on. It is not a thing that is crushing the country.

I do not know whether I have covered the situation. The hon. gentleman asked, who was it that said that we could not borrow more money from the people? I cannot say who advised that. We borrow everything we can, and his suggestion that the head of the national war finance committee, who was president of the Bank of Montreal, advised not to borrow money from the people so that we would have to borrow from the chartered banks, is wholly unfounded. Mr. Spinney has done his very best while chairman of the national war finance committee to see that the maximum amount possible was borrowed from the people.

We have had appeal after appeal and campaign after campaign. We have done everything we could think of. We have advertised and enlisted the voluntary support of perhaps 20,000 or 25,000 Canadians. We have put on great victory loan campaigns. You cannot put one on every month. Perhaps my hon. friend would ask why we do not have them more often.

Mr. SLAGHT: Oh, no.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would be the only way we could get any more. I say to him that we could not get a dollar more than we got in any one of our campaigns; we could not get a dollar more than we got through our continuous war savings certificate campaign, or by our sale of non-interest bearing bonds, which are not going over very well. I say that myself. Nobody had to advise me about that; I know it. I have lived through it, day after day, week after week, month after month. We have done everything we could to get the people of this country to save their money and to lend it to us. They have done very well; but after they got the bonds or the certificates some people sold their bonds or cashed their certificates. There are certain unsatisfactory features of the situation, but I do not know of a better system than the present one. I repeat the passage which was quoted from one of my budget speeches, that we found it impossible to get as much money as we required from the personal savings of the people. We were driven to the banks, and as between the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks we went to the chartered banks, in order to avoid inflation. We got them to lend us money on deposit certificates at cost, as nearly as we could estimate cost, and at the very time they were doing that they reduced their dividends and by all indications were not making abnormal or undue profits. Listening to some of the remarks that have been made here to-night, I should have thought they lent credit and got back cash; that they were making 100 per cent on the transaction.

Mr. HOWDEN: I should like to follow up that question. To my very humble intelligence—which is probably due to my ancestry—the thing that bothers me is that we do borrow credit and that in the end we repay that loan with actual wealth.

Mr. ILSLEY: What wealth?

Mr. HOWDEN: Actual cash, if you like; that is what I mean. We borrow credit from these people, and all the time we are building up the capital debt of our country. They lend us credit; they do not actually lend us money, to carry on the business of the country, but eventually that loan has to be paid back in actual cash.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; you can take in cheques, or something like that.

Mr. HOWDEN: Can you pay them back with cheques? Do you not require something behind your cheques?

Mr. ILSLEY: A bank account.

Mr. McGEER: All bank borrowings are repayable in legal tender cash; it is a contract under the law, as the minister well knows.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it is a contract, but actual legal tender is not taken back.

Mr. McGEER: When a depression comes along that is exactly what happens; the people are forced to convert their assets into cash. In the depression of 1929 that was the thing that brought about the appalling condition of bankruptcy, because of these liquid credits. People had invested largely in margin stocks; then they were called upon to convert those stocks into cash, and they had to get legal tender. I remember going to my own banker; he telephoned and said, "I want this security loan called." I said, "I suppose that goes for every one of your clients in this bank?" and his reply was that it did. I suppose every bank in Canada is doing the same thing. That applies not only to people like myself, who have not been gambling in the market, but to people who have been buying on margin. As a banker the minister knows that if this is the order that has gone out from the banks in Canada, and probably from the banks in the United States, to all people who have stocks as security, they must go on the market to convert those stocks into cash, and you know that will collapse the market in Canada and the United States. The very principle raised by the hon. member for St. Boniface, that they lend credit and are repaid in legal tender cash, is one of the tragic and badly misused powers enjoyed by the banking monopoly, and as yet the people have no protection or security against it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The point really is a new one to me, and I shall look into it to see whether I think there is really anything in it. The points brought up by the hon. member for Parry Sound are old; they have been discussed time after time. I cannot make my position much clearer than I have made it. Three or four times I have given the reasons why we are taking our present course, and I believe that course to be in the best interests of the country.

Mr. SLAGHT: May I mention just three matters for the minister to ponder during the recess, apropos of his explanation. He says that all this debt we are creating, and the interest we pay, is held in Canada so that it is a case of one Canadian paying another. Let me tell him that in the last victory loan there were 2,400,000 subscribers, individuals and others. There are in Canada 11,500,000 people, and of course one must make allowances for children; so that there are to-day 9,100,000 people in Canada who do not own a victory bond of any kind.

Let me give the minister one other point. He says that the chartered banks restricted their profits, and I want to give him this figure. There are 51,000 shareholders in the ten chartered banks of Canada; that information comes from the statement of the association of bankers. This means that four per cent of the people of Canada own bank shares and ninety-six per cent of the people of Canada have not a share of bank stock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But they are paying the taxes.

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes; they are paying the taxes and giving the bankers the profit under the monopolistic system.

One more point and I am through. The minister says, you might just as well go on and let them do this—the British North America Act provides otherwise, but we surrendered that right—because if you take it away from them, we shall have to pay for the banks servicing us. For instance, a grocer then would have to pay so much a cheque, and so on. They are charging that now. I know a little grocery store in a country town that is paying the bank $10 a month to carry its current account.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is better than paying the bank $100 a month.

Mr. SLAGHT: It would not have to pay the bank $100 a month.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps not, but it would have to pay a great deal more than $10.

Mr. SLAGHT: I say it would not have to pay nearly as much, and let me tell the minister why. The minister knows that the service the banks give is for the big corporatons, for big businesses, which have thousands of cheques go through in a day. That is the type of business that is using eighty-five per cent of the banking service of Canada. The working man in the factory and the farmer on the farm may have little savings accounts, but they do not go near them more than two or three times a year. If they paid five cents every time they went there and deposited or withdrew money it might cost him fifty or seventy-five cents a year. People of that kind constitute eighty per cent of the population of Canada; they are the poor people, the taxpayers. This bugaboo about servicing the people does not mean a thing; the banks service big business.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend says it will just be soaking big business; so why worry.

Mr. SLAGHT: Oh, no, I do not.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the argument.

Mr. SLAGHT: No, not at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then what did my hon. friend mean when he argued that as long as the service charge landed on big business it was not a thing we should worry about?

Mr. SLAGHT: What I meant was this. When a man takes a trip to Vancouver he expects to pay his way. A man who can afford to take that trip expects to pay the railway fare, the pullman fare, and all that sort of thing; but how many of the working men of this province are able to take a trip to Vancouver? Let the people who get the service pay for what they get; that is my principle, instead of giving the banks a monopoly which the minister has not yet attempted to justify or explain. The power to create money was given to the dominion under the British North America Act, but we gave it away to a bunch of individuals who represent four per cent of the people. I do not think the minister ever heard me offer to injure big business; I never preach that sort of doctrine. I had to tell him who use the banks; that is all. I only mean it in that sense, and in no other. I am telling him, however, on whom the burden falls. It falls on the little taxpayer paying eight per cent sales tax and now, since he is earning a little money, paying income tax. He is not using these services, but he is largely paying for them. My point is that those who use the services should pay for them in a reasonable and proper way.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to say that there are 4,000,000 savings accounts in the banks of Canada, and I will not countenance, if I can help it, the wiping out of the interest, even though it is 1½ per cent, I believe, on those savings accounts; I would not wipe out the interest of those 4,000,000 savings depositors, as my hon. friend is advocating to-night.

[Mr. Slaght.]

Mr. SLAGHT: No, not at all; let me say this, that I would not wipe out savings accounts. That is the last thing in the world I would do. That is another bugaboo which will not hold water. Let me tell the minister that the banks—

Mr. ILSLEY: I was referring only to the interest on the savings deposits.

Mr. SLAGHT: Of course they get interest on them. The banks pay 1½ per cent. But what rate do they lend it at? They lend it at 6½ and 7 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: And to us at three-quarters of 1 per cent.

Mr. SLAGHT: They do not lend you their savings at all. They lend you a bookkeeping entry, an entry in a book. You get a piece of credit, but it does not represent one dollar, in any way, of the savings.

Mr. ILSLEY: That does not matter—and my hon. friend is getting hot about this question. The interest that they pay out is a charge, a cost, against their doing business.

Mr. SLAGHT: Of course it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend says that we do not get the savings. He says that we borrow money from the bank. He points out that we deposit money in the bank, and that they have that money; that then we borrow money from the bank and pay it out, and that it goes back into the bank. And they pay out 1½ per cent when it does go back. Therefore that three-quarters of 1 per cent is a proper counter-charge or off-setting item against it. I admit that there are current accounts that are not handled in that way. However, my hon. friend's argument comes to this that he would substitute the new system of 100 per cent cash ratio, and this simply means that you would have large service charges, and you would have no savings bank interest whatsoever. There is no doubt about that. Everyone, I believe, who has given the matter any thought knows that would be the result. I do not know what would be accomplished by it. The hon. member said the service charge would be paid by big business. If the service charge were paid by big business, the taxpayers—the government—would suffer very considerably to the extent that they are liable for excess profits tax. And that still farther would impair the revenue position.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This discussion has gone on for some time. Could we now consider the item?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have only started. Before we leave this matter there are two or three questions I wish to ask the minister. We have been at work on the problem for seven years now, and I should like to ask him some questions. I cannot see why he should not allow me to do so. Frequently in the last three years he has done that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why does the minister not allow me to ask him questions while he is making one of his fine speeches?

Mr. ILSLEY: It upsets the sequence.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There are two facts the minister has overlooked. He has assumed that if $100 comes out of the Bank of Canada and goes into the Bank of Montreal so that the Bank of Montreal can lend ten times that $100, or $1,000, then immediately and automatically the Bank of Montreal will lend it. There is no justification for assuming that at all. First of all, how will the banks expand? Supposing the Bank of Montreal gets $100 as the Bank of Canada issues it, the Bank of Montreal simply cannot expand that $100 to $1,000 unless it can lend, can it? It must lend?

Mr. ILSLEY: Or buy securities.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It must lend.

Mr. ILSLEY: Or, as I say, buy securities.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It amounts to the same thing if it buys securities; all right. If it buys securities, the money is not getting into the hands of the ordinary citizen that the hon. member for Parry Sound spoke about. It is going into the hands of pretty big business, in all probability. It is altogether likely that it will not get out into common circulation at all, and that is a vital point to consider. The only way in the world in which the Bank of Montreal can expand that $100 into $1,000 into ordinary circulation is by lending money. And if it cannot get borrowers, it cannot lend the money.

Mr. ILSLEY: Or by buying securities. Why does my hon. friend leave that out?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We will come to that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does it hurt his argument, and is it for that reason that he leaves it out?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, not at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, then, put it in.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But the government must realize, the Department of Finance must realize, surely, that the difficulty as far as securities were concerned, would lie in the controlling of securities. There are measures which can be adopted with respect to securities, measures which would control the security situation. But the general assumption is that all that is necessary is to take a billion dollars or a hundred million dollars out of the Bank of Canada, and that automatically it expands ten or fifteen times. The Hon. Charles Dunning used to say that, when he was in the house, in replying to the hon. member for Rosthern. That is absolute nonsense.

The minister says the banks would be buying securities. I grant they might unless controlled. The only other way in which they can expand is either by lending to produce goods such as sheep or shoes, or by lending probably to a wholesale or other organization which distributes. Those are the only three ways I can recall.

Now, if the government can control lending to buy securities, then all it has to be concerned about is the control of lending for production or distribution. Once that is recognized, it throws a whole lot of light on the situation. Does it not? If the Bank of Montreal or the other chartered banks wish to lend money to producers to-day, to whom would they lend? They would not lend unless people came in to borrow. Who would come in to borrow? Who has not now money enough, and would need to borrow? May I ask if there is any farmer in this country who would come in to borrow who is not now borrowing? Is there any merchant who would come in to borrow who is not now borrowing —or any wholesaler? If there is, then we must draw the conclusion, that the banks are restricting loans to those who want loans for distribution and production, something which I think the minister would not concede.

I have had bankers tell me time and again in the last three or four years that they now lend money freely to any accredited borrower. Then, how in the world would they lend any more money if they had a billion dollars worth of Bank of Canada money in their tills? It does not follow that just as soon as Bank of Canada money is issued, there is an extension of credit—except by loans. If there is anything wrong with that reasoning, will the minister explain it?

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a matter I wish he would look into. I believe it comes under this item, because I notice that under it there are certain expenses for the treasury board. It is a treasury board decision to which at this time I should like to call the attention of the minister. My information is in sessional paper 225D, which includes, first of all, a copy of

P.C. 6702 of August 26, 1941. This order in council sets out a regulation or provision concerning the payment of cost of living bonus to employees of the public service. Clause No. 18 in this order in council gives to the treasury board the power to make regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of the order in council to cover any matters that have not been covered by the order in council. Under that authority the treasury board on October 23, 1941, passed minute No. T-212473-B, the pertinent part of which is as follows:

In the case of employees paid on the basis of prevailing rates, where there have been increases in prevailing rates since August 1, 1939, bonus shall be payable on the basis of present total compensation, but there shall be deducted from the amount of the bonus, the amount of the increases in prevailing rate authorized for the class since August 1, 1939.

The reason why I made some further investigation of this matter and eventually secured this material was the fact that I took up with the Minister of National Defence for Air the case of a group of employees at No. 7 equipment depot of the Royal Canadian Air Force in Winnipeg who went through the experience of being awarded a cost of living bonus and then having a portion, if not all of it, taken away on this basis. It was some considerable time before we could find out just why it had been done. First, it was thought it was the Department of National Defence for Air that was responsible, and then it was thought it was the Department of Labour. For a long time we did not know who was responsible. I took the matter up in the house with the Minister of National Defence for Air and he could not believe that this had taken place, but in the course of time it was run down.

Mr. ILSLEY: The effect is to charge against the cost of living bonus any wage increase after August, 1939.

Mr. KNOWLES: So far as I can find out, that does not apply to employees in the public service other than those on prevailing rates.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other employees have not had their rates increased.

Mr. KNOWLES: The rates applicable to these different groups are in different amounts. In many instances the prevailing rates, particularly in the case of the employees to whom I refer, day labourers, were adjusted by provincial law in Manitoba. Some time later that law was changed and the bonus was literally taken away from them. It has the effect of regarding the prevailing rate or the minimum rate as a fair rate.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that this is the way to leave it, but I shall look into the matter. That is probably all the hon. gentleman wants me to do, but I cannot just let it go at that. The whole scheme of the cost of living bonus for the civil servant was to give him what he was getting in August, 1939, plus a cost of living bonus since then. Some civil servants have had their rates of pay changed, and in order to pay them on a comparable basis with the other civil servants, you have to charge against the cost of living bonus the increase in wage rates that has taken place after August, 1939.

Mr. KNOWLES: These people are not civil servants; that is, they are not classified under the civil service commission.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is different. The hon. gentleman said we were not doing that with the rest of the civil servants.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry if I got off on the wrong track. These are employees of the public service, but they are paid prevailing rates; they are not within civil service classifications. Their situation is really more comparable with that of industrial workers. In the case of industrial workers there have been cases where the original wage rate has been adjusted and then a cost of living bonus applied after that.

Mr. ILSLEY: But the cost of living bonus may not have been the full cost of living bonus; it would be a cost of living bonus paid after the adjustment of the wage rate.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is possible for industrial workers outside the public service to make application to the regional war labour boards to have a matter like this considered, but these people are neither one nor the other; they are not civil service employees nor are they people outside the public service. They are prevented by this minute of the treasury board from getting any consideration or adjustment.

Mr. ILSLEY: Were the wage rates raised after November 15, 1941?

Mr. KNOWLES: I cannot recall.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member is comparing them with industrial workers, a lot will depend on that, and if he is comparing them with civil servants, they are being treated just the same as civil servants. The order in council deals with the whole public service.

Mr. KNOWLES: I shall not take the time to press it further. I would appreciate it if the minister would look into it.

Item agreed to.

Old age pensions (including pensions to the blind)—

51. Old age pensions, including pensions to the blind, administration, $42,505.

Mr. McGEER: I do not want to take up the time of the committee unduly, but this is a matter with respect to which I have done a good deal of work this session. I had hoped that during this session parliament would have moved to extend to old age pensioners in Canada something of the same measure of consideration that has been extended to many other classes of people, none of whom are more deserving of the attention of parliament and of the ministry than are the old age pensioners. This government has assumed an enormous war burden, but it has not been lacking in its appreciation and fulfilment of its domestic duties during this period of war crisis. The government has increased the pay of the soldier; it has improved everything required by the soldier in the way of clothing, food and shelter; it has extended a measure of consideration to the soldier's dependents, and I think in this regard we as Canadians can proudly say that we are caring for our armed forces and their dependents as well as any nation in the world. We have taken care of the wage-earner by means of bonuses and controlling the cost of living, and in numerous other ways others have been taken care of. But we have neglected to recognize the old age pensioner as a class that is worthy of just as much attention as we have extended to others.

This year the matter came up by way of a question to the minister to ascertain whether or not the cost of living bonus could not be extended to the old age pensioner, and I must confess that I was deeply concerned with the reply that the minister gave, because I believe that in all of the social reforms that are facing us to-day, success in dealing with them is largely a matter of attitude. The attitude of the minister to the old age pensioner seemed to me to be a repudiation of well established Liberal policy, and following that statement which was made in the house on April 1, I wrote to each of the provincial premiers throughout Canada the following letter:

On April 2 last I wrote to each of our provincial Prime Ministers enclosing a copy of Hansard covering the debates in the House of Commons of April 1st last, and drew attention to certain statements made by the Minister of Finance which I felt were of vital interest to all provincial governments.

In view of the replies received, copies of which I enclose, may I again draw your attention to the position taken by the Minister of Finance which I think may be fairly summarized as follows:

(1) The responsibility for old age pensions is primarily of provincial jurisdiction;

(2) The amount paid to old age pensioners is inadequate;

(3) The dominion government will not contribute any portion of any increase in the amount payable;

(4) The provincial governments are now in a better position to meet the cost of old age pensions than is the dominion government;

(5) The dominion government will give consideration to a request made by substantially all of the provinces for a reconsideration of the maximum limit in the Old Age Pensions Act (see Hansard, April 1, 1943, pages 1789 to 1793 inclusive).

I at once challenged the position taken by the minister because I believed that the settled policy of the Liberal party and our government is as follows:

(1) The British North America Act should be amended so that:

(a) The principle of the old age pensions which is sound, would become the exclusive obligation of the federal parliament;

(b) All old age pensions should be administered under one national policy;

(c) All costs, administrative and otherwise, should be borne by the federal government.

These conclusions I believe correctly summarize the old age pension policy enunciated by the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, now Prime Minister, when he was describing the policy of his government which passed the present Old Age Pensions Act in 1927, despite the fact that the act of 1926 had been disallowed by the Senate.

I enclose herewith a copy of the records in Hansard containing the relevant remarks of Mr. King to which I have referred.

Until the Hon. Mr. Ilsley's statement of last November, and repeated in the house April 1st—

And repeated substantially I think here again to-day:

—I have never known of any change in the policy defined by Mr. King.

In view of the attitude now taken by the Minister of Finance, the provincial governments must act if old age pensions are to be changed from a provincial to a national responsibility.

What is needed at the moment is a request by the provincial governments that:

(1) The British North America Act be amended to nationalize old age pensions;

(2) The age limit be reduced;

(3) The maximum payable be raised;

(4) Many of the arbitrary restrictions now in the act and the regulations be repealed;

(5) The policy adopted for old age pensioners should be extended to include pensions to the blind and mothers' allowances;

(6) The proportion paid by the federal government for pensions and administration should, pending the amendment to the constitution, be increased to ninety-nine per cent.

These requests, if acceded to, would put the policy as enunciated by Mr. King into effect and extend a similar measure of that favourable consideration which has been given to wage earners through the cost-of-living bonus, to soldiers and soldiers' dependents whose pay and allowances have been increased, and would raise the pension standards to what is now generally recognized as reasonable and just.

I can assure you that if the plan proposed is proceeded with, or some other action taken, that it will find very generous support in the House of Commons and I know that there are a great many members like myself who are anxious and willing to place our services at your disposal.

I have always understood that the policy defined by Mr. King would be put into effect as soon as the provincial governments would agree to the necessary amendment to the constitution.

At the same time I wrote to the Prime Minister under date of June 15:

My dear Mr. King,

I have always believed your policy on old age pensions to be based upon the following assumptions:

(1) The principle of old age pensions is sound;

(2) The act passed in the House of Commons and vetoed in the Senate in 1926 and enacted in 1927 would have the approval of public opinion which in turn would bring all provincial governments to accept its terms and eventually agree to the amendment required to make old age pensions a national institution when,

(a) old age pensions would be administered and paid by the federal government;

(b) all old age pensioners in Canada would receive equal and adequate consideration.

The bitter opposition to your policy came from those who believed:

(1) The cost would be too great;

(2) The system should be contributory;

(3) The responsibility was provincial and not federal;

(4) The principle was unsound and socialistic and against public interest.

No doubt you will recall the attitude of the provinces in 1924 and 1925. British Columbia at that time was the only province asking that old age pensions be established. All of the provinces, including British Columbia, refused at that time to agree to bear any share in the liability, and Quebec definitely repudiated the principle.

Notwithstanding the all-out opposition, the adverse attitude of the provinces and the veto of the senate, repudiated by popular vote in 1926, the Old Age Pension Act become a federal law under your leadership in 1927.

British Columbia came in the same year. Manitoba and Saskatchewan followed in 1928. Alberta and Ontario came in and the act was applied to the Northwest Territories in 1929. Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island joined in 1933, and in 1936 Quebec and New Brunswick made the proposition unanimous.

Public opinion to-day not only endorses the principle of old age pensions but goes far beyond and now demands a sweeping programme of social service reform.

Time, in less than 20 years, has made the vindication of your forward leadership in the field of social service reform a matter of Canadian history.

You will notice in the correspondence a quotation from your remarks in the House of Commons on June 2, 1931. May I also refer you to: Hansard, July 20, 1931, page 3947; Hansard, July 28, 1931, page 4230. In these addresses you again took the lead by declaring that the constitution should be amended to nationalize old age pensions.

[Mr. McGeer.]

I put that on the record because I believe it is a fair interpretation of the Liberal policy as defined over the years and enunciated by the Prime Minister, in contrast with the attitude taken by the Minister of Finance to-day. Again the Minister of Finance tells us: I cannot afford it. That is equivalent to saying what was said by the Tories and senators who vetoed the bill—it would cost too much. The minister admits that the amount is inadequate, but again he says: It is a matter of provincial and not federal jurisdiction.

Mr. ILSLEY: Where did I say we could not afford it?

Mr. McGEER: The minister did not say that in so many words, but what he did say was this:

I cannot see why, in a state of affairs where all the provinces have surpluses, and some of them enormous surpluses, the provinces should not undertake this, which is primarily their responsibility, not ours, instead of calling on us, with our huge deficits, running up to two and three thousand million dollars a year. Certainly we are budgeting for a deficit of $2,750,000,000 while all the provinces, as I have said before, are in heavy surplus. . . .

I know there is great interest in this matter, and I know it is a very great problem; but do hon. members think that when we are in the middle of a great war it is in the interests of the war effort for the government to pour out money and more money and still more money which will be spent on goods and services? . . .

We recognize the problem here. I am not going to say the present level of old age pensions is a satisfactory one. But why grind at the dominion government all the time, with its terrific burdens, and with its deficit of two or three billions? Why drive us, or make it almost impossible for us to carry on at all?

That, I take it, is just another way of saying that it is beyond the financial power of the dominion government—which is the equivalent of saying it costs too much. Now I want to deal with that for a moment. We are able to finance the production of an enormous war programme. At the same time we are able to finance, and did last year, the production of a thousand million dollars worth of goods and services which we handed out as a gift to Britain. That was no gift to Britain, in my humble opinion; it was simply a contribution of war energy which we had available and which should have been put where it was sent. But this year we are able to finance another thousand million dollars and hand it over as mutual aid to our allies. Every Canadian is proud to endorse that attitude. But a nation which can produce a thousand million dollars' worth of goods and services in two successive years cannot be heard to say in the same breath, "we cannot take care of our old age pensioners."

Look at your cost of living bonuses. They are not applied on a basis of necessity. It does not matter what the wage rate is, the cost of living bonus goes with it, and millions, yes, hundreds of millions of dollars directly and indirectly have been paid out as cost of living bonuses. A nation which can do that cannot be heard to say that they cannot take care of their old age pensioners. It does not add up to common sense.

On the question of whether or not we should treat the old age pension as a provincial and not a federal responsibility, that attitude has been repudiated by Liberalism ever since 1908. Technically old age pensions may come within a strict interpretation of subsections 7 and 13 of section 92 of the British North America Act. But I, speaking as a lawyer, could never believe that anybody had any right in an old age pension in 1867 in any colony, or had any property interest in it. There was no such thing in existence in 1867, either in reality or in the minds of the fathers of confederation, when the term "property and civil rights" was written into our statute. Subsection 7, which deals with charity and hospitals and asylums and eleemosynary institutions, is not in my opinion broad enough to include an institution such as old age pensions, which entirely reverses the attitude toward people of old age. We did away with the poorhouse; we did away with charity, and we established a federal act under which people took a contribution from the state not as a matter of charity, not as a matter of gift, but as a matter of right under the letter of the law. But we have accepted it as provincial.

Let me refer to a little bit of history, and I will not take very long. In 1908 Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved the first resolution in the House of Commons of Canada to investigate the subject of old age pensions. The Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux was Minister of Labour, and that year he appointed Mr. Blue, dominion statistician, Professor Shortt and Mr. Mackenzie King to prepare some evidence which would be valuable. As a matter of fact, old age pensions disappeared with the defeat of the Liberal administration in 1911, but it was a tremendously active subject in England during those years, and it appeared in "Industry and Humanity," written by the present Prime Minister and published in 1918. I have found that book one which every minister of finance should read. I just want to give one quotation from it. He points out that debt binds health as it binds freedom—and it is in this attitude of the minister who tells us that we can finance with ease, if we can keep up our national income, an enormous increase in our debt and who at the same time tells us the granting of a reasonable allowance to our old age pensioners is going to cripple our war effort.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say that.

Mr. McGEER: You did not?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. McGEER: Well, just a minute. You sometimes do not realize what you do say. Here is what you said:

> But why grind at the dominion government all the time, with its terrific burdens, and with its deficit of two or three billion? Why drive us, or make it almost impossible for us to carry on at all?

We were not dealing with anything but old age pensions when you made that statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think we were dealing with other things.

Mr. McGEER: Oh, no, you were not.

Mr. ILSLEY: At any rate I did not use the words, "cripple our war effort."

Mr. McGEER: Well, I apologize. I will simply give you the words you did say, which I think are stronger than that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, you did that.

Mr. McGEER:

> Why drive us, or make it impossible for us to carry on at all.

We were driving you then to give the old age pensioners a decent living subsistence allowance, which they were not given.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I was talking about the general attitude of wanting the dominion government to do everything in time of war.

Mr. McGEER: Maybe you were.

Mr. ILSLEY: I meant to, anyway.

Mr. McGEER: At any rate, the minister was emphasizing the danger which was coming over the land if he was called upon to meet this old age pension liability.

That was the start of it. In 1919 the Liberal convention met, and we passed as part of our platform the old age pension policy. In 1921 the province of British Columbia requested the government to establish old age pensions. In 1922 J. E. Fontaine, the member for Hull, moved > that, in the opinion of this house the dominion government should consider the advisability of devising ways and means for the establishment of a system of old age pensions in Canada.

The matter was investigated in 1924 and 1925, and in 1926 we introduced the bill. In introducing that resolution, J. E. Fontaine, Liberal member for Hull, said:

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to raise a political question out of this resolution; I am fully confident that hon. members of this house, whether they sit on your right or on your left, will consider it on its merit, but I hope I shall be permitted to say that it is an essentially Liberal idea and that it would be proper for the Liberal party to carry it out. We on this side of the house should consider that wish expressed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1916 and embodied in a resolution at the great convention of the Liberal party in 1919. . . .

Now, take what happened. That bill was passed. The very arguments used the other evening by the Minister of Finance, that it will cost too much; that it should be contributory; that it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction, were the arguments used by the Tory opposition and the senators who by a large majority vetoed that bill which was presented to the electors in the election of 1926, along with the great constitutional issue of whether or not the Prime Minister's advice must be taken by the governor general, and the electors of Canada were told that if the Liberals were elected that bill would be passed, and that if the senate dared to veto it again, the senate would be reformed.

What happened? The Liberals were returned. One of the first things they did was to introduce that bill. The bill was passed unanimously and accepted by the senate, and when one of the hon. members rose in his place and asked the then Minister of Labour, the Hon. Peter Heenan, if he was aware that the bill had passed the senate, his reply was, "Yes; it has not only passed the senate, but it has reformed the senate."

It was then that we took the responsibility as Liberals of making old age pensions a federal responsibility. What was the attitude of the Conservative party on that occasion? It will be found in Hansard of February 15, 1927, as reported at page 331. The Hon. Mr. Guthrie was speaking. He said:

I am speaking at this moment in order to make our position absolutely clear upon this question. The position of the Conservative party in this house in regard to old age pensions as proposed in this measure is this. We prefer a federal scheme. We prefer a scheme which will apply equally to every corner of Canada. This bill is limited to those persons who are in destitution and who have reached the age of seventy years. Apply the proposal to the Dominion of Canada equally and let the dominion treasury bear the expense.

That was the attitude of the Conservative party, and that attitude, I must state, was followed out later on by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). On April 18, 1928, the Prime Minister at a banquet of the National Federation of Liberal Women of Canada in Ottawa said:

Following the sequence which I adopted in referring to British legislation, let me now refer briefly to social legislation in Canada. The establishment of a federal Department of Labour, with the subsequent enactment of anti-sweating legislation, the prevention of industrial disputes by conciliation and investigation, the establishment of a system of government annuities, the provision made for the gradual extension throughout the dominion of a system of old age pensions, all these are examples in the realm of industry of the successful application of the principle of the future under Liberal administration which have served to bring to the working people of our land a wider measure of security against the hazards of industrial life. In the system of old age pensions inaugurated within the past year or two there is recognition, if such there ever was, of a community obligation to those who have borne the burden and heat of the day. Old age pensions are a part of the new Liberalism which seeks to secure the individual, in his advancing years, against the hazards of industrial life which takes from the masses of the people much of their energy and strength and leave them too often when the days of earning power are diminishing, with little in the way of security or protection in old age.

That was not the only time we declared old age pensions to be a Liberal policy and a federal Liberal responsibility. Speaking in the House of Commons on June 2, 1931, as recorded in Hansard at page 2260, the present Prime Minister made this statement:

The Liberal administration fought for many years for an old age pension act, and care I think was taken to make it clear that an amendment to the British North America Act would be required before this federal government would have power to administer an old age pension scheme. It was recognized that an amendment to the British North America Act would take some time, and for that reason the government of the day adopted the method of agreeing to give these grants in aid to the provinces on condition that they would carry out a scheme framed by the federal government which would be similar in all the provinces.

An hon. Member: A vicious principle.

Mr. Mackenzie King: The principle, from a financial point of view, was unsound. I am quite prepared to concede that. But I will go a step further and say that, in my opinion, this parliament ought to remedy the unsoundness of the principle, not by discontinuing to vote money for old age pensions, but by assuming the entire obligation, one hundred per cent. This government should take over the whole scheme and itself pay out the money. That is the position that should be taken; that is the proper way to remedy what there is of unsoundness in the principle.

A little later on, on July 20, 1931, as recorded at page 3947 of Hansard, the present Prime Minister made this statement:

Should a contributory system be under discussion there may be differences of view with regard to it, and the government may be faced with the possibility of having to carry on the original scheme increasing to 100 per cent the amount that is going to the provinces, or take over the entire administration itself. I would therefore suggest that the Prime Minister institute steps immediately to clear the way for the possibility of the federal government itself at the earliest possible moment administering the old age pension scheme, so that if parliament is asked to make any larger contribution out of the federal treasury it will be sure that it will have the right to administer the moneys in its own hands, and that no exception can be taken to its administering the scheme in its entirety. Indeed it should secure this right where the amount of the federal contribution exceeds 50 per cent as will be the case when the bill based on this resolution is enacted.

The bill was passed, and the amount of the contribution is now 75 per cent. Again, on July 28, 1931, as recorded at page 4230 of Hansard, the present Prime Minister said:

My remarks were all intended to convey the hope that the government would move as rapidly as possible towards the administration of the scheme in its entirety in order completely to relieve the provinces of that responsibility. . . . . The government of the day had been advised by the Department of Justice as to its authority and rights and powers in the matter, and as a result of the advice given the government reached the necessary conclusion that unless it were to be made a contributory scheme, which at the time we were not prepared to consider, the federal government could not inaugurate an old age pension scheme in any other way than by grants to the provinces. That was the reason why the government of the day made the grant of 50 per cent; it did so with a view to bringing about throughout Canada a uniform system of old age pensions and also with a view to giving time to remove any constitutional impediment to the dominion taking over the entire scheme. It was felt that the fact that all the provinces would be prepared to accept an old age pension scheme on the lines laid down to secure uniformity would of itself be the strongest evidence that it was desirable to have such a scheme on a national scale, administered federally.

What has happened? Since that time every province in the dominion has come in. In the letters I have received from the premier of British Columbia, he has endorsed the increasing of the amount to $30 a month and has endorsed the proposal for reducing the age limit to sixty-five for men and sixty for women. The province of Quebec, which condemned the principle of old age pensions as unsound, has now accepted that principle as sound, and the premier of that province, according to his statements appearing in the press in the reports of the Quebec legislature, asked the government to consider reducing the age limit to sixty-five years. In Nova Scotia, one of the provinces that condemned the principle as unsound in 1925, they have now agreed that the ceiling should be lifted to $30 a month. The Prime Minister, with his remarkable ability to look into the future, saw that once the principle of old age pensions was established as a sound one, public opinion would force the provincial governments to bring it into being. They have followed that course, and to-day throughout this dominion 185,000 aged Canadians in a condition of dire poverty are getting the benefit of a meagre $20 a month. Has the time not come for us as a parliament to continue that work, to go forward with an amendment to the constitution, as the Prime Minister suggested, to bring about the nationalization of the institution and establish a scheme of old age pensions under which every beneficiary throughout the dominion will receive the same quantum of benefit?

I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the difference between our attitude toward old age pensions and that of Australia. I have the greatest sympathy for the Minister of Finance in the problems he is facing, and I have no hesitation in repeating what I have said before, that I do not think we have ever had a minister more devoted or more alive to his responsibilities. With the system under which he is operating I do not think there has been another minister who performed his duties as well as they have been performed by the present minister. Probably he is the last orthodox Minister of Finance we shall ever have in Canada, but it is altogether probable that long before he has ended his days of useful service he will see the light and become a practical administrator not of sound money but of sane national finance.

Now the minister tells us that it would be a terrible thing if we brought the old age pension up to $30 a month, because probably we would get an increasing cycle of rising prices that would spiral into an inflationary St. Vitus dance. Whoever heard of inflation coming from the expenditures of old age pensioners? Yet that is what we were told here the other night. They are fighting this war in Australia, from positions more dangerous than our own, and they are putting everything they have into it just as we are. Does anyone suggest that their old age pension scheme has injured their war effort or caused them to suffer from inflation? But Canadians are so far behind Australians that it should be an inspiration to us to move onward. The population of Canada is 11,566,000. The population of Australia is 7,000,000, so that we have 64 per cent more population than they have. The number of old age pensioners in Canada, taking the figure for 1942, is 185,000; in Australia it is 275,000. They have invalid pensioners numbering 60,000; we have none in Canada. Pensioners in Canada total 185,000, and in Australia, 336,000, so that they have 150,000 more old age pension beneficiaries, though we have 60 per cent more population. The total amount paid in pensions in Australia is $93,580,000; in Canada for this year it will be roughly $30,000,000 from the federal government, which bears three-quarters of the cost, which would bring our total up to $40,500,000. If we were paying in proportion to our population the same amount as Australia is paying, we would pay out $146,000,000 a year. Yet we tremble about inflation and about our financial position in the war when we think of going not nearly as far as Australia has gone. Our age limit for both men and women is seventy; in Australia it is sixty-five for men and sixty for women. The average pension paid throughout the dominion ranges from 61 cents a day in British Columbia down to about 38 cents a day in Prince Edward Island. Does any man in this house believe that an old age pensioner can get along in the cities of Canada on $20 a month? Yet this parliament has frozen that amount by an act which was passed in 1927. It is this parliament that fixed the age limit at seventy years; it is this parliament that has put on the ceiling of $20 a month, and it is the duty of this parliament to reduce that age limit and to lift that ceiling. I for one feel more disappointed over going home without doing that much for the old age pensioners than in connection with anything else that has ever happened in this house.

I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to another reason why these pensions should be federalized, something that was foreseen by the Prime Minister when he brought in this measure. I refer to the disparity as between the provinces in the amounts paid. Is there any Canadian who speaks of national unity who does not believe that every old age pensioner, whether he be in British Columbia, Quebec, Ontario, or Prince Edward Island, should receive the same amount? Yet here is how it works out on a monthly basis, according to the figures I was able to secure from the pensions branch of the Department of Finance. The average monthly pension is as follows:

British Columbia	$19 02
Alberta	18 63
Saskatchewan	17 17
Manitoba	18 70
Ontario	18 66
Quebec	16 20
New Brunswick	14 89
Nova Scotia	15 06
Prince Edward Island	11 57

Of course, if you want to build a nation on disunity, leave things such as old age pensions under provincial jurisdiction; leave this sort of disparity throughout the land as evidence that impartial justice is not the goal of federal government.

There is one other feature on which I want to say just a word.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member has now spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed to proceed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. McGEER: Thank you; after all, I have not taken up very much time this year.

I wanted to say to hon. members that we are entirely wrong in our attitude when we think we cannot finance old age pensions. I recall standing in my place in this house and pleading with the government to put people to work. We needed roads; we needed a lot of things. We were told we could not find the money, and that we had to tighten our belts. We were told we had to balance the budget and that we had to keep our credit good. We had to borrow where the accumulated savings of the world were. I said at that time that if war ever comes one of the things we shall find out is that we shall have no difficulty in finding unlimited amounts of money to carry on the destructive enterprise of war. Will anybody say that a nation which can find billions upon billions—which we have found—with ease would have any difficulty in finding enough money to pay the old age pensioners a reasonable living allowance? It does not add up to common sense.

But remember this, that when you give an old age pensioner a living allowance he spends it. He puts it to work. He buys his food and his shelter. He provides employment for the primary producer, who produces the eggs and bacon, butter, bread, vegetables and other things that he needs, as the bare necessities of life. That money circulates throughout the community, and it probably adds up to twenty times the volume of business that the actual old age pension itself amounted to.

When we come to deal with the values of that type of investment it seems to me that we should be pretty well on the way with it now, because when we come to put back to work all the men we have in war industry, all the women we have in war industry, and all those who will be retiring from the fighting forces, we are going to find that one of the real social problems is that of eliminating producers and at the same time continuing them as consumers. That is one reason why the age limit should be reduced, and the amount of pension increased.

Can that be done? Is that possible within the limits of the financial power we have demonstrated that we possess? This is one thing which concerns me when I think of the Department of Finance and the old age pensioners. If to-day we cannot take care of the war needs of the old age pensioners, how are we to take care of the reconstruction programme that will be just as difficult and just as hard to manage as has been the war problem through which we have passed? If that is to be the attitude toward the recovery and reconstruction programme, then my fear is that we have lost the peace before we have signed the armistice. And it must then be the duty of this parliament to change the attitude of the Department of Finance.

Let me say, in conclusion, that for too long have men who think in terms of money had control of the bridge of the ship of state. The time has come when the statesmen, the engineers, the architects, the sociologists, the men who plan the life of the community shall be the captains on the bridge of that ship of state, and shall give their orders to the Department of Finance to provide the fuel.

I am not speaking to-night because I have any hope that this parliament will do anything about this matter. But I do know that provincial premiers from one end of Canada to the other are coming here. They are organizing now to come here, and among the problems they will discuss will be the problem of old age pensions. It is my hope that at the coming session of parliament, as a result of this conference, Canada will be able to receive from this government and from parliament, as a part of a new social security programme, an old age pension which will place us in the forefront of the nations of the world in respect of the care and consideration we are going to give to those who have reached the eventide of life in a condition of need, and a place where they need the help of the state.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief, because I am as anxious as anyone that we should conclude at the earliest possible moment. The hon. member made a strong argument for a constitutional amendment—and that was the most of what he said. He referred to the attitude and statements of the Prime Minister through the years, and he cited a number of speeches the Prime Minister had made to the public and to parliament. As I followed those speeches, it appeared to me that they were all consistent with the view that there should be a constitutional amendment placing this subject within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. I wish to say that I, myself, am in favour of old age pensions being within the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament; and I look forward to the day when there will be in force in Canada a system of contributory old age pensions, along the lines recommended by the Beveridge report, or something of that kind, and administered on a nation-wide scale by this parliament.

When my hon. friend attacks either the Minister of Finance or the Department of Finance, or both, for their unsocial attitude, he is very wide of the mark, because I am merely taking the jurisdictional position as I find it. I never have made any argument against the dominion parliament's procuring the jurisdiction. I have simply acknowledged a jurisdictional fact, and that is that, as matters stand to-day, this is primarily the responsibility of the provinces. That is what I said, and that is all I said.

I have said that I could not understand why, that being the case, the provinces should not assume that responsibility. That was what I said in my speech in November of 1941. Nevertheless I did say in that speech that if all or substantially all of the provinces would make representations in favour of an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act by raising the maximum pension, consideration would be given to those representations. They have been making such representations, one by one, ever since.

Mr. McGEER: They have all made them now.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said that this morning.

Mr. McGEER: Why have they not got results?

Mr. ILSLEY: The representations of Quebec were made on July 12, and those of Prince Edward Island have just been made. I thought I was justified, and the government thought it was quite justified in standing on the position it took in 1941, particularly as many of the provinces have been paying supplementary allowances. I include in that statement the province of British Columbia, which has been paying $25 instead of $20. And that applies to Alberta as well.

Mr. McGEER: And Saskatchewan and Manitoba agreed to give five, and they paid only twenty-five per cent of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I am not going to carry on an argument on the question as to whether or not there should be an amendment to the constitution. That is a different matter. The speech the hon. gentleman made to-night is one which he evidently had prepared for some other occasion. While it was a very good speech, it did not apply to the present situation. It takes no account whatever of the announcement I made this morning. By the announcement I made this morning I went just as far as I am justified in going on the basis of general provincial consent. While this is a matter of provincial responsibility, I am only going on the basis of general provincial consent. At least I think that should be the policy of the government, and it has been the policy to date.

With regard to the assumption of the cost by the government, I may have said on some other occasion that the people were driving at us from every hand and from all sides to assume projects in time of war. This afternoon I just happened to come in when the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) was saying, "What is a dollar from every member of the populaton; what is $11,000,000 to help these poor soldier settlers?" Then the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard comes along and, while he does not estimate the amount per person, he tells us that on the basis of Australia it would cost $146,000,000. Nearly every member of this house has the same argument to advance about some project or another.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have the men and materials.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have neither the men nor the materials for unlimited expenditures. We cannot do that—I will use the word—without crippling our war effort. We cannot meet all the demands made by members of this house for expenditures running from $10,000,000 to $125,000,000 without crippling our war effort. The use of men and materials would cripple our war effort completely. It may be that I may have said something on some previous occasion about being ground at and driven at from all sides for money from the federal treasury. I dare say I did, because sometimes I have to speak extemporaneously. I do not prepare a speech for four or five months; I have just to say what is in my mind. I may have showed a little impatience about the demands that are made on the treasury for money.

Mr. McGEER: You would not say that you could not take care of old age pensions without crippling us, would you?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think I would say that about any one of these things, but when you multiply it by a hundred, I would say that. That is the trouble. The Prime Minister and the government of 1926 to 1930 proceeded, not on the assumption that this was a matter primarily of dominion responsibility, as the hon. gentleman seems to argue, but on the assumption that it was not. That is the reason why they made grants in aid to the provinces, leaving the administrative machinery in the hands of the provinces. These pensions are not paid to old age pensioners in Canada by the dominion government; they are paid by the provincial government, and the dominion government makes grants in aid to enable them to do so. The proposal is to increase these grants in aid under our present constitution.

I do not think there is anything unreasonable or uneconomical or obsolete about the view that, when the provinces have changed their position from a combined deficit of perhaps $20,000,000 before the war to a combined surplus of from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 today, while we have changed our position from a balance before the war to a deficit of over two billion dollars today, the people who have the primary responsibility should take the thing in hand. Nevertheless I made the statement in November, 1941, that if the provinces would come forward, we would give consideration to their representations. We have carried that out to the letter and just as soon as it could be carried out unless we were to take the initiative and go after the provinces. I did not think we should take the initiative, and I declined to do it because theirs is the primary responsibility. That is all I have to say.

Mr. ESLING: A condition has arisen in connection with the administration of the act which was never anticipated. I refer particularly to the provision which restricts the earnings of a pensioner to $125 a year, to bring him up to a total of $365. Anything he may earn in excess of this amount is deducted from his pension by the province. Never in the history of Canada has there been such a need for labour, and many of these old age pensioners could do light work such as gardening and so forth. They are anxious to do it and their services would be most acceptable. I know of one case in my own community where a man had earned $25 a month for a year, or a total of $300. When the inspector came around and discovered this, his pension was reduced from $20 a month to $14 a month for fifty months until he had repaid the $300 he had earned.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Shame!

Mr. ESLING: Surely this situation could be taken care of administratively.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know the situation to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would apologize for rising at this late hour when we hope to adjourn had it not been for the appeasing attitude the government has adopted with regard to the speeches already delivered on old age pensions. I do not see any reason why I should hold my hand, or, should I say, hold my tongue, at this moment. First, I wish to draw a little bit of history to the attention of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) which, in his delving, he failed to note. He gave the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a great deal of credit for the present Old Age Pensions Act. If one does not have to live on $20 a month, I suppose one would be ready to give credit for the act. The fact that the amount of the old age pension, $20 a month, is as small as it is, and that the age at which a person is eligible is set at seventy years, seems to me to be proof positive that whoever put the Old Age Pensions Act on the statute books did so unwillingly. Because it was done unwillingly, as little as possible was given. I have often wondered how they came to the conclusion that the eligible age should be seventy years; at least I wondered before I came to parliament. After I came here and found how fluently the Prime Minister could quote scripture, I wondered no longer. I think it is the ninetieth psalm that says that the age of man is three score years and ten. That is the age when a man about comes to the end of his tether. When the Prime Minister was trying to urge his cabinet and supporters to accept old age pensions I can hear him saying "We will make the eligible age seventy years; any one who is alive at seventy will not live much longer on $20 a month, so that it will not cost us very much." That is a conclusion that I have come to. The two people who were responsible for forcing old age pensions on this parliament were J. S. Woodsworth and A. A. Heaps. The reason why there has been no amendment since that time to reduce the eligible age or increase the amount is that the governments in power have always had in every parliament a huge majority, so that the government did not have to grant concessions to remain in power. Let us be quite frank and clear about how these things happen. The people of Canada for the last seventeen years could have had far better government had they had the good sense not to give the government in power such large majorities as they did.

I know that the minister made a statement this morning informing the house that the old age pension is to be increased. I imagine that all that can be said about that is that it is better than nothing. I cannot agree that the responsibility is a provincial one. I know that under the British North America Act, it is; but I cannot agree that it is a provincial responsibility, because every step in regard to old age pensions has been instituted by the federal government; and if the federal government had not taken those steps, there would be no Old Age Pensions Act on the statute books of any province in the dominion. Remember that the Old Age Pensions Act is a federal statute. It decides the age and it decides the amount. The federal government is paying seventy-five per cent of the cost. Surely the logic of events has made the old age pensions a national responsibility, and not a provincial responsibility.

This matter was discussed in the social security committee, and I understood that we would have an opportunity to discuss old age pensions on the report of that committee. As a matter of fact, I was promised on two occasions that that would be the case. But we have not been given the opportunity.

I agree with some of the things that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has said. Some of those things I think should be made a little clearer. I listened to the discussion on money this afternoon, about as cockeyed a discussion as I ever heard. The fact of the matter is not whether we are borrowing credit or borrowing money. The fact is that we are borrowing goods—aluminum, nickel, timber and so forth. It is in these goods that we shall have to pay back, and it is because those to whom we would pay back those goods cannot accept them that our economy, I think, will break down.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You cannot do it without money.

Mr. MacINNIS: If you produce enough you can distribute it, if you have brains enough.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not without money.

Mr. MacINNIS: You can make your own money and call it anything you like.

I think the old age pension should be increased to at least $365 a year. The eligible age should be reduced from seventy to sixty-five for men and to sixty for women. I also think that where there is a reduction in the pension on account of the amount of the pensioner's other income, that reduction should be on a sliding scale, so that his other income should be at least double the pension before the pension would disappear. A table with respect to that was placed before the social security committee by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

I should like to draw attention to an investigation made by the commissioner of public welfare in the city of Toronto into old age pensions. After the most careful study the commissioner came to the conclusion that the pension for a person living as part of a family should be increased by approximately $3.50 a month and for a person living alone by $9.25 a month. I want the committee to note what the pension will buy in the essentials of life. These purchases have been carefully worked out. For a person living as one of a family, food is computed at $9.27 a month, and for a person living alone, at $10.40 a month; clothing for women is computed at $1.92 and for men at $2.53 a month; shelter, including heat and services, is computed for a person living with a family at $8 a month, and for a person living alone at $12 a month. Incidentals are computed at $4.33 a month for a person living with a family and for a person living alone. There is very little for anything except the bare necessities of life, and a man cannot live on the bare necessities of life. He has to have those bare necessities to live at all, but on the present amount of the old age pension he is not living; he is just existing. I am sorry indeed that the government has not seen fit to increase the old age pension to an amount that would give the pensioner at least one dollar for every day in the year.

Mr. NEILL: I assure the minister that my remarks will be as extemporaneous as his own, if that has any merit. My notes are here, but in very scattered form.

I do not believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard could have introduced a more popular subject in the country or introduced it at a more unpopular time and place. I do not blame him for that. He had difficulties which were not of his own making.

I am not going to say anything to-night with respect to the argument for increasing old age pensions, because it has been repeated so often by so many people in the house and the hour is so late. Everyone knows my sentiments and they are almost unanimous, so that I shall not enlarge on the reasons to-night why we should give a greater measure of support generally to aged people along these lines.

I wish to deal for a moment with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East. He said he was going to delve into history.

Mr. MacINNIS: No; I said that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard had delved into history.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. NEILL: Oh, did he? Well, I hope the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was more successful in his delving into history than was the hon. member for Vancouver East, because that hon. member's recollection of history is entirely different from mine, and I happened to have been there. He was not in the house for some years, four at least after the Old Age Pensions Act was passed, and I was at the initiation of it—"in the beginning", like when we started from initial things and built up the universe. My recollection of it is that there were four members of the house elected on a more or less independent ticket. There was Mr. Woodsworth, who at that time called himself a labour man. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have gone through the country and are going through the country to-night, and will continue to do it, in years to come, taking the whole credit to their party for having passed the old age pension, or, if not passing it, being the means of passing it, but they were not in existence until seven years after it was passed. Where, then, does the glory fall on their shoulders?

Mr. Woodsworth was elected as, I think he called himself, a member of the Manitoba labour party. Mr. Heaps, who was also a member at that time, was a labour representative of some sort, and Mr. Heenan, of Ontario, represented independent labour or something of that kind, and I myself had been elected as an independent. The four of us got together. The government had a very small majority; we thought we would play politics, as is the manner of people when they want something, and we approached the government and asked what the chances would be of passing old age pension legislation. We also applied, by the way, to the then leader of the opposition, the Hon. Arthur Meighen, who turned us down flat. But we had more favourable support and encouragement from the government of the day, and we discussed the pros and cons, and whether we would give the Liberals support on a vote of want of confidence, for instance, at the first session if they passed old age pensions. I have no hesitation at all in saying—and Mr. Heaps would support me on this if he were here—that the man we had the difficulty with was Mr. Woodsworth himself. Mr. Woodsworth, we all know, has gone, and God forbid I should say a word against him. I admired him very much. He was an idealist; he lived in the clouds, beautiful clouds, the product of a beautiful imaginaton, but he was not practical. The attitude he took was this: we will have no part or lot with the sons of—Belial. We will stay on the side-lines, and if the government chooses to bring down an old age pension bill and we like the look of it and all that sort of thing, we will vote for it, but not otherwise. He was for making no bargain of any kind. Heaps was an English Jew, and Jews are generally practical people; the Scotch have the same characteristic, and the Jew and the Scot saw that this attitude was not going to get us very far. We had trouble in persuading Mr. Woodsworth to come down from these golden clouds, to emerge from the beautiful and idealistic condition he lived in and make a practical deal to get something for something. I am not ashamed of it; I do not regret from that day to this the action I took. I think we might not have got the bill yet had we not taken advantage of the political situation, when the government was in a parlous condition as regards its majority. I repeat that I am not ashamed of that; the deal was of no personal advantage to ourselves. I think the government which gave us old age pensions had no reason to regret it afterwards, either, because it was very well received when we went to the country later on. But I assure the committee—and Mr. Heenan, who was the other independent, would bear me out, as well as Mr. Heaps—that Mr. Woodsworth's attitude was that he would simply stand on the side-lines and, if he liked the look of the legislation, perhaps he would vote for it; perhaps he would not. But that is not practical politics. This is the inside history of that affair.

I would never have mentioned that but for my hon. friend claiming the whole credit for the two gentlemen he mentioned, and I am glad the opportunity has come, because I am fed up with this "holier than thou," this sanctimonious air of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, who claim all the credit for everything under heaven and above the earth, and say that they did it, if it was good, but if it was bad, that the wicked Tories or the worse Grits did it. They had nothing whatever to do with it, because the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party did not come into being until 1932 or 1933, and did not run as such until 1935, and the Old Age Pensions Act was passed in 1926, nine years before.

I am surprised at the unusual methods adopted in this case of bringing in this important legislation in the last hours of the session, not introduced even by legislation, by a bill which we would have had an opportunity to study, but by a statement, one might almost call it a verbal statement, of the Minister of Finance. I went upstairs to try to get the record of what he said, so that I might appreciate the fullness of what he did say, but I could not get it. I shall have to wait until Monday morning before I can see the record of what he really did say. I was not clear from casually listening to it, just what it was, but I am going to identify what I gathered, and he will no doubt correct me if I am wrong.

I understand that he is going to introduce this legislation by order in council, and he is going to raise the potential old age pension to $25 a month. The dominion will continue to contribute seventy-five per cent and the provinces twenty-five per cent and whatever further sum the provinces may choose to give. That will make the dominion government contribution $3.75 a month more than it is now. Of course that is a small sum expressed in that form, though it may take a large sum when it is multiplied by all the old age pension people. I am not clear; it is not because I was not attentive enough, but I could not find out when this thing was going to be effective, nor could I understand where the funds will come from. You can wave your hand and pass an order in council, but if the expenditure is going to run into large sums I do not know where the money is coming from. Would the minister be good enough to tell me that when I sit down. I am sorry that nothing was said as far as I could judge about lowering the age limit. I think any hon. member will realize that the one reform is just as necessary as the other.

A man who has worked manually at hard work, when he is over sixty-five is not fit to earn in the only way he knows, by hard manual labour. With the prospect of the war ending and a possibly lessened demand for labour, the money spent in this manner would be better expended than in some form of relief. I hope the minister will be good enough to tell us whether he has any idea of making a reduction in the qualifying age. The other question I should like him to answer is, when will this be inaugurated? We are going home; we are going to tell the people what will be good tidings in many and many a home. It is a step in the right direction, but when will it begin?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the statement which I made I said that supplementary agreements would have to be made with the provinces and that they would be made as soon as practicable, but that it would take a few weeks to work that out. That is the nearest I can come to it. Sometimes it takes a little time in dealing with the provinces, but the only way we can go about it is by supplementary agreements with the provinces. The money will come from the war appropriation, because this action is to be taken under the War Measures Act.

Mr. NEILL: The minister says that it will be taken under the War Measures Act. Is there any possibility such as that when the War Measures Act disappears, this increase will be taken off again?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would, unless legislative action is taken at that time or in the meantime. I said in the statement that even if we had time to take legislative action at the end of this session, probably it would not be desirable to make any permanent amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act while this matter of old age pensions is under study by the special House of Commons committee on social security. I do not know what will be worked out about old age pensions or social security.

Mr. NEILL: The report of the committee is before the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but it is not adopted. There are suggestions for consideration and so on. There is much more work to be done on that, and there is the question of constitutional amendment, whether one is to take place or not, and the financial arrangements as between the dominion and the provinces. There is a temporary arrangement now between the dominion and the provinces which it may be desirable to continue if we are to take on certain responsibilities, although the present one is strictly temporary.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I try to set an example at this late hour by refraining from speaking at any length on a matter of this kind, even in spite of the fact that there are so many branches of political thought that are so anxious to adopt this rather important baby known as the old age pension idea. I listened with not a little amusement to those who were attempting to claim fatherhood for the movement. My hon. friend to my right has disposed, at least in his own mind, of any suggestion that any of my predecessors in office had anything to do with it, although I must confess I am unable to agree with that. I was hoping that the Prime Minister would rise at once and contradict him, because I know that the Prime Minister would not agree with that for a moment.

There are some interesting aspects of this proposed legislation coming in as it did only in the dying days of the session but on the very day on which we hope the session will die, and that fact may have more significance than may appear on the surface.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not die, but adjourn.

Mr. GRAYDON: According to the explanation the Prime Minister gives of the terms "British empire" and "British commonwealth of nations", these also may be regarded as interchangeable expressions. That is the situation with regard to adjournments, unless the Prime Minister is suggesting that we are going to have a lengthy session when we convene again, which I do not think he intends. Apart from these technicalities the government really cannot advance seriously the idea that this legislation has had the attention it should have received, because if it was good legislation on the last day of the session, it should have been good legislation on the first day. Anticipating what the minister will try to say in reply, may I say that either the provinces or the dominion were in default in the discharge of their duties in that they did not call for some conference at an earlier stage to discuss this matter and have it threshed out and decided.

The minister took the position, I believe, that he would wait until the provinces wrote to him indicating what they intended to do. He was not going to take the initiative. There may have been perfectly good reasons from the point of view of saving some money for the dominion government in his taking that attitude, but certainly from the point of view of really grasping the problem and coming to grips with it, I suggest that somebody was to blame for having left the matter until this last day of the session. It seems to me that the dominion government was the proper authority to call that conference, and I suggest that some blame must attach to them because they did not take the initiative with respect to it.

As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said, however, we are glad to have any step in a right direction; but if I may so suggest on behalf of our party, there are two steps in connection with this matter that still have to be taken.

I am not at all satisfied with the amount or with the age under the present system. I do not think they are satisfactory to the people of Canada. We should have had a reduction in the age limit of old age pensioners. I suggest that the government must also, in view of the situation that faces old age pensioners from the point of view of the cost of living, take into consideration something more in regard to the amount which thus far has been mentioned. In some of these matters the government has moved more quickly than in this, after the famous convention at Winnipeg.

In this case they were a little more tardy; it took them longer to see the light. On December 11, as the Prime Minister will recall, because he watched the convention with more than usual interest, a platform was adopted calling for retirement insurance; and the Minister of Finance, who is not always amenable to new ideas, said a few weeks ago in the house—he repeated it to-night—that he had come to the position where he favours this kind of thing as well.

While the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard talked about the Minister of Finance not being able to move in the right direction, may I say to him that there is still some hope for the minister, from what he said to-night; and although I cannot agree that he has moved far enough, at least he is moving in the direction where public opinion and the best thought in Canada is moving, namely, in line with the platform to which I have referred.

In one of the sections of this platform on old age pensions the age is reduced until such time as the retirement insurance scheme becomes fully operative. I say to the government that while they were somewhat longer in this case than they were in innumerable others, in connection with which they have adopted our platform, it is encouraging and refreshing to the people of Canada that a once great party like the government party in this country is at last seeing the light, even though it takes a convention of another party to give them that courage and initiative. However, I do not wish to detract from the credit they will normally obtain for that. I was rather expecting that the Prime Minister would rise and give his usual answer covering all matters of this kind. I wondered why he did not rise when the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was discussing the fatherhood of the movement; I wondered why he did not go back to 1911 or 1917 and say, "If you look carefully you will find it in my book called 'Industry and Humanity'." However, that is one of the things for which he will have to give credit elsewhere.

I say to the minister that this is not the right way to bring in such legislation. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni so well said, when the war is over and the War Measures Act is no longer operative in Canada, by the minister's own admission this old age pension increase actually drops out of sight. We should have had at this session legislation dealing with this matter, and I protest at this time against the laxity of the government's policy which left this matter to be discussed within a few minutes of the time when the session of parliament closes.

Mr. REID: There are two matters to which I wish to call the attention of the minister in connection with the regulations affecting old age pensioners, and even at this late hour I must take a moment or two to place those matters before him and to ask for consideration of them. First of all, like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I was sorry indeed that the discussion did not come up earlier in the session. I am of the opinion that if it had come up earlier in the session, more than fifty per cent of the members of the house would have participated in the discussion. While the statement of the Minister of Finance this afternoon does not go as far as many members from British Columbia and other provinces would have liked, still I wish to say that in my opinion the old age pensioners throughout Canada will be appreciative of that announcement. I should like also to compliment the minister upon the statement he made in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. Rightly or wrongly there is a feeling throughout the country that the minister is definitely against increasing the old age pension and lowering the age limit, and I was delighted to hear him refute that this evening.

Before mentioning the regulations with which I wish to deal, I should like to say that there are hon. members from other provinces who, sometimes, in the corridors and elsewhere, make scathing remarks about the time we occupy in talking about old age pensions. They cannot understand why hon. members from some provinces should advocate a minimum of $1 a day. I am not going to make any disparaging remarks about provinces that pay as little as $11 a month, but I want to tell those hon. members that their attitude reminds me, as a trade unionist, of the artisans who consistently refused to join a trade union. After the unions had battled for higher wages and better hours, however, they were perfectly willing to take advantage of the results the trades unions had received. I believe the fight that has been put up by some provinces, particularly British Columbia, in regard to old age pensions is bringing results in now, and I am sure the other provinces will be only too glad to take advantage of the struggle that has been waged through the years.

One matter I want to take up with the minister has to do with the regulations laid down by the dominion, and the other has to do with the interpretation of those regulations by the Department of Finance, which administers the old age pensions. At the beginning of the war the regulations provided that the pension authorities were required to consider assigned pay as income, even if there were no dependent's allowance. After many protests the dominion government permitted the pension authorities to take into account the amount of assigned pay which was returned to the soldier, if credited to him. Later, further amendments were made to provide that in all cases where dependent's allowance had not been awarded, the board was authorized to disregard any pay allotted or assigned by a member of the forces. Cases have been brought to my attention, however, of men in receipt of old age pensions whose wives are in receipt of assigned pay and dependent's allowance, and in which both those amounts were added and calculated as income. If assigned pay is not to be considered as income, why should it be credited if, in addition, the old lady gets dependent's allowance. I ask the minister to look into this matter, because, if the principle is right in one case, it should be followed right through, though I am frank to say that I should like to see both assigned pay and dependent's allowance disregarded when the wife is in receipt of it while her husband is in receipt of the old age pension.

The other matter has to do with the interpretation of the regulations by the Department of Finance, and I am going to cite one case which I am sure illustrates a great many others. I refer to the case of a man in receipt of old age pension who dies on the fifteenth of the month. In the case that has been drawn to my attention the widow went to collect the cheque and was told that since her husband had died on the fifteenth there was no cheque for her. This is looked upon as a callous act, and some have gone so far as to say that those administering the act were really robbing the old age pensioners. Here is a woman who was carrying on in the early part of the month, her husband dies on the fifteenth, and, thinking there is a cheque coming to her for half a month, she goes to collect it, only to find that the finance department and the old age pension board at Ottawa have ruled that she has no cheque coming. Even at this stage of the session I have no apology to offer for bringing these matters to the attention of the minister, because I believe they should be looked into and remedied.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly I shall look into the matter the hon. member has mentioned.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I was surprised to listen to some of the arguments advanced from both sides of the house this evening. First we listened to the Liberals trying to take all the credit for bringing in the Old Age Pensions Act. Then the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation came along, claiming they were responsible for it. Then, lo and behold, the Conservatives came along and said they were really responsible for it. I never saw so many hon. members vieing with each other for the credit for giving so little. I think the amount we give our old age pensioners is a shame, and I make no apology for that statement. The best test to determine whether or not these old people are getting a sufficient income would be for some of us to try to live on that amount. Could we live on $20 a month? And mind you, not all old age pensioners receive that amount. As has been pointed out already, it varies from province to province; and while the pension may be $20 in one province, that does not mean that all the old age pensioners even in that province receive that amount.

I am very much disappointed because this legislation has been brought down at this late date, because I believe it is one of the most important and humane measures that could be introduced. To bring it in at this stage of the session is almost an insult to the intelligence of the members of this house. I think we might well have stayed over another few days and given this matter more discussion. As the hon. member for New Westminster has pointed out, if that had been done I believe every hon. member would have insisted that the pension be increased.

The minister has made a statement as to what is going to be done in regard to old age pensions. He has said that it will be made possible for the provinces to increase the amount paid by $5 a month, with the dominion contributing seventy-five per cent of the cost and the provinces twenty-five per cent. When the social security committee was discussing this matter it recommended that the amount should be increased. The government has given consideration to that recommendation and has made it possible for an increase to be brought about. The committee brought in another, equally important recommendation however, that the age limit be reduced. That has not been done. As a member of that committee I was firmly convinced that the government would lower the age limit, and I am extremely disappointed because that has not been done. The recommendation was contained in an interim report of the committee, and I thought that report dealt with the minimum requirements. No amount was set; that was left to the discretion of the government, though, of course, we trusted that it would not be too small. The reduction of the age limit also was left to the discretion of the government, and I expected that some reduction would be made, which would have assisted a great deal. Since that was an interim report, I believed it would assist these old people at least to a degree until we were able to return here, and complete our investigation, and make more definite and detailed recommendations to the government. I feel that the social security committee has been let down in that regard.

Mr. MITCHELL: But the old people have not been let down.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes; they have definitely been let down. You might say that they have been given $5 a month more, and that the dominion is contributing its portion. But the fact is that they were expecting more than that. I know the Minister of Labour does not consider $25 a month is sufficient for these old people to live on. I believe he would be the last man to say that it is. I think I know him well enough for that. It is going to help, of course, but there are many elderly people in this country who cannot possibly get along on the amount they are receiving—and they are under the age of seventy. I have heard some hon. members discussing this matter, and saying that the age should be sixty-five years. I believe the experience of most hon. members is that the people who are in need of old age pensions are not people who during their lives have lived in comparative luxury, and have a potential span of life of probably eighty-five or ninety years. They are not the people who require this form of assistance. The people who require it are the ones who have worked hard during their lives and who, for some reason or another, have not been able to accumulate sufficient income to maintain them in their old age. When such people reach the age of seventy, they have long since passed the time when they can earn sufficient income to maintain themselves. When they reach the age of sixty they have reached an age when they are no longer capable of earning sufficient income to maintain a decent standard of living.

What will $20 or $25 a month buy? Well, one could not buy a suit of clothes with that amount of money. And if he is going to rent any kind of decent house, it would cost much more than that. One cannot get a room in Ottawa for less than $20 or $25 a month, and certainly one cannot get a room in Ottawa where he can do his own light housekeeping, or where these old people would be permitted to do their light housekeeping, for that amount of money.

When we look at this matter in a reasonable and sensible way we cannot possibly conceive of members of the House of Commons permitting this legislation to stand as it is. I think $1 a day is an insignificant amount, and the pension should be at least that much. I would also say that the age should be reduced to sixty years.

I should like to mention a few things said by the minister. I shall make my remarks as brief as possible, because the time is getting late—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I hear some hon. members saying, "hear, hear". They will remember I am not averse to holding up the committee in discussing an important matter like this. Hon. members on the other side of the house have had a large share of the debate this evening. I have my notes right in front of me, and I do not wish to be aggravated to the point where I shall have to go on to say what I had had in mind I would say.

This is really an important question. A while ago the minister spoke about the constitutional aspect. He said that he was acting within the constitution, and that he could go only so far as the legislation and the constitution permitted him to go. But I would remind him that recently we made an appeal to the British government to amend the British North America Act so that we might do certain things with respect to elections. In a matter such as this the government might very well have included a request for the necessary permission to amend the British North America Act in a way which would permit us to take over complete, national control of old age pensions.

Hon. members may bring up all the constitutional difficulties they like. They may say, "Whatever we should have done we did not do." But there is nothing which would have prevented the minister at this time lowering the age limit, and reducing it from seventy to sixty. He could have done that quite nicely by order in council. He could have made it possible to increase the old age pension from $20 to $30 a month, and that would be little enough, without any amendment to the constitution.

But the most important point touched upon to-night in connection with old age pension is this: Where is the money to come from? I was surprised and amazed when the hon. member for Vancouver East said that the arguments in support of the old age pension, as far as the money problem was concerned, were all cockeyed. It may be so to him, but the fact is it is a most serious problem. That is the problem which the Minister of Finance has to face.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not wish to interrupt on behalf of the hon. member for Vancouver East, but I must point out that when he spoke he was referring to this discussion about borrowing from the bank—whether one borrowed credit or cash, or paid back credit or cash. He was not referring to old age pensions.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He was referring to the arguments of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Parry Sound. The argument of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was based entirely upon this old age pension scheme. He was asking the minister where he could get this money from. The minister's contention was that it would be too expensive, and that monetary questions entered into it. I do not believe we are going to settle many of our economic problems until we come down to the basic question: Where are we to get the money from? I did not intend to branch out to that argument, because it has been well debated to-night. We Social Crediters have been advocating it for many years.

The minister also pointed out that the provinces should have come forward more readily than they did. If I recall correctly, the province of Alberta was ready a long time before the dominion was.

Mr. ILSLEY: And I did not say that, either. I am sorry to have to correct the hon. member, but I did not say that the provinces should have come forward before they did.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister said that the dominion could not take any steps until the provinces had asked the permission of the dominion government, or had asked for assistance from it. I believe that is correct, is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is somewhere near right; but that is certainly not what the hon. member said before.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He said that the provincial governments would have to make representations to the dominion government, and that when they have done that, legislation would be brought down to enable them to go ahead. I believe, in effect, that is exactly what the Minister of Finance said. Alberta was one of the first to come ahead, and do that very thing. In fact, after arrangements had been made with the dominion government, they were the first to increase the amount by $5.

There is one other important problem I would mention to the committee, one which is connected with the old age pensions, and that is pensions for the blind. Great as is the need of old age pensioners, there is a class of people, namely the blind, who need a great deal of assistance, and need it possibly more than the ordinary old age pensioners. I say that because, if there is a class of people more helpless than another, it is the blind pensioner. It is true that they get $20 a month, the same as the old age pensioner, and that they receive that amount at the age of forty, rather than at seventy. But a person who is blind is almost helpless, and should receive a pension regardless of age. The age should be reduced at least to the point recommended by the institute, namely twenty-one years. These blind people who are receiving the pension may, by means of a little special training given them by charitable organizations, increase their earnings by $200 a year. Their pension amounts to $240, and with that additional $200 they are brought up to $440, if single. The unfortunate thing, however, is that if they earn one dollar more than that amount, it is deducted from their pension until they have reached the sum of $200, and then they are cut off pension entirely. That should not be. If these people are diligent enough, and goodness knows they are not going to earn very much, to go out and earn a few extra dollars, that should not be deducted from their blind pension. Every consideration should be given to these people. I shall not keep the committee any longer with a detailed discussion of old age pensions or the treatment of the blind, but there is a great deal more that can be said. I shall leave it at that until the question comes up again.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are one or two things I should like to say to the minister. First of all, I should like to support the two statements that have been made many times to-night, both of which are true and, in my view, not inconsistent. On the one hand, there will be gratitude on the part of many people for this slight increase in the amount of the old age pension, but on the other hand there will be disappointment that the amount was not made $30 a month, the pensionable age lowered and certain changes made in the regulations. One point I should like to draw to the attention of the minister is in connection with the possible additional $5 which he announced this morning. Will the ceiling of $365 apply to that $5?

Mr. ILSLEY: The $365 remains.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understood the minister to say that some pensioners would not receive the whole amount in view of the application of the ceiling. I understand that in some provinces, like British Columbia and Alberta, where supplemental allowances are being paid, the ceiling does not apply.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not regarded as income.

Mr. KNOWLES: According to the terms of an amendment made to the act.

Mr. ILSLEY: By reason of an order in council amending the regulations.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. We do not know what a province such as British Columbia may do under the new provisions. They may continue to pay the supplemental allowance of $5, or they may allow this $5 to take its place. Supposing British Columbia drops the $5 it is now paying and takes this $5 instead, a pensioner who is at present drawing the additional $5 because the ceiling does not apply, will lose some of his income under the dominion arrangement. It is now possible for a pensioner in British Columbia to be drawing $25 a month and have $125 income additional.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: But if British Columbia adopts the present legislation and pays the pensioner his $25 on the basis of the announcement made by the minister this morning, the person who has $125 other income because the ceiling would then apply would not be allowed to draw the full $25; he would draw only $20 a month, and in that way would be $60 a year worse off than he is at the present time. That is a hypothetical case, but it is a possible case.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is correct, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am asking that when the regulations are drawn up the minister will watch this kind of thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not anticipate that British Columbia will drop this $5 additional.

Mr. KNOWLES: I certainly hope not, and I hope Manitoba will not drop its $1.25, but I trust the minister will watch this kind of thing. I should like now to refer to another matter. At the present time a pensioner who draws his pension from Manitoba but happens to be living in British Columbia does not get the supplemental $1.25 from Manitoba, because he is not living there, or the supplemental $5 from British Columbia, because he is not a British Columbia pensioner. Vice versa, the British Columbia pensioner living in Manitoba would get neither the $1.25 nor the $5. I realize that this is a matter of arrangement between the two provinces, but it also suggests what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was arguing, that it is desirable that there should be a federal policy with respect to the whole matter of old age pensions.

Since the order in council referred to this morning will involve dealing with the Old Age Pensions Act and the regulations, I urge the minister to give consideration, even at this time, to the regulation that requires twenty years' continuous residence in Canada. I have in mind one case of a man who came to this country from England in 1907 and has lived here the whole time except for four years which he spent in England. In 1926 he went to England for a holiday, but circumstances of health made it necessary for him to stay there longer than he had intended to. The result is that the date of his coming back to Canada is the date taken into consideration by the authorities, and he is not entitled to a pension although he is seventy-three years of age and has resided more than twenty years in the country and has lived his entire life either in England or Canada. This is a matter of regulation under the dominion act, and I should hope the minister would give attention to these matters when the order in council is being drawn up shortly as is intended.

I hope that consideration will also be given to deductions made from the $20 and to the liens which are placed on the properties. To many people this is a source of irritation and in many cases has actually deterred people from applying for something which is their right. I hope the minister will give attention to these matters and that in the not too far distant future we shall see a higher rate of pension and a lower pensionable age.

Mr. MUTCH: For a considerable part of this session I have refrained from reiterating that which I have said before about the present standing of these pensions. On account of the pronouncement made this morning, I am concerned momentarily with the matter of age. It has been recognized by industry generally and by the government itself that sixty-five years is the nominal age of retirement. There is a hiatus between sixty-five and seventy years which falls less heavily upon some than on others. Since the minister is reopening the question and is probably going to deal with these matters by orders in council, I urge even at this late date that he gives some consideration to this aspect of the matter.

It is passing strange that any discussion of this question of old age pensions seems to turn into a political discussion, when to my mind it is the one subject that should not be political. On account of the general recognition throughout Canada of the desirability of old age pensions, we perhaps all want to feel that we have some responsibility for the fact that we have something in the way of old age pensions. That may be the explanation, but there is something invidious to my mind about a discussion of this kind resolving itself into a question of paternity and who should take the credit or who should take the blame. There are many of us at the present time who feel that no one should fall over backwards in an effort to claim credit for this act. I am fully aware that for me to continue the discussion to-night might have the effect of hurting the cause I favour, but I would not let this opportunity pass, now or in any other session, without raising my voice for a more generous old age pension and primarily for a lowering of the pensionable age.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to express a word of thanks to hon. members for abbreviating their speeches. I think it might be a convenience to them to know that after the remaining items are passed it will take about half an hour to put the supply bill through its three stages and have it brought back here. It is part of my duty to inform the deputy of his excellency of the time we expect him to give assent to bills, and I am going to take the liberty of saying that I hope he will be here at a quarter past ten o'clock. If it is necessary to postpone it beyond that hour, of course it will have to be done, but I thought that as many members leave at eleven o'clock to-night, this word of notice might not be unwelcome.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Ottawa, January 14, 1944.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, the Chief Justice of Canada, acting as the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Wednesday the 26th of January at 3 p.m. for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that during the adjournment of parliament the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz:

Of Joseph-Armand Choquette, Esquire, for the electoral district of Stanstead;

Of Joseph William Burton, Esquire, for the electoral district of Humboldt;

Of William Bryce, Esquire, for the electoral district of Selkirk;

Of Fred Rose, Esquire, for the electoral district of Cartier.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT, AUGUST 25, 1943, TO BE INCLUDED IN OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that during the summer Ottawa had the honour of a visit by the President of the United States, and on that occasion the President addressed the members of both houses from the entrance to these parliament buildings. It would, I think, be the wish of all hon. members that the address delivered by the President on that occasion should find a permanent place in the records of this parliament, and I would therefore move, seconded by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar):

That the address which Franklin Delano Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, delivered to members of parliament on August 25, 1943, and the other addresses delivered on that occasion, be included as an appendix to the official reports of the debates for the fourth session of the nineteenth parliament of Canada.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the first occasion on which a speech which was not delivered within this chamber has been recorded in Hansard, but I understand that since this address was delivered within the precincts of the house, there are particular reasons for this action being taken. For these reasons I do not think we should raise any objections.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my hon. friend that the President's address was made to members of both houses of parliament, although not actually delivered inside either house. The proceedings of the occasion were immediately related to a visit of the President to Canada's parliament. Though parliament was not in session at the time, the President addressed hon. members on parliament hill immediately in front of the main entrance to the buildings.

Motion agreed to.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Fred Rose, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Cartier, introduced by Mrs. Dorise Winifred Nielsen.

William Bryce, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Selkirk, introduced by Mr. M. J. Coldwell and Mr. S. H. Knowles.

Joseph-Armand Choquette, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Stanstead, introduced by Mr. Maxime Raymond and Mr. Pierre Gauthier.

Joseph William Burton, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Humboldt, introduced by Mr. M. J. Coldwell and Mr. P. E. Wright.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fourth report of special committee on reconstruction and reestablishment.—Mr. Turgeon.

Second, third, fourth and fifth reports of special committee on war expenditures.—Mr. Cleaver.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Acting Leader of the House): Mr. Speaker, we shall presently be summoned to another place—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. CRERAR: I am glad to observe that the sense of humour of the house has perceptibly improved since the end of last session. I move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by Mr. Ilsley, that this sitting be suspended for a short time.

Motion agreed to and sitting suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

And the house having resumed:

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

The Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the fourth session of the nineteenth parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

When the present session opened a year ago, the initiative taken by the united nations gave promise of impressive victories. During the year, that promise has been fulfilled.

The axis forces in North Africa have been destroyed. The European mainland has been invaded. Italy has surrendered unconditionally. On the long Russian front the armies of the Soviet Union have relentlessly driven back the nazi invaders. The Japanese advance in the southwest Pacific has been definitely halted. The invasion threats to Australia and New Zealand have been removed. On the mainland of Asia, the Chinese armies and people have continued to hold back the Japanese tide. The destructive enemy submarine campaign in the north Atlantic has been brought under control. On both sides of the globe the united nations have maintained supremacy at sea, and gained ascendancy in the air.

To-day, in Italy, German forces, despite stubborn resistance, are being compelled to yield ground. In Russia, great German armies face unparalleled destruction. In southeastern Europe, there is growing unrest among Germany's satellite states. In the occupied countries, the people await the signal for open resistance. An ever-increasing aerial bombardment is destroying the war potential of Germany. It is bringing the war home to the German people.

In the campaign against the U-boats, Canada's navy has had a prominent part. It has helped to maintain the bridge of ships across the Atlantic on which offensive action in Europe depends. During the year, all allied naval forces in the northwest Atlantic were placed under a Canadian commander-in-chief. Units of the Canadian army were among the first to land in Sicily, and again on the mainland of Italy. In hard battles won and hundreds of miles of difficult ground taken, our soldiers have had their full share in the accomplishments of this important campaign. They have made a record unexcelled by fighting men. On the opposite side of the world, Canadian forces joined with those of the United States in the occupation of Kiska in the Aleutians. In the attacks upon the U-boats, in the aerial assaults against Germany and occupied Europe, and over battlefronts around the globe, increasing numbers of Canadian airmen continued to take a telling part.

During the autumn, the Minister of National Defence visited Canada's overseas forces in Britain and in Italy. The transport of mail to the forces overseas has been greatly improved by the establishment of air mail services.

Provision of aid to our allies continued to be a major factor in Canada's war effort. War supplies are being sent to Russia, to China, to French forces in Africa, as well as to the United Kingdom and other nations of the commonwealth. They are supplied under the mutual aid legislation enacted during the present session, and are allocated by the mutual aid board in accordance with strategic need. A considerable portion of Canada's mutual aid has been transported across the seas in Canadian built ships, manned by Canadian crews.

For more than a year, Canada has been sending wheat to Greece every month to aid in relieving the starving population. To assist in relieving famine conditions in Bengal, the government has also taken steps to ship Canadian wheat to India.

During the year, production reached the highest level in Canada's history. About half of the total has been devoted to war purposes. Farmers and fishermen have splendidly maintained the production of foodstuffs. No less devoted service has been given by those engaged in lumbering, mining, transportation and all branches of manufacture and distribution. Despite inevitable shortages, essential manpower needs of the armed forces, of industry, and of agriculture have been filled by voluntary methods and by national selective service. This has been facilitated by the patriotism and the skill of the vast majority of workers, both men and women, and by the cooperation of the provinces, local authorities and voluntary organizations.

When parliament adjourned in July, a measure had been enacted to provide for the establishment of a national council to promote physical fitness. Unemployment insurance had been extended to additional groups of workers, and provision had been made for an increase in the amount of old age pensions. Provision was also made for the collection of income taxes on a current basis.

In the session just concluded, careful study was given by select committees of both houses, to the problem of full employment after the war, and, in particular, to the establishment in useful and remunerative employment of the men and women of our armed forces and in war industries. Careful study was similarly given by select committees on social security to the most practicable measures of social insurance, and the steps which would be required to ensure their inclusion in a national plan which itself would include the establishment of a nation-wide system of health insurance. My ministers have given close attention to the recommendations of the select committees and to other investigations in the fields of post-war reconstruction and social security.

During the course of the year, the price ceiling has been splendidly maintained. My ministers have reaffirmed their determination to do all in their power to prevent inflation and to safeguard a basic standard of living. To this end the wartime wages control order has been simplified and strengthened. It will continue to be administered by the national war labour board. Consultation is proceeding with the several provinces regarding the enactment of a comprehensive code of labour relations which will be administered by a wartime labour relations board, and which will include the principle of compulsory collective bargaining.

Recognition of Canada's growing stature in international affairs has found expression in the expansion of our diplomatic and consular services, and in the agreements to raise Canada's missions to the United States, the Soviet Union, China, Brazil and Belgium, as well as the legations of these countries in Canada, to the status of embassies. Direct relations have been established with the French committee of national liberation. A Canadian representative with the personal rank of ambassador now represents Canada at Algiers. The year has also witnessed increased representation of Canada at international conferences and on international boards concerned with wartime and post-war problems.

In the month of August, the government was host to the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain and their advisers at a conference at Quebec. The Quebec conference, like the earlier conference at Washington and the later conferences at Cairo and Teheran, was one of the milestones in the strategic planning of the war. Following the conference at Quebec, Ottawa was honoured by a visit of the President. It was the first occasion on which a President of the United States has visited the Capital of Canada.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the financial appropriations you have made for the prosecution of the war. Their magnitude is again without precedent.

I am pleased that you made special provision for the appointment of parliamentary assistants to ministers of the crown. I am glad that the hopes entertained of this development in the organization of parliament have been so fully realized.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

You will have been deeply gratified that despite the increased level of taxation, the fourth and fifth victory loans met with an unprecedented public response. Clearer evidence could not have been given of the determination of the Canadian people to do their utmost in the winning of the war.

In bringing the present session to a close, I join with you in humble thanks to God for His merciful providence and for the increasing hope vouchsafed to the united nations throughout this year of war.

This concluded the fourth session of the nineteenth parliament.

ADDRESS

OF

Mr. FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

President of the United States

TO

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC

PARLIAMENT HILL, OTTAWA, AUGUST 25, 1943

(The President was introduced by the Prime Minister, Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, and thanked by the Speaker of the Senate, Hon. Thomas Vien, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, Hon. James Allison Glen)

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. President, Your Excellency, Your Royal Highness, members of the Parliament of Canada, ladies and gentlemen,—To-day will be for all time a memorable day for Canada. I need not remind you, Mr. President, how often I have expressed the desire that you might visit Ottawa during your term of office as President of the United States. We have hoped that on such a visit you would speak to the members of the Senate and the House of Commons, either within or without the walls of our Houses of Parliament. You know, too, how frequently His Excellency the Governor General and Her Royal Highness the Princess Alice have expressed the wish that they might have the honour of a visit from Mrs. Roosevelt and yourself at some time during His Excellency's term of office as the representative in Canada of His Majesty the King.

Perhaps I may be allowed also to mention how greatly, for personal reasons, I have looked forward to the pleasure of welcoming to the seat of government and to my own home one whose friendship, in ever closer association, I have been privileged to enjoy over many years. To-day all these hopes and wishes, so warmly cherished by the people of Canada, by their representatives in parliament, by His Excellency and Her Royal Highness and by myself, are being happily realized.

On behalf of all Canada I extend to you to-day, Mr. President, the warmest of welcomes to the capital of our country. I thank you for having honoured our capital city by your presence at a time which is without parallel in the history of human affairs.

The Canadian people will, I know, wish me to express to you the admiration which they feel for you and for your great career. We recognize in you one who has always had a deep concern for the well-being of his fellowmen. We have long known that your services to the cause of freedom far exceed limits of race and bounds of nationality. We honour you as an undaunted champion of the rights of free men and a mighty leader of the forces of freedom in a world at war. We feel, too, a special affection for a lifelong friend of our country.

This is the first occasion on which a President of the United States has visited Canada's capital. It is particularly pleasing to us that this visit should have its association with your momentous meeting in the ancient capital of Canada with the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Over the past two years your meetings with Mr. Churchill have been the signal for great events. The conference at Quebec just concluded will, I am confident, mark a further advance towards final victory.

The City of Quebec is the birthplace of Canada. Beneath its cliffs, in 1608, Champlain founded a settlement and established a seat of government; upon its height is erected a monument commemorating in a single shaft the chivalry of Wolfe and Montcalm in the decisive battle of 1759. It is the city in which, in 1864, the fathers of the Canadian confederation assembled in conference to fashion the Canada that was to be. We were indeed delighted when we learned that Quebec had been selected as the place of meeting between Mr. Churchill and yourself.

We rejoice, Mr. President, that your visit to Ottawa comes at a moment when for the first time in our long history as close neighbours, soldiers of Canada and the United States have fought side by side. Combined British, United States and Canadian forces have just completed the occupation of Sicily as a first step in the liberation of Europe. Combined United States and Canadian forces have just occupied the last Japanese outpost in the western hemisphere.

The rapidity with which the American people gathered their strength, and the momentum and magnitude of their war effort, have filled the world with amazement. All Canada joins in admiration for the efficiency and heroism of the men of the fighting forces of the United States. In the southwest Pacific, in the Aleutians, in North Africa, in Sicily, in the skies over every battle-front and on all the oceans of the world, their deeds are recording a glorious chapter in the history of freedom.

In the combined efforts of the military forces and the peoples of the United States and the British empire, joined with those of the heroic peoples of Russia and China and of the other united nations, lies the certainty of complete victory over the forces of tyranny which have sought the domination of the world.

Canada counts it a high privilege to have the opportunity of drawing into relations of closer friendship, understanding, and good will, the United States and the nations of the British commonwealth. We are firmly convinced that in the continued close association of the British commonwealth of nations and the United States of America lies the surest guarantee of international peace, and of the furtherance of the well-being of mankind throughout the world.

(Translation) Mr. President, once more, and using this time the other official language of our country, I wish to extend to you the most cordial welcome on behalf of all Canada.

Mr. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT (President of the United States): Your Excellency, Your Royal Highness, Mr. Prime Minister, and members of the Parliament, and all my good friends and neighbours of the Dominion of Canada,—It was exactly five years ago last Wednesday that I came to Canada to receive the high honour of a degree at Queen's university. On that occasion—one year before the invasion of Poland, three years before Pearl Harbor—I said:

> We in the Americas are no longer a far-away continent, to which the eddies of controversies beyond the seas could bring no interest or no harm. Instead, we in the Americas have become a consideration to every propaganda office and to every general staff beyond the seas. The vast amount of our resources, the vigour of our commerce, and the strength of our men have made us vital factors in world peace whether we choose it or not.

We did not choose this war—and that "we" includes each and every one of the united nations. War was violently forced upon us by criminal aggressors who measure their standards of morality by the extent of the death and the destruction that they can inflict upon their neighbours.

In this war, Canadians and Americans have fought shoulder to shoulder—as our men and our women and our children have worked together and played together in happier times of peace.

To-day, in devout gratitude, we are celebrating a brilliant victory won by British, Canadian and American fighting men in Sicily.

To-day, we rejoice also in another event for which we need not apologize. A year ago Japan occupied several of the Aleutian islands on our side of the ocean and made a great "to-do" about the invasion of the continent of North America. I regret to say that some Americans and some Canadians wished our governments to withdraw from the Atlantic and the Mediterranean campaigns and divert all our vast strength to the removal of the Japs from a few rocky specks in the north Pacific.

To-day, our wiser councils have maintained our efforts in the Atlantic and the Mediterranean and the China seas and the southwest Pacific with ever-growing contributions; and in the northwest Pacific a relatively small campaign has been assisted by the Japs themselves in the elimination of the last Jap from Attu and Kiska. We have been told that Japs never surrender; their headlong retreat satisfies us just as well.

Great councils are being held here on the free and honoured soil of Canada—councils which look to the future conduct of this war and to the years of building a new progress for mankind. To these councils Canadians and Americans alike again welcome that wise and good and gallant gentleman, the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

Mr. King, my old friend, may I through you thank the people of Canada for their hospitality to all of us. Your course and mine have run so closely and affectionately during these many long years that this meeting adds another link to that chain. I have always felt at home in Canada, and you, I think, have always felt at home in the United States.

During the past few days in Quebec, the combined staffs have been sitting around a table—which is a good custom—talking things over, discussing ways and means, in the manner of friends, in the manner of partners, and may I even say, in the manner of members of the same family.

We have talked constructively of our common purposes in this war—of our determination to achieve victory in the shortest possible time—of our essential cooperation with our great and brave fighting allies. And we have arrived, harmoniously, at certain definite conclusions. Of course, I am not at liberty to disclose just what these conclusions are. But, in due time, we shall communicate the secret information of the Quebec conference to Germany, Italy and Japan. We shall communicate this information to our enemies in the only language their twisted minds seem capable of understanding.

Sometimes I wish that that great master of intuition, the nazi leader, could have been present in spirit at the Quebec conference—I am thoroughly glad he was not there in person. If he and his generals had known our plans they would have realized that discretion is still the better part of valour and that surrender would pay them better now than later.

The evil characteristic that makes a nazi a nazi is his utter inability to understand and therefore to respect the qualities or the rights of his fellow-men. His only method of dealing with his neighbour is first to delude him with lies, then to attack him treacherously, then beat him down and step on him, and then either kill him or enslave him. And the same thing is true of the fanatical militarists of Japan.

Because their own instincts and impulses are essentially inhuman, our enemies simply cannot comprehend how it is that decent, sensible individual human beings manage to get along together and live together as neighbours. That is why our enemies are doing their desperate best to misrepresent the purposes and the results of this Quebec conference. They still seek to divide and conquer allies who refuse to be divided just as cheerfully as they refuse to be conquered.

We spend our energies and our resources and the very lives of our sons and daughters because a band of gangsters in the community of nations declines to recognize the fundamentals of decent, human conduct.

We have been forced to call out what we in the United States would call the sheriff's posse to break up the gang in order that gangsterism may be eliminated in the community of nations.

We are making sure—absolutely, irrevocably sure—that this time the lesson is driven home to them once and for all. Yes, we are going to be rid of outlaws this time.

Every one of the united nations believes that only a real and lasting peace can justify the sacrifices we are making, and our unanimity gives us confidence in seeking that goal.

It is no secret that at Quebec there was much talk of the post-war world. That discussion was doubtless duplicated simultaneously in dozens of nations and hundreds of cities and among millions of people.

There is a longing in the air. It is not a longing to go back to what they call "the good old days." I have distinct reservations as to how good "the good old days" were. I would rather believe that we can achieve new and better days.

Absolute victory in this war will give greater opportunities for the world because the winning of the war in itself is proving, certainly proving to all of us here, that concerted action can accomplish things. Surely we can make strides toward a greater freedom from want than the world has yet enjoyed. Surely by unanimous action in driving out the outlaws and keeping them under heel for ever, we can attain a freedom from fear of violence.

I am everlastingly angry only at those who assert vociferously that the Four Freedoms and the Atlantic charter are nonsense because they are unattainable. If they had lived a century and a half ago they would have sneered and said that the Declaration of Independence was utter piffle. If they had lived nearly a thousand years ago they would have laughed uproariously at the ideals of Magna Charta. And if they had lived several thousand years ago they would have derided Moses when he came from the mountain with the Ten Commandments.

We concede that these great teachings are not perfectly lived up to to-day, and we concede that the good old world cannot arrive at utopia overnight. But I would rather be a builder than a wrecker, hoping always that the structure of life is growing—not dying.

May the destroyers who still persist in our midst decrease. They, like some of our enemies, have a long road to travel before they accept the ethics of humanity.

Some day, in the distant future perhaps—but some day with certainty—all of them will remember with the Master—"Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

(Translation) Mr. Prime Minister, my visit to the old city of Quebec has recalled vividly to my mind that Canada is a nation founded on a union of two great races. The harmony of their equal partnership is an example to all mankind—an example everywhere in the world.

Hon. THOMAS VIEN (Speaker of the Senate): (Translation) Mr. President, I have the signal honour and pleasure of tendering you in my mother tongue, one of the two official languages of this country, the warmest thanks of the Senate, of the House of Commons and of the people of Canada for having graciously consented to visit our capital at the conclusion of the henceforth memorable Quebec conference.

The sojourn among us of a President of the United States would suffice at any time to fill us with pride and enthusiasm. Yet we salute in you, Mr. President, more than the highest official of our sister nation and very good neighbour. We hail and acclaim in you a worthy successor of Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln and Wilson, to mention but a few of the great men who symbolize the glory of your country.

Faithful exponent of the spirit that moved the founders of the Republic, you see in the Declaration of Independence a guarantee of freedom not only for your people, but for all the peoples of the earth. Liberal, in the widest sense of the term, you are the friend of man, in whom you behold the image and likeness of our Divine Maker. Having exhausted the resources of a wise and patient diplomacy, you unhesitatingly took up arms to free him from the yoke of oppressors who brutally denied him the exercise of his inalienable rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Were you not expressing your own philosophy of life when you so highly praised on a former occasion these words of Thomas Jefferson: "I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man"?

The British Empire, Canada and the civilized world owe you an immense debt of gratitude, Mr. President, for having come to their assistance on the morrow of Dunkirk, at an hour when the black clouds of defeat gathered threateningly on the horizon. Even before your entry into the conflict, you found the means of supplying Britain with ships, arms, munitions and the incalculable advantages of "lend-lease."

We Canadians are proud of the fact that we descend from the two greatest races in the world. Our hearts and yours, I am sure, shared the overwhelming grief of France, following the defeat of that unhappy country. We shall never forget that, for the second time in the life of this generation, your country has generously gone to the assistance of a France in mortal danger repeating Pershing's undying words: "La Fayette, we are here!"

When, with the proper perspective that only time can bring, the history of this era shall be written, you will stand in the forefront of that brilliant group of leaders—with Churchill, Mackenzie King, Stalin and Chiang Kai-shek—who have so nobly served humanity.

May I be allowed, Mr. President, to express the deep satisfaction I feel in reiterating to you the heart-felt thanks of the Canadian Parliament and people for having honoured us with your presence here to-day and having cheered us with your very comforting remarks. We pray God that He may grant you His favours in abundance, that He may bless you and the great Republic whose destinies you guide, until such time as we may all glorify Him together in final victory on the threshold of a lasting peace.

Hon. JAMES ALLISON GLEN (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. President, to-day Canada has been afforded the unique privilege of welcoming to our own capital the first President of the United States of America while still in office. This gathering is the culmination of a long-standing invitation given by the Right Hon. Mackenzie King to one who has been an intimate friend for more years than either of them would care to say. It is well, sir, that you should tax the hospitality of your friends occasionally, and I can state confidently that everyone, young and old, in this vast assembly before you, together with that great unseen listening audience throughout the whole of Canada, look upon you with that possessive regard which is bestowed when a much-loved guest honours our home. I hope I shall not be misunderstood when I say that many Canadians affectionately call you "our President."

Canada will never forget the dark and dismal years of 1940 and 1941, nor will it ever forget that unparalleled act when you, as President of your great country, gave that generous and sorely needed lend-lease help which aided Great Britain to withstand and repel a conquering and then a seemingly invincible foe. National as well as human memories, with passing years and other conditions, sometimes fade and become remote, but it would be an indelible blot on our escutcheon if at any future time Canada or the democracies forgot the noble help your country afforded us.

It is therefore with real pleasure we behold in our capital your unmistakable figure and listen to that bold and confident voice so familiar to our ears. And what makes this day so memorable to us is the knowledge that it is to Canada particularly you speak. We have shared with the world in those intimate so-called fireside chats which you have addressed to your own people but which really encompassed the world and belong to the ages. Those fireside chats, clothed in language simple, expressive and enduring, the product of a gifted mind and balanced judgment, made their striking appeal because they are based on the eternal verities without which, as we believe, nothing is. To-day, sir, your speech is an outstanding example of those utterances which have endeared you to our people and caused dismaying fear to our foes.

The road still may be long and dreary and the end not yet in sight, but the issue is no longer in doubt and upon you, sir, the tremendous responsibilities of victory will be part of your destiny. You will require the assistance of all who, like you, believe that good is the final goal of ill. We are confident that in Canada you will find that cooperation in peace which we have shared in war. All we desire is the right to exercise the four freedoms upon which an enduring democracy must be based. If I may say so, your own phrase—now a household word—"the good neighbour," definitely embodies these principles. We invoke the blessing of Almighty God upon you. May He strengthen and sustain you until victory is achieved and peace and happiness restored to this war-torn world.
