House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Friday, July 2, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LACOMBE—TRANSLATION OF REMARKS IN DEBATE ON JUNE 25

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Last Wednesday I withdrew unconditionally a statement which I had made in French in this house on June 25. Now, using my privilege as a member of parliament, I should like to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to be just and fair to me. Speaking in this house on June 28 the Prime Minister quoted from the English debates of June 25 last. This citation was as follows:

> We have here in the cabinet three new millionaires who have made their money since the war's outbreak. We shall denounce them at the proper time and place. Fortunes are being built up.

That citation is reported at page 4072 of the English Debates of June 28, 1943. This is an absolutely false translation of a part of my speech delivered in French on June 25. Consequently I should like to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister to withdraw this citation or to give instructions to the translator to correct this translation.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sure the house would wish me to be absolutely fair with the hon. gentleman, and no one is more anxious to be so than myself. I would remind him that the citation which I used on Wednesday was the citation as it appears in Hansard in French and I used only that citation and had reference to no other in the remarks I made. It was pointed out at the time that the French translation, in the mind of the hon. member who has just spoken, and I think I may say in the minds also of many other hon. members, was not a correct translation. But that was in no sense my fault or the fault of the government; it is a matter which concerns the translation staff of the house. I would say for that reason I think my hon. friend, in desiring to have any correction made, so far as Hansard is concerned, should address the Speaker of the house rather than myself. He will find His Honour the Speaker quite ready, I am sure, to see that an accurate translation is given. If he adopts that procedure he will find, I am sure, on the part of all there will be every disposition to see that a proper translation is substituted for the one that appears in Hansard.

Mr. LACOMBE: I ask Your Honour to give instructions to the translators to correct this translation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has made the request of the Chair that there should be a proper translation of the words that were used in the motion which the right hon. the Prime Minister brought before the house. I would say to the hon. gentleman that I checked the translation, and I am satisfied that the translation in English of the hon. gentleman's speeech was not a correct translation of the French text. With what the hon. gentleman has said, supplemented by the Prime Minister, and also what I now say, I think there has been sufficient reference to justify the hon. gentleman on the question of privilege, and to make clear that the English text was not a proper translation of the French text.

MR. LACOMBE—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN MONTREAL GAZETTE OF JULY 1

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): On a question of privilege, the Montreal Gazette, in the edition of July 1, 1943, has an editorial under the title, "Lacombe Eats His Words". The first sentence of the editorial reads:

> Liguori Lacombe has eaten his words to the last shameful morsel. . . .

The last sentence of the editorial reads:

> The important thing was that an irresponsible slander should be branded as such.

Using my privilege as a member of the House of Commons I ask that this statement be withdrawn, and I give the Montreal Gazette until Wednesday next at three o'clock to withdraw it; otherwise I shall ask the Chair to have the reporter summoned before the bar of the House of Commons.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has made a request of me that I should do something in connection with the Montreal Gazette. I have no power or control over the Montreal Gazette or any comments it may make.

MR. GRAYDON—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN THE TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I rise to a question of privilege based upon an editorial appearing in to-day's issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail, which reflects upon His Majesty's Loyal Opposition and myself as leader. The editorial, among other things, says that:

Last week Doctor W. J. Edmonston Scott, M.A., who served at Ottawa as a censor in languages of central and western Europe from 1939 to 1943, supplied in a letter published in this newspaper definite confirmation of the validity of its charges about the government's scandalously inquisitorial abuse of the powers of censorship conferred upon it by the War Measures Act. Doctor Scott did not merely give general support to our allegations, but he provided very damning evidence to justify them by quoting a special memorandum, dated May 1, 1942, which was issued to examiners, and ran as follows:

"All letters observed in the mails containing information regarding women's political activities in all parts of the world and women's activities in connection with post-war reconstruction should be specially submitted to this office and the file reference C.11292-38 quoted."

No denial has been made of this allegation of Doctor Scott, and presumably no denial is possible. It is so disturbing that even a staunch supporter of the government like the Winnipeg Free Press has been moved to describe it as a gross abuse of the powers of censorship, upon which the fullest possible light should be directed, and to demand that the Minister of National War Services, who is responsible for the censorship, should be cross-examined in great detail about the scope of its operations.

If a parliamentary opposition has one duty more compelling than another, it is to act as a vigilant watchdog against all unwarranted governmental assaults upon fundamental principles of liberty. But, so far, from the opposition benches not even a whisper of protest has been heard against this proved assault. All the opposition groups have a measure of culpability in the matter, as any of their members could have raised the issue. But a special degree of blame for a deplorable laxity must attach to Mr. Graydon, because the leader of the official opposition has by tradition a special responsibility for bringing a government to book for such arrogant abuse of its powers as has been revealed, especially when they strike at the roots of personal liberties. He should have lost no time in proceeding to cross-examine the Minister of National War Services about this matter.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the editorial in question is evidently based upon a misunderstanding of the position of the opposition and myself in this matter, and I desire to deny the charge that we have been in any way remiss in our duties with respect to the issue in question.

On Wednesday last, after consultation with me, the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) took the necessary steps to ask for the production of a copy of all censorship orders, regulations or instructions issued under government authority since the outbreak of war. This appears in Votes and Proceedings of Thursday, July 1. The hon. member's motion was prompted largely by our desire to have a proper basis for examination of the ministry with respect to the allegations raised by Doctor Scott and certain newspapers, particularly the Winnipeg Free Press and the Toronto Globe and Mail. We felt that a fuller and more complete examination of censorship matters generally and this case in particular could best be accomplished when the papers asked for had been tabled and a more appropriate opportunity presented itself for careful and detailed examination of the ministry. I rise therefore on this question of privilege to put the record straight so far as our position as an opposition is concerned.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

First and second reports of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Fontaine.

TAX CONVENTION ACT

CANADA-UNITED STATES CONVENTION AND PROTOCOL FOR AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION AND PREVENTION OF FISCAL EVASION

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 119, respecting a certain tax convention and protocol between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Washington in the United States of America, on the fourth day of March, 1942.

He said: The Canada-United States of America tax convention was considered by this house on June 8, 1942, and a resolution was adopted at that time approving the convention and protocol. The Department of Justice has recently given the opinion that, in order to give legal effect to the convention, it is necessary that it be confirmed by statute, and for that reason this bill is being introduced.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION DAY

MESSAGES OF GREETING AND GOOD WISHES FROM REPRESENTATIVES OF OTHER COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I feel that hon. members of the house will be pleased to know that yesterday, Dominion day, I received on behalf of their governments, either by letter or by personal call, greetings to Canada, good wishes and many expressions of thanks from members of the foreign diplomatic service resident in Ottawa at this time. There were also a number of telegrams received from different countries, some of which I have felt would be of special interest to the house, and which the house might wish to have as a matter of record on Hansard. It will not take more than a minute or two for me to refer to them; they illustrate the appreciation felt by other countries of Canada's present position and of the assistance received from Canada during the period of the war.

One message directed to His Excellency the Governor General was from King Peter of Yugoslavia, who it will be remembered visited Ottawa not so very long ago. The message was as follows:

On the occasion of the national day of Canada I offer Your Excellency my warmest greetings and best wishes for the welfare and prosperity of the dominion and of the gallant Canadian people.

From the Yugoslav Minister for Foreign Affairs in London, a message was addressed to myself in the following words:

I avail myself of the Canadian Dominion Day to convey to you my warmest greetings and heartfelt good wishes for the happiness and prosperity of your great nation.

A message addressed to myself as Prime Minister came from General Sikorski, Prime Minister of Poland, who is at the present time in Cairo. General Sikorski, it will be recalled, has visited Canada on two or three occasions in the course of the war:

On the occasion of your national holiday I send you and the gallant Canadian nation my heartiest congratulations, best wishes, all success. May I assure you the Polish nation and myself greatly admire Canada's magnificent contribution to the allies' cause on the battlefields of this war. By the same opportunity please accept my personal best greetings.

A communication came also from the Polish government in London, through the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Stanislaw Mikolajczyk, which reads:

On the occasion of Canada's day please accept, Mr. Prime Minister, the cordial greetings and heartfelt wishes of the government and people of Poland. We shall always remember with gratitude the support which your great country is so generously giving us in the hour of need. I am sure that the bonds of friendship forged during the years of our common struggle will continue after victory is achieved and contribute to the building up of a new international community.

His Excellency the President of China, Lin Sen, sent the following message to His Excellency the Governor General:

On the occasion of Dominion day, I have great pleasure in extending to you on behalf of the national government and people of China my hearty felicitations and best wishes for your personal welfare and the prosperity of Canada.

The following message was also received from Chungking, addressed to myself as Prime Minister, from Premier and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek:

On the occasion of your Dominion day I have great pleasure to extend to you my hearty felicitations. I believe that our traditional friendship which has been enhanced by comradeship in arms not only strengthens our united war effort to crush our common enemy but will stand us in good stead in our post-war cooperation to establish an enduring peace. May I also take this opportunity to express to you my personal thanks for the kind hospitality which your government and the Canadian people extended to my wife during her recent stay in your country and my best wishes for your health and the happiness of the Canadian people.

There were three or four important messages from south American countries. From the Argentine republic a communication from the Hon. Segundo R. Storni, Minister of Foreign Affairs, as follows:

It is with special pleasure that I address myself to you, the Prime Minister, to reaffirm, on the occasion of the commemoration of Dominion day the deep friendship of the government and people of my country for the government and people of Canada. The Argentine republic, linked to Canada by reason of our dwelling in the same hemisphere and by common ideals of progress, wishes to expand and consolidate the friendly relations which unite both countries.

The following message was received from the President of the Republic of Brazil, His Excellency Doctor Getrilo Vargas. It was communicated through the Minister, Doctor de Millo Franco:

The President of the republic of the United States of Brazil has instructed me by telegram to convey to you and to the Canadian people his heartiest congratulations and those of the Brazilian people on the occasion of the celebration of Dominion day. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Brazil, Doctor Oswaldo Aranha, also instructed me to congratulte you on his behalf, which I also do in my own name.

It is with great pleasure that I give course to said instructions. The commemoration of Dominion day cannot be considered by the nations of the Americas only as the celebration of a great Canadian date, but as that of a great American date, as it represents the birth of one more sister nation.

In only seventy-six years Canada has raised herself to the outstanding position she occupies to-day in the concert of nations; it is a miracle accomplished by her great people and by her leaders, and I can assure you that we Brazilians look to her with the proud admiration that a member of a same family has for the successes of another member.

The President of Brazil also sent the following message to His Excellency the Governor General:

On the seventy-sixth anniversary of the dominion I beg Your Excellency to accept my warmest wishes for the ever-increasing prosperity of Canada and for the personal welfare of Your Excellency.

A message also came from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Chile, Mr. Joaquin Fernandez, as follows:

In the name of the government of Chile it affords me pleasure to greet you and the Canadian people on the occasion of the anniversary of confederation and to express our best wishes for the happiness of your government and yourself.

A message as follows was received also from the Vice-President of the Republic of Uruguay, His Excellency Alberto Guani, who recently visited Canada:

I congratulate you very cordially seeing in your people and in yourself staunch and distinguished supporters of right and liberty in this hour of spiritual trial for all humanity. I renew my gratitude for the amicable welcome extended recently in your admirable country.

As I have already said, other countries having legations in Ottawa sent messages of friendliest greetings either conveyed by letter or expressed in person by their ministers.

CANADIAN NAVY

PROPORTION OF HIGH RANKING OFFICERS AS COMPARED WITH OTHER NAVIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Last week the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asked a question regarding the number of high-ranking officers in the Canadian navy, and if I am in order I should like to reply now. I am sorry that last week I gave the figure of seven as the number of those in the Canadian navy holding the rank of commodore or higher. The correct number is eight, but I was speaking from memory at the time and I had forgotten that quite recently another commodore was appointed. The total number, then, in the Canadian navy holding the rank of commodore and higher is eight, and a comparison with other navies, for which the hon. member asked as well, would run approximately as follows. The figures are not perhaps entirely exact, because it is difficult to ascertain the precise strength of other navies, but I think they are substantially correct.

In the United Kingdom there is one officer of the rank of commodore and above for every 3,000 men. In Australia there is one officer of that rank for every 5,200 men. In the United States there is one officer of that rank for every 5,500 men, and in Canada one officer of that rank for every 7,500 men. It will be seen, therefore, that the reports which the hon. gentleman received to the effect that we had a great many high-ranking officers in the Canadian navy, as compared to other navies, are not correct, but that, on the contrary, we have many less of such high-ranking officers, proportionately, than any of the other navies to which I have referred.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT FOR BUILDING OF TUGS AT PICTOU, N.S.—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if he has been able to reconsider the cancellation of the contract for building two tugs, which was given some time ago to Ferguson Brothers in Pictou. It has been represented to me that the minister does not understand the situation in that yard. This company took on the contract in good faith; about thirty per cent of the preliminary work has been done; it has been financed entirely by the company; this concern has about a thousand men in its different undertakings, and has not encroached in the slightest degree on the operations of the other shipbuilding yards in Pictou. They feel that if they were allowed to complete their contract, as they are prepared to do, it would form the basis of a post-war industry, of which we have very few in Nova Scotia. I should like to ask the minister if he has been able to reconsider, and reconsider favourably, representations made to him by the company and by the people of Pictou and, I believe, by the government of Nova Scotia.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The Ferguson yard at Pictou has been enlarged to provide facilities for the repair of naval and merchant vessels. A number of other yards have also been expanded for that purpose. The question arises as to whether the facilities can be utilized for other purposes, when there is an urgent need for repair facilities. At the moment the full facilities of the Ferguson yard are required and are being used for the repair of ships.

I may say that the understanding I have from my officers with respect to the tug situation is that it was felt that a steel company at Trenton had facilities for building tugs. May I add that tugs of the size we are discussing do not require to be built in a modern shipyard. They usually are built at a number of places along the great lakes and in the St. Lawrence, that are not by any stretch of the imagination shipyards. They are very simple to build, and they cost about $400,000 each.

Arrangements were made to build two of these tugs at Trenton. A dispute about wages arose, as to whether the tugs should be built on shipyard wages or steel plant wages, and the Trenton plant decided it did not want the tugs built there. Without the knowledge of the department the tugs were moved into the shipyard that had been reserved for repair purposes, or enlarged for repair purposes, at Pictou. The net result of that would be that facilities reserved for repair purposes could be used to build tugs, or for work other than repairs. The whole principle was being established that yards which had been designated to repair ships had the privilege of taking any contracts they liked, and doing it in repair yards. The result was that the contract for two tugs was cancelled, by arrangement with the Ferguson company. Arrangements were made in my office some six weeks ago—

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOWE: Just a moment; do I have to be interrupted?

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister might be just a little bit more lenient with the hon. member. He has always been very courteous. I think on reflection the minister would not want to cut him so short.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member must know what I am trying to do—explain something of which I had no notice. I am trying to think of my answer as I go along.

Mr. GRAYDON: He was only trying to help the minister.

Mr. HOWE: Well, I hope so. In any event, arrangements were made in my office some six weeks ago that this contract would be cancelled. I think the total expenditure at that time was less than $10,000. So far as the contract is concerned, the representative of the Ferguson company—and I discussed the situation with one of the brothers—seemed to be satisfied with the arrangement that was made at that time.

An attempt is being made to make this incident a political issue. Just to show the proportions of the matter, we are discussing two tugs costing $400,000 each, in a town where the government has a shipbuilding yard, as well as a ship repair yard, and is contemplating in the current year an expenditure between the two yards of about $15,000,000. I would ask hon. members who have interested themselves in this situation to have a sense of proportion.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I understood the minister to say that Ferguson Brothers, with whom this contract was placed, approved the cancellation. The representations to me are contrary to that. Secondly, I disagree with the minister when he says that this is in any way political. The representations made by the company, the town and the government of Nova Scota are unanimous in the request that the contract be continued, and that permission be given to build these tugs in Pictou.

WHEAT

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN PLACEMENT OF CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, more or less by way of making a request. In doing so I am following up a question I asked on Wednesday last, as reported at page 4199 of Hansard. At that time I asked the minister if he had received any complaints from western Canada with respect to the allotment of cars. I shall not read the whole of what took place at that time, other than to say that the minister replied that he had not heard of any charges of discrimination. He said:

> I have had requests from many sources that a different basis of allocating the cars be instituted.

Daily I am receiving complaints, and I received some to-day, protesting against the system being used, one known as the thirty-car cycle. These complaints say that it is not working out satisfactorily. There is an opportunity provided by this system of the grain firms taking advantage of the farmer by undergrading grain. I have reason to believe that the minister has had several requests for changing the system, and I must ask if he will consider the requests he has received to the effect that the system be changed over for the balance of the crop season, and for 1942 crop delivery. Would he change the arrangement so as to meet the suggestions which are being forwarded to him in large numbers?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is my usual custom to give serious, thoughtful and earnest consideration to any reasonable representations made to the Department of Trade and Commerce. I have given serious thought to the letters which have come in, and in each case I have replied, setting out the attitude of the Department of Trade and Commerce at the present time. I do not think there is anything further I can add to that at the moment.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Experimental farm service.

12. Experimental farms administration, $59,480.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the Minister of Agriculture throw a little light on this question of alcohol from wheat? A statement was made in the house by the Minister of Munitions and Supply that in the manufacture of alcohol from wheat returns to farmers would be around only 25 to 35 cents a bushel. On the other hand, Doctor Archibald, speaking to the committee on agriculture yesterday, said that if alcohol were made from wheat, given a wheat yield of twenty bushels to the acre, the farmer would get a return of $17 an acre, which works out to 85 cents a bushel. That is different from the figure given by the Minister of Munitions and Supply; I suggest there must be some explanation fo the difference between 25 or 30 cents on the one hand and 85 cents on the other. Will the minister give the committee some information on this point?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Of course one would require to have the figures used by both the parties referred to, and also the basis for those figures, before he could explain the difference between them. The difference which might be there is probably based upon the facts that are usually run into when you are discussing costs of productions or returns per acre. The statement made to the committee by Doctor Archibald, which I happen to have in my hand, contains the estimated value of various crops as sources of alcohol. Wheat is taken at twenty bushels to the acre, and the production of alcohol is stated to be 4·24 gallons per hundred pounds. Taking that as a basis it goes on to say that the total value of the crop per acre is $17.51. I am not certain what figures were used by those who worked out the cost for the Minister of Munitions and Supply, but in all probability the average production and the average cost were taken into consideration. The only statement with regard to the matter that I would care to make at the present time is that all the information I have seen, all the figures that have been compiled, indicate that wheat would have to be produced at a much lower cost than that at which I think any farmer in western Canada would be prepared to produce it, in order to permit the production of alcohol at a cost comparable with the cost of production from other sources.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to an article appearing in Business Week of June 12, 1943. I quote from pages 72 and 75 as follows:

> The chemurgist's dream of grain alcohol as the answer to farm surpluses may yet come true—and with it a lengthening horizon of post-war possibilities for the rubber, oil, and chemical industries—through a process of protein extraction which promises to make alcohol a cheap by-product.

And again:

> The process was discovered less than four months ago by Irvin W. Tucker, a young chemist in the department of agriculture working under direction of Doctor A. K. Balls, chief of the department's enzyme research laboratory. Park and Tilford developed it commercially.

The article goes into further details and concludes as follows:

> Heretofore, chemurgists who grappled with the question of farm surpluses habitually stubbed their toes on two hard problems: there was no market for the tremendous volume of alcohol that could be produced from farm products, and the cost of farm alcohol was prohibitively high. The war has solved the first problem. . . . Balls and Tucker appear to have solved the second.

This article would seem to suggest that a process has been discovered which considerably reduces the cost of making alcohol from grain, a matter which is of prime importance to Canada. I should like to know whether there is contact between the Department of Agriculture and research such as is here indicated.

I should also like to draw the attention of the minister to an article which appeared in the June, 1943, issue of the Reader's Digest. This is a condensation from the Christian Science Monitor. I quote from pages 81, 82 and 83 as follows:

> At Institute, West Virginia, a superb plant 77 acres in area is turning out rubber at the rate of 90,000 long tons a year. That is almost one-sixth as much as we used to need in normal times—and as much as 100,000 Malay natives gather from 18,000,000 rubber trees.

The writer of this article would seem to hold no brief for grain or petroleum; but note what he says:

The process used at Institute happens to make its butadiene out of alcohol. The alcohol now comes from corn.

I am emphasizing two points. First, there does seem to be a considerable volume of synthetic rubber being manufactured in the United States from alcohol produced from grain. Second, there would appear to have been recent discoveries which reduce the cost of this process.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Did Doctor Archibald give the figures at which alcohol would have to be sold in order to bring that return?

Mr. GARDINER: I have in my hand the document which was before the committee this morning when Doctor Archibald was giving his evidence. This is a survey of Canadian research on the utilization of farm products by the chemurgic committee of the Canadian chamber of commerce. It will be recalled by those who were present at the committee this morning that Doctor Archibald referred to certain reports that had been made, I think by Doctor Speakman. This document is the last word on the matter in so far as Canada is concerned. Figures are given based on cost according to United States practice and according to European practice. According to United States practice, with wheat at 60 cents the cost would be 53·4 cents for the alcohol at the plant. According to the European process, with wheat at 60 cents the cost of alcohol would be 39·6 cents at the plant. As I indicated at the beginning, after examining the figures which had been secured in the United States up to that time, as well as the experiences on the European continent, it appeared that even with wheat at 60 cents, the cost of alcohol would be 53·4 cents under the American practice and 39·6 cents under the European.

Mr. QUELCH: What is the price of alcohol to-day?

Mr. GARDINER: The price was given by the Minister of Munitions and Supply as around 27 or 28 cents.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I believe the normal price before the war was 25 to 27 cents.

Mr. GARDINER: I was in Chicago last week within a few miles of the plant that has been spoken of so much by so many hon. members. I did not have time to visit it, but Mr. Shaw, the director of marketing, was with me and I asked him to visit the plant and make a full report on what is being done. He went down there last Friday and has not yet returned. The wheat pool in Saskatchewan appointed a committee which reviewed this question thoroughly, and while I do not know that they have so far made any official report I think I am safe in saying that they questioned the advisability of attempting at this time to produce alcohol from wheat or of spending sufficient money to produce it on the information that is now available to us. That is also the opinion which we hold as a department. This, of course, is entirely apart from the question raised by members here the other day—whether we should set aside a certain sum of money to investigate the whole matter, and further whether we could not make something out of farm products that would be to the advantage of the farmer and the country. With the principle underlying that I am in entire agreement, as I think are the members of the government also.

There is, of course, the question which always arises in matters of this kind, whether we should use the present set-up under the national research council or some other set-up more closely associated with the Department of Agriculture, and further whether we should carry on experiments at the centre at Ottawa or in different parts of the country where the agricultural products are grown. All that was covered the other day, and the suggestion made on the latter point was that we should have research and experimental laboratories set up in four sections of Canada—at the coast, on the prairies, in central Canada, and in the maritimes, in regard to the products of those particular areas. That was the question that was being discussed here the other day. There was no discussion of any one particular thing, but the suggestion that many things should be inquired into.

Mr. WRIGHT: I think the minister was quoting from a report made in 1941, but since then there have been tremendous developments in the production of alcohol from wheat. I had the pleasure of going through the research laboratories in Ottawa just before Easter and of seeing some of the advances that have been made in that field. I have also read the report published by Mr. Baruch, of the United States, to the effect that if the United States went into the production of rubber they would use at least 60 per cent grain alcohol and 40 per cent alcohol from petroleum products. I certainly think this matter should not be dropped, but that further investigation should be made, because new developments are taking place all the time with which we should keep in touch. There is something to be said for the production of butadiene rubber from grain alcohol, especially when we take into consideration the cost of the plant itself. As I understand it, a plant for the production of rubber from grain alcohol can be built considerably cheaper than one using the petroleum process. From conversations I had with officers of the national research laboratories I understand they are constructing a pilot plant which will use grain alcohol. I hope the matter will not be dropped.

Mr. PERLEY: I suggest to hon. members who are not members of the agriculture committee that they study the reports of proceedings of that committee, particularly for the last five sittings, and the last day or two especially, when we had Dr. Archibald before us with reference to the experimental work now being carried on. They will find in those reports much useful information. It is impossible of course for members of the house to keep track of everything that goes on in the committee, but I would especially commend the reports of the agriculture committee for the last few days.

With regard to this particular item, I think a useful purpose is being served by this expenditure, and I hope that the minister will have investigations made into the production of alcohol from wheat, for instance, and that much of the investigational and research work be carried on in the west. The farm at Indian Head is suitable for very much of this work and a lot of it could be done there. If I had anything to complain of it would be that this vote is not sufficient. In the last two or three years especially it has been found necessary for us to develop all our resources of every kind, agriculture and otherwise, and we cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of the research work being done by the experimental farms. I would be in favour of increasing this vote.

Mr. SENN: I should like to supplement what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has said about the excellent information we received in the agriculture committee from Doctor Archibald. Undoubtedly they are doing work, particularly in the research field, and the kind of research that is being done is very much worth while. It concerns itself largely with production and processing, however, and it seems to me that there is another kind of research which might be undertaken, and that is the finding of new uses and new methods of processing our farm products, particularly the by-products of the farm. That might come more properly under industrial research, but it seems to me it is one of the live questions to-day in Canada. Quite a few farm products are being utilized in different directions, mostly for food, but for other purposes as well, and I think still other uses could be found, particularly for the by-products of the farm. There is a good deal of waste in farm by-products at the present time. New uses might be found for a good deal of straw, corn stalks, and a number of other things which would be of advantage to us industrially as well as supplementing the income of the farm. I do not suppose the Department of Agriculture or the experimental farms can very well deal with matters of that kind, but we have in Canada what is known as the national chemurgic committee, which is doing valuable work and is being fostered and assisted by chambers of commerce and similar bodies. I think the time has come from the point of view of agriculture when government assistance should be given to that committee to assist it in trying to find new uses for the by-products of the farm. I leave the suggestion with the minister, and I am sure that if he studies it carefully he will agree that it would be very much worth while.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask the minister whether the figures supplied by the Department of Munitions and Supply as to the cost of producing alcohol from petroleum products were based on experiments made in the United States or in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid the hon. member will have to ask the minister himself when he comes back before the committee. I have no information as to what those figures are based on.

Mr. HATFIELD: I would like to see research work carried on in regard to agricultural products by the experimental farms, entirely outside of the national research council. I believe they are the ones to carry on this work. We are bringing into this country millions of dollars' worth of ethyl lead to bring up the octane rating of our gasoline, while as a matter of fact, alcohol made from wheat would answer the same purpose. I think there should be a pilot plant built in western Canada or at the central experimental farm to carry on experiments in the use of western low grade wheat and low grades of starch for power alcohol.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I understand that a ten per cent mixture of alcohol will jump the octane rating of gasoline nine per cent.

Mr. SENN: Under this vote we have the animal husbandry division of the experimental farm. If we read the last report of the Minister of Agriculture we find that in the matter of dairy cattle, sheep, swine and so on, there has been a certain amount of curtailment of operations owing to the fact that the country is at war and certain other things are being done to a greater extent. This report, however, only goes up to March, 1942, and has to do really with the operations in 1941. I would ask the minister to give us a brief outline of what is being done in animal husbandry. Are the experiments previously conducted still being carried on, or have they been reduced?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that while there has been a reduction in our expenditures generally in the Department of Agriculture since the war began, our expenditures on ordinary activities are not as high as they were when the war began but in so far as some of the live stock activities are concerned we are spending even more than we were at the beginning of the war; naturally we want more hogs, eggs, poultry, beef cattle, and so on, more dairy products and other things, and therefore there has been considerable activity along those lines. We are building up at the moment rather than cutting down on those particular activities.

Mr. KNOWLES: With regard to synthetic rubber, did the Polymer corporation, which investigated methods of producing such rubber, before it set up the plant at Sarnia, consult with the Department of Agriculture or with any of the science officials in that department?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think there was any direct consultation, but of course all those who are dealing with matters of this kind have access to this publication, and there are representatives on the committee. Doctor Archibald, who is here with us to-day is a member of that committee and is director of experimental farms in Canada. This document is of course available and I have no doubt that anyone reading it to make a decision of that kind would have had access to all such information.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the 1941 document?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and 1941 would be about the time this matter was under serious consideration by those who were getting ready to do something about a plant in 1942. It does take considerable time to get into production after you start and to establish a plant of that kind. What the minister said when discussing the matter was that he hoped to get into production shortly, so that the subject has been under consideration by these people for some considerable time, and I have no doubt they took into account all the facts connected with it.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is it not a fact that practically all the chemists and engineers at the Sarnia plant come from the Standard Oil or the Imperial Oil company and are not interested in making rubber from agricultural products?

Mr. GARDINER: All I would say in that regard is that at the present time everyone realizes that we have to make rubber no matter what it costs; we are in the midst of a war. Everyone knows that the reason why Germany made synthetic rubber before the war started was that she could not find rubber towards the end of the last war, and it made no difference what the cost might be to her to produce it at home. She did produce it in her own country. We find ourselves in the middle of this war without available supplies of rubber, and we have to produce rubber in Canada and the United States no matter what it costs. I hope that the members of this committee, who when addressing themselves to other questions think largely in terms of the Atlantic charter, are not thinking that when the war is over we shall produce any commodity that we can possibly produce irrespective of the cost. I am not one who advocates that policy. I do not think the government advocates it, and I doubt very much if the members of this house advocate it, that after the war we should produce rubber from wheat just because we can produce it, no matter what it may cost. We might be further ahead to trade wheat for rubber where the latter can be produced at a much lower cost than it could be produced here. I would not say that with the information before us we would get very far along that line in discussions at the present time, basing our discussions upon what was done in Germany before the war or what is being done in Canada or the United States since the war started. We must look forward to the time when we shall be at peace and realize that we shall be able to get some of these commodities elsewhere, particularly if we win the war. Under those circumstances we may do things in a way different from the method we are following now.

Mr. SLAGHT: Apropos of the questions which my hon. friend has asked, and in the absence of the minister of munitions, I may say that before Canada made her decision as to the Sarnia plant, I personally took an interest in the matter and had an interview with him, and I know that he engaged Doctor Speakman, who is head of the provincial national research bureau in Toronto, a very able chemical man—

Mr. GARDINER: He made this report.

Mr. SLAGHT: —and I had conferences with him before the Sarnia plant was actually set up. He went to Washington and conferred at some length with the authorities there on the subject of alcohol and the use of wheat as against the use of petroleum. There was a considerable difference of opinion among the experts in the United States, a good deal of controversy for some time, but I can assure hon. members that Canada investigated the subject thoroughly before the Sarnia plant was decided upon.

Mr. WRIGHT: I quite agree with the hon. member that the government did make a thorough investigation before establishing the plant, but there have been developments since that time. What most members here desire to see is some further investigation so that progress may be made in the development of alcohol from agricultural products, to show whether more can be done in production from that source than from petroleum. We should like to see the government continue experiments to ascertain whether alcohol cannot be made from agricultural products to better advantage than in 1941. I feel sure it can. All the experiments carried on at the present time tend to show that, and it is the desire of most members to have the government carry on these experiments, even though they have committed themselves to the present programme. They have no alternative to that programme since they committed themselves to it, but that is no reason for dropping present experiments.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no intention of dropping any present experiment.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is with some hesitation that I rise to speak on this matter, because I appreciate that in time of war it is not the popular thing to try to divert public thinking from the immediate necessities of war and the problems which they have created. But, having listened in at some of the conferences of the Empire Parliamentary Association and tried to look into the future, it seems to me that, in view of the adjustments which are being made by other countries, allied and anti-ally, western Canadian agriculture is likely to be faced with a serious problem so far as markets are concerned for what are now the natural products of the prairies.

It is not unknown that since the war began the British isles have increased their agricultural production from thirty-five per cent of their national needs to, now, seventy per cent of their national needs. What effect is that going to have on the potential post-war market for the great bulk of, shall we say, western Canada's agricultural production? Is it not a moot question whether Canada can hold the favourable position she now has so far as the British market is concerned? And if peradventure the European countries which during the war have increased their agricultural production should be inclined to continue to do so, what then? They have done this through force of necessity, taking advantage of scientific research and mass production methods; and I am greatly exercised and concerned as to what we in Canada—I am not selfish in this respect, because what applies to western Canada applies also to eastern Canada—are to do with our surplus agricultural products if we continue to produce wheat and as we have done during the war. It may be that we shall have to change, if not our methods, the products of our farms in the west. The war has taught the people of Alberta, at any rate, how to raise hogs advantageously and satisfactorily, and how to produce milk and cheese and butter in quantities such as were never before contemplated. If we are to maintain the agricultural population that we now have in western Canada, we must, I believe, do one of two things: either produce a finer quality of what we are now producing, and more economically than it is now produced, or discover other ways and means of using these products, or other products which can be grown on the soil and in the climate of western Canada.

The first words I uttered in this house come back to me. They were said on the minister's estimates. I put it to myself at that time, and I put it to the committee: what would a business man do under similar circumstances? If he had a surplus production problem in respect of his plant, he would do one of two things. Either he would call in merchandizing specialists to show him ways and means of creating a consumer demand for what he was producing, and thereby enable him to get rid of his surplus, or he would go out and get the best scientific brains and ability that money could buy in order to show him how he could economically change his factory facilities to the production of some other commodity which he could produce economically and which would find a market. That is the history of every successful industrial institution on the north American continent.

We have a surplus of wheat. I am not concerned about the possibility that that surplus will last very long. Once the war is over it will melt like the proverbial snowball. But I believe that two, three or four years after this war is over we shall be confronted with a surplus situation; and rather than depend on our ability to get rid of wheat as such, I should like to think that this country is employing the best scientific brains and ability available to find other products which can be economically produced in western Canada, or other means or uses for the products which are now produced in such enormous quantities. I believe that the answer is to be found in the brains and the test tubes of our young scientists. But having made it my business, in common with certain other western members to canvass the situation with the national research council—and these excellent gentlemen are doing a mighty fine work in that institution—I am impressed by this consideration: from the very fact that that institution is located here in the heart of industrial Canada, it is pressed more with the problems of industrial eastern Canada than with the urgency or the necessity of scientific research to find means of processing and making from our agricultural and other primary resources, new products and discovering or devising new uses for our agricultural and other natural products.

I hope that as a result of what has been said in the last few days under this particular item, the government—I have no doubt as to what the minister feels about it—will accede to the request of the agricultural representatives and see to it that, either under the Minister of Agriculture there are set up across this dominion laboratories manned by scientific men whose primary function shall be to discover new uses for our agricultural products, or else fresh emphasis shall be laid on that field of research with which our national research council is also charged. To my way of thinking the industrialists and manufacturers of eastern Canada, or of Canada as a whole if you will, are getting the benefit of the scientific brains and research work of the research council to a much greater extent than the primary producers. I do not say this has been to the detriment of those producers, but I do say the needs of industry are being over-emphasized as compared to the needs of our producers, who themselves individually are not impressed by the need for scientific research and study in the same way or to the same extent that the big manufacturing institutions of this dominion are.

I for one would be very much disappointed if something did not come out of this discussion which has been deliberately precipitated by thoughtful members of this house on both sides, who have no selfish motives or ideas but are trying to further the welfare of the country as a whole. At least that is my purpose, and I give the same credit to other hon. members who have spoken on this subject. Naturally I think of my own province, which is perhaps the only province in Canada which has a surplus of electrical energy, to say nothing of the coal and oil potentials with which to manufacture and process the natural products of the prairies. I look to the minister, as I am sure all agriculturists of western Canada look to him, as our champion, to find new ways and methods of using our products. I believe this will have to be done, and I think the answer will be found in the test tube and the scientifically trained men. I trust that never again will this item be the small, picayune thing it is now, in dollars and cents, having regard to the magnitude of the problem with which we are and shall be confronted in western Canada.

Mr. JAQUES: This question of surplus foods is no new thing; it is a very old question. Of course as the minister said—and I like to think of the Minister of Agriculture as having one of the hardest heads in Canada—if we look at this question from the point of view of the war, then we may take one attitude towards it; but if we take the long view as to what is to be our policy after the war is over, then that is something entirely different.

Hon. members have said that the great problem is to set scientists at work to find the most scientific methods of spoiling as much human food as possible—that is what it amounts to—because we have or will have a so-called surplus. In the interval between the two wars there were millions of people all over the world who were underfed and undernourished. I believe it has been stated by the chief government medical health officer in Great Britain that over fifty per cent of the people of that country are underfed and undernourished, and I am perfectly certain that Britain's record is not worse than that of any other country. I have not the figures; I cannot carry them in my head anyway, but I believe the situation is even worse in the United States. Yet when people were literally starving, farmers actually were being paid not to raise hogs, to plough up their potatoes, and to do all sorts of absurd things. Now we are told that the solution is in the test tube. Well, as I have said before in this house, I have had a lifetime of experience in farming. I speak as a farmer, for the farmer, and I do not take a back seat to anyone in this house on that count. I have also had some preliminary training in chemistry, so that I know when people are talking a little science and when they are talking bunk. Most of it to-day is bunk; there is plenty of that.

What have we to do? I am not speaking of the war; for that is a totally different thing. War is hell, and just now we have to endure hell. I am speaking of the long-range programme, after the war is over, when surely we shall have a happier world, which means a better-fed world. Why has it been possible in the past to raise the food but impossible to distribute it? It is not a question of production but one of distribution, and in that connection you have to look not in the test tubes but in the ledgers of the bankers. Personally I have very little faith in so-called scientists; I think we need more hard-headed, common, horse sense. I think first the world has to learn—and people may laugh at it if they wish, but it is the truth and the war proves it—that under orthodox economics or orthodox finance or orthodox business or the orthodox price system it is impossible for the producer to distribute enough money to sell what he produces. That is why the consumer must be financed directly. If that were done the farmer would have no fear of not finding a ready market for everything he could produce. It is not a question of demand; the demand is there. It stands to reason that if people are underfed and undernourished, there is a demand for food; but the fact is that this demand is not effective because there is not enough money distributed to make it effective. So that rather than confess to ourselves that we have been blind in the past; rather than admit any mistakes on our part, the only solution we can see is to put our so-called scientists to work in order to spoil food and render it unfit for human consumption. If I might make a plea on behalf of the farmer—and I speak at present for the farmers as well as the rest of the people of Canada—it would be that we would put some real economists to work on the problem, so that in the end we could make financially possible anything that is physically possible. We have done that during the war, and the only reason we have done it is that in war time the canons of sound finance are silenced by the cannons of the enemy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I associate myself with both hon. members who have preceded me? It is true that we ought to have the west industrialized a great deal more than it is, and in that respect I agree entirely with the hon. member for Calgary West. I believe it is also true that we are going to deal more in the field of plastics and synthetic products than we have in the past.

I was shown through a plant on one occasion, and it was clearly demonstrated to me that first-class houses could be made out of potatoes. That was one example of the extent to which potatoes can be processed. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin would feel that that was a wastage of good food. I will grant that if there is a demand for that food, it should be used as food. But it is conceivable that our productive capacity in relation to potatoes will increase, and potatoes might go bad for lack of buyers. Under such circumstances it would surely be better to process them into something valuable.

I wish to ask the minister one or two questions with respect to the production of alcohol from wheat. What has been the experience in the manufacture of alcohol from durum wheat, or have any experiments been made?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be about the same. There might be a slight difference, but not much.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What has been the experience in connection with sixth grade wheat?

Mr. GARDINER: The closer it gets to 60 cents a bushel, in other words the lower the grade of the wheat used, the greater the possibility of producing alcohol from it. But what I said at the beginning is still true, that western farmers are not anxious to sell even low-grade wheat at less than 60 cents a bushel.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What has been done with respect to potatoes? Have any experiments been made to discover whether rubber can be made from alcohol extracted from potatoes?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there have been experiments in that connection. The cost is very much lower with potatoes than it is with wheat.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In the course of our travels in England in 1941 we visited the university at Cambridge, and I was much impressed by some things I was told there. We were told about certain kinds of potatoes which were very large and misshapen, but it looked as though they might be developed to the point where the yield would be enormous. If we could find a type of potato from which we could extract alcohol under suitable conditions, we might be able to manufacture rubber from potatoes, and do it successfully.

Mr. GARDINER: The different costs might be best illustrated by giving a complete record of the crops investigated. This is a table showing the return per acre from different crops:

	Return per acre
Artichokes	$70 73
Sugar beets	75 73
Potatoes	48 78
Corn	36 42
Barley	30 10
Wheat	17 51

It will be noted that the returns per acre range from $75.73 for sugar beets down to $17.51 for wheat. I believe these figures indicate the commodities from which alcohol might best be produced.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What yield per acre of potatoes was used in making this computation?

Mr. GARDINER: A yield of 250 bushels.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a small yield.

Mr. KNOWLES: A few moments ago the minister drew a distinction between war-time and post-war conditions, and I believe that distinction was well taken. He suggested that the conditions under which we produce commodities while a war is on are different economically from the conditions prevailing in peace time, and that it is quite possible that there are some things we are producing to-day which in peace time could not be produced economically. I suggest however he should realize that hon. members, and particularly those of us from western Canada who are pressing this matter, have both war-time and post-war periods in mind. We feel that a contribution to the war may be made by a further investigation into the possibilities of producing synthetic rubber from alcohol derived from grain, and, as other hon. members have pointed out, such as the hon. member for Calgary West, we are deeply concerned about the position of western agriculture, and agriculture throughout Canada, after the war is over. We are anxious that there shall be no depressing of the standard of living of our people on the farms. We feel it will not be possible to induce people to go back to the farms, if I may use that expression, from war industry and the armed services, simply by making speeches about the glories of farm life and all that sort of thing. We have to revolutionize agriculture and the possibility of its providing a really good life for the people who participate in it. I agree with the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, that there is much that needs to be done to turn the requirements of the people for food into effective economic demand. But it appears that even after we have done that, there will still be surpluses of agricultural products; and unless we find other uses for them the people who will suffer will be the farmers. We urge that the Minister of Agriculture and his department approach aggressively this matter of further investigation.

Mr. GRAHAM: I shall take only a few moments to add my voice particularly to what was said by the hon. members for Calgary West and Moose Jaw in connection with the support to be given to research work for the improvement of agricultural products and their use for industrial purposes. I am in complete accord with the statements made by those two hon. members and some others.

There is only one point I should like to make quite clear, and that is that the success of such a project would not be in the interests of agriculture only; industry would benefit very greatly if such a programme produced the results expected. Natural resources such as petroleum, coal and iron are wasting deposits on the north American continent. We see that illustrated particularly in respect of iron, petroleum and many other products of the mines. It would provide a useful contribution in the way of supply for our industrialists if out of the earth an annual crop could be produced to furnish substitutes for materials that are now gradually used up.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw mentioned a figure of $500,000. I think he set that figure arbitrarily in order to give point to his argument that research work should be carried on in this connection. I do not think any particular amount is involved in the expression of opinion that is coming from this committee. The men of the national research council who have given some thought to this matter point out that any research work of value is a matter of careful planning over a number of years. Research work involves a great number of failures, the elimination of what cannot be done in order to find out what can be done. I think this committee would feel like urging upon the minister that an amount be provided from the treasury, whether it be under $500,000 or over $500,000, in order that these objectives may be reached. I hope the minister will give effect to the almost unanimous opinion of this committee that such a plan should be put into operation, and that the scientists of this country be given an opportunity to contribute to our future welfare, as they have done to such a large degree in the past. A by-product, as it were, of this particular work, our young chemists and physicists would be kept in Canada. As a matter of course these men in the past have found employment in the United States, with tremendous loss to this country. These men would prove of inestimable value to us, and this work would give them an opportunity to serve Canada and improve Canadian standards of living.

13. Experimental farms service—Central experimental farm, $588,560.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to pay a tribute to the work done by the central experimental farm at Ottawa and to tell the minister that I thoroughly support this appropriation.

Mr. GRAYDON: I want to make the shortest speech delivered this afternoon, and to say that I endorse what the last speaker has said with respect to the central experimental farm.

Mr. HANSELL: Is the minister satisfied that there is no duplication of work by the federal experimental farms and the provincial farms? I do not see how it could be avoided, but I suppose the minister will say that there is no duplication. Money would be saved by avoiding such duplication in the future.

Mr. GARDINER: This matter has been gone into on a number of occasions. The last time it was reviewed was when the Sirois report was presented. Speaking from memory, I think it will be found that both provincial and federal authorities agreed that there was very little overlapping in agricultural work as between the provinces and the dominion. The provinces are entrusted with the task of looking after education, whether it is with regard to agriculture or anything else. I believe each province has an agricultural college, or at least each section of Canada has an agricultural college, and each institution has a certain amount of land that can be used for experimental purposes. That is true of Guelph, and the Ontario government also have a fruit experimental station in another part of the province. It is true also of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and the other provinces, with the possible exception of Prince Edward Island. The work carried on at these colleges does not overlap the work of the federal experimental farms.

Last year we closed the farm at Rosthern because it was considered to be too close to the agricultural college at Saskatoon, which caused a certain amount of overlapping. In addition there are committees upon which representatives of the provincial governments and the federal government meet to consider any work that may be required in a province with which the federal government is associated. Any work that is done provincially is linked up with our work in order to cut down as much as possible the duplication which might occur in carrying on the activities of a country where there is a federated form of government.

Mr. HANSELL: Experimental work is carried on by the colleges.

Mr. GARDINER: Only along certain specialized lines. The Ontario government has an experimental station in the middle of the fruit belt, but it does not duplicate any of our work.

Mr. HANSELL: Is the experimental farm at Lacombe, Alberta, still operated?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms service.

14. Branch farms and stations and illustration stations, $1,292,769.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give us some information as to the work being carried on by these branch farms and illustration stations, particularly those located in the west? There is considerable need for the production of seeds, such as flax, milkweed and sunflower. Also considerable work has been done by the federal government in connection with early maturing and rust-resistant grains. I should like to know to what extent the stations in the west are being used.

Mr. GARDINER: Since the war began the work in connection with the production of seeds has been greatly increased. This has been necessary in order to supplement our supplies of seeds which were formerly produced in European countries. I should like to refer to a matter mentioned by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle a moment ago. I have in my hand printed copies of the information which was given to the agriculture and colonization committee at I think eleven different sittings and which deals with the very matters we are dealing with to-day. There are more than eleven; there are eleven already in print, and information with regard to most of the questions that are being asked here is contained in those reports, just as it will be in Hansard if we carry on this discussion. I should like to remind members that early in the session we had under discussion the question whether it would not be a good thing to have much of the discussion that takes place in the house, very often in the last two or three days of the session, carried on in a committee of the house where the officials could be present and give all the information that was required, and so my department was used as a guinea pig this session. We have submitted the Department of Agriculture to the committee, and for some weeks now we have been going through the process of permitting the members to go to that committee and get all the information they required from the officials. That information is all down in very good form, and any member can get these reports and read them.

When the committee began to sit, the question came up whether we were going to discuss in the house again all the matters that might be discussed in committee. There might be reasons for such a rule, but I said no; and I am not speaking now with the intention of debarring discussion, but simply to point out to the members who have not had the privilege of sitting in the agriculture committee that anywhere from twenty to sixty members of the house have been attending a considerable number of the sittings of that committee and gathering all this information. When the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were submitted to the committee I was hoping it would have the result of permitting hon. members to go to the committee to bring out the information they wanted, which would appear in reports from day to day just as Harsard comes out, and that the information so furnished would answer most of the questions that are now being asked, and that discussion here might be confined to policy.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister have an index to these volumes eventually produced? That would greatly assist in finding what you want.

Mr. GARDINER: The volumes are not indexed individually, and I understand that an index will be prepared to all the reports. Here is one report; the front page shows that there was a general introduction by myself and Doctor Barton—we were called before the committee first; then Mr. Singleton spoke on dairying, Mr. Shaw on production, Mr. Presant on feeds, Mr. Brown on poultry, Mr. Pearsall on meats, and so forth.

Mr. STIRLING: The names of the witnesses who appeared before the committee are given, but if we are to use the reports as an informative work it would greatly assist if a subject index could be supplied when the reports are completed.

Mr. GARDINER: I think that will be done.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister referred to the fact that I had earlier in this session suggested the very thing he has just mentioned. The information that is asked for will for the most part be found in the committee's reports. I just wish now to ask a question with respect to substations. Are they being used any more than they have been in the past, and if so to what extent? I know one or two in particular in my own district that are doing very little. I think they could be used to a much greater extent than they have been in the past.

Mr. GARDINER: Experimental work is being carried on at the farms right across Canada. The Indian Head farm, I imagine, would not be suitable for carrying on experiments in connection with some garden seeds and other seeds that might be produced on some of our farms elsewhere. We are using the farm at Indian Head to carry on experiments in connection with grains of all kinds, particularly to secure rust-resistant varieties of the different types of grain. We are using the Swift Current farm not only for the purpose of assisting in connection with irrigation but also to investigate the use of farm machinery. It is being utilized to the greatest extent possible during this war period. We are attempting to grow certain seeds at our British Columbia farms, and the same is true of the fruit areas both in the maritime provinces and in Ontario. All our experimental work in connection with dehydration, for example, was carried on in a very limited way before the war at our farms such as that at Summerland in British Columbia and Kentville in Nova Scotia, and the men who were engaged in that work are the men who are heading the whole activities now in connection with dehydration as related to the war.

So far as the commodities we were speaking of a few moments ago are concerned, we are producing plants which will give rubber. That is being done on our farms in different parts of Canada. The same is true of soya beans. We are experimenting with soya beans right across the country, to see if we can develop varieties which can be produced successfully in the colder regions of Canada as compared with the warmer sections of the United States. That kind of work is going on constantly.

Mr. WRIGHT: We have in northeastern Saskatchewan an area which is engaged in the growing of alfalfa seed, and in that area we have three illustration stations. They are doing good work now, but their work is limited. The growing of alfalfa seed is something about which we have still a lot to learn. I think more scientific study should be given to it. These illustration stations are doing the best they can, but there is no scientist at the station. The stations are operated by the farmer on his own farm, under supervision. I do not think that is doing all that is necessary in the producing of that seed. No one seems to have any definite idea or knowledge as to why in some years the seed will set and in some years it will not. I urge upon the minister that definite experimental work be done in this connection. I do not know just what work is being carried on at Saskatchewan university, but I imagine something has been done there. Some work should be done in the area directly affected; the minister should establish more stations in this area to deal with this problem, which is of vital interest to the people there. It is seventy-five per cent of their living, and something which kept them off relief in the last two or three years prior to the war. The growing of alfalfa seed is a subject on which there is much to be learned. I should like the minister to comment on that.

Mr. GARDINER: There are three stations located in the area where the alfalfa is being grown. The difficulty in the growing of alfalfa has as much to do with soils as with anything else. It has been found that there are sometimes deficiencies in the soil and experiments are being made to determine what may be lacking which the alfalfa plant requires. Then the farmers will be advised what they ought to do to give the soil what it requires. It is true that scientists are not at the stations. I am sure the hon. member for Melfort will agree with me that they do not lend themselves to a set-up sufficiently large to provide for having scientists stationed there, but we have laboratories located at Saskatoon, which is the educational centre in agricultural matters in the province of Saskatchewan. There is located there a forage crop laboratory. As to the seed not setting and questions of that kind, they are referred to our representative, Doctor White, at Saskatoon, who operates that particular laboratory. The other matters having to do with soil are referred to the soil section. We work in association with the college of agriculture in Saskatoon in relation to soils, and scientific men are located at these centres. We have men who do scientific work in connection with soils at Swift Current. We do not put them at stations located here and there in the different provinces but put them at central points; the results of experiments carried on at the experimental stations are referred to these men and they conduct scientific investigations and give scientific advice on these matters.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is there any man who makes a study of this particular question?

Mr. GARDINER: Doctor White has an assistant who does nothing other than alfalfa work.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: What success has been attained in the experiment of raising sugar beet seed? Our sugar supply has been cut off by the war, and this is an important question.

Mr. GARDINER: The work in connection with sugar beet seed is done at the central experimental farm here and at Summerland, British Columbia. These are two farms at which we find it advisable to carry on that work. We have met with marked success. The beet seed can be grown successfully here.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There should not be any difficulty in raising enough beet seed to supply Canadian needs.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand we could raise all the seed here necessary to supply the requirements in Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And at a reasonable cost to meet competition with German seed?

Mr. GARDINER: The costs are fairly comparable with those in the United States, but they are not as low as on the European continent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We in this group are very much in favour of the plan the minister has outlined for getting materials relating to his estimates before members of the committee on agriculture and other committees as well. I suggest that if some announcement is made beforehand as to what particular items will be presented to the committees members may be able to have some representative from their group ask questions with regard to a particular item when it is impossible for them to attend. Personally I can say for this group that we are so busy with committees that often the overlapping makes it impossible for us to attend all committees. I think the move is one in the right direction, and it should be extended to other departments to prevent the disgraceful spectacle which we have sometimes when a few members sitting here pass millions of dollars in the dying days of the session, without any questions being asked. Has anything been presented to the committee with regard to the development of the sheep industry from the point of view of mutton and wool?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; that has been done.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What item is that?

Mr. GARDINER: It is not in print yet. Mr. Hamer gave information in that regard, but it has not yet been printed. It will be in print within a day or two.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does that give figures with regard to the sheep population of Canada, and is there anything in connection with the development of wool and mutton sheep suitable to western Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: I doubt very much whether there are detailed figures with regard to production, but I have some figures for production of farm products. That would come better under the item of production services, which comes next.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think we should encourage the development of the sheep industry in western Canada. Some of the finest wool produced in Australia is produced in the cooler areas. There is diversification of agriculture there, and an opportunity for diversification would be beneficial to our western farmers.

Another matter which has been quite evident in recent months is the growing of potatoes. Western Canada grew a very large crop last year, and some farmers were offering people potatoes if they would come and dig them up. They have not been able to take advantage of the markets on account of the quality of the potatoes. They have a scab on them, and proper attention has not been given to growing the right kind. Is anything being done in the way of a programme of education to induce the people in that area to go into the commercial growing of potatoes and shipping them? There is a problem out there, but if proper steps were taken to develop this line it would make western Canada one of the most productive fields. What has been done by the experimental farms in that direction?

Mr. GARDINER: As regards sheep, we have been carrying on work similar to that done in Australia. We have taken some of their breeds, crossed them with some of our own and produced a Canadian type of sheep which we are now attempting to encourage people to make use of in building up flocks in this country. That work has been going on for some time. It is purely a western activity.

So far as potatoes are concerned, I have hesitated to raise the question here, but it seems that I cannot avoid it when a question is put to me direct. I understand that about 100 carloads of potatoes were shipped from Saskatchewan to the east during this period of comparative shortage, but I have been somewhat concerned ever since the war started about directing people to do things during war time, which they can do to advantage but which would probably put completely out of business someone else who is just as much concerned about making a living as people in other sections of the country. It is well known that the Idaho potato is regarded as one of the best varieties produced on the American continent. Idaho runs up to our boundary line, and we have vast areas in the west on which I am satisfied we could produce potatoes. There are 500,000 odd acres of potatoes grown in Canada. We have 300,000 farmers in the west, and if we got each one to grow an acre of potatoes for sale it would play havoc with the potato market in Canada if we had to market the product here. I do not know that our people in the west are particularly anxious to get into the growing of potatoes. If we guaranteed a price we could get them to grow so many potatoes next year that we could supply the continent, provided the price were high enough. Whether that is a good thing to do in the midst of a war, and when people do want to buy greater quantities of everything than before, is something about which I have some doubts. If we grow more potatoes in the west I hope it will be because we have a suitable market for them. We would go into potatoes and find in a year or two's time that not only were we not able to make anything ourselves, but we might have put everybody else out who could not grow anything other than potatoes to advantage.

I do not know how many hon. members of the committee have been in the section of New Brunswick where they grow potatoes. I was there last year and on one previous occasion. While we in western Canada talk about wheat, in so far as that more limited area is concerned they grow potatoes just as we grow wheat. I was astonished upon my first trip at the size of the area taken up with the growing of potatoes. While it is not large as compared with the level plains of western Canada, in that whole area the people depend absolutely on potatoes for their existence. I would hesitate even in war time to start inducing people in other sections where they can make a reasonable living to go into potatoes on a basis which, if not before the war is over, certainly when the war is over, would not help themselves and would injure other people. We have been trying to keep these things as nearly as possible on a sound basis.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I believe that the dehydrating plants in the east have used up practically all their supplies and that at the present time there is a shortage. If the minister reads the report of the food conference which was recently held in the United States he will find that one of the things they said there is that there has never been enough food in the world to satisfy the nutritional and health standards of the people of the world. We are going to need the production, and if present plans regarding freedom from want and fear are to be carried out we shall need a considerable production in those areas of western Canada where production is possible. I understand that the dehydration of potatoes to make potato starch is not a particularly complicated process, and it would provide a food which will be needed very seriously within the next three or four years, not only in this country but throughout the world.

Mr. GRAHAM: In normal times where do the New Brunswick potatoes find their market?

Mr. GARDINER: Some of them, in Canada, some of them in the West Indies; some in South America, as seed; some of them in the United States. The hon. member who sits across from me—he is not in his place at the moment—markets a lot of them and could tell the hon. member for Swift Current more about them than I can. At the present time they are marketed all over the particular areas I have mentioned.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is there any duty on the entry into the United States of those potatoes?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. FAIR: May the price of wool be discussed under this item?

Mr. GARDINER: It does not come under this item; it comes under marketing or under the war appropriation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the grade of these western potatoes which the minister said were shipped from the west to the east?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that they were mostly "A".

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They were all graded before they were shipped?

Mr. GARDINER: I think they were; yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And they came up to standard?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, they would, yes. They would have to, before they would be graded those grades.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It has been stated that this country could grow enough potatoes to supply the whole continent if we utilized our land. According to to-night's Journal the duty on potatoes has been slashed from ten to fifteen per cent. How will that affect the production of potatoes this year?

Mr. GARDINER: I would rather leave the discussion of this matter until we come to marketing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Inasmuch as the question has been raised of the findings of the food conference at Hot Springs and the statement has been given us that they found that the world has never produced enough food, I think it would be fitting that we point out that the committee did not take the trouble to mention in their report that the world never has been able to buy all the food which the world has produced. In my judgment that is an exceedingly important point. The committee's report went at the whole problem entirely from the wrong end; it failed to discover why the world has not been able to buy the production which the world has had.

Item agreed to.

Production service.

16. Health of animals—administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $1,818,000.

Mr. SENN: I should like to get a little information from the minister on this particular item. It seems that under these items there are three different plans for the eradication of tuberculosis. The first is what is known as the accredited herd plan; second, there is the supervised herd plan; and, third, is the restricted area plan. All of these in the past have been very successful and I think they have done a good work. From time to time arrangements are made for the restricted area plan, particularly. I should like to know how many accredited herds there are in the process of being worked out; how many restricted areas are ready for work; how many of them are going to be done this year; how many supervised herds have made application, and how many are to be carried through this year.

While I am on my feet I should like to know whether there is any intention on the part of the department to change the valuation of these cattle for compensation purposes. The valuations are always very low, and I understand that there is a limit on the valuation that can be paid for any pure bred animal, or any animal in a restricted area. Everybody knows that the price of cattle has increased greatly. Pure bred cattle, particularly dairy cattle, are selling at comparatively high prices to-day, and it does not seem reasonable that the same price should be paid as compensation to-day as was paid when cattle were very much lower in price. Has any consideration been given to changing the amount of the valuation that is allowed, and, if so, what is it the intention of the department to do?

Mr. GARDINER: The present rate of compensation for cattle which are slaughtered on account of tuberculosis is two-thirds of $60 for grades and two-thirds of $150 for pure breds. We have had requests for increases in those amounts since the price of cattle went up, but I would recall that it is not very long since the price of cattle was pretty well down at the bottom, and we did not reduce the amounts during that period of time.

Mr. SENN: Oh, no; but may I remind the minister that the limits were not always paid. The valuation was made, I understand, by the veterinary who tested the cattle.

Mr. GARDINER: That is true.

Mr. SENN: And they do not always pay the limit.

Mr. GARDINER: That is true; it is a maximum that is set. We have not considered raising the maximum, up to the present. We have not thought it wise to do so, largely by reason of the war conditions under which we are operating.

Mr. SENN: In one breath the minister says they have not considered it, and in the next he says they do not think it is wise. What does he mean?

Mr. GARDINER: We have not considered doing it, I should say. We have considered it; we have had letters from time to time asking us to do it, and we have written back to each organization or person stating that we have not decided to take this action, so that up to date there has been no increase, and I have no reason for saying that there will be.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister give the list of restricted areas that are in contemplation for this year? I ask the question because two or three years ago my own district voted in favour of it, but it has never been carried out there. I should like to know the names of the particular areas, at least in Ontario.

Mr. GARDINER: Under the accredited herd plan we have 8,275 fully accredited herds; we have 211 herds in the process of accreditation, and twenty-four herds for which accreditation has been asked but which have not been checked as yet. That makes a total of 8,510 herds. Under the supervised herd plan we have 38,492 herds tested and 2,639 herds awaiting test, making a total of 41,131. I think the other question had to do with the restricted areas?

Mr. SENN: In Ontario, the areas in process of being accredited, or where that is in contemplation.

Mr. GARDINER: In eastern Ontario the cattle tested for the first time numbered 77,631; the total tests made numbered 128,805; the reactors numbered 302, and there were 306 reactors slaughtered. I do not know just how we could have only 302 reactors and 306 slaughtered, but I suppose the other four were carried over from the previous year. Compensation awarded amounted to $9,989; that is for eastern Ontario. I have the figures for the Belleville district, the Toronto district—

Mr. SENN: That must be re-tests; that cannot be the original tests, surely.

Mr. GARDINER: Some would be re-tests; unless the original tests were made this year they would not be the originals. This is the statement for this year. For the Belleville district, which limits it to a more restricted area, the number of herds under supervision totalled 1,927. The number of cattle under supervision was 23,178; the cattle tested for the first time this year numbered 13,189; the tests made numbered 23,475, and there were ninety-four reactors, all of which were slaughtered at a cost of $2,096. That is a very low figure.

Mr. PERLEY: That is for Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER: That is just the Belleville district.

Mr. SENN: I think the minister missed the real point of my question. There are certain areas which are accredited from year to year, and there are certain other areas which are awaiting to be accredited, and that was the information I wanted to get.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member means the restricted districts?

Mr. SENN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the certified districts in Ontario, with the dates of expiration: Brant, July 1, 1945; Carleton township, September 1, 1945; Frontenac, April 1, 1946; Kenora district, December 1, 1945; Manitoulin island, May 1, 1944; Prescott, March 1, 1949; Rainy River district, October 1, 1943; Russell, April 1, 1949; St. Joseph island, December 1, 1947; Temiskaming, December 1, 1945.

Mr. SENN: Are there any to be commenced this year?

Mr. GARDINER: I have those which have been accepted but not yet tested; I think this is the group the hon. member wants: Hastings county, Haldimand county, Lennox-Addington, Huron, Bruce, Haliburton, Oxford, Perth, Wellington, Middlesex and Elgin.

Mr. SENN: Is the department contemplating starting any of those this year?

Mr. GARDINER: There is only one we have definitely decided to go on with this year, namely Wellington.

Mr. QUELCH: I live in one of these tuberculosis-free areas in Alberta, and when that district first came under the scheme it was understood that a very much larger area was to be included. I understand, however, that owing to the war this work has had to be stopped. Unfortunately this is what is happening. A large number of untested stock are being brought into the district every year, and I was wondering what action is being taken by the government to check that practice. I know it is happening right along, and I know a great many people are doing it innocently, but apparently no check is being made. They ship a truckload of stock from Calgary; the stock are fed in the district, and some are kept there. I am afraid that the next time a check is made a large number of stock will be found that have not been tested.

Mr. GARDINER: There may be persons living in that vicinity who allow untested cattle to come into the area, but I happen to live in one of those areas myself, and I have cattle both in the west and in Ontario. My cattle in the east are not in a restricted area, and I am not able to ship even my own cattle to the western area unless I have them tested before sending them. Somebody sees that I must do this, and I think that is generally true.

Mr. QUELCH: It has happened in that province. For instance, the boundary line is just a few miles south of my home. I attended an auction sale one day, and farmers were buying stock and bringing it to my district. There is nothing to stop them.

Mr. GARDINER: The present position is that if I bring an animal into my herd in the restricted area, and that animal is not tested, I am pretty well faced with the necessity of having my whole herd inspected before I can keep those cattle. I just do not do that. I have run into that experience once or twice, where I have gone out into a restricted area to buy a bull, for example. I never bring that bull and put him on my farm until he is tested, because if I did I would be up against the possibility of having the whole herd polluted, and I would have to have them all tested.

Mr. QUELCH: Would it not be wise to remind the people once in a while that they are in a T.B. area, and that they have no right to bring stock in? I do not think it is done wilfully; perhaps they just forget.

Mr. PERLEY: Is there a general increase in the restricted area in the west, or what is being done along that line? Further, what has been done about community pastures which have been established? Do the officials insist that all animals coming into those pastures be tested, or do they allow them in without?

Mr. GARDINER: In answer to the hon. member's first question, I think if we had the money to conduct the tests, and the men to conduct them, we could have had nearly all Canada as a restricted area at this time. That is, that would be the case if we were to take into consideration what the public want us to do. We have applications from all parts of Canada, and they come in, in as great or perhaps greater numbers from the west than from any other part. Since the war started we have been holding down our expenditures for this purpose. In the first place, we have been setting aside enough money to complete the inspection, and then re-inspect to be sure that the district is pretty well relieved of T.B. cattle. In addition to that, we have the condition that two or three counties may already be in, or two or three municipalities, and there would be a natural land division—a river, a lake or something of that kind forming the boundary—which would render a municipality part of that natural group, and where cattle would naturally move, as has been indicated by the hon. member for Acadia. We have attempted to overcome that situation by getting all that area in as soon as possible, and we have been carrying on tests in areas of that kind, even since we have been short of the cash required to do it to the extent we would desire to do it.

In addition to that, we are taking into consideration all of the requests made to us from different parts of Canada, and we are having those lined up so that we may deal with them as soon as we have the funds. The work is going on as rapidly as possible.

Mr. PERLEY: And what about my other question, with respect to pasture?

Mr. GARDINER: We have the cattle in the pastures checked for T.B.

Mr. PERLEY: Has it been found that T.B. has developed in any of the pastures? I ask that, because there are large numbers of stock in those pastures.

Mr. GARDINER: I have no information of that kind in mind. We will come to another item in a few moments which deals with the pastures, and I shall give the information the hon. member requires. However, I would remind the committee that when we did market some thousands of cattle in 1937, from all the drought areas of the three western provinces, we tested them and found only a very small percentage of cattle were afflicted with T.B.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister said a moment ago that there were more applications from western Canada for the establishment of restricted areas than from other parts of Canada. Do I understand that to mean that the health of animals is not as good in western Canada as it is in other parts? I have been under the impression that the health of western animals was better than that of those in other parts of Canada.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask another question, one which may have been answered while I was out of the house. When I returned a few moments ago the minister was replying to the hon. member for Haldimand in connection with compensation allowed. Was that question asked?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Has there been any increase in the allowance? It will be realized that animals are worth much more now.

Mr. GARDINER: No; there has been no increase. I said when answering the hon. member for Haldimand that we had not intended making any increase.

In reply to the first question of the hon. member, may I point out that the first anti-T.B. area was at Carman, Manitoba. The second was just in the bow of the Qu'Appelle river and Long lake. When the late Mr. Motherwell was Minister of Agriculture he introduced the idea. The first one was established at Carman, and the second at the point I have indicated. In other words, one of the reasons why the policy has been accepted to such an extent in that section is that that is where it was first introduced. On the other hand, until more recently Alberta did not come under it. I believe that was owing to a certain extent to the view held by certain ranchers in that area during the earlier period in which this policy operated. Recently, however, Alberta has come in. In fact, that province came in since I became Minister of Agriculture.

So that it is not a matter of where T.B. was most prevalent. As a matter of fact, if it were left to the people themselves I believe the place which would come in last would probably be the place where they had some fear as to the number of cattle which would have to be slaughtered. Generally speaking, however, this is being accepted throughout Canada. I believe the maritime provinces are covered now to a greater extent than any other part of Canada.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What part of Nova Scotia is now in a restricted area? Does it cover the entire province, or just the mainland?

Mr. GARDINER: I think all of Nova Scotia, with the exception of Cape Breton, now is a restricted area.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is there a shortage of veterinaries in the department? In my constituency I find that there is only one veterinary and that he must cover five or six counties outside of the ones I represent. It is almost impossible to get the services of a veterinary to give a certificate, in the event of a farmer wishing to sell some of his stock.

Mr. GARDINER: On account of the scarcity of veterinaries?

Mr. HATFIELD: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: That is a difficulty right across Canada. I do not know just what can be done to overcome it.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is there any relief in sight?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand another man is being sent there to assist.

Mr. WEIR: A moment ago the minister referred to the first accredited area in Canada. Might I tell him that he could have gone farther and said that the first T.B. area established in the British empire was established in the Carman area, when three municipalities were first brought in under these regulations.

May I say to the hon. member for Acadia who has said that he does not see how these areas are supervised to keep out untested stock from other areas, that a review of the experience in the area in which I have lived since this work was undertaken discloses that strict provision is made against moving live stock which has not been tested into that area. No railway company or licensed trucker will take stock out of a stockyard and bring it into those areas without first advising the officials that it is being brought in. There might have been some transgression in respect of border-line stock sold at auction sales, or cattle running at large. But that is about all; and that is one of the reasons why the Department of Agriculture has since attempted to establish natural boundaries, so that there might not be this transgression back and forth.

I should like to refer to another matter, which came up in the agriculture committee this morning—Bang's disease. Several representations have been made of recent date to the minister urging that more work be done in connection with this disease which is causing considerable damage to certain herds in the country. It may cause greater loss to the individual than even bovine tuberculosis, and yet no provision is made for compensation. I have in mind two or three herds which, on account of their being afflicted with this disease, have proved almost a complete loss as far as usefulness and production are concerned. This is one branch of animal diseases which I feel should receive additional consideration. Its prevalence seems to be increasing, and something in a national way should be undertaken in an attempt to control it. Who stands the expense of the blood-tests for Bang's disease which must be made of cattle exported to the United States for breeding purposes?

Mr. GARDINER: We bear the cost of inspecting cattle for Bang's which are going to the United States. This disease has been under consideration since long before I came to Ottawa, and it is still under consideration by the department. One of the first delegations I received after I came east was of live stock breeders from the eastern provinces, particularly Ontario, who had strong objections to the restrictions which were being imposed in connection with Bang's disease. The government had been advised to brand the diseased animal with a large "B", where everyone could see it. This would act as a warning to people that the animal had Bang's disease. As I say, strong objection was taken to this, and we compromised to the extent of branding only with a small "B" in the ear. Anyone could see this if they were looking for it, but it would not stare him in the face when he walked into a stable.

I cite this to indicate the objections that were made; these were similar to those made in the early days in connection with the tests for tuberculosis. A great many people who owned and bred cattle took strong exception to the tuberculosis test at one time, but this has been overcome by the people learning to appreciate what it means. The same thing happened in connection with Bang's; the people would not accept the tests as being final. Some contended that the disease could be cured, and we have been conducting investigations and making surveys with regard to the matter. We keep a check on cattle that are moving. We have to test cattle which enter the United States for breeding purposes, and they are not permitted to enter until a certificate has been issued. I have no doubt that in due course a method of dealing with this disease will be established, somewhat similar to that used in connection with tuberculosis. I doubt very much, however, if we would be able to embark on a policy of that kind during the war period.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How many restricted areas are there in British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: There is the Fraser river valley and the settled section of Vancouver island.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have heard a little boasting by some hon. members from Manitoba. I want to use this information in connection with the item covering marketing. I take it that British Columbia is the only province where all the fluid milk is obtained from tuberculosis-free districts; is that correct?

Mr. GARDINER: The Fraser river valley provided a natural area for this work, which was carried out in the early days of the policy. The ministers in the early days, whether they belonged to this party or to the party opposite when they were in power, took the view that any area which was naturally bounded by obstructions over which cattle would not readily go should be completely tested as soon as possible. The Fraser river valley proved an ideal place for that to be done, and it was done.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not quarrelling with that; I am entirely in favour of it. However, for the purposes of item 22 I wanted to know whether British Columbia was the only province in which all fluid milk was supplied from T.B. free areas. That is my information and I should like to know if it is correct.

Mr. GARDINER: New Brunswick is entirely covered by anti-tuberculosis areas; Nova Scotia is except Cape Breton, and Prince Edward Island has also been tested.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia; the four neglected parts of Canada are the four that are entirely covered.

Mr. PERLEY: Is not a system of pasteurization just as good?

Mr. SENN: Some time ago, I believe a year or two, the minister stated that vaccine for the treatment of Bang's disease could not be imported from the United States or from any other place. Has any change been made in that regulation? Has the test for Bang's disease been found to be accurate? I understand that the United States will accept a certificate of cleanliness when the cattle are being shipped, without having a further test made.

Mr. GARDINER: My information is that the test has been found to be trustworthy and accurate. Most of the states in the United States accept a certificate from our veterinarians that cattle have been tested and found free of Bang's. A vaccine was used some time ago in some of the states which was believed to provide a cure. However, we were a little loath to admit it into Canada until we were fairly sure that it would have successful results. The vaccine is now being admitted into Canada. I understand that the calves are inoculated with the vaccine at an early age and are rendered immune from the disease. A sufficiently long time has gone by and a sufficient number have been treated to satisfy the department that there is a real advantage in using the vaccine.

Mr. McCANN: I would point out to the minister that there is a close relationship between diseases of animals and some that are transmitted from animals to human beings. The treatment of Bang's disease, for example, has been discussed here this afternoon. Bang's disease transmits to human beings what is known as undulant fever, for which no successful treatment has yet been discovered. Almost invariably that disease in human beings has a fatal termination. So that I would urge upon the minister that every possible avenue be explored for the eradication of Bang's disease and that animals having the disease be treated or slaughtered, for the protection of human life.

With reference to those animals which are treated for tuberculosis, the Department of Agriculture, in its health of animals branch, does not in my opinion go far enough. It should promote the pasteurization of milk throughout the whole country, even if it is necessary to subsidize certain provinces. The results of pasteurization in those provinces where it is in effect, particularly in Ontario, have been outstanding, especially with reference to bovine tuberculosis and milk-borne diseases transmitted to human beings such as typhoid and typhus fevers. I suggest to the minister that in view of this knowledge the department is not going far enough, and that it should encourage pasteurization in all the provinces, even going to the extent of subsidizing those provinces which are not in a position to carry it into effect.

I wish to say a word in reference to an epidemic that occurred two or three years ago among horses, particularly in Manitoba. There was an epidemic there of encephalitis and poliomyelitis. These diseases were transmitted from horses to human beings. That was clearly established by investigations made by the department of health of Manitoba, with the valuable assistance of the Rockefeller Institute of New York. It was shown that there was a direct relationship between the disease which affected horses in certain areas of that province and the disease transferred to human beings. Are investigations being conducted with a view to eradicating these diseases and to develop other preventive measures for the protection of the health of human beings from animal diseases?

Mr. GARDINER: The question with regard to Bang's disease is one with which this department is directly concerned. If we were to slaughter animals because they have Bang's disease, in order to prevent not only the spread of the disease among animals but its transmission to human beings, we would, of course, take the same action we have taken in regard to T.B. cattle. But when you go beyond that to the question of pasteurizing milk and that kind of thing, you are dealing with something which comes under the departments of health, federal and provincial. As was just stated by the hon. member, the investigations that were made and the work that was done in Manitoba were done under the department of health. Methods taken to render milk immune from the germs that cause disease in human beings and all diseases of that kind are a matter for the department of health.

Mr. McCANN: Is there any degree of cooperation between the federal department of health and the Department of Agriculture in that matter?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; there would be in the matter of the destruction of animals and that kind of thing. Our veterinarians are cooperating with the officials in the provinces, health or otherwise, in tracing up any disease in animals which might be transmitted to human beings.

Mr. SENN: There is another contagious disease in animals which is known as shipping fever, the ravages of which in Ontario, and I have no doubt in other parts of the country, are very serious indeed. What action is being taken by the department to combat this disease which causes so much loss to cattle shippers and producers in Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER: Nothing has been done which has so far proved effective. I understand it is a difficult disease to control.

Mr. SENN: It is.

Mr. GARDINER: It is developed to some extent through the conditions under which the animals are shipped. We have not yet found a way of dealing with it successfully.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not know what the regulations are, but we had a veterinarian in Chilliwack, British Columbia, last year, who was not allowed enough gasoline to go out and treat cattle that were diseased. He said he could not get the gasoline. The farmers asked him what they should do, and the answer was that they should bring their cattle into the veterinarian's office.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is any compensation paid in connection with Bangs disease?

Mr. GARDINER: No, none.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is there any outbreak of encephalitis among horses this year in western Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There are ninety-nine inspectors at $1,600. Would the minister give their distribution by provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: There are not enough of them; that is the main point.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They must be distributed by provinces. Could that information be put on the record?

Mr. GARDINER: They are distributed across the country, but it is difficult to get enough to do the work. Yes; the information can be given.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: The item before the committee is No. 17, compensation for animals slaughtered, $375,468.

18. Live stock and poultry, $719,992.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is the estimated increase in poultry in Canada this year?

Mr. GERSHAW: While the minister is looking up that information I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that a large portion of southern Alberta is again suffering from a severe drought. Not only have growing crops failed to make progress, but even the grass is not growing because of the continued lack of rain. The live stock in that area are suffering very seriously. I realize that with a war on, and with scarcity of material and labour, it is almost impossible to provide water for a large portion of that land, but at the same time the people are faced with great distress, and some temporary measures will need to be taken in order to enable them to keep going and to produce the stock which is so badly required at the present time. There are very few community pastures available there, and yet these people must move the stock to some place where they can secure feed. I urge that something be done by some government very soon to relieve the urgent situation that has developed in the last few weeks.

Mr. GARDINER: First, with regard to the increase in poultry, the figure I have here shows an increase of thirty-eight per cent in the number of chicks produced in 1942 as compared with 1941. Practically everything else in the way of increase depends on that one item.

In reply to what has been said by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, the department has a policy under which that matter is taken care of, provided the province acts in accordance with the plan which is laid out, but that comes under prairie farm rehabilitation. However, the policy in short is this. We agree to put in reserve pastures and community pastures, provided land is made available with which to do it. We have large pastures in Saskatchewan, fifty odd, some taking in 100,000 acres, and reserve pastures on which we do not permit cattle to go until there is a year such as is described now to the south of Medicine Hat. If we had large pastures there, we could of course assist by having the cattle turned into them, but the only other way of dealing with the matter is to have action taken first by the province and representations made to us that some consideration be given.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the minister explain the item of $134,000 in connection with bonuses and premiums? Where is that money spent? Is the grant to fairs being continued this year?

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member that we are on item 18. That question would come under item 20.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The item before the committee is for live stock and poultry, and in this connection there are bonuses and premiums amounting to $134,000 odd.

Mr. GARDINER: That is for boys' and girls' clubs, stallion clubs, board clubs and others of that type.

Mr. SENN: Is the sire bonus policy being continued, the policy of purchasing sires, or helping farmers who need them?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. We are continuing the policy as it was.

Mr. SENN: In both cattle and sheep?

Mr. GARDINER: Cattle, sheep and swine.

19. Plant products—Seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides, and fungicides control, including grant of $18,900 to Canadian Seed Growers Association, $535,785.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister make a statement with regard to the projects in hand for furnishing seed of different kinds, particularly vegetable seeds, and that sort of thing? We have come to the point where we cannot purchase them from Europe. Perhaps he will give a short outline of what is being done in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: That is really under the war appropriation which we shall come to later on.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Where is the centre of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association? Is this an annual grant, or must they carry on certain work? If so, what is the nature of that work?

Mr. GARDINER: The centre of operations is here in the department and funds are provided for the work they are required to do.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There are associations in the provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Seed growers' associations?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is it distributed by provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: It is not spent by provinces. The expenditure is centralized from here.

Mr. HATFIELD: This does not include the subsidy on fertilizers?

Mr. GARDINER: That is under war appropriation.

Mr. SENN: Yes, but I understand that certain subsidies are granted for fertilizers under this item. Would the minister give us an idea of how these are conducted?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand, not under this item. All of our fertilizer subsidies now are paid under the war appropriation. We shall come to that under the other estimates.

20. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $65,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Are the grants to the larger fairs being continued? Is the Toronto exhibition not closed up? They have taken over the exhibition grounds.

Mr. GARDINER: There are no grants paid at all either to class A or class B fairs, or to any fairs, except the building grants in respect of obligations incurred over the years. In the building programme, certain amounts were undertaken to be paid over a ten or twenty year period, so that we are obligated to pay these instalments as they come due.

Mr. PERLEY: There are no special grants?

Mr. GARDINER: No special grants.

Mr. CARDIFF: There are no grants paid to individual fairs throughout the provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: No; there are none now.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to have a few details about the Vancouver fair, in our province, following the reference to the Toronto one. The British Columbia security commission took over at a tremendous figure the industrial fair property which we had. I appreciate the fact that so much money is voted each year to pay for some buildings which have been built. My understanding is, although I may be wrong, that in their generosity the British Columbia security commission are looking after the Vancouver fair property, and I do not see why, if that money is being so paid, it could not be diverted to class B fairs. It does not seem reasonable to me, if we want to maintain our class of agricultural production in so far as live stock is concerned, that class B fairs should have to suffer. The federal government are still making exceptional grants for the buildings. I do not care what anybody says; the grants are for the Vancouver buildings. Tremendous sums were spent in changing the interior of the buildings, tearing out perfectly good construction and reconstructing these buildings for the Japanese. If that can be done, I wish to know why money cannot be provided for class B fairs. As I see it, we are paying the same money twice from the federal treasury in respect of these particular buildings.

Mr. GARDINER: The amounts of money in this item are: For the maritimes, $5,000; Quebec, about $15,000; Royal Winter Fair, $35,000; Vancouver, $10,000. That makes up the $65,000. Those are amounts for buildings. We entered into a contract with the exhibition board of Vancouver to spend a certain amount of money on buildings over a period of years. The amount to be paid is $10,000 a year;

$100,000 is to be paid over ten years, so that $10,000 is to be paid this year. There is not any way that we can get out of that obligation unless we say that we intend to go back on the contract we made. No grants are being paid to any association in British Columbia or anywhere else in Canada at present for the conducting of fairs; we are simply carrying out our obligations under a building contract which was entered into some years ago.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not suggesting that the government should repudiate responsibility for any payment. What I am suggesting is that if the federal treasury pays a sum far greater than $10,000 a year—

Mr. GARDINER: We do not.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am suggesting that if the federal treasury, not the minister's department, paid a sum far greater than $10,000 toward the building, the reconstructed building, surely some attempt should be made to offset one grant against the other. I should not be talking against a grant for my own province—British Columbia gets far too few grants—but I cannot see why the class B fairs are left out, particularly since in my own province there are only two class B fairs, namely, Chilliwack and Armstrong, and their grants are withheld, while we pay many times more than that under the Department of National Defence for a job to which I particularly object. Money has been squandered in British Columbia in removing perfectly good lumber, for which the taxpayers have to pay, and burning it on the grounds, in the process of converting these buildings into a Japanese mobilization camp.

Mr. GARDINER: There was not much lumber in that building.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Which building?

Mr. GARDINER: The building that this $10,000 is paid on.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think the minister knows enough about law to understand that the Vancouver exhibition association is incorporated, and you do not pay that money on any individual building.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes. We undertook to assist in building the last building which was built, some four or five years ago. As my hon. friend knows, it is a fireproof building, constructed largely with cement and steel; and this $10,000 is to pay one-tenth of the cost.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I did not say that. What I said, with all due deference to the minister, and I stand corrected if I am wrong, is that I understand that that money is not paid into a separate account of the Vancouver exhibition association, but into the general account. However, if the minister's explanation is correct, I stand corrected.

21. Grants to agricultural organizations, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $33,500.

Mr. PERLEY: What agricultural organizations are receiving grants?

Mr. GARDINER: The Canadian council of boys and girls club work, $5,000; advanced registry board, dairy pools, $4,500; live stock records, $18,000; advanced registry board for swine, $8,000.

Mr. SENN: I wish to know something about this boys and girls club work. Most of these boys and girls clubs are provincial in character and, in Ontario at least, receive grants from the provincial governments. Are these clubs and this council affiliated with provincial boys and girls club work, or are they separate entirely and do they take up a different class of work?

Mr. GARDINER: This is a coordinating body which covers all the boys and girls work that is being done throughout Canada. In reading the last item, having to do with advanced registry boards for swine, I should have said that the grant of $8,000 had been reduced to $6,000; it is $2,000 less.

Mr. SENN: Why? I thought they were doing a very important work. They are meeting quite regularly, I know, and if there is one thing more than anything else which I think needs boosting in Canada to-day, it is the quality of our hogs. I do not understand why the amount is reduced.

Mr. GARDINER: A certain feeding policy is carried on, and the amount of money obtained from that source enables us to reduce by $2,000 the amount to be voted this year. The amount spent will be as great.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service.

22. Marketing service administration, $101,314.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask a few questions under this item, because I am interested in this matter of marketing. I am sorry that Hansard does not show some of those who seem particularly anxious to rush through the agriculture estimates; I am sure it would be interesting reading for the farmers of Canada. Surely we can take a little time to discuss our main industry, when we can waste hours and hours and days and days talking isolationism and every other kind of ism. I was told this would be the proper item under which to bring up questions concerning marketing, and I am interested in how the department arrives at the amounts that are paid as subsidies on various agricultural products, particularly in connection with dairying.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry if I misled my hon. friend this afternoon, but all subsidies and payments of that kind come out of the amounts provided under the war appropriation act, and I hope we may get to those quite soon. I have not before me the figures in that connection.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was not going to ask the minister for any particular figures, but perhaps I might have the privilege under this item of saying a word or two in connection with subsidies, if I am in order.

Mr. GARDINER: It would be better under the other item, because this covers general marketing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right; I will talk about general marketing, and I am sure this will not be out of order. We were told by the minister to-day that in western Canada we could produce enough potatoes for the entire continent, with our climate and the suitability of our soil; I am speaking of western Canada in this case, not of British Columbia. I should like to ask the minister what will be the effect, on the sale of what potatoes we are able to produce, of the reduction of from ten to fifteen per cent in the tariff which was announced to-day and which, incidentally, was not announced in this house but was announced in the newspapers while the house was in session. Later on, I may ask definite questions in regard to subsidies, but surely the sale of dairy products comes under marketing administration. To-day we had a discussion on restricted areas, among other matters. It is my opinion, and I think the opinion of the dairymen of British Columbia, that you cannot possibly sell dairy products in a restricted area at the same prices as in an unrestricted area. Surely that is obvious, from the questions asked this afternoon by the hon. member for Haldimand in regard to the compensation paid when cattle are condemned and destroyed.

I am not particularly interested in the Department of Finance, for the very simple reason that I do not think they know anything at all about agriculture, but I have every confidence that the Department of Agriculture knows something about that subject. Under this item of marketing I think we are entitled to know how it is planned to market our dairy products, at prices which will permit us to continue to produce. This does not mean that I am asking for any definite figures as to the amounts of subsidies, but surely we are entitled to know how the officials of this department arrive at those subsidies. Do they take into consideration the cost of production and then add taxes, wages and other factors entering into it? Surely this department and the branch concerned with marketing must study these matters, and I should like the minister to give me some explanation of how these amounts are arrived at. I am not talking about the actual figures of ten cents a pound on this or four cents a pound on that, set by the wartime prices and trade board. What I am interested in learning is how the Department of Agriculture arrives at the figures in advising those who do fix the subsidies, whether they take into consideration the cost of production, the quality of the product and so on. I should be glad if the minister would give me a little explanation of that matter.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not had time to read the newspapers to-day, and I do not know who made the announcement to which my hon. friend refers. I do not know of any fifteen per cent reduction.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I never said anything about a fifteen per cent reduction; I said there had been a reduction in the tariff of from ten to fifteen per cent, according to to-day's Journal, on potatoes, cabbages, carrots and so on.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course that does not come under agriculture; it would come under national revenue, or some other department. No announcement has been made by this department in that regard. We are hoping that the potato acreage will be greatly increased. Our information is that it will be up from 505,000 acres to 526,000 acres, and of course as a department we are interested in production. We have attempted to bring about an increase in production. So far as these other matters are concerned, there is only one place where they can be properly discussed. I do not say that the officials of my department do not discuss them, but they come under the war appropriation items which I hope to reach in a short time. All the subsidies, increased prices and assistance of that kind, designed to make it possible for the farmer to continue to produce during war time, are made under the war appropriation, which we shall reach in due course.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Am I to understand that when a certain item comes up we shall be permitted to ask how these subsidies are arrived at? I want to repeat that I am not particularly concerned with the individual amounts. I am interested in learning who advises the wartime prices and trade board and how they arrive at their figures.

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend will wait until we reach the proper item we will discuss that. Everything under the wartime prices and trade board comes under the war appropriation. I have before me now the newspaper containing the announcement to which my hon. friend has referred. The article states that an order in council just passed has removed the ten per cent war exchange tax and the three per cent special excise tax, and that as a result fresh fruits and vegetables may cost Canadian housewives from ten to fifteen per cent less. That comes under the Department of Finance, not under this department.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is the minister's explanation, and I am bound to accept it.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not my explanation at all. It is a matter that does not concern this department, and I ask the Chairman to rule this discussion out of order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right. Am I out of order, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. GRANT: You are always out of order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Never mind anything from little Prince Edward Island; I will abide by what the Chair says.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must realize that he will have ample opportunity to discuss whatever he wishes under the proper item.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then I am out of order?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, at the present time.

Mr. HATFIELD: About five o'clock this afternoon I received a telephone message from Washington stating that there were 5,000 cars of potatoes on track in Philadelphia, New York and Boston at the close of business today, and asking me if I could open a starch factory in the state of Maine to process these potatoes. This is almost unbelievable, coming only a month after there was a shortage of potatoes all over America; but the potatoes of North Carolina and Virginia, which had a floor of $2.25 a hundred, went below that floor to-day, and these supplies were all turned over to the government, who do not know what to do with them. This amount represents more than a week's supply of potatoes for the country; yet in spite of that situation the wartime prices and trade board takes off the import tax on potatoes coming into Canada, just when the Ontario new crop, the Quebec new crop and the British Columbia new crop are coming on our market. Something should be done about this. More than that, a subsidy is being paid on imported potatoes to-day. I can get those potatoes for fifty cents a bag, delivered in Canada. What is to be done about it? This is a serious situation. These potatoes have to be consumed. They are new potatoes, and there are 5,000 cars on tracks at close of business to-day.

Mr. GARDINER: Again I say that might more properly be discussed when the minister who has charge of the wartime prices and trade board is before the committee. I presume he will be in committee either on Monday or Tuesday. This is not a matter to which I can reply at the present time. I have neither the authority nor the information with which to reply.

Mr. HATFIELD: This is a serious situation, with the new crop in Canada coming on the market.

Mr. GARDINER: But I would say it was a very serious situation just a week or two ago on the part of my hon. friends when we had thirty carloads on this side they wanted to get over to the United States. Those thirty carloads went to the United States. We cannot have these things all one way. If we are to have arrangements to have potatoes go to the United States when we are short in Canada, probably somebody has to do something to get some back here.

Mr. HATFIELD: I am not saying we should not let them come into Canada, but I do not think we should be paying a subsidy when this situation existed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question about the director of marketing service, who is paid a salary of $8,500. I believe I am in order when I ask a question at this point. What are the duties of that gentleman—if he has anything to do—in connection with advising on subsidies.

Mr. GARDINER: The director of marketing is a member of the wartime prices and trade board, and no doubt he has something to do with advising with regard to these matters. But if my hon. friend will wait until we reach that item we could discuss it without wasting time and controversy.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I resent the minister's suggestion that there would be any waste of time and controversy. I have been trying to get this information for about two weeks from the committee on agriculture. I made the motion originally in that committee, and my motion has not been presented to the house in the report of the committee. Why that was done, I do not know, maybe because it was said by some hon. members that if it were discussed in committee it would prevent discussion in the house. This is the motion passed by the committee on agriculture:

> That its order of reference be enlarged to cover and inquire into dairying, poultry and all other lines of farm produce including live stock and the processing and marketing of all farm products.

I have no objection to the director of marketing service receiving a salary of $8,500, if we have our stuff marketed. But I do wish to know and I have been trying to find out in committee, who advises with respect to subsidies. I am not blaming the Department of Agriculture at all; I just want to know who does this work. I do not wish to be told that someone presumes some other person has something to do with it. If someone else is connected with it, I want to know who it is. I am asking that direct question. Is the director of marketing service consulted by the wartime prices and trade board when they arrive at subsidies on farm products?

Mr. GARDINER: Subsidies put on by the Department of Agriculture are put on by the Department of Agriculture. We have a food board which is responsible for putting on subsidies, and the director of marketing service is a member of that board. We ask the advice of our own officials who are concerned. Subsidies are put on as a result of information gathered right across Canada. However, this matter can be discussed more properly when we are discussing the war appropriation estimates.

Mr. PERLEY: I find the details of the expenditures for marketing service at page 66 of the estimates. It will be noted that the second item, namely that for agricultural commissioner, carries no amount. Would the minister explain that omission? Then, the amount for temporary assistance was considerably increased. Perhaps he would give us some information with respect to that.

Would the minister inform the committee what cooperation there is, if indeed there is in his opinion proper cooperation, between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture in the marketing of agricultural products? I think we are all agreed that this item having to do with marketing service is one of the most important in the estimates. When we look over the headings under this item we see that most of these expenditures pertain to domestic marketing. I believe all are agreed that every possible service coming within the power of the minister should be employed in marketing our agricultural products abroad, particularly with a view to what may take place in the period of reconstruction following the war. What cooperation is there between these two departments in marketing our agricultural products?

Mr. GARDINER: Members of the committee will recall that about two years ago Doctor Allan, who was our agricultural commissioner, lost his life crossing from this country to Great Britain. The ship on which he was travelling was sunk. Last year there was no amount for the agricultural commissioner item. We now have appointed Mr. Robertson, who went to Great Britain recently. He has taken the position of agricultural commissioner.

Then, there are statutory increases and cost-of-living bonus to account for the increased amount for temporary assistance.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What are the wartime functions of this service? It will be realized that we are somewhat restricted in our marketing. This must be purely a matter of administration. What function does this group perform in war time?

Mr. GARDINER: The item of marketing covers the economic branch, for example, which has been in existence for some years, and which makes all inquiries in connection with costs of operations of farms in districts throughout Canada. It also compiles much of the data with regard to the costs we have to make use of when making decisions in the department.

In connection with dairy products and marketing of dairy products there are the activities in connection with grading of butter, cheese and everything of that kind which must be continued in war time just as it is in peace time. Of course there is a greater production of those commodities in war time than in peace time. Then, with respect to the subsidy on cold storage I would say that we require more cold storage on account of increased production of pork products, and increases in the production of cheese, butter and fruit. The whole farm production requires more cold storage than ever, so that that activity is greater than it was before.

With regard to fruit, vegetables, maple products and honey, including a grant of $5,000 to the Canadian Horticultural Council, I would point out that that item is one which must be carried on just the same in war time as it is in peace time.

In connection with the marketing of live stock and live stock products, again we must consider grading of hogs, and all matters of that nature.

Coming to the marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made, I would say that that is an amount voted from year to year, and one which is spent in our general publicity on activities in connection with marketing generally.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I notice that an agricultural economist is provided for in this vote. Has he arrived at a margin of cost in producing a bushel of wheat at a parity price?

Mr. GARDINER: That would depend upon whose farm it was on. Could the hon. member designate the farm?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could they not give it for an average farm? With all this advice available, I think something should be done toward finding out—the farmers of western Canada have not been able to market their crops; their wheat bins are filled with about a billion bushels more than they had last winter—if it might not be good economy to give these farmers a little advance or loan on what they are holding. Last year in the United States they paid an advance of $1.14 a bushel, and this year they are going to pay $1.22. Compare that with what farmers are getting out in the west. It seems to me that this staff of economists are scarcely earning their money. This marketing service requires a vote of $1,834,000, and there are one or two things the farmers in the west would like to know.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister mind answering my question as to the cooperation that exists between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture in connection with securing markets abroad for our products?

Mr. GARDINER: As my hon. friend well knows, at the present time there is very little opportunity to market any commodities in the countries with which we usually traded. The agreements that are made with Great Britain for stated amounts of farm products are made by the Department of Agriculture with the British government through the food ministry. It is impossible for the Department of Trade and Commerce to carry on any activities on the continent, so that there is no necessity for cooperation in that direction between the two departments. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has visited most of the countries in South America, and we have trade representatives in most of those countries. Those trade representatives do everything possible to assist in the marketing of any farm products that can be exported there.

Mr. PERLEY: Recently a food conference was held at Hot Springs, Virginia. When may we expect to have a report of what took place there?

Mr. GARDINER: That would be under external affairs. The Prime Minister has made a general report and has said that he will be prepared to say more when his estimates are brought down.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can the minister give us some idea whether the quality of our bacon being exported to Great Britain is being kept up to the standards which prevailed in prewar days and in the early period of the war? I realize, of course, that this may not be the time to be considering this particular matter, but I imagine that the question of maintaining our standards in the post-war period is under advisement by the minister. When the war draws to a close the Canadian farmer will be seeking to maintain his position in the British market, and the quality of our bacon which has been on the breakfast tables of Great Britain will be a factor which should not be lost sight of. I would condition my remarks upon this one consideration: this is not the main thing in which Canada and Britain are interested at the moment; at best it can only be a collateral consideration. We must see that the people in Britain are fed, and the question of whether our market after the war will be maintained is a second or tertiary consideration.

Mr. GARDINER: The question of hog grading would be a proper matter to discuss at this time. The agreements will come up later. There has been a tendency to lower the standard of the bacon going to Britain. We have been increasing the weights in an attempt to get more bacon, and the packing plants find it difficult to get the practised cutters they require to handle the amount of bacon which is passing through. We have had two suggestions made to us: first, that as soon as possible we should get down to lower weights and, second, that bacon should be sent over better trimmed and with fewer slashes. These things would tend to improve the quality.

Mr. GRAYDON: Generally speaking, our grades are not quite as high as they were?

Mr. GARDINER: Generally speaking, they would not be high enough to compete with the bacon Denmark was sending over before the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: Our first consideration must be getting foodstuffs across.

Mr. SENN: I should like to say something on this matter, but I will reserve my remarks about the return of the British market until the war appropriation measure is before the committee. In 1938 a cooperative marketing act was passed, and I understand that some agreements were made under its provisions. How many cooperative organizations took advantage of this act.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the number of agreements we had at the beginning of the war was somewhere around twenty, but the fact that we have so many controls makes it difficult for some of them to operate. Of all those that have operated since the act was brought in, there has not been a loss to be assumed by the government. As the hon. member for Haldimand knows, under the act an advance is made in order that all the product that they have may be sold over a certain period. Final payment is made later on when the full returns come into the company. Our guarantees have been in the neighbourhood of sixty per cent of the market price of the commodity for the preceding three years.

Mr. SENN: That is the provision of the act.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; we made it possible for them to finance at the bank and we guarantee the account. The result has been that we have taken no losses. The companies have come along in due course and asked for the permission of the government to pay out whatever additional moneys they have, and they have been paying out regularly. We have a number of companies that are still functioning.

Mr. SENN: Companies or cooperative societies?

Mr. GARDINER: They are cooperative associations. There is the Growers' Cooperative Association of Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, a registered seed organization; the Manitoba Cooperative Honey Producers Limited, of Winnipeg, Manitoba; the Western Canada Fur Pool Limited, of Winnipeg, Manitoba; the Ontario Fur Farmers Cooperative, Limited, of Toronto; the British Columbia Mink Breeders' Association, and the Quebec Fur Breeders' Cooperative Limited, of Quebec. The first one having to do with seed is what is generally known as the Alfalfa Association. Those are the ones operating at present.

Mr. SENN: Just five of them?

Mr. GARDINER: Six.

Mr. PERLEY: I refer the minister to page 119 of the last report of the Department of Agriculture, where I find this:

> Six agreements were approved by the governor in council under the Agricultural Products Cooperative Marketing Act, 1939, as amended, during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942. No products were marketed under one of these agreements.

Which agreement would that be?

Mr. GARDINER: One of the fur agreements. It is the company with head office at Winnipeg.

Mr. DECHENE: I do not wish to delay the passage of this item, but I should like to bring before the committee a matter which can be discussed on this item, or perhaps on a subsequent item. I wish to bring to the attention of the committee, the minister and the government information I have recently received from my part of the country indicating the state of mind of our farmers relating to marketing which I believe should receive our attention now instead of waiting to deal with it until after the war.

I agree with the leader of the opposition that our main objective is to supply food for our armed forces and for our allies. Hon. members will note, first, that the province of Alberta is now leading all Canada in the production of hogs, having passed the province of Ontario. Saskatchewan and Manitoba are also making tremendous strides in the production of hogs and cattle.

Those who have lived for many years in the west remember well what happened after the last war. I am sorry to have to go back so far to make my point, but it will be remembered that in 1919, the year following the end of the war, we had out west one of the hardest, longest and most costly winters we ever had, not even barring last winter, and that was particularly true of the northern parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta. It will also be remembered that at that time prices of hogs and cattle, in common with prices for everything else during the last war, were inflated, as well as the prices of everything the farmers had to buy. An ordinary steer in the fall of 1919 would bring as high as $125.

That year, 1919, the winter set in early in the fall. I am mentioning this to show what the farmers have in mind, and I want to take back with me from this parliament and this government the assurance that the conditons which obtained at that time shall not be allowed to return. Winter set in on the 9th of October. It was twenty-five degrees below zero on the 10th of October. The weather broke a little in December, but snow remained on the ground until the latter part of April. If I remind the committee of the severity of that winter, it is to bring out the point that the cost of carrying our stock that winter was very great. I remember hay and fodder selling for as high as $75 a ton. The farmers in my part of the country drove from 75 to 150 miles to haul in poor feed at terrific prices; but in spite of all their efforts, by the time February came, the municipalities and the government had to come to their assistance. The provincial government backed the notes of the municipal districts; the municipal districts accepted the notes of the farmers, and feed was obtained, but the result was that owners of stock went heavily in debt.

When the summer of 1920 came, that stock which could have been sold in the fall of 1919 for as high as $175 a head for a beef cattle and $140 for an ordinary steer, hogs for $17 a hundred pounds, with other prices in comparison, had to be sold for almost nothing. The market broke; the bottom dropped out of the market, and many of these steers and this stock which would have brought good prices in the previous fall died or had to be shot. It was a lamentable situation for which I blame no one, but I want hon. gentlemen to bear it in mind so that they will understand what is in the farmer's mind as to conditions that may obtain after this war unless something is done to prevent this. At that time cows went for $30 and hogs for $2.50 a hundred pounds. It was the most terrific crash in the west, not even barring that in 1931 and 1932. That is when most of our farmers went broke, through no fault of their own. They were not to blame for it, but somebody was to blame. The governments of this country and of the rest of the world were to blame for not being prepared to absorb the deflation which they must have known was bound to come after prices had risen so high. That is what I wish to bring before the committee.

I do not often speak in this house, and on this occasion I want to pay a tribute to one whom I consider to be the best Minister of Agriculture this country has ever had. We have had first-class men as ministers of agriculture, but I think our own "Jimmie Gardiner", as we call him in the west, is the best of them all. From his knowledge of agriculture, his knowledge of the soil and of marketing conditions, his courage and ability, we are fortunate that in this crisis we have a man of his courage and ability to take charge of this great department. Those of us who have attended the sittings of the agriculture committee have come to realize his great ability, and the efficiency of the men with whom he has surrounded himself. Some of them were perhaps in the department before he was; I do not know; but one thing I will vouch for is that in every branch of his department, poultry, live stock, seed, farm administration, every official of the Department of Agriculture who appeared before us was competent in his field, and we heard and learned much. I wish to compliment these men upon the magnificent work they are doing. Canada is being extremely well served by the officials of the Department of Agriculture during this war.

What will be the situation after the war? I for one feel there is no danger. But the farmers are not satisfied with a letter from me or from anyone else. The French say "chat échaudé craint l'eau froide,"—"the scalded cat is afraid of cold water". The terrific beating we took after the last war will never be forgotten by the present generation, and it is of no use telling the farmers that to-day we have very able men in charge of public affairs, men such as Churchill and Roosevelt, who framed the Atlantic charter to provide that there shall be freedom of marketing in this world after the war. The men we have in Canada, our Prime Minister, our Minister of Agriculture, and other ministers, are to me a guarantee that the condition that obtained after the last war will not obtain at the conclusion of the present hostilities. Unfortunately, however, we shall have to give the farmers some greater assurance than that. Recently I wrote a letter to the people in my constituency of Athabaska drawing their attention to the meeting that had been held at Hot Springs in which forty-four nations took part, along the lines of the Atlantic charter, for exactly the purpose that I have mentioned, namely, that provision will be made for the flow of goods after the war, for the distribution of foodstuffs, so that where there is a surplus in any country it will find its way to some other country that is in need of such goods. I hope it will be possible for the minister to arrange for a longer contract for hogs with Great Britain. Whether it is possible I do not know, but I wish it could be extended for three years at least, because I think we should be in a position to assure our farmers and live stock men that there will be stability for that length of time.

I would remind the committee that to-day the west is the greatest producer of live stock, not barring Ontario, which for many years was the banner province in this line. I repeat, that some assurance will have to be given our farmers, if we cannot make a long-term contract for bacon, for instance, that they will be allowed gradually to cut down on their vast production, so that, if we are overproducing, the shock of that overproduction will be absorbed gradually from year to year.

Let me remind the business men in this house who are personally not interested in agriculture, as I am, and as so many other hon. members here are, that there is a tremendous investment in live stock in Canada. An hon. member from one of our cities was in conversation with me the other day on this matter, and he remarked to me that anyone can look after hogs. I was telling him of the shortage in help for looking after hogs and cattle in Canada, and that was the remark he made. What a mistaken idea! To-day, in order to raise hogs successfully, the kind of hogs which we want to sell to Britain, it takes first-class ability. If I may use the term, it is a profession. It is not something that is merely haphazard. It does not consist in taking a swillpail and throwing it at the hogs. Not at all; the work of feeding live stock and hogs is a matter for experts, and it entails a vast amount of labour. Therefore I appeal to the house and the country to do whatever is necessary to help our farmers before the war is over. The war may end suddenly, and the farmers are afraid of the consequences.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Did the hon. member say the farmers were afraid the war would end suddenly?

Mr. DECHENE: I said, of the conditions that may result after the war is over. I have a great deal of admiration for my hon. friends over there, the friends of the poor man, at least to hear them talk. But any time anybody rises to make an appeal for these very people whom they are supposed to represent, or to propound some theory which will give them some relief, these hon. gentlemen laugh. They laugh as long as you do not propose some crack-pot theory for the farmers of Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba, whereby people are supposed to live for nothing, to get something out of the air, or some kind of policy which will permit them to keep on howling without working. They howl at Ontario and Quebec; they howl at everyone; they laugh when someone propounds something that is in the interests of the farming community of the west.

However, to come back to what I was saying, the farmers believe that the war may end suddenly, and if the war does end suddenly they are afraid that their markets will be gone. A survey recently taken by a farming association in the northern part of Alberta brought surprising results. Seven farmers out of ten expressed the view that if the war were to end suddenly, or to end sooner than we anticipate, or whenever it does end, they will go out of the hog or cattle business immediately. That is a mistaken idea. I realize that we must do something to prevent that. As has been explained, we have recaptured the British market. We have supplied them with the goods which they require during the war, and so we have taken back the market which we lost after the last war on account of the quality of the goods which this country allowed to be shipped to that market. It took us twenty years to restore the Englishman's trust in us in that regard. We may have fooled the people there once, but you do not fool them for very long. We fooled them once after the last war, and the government of that day was to blame for allowing to be shipped to the English market bacon of a quality that was not fit for use. As I say, we have won that market back, and we have won it with first-class goods. That is why to-day we have a rigid inspection and are keeping to the grades we have established. This is something that is of interest to those who desire to work for a living and who do not dream of an imaginary world in which everything will come to everybody without doing anything to get it. I am sure that what I am saying will appeal to those who realize that the world will be the sort of world we make by hard labour and strict attention to business.

The farmers are looking to the government for one thing and one thing only, namely, a guarantee that this market will be kept intact for them; and if, as a result of conditions that may obtain in the world, it is necessary for us to reduce our herds of live stock, I trust that this will be done in an orderly manner so as to avoid any market crash, because there are very large investments which the farmers have made in this great business. Remember that Alberta has but a small percentage of the number of farmers in Ontario, and when you come to such a province and have to market more hogs than the great province of Ontario, you will realize the extent of the work which those men have to do. You will realize that the men and women, the girls and boys are all helping in this business. They are willing to work overtime. They are not afraid of labour. They are satisfied with the price they are getting at present. They understand the conditions, but they want an assurance that their great investment in buildings and herds, in first-class animals, pure-bred stock, shall not be allowed to be destroyed for want of a policy.

I say, therefore, that it may become the duty of this parliament to take action to ensure this. I for one hope and believe that there will be orderly marketing after the war and that Britain, the United States, Canada and Russia and many other countries will enter into agreements for that orderly marketing of our surplus. I have no fears so far as our surplus wheat is concerned, but there may be some months, a season or two, when some disorganization is bound to happen. That being the case, I personally believe that we should have a floor under the price of our stock so that the farmer can carry on, knowing that he will have a fair return, until the four freedoms have been established and world markets have been opened to him, so that he can sell his hogs and other live stock for the things needed at home. It may take a year or two. No one imagines that the affairs of the world will be settled in twenty-four hours after the war. No one imagines that the new order is something in the form of a blueprint to be laid on the table so that one can point to it and say to the people, "There is your road, follow it." Long negotiations may take place, and during that time there will be need of some stability.

I hope that at some time in the next twelve months we shall wake up one fine morning and be called upon to wave our flags to celebrate the victory of the allied nations. When that time arrives, Mr. Chairman, I want to have this matter before the house, so that we shall act all together apart from any party politics, if it is necessary to support our farmers, who have made such sacrifices during this war, working the longest hours of anybody. Next after those men who are flying to-night over Germany and Italy, next to the sacrifices and the hardships endured by those boys and by those who are travelling the ocean to-night looking for the lurking beasts of prey under the waves, and all the others in all the armed forces, the men working harder are the farmers of this country, who, though short of help and in spite of great difficulties, are doing a tremendous job.

[Mr. Dechene.]

I realize that I have taken more of the committee's time than I wanted to, but I am speaking of something which I have much at heart and something which I know appeals to every hon. member, in appealing for this class which is doing so well for us during the war, the farmers, the farmers' boys, the farm women and girls. My remote region of Athabaska looks on the map as though it were outside the dominion. It is a vast riding. But let me tell you this, Mr. Chairman, last year Alberta led the dominion in shipments of hogs, and Athabaska was the second highest district in this respect in the province of Alberta, showing that it is in the lead in the dominion in the production of live stock. It is on behalf of these farmers I make my plea to our farmer Minister of Agriculture, a man whom I know has so deeply at heart the welfare of the people on the farms, whose heart is with the farmers of the west, where his own farm is situated, and where he has lived and worked so long on behalf of the agriculturists. To his department and to this committee I appeal. It may be necessary to place a floor under the price of our live stock, so that our farmers will be assured of a reasonable return and will be able to reduce their herds if this should be necessary, without suffering the terrific losses and hardships of 1919 to 1921.

23. Agricultural economics, $95,758.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What has been the relative increase or decrease in dairy production or dairy marketing by provinces in the past year?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure that I can give the exact figures by provinces all the way through for dairy products. I am informed the question has to do with the next item.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What about the marketing of dairy herds in the United States?

Mr. GARDINER: I will deal with that as soon as we reach the next item.

24. Dairy products, $379,289.

Mr. GARDINER: As to the question of dairy products, in round figures the May production in the past five years has been:

Year	Pounds
1943	32,000,000
1942	29,000,000
1941	33,000,000
1940	27,000,000
1939	28,000,000

It will be noted that in only one year of the five has the production in May been higher than it was in May of this year.

I will now give the production from January to May inclusive:

Year	Pounds
1943	95,000,000
1942	78,000,000
1941	86,000,000
1940	74,000,000
1939	73,000,000

In other words, the production from January to May has been higher this year than in any other of the five.

As to cheese, these are the figures for May for the past five years:

Year	Pounds
1943	14,312,000
1942	24,000,000
1941	16,000,000
1940	12,000,000
1939	11,000,000

Production from January to May inclusive:

Year	Pounds
1943	26,000,000
1942	52,000,000
1941	24,000,000
1940	24,000,000
1939	18,000,000

It will be noted that there was just one year when the production was greater than this year from the 1st of January down to May.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: A decrease of fifty per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: It is a decrease there; it was double the amount in that period of months last year, namely five months, as compared with five months this year. It must be remembered that we paid a special premium last year on cheese in the winter months in order to get a high production of cheese.

The exports also tell a story. I have not the figures for May, but those for April during the past five years are:

Year	Pounds
1943	6,524,000
1942	2,630,000
1941	991,000
1940	2,293,000
1939	377,000

Exports for four months, January to April inclusive, were:

Year	Pounds
1943	35,500,000
1942	29,800,000
1941	3,459,000
1939	3,491,000

One of the explanations of the very high export this year as compared with any other year is the amount which we carried over out of the big production of last year, so that while our production up to date is down, our exports are up as compared with last year.

That gives the story about as well as I can give it from the figures I have for the whole dominion.

Mr. LOCKHART: Has the minister the comparative butter stocks?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. But I have yet to give the milk part of the picture. For evaporated whole milk the average April production has been about 16,000,000 pounds for each of the last three years; in 1940 the amount was 12,000,000 pounds; and the year before 9,000,000 pounds, so that there has been an increase there, too.

As of the first of June butter stocks, excluding stocks in transit, have been as follows:

Year	Pounds
1943	18,591,000
1942	10,036,000
1941	18,515,000
1940	14,819,000
1939	14,274,000

The amount this year is the highest of the five years.

I come now to cheese in storage as of the same date.

Year	Pounds
1943	24,500,000
1942	44,600,000
1941	24,000,000
1940	22,000,000
1939	27,000,000

In two years during that period the storage was higher than this year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could we have a general statement as to dairy production in the western provinces to-day as compared with other provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a little difficult to make the comparisons of some of these. Some estimating has to be done, because deliveries are not always where the commodity is produced. Perhaps I had better give these figures as to the production of creamery butter in two tables, so that they may be compared:

	Pounds	Pounds
Prince Edward Island	2,644,674	3,523,256
Nova Scotia	6,540,837	6,668,813
New Brunswick	4,542,039	4,983,838
Quebec	76,266,197	72,979,679
Ontario	86,242,850	80,867,002
Manitoba	31,106,320	31,643,596
Saskatchewan	37,126,694	41,306,186
Alberta	35,316,143	36,985,909
British Columbia	6,062,442	5,346,543
	285,848,196	284,304,822

Production this year is up all along the line, and has increased particularly in the western provinces.

Mr. SENN: It is difficult to know just what questions to ask under this item, because the dairy products board, which comes under the war appropriation, also has something to do with dairying in a general way.

Mr. GARDINER: If it would suit the convenience of the committee, I think it would help if we would just pass these items and discuss the whole matter under the other items, because they do permit of very full discussion.

Mr. SENN: I am prepared to do that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not know whether the minister has the information available, but my understanding is that Fraser Valley is a deficiency area in regard to milk. Is that the case?

Mr. GARDINER: Taking in the city of Vancouver it is a deficiency area in dairy products.

25. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $148,098.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps the minister would turn with me to page 68 of the estimates, where the details of this item are given. I have before me a copy of sessional paper No. 231D, brought down on May 13 which, among other things, lists contracts signed under the Cold Storage Act during certain indicated periods, and there is the explanation given that these subsidies are paid to cold storage companies on a definite basis. The amount of the subsidy is not to exceed thirty per cent of the amount expended and approved in the construction and equipment of warehouses. That subsidy is payable in the following manner: fifteen per cent at the end of the year in which the warehouse is constructed; seven per cent at the end of the next year; four per cent at the end of the next year, and two per cent at the end of each of the two succeeding years. Just to take a case in point, in order to indicate what I am driving at, in this return I find that the Winnipeg Cold Storage Company is to receive a total of $171,334.66. If that is the total of the thirty per cent this company is to receive, then fifteen per cent would be $85,667.33. At page 68 of the estimates there are two amounts shown as being due the Winnipeg Cold Storage Company, and taking them together they make up the amount I have just mentioned, $85,667.33. If we go back to the basis of this payment, which is to be fifteen per cent in one year, seven per cent the next year and so on, according to the details at page 68, this firm, and a number of others, received the same amount in the year 1942-43 as they are to receive in the year 1943-44. That would look as though the total is to be paid in two years, whereas the Cold Storage Act provides that it shall take five years. Could the minister explain the apparent discrepancy?

Mr. GARDINER: The only explanation is that the money was not paid last year; that it was voted, but they had not completed the work and therefore it was not paid. The first payment amounts to fifteen per cent of the total cost, or fifty per cent of the amount we agreed to pay, and of course that payment is not made twice in two years. The payment is carried over, and that is obviously the situation here because this is almost exactly the amount shown below as not being spent last year.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are quite a number of others in the same list. It will be noted that the same figures appear in both columns, but the minister says the explanation is the same all the way through, as I understand it.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member will note that the fifth item from the top is only one-half as much this year as it was last year. Where the figures are the same, as in the case of Trenton, the same condition prevailed; we voted the money, but it was not spent. In the case of Trenton, their plan was passed some years ago, but they were in to see me just within the last two weeks talking about it again. Their plan was passed; we agreed to it, but they have not gone on with the work and we have not paid the money.

Mr. KNOWLES: No payment is made until the building is actually constructed?

Mr. GARDINER: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: Who uses these plants? Does the government store any goods in these cold storage warehouses?

Mr. GARDINER: No; they are public warehouses. One of the conditions under which we make the grant is that the plant must be open to the public, no matter who owns it, whether it is a cooperative or an individual. It must be open to the public, and the rates charged must be satisfactory to the department.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the department set the rates?

Mr. GARDINER: No; but we review them and see that they are satisfactory.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister state whether the subsidies under the cheese improvement acts come under this vote?

Mr. GARDINER: No; they come under the special items.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could the minister give any indication as to what profits are made by these companies? The point is that if the government pays thirty per cent of the cost of constructing these warehouses, the community as a whole has quite an interest in them.

Mr. GARDINER: The cold storage business is rather changeable and difficult in some ways. I would say that in all probability at the present time most of them are paying, because so many farm products are being moved which must be kept in cold storage. There are times, however, when they have losses, for the reason that there is not much produce moving. For example, let us take a plant put up to store fruit in cold storage. You may have a good year when everyone has fruit to store, and the plant will do very well. But in a year when the crop is poor, the plant is likely to lose money. I would not be in a position to say that the reason why some of these companies which have not spent their amount have not, in fact, spent it, is that they were not able to get sufficient money by any other means to go ahead and do the work they had intended to do. They have applied to us for thirty per cent. We have examined into the needs, and finally passed upon it, and said that we were prepared to pay it. If they were in a financial position where they could not get the remainder of the fund, it stands in that position until they can.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do all companies which propose to construct plants make application for this subsidy?

Mr. GARDINER: I would not say they all do. But they must make application before they start construction or, under the act, they are not entitled to payment. They make application to us. Our man examines into the whole condition surrounding the application, and if he agrees that the payment will be made they can proceed, with the understanding that they will get the money from the government. But some cold storages are, of course, built where they do not make application.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I believe the minister received a letter from George Little, under date of September 9, in which he said:

> The farmers around here petitioned to have the much needed storage built and now find it exploited largely by cheese and butter speculators hoping to profiteer by the present war.

I believe the minister has this letter. How does he allot space in a storage warehouse for butter, cheese, apples and commodities of that kind?

The letter continues:

> Not being able to procure storage means ruin to myself and many others. Should not the people's money which built this storage for fruit be demanded back, or cheese and butter be removed at once to provide storage for the fruit growers here?

How is this worked out? Does the minister allot so much space?

Mr. GARDINER: A plant was built at Trenton to accommodate fruit growers in that area, if I am not mistaken—and I am speaking from memory. However, they have always taken in butter and other products. In a year like last year there would not be as many apples in the Trenton district as they usually produce, and I am not sure that there will be this year. But in a season when apples were not filling the storage they would naturally put in butter and cheese. There might come a time like the present when, as the figures show, we have more butter than usual in storage. When the fruit producers come to the season when they want to put in their fruit, they might find a considerable proportion of the plant occupied by butter. That is probably the reason why they have been here discussing with us again the possibility of continuing with their construction. But that becomes a matter of the company, itself, financially. I am sure these companies do try to accommodate the public to the greatest possible extent. Sometimes they might find it difficult to take in a product.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): These subsidies have been going on for some years, have they not?

Mr. GARDINER: I imagine if a subsidy was paid on the plant in the beginning, that it was paid out long ago, because that plant has been up a long time. The application for the present subsidy was made four or five years ago. It has not been spent up to date. One reason is their difficulty in financing the remainder of it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would it not pay the government to help finance it, and to look after these buildings?

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid we would be building plants all across Canada. The reason for this act in the first place was that we were receiving applications from all parts of Canada to build cold storage accommodation. The government finally determined long before my time, and I believe before the time of most hon. members in the house, to assist in this way anyone who would leave his plant open to the public. Of course they can leave it open only until it is filled. Once it is filled they cannot take in any more. With that understanding, they have gone on with their programme ever since. This government, in turn, has continued the same policy.

Mr. CARDIFF: I see an item of $56,082.68 for one cold storage plant at Winnipeg. Apparently one plant is known as No. 1 and the other as No. 2.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the same thing. They made application on one occasion and intended to increase by a certain amount. Later on, they determined to increase by more, and came back to make that representation before proceeding. Now the two will be amalgamated into one. It is the same warehouse.

26. Fruit, vegetable and maple products and honey, including grant of $5,000 to Canadian Horticultural Council, $521,000.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is this the item under which I may ask my question? If not, then which one? I should like to talk about the contract for dehydrated vegetables.

Mr. GARDINER: That is a war appropriation item, too.

28. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $13,000, $25,000.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does this cover advertising?

Mr. GARDINER: Advertising is only a small part of it. It was a vote of $100,000 before the war, and a substantial part of it was advertising. Now only $4,000 or $5,000 of it is used for that purpose.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Now that there is a scarcity of canned products, I believe the minister's department should have up-to-date recipes for housewives, and that such recipes should be distributed throughout Canada. I mentioned last night the fact that the government should send out recipes for the preserving of fruit with as little sugar as possible. Housewives will have only a few pounds of sugar for canning purposes this year, and I am afraid a good many families will be pretty thin when spring comes round.

Mr. GARDINER: What the hon. member has suggested is exactly what the department does. We have recipes, and there is a greater demand for them this year than there has ever been. That point was brought to my mind when the committee was discussing sugar last night. One hon. member sent me a slip on which he had written, "Why do you not rise and produce your pamphlet which tells them how to can without sugar." We have a pamphlet which tells how certain vegetables and fruits can be canned satisfactorily without sugar, for a time. We are covering that point, and doing everything we can in that direction.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The point I make is that the average housewife does not know the department has those recipes.

Mr. GARDINER: It is announced over the radio, and in every weekly newspaper in Canada.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Many people in Canada never see a newspaper.

Mr. GARDINER: It is broadcast over the radio, too. I do not know what else we can do. We broadcast it by radio from day to day and we put it in every weekly newspaper, telling the people that this can be done. Then, we talk about it when we are out in the country.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The wartime prices and trade board send out folders and notices to householders. Why could the minister not enclose one of his instruction sheets in those folders?

Mr. GARDINER: I am a little bit afraid I would get into trouble with some of those economic experts who sometimes sit on our doorsteps and try to prevent us from publishing what we are now publishing.

Mr. HATFIELD: Does the department advertise to tell the people not to eat agricultural products such as butter and pork?

Mr. LOCKHART: Is any systematic advertising carried on in connection with frozen fruits and vegetables? There is much of this equipment used throughout the country and many people are asking for information about it. All I could get was a small pamphlet.

Mr. GARDINER: We have not been putting out information with regard to that, one reason being that it is quite an expensive piece of equipment. I presume that those who make this equipment are advertising it and having it used as much as possible.

29. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $2,000,000.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Is there any possibility of extending the areas which come under this act? While listening to the marvellous presentation made by Mr. George Spence before the committee on reconstruction, it occurred to me that there are other areas which might well be included in those covered by the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I am thinking particularly of the northern part of Saskatchewan. I realize that at present the act covers only prairie country and was originally intended to look after the moving of people from drouth areas. The northern bush country of Saskatchewan has suffered from drouth to some degree, and a number of settlers there were apparently hurriedly settled, in some instances on land which it is doubtful they will ever be able to make pay. The country is quite swampy, and I was wondering if many of these people could not be moved to other areas where better farming land would be available. At the present time it is impossible for these people to obtain any benefits under this act, because the northern line ends just at North Battleford. The government might also consider the possibility of carrying out a project on some of the lakes and rivers, such as the Battle river, similar to what was done in northern Manitoba. In that province large areas were flooded and the raising of muskrats was encouraged. This enabled the people to get a better living.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that last week the committee on rehabilitation agreed to recommend to the house that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be applied to all Canada. Being somewhat of an enthusiast about rehabilitation work, I should like to see that done, but I do not know that it would be possible to carry it out at the preseut stage of the war. I would hope that some day the benefits which have been given to parts of three provinces might be passed on to other people in Canada. One argument for the delaying of this action is the fact that many of our men will be coming back from overseas, and much of the work which would have to be done under legislation of this kind could be done then to good advantage. It would provide employment for men, particularly those who have been associated with engineering and other activities of that kind that go with war.

On the other hand, in Saskatchewan—it goes under another name in Alberta and also in New Brunswick—we have the northern areas plan which the hon. member for North Battleford will be quite familiar with. This plan has to do with persons who were rather hurriedly moved from the drouth areas into the northern district. Some of them were placed on bush land which cost $40 an acre to clear. Under this plan assistance was given in clearing up the land. The province of Quebec carries out a plan without any assistance from the dominion government, under which plan the same work is carried on and has been for some years. When settlers are moved into newer areas the province provides equipment similar to that used on the Alaska highway, but not quite so heavy, to clear the land and level it off so that the settler may have something to start with. This work is most beneficial and helpful to people who live in areas of that kind. It has been carried on for several years in Saskatchewan. My understanding is that most of the people who were on relief at the time the plan was started are now able to carry on for themselves. The plan is still being carried on by the province without any assistance, but to a 'esser extent than it was earlier.

The way we have worked under this act is to define roughly the drouth areas. We found by experience that there was only one practical way to do this, namely, to take the river basins. We have not been able to stop short of the height of land at the northern side. Recently we drew a line from some place north of Prince Albert along the northern row of sections up to the height of land north of the North Saskatchewan river to the divide where the water goes north or comes south. I do not know whether this went into the hon. member's constituency. We followed the height of land until we reached the Alberta boundary, where we went along the height of land marking the Battle river basin and others southward to the United States boundary. In Manitoba we follow the height of land forming the boundary of the Assiniboine river basin. We follow the height of land right down to north of Winnipeg. All inside that triangle is called the drouth area and is covered by the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I cannot say at the moment that it will be possible in the immediate future to extend it, but I should like to see the kind of work being carried on under this act extended right across Canada.

Mr. HENDERSON: After chatting with some of the officials I was hoping that we might see a little increase in this vote this year, but I suppose we should be grateful that we are getting enough to carry on during war time. I would be ready to support such an increase in order to permit the construction under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act of some badly needed pastures and stock-watering projects in our part of the country. This would permit the increased stock raising required in connection with our war effort.

When speaking in this chamber on another occasion I mentioned the benefits to Canada as a whole, and more especially to the west, which had been obtained from this act which was passed by the Bennett administration and greatly extended by the present government under the able administration of the Minister of Agriculture. When the Hon. George Spence appeared before the reconstruction committee and said what had been accomplished up to date at that time and could further be done, it was considered to be the most constructive paper given before the sittings of that good committee. He said that of the 3,000,000 acres of poor land broken during the first world war which should not have been broken, one and a quarter million acres are now included in sixty-seven community pastures, which during last season had taken care of over 65,000 head of stock. These pastures are not yet up to capacity. They are managed locally and nearly all are beginning to pay their way. Some have a small sinking fund put away for repairs and rebuilding at a later time.

Plans are also in the hands of the engineers to convert another one and a half million acres into seventy-three more of these pastures which are badly needed. Many head of stock are now turned away since the pastures are getting pretty well filled with stock by farmers adjoining the present pastures. Those from a distance cannot get their stock into these pastures. More than 20,000 small stock-watering projects have been completed, assisted by engineering advice and by payment of part of the cost under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and there are many more applications for such funds.

Many of these dug-outs have been so constructed as to irrigate gardens during the dry season. I may say that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has assisted with several small irrigation projects where fruit, vegetables and fodder are very successfully grown in dry seasons, and there are more applications for these works which are held up for the duration of the war.

When the war is won, Mr. Chairman, I would be bold enough to suggest that the name of this act be changed to the Canadian Farm Rehabilitation Act, an act to serve all Canada; to assist in the draining of swamp lands in the maritime provinces and rehabilitate Ontario and Quebec farms and the Kamouraska cut-over lands, and rehabilitate burnt-over timber land. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, the people of the west are prepared to cooperate in this and other work of this kind. But to rehabilitate western Canada we must have water, which has been referred to by the Hon. George Spence as "liquid gold on the prairies".

Several years ago we formed in our community the Saskatchewan-Alberta Irrigation Association along the border of the two provinces, and gave a great deal of study to this matter. On one occasion I took a surveyor and engineer, a Mr. Campbell, on an extended trip at our own expense to the eastern irrigation project in Alberta, where we counselled with Mr. Gray, who was the manager, and with his engineers who had made such an outstanding success of their project.

We secured a great deal of valuable information generally and also with regard to the much talked of "William Pearce, North Saskatchewan river stock watering scheme" which, of course, is much different from what we saw at Brooks, for Brooks is strictly an irrigation project. They can and do grow everything and operate a canning factory successfully. A wonderful good-sized town has grown up there and several small industries are flourishing. Some of the people from our part of Saskatchewan have moved in there, made their homes and are doing quite well.

We then proceeded with Mr. Campbell to Stettler to investigate storage possibilities at Buffalo lake and were well satisfied that there were huge storage possibilities both at Buffalo lake and Sullivan lake, at Hanna, Alberta, where 75,000 acres of land could be brought under irrigation. We then followed the natural flow of the water as set out by Mr. William Pearce himself in his papers. That is down Sounding creek, where the early settlers cut wood; thence down Eye Hill creek, entering Saskatchewan at Cosine, which is in the constituency that I have the honour to represent.

Eye Hill creek runs to Manitou lake, near Unity, where more storage could be provided.

Thence, with a little cutting you could bring water into Tramping lake, which is a very large lake, thirty miles in length and spoken of by Mr. Pearce and the P.F.R.A. engineers as having huge storage possibilities which would serve a large area in this district.

The engineers' reports point out that over 100,000 acres in the Kindersley, Glidden to Eston district can be irrigated and that three-quarters of a million acres in the Elrose, Rosetown to Saskatoon district could also be irrigated.

There are over 56,000,000 tons of snow water from mountains, Mr. Chairman, running away into lake Winnipeg and Hudson bay every day over and above what is being used for irrigation and power in Alberta. It would be a huge undertaking; but if these 56,000,000 tons of snow water which run away each day were stored—and there is storage—and then spread over our farms, if only a few acres on each farm, we would be doing more to rehabilitate western Canada than could be done in any other way that has been proposed to date. Instead of losing our people we would be able to make homes for more. While the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has been and is doing good work, I should like to see this work extended and take in the Pearce plan at least. The Pearce plan could be gone ahead with at a reasonable cost of a few million dollars and would provide water for stock watering and for mixed farming. That would call for only a few million dollars to carry the water through the natural channels at a small cost per annum. But for further rehabilitation an expenditure of an additional, say eighty million dollars or, as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has suggested, 100 to 150 million dollars would supply water, storage, canals et cetera to irrigate about one and a half million acres and also provide power for secondary industries. We could grow fruits and vegetables, feed and fodder for stock, build homes and keep off relief.

Before closing, I desire to thank the hon. member for Davenport for what he has advocated in this house and on the public platforms in support of this expenditure and great undertaking for western Canada. He has been very fair and, Mr. Chairman, I am sincere when I say that with his knowledge and understanding he should be honoured with the degree of doctor.

I also desire to thank the minister and his P.F.R.A. officials for the information they have furnished to the Saskatchewan-Alberta Irrigation Association before war was declared, at which time we folded up our organization for the duration, our splendid secretary, Mr. Galbraith joined the army. He is now serving his country overseas. But I more especially thank Major Duncan Stewart, K. C. of Calgary, for the assistance he has given me, which includes a letter from the late Senator Burns as well as papers and blueprint plans which belong to the estate of the late William Pearce, lent by Mr. Pearce's son. In his letter Senator Burns refers to himself as a converted old-timer. The letter is written to Colonel J. F. Dennis, formerly of the Canadian Pacific railway land department. I have received a good deal of valuable information from these papers.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): This is an appropriation in which the eastern farmers are interested, more particularly those at the head of the bay of Fundy. The special committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation made a recommendation that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act should be enlarged to enable work to be done all over Canada. I believe this recommendation was made with special reference to the marsh lands at the head of the bay of Fundy. The committee took considerable evidence. The Hon. J. A. McDonald, Minister of Agriculture and Marketing of Nova Scotia, came and gave evidence before the committee. The minister of agriculture of New Brunswick was prepared to come and will probably still come. Resolutions have been passed unanimously by the legislatures of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, by boards of trade and other bodies asking that the federal government assume responsibility for the reclaiming of these marsh lands, so that they will not revert to floating bogs, because the drainage channels become blocked, or inundated by the sea, owing to breakage of dikes and aboideaux.

I know from statements of the minister that he is personally sympathetic with this proposal. I know that his deputy minister, Doctor Barton is sympathetic, and I know that the director of experimental farms, Doctor Archibald, has for years shown his interest. Experiments have been carried on at the experimental station under Mr. Baird at Nappan, at the head of the bay of Fundy, showing the productivity of these lands when properly cultivated. Land that is not drained and cultivated will grow only half a ton of the poorest class of hay, while land of the same character, within 100 feet, can be made to produce hay of the very best quality, yielding from three to four tons per acre.

Recently there has been great interest on the part of the marsh owners, who have appointed representatives of march bodies, who are prepared to come to Ottawa as a delegation from the head of the bay of Fundy from New Brunswick, from my county, and the county represented by the Minister of Finance. This delegation is waiting for word as to when they may come to Ottawa in order to make representations, so that an appropriation may be made in order that work may be undertaken this year.

It is necessary that the work be commenced now if these lands are to be made available for farmers who come back after the war or are discharged from war industries, because it will take some years before the full benefits are derived.

There has been expended under this act up to 1942, a total of $14,547,875 for prairie farm rehabilitation, and quite an important part of that work is the control of water for the benefit of the farmers of the prairies. All those interested in agriculture in Canada are in sympathy with this. There was appropriated last year $2,000,000, and we are now dealing with a vote of $2,000,000 for the current year. We at the head of the bay of Fundy ask that this apply to our marshlands. I believe that the minister is in sympathy with the proposal, and I would ask that the appropriation be made available this year, or otherwise that an additional appropriation of at least a quarter of a million dollars be provided in order that the work may be started at once.

There are other special appropriations for the west, such as $500,000 under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, as voted last year; an appropriation of $28,175,000 to provide for wheat acreage reduction payments, and so on. There was also an appropriation last year of $1,950,000 to provide for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese and cheese factories, and another appropriation of $50,000, totalling last year $32,675,000. Not one dollar of that was expended in eastern Canada. This year the estimates under the same headings total $8,390,000. Not one dollar of last year's vote and not a dollar this year is to be applied under this act to eastern Canada unless the minister adopts the recommendation of the committee and has this act extended or makes a special appropriation in order that work on the marshlands may be undertaken at once.

When the minister sets his heart upon a project such as this in the administration of his department he has usually been successful, and I believe the interest he has shown in previous years, and the interest he has now in this matter, will induce him before the end of the session to arrange for an appropriation in order that work may be undertaken. It is proposed that the work be done mainly by machinery so as to reduce man-power requirements to the minimum. It is necessary that the main river outlets be opened up; that the drainage channels which have filled up with silt and vegetation be cleaned out; that machinery be provided which can be used for opening the smaller drainage ditches, and that the dikes and aboideaux that have gone down or weakened in recent years be restored.

The departments of agriculture in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are, I believe, prepared to make some contribution toward this work. These marsh lands are the most fertile lands in all Canada. They attracted our early settlers, and if they are not reclaimed, agriculture as we have known it in that part of Canada might as well be abandoned, as the production from these lands is used to build up the fertility of farm uplands which should carry a hundred head of stock where now there is hardly one. One acre of marshland properly cultivated involves the cultivation of five acres of upland. The production of live stock, fat cattle, and dairy products would reestablish agriculture as it was in former years, and, I believe, to an even greater extent.

I am appreciative of the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture in previous years with respect to this proposal. I believe that he is as sympathetic as ever, and it is the opinion of farmers in eastern Canada that, if he is really determined, an appropriation will be made available this year.

I do not wish to take my seat without expressing my appreciation on behalf of eastern Canada and especially on behalf of the marsh owners of the sympathetic consideration which has been given to this proposal by all the members of the committee, including those from western Canada, who have benefited by these large expenditures, by hon. members on the committee from central Canada, and by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Henderson) who preceded me this evening. I make this appeal to the minister, to the government and to the members of this committee that an appropriation be made available this year, so that some work will be undertaken to reclaim these fertile marsh lands at the head of the bay of Fundy.

Mr. GARDINER: Two legislatures, those of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, passed unanimous resolutions, I understand, asking that something should be done in connection with the marsh lands. I have had communications with both of them, and I understand they are sending a delegation here, representing both provinces, to discuss the matter with us. I hope that something will come out of the meeting at that time.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Delegates have been appointed. I understand that representatives of the marsh areas of Westmorland and Cumberland, and the Annapolis valley, and perhaps others, are waiting for instructions when they may come.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. My correspondence was with the two ministers of agriculture of the provinces, and I understand they are to come. As has been said, we have had the matter under consideration for some time, and a certain sum of money has been worked out as the amount which would make possible the carrying through of the scheme, but up to the present that amount of money has not been placed in the estimates, and I am not in a position to say to-night whether it will be in the supplementaries this year or not. But it is still under consideration.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): If this act were amended so that it would apply to all of Canada, this appropriation could be apportioned—

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but I think it would be a simpler matter at present to deal with this project alone rather than take up a larger matter. To do so would, I am afraid, delay rather than help it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The proposal that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be changed to constitute it a Canada Farm Rehabilitation Act commends itself to me. I have felt ever since I came to this chamber that Canada must be looked upon as one great united economy. Anything that injures any part of it injures every part, and conversely, anything that helps any part helps all Canada. I believe that a sympathetic ear should be lent to the voice of a representative from any part of this dominion, and I believe that the appropriation for this kind of work should be greatly increased. I have contended that now for some years.

I should like to mention to the minister one project which vitally concerns my particular constituency, the project known as the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project. Members of the committee perhaps will have had it brought to their attention in times past. Down in the southwestern corner of Alberta there are two rivers known as the St. Marys river and the Milk river. Both of these rivers are international; that is, they flow on each side of the border. The waters have been divided between Canada and the United States, but so far Canada has failed to use the portion of water which was allotted to her. It is well that members of the committee should have in mind that it is a well understood principle that in cases like this, where the interests of two nations are concerned, if one nation fails to use to advantage its share of water there is a likelihood that it will lose its right to that water, and the nation which has been using its share to advantage will have a claim on the water which is not being used by the other nation. If this principle were applied in the case to which I refer, Canada would lose very heavily and lose for all time.

The Lethbridge southeast water conservation project has been examined time and again. Recommendations were made as far back as 1921, and before, that something concrete and definite should be done, and done without further delay. But after the last war the whole matter was allowed to rest, because the governments in power said, "We have not the money; we must retrench now and pay for the war." The result was that for a generation this project was allowed to remain neglected. Now if history is to repeat itself we are likely to find a similar thing. It is an easy enough matter for us to rise in our places in this chamber and assert that as soon as this war is over, somehow or another there will be a boundless amount of money, now going to the war, available for use in rehabilitation. Unless the system under which we are working changes, no such thing as that will happen; as soon as the war is over we shall have hon. members rising in this house and contending that we must retrench and tighten our belts and pay for the war. The result will likely be that all of these projects will simply become day-dreams.

I just want to draw the attention of the minister, as emphatically as I can in a short time, the need for looking after the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project. The minister understands this well; he has been over the ground, and I believe he has shown great sympathy in the matter, but is restrained largely by financial consideration from taking action. I have contended privately before the minister and in public that I do not believe financial considerations should be allowed to interefere with the development of this project. Only $15,000,000 are involved, and 345,000 acres of the finest land in the Dominion of Canada would be brought under irrigation as a result of the development of that project.

If the findings of the international food committee mean anything more than the paper they are written on; if they really do mean that we are going to need a lot of food after the war, and we are going to use the food for the benefit of the people, obviously the food producing areas of this country should be developed to a high degree. There should therefore be no justification for delay in the matter of constructing the key dams and reservoirs of this great project. Four million dollars would be sufficient to build the main reservoir, which is known as the St. Marys reservoir, situated near Spring Coulee on St. Marys river in my constituency. It would take probably two or three years to build that reservoir even if we commenced in 1943. I contend that we should commence in 1943, not just to investigate and look over the ground and dream of what we are going to do, but should do something in 1943.

There is one other aspect of the question which is quite serious and which is becoming more urgent all the time. They are having dry weather in my constituency in southern Alberta and, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat pointed out this evening, they are having dry weather in his constituency as well. When dry weather comes in these constituencies it is an exceedingly serious matter. The present facilities for supplying water to the land now under irrigation in four major irrigation projects in my constituency are not sufficient. The water needed in times of stress, such as we are passing through now, would be available if the St. Mary's reservoir were constructed, and I think it only fair and just to the people in that area that they should be provided with ample water in time of need. This constitutes another very strong reason for proceeding at the earliest possible moment with the construction of reservoirs in connection with this water conservation project.

Mr. PERLEY: This item calls for the expenditure of $2,000,000; this year there is neither an increase or a decrease. Reference has been made to the fact that the government may consider the suggestion made by the reconstruction committee that the provisions of this act be extended to all Canada, and some hon. members have expressed themselves as being favourable to that step. I have been wondering what the minister's idea is in that regard, and if he really means to give that suggestion favourable consideration. Personally I would not be very anxious to see this act extended to the whole of Canada, because I see the possibility that it might become a racket.

When this act was passed in 1934—I believe this is the eighth year it has been in operation —it was intended to assist the farmers in certain areas in western Canada where there had been drouth for four or five years. The situation in certain parts of Saskatchewan was very serious, and this act was intended to rehabilitate those areas. It also outlined certain principles. The act was designed to assist farmers to conserve moisture, to store water and to work out schemes for the better utilization of land. The main purposes for which the act was passed were good. A great deal has been done by the present government, and I give credit to the minister for being most anxious to carry on the projects that were commenced and to support the principles outlined in this measure, but I think in some instances these projects have been developed to a very much greater extent than was ever intended.

Before we are finished with this item I hope the minister will give us a great deal more information with respect to water storage schemes, pastures that have been established and particularly some of the dam projects. To give the committee some idea of what might happen, I asked for a return in February and another in March to show the costs of certain projects being carried on in the Qu'Appelle valley which, I may say, is the boundary between the constituencies of the Minister of Agriculture and myself, so that these projects to which I have reference now might be called our projects. I find that certain surveys have been carried on in that valley during the last two years, on which some fifty-three people have been employed at a cost of something over $50,000. The returns also show that three dams are under construction, to cost approximately $127,000 on completion. But I do not think we are obtaining value for the money being expended on these dams. The one at Round lake flooded certain areas that were used by the Indians for haying purposes, and they have practically lost the entire use of that land. I should like the mnister to tell the committee if those Indans were reimbursed for the damage done and the loss sustained, and what agreement was reached with the Indian affairs branch or the men on the reserve in that connection. I have looked over that situation, and considerable loss has been occasioned.

Perhaps the minister would give a more or less detailed statement in connection with this work, because it is of interest not only to me but to other hon. members from the northern part of Saskatchewan, who know something of what the building of these dams has meant. No doubt the minister has a copy of this return, so that I need not read the questions I asked and the information that was given, but I should like a little further information which he might supply at a later date. I would ask the minister to be good enough to give me the home addresses of the fifty-three men employed in these survey parties.

Mr. GARDINER: That information can be given at a later time. I believe one of the two engineers, Mr. McMillan, came from Manitoba, while I think the other comes from up in the Rosthern country. I imagine my hon. friend will know some of the others, the rodmen and instrument men; they come from different parts of the province, and I imagine some come from Manitoba. I can let the hon. member have this information at the earliest possible date. I refer to the amounts expended on the survey work.

All I wish to say is this, that on the river there are Buffalo lake, Long lake, Echo lake, Katepwa lake, Round lake and Crooked lake strung out along 200 miles, or more than 200 miles of the river basin. Long lake, as is known, is a rather large reservoir seventy miles long and five or six miles wide. During the drouth period the level of the lake went down about six or seven feet. Much of the area at the south end of it was without water at all toward the end of the drouth period. As the hon. member knows, there has been a dam at Silton. I do not know when that dam was built, because it was built before my time. I did operate it when I was minister of highways of Saskatchewan for a time; at least, I had men operate it. But it was built, I believe, originally many years ago by the federal government.

That dam is operated to turn water which comes from the west end of the drainage basin of the Qu'Appelle into Long lake, during the early part of the season; and water runs out of that lake back into the Qu'Appelle at another time in the season. The run-off in the country to the west of Long lake was not sufficient to keep that water up to level during the drouth period. During the last year or so there has had to be some control work done. We have done some work very much in advance of what anyone was doing ten or twenty years ago.

We put in a dam at the end of Buffalo lake. That holds the water back early in the season to prevent the flooding of areas such as the Lumsden area north of Regina. Then it makes possible the irrigating of all the flat land in between Buffalo lake and Long lake. That land has not been irrigated up to the present, but the dam is in there and the water storage is there, and the land can be irrigated in that section of the river basin.

Then there has been a control dam put on the runway into Long lake, in addition to the one at Silton. The water has gone in there and raised the lake this year somewhere between eighteen inches and two feet. That is, it is on its way back to the original level. With another year or two of the kind of weather we have had in the last two years we would expect that that lake would eventually come back to its original level.

That dam is operated to let the water out in the later part of the season, so that it can go down over land which is used as hay land. There is an area of many hundreds of acres which is flooded land, when the water comes over in the spring. Then hay is cut off it later in the season. Below that other lakes lie. The water of those lakes is being controlled now by dams put in at the end of each lake.

As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle knows, there has been for many years a dam at the end of Katepwa lake. But there were not dams; at least I do not think there were dams at the end of either Crooked lake, Round lake or Echo lake. We have placed dams at the end of these lakes to control the water and keep it at a higher level throughout the summer season. That is done to supply water which may be utilized for irrigation purposes and, secondly, to keep the water in a better condition during the summer for fishing and for other purposes.

Down the valley, as I remember the figures —I have not all of them before me—there are somewhere between 30,000 and 40,000 acres which can be irrigated. Whether there is sufficient water to irrigate 30,000 or 40,000 acres, I am not certain.

Mr. PERLEY: That is at the end of the lake?

Mr. GARDINER: At the end of all the lakes. Starting at Buffalo lake, there is some between there and Lumsden. Then, below Lumsden there is some between there and the most westerly of the Qu'Appelle lakes. I do not think there is any between the most westerly lake and Echo lake. There is not much between Echo lake and Katepwa. But there are some lands there that can be irrigated. Then, down below Katepwa lake, between that and Crooked lake, there is land which could be irrigated.

Mr. PERLEY: Not very much.

Mr. GARDINER: Sufficient to provide each farmer along that area with hay land from which he could be a producer of hay. Probably in some places there is much more than would be necessary for the individual farmer who may be there, and it might necessitate the re-dividing of some of the land.

The other surveys which have been made on the streams running into the Qu'Appelle have been for the purpose of determining whether a storage basin can be found up at the head or along these streams in order that water so stored may be utilized to irrigate lands on lower levels or replenish the waters of the various lakes. Generally speaking, that is the plan and, as has been pointed out, $50,000 has been spent on the laying out of the work which has to do with determining what can be done with the land in that particular area. There have been other sums, such as $20,000 and $40,000, on different dams put in along those areas in order to control the water in the lakes.

In a season like this the water does rise to heights which will cause damage, unless the land around the edge is protected by rip-rapping against wash-outs; and there has been some rip-rapping done on these areas. That, generally speaking, is the nature of the work carried on. I think it is looked upon as something which will assist greatly the people in those areas, if we again have the drouths we had in the past.

Mr. PERLEY: What about the settlement of Indians? I understand that on hay land from which the Indians cut 300 tons of hay last year they cannot cut any this year.

Mr. GARDINER: There were some areas up there last year which, even if we had not done anything, would have been flooded to a greater extent than they had been in many years. The last time I drove through Fort Qu'Appelle the dam was not holding back the water. In the first place there was not anything in the dam to hold back the water. The water was running within three feet from the top of the works. All of this meant that no water backed up behind that. The dam had nothing to do with it. The water was there because this was an exceptionally wet season this year. When the works are completed the land on the reserve to the west may be flooded. I do not know whether that is the reserve the hon. member is speaking about.

Mr. PERLEY: No; it is at Round lake.

Mr. GARDINER: The work at Round lake may have something to do with the flooding there. But there will be land in the reserve to the west of Echo lake which will have to be taken over by rehabilitation from the Indian affairs branch if the works are completed as advised by the engineers. If any lands are flooded and remain flooded as a result of the work which has been put in, arrangement is made either to get an easement in connection with those lands, or to take them over and make them part of the plan.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. PERLEY: I understand the Indians on the reserve are dissatisfied with the arrangement which has been made. I know the situation well, and I think they have had an unfair and unreasonable deal.

Mr. GARDINER: I will look into it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. PERLEY: Oh, no, we want more information. For instance, we have not yet discussed the matter of pastures. A large number of pastures have been established, and a great amount of stock is carried in them.

Before we leave this matter of water, may I refer to an article in a western paper, namely, the Regina Leader Post, headed "Water for twenty thousand acres; project will stabilize agriculture". This has reference to the Swift Current project. Would the minister give us a little information respecting the Swift Current project, because the matter is headlined in the Leader Post to-day. It states that 20,000 acres of land will be irrigated when the project is completed.

Mr. GARDINER: The Swift Current area extends on the river from south of Swift Current to Swift Current, and then east as far as Rush lake, which is a considerable distance east of Swift Current. In that area there are between 30,000 and 40,000 acres of farm land which can be irrigated, and there will be sufficient water. One of the dams is completed, and holding water now; and the other is partly completed. There will be sufficient water to irrigate that particular land. The section most affected by drouth was in the neighbourhood of Swift Current, and we have carried on irrigation work at that experimental farm for some time. That land can all be irrigated from the two dams.

The main difficulty we have had up to date is that we did not dig a ditch last year to drain Rush lake and keep it drained. There was some water ln it this year as a result of the great fall of water we have had. Last year the whole lake bottom was in crop and we grew a considerable part of the flax, that is, the government grew it, under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, to supply seed for this year. We grew oats and barley as well and had very good crops. I do not think there is any exaggeration in what the Leader-Post says. I read the article. There is a possibility of irrigating 30,000 or 40,000 acres of land. We are not taking over the land; we are merely putting in the ditches and dams and making the water available to irrigate so many acres to each farmer. Each farmer will pay for the water he uses to irrigate his hay land. In the years that lie behind us we have brought hay from as far east as Three Rivers, Quebec. This happened in 1937, and we now hope to be able to produce the needed hay on this land.

Mr. PERLEY: Were any of the dams washed out this year on account of the extra flow of water?

Mr. GARDINER: There was one at Willows on Lake of the Rivers in Saskatchewan. We have had trouble with this one on two different occasions. I have been down to look at it personally. We may have to abandon it, but we have attempted to store water there. With the amount of water there was in the streams this year we have been surprised that we have not lost more dams.

We have fifty-seven pastures operating and ten under construction. I may say that so far as these pastures go, the treasury is not concerned after they are once constructed. The capital cost is put up by the treasury and that will stand for some twenty years at least. The posts that are used are creosoted and should be good for that length of time. Fees are paid by the farmers who put cattle or horses into the pasture, and these are more than sufficient to pay the cost of operation since there is a surplus of $38,215.01. In this connection, we have three ideas in mind. First, there is the community pasture where the farmers around the pasture are organized. They have their own association which controls the number of cattle that may be put on the pasture by each farmer and also it takes care of the fees. We appoint a manager who becomes a secretary of the association. As I have just pointed out, the fees are more than sufficient to pay the operating costs including the salaries of the managers.

In addition to that, we have the reserve pastures that I spoke of before the dinner hour. These are large areas, some hundred thousand acres in extent. We have fenced them to keep out stock in the good years and they will be available in drouth years. They grew grass as abundantly as before live stock ran over the country at all. Conditions in that section of the province are such that, with water provided, much of the live stock can run out through the winter. Then there is another form of pasture which is associated with an irrigated area. This is a community pasture in which lands are irrigated outside the pasture and produce the fodder and grain for the live stock which runs on the pasture in the summer time. All these have been operating successfully, and I do not think the neighbourhood would like to be without them in the future.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister give us a break-down of this $2,000,000?

Mr. GARDINER: The break-down is as follows:

Salaries, including permanent and temporary	$341,802
Wages	336,000
Cost-of-living bonus	86,000
Equipment	110,500
Freight and express	14,000
Miscellaneous	8,700
Printing and stationery	19,486
Supplies and materials	127,256
Telephones, telegrams and postage	11,568
Travel	171,220
Rent	45,350
Buildings and lands	388,025
Financial assistance	339,500

The last item is the assistance given to farmers to dig dug-outs and build small dams.

Item agreed to.

Special.

30. Prairie Farm Assistance Act—administration, $250,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How much was paid out last year, and how much was collected under the one per cent arrangement?

Mr. GARDINER: No money was paid out last year. I have not the figures for this year by itself, but the total levy collected in 1941-42 was $2,500,000. The total amount down to June 30, 1942, was $6,392,000. That is what was collected, and there has been approximately $2,000,000 since then. The total amount paid up to date is about $30,000,000,, and the total amount collected prior to this year was a little over $6,000,000. We have paid out $5 for $1 collected. For the year 1942 there will be none paid out, and we hope to come somewhere in the neighbourhood of $9,000,000, by the time the year's collections are in.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is it expected that there will be anything to pay out this year?

Mr. GARDINER: There was nothing paid out last year, and the crop this year looks as though we shall have a repetition of what happened last year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is an area in Alberta where they are not going to get a crop. Does this amount of $500,000 show as not having been paid?

Mr. GARDINER: The amount paid out is not shown here. This $250,000 is administrative costs. We shall have to have a supplementary estimate for the amount that is paid out, if any.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Was the $500,000 administrative costs?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; there was a considerable amount paid out last year for the preceding year.

Mr. QUELCH: Is there not some way in which the payment of the bonus to the widow can be expedited? There are cases where payment has been held up for a couple of years until the man's estate is settled. I spoke of this a year ago, and the minister said then that an amendment would be introduced whereby it would be possible to pay a bonus to the widow immediately if she were in necessitous circumstances.

Mr. GARDINER: We had no authority under the regulations as they were to make a payment to the beneficiary of the estate when the person who had a claim had died, but we did go ahead and make some payments after considerable difficulty. But a change has been made in the regulations within the past three or four weeks which now makes it possible for us to make the payment automatically.

Mr. QUELCH: There is another matter to which I wish to refer. Subsection 5 of section 8 of the regulations reads:

8. No person shall be considered to be a farmer under the act unless:

5. If residing with a parent or a brother, he is of the full age of twenty years and operates the farm as a separate unit, and the farm consists of at least a quarter-section of land.

I can understand the need for such a provision in the regulations to prevent a large farmer from dividing his farm up among his children in order to benefit by a larger bonus payment, but here is the case of a son living with his father in a town. The father is not a farmer himself but rents his farm to his son, who farms it and makes a good job of it. That boy should be granted the bonus; but he has been denied it on the ground that he is only nineteen years of age. It seems to me that we should try to encourage these young people rather than discourage them from carrying on that type of work. This is no case of the father trying to get a larger bonus because he is not farming at all; he is renting his farm to his son, and the son is denied the bonus on the ground that he is a minor living with his parents. I do not think the intention of the regulation was to deny that boy the bonus. The intention was to prevent a farmer from dividing up a large farm in order to get a larger bonus. The case to which I refer is that of Jack Turton of Consort, Alberta.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. GARDINER: There has been some difficulty. In this particular case he would be denied the bonus because he was living in the town and not on the farm.

Mr. QUELCH: No; he was denied it because he was a minor.

Mr. GARDINER: There would be the two reasons.

Mr. QUELCH: No; I will read the letter from the superintendent, Department of Agriculture, Edmonton. He writes:

With regard to the above-mentioned claim, we wish to advise that owing to the fact that Jack Turton was not of the full age of twenty years when filing the cultivated acreage report, he cannot be considered for payment under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

There have been two other letters, and in none of the letters is the question raised of the young man's living in town. He is denied the bonus on the ground that he is a minor living with his father. Perhaps I had better go into the matter further with the minister at some later time, but where there is no question of a father dividing up his farm among his children in order to get a larger bonus, when his son rents the farm from him and is making a good job of it, does not the minister agree he should be entitled to the bonus? Why deprive him of it just because he is nineteen years of age?

Item agreed to.

Special.

31. To provide for wheat acreage reduction payments, for administration expenses in connection therewith, and for temporary appointments that may be required notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, $4,265,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the actual wheat acreage reduction by provinces for 1943, as compared with 1942, and what is the acreage in coarse grains by provinces in 1943?

Mr. GARDINER: For Manitoba, in summer-fallow, coarse grains and grass the acreage was 1,400,000 in 1941, and the amount paid out, $4,430,292; Saskatchewan, summer-fallow, coarse grains and grass, 5,687,000 acres; amount paid out, $19,930,898. The farmers payments amounted to $17,300,000, and the landlords payments to $2,600,000. In Alberta, summer-fallow, coarse grains and grass, 3,147,000 acres; amount paid out, $10,438,400. The farmers payments in Manitoba were $49,000; in Saskatchewan, $159,000, and in Alberta, $86,000. The acreage for Manitoba in coarse grains, summer-fallow, grass and rye in 1942 was 1,656,000, and the amount paid out was in round figures $3,667,000; in Saskatchewan, 5,287,000 acres in coarse grains, summer-fallow, grass and rye, and the amount paid out, $11,611,000; in Alberta, 2,703,000 acres, and the amount paid out, $593,000. The number of farmers paid was 32,000 in Manitoba, 89,000 in Saskatchewan, and 53,000 in Alberta. The 1943 figures are not yet available. The acreage for 1943 is estimated at about 10,000,000 acres less than in 1940.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there an estimate of that by provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: We have not the figures by provinces.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: About the same.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, July 5, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE HON. R. J. MANION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It will be the wish, I am sure, of hon. members of all parties that I should give some expression to the loss which our country has sustained in the passing of the Hon. Robert J. Manion. His very sudden death at a late hour on Friday evening last must have come as a great shock, not only to his many personal friends and admirers, but to all who have followed his notable career.

Although not a member of this house during the present session, Doctor Manion's long association with parliament—he was a member for some twenty years—and the high and important positions which he held in the public life of Canada, would cause it to be the natural wish of many who sat with him in previous parliaments to pay, in this place, some slight tribute to his memory, and to the many services he rendered Canada, both in and out of parliament.

Doctor Manion, I am sure, would have been the last to wish, or to expect, that any attempt should be made at this time to estimate the place which history may accord his many contributions to our public life. I, myself, am the first to recognize that, at any time, it would be for some other, rather than for me, of whom he was so strong a political opponent, to perform that task. At the same time, I should like to say that, while differences in political opinion occassioned changes in our political affiliations, and open opposition in our political relationships, I shared throughout the course of many years an association in public affairs with Doctor Manion much more intimate than most political opponents enjoy, and a personal friendship correspondingly close.

A mere enumeration of the national services voluntarily performed by Doctor Manion, and of the positions of confidence and trust which he held, are in themselves sufficient to ensure that his name will hold a high place in the honour roll of Canadian statesmen who, throughout their lives, have sought to give to the service of their fellowmen and to their country the best that is in them, at home and abroad, in times of war, and in times of peace.

Doctor Manion began his career as a physician and surgeon, and to the end of his days he kept the touch of the physician in his desire to be of service to his fellowmen. The great war saw him ministering to the needs of soldiers on the field of battle. The present war saw him discharging, with his characteristic enthusiasm and vigour, the duties of national director of civilian air raid defence.

He entered the House of Commons in 1917 as a supporter of the Union government, and quickly made his mark as a parliamentarian. In the period of Mr. Meighen's brief administrations he held respectively for a few months the portfolios of Minister of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment and of Postmaster General. Throughout Mr. Bennett's tenure of office, from 1930 to 1935, he was Minister of Railways and Canals. In these positions he was regarded as an able administrator.

Doctor Manion, in parliament and on the platform, was at all times, fearless and outspoken. His thoughts came with great rapidity to his mind and were as rapidly expressed. I am sure he wished sometimes that some of his utterances might have a little more caution. However, all of us in the heat of controversy are apt to go further than we would at other times. He had many of the qualities of the pioneer: a resolute courage, complete self-reliance, and a sturdy independence of character. He possessed a great love for Canada, and her interests and future were ever closest to his heart.

Although defeated at the general elections of 1935, such was the confidence he had won among the membership of his party that he was chosen its leader at the national Conservative Convention in 1938. He then became for the ensuing two years its leader in this house and also the leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

The failure of his party to gain office at the general elections of 1940, and his defeat in his own constituency, must have been, for Doctor Manion, a bitter disappointment. Without recrimination he accepted the verdict of the country, and sought to continue his service to it in other directions. Shortly after his resignation as leader of his party, he offered his services to the government and, as is known, they were promptly availed of. The house is fully aware of the devoted manner in which Doctor Manion's time and talents were subsequently given to the country's service up to, and including, the day of his death.

It was evidence of the energy Doctor Manion possessed and of his desire to impart something of his own spirit to others, that he should have found time in the course of his active life to have written one or two books, and thus to have added to his record of surgeon and soldier, parliamentarian and patriot, the distinction also of being an author. His autobiography published under the title: "Life is an Adventure," contains in its pages many of the thoughts he would have wished most to bequeath to his fellowmen. Its pages disclose his genial nature, his sense of humour, his fearless attitude, and above all, the spirit of service which was the underlying purpose of his life.

It was on the 5th of July, 1938, that Doctor Manion was chosen leader of his party. To-day is the fifth anniversary of that memorable day in his career. The period of his leadership was brief. Brief indeed was the course of his life on earth, brought as it was to its close at the age of 61, when from him, had he been spared, so much more might have been expected. This morning, members of all parties accompanied his mortal remains to their last resting place. As we meet this afternoon, we pay common tribute to his memory.

Life, truly, is an adventure; an adventure far beyond our ken. In these halls of parliament, in which, in bygone years some of our political battles were fought, I take my leave of him, with the thought, that surely all is not over here, that—

> Somewhere, surely, afar,
> In the sounding labour-house vast
> Of being, is practised that strength,
> Zealous, beneficent, firm!

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, following the well chosen remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I should like on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party to add a word to what he has said on this occasion.

It was truly and appropriately said in the House of Commons on an occasion similar to this that in the midst of life we are in death. The passing of the Hon. Robert J. Manion in the midst of his public duties serves, I think, to recall that thought. Doctor Manion died in harness. He had a full life, and a long heritage of accomplishments and friendships which all might properly envy. He was one of the many Canadians who have risen to high position by following relentlessly the royal road of honesty, integrity and hard work. For well over a quarter of a century he was intimately associated with the public life of Canada. Prior to his entry into the House of Commons in 1917 he had reached a high peak in his chosen profession and had been decorated for gallantry in the service of his country in the first great war.

The contributions which Doctor Manion made as a surgeon, a soldier, an author, a member of parliament and a cabinet minister, and later as the leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, will be long remembered by the people of this dominion who loved him as a fearless fighter, a warm-hearted friend and a brilliant parliamentarian. His deep attachment to the things that are best in Canadian life, both in peace and in war, prompted him to offer his services again in world war No. 2. As before, he acquitted himself in the discharge of his duties with high credit to himself and to his country. Great as was his record in public affairs, equally great was his exemplary life as a family man, one who loved his own home. He believed that the real bulwark of a nation must lie within the home and family relationships.

Doctor Manion's passing comes as a great shock and will be a cause for deep sorrow on the part of his widow and his three sons, two of whom, in pursuance of their father's example, are to-day to be found in the armed forces of our country. It is of them we think at this time, and to them we send our sympathy and our condolences. In the midst of their loss they may properly take consolation from the thought that this good husband and father discharged his high duties in a full life with great credit, both in the public and in the private domain. Doctor

Manion's life is an inspiration to all of us. He has left the heritage of a good name and a life well lived.

> Lives of great men all remind us
> We can make our lives sublime,
> And departing, leave behind us
> Footprints on the sands of time.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) in extending to Mrs. Manion and her family the deepest sympathy of the members of the party with which I am associated. As for myself and others who sit with me, we shared the atmosphere of this chamber with the late Doctor Manion. There is not much that one can say, except that when we disagreed with him we realized that here was a happy nature, a man typical of the race and people from which he sprang, and one whose quick retort and ready wit often enlivened this chamber.

He left this House of Commons in 1940 after defeat, the policy laid down by his party having found little popular support throughout the country. For that failure no doubt he himself grieved and to some extent suffered.

We wish to join with all members in the house in paying tribute to the memory of a man with whom we disagreed often, but whose many qualities were admired and whose work we respected.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, when I heard that Doctor Manion had been called away I was asked to voice an expression for publication in the press. I issued these words:

> Sincerely, energetically, honourably, Doctor Manion strove to build a better Canada, serving as a surgeon, a soldier, a statesman. Doing so he was actuated by those warm and noble feelings which former generations knew as patriotism. He deserved well.

I wish to join with those who have already spoken in expressing on behalf of this group our profound sympathy with the wife and children who by his death are bereaved. May I also congratulate them upon having had as a husband and father a worthy man.

Hon. P. J. ARTHUR CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the sad news of Hon. Doctor Manion's premature passing away recalls to the members of this house and, in fact, to all human beings, the implacable brevity of life and the vanity of most of the things that hold our attention during our rather fleeting stay in this world.

On this occasion, it is fitting to say that, in spite of differences of opinion and of the disagreements inherent to political struggles, the citizens of French descent always held in the most profound respect the personality, the works, the activities of the distinguished deceased whose loss we mourn to-day. In the thick of the contest and of the struggle, he always showed himself of unimpeachable loyalty and, because of his attitude, of the nobility of his character and of his radiant sympathy, he was always considered as a friend by the citizens of my province and by Canadians of French descent; no political discussions ever left a trace of the feelings or altered the friendly relations which existed between him and Canadian citizens of French descent.

Joining all other Canadians, we, the citizens of Quebec and Canadians of French descent, respectfully bow our thoughts over the grave which, far too soon, was sealed over a citizen who made his mark in Canada's political and social life. The memory of this distinguished Canadian and of his works will long be cherished by us, and this same memory will long be veiled by the sadness which his death has caused.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume that it is unnecessary for me to ask you, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all the members of this House of Commons, to convey to Mrs. Manion and to her sons the expression of our very deep sympathy in their bereavement.

THE LATE GENERAL SIKORSKI

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is with great regret that I have to inform the house that General Sikorski, prime minister of Poland and commander in chief of the Polish armed forces, was killed yesterday in an aeroplane accident at Gibraltar while returning to the United Kingdom from a visit to the Polish forces in the middle east. General Sikorski's daughter and the chief of staff, General Klimecki, were also killed.

General Sikorski was an eminent statesman and soldier whose place in the councils of the united nations it will indeeed be hard to fill. He had faced with supreme courage, high intelligence and unshaken confidence the baffling problems that confronted a government which had been deprived of direct control of all of its national territory. He had also been foremost in the task of reorganizing units of a Polish army which have lately fought with great gallantry in north Africa and other theatres of war.

General Sikorski visited Canada in 1941 and 1942, and again briefly early in the present year. Only on Friday last I read to the house a cable received from Cairo from General Sikorski extending his good wishes on the celebration of Canada's Dominion Day and an expression of his own and the Polish nation's admiration of Canada's contribution to the allied cause on the battlefields of this war. On the occasion of each of his visits to Canada, General Sikorski impressed all who met him as one of the ablest diplomats and bravest fighters in the common cause.

In my contacts with him during his visits to Canada, I felt that, if he were spared to survive the war, he would be destined to play a leading part in the reconstitution of a free and independent Poland and in the establishment of stability in eastern Europe. He has not been so spared, and his untimely death is an irreparable loss not only for the Polish government and people, to whom I extend sincerest sympathy in the name of the government and people of Canada, but also for all of the united nations.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Third report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Donnelly.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACKENZIE KING—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. JOHN BRACKEN IN TORONTO ON JULY 2

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Speaking in Toronto on Friday last, Mr. John Bracken, leader of the Progressive Conservative party, is reported in the press of Canada as having said that the war policy of the dominion government had been "in too many of its aspects prompted by political cowardice."

Had Mr. Bracken, as leader of the Progressive Conservative party, been a member of this House of Commons, I should to-day at once have asked you, Mr. Speaker, to see that Mr. Bracken was obliged immediately to withdraw his charge of political cowardice. As one who himself has been a member of a legislative assembly, Mr. Bracken must know that these untrue and offensive words could not have been used in this house or in the legislature of any province without the house insisting upon their being withdrawn. As Mr. Bracken is not in the house, I suppose I must content myself by saying that a charge of "political cowardice" comes with ill grace from a leader of a political party who, throughout the whole of a session of parliament, following his appointment as leader of his party, has avoided attempting its leadership on the floor of the House of Commons.

I should like also to draw the attention of the house to Mr. Bracken's further reported reference, in speaking of that part of the Canadian army called up for service in the western hemisphere, to his "judgment that this home draftee army is not only an injustice to the men who are in it, but it is the biggest hoax ever perpetrated on the nation." I think the use of the word "hoax", which in existing circumstances is equally uncalled for and equally untrue and offensive, is something which the leader of the Progressive Conservative party himself will come greatly to regret ever having used.

Mr. POULIOT: Isaac Laquedem.

MR. GIBSON—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN GLOBE AND MAIL OF FRIDAY, JULY 2

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege I should like to refer to an article appearing in the Globe and Mail on Friday, July 2, under the heading "Did Abitibi bondholders follow wrong policies?" This refers to an article written by James F. Clark, statistician, Toronto, which contains the following statement:

> In the last two years Abitibi has paid out to bondholders the substantial sum of $20,272,140, equal to forty-two per cent on the $48,267,000 stated amount of the bonds. These moneys have, with the approval of the dominion income tax authorities, been applied on the principal, an unheard of practice in the writer's knowledge, and accordingly bondholders are not required to pay income tax on these receipts. Here again the reason advanced for the payment to apply against principal instead of unpaid interest is the possibility that final settlement would find insufficent assets to repay bondholders' claims for principal and interest in full. If these payments came from liquidation of the properties of the company there might be some validity to this reasoning. The writer believes that these payments would probably not have been made at all had the income tax authorities refused to consider them free from income tax.

I wish to take exception to the statement that I have read, as it by no means represents the facts. The writer refers to "an unheard of practice," whereas I would point out that it is a common practice for the payor of a debt to direct on what account the payments should be applied. But in this case the courts, by various orders, directed that payments be made on account of the principal. The question whether such payments were to be considered on account of the principal or interest was decided by the court, not by the income tax department.

Mr. Clark states that "the reason advanced for the payment to apply against principal instead of unpaid interest is the possibility that final settlement would find insufficient assets to repay bondholders' claims for principal and interest in full." No such reason has been advanced by my department. It may be that the court used this reasoning in directing that the moneys be paid on account of the principal debt, but when a creditor takes payment in the manner directed by the payor, the reasons for the action are immaterial. The fact remains that the money was paid by direction of the court in liquidation of the principal.

The suggestion by Mr. Clark that the method of applying the moneys owing by the company was subject to the approval of the income tax department and that the income tax department had power to direct how such moneys should be applied, is entirely unfounded.

QUESTIONS

SALMON AND RED HERRING FOR CANADIAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. Will salmon be released and distributed for Canadian consumption on a per capita basis to each province?

2. If so, in what manner?

3. Will canned herring be released for distribution to the several provinces?

4. If so, on what basis?

5. Will eastern herring be shipped to British Columbia?

6. Will British Columbia canned herring be released on the Pacific coast?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Approximately 200,000 cases of canned salmon will be released for Canadian consumption but the basis of distribution has not been determined.

2. Discussions are now in progress for the purpose of determining the basis of allocation and equitable distribution.

3. Certain quantities of canned herring are being considered for Canadian consumption but the basis of distribution cannot be determined until the quantity to be available is known.

4. See answer to question 3.

5. See answer to question 3.

6. See answer to question 3.

SUGAR RATIONING—WINE AND SOFT DRINKS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What is the expenditure or liability incurred to date in connection with the rationing or distribution of canning sugar for, (a) advertising; (b) salaries and allowances to personnel connected with the administration thereof; (c) travelling expenses?

2. (i) What quantity of sugar for the current year has been allotted by the ration administrator of the wartime prices and trade board to, (a) manufacturers of wine; (b) manufacturers of soft drinks? (ii) What quantity was used by each group of manufacturers during the year 1942?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. (a) Advertising, $20,300.

(b) Salaries and allowances to personnel, nil. The rationing and distribution of canning sugar was carried out by the regular personnel and no additional salaries or allowances were involved.

(c) Travelling expenses, nil.

2. (i) 1943 — (a) manufacturers of wine, 9,100,000 pounds; (b) manufacturers of soft drinks, 66,000,000 pounds.

(ii) 1942—manufacturers of wine, 12,077,274 pounds (raw sugar); manufacturers of soft drinks, 73,075,217 pounds (refined sugar).

SUGAR

Mr. SHAW:

1. What was the total production of beet sugar in Canada for each of the calendar years 1940, 1941 and 1942?

2. What was the total volume of raw sugar imported into Canada during each of the above three years?

3. Was any refined sugar imported into Canada during the years 1940, 1941 and 1942? If so, what was the total of such imports for each year?

4. What percentage of the total available quantity of sugar on hand during the above three years (by years) was procurable for home consumption? What was the actual home consumption for each year?

5. What proportion of the total available sugar was sold, (a) to manufacturers of foodstuffs; (b) to manufacturers of beverages; (c) to other manufacturers, during each of the years 1940, 1941 and 1942?

6. What were the total sugar supplies in storage in Canada as at December 31, 1940, 1941 and 1942?

7. By provinces, what is the actual average per capita allowance of sugar for the canning of fruits and jams during the 1943 canning season?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. 1940, 197,770,000 pounds; 1941, 197,365,000 pounds; 1942, 184,495,000 pounds.

2. 1940, 957,032,000 pounds; 1941, 954,423,000 pounds; 1942, 633,962,000 pounds.

4. Approximately 65 per cent. Actual household consumption was as follows: 1940, 716,689,152 pounds; 1941, 749,009,810 pounds; 1942, 584,233,651 pounds.

5. No statistics are available regarding the distribution of sugar to manufacturers during 1940. The estimated industrial usage (other than household) during 1941 and 1942 was approximately 35 per cent of total distribution.

7. The actual average per capita allowance throughout Canada was 11·3 pounds. The distribution was left to the discretion of the local ration boards.

WARTIME HOUSING—HULL, QUE.

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. How many two-bedroom houses were built in Hull at a cost of, (a) $1,889.13; (b) $2,939.87?

2. How many four-bedroom houses were built in Hull at a cost of, (a) $1,889.13; (b) $2,939.87?

3. What was the total number built?

4. What were the other costs paid by Wartime Housing Limited in connection with the building of these houses?

[Mr. Shaw.]

5. What was the total expenditure as at February 28, 1943?

6. Was the cost for providing land, sewers, roads, street lights, etc., $760 per house, as reported on page 3854 of Hansard, June 21, 1943, or $995.48 for the 100 houses and $828.68 for the fifty houses, as reported on page 3876, June 29?

Mr. HOWE:

1. (a) H-1 type 2-bedroom house, 24′ x 24′: 4 houses, bevelled siding finish, at $1,889.13; 10 houses, wood shingle finish, at $1,893.02; 5 houses, weatherboard finish, at $1,890.49; 6 houses, asbestos shingle finish, at $1,897.78.

(a) H-21 type 2-bedroom house, 24′ x 28′: 8 houses, bevelled siding finish, at $2,065.56; 8 houses, weatherboard finish, at $2,066.60; 2 houses, wood shingle finish, at $2,069.81; 7 houses, asbestos shingle finish, at $2,073.76.

(b) None.

2. (a) None; (b) 100 houses.

3. 150 houses.

4. $140,983.21.

5. As already explained on page 3876 in Hansard, June 22, 1943, the total was $577,604.06, which sum included an item of $43,593.82 which had not, as of that date, been transferred to the Ottawa project.

6. The sums of $995.48 for 100 houses, and $828.68 for the 50 houses as reported on page 3876, June 22, for providing lands, sewers, roads, street lights, etc., is correct.

The $760 per house, which was referred to on June 21 had reference to the return of Votes and Proceedings No. 19, page ii, in answer to the question by Mr. Nicholson, M.P., question 3 ("What was the average cost of providing sewers, service, etc., for each of the houses built in Hull?"), "The average cost per house for providing sewers, watermains, roads and walks was $760.66." This is still correct. The difference in the amounts is explained by the fact that the $760.66 covers only 4 items, whereas the returns of $995.48 and $828.68 include grading, street lighting, house heaters, cooking ranges, supervising architect, and many similar items.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. In the event of a victory for the united nations in Europe, will the Canadian forces take part in the victory parade?

2. If so, what flag will be used to show their nationality?

1. Have the United States forces now in England a national flag?

2. Have the Australian, New Zealand and South African forces now serving outside of their respective territories a national flag?

3. Have the British forces now serving outside of England a national flag?
4. Have the Canadian forces now serving outside of Canadian territory a national flag?
5. If so, what flag is it? If not, why?

1. Is the red ensign, in which the union jack appears at the top left quarter, near the pole, and the arms of Canada at the fly end, the official flag of Canada?
2. If so, why is this flag not displayed on the main tower of the parliament buildings?
3. If not, has Canada a national flag?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that in reading over these questions I have asked myself several times whether the hon. member who has asked them does appreciate that at the present time the world is engaged in a war in which the whole future of civilization and freedom itself is at stake. The questions are not asked for the purpose of securing information, because I have already answered questions with regard to a Canadian flag. They are asked to add fuel to a possible flame of controversy with respect to the flag in a time of war. I refuse to make any further answer to the hon. member with respect to the questions which he has asked in regard to the flag.

At this time surely hon. members of parliament must realize that there is a condition existing in the world that is more serious than any that has ever existed heretofore. They must further, if they are at all appreciative of what is reported in the press from day to day, realize that events the like of which none of us is able to contemplate are likely to take place in the course of a very few days, if I may go that far. In these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, is this country to have a flag controversy to be added to the other factors that may make for disunion at a time when above all else unity is required? I speak with feeling, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that before this summer is over this house will have strong reason to see the wisdom of not permitting anything in the nature of controversy to arise at this time when there is need for the greatest possible unity on all sides.

STORAGE OF WESTERN WHEAT AND COARSE GRAINS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

What arrangements are being made to provide advance payments or loans to the farmers of western Canada in order to assist in the storage of over 600,000,000 bushels of wheat and coarse grains?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of government policy and will be considered by the government in the light of the final results obtained from the present crop year and in the light of the extent and distribution of the 1943 crops.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—TORONTO SHIPBUILDING COMPANY

Mr. ADAMSON:

1. Has the Minister of Munitions and Supply, or any official in his department, received any communications from L. Sefton of the United Steel Workers of America relating to conditions in the Toronto Shipbuilding Company's yard?
2. If so, what was the date or dates of such communications?
3. Upon what dates were the said communications received in the said department?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. Two communications were received as follows: (a) An undated report over the signature of L. Sefton, representative of the United Steelworkers of America, entitled "Factors Entering into the Toronto Shipyards Dispute."—received June 21, 1943; (b) A letter from L. Sefton to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, dated June 25, 1943, and received June 27, 1943, enclosing a further copy of the report mentioned in (a).

NOTE: L. Sefton is not an employee of the Toronto Shipbuilding Company Limited.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL F. W. CLARKE

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Has Lt.-Colonel F. W. Clarke received an appointment in the adjutant-general's branch of the Department of National Defence?
2. If so, what are his duties?
3. What does he receive by way of, (a) remuneration; (b) expenses and allowances?
4. What was his military experience prior to this war?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Yes.

2. Special assistant to the adjutant-general on mattters pertaining to Canadian prisoners of war in enemy hands, and head of the section in the adjutant-general's branch having to do with such prisoners of war.

3. (a) Nil; (b) Nil.

4. Honorary Lieutenant-Colonel, Royal Rifles of Canada. He is 56 years of age.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN FORCES—ENLISTMENTS AND DISCHARGES

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Since the commencement of the war, and including personnel in the permanent army, navy and air force when the war began, what is the total number of men taken on the strength for active full time duties in, (a) the army; (b) the navy; (c) the air force?
2. How many of the same have been struck off the strength or ceased from any cause to be members of the same forces?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Order for return, but with the reservation that is always made that the exact strength is not to be shown.

UKRAINIAN FARMER LABOR TEMPLE ASSOCIATION

Mrs. NIELSEN:

1. Were a Mr. Wenspir and a Mr. Hamilton representatives of the custodian of enemy alien property in the city of Edmonton, Alberta, in 1941?

2. If so, (a) did they order the destruction of the library of roughly a thousand books belonging to the Ukrainian Farmer Labor Temple Association at 10628-96th street, Edmonton, in or about the month of April, 1941; (b) what volumes were destroyed, and how; (c) for what reason were such books destroyed; (d) was an auction or other sale of furniture and equipment also made on or about the same time under the direction of Messrs. Wenspir and Hamilton, belonging to the same association?

3. Were books comprising the library of the Ukrainian Farmer Labor Temple Association at 300 Bathurst street, Toronto, taken to the premises of the Pullan Paper Stock, Ltd., at Trinity and Parliament streets, Toronto, for destruction, in the early part of 1941? If so, how many volumes were destroyed, and why?

4. Were furniture, effects, or books of this association sold, destroyed or otherwise disposed of in other places in Canada? If so, where?

5. Since such properties cannot be restored, how will restitution or compensation be made?

RADIO BROADCASTING—MILK, PEPSI-COLA AND COCA-COLA

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. Was Dr. DelVecchio, of Montreal, refused permission by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to speak in favour of raw milk in 1942?

2. If so, for what reason?

3. Why does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation permit the Pepsi-Cola and Coca-Cola companies to speak in favour of the sale of their products?

4. Why does the government permit trusts of pasteurized milk to speak over the radio?

5. What is the amount invested in the milk industry in Canada by Borden Milk Company?

6. Have chemical analyses of Coca-Cola been made? If so, does the Department of National Health recommend these beverages?

7. Why does the federal government permit the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to advertise such product, and to use gasoline for its transport?

8. Are farmers denied the same privilege for the transport of raw milk?

9. If so, why?

CHRISTIE STREET HOSPITAL, TORONTO

Mr. BRUCE:

1. What amount of ground is available for patients for recreation purposes, exclusive of the buildings, on the property of the Christie street hospital?

[Mr. Maybank.]

2. What is the distance between the northerly limit of the right-of-way of the railway and the nearest point of the Christie street hospital property?

3. What factories or industries are located outside the Christie street hospital within a radius of half a mile, (a) to the west of the hospital; (b) to the south of the hospital; (c) to the north of the hospital?

4. Do any of these factories operate continuously day and night?

5. If so, how many?

6. Does any factory work at night with the help of donkey engines and searchlights?

7. Are the neurological wards of the hospital situated on the westerly side of the hospital?

8. If so, what distance are these wards from the nearest factory or industry?

9. Have any complaints been made of the patients in these neurological wards not being able to sleep at nights because of the noise from these factories or industries?

10. If so, what have the authorities done or do they propose to do in the circumstances?

11. Are casualties from the present war placed in the wards with chronic invalids from the last war?

12. If so, does the Department of National Health consider this a satisfactory and proper arrangement?

13. Is the dining-room still in the basement?

14. What is the personnel of the wartime committee on hospitalization?

CANADIAN FORCES AND MERCHANT MARINE—HOSTELS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. At what places in Nova Scotia have hostels been provided for persons in the armed services or in the merchant marine?

2. Has a hostel been provided at Liverpool, Nova Scotia, with special reference to the needs of those in the naval services, or is such contemplated?

3. What is the cost of each such property for, (a) construction; (b) purchase; (c) rental?

4. What has been the cost of, also the estimate cost to complete each property for, (a) improvements; (b) equipment and furnishings?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—PRINCE RUPERT

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda, contracts and other documents exchanged between Wartime Housing Limited, or any official thereof, and the city of Prince Rupert, or any official thereof, dated since January 1, 1941.

HOUSING IN PRINCE RUPERT

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda, contracts and other documents exchanged between the Department of Munitions and Supply, or any official thereof, and the city of Prince Rupert, or any official thereof, relating to housing in the city of Prince Rupert, dated since January 1, 1941.

KELVINGTON, SASK., POST OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. NICHOLSON:

ALLOTMENT OF GRAIN AT WESTERN DELIVERY POINTS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a copy of all letters of instruction, circulars and other notices sent from June 1, 1940, up to and including April 30, 1943, to railway companies or their agents, grain companies or their agents, by the Canadian wheat board or its committees, respecting the allotment of grain cars at delivery points throughout western Canada.

REDISTRIBUTION

AMENDMENT TO B. N. A. ACT TO POSTPONE ADJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION UNTIL CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved:

That whereas provisions of the British North America Act require that, on the completion of each decennial census, the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons shall be readjusted;

And whereas such readjustment involves in fact the determination of the number of members to represent each province and the number of electoral divisions within each province and the delimitation of such electoral divisions;

And whereas Canada has been at war since September 10, 1939, and hostilities may continue for an indefinite period;

And whereas the census of 1941 was taken during the progress of hostilities;

And whereas the effect of enlistment in the armed forces of Canada and of employment in the production of munitions of war has been to remove large numbers of the population from their homes to serve in and with such armed forces either in other parts of Canada or overseas or to reside temporarily in other parts of Canada;

And whereas experience has shown that such readjustment may give rise to sharp differences of opinion as to the appropriate delimitation of electoral divisions, which differences it is most desirable to avoid while Canada continues at war;

And whereas in these circumstances it does not now seem desirable that readjustment of representation on the basis of the census of 1941 should have to be made during the continuance of the hostilities in which Canada is now engaged,

A humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:—

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that You may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:—

An act to provide for the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons of Canada consequent on the decennial census taken in the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-one.

Whereas the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted an address to His Majesty praying that His Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth,

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

1. Notwithstanding anything in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1940, it shall not be necessary that the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons be readjusted, in consequence of the completion of the decennial census taken in the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-one, until the first session of the parliament of Canada commencing after the cessation of hostilities between Canada and the German Reich, the Kingdom of Italy and the Empire of Japan.

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1943, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1940, the British North America Act, 1907, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1943.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit certain considerations to the house in support of the motion you have just read. Members will have noted that it provides that a humble address be presented to His Majesty the King praying that he may be graciously pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to provide that:

Notwithstanding anything in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1940, it shall not be necessary that the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons be readjusted, in consequence of the completion of the decennial census taken in the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-one, until the first session of the Parliament of Canada commencing after the cessation of hostilities between Canada and the German Reich, the Kingdom of Italy and the Empire of Japan.

The reasons for this procedure are of course obvious to all hon. members. They arise out of the terms of the statute of Westminster, 1931. Hon. members will remember that it is recited in the preamble to that statute that—

> . . . it is in accord with the established constitutional position that no law hereafter made by the parliament of the United Kingdom shall extend to any of the dominions as part of the law of that dominion otherwise than at the request and with the consent of that dominion.

It is for that reason that the humble address provides for a recital that the act mentioned therein is to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom at the express request of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada.

The statute of Westminster also provides, in the enacting portion, that—

> No act of parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this act shall extend or be deemed to extend to a dominion as part of the law of that dominion unless it is expressly declared in that act that that dominion has requested, and consented to, the enactment thereof.

I may also call attention to one further provision of the statute of Westminster, section 7, subsection (1):

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts 1867 to 1930 or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

So that it is quite clear that if it is desirable in fact that readjustment of the representation of the provinces do not take place at the time normally provided by the British North America Act, the procedure to achieve that must be a request to the parliament of the United Kingdom to enact legislation to that effect.

I do not propose to labour that point. I wish to confine my remarks to the development of certain reasons why it may appear desirable that this readjustment should not be made at this time.

Under section 37 of the British North America Act, 1867, it was provided that the House of Commons of Canada should consist of 181 members, of whom 82 should be elected for Ontario, 65 for Quebec, 19 for Nova Scotia, and 15 for New Brunswick. Then it was provided under section 51 that after the completion of the census of 1871 and of each subsequent decennial census the representation of the four provinces should be readjusted by such authority in such manner and from such time as the parliament of Canada provided, subject to certain general rules, as follows:

Quebec was to have a fixed number of 65 members.

There was to be assigned to each other province such a number of members as would bear the same proportion to the number of its population ascertained at that census as the number 65 bore to the number of the population of Quebec at the same census.

It was further provided that in the computation of the number of members for a province, a fractional part not exceeding one-half of the whole number requisite for entitling the province to a member would be disregarded. But a fractional part exceeding one-half of that number would be equivalent to the whole number.

Now, the census of 1941 established that the population of the province of Quebec was 3,328,815. Dividing this by 65 gives us the quotient 51,213. According to that general rule the representation of provinces according to population would be as follows:

	Population	Number of members
Prince Edward Island..	95,047	2
Nova Scotia.....	577,962	11
New Brunswick.....	457,401	9
Ontario	3,787,655	74
Manitoba	729,744	14
Saskatchewan	895,992	17
Alberta	796,169	16
British Columbia.....	817,861	16

But section 51 further provided that on any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards. That is the text of the proviso of section 51. In 1915 an amendment of the British North America Act was passed by the imperial parliament at the request of this parliament providing that, "notwithstanding anything in the said act, a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators represent such province." Because of these provisions, the result, instead of being that which I gave a moment ago, would be as follows: Prince Edward Island would have 4 members instead of 2; Nova Scotia, 12 instead of 11, New Brunswick, 10 instead of 9; Ontario, 82 instead of 74; Alberta 17 instead of 16; Saskatchewan, with 99,823 people more than Alberta, would have the same representation; Manitoba, with only 66,425 less than Alberta, would have three less members; Ontario would have 17 members more than Quebec for a difference in population of 458,840; Saskatchewan would have only 17 members for 895,992 people.

This would be the result in spite of the fact that, since Ontario's representation was diminished in 1911, its proportion of the total population has diminished not by one-twentieth but by one-sixteenth; but because that diminution has not come about in one decade, and because the privy council in the Prince Edward Island case in 1904 held that when as a result of a census the representation of the provinces is reconsidered and the necessary changes therein made to bring it in harmony with the result of the census, it is a readjustment within the meaning of the proviso I read a moment ago, whether there be or be not any change in the case of any one province. Ontario would therefore, under that construction of subsection 4 made by the privy council in the Prince Edward Island case, be entitled to retain its 82 members.

That particular question as to whether in order that it be considered the diminution of one-twentieth had to take place in one decade, was not before the privy council for decision. What was before them for decision was whether the aggregate population to be considered to make the required calculations was the aggregate of the four original provinces or the aggregate of all the provinces which had since been added to the four original ones; and secondly they had before them for decision the question whether there could be a readjustment downward before there had been at least one readjustment upward in the representation of a province. What was being argued on behalf of Prince Edward Island was that the one-twentieth diminution had to be a diminution since a prior readjustment, and if there had been no change in the original number of representatives of a province, it was argued, there had been no readjustment and therefore there was no ascertained period to provide figures for the comparison.

That contention of the province was set aside, but in setting it aside their lordships used the language above cited, which I am going to read again:

> When as a result of a census the representation of the provinces is reconsidered and the necessary changes therein made to bring it in harmony with the result of the census, it is a readjustment within the meaning of subsection 4, whether there be or be not any change in the case of any one province.

Now it can hardly be contended that when the fathers of confederation were providing for representation by population they intended that cumulative diminutions would for all time remain ineffective if they did not all happen to come within the one decade. It is certainly arguable that if their lordships had had for decision a case in which it appeared that since any change in the representation of a province there has occurred a diminution of that province's proportion of population amounting to more than one-twentieth, although that diminution was spread out over more than one decade, they might have been expected to hold that the proper construction of the act required that this diminution in proportion be taken into account in determining the province's future representation.

Now, however, only legislation or qualification by the privy council itself of the language which I have quoted could change that rule. Therefore to make a redistribution at this time would give Saskatchewan only 17 representatives instead of 21 for its population of 895,000, while Ontario retains 17 for a population of 458,840, more than the population which Quebec still has.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister repeat that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To make a redistribution at this time would give Saskatchewan only 17 representatives instead of 21 for its population of 895,992, while Ontario, because it has 458,840 more than Quebec, would have 17 members more than 65. That would not appear to be fair; nor would it appear to be fair to reduce Manitoba from 17 to 14 with a population of 729,744. It is argued on behalf of Manitoba and Saskatchewan that some of their population has been drained away as an effect of enlistments in the armed forces and of a drift from certain portions of those provinces to war plants in Ontario and Quebec or British Columbia. As to the men who enlisted, though efforts were made in taking the census to credit all these men to their own respective provinces, it undoubtedly did happen that some of them had changed their homes since enlistment, and there is no doubt that a great many had changed their homes to go to war plants in other centres. It can be argued that these provinces should not be penalized because of these facts, but to make a redistribution at this time and not to make it along the lines above indicated would require an amendment to the constitution.

Now, though it is admittedly unfair to Saskatchewan and Manitoba to make the unit of representation for them 51,213, while Ontario, for 17 of its members, has a unit of 27,000 each, it would be equally unfair to leave Quebec with a unit of 51,213 for each of its representatives, and if a measure was to be introduced to remove this unfairness from the constitution of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, the people of Quebec might be expected to insist that they be given the same consideration. And who would there be to gainsay them if they said that British fair play meant fair play for all British subjects, whatever their race or religion.

Hon. members will readily appreciate what kind of situation would have arisen had any attempt been made at this time to amend the constitution for the purpose, among others, of allowing Quebec to have a greater proportion of representatives in the parliament of the nation. It would of course be a reasonable thing to do, and if the trend of population does not change, it is something which will have to be done some day. But it is like the question of a national flag, to which reference was made this afternoon. The applause which greeted the remarks of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) led me to believe that this house feels it is not the proper time to have a controversy of that kind. On the merits, no one can deny that it would be reasonable for the Canadian nation to signify its national status by a distinctive national flag and a distinctive national anthem. Who among us was not deeply moved when he heard Mr. Anthony Eden describe the landing in the British isles of our first expeditionary force in this war? I beg leave to quote from page 1746 of Hansard:

As dominions secretary in the opening months of the war it was my privilege to travel to a certain port, there to welcome the first contingent of your army to reach the shores of the old country. Sir, I could never forget that scene. It was a beautiful winter morning, such as we do have in Britain sometimes, at a famous port which I suppose must still remain anonymous; such are the rules of censorship. I was the spectator of the scene from the flagship of the commander-in-chief of the home fleet. As the great armada of liners swung into sight under the escort of the Royal Navy, cheering Canadian troops lined the decks and the band of the flagship played "O Canada." I suppose that seldom in human history have so many great transports and so many powerful ships of war been assembled together at one time. That was Canada making her contribution in the hour of need, and that was only the beginning.

May I be permitted to quote what the editor of Saturday Night had to say about this in the issue of April 24 last. It is under the title "A Hymn and a Flag," and reads in part as follows:

Speaking in the Canadian Commons at Ottawa a few weeks ago, Mr. Anthony Eden used for one of his most moving passages a description of the arrival in a British port of the first body of Canadian troops to reach England in the present war. He was not only a witness but a prominent participant, and the account lost nothing in the artistry of his telling. Its climax was a reference to the playing by the attendant bands of the hymn "O Canada" and it occurred to us to reflect how completely that element of the scenario of the great drama would have failed of effect if there had been no Canadian anthem for the bands to play. For the playing of God Save the King, an immensely profound and spiritual a piece of ritual in the proper circumstances, would have had absolutely no reference to the special qualities of that situation, the special significance of that drama. What made the situation dramatic was simply the fact that here were troops not raised by the fiat of the government of Great Britain, but raised by the fiat of another nation three thousand miles away from the European conflict, and yet ready to spend vast amounts of its treasures and much of the best blood of its young men in the same cause in which Great Britain already stood embattled.

Other self-governing dominions are equally fighting by the side of Britain, but if we are not mistaken, none of them can symbolize their unity and their distinct personality by a song corresponding to that of Canada. Australia and South Africa are younger dominions than we are, and their troops land in Britain without being able to announce what they are in the notes of their band. And if it is valuable to Canada to have her special and characterizing song is there any reason to suppose it would not be valuable to have her special and distinctive flag?

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may interrupt my hon. friend, I do not want to destroy his argument, which perhaps has some relationship to the matters which it is understood are now under discussion, but I am not quite able to see the relevancy of the minister's present remarks to the question which is before the house. Perhaps he would be good enough to explain.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will bear with me in patience for just a few moments, he will soon see their relevancy to the subject now under discussion.

If the strains of "O Canada" announcing to the British people that Canada was fighting by their side, were a noble and inspiring element in one of the great scenes of history, why should not a Canadian flag, proclaiming to all the world the same announcement even before the music broke, have been equally noble and inspiring?

But the applause that came from all sides of the house this afternoon has shown how necessary it has been to say that, desirable as it may be to have a distinctive flag and a distinctive anthem, the selection of the flag and the selection of the anthem would be apt to give rise to such differences of opinion and such debates that it seems the counsel of wisdom not to take our minds off the problems of the war in these critical days to devote the necessary time and attention to debates about matters which, though they are important, are nevertheless of concern only to ourselves.

I submit to you, sir, that the same must be said of any attempt to settle now the proper rules for a fair proportional representation of all the provinces in this house. Does it require any vivid imagination to foresee the possibilities of serious racial and religious controversy over any proposal to decrease Ontario's representation in this house to the end that the voting strength of the representatives of Quebec might constitute a larger proportion and be capable of exercising greater influence on decisions? It is not always comfortable to be a realist, but it is not always wise to be an ostrich. Statistics do show that over the last two decades the population of Quebec has been increasing more rapidly than that of Ontario. Quebec's percentage of increase from 1921 to 1931 was 21·77 per cent against Ontario's 16·98 per cent. From 1931 to 1941 Quebec's increase was 15·90 against Ontario's 10·307.

Now it has been asserted more than once, not by very many, and wrongly I submit, but nevertheless asserted, that this is the result of a dark conspiracy of "that man" in the vatican and "that cardinal" in Quebec to get control of the government of this country. We all know that the assertion has been made, not by very many, but by some, that Quebec did not supply its quota of men in the armed forces in the last war and refrained from doing so, by design, to save its men in order to father an increasing number of Canadian voters of the French race. We all know that that assertion has been made by some again this time. Well, I deny both the fact and the design. I do not wish to provoke controversy, but I merely wish to indicate the kind of controversy which it seems desirable to avoid.

As to what did in fact arise out of the last war, it may or may not be important, but it is of some interest to note that in 1941 Ontario had 584,740 men in the age group of 40 to 70, and in the same age group 559,944 women. Quebec had 390,064 men and 372,630 women. There is no very great disparity there. The difference favouring the male portion of the Canadian population is something which runs through the whole of these decennial censuses. In 1941 Ontario's total male population was 1,921,201, of which a little over thirty per cent were of the age group 40 to 70. Quebec had 1,672,982, of which 390,064, or 23·3 per cent, were in the age group 40 to 70. That does not indicate that Quebec saved more men out of the last war than Ontario did.

As to this war, I have been talking with men who have returned from overseas, who have had an opportunity of getting about and seeing the state of affairs over there, and according to their impression and the best estimate they could make, 35 per cent of the men in our Canadian army overseas are of the French race. I have cross-examined them about it, and they persist in the assertion that if it were desirable and workable to have an individual census made it would confirm that estimate. That would be a big job to have done accurately, and we all realize that the military heads over there have a lot more important things to do than to sort out the racial origins of Canadians who have gone there as Canadians, and who are prepared and ready to offer their lives for the victory of the united nations.

In the navy and in the air force the situation may be different. But it must not be forgotten that up to the present time, because of the haste with which these services have been organized and have had to be expanded, it has been deemed necessary that all the men enlisting in them be able to take their full courses of instruction in English, and that these services have had to be looked upon as English-speaking services. I know that efforts are being made, and I know of the plans in the course of implementation to provide, if not French-speaking units, at least bilingual units in the navy and in the air force, to such extent, that even if commands and signals have to be given and understood in English, French-speaking members can get together and rub shoulders against each other and speak their own language in their respective groups and ward rooms without being looked upon as indulging in some antics that are not just good form. I know that certain books of instructions, elementary and incomplete if you will, so far, are being prepared to facilitate to the boys from French-speaking homes the acquisition of such knowledge of English as is considered to be indispensable for the performance of their respective duties.

It is difficult, it is inconvenient, but it is not impossible and it is not unreasonable. Some may say, "Well, why should they not learn Englsh if English is the prevalent language of the service in which they are engaged?" Did anyone ever pretend before the capitulation of France that it could not be one of the united nations because its language was not English? Does anyone pretend now that the French forces that are being reorganized in North Africa will have to learn English before they can do their part in this fight? Does anyone pretend that the men on the French ships now joining the naval forces of the united nations will have to learn English before they can confront our common enemy? Would anyone pretend that the government of the United States of America, before making available to the French committee of national liberation in North Africa over $75,000,000 worth of war equipment under lease-lend arrangements, as was reported by Mr. Stettinius a few days ago, should have inquired what language would be spoken by the troops who will be using this equipment against the same common enemy?

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I have risen once before to make my point of order, and I hesitate to do so again. But I submit that on a question having to do with an amendment to the British North America Act we are going pretty far afield when we go to North Africa. My hon. friend should restrict his remarks to the point at issue. I have not yet been able to see the basis upon which he is making his argument. I know that the minister has something in mind, but I object to the circuitous route he is taking to reach the point. I believe this matter must be drawn to the attention of the house, because the minister should confine himself to the point at issue. Other hon. members are asked to do that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that what I have said is part of the argument I have to offer to the House of Commons. I am endeavouring to submit to the house definite information on certain things, and I believe that is the right thing to do at this time. I am pointing out that there is a time when it will be possible to have accomplished a few things which are to-day looked upon by all the people, or should be looked upon by all the people, as the right and reasonable things to do. And in seeking further to make that argument I am pointing out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members, that the assertion made from time to time—not here, fortunately, and not by a great many—that there is a sinister plan by members of this nation of French origin and of Roman Catholic religion to get control of the government of this country—

Mr. GRAYDON: Who ever suggested that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If my hon. friend has never heard it suggested, then he has not full knowledge of what has been going on in this country for the last quarter of a century.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for St. Boniface thought so, and said it in the House of Commons, but he was wrong.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who was?

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for St. Boniface, but he was all wrong. He knows nothing about our problems.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The leader of the opposition must realize that this proposal, for the time being, is a proposal which will not allow, until readjustments take place, Quebec to have the proper representation it would have by adhering strictly to the rules I cited in the opening of my argument. I do not know whether my hon. friend has compared the figures given, but that is the fact. Saskatchewan and Manitoba would, in a redistribution at this time, get, under the rules I cited, smaller representation. But that would be an unfair situation. It would be a situation the unfairness of which they would see. I wish hon. members to realize that when there is an unfairness apparent in respect of Manitoba and Saskatchewan there is also an unfairness to Quebec apparent at least to those of us who represent Quebec, and that we feel when unfairness is to be removed there should be set a pattern which could be applied to all the provinces.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to bow to your ruling on the point of order raised by the leader of the opposition. If I am out of order, then certainly I do not wish to remain out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point raised by the leader of the opposition brings before the house the difficulty I might have in confining discussion to the issues of the resolution before the house. We have before us a resolution which is in concrete terms, and it is my view that hon. members should confine themselves to the arguments flowing from the resolution, and that they ought not to introduce matters extraneous to the resolution. I would prefer that the Minister of Justice confine himself to the resolution, making such arguments as he sees fit. I would point out to the house that the resolution before us deals with one subject, and I hope hon. members will confine themselves to that one subject.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I just add this, that confederation was accomplished on the basis of a Canadian nation of two races, two main races with two main languages. The provisions therein were adopted to the end that that condition might be perpetuated. And when I am asking members of parliament who are of my race and who speak my language to accept this resolution, I submit I also have the right to point out to them to what extent I realize their position, and to what extent I am asking them to forgo something for the time being, for the sake of avoiding controversy and disputes which would be disruptive of that national unity which we require to achieve in the war we are waging. It is in that sense that I bring these matters before them, so that they may give them their consideration and may, I hope, arrive at the same conclusion I have reached.

The leader of the opposition asked me to explain how I was making this relevant to the discussion. Well, no one in Canada would pretend that we in Canada should make an inquiry in respect of language in pursuing the negotiations which are now under way for making available to those same fighting French forces a substantial share of the Canadian supplies to be provided under the United Nations Mutual Aid Act recently adopted by this parliament. I wish to instance, as evidence of the possibility of surmounting language difficulties where there is a will to serve and to fight in a common cause, the fact that a great many young French airmen from North Africa are already in or on their way to United States training camps to better fit themselves for their part in the continuation of the struggle.

In view of the traditional bonds of friendship which unite Canada and France, and the fact that these bonds could only be strengthened by the presence of young Frenchmen training with youth of our own country in the splendid establishments which have been set up by my colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), can anyone doubt that it will not be long before French aircrew will be training in our Canadian air schools? Of course there are language difficulties, but difficulties in the way of accomplishing anything really worth while are things for resolute men to grapple with and to overcome.

This house is by the constitution a bilingual house. Does anyone pretend that every hon. member has to learn the two languages before he can take his seat in it? I do not wish to be provocative, but I am entitled to be a realist. The Canadian constitution, as I said a moment ago, was established on the basis of this recognition of the two races and the two languages. There may have been earlier days in our history when it was felt by some that it might be desirable and possible to have a one-language British dependency on the north American continent, but those who cherished such hopes had also to be realists, and the realities were crystallized in the achievement of confederation.

Section 133 of the constitutional act deals with the matter of languages. It provides for bilingualism in this house, in this parliament, in its journals, in its records and acts, and in the pleadings and processes of the courts of Canada established under the act, to the same extent and just as fully as it provides for bilingualism in the proceedings of the Quebec legislature and the Quebec courts.

I am satisfied that the day will come when, if not all those who sit in this house, at least its readers and those who grace the treasury benches and those who sit immediately opposite, will find it to their advantage to be bilingual. I do not suggest that we from the province of Quebec are going to try to impose our language upon anybody, but I do suggest that the time will come when those whom I have indicated will find it to their advantage to learn and to understand and to use the French language as we from Quebec have found it to our advantage to learn and to understand and to use the language in which I am speaking at this moment. Not merely for the purpose of reciting a few lines prepared in advance by some helpful secretary—that is a token which we recognize and appreciate as such—but to make the kind of speech that Lord Halifax made at the last convocation of Laval university in Quebec; the kind of speech Mr. Churchill made in this house in December, 1941; the kind of speech Mr. Eden made as a part of his address when he spoke in this house a few weeks ago; the kind of speech the queen made at the laying of the cornerstone of the supreme court building, or that His Majesty makes on the proper occasions; the kind of speech that Mr. Roosevelt makes from time to time; the kind of speech that Princess Elizabeth will be able to make when she has completed her training for the great role which fate seems to have mapped out for her.

I hope neither Your Honour nor any hon. member will feel that I am forecasting a too onerous burden for you or your successors. It will not be any greater burden than we of the French race assume when we prepare to enter this house or after we get here, or any greater burden than Princess Elizabeth is assuming at the present time. But whether it is a burden or not, I do make the boast that up to the present time, whatever reproach may be levelled against the Canadians of French origin from my province, their contribution to implementing the bilingual provisions of the constitutional act has not been inferior to that of any other group. Perhaps the leader of the opposition may think that I should apologize for this digression, but it must be only—

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not ask for any apology. If the minister feels somewhat apologetic, that is all right, but I have not asked him for an apology. I was listening with a great deal of interest to what he said. I must confess that I might have risen to ask that he confine himself to the points at issue, but I thought perhaps my views on that subject might be misunderstood and I allowed him to go on without any interruption. But, Mr. Speaker, I think in all fairness you should ask the minister to try to confine himself to the resolution which is before the house.

These other things are matters which I think might well be left over for the moment. My understanding of this resolution was that it had to do with an amendment to the British North America Act which would not obviate the necessity of having a redistribution during this session of parliament or for a certain time afterward. Surely we have come now to a point where it will be most difficult for Your Honour to confine the speeches that will be made during the course of this debate. I do say with all kindness and with all courtesy to the very courteous gentleman who is making the speech that I hope he understands the motives behind my making this suggestion. I do not rise in any desire to be carpingly critical of what he is saying, or now to take any issue with him; I rise for the sole object of trying to confine the argument, which Your Honour has tried so often to do in days gone by, and I hope I shall have as much success as Your Honour has had. I would ask Your Honour to ask the minister to confine his argument to the points at issue. Surely he has arguments in his notes which do not cover such a wide field as he is now trying to cover.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think the leader of the opposition will have much more reason, if ever he had any, to complain about the kind of speech I am making.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is not the kind of speech the minister is making; it is the fact that he is covering ground that has nothing to do with this measure.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not covering ground that has nothing to do with the measure. This is a proposal to make a modification to the act of 1867. Whenever there is any change to be made in that act it must deal with the situation which had to be dealt with by the fathers of confederation, something that might serve to weld into one nation two groups of different origin, of different language, of different religion. Whenever modifications are being made that may be looked upon as infringing upon the privileges secured to one group in favour of another group, it is something which is of broad consequence and must be envisaged in that light. But I have dealt with what I wished to deal with in that respect.

While it is reasonable and proper and appropriate at all times to give full recognition in this parliament to the equality of the races and of those who speak the two prevailing languages, in respect of rights as well as in respect of obligations, there are times when the obligations are such that the whole of our time and our attention and our efforts must be given to properly discharging them. While this war continues our obligation is to prosecute it and to win it, and that requires the united and concerted efforts of the whole of our population. This is not the time to bring up for determination matters which can probably not be determined without debates apt to give rise to aspersions and denials, recriminations and aspirations, to words hotly spoken and perhaps susceptible of being deeply resented. I sincerely feel that because of the predominance of French in Quebec and English elsewhere any attempt to settle at this time a permanent pattern for the proper representation of the provinces in this house might well be such an occasion.

I wish to mention one other reason for postponing this redistribution. Redistribution will not only mean the determining of the appropriate number of representatives in this house for each province; it will mean the redistribution of this representation within each province according to territorial divisions. Now in the past there have been redistributions when the members of the party now led by my chief felt there were deliberate attempts to "hive the grits" and to make "safe seats" for members of the party commanding the majority in the house at the time those redistributions were effected. Of course like charges, absolutely unfounded in fact I am sure, have been made about redistribution statutes passed at times when this party was in power. Unfounded as those charges must necessarily have been, there were probably some people who believed, and there are probably some who still believe, that redistribution committees are apt to keep one eye on the possibilities of future elections. I submit that that is wrong; that should not be. Redistribution should, of course, be based upon the convenience of the public and with a view to secure proper representation for the different localities. But it should also be made with a view to interfering as little as possible with established territorial divisions to which the public has become accustomed.

When I was elected to represent the division of Quebec East in this house I was not unmindful of the fact that for sixty-three years Quebec East had been represented in this house by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and by my own immediate predecessor, the right hon. Ernest Lapointe. During those sixty-three years Quebec East had come to mean something to a great many people, not only to people in the constituency itself but to others. What is true of Quebec East must be true of most of the constituencies in this dominion. The lives of the men who have been associated with them have taken something from them, but in return have added something to them which it is worth while to conserve. They should not lightly be the subject of decennial changes for any passing advantage of any party or any partisan. They should be established in such manner that they can remain the territorial setting of groups of Canadian citizens towards whom the men sitting in this house have, and feel that they have, specific responsibilities; citizens whom they can get to know not only as individuals but as members of a group capable of common ideals and aspirations and local traditions and even a local pride in the kind of contribution they have made in the past and are making and hope to make in the future, to the welfare of the nation, by and with their chosen representative.

At this time the unit of representation derived from the population of the province of Quebec is 51,213. In that province there are no less than seventeen constituencies with a population of less than 40,000; in Ontario, there are thirty-seven; in Nova Scotia, four; five in New Brunswick; one in Alberta; five in British Columbia. These are practically all rural constituencies, and it may with plausibility be asserted that their population at the taking of the census was affected by the movement of some of their people to urban centres to engage in war industries. Many of them are also actually represented by members of this house now engaged in the glorious task of securing its safety against the onslaughts of foreign enemies. Some of those constituencies might have to disappear, and that would be a matter of serious concern and one which should have serious consideration. Should these men now serving with our armed forces and those who have moved from rural to urban centres to engage in war activities be distured in their present duties by any anxieties as to what might be done to their home constituenecies during their absence?

It is for these reasons that I recommend this resolution to the sympathetic consideration of the house, trusting that in other not too distant days a redistribution may be arrived at that will be fair to the respective provinces, fair to the men who are carrying on our fight, fair to those who feel that the historical significance attached to stable constituencies is something which has more than merely sentimental value.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two with respect to the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who has sponsored this resolution.

May I say first of all to my hon. friend that it was with the greatest hesitation that I undertook to inject into the debate any suggestion that he might perhaps better confine his remarks to the subject under discussion. I did so not simply because it was a matter of interest to myself or to the party which I have the honour to lead in this house, but because I felt it was essential that the resolution be adhered to in its present form, so far as the argument of the minister was concerned, from the point of view of the national interest in the larger sense.

I have no idea yet what the real motive was behind the lengthy argument which the minister made. A large part of his remarks seemed to be far afield from the problem to be discussed on this resolution. With every courtesy to the minister may I say in all fairness that I felt that he had presupposed some divisions in the house and in the country with respect to this measure which I believe do not exist. I have felt that it is improper at this time of war, as it is improper even in time of peace, to be even hesitantly provocative, shall I say, with respect to many matters which are dangerous so far as our national life is concerned, and I was sorry to see the minister this afternoon introduce into his argument some questions which I think could more properly have been left out. I do not believe in time of war or in time of peace in presupposing differences between our population or in creating unnecessary difficulties between the ministry and parliament or between different sections of our people. The minister's mention of the national anthem and the national flag I think might properly have been left to another time. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) took a stand on that this afternoon, as he did on a previous occasion in this house; he said this was not the time to indulge in discussions with respect to matters which might easily become inflammatory in a nation at war. With those sentiments I think most hon. members on this side are in agreement, because there are more urgent problems facing this country in time of war than questions respecting the union jack or the national anthem. I can only assume that the minister in his remarks—I am not saying this offensively, because it is a term generally accepted—was bringing in through the back door some propaganda which in his opinion was essential to his argument. But as I listened to it I was unable to agree that it was of very much help to him in support of his resolution.

I have always felt, Mr. Speaker, that in the final analysis we can rely on the people of this country, regardless of their racial origins, to be Canadians, and having regard to that fact it seems to me that all of us should at all times exercise the utmost tolerance towards those who do not always think as we do. I should like to see this question approached, as I am sure it will be, in a spirit of tolerance, which is becoming not only in time of war but to us as a great people in time of peace as well. I make this plea to the House of Commons because it is my heartfelt view that if there is one thing we need more than another at this time, it is not the presupposition of differences but emphasis laid upon tolerance and upon the fact that all of us are Canadians.

And so I come to this point. We have not won this war yet. The spirit of optimism which seems to have gripped the united nations may become a dangerous optimism unless we as a people understand how to deal with the present situation. While there is every reason perhaps to feel optimistic, nevertheless the fiercest challenge, so far as bloody hostilities are concerned, still lies before us. I have this feeling, and it has become more pronounced since I have sat in this seat as leader of the opposition during this session. I feel that the less we deal in national differences, in partisan differences and all those things that might perhaps divide us and divert our attention from the great object of winning the war the better, and we should frown upon them as members of parliament no matter to what party we may belong. There should be no narrow views and no narrow partisanship in time of war. I do not say that lightly, because, Mr. Speaker, and this house must recognize it, in the performance of its duty as a critic of the government His Majesty's Loyal Opposition sometimes finds it difficult, as an opposition in war time does, to know when to praise and when to strike. But whether it be praise or whether it be criticism, so far as His Majesty's Loyal Opposition is concerned, the praise is praise in the national interest and the criticism is criticism in the national interest, and no other factor must be involved. That is carrying out, as I see it, our duties as members of a war-time parliament. True, we are all prone to err. As someone has said, to err is human, to forgive divine. But it does seem to me that in a war-time period such as this we have a bounden duty to the Canadian people to make sure that whatever utterances we make and whatever action we take in this house shall be directed to the one supreme objective of the better and more comprehensive prosecution of our part in winning this war. So I say to the government and to Your Honour that there have been many times when criticism from these benches has been severe. It has been severe for the purpose of trying to effect necessary reforms in the government's policy. We have endeavoured as much as possible not to criticize for criticism's sake alone.

Having stated our position in this regard, it seems to me that despite the arguments of the minister in developing his reasons for bringing forward this amendment of the British North America Act, we must keep one thing closely in mind in connection with a matter of this kind, namely that we are experiencing war-time conditions of a strange and abnormal character. The resolution includes these paragraphs:

> And whereas the effect of enlistment in the armed forces of Canada and of employment in the production of munitions of war has been to remove large numbers of the population from their homes to serve in and with such armed forces either in other parts of Canada or overseas or to reside temporarily in other parts of Canada;
> And whereas experience has shown that such readjustment may give rise to sharp differences of opinion as to the appropriate delimitation of electoral divisions, which differences it is most desirable to avoid while Canada continues at war;
> And whereas in these circumstances it does not now seem desirable that readjustment of representation on the basis of the census of 1941 should have to be made during the continuance of the hostilities in which Canada is now engaged, . . .

Herein is contained, I think, the main argument for the measure which is proposed. Had it not been that the minister has inserted in his remarks matters which I regard as totally irrelevant, I would have made my remarks on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party very much briefer than I have been able to do. We recognize the vast changes which have taken place and the abnormal movements of population throughout Canada. We are anxious as a party that no provinces shall have any just grievance in respect to redistribution. Having that in mind, we base our support of this resolution upon the one ground that this is a war-time period when abnormal conditions exist. Because of the war and because of these conditions we feel that it is part of our duty to the nation at large to support the present resolution.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I rise to support the resolution of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). It is a time when every attempt should be made to prevent the raising of questions which may lead to bitter controversies between various parts of Canada. The Minister of Justice in his first remarks made what I thought to be an accurate and able analysis of the situation which has developed as a consequence of the working out of the basis laid down by confederation and by subsequent interpretation by the courts. But in my opinion the position in which this house is placed by a resolution of this description in the year 1943 is, to say the very least, undignified. "We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that You may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom", and so forth. The time has come when this country, as a free, independent, self-governing nation within the British commonwealth, where we wish to remain, under one head, to whom we believe this country should be loyal, His Majesty the King, should nevertheless assume the right to decide the destiny of this country and to amend its own constitution in its own way and in its own forms. I know that this it not the time when such could be undertaken. I know that the Minister of Justice in his remarks this afternoon had in view the safeguarding of certain rights which were the basis of the confederation pact. But let me say to him and those who believe with him that, from conversations again and again with members of the British House of Commons, some of them within the last few days, I am convinced that whenever Canada asks for an amendment of the British North America Act —which is, in effect, our constitution—no matter what amendment we may ask, the parliament of Great Britain will accede to the request and adopt the proposed amendment.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would not that involve the consent of each of the provinces as well?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the compact theory. The British North America Act is an act of the British parliament. The constitution of this country or any country ought not to be an act of parliament of any other country or any other parliament; it should be an act of the people of the country which is adopting the constitution. Hence I say that I agree with the Clerk of the House of Commons Doctor Arthur Beauchesne when he gave evidence before the committee on the British North America Act, some time ago, I think it was, in 1935, and with that most distinguished civil servant, who passed away a year or so ago, Doctor Skelton, when they both suggested to the committee that preparation should be made for the calling in Canada of a constituent assembly representative of all parts of this dominion with a view to arriving at an amicable, reasonable and fair settlement regarding the constitution or a constitution for Canada. These suggestions at the time were sound and good, and to-day, when we have before us a resolution of this description, in which we humbly pray that the king may cause to be laid before another parliament a measure amending the constitution of our country, we should think over these matters though we may not propose to act upon them during the period of the war. I know, of course, that at present the real power of amendment of our constitution, which is in the British North America Act, is in reality in the hands of this parliament. As I have just indicated, anything we may ask regarding amendment will be granted by the imperial parliament at Westminster. But this is a roundabout and dilatory way of doing something which we ought to be able to do in a direct way. The procedure of passing a resolution by this house and then by the senate praying His Majesty to do something is now outmoded and entirely out of date.

I was looking for what Doctor Skelton actually said in 1935. I happened to have it on my office desk and found it when I returned to the city at noon to-day. Giving evidence before the special committee which this house set up to look into the British North America Act in 1935, he was asked whether the United Kingdom should be retained as an instrument for making amendments to our constitution. He answered:

> I cannot see any reason for such a solution. No other country in the world looks to the parliament of another country for the shaping of its constitution. This solution could only be supported if we believed that Canadians were the only people so incompetent that they cannot work out a solution of their own constitutional problem and so biased that they alone among the peoples of the world cannot be trusted to deal fairly with the various domestic interests concerned.

I think we should face the problems raised by the Minister of Justice this afternoon. I believe we shall have to face them. Perhaps it might have been better had they not been raised this afternoon; nevertheless the time is coming when we must face them, and I hope I shall live to see the day when our two great peoples who have laid the foundations of this country can, by statute, if you will, which I think is saner than the present method, safeguard each other's rights; for we have to recognize that there are rights, and they should be safeguarded in such a manner that they will be safe in reality, and will provide a solution to make this country a more united nation than it is.

As an English-speaking member of this house who has a boy who was taught French by an English teacher, I regret most sincerely that I am unable to express myself in the language of such a large proportion of the members of this House of Commons. I should like to see my own children able to express themselves in that language, and in the last few days I have had the privilege of hearing English members of the British parliament at Westminster rise before a French-speaking audience in Quebec and express themselves beautifully, with ease, and at great length in the language of our French-speaking compatriots. It seems to me that we ought to face these problems, but one problem that we must face soon is that of amending this act ourselves.

For years social legislation could not be passed because we had not the power within the British North America Act to do certain things; and even to-day the provinces, and sometimes this parliament, take shelter behind the terms of the British North America Act, declaring that we cannot do this, that or the other thing which is vitally necessary. Our social legislation is in a disgraceful condition because we have not been able to formulate plans for national social services such as New Zealand and the similar federation of Australia have been able to do within their own countries. With the developing situation in this country, with the outlook for the post-war period, we ought now to be finding ways and means of making it possible to go forward with social and economic proposals. The amendment to the constitution in the present manner is something which no self-respecting member of this house ought to accept without making some sort of effective protest.

Perhaps I have strayed to some extent from the resolution. The Minister of Justice shakes his head. Well, perhaps there is something to be said in my defence in that regard, but I do say before I sit down that we who come from Saskatchewan appreciate the broad-minded manner in which the minister approached the special case of that province and of Manitoba, although I come from Saskatchewan and speak especially for Saskatchewan at the moment. The facts which the minister put on the record this afternoon relating to the surplus of representation of Ontario over Quebec, on the basis indicated, was something, I must say, to which I had not given consideration before. The minister thus makes a very strong case for the province of Saskatchewan at the moment and I was very glad to hear the case made.

We have lost from the prairies a large number of young people and older people as well who have moved away to the east and to the Pacific coast to work or serve in the war. I believe they will return to us, at any rate a large number of them. When that time comes there will be another census, and we can discuss this matter further at that time. What the minister has said this afternoon strengthens the position I have put before the house regarding our constitutional status, and the contention that we should have the right to decide our representation. This house should have the right to amend the constitution of the country in order to do anything that may be of vital necessity at any given time.

May I add one more word. I think there was a great deal in what the minister said about constituencies and the recollections they have of members who have represented them from time to time. At the moment I am thinking of Great Britain. When one thinks of William Ewart Gladstone, the great leader of British Liberalism, one automatically thinks of Midlothian, the Scottish constituency which he represented for so long. Even to those of us who would move forward more rapidly than some others in this house, there is something well worth while in associations of the past. The Minister of Justice mentioned his own constituency of Quebec East, so long represented by the distinguished Canadian who preceded him in the office he now holds; yet we have seen in other parts of Canada constituencies which had been held by men who have made a name in this house wiped out under redistribution. I am glad, therefore, to have the opportunity this afternoon of supporting the resolution introduced, although, as I say, it is rather jarring on my feelings that I have to support a resolution humbly praying another parliament to do the thing which we as a self-respecting, self-governing people ought to have the right to do ourselves.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish at once to express my thanks to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) for the indication they have given, that in their view the argument which has been presented for deferring redistribution at this time is one which not only commends itself to them but will, they believe, commend itself to the members of their following.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not all the arguments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, the argument that it is not desirable to have a political controversy arise at this time, because of any attempt at redistribution in the present session of parliament, if it is possible to avoid it.

I gather that they are in agreement with the government on that particular point, and I believe that they are also in agreement with the government in the view that at a time when several members of this House of Commons are on active service and consequently would not be in a position to attend here or to serve on the committee which would have to do with the work of redistribution, this would not be an opportune time for the house to attempt redistribution.

I rise at the moment, however, more particularly to call the attention of hon. members to certain rules which govern procedure in the house. The reference made by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party to the desirability of amending the British North America Act in a way which would do away with the act altogether and allow this country to have its own constitution indicates how many subjects it might be possible to discuss at this time on a motion brought forward in reference to the amending of the British North America Act in only one particular. I have received an intimation that it is possible amendments may be moved to the motion which is now before the house with a view to discussing other matters which are not immediately related to the question now before the Chair. I believe that members of the house generally would not wish to have a discussion on matters that are not immediately relevant. We have had a long session, there is still a very considerable programme to be overtaken; and it is, I believe, in every way advisable that we should proceed as expeditiously as possible with the measures that are on the order paper. I have no desire to restrict or narrow discussion on the question before the house, but I do feel it is desirable to avoid unnecessary discussion or discussion related to subjects other than that which is immediately set forth in the motion before us. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I intend to move at once that this question be now put. Standing order 48, under the heading "Privileged Motions", reads:

> When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the house.

My motion is for the previous question.

Standing order 55, which refers particularly to the previous question, reads as follows:

> The previous question, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment of the main question, and shall be in the following words "that this question be now put". If the previous question be resolved in the affirmative, the original question is to be put forthwith without any amendment or debate.

Hon. members will see that my motion does not preclude full debate on the motion before the house; it does preclude the consideration of any amendment to that motion. I submit it is in the interest of hon. members of the house and of the country at this time of war that the debate should be confined to the one motion before the house, and I move accordingly.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) moves, seconded by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) that the question be now put.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, may I say I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not give this group an opportunity to express itself upon the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is not deprived of doing so. Every member in the house has the fullest opportunity to discuss the motion, on the order paper, but no member is at liberty to move an amendment to the motion.

Mr. NEILL: But the very terms of the proposed amendment of the Prime Minister preclude any further discussion in the house. If the question be now put, then no one can debate the original motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I refer hon. members to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, in which standing order 55 provides:

> The previous question, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment of the main question, and shall be in the following words, "that this question be now put". If the previous question be resolved in the affirmative, the original question is to be put forthwith without any amendment or debate.

The previous question is moved when the original question is under debate. Paragraph 327 of the third edition states:

> The previous question is moved when the original question is under debate, in order to force a direct vote on the original question before an amendment is proposed. The form of the motion is "that the question be now put". Once it is proposed, the debate may continue on the original question. The previous question cannot be amended but it may itself be superseded by a motion for adjournment. The previous question cannot be moved upon an amendment though, after an amendment has been agreed to, the previous question can be put on the original motion as amended.

Therefore a discussion can take place now on the original motion. Then the question is put, and if carried in the affirmative the original motion must then be moved, without debate.

I would point out to the house that the motion is a concrete, specific motion, and that the debate must be confined within the four walls of the resolution. I ask hon. members who address themselves to the question to keep within the terms of the resolution.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who seconded the Prime Minister's motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar).

Mr. HANSELL: May I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for elucidating the point of order, and also the Prime Minister for pointing out that his motion does not preclude discussion on the main motion. However, I still regret that the Prime Minister spoke before this group had an opportunity to express itself, if for no other reason than that the Prime Minister indicated his pleasure that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) had agreed to support the motion. Had he waited, he could have said the same thing about this group.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had intended following immediately after the leader of the opposition, and it was only because I noticed another hon. member was on his feet that I desisted. But I do thank the hon. member for what he has just said.

Mr. HANSELL: Now that the coast is clear, may we express ourselves on the resolution itself? I think this group is of unanimous opinion that there should be no redistribution at this time, and that the exigencies of war and the unsettled state of affairs in the country, brought about by the movement of people from one province to another, do not tend to the best interests of such a redistribution. I do not think I need debate that point particularly.

In expressing myself with respect to the resolution, may I point out that I do not commit the party to which I belong to the views I express. It does occur to me that if Canada is what we have been led to believe it is, since the enactment of the statute of Westminster, namely, that we are now a nation capable of running our own affairs, we should not therefore have to go to the parliament of the United Kingdom to change our constitution. That is my own view. I am not the first one who has said that there should be the closest possible relationship between the United Kingdom and Canada. I was born in England; my mother and father were born there, and our family has been English for generations. I came to this country as a young lad and, with the exception of a few years in the United States, finishing my education, I have lived here ever since. I am therefore a Britisher, and absolutely loyal to the British crown.

However, I am not a constitutionalist. I know very little about constitutional law. And if there may be some little constitutional technicality which causes us to go to the parliament of the United Kingdom when we want to change our constitution, I am afraid I shall have to leave that technical point for the lawyers to fight about. I am not prepared to do it. But I am quite certain of this, that the spirit of the statute of Westminster is that we are masters within our own household. Therefore I do not see the propriety of having to go to the parliament of the United Kingdom when we desire to change our constitution. That is particularly obvious at this time because, so far as I am concerned, the postponement of a redistribution is a very small thing. It may come next year or the year after; we do not know. We recognize that it must come from time to time. Certainly it is a meagre thing in the general progression of events. It has to be done some time; and yet simply because we now find ourselves in a war, and believe it desirable to postpone the redistribution until some other time, we have to trot over to the United Kingdom and ask the parliament over there to enact a special piece of legislation in order that we in Canada might defer the redistribution. It has been said that His Majesty is King of Canada. But it would appear to me that we must appeal to His Majesty as King of the United Kingdom.

There is another point I would make here. I have always felt that the will of the people must be the constitution of the nation. I could never see where the will of the people must therefore automatically become the business of another parliament. I quite agree that the foundation of our constitution must be based upon great principles such as the principle of justice, the principle of freedom of action, and the principle of the freedom of religion. I realize that constitutions must be founded upon those great principles. But I still believe that there are times in our history when constitutions must be changed, because we are living in a rapidly progressive age. We read from our libraries scientific textbooks written only ten years ago, but we find that to-day they are out of date. We are not living in the days when our present constitution was enacted. In these days communications are different, and methods of transportation change rapidly. Who would have said ten years ago that the transportation system of the nation would have grown and changed as rapidly as it has? All these things must be taken into consideration when we desire that a constitution should reflect the will of the people.

If I might venture a new idea or a new suggestion, I would advocate that a confederational conference be held, say every ten years, to which every province would send representatives. If it were desired, I would have no objection to the British government being represented at such a conference. The provinces could come together to reflect the will of the people in this rapidly changing age. We must recognize that many things are changing. Even our present government are doing things to-day—it may be said that they are doing them under the stress and strain of war—which they never would have countenanced even three or four years ago. It is a foregone conclusion that some of the things they are doing now will continue to be done even after the cessation of hostilities.

I am not going into a debate on monetary policies, but we know that monetary policies are changing. I believe that if such a confederational conference could be held, the provinces could talk over their constitutional position as related one to another and as related to this dominion parliament. Resolutions could be passed which should receive the widest publicity, and perhaps the following year this parliament could act upon those resolutions after the people had been able to register their reactions to the recommendations. I believe that something of this kind would keep the constitution up to date and still retain within it those great and vital and basic principles of peace, law, order, justice and freedom.

In conclusion, I just want to say again that we support this measure, not because it calls upon His Majesty to have the parliament of the United Kingdom enact a bill, but because we believe that in this day redistribution should be postponed until a more appropriate time.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate, I wish to discuss the question strictly on its own merits, that is by keeping to the resolution which is before the house; and I will do so, not so much as a citizen of the province of Quebec, but rather as a Canadian citizen; just as, since I have been in this house, I have always tried to discuss the questions which were submitted to us.

Before going into the merits of the subject, I think it is my duty to congratulate the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) on the last part of the declaration he made this afternoon. Far too seldom are clarifying statements of such character heard in this house. On the other hand, far too often are incomplete statistics used to support the claim that the citizens of the province of Quebec do not contribute to the war effort as much as they should.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house is very important because it concerns the constitutional act of our country. This constitution of ours ought to be the object of the greatest care, for, to my mind, since 1867, we have changed the constitution far too often for no reason at all. I consider that, for the most part, the amendments brought about since 1867 were not justified. This constitution has become neither more nor less than a municipal regulation which is amended to suit all sorts of so-called purposes, to provide for any opportunity which might arise. The present proposed amendment is all the more important since it directly concerns the very essence of our democratic system, the representation of the people in this house. That is why it is of such capital importance.

I am somewhat surprised to find that this resolution is brought before the house by the Liberal party actually in power, for it seems to me that in the not too distant past, the Liberal party championed and defended the constitution of the country. I remember right well that in 1926 it was used as a cheval de bataille, and very successfully at that. If I am not mistaken, the Liberal party fought the 1926 election by claiming that we were in the midst of a constitutional crisis and they appointed themselves the guardians and protectors of our constitution. That is why I am somewhat surprised to see that now, for a reason that is worthless—as I shall prove in a moment—still another amendment to our constitution is proposed.

This resolution is so important that it will be no news to anyone if I recall that in 1935 a special committee of this house was appointed to study what procedure should be followed to amend or revise our constitution, the British North America Act.

I have on my desk the report of that committee. I notice that authorities on the subject appeared before the committee and I should like to give their names. They were Mr. Edwards, K.C., deputy minister of justice; Mr. Skelton, under secretary of state for external affairs; Mr. Maurice Ollivier, K.C., joint law clerk of the House of Commons; Mr. W. P. M. Kennedy, professor of law at the University of Toronto; Mr. F. R. Scott, professor of law at McGill university; Mr. McL. Rogers, professor of political science at Queen's university, and Mr. Arthur Beauchesne, clerk of the House of Commons. That committee inquired into the advisability of amending the existing rules and especially they investigated the procedure that should be followed with a view to amending or revising, as I said a few moments ago, the British North America Act. What is most important is that the members of that committee, of this house, deemed it proper, before taking any decision on that serious matter, to consult all the provinces of this country in order to ascertain what they thought of the plan.

I find here, in the report of April 2, 1935, the telegram sent by that committee to the various provincial attorneys general. It reads as follows:

"The special committee of the House of Commons on the British North America Act desires to have the views of your government with respect to methods of securing amendments to said act. The resolution referred to the committee follows: 'Resolved, that in the opinion of this house a special committee should be set up to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended so that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, the dominion government may be given adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope.' While the committee does not object to the personal attendance of a representative of your government it was thought less costly to ask for a written submission. Copies of proceedings have been sent you, please intimate when we may expect to receive your submission.

Now, the provinces replied to those telegrams. And what amazes me to-day, Mr. Speaker, is that some hon. members from all those provinces apparently deem it their duty to support the passing of this resolution. I wonder whether the feeling that was voiced in this house to-day is really entertained by the electors to whom reference has just been made in such lofty terms. I have here the replies of the various provincial governments. They deserve to be put in Hansard, because the matter is important. Here is the answer given by Prince Edward Island:

Prince Edward Island.—"Your wire March twenty-seventh government of Prince Edward Island is of opinion that dominion government should formulate its plan and policy for the purposes intended and that this should be submitted to the provincial governments and afterwards discussed at a conference of representative of the provinces and the dominion. Signed by H. F. MacPhee, Attorney-General."

New Brunswick.—"Will wire views as soon as available. Delay unavoidable. Signed by W. H. Harrison, Attorney-General."

Nova Scotia.—"Our legislature now in session and most difficult to attend to matter of this kind now in way you suggest. We feel matter should be approached by conference between representatives of provinces and dominion, where each would have the views of the other and ample time to discuss the matter. Signed by J. H. MacQuarrie, Attorney-General."

Quebec.—"Your telegram received. Surely the committee cannot expect that the views of the province of Quebec will be discussed by an exchange of telegrams or letters. In a matter of such importance I suggest that a conference of the dominion and the provinces should be held. Signed by L. A. Taschereau, Attorney-General."

Ontario.—"Province of Ontario does not desire to make any representation before your committee re British North America Act amendment, as no good purpose will be served by attempting to advise dominion government at this time. Signed by A. W. Roebuck, Attorney-General."

Manitoba.—"With further reference to your telegram of the 27th March to the Attorney-General and to his reply of the 5th instant, the government have now had an opportunity of giving consideration to the suggestion that it should make a written submission regarding the subject matter that is before your committee.

"The government of Manitoba is of the opinion that the subject matter referred to in the resolution is one of such importance that no written submission, setting out our views in reference to it, should be made without a conference with the other provinces and the dominion government. We would be willing to attend such a conference at any time, with a view to arriving at a definite method of procedure for making amendments in the British North America Act. Signed by John Bracken."

Saskatchewan.—"Referring to your telegram of the 27th day of March wherein you request the government of the province to make representations either orally or by written memoranda as to the methods of procedure which this province would suggest in connection with amendments to the Canadian constitution, I would say that I have been following with intense interest the proceeding of your committee. The question of what, if any, provision is to be made for amendment of the Canadian constitution from time to time in a question which ultimately must be decided by conferences between the governments of the provinces and the government of Canada with the possibility of a previous preliminary interprovincial conference. In view of this fact it would appear to be unwise for the provinces to be giving their views before a committee of the House of Commons. With due deference, might I be permitted to suggest that the proper procedure is for your committee to pursue its present inquiry and to make a report to the House of Commons, which I presume will either be accepted or amended or merely received without binding the government to accept the proposals of the committee and with this report available the provinces could then give consideration as to what attitude they desired to take and perhaps discuss the matter amongst themselves, and thereafter join with the federal government in a general conference. The report of your committee would serve as a basis of discussion around which would take place the ultimate solution of this problem. We realize that the question is one of great national importance and should be decided in the welfare of Canada free of all political considerations, and we are certainly prepared to do our share towards the facilitating of a solution, but we feel that we must look after the interests of the province and think that the procedure I have outlined would be the proper course for us to adopt at this time. Signed by T. C. Davis, Attorney-General."

Alberta.—"Re amendment British North America Act. Alberta government appreciates desire of committee to have views of all provinces before it on this very vital question but considers approach to question should be through interchange of views at interprovincial conference. Signed by Mr. Lymburn."

British Columbia.—"Reference your wire twenty-seventh to Attorney-General requesting written submission from the government of this province to your committee it is the opinion of the government that amendment of the constitution is too important a matter to be dealt with in manner suggested. It is not thought that satisfactory conclusions can be reached either federally or provincially until a conference of the provinces and the dominion is held when full discussion may be had and matters properly debated. Other than stating that the right should be secured to amend our constitution in Canada this province respectfully declines to make submission to your committee, neither will it feel bound by any report which may be made by your committee. Signed by T. D. Pattullo."

And there you have testimonies from the various provinces of the country, given after they had been requested to express their opinion on the proposed amendments to the British North America Act.

After having proven that this question is of paramount importance, to use an expression often found in resolutions of this nature, let me point out that the only reason brought forward and alluded to in this house this afternoon, for the postponement of the redistribution, is one that is mentioned in the resolution itself, that is the movement of the population brought about by enlistment in the armed forces of Canada and the employment of large numbers of our citizens in war industries. For how long is it proposed to postpone this readjustment? Until the coming of the session following the signing of peace with Germany, Italy and Japan. Mr. Speaker, the following question comes to our minds: Is the government of our country convinced that the present state of war is going to last until 1952 or 1953?

As we all know, the last census was taken in 1941. This resolution does not request that the constitution be amended so as to allow the taking of a new census after the war; no, it requests that the readjustment be postponed under the pretext that a displacement of the population of the country has taken place. However, if the readjustment takes effect in two or three years from now, I would ask the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) on what census it will be based if not on that of 1941? The reason put forward is worthless. I repeat it, to be logical, the resolution should request that the taking of a new census be authorized immediately after the war. However, if the readjustment should take place in two or three years from now, if the war should end this year or next year, as we all hope, if the readjustment is proceeded with in 1944 or 1945, of necessity the 1941 census will be used for the purpose. And what difference would there be during the session that will follow the end of the war?

Mr. Speaker, another proof that this reason is worthless lies in the fact that in 1941, as every one ought to admit, we were merely remedying unemployment, which had been extensive in our country for over ten years. New industries were then in course of development but not to the extent of causing a displacement of population. In fact, the increase in industrial production did not become apparent much before 1942. Here is a publication from the department of Munitions and Supply which illustrates the state of our industrial production in the years 1941 and 1942. If it be advanced that, at that time, there was a displacement of population, due to war industries, I say that this statement is unwarranted. From this report published by the Department of Munitions and Supply, I quote the following statement appearing on page 24:

Before the war the Canadian aircraft industry employed less than 1,000 people and made only a few single-engined planes and flying boats each year. In the 1939-40 period, Canadian aircraft production was just beginning its war programme which reached a value of $42 million. The following year it jumped to $102 million. In 1942, despite a radical changeover to new types and a general expansion and stabilization of the programme, aircraft production jumped to $235 million from a coast to coast chain of strategically located plants.

In the 1939-40 period the value of the dominion's mechanical transport production was $119 million. In the following year it was $206 million. Last year the output was almost doubled at $404 million.

A vast small arms industry has been created. November production of these weapons was 90 per cent greater than the output for all of 1941.

The manufacture of filling for Canadian ammunition is another huge industry in itself part of a chemicals and explosives output on a colossal scale. In 1941 it climbed to $50 million. That production was more than doubled in 1942 to a total of $121 million.

Armoured fighting vehicles were produced to a value of $160 million in 1942, an output eight times that of the previous year.

Which means, if I correctly read and understand the reports of the Department of Munitions and Supply, that industrial production, the war production of this country, was carried on in 1942 and, as I was saying a moment ago, the country was barely able, in 1941 to offset the effects of the unemployment which had prevailed for so many years. That is why, when the government claims, in the resolution, that there was a movement of population at the time of the last census or since the start of the war, I say it is not altogether true, because of the statistics I have just quoted. I say there has been no movement of population prior to 1941, before the census taken in June.

And now, Mr. Speaker, as a final point, I should like to submit to the house that if it is desired to amend the constitution in regard to the redistribution of constituencies, we should avail ourselves of this opportunity to restore, in a full spirit of justice and equity, the true representation of the provinces in this house. This is what I mean: In 1865, those who have been called the Fathers of Confederation started to hold meetings in various localities, first in Charlottetown and then at Quebec, to propound resolutions which were to give birth to the British North America Act. Those resolutions were recorded in our archives. The same statesmen met in London in 1867 to propose new resolutions based on the resolutions formulated at Quebec in 1865. Now when the British North America Act was adopted by the Imperial government, one clause which has been included in the Quebec Resolutions and in the London Resolutions was overlooked and ignored; and it was then that subsection 4 of section 51 was enacted.

In 1865, the Quebec Resolutions established in the first place resolution 17, which reads as follows:

The basis of representation in the House of Commons shall be population, as determined by the official census every ten years; and the number of members at first shall be 194, distributed as follows:

Upper Canada	82
Lower Canada	65
Nova Scotia	19
New Brunswick	15
Newfoundland	8
Prince Edward Island	5

Resolution 18 reads as follows:

Until the official census of 1871 has been made up, there shall be no change in the number of representatives from the several sections.

Resolution 19 reads as follows:

Immediately after the completion of the census of 1871, and immediately after every decennial census thereafter, the representation from each section in the House of Commons shall be readjusted on the basis of population.

20. For the purpose of such readjustments, Lower Canada shall always be assigned sixty-five members, and each of the other sections shall at each readjustment receive, for the ten years then next succeeding, the number of members to which it will be entitled on the same ratio of representation to population as Lower Canada will enjoy according to the census last taken by having sixty-five members.

21. No reduction shall be made in the number of members returned by any section, unless its population shall have decreased, relatively to the population of the whole union, to the extent of five per centum.

Later, in 1867, there were the London Resolutions which correspond to sections 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21 which I just read. These are sections 18, 19, 20 and 21 of the London Resolutions. And section 22 of the London Resolutions reads as follows:

No reduction shall be made in the number of members returned by any province unless its population shall have decreased, relatively to the population of the whole union, to the extent of 5 per centum.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wonder how we happened to have subsection 4 of section 51 which was, as I just stated, contrary to that agreement. I am not for the moment interested in the question as to whether the British North America Act is a statute, a contract or a pact, but on the other hand there is one thing which nobody can deny, namely, that that pact of the British North America Act is based on an agreement, an agreement which is found in the Quebec Resolutions and the London Resolutions, and I say that that agreement, so far as representation is concerned, has not been complied with in the British North America Act. That is the reason why I say that since our constitution has to be amended with respect to representation, we should do so in a spirit of justice and equity, in the spirit of the confederative pact, a true pact if there ever was one, which gave birth to the Quebec Resolutions and to the London Resolutions, and that the government should have subsection 4 of section 51 struck out, or at least amended within the meaning of the Quebec Resolutions and of the London Resolutions. Then we could say that we have a resolution based on a spirit of understanding and equity, based on that spirit which actuated the fathers of confederation to whom the Minister of Justice so eloquently referred this afternoon.

One last point, Mr. Speaker. As other speakers have pointed out before me, our behaviour is again that of a colony. We are applying to another legislative body to have our constitution amended. On this point, many criticisms have been expressed by competent authorities and I only wish to say a few words on this matter and point to the fact that we have to apply to another parliament, to the British parliament for the amendment of our own constitution.

First allow me to quote the words spoken in this house by the Prime Minister on the 1st of July, 1943. Like many other Canadians, I was proud to hear the Prime Minister say the following, as reported at page 4226 of Hansard:

In the course of the last great war, we saw general recognition given to Canada's status as a nation; a status later accorded full recognition at the imperial conference of 1926, and still later confirmed by the parliament of the United Kingdom in the statute of Westminster. In the course of the present war, we have seen Canada emerge from nationhood into a position generally recognized as that of a world power.

In the greetings which have come to the government from many parts of the British commonwealth, and from foreign countries, this note has been predominant. The consensus is summed up, I believe, in the following paragraphs, which, according to a Canadian Press cable, appeared to-day in a leading London newspaper:

Britain and the empire join in a salutation on the dominion's 76th birthday.

They hail her not only as a member of our group of peoples, but as a world power in her own right.

Such is the energy of her people that industrially, and by measure of armed power, Canada ranks fourth in all the company of the united nations.

And to-day, a few days only after the utterance of such a statement which, as I said a few moments ago, could inspire many Canadians with pride, a bill is brought down in this parliament, by which we are requested to ask another parliament, supposedly of the same rank, to be kind enough to amend our constitution. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is such an abnormality that, to be logical, we should not be content with denouncing it, but rather we should take a strong stand against it and oppose this resolution.

And that is not all, Mr. Speaker. A short while ago, I called your attention to steps taken by various provinces, but something of greater importance still has happened in the country and this fact should appeal to the spirit of justice and fairness which should guide us in proceeding with any proposed amendments to the British North America Act. One province protests officially against this amendment. Here is a Quebec newspaper, Le Soleil—and I might say in passing that Le Soleil is, according to its own word, the Liberal mouthpiece and consequently friendly to the Prime Minister and Mr. Godbout. I quote the following from the third page of Le Soleil, of June 23, 1943:

Godbout Sends to Ottawa a Protest Against a Breach of the Constitution

Hon. Adélard Godbout, prime minister of the province of Quebec officially protested yesterday against the desire on the part of the dominion government to override the Canadian constitution in order to postpone until the end of the war the redistribution of Canadian constituencies. The prime minister made that important announcement yesterday afternoon, in the course of a discussion raised on that matter by the leader of the opposition, Hon. Maurice Duplessis.

The leader of the opposition stated in the house that the dominion government have decided to request the Westminster parliament to override the Canadian constitution so that the dominion government may not be compelled at this time to redistribute the constituencies according to the 1941 federal census.

Mr. Duplessis said that such a precedent would be detrimental to the province of Quebec and that it was an infringement upon the confederation agreement. According to the leader of the opposition, the Westminster parliament does not attach enough importance to provincial rights, and the confederation agreement is a contract which cannot be amended without the consent of the parties involved. The leader of the opposition said that the French Canadians intend to respect the rights of others but that they want their rights to be similarly upheld.

Hon. Mr. Godbout stated that the leader of the opposition was justified in asserting the rights of his compatriots in that connection. He added that the provincial government had already drafted a protest which will be forwarded to Ottawa at once.

By now, that protest must be in the hands of the government of this country and that is why I say that this resolution should not have been moved at this time. Reference is often made to national unity; under that pretext of national unity a group of the citizens of this country are sometimes asked not to demand self-evident rights, but in the last analysis we must always ascertain whether the principles of justice and equity are observed in such matters. In conclusion, as I said at the outset, I believe that I have discussed this matter, not in a partisan spirit, but on its merits. As long as the government do not advance better reasons than those stated in their resolution for amending the British North America Act, I believe every man who is fully aware of the importance of his mandate in this house is in duty bound to oppose that resolution.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, after it had been announced in the speech from the throne that the government would proceed with the redistribution bill, the introduction of this resolution in the house, and the way in which it is worded, greatly astonishes me. I am also greatly disturbed by this proposed breach in the constitution.

Before I proceed with my remarks on the resolution itself, I should like to join with the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) in extending congratulations to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) upon the last part of his speech this afternoon. Attractive as it seemed, and in spite of all its effectiveness from an electoral point of view, it remains only a fine speech. I do not think it will do anything to heal the breach which we now see being attempted.

May I recall to my hon. friend that we have had fine speeches in the past. I remember very well the speeches we used to hear in the province of Quebec, the promises and pledges that were given, simply for the purpose of winning an election, as was admitted by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his speech on the plebiscite on January 26, 1942. We know exactly what resulted from those fine speeches and promises. A little later, in 1942, we had a plebiscite asking Baptiste to forgive the Prime Minister and the government or the Liberal party for those fine speeches and promises that had been made in the province of Quebec, but at the same time John was asked to overlook the Prime Minister's promises. Well, Baptiste refused to overlook them and John forgot them, and the Prime Minister took advantage of that situation to forget all the fine speeches and promises which had been made in the province of Quebec in the past. This very recent experience is a good lesson to us all.

That is the value of fine speeches. I will not go over again what has been said about this pretence to the effect that there has been a demographic movement in the population from certain provinces since the census was taken in 1941. I think that has been fully covered by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, and what he has said should convince us that the situation will be precisely the same after the war, which I suppose will be in 1944 or 1945.

We shall proceed then on the very same figures and the same census, and I do not see what difference it can make.

There is another paragraph, however, to which I would call Your Honour's attention. It reads:

> Whereas experience has shown that such a readjustment may give rise to sharp differences of opinion as to the appropriate delimitation of electoral divisions, which differences it is most desirable to avoid while Canada continues at war. . . .

I suggest that this pretence is even weaker than the one I mentioned before. The government has not shown very great wisdom in this statement; it has not proved that its psychology is sound. I am amazed that the government and so many hon. members should fear some bitter differences of opinion over redistribution. Should we have proceeded with redistribution, such an action would not have imposed injustice on anyone. But the manner in which we are proceeding does imply great injustice to one province, and the government is not at all afraid, it seems, that some discussion will arise over it. That is one thing I cannot understand.

I was amazed to listen to all these gentlemen this afternoon all speaking very well, offering to support this resolution and concurring in the Prime Minister's argument that we should not raise this question on the floor of the house in this time of stress during the war.

It is easy, when certain political groups are not concerned with the province of Quebec, seeing that none of them have any representatives from that province to praise this resolution as something beneficial to us. It is also quite easy for such hon. gentlemen to display generosity in appealing to others to remain calm and to refrain from discussing these matters, on the ground that we are at war. Like the Prime Minister himself and the Minister of Justice, these hon. gentlemen fail to realize that, by the very fact that, in so doing, they bring the evidence that, should the matter of redistribution have been brought before the house, they would themselves have been the cause of a discussion they want to prevent. They do not seem to realize that it implies the admission that, should the matter be brought before the house, there would be some discussion about it. They are simply asking others who do suffer the injustice involved in this resolution to remain quiet, and they are trying to be as agreeable as possible in doing this.

It is difficult to make me believe and to make the rest of the province of Quebec believe that it would be a crime to proceed with the redistribution. If unity, peace and harmony are to reign in this country, they will reign in the exact measure that contracts and pledged words are honoured. The faith of the people in the constitution and in the grandeur of the ideal which it embodies will be but equal to the respect, the worth and the dignity of our constitutional system; and if we do not want to have any trouble; if we do not want to expose ourselves to the danger which already threatens in Quebec, in the movement which is called separatism; if we do not want that movement to spread to such an extent as to jeopardize the constitution, as breeches of the principle of the constitution such as this would bring about; if we do not want to jeopardize the confederation, then we should not support any resolution or move of this kind.

It is really curious to listen to everyone making eloquent speeches, trying to give proof of good intentions, and a friendly spirit toward Quebec. It is curious to see that in different localities, when it has been desired to make some changes in the constitution, the province of Quebec has always been sacrificed. We can understand why Quebec, with sixty-five constituencies, as was explained this afternoon by the Minister of Justice, from the British North America Act, has had to suffer many times in the past. This agreement has been detrimental to that province as far as influence in the house and in Canada is concerned. But that is the constitution to-day. As it stands, there are no fewer than twenty-one seats in Canada in excess of the number there should be, in consequence of this provision of the constitution. In other words, Quebec actually has proportionately six members fewer to exercise some influence with the rest of Canada. That is one of the reasons why we oppose this resolution.

There is another reason more important than one, namely, a breach of principle. In the eyes of some it may be difficult to understand why we adhere so strictly to the principle of the contract and the constitution itself. Well, there are many reasons for that. I shall give some of those reasons which may serve to explain to hon. members why we have reason to oppose the resolution. For this I must go back a piece into history.

First, we feel that we must maintain provincial autonomy as it is, and that we must safeguard all the rights extended to us by treaties and by the constitution itself, in order that we may achieve the maintenance of French culture and French traditions in Canada. Canada was first discovered by Jacques Cartier, and afterwards was settled to some extent by Champlain. Following that, our missionaries and explorers had walked over and watered with their sweat, tears and blood every foot of land between Louisiana in the south to the Mackenzie river in the north; afterwards the territory was all surveyed and mapped and all civilized; thus we have been conquered by force. Force was the only way to make conquest, of course; and that is still true to-day.

At the conclusion of that war we were given by the highest authority in England what in those times was considered fair treatment. Despite the fact that in 1787 and 1812 our forefathers fought side by side with the forefathers of the majority in this country to keep the country under the control of the British crown, there has always been a small group in Canada inspired by bigotry which has caused trouble through the years. So much so that in 1837 we saw a revolution in Lower Canada. Matters went from bad to worse until 1840, the time of the Act of Union, a measure which imposed on Lower Canada the obligation to pay $100,000,000. Might I point out that in those times a sum of that magnitude, having in mind the small population in Quebec, would have compared with a sum of not less than ten billions of dollars to-day. Imagine the burden an amount of that size imposed on the colony of Lower Canada!

Since confederation there have been many breaches made to the confederation pact. If these breaches continue, it is our fear that step by step we shall have lost all the rights granted to us by the British authorities and by confederation. That is why we protest against this resolution. That is the reason why we ask the majority why it has not presented a resolution or made a suggestion of the kind I am about to submit. If it is not deemed proper under present circumstances to make this redistribution, then why might we not suggest an amendment to the constitution by a process which would not have been a breach of principle, and which would have ensured that Quebec be given a number of seats sufficient to equalize her representation with that of other provinces. That would have satisfied all those who do not want to lose representation; it would have protected the rights of all, and it would have meant an equal distribution of representation for Quebec. This would have been fair, but no one has thought of such a means to adjust the situation, a process which would have been fair to all.

Before concluding my remarks, may I make an appeal to all hon. members asking them to consider carefully the dangers contained in this measure to the constitution and unity of Canada. In the past we have seen some bigotry, and there are still some behind the scenes who take a narrow view. Yet, in the past there have been men who at the proper time would raise their voices—I think of Baldwin, MacNab and Macdonald. There have been men in times past, men whose names are famous and glorious to-day. And it is my hope that there will be men in this House of Commons to-day who will seek to show the injustice contained within this resolution, and who will be careful and prudent enough to see that the unity of Canada is not threatened by this injustice.

Hon. P. J. ARTHUR CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères): Mr. Speaker, the resolution now being considered by the house contains in my humble judgment a dangerous procedure to which the House of Commons should give serious consideration before adopting it in the form in which it has been couched on the order paper. For a number of years it has been admitted in all branches of public opinion that no serious change should be made in the British North America Act without the consent and approval of the parties to the contract. I admit that in the past the federal parliament has been dealing from the point of view of its own authority, and has been amending the British North America Act without consulting the provinces which are a party to that contract. But I repeat that that at least within the last few years the opinion has developed throughout Canada that the British North America Act should be considered as a sacred contract among associates, those associates being the provinces, and that nothing should be done to modify it without the approval of the contracting parties.

We have had that experience when we have dealt with the necessary amendments to permit the federal authority to deal with unemployment insurance legislation. There are many other instances in which, before making any move, we have consulted the different provinces composing the Dominion of Canada. To-day we are going to touch upon one of the fundamentals of the British North America Act without consulting the provinces, and despite the protests made by at least one province.

I claim that it is a breach of our promise, and that not only are we not dealing properly with Quebec, but also with regard to other small English-speaking provinces. I make that statement because some small English-speaking provinces will be affected by the result of the application of the principle embodied in this resolution.

English-speaking provinces in Canada have been suffering in their representation in the House of Commons by the application of the principles laid down in the British North America Act. They stood it; they accepted it, because they wanted to respect the principle that was the corner-stone of our understanding and of our existence as a dominion. Ontario, herself, accepted a reduction in her representation in the House of Commons when, following a census, the number of her representatives was reduced. The maritime provinces, more than any other of the provinces of Canada, have suffered. They accepted the reduction until such time as it was quite apparent that the reduction being imposed upon them was too great and would interfere with the proper representation of those provinces in the House of Commons. There was a limit fixed in order to prevent the representation of those provinces in the House of Commons from going below a certain number. That is to their advantage now. Now, other provinces, fearing the application of the principle laid down in the British North America Act, are trying to preserve their representation in the House of Commons when the maritime provinces have lost theirs.

This is not fair to Quebec or to the other provinces whose representation has been fixed or which has been reduced by the application of the British North America Act. This should not be done.

I have no patience with the reasons given in the resolution. They do not appeal to me at all. They should not appeal to any assembly of responsible men, of men capable of facing their responsibilities and dealing with them as true representatives of the Canadian people, even under the difficult circumstances which are facing us to-day. This resolution really states that the representatives of the people in the House of Commons are incapable of dealing properly with an important problem in the troubled days through which we are passing. It is to the discredit of members of parliament to have it asserted and established in a resolution of this kind that we in this parliament cannot, without fighting like wildcats, adjust our representation as reasonable men who are ready to understand each other. I cannot subscribe to such a theory.

What are the reasons given? First, the war. Have we not since the beginning of the war been dealing with problems just as important as this one? We had the plebiscite which was capable of upsetting the friendly relations and good understanding among all citizens of Canada. We went through that without any trouble; we went through that like men capable of understanding each other's point of view. But too often we are postponing and postponing such questions until the war is over. Why are we here? Why do we not go home if we cannot deal properly with this problem? Other dominions, such as South Africa, are facing even general elections. It is much more dangerous to fight a general election, as they are doing in South Africa and as they have done in Ireland, than to adjust our representation in the House of Commons. It is ten times more difficult. That is not the reason.

Then it is said that because of enlistments the population of certain provinces has been reduced. But, sir, men who have enlisted have been registered as being in their constituencies in 1941. They have not been registered in England or in any other part of Canada, but only at the place of their residence. Then changes on account of employment is given as a reason. Most men who have left one province to work temporarily in another were registered before they made their move. They will not be handicapped. We would not proceed as conditions are in 1943, but on the situation existing in June, 1941. At that time very few men had migrated to other provinces to obtain work.

All that was known on January 28, when this session began. We were at war when the speech from the throne announced that we were to have redistribution. On two occasions in May last we were told by the Prime Minister, and even later on, on May 31, by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), that we were to have redistribution. Were we not at war then? We were at war then, and the arguments that are being advanced now were just as strong in January and in May as they are to-day. I say that those arguments are of no value.

Then it is said that it would delay the session. Why did we not start in January? Why did we not appoint a committee to deal with redistribution in the first days of February? The report would have been before us long ago, and we would now be in position to deal properly with redistribution without doing any injustice to any province or to any division. But no, we delayed and we delayed and we delayed until the argument could be advanced that it was too late to proceed.

It is said also that there would be at this time strongly divergent views. When we have a redistribution after the war, as it has been pointed out this afternoon, it will be based upon the decennial census of 1941; it will not be based upon the situation that will exist after the war or after those who may have temporarily migrated, return to their former places of residence. The resolution says in so many words that the redistribution will be based upon the decennial census of 1941, and those provinces which are likely to lose seats by redistribution will be faced with the same situation. That is what will happen unless—I do not use this phrase in an offensive way—there is a nigger in the woodpile; unless there is a general election before the end of the war.

If there is a general election before the end of the war, those provinces which are exposed to a loss of seats will be able to preserve them, and preserve them until the next decennial census which will be made in 1951. The province of Quebec, which has a fixed number of sixty-five seats, will still remain in the same unfair position. That province is supposed to be the regulator of the representation, but year after year it has been a regulator that regulates absolutely nothing. When it comes to the application of the rule there is always an exception made. Means are always found of avoiding its application and Quebec continues to have only sixty-five members. The maritime provinces continue to have the small number they have at the present time, while other provinces enjoy a larger number of representatives to which, strictly speaking, they are not entitled.

So far as I am concerned I would have been ready to consider redistribution in the broadest sense possible. One reason has been given which appeals to me. There are members of the House of Commons who have enlisted in the armed services and who, because they are overseas, could not be here to discuss redistribution if it were proceeded with. I have the most profound sympathy for those members. They have a right to be here, and I would be the first one to see that they are not deprived of the right to express their point of view. But actually very few of them are on the other side; the majority are in Canada. We see them occasionally, and they could be here for a day or two or for a week to look after their own interests. So far as those who are overseas are concerned, and without wanting to assume too much, I think I can say in the name of the representatives of the province of Quebec that we would be ready to leave their seats undisturbed until the next decennial census. I would be the first one to propose such a measure in favour of those members who have enlisted and who are overseas.

I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that on a question of that kind, with one province in particular having so much at stake, as well as others, we had the motion which was moved by the Prime Minister this afternoon. That incident reminded me of a day long ago in the old House of Commons of Canada when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was on his feet ready to speak to a motion that had been made by Sir Robert Borden to amend the rules of the house, and a Conservative, a member of the government, Mr. Northrup, rose and proposed the very motion the Prime Minister proposed this afternoon—the previous question—to prevent Sir Wilfrid Laurier from exposing his views on the question before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend whether my motion is in any way preventing him from saying anything that he desires on the motion of the Minister of Justice?

Mr. CARDIN: No. I am explaining my point that the motion this afternoon of the right hon. leader of the government prevents all kinds of amendments being moved. The right hon. Prime Minister said so in so many words.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is something quite different from what my hon. friend just said. What my hon. friend implied was that I had been seeking to prevent hon. members from discussing this motion.

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion before the Chair.

Mr. CARDIN: No, but it reminds me of a similar motion that was made by Mr. Northrup, the effect of which was to prevent Sir Wilfrid Laurier from exposing his views on the motion made by Sir Robert Borden. I do not say that the motion made by the Prime Minister this afternoon has the effect of preventing discussion on the main motion, but here is the point to which I am coming. The motion of the Prime Minister, according to his own words, according to his own interpretation and according to the rules of the house prevents any kind of amendment; yes, prevents all kinds of amendments which might come within the four corners of the resolution and which might help to remove certain apprehensions that exist and help to prevent certain injustices that otherwise are going to follow. I do not say that the right hon. the Prime Minister made his motion to prevent me from moving my amendment. He did not know about it. Nobody knew about it. The amendment I intended to move is within the four corners of the resolution. The reason advanced by the Prime Minister for making his motion, to move the previous question, was to avoid all kinds of discussion outside the four corners of the resolution—that is the reason he gave—to avoid amendments that he had heard somebody was going to move and which might set the house afire. The amendment which I had in mind to propose and which I am going to read before sitting down was within the four corners of the resolution and would have prevented an injust treatment being imposed to a province in particular by the passing of the measure as it is at present drafted.

We have been told this afternoon that the populations of certain provinces have been reduced by reason of the war. But no evidence has been produced of that; no indication has been given of the truth of that statement. So far as the house is concerned, we do not know. But if we look upon certain documents that are at our disposal, we come to the conclusion that the decrease in the population of Saskatchewan started in 1931 and continued to decrease until 1936. There was no war on then, but the population of the province decreased considerably from 1931 to 1936. I am not quite correct in saying that. My information is taken from a report I have of the live births for all the provinces of Canada. If hon. gentlemen will look at that report they will see that the birth-rate in Canada has been increasing, with the exception of in two provinces, and one in particular, the birth-rate has been very rapidly decreasing between 1931 and 1936. That was in Saskatchewan.

I hope that nobody will accuse me of making any plea that would be prejudicial to the fair and just interests of the province of Saskatchewan. If there is an agreement that should be made to protect the province of Saskatchewan, which has suffered so much from drought, let us make it. But let us do something for the other provinces also in order to compensate for the advantages so given to one province at the expense of the others. That is my proposal. I would have been ready to consider favourably any request to help maintain at a proper number the representation of Saskatchewan in this parliament. I know that that province has been through difficult days, that it has experienced hard times. I am ready to consider that and to provide some relief, if I may use the word, in reference to representation in the House of Commons. But I think that something else should be done to compensate the other provinces that have been receiving no consideration in any redistribution made in consequence of the decennial censuses that we have had since 1871.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before my hon. friend proceeds any further, on a point of order, I was not in a position to say at the moment whether he was correct when he made the statement that the motion which was moved by Mr. Northrup was the same as the one I moved to-day. I have since had an opportunity to look into the matter, and I wish now to say that the motion moved by Mr. Northrup was not the same as I moved to-day. I wish to make that quite clear to my hon. friend. If he wishes to have the facts verified, he will find the motion Mr. Northrup moved set out in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, 1943, citation 215:

> On the 9th of April, 1913, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Hazen rose at the same time and Mr. Northrup moved that Mr. Hazen "be now heard."

Mr. CARDIN: Technically there is something in the point raised by the Prime Minister. I shortened my recital, but the effect of the two motions is just the same. Mr. Northrup moved that Sir Douglas Hazen be given the right of way, the right to speak in place of Sir Wilfrid Laurier who had risen at the same time. The speaker had "seen" Sir Wilfrid Laurier first and authorized him to speak, when Mr. Northrup rose and moved according to the rules of the house that Sir Douglas Hazen be "seen" by the Speaker and be allowed to speak. A vote was taken, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberals were defeated. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to sit down and Sir Douglas Hazen rose in his place and moved a motion like the one the Prime Minister has moved. He moved the previous question, without making any speech at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has not had to sit down, nor has he been prevented from uttering any word he wished to say.

Mr. CARDIN: No, but that is not exactly representing my position. I am referring to a situation in years gone by similar to the one we are facing to-day. When a motion was moved preventing any amendment, just as the Prime Minister's motion does to-day, I can speak on the main motion; yes, other members have been speaking on it and others will speak, but there can be no amendment moved even to better the resolution that is before the house, after the previous question has been moved. That is my criticism. It prevents all members of the house from any section of the country from moving any amendment that would improve the text of the resolution which we are at present considering and which might help to dispel the anxiety which exists in many quarters and prevent at least the injustice that is being done to certain partners to the pact of confederation, an injustice that may remain on our statute books until 1951 after the next decennial census is taken.

The amendment, Mr. Speaker, which I had in mind to move was very short. I was simply suggesting to add to paragraph 1 of the proposed measure to be introduced in the British house the following words:

> However, a readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons in consequence of the aforesaid decennial census shall be made previous to the holding of a general election.

I wanted to avoid the holding of a general election on a redistribution which was made after the decennial census of 1931. If there is an election before 1945 and the war is not then concluded, that election will be fought on a representation based on the decennial census of 1931.

Some hon. MEMBERS: 1941.

Mr. CARDIN: No, 1931, because it is not proposed to deal with redistribution based on 1941 census until after the war. The proposal is to postpone until then the redistribution based on the decennial census of 1941. So that, if we have an election before the war is concluded, that election will have to be fought on a redistribution made after the decennial census of 1931. That I regard as an injustice.

If we had embodied in the amendment to the constitution that in the event of a general election before the conclusion of the term of office of this parliament redistribution would previously be made in consequence of the 1941 census, no province would have had cause to complain. Some attention could then be given to the province of Quebec, which representation now seems to be fixed at sixty-five for the rest of the life of Canada. Attention could also be given to the maritime provinces representation. I suggest it would have been fair to amend the resolution in that way. Such amendment would not have brought in any question or any subject not within the principle of the resolution.

Even if we are deprived of the right of making an amendment to have that situation cleared up, I wonder if it will be possible to obtain from the Prime Minister an understanding that before we go to the people some arrangement will be made regarding redistribution in order that no province will suffer from the results of the amendment to the constitution which is proposed. But we have not even that. All that is proposed now is to postpone the redistribution, but we are not told what is to be done in the meantime.

The redistribution is postponed on account of the war; but there is a possibility that the war will not be an obstacle to the holding of a general election. The government is afraid of dealing in the House of Commons now with the problem of redistribution on account of difficulties which may exist, of troubles which may be raised, of representations which may be made by certain provinces and controversies which might endanger the unity of this country. Yet the government does not seem to be afraid of plunging Canada into a general election during the war and before redistribution has been made. That is the situation.

All the arguments which have been advanced up to the present against redistribution apply with a hundred times more force to the holding of a general election before the war is over, but we have not a word as to that. They will postpone redistribution and wait for the opportunity of calling a general election later on, and that general election will be held on the basis of the decennial census of 1931.

I repeat that this is not justice; it is not fair treatment. There is certainly a possibility, between understanding citizens of Canada who have in the past faced many difficulties, of reaching an agreement which will not sow any prejudice or create any disunity in the country. Speaking for my province particularly, I say there would be no trouble there, because there was none in the past when the number of our representatives remained at sixty-five and representation changed in other sections of Canada.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Of course we have difficulties; we have misunderstandings; but what country under the face of the sun is without difficulties? One has only to listen to what is being said in the parliament of South Africa, in the parliament of Australia, even in the parliament of England, to know that they are not afraid there to discuss the problems of the day and that they do not shelve them indefinitely.

It would have been possible, I repeat, to deal with this problem and to grant relief, if necessary, to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba according to circumstances and evidence placed before the House of Commons. That case is not made now. If we would deal with redistribution, the case could be made on figures, not on words, not on suppositions; and afterwards it would be easy to reach an understanding. I can guarantee that no trouble would be raised in my province against an equitable arrangement equally fair to all the members of the pact of confederation.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep feeling of regret and sorrow that I rise in my place to-day. The first reason is that, according to the press of the province of Quebec, not long ago, on June 22, it was unanimously resolved by the Quebec legislature to send a protest to the dominion government regarding precisely the motion which is now before us. It is very seldom, sir, that there is such unanimity of opposing groups; but this time Conservatives and Liberals, English and French-speaking Canadians and even Jews in the Quebec legislature united to send a solemn protest to this government against such a move as is now contemplated. It is wrong, of course, to represent Quebec as a province composed wholly of French-speaking Canadians. There is a large number of English-speaking Canadians, of people of all origins and of all religions in the province of Quebec. Jews have been elected to the Quebec legislature; in fact the first Jew who was elected to the legislative assembly of any part of the British empire, even before Disraeli was elected in London, was a Jew named Hart, who was elected in the French-Canadian constituency of Three Rivers. Therefore we cannot overlook the fact that the unanimity of Quebec on this matter is not only that of French-speaking Canadians but that of all those who live within the boundaries of that province, who are represented by members of different religious faiths and of different languages, residing within its precincts. That is why I am so surprised, in fact dumbfounded, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) have not tabled a copy of that solemn protest, which was not a private letter, because, as I have been credibly informed, it was an official letter of the Quebec government to the dominion government protesting in clear terms against such a move.

We live under a constitution that was passed by Westminster after lengthy discussion in Quebec and in Charlottetown; it is that constitution that we must respect if we are to have order and good government in this country; and if anyone says anything disparaging of that constitution, anything that brings it into disrepute in the minds of his fellow citizens, he is doing something that is contrary to the defence regulations.

The remarks that have been made by the Minister of Justice, who is a distinguished member of the bar, have greatly surprised me. He spoke of extraneous subjects and thereby invited discussion on a most controversial matter. He gave me the impression of a man pouring oil on the fire. I would have understood his position if immediately before he had risen, someone had discussed language and religious matters relating to the subject before us. But no one did so. He was the first to speak on the matter, and he himself indicated that such cases as he referred to were mentioned only by few people and were not important. A minister who holds such a rank in the government of the country had no right on such a solemn occasion to bring forward such matters, adding straw to the fire, in fact lighting the fire of prejudice throughout the country.

I am a much older member than the hon. gentleman. I have been here nearly twenty years and he is a newcomer. But never have I raised the question of race and religion in this house, and I have good friends among members who are staunch imperialists, who have not my religious faith and who do not speak my language. But I believe that we can come easily to an understanding—on what basis? On the basis of fairness. And so long as a minister admits that there is unfairness somewhere, unfairness in this act, in the way it has been interpreted and applied, whether in my province or in a sister province, the first thing to do, if we are to have national unity, is to remedy that injustice and to have the courage to do so. So long as injustice is admitted it is the duty of the government to correct it, and the government cannot come and say that because we are at war they will not correct that injustice. That is cowardice; it is not worthy of men of the character and determination of those who sit on the treasury benches.

I do not admit that in times of war unfairness should be cherished at the expense of fairness. I do not admit that, and no member will admit it. The Minister of Justice cannot enunciate the principle that in time of war unfairness shall subsist because there might be criticism in some quarters. No member can rise in his place and defend such a theory. How is it that the Minister of Justice, who is the guardian of the law, rose in his place and made a speech in which he said that we do not want to invite controversy, while at the same time he invited controversy, invited prejudice, invited hatred and religious fights and struggles in this country? I cannot conceive it, and I tell you, sir, it is a very dangerous thing to deal with. It is a very dangerous matter to handle. I saw that some of his colleagues here were worrying while he was giving his explanation. What has the question of language to do with redistribution in this country? What has the matter of religion to do with redistribution?

Members of this house who belong to the army may suffer an injustice, it is said. As the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères pointed out, is there one member of this house who would do injustice to anyone in the armed forces, whether overseas or in this country? No one would do that; no one would agree to a proposal which my hon. friend could not make but did mention, about members of the armed forces belonging to our house being given the same seats. No one would object to that even if those members were not here. No member would think of objecting to that. Therefore, why use such an argument in regard to such a question? Why raise the patriotic issue, waving that flag that we have not? What is patriotism, sir? It is a simple thing. It is love of our country and respect for our institutions.

What is the motto of French Canadians? It is, "Our religion, our tongue and our rights". That may be the motto of English-speaking Canadians as well. But because the French Canadian speaks French and the English Canadian speaks English, or because the Scottish Canadian speaks Gaelic, that is no reason why we cannot come to an understanding, provided that understanding is based on fairness. And in this case the Minister of Justice has admitted that there is something wrong, something which should be righted by the government—until lately. Why did the Prime Minister state in this house in words that were very clear, words that were not obscure, that since the question of redistribution had been mentioned in the speech from the throne the government would proceed with it at this session, before the expiration of the session? What happened between the time when the Prime Minister made that statement and the moment when this resolution appeared on the order paper? What was the reason for the change? How is it that no one doubted all along that before the expiration of the session the government would deal with the question of redistribution? I cannot understand it and nobody can. It is a mystery.

Coming to the resolution itself and the way in which it is drafted, I have a few words to say; but before doing so I would again ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice to table a copy of the solemn protest received from the Quebec government, not only on behalf of the French-speaking Canadians of Quebec, but on behalf of those people of Quebec whom they represent, whatever may be their race or religion.

In regard to the resolution I have a correction to make in the quotation of Doctor Skelton by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. Doctor Skelton appearing before the committee said that Canada was the only country in the world that could not amend its constitution. It is true, and it is not true. All dominions, with the exception of Canada, have the right to amend their own constitution. They were all subject to disallowance by the British government, as we are now. Therefore, what was the use of having power to amend the constitution when, on the other hand, the British government had the power of disallowance of any act passed by any such parliament of the dominions. An exception could be made with respect to Ireland, in these later years. But it is the only dominion where there is no right of disallowance. Therefore Doctor Skelton gave a superficial view of the constitutions of other dominions.

Now, to come to this resolution, the government of Canada proposes to go to the British government asking for an amendment of the constitution with respect to the holding of a redistribution. As one who at the request of the late Minister of Justice made a report on redistribution in each county of Quebec, covering the last eighty years, and who prepared a booklet used by that right hon. gentleman as well as by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) when they discussed the matter with Conservative ministers at that time, I believe I have the right to protest against a move like this. I have also the right to protest against the way in which the resolution has been drafted.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The other day while speaking, not about the British government but about His Majesty the King and Her Majesty the Queen, I said I did not feel humble when speaking to them, through you, sir. I did not feel humble, although I do feel so at times. I did not feel humble, because I represent people I am proud of, and I believe that is the feeling of all hon. members elected for the various constituencies of this country. But I do not see the government of Canada, which is supposed to be on an equal footing with the British government, going humbly before the lords spiritual and temporal asking them to amend the constitution. I do not see them going humbly—and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) repeated that expression at the beginning of his speech—going humbly like the burgher of Calais, or like one of our colleagues who had to act humbly, and who had to repeat flectamus genua four times the other day before his withdrawal was accepted. I cannot agree with that. I cannot agree with it because I think we should have the dignity of an autonomous country within the empire. We should have the right to amend our constitution ourselves, as has been said so well by some hon. members. I do not see how we can go twice a year, or once a year to London to ask for an amendment to our constitution. What is our constitution worth, if it has to be changed like that every year? I admit that nothing is perfect in the constitution. But when Mr. Bennett stated that the constitution should be amended I asked him very often, "What part of the constitution do you wish to amend?" He could not answer me.

Last year the constitution was amended to permit the introduction of an unemployment measure. This year it will be amended to destroy a vital part of the British North America Act, a part which deals with representation in the House of Commons, the representation of a group of men who must have their say in our deliberations, and who must have no fear or favour in the conduct of their discussion. That is the British North America Act. Every province agreed to the constitution at the time of confederation. The government has no power to go to London to ask for a change without at least asking the people what they think of it. It should ask the people by way of a plebiscite, the fashion of which was begun last year.

This matter affects not only the dominion. It affects the provinces, and affects every citizen in the country. Therefore each province and each citizen, each man and woman have the right to express their views on the matter. If this motion is passed I hope the government will be fair enough to attach to it a copy of the solemn protest received from the government of Quebec against such a change before an election. The suggestion of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères is only fair and just. He did not offer an amendment, because he could not, on account of the Prime Minister's motion. But does it not appeal to every hon. member that it would be only fair that the next election should be conducted after the last census, and not the census before the last one. What is the purpose of a census? It is to establish a basis of representation in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act. What is the use of spending a million dollars for a census, if it is of no use, and if it does not serve the purpose for which it is made?

There is no question of any intervention by Mr. Anthony Eden in respect of the matter of redistribution, except that if the matter is taken to Westminster he will be one who will have to help decide. The same applies to Lord Halifax. What has Lord Halifax to do with this matter? What has Mr. Anthony Eden to do with this matter? He may have something to do with it when the resolution is over there, but only at that time.

To this moment no one has explained satisfactorily to me the reason for the sudden change of the government in connection with this matter. I do not know the reason. I took some notes of what the Minister of Justice said, and he made one observation which astounded me. This is a proposal for a modification of the act of 1867. I do not know if my understanding of his statement was correct, but if it is not, he will no doubt correct me. When a change is to be made in the British North America Act those concerned must deal with a constitution formulated by the fathers of confederation to weld into one nation two groups of peoples of different origin and with different religions. That is not the question. It is admitted that different people have different religions. But I say that although they do not belong to the same race, or do not have the same religious beliefs, or are not of the same origin, still we are all in the same boat and we have to make the best of it. Therefore it is not by leaving an injustice, and permitting it to continue that we are going to bring about a greater degree of peace and unity in Canada.

I have said it before, and I now repeat that it is a great mistake to consider French Canadians of the same class and in the same walk of life as being different mentally from English, Scotch or Irish citizens performing the same work. That is a great mistake. All have the same interests. They are fellow citizens. They must work in unison, and they will do so, provided no one raises the cry of prejudice or brings before their eyes matters which may be exploited by a few individuals unworthy of the name Canadian.

I was sorry that the Minister of Justice took the trouble to bring that matter before the house. Some of his statements were commendable, but they would have been just as good on another occasion. But this was not the time to say what he said because, as was pointed out by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon)—and rightly so—what he said was irrelevant.

The matter before the house is one of representation of people within the boundaries of a certain unit known as a constituency. All those people have the right to be represented in the House of Commons, and it would be an injustice both to French Canadians of Ontario as well as to English-speaking citizens of Quebec not to proceed with redistribution according to the solemn promise which was made in the speech from the throne, and which was repeated not long ago by the Prime Minister. I see no reason for it.

What explanation have we been given? The hon. member who preceded me in the debate suggested that this was being done to have more seats for Quebec in the next election. No, sir; that will not work. Even English-speaking Canadians in Canada would not agree to any injustice to both English-speaking and French-speaking citizens, which would have the effect of greater support for the choice of the government in any constituency. I believe that the French-speaking people and the English-speaking people in this country are fair-minded. The only trouble is that they have not been told the things that they should have been told; they have not been spoken to in the language that should have been used. But when they read Hansard they will see the admission made by the Minister of Justice that there was something wrong, that there was, to use the expression of my hon. friend who spoke previously, a nigger in the wood-pile. They will want to know what the nigger in the wood-pile is. If they proceed farther, they will see that the Minister of Justice has admitted that there is something wrong somewhere, that we must wait until the end of the war to do something and not create a disturbance.

Our soldiers are fighting for freedom and liberty, and yet an injustice exists in our midst. Is it possible to conceive that while we are trying to cure the evils of the world, we allow them to exist in our midst? That is my last word. I make a special appeal to the Prime Minister; I make a special appeal to the Minister of Justice; I ask them in the interests of all Canadians to conceive it to be their duty to drop the motion for the previous question and the motion before the chair.

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, after listening this afternoon to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), I concluded that the consent of the provincial governments or legislatures had not been obtained to the amendment to the British North America Act proposed by this resolution. If I am not correct in that conclusion, the Minister of Justice can correct me. If I am correct, I think some explanation is due to the members of this house and to the country as to why this consent was not obtained. All the provinces are interested, and in my opinion they should have been consulted. Before an amendment was made to the British North America Act to establish a system of unemployment insurance, the consent of the provinces was obtained. But nothing of that kind has been done on this occasion.

I do not think this is the proper time to have redistribution; I do not think it would be fair to some of the western provinces, but I rise this evening to place myself on record as being opposed to any amendment to the British North America Act unless the provincial legislatures have agreed to such amendment. Any amendment to the British North America Act should involve the approval of the legislature of each province. I intend to support the resolution, but I do so upon the understanding that it creates no precedent as far as further amendments to the British North America Act are concerned.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the resolution we are requested to pass does not meet with my approval and I must admit frankly that I cannot countenance it. Here are my reasons. In 1867 the British North America Act fixed at 65 the number of members for the province of Quebec. Besides, the same legislation states that the other provinces will be entitled to as many constituencies as the number of times their population is divisible by one sixty-fifth of that of the province of Quebec.

This clause was included in the Confederation pact in order to safeguard the rights of Quebec as compared to the other provinces and ensure that it would be fairly represented in Parliament. If the population of Quebec should increase more rapidly than that of the other provinces in a ten-year period, it may well be that the representation of these be decreased, as on the contrary, it may increase if the population of Quebec should experience an appreciable decrease.

The British North America Act specifies that the representation shall be adjusted following every tenth-year census. A census has been taken in 1941; according to the constitution the readjustment of representation should take place before the next general election.

However, the government, in the resolution now before the house, request that this readjustment be postponed until after the end of the war. As main arguments in favour of its resolution the government state that we are at war and that such a readjustment in war-time would inevitably cause dissension.

I still believe, Mr. Speaker, that the war should not be an excuse or a pretext for the establishment of a precedent or for any abuse. Time and again, I have protested in this house against the tendency of the government, under pretext of the state of war, to alter or amend our parliamentary set-up. The readjustment is to be made following the census taken every ten years. It has been taken during the war. Why have not the government, at that time, thought of postponing it? Since the census has been taken why should the readjustment of representation be postponed? It had been announced in the speech from the throne, on January 28. On May 14th last the Right Hon. Prime Minister informed the house that this measure would be brought down in the course of the present session. Exactly a month later, the Right Hon. Prime Minister announced the intention of the government of having the constitution amended so as to postpone until the end of the war the readjustment of representation. Why this change in policy?

Any amendment to the constitution would establish a dangerous precedent, even in war-time. Besides, the constitution should be amended only in cases of absolute necessity. Furthermore, the readjustment of representation bill does not affect our war effort, either directly or indirectly, but is purely and simply an administrative affair.

The government fear that this readjustment may cause serious dissensions. This could not possibly be the case in Quebec, for that province may have neither more nor less than 65 constituencies. The protests could be based only on the alteration of the boundaries of existing constituencies and the government could, very wisely, avoid these, for reasons of war emergency. On account of the increase in the population of the province of Quebec, the prairie provinces will lose seven or eight electoral districts. I understand that if the redistribution was to be done at once, some hon. members, and especially those who sit on the other side of the house, would rise in protest. What happens is solely due to the constitution. The population of Quebec, a province where large families are the rule, which is no commonplace title to fame, has materially increased since the last ten years, and many persons who have left other provinces have found that Quebec was hospitable. Such are the facts. The province of Quebec is justified in demanding that the constitution be upheld, especially since the latter is the very basis of our representative system. Speaking in the Quebec house, whose members were unanimous on that point, Prime Minister Godbout has demanded on behalf and for the protection of the province of Quebec a representation wholly in accordance with the constitution. That desire on the part of the provincial government, and it is also the desire of the whole population of the province, cannot and must not be ignored.

The resolution clearly emphasizes that the readjustment of representation will be proceeded with at the first session held after the cessation of hostilities. The question comes up: What will happen if the war is to last one, two or three years longer, or if there is a general election before the cessation of hostilities? If the resolution is passed and if the government should decide to hold a general election in the coming fall or next winter, it follows that the number of constituencies will still be 245 while it should, in fact, be only 237 or 238.

Do you not believe, Mr. Speaker, that an injustice is being done as regards the rights which the province of Quebec enjoys under the confederation agreement, and that, under the pretext of war, the democratic character of our parliamentary system is being set aside? In my opinion to postpone the redistribution is simply to check the influence which Quebec is entitled to have on the political destinies of this country.

The Prime Minister has referred to an unusual movement of population between the various provinces as a result of the enforcement of the mobilization act and the opening of war plants. The argument is not absolutely convincing, since it is quite possible that the situation may, with the cessation of hostilities, become both normal and permanent.

I am opposed to this resolution for the reasons which I have just stated. I consider that I have no right to take any other stand; a principle is involved, and it is also a matter of justice for my province. Besides, this resolution interferes with the constitution and my province is especially affected. The government has no justification for overriding the constitution.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is very little I think it is necessary for me to say at this time. I wish, however, to deal with one objection that was featured rather prominently in the speeches that have been made.

First of all, it would appear that there are many members of this house who feel it is proper that redistribution should be postponed. They also realize that this cannot be done without some legislation which would be operative notwithstanding the ordinary provisions of the British North America Act. Legislation that would operate notwithstanding the terms of the British North America Act could not be passed in this country and must be obtained from the parliament of the United Kingdom. It has even been suggested that the old traditional form of "a humble address may be presented to His Majesty" indicates a degree of humility that is not compatible with the autonomous state of this country. I do not think that in the courteous forms which have been handed down to us there is anything that need prove a serious danger to our autonomy. But it is a fact that the only way in which legislative provision can be obtained that would operate notwithstanding the provisions of the British North America Act is by an act enacted by the parliament of the United Kingdom. I trust it will not always be so. I trust that there will be a system devised whereby it will be possible for us to deal here in our country with the problems which concern us. But the establishment of that system will require an amendment to be made to the British North America Act, and that amendment will have to be made by the parliament of the United Kingdom. I do not think it would be the temper of this parliament at the present time to undertake to establish any permanent system for amending in a permanent fashion the provisions of our constitution. I hope that day will arrive and that it will arrive soon enough for me to witness a system found and made operative whereby things like this will not require even to be registered, for that is really what it amounts to, as the statute of another parliament.

When it comes to making amendments to our constitution I would like to suggest to hon. members that there appears to be a fundamental distinction to be observed. Confederation was not really a pact between provinces.

As a matter of fact, there was only one province of the United Canadas, Upper and Lower, at the time confederation came into existence. But it was nevertheless the system worked out by responsible prominent leaders of the population of the areas which then constituted, on the one hand, the united province of Upper and Lower Canada, and on the other hand the maritime provinces, and it was provided that under this system provincial legislatures and provincial governments would be established to deal with certain matters over which they were allocated exclusive jurisdiction. The courts have held that the provinces in the exercise of jurisdiction in the field allocated to them are sovereign states.

There are other matters which were not so allocated for administrative purposes to provincial legislatures or to provincial governments, but which were either expressly allocated to the federal parliament or which come under the residual clause under which parliament is competent to deal with them.

I would readily concede to hon. members that if there were to be any suggested amendment to change the allocation of legislative or administrative jurisdiction as between the provinces, on the one hand, and the federal parliament, on the other, it could not properly be done without the consent of the organism that was set up by the constitution to have powers that would assumedly be taken from that organism.

Apart from the matters that are expressly allocated to the provincial legislatures and provincial governments, there are other matters which the representatives of the inhabitants of the provinces who sit in this parliament are the competent persons to deal with, and here in this instance is something having to do with representation in this house. That is something which is not allocated to the provincial legislatures or to the provincial governments. That is something which interests the inhabitants of the provinces, but the inhabitants of the provinces as electors have sent representatives to this national parliament to represent them, and I suggest that when dealing with matters in that category the members elected by the people of the provinces, who are also the people of Canada, are those who have to take their responsibility in determining whether they are in the interests of Canada or otherwise.

The example that was given by the hon. member is a case where it was eminently proper that the consent of the legislatures be obtained because it meant transferring to this parliament jurisdiction which in 1867 had been allocated to those legislatures. I submit that it would have been quite improper to take away from the provinces without their consent anything that they had by the constitution. That, I think, Mr. Speaker, disposes of the objection founded on the protest of the Quebec government or the Quebec legislature. They may have expressed their opinion, but in respect of matters concerning representation in this house they are merely electors, and they are represented here by members of parliament who have been elected by them and by the other electors of the respective constituencies in which they have their homes.

As to the amendment which the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) would have liked to move, may I point out that the hon. member must have overlooked the terms of paragraph 5 of section 51 of the British North America Act; he would expressly provide that there would not be an election until redistribution shall have taken place. Well, the constitution provides that any readjustment, whenever made, is not operative until the dissolution of the parliament under which it is made. Paragraph 5, section 51, states:

> Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing parliament.

So that a bill with that kind of amendment added to it would have been without any effect at all. It would merely have meant that a redistribution might be made at one session instead of at another session of the same parliament. There is no amendment to the constitution necessary to do that. I was not here at the time, but I am told that the redistribution following the census of 1931 was not made until the second session following the publication of the census reports. There would not only be this fact that it would utterly destroy whatever effect this bill in the resolution provides for, but it seems to me that there are also two serious constitutional objections to the hon. member's proposals.

One would be to deprive the crown of its right to dissolve parliament until there had been a session where redistribution had been enacted; and the other—an indirect effect at that—would have been to make this parliament almost eternal, to prolong the life of this parliament until the majority saw fit to enact a provision for redistribution. There would have been no obligation to enact it at any special time, and if the majority of this parliament continued session after session to find itself unable to agree on a redistribution the life of the parliament would be automatically prolonged by the terms of the amendment thus introduced.

Mr. CARDIN: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Certainly.

Mr. CARDIN: When this resolution is adopted and when the bill is passed by the British House of Commons postponing redistribution until after the war, supposing the war concludes in 1946 or 1947; does the hon. minister contend that we could not have a general election at the expiration of this parliament, which expires in 1945?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not contending anything of the kind. What I am contending is that if an amendment such as that suggested by the hon. member were made, it would not be possible to have a dissolution until after a redistribution had been agreed to by parliament.

Hon. members have asked, what has happened between the speech from the throne, in which redistribution was announced, and the introduction of this resolution? What happened was that figures collected during the last census became available, and upon looking at them it was realized that what they would mean, with a redistribution at this time, was a situation as exposed to the house this afternoon, and it was felt that that would not be fair. Now it is submitted with great vehemence that when anything unfair exists it should be corrected. That may be so, but I submit that the agreement on the extent to which there is unfairness would not be sufficiently unanimous to warrant provoking a debate or debates upon it at the present time.

For these reasons, although I agree with hon. members that it would have been preferable if the result desired could be achieved in some other way than by asking a parliament outside of this country to pass a statute, since that is not possible, and since the object pursued seems to be desirable, I submit that the resolution should meet with the concurrence of the members of the house.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have an announcement I wish to make regarding wheat farmers' gristing. At the present time western wheat farmers are permitted to grist up to forty bushels within the quota for their own home use. It has been decided that these gristing privileges shall be extended to a total of one hundred bushels to each permit-holder, during the crop year of 1942-43 without diminishing the total wheat delivery quota of fifteen bushels on the authorized acreage.

I shall be making a further announcement regarding gristing regulations for the crop year 1943-44 shortly.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, July 1, consideration in commitee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

AGRICULTURE

Freight assistance on western feed grains, $8,000,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: The other night some reference was made to dehydration, and the minister told the hon. member for Fraser Valley that he would make a statement on the question under one of these items. Under which of the items will he make that statement?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): What I did say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley was that I would be prepared to answer his question on this item. I am not sure what the question was, but I presume it had to do with the dehydration plant in British Columbia. I have an answer with regard to the plant at Haney, British Columbia. If the Haney plant can be fully and properly equipped for the dehydration of potatoes and can manufacture a product which will meet the board's specifications, and if the wartime prices and trade board will approve the production of additional dehydrated potatoes from British Columbia, the board may give the Haney plant a contract for a small quantity of dehydrated potatoes in 1943—possibly 200 tons. That is the statement which I have had prepared to answer the question in regard to that plant. However, I am not sure that that was the question intended.

Mr. REID: As the hon. member for Fraser Valley and I are both interested in this matter, and as the hon. member for Fraser Valley had to leave the chamber a few moments ago, perhaps the minister would not mind answering a question of mine, because both of us have been appealed to. This is a plant which has been in business in the town of Haney for a considerable time. Some assurance must have been given to the management of the plant that they would be given an order for dehydrating potatoes, because before I left the district at Easter time one of the prominent farmers in the district told me he had contracted his potatoes to this plant. My understanding was that many farmers both in the Fraser Valley and New Westminster constituencies had agreed to sell their potatoes to the plant.

Since that time and up until the present the management of the plant has been endeavouring to obtain a contract from the wartime prices and trade board, or whatever board has to do with it, to supply dehydrated potatoes. My information to-day is that it is without success. An argument was used that the Fraser valley was known as a deficiency area, in so far as potatoes are concerned. May I say that I absolutely disagree with that finding? In fact, I cannot understand how such a finding could have been given, because I myself remember not so very long ago—just prior to the war—hundreds of tons of potatoes being allowed to rot in the Fraser valley. And the reason why potatoes have not been grown, particularly in the Fraser valley, to any great extent, is that the price did not warrant production, or did not cover the cost of production. But the fact is that the Fraser valley is a splendid district for the growing of potatoes.

I tell the minister and the committee now that I take strong exception to the statement made by the member of the wartime prices and trade board that potatoes grown in the Fraser valley were not very good. I do not know what potatoes he was talking about, but he certainly was not talking about potatoes grown in the Fraser valley. I can tell you, Mr. Chairman, and members of this committee, that potatoes have been dished up in this city that we would not feed to the hogs, let alone to human beings.

I resent very much the statement made by that member of the board that there were no good potatoes grown in the Fraser valley. And, in so far as any deficiency area is concerned, it is not correct to make that statement, because we did grow potatoes in past years. I have seen hundreds of tons going to waste. I am going to ask the minister why this firm cannot get a contract for the dehydration of potatoes. The opinion is that there will be an excess of potatoes grown in the Fraser valley, that there will be at least 15,000 tons more this year than were grown last year.

It seems strange to me; if there is anything against the plant or the management we should know about it. The excuse cannot be given that they have not potatoes, or that the potatoes are not good. I would ask the minister to tell us why this firm cannot obtain a contract for dehydrating potatoes.

Mr. GARDINER: The wartime agricultural supplies board has no information as to whether the Berryland plant at Haney, British Columbia, has pre-processing equipment such as pealers, cutters, dicers and plungers, or whether this plant is equipped for that work. Our representative at the Summerland experimental station, Mr. Atkinson, advised Mr. J. M. Armstrong recently, namely on June 23, that the Haney plant ordered temperature control equipment for their plant, and that they have no information yet that the order can be filled, or that the equipment can be supplied. Mr. Atkinson has informed Mr. Armstrong, or did inform him, in the Lethbridge area in June, that he believed that the dehydrator and the layout of the plant was satisfactory. That statement has been made.

Mr. REID: That it was satisfactory?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that he believed it was. But we have no absolute information with regard to it. We have no definite information in regard to it. That is the first matter that has to be cleared up, namely, whether the plant is properly equipped to do the job, if the contract is given.

The second point is this: the price to be paid by the special products board for dehydrated potatoes in 1943 was thirty-five cents per dried pound. That is what is asked. That is higher than will be paid in Alberta, the price there being thirty-three cents, and prices in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick being thirty-three and thirty-two cents respectively. The price for Prince Edward Island is not known, but it is presumed it will be thirty-two cents. Only in Ontario, where a relatively small quantity of potatoes have been contracted for, will the price be as high as British Columbia. So that there is the question as to whether we can get dehydrated potatoes at a lower price elsewhere. Unless British Columbia can meet the price of other parts of Canada, I presume it will be difficult for them to get a contract.

Then, Mr. Shaw, chairman of the supplies board, gave evidence some time ago before the committee on agriculture. Among other things he said this:

> We were aware of the plant in question and had it inspected by a dehydration man whose report stated that it was fairly well equipped but lacked certain equipment for the completion of the dehydration processing of vegetables.

In other words, the report he has given to the committee is to the effect that it is not fully equipped. Then he continued:

> Now, that means just what I said in the beginning, that this plant is not at the moment in a complete position to do this job. I stated it would probably be possible, that we had no objections, in regard to giving a contract if the products were required, providing they gave assurance on two things: First, that they can do this job to the satisfaction of the board, and second, that by doing it at that particular point they do not endanger or short the domestic supply situation.

That is the question just raised by the hon. member for New Westminster, the question as to whether the preparing of dehydrated potatoes in that particular area would short the supplies for cities like Vancouver and Victoria, and for camps out there connected with military operations. Then he continued:

> Those are the two conditions and they are very important ones. They are the only points in question. I might mention this, that there are no controls in that plant. Dehydration cannot be conducted without controls, and there has been no application, as far as I am aware, for controls.

In other words, the contention is that the plant is not fully equipped, and that those who are operating would have to satisfy the board that it would be equipped before an order would be given. In the second place, there would have to be satisfactory evidence that there were sufficient potatoes—not five years ago or six years ago, or even last year—but that there would be sufficient potatoes this year to warrant the board's going in there and buying potatoes to be dehydrated for shipment out, when there may have to be potatoes shipped in to feed the people in that area.

If that can be proved satisfactorily, then there is no reason why a contract should not be given. That matter, I believe, has been referred to the wartime prices and trade board, and I understand they have stated—and I presume they had evidence before making the statement—that while it is true that British Columbia has been exporting potatoes, that very much larger quantities are imported from points outside the province. Considerable quantities move from interior points, such as Ashcroft and Kamloops. The wartime prices and trade board state it is their opinion that a dehydration programme at the coast would accentuate this movement which, under war-time conditions, would not appear to be justified. That is their decision on the information they have, up to the moment. They point out that there are so many potatoes being used there that there is some question as to whether we should dehydrate potatoes in British Columbia.

Mr. REID: I do not know whether I can answer all the statements made by the minister, but certainly I shall answer as many of them as I can remember.

First of all, with regard to the quantity of potatoes may I say that this is not the first occasion I have protested to the Minister of National Revenue against allowing potatoes to enter British Columbia from southern points, at times when the farmers had their pits full of potatoes. The fact that there have been importations of potatoes does not mean that there are no potatoes in British Columbia. We must remember that in some parts of California three crops are grown in a year, on irrigated ground, and that they have cheaper labour. They have sent the surplus crop from California, Oregon and Washington into British Columbia, while our potatoes rotted. I have protested many times in the house about that situation.

At the outset of his remarks the minister stated that whoever had surveyed the plant had said that the equipment this man had was all right for potatoes, but that he did not think it would be satisfactory for vegetables. Let us have a clear picture of this. Just what do they want? Here is an instance where the farmers have made an agreement with the manager of a plant to the effect that they will sell their potatoes to this plant. If they get an ordinary crop of potatoes in British Columbia they will have a surplus this year. I contend that that point has not been investigated. All we are getting now from the minister is a statement that some official says that some things have to be decided to find out whether they will make a contract with the farmers. This is the first part of July; the crop is almost ready for market. Steps should have been taken long ago. This matter should have been settled months and months ago.

That was the stand taken by the chairman of this firm. Will the minister say on his responsibility as Minister of Agriculture that this is a deficiency area? Will he make a statement now?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member wants me to make a statement now, and I will. He knows the reason for the action that was taken last spring as well as I do. He knows of the telegram that we received which threatened not to feed the people of the west coast area.

Mr. REID: That has nothing to do with its being a deficiency area. I would take the minister up on that statement if I had time.

Mr. GARDINER: That is why potatoes were shipped in. A certain organization in British Columbia threatened this government and threatened the board that they would not even supply potatoes for the military camps, and potatoes were admitted into that area. I do not want to get into any unnecessary discussion about this.

Mr. REID: I do not care whether the minister does or not.

Mr. GARDINER: That is quite all right. While he was speaking, on at least two occasions, my hon. friend made a statement which I had not given a moment ago.

Mr. REID: What were they?

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say anything about vegetables and potatoes. I read what I said and I still have it in front of me. That statement can still be read.

Mr. REID: The minister is taking another argument. We were talking about dehydrating potatoes at this plant. We were talking about 1943, and the minister is talking about the 1942 crop and what occurred in connection with the potato board of British Columbia. That is an entirely different subject. We realize that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) takes care of the wartime prices and trade board, but I do not want the minister to try to sidetrack the issue.

Mr. GARDINER: We were talking about potatoes; we were not talking about vegetables.

Mr. REID: If you will read the record you will find that you mentioned that this man said that they had a plant fit to dehydrate potatoes but that it was not fit for vegetables. That was the statement you made. I ask you to read Hansard to-morrow, and you will find you said that in spite of what you say now. I want to know what you are going to do. You have not yet said that there is a deficiency area in British Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon. member for New Westminster kindly to address the Chair.

Mr. REID: I will turn and look at you, Mr. Chairman, and perhaps I will not feel as bad.

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend will just permit me, I will read what was said. It reads:

If the Haney plant can be fully and properly equipped for the dehydration of potatoes and can manufacture a product which will meet the board's specifications and if the wartime prices and trade board will approve of the production of additional dehydrated potatoes in British Columbia, the board could give the Haney plant a contract for a small quantity of dehydrated potatoes in 1943 (possibly 200 tons).

Mr. REID: We will get the record straight because I am not letting the Minister of Agriculture get away with that. I did not say that that was the statement he referred to. I said that the official he spoke about who investigated the situation had given it as his opinion that this plant had the equipment to dehydrate potatoes but that they did not have sufficient equipment for vegetables. That was the statement to which I took exception, but now the minister has changed it and gone on to another statement and I am not going to let him do that. I was referring to the official who had investigated this plant, not to the statement which the minister has just read.

Mr. GARDINER: I read all of it and there is not a word about vegetables.

Mr. REID: Will you go back to the one by the official who investigated the plant? I want to know if there is to be a further investigation and I want to know if the minister is going to see that this plant gets fair treatment.

Mr. GARDINER: I have answered that on three occasions and I will answer it again. "If the Haney plant can be fully and properly equipped"—that is the first thing they have to do.

Mr. REID: To whose satisfaction?

Mr. GARDINER: To the satisfaction of those who are going to buy their product; that is always the person who must be satisfied. "For the dehydration of potatoes and can manufacture a product which will meet the board's specifications"—they have to be properly equipped before they can manufacture that product. "And if the wartime prices and trade board will approve the production of additional dehydrated potatoes"—that raises the question as to whether or not there are sufficient potatoes to supply that particular area. If there are not, there will not be any taken out of the area. If there are sufficient, then they are quite prepared to have potatoes dehydrated. "The board could give the Haney plant a contract for a small quantity of dehydrated potatoes in 1943, possibly two hundred tons." I do not know how I can make the statement any clearer than that.

Mr. REID: I am very glad the minister did not reiterate the statement that it was a deficiency area. I should like to know what official of the department advised the wartime prices and trade board that the potatoes of the Fraser valley were not good for eating purposes. Would the minister tell us who that official was? That is a slur on the potatoes of the Fraser valley and something we are not going to let go by just as easy as that. I am addressing you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know where the hon. member is getting that statement. I cannot find it in anything I have read.

Mr. REID: I will produce it later.

Mr. KNOWLES: I realize that I slowed up the proceedings by raising the question of dehydration, but I had no idea that I was going to start a family quarrel. I may have misunderstood the minister, but from what he said I understood that he would make a general statement on what his department was doing to encourage the dehydration of vegetables and fruits to meet the needs of the war situation. We all realize the desirability of maintaining as good a supply as possible of vegetables and fruits to maintain the health of our people. On account of the difficulties in connection with getting sugar it has not been possible to get canned goods as readily as was the case before the war. My information is that it would be possible to make up that deficiency to some extent by increasing the commercial dehydration of vegetables and fruits and also encouraging the home hydration of vegetables and fruits. What is the minister's department doing along these two lines?

Mr. GARDINER: The dehydrating of vegetables including potatoes was not carried on in any extensive way until a year ago. When the war first began we had been carrying on experiments in dehydration at different farms, more particularly at Kentville, Nova Scotia, and at Summerland, British Columbia. I think it was in the spring of 1941 when some inquiries were made as to whether we could provide dehydrated vegetables, fruits and potatoes to the British food ministry. I think that inquiry was made to the Department of Trade and Commerce through its officials. The officials who were dealing with it at the time were not fully familiar with what was being done in agriculture, but later on in the season the British representatives made representations to the Department of Agriculture, and we were able to satisfy them at that time that we had methods of dehydration which, if applied to some plants in Canada, might produce an acceptable product. The British representatives made some suggestions as to what equipment might be put in, and those suggestions were added to by the dehydration officials of our different farms.

One of these men has been placed in charge of dehydration in Canada, and there has been the development of plants which was agreed upon between the British government and ourselves. The result is that we have some eight plants operating across Canada. These plants have had some assistance from the government, largely in the matter of how they should be equipped and some assistance in connection with getting the equipment and having it put in the plants. My understanding is that the government is not actually paying out cash, that the equipment is to be paid for by the plants themselves. As I say, some eight or possibly nine plants by now are operating in different places across Canada. They have been providing all the products for which we could get an outlet in our arrangement with the British government. I may say that a year ago, after we got the plants operating, we were not at all certain that we would get rid of all the dehydrated products we had at that time, but since that time satisfactory arrangements have been made and the British are taking these products.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to press further the local aspect of the matter. Is the department doing anything to increase the supply of dehydrated fruits to be avaiable in the home market to replace the canned fruits which are practically off the shelves of Canadian stores?

Mr. GARDINER: Ever since the beginning of the war we have had a contract with the Nova Scotia apple people under which apples were dehydrated and also canned. The government has taken delivery of a very considerable part of the apple crop and we have either canned or dehydrated the apples. During the first year of the war we actually gave away a considerable part of the dehydrated product to the British as part of our programme to help out in the marketing of a crop which in those days was not needed; that is, in the form of fresh apples. Since that time we have been encouraging housewives to can fruit and vegetables. We have put out pamphlets which indicate how this canning can be done most satisfactorily and how fruit and vegetables can be dehydrated in the home. That kind of work is being done constantly by the department right across Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: This may have been covered while I have been away for the last few days, but in view of the fact that there is likely to be a shortage of potatoes in this part of Canada again and the possibility that we may have another large crop of potatoes in western Canada, is the department doing anything to see that our surplus potatoes in the west that may come into existence in the fall are properly stored with a view to shipping them later on to points in Canada where they are needed? The minister will remember as I do that last fall on a good many farms in western Canada there were piles of potatoes that could not be used, and yet, as we know, potatoes can be stored very simply. I have seen potatoes just put into a hole in the ground, and if it were deep enough and dry enough and had a little ventilation the potatoes would come out in the spring in excellent shape. I wonder if the department is contemplating urging farmers to store in such simple fashion any of their surplus potatoes under a sort of guarantee that they would be marketed under some government plan in the spring when they would be needed in those parts of Canada where there is likely to be a shortage.

Mr. GARDINER: There is considerable difficulty in determining very long in advance whether there will be a shortage.

Mr. COLDWELL: It looks very much that way now, with the rain rotting the potatoes.

Mr. GARDINER: It is, but I was just going to call my hon. friend's attention to the statement that was read in the house the other evening to the effect that there are now 5,000 cars of potatoes south of the line looking for a market, whereas two weeks ago we were worrying because we were not able to get potatoes. Potatoes are a crop that anyone can grow in his back yard, and we have been urging people to grow what we call victory gardens all across Canada. If they have been responding to the appeals we have been making, it is very difficult for anyone to estimate how many potatoes we shall have this fall. On the other hand, I think it is known to farmers right across Canada how potatoes can be pitted. It has long been the practice to pit potatoes for keeping during the winter. Publications go out from the department that give information to those not properly informed as to how that can be done.

I think one of the big problems in connection with potato marketing is this. With prices under control and the price based on some particular season of the year, the farmer finds that if he keeps his potatoes in the cellar during the winter and has to go down and pick them over in the spring and sacrifice probably half of them in order to get the other half, good potatoes that can go on the market, he hesitates to do so if he is controlled by the price in the fall, particularly if labour is short in the spring, which it usually is. I think some attention will have to be given to encouraging the farmer to keep potatoes during the winter and have them ready for marketing in the spring. Right at the time of the potato shortage here I had a letter from a farmer telling me that he had just taken out one hundred bushels of his potatoes from his cellar and fed them to his pigs. He was complaining of the method that had been set up for moving these potatoes from his farm to where someone wanted them. I can understand the farmer doing that, and so can anyone who has been on the farm and knows how farmers store their potatoes and what a job they have in the spring with them and the labour involved in it. If there is a shortage of labour, and that is very likely in the spring, the farmer will feed the potatoes to the pigs. We do all we can to overcome that, but I am sure hon. members will realize we cannot overcome it all.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have another question that comes to some extent under the minister's department, but largely perhaps under the Department of Trade and Commerce. Is any attempt being made to solve the problem of the transportation of our wheat to the United States for feed? I ask that deliberately, because on Friday of last week I heard that question asked by the vice-president of the United States. Is there an answer to it? I could not answer it.

Mr. GARDINER: The position is this. We shall have in Canada about 649 million bushels of wheat in store at the end of this month, a carryover from preceding years. It is not all feed wheat, but it is wheat that can be fed. But we have a decided shortage of cars on both sides of the line with which to move the grain. That is on account of the fact that the cars are being used to ship minerals, largely iron, and to handle the output of our war factories.

I should say, too, that up until a few months ago there was an embargo on wheat entering the United States, with the exception of feed wheat, and the percentage of our feed wheat is comparatively low. The Americans have recently removed that embargo, but just removing the embargo did not start the wheat to move. There was a lack of cars and a lack of shipping on the lakes to move it. The officials of the wheat board visited Washington and discussed the matter with government and railway officials there, because, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says, this matter comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and they made an arrangement whereby the United States railways would place all the cars they could at the disposal of the Canadian railways to move grain to the head of the lakes. Every hon. member from the west knows that United States cars have been spotted at the towns all up and down our western railways to move the grain to the head of the lakes. It was supposed, if moved in United States cars, to be moved there to be at the disposal of the Americans who would take it away in United States ships.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are they buying the wheat from the wheat board?

Mr. GARDINER: They are buying on the market, but I presume most of it would come from the wheat board. They have bid prices of $1 on the market and take whatever supplies they can get. The grain is then supposed to move down the lakes on United States ships and in United States cars from United States ports. The Americans want the grain in their eastern states where the shortage chiefly exists. They have sufficient grain in the prairie sections where the grain is grown. The grain has to be shipped down the length of the lakes and reshipped by train to the points where it is required. There has been this difficulty of getting sufficient cars and shipping to move feed wheat or coarse grains in the quantities we would like it to move. They wanted to get 200 million bushels, and we would like to sell them 200 million bushels, but up to date they have moved under 100 million bushels. So that the position is not as we would like to have it. The difficulty is transportation, but the railways and shipping are doing the best they can.

Mr. COLDWELL: Have the two countries a joint organization to handle it?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there has been co-operation.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what I was not clear about. Apparently the need for feed is becoming acute in the United States. They are faced apparently with the problem of shipping. I was not clear whether there was cooperation between the two sides of the line, and my impression was that some doubt existed in Washington. I wanted to be clear about that.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no reason why that feeling should exist. I have heard a little about the questioning that was done by Mr. Wallace. I was in Chicago about two weeks ago and have also heard the questions he was asking and I think his questions were based on what was being said as to conditions on this side of the line. I found that many farmers across the border did not realize that there was as large a wheat surplus as there is in Canada, and consequently they were inclined to increase their own acreage in wheat, whereas we have a very large surplus here. That was one of the reasons why I went to Chicago, to make it apparent to them that the grain is here. There is still the transportation difficulty.

Mr. COLDWELL: The government should get its information board to do something about this, because there is apparently in the United States a lack of understanding of what this country has, of what it is doing and of what it has done. While this is not under the minister's department, I think every effort should be made to publicize what Canada has done toward furnishing free supplies to Great Britain last year and to the united nations this year, and what we are prepared to do in the way of production and the extent of co-operation which we are prepared to give and have given to the United States and the other allied nations. I feel that this is not understood.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Under what item will the minister be prepared to discuss the question of wool prices?

The CHAIRMAN: We are now on item 5. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $8,000,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to have the minister's answer. The question of wool prices is very important and should be discussed.

Mr. GARDINER: The wool board is not under us, but still the special products board is; I think the best place to discuss it is here.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Under what item would the minister suggest that we discuss the price of beef?

Mr. GARDINER: Under what is called the bacon board; it should be the meat board now.

Mr. WRIGHT: On this item, freight assistance on western feed grains to eastern Canada, I think this is a policy of the government which was supported quite widely in western and eastern Canada. Would it be possible to have this freight assistance extended to commercial seed grains? What has happened during the past year is that a great deal of feed grain was shipped to eastern Canada and used for seed, because the additional freight on seed grain placed the price out of line with the price of feed grain, so that a lot of inferior seed has been sold in eastern Canada this year and a lot of good commercial seed had to be sold in western Canada for feed. That position will be even worse in the coming year, because in a great deal of eastern Canada not so much seed grain will be available this year as there was last year. It will be found that in 1944 large quantities of feed grain shipped to eastern Canada will be used for seed, and seed of inferior quality, when better seed is available and could be used to produce more grain than can be grown from the inferior grain. Would the government consider paying freight assistance on commercial seed for use in eastern Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: The freight policy was associated with an attempt to get food for Britain, and the payment of freight from Fort William east was in the hope that we could get enough western grain moved down into the eastern areas to feed all of the live stock there is on eastern farms. I do not know whether the government would be prepared to accept a policy of free freight on seed as well, coming from Fort William east. It is a new idea; I doubt very much whether it is necessary in order to get the results we desire to get at the present time. I am not sure whether the hon. member for Melfort has in mind seed grain or whether he has in mind alfalfa seed, which is grown in his constituency or in that area.

Mr. WRIGHT: I had not reference to alfalfa seed; I had reference to oats and barley and commercial coarse grain seed which is produced in large quantities and of good quality in western Canada, and has been shipped in considerable quantities to eastern Canada. My understanding is that that freight fell off this spring because some of the better carloads of feed grain were being used by eastern farmers for seed, rather than pay the additional cost on commercial seed grain of standard quality. The result is that there will not be as much production in eastern Canada from the inferior seed which has been used. I think the government would be quite justified in paying the freight so as to get better seed for eastern Canada, especially in view of the fact that there is likely to be a considerable shortage in seed grain in eastern Canada during the coming year.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course I would not be in a position to prove whether or not grain shipped down under the feed policy has been used for seed, other than to say this, that those who collect the money on the freight are supposed to prove that this grain is used for feed. Hon. members will understand that when oats, for example, get out on to the farm it is difficult for any inspector to follow the shipment and say that these particular oats went into feed and these others went into the ground. Nevertheless payment is only supposed to be made if the grain is being fed. For example, we do not pay if grain is milled for any other purpose than feeding live stock. We pay on that proportion of the wheat which goes into bran and shorts which is fed to live stock, but we do not pay on the other part of the wheat which goes into flour. For the same reason we would not pay, if we knew it, on grain which is going into seed, under the present policy. I doubt very much if the government would be prepared to pay freight on seed grain under present circumstances.

Mr. QUELCH: Is this assistance being given to British Columbia as well?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. The arrangement is the same. It starts from Calgary and Edmonton west as from Fort William east.

Mr. REID: Has the minister anything to show whether the consumption of grain has increased since the freight assistance has been put into effect?

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes; the amount we have shipped east has been greatly increased. It is about double.

Mr. REID: And west?

Mr. GARDINER: West, I would think about the same. The freight assistance amounted up to the end of the fiscal year 1943, in round figures, to the following sums: Ontario, $4,600,000; Quebec, $4,900,000; New Brunswick, $900,000; Nova Scotia, $1,300,000; Prince Edward Island $274,000; British Columbia, $1,218,000; making the total $13,343,000. The total for the fiscal year 1943 is $8,906,000, with an additional $708,000 being paid on wheat at eight cents a bushel.

Item agreed to.

Feeds administrator—

Payment of eight cents per bushel in respect of western wheat used exclusively as feed for live stock, $2,000,000.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Does this apply to feed grain shipped east, or anywhere in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: It applies on the same grain shipped to the same points as the other feed grain, and from the same points; that is, from Fort William east to any point and from Calgary and Edmonton west.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): But not to any point within the prairies themselves?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Why is this amount eight cents a bushel?

Mr. GARDINER: It is the difference between the price which the miller is presumed to get the wheat at, and the ninety cents.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is any of this $2,000,000 paid to millers who are using the wheat for making into flour? Are they paid on the proportion of the bran and shorts which are made out of wheat?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a ceiling on flour, and under that arrangement the miller gets his wheat at a certain price. That price is based on what he paid for wheat in September and October, 1941. But the farmer gets ninety cents a bushel for the wheat, and this puts the wheat for which the farmer gets ninety cents a bushel on a feeding basis eight cents lower than that.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, July 6, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

BANKING AND COMMERCE

First report of standing committee on Banking and Commerce—Mr. Moore.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. T. A. FONTAINE (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot) moved:

That the first report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, presented to the house on July 2, 1943, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 115, for the relief of John Whitehead Casement.—Mr. Emmerson.

MOBILIZATION ACT

TORONTO MOBILIZATION DIVISION—ARRESTS AND PROSECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. I understand a radio broadcast heard over certain stations at noon to-day carried the news that arrests had been made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police of certain officials in Toronto under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour. I should be glad if the minister would make a statement to the house, so that we may be informed of the latest developments in this connection.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, prior to receiving notice of the hon. member's question I had a statement prepared with regard to this matter. It is as follows:

I feel that hon. members should be informed that this morning the divisional registrar of the mobilization division with headquarters at Toronto was arrested together with several others not connected with this or any other government department. The prosecution is in the hands of the Department of Justice. I am informed that the charge is laid under section 31 of the mobilization regulations—that is, doing an act likely to nullify or impede the operation of the regulations or aiding and abetting the person committing such an act. One of the inspectors of the mobilization section has been appointed acting registrar. The investigation has not implicated anyone else in the service.

FARMERS' CREDITORS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO AMEND ARRANGEMENT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. When may we expect legislation regarding amendments to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act? We are most anxious, now that the session is drawing to an end, to have these amendments before us.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I can only repeat the information I gave the house on an earlier occasion. It is intended to bring down legislation as soon as the war appropriation measure, now before the house, is disposed of.

CHEESE

INQUIRY RESPECTING QUOTA AND PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. On May 17 of this year, when there was a discussion in the house in regard to the cheese quota for this year, and the price to be paid, the minister intimated, as reported at page 2720 of Hansard, that he might within a period of a few weeks be in a position to make some further announcement with respect to price. A press dispatch from Ottawa, dated July 4, states that on July 1 the cheese in storage is some 15,000,000 pounds less than it was on July 1, 1942. Is the minister in a position now to make some further statement?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the estimates having to do with the dairy board will be before the committee, I should hope, within the next few minutes. That would be the appropriate time to discuss this matter.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

RESOLUTION OF BAPTIST UNION OF WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. Has the government received a resolution from the Baptist Union of Western Canada, which met in Winnipeg last week, urging the government to "accede to the overwhelming weight of public opinion" —and I quote those words from the resolution—by lowering the pensionable age to sixty-five, and by increasing the amount of the old age pension to $30 per month? If so, what reply has been made by the government?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, July 5, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley —Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Flax fibre administrator — administration, $30,500.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How much flax was handled by this administrator, and what are the stocks at present on hand?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member is referring to fibre flax?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: The only flax on hand is that not processed; they are working at the job all the time. During 1942 there was a further expansion of acreage of some 2,500 acres, and three more mills commenced operations. The expansion of the industry is indicated in the following table:

8 mills	38 mills
8,300 acres	47,000 acres
1,344 tons	8,730 tons, estimated
$837,000	$3,202,000

During the year sixteen mills operated in Ontario and twenty-two in Quebec.

Item agreed to.

Fertilizers and pesticides administrator—administration, $31,600.

Fertilizers subventions and freight allowances, $1,000,000.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to discuss a matter which I have taken up before with the minister. This time I am not in a critical mood, although I may be later in the day. Of the domestic corn produced in our province some eighty-five per cent is recovered in the form of ensilage. As the minister knows, the fertilizer subsidy does not apply to domestic corn. The farmers have been asked to increase the production of dairy products and it is felt that this subsidy should apply to this class of corn. I would ask that the minister have his department give consideration to this matter. I understand that some of the officials of the department in British Columbia have agreed with our estimate that we recover that percentage for dairy feed.

Mr. GARDINER: We should like to give a subsidy on corn, but unfortunately this year we have had to withdraw it from all corn. The reason is that we are short of fertilizers and we have to distribute them largely in connection with grass and other grain crops.

Item agreed to.

Seeds administrator—administration, $16,500.

Joint seed programme—1941, $180,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does this item cover vegetable seeds or grain seeds generally?

Mr. GARDINER: It covers stock seeds, alfalfa seed, red clover seed, oil bearing seed and seeds of that type, not only for Canada but those that are sent to Great Britain.

Mr. WRIGHT: Was there any surplus of alfalfa seed this year for export?

Mr. GARDINER: There was some for export last year and there will be some for export this year, but the amount will be somewhat limited.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How much was exported last year? If the minister has the figures, I should like to know what percentage came from western grain.

Mr. GARDINER: A total of 660,000 pounds of western seed was moved east, including approximately 357,000 pounds which was purchased by the board at not more than 33 cents per pound. On this latter quantity the government paid storage and transportation costs to eastern Canada in order that the seed could be distributed under the established ceiling prices.

Item agreed to.

Bacon board—administration, $71,300.

Mr. PERLEY: How many members are there on this board and how many employees are there?

Mr. GARDINER: There are six members of the board, and either four or five employees. I have not the names here at the moment. Then there is an advisory committee.

Mr. PERLEY: How often does this board meet?

Mr. GARDINER: The full board meets about once a month and sometimes more than that, but the manager, Mr. Pearsall, who is an official of the department, is constantly at work in connection with the activities of the board.

Mr. TUSTIN: I understand that the bacon board has now become the meat board; has there been any increase in the number of the board?

Mr. GARDINER: There has not been any increase, and we have not in mind the making of any.

Mr. TUSTIN: This morning in the committee we listened to a member of this board, and we were given to understand that the board is buying beef at a lower price during the coming year. Can the minister enlarge upon that statement?

Mr. GARDINER: As all members know, we are under price control, and so far as beef is concerned there is a selling price established of between 20 and 21 cents a pound for complete carcasses at Toronto. A flat ceiling on beef cuts is established throughout the year, and then from May 27 on to some time in the middle of August there is a floor established which is a quarter-cent below the ceiling. This gradually goes down until in October it is two and one-quarter cents below the ceiling. That is on the cuts of beef, not on the carcass. There is a floor price on the cuts which is a quarter-cent below the ceiling for the period through which we are now passing. This spread goes down to two and a half cents at the period at which the original ceiling prices were set, during September and October. Then it starts to rise again until in the spring it is back up to within a quarter of a cent of the ceiling on cuts.

The result is that on live cattle there could be a spread at the widest point of about a cent a pound; that is, it could drop about a cent below the ceiling. We have an understanding that we will buy when cattle get down to that floor. These cattle are bought to take care of any deficiencies in the country outside of the area where they are bought. After the supply in Canada has been taken care of, we have an undertaking to supply any surplus beef to Britain. That beef must be frozen. If we buy that beef it would have to be put into freezers and frozen and eventually shipped to Britain.

Mr. FAIR: I think it would be well if the minister made clear to the house now that there is no guaranteed price to the producers, that the guarantee is only to the packer and that the producer is at the mercy of the market.

Mr. GARDINER: No. If the hon. member follows through what I have just been saying he will note that there cannot be any great spread which will accrue to the packer. We begin to buy beef when it gets down to the floor and see to it that that beef goes into freezers for shipment for Britain.

Mr. WRIGHT: The evidence given before the agriculture committee was that the government buys beefs only from the packer, that the price on the open market could drop as much as five cents a pound and the government would not purchase beef on the market, that they would only purchase from the packers at a given floor. There is no guarantee at all so far as the price on the open market is concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: There is probably some misunderstanding of the evidence. The board has the power to purchase beef and order it into packing plants and order it processed for the British market. We only buy beef, to be put into packing plants where it can be frozen. There is authority to see that that beef goes into freezers. The practical way of doing it, unless someone is trying to get a greater margin of profit than he is entitled to, would be simply to order the packing plants under certain circumstances to deliver a certain proportion of the purchases into the freezers. If there is any difficulty about it there is sufficient authority under the orders in council to permit of its being handled otherwise.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What we want to know is whether that authority is being used. Will the minister tell the committee by what sort of organization the beef feeders in a given area can sell their beef to a government agent in case they are unable to sell it on the open market at the price they should get?

Mr. GARDINER: I can assure all members of the committee that if it ever becomes necessary to use the authority we have we shall use it, but as long as we can carry on through the ordinary channels of trade, if that is not to the disadvantage of the producer or the consumer, we shall carry on in that way. But if we ever have reason to exercise our authority we will use it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What would constitute such reason?

Mr. GARDINER: If, for instance, there were no buyers on a certain market and the price were allowed to go down, we would probably ask somebody to buy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Suppose the buyers were refusing to pay the price they should pay?

Mr. GARDINER: That would be exactly the reason why we would take action. We have authority under those conditions to take action and secure the beef.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Suppose the farmers find the prices are too low; to whom can they apply in Alberta, for instance?

Mr. GARDINER: There are different ways of doing it. We can buy the cattle and notify the producer to ship them to certain plants to be slaughtered under our direction, or the government can secure them outright and have them sent to the plant. We have the authority to do anything that it is necessary to do, but we are not looking for trouble. If somebody creates trouble we will take action.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The trouble is that the Department of Agriculture has overlooked a serious situation. I have a letter here from a stock breeders association that fed 1,000 head last year, and the writer declares that out of approximately 1,000 head of cattle fed by the association not one brought as much as 12 cents, while many sold for 10½ and 10¼ cents.

Mr. GARDINER: On what market was that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: This is from the stock breeders association at Cardston. It does not say where they were selling, but they were unable to get government assistance. What I want to know is how they can get government assistance in a case of that kind.

Mr. GARDINER: They could wire to the department, or the hon. member could bring his wire to the department and the officials would act if action were warranted.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I turned over the wire I received from that organization about June 9 or 10, so that there was every opportunity for the department to take action.

Mr. GARDINER: That was the same wire that was referred to on a previous occasion?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: I think that was acted on.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is an indication that all was not well, and if the minister had authority to act and did not use it I want to know what can be done in a similar case.

Mr. GARDINER: All I can say to the hon. member is that the market has not been going down. It has been rising, and surprising many people by rising over a considerable time. I think the situation can well be left to the kind of cattle dealers I know in the vicinity my hon. friend speaks of, who know the cattle business better than anybody else in Canada. As long as the price is keeping up or remaining at a dead level on the regular market, I think they can be trusted to sell their cattle at a fair price.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There are very few people who know more about cattle than the people who have written me.

Mr. GARDINER: That is exactly what I was saying.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And they were not able to get a price. That indicates that something is wrong.

Mr. GARDINER: The price was there on the market.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister explain why the market is advancing so rapidly? This morning's Globe and Mail says it has advanced forty cents a hundred. Why is it advancing so rapidly, in view of the announcement that the price will shortly be dropped one cent?

Mr. GARDINER: It is difficult to understand. Here we have one member telling us that a man cannot sell his cattle at a reasonable price, and another saying that prices are going up forty cents a hundred. There is something wrong somewhere between those two statements.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly, and we want to have it corrected. There must be something wrong with the government's machinery. The people selling beef have no recourse in case the price is low.

Mr. GARDINER: There is something wrong, I think, with the report. I think that statement came at the end of a certain meeting. I think cattle have been marketed fairly successfully since then. We have had no further complaint that I know of from these people.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A return which was brought down the other day showed that the Department of Munitions and Supply was buying beef for the armed forces above the ceiling price. If that department can buy at a price above the ceiling for the armed forces, it will readily be seen what a difficulty that creates. What liaison is there between the Department of Agriculture and the prices board in order to govern that situation?

Mr. GARDINER: There are two officers of the Department of Agriculture on the board. The manager of the meat board is also a member of the staff of the department. The Department of Munitions and Supply for many weeks now have been paying the ceiling price and not more than the ceiling price for beef.

Item agreed to.

Dairy products board—administration, $14,950.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to say a word on this item, which the minister can pass very quickly if he will answer a question; then we may spend a couple of hours on the next item. I want to know how the subsidy paid on dairy products is arrived at. I have been trying to get this information for the last two weeks in the agriculture committee but so far have not succeeded. I presume it is not within the knowledge of the officials who have been there. How do they arrive at a set price on dairy products such as fluid milk? What is taken into account? Is the tax paid on land taken into account, the value of the land, the amount of wages paid, and other considerations in arriving at these subsidies?

Mr. GARDINER: Very early in the war the prices of dairy products were quite low. Butter was around 20 cents, cheese around 10 or 12 cents, and milk was about $1.60, but now prices are very much higher than that. The ceiling price on butter is 35 cents and the floor is 32 cents, and there is a subsidy on top of that of eight cents in the summer and ten cents in the winter. On cheese the price is slightly over 20 cents and on milk it runs from $1.85 to $2.50.

With regard to production, costs of course are different in different places, and I can only say that we were told by representatives of the dairy industry, very early in the war and again no longer than eighteen months ago, that prices very much lower than the prices being paid now would cover cost of production. In fact, it was suggested that if prices were established very much lower than the prices we have now for the whole war the industry would be well taken care of. We did not establish those prices early in the war and therefore I can see that the dairy people would now be justified in asking for more than actual cost of production in order to balance some of the earnings of the present period against the period when we were under cost of production.

I recite these facts to show that some attention has been given to cost of production. We did attempt to get a price higher than we had been assured earlier in the war would cover cost of production, and we have prices considerably higher than that, believing that the farmers were entitled to more than cost of production because they took less for a time.

So far as recent arrangements are concerned, the dairy industry was consulted and the whole matter was discussed with them, both by the prices board and by representatives of the Department of Agriculture before the present subsidies, which are paid on top of the price, were provided; and we thought at the time we put them on that everyone was satisfied. We found afterwards, however, that there were some who were not entirely satisfied with the arrangement made, though we have considered the arrangement fairly satisfactory and we are abiding by it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If these agriculture estimates were rushed through as they stand they would form interesting reading for the farmers. I appreciate the explanation the minister has given and I have been told by farm members from Ontario that they are satisfied with these particular prices. In British Columbia, as the minister knows, we are not satisfied. The deputy minister of agriculture, in his evidence, admitted that we had an exceptional situation in that province and that our costs were higher. The department has taken into consideration to a certain extent the question of cost of production. The minister has pointed out that the price of milk varies in different cities. I presume therefore he admits that it costs more to produce in certain areas than in others. This factor has not been taken into account so far as British Columbia is concerned.

I am not satisfied with the minister's answer. I should like to know who advised that farmers were satisfied with the prices that have been settled. In arriving at the subsidy, did the department assume that there is a difference in the quality of milk used for evaporated milk and in the fluid market respectively? In other words, one farm produces two ten-gallon cans of milk, ten gallons going to the fluid market and ten into the evaporated milk trade, both standard milk. Is there any difference in the quality? We do not think so. I should like to know whether the minister is of the opinion that there is a difference in the quality. When he answers that question I will ask another.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, the hon. member, who is familiar with the dairy farming industry and also with the processing of milk, will understand that there are different conditions across Canada; that is to say, there are different requirements at different places for the delivery of milk. Whole milk is delivered in cities or towns of much smaller size and in certain areas costs have to be higher. They have to be higher in a large city than in smaller places. That accounts for some of the variations between the ceiling that may be placed and the subsidy that is established in some particular community. As regards the prices of processed milk as compared with whole milk, the lower price paid for processed milk is accounted for by the fact that there is a smaller demand for the canned milk in these particular communities than there is for whole milk. Whole milk is delivered, or was delivered before the war started, in some provinces, though not in British Columbia, under the direction of a milk board appointed provincially. That milk board dealt with the situation within the province. Quite often they established proportions of milk to be delivered by different suppliers. A certain percentage was to be delivered as whole milk and that was all that could be distributed as whole milk. The object was to distribute the business over the suppliers, and any milk outside that particular pool was sold at a different price. Much of that milk went into canning factories, into cheese or butter or something else. I do not believe that there was a board at that time in British Columbia, and there is not now; nevertheless the situation there is governed by the same consideration. There is a demand for a very considerable amount of whole milk in cities the size of Vancouver and Victoria, and that demand itself creates a price for whole milk. I am sure, however, it will be agreed that if the canning plants in British Columbia were to be asked to pay that same price for whole milk they would not be able to compete with canning factories elsewhere; and much of this milk is sold not in the local community but in the general market outside. I understand there has been some difficulty in British Columbia because of the two prices paid for milk, one going into the canning plants and the other for use as whole milk.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is quite true that we are not operating under a board similar to those established in other provinces. The marketing act, so far, has proved profitable only to the legal profession. It has been to the privy council half a dozen times. Seventy per cent of our farmers sell their milk in competition with the lower-priced milk products of Ontario—because the deputy minister has admitted that milk can be produced at lower cost in Ontario and Quebec than in British Columbia—and all of the remaining thirty per cent of the farmers in British Columbia market their milk on the fluid markets, yet by their very regulations, laid down not by the minister's department but in the holy of holies over here, we are compelled to pay our own farmers the prices they set for the fluid milk. In other words, we have our own wholesale plant and we are forced to pay to our wholesale plant the price they set for our producers. Unfortunately, the wartime prices board always consults the minority, and never the majority, when it comes to British Columbia, and so they compel us to pay to the retail trade the price they set for our own producers, which means the price that the minority or independent shipper wants to meet. We cannot see that there is any difference in the quality of milk and there should be no difference in the price.

The minister admitted the other day, indirectly at any rate, that there is a difference in the quality of milk produced. May I point out that the three maritime provinces and British Columbia are the only provinces which are entirely tuberculosis-free areas. I am including the maritime provinces; it is an honour to them. Our milk is therefore of a higher quality. We cannot see how the amount of subsidy is arrived at by the board, which we understand sets the price paid to the farmer, subject to approval by the wartime prices board. I understand the agriculture board sets the amount of the subsidy to be paid.

Mr. GARDINER: May I correct that at once. All prices are set by the prices board. Our board does not set prices, but the prices board does. That board, however, does discuss the matter of price with our food board. If we are not satisfied with a price when it is set, if we are not satisfied that the price will get the production we want, then we arrange for the subsidy. That goes on in addition to the price.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In other words, they set the ceiling price and your department arranges whatever subsidy is necessary. I am thinking about our evaporated milk. We did not particularly complain when you left it on in the summer months before. So far as I can understand from any witness down before the agriculture committee, the main reason of the subsidy is the incentive to increase production. So far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned the Fraser valley is admittedly a deficiency area for milk. I shall have quite a bit to say a little later about its being a deficiency area for potatoes. If the milk subsidy is put on for that reason, we think that that spread should go over on evaporated milk. It is admitted by departmental officials, either the deputy minister or one of the senior officials who appeared before us, that the cost of production in our province is a great deal higher than in any other part of Canada. This statement appears in evidence given before one of the committees. I would urge upon the minister that he take into consideration payment on the quality of milk, and bear in mind the cost of production in making recommendation of the subsidy. I say this with all due deference to the statements of his official, and I should like to know from the minister now which official stated that the price was satisfactory to the dairy farmers of Canada, and who recommended him.

Mr. GARDINER: What I stated was that we held meetings with officials of the dairy organizations across Canada—the Dairy Association of Canada, I think is the name of it—and we thought we were satisfying them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is different.

Mr. GARDINER: But I stated that afterwards we found out that some of them were not entirely satisfied, but that we had checked any dissatisfactions which were announced to us, and had satisfied ourselves that the arrangement should remain as it is for this season.

With regard to canned milk and whole milk in British Columbia, we have not been asking for canned milk from British Columbia, and that is one of the difficulties in connection with two or three of these products that are being discussed. I repeat that we have not asked British Columbia to supply us with canned milk. We would very much prefer that British Columbia should entirely take care of the local situation on the western side of Canada with regard to milk. In other words, we are not bidding for the milk of British Columbia. We quite admit that if we were, we would probably have to bid a higher price than we would for milk from some other places. But the supply which we wish to send out of Canada we are obtaining at a lesser cost, where the freight rate is very much lower than if we shipped from British Columbia. I admit that that is not a complete answer. Some consideration should be given to British Columbia because of its location, because of the fact that freights from there are higher, and I think that some consideration has been given, although perhaps not enough, to that fact.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Did the minister say that we should look after the fluid milk?

Mr. GARDINER: I said that we would like you to.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like that statement explained a little. Are we not looking after it now? I should like to know where you are getting any milk in the province of British Columbia if that province does not produce for its fluid milk market. Surely that is not what the minister meant.

Mr. GARDINER: I meant just exactly what I said, that we are not anxious to get milk from British Columbia canned; we would very much prefer that British Columbia dispose of their milk as whole milk or butter rather than have it canned, and therefore we are not bidding up the price of canned milk to the price of fluid milk.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Surely the minister will admit that any dairy country, even Ontario, must have some place to dispose of its milk. You cannot in any dairy country or any dairy district dispose of all your milk on the fluid market. The minister knows that a certain percentage of it must be put in by-products—cheese, butter or evaporated milk—and obviously, with your fresh season and then your off season, you cannot sell all your milk in the fluid market in any dairying district. But last year 550,000 cases of evaporated milk were taken from British Columbia. Does anyone think that a dairy district can arrange to provide 550,000 cases of evaporated milk for the British market, which needed it so badly, in one year, and in the next year put all its milk on to the fluid or some other market?

Mr. WARREN: May I ask a question? It is directed to the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not have to be a witness, but I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. WARREN: My question is this. Fraser Valley has been represented in this house as one of the most fertile spots in the universe. Can the hon. member enlighten us on this point: why should the cost of production be so much higher in such a productive, fertile spot than in our raviney knolls and sandy hills down in Ontario?

Mr. REID: We can explain that. It is very easily explained. There are perhaps two or three reasons. First of all you must bear in mind that in British Columbia, in the lower Fraser valley, land clearing operations are very expensive. I do not think you can put under cultivation from the virgin forest in the Fraser valley one acre of land under $500 an acre. That is the first cause. Then we in British Columbia, industrially at least, have been more generous with our workers and have paid them more highly than any other province in Canada. We have led in social legislation, with the result that the costs have gone up. We have areas of very productive land which are kept productive only because they are under a diking system; they are alluvial land, and some of our farmers are paying on this account up to $7.50 per acre. Let anybody take the most highly taxed land in Ontario and ask the farmers there how they would like to pay $7.50 an acre in taxation. These are some of the factors which require that we in British Columbia should get a higher price than other provinces.

Mr. McNEVIN: I do not desire to enter into any controversy between Ontario farmers and British Columbia farmers, dairy or otherwise. But I understood the hon. member for Fraser Valley to say that the milk in British Columbia is of a higher quality because they are in an accredited area. That, I believe, pertains to the whole province. But I am sure that we in Ontario have a very much higher number of fully accredited herds of dairy cattle than any other part of the dominion. So that I think, taking it by and large, it cannot be established that milk is of a higher quality in one part of Canada than in another.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have not said that our milk is of a higher quality throughout, but the hon. member has borne out exactly what I said, and if he lives in an accredited area—

Mr. McNEVIN: I do.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: —he will know that his cattle cost more and are worth more than those in a non-accredited area. That is one of the points which I am glad he brought out. It hurts British Columbia members who are trying to get an increase in the price of their dairy products—and their potatoes, to which I shall refer in a minute—when apparently in some parts of Canada, certainly in Ontario, hon. members are satisfied with prices; and I do not think it helps much when they cannot even stay and take it when we show that we are not satisfied with their statements.

I want to revert for a minute to the question of our costs, and repeat what the hon. member for New Westminster said about the diking areas. Not only that, but we have to pay up to $2.50 an acre drainage tax as well. On top of that, we have no industries out there, so that we cannot sell our milk in markets where plants which are subsidized by the government will pay a higher price for milk.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to ask the minister if he would elaborate a little further the statement he made a moment ago, that the ceiling price of butter was 35 cents a pound and the floor 32 cents, with a ten-cent and an eight-cent subsidy. I assume that that subsidy goes to the farmer or to the milk producer. What I am interested in is the cost of the butter to the consumer. If your ceiling price is 35 cents a pound I suppose that for eastern Canada that is fixed as per Montreal. I do not know what the cost of butter in eastern Canada is at the present time, but I know that a year ago it was selling for 53 and 55 cents a pound. Now that you have a ceiling of 35 cents, and you are subsidizing the farmer to take up the extra cost to the extent that you have mentioned, why should that butter be retailed to the consumer at 55 and 53 cents a pound? Somebody is crashing the ceiling, or I do not understand the situation.

Mr. GARDINER: The position is that the ceiling is 35 cents, as I stated. The floor in May is 32 cents, and the floor advances three-eighths of a cent each month; at present it is 32 3/4 cents, and the price of butter at present is around 33 cents or a little higher. The price has been running about 33 cents for some time. What happens is that as soon as the creamery reports to the government that it has paid the eight-cent subsidy on butter fat—not on pounds of butter—to the farmer, the government reimburses it for the amount it pays to the farmer. It is of course clear from that that the money goes to the producer. The wholesale selling price is 35 cents at Montreal and 36 cents in the maritimes. The base figure is on Montreal, and then it is lower in the west and higher in the east. So that the wholesale price of butter in the maritimes ought to be based on that 36 cents—I am not speaking about the retail price.

Mr. TUSTIN: Plus the eight cents?

Mr. GARDINER: No; the eight cents is paid to the farmers.

Mr. TUSTIN: But it puts the price of butter up by eight cents?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not to the man who purchases it from a store. That is the reason for doing this. We pay the farmer a subsidy of eight cents so that the merchant does not have to charge the consumer a higher price. The idea is to keep down the cost of living. We pay to the producer, and that is not supposed to be passed on to the consumer. The producer gets it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is there any control over the price at which the retailer must sell it?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and I believe that prosecutions are being lodged regularly where people have broken the ceiling regulations.

Mr. HANSELL: What protection has the producer of dairy products in respect of grades given by creameries, or by those who buy cream or eggs? Some time ago by government action the price of cream went up. It just happened that at that time I was in a certain section of the country where I received no end of complaints to the effect that the very moment the price went up their grades came down. Of course they blamed the creameries. I tried to get some information, but the information I received in my view was absurd—although it might not have been. I was told that on account of the heavy rains last year the growth of weeds had been prolific, and that the dairy cows had been eating weeds, with the result that the grade of cream came down. The peculiar thing however was that when the price went up the cows were eating weeds in the pasture. About that time I happened to be reading a newspaper in which I came across a small advertisement which read in this way, "Eggs and cream wanted; honest grades; quick return." I will not give the name of the dairy, but the fact that they advertised the giving of honest grades would seem to indicate that somewhere in the picture there may be some dishonest grades. What protection have the producers of dairy products when it comes to grading? They have no way of grading their own cream or eggs. They are at the mercy of those to whom they must sell. Are they sure they will get honest grades?

Mr. GARDINER: I am surprised to learn that the difficulties described exist in Alberta. The simple explanation is that the inspection of cream is carried on entirely by provincial authorities. They appoint inspectors. There is an inspector who inspects every plant. I believe under the Alberta legislation—and this is not true in some other places—the plant itself indirectly pays the salary of the inspector who does the grading. But I should not think that that would result in there being any improper grading. I believe the provincial authorities in all the provinces take very good care to check carefully the grading of cream. I understand the system in Alberta is fairly complete, and if there is anything wrong with the grading in that province then that is the authority to which the hon. member should appeal.

Mr. HANSELL: The minister is assuming that the section of the country I was in was Alberta. I did not say so.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, all I can say is that it might be better if it were anywhere else in the west.

Mr. WHITE: The minister mentioned that he would give some information with respect to cheese. Is he prepared to do that now?

Mr. GARDINER: When the hon. member was speaking a few moments ago he referred to stock figures as of July 1. The figures I had intended to read, but which I shall not read unless the hon. member so desires, were those to the end of May. The stock figures as of July 1 are these: Total stock, based on nine cities across Canada, on July 1, 1942, amounted to 39,695,000 pounds. On July 1, 1943, it is 24,571,000 pounds. Those are the totals of stocks in store. There is about 15,000,000 pounds less in store this year than on July 1 a year ago. I gave figures to the house the other day which indicate that exports are still higher this year than they were a year ago, indicating that up to date we are pretty well keeping up in our deliveries to Great Britain, under contract. We have no intention of changing the cheese price this year; we intend to go through the season on that cheese price.

Mr. WHITE: The figures given by the minister last week, as reported at page 4313 of Hansard, indicate that the production of cheese in the period of January to May, 1943, as compared with the same period in 1942, was down to the extent of fifty per cent, or 52,000,000 pounds to 26,000,000 pounds. The minister has just stated that cheese in storage amounts to 15,000,000 pounds. When we look at the exports we find that exports for 1943 as compared with those of 1942 are up by only 6,000,000 pounds. Will the minister explain where the extra quantity of cheese is coming from to fill the quota?

Mr. GARDINER: Part of it comes from the surplus carried through from last year.

Mr. WHITE: But, from now on, what is it?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall come to that in a moment. Part of what is contained in the extra exports which have gone overseas, up to date, came out of surpluses carried over from last year, and we knew about that when we were setting the position for this year. The position we took at the beginning of the season was that we wanted a certain distribution of milk in order to get the result we had undertaken, whether for the home market or for the British market. We took certain action very early in the season, and announced it, in the hope that we would get a certain amount of cheese for the British market, a certain amount of whole milk for our own market, and a certain amount of butter for our own market. The present position is that in the week ending July 3, 1943, as compared with the similar week in 1942, in western Ontario—the region west of Toronto—we had 7,513 boxes inspected, and in 1942 we had 8,575. That is a decrease of 12·4 per cent in western Ontario as compared with the same week in the same area last year. In Ontario east of Toronto the total this year is 40,998 boxes, and last year it amounted to 42,841 boxes, the decrease being only 4·3 per cent. In other words, as I have stated before, this was a backward season in the early weeks. It was suggested that as the season advanced we would gradually overtake our production of last year. In eastern Ontario we have nearly reached our production of last year; in the last week for which we have figures we are down only 4·3 per cent. In Quebec we are down 25·6 per cent, the production being 21,863 boxes for that week as compared with 29,529 boxes a year ago. The total reduction for that week in Ontario and Quebec amounts to 13·5 per cent. The cumulative position at the end of this period last year was 643,000 boxes as compared with 386,000 boxes this year. That is the total production from April 1, the beginning of the cheese year. This year for this period we are down 39·9 per cent. That is about as near as I can come to the position. By taking all the cheese that is coming onto the market and by taking the carry-over from last year, we have been making the exports of which I have spoken.

Mr. WHITE: The minister has given the figures up to the first week in July. Does he feel that we are going to be able to meet our quota and still have cheese left for Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: We have not yet reached our peak. It is impossible to say definitely whether we will reach it, but we are going to come near enough to reaching it to reach the position we expected to reach at the beginning of the season.

Mr. WHITE: Is not June usually the peak?

Mr. GARDINER: Everyone knows that we are about a month late this year because of the backward season.

Mr. WHITE: Did the minister mean a moment ago that there is not going to be any adjustment in the price of cheese for 1943?

Mr. GARDINER: I should think the fact that we have come up to what is usually the peak period without making any adjustment would be the answer to that. But I have stated definitely that we are not going to make any change.

Mr. WOOD: I think the minister or those who are responsible for setting the prices of dairy products in this country should give some consideration to the amount of labour that is put into dairy production. This has been a rather unusual season and I do not expect that the production of dairy products will continue to rise. After all, weather conditions have a considerable bearing upon the production we expect to get from our dairy herds. I do not think the minister is quite within his rights to be so resolute and to say that he does not expect to increase the price. Monetary reward should not always be the consideration, but when we consider that Ontario is going to have only half a crop at best, we must realize that there will be many farmers who will have to buy grain. It is only reasonable to expect that there will be a decrease in dairy production because of that. There are farmers who are well enough off to be able to go out and buy a carload of western grain and thus keep up the production of their herds, but there are many others, and I think they are in the majority, who will not be able to do that. The minister would be wise to keep the present weather conditions in mind. As a practical farmer I do not expect that we shall be able to fulfil our quota of dairy products. Some will have to go without certain things they expect to get if we are to fulfil our agreement with our friends, and I am in favour of doing that. Dairying is an every-day job and it takes a lot of stamina for a man to milk his cows twice a day, seven days a week, three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. We have been somewhat concerned at the number of dairy cattle being sold in the United States. I realize that this is a lucrative market for live stock—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the hon. member tell us why these cattle are going across to the United States?

Mr. WOOD: The United States market is very good at the present time. These people are coming over to Canada and offering extreme prices for dairy cattle, prices not warranted by the ability of the cattle to produce. Many farmers faced with the shortage of labour are selling their surplus cattle, cashing in, as it were. It is a dollars and cents proposition.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Prices must be much better in the United States.

Mr. WOOD: Another reason is the fact that the dairy farmer or live stock producer in Canada turns out a better product than the man in the United States. They come over here to buy cattle in order to keep up the standards of their herds. With the prices they are willing to pay for cattle the average farmer is tempted to sell. Many men are short of help, and this is a lucrative market. But in my opinion this is one thing that will impair the production of dairy products in this country. With the weather conditions we have had, with the shortage of labour we are faced with, I think the minister should keep in mind the fact that there is likely to be an impairment of production.

Mr. GARDINER: For the week ending June 24, 1943, there were 516 dairy cattle exported to the United States; the exports for the same week in 1942 were 463, a difference of about 53. From January 1 to June 24, 1943, the exports amounted to 19,878 cattle; in the same period in 1942 they were 10,341, a difference of 9,537 for the period. However, in spite of the fact that we have exported that number of cattle, we have more cows in Canada to-day than we have ever had before, four million in round figures. We are shipping cows to the United States in greater numbers to-day than we were before because prices are better. That is all to the good so far as the farmer who is going to sell is concerned. While he is selling cows, there are actually more cows being kept by the whole group of farmers than ever before. I am not going to take individual cases. As has been said many times during this session, there are many farmers of seventy years of age and over who are taking advantage of the higher prices to sell their farms. Some of them are selling their live stock, breeding stock or whatever they may have. Some of this is distributed to other farmers in the community, but some goes across the line. Buyers are continually trying to pick up cows to take to the other side of the line, all of which I think is to the good. This is the one thing that is left to the farmer to sell freely in the United States at a good price. I hope that hon. members are not going to take the position that it should not be permitted. So far as I am concerned I am not going to prevent him from doing it. If he can raise cows and calves and sell them in the United States for more money than he can get in Canada, I hope he will keep right on selling them as long as the farmers as a whole keep as many cows as were kept before. That is what they are doing.

The figures on cheese have not given the picture so far as dairying is concerned. We started out in 1936 to try to get our production of cheese up to 200,000,000 pounds in a year. Last year we passed that figure. We did not start that since the war began; we started it the first year I was in the department, in 1936. We advertised for it, we put out a programme and we got up the production even before the war started. Since the war started we have been able to increase it even more, until last year we had double the production of cheese that we had in 1935, or a little more than double. Then when we got our production doubled we were told by the people to whom we were supplying the cheese that they were not at all sure they wanted to take it all. It was not our intention under those conditions to ask the farmer for a large increase in cheese, and we asked him to produce the same amount of cheese as he produced last year. We told the British we would do all we could to get them 150,000,000 pounds. Last year we told them we would do all we could to get them 125,000,000 pounds, and before we got them that amount they suggested we might ease up. We have to consider our own farmers as well as others, even when we are at war. We suggested that this year we would do the best we could do to get them 150,000,000 pounds, but that our butter is selling in Canada at prices such as were indicated a moment ago and that we cannot sell it in competition with anyone else outside of Canada. There was butter landed in Canada within the last few months—landed, but it did not remain here—from New Zealand and Australia, where they are supposed to get good prices for farm products, at 26 cents a pound, while our farmers in Canada are getting for their butter the prices that have been mentioned. We intend to see that our farmers in Canada get that price for their butter, and in doing so we think we are helping the farmer. The greater production of butter this year is putting more money into the pockets of the farmer, and I think the farmer is entitled to it. We intend to carry that policy through as we have it now, with the increased production of butter and whole milk which is bringing a higher price than it brought before the war. We want the farmer to sell as much whole milk as he can sell in this country, and at present prices he is getting some return.

I agree with the hon. member for Brant that our farmers have to get some attention and consideration. Their wages and costs generally are higher, and in following the policy we are following we are getting more milk out of the cows in Canada than we ever got before, and the farmer is selling more milk than he ever sold before and at a higher average price than has prevailed for a long time. We intend to try to maintain that position, because we realize that the dairy farmer has to put in longer hours and more labour than some of the rest of us who happen to be farmers.

Mr. CARDIFF: I am glad that the Minister of Agriculture is so optimistic, but he would have to be to hold the position he does. I think no other class of people have stepped up to the war effort better than the dairy farmers of this country; that no other class of farmer has had the difficulties which the dairy farmer has had to face. It takes a lot of labour to run a dairy farm and, as hon. members know, labour is so short that the dairy farmer has been up against it for labour. We have come to the point where a lot of dairy farmers in my riding feel they have almost gone to the limit, that they have carried on about as long as they could. Many of them are up in years and they cannot take the hard work that is involved in dairy farming, nor are they entirely satisfied with the treatment they have received. True, they are getting better prices than they ever did before, but they never got enough money before.

There is one place where I think some correction could be made. We have travelling throughout Ontario, and the same perhaps may be said of other provinces, an army of inspectors. A creamery and dairy plant in my own town has five inspectors calling there constantly. Can anyone tell me why five inspectors should call at one plant? I can readily understand that one inspector might call to inspect the electrical equipment, but why five inspectors should call at one plant is more than I can understand. I do not know but that there is some negligence in having so many inspectors going around to these places; because whether you take a quart of cream out of a can or put one in, the test comes out about the same. It is possible, of course, that some of these inspectors are for the Ontario government, but undoubtedly there seems to be overlapping in this inspection work, and I think the amount of money that is spent on it could be very well cut, and the producers might then be better satisfied than they are at present.

Mr. GARDINER: We have only five inspectors for the whole province of Ontario, and I do not think they would all call at the one plant on the one day. No doubt there is a health inspector for the town and a health inspector for the county, and probably the province has an agriculture inspector. But so far as this department is concerned we have only five inspectors for the whole province, so that if any criticism is due it is not coming to this department.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was glad to hear the minister say that he was not going to interfere with farmers in this important industry getting what they can for their produce under present circumstances. I believe we have to find ways and means of encouraging greater production of dairy products and meat products, particularly in view of the shortages we have been experiencing for the last several months.

I wonder if the committee realizes the extent to which agriculture has been discouraged and to a large extent neglected during this war period. I do not want to raise the question of aluminum again, but I would just point out that we have poured hundreds of millions of dollars into industry while we have done virtually nothing to improve the apparatus which our farmers have to use to produce their products. I am of the opinion that if we had early in the war adopted a system to encourage our farmers to use better machinery, and had helped them to finance it as we have helped industry to finance its machinery, we would not now be facing these shortages and agriculture would be in a very much better position. Agriculture is an unorganized industry, an industry with very little united power, whereas in other industries we are dealing wtih powerful organizations. I think of some of these concerns to which we have been paying, through the price level, hundreds of millions of dollars. Yet if we had suggested that the farmers increase their production, their herds, let us say, by fifty per cent, and make additions to their barns to give them fifty per cent more capacity, and purchase milking machinery because of the shortage of labour, and if we had said that we would fix a price level that would enable them to pay back during the course of the war the cost of all these things, and make a profit too, what an uproar there would have been! But that is exactly what we have been doing for some of these big corporations, including the Aluminum Company of Canada.

On Sunday I had the opportunity of seeing the wonderful work that is being done by technicians and ordinary working men at Arvida. I admired that work, but we and our allies are paying for all that, and when I heard the hon. member for Brant speaking this afternoon and realized how little we have done to encourage agriculture, I could not refrain from making the contrast in my mind, especially when I think of the shortages we face in food and dairy products. I hope everything will be done to encourage the dairy industry and other branches of agriculture to get new machinery and new equipment to increase their production, because it will all be needed in the future. To-day we are on short commons. Probably in the future, when the war ends, the demand for food will be so great that we shall have to continue rationing unless we can increase our production to a very large degree. I think some ways and means should be found of enabling the agricultural producers to equip themselves better, improve their herds, and get some machinery to meet the present labour shortage on the farms; and I hope that this will be given some consideration by the government and by the house.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think that I can let these remarks go by without saying something further. I will be the first to admit that, as was stated, I believe by the hon. member for Huron North, farmers are not getting enough, and probably never did get as much as they should get; and I would also be the last to suggest that farmers are getting as much for their products out of the war as some others are. Probably there is a reason for both those conditions which we do not need to discuss to-day. But when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar makes the general statement that hundreds of millions of dollars are going into plants like the Arvida plant as a result of the activities of the government, I think I can also say that hundreds of millions of dollars are going into the pockets of the farming industry to-day, as a result of the activities of the government, though probably not as many hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. COLDWELL: A much larger number of people are involved.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I do not know how many are involved.

An hon. MEMBER: I do.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend says "I do." But when one speaks of all the industries in Canada—

Mr. MacNICOL: And all their employees.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not thinking of the employees.

Mr. GARDINER: —and all the industry of the united nations, I am doubtful, if all those millions cover the cost of getting the materials turned out by plants, as to which of us is dealing with the more people. There is some doubt about that. In any event I do not think I can let the statement go by that the government has been arranging for hundreds of millions of dollars to go into industry, because of the necessity of getting munitions, machines of war, and ships, and that very little or no attention has been paid to agriculture.

One would have to recall that, in the first place, ever since this war began, and before it began, the government has been prepared to take every bushel of wheat which has been delivered to the elevators from western Canada, whether it could be sold or not. Anyone may say that the price is not high enough. I venture to say some of the people in some of the industrial plants will say that the price for their products is not high enough either. But that does not do away with the fact that if the government had not done that, the price would have been a lot lower. We have been taking the wheat and guaranteeing for some time advances of ninety cents a bushel. Before that we were taking wheat at a guaranteed advance of seventy cents.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister means, the quota.

Mr. GARDINER: No, we were prepared to take every bushel delivered to the elevators with that advance, and sell it to the best advantage we could for the farmer, and eventually give him the benefit of anything we got in addition. Until the last two years this applied to all the wheat. In the last two years it has applied on a quota, but we expect eventually to take it all. We were prepared to do it, and we have been doing it, but the fact is that it has taken hundreds of millions of dollars out of the treasury of Canada to do that job. Whether it is getting enough into the pockets of the farmers is another question, but in answer to the statement that we are providing hundreds of millions of dollars to get munitions and other supplies, is the fact that we are making this provision for the farmer. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that there would not have been an advance from ten cents a pound to over twenty cents a pound on cheese if the government had not been prepared ever since the war started to take delivery of every surplus pound of cheese and see that it was properly handled and delivered to Britain. Probably I can say the same thing with regard to pork products.

I know my friends can say, "If you had left the American boundary open you could have sent it all over there at even a higher price." Well, gentlemen in this house who were talking about rationing and about shortages know what that would have meant. Of course in war time, with the great country to the south not in the war until the winter of 1941, and with this country in the war, our products could have gone to the United States, and what would we have been doing in this country? With a nation of 130,000,000 living alongside of us who were in the war, and with their production up very high because of the demands which were made upon them for supplies, and with prices rising there, all the farm products of this country would have gone to the United States, and we would not only have been attempting to produce, as we are to-day, to supply Britain and other countries, but we would have been in other difficulties in addition to those we are in now. In order to safeguard against that, the government, right from the beginning, when we were paying from three to five cents a pound more for hogs than was paid in the United States, took all the hogs in spite of the fact that we could not deliver them all in the first year to Great Britain. In the second year of the war we took them, and we continued to do so all that year, before the United States price began to interfere with the shipment of hogs from this country to Great Britain. Then when it did, we began to pay the United States price and kept our prices up to theirs until the fall of the year, and in the fall of that year a price ceiling was established, which has taken care of the situation from that time. We went to Britain and made an agreement with her, and when the price was higher than she thought she should pay, we added 15 shillings last year to the then price, and this year we added 25 shillings, and for the future we are proposing to pay even a larger proportion than that. To leave out of consideration altogether, what the government has done to help the farmer, is not, I think, being altogether fair in discussing the situation as it exists. Again I come back to the position that anyone can get up and say, "Yes, you first closed the United States boundary." In war time, boundaries are closed everywhere. There is a gentleman in the senate who meets me in the hall once in a while and says, "There are only two of us left." The first time he said that I asked him, "What do you mean?" He said, "Only two free traders."

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Make it three.

Mr. GARDINER: I can say this: if we had our way we would be free traders.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to ask, who was the other besides the senator?

Mr. GARDINER: He was including me in that.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And me.

Mr. GARDINER: But in war time there is no such thing as free trade. When Britain drew her navy across the oceans she said, "In self-preservation we must see that goods are not carried into Europe. There cannot be any free trade." When Hitler sent his armies out he said, "Not only can there be no free trade, but I am going to take all I want." There cannot be any free trade in the world while that condition prevails. So that we in this country, with our small population as compared with the large populations elsewhere, had to safeguard our position. But even before we had to do that, we paid our own farmers more for some products than they could have obtained even in the United States; and I say to my hon. friends that if they will do what I have done—I have the figures on my desk here, as a matter of fact—and will take the prices as they prevail in the United States and all the costs of getting our products into the United States, it will surprise them to see how close our prices are to those of our neighbours to the south, taking these matters into consideration.

For example, wheat at Winnipeg is from $1 to $1.02 a bushel. There is a 42 cent duty on it going into the United States, and if you add that amount to the Winnipeg price you will find that it is not very far from the United States price any day that the market operates. If one considers also freight and exchange, it will be found that in respect of all our products we are very much closer to the United States returns, when our production subsidies are added on top of our price, than most hon. members seem to think we are.

Under these circumstances I just want to emphasize that the government has not forgotten the farmer. We have been doing, I think, as much for the farmer—and I have been in some of the other countries—as most of the nations with which we are allied, and very much more than those against whom we are fighting.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In my opinion these cows which are going into the United States should be purchased by the dominion government and distributed in Canada. Whatever device is necessary in order to do that, the government should adopt. You will see a time when we shall be short of dairy products in this country; then it will be too bad, and too late.

I believe that the price we are paying for milk and dairy products generally is too low. We can make all the fine beautiful theories and apologies we desire to make—Liberals are quite strong on that—but the simple fact remains that the price is not high enough at the present time to justify young men going into the farming business and building themselves up. A good deal remains to be done. When the appropriate time comes I intend to discuss the matter of wool. I will not discuss it now.

Mr. GARDINER: That will come under special products.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When the government says that it is being fair to the farmers of this country the government is just completely wrong.

Mr. PERLEY: I want to make a brief plea for Saskatchewan. I should like to see the dairy products board pay a little more attention to that province by assisting them in the matter of producing dairy products. This afternoon's discussion has covered quite a wide field; just recently it extended to the grain business.

Mr. MacNICOL: And free trade.

Mr. PERLEY: We have also had a little display of competition between the provinces. We heard from British Columbia, and the Ontario members have come to the rescue of their province with respect to the cost of production, particularly of dairy products.

The minister gave some interesting figures with respect to the number of cows in Canada and the price of butter and fluid milk. Also he pointed out that in the production of dairy products long hours and a good deal of labour are required. He made an interesting statement with regard to the number of cows in Canada. Perhaps he will give us the number of dairy cows in Saskatchewan. The statement is interesting when we recall that in 1936 he passed an order whereby the dairy farmers in Saskatchewan had to dispose of their cows, retaining not more than four apart from actual dairy herds. Hon. members will recall that there was a good deal of criticism of that action, because it dealt a severe blow to the dairy industry in that province, and it took the farmers there a little while to get back to the number of cows they had prior to that order. It had to do with the necessary relief to farmers in connection with feed and other considerations in that province. I wish the minister would give us a little more information along that line.

With reference to certain remarks made by hon. members representing constituencies in British Columbia and Ontario, I have here a table showing the number of man-power hours required to produce various articles of food that are produced on the farms—butter, cheese, pork, beef, milk and so on—in comparison with similar production in other provinces. Here I want to put in a word for Saskatchewan, because I said that I hoped the dairy board would give some attention to that province. This table shows that it requires, to produce sufficient fluid milk to provide for the needs of one person for a year, 120 man-power hours, which is less than the number required in any other province. I have similar tables for other products, wheat, pork, beef, cheese, butter and so on. Saskatchewan shows up pretty well, and is becoming a diversified farming province. I simply wanted to make this statement to show that Saskatchewan holds a favourable position in regard to the number of man-power hours required to produce a sufficiency of food for one person for a year in any line produced on the farms.

Mr. REID: Who made that compilation?

Mr. PERLEY: I prepared the table myself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PERLEY: You need not laugh. In my office I have a table which I have taken from the records of the bureau of statistics in Canada and the national research council in the United States. I put the two together and I can produce a comparative table if hon. members would like to have it on the record.

Mr. WRIGHT: The Minister of Agriculture said that the government had paid hundreds of millions of dollars in subsidies to Canadian agriculture since the war started.

Mr. GARDINER: Do not put words into my mouth. I did not say subsidies. I said that the government provided hundreds of millions to take care of certain farm products, just as it does with regard to other products.

Mr. COLDWELL: Most of it you got back.

Mr. GARDINER: That is true in everything. I noticed that a speech which was made outside the house contained the statement that fifteen per cent of the profit did not come back. If eighty-five per cent of the profit went back, and much of the capital, that is a different matter from representing that every dollar paid remains with the industry.

Mr. WRIGHT: There has not been that amount of money spent to date in agriculture in Canada, in the way of subsidies, during war time. As a matter of fact, I do not think there has been $100,000,000.

Mr. GARDINER: In acreage payment and subsidies there has been much more than $100,000,000 over the period, or pretty close to $100,000,000 in one year.

Mr. WRIGHT: One hundred million in acreage bonuses and subsidies?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT: Would the minister put the figures on the record to show what has actually been paid?

Mr. GARDINER: I will when we get into the wheat acreage reduction under my other estimates. I will give all the figures.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister also said that he was one of the few free traders left in the house. How does he explain the government's policy—

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say that either. I said that another gentleman so designated me when we met in the hall.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister has a nice way of taking credit to himself for what others say. How does he explain the policy by which the government the other day took the war exchange tax off vegetables coming into the country but did not take it off implements which the producers in Canada require to produce these commodities?

Mr. GARDINER: If you look at your potato speech you will know why.

Mr. WRIGHT: To be fair, they should at least have taken the 10 per cent war exchange tax off the implements of production that farmers need in order to produce goods of the kind which the government are allowing to come into the country. Since the war started the farmers have been paying approximately 28½ per cent in exchange and tariff on the regular line of implements they use, and on some implements as high as 46½ per cent. In view of these facts I do not know how the minister can say that he as a member of the present government believes in free trade.

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps I may be allowed to intervene here. I rather think it would be the feeling of the committee that hon. members should keep within the limits of the item under discussion. The present discussion seems to me to be irrelevant to the item, which has to do with dairy products.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Occasionally the minister and his supporters take credit for all the money that has been spent to assist agriculture, but I suggest that if we had the figures since the beginning of the war it would be found that they do not amount to over 8 per cent of what industry has received. I will not labour that point. There seems to be a controversy as to who comes from the best dairy province. I come from Manitoba, a province which for seventeen successive years carried off prizes for the best creamery butter produced in that period. As regards the question of creamery inspectors, I am not clear whether this is entirely within provincial jurisdiction or whether there is some liaison between the province and the federal Department of Agriculture. At certain seasons of the year these inspectors are rather lax. Whose responsibility is that?

Mr. GARDINER: Cream inspection is all provincial. We have butter graders and people who inspect products going out of the province, but the inspection of cream is all done by provincial men.

Mr. WOOD: I will try to keep within the confines of the item, but seeing that there has been some latitude in the discussion I should like to place on the record certain facts I have discovered in a return that was tabled on June 16 by the Department of Finance in response to a motion of the hon. member for Mégantic-Frontenac (Mr. Lafontaine). The return shows the numbers and the amounts of repayments made by farmers in each province who obtained loans from the Canadian farm loan board during the years from 1938 to 1942 inclusive. After all, perhaps the measuring stick of prosperity of agriculture may be determined to a large extent by the ability of the farmers to retire their indebtedness. I would point out that possibly the provinces that produced dairy products have enjoyed a little greater prosperity through the difficult times than other provinces that do not produce these commodities. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made a plea for the farmer, he will probably be interested in an analysis which I have made of that return. I should like the hon. member for Huron North also to follow closely the observations I shall make as a result of some Ripleyizing I have done of the return in question. It gives the number of payments made by the farmers in the various provinces in the years indicated and the amount of money that has been paid out, and I have averaged it and discovered that in Ontario, for every dollar paid on the farm loan in 1938, the farmer had been able to pay $1.73 in 1943.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: At the expense of the rest of Canada.

Mr. WOOD: That was to the end of March. No, it is not at the expense of the rest of Canada. I am speaking of the ability of farmers to retire their indebtedness, and Ontario has made the best record in spite of the fact that we are not supposed to be farmers in that province.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That record is attributable to the fact that you have an industrial market at your door.

Mr. WOOD: That may have some bearing on it, but in answer to the hon. member for Souris I suggest that we analyse the figures for Manitoba. Manitoba is not as far from industrial markets as Saskatchewan. For every dollar his province paid in 1938, only 69 cents was paid in 1943. And there is Saskatchewan.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The boys are all in the army in Manitoba.

Mr. WOOD: They were not in 1938. Then it goes on—

Mr. QUELCH: Are those payments made with respect to dairy produce?

Mr. WOOD: No; these are total payments made to the federal farm loan organization upon mortgages. These are repayments on the loan.

Mr. QUELCH: What has that to do with this item?

Mr. WOOD: I am carrying out the argument offered by the Minister of Agriculture that the contribution this government has made to agriculture, by way of subsidies and encouragement to agriculture, has been substantial, and that we are getting results, as indicated by the ability of farmers in the various provinces to retire their indebtedness. Is there any other better measuring stick to substantiate the argument offered by the minister than the ability of farmers to pay off the mortgages? I think that is one of the best measuring sticks possible.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member should take that up with the Minister of Finance. Let the Minister of Agriculture get his statement there.

Mr. WOOD: The hon. member for Souris is one hon. member who is most talkative about getting some advantage for the farmer. I say you cannot divorce financing from farming, when measuring the prosperity of agriculture.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not see any hope of getting any help from the hon. member's speech.

Mr. WOOD: I insist upon placing this record on Hansard, for the benefit of the hon. member for Souris.

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Chairman, are we discussing farm indebtedness or dairy production? I understand a bill will be introduced later, and that it will deal with the matter of farm indebtedness.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe the point is well taken. I must confess I have allowed considerable latitude, but I think the time has arrived when we should confine ourselves to the item.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, are you going to allow the discussion to continue?

Mr. WOOD: I shall try to comply with the ruling, and I shall complete my observations as soon as possible. What I have said is, I believe, the conclusion which must be drawn in connection with the matter of the prosperity of the farmers in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the hon. member's figure for Saskatchewan?

Mr. WOOD: I am glad the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is interested. In spite of the difficulty that province has had with the drouth condition it has a creditable record. For every dollar paid on farm loan in 1938, they have paid $1.08 in 1943. On top of that, four times as many loans are being paid in 1943 as in 1938.

Mr. COLDWELL: But let us not forget that 1938 followed the worst year we ever had.

Mr. WOOD: I agree with that. That condition was reflected over a period of years. For every dollar Alberta paid in 1938 they have paid only 84 cents in 1943.

In conclusion, there seems to be something —and I do not know whether it is coincidental or not—which might be said with respect to Alberta and Manitoba. I have noticed that they are the only two provinces which have not been able to measure up, in the repayment of their mortgages, with the other provinces. It will be noticed that they are the only two provinces unfortunate enough not to have an honest-to-goodness Liberal government. Perhaps that has had something to do with their position.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did the hon. member use the word "fortunate"?

[Mr. Wood.]

Mr. WOOD: I said that those two provinces were unfortunate enough not to have Liberal governments, and that their condition may be on account of that fact.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend has a good sense of humour, and I am sure when he made that statement he was exercising it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The Prime Minister will maintain, probably, that they should not have five cents' worth of assistance.

Mr. WOOD: I have been interrupted considerably in placing this analysis before the committee. This is a most interesting return, so far as the position of agriculture is concerned. The only thing I can say is that the leader of the hon. member for Souris, who is now running at large, had the administration of that province for about twenty years, and yet they do not seem to have had the same degree of prosperity as farmers in some other parts of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Manitoba has had the best administration in Canada in the last few years.

Mrs. NIELSEN: The Minister of Agriculture is probably aware that for a considerable length of time in northwest Saskatchewan our farmers have been getting together to discuss those various matters which would permit their going ahead and making the greatest possible contribution to the war effort. In the last year, over a hundred farm production gatherings were held in that area. As a result of the discussions we have found out some interesting facts. Roughly speaking, we have in the area of North Battleford about 10,000 farmers. Those people agree that if they could have only one more milch cow on each farm they would be able to produce 2,000,000 more pounds of butter each year. That indicates what can be done on a small scale, by many farmers who are not big producers. They have had very little assistance.

These discussions have brought out the fact that the majority of our farming people are unable to expand, and for two reasons. First of all, those who have fair-sized herds are afraid to increase because they lack a guarantee as to future price. Then, the smaller farmers have not derived any great benefit from the bonuses. They may have only fifteen or twenty acres decrease from wheat, and therefore the amount they would get from the bonus would be very small. They still have a little wheat, which they are unable to sell. Many of those farmers have one or two young cattle or young heifers. However, week after week they are being forced to sell their cattle before they are finished. We have estimated that if each farmer could keep the cattle he has, we could produce about 20,000,000 more pounds of beef from that area alone.

I know our farmers are supporting the provincial government's scheme with respect to farm committees. I was wondering, however, if the Minister of Agriculture would tell us whether it would be possible to initiate a scheme whereby some assistance could be given to the smaller farmers to allow them to keep their stock, if they lack at the present time that little bit of cash necessary to carry on farm production. If this assistance were given, instead of having to slaughter their young cattle our farmers would be encouraged to keep them. Then, has the question of future prices been discussed by the government?

Mr. CARDIFF: Has the quota of milking machines been raised in 1943 over the 1942 figure?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand the quota has been raised, but I am not in a position to say by how much. There is provision made for milking machines, and a further provision for obtaining transformers to step down electrical power, so that farmers can have more opportunity to operate milking machines. Both these things have been done to the greatest possible extent.

Item agreed to.

Special products board — administration, $49,459.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Unfortunately I could not be here last night because I had to meet a train. But it is clear that we have teamwork in British Columbia, because the hon. member for New Westminster spoke for me. Some statements were made in connection with the dehydration of potatoes which were not strictly in accordance with the facts. I should like to have the record straight in that connection.

Among other statements was one that for some reason or another we cannot get an order for our plant in British Columbia. At this point I should like to know if that plant is not bona fides, or if the owner is not bona fides. We should like to be told that and we think we are entitled to be told that. This plant was passed by one of the officials. It was passed by Mr. Atkinson, an employee of the federal Department of Agriculture, a man who is employed for that very purpose. Then, we are told the plant is not capable of handling this job. In fact, we were told last night that we could not produce in the Fraser valley and in the constituency of New Westminster potatoes equal to those found in other parts of the world. Well, I am not going to boast; I am going to tell the straight facts. The constituencies of both Fraser Valley and New Westminster produce potatoes better than any others on the north American continent.

We have been told that the plant in British Columbia cannot get a contract. Two excuses have been given to us. We are told that it must be capable of producing, and that it must pass the requirements. We admit it is only right that it should meet those requirements. I repeat that the plant has been inspected by Mr. Atkinson, and that it has been passed by him. The second excuse is that we must guarantee that we shall not be a deficiency area. May I point out that neither the experts in the federal Department of Agriculture, nor those in any other department, can tell whether or not we shall have a deficiency area. Just this afternoon the minister said that owing to exceptional weather we shall have one of the heaviest hay crops ever known in Ontario. I wonder how much hay could have been harvested yesterday or the day before, in that kind of weather. What a ridiculous statement to make—that they could guarantee that there would be a surplus crop! I repeat that no department in any part or province of Canada can guarantee that we shall have a surplus in any crop such as potatoes.

I do not believe I could bring a better witness as to the truth of that statement than the Minister of Agriculture himself, one of the most competent men in agriculture on the north American continent. I do not know what better evidence I can produce to prove that the officials of his own department do not know what they are talking about when they say that they can definitely state whether or not we shall have sufficient potatoes. I quote this from Hansard at page 4372.

Mr. Gardiner: There is considerable difficulty in determining very long in advance whether there will be a shortage.

A little lower down on the page, referring to victory gardens, he is reported to have said:

If they have been responding to the appeals we have been making, it is very difficult for anyone to estimate how many potatoes we shall have this fall.

That is the Minister of Agriculture speaking, who also tells us that the only reason this plant cannot get an order to handle surplus potatoes is that we cannot guarantee that we shall have a surplus.

Mr. GARDINER: I gave three reasons.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to put this letter on the record. It is under date of Ottawa, June 7, and two paragraphs read as follows—

Mr. GARDINER: I gave three reasons last night.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: This was sent to me after I had been trying month after month to get a plant in British Columbia to handle our surplus potatoes. I quote:

1. That the plant is properly and completely equipped with the necessary machinery for pre-processing and dehydrating in order to do the job;

2. That the agricultural supplies board could be assured by competent provincial authority that the dehydration of whatever quantity of potatoes might be decided upon in the Fraser valley will not in any way short the domestic market in the coast area, a point in which the foods administration of the wartime prices and trade board is vitally interested.

That is signed by the Minister of Agriculture. Those are the principal reasons we cannot get it. Is it the desire of the government to create little Balkan states within Canada? Last year one organization produced some 14,153·25 tons of potatoes, and Mr. Langdon, the district horticulturist, estimates that we shall have from thirteen to fifteeen thousand tons more this year. Then the authority on potatoes and other farm crops, Mr. Donald Gordon, comes out to British Columbia and is reported to have said, among other things, that the farmer would produce whether it pays or not. At a time when there was no shortage of potatoes this wartime prices and trade board, which was not advised by any practical agriculturist, placed a ceiling on the different grades of potatoes. Prices were set at a point which will ruin this organization which is owned and controlled by the farmers and which was originally set up by the federal and provincial governments to be operated under the provincial department of agriculture. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to note that at no time did this organization refuse to market potatoes to the armed forces or to anyone else. At no time did they advise their producers not to do that. But this price board cut the ceiling price some thirteen dollars and expected us to go on selling. Then they said we were a deficiency area, that we could not produce the potatoes. This at a time when hundreds of tons of potatoes were rotting annually. The minister said last night that he was not interested—I do not mean that he wanted to see food wasted—in so far as dehydration was concerned in what had been lost last year or a few years ago. Here is what was advised by the experts we have over here. The minister is reported at page 4369 of Hansard as follows:

—not five years ago or six years ago, or even last year—but that there would be sufficient potatoes this year to warrant the board's going in there and buying potatoes to be dehydrated for shipment out, when there may have to be potatoes shipped in to feed the people in that area.

How many hundreds of tons of potatoes have been shipped into Ontario this year, and yet there are two plants in Ontario? According to the evidence given in the agriculture committee, they brought in potatoes and yet have given contracts for 250 tons of potatoes from New Brunswick to be dehydrated. Here is something else that interests me, and I think the people of British Columbia will also be interested. The minister is reported at page 4369 of Hansard as follows:

If that can be proved satisfactorily, then there is no reason why a contract should not be given. That matter, I believe, has been referred to the wartime prices and trade board—

The wartime prices and trade board were to say whether we can produce enough potatoes in British Columbia or anywhere else; the wartime prices and trade board which is to tell us everything about agriculture. I continue:

—and I presume they had evidence before making the statement—that while it is true that British Columbia has been exporting potatoes, that very much larger quantities are imported from points outside the province. Considerable quantities move from interior points, such as Ashcroft and Kamloops. The wartime prices and trade board state it is their opinion that a dehydration programme at the coast would accentuate this movement which, under wartime conditions, would not appear to be justified.

Kamloops and Ashcroft are not in my district, but I do not think there is any district on the north American continent, and I say this with due deference to the maritimes, which is more famous for its potatoes. I am sure that the minister's officials might know that. These points are only 150 to 200 miles from Vancouver, and yet it is proposed to set up little Balkan states so that potatoes cannot move into Vancouver or Victoria. I quote again:

That is their decision on the information they have, up to the moment. They point out that there are so many potatoes being used there that there is some question as to whether we should dehydrate potatoes in British Columbia.

That is the decision of the board whose head has said "that farmers will produce whether they make any money or not," Unfortunately that is true because the farmer has been foolish enough in the past to do just that. We are told that we must not send potatoes from Ashcroft or Kamloops to Vancouver if we want a contract to dehydrate our surplus potatoes which have been rotting on the ground. I wonder if the wartime prices and trade board, which apparently has had so much to do with this matter that it has been afraid to appear before the agriculture committee, will give a guarantee to the farmers and the people of Canada that surplus potatoes will not rot in these days of want if we do not get this order.

I hold no brief for this particular company. To the best of my knowledge the owner is a prominent political opponent of mine; but I do object to discrimination being shown, not only to this plant but to the farmers in my province and in my riding, in refusing an order for dehydration on two grounds. The first was that the plant must be up to standard. I am willing to accept that, but it has been passed, so we are informed by their own engineers and we have the report. The second point is that somebody is to say whether we shall have a lot of rain. When you go out ten miles from Ottawa, as I did last Sunday, you can see potatoes with four inches of water over them. Can anyone tell whether you will have a surplus? I want a more definite reason from the minister.

I disagree entirely with him that the Fraser valley and New Westminster are deficiency areas. I disagree with him, or with his officials, when it is said that our potatoes are not up to quality. I think the people of British Columbia are entitled to know why a contract to dehydrate potatoes or other vegetables has not been given. It is obvious that the department has no fear that we are not going to have potatoes, but it is anxious to repeat its actions of past years, as was referred to by the hon. member for New Westminster, and permit southern potatoes to come in just when ours are beginning to come on the market. Not only that, but the department adds insult to injury by reducing the price of potatoes, as it did last week, when our own are just coming on the market. The ceiling price of new potatoes is restricted to that of old potatoes. Is there a farmer, even in Ontario, where apparently they are satisfied with farm prices, who will tell you that you can produce new potatoes in June at the cost of old potatoes? I am sorry I was not here last night. I was in the chamber most of the day and heard a lot of nonsense, and then I had to go and do some business. I should like the minister to tell me why this plant cannot be given a contract. Is it because the plant is not satisfactory? Is the man who owns it not reliable? Incidentally it is the only dehydrating plant in the Dominion of Canada that has not had one dollar toward the purchase of machinery or anything else.

Mr. GARDINER: All I can do is to give the same answer I gave last night. I notice the hon. member for New Westminster is not in the chamber, but I should like to apologize to him for having said last night that I did not use the word "vegetables". When I read Hansard I found I had used it once.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member spoke on my behalf, so that I will accept the apology on his behalf.

Mr. GARDINER: I am one who perhaps is not enough of a botanist to be able to distinguish between vegetables and potatoes. The answer which I gave last night covered three points. What I said was that if the Haney plant can be fully and properly equipped for the dehydration of potatoes and manufacture a product which will meet the board's specifications, and if the wartime prices and trade board will approve the production of additional dehydrated potatoes in British Columbia, the special products board could give any plant a contract for a small quantity of dehydrated potatoes in 1943, possibly 200 tons.

The reason why we state a small quantity is that the plants which are operating are producing all that we have required up to the moment. This question has been under discussion for some time, and I think I explained to the hon. member for Fraser Valley before this discussion even started in this house that we were considering giving this plant a contract for a limited amount, provisional upon their having the necessary equipment to produce the product, and provisional, too, upon the prices board agreeing to the contract being given. It is true that the decision would depend upon whether they are satisfied that there are sufficient potatoes in the Fraser valley to take care of the demands in the valley, but I doubt whether anyone has used the argument that anyone has been able to determine up to date whether that would be the case or not. I venture to say that even plants which are now producing dehydrated potatoes, if they could get more for their fresh potatoes, would not bother to dehydrate them. I gave one other reason last night, namely, that we were getting potatoes at thirty-three cents a pound in Alberta, at thirty-two cents at other points, and that British Columbia was suggesting thirty-five cents. Of course we were hoping that we could get the product at the same price as elsewhere but that was not a condition in the statement I have made. The statement is that if they can produce a plant properly equipped and if we can get the consent of the wartime prices and trade board, which would be dependent on whether there are sufficient potatoes to take care of the demands in the valley, there will be no doubt about a contract being given for the limited amount stated here. I cannot see that we can do any more than that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I thank the minister. I am not quarrelling with his department or with the assistance we have been given in the past and are receiving to-day and will no doubt receive in the future, but the only approach to the prices board that a member has who represents a farming district is through the minister. I might just as well bump my head against the Queen Victoria monument out here as talk to the prices board. In the first place, in my opinion they do not know anything about whether or not there will be enough potatoes. As to price, the order of the prices board last year gave Alberta and British Columbia interior farmers a higher ceiling price by $4 a ton on Canada No. 1 potatoes and $8 a ton on Canada No. 2 potatoes in the Vancouver market than that received by coast growers for the same grades. Yet it is suggested that we must receive thirty-two cents or lower. As I have said, I have no other approach to the wartime prices and trade board nor has any other private member of this house than through the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: I should have said that we have already written to the owners of the plant asking if they can give us information on which we can base a decision on the question of equipment. We are hoping for a reply from them and will then communicate with the hon. member.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I accept that, because when the minister undertakes to do anything he completes it, but I cannot say that for the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. FAIR: I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we can discuss wool on this item. I would ask the minister to tell us why the price of wool is at its present figure. I expect to be told immediately that provision has been made for a four cent increase in the price by way of subsidy, provided the wool is put into a certain condition, and provided that the province will pay one-half of the subsidy. Wool was one of the first commodities to be brought under control at the outbreak of war, and so far as I know the price of wool is the same now as it was before the war. I do not think that is fair to the wool growers. They seem to be unable to help themselves, and I would suggest that the government, either the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Finance, under which the wartime prices and trade board comes, do something to increase the price of wool at the present time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am wondering if the minister really wants wool production in Canada increased.

Mr. GARDINER: A year ago we embarked on the definite policy of trying to increase the sheep population in Canada in order to increase our wool production. We have had some success in that, although I have not the figures with me at the moment as to the extent to which the sheep population has been increased. But it has increased, and we are still carrying out that policy. Hon. members know that the day war was declared, even before that, Britain had secured the whole wool supply of all parts of the empire, and Canada along with other parts of the empire came into that arrangement. We had an undertaking to take our deliveries from that set-up, the same as all other peoples who were cooperating with Britain in the war. That condition still exists. We made that undertaking with Britain in the first year of the war when it was not possible otherwise to get wool to make uniforms for the troops or for any other purpose. This is now the fourth year of the war, and that arrangement still exists. The position at the beginning of this year was that we had all the wool in Canada we needed, whether or not we got an increase in our own production; that is, we had all the wool we needed if we carried out that agreement. We cannot hope to produce anything like what we require; we have to depend on the pool for part of our requirements, but we do not require to get any more wool for our purposes in Canada beyond the deliveries under the agreement. In spite of that, we did go ahead to subsidize the production of wool if the provinces would pay half the cost of the subsidy. I think nearly all the provinces are paying half the subsidy now; I am certain Alberta pays.

Coming back to the question whether we could do better if we sold our wool elsewhere, the last time I looked up the figures, which was only a few weeks ago, they showed that we could not obtain as much by shipping to the United States as we could obtain in our own market. The United States is the only other market available, and our farmers are getting a better return by selling in their own market.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How is that?

Mr. GARDINER: In the first place, there is a duty on wool going into the United States, and other costs in getting the wool there. Those who figured out the position figured out a comparative price for me because I was interested in finding out just what the position of the Canadian farmer is as compared with the farmer in the United States, and the position of the Canadian farmer in comparison with what his position would be if he shipped to the United States market. I found that as far as wool is concerned our farmers are in a better position than they would be in if the wool were being marketed in the United States when all the costs of getting it there are taken into account. Those are the facts, and I would suggest that we are doing fairly well. We do not think we are doing all that the sheep people might expect or all that they might be entitled to, but we are doing all that we have thought it was advisable to do under existing circumstances.

Mr. FAIR: The minister says that we are doing as well now as if we had access to the United States market, but what I am trying to find out is what the Canadian farmer could get in dollars and cents as compared with the United States farmer. According to the press, the farmer in Montana has been receiving from 37½ to 55 cents a pound for wool, which is a much higher price than we are getting here, and in addition the United States dollar will buy much more than our Canadian dollar. So that there is really no comparison between the prices obtained by the farmer in Canada and those obtained by the farmer in the United States.

Mr. GARDINER: I had forgotten to mention one point. The price is very much higher now than it was before the war. The price before the war was, I think, about 16 cents; it is now around 30 cents, with a subsidy of 4 cents. The price in the United States for the same grade of wool is about 54 cents; but when one takes all the charges and the duty and everything else into consideration, the return to the Canadian farmer, with the subsidy, is slightly better than the return he would have if he sold his wool in the United States.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): What is the United States duty on wool?

Mr. GARDINER: I have forgotten what it is, but it was all figured in the price.

Mr. FAIR: I was trying to get at the number of cents a pound received by the farmer here and by the farmer in the United States. If I remember correctly, the price of wool last year was 30 cents a pound. At the present time, with the extra 4 cents, it will be 34 cents a pound. The price in the United States is much higher. The fact that our price is 34 cents a pound this year compared with 16 cents before the war will not convince us that two wrongs can make a right, because before the war the price of wool, as of several other farm products, was far below the cost of production or what it should have been.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not going to try to put my figuring against my hon. friend's figures. I got the best statistician in the department to figure for me, and he came back with the statement that one could not get as much here for the same quality of wool in the United States as is being paid, in the conditions prevailing here, by shipping it to the markets there. The market here gives a better return. I have the figures in my office, I do not happen to have them on my desk, but I can produce them.

Mr. FAIR: My point is that I should like to have the market price in Canada raised to the price in the United States market, because it is only after taking into consideration the freight charges and the duty that the comparison which the minister makes can be made.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is the date of the order in council passed in the spring, under which a bonus was to be given to the farmers?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a quality bonus; it is paid on only a certain quality of wool.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It was passed on March 29, was it not?

Mr. GARDINER: About then. It was around that time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the minister contend that, when an order in council is passed on the 29th of March to give farmers a bonus for high quality wool, particularly clean wool, he is giving the farmer anything like a chance to prepare clean wool?

Mr. GARDINER: I would say in reply to that that I was probably affected a little at the time the date was set, by some criticisms which were made in this house previously. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made an announcement on the floor of the house with regard to wheat, and a number of hon. members rose and criticized him for having made it alleging that the farmers had not a chance to present their representations. A farm delegation notified me that they were coming here about wool, and I waited before we made the decision and put the order in council through until I heard what they had to say. They came here at that time of the year and asked for it, and I presume it was of some benefit to them or they would not have asked for it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Certainly it was not giving the farmers any chance at all to qualify for the bonus. That is perfectly clear. I wonder if the committee could know when Doctor Barton's letter was sent out to the various provinces telling them of this new arrangement?

Mr. GARDINER: Right after that, but whether the letter got there or not, it was announced in this house right at the time, and I think it was pretty well known.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In other words, the provinces would not get word until along in April, would they?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be in April.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which made it completely impossible for the people who had not been particularly preparing that clean wool to qualify for the bonus. In other words, the bonus was offered and taken away at the same time.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the purchase of butter in order to maintain the price established by the wartime prices and trade board and to pay necessary storage, insurance and freight charges thereon, $1,500,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: Would the minister make a statement on the amount of butter that has been purchased by the board, the dates of the purchases, and the import position in Canada with regard to butter last year and this year?

Mr. GARDINER: I would have to speak from memory in giving a figure, but the amount of butter which was purchased was somewhere between three and four million pounds. The amount represented by this item would indicate about what was necessary in order to carry through the transaction.

The position is this, that when butter goes down to a certain price we undertake to purchase it. There was about a week, between the going out of the old season and the coming in of the new, when we found ourselves obligated to take butter off the market because the price had dropped below the floor. We took the butter off the market and we still have it.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. BOUCHER: How much butter is on hand in Canada, and how does the amount compare with other years? I believe the general feeling in my community is that the butter situation is a very difficult one for the farmers. All the evidence I have is that there are large stocks of butter on hand in spite of rationing, and the farmer who makes his own butter is breaking the law if he makes more than the limit the law allows him. I have had many constituents come in to see me claiming that though they have butter on hand they cannot sell it; they have made it but there is no market for it; they are not supposed to have it. There is a danger of farmers running short of butter who could make it for themselves and their neighbours. I submit that, if there is anything like the required amount of butter in storage, and the consumer could use more, it is a great detriment to the farmer to ration butter, because it prohibits the farmer from selling his own products. I feel that if many of us in this chamber were prohibited from carrying on our own businesses the way in which the farmer is prevented from making his livelihood in his own way and selling his own products, we should look at this question in a vastly different way from the way many of us do.

Mr. GARDINER: The amount in storage in July was 26,000,000 pounds; one year ago it was 14,000,000 pounds; so that there are now 12,000,000 pounds more butter in storage than there was on the first of July a year ago.

With regard to the other question, as I stated a few moments ago, the floor price at the beginning of this year was thirty-two cents. It goes up three-eighths of a cent each month, and is now 32¾ cents. The government is obligated to buy all butter when the price goes down to the floor. We have not bought any since the beginning of this dairy year, which indicates that the price has never been down to the floor. So that although it is said that the farmer has not been able to sell, the fact is that he has been able to sell all his butter at a price higher than the floor, and then he gets the subsidy on top of the price. The price has been around thirty-three cents, always a little above the floor. It is added to by the subsidy of eight cents a pound on butter fat, which has been in force ever since the beginning of the period.

The other question, whether we should stop rationing, is a question of policy, of course, upon which I cannot make any comment at the moment other than to say that we are still rationing.

Mr. BOUCHER: Surely the minister appreciates that the rationing restrictions affecting the sale of butter have an all-important bearing on the salability and the price received by the producer. It is much the same as the market for rhubarb around the city of Ottawa this year. You could get twenty-five cents a bushel if you could sell it at all, but you could not sell it.

Mr. GARDINER: It could not make much difference. They are buying butter for sale next winter. The price is set as it is, going up three-eighths of a cent each month, because that will pay the carrying charges on the butter, and the man who buys in May or June has to have his three-eighths of a cent each month to carry it until January of next year, when he is going to sell it, so that the price of butter could not be much higher if the ceiling price is to be thirty-five cents. He is getting all there is in it if he is to carry it and still have the thirty-five cents. We have taken care of that condition by providing a subsidy of eight cents in the summer and ten cents in the winter, and this puts up the return to the farmer, as against twenty-six cents at which butter was laid down in this country a short time ago.

Mr. BOUCHER: But the rationing policy means that he cannot even sell on the local market without coupons — which makes it impossible for him to do so.

Mr. GARDINER: He gets exactly the same price. He can sell it at that.

Mr. BOUCHER: But he cannot sell it.

Mr. GARDINER: If there is anyone who has been unable to sell his butter at 32¾ cents, the government will buy it. You can tell him that.

Mr. BOUCHER: If the minister will tell us how much butter has spoiled in storage, and how many complaints he has received from local warehousemen about the butter they have on hand which they cannot dispose of at an economic price, he will complete the picture, but until he does so his argument will not seem true to me.

Mr. GARDINER: The butter broker or merchant has never done anything else at any other time. He cannot carry on business in any other way. We produce most of our butter in the summer months, and we consume in the winter months twice as much as we produce. Anyone engaged in the butter business has to buy his surplus in the summer and carry it until the winter. We take care of that by raising the price three-eighths of a cent each month. He can buy in May or June or July and get his carrying charges under this system. In previous years, it is true, he might buy at twenty cents and sell at thirty-five cents and make an enormous profit. He cannot do that during war time, but he can buy it and get all his costs guaranteed and carry it through to the winter months. Men in the butter business are bound to be storing at present. They do not want to sell it; they are carrying it to the winter months to sell it then at the ceiling and make the cost of storage.

Mr. BOUCHER: That is exactly the point. That is a benefit to the man who handles butter. It is no asset to the man who produces butter. I realize that it is not the minister's department that makes the regulations, but I took this matter up about a month ago. A farmer in my community manufactured in the spring approximately sixty pounds of butter for the use of his family before sending any of his product to the dairy. After rationing came in, the farmers realized that they were breaking the law by holding so much of their own home-made butter for their own use, and they reported the situation to the ration officer, surrendering their coupons. They asked what they should do with the butter and the answer was to sell it. They tried to sell it, but they could not get the coupons for it, except for one or two pounds, from this man here and there. It was simply impossible for them to sell the butter. They went back to the office and asked what they were to do and the officer there simply threw up his hands and said, "I cannot tell you, but you have to get rid of it." That is the situation, and surely that must have a detrimental effect on the production of butter in the country, especially when we are rationed to the limit, cutting down home consumption of butter materially. The matter is very serious. It is one of the elements that cause trouble and discontent, and it is very hard on our farmers. Perhaps the minister can tell us something about spoiled butter.

Mr. GARDINER: There must be a misunderstanding somewhere. I do not know of any regulation that prevents a farmer from producing dairy butter and keeping it in his cellar, and if there were, there is a stabilization corporation which has undertaken to buy from them and pay a price for it. That has been known for months. When the stabilization corporation went out to look for all this dairy butter they could find only 7,000 pounds in all Canada for sale. In other words, I find it difficult to follow the story my hon. friend is telling.

Mr. BOUCHER: Nevertheless it is an actual fact. The regulations stipulate that no one may keep on hand more butter than the ration authorities permit, and sixty pounds is more than these people could keep, with the size of their family. It is all very well to say that they can dispose of their dairy butter, but no dealer will buy butter made by a farmer when he can buy creamery butter made by the dairies, and the farmers cannot market the product.

Mr. CHURCH: When the rationing of butter was announced last year there was a very wide division of public opinion as to whether it would be a success, or whether it was necessary, in view of the complex nature of the proposal. It was contended that there was no scarcity of butter and therefore no need to ration the commodity. I argued that rationing should be under the control of the Department of Agriculture, under the minister himself, and there was a great deal of discussion in the newspapers, among consumers' leagues, bodies in the retail business and other organizations in the country with regard to the desirability or the necessity or the usefulness of such a proposal in an agricultural country like Canada, which has a vast agriculture dominion organization for this industry, and another one under provincial direction. I contended at the time that it was absolutely useless for us to hand over to the wartime prices and trade board a technical matter of this sort, because many of the people comprising the board have no practical experience either in agriculture or in business, wholesale or retail, or in the production and marketing of butter and other food commodities. During the past year we have spent $65,000,000 in a subsidy programme, and this programme will be costing this fiscal year from $90,000,000 to $100,000,000. There was a great deal of blowing about the success of rationing in Canada as compared with the United States, but people seem to forget that in the United States there is a population of well over 100,000,000 people, whereas we have but a small population. Moreover, they have more complex problems than we have, owing to greater population and area and greater variety of trade and production.

I should like to find out from the minister what coordination there is with the control board in the direction of this whole rationing scheme. I repeat, it and also beef rationing, should have been left under the present minister, in the Department of Agriculture. That was the opinion I expressed a year ago and I am still of that opinion. It should have been left to a responsible minister of the crown. Had that been done matters would have been far different. It would have been far better than leaving it with some college professor who knows no more about butter than what he consumes himself. The policy was all wrong. I should like either the Minister of Agriculture or any other cabinet minister to tell this committee why there should be any scarcity of such an important food commodity as butter, and so much faulty distribution. Rationing of butter has not been a success; at any rate, it has not been the success that it should have been. It has cost us a great deal of money with a huge organization, and there has been a lot of waste and useless duplication. Ration books are issued, and before they are used new books are brought out. I should like to have a statement from the minister. I have looked into this question a great deal, both during the recess of parliament and since, and I suggest to the minister that if he has time, when the house gets through with its business, he should look up the June number of the monthly booklet of the National City Bank of New York city and see what that publication has to say with regard to the effectiveness of subsidies in the United States. Let me quote a few passages from this booklet under the heading, "Subsidies conditioned on economics."

> Canadian subsidies are tied directly with regulation of profit margins on the particular product. They are designed to cover only a part of the increase in costs, and are conditioned upon adoption of various economies in production, importation and distribution.

It gives reasons why there should be a limit to rationing many of these commodities. I think the time has come when we should have a statement from the government in connection with the whole matter.

Mr. GARDINER: I am interested in the opinions of the hon. member with regard to the last matter he spoke of, but he will realize that it is impossible for me to discuss that point. It is a matter of policy which has been decided, and the prices board is under the Minister of Finance.

On the other question as to this particular arrangement, with regard to the purchase of butter, that is not arranged by the prices board. The Department of Agriculture sets a floor price, and the department protects that floor by purchasing butter when butter goes down to the floor, so that $1,500,000 is provided with which to buy butter when it goes to the floor, to prevent its going further. That is an arrangement which is made entirely in the Department of Agriculture to protect the farmer against an unusual drop in butter prices. The extent to which it can drop with the widest margin is 3 cents, but at the present time it is 2¼ cents, until we have to step in and purchase.

Mr. WRIGHT: I asked a question with regard to the amounts purchased by this board last year and the dates of purchase.

Mr. GARDINER: I gave that figure.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister did not give the dates purchased. Did he give figures with regard to imports of butter?

Mr. GARDINER: It was the last week before this present year came in, the week beginning May 1. It was in the month of April, and our year in connection with dairy products comes in on May 1. These regulations would apply to May 1.

In reply to the hon. member for Broadview, I may say that this policy was announced prior to the 1st of May, to cover the whole year from May 1, 1943, to May 1, 1944. This money is to carry out that policy.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Where is this butter stored at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: There are nine different cities across Canada in which it is stored. It is in storage right across the country.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What companies?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be in cold storage plants in those cities.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not government cold storage plants?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. BOUCHER: Has the minister any particulars as to the amount of spoiled butter, unfit for human consumption in Canada, and has he further information as to what butter, if any, has been sold for other than consumption purposes?

Mr. GARDINER: We have no information as to any spoiled creamery butter in Canada. We have no knowledge of any such thing.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has the minister figures with regard to imports of butter?

Mr. GARDINER: They are very small. There was the butter I referred to a while ago which was landed in Canada but which we are shipping out again, if it is not all shipped now.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister has no particulars about the spoilt butter. Has he any information about dairy butter?

Mr. GARDINER: None.

Mr. FAIR: There is another question about the subsidy on butter. I understand no subsidy is paid on dairy butter, but there is a subsidy on that delivered to the creameries.

Mr. GARDINER: The subsidy is paid on butter fat, not on butter, either creamery or dairy. There is a subsidy paid on any butter fat delivered to the creamery.

Mr. FAIR: There seems to be a good deal of dissension about the subsidy, because there is discrimination against those who are not located close enough to the creamery to deliver butter fat.

Mr. GARDINER: I gave an answer a moment ago which was to the effect that we have set up prices by which the government is prepared to abide, for dairy butter, where there is any difficulty about it. But we have not been able to find much of it anywhere in Canada.

Mr. FAIR: Will the government purchase dairy butter from the farmers?

Mr. GARDINER: There would be a price paid which the government guarantees.

Mr. FAIR: A price which will not compare with the creamery price.

Mr. GARDINER: It will not be as high as the creamery price.

Mr. GILLIS: Has the minister any figures as to the percentage of butter now in storage which was imported last year?

Mr. GARDINER: The total amount of butter imported in 1942 was 592,000 pounds. That is, of course, just butter which comes across the boundary line at different points, or at least the greater part of it. I cannot tell how much of that is in storage to-day. I imagine it is practically all eaten.

Mr. BOUCHER: Where was that butter shipped to?

Mr. GARDINER: The butter I mentioned earlier was shipped to Halifax.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister says that the butter imported was almost all from the United States.

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot tell the point to which butter was shipped.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister cannot say where it was imported from.

Mr. GARDINER: It was received at points all the way along the boundary; it would come over at different points.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Wartime prices and trade board—administration, $14,300,000.

Mr. LALONDE: Mr. Chairman, in time of war it is often necessary to set up commissions so that the government may share the responsibilities of administration. We are now discussing the administration of one of these commissions, namely, the wartime prices and trade board, which operates under the authority of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I do not intend to delay the committee unduly, but I should like to refer to a special case, the characteristics of which almost constitute a question of privilege in connection with myself. That being so, I feel I am entitled to discuss the matter with the minister. I do not bear any grudge against anyone, either against the minister or any of the parties involved in this case, but I want to clear up my position as a member of this house and as a public man who, I believe, has had a rather good public and private reputation.

The wartime prices and trade board established in Mont Laurier, the principal town in my riding, an office which is in charge of a representative appointed in the usual way by the civil service commission in cooperation with the wartime prices and trade board officials. This man is Mr. Alphonse Forget. During the summer of 1942 I received many complaints about the handling of tire sale permits. It was alleged that this representative was using the privileges attached to his office to divert all tire sale permits to a certain garage in Mont Laurier. I made a personal investigation, and I thought it was my duty to put the results of this investigation before the proper authorities. This I did at the beginning of December, 1942.

At the end of November the investigator who had been appointed to this office, a Mr. Pellerin, was suddenly dismissed without any apparent reason. While I was in Montreal I received a call from this man, one of the outstanding citizens of Mont Laurier, and he complained about the brutality with which he had been dismissed by the mimic dictator who is in charge of the wartime prices and trade board operations in Montreal, a Mr. Robitaille. Mr. Pellerin came to Montreal, and we had an interview with Mr. Robitaille when we were told that the investigator had been dismissed because he had taken out of the office at Mont Laurier, with the complicity of the hon. member for Labelle, certain records and other confidential papers which were being used in my office. Needless to say, I deny emphatically this accusation, and I state from my place in this house that I never constituted this investigator my political agent in my riding, and that I never, either directly or indirectly, asked him to communicate to me any of the particulars pertaining to this office. I put the matter before the wartime prices and trade board, represented by Mr. Robitaille. Later, on February 7, 1943, I received a letter from Mr. Pellerin giving all the particulars of this incident. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I shall read this letter because it states the case much better than I could. It is in French and reads:

(Translation)
Mr. Maurice Lalonde, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Lalonde,

It will be three months on the 14th instant since I have been suspended, by telegram, from my duties as investigator for the prices board at the Mont Laurier office, and three months on the 28th, since I have been definitely discharged by Mr. L. C. Robitaille, although his letter did not reach me until December 2, 1942. I need not tell you that time hangs heavy on my hands.

As I have often told you, I shall always claim that I have been treated unfairly; that is why I asked you to take up my case and attempt, if possible, to have me reinstated by the competent authorities.

I renew my request to you and point out the succession of events as they really happened.

All through last summer, 1942, I received complaints from various Mont Laurier garage operators who claimed that the permits for the sale of tires, issued by Mr. J. A. Forget, local representative at Mont Laurier, were mostly in the name of the Laurin garage to the exclusion of other tire distributors of the district. I have often called Mr. Forget's attention to these complaints and in every case he answered that those who complained were nothing but jealous cry-babies.

Seeing that the complaints continued to come in and that, besides, I had had personal knowledge——of a couple of infractions to the commission's orders on the part of Mr. Forget, I decided, while I was still in office, to find out whether there was any truth to the complaints received.

I emphasize this phrase "personal knowledge."

On November 12, while at my office, I asked the secretary, Miss L. Lamarche, to hand me the files relating to tire permits, which she did very willingly and without any comment. I then took a few notes, a copy of which is in your possession. Under the circumstances, I thought I was perfectly justified in going over the files and taking notes, since serious charges had been made which I did not choose to submit to my superiors without further investigation. Moreover, I have never shown these notes to anyone, not even to yourself, until the 2nd day of December, date on which I was discharged, and asked you to take up my case.

However, on the afternoon of November 14, I received a telegram from Mr. Robitaille, suspending me from my duties.

As I had no inkling of the reasons for such a sudden action, I went to Montreal, on Sunday, November 15, and, on the next day, I saw Mr. Robitaille in his office.

It is then that I learnt from him that I was charged first, with being the political agent of the member of parliament for Labelle; second, with having secreted some files from the office and having taken them to your place on a certain afternoon, when we are supposed to have looked them over together; third, with having used a certain amount of pressure on Miss Lamarche or having attempted to intimidate her in some way in order to obtain the files relating to tire permits.

Needless to say that I have offered Mr. Robitaille a positive and energetic denial of these three charges; I even offered to swear an immediate written denial if he wished to call a superior court commissioner into his office. However, Mr. Robitaille did not comply with this request. I was the more at ease in denying these charges for the fact you were accused of being mixed up in this affair and that I was perfectly satisfied that you were in a position to support my statement.

S. Pellerin.

Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to add this:

(Text) If there were grave accusations against this man it was the duty of the district representative of the wartime prices and trade board in Montreal immediately to have a thorough investigation made to determine whether they were true or not. I offered Mr. Robitaille to file my own personal sworn affidavit, but he refused. My personal belief is that this Robitaille has gone too fast in this matter; I repeat again from my place in this house that all the accusations that I cited a few moments ago are false from one end to the other, and I ask the Minister of Finance to order a serious investigation by competent officers before whom, if necessary, I will appear and clear up the matter once and for all.

But, Mr. Chairman, there was another reason. There was a nigger in the woodpile.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just one?

Mr. LALONDE: Just one, and I think that is enough in the circumstances. This investigator was in the way of the manager. I understand that the specific charge which has been made against this representative that he was centralizing the tire sales permits in one garage has been investigated many times. I can say immediately that I was not at all satisfied with the investigations carried on by the investigator of the wartime prices and trade board, because my own personal belief is that they did not go to the bottom of the matter. Consequently I took the matter up with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who made an investigation and filed a report, but since as I am just a member of the house elected by the people of my district, I was not allowed to see that report. I can say, however—I think the minister is in possession of the report—that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police reported that the charge was well founded, that this garage man had his tires sales business increased by nearly 100 per cent and that the other garage man in the same locality dropped around seventy-five per cent. I cannot accept the explanations given by the officials of the wartime prices and trade board, explanations which are not satisfactory to any intelligent man who knows human nature. This specific charge has been found by the mounted police to be well founded and I really wonder why this man still occupies his position as representative of the wartime prices and trade board in my town.

One may say that the phenomenal increase of tire sales in one garage may be explained by the fact that this man has carried on a certain kind of propaganda or advertising, but I have before me a sworn affidavit by one of those people who complained about the matter in which this sale of tire permits was handled. This affidavit has been sent to the proper authorities, and it represents the real meaning of the gossip that one can hear around my district. It is because this man remains in his position, because the situation has not been straightened out, that one now hears around my district that the member is interested in the racket. I cannot stand for that, Mr. Chairman, and that is why I am on my feet to protest and say to the people of my riding and to this committee that that is false, that I am not interested either directly or indirectly in any kind of tire sales business in Mont Laurier, even if my tenant sells gas or tires or any kind of auto accessories.

This affidavit is also in French, but it throws a true light on the real situation that exists now in Mont Laurier. It reads:

1. At the beginning of October, 1942, I made an application for tires at the garage of Mr. Gaston Forget;

2. My application was delivered by myself in the office of the wartime prices and trade board, at Mr. A. Forget's, to himself, on the same day.

3. About three weeks later, I went to see Mr. Forget in order to ascertain why I had not received the tires. He answered: "I cannot account for that." He then advised me to go to the garage of Mr. Yvan Laurin, and in fact he accompanied me there. After we had reached the garage he prepared a new application, which was left on the counter at the garage. Mr. Alphonse Forget then told me that everything was O.K. and that I would obtain the tires.

4. About two weeks later, as a result of the application made at Mr. Laurin's, I obtained two 7.00 x 16 tires.

In witness whereof I have set my hand—

(Text) For the benefit of those who do not understand French, the affidavit I have just read is to the effect that this man has been directed by the representative of the office in Mont Laurier to buy his tires at a certain garage. Well, if this is to continue, I am asking myself if our people will have great confidence in this organization, and if I speak to-night on the matter I do not do so on political grounds, because the parties of whom I have spoken to-night are Liberals in good standing. If I protest against the treatment inflicted on Mr. Pellerin and on myself by this dictator, Robitaille of Montreal, it is because I believe, and I believe to-night as strongly as ever before, that the public interest is at stake, and I want in all sincerity that this board be honestly administered in my district. The board in some other fields has done a good job, and I am glad to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance upon that.

But this very special case is one of those that I cannot let pass without protesting as strongly as I can. This centralization of tire sales permits in just one garage man, and the conclusion of the report of the mounted police, together with the evidence I have filed before, is sufficient, I humbly submit, to justify the minister in taking this matter under his control; and in spite of certain advice that has been given by certain officials of the wartime prices and trade board, I say that the minister should dismiss immediately this representative from his position and place any other man there; I am entirely disinterested in who it may be, provided he is honest and capable.

There is also one accusation against this manager that has not yet been cleared up, and I think, although I am not quite sure of it, that the hon. minister has it on file. This representative is accused of having bought an inner tube without a permit from a certain garage man in Mont Laurier and having sold it to another party at the same price after having paid for it out of his own pocket. The evidence shown in this other charge is such as left me under the impression that this man, if he had done that, would have done something more, and that he does not deserve the position he now occupies.

I put these facts before the committee. I hope that the Minister of Finance will take the necessary steps to remedy the situation. I again emphasize at this point that if I intervene in this matter, it is not on political grounds. I know the wartime prices and trade board has probably received instructions not to play politics, and I agree with that. If politics is to enter into the administration of these boards, we would rather cancel all these schemes and let the matter go. But if I had been interested in a political sense, I would not have put before the wartime prices and trade board any charge against my political friends. If I have done so, it is because it is a question of honour for me and for my family, because in my district gossip begins to circulate to the effect that "this man seems not to have the confidence of the people; yet being always in this position, it might be that the members may be interested in the racket." I emphatically deny that it is so, and my last remark is that I wonder how a man can stay in public life without clearing up this matter.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): This is a troublesome matter, this question of the fitness of Mr. J. L. Alphonse Forget to discharge the duties of representative of the wartime prices and trade board at Mont Laurier. The hon. member for Labelle is strongly of opinion that Mr. Forget is not a suitable representative of the board, and has asked for his dismissal, or, in the alternative, his transfer.

I have discussed this matter on two or three occasions with the hon. member for Labelle, and I have put a large amount of time on the case myself to see whether an investigation would reveal the existence of facts which would warrant the dismissal or transfer of this man.

With regard to the statement of the hon. member for Labelle that he was not privy to any examination of the files by Mr. Pellerin, who was dismissed, I believe at the instance of Mr. Robitaille, I of course accept without hesitation the hon. member's statement in that regard. It is, however, true that Mr. Pellerin examined the files and made certain copies, for purposes of his own, presumably, in the absence of Mr. Forget, who was in charge of the office; and Mr. Pellerin, if I understand the facts correctly, had not the authority to do so, his position not being such that he had the right to do that in the absence of his superior. At any rate the dismissal took place at the instance, I believe —the hon. member for Labelle will correct me if I am wrong—of the representative for the province of Quebec, Mr. Robitaille of Montreal.

The crux of the charge or charges against Mr. Forget, because, after all, that is what I as minister am concerned with, is whether he was guilty of favouritism toward one of the garages. While the police investigation is confidential, I think it would do no harm for me to say that the member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who investigated the matter was of the opinion that there had been favouritism. On the other hand, a study of his report indicates that that opinion was a conclusion to which he came, and was not necessarily the conclusion to which everybody might come. It was in all respects an opinion, but it was based, I think entirely, upon the large proportion of sales in the district made by a certain garage known as the Garage Laurin, and I should add, upon the fact that sales of tires by that garage increased during 1942 and that sales of tires by the other garages in the town decreased during 1942.

Mr. LALONDE: Would the minister give the figures, if they are not confidential?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I can give the figures. I have not them in tabular form; I have a memorandum of my own, but I would have to go all through the police report, and it would take quite a long time. They would all lead to this conclusion, that there was a sharp increase in the sales of tires by the garage which was alleged to be favoured, and a sharp decrease in the sales of tires by the other five garages in the town.

Mr. LALONDE: If the minister will permit me, could he later on place those figures on the record?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have sent for another file, and I think I may have them.

Mr. LALONDE: Later on, maybe tomorrow?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; I can get those. The investigator—I think he was the first investigator sent by the Montreal office to investigate the situation there—in his report to Mr. Robitaille on November 27, 1942, points out some fairly significant facts, facts which I think are a little difficult to answer. I will read this report:

Montreal, November 27, 1942.

Mr. L. C. Robitaille,
Prices and Supply Representative,
Room 703, Aldred Building,
Montreal, Quebec.

Dear Sir,

A check-up of tire rationing in Mont Laurier reveals that 80 per cent of the applications made for tires or tubes were made by dealers in Mont Laurier. The balance—20 per cent—was made by dealers in the district outside of the town.

30 per cent of those applications were made by Garage Laurin.
17 per cent of those applications were made by Jean Brisebois.
10 per cent of those applications were made by Garage Vanchestein.
18 per cent of those applications were made by Garage Gaston Forget.
10 per cent of those applications were made by Grenier Frère.
10 per cent of those applications were made by W. Grenier.

Of the total applications made at Garage Laurin, 29 per cent were refused.

That is very important. If the percentage of refusals had been negligible for the garage which was alleged to be favoured, a much better case would be made, but it was not so.

At Brisebois, 19 per cent were refused.
At Vanchestein, 27½ per cent were refused.
At Forget, 39½ per cent were refused.
At Grenier Frère, 39 per cent were refused.
At W. Grenier, 53½ per cent were refused.

As suggested, every tire dealer was asked if he could specify one case where one of his applications has been refused and that the applicant had obtained a permit by making his application through another dealer. Not one could be named although it was rumoured. In the office, was one case of an application for tire and tube pending investigation as to the necessity of a new tube. In the meantime, a second application for a tire only came from another dealer for the same applicant. The latter one was granted and first one cancelled.

More details on separate reports for each dealer are given.

A report made by Mr. Pellerin on May 18, showing a deficit of 43 tubes in W. Grenier's place and never produced, is also attached.

Also found in Mr. Pellerin's desk were a few gas reports. These were turned in to Mr. L. Leroux for his inspection.

Yours truly,
E. Alphonse Lalonde.

Mr. LALONDE: "Forget".

Mr. ILSLEY: No; this is Lalonde, who, I assume, is Robitaille's investigator. That was the report of the investigator to Mr. Robitaille, made on November 27, 1942. Now, there has been investigation after investigation in this case; not only the police investigation, but repeated investigations, some of them taking a great many days, and involving interviews with large numbers of persons in the district. These reports have been studied, and the representative for the province of Quebec, Mr. Robitaille, stands very strongly by Forget. He states that as a result of the investigations Forget is in the clear, that there is nothing whatever which will justify his dismissal; and a review of the report by the wartime prices and trade board here, by the secretary and the general counsel and I think, perhaps, in a somewhat rapid manner by the chairman of the board, leads to the same conclusion, that there is not sufficient proof of anything against Forget which would warrant his dismissal. It must be remembered that there are a number of small incidents. The one mentioned to-night is perhaps the most serious of those minor incidents. It is that Forget himself, to oblige somebody, bought an inner tube for $2.74 or $2.76 and turned it over to his friend or acquaintance for that $2.76 without any permit being issued. Now, Forget has an explanation of that transaction which may or may not be creditable to him. It is that he was trying out the garage man to see whether he would sell without a permit.

Mr. LALONDE: He was an agent provocateur.

Mr. ILSLEY: And he did not pursue the matter any farther because it was a small one.

Mr. GRAYDON: He was satisfying his curiosity.

Mr. ILSLEY: The transaction was a small one for which to dismiss an official, and in the opinion of the board it would be going a little too far. I have gone over the file, and the only accusation in substance against the man was one of favouritism, which certainly is strongly denied by all the board investigators who have gone into the matter. They say it can be readily explained on other grounds, and the explanation is that this garage had a good deal of what is called fleet business, and from the nature of its business it sold in the summer of 1942 a larger number of tires than the others.

The hon. member for Labelle feels strongly about this case. This man was appointed by the civil service commission. He is a civil servant, and he is entitled to retain his position unless he is proved to have been derelict in the discharge of his duties. Much as I should like to oblige a member of parliament, I do not think the hon. member for Labelle expects me to do so in a matter of this kind; and I must say that he never has, because he has recognized the fact that unless I had before me something that would justify the dismissal of this man I could not institute proceedings leading to his dismissal simply because the hon. member for Labelle feels that he ought to be dismissed and that he is not fit for the position.

Mr. GRAYDON: During the course of the debate to-night some suggestion has been made about a recommendation either for the dismissal or for the transfer of this man. Who made that suggestion?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The suggestion with regard to his transfer was made on this basis. It was felt that the evidence did not justify dismissal, and certainly the trouble that has been caused in the community by persons taking one side or the other of this argument—and there are many who take the other side, for I have a petition signed by sixty-five residents of Mont Laurier urging that the man be not transferred—would seem to suggest that, the community being so divided, the man's usefulness is greatly impaired so far as that particular town is concerned, and that even if there were no clear evidence against him a transfer would be the sensible way of dealing with the matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: It occurs to me that if the man is not competent; if he is not a proper person to fill the position which he now holds, it is clearly the duty of the department to dismiss him. If, on the other hand, he is fulfilling his duties in a competent, capable manner, and without any real cause for dismissal, then of course he should not be dismissed. You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. ILSLEY: But it may still be the sensible thing to transfer him.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would be a matter of policy on the part of the department; nevertheless the department must take a more unequivocal position with reference to the question than simply saying to the man, "You are competent and capable, but we are going to get rid of you." That is what the hon. member apparently had in mind. I suggest that the department must make up its mind whether the man is capable and competent, there being nothing in particular against him so far as the department is concerned. If so, he should be retained; if that is not the case, he must be dismissed. The question of transfer is certainly at best a compromising of a rather peculiar situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The board is strongly of the opinion that the man is competent and should be retained where he is.

Mr. LALONDE: I thank the minister for the explanation he has given. May I point out that the civil service commission, in view of the reports of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, has refused to renew the man's certificate. He was hired on a yearly basis. At any rate, the certificate, if it has not been cancelled, was not renewed by the end of March of this year. I am not quite sure whether he receives his pay, but I can say that the treasury board is fully aware of the facts. In view of the opinion of the civil service commission I am not alone in believing that this man is incompetent and should be dismissed.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did my hon. friend not suggest that he should be transferred?

Mr. LALONDE: I made the suggestion to the proper authorities, because the matter has created a certain amount of uneasiness in my district with reference to the wartime prices and trade board, and everyone feels that we must go through this garage in order to have better tire sales bargains.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member is not being kind to the next one who is asked to take the man.

Mr. LALONDE: The minister has stated the explanation given by the wartime prices and trade board for the increase in these tire sales from, I believe, $7,000 to nearly $14,000, within a few months in just one small locality.

Mr. ILSLEY: In one year.

Mr. LALONDE: In one year. The board states that this garage is the largest dealer in accessories and the customers are fleet operators. I know personally this is not true. That is simply an explanation to cover this man, and so long as the proper authorities have not decided to remedy the situation, either by dismissing the man or by transferring him, public opinion in my district will not be satisfied.

Mr. KNOWLES: As I understand it, the work of the wartime prices and trade board relates to two main functions, and I should like to say a few words about each of these functions. On the one hand, it is concerned with keeping prices down as far as possible, and, on the other, it is concerned with the supply of goods to the people of this country. In connection with the work of keeping down the cost-of-living index, I think hon. members of this house will agree with the spirit of what the minister said the other night when he spoke of the achievement of the board in that field during the course of this war, compared with what happened during the course of the last war. I say that quite definitely, because I shall be making some remarks with reference to figures that might suggest that that we do not appreciate what has been done. I do not wish to detract from that appreciation; nevertheless I think I should express the view which is commonly held by housewives, and by the husbands who provide the money for them to buy things with, that the cost-of-living index figures provided by the bureau of statistics, and referred to so frequently by the wartime prices and trade board, do not seem to be borne out by experience.

The other evening the minister gave certain figures which will be found at page 4254 of Hansard. I wish to refer to figures that have been given by the bureau of statistics, and perhaps if I use those that appear on page 70 of the report of the wartime prices and trade board it will be just as satisfactory. The reason I take the figures from the report rather than the figure the minister gave is that he gave just the final average, whereas the figures on page 70 of the report of the board give the final average, and also how it is made up, among several different lines of goods. In the third column of this report we are told that in the eighteen months from November, 1941, to March, 1943, the rise in the cost of living has been only ·9 per cent. If I might compare that with the figure the minister gave the other night as reported at page 4254 of Hansard, I would point out that at that time he said there was a rise of 1·5 per cent in the period of eighteen months ending May 1 of this year. The minister will note that the figures in the table on page 70 break that down, and indicate that in the matter of foods, for one example, the increase in the period of sixteen months was 2·3 per cent.

I have in my hand a portion of the Winnipeg Free Press of June 9, which contains an article headed "City tests show 48-cent rise in Winnipeg's cost of living." May I add that this report arose out of an investigation made by the public welfare committee of the Winnipeg city council. The concern of that committee is with the standard of living of people on relief. In other words, their concern is not with a high or even an average standard of living, but with that of people under their jurisdiction. The paragraph I would read is as follows:

> Cost of living in Winnipeg has risen 48 cents a month per person, buying tests recently conducted by the city public welfare department reveal. Test purchases in ten stores were made on March 23—

That is in the present year.

> —and it was found that the average cost of a week's groceries for a family of five was $7.78. The same tests made June 1 disclosed that the average cost of a week's groceries for a family of five has risen to $8.38, an increase of 60 cents, or 7·71 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: During what period?

Mr. KNOWLES: That increase of 7·71 per cent is in the period of ten weeks between March 23, 1943, and June 1, 1943. I do not wish to make any rash statements about the figures given by the dominion bureau of statistics, but I think the minister knows of the statements which are made throughout the country about those figures. There is a feeling that while the wartime prices and trade board have done a good job, as I have already said, compared with the experience of the last war, still people know by their experience and by methods of dead reckoning that the cost of living has gone up more than these figures indicate.

In connection with the ways in which the cost of living can go up, there are a few comments I should like to make. In the first place, owing to the fact that some lines of goods are off the market, it actually becomes necessary for people, in order to feed themselves at all, to buy in many instances a better quality of food than they would buy in normal times. People who normally look for bargains and are prepared to take second or third grades in order to balance their budgets, find that those second or third grades are not available. In many instances they are forced to buy better quality goods, with the result that the amount they have to spend increases.

On the other hand, in connection with some goods, such as clothing, the general feeling is that there has been a certain amount of deterioration in quality. While I realize, from an answer given some time ago at my request by the dominion bureau of statistics, that manufacturers are asked to take into consideration deterioration in quality, still the general feeling of people with whom I have talked is that in the matter of clothes people are not getting the same value for their money they were getting before the war. The result is that clothes have to be bought more often, and this fact reflects itself in an increase in the cost of living under war-time conditions.

Mr. ILSLEY: What did the hon. member say was the reason why people are buying better food?

Mr. KNOWLES: I said that in many instances families which in normal times might in some lines buy second or third quality now find in war time that second and third grades are not available.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why not?

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not know why not. Does the minister?

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it not because the very considerably improved income of the people causes them to buy better grades? Is that not, honestly, the truth? I think it is common knowledge that it is.

Mr. KNOWLES: My view is that the better food some people are eating to-day is not purchased by them because they want to spend that greater amount of money on it. It is purchased because the better quality is the only line of food available to them.

Mr. ILSLEY: Where is the rest of it?

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not know, but it is not available. Another item I think the minister would have to take into consideration is the increase in taxation, part of which has actually gone into subsidizing prices and, in other words, really should be considered in computing the increase in the cost of living. I understand the dominion bureau of statistics feels it includes all the taxes it should in the cost of living index when it includes indirect taxes which show up in the prices people pay for food. But the bureau of statistics apparently does not take into consideration any of the direct taxes paid by the people of Canada. Yet those taxes have increased tremendously, and add to the cost of living. As I have said, part of the money paid in taxes is used—and I shall deal with that specifically in a moment—to subsidize prices. Part of what we pay in taxes is actually part of the price which we pay for some of our food.

Another factor which I think should be considered is that averages are very deceiving. It is one thing to find what the average cost of living is on certain quantities of goods across the country, and it is another thing to find a family which is at that precise average point. Conditions vary in different parts of the country, and they also vary considerably according to the income of the family. The dominion bureau of statistics can establish quantities of necessary commodities which it takes into consideration in making up its cost of living index, but whether or not the relative quantities of those various goods are bought depends upon the family income. Those in the lower income brackets do not buy the same proportion of all the various kinds of goods included in the list of things which make up the index. There are certain basic things they have to buy first, and so far as they are concerned if those basic things go up in price, then their cost of living index may have risen to a greater extent than is reflected in the average published by the dominion bureau of statistics.

One might ask why we are concerned with the figure the bureau of statistics publishes, and why we bring it to the attention of the wartime prices and trade board. The answer, of course, is quite clear; namely, that the cost of living bonus is paid—when it is paid—in proportion to the increase in the cost of living. Of course the wartime prices and trade board watches the cost of living index closely, because that index indicates whether the board is doing its job, so far as the control of prices is concerned. I think there would be a good deal more satisfaction and perhaps a greater appreciation of the work of the board if the whole question of the determination of the cost of living index were gone into anew, in the light of war-time conditions, and in the light of some of the factors which I have suggested, and some other factors which no doubt other hon. members will suggest later on. This ought to be done to see if it is not possible to arrive at a figure which will more nearly approximate the experience of our people. I say again that that rise of only 2·3 per cent in the price of food in eighteen months hardly tallies with the experience of the housewives of Canada.

I have given as one piece of evidence on the other side the article in the Winnipeg Free Press, which is an account of a report made by an established committee in Winnipeg, and which shows that there was an increase of 7·71 per cent in the period of ten weeks ending June 1, 1943. When I started I said that I should like to make a few comments on the other side of the board's activities, namely, that of seeing to it that necessary goods are made available to our people. Here again I agree in spirit with the statement made by the minister the other night when he expressed satisfaction with the work the board has been doing in this connection. If all we have to suffer on this continent while this war is on is a few privations through not being able to get our chosen foods, that is not a very large price to pay and there should be no complaint so far as adults are concerned. I am going to take a moment or two, however, to speak on behalf of one group of citizens, our children and infants.

It seems to me that the board ought to do something to try to improve the situation with respect to the younger members of our community. We do not know how long the war will last, and what our children receive in their younger years may have a bearing upon their health throughout their whole lives. A great deal of progress has been made in recent years in the field of nutrition. We know the things that are necessary in order to build health, and yet some of the things necessary for infants and young children are most difficult to get at the present time. One item is the little tins of fruits which are prepared for children and which an adult would not eat unless he were ill. Then there is the good old stand-by, prunes, and there is also canned milk. The minister made some comments about this the other night and pointed out that we have actually increased our production of canned milk. Despite that, shortages seem to be turning up. Corn syrup has become very important to babies, and then there are such things as oranges and other fruits.

I would suggest that some of these items be rationed. I know the minister said the other night that while it is realized that theoretically rationing is the most perfect method of distributing food, it is something to be avoided if possible. But despite all the difficulties that would be encountered, I think we should be concerned about the health of our future generation. The ration books indicate the age of the holders. Children under a certain age receive no coupons for tea and coffee, and I suggest that in reverse fashion it ought to be possible to make some of the things I have mentioned available only to our younger citizens. These items which are seldom found on the shelves of our stores should be made available on a ration basis. I know that a great many young mothers, and fathers too, are worried because they cannot get corn syrup, prunes and other articles of food required by small children.

I would refer also to fruits, such as oranges. Perhaps it might not be feasible to ration oranges, but I would suggest that the whole matter of subsidies should be handled with a view to making these commodities available to the younger section of our community. In this connection I would say that I have read with great interest certain parts of the report of the wartime prices and trade board. One section which I have studied quite closely is that dealing with the functions of the commodity prices stabilization corporation. It seems to me that too much of the initiative lies with the companies which are interested in obtaining subsidies and which make application to the corporation. I feel that the initiative should lie with the board. The board, after consultation with health and nutrition experts, should have a picture of what our children ought to have in the way of food. It should start first with the group to which I have referred and should take the initiative in granting subsidies in such a way as to make these things available to those who need them.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman referred to a check in the rise in the cost of living made in Winnipeg and stated that the results of this survey indicated an increase in the cost of foods or groceries of 7·71 per cent between March 23 and June 1, 1943. From this he argues that the rise of 2·3 points indicated by the bureau of statistics for the sixteen months ending March, 1943, must be incorrect.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was quite conscious of the fact that the periods were not the same. I had not the figures for the latter period and this was the best I could do. If it is true that there has been a rise of only 2·3 points in sixteen months, then I know that a rise of 7·71 points in ten weeks would have made the minister very much concerned and he would have done something about it. That much difference in the rate of rise would have been quite serious.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not in position to express any views as to the validity of the Winnipeg survey. I do not know anything about it, nor do I know what foods they considered.

Mr. KNOWLES: I can quote further from the article. It reads:

> Foods tested were: bread, eggs (or one pound of liver), cheese, potatoes, root vegetables, cabbage, three tins of tomatoes, dried vegetables, dried or fresh fruit, rolled oats or cracked wheat, rice, tapioca (or barley), macaroni, flour, sugar, molasses, jam (or honey), salt pork or peanut butter, tea or coffee or cocoa, soap, salt, pepper, meat, shortening, butter or fish, milk.
> When the tests were made June 1, the following increases were noted as against prices of March 23: cabbage, increased from 15 to 44 cents; eggs, 34 to 38 cents; potatoes, 50 to 57 cents; root vegetables, 41 to 56 cents; dried or fresh fruit, 34 to 42 cents.

I would remind the minister that this survey was conducted by the public welfare committee which was considering whether they should increase the amount of the grant made to families on relief. In other words, they were thinking of that standard of living.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman know anything about the weighting given to the various foods?

Mr. KNOWLES: An attempt was made to find out the increase in the actual cost of living for a family of five on public welfare. As the minister knows, a committee of this kind would have had experience over a great many years with keeping down to a minimum the quantities of food necessary to keep a family alive.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I say, I am not in position to argue one way or another about the validity of the survey or whether the correct weighting was given or the correct methods applied. That may or may not have been done.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand the same quantities were taken both times.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes; otherwise the comparison would be entirely useless. The position of the wartime prices and trade board with regard to the cost-of-living index is that it is an index compiled by another department of government, the bureau of statistics. It is said to be an excellent test of the real cost of living, but I suppose no index is perfect. I suppose opinions would differ as to the accuracy with which any index really indicates the cost of living, but compared with the indices in any country I know of I would express the opinion that the Canadian index is at least as good as any of them. It is true it may be said that in certain periods the index does not measure the true increase in the cost of living, such as in a very recent period when the cost of fruits and vegetables has gone up rapidly. The hon. member mentioned, for instance, an increase in cabbages from fifteen to forty-four cents. These would be imported fruits and vegetables, and there is no doubt there has been a great increase in prices in the United States. But these are not in the cost-of-living index. There are certain reasons why seasonal articles such as fruits and vegetables are deemed improper for inclusion in a cost-of-living index. There are certain vegetables in the cost-of-living index, but the great bulk of them are not there, and that causes some persons to complain of the cost-of-living index. The only fresh fruits and vegetables in the index are oranges, potatoes and onions. I understand that consideration is being given to ways and means of overcoming the technical difficulties of incorporating other items in the index. The chief technical difficulties are wide seasonal variations in prices, many fresh fruits and vegetables being on the market for only a few months of the year, wide variations in quality, and lack of standard units of sale. I am not in a position here to express any technical opinion as to the cost-of-living index except to say that it is generally regarded as a good index; the weighting is good and there is a wide but not too wide variety of articles included. Of course one of the most important items in the cost-of-living index is not food at all; it is rent. That bulks very large in the cost of living.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the reason I took the table on page 70 of the report rather than the minister's figure which appears on Hansard, and made a comparison between the report in the Free Press and the actual increase for foods as set out in the report.

Mr. ILSLEY: One of my officials points out that twenty-nine cents out of the sixty cents increase was for cabbages alone. There might be some answer to what I have said about cabbages; I do not know. It is a very difficult matter, one for statisticians to work out. There were tremendous increases in certain fruits and vegetables in that very period. That may be the reason for that apparently large increase, but certainly I would not regard that as prima facie evidence that the cost-of-living index is not a true index.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the minister deals with the other phase, may I say that the functions of the dominion bureau of statistics, including the cost-of-living index, date back, I take it, a good many years. It seems to me that with the emergence of the war and, in particular, this new function, namely, the control of prices by a board such as the wartime prices and trade board, it is certainly a debatable point whether the old basis of working out the cost-of-living index should be used. It was with that in mind that earlier this year I asked a question on the order paper which appears at page 2929 of Hansard. My question was:

> Has the dominion bureau of statistics, since the outbreak of the present war, made any revisions in the method of determining the cost of living index?

The reply is quite lengthy, but I give this sentence from it:

> No change in method has occurred since August, 1940, although two revisions in the index budget have been made.

My point is that what is required is not just revisions in the index budget, but an examination of the whole method in the light of this new economic phenomenon, namely, the attempt of the wartime prices and trade board to control prices. I appreciate the validity of the minister's argument. He speaks of the independence of the bureau of statistics from the wartime prices and trade board, and in one sense that is good, but it is also true that the wartime prices and trade board has an interest in the cost of living index because it indicates whether the work of the board is effective. My feeling is that these figures do not give the wartime prices and trade board a clear picture of its work. While its work is good; while it has achieved wonderful results in keeping the cost of living down, in my opinion it is not true to say that it has kept it down to an increase of only 2·3 per cent, with respect to food, in the period of the board's operation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has made certain suggestions in the interests of children and infants. That gives me an opportunity of pointing out something that has been done along those lines. We have subsidized all consumers in the purchase of milk. We have reduced the price of milk two cents a quart to all buyers in Canada. That certainly would be along the lines suggested by the hon. gentleman. He also mentioned oranges and orange juice. Similarly we selected oranges for subsidy. That is also along the lines suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KNOWLES: To what extent was that done? Perhaps the minister would prefer to give the information when we come to the item.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; I will get the figures. The board has also energetically sponsored the production of cod-liver oil in this country. It has taken great pains to assure an adequate supply of cod-liver oil.

With regard to tinned baby foods, I do not know just what they would be, but there are tinned baby foods, and the use of tin for these foods has been authorized to 100 per cent of its use in 1941. Of course the amount in glass containers, and so on, that can be manufactured is unlimited.

Mr. KNOWLES: There would appear to be no shortage of tin in this connection; if the minister goes into any store in town he will find that there are certain infant foods of which there is an unlimited supply in tins. Spinach is one of them—Popeye must have had some influence there. But you simply cannot buy any children's tinned fruits in Ottawa anywhere, and it is practically the same in any other city. You cannot buy tinned peaches, tinned pears, tinned apricots—any fruit in tins.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is certainly not correct to say that there is an unlimited supply of tin.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thought the minister said that.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I said that baby foods in tins could be manufactured to the extent of 100 per cent of the 1941 pack. The hon. gentleman was saying that the board should have some regard for the welfare of children, and I gave as an instance tinned baby foods. A very fine case can be made for what the board has done in that regard. I do not take any credit for it myself—

Mr. KNOWLES: But it is only—

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a moment. The hon. gentleman does not give me a chance to get going at all. I was not quite clear as to what his suggestions were as to rationing, but I gathered that he thought certain articles not now rationed should be rationed. All I can say about that is that rationing presents such tremendous difficulties that if it can be avoided in almost anything it ought to be.

Mr. KNOWLES: Might I say a word further. I appreciate what the board has done in the matter of tin, but I tried to point out that there is only a limited variety of goods available in tins. They happen to be all in the vegetable line. There are no fruits in tins. I imagine sugar has something to do with that. My point is that the boards should see to it that those things which are necessary—they can get the advice of nutrition experts—should, if possible, be produced and rationed among those with children of certain ages.

In connection with rationing I would suggest that it be done with prunes, with canned milk and with corn syrup. I happen to know that in some cities attempts have been made at voluntary rationing of syrup at the stores, at the suggestion of the local doctors. There are difficulties involved, but to me the importance is such that the difficulties are not insurmountable.

Mr. REID: The matters which I have to bring before the minister to-night have to do with the recent beef orders and pork orders, and are raised on behalf of the British Columbia independent meat packers, who charge discrimination, and that the advice given to the wartime prices and trade board by and on behalf of eastern packers is to the disadvantage of the British Columbia independent meat packers, and so discriminates, generally speaking, against British Columbia.

The British Columbia independent meat packers have five members, whose offices and stores for business are in Vancouver. They made personal representation to me during the time I was at home at Easter. The names of the five are: The Pacific Meat Company Limited, Fletchers Limited, the Associated Packers Limited, H. Brown and Sons Limited, and the Alberta Meat Company.

The original beef order, they claim, divided Canada into fifteen different zones for marketing purposes and put a beef ceiling in each one of these zones. The beef order, however, did not take into full account the cost of shipping cattle from the prairie provinces to British Columbia.

Ontario and Quebec, generally speaking, do not bring any live cattle from the prairies for slaughtering on account of the long haul and the cost. These are bought by the packing companies, slaughtered in the provinces and then shipped east as beef.

On February 6 a regulation was put into effect assisting beef shipments to eastern markets, completely ignoring the fact that British Columbia could not import live cattle at the price differential set by the beef order.

There is only one cent a pound differential between Alberta and Vancouver price ceilings, which is not sufficient to cover the freight charges, handling charges and shrinkage. This one cent differential allows Alberta packers to pay more for their live stock than British Columbia packers can and so keep within the price ceilings.

Eastern concerns were allowed $1.35 per 100 pounds as a subsidy on dressed beef. This makes it possible for them to draw cattle from the Alberta market, kill these cattle at their Alberta plants in Alberta, and ship their beef east with the assistance of the government subsidy. The effect of this was to raise the cost of cattle in Alberta and Saskatchewan by retaining a strong demand on the Alberta market, but it has caused the independent meat packers of British Columbia to import and kill cattle at a loss or go out of business entirely.

British Columbia meat packers should be allowed $1.30 per hundredweight to equalize the cost and the selling price.

Every price order on hides or tallow or any other by-product is based on the supposition that the market for all these products is in eastern Canada. The ceiling price on these, generally speaking, are Toronto prices less the freight to western producers.

Under the order setting the prices for hides, tallow or by-products, hides are sold under two designations, namely, large and small packer hides. Large packer hides are priced at 25 cents per hundredweight more than small packer hides. Eastern officials and their advisers have classified the Canada Packers plant in Vancouver, who by the way have their head offices in the east, as a large packer, and the independent meat packers such as the Pacific Meat company are classified as small packers.

It should be noted in regard to this that the Canada Packers plant in Vancouver are killing about 1,000 head of cattle per month, for which they receive 25 cents per hundredweight more for the hides than the independent Pacific Meat company with no eastern head office but who kill approximately 1,500 head of cattle a month. Yet this independent meat company, classified as a small packer, are killing more than the company designated as a large packer, and to the advantage of the large company.

With regard to tallow, the price of tallow throughout the United States was set at a nation-wide price, the same at any point of production. Canadian price ceilings were established with a 75-cent per hundredweight price differential between eastern and western points. All tallow is not processed in the east. Why should there be any difference in price?

With regard to pork and bacon products, here is the history. The history of the orders of the wartime prices and trade board and the bacon board as they affected British Columbia meat packers started in 1941. The packers at that date were allowed to kill for their domestic trade only the number of hogs slaughtered in 1940. The order was changed in July, 1941, when they were allowed to kill only 75 per cent of what they did in 1940. Then in November, 1942, this amount was again reduced to about 50 per cent of the number killed in 1940. There was a reason for this, because the number of hogs taken away from domestic slaughterings were added to the exports to the United Kingdom. No complaints were made regarding this, for it was realized that exports to Britain were very necessary, although it should be noted that the hogs taken away from the domestic market were handled by an eastern plant with a guaranteed profit. On two occasions the government has raised the price of export bacon, and this has brought about corresponding increases in the live hog market since 1941.

It has been urged that there should have been also a corresponding rise in domestic pork prices, but this is a matter which I am not arguing at the present time. I think, however, it should be stated that Mr. Peterson, director of live stock and poultry products, wrote to the independent meat packers in October last and told them that ceiling prices of domestic pork products are not out of line with current hog prices, admitting there may be exceptions in certain sections of Canada, including the Vancouver area, but that it was their intention to make some certain necessary adjustments. Although the price to the producer has advanced over $2 per hundredweight, the adjustments promised by Mr. Peterson have not yet been put into effect.

There are on the average 110,000 hogs marketed in Canada per week; of these, about 90,000 are handled by a handful of exporting firms who actually operate on these on a guaranteed government profit. This leaves about 20,000 hogs per week for slaughtering, and these 20,000 are divided among all the packers and pork processors throughout Canada, including the three exporting firms, who handle the 90,000.

On April 1 of this year order No. 247 regarding pork products was issued, and it is claimed by the independent meat packers that this latest order is another attempt to put the Canadian packer industry into the hands of large eastern concerns. The features of this order, it is claimed, are discriminatory.

First of all, as regards the price set, the very basis for the pork order set-up is on pork carcases. Montreal and Toronto are allowed $1.50 spread between the cost price and the sales price, but the price differential allowed in Vancouver is only forty cents. Pork product number one of the pork order No. 247 carcase, with the head on, has a selling price in either Montreal or Toronto of nineteen cents or $19 per hundredweight, with a cost of seventeen cents delivered plus a shrinkage of fifty cents from the hot to cold weight, making a total cost of $17.50 per hundredweight. That allows a spread of $1.50 per hundredweight. Vancouver has a selling price of eighteen cents or $18 per hundredweight, which is $1 per hundredweight less than the eastern price, and since the total latest cost in Vancouver is $17.60, it leaves a differential of only 40 cents per hundredweight compared with the $1.50 allowed the eastern packers. It is obvious by this that western conditions or interests were not kept in mind when the regulations were made.

Another matter. The price set-up of the pork cuts when the hog is broken down between east and west bears the same ratio to one another as do the carcases. Whilst it is relatively unimportant, it should be noted nevertheless that the cuts of pork must now be all put out according to the eastern style, a style which is quite different from what we have in British Columbia and from what we in British Columbia are and have been accustomed to, and bears out, I believe, the contention that British Columbia and the west were not at all consulted when these regulations were drawn up.

The claim is made by the independent meat packers that eastern concerns are being subsidized, that eastern concerns have the privileges on all by-products, and that eastern concerns have been allotted practically all hog slaughterings, leaving British Columbia with only 1,800 out of approximately 110,000 hogs which are slaughtered per week. Further than that they have been granted $1.50 per hundredweight spread in Toronto and Montreal to British Columbia; forty cents per hundredweight spread with an added disadvantage in British Columbia of being only allowed a meagre supply of hogs.

One further matter complained of is that in the prices set by the board for blood meal, British Columbia has been left out. In the light of the statements and accusations made by the British Columbia Meat Packers, I am of the opinion that the matter is so serious that a complete investigation should be made. I realize, in bringing the matter to the minister's attention now, that he is perhaps not in a position at the moment to give me a definite answer to all the charges made by the independent meat packers of British Columbia, but I trust he has taken serious note of the charges made, because they claim they will go out of business and that then the three large companies, Swift's, Burns and Canada Packers will be in entire control.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can only say that the interests of the packers of British Columbia have been brought to the attention of the board by way of a brief or briefs containing the representations which the hon. gentleman has just made, and so far as neglect of their interests is concerned, perhaps I might point out that the meats administrator is not an eastern man. He is Mr. Grisdale, from Alberta; he is not from British Columbia, it is true, but he is not an eastern man. Moreover, since about Easter, Mr. Diamond, the manager of the Pacific Meat company, has been a member of the advisory meat committee and is consulted frequently about the problems that arise. These problems, as hon. members will have noted, are highly technical, and they are being worked out. I will take note of the hon. member's representations.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish for five or six minutes to discuss some of the principles in general of the administration of this particular department under the minister. It is unfortunate that this great question of control and of subsidies should come up ten or twelve days before the close of the session. Yes; I hope to see the session close by the end of next week. It would save a good deal of money to the country, because this parliament can do nothing. Our powers, privileges and functions have been taken away from us by various controls, sub-controls and bureaucrats, so much so that we might as well go home and leave the control of this particular work to the house of Gordon. It used to be that the parliament of Canada consisted of the House of Commons and the Senate; but that is no longer so, because, as I say, all our privileges and functions have been wrested from us by a third house aforesaid, and we have little control over anything. We have practically no say in regard to any of the control policies of the government of the day. The cost of ceilings and subsidies and of administering this control system is $65,000,000, which is twice as much as the Tupper government spent in 1896, when they left office, to administer the affairs of the whole dominion at that time. I sympathize with the present Minister of Finance, because he has been bearing the brunt of a great deal of the burden of government. On general principles, I believe the public of Canada will commend the policy of trying to check inflation; but in trying to check inflation a great deal has been done that will have the opposite effect. There have been some excellent things, but the various boards have not adopted any cure, nor have they got rid of the disease; far from it, they are themselves causing inflation by unlimited, amateur price fixing, which is linked with wages.

We never knew how our mode of living was related to the far east until we lost command of the sea in the Pacific. Our entire way of life depended upon foreign products from the far east, such as rubber, gasoline, tea, sugar, coffee and many other imports, and we have had to change our manner of living in consequence of the changes that have been brought about by this war. No doubt the government was prompted to institute these various controls by what happened in the last war when prices went sky-high. But as Mr. Churchill said in the House of Commons on August 8, 1939, the people of Great Britain were obliged to look forward to a vast change in parliamentary government, in their method of government. It might seem a paradox, he said, that a war undertaken in the name of liberty should require as a necessary part of its process the surrender for the time being of so many of their dearly-loved liberties and rights. In the last few days, he said—he spoke, as I have said, in August, 1939—the British House of Commons had been voting dozens of bills handing over to the executive the most dearly-loved traditional liberties of the British people, but he trusted that those liberties would not be abused, that they would not be used for any class or party interest, but that the people would continue to cherish them; and he looked forward to the day, surely and confidently, when all those liberties and rights would be restored to them.

So far as we are concerned, I do not think it was ever intended that the control system, started with a skeleton staff largely made up of civil service staff, should go on expanding day by day until it reached the huge proportions we now see, going up in wage bills from $10,514,000 to $14,300,000 all in one year, just for administration purposes alone. This is a staggering thought for the taxpayer. The minister must provide the necessary money by debt charges or by taking it out of the taxpayer by revenues and income. If this had as its object the winning of the war no one would object; but it can safely be said, so far as seventy per cent of it is concerned, that it is not for the purpose of winning the war. It simply adds to the burden on the taxpayers of Canada, who have to pay income tax, sales tax and other war levies as well. In the last few days of the last session of parliament I asked what was the cost of this department of the minister, but I did not get a return until late in September. It is not his fault; he is overworked, I admit, and I am not criticizing either him or anyone else. The fact is, however, that we could not tell from day to day, from month to month, the number of people on the payroll of this enormous control system that we had. And if you got certain information to-day it would be changed next week. Now we have $14,000,000 for administration alone. The people are becoming bewildered at the cost of this institution. I asked last year what these ceilings involved, and the officials said, before the Easter recess, that they did not know. Then Mr. Gordon went to Winnipeg, and we were given to understand that the amount was $2,000,000. That information was given during the recess we had over the referendum. The government later, after the Easter recess, said the same thing; then the amount went up in the last fiscal year; and the cost of the Canadian subsidy programme from December 1, 1941, to March 31, 1943, has reached the enormous figure of $65,000,000. That, I repeat, is a staggering thought. If it were necessary to win the war it would be quite justifiable; but, as I say, a great deal of this is not necessary for that purpose.

If the policy of the government is to control all the activities of the people, to administer their affairs for them in every walk of life, from the cradle to the grave in this way, to control every man's business, whether retail or wholesale, indeed, to abolish all private business, private enterprise, thrift, and private ways of conducting business, then I say the people of Canada should know it. Many of the small storekeepers in our cities and towns have been driven out of business by this control system, and we in parliament have lost our control over the administration. We have simply handed over all our powers to an outside body to pass rules and regulations and by-laws and to send people to gaol and inflict upon them fines as high as $5,000. What a system! They would not have anything of this sort at Washington; they threw it out of the front door. Congress and the senate a week ago simply refused to have anything to do with it. The people over there are sick and tired of it all. They are willing to put up with a reasonable degree of restriction to stop inflation, but the control that we have has destroyed all competitive business, both retail and wholesale, until private enterprise has been crippled, and no one any longer can conduct his own business.

What did they do in the mother country? They passed the Pre-War Trade Practices Act in 1942, which had the effect of putting the business man, large or small, back on the basis on which he operated before the war. I submit that the time has come in Canada for us to call a halt to the present tendency and to consider seriously where we are going. We are simply leading to more inflation by the policy we are pursuing. In addition to the personnel of the wartime prices and trade board and all their deputies in Ottawa, there are hordes of workers attached to the board outside, all over Canada a small standing army of busybody officials. Every day we read in the newspapers pages of advertisements announcing additions to this vast dictator system. There is an army of them, several regiments of them from one end of Canada to the other, every one of them making different, divergent announcements at the same time, until the people are bewildered. A morning newspaper in Ottawa has been criticizing them with reference to one commodity. The country is ready to stand some of this sort of thing, but to-day we have nothing but a modern tower of Babel in Canada, with these controls that do not control. Every city and town in the country are subject to the dictates of these controllers, sub-controllers and deputy sub-controllers, constituting one large army of officials. Not only that, but in the administration of the civil service departments we find some of the most able men in the country, who get only a certain amount of salary. Others, in these controls in this department are paid almost any amount, over the head of parliament, without our having anything to do about it. All the comptroller of the treasury does is to find out whether it is an amount paid as a war appropriation, under the war appropriation measure, and then just put his stamp on it. That is what he does, on sums up to $14,000,000. It is a fine system! The auditor general admitted to me in a letter last July, a copy of which I sent to the minister, that he has no control over expenditures made under the war appropriation bill. He has no control at all over that bill. That is under the control of the comptroller of the treasury.

Anyone must know what will happen later, because I can say this that it will put a lot of men out of work, and that both before the war is over and after the war it will lead to wide unemployment if we do not check some of these unnecessary controls. What control have we over all these contracts which have been made by the board here? We have no control at all. We do not know whether the people are getting value for their money.

At this point I should like to read only a few paragraphs from the review by the National City Bank of New York. This is the June issue, for 1943, which deals with the economic results of Canada's whole ceiling and control system. In this issue it makes reference to a speech by the chairman of the board, Mr. Donald Gordon, delivered at Chicago. At that time Mr. Gordon spoke about subsidies, and the way in which they operated in Canada. I should like the committee to have the benefit of hearing what is set out in this review and, since it is not lengthy, I shall put it on record as follows:

Canadian subsidies are tied directly with regulation of profit margins on the particular product. They are designed to cover only a part of the increase in costs, and are conditioned upon adoption of various economies in production, importation and distribution. A good illustration of combination of subsidies with reduction of operating costs is provided in the case of leather footwear. This is described in an official report of the wartime prices and trade board, dated May 1, 1943, as follows:

"Soon after the maximum prices regulations were introduced it became apparent that the shoe manufacturers could not, until economies were introduced, carry on under the retail price ceiling. An investigation was carried out by the accounting administration and this indicated that approximately 15 per cent of the manufacturers' selling prices would have to be absorbed to enable the industry to carry on without serious difficulty, provided the cost of leather was maintained at prices prevailing during the basic period. It was arranged that 4 per cent would be passed on to the wholesale-retail group, that manufacturers would absorb 4 per cent, and that the commodity prices stabilization corporation would take care of the remainder by paying a temporary subsidy of 7 per cent. A simplification programme was initiated by the board and on July 1, 1942, the rate of subsidy was reduced to 4 per cent. The subsidy is not payable on footwear sold at higher prices than ceiling prices (e.g., sales to the Department of Munitions and Supply, and export), or on felt boots or rubber footwear."

The rate of Canadian subsidies is limited by various formulae and special arrangements. They are paid to low-cost producers at the same rate as to high-cost producers, but are considered income for tax purposes, and thus are recaptured in part when they result in excess profits.

In describing experience with the subsidies, the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, Mr. Donald Gordon, had this to say in a speech in Chicago in February:

[Mr. Church.]

"We have found, in practice, that it has not been necessary to pay out anything like the sums which some pessimists predicted when it was announced that subsidies would be payable under stipulated conditions. Moreover, we have found that our declared willingness to provide such subsidies has enabled us to enter into negotiations or discussions and to reach agreements between parties providing for a fair sharing of increased costs without actually paying a subsidy at all. We are satisfied that in many cases we could not have even arranged for necessary conversations if a willingness to subsidize in case of proven need had not been expressed in advance."

The direct cost of the Canadian subsidy programme from December 1, 1941, to March 31, 1943, was about $65 millions, of which $34 millions was paid on imported commodities and $31 millions to domestic producers. The cost during the present fiscal year may reach $90 to $100 millions. On a per capita basis, the equivalent cost in this country would be on the order of $1 billion.

Opinions as to the applicability of British and Canadian subsidy systems in the United States must take into consideration differences in conditions in the three countries. The British situation differs from ours in that a far greater percentage of commodities affecting British costs of living are imported and enter the country through relatively few ports, facilitating control by the Ministry of Food. In the United States the bulk of production is domestic; it is shared, even on the processing level, by many thousands of producers. Also problems of subsidies and price fixing in this country are more complex than in Canada, due to greater population and area and greater variety of production and trade.

That is their review. The people of this country are not satisfied when they see some of those who are engaged in this matter of control. For instance, let us consider the clothing industry. Was anyone brought to the control of that industry who knew anything about clothing, or simplified practices in it? Not that I know of. Why, they take a cut off here, a cuff off there, a sleeve off here. And what do men say who have been in the business all their lives? They say that if those controllers had stayed in the business to which they belonged, it would have been far better for the retail and wholesale clothing business. Some hon. members know, because I see some of them are wearing controlled clothing this evening. And that simplified process has been applied to all clothing, even to collars, shirts and ties.

I know something about control of this business. One or two of the controllers I know were not working in the clothing industry at all. All they knew about it was what they had themselves to buy from the retail store. Yet they are put over a great industry. That is a bad policy. In the city of Toronto, if one goes along Danforth avenue, Bloor street, St. Clair avenue or Yonge street and asks any business man what he thinks about some of these laborious controls, he will say they are putting him out of business.

That is what we are heading for. I have seen something of the results of some of this inflation. Disaster will meet us in part in the end. Just wait until we see it next year. We are told that there will be $90,000,000 for the next fiscal year. Last year it was only $2,000,000. This year it went up to $60,000,000. Now we find in this review of the National City bank that it is to be $90,000,000 to $100,000,000.

Let us consider the coal industry, for instance. Some of these controllers put on seventy-five cents a ton for delivery charges, without the authority of parliament. That was one ceiling where something could have been done to help the poor retail man who has to deliver the coal. He could have been given that seventy-five cents out of a necessary ceiling, and it would have given him something on which he could exist and help get his retail coal delivered.

In the United States they had an example of control before the war started, under what was known as the new deal. Not long ago I listened to a senator from Ohio, a former mayor of the city of Cleveland, who addressed a meeting in room 16 in this building. He was a republican, anti-new deal and isolationist. What did they do with the ceiling, price-fixing policy in the United States senate? I read the record of their debates and of congress debates every day, and I find that down there they have abandoned the new deal and this control subsidy system.

I am not asking for the complete abolition of control, but I am asking for some moderate reduction. I believe that in a country of only 10,000,000 or 11,000,000 people, some of this control may have merit. Credit should be given to the minister for much of what he has done to check inflation. But I plead with him now to let us reduce our tax rate, and surely this is one way in which it can be reduced. Let the retail man run his own business, and the wholesale man who knows his business run his own business for the remainder of the war with less state control, much of it unnecessary and not a war aid.

We have been at war four years. If during the next year, or during the remainder of this year and the year following we can relieve trade and business of some of these awful burdens and artificial barriers they have been carrying, it will be a blessing for the taxpayer and small business man. When we help the retail or wholesale man we are helping the taxpayer. It is all right to talk about this subject in an academic way. For instance, references have been made to beef and butter this afternoon and evening. Instead of having somebody who knew something about beef and butter, either a farmer or a drover or a butcher, draw up some regulations with respect to these products, we find a teacher. Well, teachers are all right. We will remember that the Carpenter of Nazareth was a teacher. The average teacher is all right in his profession. But surely he should not start to run the grain business, or set himself up as an expert in the grain or any other business. Surely he is not an authority on retail gents' furnishings or ladies' underwear, nor would he be an authority on some of those other many things mentioned by the hon. member for Témiscouata with regard to some of the controls. Those matters are out of the teacher's sphere.

Let us have a more reasonable and a common-sense system of reasonable, necessary controls. People are getting sick and tired of many of these unnecessary controls. They are sick and tired of some of the bullying practices adopted by the board. We know that some people have been taken into police court, people who never were in courts in their lives before, and those people have had to pay fines, maybe up to $5,000 for some simple, unintentional infraction.

In conclusion, I plead with the minister that he should look into some of these matters, and try to cut down some of the controls by 30 or 40 per cent in the next fiscal year where they are found unnecessary, and so aid business.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are just a few matters respecting which I should like to have some information from the minister. I believe in 1943 the retention of the price-ceiling policy and the prevention of further inflation will receive its greatest test. According to the information given recently, in 1943 the income of individuals as such will be some $400,000,000 more than it was in 1942, and there will be from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 less civilian goods available during the year. All this points to one conclusion. Unless there is the strictest enforcement, aided by the cooperation of the Canadian people as a whole, inflation will progress by leaps and bounds during the present year. So far as the opposition is concerned, its attitude has been one of assistance to the government in preventing inflation. I have pointed out that in order to secure the Canadian people against the danger of inflation there must be cooperation on the part of the people as well as strict enforcement of the law against wrongdoers.

The committee should have from the minister at this time a detailed statement of the number of investigations that have taken place during the past year into infractions of the regulations of the wartime prices board, as well as the number of prosecutions, province by province, that have taken place, the number of convictions registered, the fines that are being imposed and a general statement showing what is being done against these wrongdoers. Their number is increasing because there is not the enforcement of these regulations that there should be. Loyal and patriotic people accept the rigours of the regulations that are in effect; small business men are finding themselves in a position where they are unable to carry on, and, as times goes on, these conditions will be accelerated. They can be prevented only by strict enforcement.

The people as a whole feel that during the past few months there has not been the strict enforcement of the law that there should have been. As time goes on, there will be a greater incentive to commit offences against wartime prices regulations, and this will increase in proportion to the failure strictly to enforce the regulations in the courts. I should like the minister to furnish the committee with a full statement regarding enforcement to date, so that we may appreciate just what is being done to guard against the grave danger that now faces Canada through an increasing purchasing power and decreasing amounts of civilian goods. The people as a whole are cooperating; the wrongdoers are few in number, but they are increasing, and they will increase unless enforcement is made rigorous and drastic, unless penalties are increased.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether I shall be able to cover all the ground mapped out for me by the hon. gentleman. He has asked for the number of investigations that have been instituted, but I am informed that it would be impossible to give that because there are so many. Investigations of complaints are taking place all the time. Some kind of record is kept, but it would not mean a great deal. A woman may complain that she has been overcharged, and the investigation into the complaint may take only half an hour. To make a list or to give the number of such complaints would not mean very much.

With regard to prosecutions, there have been 3,335 between December 1, 1941, and May 31, 1943. The ratio of convictions was ninety-four per cent. This number includes a certain number of prosecutions in connection with gasoline, tires and other matters, for the Department of Munitions and Supply. There were 467 gasoline prosecutions, 263 tire prosecutions and 63 others. I agree with the hon. gentleman that there must be enforcement of these regulations. If there had not been such a high degree of efficiency in the enforcement administration, perhaps our price control would have broken down. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) suggested the other night that most people in the country want to obey the regulations, but there is a minority who do not. If that minority is allowed to infringe the regulations with impunity, they become larger and larger all the time until eventually the whole structure crumbles. Some time ago I tabled the report of the wartime prices and trade board for the period September 3, 1939, to March 31, 1943. A great deal of pain was taken with preparing this report, and on pages 66 and 67 will be found a number of paragraphs on enforcement. It would take too much time to put these on Hansard, but the principles upon which the enforcement administration proceeds are set out in the report much more lucidly than I could set them out.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister think the prosecution of 3,300 people in sixteen months represents a serious endeavour to enforce the war-time regulations passed by this board?

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not seem to me to be an insignificant number of prosecutions. The prosecutions have been increasing month by month, and perhaps I could give some figures as follows:

October	317
November	303
December	217
January	332
February	239
March	311
April	445

It never occurred to me that 433 prosecutions in a month was a small number. You cannot be prosecuting everybody all the time, and we are prosecuting quite a number.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wonder how the Minister of Finance knows where he is at. Two speakers in the ranks of the official opposition have spoken within the last half hour or so. One of them upbraided the minister because of the extent of the regulations of the wartime prices and trade board and the way in which people were being interfered with, and then the other one rises in his place and upbraids the minister because more people are not prosecuted and because the law is not enforced more rigidly. I agree with the point of view expressed by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), that there must be a close check-up and control of prices. That is because of the increase in the amount of money in the hands of the buying public and the decrease in the consumers goods that are available.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that we are proceeding here without very much system. I had hoped to follow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and refer to some of the points raised by him, but now other matters have been brought in and I do not know just how we are to proceed.

The minister in his reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that he did not know how much validity there was in the figures he quoted in regard to the increase in the cost of living. I do not know whether the minister knows it, but I am satisfied that there are two or three million housewives in Canada who are doubtful about the validity of the figures that enter into the cost of living index. The minister would have to be more persuasive than he is in this house, though I am not finding fault with him on that score, to convince these women that the actual cost of living is truly represented by the cost of living index.

The minister also questioned whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave the proper weight to the various items in the cost of living index. It is difficult to give these items their proper weight. The weight given to them in the cost of living index is an average weight, but it is well known that the lower the income, the greater the proportion of it that must go for the purchase of food, and the increase in the cost of living has been more in foodstuffs than in perhaps any other one item.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would not the larger proportion of the smaller income go for rent?

Mr. MacINNIS: No; I do not think so, because if the income is very small, housing conditions are the first to suffer, if the family can find a cheaper place to move to. The important thing for the poor family is to ensure themselves enough food to at least keep away the pangs of hunger.

Then there is the point that fresh vegetables do not appear in the cost of living index. That is, I think, owing to the fact that the items that go into the cost of living index have not been changed for a number of years, not since 1913, I believe. There might have been revisions—

Mr. ILSLEY: It was all overhauled in 1940.

Mr. MacINNIS: The overhauling was not so very extensive.

The minister also said that fresh vegetables were on the market for only a few weeks of the year. I know the minister is busy and has not the time to look into shop windows or go into stores to do any buying, but it is a fact that fresh vegetables to-day are a part of the family diet of everyone who can afford to buy them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said that imported fresh vegetables are on the market only at certain seasons of the year.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite true, but some imported fresh vegetables are on the market for the larger part of the year. Head lettuce, for instance, from California is on the market in Vancouver for at least nine or ten months of the year, and so are quite a number of other vegetables. The Minister of Pensions and National Health takes considerable time to advertise correct diet charts and that sort of thing; but what is the use of wasting time and money in preparing correct diet charts telling people what to eat to have good health, and then to have a cost of living index which does not include these articles for healthy living, and to have wage rates which do not allow people to buy the things essential to keep them in good health. These are some of the matters to which the wartime prices and trade board, the Department of Labour and the Department of Trade and Commerce, under which the bureau of statistics functions, should give consideration.

I do not care what the cost of living index says, because I know this: every woman who does the buying for her family knows that the cost of living is increasing continually, far more than is indicated by the cost of living index. I do not know how that increase can be stopped. I think it could have been stopped at the beginning if there had been posted up in each store a list of the prices of the main articles purchased. The housewife could then compare the price she was paying with the price on the list. Otherwise there is no proper check on prices, because no one can keep these prices in their heads all the time and know whether they paid less last week than they paid this week. They do know, however, that their pay cheques do not go as far this month as they did, say, two months ago. I bring these matters to the attention of the minister and point out to him and the government—because I do not know to what extent it comes under the minister's own department—that the cost of living as it bears on the low wage workers of this country is coming to the stage where there will be an explosion if something is not done about it.

Mr. REID: There is another matter I wish to bring to the minister's attention. I have already brought it to the attention of his parliamentary assistant, but as with many other matters brought to the attention of the minister and his assistant, it goes to the department; the department gives an answer which the minister or his assistant brings back, and that is that. But we want something more sometimes than a stereotyped answer.

A standard price of 15½ cents a pound has been set for honey all over Canada. It seems strange that some articles have a blanket price applicable from the Atlantic to the Pacific, while other articles, beef for instance, have price zones, and other articles, eggs, butter and pork, have different prices. But when it comes to honey there is one price, 15½ cents a pound all over Canada. The honey producers of British Columbia had been receiving up until the war at least twenty cents a pound for all the honey produced in that province. I am not trying to get into an argument over why people prefer local honey to the imported article, but such is the case. It is the same with turkeys brought into British Columbia from Alberta and the prairie provinces. They are sold on the market at a lower price than turkeys and chickens raised in British Columbia because people prefer the local grown. We in British Columbia think we have a fine honey. The price which has been set, 15½ cents a pound, is 4½ cents a pound below what the honey producers of British Columbia have been receiving for the last twenty years. I can say that of my own knowledge, because at one time I was in the honey business myself and kept upwards of 100 hives, so that I know what I am talking about. We sold our local honey around twenty cents a pound. I appeal to the minister; I say that we cannot produce honey there at 15½ cents a pound. No one was kicking at the price of twenty cents. But the price was made 15½ cents, and then to aggravate the situation we find that an inferior grade of honey is coming in from Mexico and is allowed to be sold at from thirty to thirty-five cents a pound. Naturally the local bee-keeper wonders why his local good product is held down to the ceiling price of 15½ cents a pound, when in other years he got at least twenty cents for it, and honey from Mexico of an inferior grade is allowed to come in in large quantities—I understand it is coming in by the barrel—and is being sold at from thirty to thirty-five cents a pound.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the reason?

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. REID: I am trying to get the reason and I cannot find it. That is why I am raising the question in the house to-night, because when I brought the matter to the attention of the minister's parliamentary assistant I got a kind of answer, but my question was not answered fully. That aspect of it was not touched on. Now they are talking about changing a little the price of the pasteurized honey as against the unpasteurized. But I ask the minister why, when there was no injustice being done to the people of British Columbia, and no one was kicking, they should reduce the price to conform with the price of honey in eastern Canada. In Ontario the price was not, I believe, above 15½ cents, because in years past quantities of honey came from Ontario at a much lower figure than that, as contrasted with the price of the local product. But when people want a local product and will pay for it, and it cannot be produced out there to sell at 15½ cents, I ask the minister to have the matter looked into further in the light of the representations I am making.

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly will. I find it quite startling to be informed that the ceiling price is so much below the pre-war price. I do not know what the explanation is.

Mr. REID: I should like to have it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will look that up.

Mr. REID: Just one other question. Could the minister explain why canned salmon is one of the articles which is reckoned in the cost of living index. I am glad that it is, but I wonder why it has been chosen as one of the articles in this index, because it is not generally used. I believe that, generally speaking, there is more fresh fish used in Canada than there has been used of canned salmon.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There will not be two tins per family released this year—only 2,000,000 in all.

Mr. REID: I wish the minister would explain why canned salmon is included, because last year very little was sold in Canada; most of it went to Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only thing I can do is to make inquiry of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have to repeat that the cost of living index is a product of the bureau of statistics; it is not a wartime prices and trade board index. It may be that an article not very widely used is an index of the cost of articles which are more generally used. That occurs to me as possible, but I do not know whether that is the answer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wish to continue and to ask a few questions in regard to the matter of enforcement, which I think is of very great importance. The minister, when I asked the question a while ago, took the attitude that 3,300 prosecutions represented a not inconsiderable number of prosecutions for a period of fifteen or sixteen months. While the statistics which I intend to read at the moment are not very helpful and are not altogether comparable, the fact remains that in 1940, which is the last year for which information is available, there were convictions in Canada, for indictable offences, of 46,723, and for non-indictable offences, 456,109, or a total of approximately one-half million convictions during the year. Looking over the section of the report of the wartime prices and trade board to which the minister made reference, I find that there are 500 persons engaged in enforcement and investigational duties at regional offices throughout the dominion. Five hundred enforcement officers, in a period of approximately fifteen months, enforcing regulations that permeate through every sphere of life and have many ramifications, and a total of only 3,300 prosecutions, indicate, I submit, that there is not that serious enforcement of the regulations which there should be, having regard to the substantial increase in the cost of living which is taking place all over this country. As I read this section with respect to enforcement I find that, while there are the number of enforcement officers that I refer to, the major part of the responsibility of policing the price ceiling has been placed upon the women of Canada, so it states. Then it goes on to point out, at page 66, the method whereby enforcement of the regulations is carried into effect, and it states that after an investigation has taken place—

> A report is then made to the regional enforcement counsel, and if it appears that an offence may have been committed, the report is forwarded to the enforcement administration at Ottawa.

There are regional enforcement counsel in various districts in the dominion, and after the investigation takes place by the investigating officer, a report is made to the regional counsel. He in turn reports to the board itself at Ottawa. The report then states:

> Prosecutions are undertaken only after a review of the case at Ottawa and only on authorization by the board; they are conducted in the regular courts by counsel appointed by the Minister of Justice.

I have not the exact figures at the moment, but some time ago I asked what was the total amount of fines levied in Canada up to approximately the 1st of March, if I remember rightly, and fines amounted to about $120,000, and counsel fees to over $50,000. In the enforcement of this legislation, $120,000 of fines imposed in a period of approximately, at that time, twelve or thirteen months, does not indicate the enforcement that there should be of these regulations. All of us admit the desirability of enforcing them; for, if infractions take place, as the minister points out, unless prosecutions take place and sure and swift punishment follows the commission of serious infractions, the whole basis will fall down on which the price ceiling is being built in so far as those people are concerned who are prepared to break the law and who have no regard to the necessities that the war demands.

I therefore wish to ask the minister, how many reports were received by the enforcement administration at Ottawa during the period he mentioned a while ago and, of the reports received, in how many cases did prosecutions take place? We have the latter information, but it does not indicate the degree to which enforcement is being made, unless we have a record showing the number of cases where the regional counsel have reported to the central board the necessity of prosecution taking place.

I want further information. So far as prices of food are concerned, on every hand one hears complaints. Prices are going up; prices far beyond those indicated by the index in so far as the increase is concerned are being charged. People have forgotten what prices were in September and October, 1941; they have no references as to them. They want to get the food; they want to get supplies, clothing and the like, and with the diminished supplies they are prepared to pay over and above what the price ceiling will permit, in order to secure possession of he goods. That is the one thing which these regulations are intended to prevent—to prevent the person who has surplus money from securing goods, such as clothing, food, that he would not be able to secure unless he paid a bonus to the vendor.

Therefore I wish, further, the minister to give this information: of the number of prosecutions which have taken place, how many related to prices, how many to rentals, how many to hoarding and rationing offences? The minister has a break-down for them; for as of the 31st of March, in this report a statement was given which indicated that up to March, 1943, of the 1,679 prosecutions which were undertaken from July, 1942, 547 only related to prices, 730 to rentals, and 253 to hoarding and rationing offences. My experience has been that in so far as the rental regulations are concerned, enforcement has been reasonably strict, but in so far as food and clothing prices are concerned and infractions of the regulations with regard to them, there has not been a strict and sure enforcement.

While the comparison which I mentioned at the beginning—the number of offences, non-indictable and indictable, during the year 1940—does not strictly show the position, it does indicate that, if a half million people were committing offences in Canada during the year 1940, many of them merely against statutes such as the offences against the war-time regulations would be, 3,300 prosecutions do not indicate that the enforcement officers are doing their duty. It says that the housewives of Canada are to be the policewomen, in the main, to enforce the law. I have already pointed out the weaknesses of that suggestion. with the number of investigators that there are, the number of officials that have been appointed to administer these regulations, my submission is that they should be engaged in the work of investigation. You cannot do it thoroughly, I realize; if you did, you would have a tremendous army of inspectors. But they can do at least this much, that when serious infractions are found, the penalties imposed shall not be the weak pusillanimous penalties that have been imposed up to the present time.

Let me give the record in that connection. At page 67 of the report we find the maximum penalty of $5,000 or two years' imprisonment or both. A penalty such as that is no deterrent to the wrongdoer when he knows that it will not be imposed. Let me quote from the report:

> In the introductory stages of the price ceiling programme the courts were inclined to give light sentences for offences against the board's regulations. This tendency has not disappeared and fines still remain substantially lower than those levied for comparable offences in Great Britain. Sentences for most offences have been fines of less than $50, although recently a number of fines ranged from $100 to $1,000 for each offence. Several terms of imprisonment have been imposed for offences relating to rationing of rubber tires and gasoline.

My point is this: Laws unenforced bring the whole administration of the act into disrepute. Laws such as these regulations of the wartime prices and trade board, which are designed to increase Canada's war effort and to provide for the safety of us all, should be enforced by penalties that will act as a deterrent to potential wrongdoers. Penalties such as those one hears of imposed from day to day—$5, $10, $15 and costs—do not act as a deterrent to the type of wrongdoer that the wartime prices and trade board has to deal with, the type of person who in a time of war, for personal gain, endeavours to take advantage of the common peril of the nation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman asked me for a break-down of the prosecutions. Of the 3,335 prosecutions from December 1, 1941, to May 31, 1943, 894 were for infractions of the price regulations; 952 rentals, 465 rationing, 225 for "other" wartime prices and trade board regulations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the last?

Mr. ILSLEY: There were 225 other wartime prices and trade board regulations, 467 gasoline, 263 tires, 63 other, Department of Munitions and Supply, regulations. Then there were six other cases. These figures will add to 3,335. The hon. member asked for information as to the number of reports received from regional enforcement counsel. I have not that information here, but I will give it to the hon. member to-morrow.

With regard to the size of the fines, that is a matter over which, as the hon. member knows, the board has no control. It is a matter for the courts. I find, on looking over the list of fines imposed in the month of May, which is the latest month for which I have a report, that some were $500, some $250, some $200, some $100, some $50, some $25, some $15, some $10, some $5 and an odd one of $1.

Mr. GRAYDON: Many of $1?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I had to look through several pages to find that one. It is a matter of judgment for the court as to what the fine should be. The court has the right to impose a fine up to $5,000. There were three fines of $500 each on one man for hoarding—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In Saskatchewan?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I recommend to the Department of Justice—

Mr. PERLEY: What was he hoarding?

Mr. GRAYDON: Wheat?

Mr. ILSLEY: Food and so on. I recommended that there be a remission, but I do not know what the Department of Justice did in the matter. I thought it was too much.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did you ever ask them to jack up the dollar fines?

Mr. ILSLEY: As a matter of fact, I did not know there were any until to-night. They are for small offences. There is a wide variety of offences for which people are fined.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with enforcements, has consideration been given to the fixing of a minimum fine? As the situation is to-day, if a man in a district is brought before the local justice of the peace, naturally, things being what they are, the penalty will be a nominal one. Consideration should be given to the imposition of a minimum penalty, because the situation to-day is, in spite of the references that have been made to fines of $500, $200 and $100, that in the main the penalties are so small as not to amount to a deterrent to the wrongdoers.

There is another matter I would mention. We appoint outstanding counsel in all parts of Canada as regional enforcement counsel. The appointee in Saskatchewan is an outstanding lawyer who has given his services at a fee not in keeping with his abilities. He knows the local conditions. Why should his recommendation not be sufficient for a prosecution? Why should it be necessary for all cases from Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, and so on, after passing through the hands of the regional counsel, following investigation by trained investigators, be sent to Ottawa to be reconsidered? What is the purpose of that? In no other phase of prosecution is that course followed, except in so far as prosecutions under the Inland Revenue Act are concerned. Why is it necessary to get the consent of the authorities in Ottawa when the counsel in the province, the investigating officers, have noted infractions and have recommended that prosecution take place? Why should there be another board in Ottawa to determine whether the regional counsel in the province and the investigator have sufficient evidence upon which proceedings should take place? That in itself defeats one of the aims of criminal justice, namely, that punishment shall follow swiftly on the commission of the offence. Delays occur; witnesses disappear; conditions change by the time the prosecution is proceeded with, and where justice should be done it is not done. I should like the minister to explain the reason for that precaution so far as this legislation is concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: The legal reason is that the order in council requires it; but the question I suppose really is, why does the order in council require it? I do not know that I have ever given much thought to that question, but it strikes me as being appropriate in some way or another. It may be that I am influenced by the traditional view. In the transaction of government business it has always been the custom that before a prosecution is instituted there must be authority from the appropriate governmental department headquarters in Ottawa.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But you already have a regional counsel.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I know. But it is a serious thing to lay a charge against a man, and it is a question as to how much checking there should be. The hon. gentleman was not in the house the other night when the hon. member for New Westminster gave two cases of prosecutions which he thought should never have been instituted. Those prosecutions were presumably reported to Ottawa by the regional enforcement counsel and were authorized from Ottawa, and it sounded to me as if one at least of them should not have been instituted. It was a prosecution against an old age pensioner for some infraction of the price regulations, and it sounded to me as though whoever had authorized it had made a mistake. The hon. member may say that the board is just as likely to make a mistake as an enforcement counsel. But at least there is less likelihood of two making a mistake than there is of one making a mistake. That is, I presume, the reason why, generally speaking, we are cautious before instituting prosecutions. Somebody other than a local man has to pass upon it. The principles upon which prosecutions are instituted might become different in different provinces, depending upon the view enforcement counsel took. The hon. member may say that wherever there is a violation or wherever there is any infraction of the law, a prosecution should be undertaken. He may say that. Well, I do not think that would be the right thing to say. If he does not say it, then there must be a certain amount of discretion in the officials as to the class of the case or kind of case in which they will institute prosecutions. That is, the enforcement counsel must have sense enough to say, "Oh, that is a minor thing; it is really an insignificant case where a man has made a mistake. A warning is sufficient." If it were left to enforcement counsel throughout the country to exercise that discretion, it might not be uniformly or consistently exercised; and for that reason it probably is desirable to make it necessary to have authorization from the board at Ottawa.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then what good purpose do these regional enforcement counsel fulfil? What is the purpose of paying them as much as $4,000 a year, if their recommendations mean nothing? There are local enforcement officials who investigate the infraction of the regulations. Why, then, have regional counsel? They have no position to fill, unless they are to enforce the law within their own province.

Furthermore, I point out that these enforcement counsel draw salaries of $4,000 a year or more. Yet, when a prosecution takes place, they have nothing to do with it. The Department of Justice appoints counsel in the various cities and towns to attend to the various prosecutions, appointing them ad hoc for the prosecutions in question. If these regional counsel are not men who can exercise discretion, then they have nothing whatever to do, other than to supervise the enforcement of the law. If so, why have them at all, when they have no authority?

Mr. ILSLEY: The enforcement counsel are really the head of investigational staffs. The investigators report to the enforcement counsel, and I presume that the enforcement counsel weed out certain reports, and say, "Do not bother with this one", or "We cannot get anywhere with that", and use their legal knowledge in so doing. They would recommend against a prosecution if it were apparent to them that there was no proof available, and they would realize, too, that they are dealing with laymen. Perhaps I am drawing on my imagination when I set out what they would do, but I believe I am correct. I think they would be discharging a useful function in so doing, because otherwise we would have all kind of reports coming in from 500 or 600 investigators, direct to Ottawa. I believe there would be a great advantage in having them gathered up, put into proper shape and winnowed out by these enforcement counsel.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask one or two questions with respect to the situation in Ottawa. Some reference has been made to the various steps taken and the various machinery existing for enforcement in connection with infraction of the wartime prices and trade board regulations in outlying centres and in the various provinces.

Would the minister give me some information as to what, if any, cases connected with infractions of the wartime prices and trade board regulations, during the period which has passed since the setting up of the board, have been referred to the Department of Justice in Ottawa? If so, how many of these cases have been prosecuted, after having been referred to Ottawa?

Then, to complete the picture set up by the hon. member for Lake Centre would the minister tell us how many of these cases, after having been referred to the Department of Justice, were then referred back to the wartime prices and trade board for further evidence, and how many were refused on the second submission to the Department of Justice, when the matter of prosecution was considered?

As I understand it, this raises an important question. The minister should explain to the committee whether or not the enforcement branch of the wartime prices and trade board has ever asked for its own final authority in connection with prosecutions arising from infractions of the wartime prices and trade board regulation. As the matter stands now, if my information is correct, final authority does not rest with the enforcement section of the board, but rather with the Department of Justice. What actually happens now is that the final authority rests with the Department of Justice. Not only have we regional counsel, and not only have we reference to the enforcement branch of the wartime prices and trade board, but the final authority does rest with the Department of Justice.

If that is so, I would ask the minister whether that has been working out, and whether it has been found to be a satisfactory solution to the matter of law enforcement. I would ask if it is not the minister's opinion that in so far as the enforcement section of the wartime prices and trade board is concerned, at least in certain cases there should be some final authority resting in their hands. I would ask for this information, because I believe it goes to the root of the peculiar position in which the enforcement branch actually finds itself at the present time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will get the information, but I shall be very much surprised if I do not find that the correct answer is that the wartime prices and trade board has the final authority to authorize prosecutions and does not refer these matters to the Department of Justice at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have asked for the number of cases.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will find that out. They apply to the Minister of Justice to appoint counsel to conduct prosecutions. But, by law, the right to make a decision as to whether a prosecution shall be authorized or not rests with the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. GRAYDON: And not with the Department of Justice?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am fairly sure that is correct, but I shall obtain definite information on the point.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister does not wish to commit himself. I am inclined to think he will find a different answer.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the minister think the fines have not been severe enough? Is it his impression that the law has been enforced properly?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should not like to express an opinion on the point. I shall discuss the matter with Mr. McGregor, the enforcement administrator, and after having done so, I can make a more intelligent reply.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am inclined to think the hon. member for Lake Centre over-emphasized this matter. I do not believe that members of parliament should urge that the minister apply fines more severe than are now being applied. If the law is being kept, that is sufficient.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the law is being kept, we do not need to worry about the fines.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the point. The test of the efficacy of the law is not the size of the fines. A perfect condition would be where no prosecutions would be necessary. One might find a situation where the control was perfect, and where there would be no prosecutions whatever.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister think we have arrived at that stage?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not think so. I know there are certain infractions of price regulations; there is no doubt about that. There are a tremendous number of prosecutions, and I believe the number is increasing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not if it applies to farmers.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is my impression that, considering the almost bewildering complexity of the regulations under the control of the wartime prices and trade board, the infractions of the law are surprisingly few.

Mr. ILSLEY: The rentals regulations are pretty well observed, and the number of prosecutions there is on the down grade.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In that connection, would any prosecution be instituted without authority from the central board in respect of rental cases?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): None whatever?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; there must be approval from Ottawa.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have a very peculiar case I should like to bring to the minister's attention to-morrow.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

PRIVILEGE—MR. LACOMBE

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER ON JUNE 28

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On June 28, 1943, the Prime Minister made the following statement in the house as reported at page 4072 of English Hansard:

> The statement to which I refer is as follows: "We have here in the cabinet three new millionaires who have made their money since the war's outbreak. We shall denounce them at the proper time and place. Fortunes are being built up."
> The proper time and place to make a statement of that kind is in this House of Commons with the hon. member simultaneously undertaking to prove the charge or, if he is unable to do so, to resign his seat in this house. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member should be obliged either to withdraw the statement completely or else to convert it into a specific charge to be investigated in the usual manner, and the consequences of the investigation also to be followed up in the usual manner.

On my question of privilege I do say that those words which he then used about me bear a charge based upon an incorrect translation of the French debates of June 25 last. Because the Prime Minister did not verify the translation of the speech I gave in French I was subjected to serious wrong in respect of my privileges and prerogatives as a member of parliament. I was unfairly attacked by a certain portion of the press, and the incorrect translation of my speech, as quoted by the Prime Minister, was broadcast to all the country. This is the reason why, for the sake of truth, justice and honour, I ask the Prime Minister to withdraw the words which, on June 28 last, he unfairly said about me, on the basis of a highly incorrect translation.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought that matter had been cleared up some days ago.

Mr. LACOMBE: It has never been.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made it perfectly clear to the house and to the country that I did not regard as correct the translation which my hon. friend claims is not correct. I said so, and I gave the original French words my hon. friend used. I certainly thought the whole matter had been cleared up, and His Honour the Speaker indicated to the house that he was of the same opinion.

Mr. LACOMBE: It was not the same day; it was on Wednesday last.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The same correction applies of course to both days, if that is any satisfaction to my hon. friend.

Mr. LACOMBE: I want a decision from the Chair. A few minutes ago I did not ask the Prime Minister to withdraw the translation, but to withdraw the words which he said about me concerning this false translation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member brought this matter before the house on Wednesday last, as he has said, and I then indicated to him that the motion before the Chair dealt only with the French text, and not at all with the English translation. I would also point out to the hon. member that a question of privilege should be raised immediately or as soon thereafter as it is possible, by the hon. member who is claiming the privilege. This matter has now been before the house on two occasions, and the hon. member under the rules has no right to exercise a claim for privilege in respect of a matter which was already before the house a week ago.

In respect of the question the hon. member now raises, may I point out that the matter brought before the house was on the French text, not on the translation. I think therefore the incident must be considered as closed.

Mr. LACOMBE: I regret to have to appeal from your decision.

(And less than five members having risen):

Mr. SPEAKER: Presenting reports by standing and select committees.

PRIVATE BILLS

FOURTH AND FIFTH REPORTS—CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT

Mr. T. A. FONTAINE (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot) presented the fourth and fifth reports of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, and moved:

That the fourth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, presented this day, asking for leave to sit while the house is sitting, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

EMPIRE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

VISIT OF CANADIAN MEMBERS TO WASHINGTON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a copy of the Congressional Record, the proceedings and debates of the 78th congress, first session, Washington, Saturday, July 3, 1943. This number contains an account of the visit made by members of congress to the meeting of the Empire Parliamentary Association at Ottawa. I understand that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who was chairman of the conference, has also received a copy of the Congressional Record and would like to make reference to the visit of Canadian members to Washington arising out of what appears in the Congressional Record. If such is the case, I feel that my hon. friend might be permitted to make his remarks at this time.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister and the house for the opportunity of referring to the visit made by members of this house, together with the Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable Thomas Vien, to the Senate and the House of Representatives in Washington on June 30 and July 1.

The members of this house who were privileged to attend on that historic occasion were the hon. member for Stormont, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Chevrier), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and myself. I think reference should be made to the kindness and the friendship and hospitality which were shown to us by both houses, not as individuals but as representatives of the parliaments of Canada and the other parts of the British empire. I need hardly say that the depth and warmth of their reception of us epitomized the devotion and the common sacrifices of the British empire and the United States of America in the present struggle, and it was the expressed hope and prayer of the members of congress, the members of the Canadian parliament, and of the parliaments of the United Kingdom, of Australia, of New Zealand and of Bermuda, that out of this meeting would come a repetition in the years to come of like meetings, and that the spirit of cooperation that now actuates the great democracies in the world should be continued in the days of peace.

I should mention the outstanding event of the visit which showed the appreciation of the United States of America of the empire as a whole, and of Canada, which was that for the first time in history, members of parliament from all parts of the empire were invited to take and did take desk seats on the floor of the United States Senate while it was in session. This was the greatest tribute that the United States Senate could pay to the representatives of the empire, and history was indeed made thereby on July 1, 1943. I hold in my hand a copy of the Congressional Record of July 3, 1943, in which United States Senator Warren Austin, one of our distinguished visitors, referred to the visit of the representatives of the United States to Canada. Referring to the fact that delegations from all parts of the empire and the United States had attended, he said:

> The subject of study and informal discussion was the qualification and capacity of democracies to win the war and to attain peace that will prevail throughout the world.
> The discussions were marked by eagerness for information, candour of expression and friendly understanding.
> No obligations were sought or undertaken, but consequences of high value in mutual understanding were realized.

He goes on to say that with the unanimous consent of the Senate he would like to place upon the record the eloquent speeches made on the occasion of that visit by the Prime Minister of Canada, the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and the hon. member for Lethbridge. He used these words:

> I concur in the opinion of the Prime Minister of Canada that "the resolution itself will in time become an historic document," and I believe that this first meeting of members of the Congress of the United States with members of the Empire Parliamentary Association is the beginning of a relationship among those bodies—which are closest to the people of the democracies—having endless possibilities of understanding and achievement.

He ends with these words:

> The compliment of their visit to the Congress of the United States is further evidence of the intention of the democracies to cultivate a more perfect union for the prosecution of the war and the attainment of lasting peace.

The words of Senator Austin are reechoed by every hon. member of this house.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 116, for the relief of Elaine Alice McCormick Desrosiers.—Mr. Hill.

Bill No. 118, for the relief of Phyllis Beatrice Barnett Woodham.—Mr. Hill.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—HALIFAX

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What is the total number of prefabricated houses built by the Wartime Housing Limited, in the city of Halifax?

2. How many of these houses are occupied by, (a) employees of H.M.C. dockyard; (b) employees of Halifax Shipyards Limited; (c) employees of construction firms presently engaged in war-time construction projects; (d) members of the armed forces, army, navy and air force; (e) waterfront workers; (f) civilians otherwise employed?

3. What is the method used in selecting tenants?

4. Are any houses occupied by persons who have moved to Halifax since May 1, 1942? If so, what number?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. 544.

2. (a) 224; (b) 205; (c) 70; (d) 9; (e) none; (f) 36 (Department of Transport and the civil service).

3. During the course of the construction of the houses, an allocation plan is worked out with the industries which Wartime Housing must serve in any locality. Each industry thereafter selects its list of tenants for the houses allocated. Upon Wartime Housing Limited's investigation proving the necessity, the houses are given to the persons nominated.

4. We have no knowledge as to the arrival dates of our tenants. This can only be determined by taking a census.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—CLARK-RUSE LIMITED, LAKEBURN, N.B.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. What number of prefabricated houses have been built by the Wartime Housing Limited at Lakeburn, Westmorland county, N.B., for the use of the employees of Clark-Ruse Limited?

2. How many of these houses are now occupied by employees?

3. Is the Department of Munitions and Supply considering the making of these houses available to members of the armed forces, if they are not taken up by Clark-Ruse employees at an early date?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. At Lakeburn, N.B., 200 houses were constructed for the use of workers and their families engaged in the production of munitions or on defence projects. By reason of proximity, the Clark-Ruse plant would be the largest user of these houses.

2. As of July 3, 1943, 143 houses were occupied by employees of the Clark-Ruse company except for 11 houses occupied by employees of T.C.A., Department of Transport, or the McNamara company.

3. On all Wartime Housing projects certain houses are made available under standard conditions to families of soldiers in overseas service. As yet, no requests have been made in proper form for houses to be used in this locality for this purpose.

Wartime Housing Limited has not considered the making of these houses available to others than those permitted under the order in council which created Wartime Housing Limited. Daily we are informed by the Clark-Ruse company that by fall they will require all of these houses and possibly will be asking for some additional houses.

MEAT RATIONING—TURKEY AND CHICKEN

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. Why are there no coupons for turkey and chicken when coupons have been issued for beef and pork?

2. At whose request was the rationing of beef and pork instituted?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. No coupons are issued for turkey and chicken because poultry is not rationed.

2. Rationing of beef and pork, as well as veal, lamb and mutton was introduced as a government policy to ensure an equitable distribution of meat throughout all sections of Canada and for the purpose of releasing additional quantities of meat for export to our allies.

CEILING PRICE OF PULPWOOD

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

In view of the increase of $4 per ton on pulp, as per agreement between the wartime prices and trade board and the U.S. office of price administration on February last, and since present indications are that a further advance in price of pulp will be permitted, will the ceiling price of pulpwood paid to the producer be increased also?

Mr. ABBOTT: There was no increase of $4 per ton in the price of pulp in February last, but it is assumed that the question refers to an increase of $4 per ton in the price of newsprint effective March 1, 1943. No increase in the price paid to producers of pulpwood is contemplated as a result of this increase in the price of newsprint or as a result of any increases under consideration at this time.

Actually, the price increase made in March was the first increase in the price of newsprint since 1938. This was allowed partially to compensate Canadian newsprint producers for increased costs including increases of from $1.50 to $2 per cord in the prices paid for pulpwood during the period from 1938 to the date of the establishment of the price ceiling in the fall of 1941.

STORAGE FACILITIES FOR 1943 WESTERN CROP

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

What steps are being taken at the present time to provide building materials to the western provinces for the erection of storage facilities for the 1943 crop?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Arrangements have been made whereby all but a very small percentage of the production of lumber in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and in the northern and southern interior of British Columbia is to be made available for use in this area for war purposes and essential civilian demands, of which agriculture is considered of major importance. Arrangements have also been made whereby substantial deliveries of lumber produced in the coastal area of British Columbia have been and are made available to the prairie provinces.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CORNWALL CANAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. What are the conditions and regulations regarding the employment and pay of employees engaged on the secondary canals of the dominion?

2. Are these conditions and regulations being followed in the case of, (a) lockmasters; (b) lockmotormen employed on the Cornwall canal?

3. What are the differences in the conditions of employment and pay of these two classes of employees on that canal?

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT—MEDICAL SERVICES, QUEBEC CITY AND MONTREAL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What medical doctors in Quebec city and Montreal have been employed by or engaged in connection with the work of the Government Employees' Compensation Act in each of the years 1940 to 1942 inclusive?

2. How much has been paid to each for such services during each of the said years?

ROAD CONSTRUCTION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Is the government of Canada constructing a road in Newfoundland, (a) on its own account; (b) in conjunction with any other government?

2. If so, what is the location of such a road?

3. What is the estimated cost of same?

4. Has any part of such road been completed? If so, at what cost?

5. By what firm or firms is the road being built?

6. Did the contractors supply the equipment for building the road?

INTERNMENTS—CAMILLIEN HOUDE

Mr. LACOMBE:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, memoranda, evidence, reports and other documents in the possession of the Department of Justice, concerning the appeal of Mr. Camillien Houde, heard on the 28th May, 1943, by an advisory board at Fredericton.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to oppose the motion made by the hon. member for the production of these papers, because I thus have to remain responsible for the decision that was taken. I have to take that position for two reasons. One is that the terms of the defence of Canada regulations make it the responsibility of the Minister of Justice to exercise his judgment in these matters for the safety and security of the state, and in order to discharge that responsibility it is necessary that he be able to have available to him information that cannot be made public. Moreover, the terms of the defence of Canada regulations provide expressly what information in that respect is to be communicated to the house:

21. (3) The Minister of Justice shall, at the beginning of each session of parliament and every four weeks thereafter during each session, make a report to parliament showing the action taken under this regulation, which report shall show:

(a) the number of persons detained under orders made pursuant to this regulation; and

(b) the number of cases, if any, in which the Minister of Justice declined to follow the advice of any advisory committee which may be appointed under the next following regulation.

Those are the items of information which the regulations provide shall be communicated to parliament, and they have always been regularly and fully communicated.

The second reason is that this matter comes in terms within the language used by Your Honour on the 30th of June in disposing of a motion for the production of papers, your remarks and decision being reported in Hansard at page 4287. These papers are communications from confidential advisers to the minister for the purpose of enabling him to reach a decision and come expressly within the language used by Your Honour in giving a ruling on the 30th of June. In my judgment, for these reasons it is not in the public interest that these papers be produced, and I ask that the house do not order that they be tabled.

Mr. LACOMBE: I want to draw attention—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This motion is not debatable.

Motion negatived on division.

CENSORSHIP REGULATIONS OR INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of all censorship orders, regulations or instructions issued under government authority since the outbreak of war.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. Speaker, I ask that this motion stand, for the reason I gave on Monday.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I be permitted to say a word with respect to the minister's explanation? This is the second occasion on which the minister has asked that this motion stand. We are anxious that the papers called for by this motion shall be made available just as soon as possible, because shortly the minister's department will be before us for consideration, and without the papers which are here called for I am afraid we shall be prejudiced. I should like to know why the minister is continually asking that this motion stand.

Mr. LaFLECHE: On the 5th of this month when this motion came up I said:

Mr. Speaker, because it will not be possible to ascertain the full extent of this motion before a few days, may I ask that it stand?

I have done my best to find out just what all this means, and I have been told by the officials who are in Ottawa that it will take a very long time to produce all these papers, because hundreds of files must be perused. The gentleman I would particularly like to see is the director of censorship, who will not be back in Ottawa until next week. It is really to save time, certainly not to deprive the house of information, that I ask that the motion stand.

Mr. CHURCH: The whole thing should be abolished. It is nothing but a farce.

Motion stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Thursday, July 8, 1943, until the end of the session the house shall meet at eleven o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock, p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock, p.m.

Motion agreed to.

BEER

QUESTION AS TO FEWER RESTRICTIONS AND BETTER DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. TURNER (Springfield): I desire to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question. As the result of an article in the Montreal Gazette of June 21, which states that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation at their convention passed a resolution "for less restrictions and better distribution of beer supplies", does the government intend to take any action along this line?

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): I have not received a copy of the resolution to which the hon. member for Springfield has referred, but I understand from what he said that it referred to the production and distribution of beer. I should like to say that the brewers are having great difficulty in maintaining, with the staff that they have available, the quota which has been given to them, but I have not heard of any suggestion that men should be diverted from essential war industries in order to produce more beer. With regard to the better distribution of beer, that is entirely a matter within the control and jurisdiction of provincial authorities.

Mr. REID: Will the minister explain why British Columbia has been discriminated against in this matter?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. REID: That is a legitimate question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GIBSON: There has been no discrimination against any province. Every province is treated on exactly the same basis, receiving a cut of ten per cent of the amount purchased in the previous year.

Mr. REID: I think a fuller statement is required for the information of this house.

CHRISTIE STREET HOSPITAL

PROPOSED ADDITION—OFFER BY TORONTO OF FREE SITE FOR PERMANENT HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, notice of which I have given him. It concerns the proposed construction of an addition to Christie Street hospital. Has the minister been officially informed of the offer by the city of Toronto of a free site for a permanent hospital ultimately to replace Christie Street hospital, and stated to be either Earlescourt Park or a site in High Park? Further, will the minister consider staying construction pending a further survey?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is a question which should not be asked on the orders of the day.

CANADIAN FORCES

LEAVE TO SOLDIERS FOR WORK ON FARMS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I have a question to ask of the Minister of National Defence, notice of which I have given, arising out of a wire I received this morning from Vancouver, and a copy of which was received, I believe, by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who kindly deferred to me as regards asking this question, which concerns a farming district. It is as follows:

Vancouver, B.C.
July 6, 1943.

Farmers of the Fraser Valley face extremely serious labour shortage entailing danger to a number of important crops unless men are found for harvesting immediately. Right now at least 100 men needed in Surrey municipality and several hundred more in other parts of valley to harvest hay now ready to be brought in. If hay not harvested it is certain that many dairy farmers will have to sell herds for beef in fall and go out of business with calamitous results to dairy business. Acting on behalf of dominion provincial emergency farm labour committee Surrey branch Surrey municipal council and Vancouver labour council the undersigned have already met with military officials in Vancouver to-day requesting that members of armed forces be assigned to farm labour work for next two-week period but have been told that their orders forbid such action except when men are off duty. We would urgently request that you do what you can to bring about a special order from national defence headquarters which would permit allocation of needed man-power from armed forces for emergency service in Fraser Valley farms until critical period is passed.

Councillor Tom Binnie, Surrey municipality; Councillor Ben Shepherd, Surrey municipality; E. E. Leary, President Vancouver labour council; R. K. Gervin, Secretary Vancouver and district trades and labour council.

The question I wish to ask the minister is: Will the department consider harvest leave for soldiers stationed in the area, or will they permit the use of sufficient soldiers as a flying column for this purpose, these men to be returned by truck each night to their camp?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): If the hon. member will put the question on the order paper I will see that it is answered to-morrow. In the meantime I shall send him a copy of the directions which have been issued with respect to harvest leave, dated July 5, so as to give him immediately what information I have.

RADIO BROADCASTING

VACANCY ON BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister a question of which I have not given him notice, but which is somewhat supplemental to a question I asked previously. I have not received any word that an appointment to the vacancy in the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has yet been made; can the Prime Minister give any information as to when we may expect some news on that point?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is quite true that the appointment has not yet been made, but I hope it will be made very soon.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

ARREST OF FORMER LEADER OF CANADIAN UNION OF FASCISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On June 30 the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) asked a question on the orders of the day concerning the arrest of one Charles Brandel Crate. Perhaps I may be permitted to table the answer as if it were a question placed upon the order paper in the usual way.

Charles Brandel Crate is a former leader of the Canadian Union of Fascists. At the outbreak of the war he severed his connections with this organization and signed a statutory declaration to that effect.

The Canadian Union of Fascists was declared an illegal organization under the defence of Canada regulations in June, 1940, and there is no evidence that it had been functioning since, nor any attempts made to revive it.

Crate was engaged in August, 1942, by the Par Tex Foundation Company, Limited, Toronto, and was sent by this company to Newfoundland to work on a telephone construction line, which apparently the said company contracted to build. He returned to Canada in December, 1942.

In December, 1942, he obtained employment with the Dominion Bridge Company, Toronto, Ontario, as a labourer.

In January, 1943, he was engaged by the Don Construction Company and on the 28th of that month left for the company's camp at Dawson Creek, British Columbia. He worked there until about the end of May.

Crate arrived at Edmonton during the early part of June. He was arrested at Edmonton on June 21 and charged under section 39C of the defence of Canada regulations for having advocated the policies of an illegal organization, namely, the Canadian Union of Fascists. He appeared before Magistrate Miller on the 29th of June. No plea taken and accused remanded in custody until July 7. The case is still before the courts.

Crate was employed in the area around Dawson Creek and did not go beyond that. This is not a restricted or prohibited area.

This man is a Canadian by birth, of English parentage, and as Dawson Creek is not in a restricted area he did not require a permit to travel to that area. It is understood that Crate has complied with the national selective service regulations.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 6, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the Chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Wartime prices and trade board—administration, $14,300,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is in connection with another matter, but I wish to raise the point before the minister begins his remarks. I thought a moment ago I saw the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour. I should like some information as to when we may expect answers to the questions which have been standing since the estimates of the Department of Labour under the war appropriation bill have been before the committee. I believe I was promised them last Monday; it is now Wednesday. I suggest to the Minister of Labour that, if it is convenient to his department to do so, the questions might be answered to-morrow.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yesterday I was asked for certain information which I did not have at the time. The leader of the opposition asked last evening for a statement of the number of cases referred to the Department of Justice. I have made inquiries and I find that no cases have been referred to the Department of Justice. Decision as to whether or not there shall be prosecution in prices board cases is made in every instance by the board.

Mr. GRAYDON: Their decision is final?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle asked the other night for the number of inspectors in the rural part of Saskatchewan. The board employ inspectors who are attached to the regional office and to the subordinate local offices in Saskatchewan. There is no separation of their work as between urban and rural districts, the investigators covering the general area in which the office to which they are attached is located. On April 15 the investigators employed by the board in Saskatchewan numbered 80. I can furnish a list of the number operating from the various offices, if the hon. member wishes.

The member for New Westminster last night raised a question with regard to honey prices. Order 286 of the board, effective June 21, sets maximum prices to primary producers, on sales in bulk to processors or dealers, at 12½ cents or 14 cents for pasteurized. Primary producers may sell at retail to consumers at 15½ cents in bulk when the purchaser provides his own container. In non-glass containers the maximum prices vary from 17½ cents in 8-pound containers to 23 cents in one-pound containers; in glass, from 20½ cents in 4-pound jars to 35 cents in half-pound jars. The prices which I have given are for non-pasteurized, and for pasteurized, granulated, one must add 1½ cents per pound to all prices. It occurred to me that the hon. member said that the producers received before the war 20 cents per pound. That may have been in containers, and if so these prices would be consistent with that price.

There was also a question with regard to imported honey. All imported honey sold at retail must be sold strictly within the lawful price ceilings. During the autumn of 1942 and the winter of 1942-43 some imports of Mexican and Jamaican honey were authorized for sale to or use by industrial users, for example, packers and soft drink manufacturers, or by contractors operating construction or lumber camps. The cost to such users or contractors was in the majority of cases from 16 to 17 cents a pound. There were a few shipments where the laid-down cost to industrial users in Canada was in the neighbourhood of 20 cents. The board has no record of prices as high as 35 cents. In each case the industrial users were required to give an undertaking to absorb such increased costs of this raw material and not to raise their prices to their customers. During the past three months no new authorizations for the sale of imported honey at higher than ceiling prices have been given, even to industrial users. It is however lawful for an industrial user to purchase honey in a foreign country and bring it into Canada for his own use, since no purchase or sale takes place in Canada.

The member for Lake Centre asked for the record of the percentage or proportion of recommendations of regional counsel which were acted upon. The records of the enforcement administration are not kept in such form as to make readily available the number of prosecutions recommended by the regional offices. A careful estimate however indicates that approximately 75 per cent of such recommendations are approved by head office in Ottawa. The percentage varies of course as between the several regions—as low as 60 or 65 per cent in some and as high as 90 per cent in others. Those are the main points.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Do I understand the minister to say that only a percentage of the prosecutions were authorized by the head office?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. All that take place are. What I have been saying is that recommendations are received from regional counsel which in some cases are not accepted by the head office.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Does the chairman of the board authorize the prosecutions?

Mr. ILSLEY: The wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Does the chairman of the wartime prices board issue the authority?

Mr. ILSLEY: The board itself as such does so.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There has been considerable publicity and talk about black markets in Canada, especially in meat. I have heard that there has been a great deal of interference from packing houses, either by telephone or otherwise, and it has been said that certain threats were made over the telephone by the heads of certain packing houses to the chairman of the prices and trade board. Is that right?

Mr. ILSLEY: Certain threats?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In some cases. That is what I am informed. Just what interference has there been from officials of packing houses with the chairman of the prices board?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no knowledge whatever of any threats to the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, coming from anyone.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There has been no attempt at all at interference by officials of packing houses?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not so far as I know. The official of the board who would be in a position to know says that he knows of none.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not think the minister has answered all the questions I asked. For example, there was a question as to the division between various types of prosecutions, rental and so on.

Mr. ILSLEY: I gave that last night.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh; they were given?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: I have here a most important document, a return I first secured showing that for the first three years of operations of the wartime prices and trade board, down to June 15, 1942—three years less two months—the number of prosecutions has been 150. In this connection I have a return to an order of the house with regard to the enforcement of the law. This is sessional paper No. 341, Monday, June 29, 1942. I will read the questions:

1. How many people, by provinces, have been prosecuted in the law courts for not carrying out the orders in council and instructions, rules and regulations and directions of various boards and controllers and dollar-a-year men, including the wartime prices and trade board, and various non-legislative bodies?

2. What lawyers, by provinces, have been retained, and what are their fees?

3. Does the Department of Justice provide counsel to enforce federal law for the wartime prices and trade board and other federal boards?

In reply to the first question the answer is:

1. Numbers of persons prosecuted for alleged contraventions of regulations, orders and requirements of the wartime prices and trade board, September 3, 1939, to June 15, 1942:

Nova Scotia	8
New Brunswick	1
Quebec	22
Ontario	96
Manitoba	6
Saskatchewan	8

In reply to the third question, whether the Department of Justice provide counsel to enforce federal law for the wartime prices and trade board and other federal boards, the answer is yes. The minister said that there have been 150 prosecutions in two years and ten and a half months.

Last night the minister announced that of 3,335 prosecutions from December 1, 1941, to May 31, 1943, 894 were for infractions of price rules, 952 rentals, 465 rationing and 225 sundries, like gasoline. I can tell you that in the city of Toronto the fines levied in connection with many of these prosecutions are not uniform. The magistrates impose heavy fines; the people are not given time in which to pay, and they have to go to gaol. There should be a standard of action and uniform enforcement in these cases; and in any case why should we in Toronto have the greatest number of these rental prosecutions, while the prosecutions in connection with rationing, gasoline and so on, amounted to only some 465? Then where are these people detained? We know that during the depression the government of Canada, in order to relieve unemployment, built many municipal institutions all across Canada, though Ontario did not get any. In some of the provinces they built gaols, schools, court houses and places of that kind, thus relieving the local taxpayers. In the county of York they have a gaol which was built shortly after confederation and which does not provide adequate accommodation for these people. As a result there is a good deal of suffering. I believe the minister is very humane and I suggest that he should look into these matters and consult with the enforcement officers as to equality of treatment and more reasonable fines for petty breaches.

Then I should like to know why a number of these young solicitors are employed in enforcement work when they should be doing war service. I have noticed some of the names in the newspapers, and I cannot understand why the Department of Justice should engage these young prosecutors when there are crown attorneys in all the districts whose duty it is to enforce the federal laws. The enforcement of all federal laws comes under the provincial attorneys general and their deputies, the crown attorneys in the police courts throughout the country. I do not know why these other solicitors should be engaged.

I appreciate what has been done by the minister in freezing rents in order to protect the poor people, especially in the cities. He has done very good work, but I believe the time has come when we should have a vast housing policy, because under present conditions no one wants to own property. The minister has a parliamentary secretary, one of whose relatives was for a number of years our corporation counsel. I refer to the late Mr. W. C. Chisholm, K.C., a very capable official, who went into this enforcement matter thoroughly some years ago. At that time it was found that a large share of the work of enforcing federal statutes was carried on by the police departments and crown attorneys of the various cities, who had that much less time in which to carry on their other duties. I do believe the municipalities should be given some help in this enforcement work. I believe some contribution is made in connection with the detention costs, but then I believe there is altogether too much detention. Many of those offences are merely trivial; many people are brought to court unnecessarily, though where serious offences occur of course there should be proper punishment. We should never legislate against human nature, but I am sure the minister and his assistant have done very good work.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure all the members of this committee sympathize with the minister and the officials of the wartime prices and trade board in the very difficult and responsible duties they have to perform. I noticed that Canada's first minister of finance brought down in this house in 1867 a budget with expenditures during the first five months of just a little over $5,000,000, and that the monthly expenditures at that time were less than we are spending in two hours now. The controls necessary in order that the burdens of modern warfare may be distributed fairly and evenly across the country are very complicated. I think the minister and his staff are to be congratulated on having been able to bring the public of Canada along with them so well and to have so few black markets and so few people in various parts of the country who are trying to take advantage of the regulations. I have a letter from the chairman of one of the war finance committees in my constituency in which he states that his district raised $42,000 though the quota was only $28,000 in the last campaign. In his letter he went on to say:

> We have very little canvassing to do this time, as it was great the way the people came in with their subscriptions. One party had twenty-nine cream cheques saved up. Several people of very little means came in and bought on the instalment plan. Those are the kind that give a canvasser more pep. Those are the ones that we fight to save.

That is from a veteran of the last war, writing as chairman of the committee, and I think it important that we maintain this attitude right across the country.

Before I discuss the two questions I want to bring to the attention of the minister I might say that planning by people who are opposed to social planning has produced some worth while results. One of the press releases referring to order A-314 of the wartime prices and trade board states that the order has had the effect of eliminating at least one hundred million truck miles per annum, which is said to be an ultra conservative figure, with few instances in which justifiable criticism based on actual hardship could be levelled at the board, either because of lack of service or increased cost. Then it goes on to say that in the ice cream industry in Ontario between 60 and 70 per cent of the mileage previously run has been saved, at an actual dollar and cents saving to the industry. In other words, competition in the industry had in peace time wasted from 60 to 70 per cent of delivery costs, and since we have demonstrated that this wastage can be avoided in war time I hope we may have similar controls when the war is over, for the greatest good to the greatest number.

[Mr. Church.]

The minister's parliamentary assistant brought down for me some answers in connection with the amount of sugar being made available this year for canning, for the soft drink industry, for the manufacture of wines, and for the making of candy. I should like the minister to regard himself as the father of a very large family—the people of Canada—with the welfare of that family to consider. This year he is providing about ten pounds of sugar per person for canning. At the same time, according to these figures, he is providing 6·6 pounds of sugar per person for the making of soft drinks, ·9 pound per person for the making of wines, and 4·8 pounds for the making of candy. The actual figures as they were brought down in the house are 66,000,000 pounds for soft drinks, 9,100,000 pounds for wines, 48,000,000 pounds for candy and 100,000,000 pounds for preserving. To work it out on the actual amount of sugar available for the minister's family this year, on the assumption that he has three children—I do not think that is correct, but assuming that he has the average family he would receive ten pounds of sugar for each person, or a total of fifty pounds of sugar for canning purposes. He would have thirty-three pounds for making soft drinks, four and a half pounds for making wine, and twenty-four pounds for making candy. I suggest that the minister and his assistant discuss this matter in their family circles to-night, and note the reaction of the members of their families.

I understand the difficulties. I know that the soft drink industry in Canada has a large investment. I know that less sugar is available to them than was available last year. But the information we have seems to indicate that they have far too much sugar made available, taking into consideration the amounts provided for essential purposes such as canning and preserving.

I received only this morning a communication from the sugar protest committee of Victoria, British Columbia, a communication which I believe other hon. members also have received. People across Canada are not organized; they cannot make their protests vocally. But I believe there is a genuine protest across Canada against giving a family of five only fifty pounds for canning, and at the same time giving them thirty-three pounds for soft drinks, four and a half pounds for wine, and twenty-four pounds for candy.

I realize that some educational work must be done immediately to counteract the influence of the people who make soft drinks available. I have been disturbed by the reply made in confectionery stores when requests have been made for soft drinks, when none were available. They say, "Blame Mr. Ilsley for this", instead of "Blame Hitler". I suggest that the wartime information board should be trying to have our people understand that we cannot have suggar for canning and for our children if we are going to continue to make this very large volume of sugar available for the soft drinks industry.

An hon. MEMBER: And the wine industry.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Certain hon. members may think I am a crank on the question of drink. I think in peace time the soft drink industry provides an alternative to harder liquors. But with the tremendous amount of fruit which will waste this year there will have to be some change in the amount of sugar made available.

In connection with trucking I would point out that I placed a question on the order paper in which I asked how many trucks in Canada delivering soft drinks exclusively have been permitted to operate beyond the thirty-five mile limit. The answer to that was 222. Then I asked how many trucks delivering beer exclusively operated beyond the thirty-five mile limit, and the answer was 203. To the question as to how many trucks belonging to wholesale produce dealers were permitted to operate beyond the thirty-five mile limit, the answer was 126.

In my constituency we have a large wholesale produce industry. That industry has large territories to cover, in which only a poor train service operates. They are placing on the market a very large volume of eggs for purposes of processing for the British trade. My information is that they have not been able to obtain permission to operate beyond the thirty-five mile area. At the same time soft drink trucks go whizzing by, and apparently they have no difficulty at all in securing adequate supplies of both gasoline and rubber. I submit we are allowing the soft drink industry two great concessions. I would ask the minister to make a statement indicating whether something can be done this year to make more sugar available for canning and less available for soft drinks and wine.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I should discuss one at a time the purposes for which sugar is made available. The cut in the amount of sugar made available for candy is thirty per cent this year below the amount allowed in 1941. The same cut of thirty per cent is made in respect of wine and soft drinks. The hon. member says that the relationship of the amount used for these purposes to the amount available for canning of fruit is an incorrect relationship. To begin with I would point out that the thirty per cent cut is a substantial and severe one. The hon. member seems to think that we should discourage to a greater extent than we do the use of soft drinks. Well, human beings are so constituted, whether we like it or not, that they have to drink something.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about cold water?

Mr. ILSLEY: Legislative bodies which have tried to decree that the only drink should be cold water have encountered some little resistance in public opinion. And if they are to have freedom to drink something other than water, I suppose the alternatives are soft drinks and beer.

Mr. GRAYDON: Oh no—milk.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a food rather than a drink.

Mr. NICHOLSON: And buttermilk.

Mr. ILSLEY: The possibility of utilizing these food drinks—because that is what they are—in a large way, is limited. I know the hon. member does not think that people should drink more beer. And with a very large number of persons in the country complaining that they cannot get as much beer as they would like, I am afraid that the discontent of the population would be considerable if we made an extremely drastic cut in the amount of soft drinks they can obtain. We are told that in war plants the availability of soft drinks is essential to morale. It would not be essential to my morale, and probably not to the morale of my hon. friend; but it does appear that there are a great many people in the country who do like to drink some soft drinks. I am afraid that if we cut the amount of soft drinks by more than thirty per cent, along with the cut in beer which has taken place, we would have a greater outcry than we should have in a time of war.

With regard to candy I would direct the minds of hon. members back to a session or two ago when we were discussing the thirty per cent tax on candy. I well recall the speeches made at that time. I remember speeches by hon. members who are also members of the medical profession, in which they argued that candy was not an article we should tax, because it was a good energy-producing food, particularly for children. We all remember the story about those poor little boys and girls who, we were told, were going into the stores to buy a stick of candy for a cent. They would reach up their little hands and hold out the cent to the storekeeper, saying, "A cent's worthy of candy, please", and the storekeeper would say, "Oh, no, my child; that is two cents now, because of the Mackenzie King government." I think it was the hon. member for Peterborough West who accused us of having arranged it so that we would even take candy from kids. I am just mentioning these things to show that candy has made friends—or at least that it had a lot of friends at that time in the House of Commons. If we cut down to too great an extent the amount of sugar available for candy we get results which are not the results we should like to have.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister must have been more impressed than we thought he was.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, I was touched by the speech of the hon. member.

Mr. GRAYDON: So were the taxpayers.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what the hon. member said. With regard to wine, we are following the same course; that is subject to a thirty per cent cut. The hon. gentleman referred to the heavy investment, and the implication was that we were very tender toward heavy investors. Whenever anything is done about wine the investors who are most vocal are the grape growers. They are the ones who protest most vociferously when anything is done which unduly affects wine. Nevertheless we have passed an order in council which prohibits wines being reinforced by spirits, and we are subjecting them to the same type and degree of sugar control as applies to other industries. Here again I think the only proper policy is not to go to extremes.

The hon. gentleman says that much fruit will be wasted, but the reports I get are that the fruit crop is very light in Canada, that in many cases it is going to be difficult to get fruit. Some people will have more sugar than they will be able to use, and some will have less, possibly a great deal less, than they will be able to use. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the people of Canada never used more than 100,000,000 pounds of sugar for the canning of fruit. In 1942, when they were given the privilege of securing as much sugar as they requested for canning purposes, they required only 106,000,000 pounds. That represents practically one hundred per cent as against the seventy per cent being supplied to these other industries. If the hon. gentleman can work out a more rational policy than the one we are following, I should be glad to have him do it. The hon. gentleman mentioned beer and soft drink trucks.

Mr. NICHOLSON: And wholesale produce trucks.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to delay answering that until I have looked over a memorandum which has been placed before me.

Mr. GRAYDON: As the question of sugar rationing has been reintroduced into the discussion, there are one or two matters I should like to bring up. Will the minister clarify the position in connection with the international sugar board? The information I have—perhaps the minister will correct me if it is erroneous—is that the amount which can be had for this purpose is regulated by an international sugar board which operates not only so far as Canada is concerned but with respect to the United States. I note from an article which appeared in a Fairfield, Maine, newspaper that the amount of sugar being provided for canning in Maine is twenty-five pounds maximum. That is a maximum, not an arbitrary or a minimum amount. As I read the article, it states that a top limit of twenty-five pounds of sugar per person was set under new regulations which became effective on May 15.

If there is an international sugar board or any arrangement which covers both countries, we ought to be entitled to as much for canning purposes as is allowed in the United States. It is natural that thoughts of discrimination will arise, particularly along the border. This is one point I should like the minister to clear up. While I am on my feet I should like to place a letter on the record on behalf of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling), who has asked me to do this for him. He is very much interested in this matter. He received a copy of a letter addressed from Silverton, British Columbia, to the ration administrator, Confederation building, Montreal, Quebec, under date of June 25, 1943. It reads as follows:

> We have to-day received from the Nelson, British Columbia, ration committee, coupons for sugar for canning, amounting to thirty pounds for our family of three.
> It was understood that rural districts where fruit is extensively grown in gardens, would receive at least fifteen pounds per person.
> This ration allotted us amounts to one crate of fruit per person for the entire season's canning, and no sugar for jam. This is a ridiculous allotment, in view of the fact that it has been impossible to secure any supplies of jams, jellies, or canned fruit through retail channels in this district, and also in view of the fact that in practically every home, raspberries, strawberries, cherries and currants have been given extensive cultivation in preparation for the season when home canning and jam making would have to take the place of bought goods.
> Those of us with small patches of berries and fruits might just as well cut them down, as the crops will now go to waste, and this in a country which is in a state of war.
> According to press reports British Columbia, a fruit producing area, has been given the lowest allotment per person in Canada. Why?
> Last year, according to official statistics, the amount of sugar used for home canning and preserving was about as much as the allotment for 1943. Yet everyone who did home canning had ample. Why are we cut to one crate of small fruit per person this year? If eight and a half million people have applied for sugar for canning, there is something wrong in the administration of the sugar distribution. After many years in the wholesale fruit business, I am convinced that there is no such thing as 85 per cent of the population of Canada preserving at home. Fifty per cent would be a high figure. Either your figures are inaccurate or else almost 50 per cent of those applying have no intention of using this sugar for canning, thereby cutting the allotment for those who legitimately intend doing so.

Your figures in your circular are also out of line. You claim there are 100,000,000 pounds sugar available for canning among eight and a half million applications.

According to my way of figuring, this would work out to almost 12 pounds per person. Why only 10 pounds in a fruit producing district?

If the same amount was used in preserving last year, then only 5,000,000 people used preserving sugar, including men, women and children, as the amount used was about 20 pounds per person on the average. Where have the three and a half million extra users of sugar come from? An increase of 70 per cent?

On what basis has this distribution been made that some districts, non-fruit producing, receive more than those which produce fruit in the home yards?

What information and from what source was it gathered upon which the distribution was made? What steps have been, or will be taken to ensure that the allotment given will be used for preserving? (It would take an army of policemen to check each individual's canning operations.)

As citizens who are making sacrifices to enable this war to be fought to a successful conclusion, we have the right to ask pertinent questions, which affect the distribution of the sacrifice, and sugar for our families on an equitable basis.

It has been proved conclusively on several occasions so far since the war started that administration for the whole of Canada cannot be done effectively from points which are over 3,000 miles from the area administered, and possibly this is the answer to some of the questions which the people of British Columbia are asking.

I want to thank the minister and the house for permitting me to read this letter on behalf of the member for Kootenay West, who had asked me to do so when this item was under consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for York-Sunbury raised the question of the use of sugar in the United States as compared with Canada in the house on June 4, and instead of replying in the house I wrote him on June 17—

Mr. GRAYDON: Did he make the same suggestion as is made here?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, he did not give this figure. He raised the question because he said the restaurants of the United States seemed to be a little freer with their sugar than restaurants here. Perhaps I had better read the letter I wrote to him:

Dear Mr. Hanson:

On June 4 you asked me in the house for information as to the allocation of sugar supplies for Canada as compared with the United States.

At the end of 1941 it became obvious that the United States and Canada would have to ration sugar due to the shortage of ships to carry sufficient raw sugar from producing areas to the United States and Canada.

At that time, many discussions were held in Washington between the Sugar Administration and the office of Price Administration and other competent American government agencies. Subsequently, the ration administration was formed and participated in these discussions.

It was laid down as a principle between the Canadian and United States government agencies that as far as possible the two ration schemes should be as nearly equal as local geographical, economic and distributive conditions permitted. At the present time, the per capita consumption, excluding the needs of the army, is almost exactly the same, being about 66 pounds per head in the United States and 65 pounds per head in Canada. This consumption of 65 pounds per head is the total amount of sugar consumed in Canada for household, home canning, industrial and institutional use, divided by the population.

At the beginning of rationing, the sugar administration felt that the restaurant business, in order to save sugar, would require to be authorized to remove sugar bowls from the table. If this was not made mandatory, competitors might have nullified any saving in restaurant consumption. In the United States, such removal of sugar bowls has not been made mandatory but a very large number of restaurants and hotels only serve one tablet of sugar for a beverage and a little envelope of soft sugar for cereal or fruit. The envelope contains less than one teaspoonful and one tablet is less than three lumps. From our investigation and experience, the amount of sugar allowed to clients in restaurants in United States is appreciably less than in Canada, although there are exceptions where it is possible, on demand, to obtain more.

The allocation of sugar internationally is made by the combined food board through its sugar committee, on which Canada is represented. At meetings of this committee, Canada, United States and Great Britain present figures of their requirements and available supplies are allocated in accordance with relative need. Canada and the United States share on a similar basis, our ration plans being almost identical. The United Kingdom is slightly differently placed, in that larger stocks have to be carried and disseminated throughout the island for security reasons.

We are dependent upon the United States for our share of raw sugar to the extent of about one-third, in that the war shipping administration has given the Canadian sugar administration an undertaking to lift in 1943, 100,000 tons of raw sugar by American flag vessels. United States government agencies, therefore, expect to be assured that we are not providing more sugar per capita in Canada than they are themselves in the United States.

I have no definite information as to how they have divided their sugar in the United States between canning and ordinary purposes. The officials tell me that it is their opinion, although they do not vouch for this, that one billion pounds of sugar has been allocated by the United States for home canning, which would be a smaller amount per capita than in Canada, and their information also is that the amount allowed in the United States is 25 pounds per family rather than per person. But I am not in a position to deny what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just to have the matter made clear perhaps I might read into the record this one paragraph for the minister to check, because it raises a question which it seems to me will have to be decided one way or the other. This article appeared in the Fairfield Review, in Maine, on May 15 last. It is entitled "Canning Sugar", and reads:

> Procedure by which housewives will obtain sugar for home canning and freezing of this season's fruit crop on and after May 15 was released Monday by the Maine district office of price administration. As previously announced by price administrator Prentiss M. Brown, sugar for home canning is being allotted on substantially the same basis as last year, that is, one pound for each four quarts (or eight pounds) of the finished product, and by essentially the same procedure—written application to the local board. A top limit—

I spoke of that before as being a mistake.

> A top limit of 25 pounds of sugar per person is set in the new regulations, which become effective May 15. The OPA emphasizes, however, that the 25-pound figure is a maximum, to be granted only in the relatively few cases where this large amount of fruit will be canned and preserved. Last year there was no nation-wide ceiling over the amount that was allowed each person, but many local boards set individual limits of 10 or 15 pounds, while others granted individual amounts as high as 45 pounds. The new limit of 25 pounds per person assures more uniform treatment, although it is not expected that many families will apply for the maximum amount. Within the 25-pound per person limit, any family can apply for sugar to put up jams, jellies and preserves at the rate of five pounds per individual. This is a more generous allowance than last year, when sugar for preserves was limited to one pound per person.

I leave that with the minister, so that the whole record will be clear.

The CHAIRMAN: Before we go any further I should like to refer to the statement made by the leader of the opposition. This sugar discussion has been taking place on several occasions. It is an important question, and perhaps it would suit the convenience of hon. members and the minister if we disposed of the sugar question first.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister referred to the curtailment which is to take place in various lines of production, but he did not say anything with regard to a curtailment in the consumption of sugar permitted for the commercial canning of fruits and for the making of jam.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no limit for commercial canning.

Mr. STIRLING: Or for making jam?

Mr. ILSLEY: Or for jam making, no. There would be a limit on account of other factors, such as the amount of fruit available; but they can get the sugar that is required.

Mr. STIRLING: There is a cut of thirty per cent in sugar for use in the making of soft drinks.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. STIRLING: But the cut to the housewife who does her own canning is a great deal worse than thirty per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no cut below last year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The canning factories have to use a thin syrup; they are not allowed to use a heavy syrup—

Mr. ILSLEY: They have to use a thin syrup.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is their cut?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think it is realized by the people of Canada that the difficulties we are experiencing because of the rationing of sugar arise out of the sheer stupidity of the men who have been in charge of this country for the last six years. I can support my stand very easily. There is no reason in the world why Canada should not be producing all the sugar that Canada needs.

Mr. MacNICOL: Absolutely none.

Mr. BLACKMORE: As far back as 1936 I began to draw to the attention of hon. members the danger we were running into by reason of a war restricting the amount of sugar which could be brought into this country. Generally speaking, whenever I made such a remark some of the wise men on the Liberal side passed my warnings off very lightly. Oh, they were buoyant in their disregard in those days. Now we see the country in the difficulties which their buoyancy and simple-mindedness have run us into. I wish to point out that there was plenty of time in 1936 to have made provision for all the sugar which Canada would need, and anyone with real intelligence and the disposition to use it could have seen at that time that there was serious danger of a war. I rose in this chamber in 1937, and again in 1938 and 1939, and I pleaded with hon. members and with the government to increase sugar production in Canada. Not a word was said in reply—not one. In 1941 I had to rise in my place and devote a considerable amount of attention to the problem of sugar, because it was proposed by some all-wise individual in Canada that we restrict by 1,300 acres the amount of sugar beets which could be planted in the southern Alberta area.

Mr. MacNICOL: Surely not restrict the production?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes. It was only after a great deal of effort that certain stupid men could be brought to see that such restriction was really wrong and that the 1,300 acres should be permitted to be grown.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are the farmers of southern Alberta actually prevented from raising all the sugar beets they wish to raise?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Oh, undoubtedly. The hon. member will find in Hansard of April 3, 1941, my speech dealing with the whole question, if he is interested enough to look it up. That was actually proposed in Canada, and but for a good deal more effort than should have been necessary it would have been adopted.

I believe it is time that we as members of the house and the people generally in Canada should begin to recognize that it is a good thing for a country to be producing what it needs. Generally speaking, people admire the mixed farmer; they generally rejoice over a mixed farming area, and those areas as a rule are more stable than one-crop areas. Now, Canada is far from stable economically. But we are in a position now to start over again. At least we can begin to start to plan over again. I hope that by some means we can manage to prevent the people who have charge of the planning policies of this country from developing such fatuous ideas about the national economy as have prevailed since 1935, such ideas as that we ought to specialize in one, or two, or three or more commodities and import just as much as we possibly can, so that we can export. Why were we supposed to restrict our sugar production in this country? Why? So that we could sell salt fish to Cuba. It sounds most attractive now, does it not,—salt fish and potatoes to Cuba? And in order to be able to sell salt fish and potatoes, we were to restrict the development of the beet sugar industry in Canada. If you can imagine anything that looks more stupid in the light of what has happened since, come around and tell me about it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Unless you happen to be catching fish.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to point out furthermore that it was possible for us to have brought into Canada in the spring of 1941 two big beet sugar factories. They would have been producing sugar in the fall of 1941. There are areas in the province of Alberta in which those factories could have been established, and sugar would have been coming on to the market greatly to the relief of the sugar situation in Canada. Now it may seem impossible for hon. members to believe this, but I personally went to members of the government and urged upon them the advisability and the necessity of allowing those two factories to come into Canada and of setting up conditions and circumstances which would assure them of getting a market if they did come in; but I was met with a courteous disregard. Not only that: in the spring of 1942 we could have had another factory, but the government let it go. I wonder how long the people of this country and the members of this house are going to submit to a management of the country's affairs so open to question as this kind of thing is.

I thought it was fitting, Mr. Chairman, that we should do a lot of thinking about this matter before we left the subject of sugar.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, at the risk of enhancing my reputation for stupidity I should like to point out two or three qualifications of the hon. gentleman's remarks. I do not think anyone ever suggested that Canada should or could put herself in a position to supply all her requirements from beet sugar production in Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because the economic sacrifice involved in so doing would be too great. The opportunity for expansion is not there, except at a tremendous cost. At the present time, or before the war, if I remember correctly, the total proportion of sugar derived from sugar beets in Canada was about 15 per cent, and it rose to about 18 per cent. Of course there is a vast difference between that and 100 per cent; and certainly I never heard it suggested by the hon. gentleman or anyone else that it was feasible to fill that gap between 18 and 100 per cent. Those who have advocated a subsidized and greatly expanded programme of sugar beet production in Canada have been ambitious to get it up to a little higher figure; that is all. If that all along has been the only policy which would be arguably sound, I think the hon. gentleman's assertion that if we had been supplying a larger part of our requirements from beet sugar production we would have had more sugar for use by the civilian population is incorrect, because the amount of sugar we are able to get from abroad takes into account the amount of sugar which is available in Canada, and if we were to double our beet sugar production in this country we would be denied a proportionate amount of cane sugar by way of importation. So that the results of the ineptitude of ministers and governments and so on, if such it were, are not the results which the hon. gentleman has portrayed so feelingly. It would not have meant that we would have had more sugar; it would merely have meant that a larger proportion of the same amount of sugar would have been grown here instead of being imported.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the minister ought to explain the statement he made that it would be impossible except at very great cost to produce Canadian sugar in Canada. Before he starts to meet my contention—

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not intend to start.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then he has made a statement which is utterly unsupported and unsupportable.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, sir; utterly unsupported and unsupportable. I doubt if there is a province in Canada in which a sugar factory could not be established.

Mr. MacNICOL: We have them in Ontario.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Certainly they could be established in Ontario to supply all Ontario's needs, and certainly in Manitoba; and in the Carrot River valley in Saskatchewan I am told the same could be done. In Alberta fifteen factories could be operated, each of which would supply five per cent of Canada's total needs. I am positive that a sugar factory could be established in British Columbia, and I have had representations from Nova Scotia to the effect that they could establish one successfully there. Under the circumstances, I wonder how the minister can support his claim that it would be too costly. Let me give him another thought before he attempts this task, which he may rush into, because he has got into the habit of recklessness in the matter of sugar.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why were they not established?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Because sufficient encouragement was not given.

Mr. ILSLEY: Who would pay for the encouragement?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The encouragement could be paid for very easily.

Mr. ILSLEY: By whom?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I happen to come from an area where sugar is produced and I know a few things about sugar. All the minister has to know is this—and I have already pointed this out to the house! In the Raymond area, where I was living when I was elected, the sugar factory sold its sugar at just about four cents per pound in 1937 to the wholesaler. That is so cheap that the prospect of buying sugar at four cents per pound must appear to the people of Canada as utopian. They sold their sugar at four cents a pound and the factory made $155 an acre gross for every acre that was used in the production of sugar beets. If that is not enough to show that sugar can be produced economically in Canada, there must be something that I have overlooked, and I do not think there is. All that would have been necessary would have been to guarantee to the producers of sugar beets access to the Canadian market first. That is all. As matters were, it was so easy for the Department of Finance or the department of inland revenue to change a certain duty ever so little, and thereby admit sugar from cane producing areas at an exceedingly lower rate to destroy the beet sugar production enterprise here. A great many people had to abandon the idea of going in for the production of beet sugar, which otherwise they would have undertaken.

I think it would have been found that the economic advantage to Canada which would have accrued from the raising of our own sugar beets and the production of our own sugar would have been so great that it would have doubly compensated us for any possible expenditure which we might have had to make as a government to protect the beet sugar industry.

Let me give one example. A 1200-ton slicing capacity mill at Raymond in my constituency is estimated by responsible American authorities to be capable of keeping 10,000 people; not only those who grow the beets and those who process them in the factory, but those who produce the coal and the various other items that contribute to that processing, those who haul the beets, those who care for them, those who take care of the live stock which are produced in a beet sugar area because of the abundance of feed there; hay grown in the crop rotation in preparation for the beets; beet pulp, beet tops, beetalasses, and so on. When all these factors are taken into consideration it will be seen that a 1200-ton slicing capacity mill will keep 10,000 people. We were keeping people on relief in Canada year after year and paying for it out of the dominion treasury as well as out of provincial and municipal treasuries. That is one simple example. Moreover, we were losing all the revenues that would have gone to the railways for the hauling of the beets and the hauling of the sugar and all that sort of thing.

Even these two considerations will constitute a serious obstacle for the minister to climb over in establishing his contention that Canada could not on economic grounds afford to have produced her own sugar.

Let me make one more observation before I resume my seat. We have been hearing a good deal lately about the food conference at Hot Springs, Virginia. The most important pronouncement that came out of that conference was that never yet had mankind produced enough food. They omitted, I grant, to say something else of equal importance, if not indeed of greater importance, namely, that never had mankind been able to pay for the food that it had been able to produce. They did say, however, that mankind had never produced enough food, and they urged that every means be taken to increase the food production of the world in every country. If their advice means anything at all it should mean that in Canada we should increase our food production, and among the foods which should receive first consideration, apart from commodities which we now produce in abundance, such as wheat and other grains and vegetables, beet sugar should be prominent.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I should not like the remarks of the hon. member for Lethbridge to pass without in a measure agreeing with his general premise, but I am more particularly anxious to emphasize, or at any rate to confirm, the view which the hon. member took back in 1936, that our country should see to it, in the interests of the generations that will come after us, that in the supply of all necessary commodities, and particularly foodstuffs, for every individual commodity we should at least have some source of supply, even though that source might be very limited in comparison with requirements. At any rate, our country, Canada, should have a spot where that particular commodity might be produced, and I say that Alberta is such a spot for sugar.

I rise now merely to emphasize the hon. member's remarks. Coming from the central province of Ontario, I commend to the consideration of the house his remarks of 1936 and his consistent and continued argument from that day forward, because, in common with members from Alberta, I would point out that in western Ontario at Wallaceburg, and in the counties of Essex and Kent and through that area, we are able to produce a certain amount of this particular commodity. The economics of production is another matter. If we had a world-wide free interchange of all commodities the situation would be different. It is perhaps not feasible or economically possible to produce our own requirements in certain lines within the confines of our own country. It is probably true that sugar can be produced more easily and more economically in the West Indies and other areas closer to the equator than it can be produced here; but if future events should once more give people the disposition to become more self-sufficient than is the case at present we may be forced into the position of keeping lit the embers of the fire which made it possible for us to begin the production, within the confines of our own country, of a very necessary commodity such as sugar. I believe the hon. member for Lethbridge deserves the commendation of this house for the effort he has put forward, ever since he has been a member of this chamber, in keeping to the fore the possibility of Canada producing her own sugar requirements. It is true, as the Minister of Finance has said, that our own production amounts to only fifteen per cent of our consumption at the present time, but still that fifteen per cent might sustain us should the world economic position become so desperate that we would have to depend upon Alberta or Ontario for our sugar requirements. But apart from the economics of the situation there is the fact that 10,000 people can be sustained by this industry within our own country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is by just one factory.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): As the hon. member says, that is in connection with only one factory; and before we are very much older the day may come when we shall be happy to find employment for 10,000 of our citizens, whether in Alberta or in Ontario. Further than that, we must keep our transportation system going, and any little help it may get from the sugar industry in connection with transportation from Alberta to the consuming centres of Ontario and Quebec might help out very considerably.

I am very anxious, as I am sure the Minister of Finance is anxious, that the observations of the hon. member for Lethbridge should be borne in mind in the days to come, so that we may give some thought and study to the development of another necessary industry within our borders, not only to keep our own people employed, not only to maintain a balanced national economic system, but also in order that those of our people who desire to exercise their talents in this particular branch of industry may have an opportunity to do so. We must produce sugar for our own needs; and while it is true that the larger part of that sugar comes from other parts of the world, I believe we should maintain some production in Canada. The efforts of the hon. member for Lethbridge in connection with the production of sugar in Canada have been really worth while. I believe they will find a ready echo in the western part of Ontario, particularly in the counties of Essex and Kent, and more particularly in the town of Wallaceburg, whose refineries have been idle oftener than they should have been; as well as in the city of Chatham.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I think I should keep the record straight and talk about the sugar industry for a moment or two, since the question has been discussed at some length by the hon. member for Lethbridge and the hon. member for Danforth. It does seem to me that we should settle once and for all whether or not it is economically sound to produce our own sugar in Canada; for this question has been bandied around the house ever since I came here, in 1935, and for many years before that. Neither this nor any other government of Canada has given much encouragement to the production of sugar beets in Canada, though I have no doubt that from an economic point of view, we cannot compete with the sugar cane industry of the West Indies, Cuba or some of the other southern islands, so far as price is concerned.

The previous speaker mentioned the counties of Essex, Kent and Lambton, and referred to the sugar refineries in that area. It is true that we have two modern sugar refineries there, capable of processing approximately 40,000 acres of beets annually. This year, in spite of all the efforts that have been put forth, only about 10,000 acres of beets, or perhaps less, are being grown. If another 30,000 acres were produced we would be able to produce approximately 75,000,000 pounds more sugar in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask why that is not being produced?

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I was just coming to that. The contract that has been offered to the growers is very good, probably fifteen or eighteen per cent better than last year, but there are several factors entering into it. From the point of view of returns, sugar beets must compete with such crops as corn, soya beans, white beans and so on, which probably would not give an equal gross return, but which probably give an equal net return. The question of labour also enters into the problem. It is difficult to guarantee sufficient labour to stimulate the production of this additional 30,000 acres of beets.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is mostly labour, is it not?

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Labour is one problem.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is the main problem.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): The price is another factor. This year, on a sixteen per cent sugar content, these sugar beets would give the grower a gross return of approximately $100 per acre, and the average sugar content of the beets in those southern Ontario counties over the past ten years has been approximately sixteen per cent. But that return was not sufficient, particularly in view of labour difficulties and also having regard to other field crops, to bring about the maximum production of sugar beets in this country.

I do not know just what is the solution. It has been stated publicly that if we produced an additional 75,000,000 pounds of sugar we would have ample for our own use. That may be true, but, as the minister has said, if we brought about that additional production we would get approximately that much less from the United States. As the minister explained, our policy is coordinated with that of the United States in regard to sugar. Formerly we obtained the great bulk of our supplies under a trade treaty with the British West Indies. That has been cut off, owing to the lack of shipping space, and also to the fact that most of the south Pacific islands are in Japanese hands, and now our sugar comes from Cuba, whose production is controlled by the government of the United States. So that now we buy our sugar through the United States, and if we produced an additional 75,000,000 pounds of our own we would probably get that much less from the United States. Our 75,000,000 pounds would simply go into the pool, to be divided among the people of Canada and the United States, and this would not make a great deal of difference to the average person who is doing some canning, or to the amount of sugar the average purchaser would get.

What I rose to say was that the sugar beet industry has been bandied around for a long time. The government of the day should make up its mind whether it wants sugar beets to grow in this country, or whether it does not. That is something the government does not seem to be able to do.

Mr. LALONDE: Last night the Minister of Finance promised that he would put on record certain figures respecting tire sales in the district of Mont Laurier. Would he be good enough to do that now, if the figures are not confidential? Then, is it true that the central office of the wartime prices and trade board in Montreal, Quebec or Ottawa establishes a quota on sales of tires in each territorial district? If so, how does that quota operate?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I cannot explain the operation of the quota very well, because it is established by the rubber controller rather than by the wartime prices and trade board. The rubber controller is an official of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

I would have to take out of the police report the figures for which the hon. member has asked. I do not think I should place on the record the figures showing the sales of half a dozen competing garages. I believe, however, that I might place on record the percentages, so as to bring out the point I made last night.

I said last night that the sales in 1942 by the Laurin garage were sharply up from the previous year, whereas the sales of the other five garages were sharply down. That is correct. The percentages I shall give are only approximate, and they may be slightly misleading because the fiscal years of the various garages are not the same. One would run from April to April, another from November to November; another would be the calendar year and so on. But approximately it would be true to say that sales of tires and tubes of the Laurin garage were double in 1942 what they were in 1941, or that they were 200 per cent of the 1941 figure. The 1942 sales of the Gaston Forget garage were approximately twenty-five per cent of the 1941 sales. It is, however, fair to say that this percentage does not cover quite a twelve-month period. The 1942 sales of the William Grenier garage were approximately thirty per cent of the 1941 sales. The 1942 sales of the Grenier Brothers garage were approximately twenty-five per cent of the 1941 sales. The 1942 sales of the Vanchestein garage were approximately forty per cent of the 1941 sales. The 1942 sales of the Brisebois garage were approximately eighty-five per cent of the 1941 sales.

These figures had to be picked out of a confidential police report and converted into percentages. As I have said, allowances will have to be made for differences in the fiscal years, and in at least one case a period shorter than the fiscal year has been taken. That affects, of course, the validity of the comparison.

Mr. LALONDE: I thank the minister for this information. While we are on the subject of tires, I would point out that in my humble opinion the establishment of a quota for each district may lead to some misunderstanding. In fact, my information is that if a customer comes before the representative of the wartime prices and trade board with an application signed before a friendly garage, the quota is open to him. But if he comes with an application signed before a garage not friendly to the representative, then he is told, "Too bad, my friend; the quota is exhausted." I have received many complaints from my district regarding the handling of tire sales permits. The figures given by the minister this afternoon are an explanation of what has happened in my constituency. I am not surprised to see that the Laurin garage percentage has increased to the extent indicated, because Laurin and the representative of the board at Mont Laurier are very close friends. If the investigators of the wartime prices and trade board wish to make any further investigation, they would do well to see a certain number of persons in my district who would be only too glad to state that when they went to the representative's office with an application signed by a garage other than the Laurin garage they have always been told that this famous quota is exhausted.

I urge the minister to find a means of cutting down this practice which seems to be open to representatives of the calibre of the one at Mont Laurier. I thank the minister just the same for the trouble he has taken, and I would sincerely hope that in the near future he would keep a tight grip on the arrogant bureaucracy now prevailing in the district of Montreal, so far as the wartime prices and trade board is concerned.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I have here a letter dated June 18, 1943, sent out by a large wholesale clothing company to all its branches. It is as follows:

> There has been a ruling just put into force by the wartime prices and trade board saying that our khaki tropical worsted can be made in air force officers uniforms only. So if you get an army man or a navy man wanting a uniform of the wool tropical do not take the order, as we are not allowed to make them. The government is supplying the cloth, and they are reserving it for the air force only.

Why should the wartime prices and trade board discriminate against the army and the navy? Is it because the air force has such a pull that they can get that kind of goods, while the other armed forces cannot? These are materials for officers' uniforms. Surely there must be some explanation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this from a wholesaler?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is from a wholesale house to its branches. Officers of the army—I do not know about the navy—are pretty well upset about it and are wondering why a ruling like that should come out from the board.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to get information about that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I mentioned the matter when the estimates of the Minister of Munitions and Supply were before us. It is something that should be cleared up at once, because there should be no necessity for these officers to go around in heavy uniforms if they can get the others. There should not be that type of discrimination. Officers of the air force are allowed to have bellows pockets in their uniforms, but the officers of the army or the navy are not allowed these. Uniforms fit better with this type of pocket, especially when an officer is carrying his order book or anything else in his pocket. I think the minister should look into the matter at once.

Last evening the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) stated that many employees of the wartime prices and trade board were receiving salaries of $4,000 or more. I do not object to their receiving salaries of that kind, although some of these men perhaps were not receiving any salaries in 1939. Many of them were attending university. I should like to cite the case of a sole proprietor who was doing a business of $30,000 or $40,000 a year in 1939 and taking out of the business only something like $2,500. Anything above that was being put back into the business. This man is not allowed to-day to take out any more than the $2,500, even though he has increased his business, which may be an essential one, to $160,000 or $170,000 a year. I believe there is a point where he can take fifteen or twenty per cent, which would bring him up to $3,500 or $3,600. This man is making for the government $15,000 in excess profits tax and $4,000 or more in standard profits tax, but he is kept down to $3,500. He is not allowed to go up to the $5,000 salary limit, but men in the employ of the government, in the wartime prices and trade board, have had their salaries jumped from $6,000 to $10,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There is one man who had his salary raised from $6,600 to $10,000, and there are others who have had their salaries jumped up, although perhaps not that much.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be a promotion to a different job.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It might be a different job, but this sole proprietor of an essential business is doing a different job. In 1939 he may have been working only six hours a day, but to-day with the lack of help he is working eighteen hours a day; he is sales manager, treasurer, cashier and everything else. He is working for this government; he is working for you and for me, and he should be allowed to jump his salary to $5,000 the same as other government men have jumped theirs. If one man is allowed to do it, another man should be allowed to do it.

It is up to the government to see that these sole proprietors are not discriminated against. I know of two or three cases, but I have this one particularly in mind. I have not given the exact figures, but they are pretty close. This man has been held down to $3,600 and, as I said before, he is making for the government $15,000 in excess profits tax and $4,000 in standard profits tax. In 1940 about all the government got was the income tax on his $2,400 salary.

Mr. ILSLEY: This scarcely comes under the resolution. For a while I thought the hon. gentleman was discussing salary control, but apparently he is discussing the administrative practices of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is salary control.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not in the ordinary sense. Just let me make it clear. The sole proprietor is getting no salary because he is employer and employee in the one person. The only importance of the point at all is for tax purposes—how much will the Department of National Revenue allow him to call salary for taxation purposes? It is not a question of salary for salary control purposes; it is merely a taxation problem, and it would not come under this resolution.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It comes under the wartime prices and trade board; they are the ones who regulate salaries.

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not have anything to do with salaries; the salary controller does not have anything to do with this kind of thing. It is a matter of what the income tax branch will allow to be called salary for the purpose of computing the taxation of the company. That does not come under wartime prices and trade board; it is a matter for my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Must your department go to the income tax commissioner when it jumps up a salary from $3,000 to $5,000 or $10,000, or do you just go ahead and do it?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is not talking about the salary order; he is talking about the relationship between an employer and an employee. The salary in that case would be subject to the provisions of the salary control order. This matter is administered by the commissioner of income tax, who has a board to assist him. I do not want my hon. friend to get the idea that salaries are being jumped in the civil service. Where there are promotions, the appointees take the salaries of the higher positions. I may say that there has been a great deal of criticism, amounting almost to resentment, because of what is alleged to be harsh treatment accorded to the civil service. I would be glad to have my hon. friend's rebuttal on that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I said that I did not object to the salaries being paid, but I said that they should all be equal. If you give it to one, you should give it to the other.

Mr. ILSLEY: The same principles are applied.

Mr. SENN: Among other duties, I believe the wartime prices and trade board is charged with the responsibility of making decisions in connection with prices of foodstuffs. I think it was in February when the minister made a statement about the relationship between the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Agriculture, particularly the agricultural food board which has been set up by that department to deal with questions relating to foodstuffs, food production and distribution. It was apparent from the minister's statement that there has been a certain amount of overlapping and uncertainty, and even open conflict, with regard to the jurisdiction of these boards. The minister stated that there had been a blurring of the lines of responsibility between the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Agriculture and that there had been detailed consultations between the departments concerned. He stated also that as a result of conferences between the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and himself, a full understanding of the responsibilities of the two boards had been reached and overlapping had been eliminated. He then gave a detailed statement as to the authority of the two boards. He said that the wartime prices and trade board was charged with (1) responsibility of estimating and defining the over-all domestic needs for food; (2) responsibility for import and distribution of food; (3) final responsibility in all matters of price and final responsibility in all matters of consumer rationing.

The duties of the agricultural food board were defined as follows: (1) responsibility for maintaining and encouraging production; (2) consulting with the wartime prices and trade board as to subsidies and price adjustments; (3) recommendations to council re producer subsidies; (4) the exportation of foodstuffs, and (5) the diversion of foods to the armed forces.

In passing I should like to point out to the committee that these two boards, with a number of other agriculture boards, deal with farm problems; at least, they deal with farm prices. They influence farm income; in fact they practically control the whole economic set-up of agriculture to-day in Canada.

The finance minister stated in February that this division of authority was clear, but I am afraid that overlapping and misunderstanding are bound to continue. Several members of the different agricultural boards have just recently appeared before the committee on agriculture and colonization, where questions were constantly arising which had to do with the functions of the wartime prices and trade board and the relationship of price to production. The reluctance of the members of these agricultural boards to make any statement regarding the activities of the wartime prices and trade board was sufficient evidence, to my mind at least, that misunderstandings still exist and that there is not yet a clear division of authority.

The most important factor to be considered in the encouragement, maintenance and increase of production, which is stated to be the first function of the food board, is necessarily that of price. If prices are not satisfactory, production cannot be maintained, let alone be increased. No one knows better than the Minister of Agriculture that this is so; for, speaking in the house on the demand for greater production of cheese some time ago, the minister instanced how the price of cheese in the winter months of 1941-42 had been raised to stimulate production, and he gave figures to show that when the price was raised, production increased substantially. If price is the main factor, how can the food board and other agricultural boards function properly to maintain and increase production, if price is controlled by another board over which they have no control, and which they can only consult.

I am firmly of the opinion that any control of the price of farm products should be vested in the boards which are responsible for the encouragement of production. The food board and other agricultural boards should be in the best position to deal with matters of price and production. Price and production go together; they cannot be managed by separate authorities. I believe that if price control of farm products had been vested in agricultural boards much dissatisfaction and uncertainty would have been avoided.

No one will deny that the price for farm products should be sufficiently high to cover the cost of efficient production and give a reasonable profit to the producer.

Nor can it be denied that in many lines of farm production the price ceiling as established by the wartime prices and trade board on the finished product has not been high enough to create a proper relationship between the price paid to the farmer for his goods, and that of the goods which he must buy. I have stated on more than one occasion that price control is necessary. We cannot allow inflation to run riot. But I am equally certain that price ceilings on farm products should not be imposed which do not establish parity as between the farmer's prices and those of other products. I therefore reaffirm my belief that one of two courses should have been followed by the wartime prices and trade board. The first one would be that until prices of farm products have risen to the point where there is parity, no price ceiling should be established on foodstuffs which come from the Canadian farm; or, second, ceilings providing parity should have been set up in the first instance. It is true that the Minister of Agriculture early in the session gave certain figures, which appear in Hansard, endeavouring to show that parity exists already. His definition of parity, however, is theoretical and academic. It reads as follows:

> Parity price is the price of the commodity which will give a purchasing power with respect to articles the farmer buys equivalent to the purchasing power of such commodity in the base period.

If we assume for a moment that this is a correct definition, it will be readily seen that a base period during which parity existed should be chosen for purposes of comparison. Certainly farmers will not agree that parity existed at the time chosen by the minister, namely, the period between 1926 and 1929. As a matter of fact, the inequalities in prices which existed at that time, and for years before, was one of the chief causes leading to the depression which began in 1929. The fact remains, however, as the minister knows, and certainly as producers know, that farm prices were entirely out of line in the period chosen, September 15 to October 12, 1941, which served as a basis of present ceilings above which prices of foodstuffs are prohibited from going. It is the season when large quantities of farm products are being marketed and when prices are generally lower than the yearly average. Seasonal conditions are largely responsible for these low prices. It is the period when grain has been threshed, when farmer's commitments become due and when taxes must be paid. He must sell to raise money to meet these demands, and he is convinced that his necessity is often exploited by the concerns that process and market his goods.

I feel certain that the price received from exportable surpluses of farm products would in large measure prevent excessive rises in price, because the domestic price is largely governed by the price received for such exportable surpluses. If shortages arise which might tend to boost prices above a reasonable level, rationing as it is being practised by the wartime prices and trade board would finally effectively control such rises.

The question will then be asked if, when prices of farm products rise to a position of parity in Canada, will that increase the cost of living and create dissatisfaction among the consumers in the urban centres? I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in such cases, instead of providing producer subsidies, which are more or less hand-outs to the Canadian farmer, consumer subsidies should be given, if necessary, to protect the interests of the consumer. We have at the present time one specific example of consumer subsidies which is working satisfactorily. The farmer is fairly well satisfied with the price he receives for milk destined for fluid consumption. The consumer is protected by a consumer subsidy on milk of two cents a quart, which keeps the price to the consumer at a reasonable level. In my judgment the same method should be applied by these boards to other commodities if we are to encourage production, and if price is to be the deciding factor in so doing.

I do not want to carry on to any great extent, but I should like to say that the same conditions that have applied between the bacon and meat board and the wartime prices and trade board exist also with the dairy industry. Milk is processed into a number of products, all of which are important as food. But on these products arbitrary price ceilings have been imposed, just the same as in other lines of foodstuffs. In the case of dairy products, as in the case of bacon, the price realized for the processed article influences in great measure the amount of production in the different lines of dairy products. Instead of prices of dairy products being allowed to find their own level and thus stimulate and encourage production, a rigid control, often unevenly applied, has been practised. I am not objecting to control, but the unevenness of the control is a matter which, I think, should be criticized, and it has resulted in confusion, rivalry and distrust in the dairy industry. It is comparatively easy for milk producers to change the factory to which they send their milk; in fact, they can change overnight from a cheese factory to a butter factory, or to a condensary. Some discussion was had a short time ago respecting the power of the dairy products board or of the food board to determine the destination of the farmers' milk. To exercise such power, even in a roundabout way or by moral suasion, is, in my judgment, interfering too much with personal liberty.

The whole point of the argument which I have been attempting to make is that price ceilings on food should not have been established at levels lower than are commensurate with the cost of production and at levels lower than those set for other commodities which the farmer has to buy. Great care should be taken to study carefully every implication and every possible result of price fixing and control before making an order. Too often after an order is made, some unforeseen complication follows which, in turn, has to be remedied until the whole system is a patchwork puzzle which confuses and discourages the producer.

Agriculture in Canada is fully aware of the vital need of food production as part of our war effort. It has made almost superhuman efforts to produce to capacity. In this it has been blessed by Providence with favourable weather conditions resulting in bumper crops. It has been, however, and is still handicapped by labour shortages and insufficient cash returns.

I once more urge upon the minister and his colleagues the advisability of placing the price structure of food products where it properly belongs, namely under the control of the Minister of Agriculture and the agricultural boards.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I should say at once that I believe that would be a great mistake. It is essential in every price control system that the control of all prices be vested in one body, one authority. If the setting of prices on agricultural products were to be removed from the authority of the wartime prices and trade board and transferred to the Department of Agriculture, there would be an equally good reason for removing control of fishery products from the wartime prices and trade board and placing it in the Department of Fisheries, and, as a matter of fact, for removing the prices of products of the mines and the forests and placing it under the jurisdiction of the Department of Mines and Resources. In fact, the only theory on which there should be that spreading around of authority is that it is desirable to put the control of prices in the hands of persons who are directly concerned with production and who traditionally have concerned themselves more intimately with the interests of producers.

That is a very popular theory, and it does not apply only to farmers; it applies to a great many groups in this country who would like to get their prices away from the wartime prices and trade board. I repeat, they would just love to get their prices away from the wartime prices and trade board, because they would hope to be in a little more sympathetic forum when they applied for higher prices. That would be their reason. I am not saying that against them. I am not saying that against the hon. gentleman who is advocating it. He speaks in this house for the farmers and argues the farmers' case on a good many occasions, and that is his right. But the reason I have given is the reason why these groups want to get somewhere else; they would like to get some place where, they think, they would be dealing with individuals who would be less concerned with control and more concerned with higher prices.

We have to take hold of this thing or drop it. We have to be firm, or we have to be vacillating.

I am utterly convinced of the unsoundness of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Haldimand when he says that we should carve out one set of prices and take that away from the price control authority; because you cannot separate one set of prices from other prices. A great many farm products are used in the production of processed products. Would the price of the processed product be left under the jurisdiction of the wartime prices and trade board when the price of the primary product was placed under the jurisdiction of some other authority? Would the price of competing imports be left under the jurisdiction of the wartime prices and trade board and the price of primary products in Canada be transferred to some other authority? As a matter of fact, if the pace of price control were to be set by various competing authorities, with a central price control authority, the administrative task of the central price control authority would be impossible and they might as well go out of business. That is the reason why I have always urged and argued that there be one price control authority for all prices. I am sure that no other system of price control would work.

With reference to the other point which the hon. gentleman has argued, with regard to parity prices and prices on farm products, I think, if we talked about that, we would talk endlessly. It has been discussed and discussed and discussed in this chamber every time the Minister of Agriculture comes before the house, and I have made some speeches on it from time to time over the last two or three years. It has been repeatedly emphasized by public men in other countries as well as by public men in this country that if you intend to institute price control you have to start some time, you cannot go on partly adjusting before you start. We thought the time had come in the fall of 1941 when we had to start, and, as I said the other day, I am convinced we did the right thing and did it at the right time. We made some adjustments afterwards. We made most of our adjustments by way of subsidies, and the subsidy bill is very substantial indeed. As a matter of fact, the difference between producers' subsidies and consumers' subsidies is not as great as hon. gentlemen seem to think; it is a difference in form rather than in principle. When we pay a subsidy of ten cents a pound on butter we are doing so for the benefit of the consumer, are we not; as much as for the benefit of the producer? The consumer is enabled by the payment of that subsidy to get his butter for thirty-five cents a pound, and the producer is enabled by the payment of that subsidy to get forty-five cents a pound for it. I do not see that there is very much difference in principle, although there is a difference in form, between that and the milk subsidy, which has the effect of enabling the producer to get whatever the price is—say, twelve cents—and the consumer nevertheless to get milk for ten cents a quart.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think the minister meant what would appear to be the natural implication of his last statement, namely, that the farmer is getting twelve cents a quart for his milk.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, less the distribution charges.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister had better make that clear.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is less the distribution charges.

Mrs. NIELSEN: The hon. member for Mackenzie a little while ago suggested that the minister might regard himself somewhat as the father of his country. If he does so regard himself, I believe we should bring to his attention one matter which is of great importance in a country like ours. I have had representations from small retail stores selling children's clothing and children's underwear, and also letters from young mothers-to-be on the extreme shortage of yard goods which are needed for babies' layettes and young babies' clothing. I think the minister is familiar with that square garment which constitutes the major portion of a baby's wardrobe in its early years. Really there is an appalling shortage of cotton goods, mostly flannelette. I had word from one store in Vancouver that they were able to sell only five yards of flannelette to every layette. That is positively absurd, and there are hundreds, indeed thousands of young mothers-to-be who are frantic, because they do not know where to get the material they need. The question of price is also important. Twenty-five or thirty-five cents a yard used to be considered a reasonable price for a good quality of flannelette, and at that price it was decent enough for most mothers; but now the price is roughly fifty cents, which makes the cost of the layette for the working mother considerably greater. Even in the white wool for small coaties for very young babies there is an extreme shortage. This is a matter of importance to thousands of young people, and I suggest that the minister might look into this shortage, particularly of yard goods and flannelette, and see to it that an adequate amount is allowed. I am informed by one retail store in Vancouver that 230,000 yards of flannelette is being released this year, but that is totally inadequate to provide for the number of layettes expected.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been an increasing demand for flannelette, and the board is fully conscious of the present situation and has taken steps to limit the use of flannelette for certain purposes and to order the production of greater quantities. It is a problem with which the board is quite familiar and on which it is working.

Mrs. NIELSEN: What about the price? Does that necessarily have to be greater, or will they keep the price down? At present it is fifty cents and that is exorbitant.

Mr. ILSLEY: Has it increased?

Mrs. NIELSEN: It must have, because twenty-five or thirty cents a yard was all I paid a few years ago.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should be surprised if the price has been increased over the base period. This is a very good illustration of conversations that very often take place. Persons say quite conscientiously that they are sure the price ceiling has been pierced, that the price of this or that commodity has gone up, and when investigation is made it is found that the price is the same as it was during the base period, although it is considerably higher than it was some time prior to that period. I have had the same feeling myself about articles that I have bought; I have thought that the price must have gone up. On looking into the matter, however, I have found that I was paying the price that prevailed in the period between September 15 and October 11, 1941. I do not think there has been any exception in the case of flannelette but I will look into the matter. The officials tell me that there has been no exception of that kind. We have tabled documents showing the exceptions and the adjustments made, and that is not one of them. I do not think it is proper to bring down the price, if it is no higher than it was during the base period.

Mr. WRIGHT: May I refer to a question raised by the hon. member for Haldimand. There are one or two questions I would ask with respect to it. What is the basis of determining the subsidies paid on various agricultural products? Observing these subsidies, it has been difficult for me to find out any basis on which they are paid. It seems to me that the basis has been simply that when a certain product became scarce the department gave a subsidy to secure greater production, and there does not appear to be any basis, or equal basis, for different products, on which the subsidy is calculated. If that is the principle on which the subsidies are paid, then the only way in which agriculture can get a fair price for its products is to have a shortage, and when the shortage becomes apparent the subsidy is immediately paid. That appears to be a poor method by which to get extra production. We are going to be scarce of a good many agricultural products this year. From evidence we have had before the committee on agriculture it is doubtful whether we shall be able to supply the amount required by the British government this year in any agricultural product with the exception of wheat. Certainly in dried potatoes, vegetables, dried eggs and cheese, the situation is doubtful. I doubt whether we shall obtain the production that they require without further seriously curtailing the amount for home consumption in Canada. Price is a determining factor in the amount of agricultural commodities produced. Take eggs. Last winter they dropped nineteen cents a dozen in the month of January, and immediately there was a serious curtailment in the production. While these conditions prevail, unless agriculture is guaranteed a market in which the farmers know they will get a certain price for their products, the production required will not be obtained.

As regards transferring authority for the payment of these subsidies from the wartime prices and trade board to the Department of Agriculture, I certainly think agriculture would get more favourable treatment from the Department of Agriculture than from the board. That does not necessarily mean that the price ceiling would be pierced. You can pierce the ceiling in two different ways, by making articles scarce and by creating a black market, or by the other method. The policy being followed by the wartime prices board is one that is creating a scarcity of agricultural products, and I suggest, therefore, that the basis on which the subsidies are paid should be the cost of production. I have argued this point with the minister before, and he says it is impossible to ascertain the cost of production of agricultural products because every farm is different. They find the cost of production of war goods and pay different prices to different factories on the same goods. I maintain that the cost of production of agricultural products can be ascertained, not necessarily on every farm, but a fair base price could be ascertained and the subsidies could be paid on that basis instead of by the haphazard method by which they are now paid.

Will the minister explain the basis on which the subsidies are paid on different agricultural products and the reason for it? Will he tell us by what method they ascertain the amount paid on any particular product?

Mr. ILSLEY: The recommendations for subsidies have come from the Department of Agriculture since the arrangement which I announced on February 9, 1943, and I do not think I could presume to speak for the Minister of Agriculture or the Department of Agriculture. They make the recommendations to council after consultation with the wartime prices board. They must consult the board, because there are questions of price over which the board has jurisdiction and which have to be discussed, and the subsidies have to be adjusted accordingly. They have to know the background of present operations and plans for the future with respect to price. When the wartime prices and trade board was itself paying agricultural subsidies, it may be true that they were largely concerned with the question of production. That was their function. As I explained the other night, the wartime prices and trade board is concerned with two things; one is the control of prices, and the other is the obtaining of supplies. I presume those would be the guiding considerations in the determination of subsidies. Whether or not the Department of Agriculture works on precisely those principles, I do not know; I presume they try to take a common-sense view of the situation and provide a price which they would describe as fair. Personally I do not know what a fair price is. I know when one is very unfair, and I think I know when one is obviously fair, but I could not put in precise words the determining factors that would lead me to a decision in that regard.

I have argued with the hon. gentleman previously as to the cost of production. I have always thought that in connection with any farm products about which I know anything the cost of production varies from farm to farm, from district to district, and from year to year. It depends upon the weather; it depends upon the efficiency of the operator of the farm; it depends upon so many factors that it is impossible to ascertain except on a very broad average and for a very limited district. I should think that would be true about the cost of production.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister stated that the Department of Agriculture made recommendations to the wartime prices and trade board with respect to subsidies. Are these recommendations accepted? That is the point in which I am interested.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not quite correct. The precise position is that the Minister of Agriculture consults with the wartime prices and trade board and then makes such recommendations to council as he thinks fit with respect to subsidies to primary producers. Whether or not council accepts his recommendations depends, of course, upon the view they take of the matter at the time. They have to give consideration to all the factors involved.

Mr. WRIGHT: Then are we to take it for granted that the Department of Agriculture is responsible for prices?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; prices are wholly under the control of the wartime prices and trade board; that is, the prices that may be charged for the goods in the market; but the payment of subsidies, which is separate from prices, is a matter for council, and the recommendation to council comes from the Minister of Agriculture after the matter has been discussed with the price-fixing authority by the officials of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the wartime prices and trade board anything to do with the regulations of the prices of articles made from magnesium, zinc, rubber, beryllium, titanium, plastics and so forth?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it has everything to do with the prices if they are civilian goods.

Mr. MacNICOL: But not military goods?

Mr. ILSLEY: The price ceiling does not apply to purchases by the Department of Munitions and Supply. They have the right by law to pay more than the maximum price and have done so on occasion when they found it necessary in order to get what they had to get. But more and more they are complying with the ceilings and working very closely with the wartime prices and trade board, giving the board every opportunity to get them the goods at or below the ceiling.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know it is important to get the munitions, but on the other hand a great deal of important material came out before the United States senate committee dealing with patents and so on which indicated that prices were being enhanced through the control of patents, the restriction of production and the control of materials through cartels and so forth. As a result, the assistant attorney general of the United States, Thurman

W. Arnold, appeared before that committee and asked for specific legislation to prevent the United States from being compelled to pay enhanced prices through restrictions on patents and so on. On July 31, 1942, he asked that legislation be passed to prevent—

> . . . the use of patents as an instrument to suppress competition, restrict production or destroy independent business on a scale that substantially interferes with the distribution of any commodity.

And which results in the enhancing of prices. I have been wondering what we have in this country. We do not have a committee set up to go into these matters, as they have in the United States Senate, nor I suppose, have we officials such as they have in that country to control these prices, unless the wartime prices and trade board exercises such control. The minister says it does not have that control in relation to goods supplied for military purposes. It is well known that aviation gasoline, rubber, beryllium, titanium, magnesium, zinc and so on are all under the control of patents and cartels, most of them international in scope. Is Canada being protected now, as the United States is, against the payment of enhanced prices for such articles even if they are required for military purposes? I agree that the main purpose is to get the materials; that is all-important; but on the other hand there should be some control in regard to prices, even where materials are purchased for war purposes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can only repeat what I said, that whether they are cartelized or not, no matter how they are handled or by whom, when they are sold to a civilian purchaser they must comply with the price ceiling. It is well known that this price ceiling runs through hundreds of thousands of different articles, and that they cannot go beyond it. That does not apply, as I said before, to sales made to the Department of Munitions and Supply. As a matter of practice, I think they do buy at or below ceiling prices in nearly all cases. They have their controllers, their buyers, their organizations; they do not pay any more than they have to, but for the reasons I gave the other night and again to-day they are exempted by law from the operation of the ceilings.

Mr. MacNICOL: In connection with magnesium metal they are paying a very much higher price than that given to the house a year ago by the Minister of Munitions and Supply as the price at which magnesium metal would likely be made in this country. Who controls the selling price of magnesium metal made for the Department of Munitions and Supply? Do the producers set any prices they wish? I am quoting from memory and I may be wrong, but I believe the price I mentioned in this house recently was forty cents a pound, or a cent or two one way or the other. That is a very high price for magnesium metal, which was offered to the government by another company at a very much lower price.

Mr. ILSLEY: The price is set by the Department of Munitions and Supply, for reasons which appear good to them.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then there is no control over what is paid by the Department of Munitions and Supply?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not under this legislation. It is controlled by order in council; that is, the contracts are approved by order in council.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is not any control, as we understand it, under this legislation.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: During last night's sitting of the committee, the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre and Vancouver East dealt at some length with the official cost of living index prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics, suggesting that it did not provide an accurate measure of recent changes in costs of living in Canada. I pointed out during the course of discussion that the wartime prices and trade board has nothing whatever to do with the preparation of the index, either directly or indirectly, and that it is based on an independent and scientific analysis by competent statisticians in the bureau of statistics which is responsible to my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

In view of the importance of the index to the government's whole wage and price stabilization policy, I have come to the conclusion, however, that I should not leave these criticisms unanswered. I am afraid that if I do so, hesitation may be interpreted as an admission that there was some validity in the criticisms. This would be most unfortunate and I want to make it perfectly clear that the government as a whole realizes the importance of the index to all those Canadians whose cost-of-living bonus is determined by it and is very much concerned to see that the index is sound and accurate and has the confidence of the public at large.

For this reason I intend giving a fairly comprehensive statement dealing with the preparation of the index. Again may I repeat that the preparation of the index has nothing to do with the wartime prices and trade board or the Minister of Finance. In effect the committee may consider that in dealing with the index

I am speaking on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is unavoidably absent to-day.

First, with the consent of the committee I wish to place on Hansard a copy of a recent bulletin prepared by the bureau of statistics which deals with the technique employed in preparing the cost of living index and which includes a list of the items in the index. Have I that consent? This contains many figures, and it would take a long time to read it.

The CHAIRMAN: If it is acceptable to the committee, it can be placed on Hansard, by unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAYDON: There was a similar occasion when a matter of this kind arose in the house not long ago. On that occasion the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air was placing on Hansard the answers to some questions. At that time I was quite agreeable that he should do so, in order that the time of the house might not be consumed unnecessarily in the presentation of those answers. It was pointed out at that time however, and it should be pointed out again, that if this is placed upon Hansard it constitutes a departure from fairly well established rules.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It can be done only with unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAYDON: I realize that. But in addition to what the hon. member has said with respect to unanimous consent, may I point out that I am anxious to preserve all the formalities which this house jealously maintains and guards. In view of the present stage of the session, if this statement contains many figures and statistical information I believe we might make an exception. But if it is a statement, in the general sense of the term, supplementary to the statement the minister is now making, then I would be definitely opposed to allowing it to go on Hansard, from the point of view of precedent alone.

Mr. ILSLEY: So that there may be no misunderstanding, may I say that this is partly a statement and partly figures. If there is any objection, of course I shall have to read it. It would become part of my speech.

Mr. GRAYDON: I will not object to it. I believe we have protected our position as members of the House of Commons by raising the objection which has been raised. It is distinctly understood that this shall not constitute a precedent in any shape or form?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. KNOWLES: How long would it take to read it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Quite a while. I am making a statement supplementary to it. I take this trouble, because this is a very important matter, and there is wide public interest in it. The bulletin prepared by the bureau of statistics, which I shall now place on Hansard deals with the technique employed in preparing the cost-of-living index, and includes a list of the items in the index. It is as follows:

Appendix

Prices and Price Indexes, February, 1943

Revised explanation and description of the dominion bureau of statistics cost of living index.

Introductory Note:

This memorandum describing the official cost of living index replaces the original statement, the supply of which has been exhausted. The present memo gives more attention to interpretation, and notes several minor adjustments in weights which have been made in accordance with the bureau's practice of keeping the index in line with major changes in consumption.

Purpose:

The dominion bureau of statistics cost of living index measures the influence of changes in retail prices of commodities and services upon the cost of a representative urban wage-earner family budget. The index is specified by order in council P.C. 5963 as the basis for cost of living bonus adjustments authorized under the terms of this order.

Interpretation:

It should be clearly understood that the index is a measurement of price change. Many people use the term "living costs" to indicate the total cost of things they buy. Used in this sense, "living costs" may include different things from month to month and year to year, and likewise different amounts and qualities of the same things. A cost of living index based upon this idea would simply reflect the value of total purchases made by everyone. In normal times it would move closely in line with estimates of national income. The bureau's index is based upon a quite different idea. It measures changes in the cost of a family budget which includes the same amounts of the same commodities and services for considerable periods of time; it is revised only to take account of important "long-run" changes in consumption. It is, therefore, essentially an index which measures changes in prices.

Each index is a percentage which shows the relationship between the dollar value of the index budget for a specified period, and the corresponding dollar value of the same budget in a reference period. The bureau's standard reference period includes the five years 1935-1939. The average value of the index budget for this period is represented by 100·0. The value of the same budget in August, 1939, was 100·8 per cent of the reference budget, and the corresponding value for December, 1942, was 118·8 per cent. These figures become the cost of living index numbers for August, 1939, and December, 1942.

Because August, 1939, the last pre-war month, provides the basis for cost of living bonus adjustments, it is frequently used as a reference period. The procedure in this case is essentially the same as that described above. The value of the index budget in August, 1939, is considered as 100·0, and budget values for other months are computed as percentages of the August, 1939, value. The December, 1942, index then becomes 117·9. Indexes related to the August, 1939, budget value have become widely known as the "adjusted" indexes. They may be computed by dividing the original August, 1939, index of 100·8 into the comparable index for any other period, e.g., the December, 1942, index of 118·8 divided by 100·8 gives 117·9.

The Index Budget:

A complete list of items in the cost of living budget, together with percentages indicating the relative importance of individual items and groups of items is listed below. The basis upon which this list was selected has been described in detail in an earlier release, "Living Costs in Canada, 1940". The index budget represents annual purchases reported by a group of 1,439 typical wage-earner families in the following cities: Charlottetown, Halifax, Saint John, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, London, Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Edmonton and Vancouver. These expenditures covered the year ending September, 1938.

The survey families averaged 4·6 persons and the majority had two or three children. Family earnings in many cases were supplemented by minor sources of income; total incomes for these families were heavily concentrated between $1,200 and $1,600. They ranged, however, from as low as $600 up to about $2,800 per annum. There were approximately two tenant families to every one home-owning family, and about one family in three operated a motor car. The general distribution of living expenditures for these families which represented all the principal racial groups in Canada was as follows:

Urban Wage-Earner Family Annual Living Expenditures
(Year ending September 30, 1938)

Budget Group	Expenditure Averages		Percentage Distribution
Food	$ 443·0		31·3
Shelter	269·5		19·1
Fuel and light	90·5		6·4
Clothing	165·8		11·7
Home furnishings	125·7		8·9
Miscellaneous	319·4		22·6
Health		60·8		4·3
Personal care		23·9		1·7
Transportation		79·3		5·6
Recreation		82·1		5·8
Life insurance		73·3		5·2
Total	$1,413·9*		100·0

* Directly represented in the index. Other miscellaneous outlay brought the total family living expenditure to $1,453·8.

Minor changes were made in the index budget in January, 1943, to take account of war-time changes in consumption and adjustments were made in such a way that the index continues to reflect price changes only. The revised budget measures percentage changes in prices from January, 1943, forward, but does not show increases or decreases reflecting weight differences. In other words, the value of the January, 1943, adjusted budget is exactly the same as the value of the budget it replaces.

The following items have been removed from the revised budget: coke, automobile tires and tubes, steel frying pans and bananas. These are all items which are not available in quantity to the general public. Downward weighting adjustments have been made for tea, sugar and motor operating costs. Weight removed from motor operating costs has been transferred to the recreation sub-group, since the reduction in motor operating costs represents mainly a reduction in recreational driving. The weights of deleted food items and reductions for tea and sugar have been prorated among other items in the food index. No change has been made in weights for coffee and butter. The present weight for butter provides a weekly per capita allowance of only 0·1 pound per week above the ration allowance, and the change involved in coffee would be even smaller. Such changes are not of sufficient importance to warrant weight adjustments. The steel frying pan weight has been added to the weight for cast-iron frying pans. The question of weight adjustments is under constant consideration and other changes may be made and announced from time to time to keep the index budget in line with changing consumption.

Commencing July, 1942, a change was made in the treatment of taxes on cigarettes and tobacco. Prior to that time changes in all indirect taxes affecting consumer prices had been reflected in the index. By order in council P.C. 6219 as amended, the tax imposed on June 24, 1942, on cigarettes and tobacco was excluded from indexes calculated for the purpose of reckoning cost of living bonuses.

The bureau continues to publish in the monthly bulletin "Prices and Price Indexes", a cost of living index which reflects all indirect taxation.

Comments on Group Index Numbers

The index budget is divided into six expenditure groups for which separate indexes are calculated: these are foods, fuel and light, rent, clothing, home furnishings and services, and miscellaneous items. Each group contains a list of items sufficiently large to make it representative of the merchandise field covered. It would be possible to add many more minor items without affecting the movements of the composite cost of living index by any significant amount. These additions would lengthen the time required to calculate the index and impose a greater burden upon firms making price reports, without making a corresponding improvement in the accuracy of the index. In many cases, accuracy might be reduced as comparisons on a quality, or specific quantity basis are not possible over a long period. This would be true of style merchandise such as women's hats, and also for fresh vegetables, which are frequently sold in bunches. The cost of all these omitted items is included in group weights, which represent all expenditures falling within the six groups noted above. The base period food weight of 31 per cent, for example, was reckoned from total food costs reported by survey families, although the food index includes only 45 items which represent about 75 per cent of a representative family's food expenditure.

Foods: Prices used in calculating food indexes are collected on the first business day of each month from approximately 1,600 stores including independent and chain grocers and butchers. Quotations for each of the 45 budget items are averaged and then multiplied by the budget quantity for each individual item to find the cost for that item. These individual cost figures are added together to find the total cost of the food budget; this figure is then expressed as a percentage of the corresponding reference period cost to find the food index.

Fuel and Light: From January, 1943, the fuel and light index has been based upon changes in prices for coal and domestic rates for electricity and gas. Coke prices formerly were included for Quebec and Ontario cities. Separate indexes are calculated for coal, gas and electricity. The two last mentioned are reckoned from monthly bills for quantities which are typical of consumption in the cities represented. The bill for each city is weighted by the number of domestic consumers in order to calculate dominion indexes. The coal index also takes account of typical amounts consumed in different areas and of the population of each city represented in the index. Price changes for coal are related to kinds most used in each area.

Rents: There are two tenant wage-earner families for every home-owning wage-earner family in Canada, and the cost of living index is calculated on the assumption that housing costs generally are reflected in rental trends. Rental surveys are made by the bureau at the May and October leasing periods. Rental agents are asked to report upon the current position of rents relative to those at the preceding lease date, as indicated by their list of rental properties. In the workmen's group of dwellings, upon which the rental index is based, records are collected for houses, flats and apartments. Before reporting blanks are sent out, rent data and property descriptions reported by each agent for the last period are copied onto the new schedule in order to maintain continuity from period to period. The calculation of the rent index is similar to that for the fuel and light series, with two sub-group indexes being reckoned first for houses, and flats and apartments. Very complete weighting data have been used, recognizing the different numbers of each type of dwelling in various centres. Approximately 200 reports from 61 cities are used in making rental indexes.

Clothing: The clothing index has been based upon a carefully selected list of men's and women's apparel. It includes no children's clothing, and omits some items of adult clothing which are of considerable importance, such as women's dresses for afternoon and evening wear, women's hats, men's hats and gloves. Unusual difficulties in maintaining continuous price series on the same quality of goods occur in clothing due to style and seasonal changes which must be excluded from price comparisons based upon quality. The items in the clothing index have been selected to represent the basic materials entering into clothing in approximately the same proportions as they would be found in a complete clothing budget. Some of the items chosen to represent basic materials form a comparatively small portion of a complete budget, but are useful in measuring clothing price trends because of their standard construction. Women's woollen hose afford an example of such items. The index contains 31 items of clothing, piece goods and footwear, and price series for these have been examined individually over a period of years to test their reliability. Most apparel is composed of five basic materials, cotton, wool, artificial silk, leather, and rubber. The bureau has reduced its clothing list on the assumption that 31 accurate price series will measure the trend of clothing prices better than a large list including items which fluctuate widely in price due to style and seasonal factors. Department stores are the source of bureau clothing prices. These distributors handle approximately one-third of the dominion's clothing trade, and make monthly price returns to the bureau, especially designed for the cost of living index.

Homefurnishings and Services: The homefurnishings and services index is a composite of eight sub-groups, including two sets of service costs in addition to actual furnishings. The eight sub-groups are: furniture, floor coverings, textile furnishings, hardware, dishes and glassware, cleaning supplies, laundry and telephone. The complete group accounted for 9 per cent of the base period index budget cost, placing it next to clothing in importance. It approximates clothing also in many details of construction. The data for furniture, floor coverings, textile furnishings, hardware, dishes and glassware are obtained from department stores and the same principle of the representation of basic materials by a comparatively small number of items is used. There are 7 items of furniture, 3 of floor coverings, 4 of textile furnishings, 4 of hardware, 2 of dishes and glassware, 4 of cleaning supplies, 3 laundry rates and one type of telephone service.

Miscellaneous: Five sub-groups, health maintenance, personal care, transportation, recreation and life insurance comprise the miscellaneous index. This list does not exhaust all remaining family living expenditures, but most of those which are left such as church contributions, the support of dependents, bank savings, etc., cannot be treated in the same way as items which are bought and sold. The index takes no account of these items which amounted to only 3 per cent of average wage-earner family living expenditures reported in the bureau's 1938 survey.

The health section is based upon prices for 6 items of household medical supplies, 2 kinds of hospital service, 3 types of doctors' fees, and rates for 6 types of dental service. In view of the stability of fees for doctors, dentists and hospitals, these records are collected only at annual intervals, while medical supplies are priced quarterly. Records for practically all miscellaneous sub-indexes are collected from 23 of the larger cities, chosen to give adequate regional representation.

Personal care costs are represented by 7 items of toilet requirements plus fees for men's haircuts and shaves.

Three kinds of transportation are represented in the transportation sub-group: motor car, street car and railway. The two latter present no special problems, but motor car operating costs are more difficult to measure. The bureau's record is based upon service station prices of gasoline, licence fees, and wage rates for garage mechanics. It is assumed that depreciation is 37 per cent of operating costs, and that for car owners as a group it remains constant from year to year.

The recreation section includes records of motion picture theatre admissions, and newspaper, magazine and tobacco costs.

The life insurance index is based upon premiums for ordinary non-participating life policies, since these appear to give the closest possible approximation to the cost of pure risk. Averages of premiums for ages 20, 35 and 50 years have been used covering the records of 11 large companies.

The Cost of Living Index Weighting System

There are two stages in the calculation of each of the six principal group indexes from which the composite number is calculated. In the first stage, the general procedure is to multiply current price averages by budget quantities. These products are added together and the resultant aggregate divided by a corresponding base period aggregate. The resultant number is multiplied by 100·0 to secure a sub-group index for the current period. This index is then multiplied by a sub-group weight indicative of the cost of goods in this sub-group relative to all goods in the group. When all sub-groups have been weighted similarly, the group index is found by adding up this second set of products and dividing by 100·0. This routine is repeated to secure the final composite cost of living index. The second and third stages of weighting are made necessary by the fact that it is not feasible to include all items in the family budget.

For the expert statistician this is perhaps sufficient, but I feel that the committee would appreciate some general comments of a less technical nature which may help to explain just how the index is prepared and what it means. These are based in the main on information supplied by the bureau of statistics.

The index is a measure of the month to month changes in the cost of living of the average Canadian wage-earner's family. In 1937 and 1938 the bureau made a study of the living expenses of nearly 1,500 Canadian families. These families were specially picked as typical wage-earning families; each consisted of a husband and wife and one child or more. The average number of people in the family was 4·6, and the average family income was $1,453 a year. Officials from the bureau asked these families to keep a careful record of their expenditures during the twelve months from October, 1937, to September, 1938. It was on the basis of these records that the bureau knew how much importance to give to the various kinds of food, clothing, recreation and all other things that come into the family budget. They divided the cost of living up into the six main groups and found that they occupied the following proportions of the average living expenses of the families that were surveyed: food 31 per cent, fuel and light 6 per cent, housing 19 per cent, clothing 12 per cent, home furnishings and services 9 per cent, miscellaneous items 23 per cent.

It has been argued that conditions have changed a good deal since that budget was prepared in 1937 and 1938. There are some goods that cannot be bought to-day, and the purchase of other goods is limited by rationing. I want to make it clear that the bureau takes such changes as these into account. For example, automobile tires and tubes, steel frying pans, and bananas have been removed from the index since they are no longer regularly available. The weighting given to tea, sugar and motor operating costs has been reduced on account of rationing. Some changes in buying habits are so small as to have a negligible effect on the index, and in such cases, of course, there is no point in making adjustment. I should also point out that when the bureau takes an item from the index, that does not mean that the total living expenditures have been reduced. The amount of money that was formerly spent on these articles is regarded as being distributed among other items in the index.

It is important to realize that the index aims to record a fixed standard of living. During the war, and particularly during its early years, many families increased their family income, and as a result have bought better clothes, more expensive food, et cetera. The index does not and should not record higher living expenses due to better living. If it did it would indicate not a higher cost of living but a higher standard of living.

Now, let me revert for a moment to one of the most frequently expressed criticisms of the index. Many people want to know how it can possibly be maintained that the cost of living has only gone up 17 per cent during the war in view of the rise which has taken place in foods. They point to stewing beef which has risen by 78 per cent, lard which has risen by 73 per cent, round steak which has risen by 66 per cent during the war, and so on.

It is perfectly true that those particular foods have risen by that amount, but the committee should remember that they represent only a small part of the cost of living. All foods put together represent less than a third of the cost of living index, and while some foods have risen substantially, other foods such as bread, sugar, et cetera, have remained steady, and milk has actually declined in price. These are important foods, and occupy a much larger part in the weekly family budget than many of those foods which have risen in price.

Foods in the cost of living index have risen by 31·8 per cent since the beginning of the war. This is a substantial rise, most of which occurred before the application of the price ceiling. It is also the part of the cost of living of which the housewife is particularly aware since she sees the effect of it upon her allowance for housekeeping expenses. The other items, which in many households are paid by the husband, have not risen by anything like this amount since the beginning of the war. Fuel and light have risen by 14·1 per cent, housing by 7·4 per cent, clothing by 20·3 per cent, home furnishings and services by 16·7 per cent, and miscellaneous items by 6·8 per cent. The total index has risen by 17·6 per cent since August, 1939, but of this only 2·2 per cent since the establishment of the ceiling.

The point I want to make here is that the cost of food has risen by more than the other groups in the index, and the cost of certain particular food items has risen by a good deal more than the cost of food as a whole. Now many people tend to regard the cost of living as just the cost of food. They forget that the cost of living also includes rent, and clothing, and electric light, and life insurance, and doctors' bills, and many other needs which have increased in price a great deal less than has food.

Another question which is frequently asked concerns the accuracy of the price reports made to the bureau.

The bureau does not rely entirely on reports from storekeepers. In addition to the reports which it receives from storekeepers, it has its own representative in most of the principal regional centres, and it may appoint others before long. These representatives obtain the prices needed each month by personal visits to stores. It may interest the committee to know that these representatives periodically visit smaller towns so as to make a check on the trend of prices throughout the region.

I should now like to say a word on deterioration of quality, which is a live topic at the moment. For many years the bureau has asked firms reporting prices for clothing and home furnishings to make at the same time estimates of any changes of quality in the goods. When the bureau receives a report of a reduction in quality, this reduction is treated just as if it were a price increase of the same amount. The bureau, furthermore, instructs its field representatives to be on the watch for quality deterioration when obtaining price reports.

It must be remembered that there are two types of quality deterioration: that which shortens the life of an article, and that which affects its appearance without shortening its life or reducing its serviceability. If a man finds that a suit now stands only three quarters of the wear that a similar suit used to stand, the cost of his clothes over a period of years has risen, although the price remains the same. It is obviously reasonable to include deterioration of that type in the cost-of-living index. Suppose, on the other hand, the man finds that the suit he now buys is less attractive than it used to be, the material rougher perhaps or with less novelty in pattern but it still lasts every bit as long as it used to. He could not then claim that this quality deterioration had affected his cost of living.

There have been complaints that many cheap lines of goods are now off the market, and that it is necessary to buy more expensive brands. In such cases the bureau puts the price of the more expensive brands into the index. Stores have instructions not to report the price of any article which is not readily available, but instead to send in the price of the next more expensive article that is readily available.

A list of the items included in the index has been published, and comments have been made on the large number of items entering into an average family's normal budget which are not on this list. These omissions may be difficult to understand but the reason is that it is not practicable to get direct price quotations for every item in the family budget. The bureau instead obtains price reports on what are regarded as typical items, "weighting" those prices sufficiently highly to cover all the items that ought to be in the group. I would take as an instance, foods. Many foods have wide seasonal price changes, and as a result the consumption of them varies. People eat them in quantity when the price is low and eat less when the price is high. Shifts in consumption from season to season and year to year, as crops vary, are so great that it is extremely difficult to give these foods a correct degree of importance in the budget. There is also the problem of obtaining comparable prices. Many of the fresh vegetables in particular are not always sold upon a weight basis, so that price changes may actually reflect quantity differences as well. To include these items might well result in the index becoming less rather than more accurate.

The bureau of statistics, therefore, picks out those foods items on which a representative price can be obtained from month to month. The index includes forty-four food items which represent about seventy-five per cent of the total cost of foods in the budget on which the index is based. Those foods on which a price is not obtained are considered to have risen by the same proportion as those foods on which price reports are made.

The bureau has often been asked whether the restricted number of foods in the index makes it less reliable. In order to test this possibility a check was made. An experimental food index was computed on the basis of only fifteen items; round steak, blade roast, rolled rib roast, pork loins, bacon, milk, butter, eggs, flour, sugar, potatoes, corn syrup, marmalade, oranges and lard. This index, with one-third of the items in the official index, shows a wartime rise to May, 1943, of 30·3 per cent, which is only 0·5 per cent less than the increase for foods shown in the official index. I might mention, incidentally, that the number of food items included in the Canadian index compares favourably with those in the indexes of other countries.

Food, of course, is not the only group where difficulty is experienced in getting representative prices. Another difficult group is clothing, which also includes many items seasonal in character. A lady's hat may sell in season at $4.95 and be cleared at $2.98 or less. The same is true of dresses, coats, and many other items. To include prices for these things in the index would cause erratic movements which would not follow the basic changes in clothing prices. Therefore, the bureau has selected a comparatively small list of twenty-nine clothing items which are of fairly standard construction and have no pronounced seasonal price movements. These items represent in proper proportion all the important materials used in making clothing, i.e., cotton, wool, rayon, rubber and leather. The bureau assumes and I think with reason, that the change in cost of these items gives a correct record of the rise or fall in all clothing prices.

Having dealt with the cost-of-living index itself I now wish to make a few remarks on related topics which are more strictly the concern of the Minister of Finance.

In the course of his remarks the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the effect of direct taxes, such as income taxes, on the cost-of-living index. This is a question that is raised from time to time and I think merits a fairly full explanation. The hon. member said and I quote:

> But the bureau apparently does not take into consideration any of the direct taxes paid by the people of Canada. Yet these taxes have increased tremendously, and add to the cost of living.

If the committee will consider the matter carefully I think they will agree that to include direct taxes in the cost-of-living index would be quite inappropriate and would indeed defeat the whole purpose of our wartime financial programme.

The cost-of-living index measures changes in the cost of living of the average wage-earner's family. It is an index of prices like an index of wholesale prices or an index of retail prices. If prices go up the index goes up; if prices go down the index goes down. To the extent that taxes such as excise and customs taxes which are indirect taxes enter into prices, they are, of course, reflected in the index. The only exception to this is the increased war taxes on cigarettes and tobacco which were excluded for a specific and, I think, obvious reason.

Direct taxes, on the other hand, do not affect prices. They are taxes on incomes, that is, they reduce the amount available for spending. If the hon. member's argument were sound that direct taxes affect the cost of living, it would follow that the cost of living of the rich man had risen many times more rapidly than that of the man with a low or moderate income. Equally absurd, it would mean that the cost of living of the man with a family had risen less sharply than the cost of living of a single man with the same income.

I would also point out that if an attempt were made to include income taxes in the cost-of-living index, there would have to be an individual cost-of-living index for each taxpayer as taxes vary enormously from individual to individual depending upon income, family responsibilities and personal circumstances. An average would mean absolutely nothing.

But there is a very much more important reason for not including direct taxes in the cost-of-living index. When, as acting Minister of Finance, I delivered the first Canadian war budget speech on September 12, 1939, I said:

> We shall be guided by the belief that all our citizens will be ready to bear some share of the cost of the war, but we shall insist on the principle of equality of sacrifice on the basis of ability to pay.

If income taxes were included in the index, this principle would be nullified, for since the cost-of-living bonus is determined by the cost-of-living index the bonus would be increased by approximately the amount of the increase in the income tax. Thus people getting the bonus would pay little or no income tax. Furthermore, it is to be remembered that only certain groups are eligible for the bonus. To these, in effect, taxes paid would be rebated, leaving more to be borne by those who are not eligible for the bonus.

The hon. member then went on to say, and I want to deal particularly with this phase of his argument, that "part of the money paid in taxes is being used to subsidize prices. Part of what we pay in taxes is actually part of the price which we pay for some of our food." The hon. member appears to be arguing that the policy of paying subsidies in order to stabilize the cost of living is a case of transferring money from one pocket into the other, of robbing Peter to pay Paul.

The truth is, of course, that subsidies designed to keep down the cost of living serve a very definite and useful purpose and that, used judiciously, they are essential to any general policy of price stabilization, serving the dual purpose of ensuring supply and of protecting the standards of life and of those receiving low or moderate incomes.

A rise in the cost of living produces unequal effects upon various sections of the population. It is true that some individuals might manage to cover the added costs of living by the increases in their incomes resulting from higher prices. Perhaps the unmarried industrial worker drawing cost-of-living bonus would be in that fortunate position. But his fellow worker, married and with a family, is not so well placed. His cost-of-living bonus is exactly the same as that of the single man, yet he has not one but several mouths to feed. A stable cost of living is very much in his interest. It was not overlooked, also, that a rise in the cost of living affects everyone, whereas certain important groups—farmers, small proprietors, pensioners and all those whose incomes make them ineligible—do not receive the cost-of-living bonus.

As to the cost of subsidies, this is borne, not in proportion to benefits received—then it would be a meaningless transfer from one pocket to the other—but like any other war cost, in accordance with ability to pay. The family man who benefits most from stabilized living costs pays his share of subsidy costs not directly in proportion to the benefits received but, on the contrary, according to his taxes, which vary inversely in proportion to the number of his dependents. Rich and poor benefit in proportion to what they consume; they pay in accordance with their income. In other words, the payment of subsidies distributes the burden of rising costs according to ability to pay. Far from being a policy of robbing Peter to pay Paul, the payment of subsidies to stabilize the cost of living is sound and in the best interests of the very groups in the community on whose behalf my hon. friend so often speaks.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister mentioned twenty-nine articles of clothing. Would he give them?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are in the bulletin I have already put on Hansard.

Mr. ADAMSON: It does not include ladies' hats, for instance, which are most intangible?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BENCE: The matter of enforcement was referred to last evening by the hon. member for Lake Centre. The minister also had something to say on that this afternoon, although I think I did not quite follow him. My understanding is that in the first place a recommendation is made by the local investigator that a prosecution be instituted, that the local office sends it on to the provincial counsel, who is a permanent official retained by the government to look after these matters, and that provincial counsel then sends the whole file on to Ottawa, where the matter is dealt with by the enforcement administrator here, who I understand, is Mr. F. A. McGregor. I asked a question in the house on the enforcement division last March. My question was:

What are the names of the administrators and other officials of the enforcement division of the wartime prices and trade board situated in the city of Ottawa?

[Mr. Ilsley]

I was informed in reply that Mr. F. A. McGregor was the enforcement administrator, that he was a permanent official of the Department of Labour at Ottawa, and that there were two other members of the division, Mr. H. M. Brown, deputy enforcement administrator, also a permanent official of the Department of Labour, Ottawa, and Mr. P. J. M. MacDonald, enforcement counsel. My understanding is that one of these three gentlemen is a barrister by profession. It is this board of three which in the final analysis determines whether or not a prosecution shall be instituted.

Under the provisions of the order in council under which the prosecutions are instituted, it is necessary to obtain consent in writing from the wartime prices and trade board or from the attorney general of the province concerned before an information can be laid. The prosecution is a very technical one, and I suggest to the minister that this whole matter should be left in the hands of some competent counsel who has experience in prosecutions and that it should not be left in the hands of this board of three sitting in Ottawa. I say that for a particular reason. I have personal knowledge of one case in which Mr. McGregor insisted on a prosecution despite the fact that he had been advised by the local counsel in Saskatchewan that the consents necessary before the information was laid were not proper consents, and that a conviction could not be obtained. As a matter of fact, because these consents were not proper, seventeen charges were dismissed. I suggest to the minister that since these prosecutions are very technical, as he knows as well as I, if not better, they should be in charge of some man who is well trained in such matters. I am not for one minute suggesting that they have not trained men in the provinces; I know they have in Saskatchewan, but my point is that prosecutions should be in the hands of someone who has a greater knowledge of prosecutions than this board of individuals who reside in the city of Ottawa.

There is another matter. The minister in the course of his statement referred to the fact that a change in the quality was taken into consideration in determining the price, and that, if the quality were inferior the price had to come down in order to keep in line with the price-ceiling policy.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not quite correct. If there is a deterioration in quality and no reduction in price, it is regarded as a price rise, and if that conflicts with the ceiling it could not take place.

Mr. BENCE: If, for example, a certain type of commodity cost $50 in the fall of 1941, and the same commodity, with cheaper materials in it, was constructed to-day, the price could not be retained at the same level; I understand it has to be of the same quality in order to justify charging the same price. That was the original statement contained in the price-ceiling policy which was brought down by the government. It has to be of comparable quality.

Mr. ILSLEY: As serviceable.

Mr. BENCE: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The test is serviceability.

Mr. BENCE: Well, comparable quality means taking everything into consideration, and the minister impressed upon us the fact that it means "serviceable" rather than particularly good looking or anything like that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: The point I was going to make is this. I understand that the quality of gasoline which is sold now is not as high as that sold during the price-ceiling period. I understand that this matter was taken up with the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, because the complaint was that a gallon of gasoline is now of inferior quality, probably for reasons which are beyond the control of the administration; I do not know. But if that is the fact, I should like to know why steps have not been taken to review the cost of gasoline to the consumer, because if with a gallon of gasoline you could go, say twenty-five miles in 1941, and with a gallon of gasoline you can now go only fifteen miles, surely, if the price-ceiling policy is to be retained, some reduction in price should be made.

The other point to which I wish to refer seems to me to be of the utmost importance, and I should like to obtain some information from the minister in connection with it. I refer to the setting of a price. As the years have gone by since this price-ceiling policy was introduced, we have found that it is necessary to depart from it to a certain extent with respect to certain commodities. I have in mind particularly meat. At one time meats came under the original price-ceiling policy of the government, they had to be sold at the same price at which meats of a comparable quality were sold during the basic period. But since that time the whole set-up has been greatly changed, so that now we have prices set for lamb, pork, veal and so on by special orders in council. I wish to know from the minister the method by which it is determined that there should be a change in the price ceiling with respect to, say meat or eggs, because I can see that the whole situation is fraught with a great deal of danger, particularly if the matter is not kept completely secret. I should like to know whether the decision is restricted to a very few people, or whether a number of people are called into consultation, and, generally speaking, just how the administration safeguards the public against the possibility of a change in the price ceiling leaking out before it is made effective.

I know very well that it is difficult to conceal these things. I must confess that I have been somewhat amazed, and have expressed this feeling before, that things which are supposed to be kept in the dark nevertheless seem to get out. For example, a short time before the minister brought down his budget a year ago he announced that the administration did not believe a policy of compulsory savings to be feasible, and yet two days before the minister made his speech in this house last year there was a little write-up in one of the local papers indicating that in all probability a system of compulsory savings would be brought in. I give that to the minister as an indication of the manner in which things may leak out, and I am very much afraid, in connection with the price-ceiling policy, that unless the most rigid control is kept over the matter of the deliberations of the people who have charge of these matters, there is great scope for possible dishonesty. I should like the minister to clear that up, for this reason. In the last few months there have been several changes in connection with the price ceiling on meat and also on eggs, and I have received inquiries from citizens in my own constituency with respect to the manner in which this was done. They have said to me—and I repeat this to the minister —"It is a strange thing that just before there is a rise in the price ceiling of meat, certain people are very active in the meat buying market." They say, "Either they have inside information"—which I am not necessarily suggesting—"or else they are pretty good guessers." I have known in my own city of meat buyers going to the stock yards and buying meat in tremendous quantities just before there happened to be a rise in the price ceiling. The same thing has happened with regard to eggs. I suggest that, in view of the feeling on the part of these people which I have mentioned, the minister should make a statement clearing up this situation.

I give the minister another example of what happened recently, in connection with the matter of eggs. There was a change in the price, I have forgotten whether it was up or down, and in order to ensure that holders of eggs would not make an undue profit, the government agencies, I understand, went to various parts of Canada and purchased as many eggs as they could possibly get from the people who were holding them. One or two persons either became suspicious or had inside knowledge. They held on to their eggs and were able to make a profit, whereas other purchasers of eggs complied with the request of the government that they should be delivered to the administration and were done out of the profit which these other people made. I should very much like the minister to clear up this position, because it seems to me that it is one of the most dangerous angles of the price ceiling policy administration.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the third point made by the hon. gentleman, the importance of secrecy is very well recognized by the board. The officials are sworn to secrecy when they take office, and not only that, but all advisory committees who are consulted take an oath of secrecy. I know of no leaks. The rise in the price of eggs of a cent a dozen, I think it was, was on account of the fact that the Department of Agriculture advanced the price of eggs which were to be exported to Great Britain. I remember the circumstances very well. It was not at all a wartime prices and trade board matter. I do not believe there was any certainty on what was going to happen until it did happen, although naturally there may have been some discussion among officials, including wartime prices and trade board officials. But the rises in prices to which the hon. gentleman has referred are, I think, monthly rises which are public knowledge.

Mr. BENCE: Oh, no. May I say to the minister that it was determined at a certain time that they would put in this policy of monthly rises in prices of meat, but at the time that policy was determined on, nobody outside knew it would be put into effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; that is right.

Mr. BENCE: And so in connection with other matters of the same kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: The fact that there is some activity in buying does not indicate that those who are buying know what is going to happen, nor do intelligent forecasts of the contents of a budget indicate that there are leaks. I do not think there have been any leaks at all since I have been Minister of Finance or, as far as I know, before that. In one of our budgets, an important one, there were fifteen or twenty officials who participated in the pre-budgetary discussions which went on for several months. We were deciding upon very important policies, and there was nothing at all in the way of a leak at that time. But of course the more people there are discussing a move, the more chance there is that someone will drop a word or say something which a shrewd hearer can interpret in a certain way. All I can say is that the importance of the problem is well recognized.

Mr. BENCE: How many persons would know that a price rise would go into effect—change in policy?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how many would know; a few would know. Often it is announced almost as soon as it is decided. The decision is not made until the night before the announcement. Sometimes, in matters of importance, I am consulted and I take the matter to the cabinet. No one knows what the cabinet will do. That does not happen very often. Usually the board makes these decisions itself.

Mr. BENCE: Will the minister say something with regard to gasoline?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that what happened there was this. The various companies had various systems of grading or were selling various grades of gasoline. The oil controller thought it would be better to reduce them all to two grades; accordingly he instituted a system of two grades of gasoline, and the average quality of these two grades is believed to be as high as the average quality of the grades that were sold by the various companies.

Mr. ADAMSON: What are the octane ratings of the two grades?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not in my department but in munitions and supply.

Mr. BENCE: Has the wartime prices and trade board considered the question whether there has been a breach of the ceiling in that direction?

Mr. ILSLEY: The officials are not acquainted with that subject matter. I shall have to inquire.

Mr. GRAHAM: In my opinion the minister has placed on Hansard a very important statement dealing with a matter that has certainly a considerable bearing on the spirit of the people, because, as he pointed out, the price of foodstuffs is something very real to the average housewife. The statement, I am sure, is one from which members of this house will derive much benefit if they will read and carefully digest it at their leisure. I make one suggestion to the committee. Since this is of such great importance, and the matter has such a marked effect on the degree of satisfaction in the country with the government's price control policy, not merely the usual means of publicity should be given it, but some effort should be made to see that it is given wide publicity, and not in the daily newspapers only. What I had in mind was this. There is at present in this city the editor of my own home city weekly newspaper, the Swift Current Sun, of which that community is particularly proud. It has on several occasions won awards of the Dominion and Provincial Weekly Newspaper Associations. That gentleman is here assisting in writing up some of the matters that are of public interest for circulation throughout the weekly newspapers of Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: He does a good job, too.

Mr. GRAHAM: He does a good job, and I warmly suggest to the minister that Mr. James Greenblatt, who happens to be the editor of whom I am speaking, be asked to prepare, in briefer form than the minister has been able to give, a summation of the information given to-night and put on Hansard, and that it be circulated throughout the weekly newspapers of the country. In addition, I hope the minister will be able to find an opportunity of giving the information to farm journals. I know of no class of persons in this dominion who in the last analysis are more important than the housewives—and I am speaking of the war effort. They are an amazing source of strength to the nation, in the towns, the villages and the countryside, and any information that we can give to the housewife, which will enhance her appreciation of the fairness of the laws of Canada at the present time, in the carrying out of the difficult task of maintaining reasonable prices, particularly of foodstuffs, clothing and shelter, will, I am sure, pay dividends in renewed interest and in unity of support of our total war effort.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will take note of the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Last night the minister spoke of the work the housewives did in the way of policing and enforcing the price-ceiling regulations in Canada. I think they have done a very good job. It is most important that the ceiling be maintained and the cost of living kept down if we do not want to have inflation, and anything that will further that end will be of benefit to the citizens. But as goods become scarcer it will be more difficult for the housewives of Canada to play this part. This is the point. They will be told that they have to take this or that at a certain price or go without. There is going to be a difficulty. When information is laid in connection with prices, is the name of the person laying the information made public or is it kept secret?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is secret.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think every precaution should be taken to protect the housewives in connection with the enforcement of these regulations.

Perhaps the minister has noted in the newspapers that one of the controllers in Toronto has called for some kind of rationing of fuel for that city this year. There is no question about it that from appearances the situation is now a very serious one for the people of our city. Here is an interesting headline in the Globe and Mail of June 24: "Fuel oil hopes far from rosy for eastern United States." That is just fuel oil. That is the situation that exists to-day. What is the government going to do? Are we to have a repetition of what happened before, when we were told in the first place that there would be no rationing of butter and two or three weeks afterwards rationing came in? Are we to have the same thing that happened with potatoes, and so on? In my own city the housewives were able to buy only from their own grocer, or if they wanted potatoes they had to buy other food with it, and they were paying as high as five cents apiece. Are we to have that, or are we to have a policy in connection with the fuel situation before it becomes too serious in Toronto. Are we to ration fuel this winter or not? It is about time we had some policy so that the people of my city and the people of the rest of the country will not suffer. Are we to have the same thing that happened in connection with cordwood and wood fuel? That situation has not improved. Let us get something done in time, so that we may know what the situation will be.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the hon. gentleman would expect me to say whether or not any commodity is to be rationed. I would not want to say that, because I do not know.

Mr. LOCKHART: A press report to-day said not.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then is the situation as serious as we think it is? What is to be done about it? Is it to be allowed simply to drift? Who will take charge of it—the wartime prices and trade board or somebody else?

We want to know in time, so that we may make our plans for next winter. This is the time to do it, not after the snow comes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The production and distribution of coal and fuel wood are under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. If rationing should become necessary, I do not know what department would carry it out. There is one rationing authority now in the Department of Munitions and Supply in connection with gasoline and tires.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then there is the other point in regard to housewives who help enforce the ceiling policy.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman will look at the report of the wartime prices and trade board, he will find that at page 66 it is provided that the names of persons furnishing information to the board on enforcement matters are held confidential in the investigations which follow.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In connection with administration costs which amount to $14,300,000, how are the personnel selected? How are those who are to be placed in charge of the various regional offices of the board selected, and what salaries do they receive? This question has to do with the ability of the staff to keep the public informed and to give the public accurate information. There is a multitude of orders in council being passed in regard to prices, and I should like to know what machinery exists in order to keep these officials informed, and what are their instructions with respect to giving information to the public. A person goes to the wartime prices office and asks for some information in regard to what rent should be charged for a room, or what he should do with some surplus coupons, or some other related matter in connection with which they require information. The complaint I have received is that these persons often are told to go and see a lawyer about it, that those in charge of these offices did not know what should be done, and admit it. I should like to know whether those employed in these offices are instructed to do this, or whether there is not some higher official in Ottawa from whom they can get the information they require.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an important system of internal circularization; that is to say, the board orders, instructions and so on are sent round to the staff of the board in all parts of Canada. They are informed promptly as to everything it is necessary for them to know. It might be that some official would not take it upon himself to advise an applicant on some legal question; that sometimes happens, and in a case like that it is better to tell the applicant to see a lawyer than to give bad legal advice.

Generally speaking, appointments to positions carrying salaries of under $5,000 are made by the civil service commission, and to those carrying salaries of over $5,000 by the governor in council. On the question of salaries it might be of interest for me to inform the committee that as of March 31, 1943, those serving without remuneration numbered 259; those receiving over $8,500 per annum, none; those receiving from $5,000 to $8,500, 43; those receiving from $4,001 to $5,000, 83; those receiving $3,001 to $4,000, 174; those receiving from $2,001 to $3,000, 683; and those receiving $2,000 and under, 3,723; making a total of 4,965 at that time. The average salary including cost of living bonus, based on salaries paid during the month of March, 1943, and including those serving without remuneration, was $1,525, while excluding all persons serving without remuneration the average annual salary, on the basis I have just given, was $1,610. Was that the information the hon. gentleman wanted about salaries?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes. The other question whether there is any source to which those in charge of these offices can refer in case they are asked something they cannot answer. Are they instructed to tell people making such inquiries to go and see a lawyer? Is there a source within the department to which they can refer such inquiries?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; they would go to their superiors for information. If their superiors did not have the information, they would apply to their superiors and finally it would be obtained. You know sometimes people ask you the most annoying questions, and I can well understand that an official might hesitate to give an opinion which, unappreciated by the questioner, might have to do with a difficult point of law about which a lawyer should be consulted.

Mr. KNOWLES: You send the annoying question to a lawyer?

Mr. ILSLEY: I never like to be asked for a definite opinion on a difficult point of law, because it is a most dangerous question to answer.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In a wartime prices and trade board press release, dated July 6, I find the following:

Appointment of Irving B. Everett of Toronto to an executive position in the wartime prices and trade board's ration administration was announced to-day. Mr. Everett will be chief of the general section in charge of meat and butter. Mr. Everett is on loan from the Swift Canadian Company, Limited, Toronto, of which he has been sales manager.

I am just wondering how many members of that board have been employed by these packing houses. In my own riding there is a man who has been slaughtering hogs for the last thirty or forty years; in fact I think he had the first private slaughtering place in our district. Now he has been denied a permit to slaughter hogs. He asked permission to slaughter just what one might call the runts in the different pens, and even that was refused him, though they said he would be allowed to slaughter farmers' hogs. It looks to me as though there is some discrimination against the small man who is slaughtering his own animals, or is slaughtering for others. I find this in the Globe and Mail of July 6:

The Central British Columbia Live Stock Association has sent an appeal to the dominion government asking that merchants holding slaughter permits be allowed to issue temporary permits to producers to slaughter live stock for sale to the merchants.

At another point they say:

The wartime prices and trade board recently decreed that slaughtering of live stock for local use in rural areas must be done and stamped by one man. In the Burns-Francois lakes district, the man appointed by the local ration board was the only one who might be said to have an "abattoir"—two poplar trees growing beside a road.

The farmers complain that to obey the order they must in some cases hire trucks or hitch up the old grey mare and cart live stock anywhere from ten to one hundred miles to be butchered at the poplar tree abattoir.

I note that it is creating a hardship throughout the rural district, because these people who are forty or fifty miles, or perhaps more, away from packing houses cannot haul their hogs to those packing houses and then back home again.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Everett, to whom the hon. member referred, is chief of the rationing administration. The rationing administration has no connection with the food administration. It is in the food administration that the slaughtering control rests.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It would be all mixed up.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; they are distinctly separate. The rationing administration is at Montreal, and the foods administration is at Ottawa. They are certainly distinct. It is easy to say that this slaughtering control is in the interests of the packers, but the fact is that some slaughtering control is absolutely necessary to make the rationing of meat a success. To show how far they go in some countries, I would point out that in Great Britain they reduced the number of slaughtering places by ninety-five per cent.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes; but they have not the distances that we have in Canada. It is altogether different over there. The whole country could be put in Ontario.

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not go to anything like the lengths they have gone over there.

Mr. BENCE: Might I ask a question at this point about the construction of the new wartime prices and trade board temporary building in Ottawa?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: Did the minister consider the advisability of the erection of this building?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I did.

Mr. BENCE: In the minister's opinion, in view of the fact such a tremendous amount of lumber and materials are required for construction, might not some alternative plan have been arrived at, rather than use up all these valuable materials and man-power. Was the situation thoroughly canvassed as to whether or not these various parts of the board could not have been left where they were, or put in other places, either in Ottawa or in adjoining cities?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sure the hon. member has no conception of how thoroughly that situation was canvassed. I can say it was canvassed very thoroughly. The wartime prices and trade board was at that time in twenty-two separate places in Ottawa. They were spread around throughout the city. We were trying our best to send as many branches or divisions out of the city as we could. For instance, the rationing administration, with a tremendous personnel, is established in Montreal. But we can go only so far in that direction. It was expensive and it was inefficient. It was a waste of time, money and everything else to operate in that way, to have one administration here and another there. I came to the conclusion it was necessary to have these branches together, under one roof, if possible.

Then the question was raised: Where? That was discussed very thoroughly. The proposal eventually adopted is by far the cheapest of the alternative proposals considered—and several were considered.

Mr. O'NEILL: Is the slaughtering of hogs on the quota basis in British Columbia, and are the accredited abattoirs under the control of the packers?

Mr. ILSLEY: The quota that can be slaughtered is fixed by the meat board, formerly known as the bacon board. Is the hon. member talking about hogs alone, or does he include beef as well?

Mr. O'NEILL: When the slaughtering of beef animals was first considered it was put on a quota basis. That is to say, if a certain company slaughtered a thousand animals last year they were permitted to slaughter whatever percentage is allowed them this year. For instance, if it were ninety per cent, then they would be permitted to slaughter 900 animals.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. O'NEILL: But that system was abandoned. At the present time while there is a quota, that quota is not divided among the packers on the same basis as it was last year. They are allowed to slaughter so many cattle. But there is no certain quota fixed for any one company. I was wondering if the same thing now applies to hogs, or whether each packer is allowed a certain quota of hogs to slaughter.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a quota for each slaughtering place. For export houses the quota is fifty per cent of 1940, and for others it is seventy-five per cent of 1941. That is fixed by the meat board.

Mr. O'NEILL: What about domestic consumption?

Mr. ILSLEY: The export houses have for their domestic quota fifty per cent of 1940; and the others—those which are not export establishments—have seventy-five per cent of 1941.

Mr. O'NEILL: Are the accredited slaughtering abattoirs under the control of the packers, or are there independent slaughtering houses?

Mr. ILSLEY: There have been 12,000 slaughter permits issued, and there are about forty-five or fifty inspected houses. I cannot imagine that all of them are controlled or owned by the packing industry. I do not think that would be the case at all.

Mr. O'NEILL: I understand that there are only three in Vancouver, two of which are owned and controlled by Canada Packers, Swifts or some of the others, the third one being an independent house. However, I understand that negotiations are under way by the packing concerns to get hold of this house. The government will not permit animals to be slaughtered except in an accredited slaughter house. If the packers own all these places, there will be no place for an independent man to slaughter his stock. The independent man always pays the producer anywhere from two to three cents a pound more than the packer pays. I should like to have this matter cleared up, because it is of great concern to producers in British Columbia.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to get some information for the hon. gentleman. I did not understand that he was asking a question; I thought he was just making a statement. I shall look into the situation.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister will see how the small producer is gradually being squeezed out of existence.

Mr. ROY: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to a particular situation which arises in the lower part of the Gaspé coast where the only means of transport is by water. It may happen that during the season of navigation a merchant may not get in sufficient sugar, syrup and other foodstuffs to last thoughout the winter, and the result is that before spring the population is short of these items. Last fall they could not secure sufficient molasses and sugar to last until the spring. Since last spring some of the ships which used to carry on this trade have been sold to other companies and it is not expected that they will be kept on this route. We are afraid that sufficient stocks of food will not be brought in before the fall to last until next spring. I suggest to the minister that this board should make sure that necessary stocks are delivered to last throughout the winter.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the responsibility of the wartime prices and trade board to attend to the proper distribution of foodstuffs to meet a situation of that kind. I understand that the local merchant makes arrangements for delivery of what he requires, and if he anticipates any difficulty it is open to him to apply to the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. ROY: Will the minister make sure that the board investigates the matter and sees to it that sufficient supplies are taken in before the close of navigation? Orders should be given to the board to proceed with this investigation.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are fully aware of their responsibility in that regard. In view of the fact that the hon. member has publicly called attention to the necessity of seeing that transportation is provided, I am sure that they will give attention to this matter. I shall suggest to them that they do.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Before I ask some questions that I have in mind I should like to say a word of praise to the minister. I am sure he has not expected this of me. I understand in our neighbouring country to the south they have had to make three changes in the gentlemen who have been in charge of their price control. I congratulate the minister upon being so successful in securing the man he did. I disagree ninety per cent with what he says, but I believe he has the courage of his convictions. He has stayed with what he started out to do. However, I would say that I do not think this gentleman has the foggiest notion of what he is talking about in connection with agriculture.

The first question I have to ask is in connection with an order for return brought down on July 1. This contained a number of questions in connection with sugar, but the fifth question asked if women's organizations had been represented at the negotiations that were carried on and, if so, which ones? I know the minister will not have these answers with him, so that I shall give the answer that was given. The answer was that the foods administration, the ration administration, the consumer branch of the wartime prices and trade board and the consumer branch of the Department of Agriculture each had a woman representative attending these discussions. I should like to know who these ladies were, who appointed them and what organizations were represented.

Mr. ILSLEY: The lady representing the consumer branch of the wartime prices and trade board was Miss Sanders. The consumer branch is a voluntary organization of the women of Canada, consisting of about 12,000 in all. The lady from the foods administration was Miss Speers, a nutrition expert and a member of the staff of that administration. The lady representing the Department of Agriculture was Miss Pepper, and the lady representing the ration administration was Miss Archer.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On July 5 I asked this question:

Will salmon be released and distributed for Canadian consumption on a per capita basis to each province?

I was informed in reply that approximately 200,000 cases of canned salmon will be released for Canadian consumption but that the basis of distribution had not been determined. I also asked further questions in reference to canned herring on the same day. The reason I asked those questions was that my information was that last year herring from the Atlantic coast was distributed in British Columbia while all the herring in that province went to the British market. I think the public are entitled to know the answers to the questions, and I must say that I do not particularly appreciate the answers that were given me. I will give the questions and answers:

3. Will canned herring be released for distribution to the several provinces?

The answer to that was:

3. Certain quantities of canned herring are being considered for Canadian consumption but the basis of distribution cannot be determined until the quantity to be available is known.

Then I asked:

4. If so, on what basis?

The answer to that was:

4. See answer to question 3.

Then question 5 was:

5. Will eastern herring be shipped to British Columbia?

The answer to that was:

5. See answer to question 3.

My last question was:

6. Will British Columbia canned herring be released on the Pacific coast?

The answer to that was:

6. See answer to question 3.

British Columbia produces as much fish as any other seven provinces in the Dominion, and my question now is, do the wartime prices and trade board, in their so-called maintaining of the price ceiling and of the so-called cost of living index, believe that herring from the Atlantic coast can be transported to British Columbia, where we produce as much fish as any other seven provinces—those are the figures of the bureau of statistics—and sold there, while our herring in British Columbia is taken overseas and the so-called cost of living index be maintained under those circumstances?

Mr. ILSLEY: As I understand it, nothing is settled about the distribution of herring this year. I think the answer to question No. 5 which my hon. friend has just quoted indicates that nothing is settled. The answer means nothing much more than that the matter is under consideration. The hon. gentleman is complaining that last year some herring from the eastern coast was sent to British Columbia, while British Columbia herring was sent to Britain. I do not know the facts of the case. Perhaps my colleague the Minister of Fisheries has something to do with the distribution of the fish production of this country. I do not know whether he will be able to throw any light on that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: With all due deference to the minister, and I have given credit where credit is due, I do not agree with the cost of living index, and I am doing my best to point out that the figures are not true, when herring from the Atlantic coast can be moved to British Columbia whose fish production is the equivalent of any other seven provinces. My interpretation of the answers that were brought down in reply to my questions is that the wartime prices and trade board—not the Department of Fisheries—determines how and where the fish is to be distributed. I should like to be corrected if I am wrong. May I ask the minister whether fish from the Atlantic coast are to be released for local consumuption on the eastern seaboard, and whether fish from the western coast will be released to that district?

Mr. ILSLEY: The matter is not determined yet. The answers to the questions show that. I rather intimated a moment ago that perhaps the Department of Fisheries has the distribution or allocation of fish under its control. That is not so. The wartime prices and trade board looks after the distribution of fish in Canada, while the Department of Fisheries takes responsibility for the export of fish. The allocation or distribution of fish to meet the demands of the Canadian market is the responsibility of the wartime prices and trade board. What arrangements will be made for the present year remains to be seen. That has not yet been determined.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have another matter to take up with the minister. I have already taken it up with his parliamentary assistant. My information is that on June 21 a firm of canners in British Columbia received a call from the office of the wartime prices and trade board in Victoria that the Department of Munitions and Supply would call for the release of 5,000 pounds of jam for a boat, presumably a naval boat. It is not in the public interest to make the name public. This firm of canners replied that they did not have available that quantity of free stocks, but that they had it in frozen stocks. They were informed that they could not release that amount from the frozen stocks, but that they could from the free stocks, but that if munitions and supply had Ottawa requisition the wartime prices and trade board it could be done. I was informed that that was entirely incorrect. That was the answer given by the department, under date of July 2, at Mission, British Columbia. On the morning of the 21st of June a telephone call was received from the wartime prices and trade board that munitions and supply office at Victoria would be telephoning and asking for 5,000 pounds of jam, and that United Farmers Cooperative Exchange could supply them out of free stocks but not out of frozen. According to the statement of the manager, in his letter, the board stated that—

> . . . we could supply them out of our free stocks but not to send any out of the "frozen" stocks—we had 1,600 cases of frozen jam in our warehouse at the time. I said we were sold out of free stocks, which they already knew.

This is the important part:

> I asked for the release of 100 cases of 4-lb. jam if they phoned for it but the answer I got was that they had no power in Vancouver to release any frozen jam to the naval stores at Victoria.

Shortly afterwards another telephone call came from Victoria asking if the firm could ship 5,000 pounds of jam to the naval stores at Esquimalt. In case any hon. members from the Atlantic coast do not know, Esquimalt is the foundation of the entire defence of the Dominion of Canada on the Pacific coast; it is our Halifax, only a far greater port. I do not want to weary the committee by reading the whole letter.

An hon. MEMBER: You are bragging.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Maybe I am bragging. I am entitled to brag about my province. But there is something wrong, to my mind, when naval stores cannot get a release of jam at any time without having to go through all this rigmarole.

Here is the point which I am most concerned about. The wartime prices and trade board have—I say this with all due deference—no greater influence than possibly their master the Canadian Manufacturers' association. This firm got in touch with the Canadian Manufacturers' association, and they immediately took the matter up. I should be glad to give the minister a copy of this letter. They informed the firm that they could do nothing about the matter. But then, as this boat had to leave, the firm shipped the jam on their own responsibility. The wartime prices and trade board called them up and severely bawled them out. They had forwarded requisition order No. C-1382.

Mr. STIRLING: And never got the jam?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And never got the jam? That I do not know. The point I am trying to get at is this. Are a few officials here, who do not even know there is a war on, to have the privilege of denying our navy jam when requisition is made in due order, and then afterwards it is O.K'd with a number I have given, requisition order C-1382? This can be checked from the records—the O.K'ing of the order. What I am interested in knowing is this, can the Department of Munitions and Supply at any time requisition jam or any other food product for our armed forces without being hindered by the wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend indicated, I took this matter up when he first put his inquiry before me. The inquiry took the form of a statement that he had been informed that a firm in Vancouver, United Farmers Cooperative, had been refused permission to deliver frozen stocks of jam to the Department of Munitions and Supply, presumably for the armed forces. I took the matter up with the wartime prices and trade board; and I was informed that, while frozen stocks of jam were, of course, under the control of the wartime prices and trade board, on no occasion had they refused a requisition from the Department of Munitions and Supply for the armed forces. In addition, that morning they telephoned long distance to the wartime prices and trade board office in Vancouver and were informed by the office in Vancouver that they had received no request from United Farmers Cooperative for delivery of jam to munitions and supply. I communicated that information to my hon. friend, and that is the last I heard of it until to-night. If the jam supplies were required for the navy, as I take it from what he said they were, as the committee knows purchases for any of the armed forces are made through munitions and supply. But the point I wish to make is that the wartime prices and trade board food administration stated without qualification that they had never refused a request from the Department of Munitions and Supply for frozen jams or any other food products, and that in the case of this particular company they had been informed over the long distance telephone, on inquiring, that no request for delivery had been received.

There may have been some mix-up in the filing of the requisition—I do not know as to that—but that is the information which the board here were given by their office in Vancouver. If my hon. friend has any further particulars, we shall be glad to go into the matter and see what happens.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I thank the parliamentary assistant. I am not quarrelling with him; he gave me a very fair report at the time and answered every question I asked. This firm may be wrong in their information, but they are the largest independent jam firm in the Dominion of Canada—I repeat that, "independent jam firm in the Dominion of Canada"—and they make the definite statement that they were turned down on this. Everybody knows that no firm has any difficulty in selling this kind of produce. The firm are not worried about the order; but what I am interested in and what the manager of the firm is interested in and took upon himself as a good Canadian to bring to my attention, is that some naval boat—I reiterate, what we hear so often, that "it is not in the public interest" to say what particular boat, because apparently anything we do not want to mention is not in the public interest—required this jam, could not get it, and he took it upon himself to release this jam. I want to know whether the wartime prices and trade board, either any official or the whole board, has any power to refuse to release jam or any other food to any branch of the armed forces. I am entitled to an answer to that question.

Mr. ABBOTT: Just to answer my hon. friend's last point, these frozen stocks to which he is referring, of jam and other products, are frozen, not because the wartime prices and trade board wants to freeze them, but at the request of the Department of Munitions and Supply in order that they may be sure that there will be an adequate supply for the armed forces. As I say, it is possible that in this case naval stores or some group like that attempted to order this jam direct from the supplier without going through munitions and supply. I cannot say as to that. But the important point in principle is that the wartime prices and trade board does not refuse and has not refused requisitions from munitions and supply for the armed forces, and the purpose of freezing these stocks is at the request of munitions and supply in order that they will be available for the armed forces.

Mr. O'NEILL: I did not know that my hon. friend was going to switch from salmon to jam, or I would have risen before. I wish to ask a question with respect to salmon. My understanding is that 200,000 cases of salmon will be released for domestic consumption. Can the minister say whether it will be released on the percentage of population of the different provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: The basis of distribution has not been settled. Discussions covering the whole distribution of fish are going on between the board and the Department of Fisheries at the present time.

Mr. O'NEILL: Would it be unfair to have it allocated on a percentage basis of the population?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not see anything unfair about it, if everything else is allocated on that basis. Whether it was fair or not might depend upon the allocation of other foods.

Mr. O'NEILL: I should now like to ask a question with respect to jam. Is more jam being released to the German internment camps than is being allocated to the civilian population of this country?

Mr. ILSLEY: The German prisoners get the same rations as the depot troops in Canada. That is by virtue of the Geneva convention. How that compares with the amount available for the civilian population I do not know. It it not a ration to the civilian population. One would have to know how much is available and find how much that would give to every civilian in Canada and compare the result with the army ration. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. O'NEILL: I am not very familiar with the matter, and possibly the minister does not buy any more tins of jam off the shelves in the stores than I do, but I understand from my wife that there are many days when there is no jam on the shelves, though occasionally you will find it in the stores. Yet there is common gossip that there is all the jam in the German camps that they require.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been a large increase in the amount of jam available for the civilian population of Canada, but even a greater increase in the demand. A good instance of this will be found in the statement I made when the wartime prices and trade board estimates were introduced. I quote from page 4256 of Hansard.

> A good instance of this is jams, jellies and marmalades. Before the war the production of these items was in the neighbourhood of 45 million pounds. By 1942 the output had risen to over 70 million pounds. Of this total some 15 million pounds were used by the armed forces and other priority users, but there still remained a considerably larger quantity for civilians. Yet hon. members, or at least their wives, know that jams, jellies and marmalades are very difficult to obtain in retail stores.

It shows the increase in the supply and the greater increase in the demand for jams, jellies and marmalades.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I wish the minister would clarify the Canadian War Orders and Regulations, Ottawa, June 28, 1943. There is one point that I do not understand. Let me quote from order No. 289, respecting maximum manufacturers' prices of certain groceries. I quote:

> The board hereby orders as follows:—
> 1. The schedule to order No. 116 of the board is hereby amended by deleting therefrom the words "jam, jelly and marmalade" and substituting therefor the word "marmalade".

The second paragraph is the one I do not understand:

> 2. The said schedule is hereby further amended by deleting therefrom the words "clothes pins".

Would the minister explain that?

Mr. ILSLEY: There was a special order, with a long list of articles sold by grocery stores, including clothes pins, and they therefore appeared in the schedule. One by one specific orders were made relating to the prices of these articles. I do not know whether all or even most of them have been covered, but at any rate clothes pins are among those that have been. When a specific order was made the article affected ceased to be subject to the general order and therefore was taken out of that general order by deletion from the schedule.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It has nothing to do with jams?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Jams appear elsewhere on the list.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the minister made a timely statement this evening. It is one that should have been made some time ago. It dealt with the many difficulties which the board has and the manner in which it is trying to cope with the various problems. A good deal of information was given us to-night which I think is worth while, and I endorse the suggestion made by the hon. member for Swift Current, that the statement given to-night should be summarized and set out in concise form by a certain representative of the press whom he mentioned and who would be capable of doing it. He suggested that it be published in the weekly newspapers so that the people would have the information. I am prompted to support that suggestion by the statement made by the hon. member for Saskatoon. He indicated some of the difficulties which merchants, consumers and others have through failure to understand the working of the prices board and also the changes in prices. The local merchants in my own district face these difficulties. I have heard them complain that there is so much confusion and lack of understanding in the method of carrying out the different regulations, and of the changes in prices. As the hon. member for Saskatoon said, the information sometimes gets out in advance, while in other cases there is delay. I have heard both consumers and local merchants complain. I will not enlarge on this, though I have letters which I could read to illustrate what I am saying. However, I am trying to be brief. I suggest that the statement be summarized and given out. Yesterday there was some discussion on the question of rent and rent control and prosecutions, and in that regard I have had some complaints.

The hon. member for Haldimand suggested this afternoon that the producers should have had representation on the prices board. On page 73 of the report referred to yesterday by the minister we find a list of the board and the different firms whom they represent, but we do not see a real representative of producers there, apart from the Department of Agriculture. I wish to endorse the statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Haldimand that we should have a real representative of the producers on this board. In my opinion we would have avoided many of the difficulties in regard to the ceiling on farm products if this had been done. I agree with the hon. member that ceiling prices on certain farm products are not fair or as close to parity prices as they should be.

To come back to the question of rentals, it was stated yesterday that during the nine months' period ending March 31 last there were 1,679 prosecutions, of which 730 concerned rentals. Would the minister give us a break-down of that figure of 730, to show how many of these prosecutions occurred in the western provinces? I hear many landlords in the city of Regina complaining about the enforcement of the rental regulations. I happen to have a block also and I could recite some of my own difficulties, but I shall not do so. It would satisfy me if the minister would say a word in regard to the prosecutions in the city of Regina. I hope the minister also will consider the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Swift Current, which I am making on my own behalf now, that the public generally should have some better understanding as to how these matters are being regulated.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am glad the making of the statement in regard to the cost of living index appears to have met with the approval of the committee. Personally I thought that even though it might take a little time it would be advisable to make a full statement on the matter because of its importance and the interest it has attracted, and I shall try to see that the statement is given the widest possible circulation by the most efficient means.

With regard to the composition of the wartime prices and trade board and the suggestion that the farmers should be represented on it, as I have pointed out before, this board does not consist of representatives of any occupations at all; it consists entirely of senior government officials. On it there are two representatives of the Department of Agriculture, but it does not have representatives of any industry or occupation or calling. We have kept it strictly to government officials, because it is not a gathering place for persons who represent their own points of view or the points of view of various groups—

Mr. PERLEY: I appreciate that, but it is not any personal point of view I have in mind.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not have before me the information with regard to the rentals prosecutions by provinces, but I can get that information.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one matter I should like to place before the minister, because I think it is of interest to every small retailer from the Atlantic to the Pacific. During the last few months there has been a marked trend toward a diminution in the numbers of small retailers throughout the dominion which, unless something is done to correct it, will ultimately lead to their general extinction. The reason for the failure of the small business man lies in the fact that he is unable to secure his fair and proper share of the consumer goods that remain to be distributed throughout the country as a whole. I hear this point raised on numberless occasions. It is said that unless something is done very soon to put a halt to this trend, by the time the war is over the small retailer will be forced out of existence, to all intents and purposes, while on the other side of the equation we shall see an ever-increasing concentration in the hands of the large retail concerns throughout Canada.

I think every hon. member will agree that no group has done more for this country, in the remote settlements as well as in the more thickly populated parts, than the small merchant. We now have rationing of many of the necessities of life; we have rationing of gasoline, all under a body which has a large number of officials, and I should like to know what is being done to see that the small retailer obtains his fair and proper share of the consumer goods still available for distribution throughout the country as a whole.

What is the scheme? What is being done to see that the various foods, the various kinds of clothing, and so on, are made available to the small retail stores which, after all, are the backbone of the business life of this country? What is being done by the wartime prices and trade board to see that these small businesses are treated fairly? This is a matter which deserves a complete answer on the part of the minister. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has said, the statement made this evening by the minister about the operation of the index number with respect to the cost of living will do much to clear up the misunderstandings that one hears expressed on every hand. The consumer, too, has an interest in the small retail store, and to-day consumers complain that they are placed in the position that in many cases they can no longer go to their local stores, because those stores do not have the goods available.

Just in that connection I wish to mention a matter which I think should be brought to the attention of the committee, for it illustrates in concrete form the tendency to give preference to large stores as opposed to the smaller stores. Following the rationing of tea, an order went out as late as September, 1942, with respect to the distribution of tea in the northern parts of Canada. Here is the strange thing about the order which was made. The Indians were made subject to the rationing of tea, provided they did not deal with a certain well-known company which operates in the north. If they were dealing with this very large corporation operating in northern Canada they were not required to have ration coupons.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What company was that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Hudson's Bay company. If, on the other hand, they wanted to deal with the small, independent trader, they could not do it without ration cards. What was the result of that order? I do not know whether it is in effect to-day, but it was in effect as late as October, 1942, and it was admitted to be in effect by Mr. George Short, director of commercial and institutional rationing. The effect was that when the Indians came in to buy their supplies, if they had no ration coupons and they went to the company's store they were able to purchase anything else they wanted. If they went to the independent trader, that was denied them. They would not buy the rest of their supplies because they could not secure their tea.

That is an order which I find difficult to understand. It had the effect of arousing the antagonism of all the smaller traders in the north, those men who carry on trade from the Hudson bay to the Yukon territory. It is an order which is unfair and unjustified. An explanation was given that any Indians who wished to buy from independent merchants may be directed to the nearest Indian agency for a requisition enabling them to buy from such independent merchant. That order, I submit, is one that cannot be justified.

I point this out for the purpose of indicating that there is a feeling that sufficient consideration is not being given by the government, through the instrumentality of the board, to the welfare of the small business people. For them I make this plea, and I ask that machinery be set up in addition to that already existing, which will assure to the small business man and the small retailer a fair and proper share of consumer goods, reduced as they are to-day in amount, by the exigencies of war.

Mr. ILSLEY: This subject probably deserves a fuller explanation than I am prepared to give to-night. But I do not wish to go away and take the time to prepare a set speech or statement on it. I want to deal with it now, because it is the favourite procedure of certain critics of the wartime prices and trade board to state that the small retailer is being sacrificed to the big one. That is a favourite criticism. It was hinted by the hon. member for York-Sunbury the other night.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am asking that it be answered.

Mr. ILSLEY: And I will answer it. I wish to say this, that if it had not been for the wartime prices and trade board and its policy, and if it had not been for the policies which have been pursued, the small retailer would have been in a far worse position than he is in to-day. I wish to give the reasons for saying that.

When goods in short supply are faced with higher war-time costs of distribution, suppliers tend to divert, if left to themselves, larger shares of supplies to preferred customers, and for various reasons—because of larger orders, because of the stronger financial position on an average, because of the ability of the preferred customer to pay higher prices, as the result of having higher individual ceilings in a great many cases, because of lower freight absorption, and because of other considerations favourable to the seller.

The board, in 1942, published a statement of policy, which appeared in the Canada Gazette, and which I think I shall have to put on record. It will take a little time to read it into the record. But from the beginning, at least from the fall of 1941, when the ceiling policy went into effect, the board made it quite clear that there would be as equitable a distribution of supplies to all retailers, both large and small, as could be effected. The basis of that distribution was a ratable distribution of goods in short supply to 1942 customers, in proportion to their purchases during 1941. It was recognized that no base period could be completely satisfactory, on the basis of quota between areas and between outlets, but 1941 seemed to be the most satisfactory basis available.

Representations have been made to me by the hon. member for Assiniboia who knows about conditions in that part of Saskatchewan, and he argues that in that area purchases, on account of economic conditions, were limited in 1941, and that therefore the application of that formula is unjust to that area, and presumably to certain other areas in Canada.

It may be that the formula has not allowed for the increase in purchasing power in that particular part of Saskatchewan, the increase in the relative prosperity of the people. It may be that it does not allow for that factor. Other considerations have, however, been allowed—not there, necessarily—but quotas in certain designated areas have been increased to allow for the marked increase in population caused by the war, and wholesale and retail trade administrators have given individual adjustments in cases of anomaly. But the equitable distribution policy applies only to unrationed goods. Normally, under rationing, other controls—for example, the coupon flowback—meet the needs of the situation.

An analysis was made to find out the effect of what was happening to the independent stores, chain stores, and departmental and mail order stores, in respect of sales and in respect of inventories. There is a small table I should read, which was prepared from dominion bureau of statistics' figures. It shows the change in sales between December, 1941, and December, 1942. There was no increase in sales by the department and mail order stores between December, 1941, and December, 1942. Therefore the percentage of increase is zero.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What about the amount of supplies they had on hand in each of said years?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will come to that. I am dealing now with sales. For the general stores there was an increase of 1·7 per cent in sales in 1942 over sales in 1941. For independent stores there was an increase in sales of thirteen per cent in December, 1942, over the same month in 1941.

Now, what about the change in inventory as between those two months? For the departmental and mail order stores there was a reduction in inventory of nine per cent. For the chain stores there was a reduction in inventory of ·6 per cent. For the independents there was a reduction in inventories of one per cent. I gave some figures with regard to failures and so on when I introduced my estimates, but I should like to quote now from a speech delivered by Mr. P. K. Heywood of the Canadian retail federation at the retailers' war-time conference held in Toronto on Tuesday, April 6, 1943. The Canadian retail federation is an association made up largely, if not entirely, of small retailers. The chairman appears to be Mr. P. K. Heywood and the secretary is Mr. George S. Hougham. This is what Mr. Heywood said in his speech:

> The federation has received a large measure of recognition, both by the wartime prices and trade board and by other agencies of government and, I believe, will be increasingly consulted on the vexing problems that have to be faced in the days ahead.
> Now let us look for a moment at the position in which we find ourselves to-day and take a brief glimpse into the future.
> As is usual when any sudden changes are encountered, there are many predictions of disaster and the institution of price ceiling legislation was not without such predictions. What are the actual results? In the first place, most classes of retail business have experienced a boom in sales unequalled in modern times and all classes would have experienced a similar boom had the civilian economy been equal to the task of production while also producing for war. This we know was not possible and many lines of household appliances, hardware, tires and the entire automotive industry are, in varying degrees, casualties of this war in a civilian sense. But the total impact of the war on retailing as a whole has so far been chiefly psychological. Government regulations, merchandise deliveries and man-power shortages seemed to be enormous difficulties—but the fact remains that most stores have been doing pretty well and have had a good year in 1942, with satisfactory profits even after taxes.
> Many predictions have been made as to the fate of the small retailer—that his doom was sealed—that 20,000 would go out of business this year. Such publicity is most unfortunate. Even in normal times over 12,000 retailers go out of business per annum but in normal times about an equal number start in business so the total remains about the same. During the present emergency none are starting in business and many more are going out because they can find more lucrative employment in other industries. The number of empty stores appearing in most cities is not nearly as serious as it might appear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many went out of business in 1942?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have no accurate figures on that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As nearly accurate as possible?

Mr. ILSLEY: I suppose I could get some figures, but they would not be accurate. The point I wish to make is that when we got some gentlemen who might be described as high-powered executives from large commercial institutions to work with the board, accusations were made that we were going to put the small retailer out of business, that decisions would be made in the interests of the departmental and chain stores as against the little fellow. It is easy to make accusations against the government or against a government agency; but the board, perhaps because of these accusations, has leaned over backward to make sure that the small retailer and the small business man of this country were fairly treated. The hon. gentleman gave an instance of tea for Indians supplied by the Hudson's Bay company. I do not know why that was done, but apparently some arrangement was made so that Indians could get tea from the Hudson's Bay company. I presume there is a good explanation for that and probably I shall be able to get it. But I want to say that there is no one from that departmental store in the employ of the wartime prices or trade board or any of its branches. If an arrangement of that kind was made, I venture to say that it was made in the interests of the Indians rather than in the interests of the Hudson's Bay company.

I should like to put on record what the board calls a statement of policy. This is not a statement of government policy since the board has no power to issue a statement of that kind. But I have authorized the publication of these statements of policy by the wartime prices and trade board, because they are what might be called statements of administrative policy. The policy is set out in the orders in council which constitute the board, but administratively they have to lay down rules and set up certain principles. This is what they said on October 13, 1942:

In the original statement of policy issued by the wartime prices and trade board in November, 1941, and from time to time thereafter, it has been stated that it is the policy of the board to require suppliers to make an equitable distribution among their established customers of any goods that are in short supply. It is not practicable to draw and incorporate in a board order any standard provisions which would fit the great number of different situations that are met in distributing various classes of goods, but the board now reiterates its policy and amplifies it in this statement. Suppliers, both manufacturers and wholesalers, should govern their actions accordingly; if necessary, however, special directives will be issued by the administrators of the board to implement in particular cases the policy herein set forth:

(1) In a large number of lines of merchandise, manufacturers and wholesalers (herein referred to as suppliers) can no longer supply the full requirements of retailers. Where this condition exists the supplier must allocate his available supply ratably among his customers to whom he sold merchandise in the year 1941. Thus, if a supplier in the year 1942 had available only 60 per cent of the goods which he distributed in 1941, each of his customers would be entitled to a quota of 60 per cent of the purchases made by that customer in 1941.

(2) When the conditions described in the preceding paragraph exist, the supplier must refuse to take on any new accounts unless he does so at the specific request of the administrator.

(3) A supplier, having his own retail sales outlet or outlets, must consider such outlet or outlets as one customer, thereby imposing the same limitations on himself as a retailer as he imposes on all his other customers.

(4) From time to time cases will arise where, due to extraordinary population increases, distribution of goods to a particular community on the basis of 1941 sales would be unreasonable. In such cases the interested retail outlets or the suppliers may apply to the administrator of retail trade or the administrator of wholesale trade for an adjustment of quotas. These administrators will investigate the situation and, if it is found that the population increase is of a magnitude sufficient to justify increased quotas, will, through the appropriate administrator, give the necessary direction to the suppliers concerned. In other cases where substantial reductions in population have occurred reductions in quotas may be prescribed by the administrators of retail or wholesale trade.

In determining the basic quotas under the provisions of paragraph (1) above, suppliers should, if possible, set aside some small percentage of the total goods available to be retained as a reserve against which to draw when they were authorized to increase quotas in particular areas as a result of population changes. For example, if a supplier expected to have available 84 per cent of goods delivered in 1941, he might use 80 per cent in establishing basic quotas. Furthermore, any unused quotas such as might result from an established customer retiring from business should be retained for the same purpose.

(5) Under their general powers, administrators have the authority to direct any supplier of goods to make deliveries of such goods to any designated person or persons. This authority will be used if the circumstances require in order to ensure an equitable distribution of goods which are in short supply. When a supplier is directed by an administrator to supply a particular customer the supplier shall do so in accordance with the terms and conditions of sale which he would have granted to the same class of customer during the basic period, September 15 to October 11, 1941. It is to be noted, however, that the extension of credit and the length of the credit period must be left to the discretion of the supplier to decide on the basis of his customer's credit standing and his own financial position, but when the supplier has decided his credit policy, prices, discounts, etc., must be such as to involve no breach of maximum price regulations.

(6) The administrator of wholesale trade or the appropriate industry administrator should be consulted when a supplier is in doubt as to the course he should follow, or if he is contemplating any change in procedure which would represent a departure from the spirit of the policy herein set out.

Ottawa, October 6, 1942.

There are two or three ways in which the policy followed is of inestimable benefit to the independent retailer. First, there is the allocation of supplies. It is the only way in which he can get his fair share of supplies. The second benefit is in the restriction of the establishment of competitive businesses. This must be of tremendous benefit to those in business who, with a shortage of goods developing, will perhaps find their business diminishing. The board, except in exceptional circumstances, does not allow new stores to start up and divide up the business that there is. That might in itself provoke opposition and attack; it does to a certain extent. Where has freedom gone, they say, when people cannot start up in business? But the reasons are, of course, perfectly obvious. The third benefit is that if our anti-inflationary policy succeeds, no one will benefit to a greater extent than the small retailer. The small retailer in an inflationary period is in no position at all to protect himself and compete with his big competitor.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have listened with some interest to the minister's defence of his department in connection with the small retailer and those who are in big business in the retail trade. I should like to bring to his attention administrator's order No. A-752, which was issued by the wartime prices and trade board, respecting maximum prices of cheddar cheese. The order is signed by K. H. Olive, administrator of dairy products, and the order was approved by the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board and became effective on June 3, 1943, being dated at Ottawa, June 2, 1943.

On page 2 of this administrator's order this problem presents itself. Perhaps the minister will be able to clarify the situation and bring out about a proper understanding of it. Clause 3 of this order provides:

The maximum price at which a manufacturer may sell or offer to sell cheese to any person for resale at retail shall be the sum of the following.

(a) an amount equal to—

Then it goes on to itemize, for instance, an amount for paraffining; an amount for storage, insurance, and shrinkage; an amount for cutting; transportation charges from the factory shipping point to the buyer's place of business, and so on, and then it includes a mark-up —and this is the point I want to bring to the minister's attention, because this seems to be a digression from the policy which he enunciated to-night. In addition to all the other charges, the manufacturer may include:

a mark-up not exceeding the lawful markup customarily obtained by the manufacturer during the basic period from September 15 to October 11, 1941, both inclusive, on sales of cheese to the same class of customer but in any event not exceeding:

(i) ½ cent per pound on purchases from him by a retailer, who operates more than two retail places of business and a central warehouse for such place of business; or

(ii) 2½ cents per pound on sales to any other person selling cheese at retail.

It will be noted that the mark-up is ½ cent a pound to a retailer who operates more than two retail places and a central warehouse, and 2½ cents a pound—or a full two cents advance in the mark-up—on sales to any other person selling cheese at retail. The only inference that can be taken is that when a manufacturer sells or offers to sell cheese to those with more than two retail places and having a central warehouse, the mark-up can be no higher than ½ cent a pound, but that when he sells to a man who operates only one store, the mark-up may be as high as 2½ cents a pound. There is a difference of a full 2 cents in the mark-up as between sales to one class of retailer and another class. I bring that to the minister's attention because, on the face of it, it looks like a clear case of discrimination between two classes of retailers. Having in mind what the minister intimated to the committee tonight, I thought I should bring this matter to his attention.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would gather from that, that the store with more than two outlets and a central warehouse is treated as a wholesaler and gets the wholesale price instead of the retail price.

Mr. GRAYDON: The wording of the order itself denies that argument because it says:

One-half cent per pound on purchases from him by a retailer.

That is on purchases by a retailer, not by a wholesaler, who operates more than two retail places of business and has a central warehouse for such place of business.

Mr. ILSLEY: And a central warehouse, it says. It is quite usual for chain stores to be treated as wholesalers in the price-fixing system of the country. They discharge the functions of wholesalers. They have their own warehouse and distribute the goods among their branches, and therefore it is quite usual for them to get a lower price. They have higher charges because they do their own warehousing.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do I understand that if the word "warehouse" were left out of the section, it would read differently. It is two distributing stores and a warehouse, and if the retailer does not operate the warehouse he does not get as large a discount.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would not mind continuing the argument if my hon. friend is going to get into it. As a matter of fact, we might as well be frank and say that the mark-up for the chain stores can be no greater than one-half a cent a pound. To be blunt, despite the explanation of the minister and the complementary remarks of the hon. member for Calgary West, the fact remains that the mark-up for any other retailer is 2½ cents, and the arguments from time to time on this very point still stand, so far as I can see, despite the explanation which has been made.

Mr. ILSLEY: It goes back to the old contention which used to be made, that the manufacturer should not charge any lower price to groups that did their own warehousing than to those who had no warehouse. That was all fought out in the price spreads committee, and there were different opinions.

Mr. GRAYDON: What was your view? You were on the committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: I forget about that, but I recognized, I think, the practice, which is practically universal and has been followed all through the years, of manufacturers giving a department store, a wholesaler, a chain store, and people who do their own warehousing or discharge the functions of a wholesaler a lower price than that at which they would sell direct to the retailer who did not discharge that function.

Mr. ESLING: The interest of the minister is asked in a specific case of the administration of an order which not only results in hardship on the importer but is manifestly unjust. It will be recalled that in December last there was a broadcast, with some satisfaction to the corporation and with more satisfaction to the consumer, that oranges would be eligible for a subsidy, and the order was communicated to wholesalers. In the city of Trail there is a wholesale importing firm which does not resort to the railroads. Twice a week they go to the market in Spokane, which is the distributing centre for jobbers along the international boundary, and then they bring back their supplies, which, it will be readily seen, must be much fresher than those which come in the ordinary course by train. When this order came over the radio, the representative of the prices board resident in Trail informed this particular wholesaler that he must reduce his price, which he did. He brought in three lots of oranges, and presented his application for his subsidy. Up to the time when the second lot was brought in, the representative of the board had not received any instructions as to the terms or conditions under which that subsidy would be granted, with the result that when the firm's application went in, the firm was told that the subsidy could not be paid to it for the reason that the application was not covered by the terms and conditions of the order of the board.

What was the firm to do? The representative had had no instructions; this firm acted in good faith, and the matter has been pending ever since last December, for the reason that the application was required to show, in order to cover the bonus, that these oranges were brought in, in carload lots, and that the importer had title at the source of production. What is a wholesaler on a small scale to do where he cannot afford to bring in carload lots? The nearest point to the interior where carload lots would be brought in would, I think, be Vancouver, 500 miles away, with two freights for the wholesaler to pay. This man complied with the principle of the order, which was to reduce the cost to the consumer. He has reduced the cost; he is out to the amount of his reduction on all three lots of oranges brought in, and yet up to to-day, notwithstanding the efforts of the representative of the prices board to secure an adjustment of the matter, that firm is still out of pocket. It is a small firm; it has been in operation for four years; its capital is limited, and it cannot very well stand the loss, nor can it afford to bring in oranges in carload lots.

It certainly means that communities in which there is not a large consumption must pay the old price and not have the benefit of the subsidy. I ask the minister if he does not think there is a direct injustice imposed, not only upon that importer, but upon the consumers in small communities.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know anything about that case. I will take it up with the commodity prices stabilization corporation. I assume there is some explanation there. I have here a statement, though probably I had better not stop to read it, showing the treatment of oranges. We did not undertake to pay any subsidy, to start with, on oranges; we simply removed the duty; but later at some stage a subsidy was arranged for on carload shipments. I should not like to express any opinion about this case until I look it up in Hansard and bring it to the attention of the commodity prices stabilization corporation. If the hon. gentleman would like to take it up with them direct, I am sure that they would give him every courtesy and consideration in discussing it with him and dealing with it.

Mr. ESLING: I should like to impress upon the minister that the department's own representative has not been able to get this adjustment, although he has been trying to do so ever since December.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think all of us must congratulate the hon. member who has just taken his seat upon the clarity with which he presents his argument, depending as he does upon someone to read to him.

There are a number of questions I should like to ask the minister, arising out of his statement. They are these:

In how many cases has an order been made directing that a quota be given to a retailer who had complained that he was not receiving his proper share of goods?

How many retail stores in Canada have been allowed to commence business since the order was made freezing the stores then in existence? I should like that information by provinces.

Also I would press upon the minister the necessity of answering the question I asked a while ago, namely, how many retail stores closed in the year 1942. Information must be available. The minister was able from the reading of a speech by one of the officials of the retailers' association to say that a certain number each year were expected to close up in the ordinary normal flow of business, and that usually that number was compensated for by the number of new businesses which opened up. That being so, the information must be available, and I would appreciate being informed as to how many retail stores have closed down. That answer will indicate whether or not there is anything to the argument that retail stores are greatly diminishing in number and importance throughout the country.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will get as much of that information as I can for the hon. gentleman and present it to-morrow.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister has said that no new business can be undertaken without a permit. If a man engaged in general hardware decides to take on household furnishings, would that not be permissible?

Mr. ILSLEY: He cannot do that without a permit.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the regulation with regard to the delivery of ice throughout the country? Is there a definite restriction, and to what extent does it apply?

Mr. ABBOTT: Two or three weeks ago I made an announcement on that question. It was restricted to two deliveries a week—I speak from memory—and was extended by order of the board to six deliveries a week to residential customers. That order was to be effective from the 1st of June until the 1st of October.

Mr. GRAYDON: The parliamentary assistant will find, I think, that it was originally three days a week, and not two, as he states.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; it was three.

Mr. GRAYDON: If it has been changed to six, there is no point in the question I was going to ask.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Shefford raised the question, and it was brought to the attention of the minister.

Mr. TUSTIN: Since the rationing of meat, the retail butchers' stores have had a coupon bank in their local banks and they make purchases against the coupons banked with that institution. I am given to understand that in cutting up a carcase of beef there is anywhere from 75 to 100 pounds of waste. Has the board considered making an allowance for that waste to the retail butchers? If not, will consideration be given that matter?

Mr. ILSLEY: My information is that the most detailed and careful consideration has been given and that a schedule of tolerances has been published.

Mr. SHAW: I should like to have a statement from the minister with regard to the utilization of commodities which retail outlets are permitted to procure and which remain on their shelves for a considerable time. I come from an area where the lumbering industry is carried on extensively and where railroad ties, cordwood and so on are produced. I refer to the Rocky Mountain House area of Alberta. Rocky Mountain House itself serves a vast area and a tremendous industry, an industry producing commodities which are most essential to the prosecution of the war. They are having the most extreme difficulty in procuring equipment to carry on the industry. For example, they find it very difficult to obtain saws. The quota is ninety per cent less than pre-war stocks and their ability to produce is severely jeopardized. The board of trade of that town has communicated with me by resolution and by letter pointing out that there are communities of which they are aware which are securing ten per cent, as they are, of the pre-war quantities of such necessary tools, notwithstanding that the need does not exist for these tools in those communities. I would assume from their letter that they are of the opinion that some check should be made upon these retail outlets, who are securing the allotment to which they are entitled but are not putting those commodities to use, though they are definitely required in some other area such as the one to which I have referred. What check is made upon the use of these tools that are allowed to go to these retail outlets?

Mr. ILSLEY: The suggestion, as I understand it, is that these retailers get certain stocks which they do not need but to which they are entitled. Because they are entitled to a quota they get such stocks and keep them, though they do not sell them for some reason or another. Is that the suggestion?

Mr. SHAW: Take Swede saws, for example, which are in popular demand in that area. In some areas you will see them on the retail shelf for a period of two years. The retailer procures them because he feels that he is entitled to a certain quota, but no purchaser comes to demand them, and he keeps them there. I say that a commodity such as a Swede saw, for which there is such a demand in the area that I have referred to, should be sold where it is needed. There should be some claim on that article where it is required, and the board should endeavour to see that such articles are placed where there is a shortage and where they will be made use of.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is some machinery for the exchange of dormant stocks. I do not know much about it, but I will get some information in that regard. I should be surprised if what the hon. member describes as a condition is a prevalent one, because the retailer does not have to take his quota, and he would hesitate before buying something in which his capital would be tied up for two or three years if he could not dispose of it.

Mr. SHAW: In the hardware line that happens frequently. Stocks are carried for two or three years, especially if the dealer thinks it may become more difficult to procure such stocks in the months ahead. Be that as it may, let us take the situation at Rocky Mountain House, where commodities such as I have mentioned are produced. Since production is jeopardized—users having encountered a ninety per cent reduction in the volume of the tools that are necessary to their production—what should dealers do in order to have their quota increased? What would be the procedure for them to follow?

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. ILSLEY: They should apply to the retail or wholesale trade administrator. If the stocks are available, there is jurisdiction under the order to increase quotas under certain circumstances. I would not give any undertaking that they would be increased, but that is the procedure to follow. There is a bulletin dated June 15, 1943, called the "Wholesalers' Bulletin," which gives instructions about this whole matter. One of the sections has to do with increased quotas for selected areas, and it has notes on alternative systems for distributing goods on the quota basis, and so on.

I keep undertaking to give information later on, and I want to carry out that undertaking. The hon. member for Mackenzie asked me this afternoon to say something about the truck distribution of soft drinks and beers. The purpose of the trucking restrictions is to secure economical and efficient transportation. Before the restrictions were put in force a very large part of the distribution of beer and soft drinks was handled by trucks. By a combination of the thirty-five mile limit and gasoline rationing, the reduction in the miles travelled has approximated sixty per cent. In the administration of the thirty-five mile limit, permits for 203 beer trucks and 222 soft drink trucks have been granted in individual cases where the administration was satisfied that it was efficient to do so. One factor taken into account in reviewing applications for permits is whether or not a full load will be carried on the round trip. Many trucks are loaded only when making deliveries and are empty on the return trip. Soft drink and beer trucks normally carry a full return load of empty bottles. There are a great many factors to be considered in any particular case; but by way of illustration, rather than explanation, a number of permits have been granted to permit deliveries to army camps.

This afternoon the hon. member for Peterborough West read a letter which was sent by a wholesaler to a retail customer, if I understood it correctly, in which he purported to quote an order of the wartime prices and trade board to the effect that certain kinds of cloth were to be used for making suits of clothes for members of the air force only and not for members of the other two services, and the hon. member asked for an explanation of that order. I have had inquiries made, but no one in the wartime prices and trade board seems to know anything about any such order. They have no record of it at all, so that I shall have to ask the hon. member to get a little more information. If he can direct me to the order; if he can give the number, or tell me who issued it, I shall trace it further, but it may be that the wholesaler in question made a mistake when he said it was an order of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has the minister given consideration to making it possible under certain circumstances to cut a ration coupon in two? Sometimes they do not fit in properly, and it has been suggested that it might be advisable to be able to split them.

Mr. ILSLEY: For what commodity?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I cannot say which one.

Mr. ILSLEY: The coupons have been worked down to call for a normal sized package. For instance, I should not think anyone would want to use half a tea coupon, since a tea coupon is good for only two ounces in any case. In the same way, I do not think anyone would want to split a butter coupon.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about meat?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the weekly ration is split; there are two coupons a week.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is what I mean. If you go into a store to buy a roast of beef and it comes to say, four and a half pounds, the butcher will ask you to take half a pound of bacon, or something like that, to fill out the coupon. My observation is that sometimes you are tempted to buy something you really do not need.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I had two things in mind, and one of them was the point mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The other is this. I would not advocate that a person should be permitted to use half a coupon by itself, but when you make a purchase of meat which requires two and a half coupons, either you buy more than you require or you buy something that you do not want. The only other alternative is to waste that half coupon. This was brought to my attention, and it appeared to me that something might be done about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is just a question of how finely you should divide it. Certainly it would complicate the banking arrangements quite a lot to have a much larger number of pieces of paper. A great deal of thought has been given to this subject.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is anything being done with regard to the meat used for sausages and hamburg, which we discussed here some time ago?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have a memorandum on that matter which I seem to have mislaid. A check was made at the various regional offices of the board, and it was found that there was very little waste in connection with either sausages or hamburg. There were four or five areas, among them Ottawa and London, Ontario, which did report that in the first week or two there seemed to be a considerable surplus of sausages and perhaps some waste, but the general report throughout the country was that there was no abnormal waste.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did that apply also to the meat going into hamburg?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): A very thorough check was made by the officials of the Toronto district, and after canvassing the situation very carefully they were of opinion that the waste is nothing more than normal for this season of the year. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox raised a question to which the minister said he would give some consideration. I just want to place on record my view that the only proper way of handling this situation is that now employed, the method of allowing a tolerance. If we were to try to ration the waste, the task would be almost impossible, principally because the waste is not all in connection with one commodity. There are many varieties of waste, perhaps not all pertaining to the commodity for which the ration ticket was issued, and there would be no way of separating one kind of waste, coming from a rationed product, from another kind coming from a non-rationed product. So that if you tried to issue ration coupons for waste, you would have confusion worse confounded. You might better continue to control the situation by allowing a definite tolerance on the rationed article, rather than to try to issue coupons for the waste.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Can the minister give any information with regard to the restrictions on the delivery of bread beyond the thirty-five mile limit, either by truck or by rail, from bakeries in cities and towns?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no information on that matter with me at the moment. If this item goes through, I think I could give that information on the next item without doing any great violence to the rules.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 11.03 p.m., until 11 a.m., Thursday, July 8.

SOCIAL SECURITY—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Queens) presented the second report of special committee on social security, and moved:

That the second report of the special committee on social security, presented this day, asking for leave to sit while the house is sitting, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

OIL SHALES

NEW BRUNSWICK—REPORT OF INVESTIGATIONS BY MINES AND GEOLOGY BRANCH

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I wish to lay on the table the report of the investigations into New Brunswick oil shales which were conducted by the mines and geology branch of the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will a copy of this report be sent to each member?

Mr. CRERAR: The report was made just a short time ago, and I am tabling it.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member is asking whether copies will be available.

Mr. CRERAR: We have only two or three copies, and it is a voluminous report. I suppose I could have additional copies made. I shall make inquiry and advise my hon. friend.

GOLD PRODUCTION

Mr. MacINNIS:

What was the total production of gold, in ounces, for each year from 1930 to 1942?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

Production of Gold in Canada, 1930-1942

Year	Fine ounces
1930	2,102,068
1931	2,693,892
1932	3,044,387
1933	2,949,309
1934	2,972,074
1935	3,284,890
1936	3,748,028
1937	4,096,213
1938	4,725,117
1939	5,094,379
1940	5,311,145
1941	5,345,179
1942*	4,829,815

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Mr. HANSELL:

1. Is there a membership fee paid to the league of nations, and if so, what was the fee paid by Canada for each year during which Canada held membership?

2. What was the total amount paid by Canada for the years 1932 to 1942 on account of the league of nations?

3. How much of this was chargeable to the international labour organization?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. There is no "membership fee" paid by member states of the League of Nations. The expenses of the league secretariat, the international labour office and the permanent court of international justice as set forth in the annual budget of the League of Nations are allocated between the member states according to an agreed scale. Each member state pays a single contribution to the secretary-general of the League of Nations which includes that portion of the contribution devoted to the international labour office and the permanent court of international justice.

2.

Year	Total Cost
1919-20	$ 87,728 58
1920-21	223,730 09
1921-22	209,427 07
1922-23	223,177 66
1923-24	200,356 66
1924-25	195,620 30
1925-26	195,345 83
1926-27	190,268 08
1927-28	204,213 77
1928-29	216,507 14
1929-30	234,808 96
1930-31	251,694 46
1931-32	311,600 67
1932-33	277,936 52
1933-34	389,891 97
1934-35	404,732 02
1935-36	423,572 29
1936-37	397,251 37
1937-38	328,638 08
1938-39	311,318 61
1939-40	292,417 23
1940-41	258,610 63
1941-42	189,920 76
1942-43	184,255 74

3. As stated in the answer to No. 1, member states pay a consolidated contribution and are not separately assessed for their contribution to the international labour office. In 1939 the budget of the international labour office made up 26·04 per cent of the total league budget. This proportion increased in 1942 to 32·85 per cent and in 1943 to 40·29 per cent.

CIVIL SERVICE ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. What matters was the committee under the chairmanship of H. J. Coon instructed to investigate?
2. What was the personnel of the committee, and whom of its members were civil servants or members of the civil service commission?
3. What changes in the civil service were recommended?
4. What recommendations of this committee have been acted upon by the government?
5. Are further steps being taken to implement the recommendations of this committee? If so, in what respects are such steps being taken?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. See P.C. 2/584, dated January 23, 1943, sessional paper No. 108-A, tabled in the House of Commons on April 12, 1943.

2. H. J. Coon, Executive Assistant, head office, Bank of Nova Scotia; C. H. Bland, Chairman, Civil Service Commission; B. J. Roberts, Member, National Harbours Board; A. Thivierge, Civil Service Commissioner; W. C. Ronson, Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance.

3, 4 and 5. As stated in the House of Commons on June 7, 1943, the recommendations of this committee are considered by the government to be confidential.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MILITARY TRAINING OF STUDENTS AT COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What has been the expenditure to date in connection with the military training of students in course at each of the colleges and universities in Canada?
2. Do civilian instructors receive payment?
3. Does the department pay students taking courses in, (a) reserve training units; (b) officers' training courses? If so, how much?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Return tabled.

WINDSOR, N.S., EMBARKATION TRANSIT DEPOT

Mr. PURDY:

1. Was preliminary work such as construction of roads, temporary ditching, stream diversion, etc., in connection with embarkation transit depot, Windsor, N.S., carried out by the Department of National Defence, military or civilian personnel?
2. If so, was Lieutenant James K. Garner (alias Lee), Royal Canadian Engineers, employed to direct and supervise this work?
3. Did Ralph and Arthur Parsons Company, of Windsor, N.S., have any connection with this work directly or indirectly?
4. If so, in what capacity?
5. Was plant machinery or equipment rented from Ralph and Arthur Parsons Company?
6. If so, what were the total rentals paid this firm for plant machinery and/or equipment?
7. What was total rental for each unit?
8. How much was paid this company for supervision?
9. Was rental of power shovels and other equipment on basis of complete operating cost?
10. Was the time of defence personnel and defence materials used by Ralph and Arthur Parsons Company covering repairs and overhaul of plant and machinery charged to and paid for by Ralph and Arthur Parsons Company?
11. If so, what was the amount so charged or paid for this work?

CANADIAN FORCES—PERCENTAGE OF INTAKE TO MALE POPULATION

Mr. PURDY:

As at June 30, and by military districts, what has been the total intake of men into the armed forces since the outbreak of war, and what percentage do these figures bear to the male population in the military age group in each district?

PRESS CENSORSHIP

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What has been the annual cost of press censorship since the beginning of the war?
2. Who are the press censors, (a) in Ottawa; (b) in Toronto, and what experience have they had for such work?

3. Who appointed them, and what are their salaries, travelling expenses and all other emoluments?
4. Have daily Hansards been censored?
5. If so, by whom, why, and under what law, statute, custom or usage?

IMMIGRATION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many immigrants came to Canada, by years, since the war began, (a) from Great Britain; (b) from the United States of America; (c) from the British dominions and colonies; (d) from the continent of Europe; (e) from elsewhere?
2. What is being done to promote immigration from Great Britain, (a) during the balance of the war; (b) after it is over?

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Speaker, I think this question had better be made an order for a return, because the information asked for in the first part of the question will have to be obtained from the statistics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and it may be some considerable time before the return can be brought down because the form in which the question is asked does not correspond with the manner in which the records are kept. A great deal of work is involved in providing the information, but it will be brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. CHURCH: We are in the fourth year of the war and some statement should be made to the house on this question.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask if the minister means that we shall not be able to get the return this session?

Mr. CRERAR: That depends on when the session closes. I am pointing out that the form in which the first part of the question is asked involves a very considerable amount of work in getting the data together, but it will be proceeded with as rapidly as possible. The second part of the question raises a question of government policy, which policy will be made known in due course.

FARM LABOUR

VOLUNTARY WORKERS—INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Harvest is now due in Canada and farm help is very difficult to get. Many of these workers will come as volunteers from towns and cities and work part time, perhaps in the afternoon or evening. Will the wages paid to these voluntary farm workers be subject to the income tax, and if so, what part does the farmer play in it?

[Mr. Church.]

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): All wages are subject to income tax, but as to wages paid to temporary help on farms, such as students working in the summer, the farmers are notified that no deductions need be made in such cases where the amount earned during the summer will not come up to the taxable level. That is, the farmers do not have to make deductions in the case of temporary help engaged for short periods during the summer.

INTERNATIONAL RELIEF

DRAFT AGREEMENT FOR UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister, based on a Canadian Press dispatch from Washington, dated July 6, in which the statement is made that a draft agreement has been submitted by the Big Four to Canada and that the Canadian government reply to the draft agreement has been delivered to the state department at Washington. Will the Prime Minister table a copy of that agreement at an early day, and will he give the house an opportunity to discuss this draft agreement and determine whether or not it is a treaty?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend sent me a copy of his question, and I have been asking myself ever since what agreement in particular it has reference to. I assume it is the draft agreement for united nations relief and rehabilitation administration. Is that what my hon. friend had reference to?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The press dispatch was not very clear, so that I merely asked regarding the draft agreement mentioned in the press dispatch. I presumed that the mention of the press dispatch would identify the agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's question is not any clearer. If he cannot tell me what draft agreement he wishes to know about, I am afraid I cannot answer him. I imagine that what he has reference to is the draft agreement for united nations relief and rehabilitation administration. If that is so, I tabled that agreement on June 18 and asked that it be printed in Votes and Proceedings of that day. My hon. friend will find it printed there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I was endeavouring to find out whether that was the agreement referred to in the dispatch.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is.

GENERAL GIRAUD

ACCEPTANCE OF INVITATION TO VISIT CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members will have observed that General Giraud is at present in the United States. I might inform the house that about a month ago, when I learned of the possibility of General Giraud's visit to the United States, I had a communication sent to the general through the United Kingdom resident minister at Algiers expressing the hope it would be possible for him to visit Canada at the time he might be on this continent. I received shortly afterwards a reply from General Giraud saying that he would be happy to endeavour to arrange to visit Canada if and when he visited the United States. I have since learned that there is every probability that General Giraud will visit Canada in the course of the next week or ten days.

COAL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESTRICTION OF DELIVERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question with respect to the deliveries of coal. Last month the minister announced that he was considering a request which the Canadian Retail Coal Dealers' association had made at a meeting at Toronto, that, in order to conserve supplies, coal deliveries be restricted to 70 per cent of last year's deliveries. I would ask the parliamentary assistant in the absence of the minister if he will be in a position to make a statement to-morrow in regard to this urgent and important matter.

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply): I believe the minister has already covered that to some extent, on one if not on two occasions. However, I shall bring the matter to his attention to-morrow and see if there is not a possibility of getting an answer for my hon. friend.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

AGRICULTURE

Special.

31. To provide for wheat acreage reduction payments for administration expenses in connection therewith, and for temporary appointments that may be required notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, $4,265,000.

Mr. PERLEY: When we were on item 29, Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, I asked the minister if he would table a supplementary report giving the names of the field men and the rod men who were working under the survey in the Qu'Appelle Valley. He said he would.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I have a number of statements I wish to make; but, in answer to the question just raised, I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that I should obtain the post office addresses of men who are employed on the Qu'Appelle Valley projects in connection with surveys, I shall have to get those addresses from the Regina office; I have not got them up to date. The addresses which are given on the return that came through some time ago are their present addresses, wherever they happen to be working from. The local addresses I shall have to get from the offices.

There are two or three statements which I agreed to make the other evening when we were on the war appropriation which do affect somewhat these estimates as well, and one which I have been asked to make as a result of statements in connection with the movement of grain.

A Canadian Press report appeared, following the discussions the other day, in these words:

Hon. J. G. Gardiner, agricultural minister, told the commons last night that due to the lack of transportation facilities less than one hundred million bushels of Canadian wheat have been moved to the United States, although there is a market for two hundred million bushels.

The word there should not be "wheat" but "coarse grains" or "feed grains." The matter under discussion was not wheat, but feed grain.

The dispatch continues:

Replying to questions from M. J. Coldwell, C.C.F. leader—

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether you can hear me; I can hardly hear myself.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does that "feed grain" include wheat?

Mr. GARDINER: I was talking about oats and barley. To make it absolutely plain, when I spoke of 200 million bushels I was not talking of wheat at all; it was oats and barley.

Replying to questions from M. J. Coldwell, C.C.F. leader, Mr. Gardiner said both Canada and the United States were handicapped by lack of railway cars and lake shipping facilities to take Canadian wheat to American markets.

Some grain cars were made available to Canadian railways to carry wheat to the head of the lakes, whence to be shipped to United States buyers, particularly in Maine and other eastern states.

The point is this, that before completing that statement the other evening I said that the railway companies were doing a particularly good job under all the circumstances. That does not appear in the press report. As a result of this report going out I had communications from both the railways pointing out the job that they had done up to the moment, and I would like to place on the record the substance of that report, so that what has been done will be known:

Grain of all kinds moved from lake head since April 26, 1943, by water to July 5, 1943, 111,838,000 bushels as against 92,408,000 bushels from March 30, 1942, or 19,430,000 bushels more in 1943 than in 1942. That is of all grain, wheat and feed grain as well, they have moved this year 19,430,000 bushels more in the same period of time, that is from the opening of the lakes up to the present time, than they did a year ago.

Then, loaded at head of the lakes for all rail movement to eastern ports, August 1, 1942, to date, 30,000 carloads as against 19,200 carloads in 1941-42.

To-day held unloaded on track, Canadian Pacific, 3,000 cars at lake head, 3,000 cars at Winnipeg, 3,500 at other points, making a total of 9,500 cars on track: Canadian National, 2,000 cars at lake head; 1,854 cars at other points, making a total of 3,854.

Then, to American ports, Buffalo, 33,673,000 bushels, and to other points, 19,172,000 bushels, or 52,845,000 bushels have been moved to the United States ports.

The total of 111,838,000 bushels is divided as follows: United States ports, 52,845,000 bushels; Canadian ports, 58,993,000 bushels.

I repeat that that is since April 26, 1943 down to the present. I would like to repeat what I said on the previous occasion, with these facts before the committee, that we consider that a particularly good job has been done by the railways. But the fact still remains that we have 200,000,000 bushels of oats and barley from last year's crop which ought to be moved out of western Canada and should have been moved by some means if it were at all possible before the new crop came in, and hon. members can see the importance of getting that down between now and the middle of August. As I stated the other day, the problem is obviously a transportation problem, and I am not blaming the railways for that; I am only saying that we have an unusually large amount of feed grain in this country which we should have liked to see moved to the United States and eastern Canada, and so far no one has found it possible to move it.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. PERLEY: In what part of the provinces is most of this feed grain?

Mr. GARDINER: It is all over the three prairie provinces. As my hon. friend knows, a very considerable part of it is still out on the fields, not under cover. What I am trying to do is to overcome some of the things that are being stated. For example, I have here an editorial which appeared in the Financial Post which came to my table just this morning, entitled "He takes credit from heaven". The article goes on to say that I am continuously drumming away about this surplus of feed grain that we have and implying that there is no trouble about feeding the people of Canada next winter, and that it was heaven that gave us this crop and we ought to be more concerned about it. Well, right at the moment I am concerned about getting a place to put the next crop so that it will not be lying out under heaven but will be under a roof some place, and I would like the assistance of the Financial Post and a few other of these periodicals in getting that done rather than saying all the time that we want something else done.

Mr. PERLEY: The grain exchange are not worrying very much about it, judging from the way they are boosting the price.

Mr. GARDINER: The grain exchange can make money only by getting the grain transported from one place to some other place. They cannot get money while it is lying on the farm and not moving, and therefore I presume they are as anxious as anyone else to get that grain moving. Everybody in the west wants to get it moving and we want the help of everyone towards this end.

Mr. MacNICOL: How many hundred million bushels are lying there?

Mr. GARDINER: All the grain we have fed in Canada before amounted to half a billion bushels of oats and barley. Last year we produced a billion bushels. In other words, we produced twice as much as we had fed before, and we agreed last fall to try to put 200,000,000 bushels of that into the United States. That would still leave us with 300,000,000 bushels more than we had the year before to feed all our live stock, and we wanted to keep that as a reserve. To date we have not been able to move half of it and we are within a month of our new crop. I would emphasize that we do want the assistance of all the shipping people, all the railway people and all the newspapers in Canada to try to get that grain moved to the United States where they tell us there is a shortage of feed grain. That is the only way the farmers can get money out of it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The United States could take all of it if it could be transported. The only difficulty is lack of transportation.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, lack of sufficient transportation. We are not criticizing the railways. Somebody is asking the railways to move munitions, guns and other supplies, and in spite of that they are moving more grain than they did before. The problem of the farmers in getting their stock fed involves the moving of that grain out of these piles on the fields to the places where the stock is, and there is only one way of doing that, namely, by railway and boat.

Mr. SENN: Is there also a demand in eastern Canada which cannot be filled because of lack of transportation?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. There is a demand. I do not know that there is any great suffering at the moment, but unless we can get a very considerable volume of that grain moved this summer into storages there will be trouble next winter. That trouble will not have anything to do with what heaven does this year with the crop. That grain is there and we want it moved to the east and put into storage elevators, and an order in council has already been passed by the government putting up money to cover the extra cost.

Mr. SENN: What cost?

Mr. GARDINER: Any extra cost to hold the grain between the time it is shipped down and the time it would be shipped under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. SENN: Is there not another difficulty in the financing of the grain to hold it in storage? There is not a sufficiency of funds available, particularly among the farmers, to purchase the grain and keep it in storage until next winter's feeding.

Mr. GARDINER: An order has already been passed and there is an order now under consideration, which I hope will be passed in some form in due course and which is known to the trade and others who will be handling this business, and that will take care of the problem of providing for grain being moved down. So far as the financing of that kind of thing is concerned, the trade is prepared to finance it provided the government is willing to take care of the extra charges that would be involved by reason of shipping it now instead of waiting until next January or February, and we are attempting to provide for that under the arrangements that are being made. I wish to make that clear to the committee before we discuss the other statement I had intended putting on the record.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is there an abundance of grain available in Fort William to people who need it? I was talking to one dealer a few days ago and he said he had difficulty at that time in getting sufficient oats or barley from Fort William for his customers.

Mr. GARDINER: There was difficulty last winter, in spite of these figures which indicate that very much more was being moved; notwithstanding the difficult winter we had, the railways moved more grain than they had been accustomed to moving—very much more—owing to the fact that there is much more live stock being fed this year. In addition there is a poor grain crop in the eastern part of Canada; at any rate they anticipate a poor crop because of the late seeding. Because we are afraid of that we have made every possible arrangement and everyone is trying to cooperate in getting that grain put down here. Moreover, we are trying to develop some means of encouraging the farmers to take it from the feeder and put it into their own storage. All that is involved in the orders I spoke of a moment ago, and we believe that a very considerable amount of grain will be moved down before the freeze-up this fall, and put into storage here, to supply the farmers. It is true, as represented to the hon. member for Souris, that there will be different localities in the east that will now have trouble because this grain did not get down in sufficient quantities last winter or the early part of this season.

Mr. SENN: I believe I raised the point the other day about the anticipation of a shortage of feed in Ontario and eastern Canada, and also the question of the price that will be charged to feeders in eastern Canada. If it is brought down and left in the hands of the trade the trade can perhaps charge the farmers what they like. There is a ceiling on feed grain, but after it is processed and made into chop for feeding, is any precaution being taken to see that the farmer does not pay a very high price for it? That would probably come under the wartime prices and trade board, from the point of view of prices.

Mr. GARDINER: My understanding is that the grains themselves are all under a ceiling and it is impossible for dealers to collect freight on the grain shipped from Fort William unless they abide absolutely by these regulations. In addition to that, there are ceilings on such things as mill feeds, and I understand that there are ceilings on the other feeds as well. I did not want to be too certain about that, but there are ceilings so far as our activities with them are concerned. They cannot collect freight unless they sell with the price margins as between what they obtain the product for and what it cost to market it. We have to be satisfied on that question, before paying freight which does establish a ceiling.

Mr. SENN: So long as the farmers are protected I do not care. That is all I am worrying about.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what we are trying to do, and if there are cases where that is not being done I should like to have a report regarding them.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would it not facilitate matters with regard to this whole situation if the grain board handled all this grain instead of letting the grain exchange in Winnipeg operate?

Mr. GARDINER: Of course if the grain board were going to handle it all they would have to set up agencies all over eastern Canada. I do not want to enter into a discussion of the question whether it is better to have grain handled by a government board or otherwise, but the facilities are all set up in eastern Canada, through feed dealers at every small point throughout the farming area, and we have been utilizing that machinery to distribute this grain. They have had their contacts with different grain companies from which they get their grain, and the business is being done much in the manner in which it was done before the war. But it is being done under regulations, and we are keeping a check on the margins that do exist between the cost of grain and the selling price of the product. We are keeping a check on these margins with the idea of keeping down the cost of producing food in Canada. Our object is to keep down the price of feed to the farmer in eastern Canada, and so far as it is necessary to take care of the western farmer we are allowing him to participate in the price of any grain which is shipped out of Canada, spreading that participation over all those who sell oats or barley in western Canada, whether it is shipped east or to the United States. So that the man who supplies an eastern Canadian farmer, under the ceiling, will eventually get the same price for his grain as the man who supplies the United States market with grain.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If the grain board does not ship grain out of Canada, how will the farmer participate in that?

Mr. GARDINER: The grain board issues a permit to anyone who ships grain out, and they have to pay the difference between the Canadian market and the United States market.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But that does not include the higher grades of wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: No; the higher grades of wheat are selling in the United States higher than the market price in Canada. As to wheat that has been delivered to the board, the advance is the same whether it is finally sold in the United States or not. If it is sold at a profit in the United States, participation certificates take care of the producer's interests.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But grain is paying a dollar in the grain exchange at Winnipeg, or, as the minister said the other day, $1.02. If the board is handling it, whatever was received from the United States would go direct to the farmer.

Mr. GARDINER: One has to remember that the farmers always deliver their grain to the wheat board as long as the advance paid by the wheat board is higher than the market price. And up until a certain date practically all, if not all the wheat, was delivered to the board. Then at a certain time the price rose above 90 cents. In fact it has gone up to about $1.02. Since that time practically all the grain is being delivered to the trade. That is just a choice that is made by the farmer; it is not made by the government. They must make a choice of one or two things. They can either deliver the wheat to the board and get the ninety cents advance, taking advantage of the participation certificate for collection later, or they can deliver to the trade. They have their reasons for delivering to the trade. I do not wish to discuss them at the moment. But the great majority of them, as soon as the price goes above the advance, deliver to the trade. The trade has been selling that wheat as they bought it, and probably some of it is offered by the board on the market. The wheat which is delivered by the board on the market will be getting ten cents a bushel to go toward participation certificates. But the wheat which goes to the line companies will be sold by the line companies at whatever the market is. They will buy at whatever the market is, and they will sell at whatever the market is. To that extent they may make some profit, or they may make some loss, depending on how the trade goes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But the farmer gets nothing out of it.

Mr. GARDINER: Nothing more than what he selected when he made his choice. He may have chosen to take that price rather than the ninety cents advance.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): But to-day he is getting $1.05 in Fort William.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I guess it has been as high as that.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It is $1.05 to-day.

Mr. PERLEY: It is only $1.03.

Mr. GARDINER: The principle is the same in any case. There was one other statement I agreed to make, with regard to wool. I stated the position in connection with wool, that one could realize a higher price in the Canadian market than in the United States market. I wish to place the figures on record so that they may be used by hon. members, if they choose. These figures are the net returns. The Boston price of one-quarter blood greasy is 54 cents. The duty is 59 per cent of 34 cents, or 20 cents. The freight is 82 cents per hundredweight, or 8·2 cents per pound. So that the farmer in Canada would net 25·8 cents. Then, if we add exchange, which is 2·6 cents, we find the farmer nets 28·4 cents. The price including four cents subsidy in Canada is 34 cents. That is, it is the difference between 28·4 and 34 cents.

Mr. FAIR: The farmer in the United States is getting a better price than the farmer in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: That is admitted by everyone.

Mr. FAIR: That was the point I was making.

Mr. GARDINER: The point is that so far as the Canadian dealer in wool is concerned, he can realize more at the present time, under all conditions, with our prices here, than he could on any other market. That was the point I made.

Mr. FAIR: My point was that a condition should be brought about in Canada, by subsidy, or in some other way, under which we can get a price which would compare with the price in the United States.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that. There was another question asked by the hon. member for Melfort. He asked that I place on record the figures which indicated that nearly $100,000,000 had been paid to farmers in subsidies and acreage payments in one year.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister said there was a hundred million.

Mr. GARDINER: I will deal with that too. I made the definite statement that there was nearly—or, I believe I said, pretty nearly—$100,000,000 in acreage payments and subsidies, and I was asked to put those figures on record. I have them here. These are the subsidies paid to agriculture in the calendar year 1942—that is, some of these amounts will relate to the 1941 crop, but they were paid in the calendar year 1942:

Prairie farm assistance	$14,471,060
Prairie farm income	18,175,114
Wheat acreage reduction	32,297,670
Cheese quality payments	1,730,919
Cheese factory subsidies	203,732
Butter for subsidy	7,000,933
Fluid and concentrated milk subsidy	3,846,036
Fertilizer subsidy	975,275
Feed freight assistance	9,832,004
Feed wheat, 8-cent drawback	333,720
Egg price subsidy	918,224
Subsidy on strawberries, by the wartime prices and trade board	42,233
Apple assistance (1)	2,257,620
Beef cattle purchase, by the wartime prices and trade board (estimated)	800,000
Fruit and vegetable subsidies to canners	741,000
Provincial subsidies on hogs and cheese for 1942 (estimated)	4,500,000
Total of subsidies and acreage payments	$98,125,540

This figure, I believe the committee will agree, is nearly a hundred million dollars in one year, involved in these transactions alone. What we were discussing at the time was the amount of money involved. The statement was made that hundreds of millions of dollars were going to industry in order to bring about and utilize to the full the production from factories for war purposes. I said it could be stated as surely that hundreds of millions had also been utilized to make possible the production and proper distribution of food supplies or farm products. Now, the figures with regard to that are round figures. I am not going to go into detail, because I am not allowed to do so in connection with these particular items. The wheat delivered by producers to the wheat board involved financing to the extent of $746,000,000 and carrying charges of one kind and another amounting to $115,000,000, making a total of $861,255,000 on the handling of wheat which passed through the wheat board. If one adds to that the $98,000,000 I have here, and another $150,000,000 which has been spent in direct subsidies through the years—the statement I have put on the record covers only one year—he will find that the total amounts to over a billion dollars. I think these figures substantiate what I said the other night, that in one way or another the assistance provided for the production and distribution of farm products has amounted to several hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. FAIR: I think it would be a good idea if the minister would place on record the fact that in 1942, the year for which he has given figures, the farmers lost, because of not getting parity prices for wheat, something like $140,000,000. It is agreed that the parity price for wheat is $1.40 per bushel.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think the time has yet come for me to say that. As I understand it, more than half of the wheat is still on the farms. I think that the best bank account there is in Canada to-day is a bin of wheat on the farm. What the farmer is going to get out of that wheat is not yet known, so that I am not in position to make that statement.

Mr. FAIR: I was referring only to the 280,000,000 bushels which have been delivered.

Mr. GARDINER: Even that is not all delivered; there is a considerable part of it still on the farms. The farmer has not yet lost money on that—I am not saying he will not lose something—so that I am not in position to make a statement as to what his position is with regard to the 1942 crop. I gave good reasons for that when I said that not very much has moved as yet. I want to emphasize what I have emphasized before, that the farmer has within his own hands the privilege of making sure as to whether he has an opportunity to get further returns on that crop. He can get a 90 cent advance from the wheat board. If he believes in the pooling of wheat as a method of getting every cent there is to be got out of the wheat, he will put his wheat into the pool. If he believes he can make more money by selling it now, he will sell it now. I do not think that I or anyone else could interfere with his judgment in that matter; he will probably do what he thinks is wise.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to point out the difference between the advances made to agriculture and those made to industry. The minister has stated that hundreds of millions of dollars have been placed at the disposal of agriculture. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the hundreds of millions of dollars which have been placed at the disposal of industry become its property at the end of four or five years through depreciation, but the hundreds of millions of dollars which have been advanced to agriculture will be repayable to the government on the sale of the wheat. The minister mentioned some $98,000,000 which had been paid out as subsidies during 1943, but I would point out that these subsidies were not all for 1942. In many cases they were not paid to the primary producer, the farmer, but rather to the processor.

Another matter I wish to bring to the minister's attention is the question of car allotments to the elevators in western Canada. When Mr. McIvor, chairman of the wheat board, was before the committee he stated that there had been no complaints as far as the board was concerned by the elevator companies. Since then I have received a number of telegrams and resolutions, and I think the chairman of the agriculture committee has received a number of resolutions, complaining bitterly about the allotment of cars made to the various elevator companies. It appears to me that the pool elevators are being discriminated against and are not receiving the cars they should. The result is that the producers cannot market their grain to their own elevators. I ask that something be done with respect to this.

Mr. WEIR: I have had representations made to me in connection with this matter since the meeting of the agriculture committee, and I took what I considered to be the proper course. I referred the representations that came to me to the officers of the Canadian wheat board. I received a reply a few days ago from the chairman of the board in which he stated specifically that until a certain telegram was received, I believe from the secretary of the Saskatchewan wheat pool under date of June 8, the board had not received any complaints with respect to the distribution of cars. He considered that since no complaints had been received the policy which had been pursued during the past year was working reasonably satisfactorily. He went on to say in his letter that the officers of the Canadian wheat board had met with officers of the three wheat pools, the meeting being held in Winnipeg I think about a week or ten days ago. This matter was discussed for one or two hours, but there had not been evolved or suggested any scheme that was more workable than the one in operation. The chairman of the wheat board went on to say that the managers of the three wheat pool organizations in western Canada were meeting officials of the Canadian wheat board to try to see if a more satisfactory system from the administrative point of view could be worked out. I think it is only fair to say that so far as the officers of the Canadian wheat board are concerned, they had not received any complaints with respect to the operation of the policy during the past year. Not having received any complaints, they considered that the policy was working out reasonably well. I repeat that steps are being taken to see whether a more workable scheme can be suggested. If it can be, I am sure that they will take steps to put it into operation. I think this statement is due the officers of the wheat board and the others concerned, because this problem of transportation is a most critical one.

Mr. FAIR: I should like to support what has been said with respect to subsidies. While I know that arguments are advanced from time to time showing that the farmer is getting everything or almost everything that is coming to him, with the exception of wheat, I must say I cannot agree with them. I have admitted before on several occasions that the cure is in the farmers' hands. If the farmers want to organize as industry and labour have organized, if they want to demand what is coming to them, they can get their just rights. Until that is done they never will get what is coming to them.

In the early days of the wheat pool in my province we had fifty-one per cent of the farmers signed up, but in a short time inducements were placed before them and many of the farmers started to bootleg their grain. They were given an extra grade, but at the same time a certain number of bushels per load were removed by painless extraction. Until the farmers wake up to what they are being done for they will have to be satisfied with receiving less than they are entitled to.

There is one point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister in connection with the storage of the grain we hope to get in the 1943 crop. I believe in a number of cases farmers will be compelled to buy lumber to build bins in which to store their grain. At the present time the approximate cost of a bin twelve by fourteen by seven, with a shingle roof, which will hold about 1,100 bushels of wheat, is $110. But I understand that at the present time a farmer can buy only $200 worth of lumber at one time. If this is correct, as I believe it is, some provision should be made by which a farmer may obtain enough lumber for more than two bins. In many cases additional storage space for 2,000 bushels will not be sufficient to take care of the crop during the coming year, because of the grain already in storage on the farms.

Mr. PERLEY: We have had some interesting information this morning; it appears that the Minister of Agriculture has taken over from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In some parts of western Canada that would be good news; for I believe the minister would make a pretty good job of it. Several questions have been opened up this morning on which I should have liked to say something, but a great deal has been said here and a great deal more was said when we had Mr. McIvor, the chairman of the board, before the agriculture committee, so that I do not think it is necessary to repeat what has been said by other hon. members.

I should like to say a word in regard to discrimination in the allotment of cars. I believe there has been discrimination; and I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has just left the chamber, was well aware of it. On June 30 I asked the minister directly if he had received any protests with respect to this alleged discrimination, and he replied that he had not. Later I met him and had a conversation with him, and he informed me that while there was no direct charge of discrimination, he had received many protests from individuals. Again on July 2 I brought the matter to the attention of the minister, and he admitted again that he had received many protests but stated that the board was not going to pay very much attention to them. When I was home at Easter I heard many complaints in our district in this regard, and I think there is no doubt that if the distribution of cars had been handled without discrimination, a great deal more grain would have been moved and many farmers would have had a chance to get a greater portion of their quota off their hands.

Something has been said to-day with respect to the price of wheat. I have just received a note from the hon. member for Moose Jaw in which he offers to bet me that wheat will go much higher. I wish he had given me this information a few days ago. I was given a certain amount of encouragement in listening to the minister this morning, but I delivered my wheat to the board and took a participation certificate, which the minister mentioned a few moments ago. That applies to about half my crop. I could not deliver the full quota before January or the board would have had all the wheat I was allowed to deliver. Fortunately or otherwise I could not get off the last four or five bushels of my quota until after Easter, and the price went up. As a matter of fact I held it until about twelve days ago, when wheat hit $1. I have been consistently advocating that the price of wheat should be $1, so that when I was able to get that price for it I thought I had better sell. Yesterday it reached $1.05, so you can see how I feel about it. However, part of it was delivered to the board under a participation certificate, which I hope may be worth another 20 cents before we are through.

Earlier this morning the minister said that the member for Qu'Appelle knew very well there was a great deal of grain in western Canada that should be under cover; and I will agree that if more cars had been made available and transportation facilities had been provided, much of that grain would have been under cover. Only this morning I received another letter from a lumber dealer in my constituency in regard to a matter which I took up with the lumber controller here in Ottawa. This is the second letter I have received from Mr. Rosborough, a pioneer lumber dealer at Grenfell, Saskatchewan. I took the matter up with the lumber controller, as I said before, but did not get very much satisfaction. This gentleman complains that he cannot get lumber to supply the farmers who want to build bins, and in the letter I received this morning he asked me to follow the matter up and see what can be done. No doubt the minister knows of many similar cases, and I suggest that he take it up with the lumber controller to see if they cannot get lumber at some of these local points so that the farmers may do the very thing the minister suggests—build bins and get their grain under cover. If he will undertake to do that it will save me the trouble of taking up the matter again with the lumber controller. In addition to the letters from this gentleman I have received several other protests from boards of trade to the effect that lumber is not available in some of these smaller towns, while in other places plenty of lumber is being supplied. The minister should go into the matter with the lumber controller and have the situation straightened out.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We called an item, and while it was perfectly in order for the minister to answer questions which had been asked previously, I would beg of the committee not to go all over the items which have been passed already. I do not say that in any critical way, but I believe it to be the general feeling of the committee that we should keep the discussion closely to the item under consideration.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I wonder if the hon. member for Qu'Appelle would be good enough to read the note I sent him, because I do not want any wrong impression to go abroad.

Mr. QUELCH: In reference to the item under discussion, could the minister tell the committee just what is the situation as between the renter and the landlord? That is to say, if the renter refuses to sign the landlord's application, does the whole amount of the bonus go to the renter, or does he merely receive his share based upon his share of the crop?

Mr. GARDINER: Under the law as it has existed since early this session, if the renter refuses to sign the statement that the other man is his landlord, the money goes to the renter.

Mr. PERLEY: Just to keep the record straight, this is the note I received from the hon. member for Moose Jaw: "No. 1 northern yesterday $1.05⅛. Will bet you ten dollars it will close higher to-day." I think the hon. member has some advance information on what is going to happen, or I would take him up.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There was a statement made by the minister which I think should not be allowed to go without someone taking exception to it. He pointed out that the farmer was in a position either to take his 90 cents advance now or to sell on the open market.

Mr. GARDINER: I think you ruled, Mr. Chairman, that we should go on with the item before the committee. We have got back to it now, and I think we should stay with it. We have been into trade and commerce and munitions and supply, in regard to lumber; I have been told that I am taking over another department, so that I think we should stop talking about it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If the chairman rules that I am not allowed to continue with this matter, I shall comply with his ruling; otherwise I should like to make a short statement.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the hands of the committee, but we have been discussing items which were passed previously, and the minister had to answer some questions which were put to him at that time. I do not believe we should go all over the items which have been passed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand that, but I should like your ruling as to whether or not the statement I wish to make is in order.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe the committee would allow the hon. member to make a brief statement. We are on item 31, which provides for wheat acreage reduction payments and administration expenses in connection therewith. If the hon. member wants to make a brief statement in reply to the answer given by the minister, I believe it would be in order.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My statement will be brief. The farmer was not in a position either to deliver grain to the board and accept the ninety cents Fort William price, or to sell on the open market and take the $1.02 Fort William.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the ninety cents advance, not price.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes, the ninety cents advance. Thousands of these farmers were in no position to take a chance on the ninety cents advance because no opportunity was given them to get hold of any cash last fall. They were allowed to deliver only five bushels to the acre, which was the opening quota. Since that time the quota has been raised, and the government have promised to take 280 million bushels of wheat from western Canada, but they have not taken that even yet. The farmer is in debt. He has not been allowed to sell a cash crop. What he sold did not cover the cost of harvesting, taxes and other indebtedness. He has had to sell what he could to get cash, and was forced to take the few cents extra he could get on the open market.

Mr. EVANS: That is not correct.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The hon. member can make his statement when I am through. I say that is why the farmer was forced to sell his grain where he could get most cash. I do not know what the grain exchange does except to take the farmer's profit. The grain exchange is allowed to clean up on what might have been the farmer's profits. I believe that if you took the subsidies that have to be paid to agriculture and added them up you would get an amount about equal to the profits made by the grain exchange.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to have an amplification of the statement made by the minister in answer to the hon. member for Acadia. Do I understand that the owner of a piece of land who rents it cannot get the money to which he is entitled unless the renter is prepared to sign a certain form?

Mr. PERLEY: That is correct.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: In my part of the country leases have been in effect for a number of years but because they were drawn up at a time when there was no crop bonus, no clause was put in to cover that. It seems an intolerable state of affairs that a man who rents the land that he owns should not be entitled to his fair share of the proceeds from working that land during the year. He is entitled to one-third share of the crop, and surely the man who owns the land and pays the taxes and looks after its upkeep is entitled to his share. I know cases where tenants, for reasons best known to themselves, have quarrelled with their landlord but have nevertheless stayed on the land, and under the law they can continue to stay there and do comparatively no work and take the proceeds of this wheat acreage bonus. I emphatically protest against that. Why not put ourselves in this position, that where a landlord produces a lease to the officials he shall be entitled to a share of the crop despite the fact that the tenant might be recalcitrant about signing any particular form submitted to him?

Mr. GARDINER: The only reason we do not do it, so far as the administration is concerned, is that that is what the law says. We passed the law in this house at this session; the whole matter was then discussed, and the law was made as it has been recited. That is why the administration has to do things in this way.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the minister the wheat acreage reduction by provinces for 1943?

Mr. GARDINER: There are no final wheat acreage reduction figures for 1943. I have the wheat acreage reduction figures for Alberta for 1942.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understood the minister to say that the approximate reduction for 1943 would be ten million.

Mr. GARDINER: The figures cannot be completed until the season is much more advanced. The final totals cannot be made up until about a year from now.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But the minister gave an approximate figure of ten million.

Mr. GARDINER: That is only an estimate.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You have no figure for 1943?

Mr. GARDINER: No actual final figures.

Mr. BENCE: Somebody interjected when I was speaking a while ago that I was acting for a mortgage company. May I point out that I have personal knowledge of many cases where the land is owned by private individuals, sometimes by widows with children. It does seem to me that consideration should be given to both sides of the case.

Mr. PERLEY: How many more applications for wheat acreage reduction bonus have there been this year than last year?

Mr. GARDINER: We have not the figures for this year, but the number would be about the same.

Mr. PERLEY: I have a clipping here from the Regina Leader Post in which Mr. Gray, the director at Regina, says that there are 14,000 more applications this year, and I was wondering why there are more. Are there new people coming in?

Mr. GARDINER: That would be new people coming in. The 14,000 would be in addition, but as members of the committee know, the application for payment is not required to be made until after July 1. While a farmer might have given indication of his intention to apply earlier than that, he might afterwards change his mind and not reduce his acreage at all.

Mr. PERLEY: This clipping is dated June 7.

Mr. GARDINER: The regulations provide that the farmer is not required to make application for payment of the bonus until after July 1. He can make it at any time after that. He might state his intention to apply before the 30th of May, but with conditions as they have been, many people would probably change their intentions. When the applications come in for payment we shall be much more certain as to the number of farmers reducing their acreage than we could be simply by taking their indication of intention.

Mr. WRIGHT: In view of the different method of determining the wheat acreage reduction this year, can we not expect a reduction in the number of inspectors in western Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: We have reduced the number. As a matter of fact, there are no permanent inspectors at all on wheat acreage reduction or on prairie farm assistance. There is simply a list of individuals whose services have been used from time to time. Some are called in for two or three weeks, some for a month, others for two or three months. This year there are fewer than in 1941.

Mr. FAIR: To come back to the amendment which was passed this session providing that the tenant must sign an agreement acknowledging his landlord, I remember distinctly that it was passed one evening after the dinner recess, by no means with the unanimous consent of the committee. Very shortly after that amendment was passed I asked the minister when we were in the railway committee room if we could not have an amendment to rectify what I believe is a wrong. I think it is not too late to do that yet. Some people have been taking advantage of this provision in the past, and if we go on with the law as it is now, we are only inviting more trouble. An amendment would make administration easier. But administrative difficulties can be overcome, and I think an amendment should yet be made to rectify the wrong of which we have spoken in this committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think that that question is in order. We are dealing with reduction of wheat acreage.

Mr. FAIR: That is exactly what the question is in connection with—who shall receive the respective shares of the wheat acreage reduction bonus.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister inform the committee why these inspectors are changed around? The department does not allow one of its inspectors, who works only during the summer-fallow and crop season, to remain more than one or two years in the same municipality. We have had, I believe, three different inspectors in the last three years in the Wolseley municipality. I would have thought that when an inspector has become acquainted with the farmers and has got to know the acreage and that sort of thing, he would make a better job than a new man. When any claim is in dispute and a second inspection is required, they have always sent in an outsider—which may be all right.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course there are different reasons for moving inspectors. Sometimes one man is left in a community much longer than another man is left in a community. For example, generally speaking, under prairie farm assistance—and both these operations are carried on under the same inspectors—we do not think it is desirable to have a man inspect his own township. There are obvious reasons for that. Quite often farmers who live in a township have large families in the same township, or family connections there or somewhere in the vicinity, and we would rather put these men in some other locality than have them accused of being partial to those people with whom they may be closely associated.

That is one reason. Then, we find that one inspector will be particularly efficient in inspecting a certain kind of crop; that is, he may be very efficient at estimating the yield while a crop is standing. That man of course would be used in places where that work is being done. Other men may be particularly efficient along other lines; and if we have to move a man from the place where he was in order to give him work somewhere else in which he is particularly efficient, then we have to move some other person into the area to cover the work he has been doing; the other person may be more competent to do that work than he is. That is, generally speaking, the way in which it works.

In reply to the hon. member for Melfort, it might be well if I put the number of inspectors on record. There were 57 inspectors and 32 supervisors at work in the three provinces on June 30. I believe there are 17 districts in Saskatchewan and one supervisor over each district. Alberta is divided into districts, with one supervisor over each district there, and Manitoba is the same. These 32 men are permanently employed; they work the twelve months through, but the 57 inspectors are men whom we call up to do inspection work when it has to be done, in the summer months, and they are employed only part time. There were 57 of these on June 30.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has the minister information as to the total number employed say in October 1942?

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid there may be less in October than now.

Mr. WRIGHT: There are certain seasons of the year when there are more of them?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there are certain seasons when the number is much higher, but this depends on the year, the type of the year and the extent to which work was done earlier. Somebody said a moment ago that under the act as it now is the procedure is much simpler than it was before, the reason being that now we are only checking on how much land a man took out of wheat and whether he is doing something with the land he took out of wheat. We are not particular about what he is doing; we simply say that as long as he is farming in a reasonable way and as long as he has taken the land out of wheat, we pay him $2 an acre. It is much simpler to administer that and it takes much less inspection than when we had to determine how many acres of barley and rye and summer-fallow and grass he had as compared with 1940. Now, so long as he can satisfy the administration that he has reduced his wheat acreage as compared with 1940 and is doing something with the land which is essential to the operation of the farm, he gets his $2. It will be seen from this that the figures with regard to inspection in past years would not give us very much information upon which to go this year.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it the intention of the minister to make an inspection of each farm again this year?

Mr. GARDINER: On the wheat acreage reduction we are taking the word of municipal secretaries to a greater extent this year than was done last year.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I find that municipal inspectors who commenced their duties other years on August 1 are beginning their inspections this year on July 1. Why would that be?

Mr. GARDINER: One reason is that in spite of the fact that the law does not require one to make a claim until after the first of July, the administration have been encouraging farmers to make these claims earlier. Many people have put their claims in, and the greater number of claims being in makes it possible to have the inspections at an earlier time, and we hope the payments will be out at an earlier time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Summer-fallow does not have to be done until the first of August. Might there not be a great deal of repetition in inspections of that kind, or does it apply only in the case of the fall rye which they have to check by the first of July. I would think that in the case of wheat reduction, summer-fallow and so on, it might be necessary for other inspectors to follow up, and that would be a costly procedure.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course the very fact, as stated a moment ago, that we are relying much more on municipal secretaries for reports of that kind would not necessitate, perhaps, a second inspection. We would get information as to whether that land is still black or whether it is growing a crop. If it is not growing wheat but something else, we pay the $2.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister say whether all last year's vote was taken up, and if it was, how is it that the vote this year is so much more? Is there to be a supplementary estimate?

Mr. GARDINER: There always has to be a supplementary estimate, and that will come in on the supplementaries. This vote, as is known, was made up months ago; it came down very early in the session, and it is only the administrative end of the work plus some demands which we know have to be met. The outside amount this year, we estimate, will run to about $26,000,000. The addition to this will be in the supplementaries.

Mr. SENN: It was all taken up last year?

Mr. GARDINER: There is about $2,000,000 of a carry-over of what was estimated last year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Rather than pay $4,265,000 to get farmers to go out of production, it would be a whole lot better to spend this money in fixing a parity price and getting more production of wheat and other food in this country. The United States is encouraging the growth of food. At the Hot Springs food conference, which was held recently, in which forty-four countries participated, it was pointed out that there never was sufficient food in the world for all the people. I think we are going at this in the wrong way. The paying of a bonus in this form is, I think, entirely wrong, and probably in a few years' time we shall be working in the opposite direction. However, seeing this is the policy of the government in power I suppose we have to carry on with it.

There are two complaints under this policy which have come to my attention. One is that many of the farmers who have made applications found that there was no record of their applications having been received. When they stated "I went down and made my application," they were asked "When did you do it?" "Oh, on a certain date." "Well," was the reply, "we have no record in the office here." That farmer gets no redress. Is something being done to see that the farmer when he makes application receives a duplicate of the application form signed by the municipal secretary?

Another point is this. A number of farmers found that they were too late putting in their application. They said they did not know they were supposed to have it in by a certain date. Is something being done to get in contact with the municipal councils in order that the councillors may inform everyone in their division that they must have their application in by the date specified?

[Mr. Senn.]

Mr. GARDINER: There are approximately 184,000 farmers paid under wheat acreage reduction, and I believe, speaking from memory, that the number that claimed they had made application or were entitled to make application in the first year, which of course would be the year in which there would be the greatest number of people who would not be informed, was six or seven hundred. There were 600 or 700 in that year who had to be considered afterwards, some of whom were allowed to collect. That is to say, we found that they had actually made application but their letters had either been misplaced or had not reached the proper authority. There are probably between 2,000 and 3,000 in addition to the 184,000 who actually did claim payment on wheat reduction but we did not consider that they properly came under the act, and there would be in addition to that, a few hundred who would come back and say that they did apply and the secretary of the municipality thought he had sent in the application. In those cases we check back and if we find the statement is correct the payment is made. There are cases where we are not satisfied with the man's statement and we say to such people that we have spent thousands of dollars putting this over the radio and in the local press and making statements about it generally so as to get it out to everyone we could possibly get in contact with by these means, and we have therefore to assume that these particular people had the same chance as everyone else. If therefore they did not apply until months afterwards we do not find it advisable to make these payments, and some have not been made. But there are very few compared with the total number.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Are there any exceptions to the rule with regard to those who do not apply on time?

Mr. GARDINER: No; there are no exceptions, unless they can show that they did apply. There must be someone somewhere to prove that they made application.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If it is a matter of negligence on their part—

Mr. GARDINER: If we are satisfied that it is negligence on their part we do not pay anything.

Mr. QUELCH: Suppose the farmer claims that application was made and that the application was lost; do you accept his affidavit?

Mr. GARDINER: It has to be supported by some other person. Someone has to know that he did make application. We do not accept his sworn statement by itself.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I have in mind a case which depends on this very point. This man claims that he did make application but they have no record of it. He claims further that he consulted the secretary of the municipality but the secretary says that he does not recall it. The whole thing boils down to the question whether the department accepts the farmer's word or his sworn affidavit or whether it discards that type of proof.

Mr. GARDINER: We will discuss the matter with him until we are satisfied one way or the other. I have some recollection of a case brought up by the member for Bow River, and I do not believe it is finally closed. As long as the man has any chance of giving proof that he did apply we will continue to try to find that proof.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But this is a brand new case.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh; if it is a new one he is starting pretty late.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister says that there must be some independent support. If a neighbour supports the man's declaration and states that he knows he made application, is that accepted?

Mr. GARDINER: I should not like to make a decision out of court. He will have to appear before someone and prove his statement, and if he proves it to the satisfaction of the officials he will be paid. If he does not, he will write to me and I shall have to go to the officials and see whether he made the mistake or they did. I get these letters from time to time.

One point was raised by the member for Yorkton which I cannot allow to pass without comment. He said that we are spending $4,000,000 to reduce production. That is not correct. We are spending $4,000,000 and some odd thousands to get more production of something we want, and that production will give greater returns than the production of wheat will yield. We are asking men to transfer from the production of wheat, of which we have 650,000,000 bushels in store, to the production of something else which we can sell right away, and to do that we are asking them to transfer certain acreages from wheat over to other grain and grasses. That is not reducing production. That policy so far has resulted in greater returns from the farms than could have been obtained in any other way, both in quantity of food and in return in cash, and for that reason I do not want to allow that statement to pass.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the minister could save a good deal in this inspection work. In the first place, we have far too many inspectors. The municipalities have to do a great deal of this work. In making applications for this bonus the municipalities take nearly all applications and send them in and they have to get out a lot of information on the matter. They do a good deal of work apart from a certain portion of the actual inspection work. As I say, a good deal could be saved. The minister may not have the information before him at the moment, but will he take this as an order for return, so to speak, and give us the number of inspectors in Saskatchewan, their salaries and expense accounts for the last year, and at the same time the number of those men employed again this year. I should like to have that information on Hansard.

The minister said something about the efficiency of the inspectors. I may point out the efficiency of one or two of them. I was north of Moosomin last year sitting with a farmer in his yard when one of the inspectors drove in, in a car, in a hurry, and stepped out of the car and rapped at the door. He asked whether this farmer was Mr. so and so, and was told that he was. I had never met this man before, but he did not impress me with his manner. He drove in in a blustering sort of way. The farmer asked him if he would like to meet Mr. Perley and he said, "Sure." The farmer said, "This is Mr. Perley." We got into a discussion about inspection work and he told me that he could inspect any field of grain in that municipality on the fly. I questioned him about how careful he was in going through the fields and he said he did not have to do that. If he could not inspect any field of grain, to get the information he required, by just driving past in a car he would not be on that job.

Mr. GARDINER: That would be right this year on wheat acreage reduction.

Mr. PERLEY: It did not happen to be right last year. We were looking at that crop from the barn and I was not impressed by that fellow. There were many complaints in that district regarding the manner in which he did his work, and he received a salary for it.

Mr. GARDINER: A return was brought down on February 20, 1943, giving all the information up to that date. Let me say again that it will be absolutely impossible to give a return right up to date. In the first place I would have to send to the office in Regina, and they would be able to give it only up to about a month ago. I could not possibly get that while the session is on, up to date.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give the number of men on the job this year?

Mr. GARDINER: There are only 57 on the job, up to date, although last year before the end of the season the number reached about 400 who had been on at some time or another.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There should not be so many required this year.

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The statement of the minister was partly true.

Mr. GARDINER: It was all true.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think the records will show, however, that the increased summer-fallow in the last few years has brought about a reduction in the possible production of food. We do not have what we could have had in the way of production. We have taken 10,000,000 acres out of the production of wheat, and only part of that has been put into coarse grains. The minister's own statement was that a few years ago we had too much wheat. Well, if he wishes to get production he will have to give the farmer a parity price. If he does that he will get the production he wants. The farmer does not want the bonus if he can get parity price.

Mr. GARDINER: We have got more food now than we ever got at any other price.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Because you also got rain, which you may not get this year. I have a further question: Are duplicate copies of farmers' applications to be given to them this year, so that they will have evidence that they have made application?

Mr. GARDINER: When I got mine I got three copies, only two of which had to be returned. I was permitted to keep one. I presume every other farmer will get the same.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has that been the procedure in the past?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that is the procedure.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has it been in the past?

Mr. GARDINER: Not always in the past, perhaps. We did start at some time to do it, and we are still doing it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The farmer is entitled to a copy of his application if he wishes to have it. Something has been said about municipal officials doing a great deal of this work. I know in my own province this work is heavy. Many of the farmers look upon their municipal offices as their community centre. They go to the clerk and find out a great many things which otherwise it would be very difficult for the farmer to learn. I suppose the municipal clerk is allowed something for taking these applications. I do not know whether he is allowed enough, but I trust that the minister, so long as this scheme is in operation, will continue to work through the municipal offices in the prairie provinces, because certainly they are of very great assistance to the farmers, generally speaking. Otherwise the farmers would be in a quandary, completely, if they had to write to the head offices, or chase up an inspector. I appreciate the work that has been done by municipal officials in those offices, and I presume the same has been done throughout all the prairie provinces. I trust it may be continued, and that they will receive appropriate remuneration for the work they are doing.

Mr. QUELCH: I understood the minister's statement to be that the purpose of the wheat acreage reduction bonus is not that of reducing the yield, but rather to increase coarse grain production. As the minister will know, in parts of Alberta, and I believe in some of Saskatchewan, there has been serious drought. In some instances wheat which was sowed never came up. That ground is now being cultivated, and it may possibly be sown to oats. However, if it is not sown to oats it will be summer-fallowed, thereby increasing the production next year. Will there be a wheat acreage reduction bonus on that land?

Mr. GARDINER: No. It is the action taken, not the weather, which controls the payment under wheat acreage reduction. Under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, if it goes into operation, assistance would be given to persons who are dried out during the season. But so far as this act is concerned, it relates to a man's action. That is why these inspectors are sent out—to find out whether the farmer has done differently. If we find that a man had sown wheat in the spring and ploughed it up in June, he would not be counted for wheat acreage reduction. It may be that some would get away with it, but that is not the intention.

Mr. QUELCH: For the good of the country as a whole would it not be better to change that arrangement? If the farmer leaves that grain as it is, and does not touch it, he will have a chance of getting $2 an acre prairie farm assistance bonus, but the country will not get anything from it. The country is losing production by this procedure. It would be far better for Canada if that farmer were to cultivate that land and put in coarse grains this year. But if he is not going to be eligible for wheat acreage reduction bonus he may think, "Well, if I leave it as it is I can get $2 an acre prairie farm assistance bonus for it, so I will leave it." I think it would be well if the minister were to consider that, and make it possible for the farmer to get the benefit of this provision.

Mr. GARDINER: I am pleased to see that the hon. member for Acadia is a much better farmer than the hon. member for Yorkton. It would seem that the hon. member for Yorkton thinks that by putting land under summer-fallow we reduce production. Every farmer in the committee must know that during difficult years the farmers were cropping more of their land than they should have been cropping under good farming practice, in the hope of getting a good crop some year to pay off some of their bills. We all know now that we were mistaken in that. And we know it more than for any other reason because of the acreages summer-fallowed under this act. We have grown more grain on the same acreage, even with as little rainfall as we have had in other years, in 1942 than we ever grew before. And one of the reasons was the increased summer-fallow. On my own farm I have convinced myself that I am going to summer-fallow more land than I did in the past. I have been convinced that, if I do, I will grow more bushels over any twenty-year period than I ever grew before, and I think most farmers in western Canada have been convinced of the same thing. Increasing summer-fallow until you reach fifty per cent of your land—anywhere between twenty-five per cent and fifty per cent—does not necessarily reduce production.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are they doing it this year?

Mr. GARDINER: They are not anywhere near fifty per cent. They could still increase their summer-fallow and farm to better advantage over a period of years. I am pointing out that it is wrong to say that an increase in summer-fallow cuts down production. The fact is that you are not cutting down production; rather you are increasing it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know anything about summer-fallow, when compared with the minister; certainly he knows more about it than I do. But I should like to ask two questions arising out of his controversy with the hon. member for Yorkton. The minister introduced a policy of wheat acreage reduction, and paid a bonus to western farmers for not growing wheat, on the theory that if the farmer did not grow wheat he would grow coarse grain. He believed that in that way he would have a production of a greater variety of grain. The minister and his officials believed that that would be more beneficial for the country generally. I am inclined to think that the policy had that effect. But what I wish to know, and what the farmers of eastern Canada are asking, is why this policy has not been made available to other parts of Canada, if indeed it is a sound policy.

The second question I would ask is this: why was it not considered good husbandry and good economy for the government to indicate to farmers that they should grow less wheat and more coarse grains, and not pay them for doing it—for doing something which a good farmer ought to do in his own interest? We had the same problem in a very much smaller degree in New Brunswick. The farmers there desired to raise seed potatoes. If they followed their own bent they would all be growing seed potatoes, and some of them would not even have a cow. That has happened in some parts of Maine. But they were all shown in years gone by that that does not pay. Those of us who had an interest in agriculture—and I do not mean that we all got down to the dirt and dug with them—have for many years been trying to preach to the farmers of the Saint John river valley and in the northern part of New Brunswick, that they should not put all their eggs in one basket. But nobody ever suggested that the farmers of New Brunswick—the farmers in Carleton county or Victoria county—should be paid for not raising potatoes. They do not understand why western farmers are paid a bonus for reducing their wheat acreage, while the farmers in New Brunswick get nothing. That is something the minister must explain to the farmers in my part of the country before the next election.

Mr. GARDINER: I can explain it now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish the minister would explain why that economy is practised in western Canada, and the rest of Canada has to foot the bill and get nothing out of it. I want to know that.

Mr. GARDINER: In the first place I would say that while the hon. member's statement will be looked upon by farmers in other parts of Canada as being very accurate, I do not think it is exactly accurate. For example we induced farmers in western Canada to grow feed grain, not only to feed their own live stock but to feed live stock in eastern Canada and in the United States. In order to provide assistance to the eastern farmer, we put a ceiling on the price that he had to pay for this feed grain, though we did not put a ceiling on the price to the American farmer. In addition we paid the freight from Fort William to the destination in the east.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the form of bonus the eastern farmer gets.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; we are giving him the grain at the price realized by the western farmer, plus the freight as far as Fort William. Last year the assistance which was given to the eastern farmers on that basis amounted to something like $10,000,000. In the coming year the assistance given to western farmers under war acreage reduction will amount to about $26,000,000. It may be said that the amount paid to do the job in the east is less than half the amount being paid to do the other job in the west, but to the amount expended in the east in this connection must be added the money we have paid for fertilizer, assistance which we are not paying on the prairies. We are assisting with fertilizer to the extent that we can get it, though we have not been paying for it in connection with potatoes. Until a few weeks ago we thought there would be enough potatoes, and that there would not be a market for all of them. Now we find that there will be a market and that we cannot get enough, but whether or not that will be the case next year I cannot say. However, we do try to keep that balance.

The hon. member asked why we should pay the farmer who is a wheat grower. We do so for the same reason that we pay the Nova Scotia apple grower. The wheat grower could not market all his grain after the early stages of the war and therefore would not have been able to stay on the land if something had not been done for him. So far as the apple grower is concerned, he does not get the full amount of the assistance provided. It works out at the rate of something like $400 or $500 per family that we have had to pay in one year. It is true that there are only between four and five thousand families, but the amount we have paid in order to keep the apple industry going in Nova Scotia, and to a limited extent outside that province, amounts to about the figure I have mentioned per family. We have never paid that much per family in western Canada, but I submit that is no reason why we should not pay the amount we are paying in connection with apples. As I have said, it does not all go to the apple grower; his is a different line of activity, and you must take into consideration the man who puts in the fertilizer, the man who puts in the spray, the cost of the barrels, and all that sort of thing. However, that is what it is costing us. The total is much smaller because we are dealing only with about four thousand families. When you have to deal with 250,000 or 280,000 families the amount piles up, but the individual farmer does not get any more.

In reply to the last question, the wheat growers have said to us, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has just finished saying, "We cannot produce wheat at less than $1 a bushel." We have replied, "Well, you cannot produce wheat even at $1 a bushel if, as a result of weather conditions, you do not grow any wheat." So we provided those farmers with prairie farm assistance in order to keep them on the land during periods of that kind in order that they might produce another crop the next year. Then the war came along, and after the fall of France we found that our markets on the continent had gone and there was no possibility of marketing much of our wheat. Every organization in western Canada—and I say this for the benefit of the hon. member for Yorkton—came here, led by the wheat pools, and asked us to quota the deliveries of wheat. The figure of 280,000,000 bushels is the figure of the delegation of four hundred that came here in the spring of 1942. I pleaded with them over in the hotel to ask for 300,000,000 bushels, but the best I could get out of them was to ask the government for not less than 280,000,000 bushels. If I had been the treasurer I would have done just what the present treasurer did; I would have said, "Since they mention not less than 280,000,000 bushels, why make it more?" I sat right on the platform with all the pool officials and the four hundred delegates, with the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Mines and Resources and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I said, "I have asked the government to put that figure at 300,000,000 bushels," but even after that when they came in with their recommendation it asked for from 280,000,000 to 300,000,000 bushels.

I just make that statement in order to place the facts before hon. members and to show that the quota was not fixed by the government alone; that this was the reasonable way to deal with it, as worked out by the grain handling companies together with the farm organizations and presented to the government to assure that all farmers would get some return. As a result we have placed the marketing of wheat under quota. I believe every farmer in western Canada will say that under the quota he has had the most orderly marketing of wheat in the history of the marketing of grain in western Canada; but because we were not able to take all the wheat and were not able to pay the advance which farmers thought they ought to have we said, "Now, we want you to take some of this land out of wheat. The only cash crop you have in sight is wheat. We are not going to increase the advance beyond ninety cents, but we will give you an acreage payment on the land you take out of wheat and put into some other production, because we want that other production." We gave them the money because we felt that otherwise, not being able to market their full crop of wheat, they would not be able to continue to produce. So we gave them acreage payments which one year amounted to almost $35,000,000, which last year came to $21,000,000 and which this year we estimate will amount to $26,000,000. We are giving that assistance to farmers who produced wheat before the war, when they had a market for it, in order that they may remain in the production of wheat to a sufficient extent to be able to swing back into wheat, if they should be required to do so, or to go on producing live stock. We hope the future may be such that we can remain in live stock production without hurting people in other parts of Canada; but if in order to assist agriculture right across the country it becomes necessary for the west to go back into wheat, to supply some demand somewhere in the world, I am sure it will be to the advantage of those in the east for us to go back into the production of wheat. At the moment, however, we do not think that should be done.

Mr. SENN: The minister made one statement which I cannot allow to go unchallenged, to the effect that the assistance given in connection with freight, amounting to about $10,000,000, all went to the benefit of the eastern farmer. I cannot agree with that statement, for the reason that if that freight assistance had not been given, the western farmer would have had to take lower prices for his coarse grains; otherwise the eastern farmer could not have used them. The farmer of the east could not pay that additional cost and continue to produce beef, dairy products or hogs. Therefore if this assistance had not been given, that grain would not have been used in the east and the farmers of the west would have been forced to sell at lower prices.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I listened to the minister's explanation, and he certainly made a reasoned argument. At the same time, after listening to agricultural debates in this house for a good many years, I wonder if the western farmer would not prefer a decent price for his wheat instead of bonuses. I think that is the issue. From an economic standpoint I cannot understand a member of a Liberal government advocating bonuses. I recall a pamphlet I saw in 1935, I think put out by the present Minister of Agriculture, which stated, "Dollar wheat will pay your debts. Dollar wheat will pay your taxes." That pamphlet did the trick in Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: We got it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree; it was a smart trick on the people of Saskatchewan, but they never got dollar wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes; we got $1.50 wheat after that and have dollar wheat now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You got the votes, too. However, I did not rise to make a political speech. I should like the minister to answer one further question before one o'clock. Is this to be a permanent policy? Are we to look forward to government bonuses, not only for the duration of the war, when quotas are being set and markets have been lost, but as a permanent thing?

Mr. GARDINER: I think I said the first year we hoped it would be only for one year. For that reason we did not put it in the form of legislation. We have now gone into the third year and we certainly hope that it will not be necessary to have this continued after the war, but there are grave doubts of our being able to do other than what we are doing in some form while the war is on unless before the end of the war there is a very decided increase in the market for wheat. I want it to be quite clear the record of the meeting of the 400 farmers who came to Ottawa is there to be read; every word that was said was taken down; there was evidenced a decided determination that the acreage payments we were making should not be an alternative for dollar wheat. The farmers were more prepared to accept 90 cent wheat plus these payments than they were to have dollar wheat without them. They believed that it gave some insurance. During the discussion this definite question was asked: If we get dollar wheat, does it mean the taking away of these acreage payments? I had to get up and say that as long as I was Minister of Agriculture the prairie farm assistance payments were going to stay.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a permanent government policy; that answers my question.

Mr. GARDINER: The prairie farm assistance was in effect before the war and is permanent policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was because of the drought.

Mr. GARDINER: They wanted the acreage payments as well as whatever advance was made on wheat.

Mr. FAIR: I think it should be made clear that the statement made by the minister was in connection with the prairie farm assistance bonus but did not refer to wheat acreage reduction bonus.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is one observation that ought to be made before this item carries. It does not bear exactly on the topic under consideration, but inasmuch as the minister told us at the beginning of his remarks that one of his chief concerns now was to find a way of storing the crop that is coming in, I think it would be well to spend a moment or two on this question.

I suggest to the minister that the only really thoroughly satisfactory long-range way of dealing with the storage of grain is to provide for storage on the farm. That will require a reversal of policy to a considerable degree and necessitate a great deal of government credit being advanced to farmers to enable them to build granaries to store the grain. But I believe it will be found to be the correct method of approach in the long run. There are several reasons why.

If the farmers were enabled to store grain in granaries which they themselves built and filled, and were to hold the grain in trust for the Dominion of Canada, having received payment for it and being paid storage regularly on it at very much the same rate as is being paid to the elevators, then in due time the farmers would come to possess the grain, or at least they would possess the granaries. The farmer would be required to keep the grain in good condition, and to show sufficient evidence to satisfy the inspector that he had done so before he would be permitted to market his new quota of grain. I believe this device would render the government secure against the loss of the grain, which would then be held for the government and be just as readily available to the government as though it were stored at a terminal elevator.

There are two or three reasons why this would ultimately lead to a satisfactory state of affairs. In times of drought, when grain has had to be shipped out to farmers for feed or seed, a good deal of expense has been entailed which would not have been necessary had the grain been stored on the farm and consequently been in the community where it was later to be used.

There is another serious aspect of the question. We may have disorder in this country at some time. We are so accustomed to looking upon our country as being secure from all internal commotion that we are likely to find it impossible to project ourselves into a state of affairs where there might be disorder, and if such occurred in the future it would be greatly to our advantage if we had the grain stored out on the farm where it would be much more readily accessible to the people than if it had to be distributed out from large terminal elevators.

The question will be raised immediately, where will the material be obtained now with which to construct these granaries? It is my settled conviction, from such information as has been given me, that there are a good many places in Canada where lumber of a more or less low grade could be manufactured were it not for the restrictions imposed on the manufacturer as a result of the activities of the timber controller. If the Minister of Agriculture were to take this matter up really seriously with the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the other ministers concerned, I believe a way could be found of rendering available a considerable quantity of lumber which is not now going into the hands of those who could use it.

May I suggest also that there is a good deal of cement which could be used to a considerable extent in the construction of granaries on the farm. Certainly it would be better to store the grain in that way than to allow it to accumulate in great piles on the ground, filling with anxiety the minister and everybody else concerned.

To sum up, may I suggest to the minister that a good deal of care and attention should be given to the matter of enabling us to store our grain on the farm.

Mr. FAIR: There is one phase of this question which should be discussed at some time, and that is the question of advances to the farmers on the grain they have stored on their farms. While the committee was sitting this morning, I got a letter in the mail box from a man who had been served thirty days' notice to get off his farm. He has feed and he has a number of brood sows and hogs, but he cannot sell the grain that he has, and he has been asked to get off the place. I understand that he happens to be in a fairly good financial condition. This is only one case of which I have knowledge, but I think that some interest should be taken in this phase of the question under discussion.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to revert to the question I asked this morning with respect to paying the bonus on burnt-out land which is now being cultivated. Would these men be eligible for the prairie farm assistance bonus?

Mr. GARDINER: If they are in a township which comes under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and they qualify, under the act, they would receive assistance.

Mr. QUELCH: A few years ago they were told that they would have to leave the land as it was, as proof that it had been burnt out.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no regulation that I know of to that effect. The more a man tries to help himself the more we like to help him.

Item agreed to.

Special.

32. To provide for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese and cheese factories, $1,875,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could not some consideration be given by the minister and the department to having cheese tested and graded which is made on some farms? The minister will remember that I had some correspondence with him on the subject last year and again this winter. I have in mind a first-class cheese maker who has put a lot of money into a herd of Jersey cattle. He is a cheese maker from the old country, from a district where they make one of the most famous cheeses, the Yeovil district of Somerset. This man at one time was manager of a cheese plant that made St. Ivel cheese, which is one of the most famous English cheeses. He has been producing a very high grade of cheddar cheese in this country but he cannot qualify under the bonus. He cannot get his product graded. I do not want to enter into a long discussion with the minister, but I would ask that reconsideration be given to meet cases of this sort. There may be others; I do not know of others, but I do know of this one case.

Mr. GARDINER: All I can say is that we do pay a premium on cheese. If it grades 93 the premium is one cent; if it grades 94 the premium is two cents. I know of no provision in the legislation or the regulations that would prevent a man who is producing high-grade cheese in some small plant of his own on his farm from getting the premium if the cheese is of the proper quality.

Mr. COLDWELL: His trouble is to get it graded.

Mr. GARDINER: It has to be cheddar cheese.

Mr. COLDWELL: He is making a cheddar cheese, but cannot get it graded.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think that that should put him in a position where he cannot get the premium. I think we ought to provide for its being graded. I have not in mind the details of the case. It is somewhere in the northern part of the province, is it not?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. GARDINER: Then probably there is only one man doing this. Probably the only way we could have a check made would be to get someone at the agricultural college at Saskatoon to go and make the check. I do not think this man should be deprived of his premium because someone is not coming around regularly and checking it up.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister's opinion is different from the opinion I got from the department before.

Mr. GARDINER: This is the view that I express. I will try to bring my view to bear on the department.

Mr. SENN: I ask the minister to break this item down into two parts. One part I believe is devoted to a premium of one cent and two cents on high grade cheese; the other is for improvements to cheese factories. I should like to know how much money was expended last year under each item, and what is anticipated will be spent this year.

Mr. GARDINER: The amount has been $350,000 for the construction and $1,600,000 for premiums. There is some difficulty at present in getting priorities for equipment, and we do not estimate that more than about $275,000 will be utilized for equipment; the remainder will be required for premium.

Mr. SENN: I suppose if this amount has been expended from year to year for the last three or four years since the Cheese Factory Improvement Act came into force, by this time most of the factories are properly equipped, though no doubt there are some which are not. However, I did not intend to emphasize that part of it. What improvement has been made in cheese production since the bonus has been in existence? Are we getting a larger percentage of our cheese to grade No. 1 and No. 2 than we did formerly, and if so, to what extent? Perhaps the minister also would say something more about our cheese exports to the old country. Is it likely that we shall be able to fill our quota this year? Evidently up to the present our cheese production for this year is far behind what it was last year.

Mr. GARDINER: As has been stated on a number of occasions, we had a higher production of cheese last year than we have had since very early in the century, and some of that increased production was due to the fact that we encouraged the production of cheese in the winter months. Starting with January and down to April there was a very great increase of the production of cheese as compared with the preceding years. If one takes the whole year into consideration, the quality is down in 1942 as compared with 1941. If one takes just the summer season when the better cheese was being made in all preceding years the position is about the same. Even in spite of the fact that we have had a great increase of production the position is about the same. To give the exact percentage of first-grade cheese to all cheese produced: in 1939 we had 91·72 per cent; 1940, 94·54 per cent; 1941, 95·51 per cent. There was a constant increase up to that time. In 1942, with 93·68 per cent, it is down as compared with 1941, but one has to make allowance for the two things I mentioned, the much greater production, and the fact that we produced so much in the winter months.

Mr. SENN: Do we ship that lower grade cheese to the old country?

Mr. GARDINER: As long as it is No. 1, 2 or 3 it may be shipped to Britain, but if a larger proportion of it in the winter is not in those grades, not so large a portion of it goes to Great Britain. As a matter of fact we did encourage the increase in the winter time in 1942 to supply local markets.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has there been any application for assistance under this item to cheese factories in western Canada, and are there any inspectors there to inspect cheese for the purpose of the bonus?

Mr. GARDINER: Most of the inspectors, of course, are in Ontario and Quebec, because that is where most of the cheese factories are, but there are some in the other provinces. The numbers of factories, with the amounts paid, are these: New Brunswick, two, amount paid $113.33; Prince Edward Island, two, $252.75; Quebec, original 143, supplementary 80, total subsidies $189,221.50; Ontario, original 67, supplementary 16; total subsidies $28,922.93; Alberta, two, $2,032.43; British Columbia, one, $981.85. There are none today in either Manitoba or Saskatchewan. In those provinces, as I indicated a moment ago, naturally there are no inspectors checking the work, there being no cheese factory.

Mr. WRIGHT: There have been no applications from Manitoba and Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think there were any in 1942, but my recollection is that there was one in Manitoba one or two years earlier. I doubt if there were any from Saskatchewan. We make very little cheese.

Mr. BOUCHER: Is there any collaboration between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Munitions and Supply as to priorities for cheese makers in respect to gasoline and tires? I have had several complaints from cheese makers about the difficulty of getting priority rating, as farmers do, for new tires. I think the question, although not strictly the minister's responsibility, is of interest.

Mr. GARDINER: We have a man, Mr. Armstrong, who is working all the time in connection with all these priorities, and he takes up with the officials of the Department of Munitions and Supply any complaints which are brought to our attention. On quite a number of occasions we have secured assistance for the people concerned, but there are many cases for which it is impossible to get priority.

Mr. DUPUIS: This forenoon we discussed the question of transportation of grain from the west to the east, and I understood that the reason given why more grain is not transported is lack of railway facilities. I have just had the pleasure of listening to the distinguished president of the Canadian National Railways with his officials. He stated that actually they could carry more grain than is offered. I thought it well to bring that to the attention of the minister so that the farmers of Quebec may be allowed to have more grain to help them in raising their stock.

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot let that statement pass without correction. I do not know what the officials said in the committee, but I have sat in committees and tried to arrange with the railways for some considerable time to provide cars. The railways have done their best, but there is no one moving grain in Canada to the extent that we want it moved, neither the railways nor anyone else. We are not blaming anyone for that. We are asking the railways to move other things. But both the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I have sat on committees with representatives of both railways and have pleaded with them to put more cars at the disposal of those shipping grain, and they made representations to the effect not only that they could not do so but that, so far as they could see, they were going to be able to move what grain had to be moved. These discussions go on continuously and so far we have not been able to get a sufficient number of cars after appealing to railways on both sides of the line to move the grain.

The CHAIRMAN: I hope that the question brought up by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville will not be taken as affording an opportunity to discuss this subject again, because we passed that item this morning. I believe it is the wish of the committee that all hon. members should remain within the item under consideration.

Mr. MacNICOL: I happened to be out of the house on a committee when item 29 was carried. I am not going to discuss that item now but I should like to say a word by way of compliment to the minister and his department on having in charge of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act a man who in my judgment was cut out for the job. I refer to Mr. George Spence. He has all the qualifications for the job, he is intensely interested in his work, and I am convinced that he is doing a good job.

Mr. FAIR: I wish to ask a question not on cheese but on a matter which is closely related to it. It is a hangover from a previous discussion. What price is being paid by the government for any surplus of dairy butter?

Mr. GARDINER: It is paid under the commodity prices stabilization board, which is under the prices board. I am sorry I have not the exact price offered, but that can be obtained when discussions are on with regard to the prices board.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Unfortunately I happened to be out of the chamber when the minister made his statement on prices of wool. Would the minister tell the committee what is the average price of wool for 1943? According to the figures I have, the price in 1941 was 24·91, and the price for 1942 was 26·75. What would be the price for 1943 comparable to those?

Mr. GARDINER: The return for the grade of wool we were talking about is indicated, in the statement I gave, as 34.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That would be the price to the ordinary wool producer in Alberta, or would he be producing the type of wool the minister had in mind?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be impossible to go across the country and give the exact price at every point. I am not certain whether it is Winnipeg or Toronto, but it is some central point.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That would be the price which the wool producer would receive, less freight?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 7, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I think we had better finish the wartime prices and trade board items. One item has been carried, the wartime prices and trade board proper, but the allied agencies have not been dealt with. I think they should all be dealt with at the same time. The next item is the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, and then follow two crown companies. It would interrupt the sequence badly if we were to vary that order.

The CHAIRMAN: What item does the minister wish to have called now?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, $120,000,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I sat in the house all yesterday and I wished to ask a certain question, but the relevant item was passed in my absence. I understood that No. 1 would not be finished. I left at ten minutes to eleven. There is one matter to which I should like to make reference if I may.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot take any exception to that, because I said last night that there were certain questions unanswered which I thought I could answer on the next item without any undue stretching of the rules.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What I have to say refers to a matter which I know will receive the approval of hon. members generally. It is something that is being advanced not by way of criticism but from a desire to rivet the attention of the house and the country on the necessity of assuring men who were in business and who come back from overseas of the opportunity of securing a permit to carry on business. I am going to give a concrete example which has just come to hand. It reveals I submit a serious situation when the rehabilitation of the men who have served overseas and who return is being considered. Since November 2, 1942, no new business may be opened up within designated lines of business, and the result is that service men who were formerly engaged in business, say, in a retail store, which is the only training they have had, when they come back are denied the opportunity of carrying on that business. It is the only business they know anything about, and their experience fits them for nothing else. The instance I have in mind is sufficiently definite to be regarded as typical of the result of a strict application of the regulations. This ex-soldier, William W. McIntosh, served overseas twenty-five months. He had been running a hardware store in Vonda in Saskatchewan before he enlisted in September, 1939. He has two sons, and both of those boys are overseas. He left his business under the control of a relative who did not operate it any too well, and finally, in August 1941, the relative closed the business, there being a large amount of hardware still on hand. Finally this man returned from overseas. For thirty-five years he and his father before him had operated this hardware store. There had always been two hardware stores in the town. When he was discharged from the army the only place he could go was back to the operation of the business, in respect of which he still had a large amount of stock on hand. On April 27, he wrote the wartime prices and trade board setting out the facts I have given to the house, and also stating that in order to establish himself in civilian life it would be necessary for him to open his store, that being his only means of support. In his letter he stated further:

> There is a good stock on hand, many articles which are unobtainable in the market to-day. It will not be necessary for me to purchase a great deal of stock except for replacement of goods which I may sell from the present stock.

He was discharged in March, and wrote this letter in April. He received no reply, and again on May 20 he wrote the wartime prices and trade board at Saskatoon advising them that on April 27 last he had made an application to the board for a permit to reopen his business, after being discharged from the Canadian active service army. Then he said in his letter:

> I have as yet received no word as to whether or not my application was received or whether it was granted or refused. Surely some decision must have been arrived at after a period of over three weeks.

On May 27 he received a letter from Mr. J. E. Housey, the representative in Saskatoon, acknowledging receipt of the letter of May 20, and stating:

> We would also like to know if anyone else has started in this business in the town of Vonda. If so, your store would have to be treated as a new entrant into business.

No store had been opened in the interval, and he so replied, stating further in his letter:

> I would say that no one else has started in a hardware business in the town of Vonda since the closing of my store, and my store cannot be considered a new entrant. It is now over a month since I made application for a permit. In view of the fact that my small capital is being depleted for living expenses and I have no other income until I can open my business and reestablish myself in civil life, I would ask you to rush this matter through as quickly as you possibly can.

On May 31 Mr. Housey wrote again, stating:

> Owing to the fact that this store has been closed since August, 1941, it will have to be considered as a new entrant into business, as order 184 states that a business not operated or closed for a year prior to November 2, 1942, must be considered a new entrant into business.

Nothing further was done, and on June 15 one of the wartime prices and trade board representatives at Regina, Mrs. May W. Neal, wrote to him as follows:

> Will you be good enough to inform us what other stores in your community are handling the same lines of hardware, and if there are no others how close the nearest hardware stores are located to you. We must also know the definite date on which your business was temporarily suspended.

The soldier replied on June 16. In part he wrote:—

> When I was discharged from the army I had a limited amount of capital but this is rapidly being used up in living costs while awaiting permit to open my store. It appears to me, that in my case, where I had served three and a half years in the active service army and over two years in England, that my application could have been granted immediately and every assistance given to me to reestablish myself in civilian life without assistance from the government.
> As the matter now stands I will very shortly either have to open my business or apply to the government for assistance, as I cannot go on living without some means of supporting myself.

He received no reply to that letter. Then he wrote again on June 27 to the wartime prices and trade board, stating:

I cannot understand why it should take two months to deal with my application.

He received no reply to that, and, finally, on July 5, he wrote a letter which is undoubtedly the culmination of over two and a half months of delay. In that letter he said:

It will be ten weeks ago to-morrow since I made my application for a permit from your board. Repeated requests for some action one way or another have had no results and I have been put to considerable expense and monetary loss through this unnecessary and unwarranted delay.

Then he states something which I believe I should place before the committee. These are his words:

I can no longer support myself without some means of subsistence, and if no permit is received from your board by next Monday, July 12, my store will be open for business without a permit.

That part of the letter I do not try to justify. But here was a man who served his country, and whose two sons are overseas. He has engaged in only one business, namely, the hardware business. I know I will receive the sympathetic cooperation both of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and also that of hon. members generally, when I ask that this rule which prevents the opening of a business be not applied against men returning from overseas. When a man returns from overseas, and wishes to reengage in business in the town in which he formerly operated, he should be given an opportunity to do so in order to rehabilitate himself. Otherwise the observance of the letter of the regulation issued by the wartime prices and trade board means that our men, after they have served their country, are going to be denied the opportunity of rehabilitating themselves. I believe an undertaking along that line would do much to improve the morale of the men who serve.

Practically every able-bodied man in this little town of Vonda is in the army—people of various races, including besides people of British origin, French, Ukrainian and German. When these people see the regulations strictly enforced against a man who returns from overseas, thereby denying him the opportunity of earning a livelihood, it does not make for the type of feeling which should exist. I would ask the minister to alter the letter of the law, so far as the opening of new businesses is concerned, in respect of men who go overseas. When they return, they ask for and have the right to demand the opportunity to earn a livelihood. I believe all hon. members agree that these men should receive everything the country can give them fairly, and surely they should not be denied the right to earn a livelihood in the business in which they were formerly engaged.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the first I have known of the facts, although I understand my hon. friend communicated them to my parliamentary assistant this morning. On the recital of the facts I cannot, of course, justify the delay in dealing with the case. I do not know if there is any explanation for the delay, but I shall have the case investigated. The hon. gentleman asks me to give an undertaking that a principle will be established that men returning from overseas will be exempt from the provisions of the order preventing the establishment of new businesses.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If they were previously engaged in business, or if their training in civil life was in business.

Mr. ILSLEY: I very much doubt if permits are denied now in cases of that kind. There has been delay in the case mentioned, I admit; but I just want to point out that this order preventing persons from going into business is of course a serious interference with the freedom of the individual, perhaps one of the most serious of the interferences that have been set up by the government. It was set up because, as persons in business understand full well, in a great many lines the stocks that are given to one trader are virtually taken away from other traders, and the order was passed for the protection of retailers and persons now engaged in business of that kind. I do not think the hon. gentleman would advocate the rescission of that rule; I do not know whether he would or not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not argue the abolition of the rule, but I do argue against its application to discharged soldiers; otherwise you are going to deny men who have served overseas an opportunity to rehabilitate themselves.

Mr. ILSLEY: My colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health has made representations with regard to these men returning from overseas. He has submitted that they should be granted permits; the matter has been fully discussed, and he has just handed me this memorandum: "Gordon said he would make reasonable allowance for men setting up in business after discharge by allowing quotas of rationed goods on special basis. The man's difficulty was that he had no quota," this was a British Columbia case,

"not having been in business during the basic period." I do not know just what that means, but I know that special consideration is given to cases of returned soldiers. In view of what the hon. gentleman has said; in view of the fact that this man had a store, I should think this would be a case in which special consideration would be given, but there are cases in which men want to buy stores and reestablish themselves in that way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They want to start new businesses.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. If that were allowed generally—perhaps it is allowed generally; I do not know—or at any rate if it were allowed in every case it would just mean that those in business, including veterans of the last war, it must be remembered, would be deprived of part of the stocks in trade they would be able to obtain otherwise, because there is quite a scramble now for stocks in trade in these limited lines. So that some sort of reasonable balance has to be fixed. As I say, on the statement of facts given by the hon. gentleman there has been a delay for which there would appear to be no justification, and I shall have that case looked into at once.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What would be the attitude of the board with respect to a case like this? A well established retailer dies and there is no one in the immediate family to carry on the business. The widow must sell. Would a permit be issued to a purchaser to take over that business? Of course these questions are always based on individual cases, and I understand there was such a case in which a permit was first refused and subsequently granted. I should like to know the practice.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am told that the practice is to grant permits in cases of transfers of ownership.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that would be fair.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry I was out of the house this morning, on account of the various committees which are sitting, and which I think is unfortunate, but I want to ask the minister something about the purchasing abroad of various commodities in bulk. Perhaps that question was answered earlier.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. If my hon. friend will permit me, we are trying to finish up the item that was passed last night, and we shall come to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation in a moment.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought the other item was finished last evening.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was finished, but on the understanding that I would answer one or two questions that were raised, and I shall do that now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister given consideration to the situation which I have brought up in the house on two different occasions, namely the application of the price ceiling along the border of New Brunswick and the absence of a price ceiling in the United States? I would urge the government to deal with that situation. Since I spoke previously in this connection a very difficult situation has arisen with respect to fuel wood along the border; I think I mentioned the matter months ago. Fuel wood is subject to a ceiling in New Brunswick. Fuel wood has no ceiling in the adjacent state of Maine. To-day the spectacle is being witnessed down there of truckload after truckload of fuel wood going across the line, commanding the higher price plus a premium. Last night at McAdam Junction a man who lives at Aroostook Junction told me that it was impossible to buy fuel wood in New Brunswick as a result of that situation. A controller has been appointed down there. Has a permit system been set up, or what is the position? As the cold weather approaches that situation will become very serious, and of course the pulpwood situation is much more serious.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman brought up the question of pulpwood, the export of which is under permit. Of course in connection with any commodity the price of which is higher in the United States than in Canada, very difficult questions arise because the exporters who are lucky enough to be able to get their exports under the quota permitted receive more money than those who are unlucky and have to sell in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the difficulty. The quota is so large that it will take all our exports; there is no trouble about getting a permit. The difficulty is that the local mills are not going to be able to keep going. All the pulpwood cut on the farmers' lots and in the small freehold sections of the province is going into Maine, while the portion ordinarily available to the provincial mills is not available now because they cannot meet the price. There is no trouble about getting a permit to export.

Mr. ILSLEY: According to the figures I have, the situation is that Canada agreed to supply to the United States 1,550,000 cords of pulpwood in the calendar year 1943, inasmuch as Canada for many years has been a substantial exporter of pulpwood to that country. Realizing the possibility of a reduction in production, this quantity was arrived at in relation to our exports of both pulpwood and newsprint, and compares with exports in 1942 of 1,920,508 cords and in 1941 of 1,842,234 cords. This reduction in quantity was arranged in order to allow a greater quantity of wood pulp to be available to Canadian consumers. With regard to wood fuel, that comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am told that pulpwood comes under his jurisdiction as well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is correct.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am under the impression that fuel wood has not been placed under export permit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps it should be; I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): From the investigations I have made I think that something in the nature of a permit system could be worked out under which the local controller who is on the ground could see that supplies for local consumers were reserved for them before the surplus was allowed to go out. However, the difficulty is the difference between the selling price in New Brunswick and the very much higher price across the line. The result is that producers just will not sell locally; they will take their chances on holding. I know it is a problem, perhaps due to the failure—I say that for lack of a better word—on the part of the authorities across the line to keep prices down somewhere on a parity with ours. The effect is very bad upon our consuming population, and this problem will have to be tackled.

I do not think the person who prepared that memorandum on pulpwood visualized the true position. It is true that we have always sent a certain amount of pulpwood, but when that was done we were dealing on an equal basis with the Maine mills. However, with the present ceiling price in Canada we just cannot compete with the prices they are willing to pay. No one is willing to sell to the Canadian mills. They know that we are well within the quota and they can ship across the line and get the enhanced price of at least $5 per cord; taking into account the premium, it may be even higher than that. This situation, if not corrected, will result in at least one mill temporarily suspending operations. I am quite aware that we owe something to our United States friends in the way of supplies of raw materials, but this is the situation that exists.

I think the remedy would be to put a limitation on our price and let our people go out and compete with them on even terms. That may not be possible, but that is my suggestion. Let them take their chances on getting their share of the production. This is what should have been done at the beginning. Give them export permits, but let them compete on an equal basis.

Mr. ILSLEY: Raise the price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not suggesting that; perhaps there should be an increase in the price in New Brunswick, but that would be one more item of increased production costs. The minister talks about the cost of living, but the fact is that it is going up in every line. One item is the increased cost of producing pulpwood. I am going to send the minister a copy of a letter which I received from a Methodist minister in Windsor about the increased cost of living and the price ceiling. It will amuse the minister to read this. I am not going to put it on the record. Say what you will, commend the policy, and I do commend its objectives, the fact remains that this thing is just bursting. I do not know how we are going to hold it without control across the line. It is a terrible problem that is confronting the board having regard to the situation existing in the United States. We are right alongside the border and we are feeling the repercussions.

It is not good enough to say that the cost of living index has not risen beyond what the minister says it has. Every housewife knows differently. If the minister were marketing, as I was on Saturday, and had to pay fifty cents a pound for lamb he would know what the cost of living is.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will read the letter. I ask my hon. friend to read the remarks I made last night about the cost of living index.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will. I know the minister defended it. He said that it was the best that was available, but that is a change in his attitude. He always said that it was the criterion.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not agree with the minister, and there is no one else in the world who does. It may be the best index that is available, but it does not tell the true story of the cost of living. Go into any home you like in this country and you will find that the cost of living has increased by a greater percentage than that given by the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: The cost of food has gone up thirty per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The cost of everything else has gone up.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The cost of firewood has gone up twenty-five per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: What proportion of your income do you spend on firewood?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In my case it might not be very much, but it would be quite large in the homes of some of the poor. The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount would not understand that.

Mr. ROWE: What basis is used in allotting the percentage to food products?

Mr. ILSLEY: Could we not finish the wartime prices and trade board item and then go on to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation? I think when I answer two or three questions which I undertook to answer it should wind up the discussion on that item.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) asked last night whether all the inspected slaughter houses were owned by the big packers. I have made inquiries and I find that there are 54 inspected slaughter houses in Canada, of which eighteen are owned by the big three packers, that is, Canada Packers, Swifts and Burns. The rest are owned by what might be called independents.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked the number of permits which had been granted to new entrants in business. In the first few months of the administration of the governing order it was not practicable to tabulate totals of permits issued. The figures could be obtained by a detailed analysis of the files, but this would represent a very large task. From March 16, 1943 on records have been kept which show that from that date to June 30, 689 permits have been issued. A large number of these have been for quite small enterprises; for example, 122 permits for egg grading stations and 31 for coal dealers. Permits issued prior to March 16 were for the most part granted in recognition of commitments made prior to November 2, in accordance with the policy announced when the order was issued. The hon. member asked for the distribution of permits by provinces. There are four districts, and the distribution was as follows:

Western provinces	360
Ontario	178
Quebec	106
Maritime provinces	45
	689

The larger number in the western provinces is due to three factors. One, quite a number of egg grading stations were authorized; two, a large number of people were given the right to mix and sell mixed feed for live stock and poultry, and, three, it was necessary to authorize a number of new businesses to take care of the new Alaska project. The records of the director of licensing do not show separate figures for each western province.

The hon. gentleman also asked for the figures showing the effect upon retail stores. Particulars as to the closures of retail establishments are not available, but the figures for commercial failures, as published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, show the following for the trade and service groups:

1939	861
1940	792
1941	671

The corresponding figure for 1931 was 1,357.

These figures, of course, do not tell the whole story, since there are a substantial number of persons retiring from trade otherwise than by failure. Figures for the total number of closures of retail establishments are not available, but the wartime prices and trade board has, on three occasions in the past year, arranged for test surveys to be made of the reasons for closures, examining approximately 150 cases on each occasion.

These surveys were made on recognized sampling techniques, and I have every reason to suppose that they reflect conditions generally. The surveys show conclusively that by far the greatest number of closures are still occasioned by reasons of illness, old age, and bad management, but quite a number are due to transfers into war industry and other civilian employment.

Some closures were reported as being due to curtailment of supplies. This is inevitable during war time, and must follow from the restrictions on manufacture of certain consumers' durable goods.

There has apparently been some increase in the closures occasioned for these reasons; the fact remains, however, that the greatest number of closures are still occasioned by reasons other than war-time controls.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle wanted a statement of the rental prosecutions for the province of Saskatchewan. From December, 1941 to June, 1942, there were 6; in July, 1942, 2; August, 3; September, 6; October, 12; November, 4; December, 5; January, 1943, 6; February, 3; March, 3; April, 5; May, 3; making a total of 58.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that for the whole of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, just for Saskatchewan. I have here the figures for the other provinces, but they were not asked for.

The hon. member for Lake Centre asked for the number of directives that have been issued pursuant to the announced statement of policy on equitable distribution of goods in short supply.

This policy is implemented by all administrators of the wartime prices and trade board, and no centralized record of the directives given by such administrators is maintained, nor would it be practicable to do so. Any person who is of the opinion that he is not receiving his fair share of goods in accordance with the announced policy may apply to the appropriate administrator for relief, and if the administrator is satisfied, appropriate action is taken. Frequently such action is quite informal and an official directive is not necessarily issued.

The hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence), suggested that there had been a deterioration in quality of gasoline without a corresponding reduction in price. The standardizaton of grades of gasoline is covered by oil controller's order No. 008-A, dated September 26, 1941, which date is prior to the commencement of the over-all price ceiling.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps at the proper time the minister would answer a question I am going to put to him now. It seems that it has been necessary since the outbreak of the war to change the wording of the auditor's certificate of accounts, and perhaps with regard to the wartime prices and trade board. How far behind is the audit now? Last year it was considerably behind, but there has been some catch-up. What means are being taken to keep the audit close up to the expenditures?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that would come under the item for the auditor general.

Mr. HARRIS: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will try to be prepared with the information when we reach the item.

Mr. O'NEILL: Last night I asked a question with respect to the slaughtering of hogs. Reading Hansard to-day I am not very sure just what the minister meant. The minister said:

> For export houses the quota is fifty per cent of 1940, and for others it is seventy-five per cent of 1941.

Then he goes on to say:

> There have been 12,000 slaughter permits issued, and there are about forty-five or fifty inspected houses. I cannot imagine that all of them are controlled or owned by the packing industry.

He concludes by saying:

> I shall have to get some information for the hon. gentleman. I shall look into the situation.

My information is that in the city of Vancouver there are three of these packing houses. Two of them are owned by the large packing concerns and the other was an independent concern. There was a mortgage on it, and they were closing out the mortgage. The minister says that a quota is placed on the slaughtering house, so that quite naturally there would be no way for the independent man to get his produce in there.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would not make any difference, because the quota is a proportion of the number slaughtered in 1940 or 1941, as the case may be, and the result would be the same whether the quota went by establishments or by companies. The answer I gave was correct, except that I should have said "inspected" houses rather than export houses, but the two terms are used interchangeably in common parlance. What I said was substantially correct. I said forty to fifty, but it should have been fifty-four inspected houses. Eighteen of them are owned by Canada Packers, Swifts or Burns, and the rest by other packers. The quotas for hogs are the quotas I gave last night; the quota is 50 per cent of the 1940 slaughtering for domestic sales by the inspected houses, and for non-inspected houses 75 per cent of the 1941 slaughtering.

Mr. O'NEILL: I understand that exactly the same procedure was adopted with respect to hogs as they had for cattle. But that was changed so that the quota is not divided among the packers on the same basis as it was last year. Instead there is a quota to a district, and all you have to do then is to have your animal slaughtered in an accredited house.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no quota to a district.

Mr. O'NEILL: The information I have from the foods administrator is that the quota used to be divided among firms, but that was changed and now there is a certain quota for a certain area. It no longer applies to any particular company. But with hogs that does not apply. With hogs it is a quota to a concern or packing house. That is unfair to the small dealer and bad for the producer.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are no district quotas, I am informed. It is a technical matter, and perhaps the hon. gentleman would take it up with me. It is pretty hard to get much further with it in a discussion such as this. All I can do here is to put it off for the moment, look into it a little more and then come back.

Mr. O'NEILL: I do not want to hold up the minister's estimates, but a quota as between companies who had formerly done business is not, in my opinion, a fair way to have it. If there are a certain number of animals to be slaughtered, the man who will pay the producer the highest price and keep within the ceiling is the man who should be permitted to slaughter these animals. If you are going to operate it on a quota or percentage of what these men slaughtered last year or in 1941, you are going to squeeze out the small producer. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CHURCH: I want to add a few remarks about the administration. There is a grave danger in the rapid expansion of this wartime prices administration, which went from $55,000 to $161,000, to $10,514,000, and now to $14,300,000 a year. By this rapid expansion in geometrical progression you are creating a mechanism which is not only inflationary in the widest sense but very possibly will not attain the objects for which it was created. It is fraught with great danger to the finances of the country in other ways and to all connected with the system. Just look over the many phases of the problem which has been discussed in the past twenty-four hours with regard to some twelve different forms of business. One cannot expect the Minister of Finance to know everything about this particular organization; it amazes me that he can attend to as much as he does. I do not want to be critical of him; I hope he has not inferred from what I said the other evening that I am critical of him and his department. But in a report made by a very important bank they point out that the more expensive and elaborate an administration becomes, the greater the opportunity for mistakes, and the more costly the mistakes, the greater is the inflationary effect. That is true. Anyone who has had any experience in this connection knows it to be true as subsidies tend to widen and cover more producers cost increase. There is a great deal of information on the administrative part of the board's work in a very informative bluebook covering the period September 1939 to March 1943.

From the various references which have been made in this debate one can see how widely this work has expanded. One hon. member has just referred to slaughtering, another has spoken of fluctuations in the cost of living affecting many very important phases of production and distribution. The system has widened out to something we never thought of. What I am fearful of is that we shall go a little too far. There was a return brought down on March 18 last, and I think the minister stated that, so far as the economic administration of this department and the economic life of our country were concerned, this had been turned over entirely to an outside board with such complete control that it was practically a parliament in itself. The head of it could issue rules and regulations having the force of statutes, with the grave dangers which attend such a proceeding. When the board started I asked certain questions of the minister concerning the expansion all along the line of this administration, which now costs $14,300,000. The higher you soar into the clouds of finance the less the likelihood that the money will be well spent. That is a well known economic principle.

On March 18 last I asked this question:

Who is the minister of the crown responsible for the various public utterances of—

The chairman of this board.

—and all his staff and controls, sub-controls and other officials in Canada, and are these speeches first submitted to each separate ministry?

2. What has been the cost of the wartime prices and trade board since its inception, by years?

3. What are the salaries, living allowances, travelling expenses and other allowances of each headquarters officer or official of the said board since appointment and what was the previous occupation of each?

4. Who instructs them as to their duties?

There has been a great deal of criticism of one of the branches which deals with rentals. I think the hon. member for Yorkton dealt with this matter the other evening.

5. What is the number of officers under each control and the total payrolls for the last year of record of the board and its officials?

Here are the answers: First, as to who is responsible:

The wartime prices and trade board is responsible to the Minister of Finance. The texts of such speeches and public addresses are not normally first submitted to the minister.

In other words the chairman of the board can pass orders and rules and regulations having the force of statutes and impose fines up to $5,000 and is himself in absolute control of our whole economic life. That is a very dangerous practice. True it is that there is a war on, but I am sorry to see what is going on in the name of the war. All over the country we find activities alleged to be for the war which are not for the war at all. I am surprised to see that the war is blamed for many expansions in the administration with which it has nothing to do.

To the second question, what has been the cost of the board since its inception, the following answer is returned:

September 3, 1939, to March 31, 1940	$ 55,117 41
Year ending March 31, 1941	161,309 48
Year ending March 31, 1942	1,436,988 61

Information for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, not yet available.

The next question is, what are the salaries, living allowances, et cetera, of each official of the board, and what was his previous occupation? From the answer it is clear that a large number of lawyers and others were brought into the department as counsel, solicitors, administrators, assistants in the price division, and deputy administrators. They must have a very large legal busines to judge by the amount of money spent on legal costs. As to the administration of rentals, more than sixty per cent of it is just a farce. The minute the man who got the position is appointed what does he do? He heads for Chicago to address a real estate convention. Then they have a "special assistant to newsprint administrator." Of course they have press officers who, I know, beset the newspaper offices. I know that myself, from the unfair and untrue criticism I have had in the past two or three years from certain of the corporation press in one part of Canada. The secretary of the board is answerable to the chairman, we are told in the return. I do not know anybody who was not answerable to the chairman. I do not think the chairman is answerable to anyone in the heavens above or the earth beneath or the waters under the earth. Is there anything in that important agency, from beginning to end, which the chairman of the board is not over? Then there is the chief of supply. He is loaned from the foreign exchange control board. There are many other administrative officers, but I will not detain the committee by reading a list of them. I find that hardly any of these men know anything at all about what they are trying to administer, or have any practical experience in it whatever and never had. As I said the other day in connection with the administration of beef and butter, all they know about beef and butter is what they consume themselves. We find doctors of everything, lawyers, clerks, preachers and everybody else brought into the department to handle the business, economic and all else, of this organization. Would anybody here engage a Doctor of Laws to manage his wholesale business? No. Doctors of Law are all right in their sphere, but certainly this is not their sphere. Go over the whole department and you will find similar occasions for criticism. The chairman, the administrator of this department, with a payroll of $14,000,000 is himself a civil servant. I have never yet said in this chamber anything of a personal nature about a man, and I do not intend to begin now.

They are all gentlemen, as far as I know. There is one very fine man sitting at the table now, and I would probably not have said as much as I did had I been aware of the fact. But the public principle is just the same no matter where these gentlemen sit, whether here in the gallery or behind desks in an office. They are passing orders that affect the liberties of the subject and a lot of what is done is doing little or nothing to win the war. I can say that this sort of thing has been condemned in the British House of Commons and an attempt is being made there to get away as much as possible from it. The other day I referred to what is being done at the present time in Washington. They do not want to have any such elaborate system of controls there. We had an example of it in the new deal idea which was introduced by Professor Moley of Cleveland into the United States some years ago, and this method of erecting artificial barriers and all kinds of barriers in the way of business was condemned in that country before the war. They saw something of what was coming in this war and they are trying now to reduce administrative machinery in the senate there as far as they possibly can instead of expanding it as we are doing here. The more it expands and widens in Canada, the greater the likelihood of the whole system collapsing, because we are simply building on sand and when the rains descend, and the winds come, and the floods rise, woe betide the taxpayer of Canada, the retailer, the wholesaler and all the little business men throughout the country.

The small stores are being closed up right and left. In my own constituency 18 per cent of these small establishments have gone out of business, and I have been told by responsible persons that this figure will rise to anywhere from 20 to 40 per cent. Going down on the street car on Yonge street I can see buildings in which small stores used to flourish and which are now converted to other housing uses. There was one fish store in Toronto that had been carrying on business for thirty years and now it has been turned by conversion into a three-family apartment. I do not know how people can possibly live in a place from which the smell of fish cannot possibly have been removed after all that time. All these little stores are being put out of business by this board.

The chairman himself was a civil servant, and what does he do? He gets first a skeleton staff, two or three civil servants of the second class, around him and then appoints outsiders. I do not wish to say anything to disparage the civil service. Far from it. I think we have an excellent civil service in this country. From that service some men have gone into business outside and have risen to the top. One such man has made a success of the banking business and is head of a bank to-day. He used to be in the Department of Finance. Our civil service has been a blessing to the taxpayers of Canada. These able men have worked for comparatively small salaries all their lives and have effected a great deal of economy in the country's administration. We have one able man at the table to-day, and there are many in the minister's department. But after selecting a skeleton staff they go to the universities to get their men. One favourite university is that in Hamilton, McMaster, a fine university. I remember when it used to be on Bloor street in Toronto, and I can say that it has turned out some very able men, for example, Mr. Cyrus Eaton of Cleveland, a Canadian, a man of outstanding ability and a credit to this country. But this board gets together a lot of professors, doctors, lawyers and other professional men and marches them into the office before the chairman and he assigns them to duties all over the country.

They have virtually assumed kingly powers over the citizens of Canada and over parliament, and they issue their edicts every day. Municipal officials are constantly writing to me from various parts of Ontario asking me what this or that order in council means, but no Philadelphia lawyer could tell them what the law is. They have drawn for a staff on the genius of a cosmopolitan collection of self-styled patriots, because that is all they are, who have left their chairs in college and their teaching, their offices and their desks in Toronto, Hamilton, and also here, to serve the state, if you please, at two or three times the salary that an able civil servant receives. They are disrupting the whole civil service by such favouritism. And added to that, they receive travelling expenses, hotel bills, and so on. When I travel on the trains I can see the sort of accommodation provided for them compared with what ordinary civilians have to put up with.

It would not be so bad if these gentlemen knew anything at all about business, retail or wholesale, or about technical questions which they seek as amateurs to control and which they presume to dispose of. As I read a list of these gentlemen, from beginning to end, I am reluctantly driven to the conclusion that generally speaking they are chosen by the chairman of the board on the principle that they have no knowledge whatever of the work they are asked to undertake. And what do they do? They begin by driving out of business all the small storekeepers and retailers on Bloor street, Yonge street and elsewhere, all the little producers and dealers, and muddle all production and distribution. They are driving all these people to distraction with the number of orders they issue directing experienced men how to run their business. Last night I referred to clothing. Well, these gentlemen are telling people engaged in the retail and wholesale business exactly how to run their affairs, and the result is that to-day we have a sort of tower of Babel.

They issue their orders every day over the radio and in full-page advertisements in the newspapers, and some of the corporation press will not publish one word of criticism of them. Instead of that they write pages of articles eulogizing these many control gentlemen and their sisters and cousins and aunts. And the writers of such articles do not publish their initial names as formerly. A lot of these people have adopted the hyphened compound name. Suppose some gentleman who used to be known as John K. Doorhandle is appointed an administrator; thereafter he becomes John Knob-Doorhandle. In some instances where the state takes over a business from private enterprise, these men step in to control and to direct businesses that have been managed by the same family people for two or three generations. These bureaucrats step in and dictate to the son or the grandson of some man who established a well known business two generations ago, and, let us say, which has been running successfully all these years. The bureaucrats come in and destroy it by their amateur mistakes. The result is that private enterprise is nowhere to-day, because the private business man is not allowed any longer to use his own initiative. He must obey the dictates of this new form of civil service bureaucracy that has sprung up in the country and knows not how to operate a competent business.

I submit that we are allowing this modern bureaucracy too much leeway. The deputy subcontroller has to report to the subcontroller, and the subcontroller to the controller and the controller to somebody else, so that there is no finality about anything. Weeks and months pass before you can get anything done or any finality along any line. The man in private business gets results and he will admit his mistakes when he makes any, but not these gentlemen. I do not believe in this expansion system; we have had too much of it and, as I said last night, I believe there should be some curtailment of it, although a lot of good work has been done so far. This item of administration has now reached $14,300,000. I do not know what auditing of this amount there can be. For two years I have been trying to find out who has control of the department, whether it is the comptroller of the treasury or the auditor general. These are war appropriation items, and all the comptroller of the treasury has to do is to put his stamp on them, without any investigation at all. The auditor general wrote me a letter last year in which he said, "I have no control over these war appropriation bills." He deals only with civil estimates.

I can tell you we are heading for disaster. I have not made any strenuous objection, because I believe the minister is overburdened with work. I believe, too, that he has done a great deal of good work in the prevention of the inflationary spiral. I am prepared to admit that. May I add that he has the backing of the large majority of the people of this country in what he has done so far to control inflation; but surely the time has come when we should change our policy of dealing with the whole problem. Let us do something to help wholesale and retail business men. I say this because there are many small retail business men in my constituency, and I have been deeply impressed by what I have heard people say.

For instance, I have in mind one business on Eastern avenue which has operated for almost a hundred years. But they have now been driven to the wall, and have had to close up. There are many poor people in my constituency, because it is very largely a workingman's community. I deeply sympathize with them, when they come to me and tell me that families which never knew what it was to be haled into police courts, families whose records have been clean for three generations, have now been subjected to that sort of treatment, for some petty infraction.

I did not say what the newspapers reported with respect to prosecutions. I said in the return I read there were 150 in the two years and nine months, 96 of which were from Ontario mostly Toronto. The minister gave the figures correctly when he placed them on Hansard. There were 3,355 prosecutions from December 1, 1941, to May 31, 1943. There were 894 for infractions of the price control regulations, 952 for infractions of the rental regulations, 465 against the rationing regulations, and 225 prosecutions of other kinds. Then, there were 467 prosecutions in connection with the sale of gasoline, 263 in connection with tires, and 65 other prosecutions. Then, if we deduct the figures 150 which I gave for the first two years and nine months we have a figure of 3,205 prosecutions in the last fiscal year.

I do not wish to detain the committee further. I have always been opposed to this censorship business. I do not blame the minister for it, or the chairman of the board. But I do know that some of these press officers are going into the newspaper offices to attack those here who dare criticize—at least, I have been told that by newspaper men. I have great respect for the minister and his department, and his fine parliamentary assistant. I exempt them. But I do sympathize with those people who have been driven out of business by drastic controls. Businesses have been operating for two or three generations and they have gone to the wall. Some of their sons are at war. Of course those people hope to hold their business. I attended a funeral the other day of a man whose business had been in the family for three generations. Three of that man's sons are overseas. The father is dead, and when they come back they will not have a business. They will have no business to conduct when they return. I do plead with the minister to put on the brakes on some of these controls that will not aid the war and will lead to inflation. I would ask him to have the board put on the brakes, so that we may have some private initiative, thrift and enterprise, and an opportunity of conducting wholesale and retail business, and small business, not only in Toronto, but in other cities throughout Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the item carries there is one matter we should consider with some care. We hear the word "inflation" used, apparently with a wide variety of meanings, by different hon. members who speak in the house. As I take it, the whole object of this appropriation of $120,000,000 for the year 1943-44 is that—

Mr. ILSLEY: May we regard the item for $14,300,000 as having been passed, so that we may proceed to the item for $120,000,000?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is what I wanted to know.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, we are mixing things up.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Who has the floor?

Mr. GILLIS: I am not satisfied to have this item carried, because I want to say something about it. If it is not carried, then the hon. member may have the floor.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Is the administration item carried?

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mr. TAYLOR: It was carried last night.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is just about impossible to keep any sort of order in our procedure. I made the mistake last night of pressing for the passage of the administration item, on the understanding that when the next item was called I would answer certain questions left over from this one. Then the hon. member for Lake Centre said that he had been absent from the house, and asked that we return to the administration item. I said that I would answer a certain question, and that started a new debate on an item already carried. Could not the hon. member ask his questions on the next item?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, certainly. I have no desire to hold it up, but I did not want my observations ruled out of order because they might not apply to the item before the committee.

Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation—subsidies due to application of order placing a ceiling over all prices, $120,000,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: How are commodities bought from overseas producers? I am thinking of tea, coffee, spices, vegetable oils and articles of that description. As I understand it the government to-day is controlling the importation of these commodities. Is that done through a government organization, or is it done, as I believe it is, through brokers? If so, what brokers do this kind of work, and on what terms? I should like to have a clear picture of it. I have been asked a question on the point, and I am not just clear in my own mind as to how purchases of commodities of that kind are conducted.

Mr. ILSLEY: The best answer to a question like that would be a reference to the report of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry I have not read it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a good foundation for any discussion with respect to these matters. At page 29 I find the following:

> The third method by which the government has taken a share of a "squeeze" too heavy to be absorbed by industry and trade has been through purchases by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation of Canadian requirements of certain imports from abroad. In general the corporation sells such imports at prices appropriate to the retail ceiling. It is selling tea, for example, at a price appropriate to the reduced retail price announced in accordance with the cost of living reduction programme. Coffee has been sold at a price appropriate to the ceiling in spite of cost increases, although now these cost increases, as well as the 4 cents a pound reduction on retail sales to consumers, have been offset by cancellation of the special war duty. Despite increased costs the selling prices of other bulk purchases, among them cocoa beans, bristles, beeswax, spices, dried fruits, fertilizers, pesticides, oils and fats, and certain types of cotton fabrics, have also been set in appropriate relation to retail ceiling prices. Economies resulting from centralized buying through a single government agency have made it possible to keep trading losses to a minimum. Trading losses incurred by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation up to February 28, 1943, totalled $2,111,383.28.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not the point in which I am particularly interested. I was wondering just how this business is conducted. Do we buy and sell through brokers, or does the commodity control board have its own organization, or does it designate certain brokers, or just what is done in this regard?

Mr. ILSLEY: The corporation imports and distributes. They have, managing the bulk purchasing division, the firm of Harrisons and Crosfield (Canada) Limited. They manage the bulk purchasing division on a commission basis.

Mr. COLDWELL: They act as sort of brokers?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not say they were brokers. I am informed that their position is that of manager of the bulk purchasing division of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, but they are paid for those services on a commission basis. That is the correct statement of the position.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are any other firms allowed to go into the market outside Canada and buy and import goods?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the case of some commodities purchases can be made only by a governmental agency; those in control of the foreign source of supply will sell only to a Canadian government agency, and in that event no other importer in Canada would be in the field. In other cases the government buys through the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and importers are buying as well.

Mr. COLDWELL: Was this form of transaction organized in any degree through pressure from overseas sellers? Did they express the preference that rather than have a government organization set up they would prefer to deal through a firm of brokers? The minister does not designate them at the moment as brokers, but from his answer to my first question I would take it that this firm has been in the brokerage business. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; they were large general importers of tea and coffee.

Mr. ILSLEY: Harrisons and Crosfield are one division of a very great organization.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are they part of an English organization?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; I understand they are part of an English organization, though I do not know very much about them. I believe the question is this: has the English government or have English exporters stipulated that these goods must be bought through Harrisons and Crosfield. Is that it?

Mr. COLDWELL: It would amount to that, practically.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer is very definitely, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: They did not designate this particular firm?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then what about the other firms who were engaged in this kind of business before the war? Are they in any way taken into this set-up and allowed to continue in business, or what has happened to them? What I mean is this: if it has been practically all centred in this one firm, what happens to the other firms?

Mr. ILSLEY: The bulk purchasing division of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation tries to distribute through existing channels. I do not like to have it suggested that this manager is anything other than an employee of the bulk purchasing division of the corporation, because that is the true relationship, even though payment is made on a commission basis. Is the hon. gentleman talking about importations?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: If we are the only buyers no one else can import; that is all.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then it is this firm that makes the arrangements for the importations, and this firm gets a commission for making those arangements?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not correct to say that Harrisons and Crosfield Limited import; it is the bulk purchasing division of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation that does the importing. These people manage it; they organize it; they arrange it for the corporation, and are paid on this basis. Of course the business is not divided up. If you are buying so many raisins, for instance, you do not have a dozen people working for you buying those raisins; you do not have all the ordinary importers of raisins sharing in the buying for the corporation. These persons do the buying.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does this management firm designate how the distribution of the articles so imported shall be made? Would it be entirely in their hands to say where these commodities should go?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; they do not have anything to do with the distribution, which is directed by the administrator of the commodity in question. As the hon. gentleman knows, there are administrators having jurisdiction over practically every commodity.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister said just now they were paid on a commission basis.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. COLDWELL: How is that commission calculated?

Mr. ILSLEY: A question was asked about this company by the hon. member for St. John-Albert on February 4, 1943, to which an answer was given on March 3, as follows:

1. Do Harrisons and Crosfield (Canada) Limited act as brokers for Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation?

A. No.

2. Is this company employed by the corporation in any other capacity?

A. Yes; as the managing agents of the bulk purchasing division of the corporation, their responsibilities being to arrange for procurement of the goods and thereafter take all necessary action to ensure delivery.

3. How long has it been employed as broker or in any other capacity with the corporation, and on whose recommendation was it appointed?

A. In the above capacity, since March 1, 1942; directly by the corporation at its own instance.

4. Is this company the exclusive broker for the corporation, and if not how many other persons or companies are so employed, and what are their names and addresses?

A. No; bulk purchases by the corporation are distributed as far as possible through ordinary trade channels which may include the use of brokers.

5. What remuneration does this company receive for its services to the corporation, and what service has it rendered the corporation to date, and how much has it been paid in each case?

A. The contract with the corporation provides that Harrisons and Crosfield (Canada) Limited assumes the cost of office, travelling, salaries and other charges (except office space and stenographic assistance at the head office of the corporation), such expenses to be reimbursed to Harrisons and Crosfield out of commissions covered by the following schedule. These commissions are calculated on the f.o.b. port of shipment price, i.e., on the prime cost, exclusive of transportation, duty, insurance and similar charges:

Up to		$ 100,000—	2½ per cent
Over $	100,000 but under	250,000—	2 per cent
Over	250,000 but under	500,000—	1½ per cent
Over	500,000 but under	1,000,000—	1 per cent
Over	1,000,000	—	½ per cent

Harrisons and Crosfield (Canada) Limited are required to keep separate accounts for expenses incurred exclusively in connection with the corporation's business. To the extent that the net earnings of Harrisons and Crosfield (Canada) Limited, including profits from the contract with the corporation, bring the total profits of the company above the profits subject to income taxes earned in the company's fiscal year ended April 30, 1942, such earnings on the corporation's business will be rebated. Under this general arrangement definite settlement has been made up to September 30, 1942. For the four months which have elapsed since that date advances amounting to a total of $20,000 have been made, subject to final accounting and adjustment which, under the agreement described above, takes place quarterly but is naturally delayed on account of the necessity to prepare statement of profit and loss for each quarter. The agreement came into effect about 1st March, 1942, and the total cost for the seven months ending September 30 was $47,017.42 which, as indicated, includes all salaries, travelling, office and other expenses. This covers a total turnover during the period of approximately $15,000,000. The total cost of the period was therefore less than one-third of one per cent of the turnover, the limiting factor mentioned above having had the effect of reducing the commissions which would otherwise have been payable under the above schedule for this seven months by no less than $96,080.42.

The services rendered the corporation is covered by the answer to question No. 2. It will be seen from the above explanation that the cost of services cannot be apportioned to individual transactions.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

6. What is the total amount this company has been paid to date for services rendered the corporation?

A. Up to September 30, 1942, Harrisons and Crosfield (Canada) Limited have received payments as mentioned above of $47,017.42. For the four months ending January 31, 1943, the company have received advances of $20,000, subject to accounting and adjustment on a quarterly basis, as explained above.

7. Is this company employed in any other capacity by the government or any board or other corporation set up by the government and if so, by what department, board or other corporation and in what capacity and how much has it received to date for its services?

A. No information.

Mr. COLDWELL: I notice that they may employ other brokers and pay brokerage charges; in that event would those charges be added to the price, or would they be paid by the commodity prices corporation?

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer to question No. 4 is that bulk purchases by the corporation are distributed as far as possible through the ordinary trade channels, which may include the use of brokers. I would imagine that dried fruits or tea or whatever it is would be distributed in the same way as the importer or manufacturer would distribute the product. If it is necessary to use brokers, they would be used.

Mr. ABBOTT: Harrisons and Crosfield (Canada) Limited have nothing to do with distribution.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wanted to know to what extent brokerage charges would affect the price level, but apparently the brokerage services mentioned there is the type normally used in the trade.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not know, but it seems to me that to designate one firm might cause a great deal of criticism. I suppose it was chosen because it is equipped to do this particular type of work?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct. There has been some criticism.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would rather see a government organization representative of the various importers, if it were possible to organize it. However, the minister has given what appears to be a good accounting this afternoon.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that this is a very efficient organization and that the arrangement is quite satisfactory.

Mr. QUELCH: What part of these subsidies apply to imports?

Mr. ILSLEY: The import subsidies are estimated at $64,000,000; domestic subsidies at $40,000,000; trading losses at $15,000,000; expenses at $1,000,000, making a total of $120,000,000. Some of the trading losses would have the same effect as import subsidies.

Mr. QUELCH: There seems to be a good deal of fear that the price level in the United States may cause a rise in our price ceiling, but so long as we continue our subsidies it should not materially affect Canada because on balance the exports would gain by the amount that we lose on our imports. We would not suffer at all provided we carried on our subsidies to maintain the price ceiling.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is quite theoretical, and I do not know whether I can give an answer. If prices went up very high in the United States, our subsidy bill would be very great. The payment of subsidies is an inflationary influence in itself, nevertheless we feel that it is desirable because it is not nearly as productive of inflation as letting prices go uncontrolled would be.

Mr. QUELCH: How can the minister say that it is inflationary in view of the fact that it is used for the purpose of reducing prices?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the spending of government money, it increases the purchasing power and it puts an additional strain upon the ceiling of prices. It is used to hold them there; nevertheless it puts an upward strain on them.

Mr. QUELCH: But on the other hand you are obtaining a large part of that by taxation, which would have a deflationary effect; it should counterbalance the other.

Mr. ILSLEY: If we could get everything back by taxation there would be no difficulty; there would be nothing inflationary about the payments being made, but of course we cannot do that. We can get some of it back; we can get a lot of it by borrowing, but it does not work perfectly by any means.

Mr. QUELCH: In view of the fact that we are having trouble in maintaining a price ceiling, would it not be a good thing to eliminate the sales tax, which would give relief to the extent of 8 per cent, and then substitute direct taxation for the sales tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not be in favour of that, because we have so much difficulty with direct taxation. Hon. members are familiar with the problems that income taxation creates. We are told by creditable sources all over Canada that because of the progressive factor of the income tax, higher earnings being charged a greater rate, the working of overtime is discouraged and there is greater absenteeism, with a resultant diminishing production. If we raised our income taxes sufficiently to make up for what we would lose by repealing the sales tax, the undesirable features of the income tax would be accentuated. After all, the sales tax takes purchasing power back from people who I think can now afford to pay.

Mr. QUELCH: But it falls most heavily upon people who are in the low income brackets, because it takes a greater proportion of their income.

Mr. ILSLEY: It seems to be regarded as perfectly natural and normal that a man in the lower income brackets will not wish to work if most or a large part of his pay is taken in taxes. But it seems to be considered an abnormal and shocking thing if a man in the high income brackets should act in the same way.

Mr. QUELCH: It is the amount that is left after the taxation is applied that really counts, and the amount that is left to people in the higher income brackets, even after the heavy taxation is applied to their incomes, is much higher than what is left to the people in the lower income brackets.

Mr. ILSLEY: Whether we like it or not, you cannot possibly level the standard of living of everybody in the country. The organization of society is such that it is impossible.

Mr. QUELCH: You can at least make it more equitable in time of war.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is exactly what we have done, and done to a tremendous degree.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understood the minister to say that the amount paid to this particular firm in commission averaged one-third of one per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: On the turn-over.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. Then I understood the minister to say—he will correct me if I am wrong—that on $100,000 and up to $250,000 the commission was 2½ per cent, and then going to the top, on $1,000,000 the commission was one-half of one per cent. In view of those figures I cannot see how the average could be one-third of one per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is profit control.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is where profit control enters?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: That clears it up.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to make a few remarks on this appropriation of $120,000,000, which is largely to take care of subsidies in order to maintain the price ceilings. Let me preface what I have to say by an observation with respect to the minister's statement a few nights ago that the Department of Munitions and Supply, one of the largest purchasers of commodities in Canada, has not in the past been bound to observe the price ceiling. The understandnig now is that it will observe the price ceiling after consultation with the wartime prices and trade board. But under the regulations, the Department of Munitions and Supply is not in duty bound or morally obligated to pay any attention to the price ceiling. I do not desire to go into a lengthy discussion of this matter, but if we want to maintain respect for the laws of this country and have them observed to the letter, I submit to the minister that the laws of this country must apply to each and every person in Canada without regard to his particular position. I am a little sceptical, as I think the great majority of the people of this country are, over placing this kind of leeway through the Department of Munitions and Supply in the hands of people who in my opinion are largely buying from themselves.

A return which was brought down recently for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar sets out that there are fifteen controllerships in the Department of Munitions and Supply and fourteen controllers. I am not going to read the list; but taking it by and large, the personnel in control in the Department of Munitions and Supply are for the most part directors of most of the large corporations in this country, including some of the packing houses, who are selling raw materials to that department.

The hon. member for York South pointed out a few nights ago that within the last year four of the large packing houses in Canada were permitted, on account of a shortage in beef, pork and other commodities, to sell to the Department of Munitions and Supply above the price ceiling, and what I am trying to tell the minister now is this. If, in order to avoid inflation in this country, it is necessary to keep the wage-earners down to a certain wage level so that they shall not compete for peace-time commodities or non-essential war commodities, and at the same time you are to allow the Department of Munitions and Supply, which is the largest purchaser of commodities in this country, to compete in the open market and spend millions without observing any price ceiling at all, then, while I am no expert in finance, I think that shoots the argument for inflation full of holes.

If we are to permit the controllers in the Department of Munitions and Supply—men who are on loan to the government, who are the servants of the government, and who are also responsible to their own organizations and who through the Department of Munitions and Supply are buying from themselves—to have unlimited authority in the spending of the taxpayers' money, the anti-inflationary machinery cannot work; and once that is understood, you will not get the cooperation of the average working man and working woman in this country who after paying taxes are living on just about a subsistence level. I am not quarrelling with the price ceiling. I think it should be maintained; I know it is necessary. But I think the minister should make it distinctly understood that the ceiling must apply to everyone. Even with the controls there are, the fact that there were 3,000 prosecutions last year is proof positive that enforcement of the ceiling is necessary. I would not want to imagine what the situation would be without a ceiling when we have the number of prosecutions we had last year in the face of all the controls that are now in operation.

What I am trying to emphasize is that all purchases by the Department of Munitions and Supply should come under the price ceiling. The price ceiling should apply to those who are selling to the whole Canadian public just as much as it applies to the average man or woman who makes a purchase in a store, and just as much as it applies to the ordinary merchant who has commodities to sell. There is no argument that I can see for allowing the Department of Munitions and Supply any latitude with regard to the price ceiling because, to start with, they have a priority even without the ceiling; they can get what they want. The average citizen of Canada readily concedes that the armed services have first call on any commodities in this country that are necessary for the prosecution of the war. But if you are to allow large packing companies and others who are supplying large quantities of materials to the Department of Munitions and Supply to go above the price ceiling on the ground of a shortage in any commodity, that is a complete negation of every argument that I have heard with respect to the necessity for the price ceiling. Artificial shortages can be created as a ground for increasing the price if these people are to be given that latitude, and it must be remembered that in the final analysis they are buying and selling to themselves. Increasing the price does not reduce the shortage, but it is likely to create an artificial shortage because they can make more out of it. I think that before the house rises the minister should assure hon. members and the country that as far as the ceiling is concerned it applies equally to everyone.

I should like the minister to clarify one point with respect to the stabilization of prices. Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture, speaking on his estimates, stated that the government are now paying a subsidy to the producers of butter of eight and ten cents a pound, and that the price of butter is fixed at thirty-five cents west of Toronto and thirty-six cents east of Montreal. That butter goes to the wholesaler, I understand, for thirty-six cents, and the Minister of Agriculture stated that that was the ceiling on butter. If it is, that is the price at which butter should be retailing. According to the last Labour Gazette, which sets out the statistics upon which the cost of living is based, that butter was retailing in Sydney, Nova Scotia, for forty-three cents a pound. If the ceiling on butter is thirty-six cents and the government provides a subsidy in order to fix it there, why is there this difference of seven cents in the selling price to the consumer? Why is the ceiling fixed by the government not maintained? Everybody all along the line is subsidized to maintain ceilings on commodities. I have taken butter as only one example because the Minister of Agriculture elaborated on it to some extent, but in every commodity where there is a ceiling the same considerations apply, and if the government is to spend some of this $120,000,000 next year in order to subsidize butter and fix the price, so that the consumer will be able to get a bite to eat, based on cost of living bonuses, the ceiling should be maintained where it is fixed. That applies not only to butter but to pretty well every commodity which is subsidized. The consumer does not seem to be getting the benefit. Someone in between the wholesaler and the people who finally consume that butter appears to be reaping a complete harvest on the money that is being spent by way of subsidies to maintain these ceilings.

Mr. ILSLEY: Now, Mr. Chairman, let me correct two or three statements of my hon. friend.

In the first place, the ceiling of thirty-five and thirty-six cents is not the retail ceiling; it is the ceiling on the price which the creamery can charge the jobber or wholesaler or anyone else who buys from the creamery in solid blocks of fifty-six pounds and in carload lots. When we talk about a thirty-five or thirty-six cent ceiling, that is the ceiling. To that must be added the wholesale mark-up, the charges for cutting and wrapping, the retail mark-up, and transportation.

Mr. GILLIS: Is there any control on these points?

Mr. ILSLEY: The control there is the retail ceiling, and the retail ceiling is the highest price for which that individual retailer sold butter in the period between September 15 and October 11, 1941. There are individual retail ceilings. That is the principle of the price ceiling policy; it varies from place to place; it may vary between stores in the same city; it may be forty-three cents in one store and forty-two cents in another.

Mr. GILLIS: And fifty-three cents in another.

Mr. ILSLEY: The man who charged the fifty-three cents would not stay in business; he would not sell any butter.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Unless the other fellows were out.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right, if by some miracle some butter seller in Sydney were able to get fifty-three cents in the base period, but I do not believe there is one in Sydney or anywhere else in Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not saying that there is, but it is not so long since there was.

Mr. ILSLEY: If there were, the law would permit him to go up to that retail ceiling, because that is the ceiling. I think I have made that clear about the butter.

Mr. COLDWELL: These ceiling prices apply only to persons who buy in blocks of fifty-six pounds and in carload lots?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: So that a small dealer in butter could not take advantage of this, could he? I mean he could not buy less than a carload and he would have to have the equipment to deal with it by the block.

Mr. ILSLEY: What happens there is that there are recognized differentials. He would probably pay half a cent more.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister give a break-down of this $120,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I should, however, like to talk a little longer to my fellow Nova Scotian, the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. GILLIS: You were giving the Minister of Agriculture information that time, not me.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so. I think the Minister of Agriculture understands it pretty well.

Mr. GILLIS: He was stuck at the thirty-six cents.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but he was stuck at the creamery too; he was not at the grocery store in Sydney.

My hon. friend made some rather sweeping statements about these munitions and supply people buying from themselves. That is his theory, but it really is not the situation. He talked about controllers. The controllers do not do any buying at all. That is not what a controller does. He does not buy. The persons who do the buying are those in the purchasing division. My hon. friend may think and may say that officers of the purchasing divisions are buying from themselves. I do not know who constitute the purchasing divisions, but I myself believe that the buyers of the Department of Munitions and Supply are extremely conscientious buyers. That is my conviction.

Mr. GILLIS: That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. ILSLEY: If my hon. friend is afraid of it, let me tell him what he had better do. He can get all the orders in council and he can there get the purchases and the prices. We have to put through a great many orders in council, a thousand or so a month. Not all have to do with buying; but purchases of over $15,000 have to be passed by the governor in council, and if anybody wants to challenge the prices being paid by the Department of Munitions and Supply, why does he not challenge them head-on and say, "That is too high; that is more than the stock is worth." But do not come at it in this way and accuse these men of breach of trust, because that is what it is, when my hon. friend says that men have got themselves appointed here to a public position, and act in this way in the discharge of their duties. They are servants of the government. My hon. friend said they were not, but they are servants of the crown and they have positions of trust. He should not accuse these men of violating their trust unless he has some facts to go on. He should not go on just what he thinks they would do or what he thinks somebody might do, because I do not believe they are doing it.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister has already made statements to this committee which prove that they are doing it.

Mr. ILSLEY: What?

Mr. GILLIS: Forcing the price ceiling. They are granted privileges which the ordinary citizen of this country is not granted. And second, if I come in here from Canada Packers or International Nickel or Barclays Bank and am on loan to the government of this country for a year or two years, I am going back to my former position. That is where my future means of livelihood is. And we are all human.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not human in that sense.

Mr. GILLIS: I am expressing my opinion. It is still my opinion, and I think it is the opinion of a large percentage of the people of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, yes. If a corporation outside this house is paying me $25,000 a year and I come here and take a position on this board, my first consideration is to protect that company I am working for. That is human. Neither the Minister of Finance nor the Minister of Munitions and Supply has any more control over such a man than I have, because he can walk off the job to-morrow and he is not losing anything. He is not obligated to the government or to the people of the country. As I see the whole set-up, I am not quarrelling with the minister or making accusations, but I am giving my opinion on the basis of what I know of human nature and of the responsibilities of those on the inside to those on the outside. I say that the latitude given munitions and supply is too sweeping. It is too much control in the hands of somebody who has something to sell, who is not responsible to the taxpayers of Canada by virtue of election and the necessity of reporting upon his stewardship. They report to the boards of directors of corporations. I am not making accusations.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, you are.

Mr. GILLIS: I am pointing out the implications of the machinery.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has a very low view of human nature. I am really surprised. To begin with, people do not act in that way. Just the odd one does. The average person does not. When he accepts a position with the government of Canada he does not act in that way. I do not know whether they all have to take an oath, but they do in the wartime prices and trade board. Does the hon. member not give them credit for wanting to do something from good motives?

Mr. GILLIS: If they take a position with the government, but not otherwise.

Mr. ILSLEY: But they take a position with the government and are answerable to their deputy minister and their minister and the presumption is that they will do their duty. If my hon. friend wanted to ascribe a low motive to these men, I would point out that what they do is open to the scrutiny of official after official in a long line, and finally it comes to the government. If a man were of that type and dared to try that sort of thing there, he would be spotted in a day or a week and it would be well known that he was not the kind of man to have in the employ of the government. I say to my hon. friend that instead of propounding his remarkably low views of human nature, and therefrom deducing that men are acting in certain ways, he should tell me what they have done that is wrong. Let him tell the Minister of Munitions and Supply what they did that is wrong and we will face it here. But do not base it on some idea of an essential badness and a disposition toward a breach of duty, a breach of trust, which I am satisfied does not exist in the case of the great majority of persons employed by the government. Most of these people are proud of the job they are doing. The important thing for them is not some crooked back-door favour that they can do their former employers. The important thing for some of them is the prestige they gain by doing a great war-time job. Surely my hon. friend has enough imagination; surely there is enough scope in his understanding of the motives that prompt people, to realize that. Surely he does not think that men come here and take jobs, making great sacrifices in many instances, in order to put their own sordid, mercenary financial motives above these other and higher considerations. As a matter of fact they do not. I am satisfied that they do not, and the rank and file of the people of the country, I think, will agree with me rather than with my hon. friend. The trouble with my hon. friend, and with some others in this house, is that they think, if men are earning more than a small income, there is something crooked about them. They think that is the case. That is not my experience. I have said repeatedly in this house that in the low-income groups, as in the high-income groups, there are good men and bad men, and I have not been able to draw any hard and fast rule such as my hon. friend implies. The idea that because a man has made a success of his life and has accumulated some money, or has obtained a position wherein he makes a substantial income, he is a crook, is entirely false. My hon. friend says: oh, yes; but they pierced the ceiling in some cases. I cannot get the facts very well on this, but there was a time when, in order to get cattle, a year or two ago, they had to pay a good deal to obtain them for the reason that cattle were not coming forward.

Mr. MacINNIS: They had to pay a lot to get cattle, but it does not follow that the people who provided the cattle got the prices.

Mr. ILSLEY: Cattle were $12 on the Toronto market, which was inappropriate to the ceiling, and there were sales to the department that were appropriate to that high price to the farmer.

Mr. MacINNIS: Let us place this matter in its proper perspective in relation to other questions. If that price was set and the farmers would not sell at that price, the farmers were on strike. What was said in this house when we were discussing the steel strike? One hon. member rose in his place and said, "I would have uniforms for these men and tell them to get into those uniforms or go to work." There was a great pounding of desks on that side of the house when that statement was made. It is all right, however, for Canada Packers to go on strike, or for Canada Packers to hold up the people of Canada until they got their prices. The department of munitions comes through and pays the price and nothing is said about it. When we were discussing the aluminum deal one after another said, "What could we do? These people have a monopoly of aluminum and if we did not pay their price we could not get aluminum." But when a worker takes the position that he is not getting enough to eat—not that he is not getting enough profit, which is an altogether different thing—after months and sometimes years of negotiations, after jumping over every hurdle which the government by order in council could think of, so that he is compelled as a last resort to go on strike, ministers do not stand up and make excuses for that man. We have to be fair about this. The minister may not believe that people are actuated by these sordid motives, but the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon)—and I do not find any opposition to him on that side of the house on this score—suggests that private initiative is the only way by which we can get things done; that there must be an incentive for people to make gains, or people will not work. My hon. friend was on the price spreads and mass buying commission that sat here in 1934 and 1935. Has he forgotten the report of that commission? Has he forgotten what they reported to the house? Yet he rises and says that we can leave this matter to business men and be assured that everything will be fair and aboveboard.

As a matter of fact no explanation has been given by the minister as to why the department of munitions should be allowed to pay more than the ceiling price for any commodity. He said there was a scarcity—the scarcity will still be there after the price is raised, because there will not be time to make purchases above the price ceiling, and that price being passed on to the producer. If the present ceiling is not high enough, the proper thing is for the wartime prices and trade board to raise the ceiling and not to allow individuals or departments to go beyond it, because the increased prices do not go to the primary producer.

Mr. ILSLEY: The instances of paying more than the price ceiling have not been very numerous. There has been a return to the house from the wartime prices and trade board. They have a working arrangement which in effect provides that the price ceiling shall not be exceeded by munitions and supply at least until after there is consultation with the wartime prices and trade board and they have attempted to get supplies for the Department of Munitions and Supply at or below the ceiling. The Department of Munitions and Supply have done, I think I am safe in saying, far more purchasing below the ceiling than they have above the ceiling. But they do have a certain freedom which is not permitted in connection with civilian purchases.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is no law against anyone purchasing below the ceiling.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but they have a certain freedom. They can pay more; if it is necessary to pay a price higher than the ceiling price to get supplies, they have freedom to do it. I never said you could safely leave everything to business men and trust them always to do the right thing. I never said that at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: That was the assumption.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; that was not the assumption at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the general assumption.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; that is not the general assumption, nor was it my assertion. With the system of checks and balances, and the number of officials through whom they have to go, finally reaching the governor in council in respect of purchases of more than $16,000, there is ample protection. The prices that are paid are not the prices known to one man alone, or to one man's company, or to a limited number of people. They are known to a whole lot of people. And the prices, I am satisfied, are not wrong. I should like to hear some talk on prices, instead of talk about people.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. GILLIS: I do not wish the minister to put words in my mouth. He tried to create the impression that I was making individual accusations, and that it was my endeavour to prove that these men were crooks. That word was used by no one but himself. I merely said that I objected to any organization or any group of people in this country having any special privileges under the laws of the country. That is what I objected to. I still contend that if I am drawing $25,000 a year from a company, and I am sent here to Ottawa, and not being paid anything for my work here, my main interest is that company which is employing me. It is their interests I am concerned with.

I also know—and I think the minister knows it too—that the war we are engaged in to-day has a lot to do with the control now set up in Canada, and the future of that control. I know that in Canada and in the United States and in Great Britain there is just as great a struggle going on on the home front to change the order of society to something that will suit those who are responsible for what is going on in Europe to-day. And Canada is not isolated from that struggle. She is not isolated from those who stand for that so-called system of private enterprise and the right to exploit our fellowmen. And those who stand for private enterprise are very carefully watching to see where there is any control that will influence the future of this country in that direction.

I sat in on meetings of the reconstruction committee, and in the last few months I have heard presentations from almost every organization in the country, including chambers of commerce, the legislative mouthpieces of big business who are in on these controls to-day. I know what they represent and what their opinions are with respect to the future of Canada. I know what their opinions are with respect to democracy. I know the use to which these controls will be put. I know what their intentions are with respect to crown companies, and the investments of the people to-day in plants and factories.

It is all these things, and the knowledge of what Canada faces in the future, that make me fearful of any control in this country on the part of any group of individuals other than the elected representatives of the people of Canada. I am afraid that in the not far distant future perhaps the Minister of Finance and other ministers may not have the right to sit in and to legislate for the people of Canada. That is what I am afraid of, and that is why I wish to see this parliament supreme in any matter involving the laws of this country. I am interested in seeing that no freedom to go beyond those laws, in any way, is extended to any group of individuals.

Mr. HANSELL: The minister has said that he would like to hear an attack made upon prices. Perhaps I shall make an attack, but it may be different from what he might expect. I shall not attack the piercing of any price ceiling, but I would say something about prices which, in some parts of the country are regarded as being a little bit too low. I refer to farm prices.

I shall not make a speech, but will simply ask the minister if it is possible for him to inform us why the Canadian farmer must accept less for his wheat and less for many other products he produces than is received by the farmer in the United States? I have not heard an explanation on the point, despite the fact that I asked for one on an earlier occasion, and the subject has been discussed with the Minister of Agriculture. Perhaps the answer may be complicated; I do not know. But I do know that that is a question which has not been satisfactorily answered, so far as the farmers are concerned.

I have read that when speaking in Chicago not long ago the Minister of Agriculture said that the greatest problem which faced the government of Canada was that of explaining to Canadian farmers why they must take a dollar a bushel, or whatever the price of wheat might be, while the United States farmer was privileged to receive a considerably higher price. Then I believe he went on to say the answer was that we were all taking part in a great, united effort to win the war, and that there must be equality of sacrifice.

That is not a satisfactory answer, so far as equality of sacrifice is concerned. Not only does the farmer of western Canada take a lower price for his product than is received by the farmer in the United States, but he must pay more for his farm machinery and those other necessary commodities he must buy to equip and run his farm. He has to pay much more than the farmer in the United States. This is the picture; the farmer in the United States pays less for his equipment and receives a bigger price for his product, while the farmer in Canada receives less for his product and has higher operating costs. Yet we are all fighting the same war, and the desire is to have equality of sacrifice.

I do not know whether the minister can give a satisfactory answer, but those are the questions being asked. And, believe me, when Canadian farmers make up their income tax returns they will certainly ask those questions. I am sure they are questions vital to the minister as well as to farmers, and I should like to know if he would give the committee an answer.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member has certainly opened up a big question. The question as to the level of farm prices has been discussed time and again, and I had hoped that at this time we might avoid another discussion, because once it is opened it might continue for a long time.

Farm prices in Canada are not as high as prices in the United States. Wages, generally speaking, are not as high in Canada as they are in the United States. Living costs are not nearly as high in Canada as in the United States, either. The United States is in a higher level all along the line than we are in Canada. The hon. member has said that some of the operating costs faced by farmers are lower in the United States than they are in Canada. I do not know whether that is correct or not.

Mr. HANSELL: What about farm machinery?

Mr. ILSLEY: Probably farm machinery; I do not know about that. But I do not think that is true generally with respect to farm costs in the United States. I am certain also that farm costs have gone up faster and farther in the United States, by far, than they have in Canada since the beginning of the war. We have a different economy here. We cannot tie our economy to that of the United States. If we were to raise farm prices to United States levels, there would immediately have to be widespread wage increases all along the line—I do not mean the international line but all over the country—and if there were wage increases together with increases in the price of farm products, certainly those wage increases would lead to increases in the prices of all industrial products.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the minister would permit a question, would it be necessary to raise wage rates if the increases in farm prices were paid by bonus or subsidy?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a limit to subsidies. I could not reconcile myself to an unlimited laying out of subsidies. The subsidy policy is one which must be operated within limits; otherwise it would break down by the force of public opinion. Even in the United States apparently the senate will not pass a subsidy policy. To keep public opinion behind it a subsidy policy has to be kept within reasonable limits. If it starts soaring to great heights you are pouring out these vast amounts of money all over the country; the taxpayers are paying that money; it is going to farmers and others. Theoretically it comes back in the form of income tax from the farmers, but actually it would not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But the minister would agree that, provided increases were met through subsidies, it would not necessarily result in an increase in wages?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to answer a question in theory or to make a theoretical answer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But the minister is answering in theory. He is talking in theory right now; it is his theory.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry if I am; I was trying to answer the question of the hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to know how the minister justifies the removal of the ten per cent war exchange tax on vegetables coming into Canada, while not removing that tax from the machinery necessary for the production of those vegetables in this country.

Mr. ILSLEY: Our business is to keep prices stable, and with the exception of a minor adjustment at the beginning of the price-ceiling policy the prices of farm machinery have not risen above the ceiling prices. We have taken great pains to see that this should be so. The price ceiling came in on December 1, 1941; thereafter the highest prices that could be charged were the highest prices of farm machinery during the period from September 15 to October 11, 1941. Certain prices had been raised before that, but one or two of the companies—I cannot remember which companies they were—had announced increases in prices but had not put those increases into effect before October 11, 1941, so that an increase of up to five per cent was permitted those companies in order to bring them into line with the other companies. From that time to this, however, prices of farm machinery have been stabilized, despite what would have been great increases in cost if stabilization measures had not been taken all the way down the line. The prices of farm machinery have been kept at that level.

With regard to fruits and vegetables, I would not say the price level has got out of hand in the United States, but at least it has gone away up in that country, so that, as hon. members know, cabbages, asparagus and all these other imported fruits and vegetables have sold in Canada at very high prices. We thought the time had come when we should do almost anything to bring down the prices of these fruits and vegetables. There was a reason for taking action there which did not apply in the other case.

Mr. WRIGHT: Certainly prices of farm machinery have gone up since the start of the war. The higher exchange in the United States, together with the ten per cent war exchange tax has meant a straight twenty per cent increase in prices of farm machinery since this war started, and I think the government should take into consideration the question of removing that ten per cent tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not talking about increases since the outbreak of the war; we are talking about the freezing period. If I were to talk about increases since the outbreak of war I could give some amazing figures about the percentage increases in the prices of farm products, but the moment I did that I would be accused of taking increases over a period of low price levels. Farm prices have increased by forty-three per cent since 1939, or, excluding wheat, by fifty per cent, not counting butter fat subsidies. I could give a whole list of articles I have here, but prices of farm machinery have not gone up anything like those percentages since the beginning of the war. However, I do not think we would gain anything by going back to the beginning of the war. We go back to the freezing period between September 15 and October 11, 1941, and we have kept farm machinery prices to that level. We have gone to a great deal of trouble and expense to do that, and therefore there is not the same reason applying in that case as in the case of these fruits and vegetables that have gone sky-high as a result of not being under the ceiling in Canada. So far as I can see, they cannot be brought under the ceiling here, but in any event those higher prices have resulted from higher costs or lack of control or something in the United States.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How about the cost of farm machinery repairs?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are under the ceiling.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the minister's statement with regard to the cost of farm machinery apply also to repairs to that machinery?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; under the ceiling they have not been raised at all; there has been no adjustment upwards. What I said about the one or two companies in regard to farm machinery does not apply to repairs, which are subject to the ceiling.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not wish to interfere with the hon. member for Wetaskiwin; if he is going to follow up this discussion I shall yield at once, but I wanted to ask one or two questions on a point already raised.

Mr. JAQUES: I have only one further question to ask. Does the minister consider that gold mining has any effect upon prices in Canada? By that I mean that the money distributed through the mining of gold is effective purchasing power, but nothing which the people consume is produced. I take it that the gold is exchanged to the United States for munitions; and since the value of our gold production is in the neighbourhood of $200,000,000 a year, I suppose that represents roughly the purchasing power that is distributed in Canada, in respect of which no consumable goods are produced. Therefore it increases the purchasing power without also increasing the supply of retail goods. I should like to ask the minister whether in his opinion gold mining is not inflation as far as prices go.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know; I would have to give some thought to that. I do not know that I should like to give an opinion on that point offhand; I would have to try to see the real meaning of the question. Is the hon. gentleman suggesting that the production of gold which is exchanged for goods is more inflationary than the production of some other product which is exchanged for goods? Why would that be?

Mr. JAQUES: In the production of gold something like $200,000,000 of purchasing power is distributed; but gold is a substance which nobody uses and which is exchanged, I understand, to the United States for munitions of war, which of course the people here do not consume. The money distributed because of the production of gold is effective purchasing power, but there is no addition to the amount of retail goods to correspond with the increased purchasing power.

Mr. ILSLEY: I see what the hon. gentleman means, but gold is no more exchanged for munitions than for fruits and vegetables or other consumer goods that are brought in from the United States. You cannot allocate gold to munitions any more than you can allocate it to farm machinery. I do not see that the production of gold can be put on a different footing from the production of any other commodity. We are not exchanging gold for United States munitions any more than we exchange other products, such as newsprint, that we export to the United States. I am unable to see why it is any more inflationary to produce gold than it is to produce newsprint or coarse grains.

Mr. GRAYDON: There has been a change made in the regulations affecting exchange relative to fresh fruits and vegetables coming into Canada. When was this change made? What is the extent of the exchange relaxation? Has the minister given consideration to the results of this change at this particular time? We are now entering a period when there is a great production in our own country of fresh fruits and vegetables, and I should like to know if the minister has given careful consideration to the results which may arise from this change and the freer entry of fruits and vegetables into Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Prices are so high in the United States that I do not think there will be any effect at all. The timing was not very good. The recommendation was made by the wartime prices and trade board, but I think it was six weeks before it finally went through, because a lot of things had to be straightened out. Final action was not taken until June 22. While that was not too late to do any good, it was getting along toward the period when it would have been too late. We took off the war exchange tax and the special excise duty. The special excise duty of 3 per cent applies only to importations from countries against which the general tariff applies. In practice this will mean Mexico. It has been 10 per cent against the United States and 13 per cent against Mexico.

Mr. STIRLING: Does it apply to any fruits besides grapefruit?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are thirteen fruits and vegetables covered.

Mr. STIRLING: Are they not nearly all vegetables?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think there are three or four fruits. I have not the list here.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Has the minister's department carried on any negotiations with the Department of Munitions and Supply in connection with the bonus on fuel wood. Apparently the policy is to pay the dollar subsidy direct to the dealer. During last week-end I was in a part of the country where wood is the only fuel used, and I had an opportunity of talking to a great many men who make it their business to cut wood. I was informed that the people who actually cut the wood will get no benefit from this subsidy, that it goes to the dealer. This means that the dealer is getting an extra dollar profit on wood which someone else cuts. A number of these men told me that they have been in the habit of cutting wood and delivering it direct to customers. One man told me that he had delivered as many as a thousand cords of wood in a year without having it go through any retailer. He has been unable to get any part of this subsidy. Could not steps be taken to see that this subsidy is paid directly to the men who cut the wood? I do not think it will be possible to get an increase in the production of wood fuel unless some means can be adopted to shunt this dollar into the pockets of the men who actually do the cutting.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would come under another department. I do not know very much about it and I am not in position to explain it. I believe the Minister of Munitions and Supply has dealt with the matter on several occasions.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: He made it quite clear that it went to the dealer.

Mr. ILSLEY: And he gave some very good reasons why that would bring about the results, if I remember correctly. I do not want to cross wires with him; it is up to him to explain that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I asked the minister for a break-down of this amount.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give that at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, when the estimates for the Department of Labour were before the committee I said that I would reply to a number of questions that had been asked by some hon. gentlemen.

I will deal first with the question asked by the hon. member for St. John-Albert, who asked me for a statement on the information division of the Department of Labour.

This branch was established in December, 1942. Previously, publicity work had been handled by various staffs—by a director of publicity and staff, under the director of national selective service; by a director of publicity for the Department of Labour proper, and by a director of publicity for the unemployment insurance commission. The new information division represented a consolidation of the work.

The duties of the information division consist of the preparation and issue of press releases, preparation of special articles on the work of the department, informational contacts, preparation and placing of paid advertising, and other duties as assigned.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

The staff, and annual salaries, are now as follows:

1 director of information at	$3,500
1 writer-translator at	3,000
1 advertising specialist at	2,820
1 principal clerk at	1,920
1 grade four clerk at	1,680
1 grade three clerk at	1,380
2 grade two stenographers at	1,080
1 office boy at	420

These salaries are augmented by cost of living bonus up to but not including $3,000. At the moment an officer of the industrial relations branch at a salary of $3,120 is temporarily on loan with the information division.

Cost of operating the division since its establishment seven months ago amounts to $9,000, approximately, to June 15, 1943.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition asked for information with respect to the records kept by the local employment selective service offices.

In the larger offices, a number of telephone operators are in constant attendance in the order room, where telephone orders are received from the employers and full details noted on an employer's order card.

This card is then sent to the priority section of the office, where by use of the industrial classification manual published by the Department of Labour early in this year the classification number of the industry is placed on the card. I think this manual is a tribute to that section of the Department of Labour. In it will be found a classification of practically all the industrial occupations in Canada. I think this is the first time such a thing has ever been attempted in this country.

Mr. REID: Will copies of the manual be available to hon. members?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will get the hon. member a copy.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it a new publication?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a recent publication which we have got out for the guidance of selective service officers.

Mr. GRAYDON: How long has it been out?

Mr. MITCHELL: It was issued early this year. I do not say that I had something to do with its drafting, but I had something to do with the initial steps taken to develop a manual of this description.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do not be too modest.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am just saying that I am not responsible for drafting the manual. It will be appreciated by anyone who has any knowledge of the various classifications of industry how a manual of this sort can be of great assistance to people who may wish to consult it from time to time instead of relying on their memory.

Mr. GILLIS: Can we secure copies of it?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to secure a copy for my hon. friend.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you.

Mr. MITCHELL: From this number, reference is then made to the priority index, prepared by the inter-departmental committee on priorities, and the priority, whether (a) (b) (c) or (d), is marked on the employer's order card.

The card is then forwarded to that section of the office dealing with the particular industry, and there is placed in the live order file. The same procedure is followed in a more restricted form in the small offices.

When an applicant for work or a person directed to report to the office comes in, he is interviewed by a trained officer, and full particulars, such as his name, address, primary occupation, secondary occupation, age, height, weight, physical condition, disabilities, war service, education, specialized training, trade tests, farm experience and the nature of his previous employment experience, are all noted down on a card.

Some may ask why such particulars as height, weight and physical condition are required, but it will be readily understood that when men are wanted for heavy industries, for example, it is necessary to know something of the physical qualifications of those who are to be employed; that is why these particulars are noted on the questionnaire.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suppose the officers have to rely on the statement of the man himself as to his physical condition?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would think so.

Under present conditions, when the demand for labour is so heavy, the bulk of the applicants can be immediately directed to an employer who is seeking their services, and for this purpose the national selective service permit form is issued and a notation made on the employer's order card that such and such a person has been referred to him.

It may be that upon the arrival of the applicant at the employer's place of business, the latter is unwilling to employ him. We have not yet reached the stage when we wish to compel an employer to hire a person who is unacceptable. Therefore, we always have on our records a large number—as of June 10 amounting to almost 40,000 persons—who are what we describe as "unconfirmed referrals." I would point out that in Great Britain the average number of "unconfirmed referrals" is about 100,000, and I understand the figure is higher in the United States, which probably has not yet reached the stage in the war that we have reached.

We are unable to prove that the person referred has actually been employed until we receive back from the employer the duplicate copy of the NSS permit, or check by telephone. The latter procedure has obvious limitations.

The situation may exist in certain localities where there are more applicants of a particular skill than we have employers' orders for. In this case, the same "application for employment" card is filled out and is filed on a live applicant file. That is what we call the live file. These files are constantly being examined by the officer concerned with that particular group of industries, with their related classes of occupation; and when an employer's order is received, applicants of the desired qualifications are directed to the employer for interview in the order in which they made application. That is on the basis of seniority, which the hon. member for Vancouver East will understand probably as well as I do.

The persons are selected by means of the data which has already been collected and recorded on the "application for employment" card; and in all cases the applicant must necessarily be got in touch with a second time, in order that his national selective service permit may be made out. That is, he is given a permit to go to the employer. Then we have another check when he is there. A second form is then made out.

At this second interview, if there is any need for a further exhaustive examination into the previously recorded skills, the employment record or the personality of the individual, this is, of course, done at that time, and I make the point that very few jobs are changed on the basis of something which happens to be on a card.

In fact, no persons are being moved to new employment under the compulsory orders without a thorough examination having first been made into their previous experience and present capabilities. I think that will be readily understood. When you are moving men by compulsory order you must do everything that is humanly possible to see that they are suitable to the occupation to which they are being directed. We have had a number of complaints and have traced some of them down, and we found that where it seemed on the surface that perhaps some ridiculous action had been taken, after we looked into the matter we found that it was not as described in the press in certain instances.

We maintain in each local office an employer's record form which contains such essentials as name, address, plant unit, employer's number, principal product, name of personnel manager, normal working forces, male and female, agreements with trade unions, special skills utilized, a record of visits to the plant by our own officers, and a record of all transactions with the local office. That follows; the man who is in an insurable trade or calling naturally has his insurance book picked up and placed with the new employer.

The employer's order, form UIC 733, gives such information as the employer's name, address, business division of the firm, the occupations of the persons required, description of their duties, the rates of pay, regular and overtime, how often paid and when, hours of work per day, per week, probable duration of the work, the requirements as to experience, skill, age, et cetera; the tools—I should probably point out that some tradesmen carry all their tools and some carry part of their tools; some tools are provided by the employer—special equipment, permits, licences, certificates of educational standing, et cetera, which are required, the board and living conditions, the transportation arrangements, the person to whom the applicant should apply; and it makes provision on the back for details of the transactions covered under this order.

The priority form gives the division of industry and the number of the industry within that division, all of which is taken from the industrial classification manual published for the use of the employment offices, and also shows on the same card the priority rating, whether (a), (b), (c) or (d), the date at which it was authorized and separate ratings for men and women.

For the applicant's records, we have the form UIC 701 which contains the details such as name, address, occupation, et cetera, which have already been enumerated; the NSS form 120, which is the separation notice given by the employer, the most recent copy of which is always maintained on the office files, and which contains, of course, written proof of the man's previous employment and his reason for separation.

The NSS form 122 is the permit to seek employment, two copies of which are handed to the applicant—one for his own use, and one, in postcard form, for the employer to return to the office as proof that he has employed the applicant—the third copy remaining on the office files.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there any difficulty with that part of the machinery?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would not say so. When you are handling the vast number of human beings that we are handling, I would say it works out reasonably well. Some are bound to slip through the net; I think that is natural, but as you gain more experience with this operation that kind of thing will become less and less.

There are other special forms which may be used from time to time, and special reports covering various industries, but the ones already mentioned are the basic and essential ones on which our employment service is based.

As to statistics, the first form which might be mentioned is form UIC 753A, which is the daily work sheet used by the local office to compile the statistical data required for form UIC 751A.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister why some are UIC and some national selective service?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know. I think it is just as the thing develops. Personally I see no reason why all should not be selective service. I might point this out to my hon. friend: I think I know what is in his mind. The unemployment insurance commission was functioning before we thought of selective service, and they retained the name UIC. on the forms which were in use prior to the development of selective service. Personally I see no reason why we should not call them all by the same name, "selective service," except that when you are handling forms people get accustomed to using a particular name for them, and notwithstanding that you might change it, in the office routine they still use the same name.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would seem to indicate that the offices were still being manned by the original unemployment insurance personnel.

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely. As a matter of fact the whole selective service system has been built on the unemployment insurance offices, just as it has been in Great Britain, the United States, Australia, New Zealand, and any other country where they had that form of organization for what they call job placement. The selective service has been superimposed upon it. In every country that has been done.

Form UIC 751A is a weekly report giving a great deal of information on the vacancies in stated industries, at the beginning of the week, notified during the period, cancelled during the period, et cetera.

Also prepared at the local office is form UIC 757, showing the number of unfilled vacancies by industry priority, divided into approximately 100 separate occupations.

This form also shows the unconfirmed referrals to employers, that is, those applicants sent to employers for whom we have not yet received a confirmation by the receipt of the employer's copy of the NSS. permit, and also the numbers of unreferred applicants in each of these 100 or so occupations.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Just at that point, how does the employer find out what is the priority, whether he is (a), (b), (c) or (d)?

Mr. MITCHELL: He does not find out.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Just at that point he does find out. My hon. friend's friend from Waterloo North gave an interview to the press stating that certain industries were in (b) priority. How did he come to know?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know. Who is "my hon. friend's friend"?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister's friend from Waterloo North. He is in the chamber now, behind the curtains; perhaps he can explain how he gave an interview to the press some three or four weeks ago stating that a certain industry had a (b) priority.

Mr. MITCHELL: From these two reports which I have mentioned statistics are compiled for the whole of Canada at Ottawa showing the vacancies and referrals of males by priorities for all industries, in greater or lesser detail, as is required by the department. The same procedure is used for the preparation of reports for females.

All these forms have been amended and improved upon as a result of the greater amount of information required, and the more rigid control of employment which we have instituted.

For years, however, a record of the vacancies and of the placements as reported to us, both by the old provincial employment offices, and since July, 1941, by the offices operated under the jurisdiction of the unemployment insurance commission, has been published in the Labour Gazette.

I should like to lay on the table copies of the following forms:

1. Employer's record card, form UIC 731.
2. Employer's order—male, form UIC 733.
3. The priority form.
4. Industrial classification manual.
5. Employee's application for employment, form UIC 701.
6. Notice of separation from employment, form NSS 120.
7. Permit to seek or enter employment, form NSS 122.
8. Daily work sheet, form 753A.
9. Statistical report on employment operations by industry, form UIC 751A.
10. Report of applicants and vacancies by occupations—males, form UIC 757.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition asked for a statement as to the resignations, since the resignation of the former director of selective service, of certain gentlemen employed by selective service.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some seventeen, I think. The minister is going to read the names?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; I will put it all on the record.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can we have the dates of the resignations?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have not them here, but if my hon. friend wants them I can get them for him. He did not ask for the dates, but there is no reason why I should not give them.

Beattie, Helen; publicity, resigned in order to transfer to wartime prices and trade board.

Campbell, L. S.; consultant, resigned to take a more remunerative position.

Colle, S.; consultant, resigned owing to discontinuance of arrangement to pay living expenses when away from Montreal, in addition to salary.

Daly, J. C.; selective service officer, resigned because he was not prepared to accept reclassification by civil service commission and consequent lower salary.

Mr. GRAYDON: Were these the reasons the department give for their resignations?

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely. I would say this to my hon. friend. I am not placing any blame; but a good many men were hired without consultation with anyone; when it was necessary to keep the record straight they were gone over by the civil service commission, and certain allowances were dropped and certain classifications established, and some of these gentlemen, naturally, did not agree with their classification, and resigned. The Department of Labour as such had no jurisdiction in the matter. But that was done, and from my own point of view it had to be done; may I say that.

Garside, S. T.: consultant; resigned because of discontinuance of arrangement to pay living expenses when away from Toronto, in addition to salary.

Grabill, E. L.: chief enforcement officer, Montreal, classification out of line with other enforcement positions in the service as approved by treasury board and civil service commission. Resigned on account of reduction in salary.

Harvey, Robert: executive assistant. Returned to Allied War Supplies Limited, from which corporation he had been on loan.

Holland, L.: consultant—was in charge of staff personnel. Resigned, reason not stated.

Melancon, Claude: publicity director. Returned to Canadian National Railways, from the staff of which he had been on loan on the understanding that period of loan would be limited.

Perhaps I might state a personal experience I had when we organized the national war labour board. Sometimes it is necessary to borrow a man for six or nine months, and in one case Mr. E. R. Complin, of Canadian Industries Limited, came as an executive director of the national war labour board, Mr. G. W. Huggett, president and general manager, having very kindly loaned him to the department until we could get over the hump and get the thing on paper. It was more or less an administrative undertaking and we borrowed him for six months. After that he went back to Canadian Industries Limited.

McGillivray, L.: news and feature writer. Resigned in order to take a position with wartime prices and trade board.

McTaggart, K.: news and feature writer. Resigned to return to newspaper work.

Quinn, Valentine: selective service officer. It was not found possible to assign him to a position at a salary he felt he should receive, and in consequence his services were dispensed with.

There is nothing new about that; you get it in all business and governmental organizations.

Reinke, Carl: assistant to director. Resigned. No reason given.

Roberts, W. R.: consultant. Transferred to a position with the timber controller.

Smith, Goldwyn: consultant. Resigned due to personal dissatisfaction with status on the staff of national selective service, stating he was to return to his former position in the university of Iowa.

Taylor, Robert: news and feature writer. Resigned to return to the press gallery.

Wright, L. A.: assistant director. Resigned to return to Engineering Institute of Canada of which he is secretary.

I think my hon. friend will agree with me that these things happen in every business organization—resignations because salaries are not good enough, and that sort of thing. I am frank to admit that a good deal of publicity has been given the matter. In a well-known national newspaper in this province there appeared a leading article on the resignation of one of the officials of external affairs, who was loaned to us for a short period in the formative stages of the establishment of selective service. I refer to Mr. John Deutsch. This is the letter written to Mr. MacNamara by Mr. Norman A. Robertson in this connection:

Dear Mr. MacNamara:

With reference to our correspondence and conversations about the services of Mr. John Deutsch, I wish to confirm my understanding that Mr. Deutsch will return to the Department of External Affairs on Monday, January 18. I am sorry that I am not in a position to make his services available to your department for a longer period, but the pressure of work on the economic side of this department makes his return imperative. I need not add that he and his colleagues in the department on the economic and prisoners of war side of the work will always be ready to help where they can in dealing with aspects of these questions which are of concern to both our departments.

Yours sincerely,

N. A. Robertson.

I know Mr. Deutsch quite well. We borrowed him for two or three months from external affairs until we got over the preliminary work of laying down the administrative policy in connection with selective service, and after that period he went back to where he had come from.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has given the departmental explanation as to why a number of these men have left the staff. Is it not correct to say that, if not all, at least a large number of these men had actually been brought into the department under the supervision and jurisdiction of the former director of national selective service, and that when the blow-up came and Mr. Little resigned, then of course gradually these men one by one left the service. I think the minister ought to be clearer in his explanation, because that is the generally accepted explanation of the situation.

Mr. MITCHELL: That may be generally accepted. Probably some people would like to accept it, but I do not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister if the resignation of these seventeen men, after Mr. Little had resigned and he had had his differences with the minister, was a mere coincidence?

Mr. MITCHELL: In many respects, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the public do not think so.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know the public do not, but some people tried to sell an idea.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What were the reasons given by the men themselves? I would rather have their reasons than the minister's.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have stated the reasons given by the men themselves.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Those were the departmental reasons, I understood.

Mr. MITCHELL: Those are extracted from the correspondence arising from the resignations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to make my own interpretation.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I know something about organizations and about the civil service as well as my hon. friend, and I suggest that there should be some measure of responsibility when you hire people, some consultation with those people who understand the conditions under which men are hired through the civil service. I am not being too critical about this—

Mr. GRAYDON: Was he not trying to cut the red tape?

Mr. MITCHELL: There was no red tape. If my hon. friend were sitting here he would have to do the same as I am doing. You cannot create a condition where you meet men, almost on the street, and hire them and give them salaries that throw your whole salary arrangement out of line in your particular service. There has to be some order in these things, and the first thing I set out to do was to put this in order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course, he was trying to do the job quickly.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all very well, but we have seen lots of people try to do jobs quickly. May I say to my hon. friend that I would be in a very different position to-day if I had not stepped in and said, "You cannot do the job too quickly; you have to conform, at least in a measure, to government policy." I think I know what makes the democratic clock tick. I know something about responsibility to the public.

Mr. GRAYDON: He was perhaps speedier than the government's policy.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is all very well to say that, but the minister has some responsibility, and I should not like to see develop in this country what I have seen at close hand in other countries. As long as I am Minister of Labour the minister will be responsible and will answer to this parliament. If there is any statement of policy, this is where it will be made, right here while the house is in session. Make no mistake about that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have only to observe that that was not the case with respect to the government's man-power policy in the early stages. Who laid down the policy for the Department of National Defence after the mobilization act was passed? Who was the government's spokesman before the Canadian club at Ottawa but the chief of general staff of this country when the minister did not have the guts to get up and do it himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what happened.

An hon. MEMBER: He has more guts than you have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would take somebody else's judgment besides yours.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is another question. The minister may have overlooked it. It is a question in connection with the change in the enforcement officer in the department. I am not sure, but I think his name is Wright. I asked that question, but the minister may have overlooked it.

Mr. MITCHELL: He resigned to return to his former position with the Engineering Institute of Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think I asked a supplementary question, namely, whether or not someone had taken his place as enforcement officer.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, and a very efficient enforcement officer, at that I might say.

Mr. GRAYDON: He would not be an exception, of course?

Mr. MITCHELL: No; he is an extremely efficient officer.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Mr. ILSLEY: If we have finished with that, perhaps we can proceed with something else. The hon. member for Yorkton asked me to place on record a break-down of the $120,000,000. I shall now do so. May I say that the estimates which I am about to place on Hansard are little more than intelligent guesses, because it is very difficult indeed to forecast the amount of money which will be required for any particular subsidy.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But they will fall in line pretty well with the $80,000,000 last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that. They will depart to some extent from last year. The estimates are as follows:

Estimates for the Fiscal Year Ending March 31, 1944

Domestic subsidies
Basket manufacturers	$ 750,000
Butterfat	3,000,000
Butter stocks	350,000
Canned goods	2,000,000
Cereal products	5,000
Cheese boxes	40,000
Coal	1,300,000
Coffee and tea inventories	400,000
Frozen eggs	40,000
Fertilizers—(transportation)	80,000
Glove and garment leather	1,175,000
Groceries	2,000,000
Leather footwear	1,200,000
Lumber	1,100,000
Milk—production	1,100,000
Milk—consumers	20,000,000
Soap and shortening	1,850,000
Peaches	15,000
Pit props and mine ties	20,000
Pit wood	375,000
Potatoes	1,500,000
Transportation—foodstuffs	200,000

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to the $24,000,000 on imports of raw cottons, is the minister in a position to tell the committee what was the total of extra cost of raw cotton imported into Canada, including the $24,000,000, which the government absorbed. In other words, how much did the industry itself absorb? The minister will recall that on one occasion he intimated that he was going to apply the squeeze to the textile industry. He will no doubt recall having said that. I wonder how much was squeezed out of the textile industry in addition to the $24,000,000 the government paid to keep its price level down.

Mr. ILSLEY: The $24,000,000 I spoke of is for the present year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much is the industry supposed to take care of, itself, or has that been calculated, on the basis of production prices?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was given last year in the shape of subsidies on the importation of raw cotton, and how much did the industry itself take care of?

Mr. ILSLEY: Import subsidies paid on raw cotton and cotton fabrics for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, have been $2,704,631.63.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister that figure divided between raw cotton and cotton fabrics?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is practically all fabrics.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No subsidy paid on imported raw cotton in the last fiscal year; do I understand that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Noble told me the other day there had not been any.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Had not been any subsidy?

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The cost of raw cotton has greatly increased, has it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is to say, the industry itself in the last fiscal year had to absorb the whole increase?

Mr. ILSLEY: They did an immense amount of forward buying, at the instance of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They showed good business judgment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I contend that the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation should have a large measure of the credit. They took a very strong lead in getting all the cotton companies to buy just as much cotton as they could, and by that action they saved this country at least $15,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the companies themselves are entitled to some credit. They put up the money and took all the risk.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they did; and it might have turned out differently.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They took all the risk.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will put it in this way, that it was one of the most fortunate moves the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, or any other government agency, ever took. It saved the taxpayers of Canada an enormous sum of money.

With regard to the squeeze to which the hon. member referred, I would say that that was applied. The arrangements with the cotton industry are embodied in a number of very carefully drawn and somewhat complicated agreements. They embody the principle of profit control. It would be impossible to go into the matter at length, and do it intelligently, this evening.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not ask that. The minister would have to have the documents themselves.

Mr. FAIR: Shortly before the committee rose for the dinner recess the hon. member for Macleod asked the Minister of Finance for an explanation of the system arrived at for the fixing of the payment of subsidies on farm commodities. I was amused but not a little surprised at the way in which the minister skated around the question. He did manage to touch one or two of the small items, but he kept away from the matter itself.

Then, as a main reason possibly for having prices fixed as they are, he said that if prices were raised we would have to have a general increase in wages. If there were an increase in farm wages I think there would not be any complaint, because to-day farm help is lower paid than the help in any other industry in Canada. Farm help also works longer hours, by at least fifty per cent, than any other class of workers in the country.

Then, coming to the period on which prices were based, we find that the period from September 15 to October 11 is the most disadvantageous and most unfortunate that could have been picked in respect of the fixing of farm prices. Whether they be farmers or not, all hon. members know that at that time of the year harvesting is being done. For that reason there is a heavy marketing of different commodities and prices are forced down to a considerable extent.

For the information of the committee I should like to mention the cost of some items of farm machinery in past years, as well as the prices obtained by the farmer for different grades of grain. I am going to mention only three farm implements, the two-furrow fourteen-inch gang plough, the twenty-run seed drill and the eight-foot binder, implements every farmer must use if he is going to harvest any grain. I am going to quote also the prices of No. 1 northern wheat, 2 C.W. oats and 3 C.W. barley, basis top grades at Fort William:

Year	Plough	Drill	Binder	Wheat	Oats	Barley
1914	$ 92 00	$145 00	$175 00	$1 32	$0 57½	$0 69·4
1920	164 50	249 00	279 00	1 99·3	54½	90·4
1926	160 00	258 00	292 00	1 46·3	58·7	72·6
1930	152 00	258 00	287 00	64·2	29·9	28·4
1933	138 00	245 00	272 00	68·1	33·4	38·8
1939	153 50	269 00	334 00	70	.....	.....
1940	160 50	281 50	349 50	70	.....	.....

I would direct particular attention to the price of wheat in 1930, the first year of the depression, and compare the implement prices with the figures for 1926, when wheat was worth $1.46·3. I would also direct attention to the fact that in 1939 and 1940, when we were receiving only seventy cents a bushel for our wheat, the cost of the binder went up, first to $334 and then to $349.50. Then I would ask the committee to take note of the price of the binder in 1914, which was $175, when wheat was selling at $1.32. It is easy to convert the price of that binder into the number of bushels which would be required to pay for it. Coming to 1940 we find the price of the binder 200 per cent what it was in 1914, while wheat was very little more than fifty per cent of the 1914 figure. I am giving these figures in order that the committee may have some realization of the injustice of the present price-fixing policy and of the attempt which has not been made by the prices board to establish fair and equitable prices on which to base subsidies for farm products.

There are several other matters I could mention, but I hardly think it is necessary, since time after time in this house we have produced evidence which could not be successfully contradicted, indicating that the farmers are not getting just prices as compared with other lines of industry. Take the supplying of credit, for instance. In 1914 I believe the interest rate was eight per cent. Later that was brought down to seven per cent, and it is still seven per cent. I wonder if the minister or the board have investigated the cost of supplying national credit, to see whether it bears any fair relation whatever to the products of agriculture at the present time. I am not going to take more of the time of the committee just now, but I believe the items I have cited will show discrimination and injustice in the fixing of prices of agricultural products.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Before six o'clock I was asked to place on record the fruits and vegetables from which the war exchange tax and the special excise duty were removed. I should say that the date of the order in council was not June 22, as I stated, but June 15. The items were thirteen in number, and included: potatoes, onions, beans, cabbage, carrots, celery, lettuce, green peas, spinach, tomatoes, pineapples, grapefruit and lemons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is to be a subsidy of a million and a half dollars on potatoes. How does that arise? I have not the information, and I should like to know. I believe it is on domestic production.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is an estimate for the current year. The price ceiling was set for all potatoes, and some potatoes had to be imported at higher than the ceiling price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the new crop coming in from the south?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. A corresponding subsidy had to be paid on the domestic production of new potatoes, and $1,500,000 is the estimate of that domestic subsidy.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to make one further appeal to the minister along the lines of the appeal I made the other evening; I hope he will give it serious consideration and pass it on to the board. I speak again on the matter of certain fruits for infants. In the break-down the minister gave a while ago I noted that in the section dealing with foods, canned goods came fourth, and there is quite a subsidy set aside in this connection. Also on page 25 of the report of the wartime prices and trade board I noticed this paragraph:

> Peaches. A subsidy of $5 per ton was paid on fresh peaches processed in Ontario during the 1942 canning season, to enable processors, who purchased peaches from growers at the higher prices approved by the farm products control board of Ontario for the 1942 crop, to sell the canned fruit under the ceiling. It is payable on all peaches whether grown by the processor himself or purchased by him from another grower.

I want to make it perfectly clear at the outset that I am not putting up any argument that adults should have any special concession in connection with fruit, particularly when these things are needed overseas both for the civilian population of Britain and other countries and for the armed forces. As I pointed out to the minister the other evening, however, in view of the fact that certain of these fruits were prepared and put into tins for the use of children only, I believe it would be possible, if the proper directions were given, to see to it that some of the fruits now being grown, processed and canned are reserved for children and infants.

Peaches are one of the fruits subsidized, and the minister has spoken about arrangements being made to provide sufficient tin with which to make cans for fruits and vegetables. Canned fruits have been mentioned to-night, and my request is that steps be taken to see that they are not canned just in adult sizes which will be grabbed up by the first purchaser, but rather put into the smaller tins and made available for children and infants. I am sure I speak for a great many parents of young children when I say that there is great concern at the present time over not being able to get the fruits which the nutrition experts say are so necessary for young children. I mention peaches because I find that fruit referred to in the report of the wartime prices and trade board, but I could refer also to apricots, pears and prunes, as well as the matter of corn syrup. If my suggestions are not the best, I hope the minister will be able to devise better ones, but I ask him to see to it that these things are made available to this group of our citizens.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall take note of the hon. gentleman's suggestion and bring it to the attention of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the minister explain how the milk subsidy of $20,000,000 in the estimates is distributed? I understand that two cents per quart is paid to the distributors, and that there is another subsidy paid to the producers.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a small amount here for a producers' subsidy. The administration of this subsidy was transferred to the Department of Agriculture, and this amount of $1,100,000 is only to cover what was paid by the board up to, I think, May 1 of this year. The estimated cost of the consumer subsidy is $20,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all consumer?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the consumer subsidy. That is paid to bring the price of milk down two cents a quart to all consumers in Canada. The hon. gentleman is inquiring about the machinery in connection with that?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The distribution of the $1,100,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is under the Department of Agriculture; that is not paid by the wartime prices and trade board. For a short time at the beginning of the fiscal year it was paid by the board and then it was transferred to the Department of Agriculture. We administer the consumer subsidy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is one aspect of the milk question to which I should like to direct attention. In the Sherbrooke district in the province of Quebec the surplus milk is sent to the Carnation company, who are evaporators. On two different occasions they have reduced the price to the farmers in that area. I took the matter up with an official of the wartime prices and trade board—for the moment I cannot think of his name—and I had hoped that the situation would be rectified. We were told that this would be under the authority of the Quebec dairy commission, but they have not taken any action although they had a meeting with respect to it and other kindred matters. These farmers are having to take cut after cut.

Mr. REID: It is the same in British Columbia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If we are to provide subsidies for the benefit of the consumers of milk, some provision should be made for those who produce milk and have surplus supplies. They should not be lost sight of in all this tangle of subsidies, subventions and that sort of thing. What happened in the days of the depression was nothing less than terrible. Surplus milk was dumped on the market and the dairies paid what they felt like paying. I do not know whether this is under the jurisdiction of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is under agriculture now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure the official in the wartime prices and trade board who is in charge of dairy products is familiar with the situation and knows what is going on. Apparently these people have no one to speak for them and they feel that they are losing money. They feel also that if the farmer got a fair price for his milk there would not be any need for a subsidy. I am not arguing that at the moment because I realize that the minister's efforts are directed toward keeping down the price to the consumer. That is a good thing because milk is a staple diet which is absolutely necessary, especially for children. I want someone to look into the situation in Quebec to see if it cannot be rectified.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The other item in which I was interested is the $24,000,000 to be paid on imported petroleum products. What are these products? What quantity of each is imported? How is the amount of subsidy determined, and to whom is it paid?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is nearly all crude oil; there is some aviation gasoline, but not much. It is really the assumption by the government of this country of the increase in the cost of transportation since the base period.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On imported petroleum products?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Considerable crude oil comes by tanker, and after December 7, 1941, there was a sharp increase in the war risk insurance rates and also in freight rates because it was at that time that the submarine sinkings in the western Atlantic became so serious and so many tankers were lost. We were faced with two alternatives: one, to let the price of gasoline go up considerably in this country contrary to price ceiling principles or, two, to assume the increase in these costs. We assumed them, and the manner in which we assumed them was by paying this import subsidy.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister give us roughly what that amounts to per gallon?

Mr. ILSLEY: The high point was about 14 cents a gallon on gasoline. Those who were using gasoline produced from oil which came in by sea, such as residents of the maritime provinces, were at one time subsidized to the extent of 14 cents a gallon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is it to-day? I do not care if the minister does not know.

Mr. WRIGHT: Have insurance rates on the western Atlantic been reduced appreciably from the high point?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes. The figure would be about half that now.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. MAYHEW: I should like to refer to an order issued by the wartime prices and trade board, A-794, of June 29, which reads as follows:

1. For the purposes of this order, "Corporation" means Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Ltd.

2. Except as otherwise provided by section 3 hereof, every person in British Columbia who processes and preserves any strawberries, raspberries, loganberries, black currants or apricots in SO_2 or by heat sterilization or by freezing with or without sugar, shall sell all such products to the Corporation or to any person appointed by the said Corporation to act as its agent for the purposes of this order.

3. The provisions of section 2 of this order shall not apply to a person who processes and preserves any of the products mentioned therein;

It goes on to say:

4. The price to be paid by the corporation for any product sold to it pursuant to this order shall be the price for such product from time to time fixed by the administrator of processed fruits and vegetables with the approval of the chairman of the board.

My point is this: How can you expect people to go on processing strawberries, raspberries, loganberries, and black currants without knowing what they are to get for their products when they are canned?

The other point I would bring to the attention of the minister is that this order was issued as late as June 29 of this year. At that time it was very much too late for the British Columbia fruit growers. I think the reason for issuing this order and also the prices to be paid should be made known without delay in order that we may go ahead and process as much as we can.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the price would be fixed by order in council; I believe it would be fixed but by agreement between the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and the processors. I do not know what arrangements they have made about prices, but I presume that there is some arrangement being made.

Mr. MAYHEW: This order was issued on the 29th of June, and there have been no prices fixed to date.

Mr. ILSLEY: The administrator is now in British Columbia, I am informed.

Mr. MAYHEW: Has he authority of himself to name the price?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it must be with the approval of the chairman of the board, but he would negotiate the matter and then, I suppose, telephone or telegraph to Ottawa and get the matter completed.

Mr. MAYHEW: It was not completed to-day. Would the minister look into it as soon as possible?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The object of the activities of the whole wartime prices and trade board set-up and the object of this proposed expenditure of $120,000,000 is, I take it, to prevent inflation in Canada. Will the minister agree that that is the object?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is part of our programme.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The object is to prevent inflation. There has been a good deal of misunderstanding of the meaning of the word "inflation" in the house, and there is still a good deal of misunderstanding about it in the country. We have heard members of the house use the word "inflation" with a variety of meanings. I believe it is very important to the progress of this country and the progress of the world that every member of this committee get clearly into his mind that inflation is a rise in price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Another lecture.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member for York-Sunbury needs ten lectures, and then he would not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I feel flattered at the testimonial just given me by the member for Lethbridge, because I venture to say that ninety per cent of the members of this house are in the same position with me, so that I feel I am in good company.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is all the more reason why we should stop and discuss this matter with some care at this very time, because until we understand what inflation is, it will be impossible for this country to accomplish any of the things we are aiming to accomplish in the peace, and it will be impossible for the world to accomplish the fine things which are envisaged in the Atlantic charter.

The meaning of inflation is fundamental to an understanding of economics. I would like to commend the minister and the wartime prices and trade board for the great amount of activity in which they have been engaged and for the great many discoveries which they have made. They are being more or less forced into making important discoveries. The minister is doing things this year which two and a half years ago he would have considered quite impossible. A few minutes ago he rather wanted to lecture me because I was going to talk theoretically, but in the last two and a half years the minister has learned a lot of theory he did not know before, and I promise him that if he will keep as alert in the next two years and a half as he has been in the last two and a half he will learn a whole lot more than he possibly imagines now.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not to-night, though!

Mr. BLACKMORE: No; I would not undertake to teach the minister to-night. What I am concerned about is that we understand that inflation is merely a rise in price and that inflation can be prevented by devices similar to those which are being used by the wartime prices and trade board at the present time.

I wish to refer for a moment or two to the question I raised just before the dinner recess as to why it would not be possible to raise the price of agricultural products by subsidies without making it necessary for the labouring man to receive higher wages. The minister expressed considerable anxiety, saying that it would put into circulation a great deal of purchasing power which would have an inflationary tendency.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is another reason, too, namely, the tremendous administrative difficulties involved in subsidy payments. At the moment we are having so much difficulty with some of the payments that we feel we may have to stop them just for administrative reasons.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The administrative difficulties are great, but the minister will be the first to acknowledge that Canada, with all the administrative difficulties which she has assumed, is in a far healthier condition than the United States where they have refrained from assuming the responsibility of going through such difficulties. It will be discovered by and by, when men know more about money and prices and kindred matters, that there are simple techniques which can be used which avoid many of the administrative difficulties.

But let me go back to the question which the minister raised. He said that if we put a good deal more money into circulation, it would have an inflationary tendency. But it will not matter how much inflationary tendency there is if prices are controlled.

Prices can be controlled in three different ways. One is by definite price fixing; another is by subsidies such as the wartime prices and trade board is using in many directions, and another is by rationing. These three devices wisely and scientifically used will control inflation. There may be administrative difficulties; we are bound to have difficulties because we are trying to use an outmoded financial system that we should never be trying to use. We are trying to bolster up a ramshackle thing, and of course we are having all the difficulties that a person would have in trying to run a fifteen year old car in comparison with one who is trying to run a car which has just come out of the factory. That is why the difficulties are so numerous; we are trying to use an outmoded system, an ox-cart system which we should have discarded long ago. May I repeat that prices of agricultural products could be raised by subsidies and bonuses very much like those which are used to-day, and there would be no necessity for a rise in the price of agricultural products to the general consumer any more than there is for a rise in the price of milk, which rise the minister has taken great care to prevent. Society as a whole has absorbed the rise, so that the consumer does not have to pay. That is the first point that I wish to make.

May I repeat once more that inflation is simply a rise in prices. Now, if inflation is a rise in price, I wonder if it will be worth while to direct the committee's attention—I believe I will—to this fact. If inflation is only a rise in price, and if it can be prevented by subsidies of one sort or another, is there any reason why state-created debt-free money could not be used for the subsidies just as well as the money which is now being used? If there is any reason, it would be a good thing to have it immediately.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I have given the reason several times.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will challenge the minister to give it now. I will challenge him to give any reason why. I will raise this question for him. If he is going to pay a subsidy on milk, will it make any difference to the price of milk whether he uses money which he borrows from the Bank of Montreal or money which he borrows from the Bank of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: It makes a difference in the price of other products.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would it make a difference in the price of milk?

Mr. ILSLEY: No—other products, though.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why? Which would have the greater inflationary tendency, money which came out of the Bank of Montreal or money which came out of the Bank of Canada?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Would I shorten this or lengthen it by answering the question? I am afraid it would lengthen it. I think I will just listen.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you. I think that is the safest thing for the minister to do. Now, if he used the money out of the Bank of Canada, he would be using money which would be created by the Bank of Canada without a debt; and if the Bank of Canada allowed him to have the money without a debt, he could still use it to subsidize the price of milk and he could keep the price of milk down just as well as he is doing now with the money which he is using now, let that money be money which he raises by taxation, or by borrowing from people, or which he gets out of the Bank of Canada, or which he gets from the Bank of Montreal. It will not make a particle of difference to the price of milk.

Once that is understood, we will go one step further. I have said before in this house several times until I have wearied the hon. member for York-Sunbury—bless his soul; men like him we need for ballast—I have said time and again, until many hon. members have grown weary of the thing, that money could be created. I have pointed out that in the last war Canada created $26,000,000 worth of bills. The treasury board did it; they printed the money; there was no debt attached to it at all. If the treasury board had still retained its function, its ability to print dollar bills, I would challenge the minister to show that the treasury board could not print dollar bills of the amount needed right now, turn it over to the wartime prices and trade board and let them use it as a subsidy to prevent a rise in the price of milk. I challenge him to show why he could not use such money to as good effect as the money which the wartime prices and trade board is now using.

The minute that it is discovered that he could do so, once this is granted—and it is one of the things the minister must learn—once it is realized that the value of a dollar does not depend upon the gold behind it, does not depend upon whether it comes out of the bank, or whether it is taxed from anybody or whether it is borrowed from anybody, but that the value of a dollar depends upon the amount of goods and services which are in the country behind the dollar, for which the dollar can be spent, and the skill with which the dollar is handled after it is created, we shall have taken a great step forward.

I want to lay down that principle. If one reads the press carefully and listens to men speaking in the house and outside it; if one reads the reports of speeches being made in various parts of the country, the conclusion cannot be avoided that people are seeking for a new way out of what seems to all an impossible situation. I say that the situation is utterly impossible unless we make this simple discovery, and acknowledge it, that we can keep prices of commodities in a country wherever we want to keep them, with money created by the sovereign power of the state, free of debt, without taxation and without borrowing and without gold backing, and that when we keep the price level where we want it we prevent inflation, absolutely.

I wish to ask the minister to do what he promised to do, although possibly he has forgotten it. The other night I asked him if he would give us a statement concerning the rationing system used in Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I will do that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wanted him to show why the rationing system used in Great Britain would not be just as successful in Canada. As we pointed out, rationing is extremely important because it is one of the devices for preventing inflation.

While the minister is dealing with the question of rationing, I wish he would tell us about point rationing as it is used in Great Britain, and what are the essentials of point rationing, and why it could not be used in Canada as successfully as it is used in Great Britain; also to what extent, if at all, it has been used in Canada.

If the minister forgets some of the things I am asking, I will remind him. First, I should like to have him tell us about the rationing system as it is used in Great Britain and explain why the same system would not work with equal success in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are on the wrong item for that. The hon. gentleman is quite right; he asked me for that the other night. I would ask him to let me answer his question of the other night but not ask me to go into the question of point rationing versus the type of rationing we have here, because I am not prepared to do so and it is a very difficult kind of statement to make. If the hon. gentleman had raised that the other night it would have been different, but we are on another matter—subsidies payable by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Could the minister tell us under what item he would be pleased to give the statement?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not be pleased to give it on any.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, then, on what item he would consent to give it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am meeting the hon. gentleman half-way by answering the question he asked the other night, which was under the proper item, namely, the administration of the wartime prices and trade board, which covers rationing. He asked whether there was any sufficient reason why wholesale and systematic rationing should be more difficult in Canada than it is in Great Britain.

The essential element in any rationing scheme is effective control of supplies, and in this respect the British rationing authorities, especially in the field of food rationing, are in many instances in a much more advantageous position than is the wartime prices and trade board in Canada.

As examples of some of the major differences between the two countries I would point to the following:

1. The larger number of producers of foodstuffs in Canada scattered over a much greater physical area.

2. A large proportion of the United Kingdom's food supplies are imported and the British Ministry of Food is thus enabled to obtain complete control over these supplies to the extent of owning them. In Canada, on the other hand, the board is forced to meet the situation where certain of the important foods to be rationed—for example, meat, butter—are domestically produced by a large number of small producers, with the result that control of supplies is necessarily less effective.

3. In part because of the smaller size of the country and the less diversified character of its agriculture, the British Ministry of Food has been able to exercise stringent measures of control over farmers which have not been considered practicable for introduction in Canada. This greater measure of control, supplementing the control exercised by government purchase of food imports, is carried to the extent that the Ministry of Food owns the live cattle which are slaughtered. I would point out, for example, that farmers in Britain must give twelve days' notice prior to slaughtering, and animals may be slaughtered only in government-controlled abattoirs, while the number of abattoirs allowed to be operated has been reduced by ninety-five per cent.

4. Because of the larger physical area of Canada it is impossible to have a standard price structure throughout the country for basic food commodities. The fact that the British Ministry of Food has been able to establish such a standard set of prices for meat has allowed it to ration meat on a value basis, thus freeing it from much of the complication of the points plan which has had to be adopted for Canada.

5. Consumption habits are more uniform in Britain than in Canada, and coupon rationing whereby everyone is entitled to an equal quantity of the rationed article or articles is, therefore, more suitable in Britain than in Canada. It is necessary in Canada to take account of differences in consumption due to such things as occupation or geography and this is very difficult to achieve under rationing.

That is the answer to the question the hon. gentleman asked the other night. I am not prepared to go further at the moment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I appreciate the care with which the minister has answered the question. There are devices in Canada whereby the government could gain just as effective control over commodities as obtains in Britain. It would require a departure which the government has not made, but it has taken some steps in this direction. For example, in the Department of Agriculture, as soon as beef falls to a certain point, it undertakes to buy beef. This begins to lay down the principle that the government under certain conditions will purchase all commodities. I believe the minister will find that in Great Britain, to a great extent, it is done by the government, and there are several regulations in Canada which approximate the regulations used in Great Britain. However, I do not know that it would be profitable to go further into the discussion except to point out that we can do more in the way of rationing if we need to in Canada as a means of helping to prevent inflation, and a great deal more in the matter of subsidizing than we have done. I was surprised to find that the minister had estimated only $120,000,000. I should not have been surprised if the figure had been $450,000,000 or $500,000,000, for the important purpose of keeping down the price of foodstuffs, keeping prices stable, keeping the wage rates stable and agricultural price rates stable.

We do not realize it yet—perhaps the minister does not realize it—but there is a tension developing in the minds of labour men to-day on account of the rigid control being exercised over their wages and the incessant plea that is being made not to have an increase in their wages because this would cause inflation. That tension is not building up any good for Canada. Heat is being generated, and the day may come when an explosion will take place, which everyone will regret. The farmers are being seriously injured on the plea that they must not have better prices because, if they do, it will pierce the ceiling and bring on inflation. In the light of realities, both of these contentions are utter nonsense, and the minister will know that in a year or two if he does not know it now. He did not know two years ago a good many things that he knows now. It is not necessary to keep the labouring man working under conditions which are causing stress and strain. It is not necessary to keep agricultural prices in this country at a level where farmers are unable to live happily and to produce abundantly. We think it is—at least the minister thinks it is—and therefore it is extremely important that the minister should understand the point I have been making, that we can go much further in subsidizing and bonusing without doing harm.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am sorry to bring up the matter which I am going to discuss now; but I have been trying for the last three weeks, after having a notice of motion before the committee on agriculture, which was carried unanimously, to have it brought to the attention of the house. The chairman of the committee on agriculture has refused to present it. I do not know on what authority he refuses to do so, nor does anyone else; but apparently he does, and my only recourse, if I am to obtain the information which I desire, is to ask questions on these estimates. I regret having to do so because I have been accused of holding up estimates before now.

About two years ago three of us from the province of British Columbia tried to have loggers included in the unemployment insurance scheme and we were told that we were holding things up. If the committee on agriculture, in their wisdom, under instructions apparently, are afraid to have the wartime prices and trade board answer a few questions, then I want to ask a few. I have several questions to ask. I am not particularly worried if the committee on agriculture, under instructions, are afraid to have the members of the wartime prices and trade board come before them. I have, however, no alternative but to tie up the estimates by asking certain questions and insisting upon answers to them. The first question I have to ask is with reference to berries, such as strawberries, raspberries and small fruits. I want to know what the subsidy is, how it is arrived at and on whose recommendation it is made.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is paid by the Department of Agriculture. I have no information on it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am informed by the so-called agriculture committee, who are afraid of the wartime prices and trade board, apparently under instructions—

Mr. WEIR: On a point of order, is the hon. member in order in referring to matters that have been going on in a committee? At any rate, he is not giving a proper interpretation of the business before the agriculture committee.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Pottier): As a rule an hon. member may not discuss here matters that come before a standing committee of the house.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and in doing so I leave it to my hon. friend. I am not referring to anything that has gone on before that committee, because the matter was not permitted to be brought before the committee—under whose instructions, I do not know, but certainly under somebody's instructions.

Mr. WEIR: The matters before the agriculture committee were directed to the committee by an order of reference which passed this house.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to ask the hon. member who has interrupted me if he brought before the House of Commons a resolution passed unanimously by the committee on agriculture.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WEIR: I doubt if this matter is in order, Mr. Chairman, but I can say to the hon. member that the chairman of the committee on agriculture brought before this house the order of reference with which the committee on agriculture had to deal.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am willing to bow to any ruling of the Chair, but I repeat —and I am entitled to repeat—that a resolution was adopted unanimously by the committee on agriculture, and that it was not brought before this house, in spite of what the hon. member says.

Mr. WEIR: I should like to say one further word. The hon. member has referred to a resolution which he says was passed unanimously. He does not also tell the committee that the same resolution was later rescinded, and another order of reference made. Had the officer of the wartime prices and trade board been brought before the committee on agriculture, I doubt very much if the hon. member would have had the right to continue his discussion in this committee. He has that privilege now, and I am sure he can get all the information he wants with respect to matters pertaining to the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Pottier): Order. I must ask the hon. member to put his question, and to stop referring to what happened in the committee on agriculture.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: As I understand the rules of the house, I am now entitled to speak to the point of order raised by the hon. member, the chairman of the committee on agriculture. Am I not correct in that? I am willing to bow to the decision of the Chair, but am I not correct? What the hon. member says is correct, with this exception—and I am speaking to the point of order—namely, that the resolution was passed and passed unanimously.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Pottier): Order. I have asked the hon. member to refrain from discussing what took place before the committee on agriculture, and I must ask him to follow that ruling.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Very well, Mr. Chairman. May I ask a question through you, because if I am not to be permitted as a farm representative to have before the committee on agriculture a member of the wartime prices and trade board, I shall have to ask my question in this way. What is the subsidy, if any, and what is the ceiling price paid on soft fruits? Who set it, and who recommended it?

Mr. ILSLEY: The subsidy is determined by order in council based on the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture. I have not the particulars before me with respect to the subsidies on soft fruits.

The hon. member's second question was with respect to the ceiling price on soft fruits. That comes within my jurisdiction, and I shall get the information for him.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I appreciate the minister's answer. My understanding is that whatever the subsidy is on soft fruits, it was set on the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; and there is no ceiling price.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And, as I understand it, that price will be tabled, whatever it is?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no ceiling price on soft fruits.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then, through you, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister how the wartime prices and trade board arrive at the subsidy, if any, to be paid on milk. There are many questions in this connection I should like to ask, and I shall try to keep them in order so that the minister may have a fair chance of answering them. My information is that a subsidy is paid on fluid milk in certain areas. I am further informed that a subsidy is paid on evaporated milk, or other manufactured dairy products. My first question is this: how is the subsidy arrived at? Is the cost of production taken into consideration in the production of milk? Is the quality of milk taken into consideration? I explained this to the Minister of Agriculture, but for some unknown reason I am not allowed to have a representative of the wartime prices and trade board before me in the committee on agriculture.

We will presume that a farmer has two 10-gallon cans of what is commonly known as 3·5 standard milk. One of those cans goes into fluid milk and reaches the fluid market. For the benefit of the wartime prices and trade board may I explain that that is the milk which goes for city consumption. The second 10-gallon can goes into the manufacture of evaporated milk or cheese. Is there any difference in arriving at the subsidy, in the quality of the milk or in the cost of production of the milk that goes into the cheese or other by-products?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a producer subsidy paid on fluid milk consumed on the fluid milk market. That is now administered by the Department of Agriculture, and has been so administered since May 1, 1943. The subsidy was instituted in the first instance by the wartime prices and trade board. I do not have to go back to the winter of 1941-42, but I might say that the second subsidy scheme was put into effect on September 1, 1942. On markets specified by the wartime prices and trade board the primary producers were paid twenty-five cents per hundred pounds for fluid milk, in addition to the specified minimum price. The subsidy was paid by the distributors, who in turn were reimbursed by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. The total cost at May 31, 1943, was $4,032,613.07. The food administrator at that time, at the time the subsidy was worked out, was the Hon. Mr. Taggart, and the wartime prices and trade board fixed the amount I have mentioned for subsidy.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I thank the minister. My question is this: Given two 10-gallon cans of 3·5 milk, does the wartime prices and trade board consider there is any difference in the cost of production of one 10-gallon can delivered to the fluid market and the cost of production of the second 10-gallon can delivered to the evaporated milk or by-products market?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the attitude of the wartime prices and trade board would be, but my opinion would be that if a farmer produced two cans of milk it would be pretty hard to say that it cost any more to produce the first can than it did the second. That would be my offhand opinion.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is just the point I am trying to get at. If we had not had the obstruction of the committee on agriculture in this committee, we could have finished it up some time ago. I agree with what the minister has said. That is the contention of the dairy farmers in British Columbia. They say that two cans of milk, one of which goes into evaporated milk and the other into the fluid milk market, cost exactly the same to produce. I was informed by agricultural representatives who appeared before the committee, however, in what they were allowed to say there, that the wartime prices and trade board had set this price, and that is what I am trying to arrive at. As I understand the minister, there is no difference in the cost of milk of equal grade produced for evaporated milk, cheese or butter, or for the fluid milk market.

Mr. ILSLEY: Produced by the same farmer at the same time.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Exactly.

Mr. MacNICOL: The milk might come from the same herd, I suppose?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You know, Mr. Chairman, I have had a great deal of experience travelling with the hon. member around the Athabaska district trying to get oil out of the sands there, but perhaps he will leave me alone with milk now. The question I am asking is whether, in setting the subsidies to be paid in connection with milk or dairy products, the cost of production and possibly some margin of profit are taken into consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman means, were those factors taken into consideration last September when the scheme was instituted by the wartime prices and trade board? That is what he means, is it not; was the cost of production taken into account when Mr. Taggart made his recommendation to the board and the board took action?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether it was or not, but I presume some regard was had to that among other factors. I do not think the cost of production was ever ascertained, nor do I think it would be possible to ascertain it. I do not know just where we are getting on this, but perhaps the hon. gentleman is overlooking the fact that fluid milk has always commanded and received a higher price than milk for processing. That has been true in every market for many years.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am glad the minister has given us the interpretation of the wartime prices and trade board. My argument, if I may put it in that way, is that all milk of equal quality should receive the same subsidy. As I understand the minister's statement, he admits that the cost of production has nothing to do with it; that whether the farmers have to sacrifice their herds has nothing to do with it. Under the wartime prices and trade board a certain price will be paid if the market is able to absorb all the fluid milk; if there is anything left over it can be dumped down the sewer or the cows can be slaughtered, as I understand the minister's statement. I want to point out, as I pointed out in the agriculture committee today, that I did not want to bring this matter up on the floor of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no harm done.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The minister and I understand each other. However, I was refused the right to bring up the matter in the agriculture committee, which I thought was the proper place for it. I do not know on whose instructions I was refused that right, but I am sure the farmers of Canada and even the farmers of Ontario would like to know on whose instructions I was refused the right to bring up this matter in the agriculture committee. I am satisfied with the minister's explanation in regard to milk, because I think he has been fair about it as he and the board see it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I dissent from the various interpretations the hon. gentleman has placed on my remarks.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Very well, Mr. Chairman; I dissent from many of the remarks made by the minister in his interpretation of what is due the farmer. I stand to be corrected in this statement, but apparently the wartime prices and trade board does not take into consideration the cost of producing milk in arriving at the subsidy to be paid.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I did not say that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then will the minister say whether or not that was done? This means a great deal in my district. Was the cost of production taken into consideration in arriving at the subsidy?

Mr. ILSLEY: As I said before, I presume those who went into the matter had some regard to the cost of production though I feel sure they did not ascertain it, because I do not believe it is possible of ascertainment. Certainly they must have had regard to increases in cost, because doubtless those were the basis of the subsidy.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The Minister of Agriculture gave it as his interpretation of the subsidies principle that they were an incentive to production. I submit that there is a difference between an incentive to production and the actual cost of production. The Minister of Finance is the only approach I have to the wartime prices and trade board, and he says that the cost of production has nothing at all to do with it, so that I shall pass on to another matter. I have to bring up these points here because the chairman of the agriculture committee will not permit me to bring them up there.

I come now to potatoes. Is there a subsidy paid on potatoes in British Columbia or any other province in Canada and, if so, on what basis?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a subsidy on domestically produced new potatoes. The subsidy was announced as payable to persons buying new potatoes direct from the primary producer or his agent for resale. Wholesalers and retailers will be reimbursed to the extent that laid-down costs at their distribution points exceed the lawful maximum prices on sales at wholesale and retail respectively, as set in board order No. 236. The minimum quantity of potatoes subsidizable is seventy-five pounds. No subsidy will be paid on new potatoes purchased from primary producers at prices higher than $3.75 per hundred pounds when shipped before July 31, 1943; $3.50 when shipped between August 1 and August 15, and $3 when shipped between August 16 and August 31. No subsidy will be paid on new potatoes shipped on and after September 1, 1943.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was not able to get down those dates. I was trying to take them down, but I am afraid the minister has adopted the habit of speaking a little too quickly. In the province of British Columbia we do not speak in terms of bushels or baskets; we speak in terms of hundred pounds or tons. The point I am trying to arrive at is the $3.75 per hundred pounds. In British Columbia, and

I think in most of western Canada, new potatoes cannot be produced on June 20 for $3.75 per hundred pounds. I want to know how they arrived at that. I am sorry to take the time, Mr. Chairman, but I was not allowed to do this in the agriculture committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: The subsidy to the dealer is the difference between his selling price and the cost, but a cost of greater than $3.75 will not be recognized.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Never mind this "carried" stuff. I should like to introduce something that would affect the future incomes of the lawyers of Canada and then you would see an influx of them in here in a minute. They would not be in such a hurry to carry the item. I am sorry, and I apologize again to you, Mr. Chairman. If I had not been denied the right I was entitled to—

Mr. WEIR: On a point of order. My hon. friend is imputing motives; he is saying that he was denied the right to secure certain information in a certain committee. I do not wish to refer to it any further, but he did secure information in connection with the order of reference to the committee from this house. Most of the items he has been discussing this evening were discussed in the committee and he got a great deal of information. He may not have secured all he wanted, but he got a great deal from the officials administering the different marketing organizations in the Department of Agriculture. It is true they were not officials of the wartime prices and trade board, but they were charged with the responsibility of dealing with these matters in the Department of Agriculture. I do not think the hon. gentleman is entitled to imply in any way that he was denied the right of securing information in the committee.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am entitled to speak to the point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is all very well for hon. members to say "sit down," but I was sent here by my people and I am not sitting down, with all due deference to you. I accept the explanation given by the chairman of the agriculture committee. I asked for certain information and he may think I got it, but I did not.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Pottier): I refer the hon. gentleman to citation 303, which reads:

> Until a committee reports, it is irregular to refer to its proceedings in debate in the house.

I am going to ask the hon. member to refrain from referring to what took place in the committee. I have asked him twice; this is the third time, and I hope it will be the last.

An hon. MEMBER: Not right.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have to abide by it. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I should like to ask the minister something which was not referred to in any committee. I have not asked this question in any committee because I never had an opportunity of doing so. What is the ceiling price in each district of milk, both fluid and for evaporating purposes, and who made the recommendation in each case?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am told that there would be at least one thousand places where milk prices have been set by local milk boards and concurred in by the wartime prices and trade board. I have not that information here and it would be very bulky. I do not think the hon. member should press for it. He can get it from us officially, but I do not think he should press for it in the house. It would take so long to give because it is so voluminous.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to be reasonable. Do I understand that the ceiling price on milk varies in over a thousand districts?

Mr. ILSLEY: It may not vary, but the officials tell me that there are at least a thousand districts. There is a price for each city, town and so forth all across the country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I assume the minister is referring to the retail price of a quart bottle? What is the price according to provinces for manufactured dairy products, fluid milk and so on? There can only be so many provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no ceiling on the price of milk sold by farmers. If a farmer takes milk and sells it for cheese, for butter, for condensed milk or as fluid milk, there is no ceiling on it. There is a ceiling on what can be charged the consumer by the distributor of milk, and there is a ceiling on what the creamery can charge for butter, or what can be charged for cheese. There must also be a ceiling on condensed milk, but there is no ceiling on what the farmer can get. Of course, that would be regulated by the other ceilings.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is there any ceiling on the price at which a wholesaler sells milk to a retailer?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What is that ceiling in British Columbia, and why?

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is a fair question. It concerns seventy-five to eighty per cent of the dairy farmers in British Columbia.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are there any wholesalers in British Columbia? The officials do not appear to know that offhand.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The officials should know. In the lower mainland of British Columbia, which as the minister knows is the principal milkshed, at least 75 to 80 per cent of the dairy producers belong to one association. We sell to our own wholesalers and in turn retail what we can on the fluid market. That is the point. We retail a certain percentage of our milk, but the remainder we wholesale to various retailers, and the rest we put in evaporated or cheese or butter or by-products. What I want to know is, are we compelled under an order of the board regarding the price at which we as wholesalers, or cooperatives can sell our surplus to these independent distributors?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I shall have to give that information a little later.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I appreciate the fact that the minister cannot answer that offhand, but it is of vital importance, and I am not allowed to ask it in a certain other committee which I am not permitted to mention. Therefore, will I have the privilege, before this item is closed, of speaking to that again?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I shall have that information in a very few minutes, and I will give it before the item closes.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, Mr. Chairman, just a minute. I have asked a reasonable question and also asked whether I would be allowed to speak to this again, and the minister said that he would bring me what information he could. I do not think the item should carry until such time as I have the privilege of speaking on it again after his answer is recorded.

Mr. ILSLEY: We will wait, then, and try to get it.

Mr. ESLING: At a convenient moment before the final disposal of these war appropriation estimates will the minister clarify the condition under which the importation of oranges is eligible for subsidy? If he has an application form he will know, first of all, they must be brought in in carload lots; second, that the importer must hold title at the point of production. Manifestly this is unjust to the small importer. A man may have been a responsible business man and may have carried on an importing business for ten years, but he may not be financially in a position to purchase in carload lots, which means that there is discrimination which puts him out of business, because those who deal with such an importer will naturally go to his competitor and will finish their purchases of products there. If he must purchase in carload lots; if these conditions must be followed, could it not be arranged to modify that so that the wholesale importer could secure a certificate from the jobber across the line to the effect that the oranges which he purchases were brought in from the point of production by the jobber? That seems to me the only way out of it. Manifestly it is unfair to the small man and simply turns the business into these channels of the larger and more influential and substantial importers.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman brought that up the other night. He is asking me to clarify the matter now, is he?

Mr. ESLING: To modify it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, to modify the matter? I will take that up. We have not had much time to do anything since the hon. gentleman brought it up the other night, but I have looked into it. I have before me the name of the firm which apparently imported these oranges by truck. I will go into the matter as soon as we get through these estimates. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could communicate with me or with the board about it.

Mr. REID: May I ask whether the regulations with regard to the conversion of dwellings for homes come under the wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. REID: There are some regulations to that effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. REID: What I have in mind is that complaints have been made that the regulation was set for homes of $7,000 and upwards, and when I was back at Easter serious complaints were made that in Vancouver and Westminster it is only the exceptional homes which come in that class; there are few of that kind. The majority of homes in the province have an average value of from three to four thousand dollars. If the regulation had been changed to permit the conversion of homes of that class or value, more might have been done to provide accommodation. The suggestion was made that perhaps the $7,000 valuation was adopted by taking into account homes in the east which are built of stone or brick, and are probably more substantial and cost more. I wonder if the minister would look into it, because it has been contended that the housing situation in both Vancouver and New Westminster would be helped if the conversion value were reduced to, say $3,500 or $4,000, which would take in about eighty per cent of the homes in both cities.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman is thinking about the same thing I am thinking about, he is thinking about big buildings. I am thinking about the housing conversion plan, which is a new plan for converting large houses into apartments. The object is to get as many family units as possible out of one building. It is expected that family units can be obtained at the cost of $1,000 to $1,500, provided enough apartments can be made out of one house. My impression would be that if a house were only worth, to start with $3,000 or $4,000, it would not be an appropriate building to come under the housing conversion plan.

Mr. REID: It will take only a moment to read the brief which was presented in the matter. It is very short:

Recently the government appointed a real property administrator, and under the order in council, he was empowered to take over any premises of any nature that might be utilized for war purposes, or for use of those employed in any war enterprise. A short while after this appointment a new regulation was passed which nullified for the duration of the war any local municipality or province acts of regulations, restricting housing occupancy. In so far as Vancouver was concerned this could possibly be implied to nullify the Shaughnessy restriction act, which provides that this area could only be used as a one-family dwelling district. Under this amendment it is now possible for all houses in this district to be used for rooming or boarding houses, or made into multiple dwellings, or made into two or more apartments. The effect of this regulation in regard to the Shaughnessy area, along with the proposal to limit the expense of conversion to $1,500, would virtually change that area into a somewhat slum condition, as the houses are so laid out, and of such a character, that with an expenditure of only $1,500 there would be such a contrast to the original structure and finish that they would become a second or third class accommodation. The intention of the government in restricting the housing conversion to dwellings of a market value of $7,000 or over, is utterly impractical as far as Vancouver is concerned, as the vast majority of these houses are either in Shaughnessy, South West Marine, or British Properties on the north shore. The houses most suitable for conversion are in the $3,000 to $6,000 class.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. ILSLEY: That may be so, but the brief my hon. friend has just read is a pretty good argument for not going into the small house. The writer says that it will cost more than $1,500 to get your units, and the government is interested in getting a cheap unit. We can get them for $1,000 under proper conditions. If you get the right kind of big old house, you can convert it into ten or a dozen apartments. That is a cheap way to get family units. You have to get the right type of house, of course, and make the right kind of bargain with the owner. An order in council was passed authorizing the conversion of, I think, fifty buildings in Vancouver. Mr. Nichols, the director of housing, who is doing the administrative part of the work, went to British Columbia and I thought he was making pretty satisfactory progress but on a limited scale. We cannot go in for it in a wholesale way. It would be expensive, and as the writer says, it might make slums out of good houses if you started in on cheap houses.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understood the minister to offer to give me an answer, and I claim the right, Mr. Chairman, to have the answer before the item is carried.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a special order about the Vancouver area. It is order 238 of the wartime prices and trade board. Section 4 reads:

4. The price to be paid to primary producers for milk delivered to a milk dealer's or producer-distributor's plant for sale by the dealer or producer-distributor in the Vancouver area in the form of milk, cream or ice cream shall be as follows, according to quantity and butter fat content:

(a) for each 100 pounds of milk of 3·5 per cent butter fat content, $2.45;

(b) for each 100 pounds of milk, the butter fat content of which is greater or less than 3·5 per cent, $2.45 plus or minus 5 cents for each one-tenth of one per cent of butter fat content greater or less, as the case may be, than 3·5 per cent;

(c) for milk in quantities of less than 100 pounds, a price proportionate according to quantity to the prices stated in clauses (a) and (b) above for the quantity of 100 pounds.

I said a while ago that there was no ceiling on the sale, but there seems to be a special order applicable to the Vancouver area, to ensure a price to producers comparable to that prevailing in similar markets elsewhere in Canada.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I appreciate the answer which the minister has given, and I think Hansard will bear me out in the argument I advanced. This is once, Mr. Chairman, that I wish I followed the practice of some of my friends from Ontario of reading a speech, but I never have and I never will read what I have to say so long as I am in the House of Commons. I will say my speech as I think it.

Approximately seventy-five per cent of the producers of milk in the province of British Columbia are in the Fraser valley. They sell twenty-five per cent of their milk on the fluid market, and anybody who knows the dairy industry knows that that is where the money is. They sell the rest, seventy-five per cent, in manufactured products.

My information is, and I think this is borne out by the minister's statement to-night, representing the wartime prices and trade board which comes under his department, that the price is set to the wholesalers on what we can sell the distributors. As I said, we produce seventy-five per cent of the milk and we sell, in round figures, twenty-five per cent of our milk on the fluid market and the other seventy-five per cent on what is known as the open market, which means the world market, in the form of cheese, butter and by-products. The other twenty-five per cent of the producers sell 100 per cent of their milk on the fluid market, where the money is, and yet as I understand the minister and the regulations, the wartime prices and trade board say to us who are the wholesalers that we must sell to the distributors at a certain price. For the sake of argument we will say that it is $2.50 per 100 pounds of 3·5 per cent milk. We are not allowed to charge more than that. We are not allowed to pay our own retail outlets more. We who represent seventy-five per cent of the dairy producers in British Columbia are not allowed to pay our producers more than that set price, and we as wholesalers pay that as distributors.

In our own particular case we own both companies. But the price is set by the wartime prices and trade board. We cannot pay our own distributors any more than that. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the reason why the price is fixed in that way is that there is a small minority of independent distributors who must depend upon us as wholesole distributors for the volume of fluid milk for sale, and for that reason and that reason only the price is kept at this minimum. I am using the figure of $2.50 per 100 pounds for the sake of argument. In our particular case we represent seventy-five per cent of the dairy producers. We own our own wholesale and our own retail outlets. I do not know whether I am making myself clear to the minister, but those are the regulations as I understand them, and as I understood the minister to confirm them to-night. The minister has all the details. My interpretation of the act is that we as wholesalers sell to the independent distributors at a given price and must sell at that price.

Mr. ILSLEY: The price to the primary producer, if he delivers the milk to a milk dealer's plant or a producer-distributor's plant, for sale by the dealer or the producer-distributor, in the Vancouver area, in the form of milk, cream or ice cream is set at the figures I have mentioned. That is all I can tell my hon. friend. I put the section on Hansard and I think it is clear enough.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I appreciate what the minister said in reference to the section, and all that, but I have no recourse but to do what I am now doing, because I am deprived of the right to do it in the committee on agriculture. I want to know who advised that this price was to be set as it is—that we as wholesalers, representing the producers, must sell to the independent distributors at a given price.

Mr. ILSLEY: The date of this order is February 16, 1943. It is dated just after Mr. Taggart left the office of foods administrator, and I am informed that he worked out the order. He was very familiar with conditions in British Columbia, I know, because he used to talk about conditions in the Fraser valley, and I believe he sent a man out there to work out this order. I do not know whom he consulted out there. Perhaps he consulted my hon. friend. Did he?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I wish he had. I think the minister knows that I do not want to delay matters. If I were one of those who want to do that, I could rise in my place and spend time as a farm representative telling the Minister of Finance many things. He is the greatest Minister of Finance we have ever had, a man we all look up to and admire. He knows I am not making a personal issue of this. I am speaking as the representative of a section of the people—and do not forget this, that I have never read a speech in this house. I speak without reading, and what I say goes back to the people of my district from myself and not from the maritimes. I think I am entitled to the information I am seeking. In our district we own our own wholesale outfit, which is the largest cooperative dairy organization in Canada and the second largest on the north American continent. That is something that can be verified. We also control our own retail outlet. Now I want to be corrected if I am wrong, and that is the minister's job, because I am not allowed to find it out in the committee on agriculture. My information is that our own wholesale outfit, which we own, is not allowed to sell to our own retail outlet except at a certain figure set by the wartime prices and trade board. Is that right?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I cannot tell my hon. friend that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the minister produce some member of the wartime prices and trade board before me who can answer that question? I want to repeat it. My information is that the price which the associated dairies association can pay to the Fraser valley milk producers' association is set by the wartime prices and trade board. That is my information. Before the item is carried I am entitled to the information in that regard, and so far as I am concerned, before this item is carried I shall know whether the wartime prices and trade board sets the price to the farmer organization owned by the farmers, the price at which they can sell to their own retail organization, about fifty-three per cent of which is owned by the farmers. Is that correct, or is that price which is to be paid by the distributors set by certain independent companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: How would it do for the hon. gentleman to get in touch with the foods administrator, to-morrow say, and get this information then?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, I have been trying for three weeks to do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no difficulty about it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I know there is no difficulty in getting in touch with them—and very fine gentlemen they are, too. I have met them. But the minister knows as well as I do that the only place where anything effective can be done for the farmers is in this chamber. I cannot get my point before the committee on agriculture. I have tried for three weeks, and they refuse to hear me. I ask the minister this straight question: Has a wholesale company or cooperative to conform, on their sale to their own distributors to a price set by the wartime prices and trade board? If so, why?

Mr. LECLERC: Mr. Chairman, I know something about the milk business, and I think I can answer the hon. member from British Columbia. There are regulations in his province, the same as in all provinces of Canada. I am not sure whether they have a milk commission in British Columbia, but I know we have in Quebec. These commissions were formed to protect the farmers against themselves. Formerly, when farmers retailed their milk they tried to cut each other's throats. Finally the provincial government appointed a commission to set the price. That price was set after interviewing the different farmer organizations in my province. They are not allowed to pay less than the commission price, and they are obliged to sell at the price stipulated.

I believe the farmers are fairly well satisfied at the present time. I am in direct touch with them every day when I am at home, and I know conditions are far better than they were before the war. Unfortunately for the farmers, prices of butter and cheese are not set according to the cost of production. That is too bad for the farmers, but it has always been that way—and especially so before the war. Now the government is giving a bonus of 8 cents on butter, and about the same thing in proportion for cheese. Only the other day a farmer came to me and said that while he had only a small herd he had received $75 from his creamery, that he had never got that much before and that he was well satisfied. Before the war farmers were obliged to take 18 to 20 cents a pound for butterfat. Now we are paying them 46 or 47 cents, and they are fairly happy about it. Perhaps that is not very high, but certainly it is much better than they got before. There was some difficulty last winter in connection with securing grain, and now they are having some trouble in getting hired help. But had it not been for those two things I think everything would be very satisfactory for the farmers. If my hon. friend wishes to have some other information, I should be glad to give it to him.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the lecture by the hon. member from Quebec, and I am very glad to know the Quebec farmers are satisfied. But I am perfectly entitled to say that the British Columbia farmers are not satisfied. If my hon. friend is satisfied with the treatment given the dairy farmers of Quebec, then it is all right for him to say so, and I have no quarrel with his opinion. But we in British Columbia are not satisfied. I should not have to tell why we are not. We never will pay the wages, or have the social security enjoyed by the province of Quebec.

I have asked a question. Might I point out in passing that the Minister of Agriculture himself—and there is no better authority on agriculture on the north American continent —has admitted that it costs us more in British Columbia to produce than it does in the hon. member's native province of Quebec. Incidentally I might point out, for the benefit of a few, that so far we have done very well for the legal profession, and for the privy council, a few times. But let me ask this: Are we to be allowed to sell our own wholesale milk to our own distributing agency? The hon. member from the Okanagan valley knows about this condition, and other hon. members from British Columbia know the circumstances. Are we to be allowed to sell our own milk from our own wholesale agencies, owned and controlled 100 per cent by the farmers, to our own retail agencies, at a price which we set? Now, mark you, I am not asking to upset the ceiling price of 11 cents a quart or whatever it is. I am talking about our own distributing agencies—and there is a big difference in that. We are not upsetting the retail price to the consumer in Vancouver, Victoria, or wherever it may be, even by one cent. All we are asking in this instance is for the privilege of selling to our own distributing agency or any other distributor at the price we see fit to set. I am asking the minister if we are to be permitted to do that, and I repeat that we are not upsetting the retail price to the consumer one iota. Are we to have the privilege of selling our surplus milk either to our own distributor, which in this instance is known as the Associated Dairies, or to whoever wishes to buy our milk, at our price?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, no; I object to this carrying stuff. I have asked the minister a question, and I speak for the 4,300 farmers I represent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have before me an order. I do not know the names or the set-up of the organization in the Fraser valley. As I read this order, it would seem to me that the wholesale organization comes within the definition of a primary producer, and the price which that wholesale organization can charge for milk is fixed by this order. I should say, after reading this order, that if it is a sale to a dealer or a producer-distributor, it is governed by the provisions of the order. That is, if it is a sale. The hon. member is talking as if it is merely a family arrangement of some kind, and not a sale at all. He may be raising some fine legal point. He is asking me to say what this order does, or what it can do. He is asking what can be done legally. There is no doubt under this order that if it is a sale by a wholesale organization such as he has named—and I do not know whether the one he has named is an incorporated body or not—but if it is a sale from that wholesaler to a milk dealer or producer-distributor, it is governed by the provisions of this order.

He can find out in ten minutes by asking an official of the wartime prices and trade board. I am informed there are several officials who have been out there and who understand this situation thoroughly. He can find that out by calling them by telephone to-morrow morning. All I can do is cite the order to him. Does he not know about this himself? Has this matter not been discussed since last February? Are the facts not well known? Does he not know that the price that the wholesale organization can charge is fixed? What is the object of this? Is the hon. gentleman asking me for a legal interpretation of the order, or is he asking me to tell him something he already knows, for the purpose of the record?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not have to worry about the record at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then why does the hon. gentleman not go to the board to-morrow morning and get his information, instead of taking up all this time?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not going to be lectured by the minister or anybody else; I came here to represent the farmers of my riding. I first asked for this information in the agriculture committee. I know exactly what the minister has told me, but there is something else I am trying to bring home to him. I will tell him why I am asking these questions. The representatives of the wartime prices and trade board went out to British Columbia. Did they get in touch with the organization that represents at least seventy-five per cent of the dairy farmers of that province? No; they went to the other twenty-five per cent. I am here to do my duty as I see it, and if I do not do it I am quite prepared, if and when the time comes, to resign or to accept the decision of the voters of the constituency of Fraser Valley.

The minister has not yet answered my question. He has admitted that his department is afraid of the majority and is ko-towing to the minority in British Columbia. That was exactly what I said. Our own farmers sell to a wholesale organization known as the Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association, who in turn sell to an organization known as Associated Dairies. I will admit that the minister has no reason to know all these details, but I want to tell the minister that the officials of the board are afraid to appear before any committee, because as soon as they arrive in British Columbia they go to the minority group, get their instructions and report back to the wartime prices and trade board. His officials are afraid to appear before the committee and answer questions in that regard.

As the regulation stands to-day we have to pay a certain price; that has been admitted by the minister. It does not make a particle of difference to me if the minister shrugs his shoulders; I can shrug mine, too. I represent 4,300 dairymen. Our organization has to sell milk through a wholesale outfit to our own distributors at a given price. Why? To protect this little minority of distributors who have been the godsend of the legal profession of British Columbia for the last fifteen years.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Never mind the "carried" stuff. I should like to know if some of those hon. members who call "carried" are satisfied with prices of dairy products in Ontario. Certainly we in British Columbia are not satisfied, and we are not afraid to say so. Will the minister tell me why we cannot set our own price to our own distributors, provided—and I want this to be quite clear—that we keep within the ceiling price to the consumer? I understand the purpose of these regulations is to protect the consumer, and I admire the excellent work the minister has done in that regard. All we are asking is that we be allowed to set our own price to the distributors, always keeping within the retail price ceiling to the consumer. Are we or are we not to be allowed that privilege?

Mr. ILSLEY: Did the hon. member ask why they should not be allowed to do something? What was his question?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: My question is: will we be permitted, as wholesalers, to sell to our own distributors at any price we see fit, or to any other distributors, provided the ceiling price to the consumer is not disrupted?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think you can, under this order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, Mr. Chairman, I imagine I am not making myself very clear. I know we cannot do it under the present order. I am not afraid of being quoted as saying that in this instance I represent seventy-five per cent of the dairymen of Fraser valley.

Mr. ABBOTT: Who represents the other twenty-five per cent?

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I see I shall have to talk until eleven o'clock to get this across, but I am asked who represents the other twenty-five per cent.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Nobody questions that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No? A few years ago we were told that we could not produce enough fish. We put away 1,800 Japanese fishermen and to-day we are producing more fish in British Columbia than we ever produced.

An hon. MEMBER: Milk is the item.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The Minister of Fisheries asked for that. I am pointing out that I represent seventy-five per cent of the dairymen of the Fraser valley, and I think I am putting up a reasonable argument; I believe the hon. member for New Westminster will bear me out. I have not been able to get an answer as yet. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I want to repeat that I was not allowed to bring up this matter in the agriculture committee, where it should be brought up, because they were afraid to face it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Never mind the order; you cannot take it. Representing this percentage of the dairymen, all I am asking is that as wholesalers of milk we be given the right to state to the distributors what the price shall be, as long as it does not disrupt the price ceiling. A moment ago the minister said he could not answer that suggestion. Well, Mr. Chairman, if I cannot approach the matter through the Minister of Finance, who is head of the wartime prices and trade board, through whom in the name of time can I approach it? I cannot approach it through the Minister of Agriculture; he says he has nothing to do with the setting of that price, which I admit. Let me repeat that we do not want to disrupt the ceiling price to the consumer by one iota. We want the privilege of saying what the price from the producer to the distributor shall be. I say to the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman—the hon. member for New Westminster was called to order for not addressing the Chair—that approximately seventy-five per cent of the dairymen of the province cannot produce milk at the present price to the consumer. They want to increase the price to the distributor by five or seven cents per pound butterfat, but by order of the board they are refused that right. I want to repeat under the ruling of the board we are refused the right as wholesalers to increase our price to the distributors and keep within the ceiling price to the consumer. Are the rights of democracy, are the rights of the majority to be considered, or are the rights of the minority to be considered? As soon as the board's dairy representative arrived in British Columbia he approached the twenty-five per cent, not the seventy-five per cent. He is afraid to appear before the agriculture committee. I ask the minister again, and I want an answer; if I have to talk for four days I can do so. Can the wholesaler of milk set the price to his own distributor or any distributor, provided the retail price does not exceed the price as set by the wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. ILSLEY: Why do they wish to lower the price to the distributors?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Lower it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: I know the hon. member for Fraser Valley does not want to prolong the debate unduly. He has always been most fair. I think he realizes that the Minister of Finance and his officials are not backward in answering any questions. I think he realizes that the minister has tried to answer in the best way possible, and I ask the hon. member to take that answer.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I appreciate your generous decision, Mr. Chairman, but the minister has asked me a direct question. I am flattered, because this is the first time I have been asked a question by so eminent a person.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman wish to lower or raise it?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Now who is prolonging the debate? The minister has asked me a direct question. With all due deference to you, Mr. Chairman, I think the next time I shall write out my speech because I am about the only member who does not read what he has to say. We do not want to lower the price; we most decidedly want to raise it. I am asking why we as producers as represented by our own association—I mentioned the approximate figure of seventy-five per cent—and the present attorney general of British Columbia and the former attorney general of British Columbia, who now has the distinguished honour of having a seat in the place known as the other place—

An hon. MEMBER: Out of order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is not out of order. They have taken it to the privy council. We are saying that as the Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association we have the right to set the price at which milk is sold to the distributors, provided the cost to the ultimate consumer does not exceed the ceiling price. I am asking the minister if that is possible. I appreciate the fact that he cannot answer offhand.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why does the hon. gentleman want to raise the price even to his own organization? That is what he has been talking about all evening.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The reason why I want to raise the price is that we sell seventy-five per cent of our milk to distributors.

Mr. ILSLEY: To your own distributors.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: To our own distributors and others.

Mr. ILSLEY: To your own people. Why do you wish to raise it?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The remainder of our milk, the seventy-five per cent, goes into canned milk or manufactured milk—I am speaking in round figures—and twenty-five per cent goes into fluid milk. But 100 per cent of the milk produced by the other twenty-five per cent, the independent producers, goes into the fluid market. They cannot handle their consumers, so that they have to buy from our wholesalers, and we cannot charge them the price which our own distributing agents are prepared to pay. This official of the wartime prices and trade board arrived in Vancouver, and he went down to this agency and asked what they could afford to pay.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is not interested in the price he is charging his own organization; all he is interested in is the price to be charged the independents. He wants to raise the price to the independents. Is that the idea?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, I do not.

An hon. MEMBER: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I happen to have the floor. Since I have not been able to make my point clear, I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to call it eleven o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is the item carried? I did not agree with that at all.

An hon. MEMBER: No; it was not carried.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, July 9, 1943

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 128, for the relief of Theodore Panos. —Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

Bill No. 130, for the relief of Pierre Henri Honoré Paré.—Mr. Casselman (Grenville-Dundas).

FLOOD CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN EASTERN TOWNSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government what, if anything, has been done for the relief of all the good Canadians who have suffered so heavily from the recent flood in the eastern townships, particularly in Coaticook?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question that must be placed on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SITUATION AT MARCONI PLANT, MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question. I think he is aware of the fact that the employees of the Marconi company in the city of Montreal are taking a vote on July 14, 15 and 16 to choose between a union of their own choice and a company union. Since the company is not allowing the vote to be taken on the premises and is refusing to cooperate with the government in this matter, and since the Minister of Munitions and Supply said a while ago that every contract awarded by his department contained a clause requiring the labour regulations to be complied with, will the government insist on the regulations being complied with and take over the plant if they are not?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question as to policy which I think should be placed on the order paper.

[Later:]

Mrs. NIELSEN: May I ask another question of the Minister of Labour? Since he was not allowed to answer my first question, will he at the earliest opportunity make a statement regarding the situation existing at the Marconi plant?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not like the reference of my hon. friend, "since he is not allowed to make a statement." I should like to say to my hon. friend, having had some experience in industrial disputes, that I think this is not the place to settle them. Yesterday I received a telegram of commendation from a representative of the employees for the action I was taking. This information which my hon. friend has is all new to me. In the settlement of these disputes I have always been ready to cooperate with any hon. member; all she had to do was to call at my office with this information and I would see that the necessary steps were taken to correct it, if it is as stated by my hon. friend.

VACATION RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES IN CERTAIN GOVERNMENT PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. I did not send notice of the question, but I think it is one which he can answer without notice. Are employees in government-owned plants which are being operated by outside management entitled to holidays with pay on the same basis as government-owned plants operated by the government?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The minister has replied to a question which was asked him and which I thought should be placed on the order paper. The question which is being asked cannot be answered to-day, and it should be placed on the order paper.

SERGEANT GEORGE HICKSON

AWARDS FOR GALLANTRY AT DIEPPE AND IN NORTH AFRICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. O. BREITHAUPT (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called there is a matter which I would like to draw to the attention of the house, and that is that a citizen of Canada, born in Kitchener, Ontario, Sergeant George Hickson, is the first Canadian who has won two military medals in this war. He won the Distinguished Conduct Medal at Dieppe, and Colonel Ralston has just announced that the Military Medal has been won by the same brave soldier in North Africa.

COAL

PROPOSALS WITH RESPECT TO DELIVERIES FROM DEALERS TO CONSUMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply): Yesterday on the orders of the day the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) inquired about deliveries of coal from dealers to consumers in Toronto. The matter of deliveries of coal from dealers to consumers in Toronto and elsewhere in Canada falls within the jurisdiction of the wartime prices and trade board, through the services administrator and the coal administrator. The recommendations of the Canadian Retail Coal Dealers' Association, recently convened in Toronto, have been submitted to the coal controller of the Department of Munitions and Supply. These proposals have received serious consideration, and a course of action is being planned. The plans have been further reviewed in conjunction with the wartime prices and trade board and a representative group of Ontario and Quebec dealers, and are now receiving final consideration. Action wil be taken on these proposals in the near future.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

36. Departmental administration, $252,525.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and other members of the house have asked me if I would make, when it came to a discussion of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, a somewhat fuller statement on the war situation than it was possible to make earlier in the session. Hon. members also at different times have requested that in dealing with the estimates of external affairs I should take up particular subjects which they have specified. I have thought that it would facilitate the discussions in committee were I to anticipate as far as possible the information with which hon. members would wish to be supplied. I shall therefore first of all very briefly review significant and recent developments in the war situation, and follow that by statements with reference to the united nations organization and planning, the agencies for the direction of the war effort, the planning of the settlement which may follow the ending of hostilities, the refugee situation, and Canada's diplomatic representation; I shall also later in the discussions give to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) the information which he asked I should let him have with respect to the Alaska highway and the pipeline from the Fort William oil fields to the refinery at White Horse.

In the earlier part of the session, and especially in the statement which I made on February 1, I reviewed in some detail the known proceedings of the Casablanca conference between Mr. Churchill, President Roosevelt, and various officers of the armed forces of both nations. I called attention also to various developments in the means and usages of consultation and conference among the governments of the united nations. I suggested that some of the gaps, in these means of consultation, would have to be filled in as the further planning of offensive warfare progressed. What I am about to say relates to developments of the last few months and especially to the mounting successes in the offensive warfare of the united nations.

During most of the months between May of 1940 and August of 1942, the story of the war was mainly one of aggression succeeding aggression in many parts of the world. In no aspect of the general picture of the war in 1942 was there any more significant departure than the extent to which the united nations were able to take the offensive on a large and sustained scale against the axis.

In many areas throughout the summer of 1942, battle forces were so evenly matched that in any particular theatre, even a slight alteration of forces, even a slight accession of concentrated strength, might have tilted the balance towards victory or defeat. As late as mid-October, I felt it was necessary to say that there was no sign that the tide of war had definitely turned. We know now to what extent good use was made of those months from June to October in supplying reinforcements and equipment to a few areas in which a later offensive against the axis might be launched. We know now how careful and precise was the planning which, once the initiative had been taken, made it possible for the offensive to be sustained.

That offensive marked the first turning of the tide in the great battle around the world. The main offensive phase began in the southwest Pacific with the American landings in the Solomons in August, 1942. It was continued, nearer the European fortress, in the offensive launched by the British Eighth Army, westward from El Alamein, late in October. It received its greatest impetus from the allied landings, in Morocco and Algeria, early in November.

On May 10, in introducing a resolution of congratulation on the victory of the allied forces, I reviewed the campaign in North Africa in some detail. I shall not say more of it to-day. The results are well known. They mark the triumphal close of an all-important chapter in the war.

Elsewhere, campaigns which were holding actions on a vast scale have been turned against the original aggressors with increasing force. In Russia, what looked for a long time like a last-ditch defensive stand was turned into an offensive of such proportions that the entire German Sixth Army was annihilated at Stalingrad. Losses of men and materials on this front have been heavier than in any other theatre of operations. Before the end of 1942, at various points: at the eastern edge of the Black Sea, in the Don valley, on the central front, and in the northwest region fronting on the Baltic, steady gains had been made by Russian forces.

On January 18 of this year, while talks between Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt were continuing at Casablanca, the siege of Leningrad was lifted. Until the present week, for many weeks past, the front in Russia has been relatively quiet. During the present week, a new German offensive has been launched along nearly 200 miles of the central front. It, along with the recent intensified bombings of strategic areas over Europe, marks a place of new beginning in the war in Europe.

In the Pacific area, Japan's hold remains widespread. There have been some local gains by China in freeing her soil, though the Chinese effort is sharply limited by supplies available, and even more by the length and the difficulties of the supply routes into China. The organization of free China, and the maintenance of industries, education, social services—many of which migrated for hundreds of miles—has been one of the most resourceful answers to aggression in the history of the world.

In the great area of sea and islands in the south west Pacific, the power of Japan has been held at bay, and losses have been inflicted upon her shipping greater than her present capacity to replace it. United States forces have recently driven the Japanese out of some of their strongholds in the Solomon islands. By a determined initiative, they have denied to Japan other bases and harbours which might be used to attack Australia or to prey upon the sea routes from the United States to Australia and the Indian ocean. Forces of Australia and New Zealand have joined in fighting the Japanese in New Guinea and other islands to the north of Australia.

One other area, much closer to our own shores, deserves more than passing mention. As a part of Japan's attempt to control the Pacific, her naval and air forces reached out, during 1942, into the Aleutian islands. The Japanese made determined efforts to build and fortify bases for submarines, seaplanes, and other aircraft at Attu and Kiska. During the latter part of May, following initial landings on May 11, Japanese forces were driven out of Attu island, which is now under American control. Kiska remains a potential centre of attack upon our shores, and upon other parts of this continent. To combat this menace, squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force, based in Alaska, have been operating continuously in conjunction with United States forces.

From all of the developments of the past eight months, from what is known of decisions taken at Casablanca and during Mr. Churchill's visit to Washington in May, and from the combined planning which continues from day to day, the picture of the war in 1943 emerges more clearly. Germany and Italy have been driven out of Africa. In addition to the loss of all her African territories, Italy has had to relinquish Pantelleria, and other islands in the central Mediterranean. The aerial and commando assaults against Italy and Sicily, against Sardinia and Crete, are parts of a single strategy which the immediate future may be expected rapidly to unfold.

The war in 1943 must be thought of as a vital part of the war of liberation of the oppressed countries of Europe, of which the liberation of the French empire in Africa was both an essential and a memorable prelude.

I shall now come to speak of the united nations organization and planning.

The supreme direction of the war, the co-ordination of the war effort of the united nations, and the planning of certain aspects of the post-war period and the peace, are all matters which are engaging the attention of appropriate boards or committees representing the united nations.

The united nations have no formal organization. In the prosecution of the war they act together by constant consultation through the usual channels between governments. These channels are supplemented by a series of international advisory bodies which have been set up to facilitate rapid agreement and speedy execution of joint plans. Canada now has very extensive machinery for consultation with the other united nations. Through the Canadian high commissioners in all the countries of the British commonwealth, through the Canadian ministers in the United States, the Soviet Union, China, and diplomatic relations with other allied governments, and through the high commissioners and ministers of the united nations represented in Ottawa, we have the equipment for constant day to day consultation regarding the conduct of the war and the framing of the peace. In addition we have the continually improving methods of consultation and cooperation by direct exchange of cables between governments.

These channels of communication have been supplemented, especially in London and in Washington, by enlarging staffs and by establishing missions representing particular Canadian departments and services, such as the joint staff mission in Washington, the representation of the Department of Munitions and Supply in both capitals, and the offices abroad of the wartime information board. There has been a similar growth of specialized representation in Ottawa, particularly in the case of the United Kingdom and the United States. On the military side, I need scarcely refer to the work performed in England by General McNaughton and by the overesas headquarters of the three armed services.

Before the United States entered the war we had supplemented our methods for considering problems of common interest by the creation of a series of joint advisory bodies dealing with the defence of North America, with raw materials, with economic coordination, and with war production. To these a joint committee on agriculture has recently been added. These committees and bodies supplement but do not replace the normal methods of consultation.

Shortly after Pearl Harbor, in order to secure more rapid cooperation between the war efforts of the United States and the United Kingdom, a group of combined agencies was established. These agencies are:

1. The combined chiefs of staff, meeting continuously in Washington, composed of the United States chiefs of staff and representatives of the British chiefs of staff;

2. The munitions assignments boards, meeting in Washington and in London, to allocate finished war materials on strategic grounds as they become ready for delivery;

3. The shipping adjustment boards, also meeting in Washington and in London, to regulate the pools of shipping controlled by the United States and the United Kingdom; and

4. The combined raw materials board, meeting in Washington, charged with the duty of planning the most effective use of raw materials. There were later added two further boards, both meeting in Washington;

5. The combined food board, and

6. The combined production resources board.

With one exception these bodies are composed of representatives only of the United States and the United Kingdom and their chief duty is to make recommendations to these two governments in the light of the joint study of the problems before them. They are war bodies formed for special purposes to facilitate the rapid taking of decisions on matters vital to the conduct of the war.

It is essential that the high strategy of the war should be discussed by a small group in conditions of the most absolute secrecy. To avoid giving aid to our enemies, a degree of secrecy, which would be intolerable in times of peace, must surround the taking of decisions, not only on strategy but on almost every aspect of war direction. The recommendations of the combined boards frequently concern governments other than the United States and the United Kingdom. When Canadian action is required to give effect to their recommendations, these recommendations are referred to Canada for approval. The government has sought, with a considerable measure of success, to ensure that in framing their recommendations the combined boards should give the fullest consideration to the position and resources of Canada.

A Canadian joint staff mission has offices in the building which houses the combined chiefs of staff, and it is represented at discussions of direct concern to Canada. We have developed special methods of liaison with each of the combined boards. In the case of the combined food board, for example, a representative of the Canadian government participates as a full member on all the commodity subcommittees.

On one board, the combined production and resources board, Canada is represented by a full member. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is a member of this board. The board, by the way, as hon. members are aware, is meeting in Ottawa this morning.

I have outlined the chief agencies that have been established for the direction of the war effort. The government hopes that it will be found possible to have a broader basis given to some of these bodies.

Turning now to the planning of the settlement, I have said on previous occasions in this house that informal and exploratory discussions about international aspects of the settlement were constantly taking place, and that Canadian experts and officials were participating in these discussions. On matters as complex as methods for stabilizing currencies, it is obvious that there must be many preliminary talks between experts from many countries before plans can be framed for the consideration of governments. Canadian officials have participated in such talks in London and in Washington. These meetings are supplemented by the constant exchange of information through the usual inter-governmental channels. As the end of the war comes closer, such meetings will grow in number. As plans are framed, they are likely to become the subject of more formal conferences at which most, if not all, of the united nations will be represented.

The first of such conferences—the united nations conference on food and agriculture—has already been held at Hot Springs, Virginia. Hon. members will recall that on June 14, in tabling the final act of this conference, I made a statement on the general work of the conference and the programme for future action. A further united nations conference to consider the international organization of relief in the immediate post-war period will be held later in the present year.

Other meetings will follow as the preliminary discussions complete the preparatory work on each major subject for international agreement. I cannot yet indicate exactly what these subjects will be. Doubtless among them will be included the distressing and baffling problem of refugees, which has lately been discussed at a meeting in Bermuda between representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom. I shall speak of this problem in a moment.

It is too early for me to attempt even a shadowy outline of the form of the international settlement, political and economic, which may follow the ending of hostilities. It may be useful, however, to say a word about one of its aspects. The strong bonds which have linked the united nations into a working model of cooperation must be strengthened and developed for even greater use in the years of peace. It is perhaps an axiom of war that during actual hostilities methods must be improvised, secrecy must be observed, attention must be concentrated on victory. The time is approaching, however, when even before victory is won the concept of the united nations will have to be embodied in some form of international organization. On the one hand, authority in international affairs must not be concentrated exclusively in the largest powers. On the other, authority cannot be divided equally among all the thirty or more sovereign states that comprise the united nations, or all effective authority will disappear. A number of new international institutions are likely to be set up as a result of the war. In the view of the government, effective representations on these bodies should neither be restricted to the largest states nor necessarily extended to all states. Representation should be determined on a functional basis which will admit to full membership those countries, large or small, which have the greatest contribution to make to the particular object in question. In the world there are over sixty sovereign states. If they all have a nominally equal voice in international decisions, no effective decisions are likely to be taken. Some compromise must be found between the theoretical equality of states and the practical necessity of limiting representation on international bodies to a workable number. That compromise can be discovered, especially in economic matters, by the adoption of the functional principle of representation. That principle, in turn, is likely to find many new expressions in the gigantic task of liberation, restoration and reconstruction.

I shall now make a statement on the policy of the government with respect to refugees from Europe. Only the most callous could contemplate with indifference the situation of most of those unfortunates who, since Hitler's assumption of power, have been driven from their homes. Among them are to be found members of nearly every nationality and creed under the sun. They have been scattered far and wide. Most of them, however, including those whose sufferings are greatest, are still contained within the ring of territories held by the axis armies. For them, except perhaps for a tiny number who may by subterfuge or stealth cross the axis-held frontiers to neighbouring neutral countries, the only escape from persecution lies in the victory of the armies of the united nations.

Inside German dominated Europe terrible things are happening, but the lash has fallen on the backs of the Jews more heavily than on any other group or race. Last December, the allied governments in London, in conjunction with the United Kingdom and the United States, issued a declaration denouncing the ruthless German policy of extermination of the Jewish people under their control and promising retribution. The government of Canada was glad immediately to associate itself with this declaration. There is, unfortunately, abundant evidence that there has been no change during the last six months. Indeed, in eastern Europe especially, the signs are that the treatment of the Jews has grown even more pitiless, and Jews from the western European territories under German control have been moved eastwards to share the fate of those from central and eastern Europe.

There is nothing that the allied governments can do to save these hapless people except to win the war as quickly and as completely as possible. They cannot be removed from axis territory. Efforts to aid them, even if aid was feasible, would prolong their agony if these efforts were to prolong the war. It was agreed, at the recent Bermuda conference between officials of the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom, that no negotiations could be undertaken with Hitler, since his entire record has left no doubt that he would only agree to such solutions as would be of direct aid to the axis war aims. It was also agreed that nothing could be recommended that would interfere or delay the war effort of the united nations.

This Bermuda conference, however, has made a number of recommendations for the purpose of assisting those refugees who have already managed to penetrate through the axis ring to neutral countries. While victory alone can reach the central core of the refugee problem, it is not by any means beyond the power of the united nations to aid those who have escaped but have not yet found a safe asylum until peace is restored. I cannot give the house details either of the number of refugees in various neutral and allied territories or of the proposals—now accepted by the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom —which were recommended by the Bermuda conference. The delegations agreed that the details of their deliberations must be regarded as confidential so long as a knowledge of their recommendations would be of aid or comfort to our enemies or might adversely affect the refugees whom all are trying to aid. The universal problem of shipping was also recognized at the conference as of the utmost urgency and it was agreed there that any plan that looked to the diverting of allied shipping from the war effort, to remove or care for refugees, would present considerations of a military character which would disclose almost insuperable difficulties.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Were we represented at Bermuda?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We were not invited to be present at the conference. It was a conference between the United States and the United Kingdom with regard to which we had received no prior information other than that the two countries were seeking to arrange a conference at some place to be subsequently chosen, Bermuda became the chosen locality.

Mr. COLDWELL: Have we been asked to accept the recommendations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not as yet. I shall have a word to say about that in a moment.

Mr. COLDWELL: Have they been forwarded to us?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall refer to that in just a moment. Refugees who have reached Switzerland and Sweden cannot be moved to other destinations, as there is no means of transporting them. Refugees who have escaped into Spain, Portugal, the middle east, and Africa, but have not yet found a safe resting place, can, if shipping is available, be moved to places where they can remain until peace is restored. This group includes many thousands of many races: Poles and Frenchmen, Czechs, Greeks and Yugoslavs, as well as Jews.

All that I can say about the decisions at Bermuda is to quote as follows from the statement issued after the conference:

> The conference was able to recommend measures both for removing refugees from neutral countries and, in those cases, where such removal was not possible, for giving assurances of international cooperation in the future of the refugee problem so far as it affected them.
> It also recommended a number of temporary refugee havens to which refugees could be transported and maintained if and when shipping should become available. At least one such movement has been effected.

The Bermuda conference also made certain recommendations of a more general character. The refugee problem is essentially an international one, which can only be solved by cooperative effort. The conference recommended that the inter-governmental committee on refugees, which was established at the Evian meeting of 1938, should be reconstituted with increased authority, larger membership and greater financial resources. The Canadian government will be glad to play its part in giving effect to this recommendation. The conference also recommended, in order to allay the anxiety especially of neutral European countries, that the united nations should in a declaration provide for the repatriation of refugees to their own lands at the end of the war. The conference adopted other proposals designed to make it easier for neutral countries to maintain the refugees in their territories whose removal could not be arranged. The Canadian government has not yet been asked to assist in giving effect to the proposals framed at Bermuda, but it will be glad to play its full part as soon as these proposals are presented to the united nations. This would include participation in the revised and strengthened inter-governmental committee, and also the reception in Canada until peace is restored of a number of refugees in addition to those already within the country.

I cannot state how many additional refugees Canada will be prepared to receive. This depends on many factors not within the control of the Canadian government. The dispersion of refugees now in neutral European countries, and the reception of those who may hereafter escape from axis territories, must be conducted under international auspices, with consideration given to the possibilities of transport, of repatriation at the end of the war, of uniting families and of useful employment in the war industries. Considerations of security must be carefully weighed in individual cases. A declaration such as the government has been urged to make, that Canada would receive all refugees from axis territory who could reach her shores, would be an invitation to the German government to distribute in this manner their spies and secret agents.

There is outstanding an offer of the Canadian government made last autumn to receive for the duration of the war up to 1,000 Jewish children then in unoccupied France and separated from their parents. The care and maintenance of these children was guaranteed through the Canadian Jewish congress under conditions generally similar to those applied to children evacuated from the British isles in 1940 under the government scheme. Before effect could be given to this offer, the Germans occupied the whole of France. The offer, however, is still valid. If arrangements can be made through neutral countries or the inter-governmental committee for the departure of these children from France, we shall gladly accord them admission to Canada.

We already have in Canada a very considerable refugee population. Many of those here have been admitted for permanent residence in accordance with the provisions of the Immigration Act and regulations. Others have been granted asylum for the duration of the war only, and it is to this latter group that I wish now to refer for a moment. There are doubtless among them many who would be glad to make their permanent homes in Canada, including some who have come from the British isles and some from countries of continental Europe. While the government can give no general undertaking that all who wish to stay will be granted the right to reside permanently in Canada, individual applications for permission to remain in this country after the war will be given full and sympathetic consideration.

It is hard to say how many refugees from Europe have been admitted to Canada since Hitler's rise to power. In our immigration statistics there is no category of entrants who are recorded as refugees. My impression is that those who criticize what has been done, and accuse the government of inertia and inhumanity, are often not fully cognizant of the facts. In the years 1933-42, nine thousand persons were admitted as immigrants to Canada by special orders in council, and most of them were European refugees. In addition, shortly before the war, 300 families and a substantial number of single men from the Sudeten area were admitted for agricultural settlement in western Canada, and hundreds of other agricultural refugees from central Europe were also admitted during that period. The total immigration from Europe, between April 1, 1933, and March 31, 1942, was 39,000, the bulk of whom were refugees. All these entered Canada for permanent residence.

I cannot even give an approximate figure of those admitted temporarily, as the records do not exist. All I can say is that these amount to several thousands, not including nearly 8,000 women and children who have been evacuated from the British isles since the spring of 1940. We have released also, under temporary status in Canada, about 900 persons of German and Austrian citizenship, who were transferred to Canada in July 1940 by the United Kingdom government. In addition we have received several hundred Polish and Czech technicians to work in our war industries. Quite apart from all these groups I should mention the many thousand prisoners of war who have been transferred to Canada for safe custody; while they are in no way refugees they constitute nevertheless a drain on our supplies and resources and their presence here has made it easier for refugees to be accommodated in African and Middle East territories under allied control.

We have not, of course, done all that we could have done and perhaps we have not done all that we should have done. Our record, however, is better than it is frequently made out to be and I think that it will stand comparison with the records of other parts of the British commonwealth and of the United States.

Since the outbreak of war Canada's diplomatic representation has been greatly extended. In September, 1939, Canada had, in addition to the long-established office of the High Commissioner in London, legations in the United States, France, Japan, and in Belgium and the Netherlands, as well as the office of the permanent delegate to the League of Nations. Since that time the legations in Paris, Tokyo, Brussels and the Hague and the office in Geneva have been closed. But in the interval, fourteen new offices abroad have been established. Of these, five represent the appointment of high commissioners within the British commonwealth, to Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Ireland and Newfoundland. Five are of new legations, to U.S.S.R. and China, and in South America to Brazil, Argentine and Chile. In addition, one minister has been accredited to seven of the allied governments established during the war in London: Belgium, the Netherlands, Poland, Norway, Yugoslavia, Greece and Czechoslovakia. All of the countries I have mentioned are represented in Ottawa by ministers, high commissioners or accredited representatives as the case may be.

Consular officers of Canada are serving in Greenland, and in St. Pierre and Miquelon. Most recently, with the appointment of a consul-general to New York, the first separate consular establishment in the United States has been opened.

The supervisory commission of the League of Nations still meets, though not at Geneva, and there is a Canadian representative on this continuing body. An important part of the league, the International Labour Organization, has, since 1940, had its headquarters at Montreal.

All of these formal relationships speak of the developing importance of Canada in the world community. The fortunes of war—or perhaps something more than the fortunes—have brought to Canada valiant men and women of many nations: sovereigns, prime ministers, foreign ministers and officers of state; chiefs of staff and ranking officers of armies, navies and air forces of many lands.

The stature of nationhood which Canada has reached—I mean the position of Canada as a world power—has been reached, not on material grounds alone, though Canada's contributions to mutual aid have been impressive by any standard. Neither does it owe its emergence to political considerations. It has arisen, I believe, from our recognition of the needs of humanity. Our conception of nationhood rejects, as it must always reject, any attachment to ideas which are non-democratic, or to usages which would constitute the negation of free institutions and the untrammelled expression of the free souls of free men. It is something which speaks not simply for to-day, or next month, or the year after next, but for all the future of Canada.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Chairman, this is the first opportunity that has been afforded the House of Commons during the present session to discuss Canada's foreign policy, and I think that is to be regretted. Questions of foreign policy are daily becoming of greater importance to Canada. They are probably the most vital questions this house can face in any of its sessions. Therefore I deprecate greatly the practice of the government in postponing each session the discussion of foreign policy, and then setting aside a very short time for that purpose.

It has always seemed to me that it would be very helpful if we were to have set up in this house a committee to be known as a foreign affairs committee, or one at any rate which would deal with questions of foreign affairs. For that matter there might also be a similar committee set up in the senate. I am confident that if this step were taken it would mean that the government of the day would get help in settling problems having to do with foreign affairs. It would also mean that members of both the Senate and the House of Commons would be far better informed on foreign questions, and it would help the Canadian people to get a better grasp of the different problems.

At the present time Canadians are given very little leadership by this parliament in connection with foreign affairs and yet the foreign policy of any country must be based upon the beliefs and wishes of its people.

Before the war Canada's foreign policy might be summed up as, first of all, friendliness to all nations. With that policy no one can quarrel, although at times it was carried to an absurd length—for example with Germany and with Japan. Hon. members who were in the last House of Commons, the last parliament, will remember how this government allowed scrap iron to be shipped out to Japan, even when it was obvious to everyone that it was only a matter of time before Japan would be at war with the British commonwealth and with the United States. Friendliness in foreign affairs can very easily go so far as to become a policy of hiding your head in the sand.

Then, the second branch of Canada's foreign policy before the war was that we had no commitments to anyone—either to Great Britain, to any of the other members of the commonwealth, to the United States or any other nation. Time and again both in the house and on the hustings members of the government stated that policy—that Canada had no commitments. And they put it in this way, that Canada could be informed by Great Britain of what was going on, but she could not be consulted, the implication being that if she were consulted she would be under some obligation, and Canada felt that she should be under no obligation to Great Britain or to anyone else.

Now, that was the announced policy. In actual fact it was not the policy. One has only to refer to the report of the imperial conference held in London in 1937 to learn that at that time and at that conference the main topics of discussion were foreign affairs and defence. Quite extensive plans were made for the empire, for the commonwealth, to have a common policy in foreign affairs, and also for the defence of the commonwealth as a unit. But the government did not see fit to explain that to the Canadian people. And I do suggest for the future—unfortunately it is too late now to do anything about the past—it would have been better if the government had come right out in the open and said, "The nations of the British commonwealth propose to stand together, war or no war. War or no war we stand together as a British family; and let the rest of the world take notice accordingly." That is the only fair way to treat the Canadian people. Hearing this talk of a no-commitment policy, and not knowing where they stood, there was utter confusion from one end of Canada to the other with regard to Canada's foreign policy. I repeat it would have been far better for the Canadian people if they had been told by their government that the British family intended to stand together as one, and that Canada was with the rest of the family.

[Mr. Green.]

Perhaps the most humiliating situation in which Canada was placed as a result of this no-commitment policy was on July 1, 1938, Canada's birthday, when those of us who were in the last parliament had to sit in the house and hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) say that he was unwilling to have Great Britain set up schools in Canada for the training of her airmen, because that would be the equivalent of setting up a foreign military station in this land.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take exception at once to what my hon. friend has said. If he makes any reference he should make clear that the whole point in connection with the schools being established in this country was that the government had no objection whatsoever to the schools being established, so long as their administration was to be under the responsibility of a Canadian minister.

Mr. GREEN: I have the reference from Hansard before me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read them.

Mr. GREEN: Unfortunately what I have said is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is not correct. I have made a statement, and I challenge the hon. member to refute it. The position has been perfectly clear at all times.

Mr. GREEN: And I may say this, that as an old soldier of Canada I hung my head in shame at the words of the Prime Minister on that occasion, and the manner in which they were said.

The CHAIRMAN: The Prime Minister has denied the statement attributed to him, and has asked for the exact statement.

Mr. GREEN: I would refer the committee to page 4527 of Hansard for July 1, 1938, where the Prime Minister is reported in this way:

> May I say a word with respect to the idea of having the imperial air force set up flying schools in Canada to train their pilots; in short, a military station put down in Canada, owned, maintained and operated by the imperial government for imperial purposes. I must say that long ago Canadian governments finally settled the constitutional principle that in Canadian territory there could be no military establishments unless they were owned, maintained and controlled by the Canadian government responsible to the Canadian parliament and people.

The Prime Minister goes on to say:

> Such domestic ownership, maintenance and control of all military stations and personnel is one of the really indispensable hall marks of national sovereign self-government and an indispensable basis for friendly and effective cooperation between the governments of Canada and those of other parts of the British commonwealth of nations, including the government of the United Kingdom.

At page 4529 of Hansard we find this:

Mr. Bennett: This is not a military force but a training force.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I want the house and the country to understand clearly what is being discussed. My reference was with regard to the idea of having the imperial air force set up a flying school somewhere in Canada to train their flying pilots. In short, a military station to be put down in Canada, owned, maintained and operated by the imperial government for imperial purposes.

Mr. Bennett: Not for imperial purposes.

Mr. Mackenzie King: It is for imperial purposes. Is it for Canadian purposes?

Mr. Bennett: Yes, very much so.

I will leave hon. members to draw their own conclusions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend, were he willing to make the record complete, should have drawn attention to what I said several times, in addition to the particular excerpts he has quoted, and which served to make our position very clear.

Mr. GREEN: If the Prime Minister wishes to explain his words he will have an opportunity to do so.

The third branch of Canada's foreign policy before the war was that there was great emphasis placed at all times upon our independence and our equality of status. It was claimed that Canada was a nation by reason of the imperial conference of 1926 and of the Balfour declaration and the statute of Westminster which followed. Actually Canada became a nation because of the fighting of the Canadian corps in the last war. Those were the three branches of Canada's foreign policy before the war—friendliness, no commitments, and emphasis on equality of status.

Now after four years of war presumably Canada still has a policy of friendliness, but I believe the Canadian government no longer follows the policy of no commitments. We have commitments in every direction, and quite properly so. The stage of no commitments has long since passed. But the Canadian government has not yet given up the third branch of its foreign policy, which, as I have said, is to place great stress on equality of status. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), on March 19 of this year, outlined Canada's foreign policy, and by the way he did it then much more fully than he has done to-day. He read the Balfour declaration and ended his speech with these words:

In all our relations with other parts of the empire and with other countries, so far as the present administration is concerned, we intend to stand on the ground of a status of our own equal to that of each and all of the self-governing communities—the dominions and the United Kingdom included.

No one either inside of Canada or outside of Canada is questioning Canada's equality of status or Canada's independence, and the government in making a declaration of policy of this type is setting up a straw man simply to knock him down. In these days, in the fourth year of the war and approaching the fifth year, Canada needs something far more up to date and far more realistic in the line of foreign policy. We are living in a different world from that of 1939. There have been great developments as a result of the war. I need not list them, but there have been developments, for instance, in the way of raising men for the armed forces, in the production of manufactured goods, in the production of food, and other developments so great that the Prime Minister the other day, on July 1, another of Canada's birthdays, boasted in this fashion, as found at page 4226 of Hansard:

In the course of the present war, we have seen Canada emerge from nationhood into a position generally recognized as that of a world power.

Canada a world power! Those are striking words and thought-provoking words for every man and woman in Canada, and they can be made a fact. But they will never be made a fact with a Canadian foreign policy that emphasizes only friendliness for all and equality of status with the other British nations. That does not go far enough. Something more is required if Canada is to be a world power. A foreign policy is required that will give the Canadian people a vision of their nation taking a stand on world questions as they arise, and not simply waiting outside the door for some of the larger nations to hand out a decision. Canada herself must take a stand on world questions as they arise. Secondly, a vision of Canada boldly asking for the sort of world that Canadians believe in as individuals. Thirdly, Canada must be willing to assume her fair share of responsibilities, of whatever burdens there may be entailed in order that a better world may be developed after this war.

If the Canadian people catch this vision of Canada as a world power taking the lead in making a better world, they will so build this nation and develop Canada—and after all it is the people who develop a nation, not the government—that she will become such a world power.

The foreign policy announced by the Prime Minister is too much wrapped up in a blanket of words, which is one of the great failings of the Prime Minister in practically all his announcements, and it is qualified by too many provisos. Canadians must have a foreign policy that is straightforward and easily understood by all. To-day I make bold to suggest certain broad principles for a Canadian foreign policy and to ask the government to give them the most serious consideration.

The first principle I enunciate is this, that the Canadian government should make it known to the Canadian people that this nation has finished forever with a policy of no commitments, with a policy, in other words, of isolation. It must be clear now to the most stupid person in the civilized world that no nation can stand alone. Let Canada be prepared to stand with all the other nations who are seeking to build a better world.

The second principle is that Canada will accept her full share of responsibility for maintaining law and order beyond her own boundaries. That may mean that Canada must provide an air force for the post-war period, that she must provide troops, that she must provide naval forces for the maintenance of law and order beyond the boundaries of Canada. We must be prepared to take our share in maintaining order after the war. The United States is moving along this line. I was very much impressed by what is known as the Fulbright resolution, a resolution recently passed unanimously by the foreign affairs committee of the House of Representatives favouring—

> —the creation of appropriate international machinery with power adequate to establish and maintain a just and lasting peace among the nations of the world and favouring participation by the United States therein.

That is a notable declaration by the United States House of Representatives, and a principle of that type could very well be adopted and enunciated by the Canadian parliament.

The third principle is this, that Canada intends to stay in the British family of nations, that Canada intends to develop within the British commonwealth. That will mean Canada standing as a world power at the side of Great Britain, perhaps a power with a larger population eventually than Great Britain; in my opinion, if this nation is given proper leadership, that will become the case in course of time. And it should be made clear that Canada believes that the British family of nations should speak with one voice in foreign affairs. That is what the United States and the other nations of the world expect; that is what the Canadian people want—make no mistake about it—and in the long run Canada's foreign policy will be what the man on the street wants it to be.

In recent years Canada has placed too much emphasis on status. It is like a man throwing out his chest and showing off what a big fellow he is. That is very clearly brought out in a pamphlet entitled "The British Commonwealth at War", by William Yandell Elliott and H. Duncan Hall, and published this year. At page 14 I read this:

> The period in which the emphasis was laid by the British dominions upon status, rather than upon their common interests and their obligations as members of the British commonwealth, lasted for little more than fifteen years; it ended roughly in 1935, when the world began to be once more manifestly unsafe for small powers. The dominions which placed the most emphasis upon status were Canada, the most secure of all the dominions, and Eire and South Africa which, because some of their population had recently been at war with Britain, were under a deep psychological necessity to assert their independence. Australia and New Zealand, the most exposed to danger from war, the most British in the composition of their populations, the most free from memories of past friction with Britain, placed far less emphasis upon status and far more upon the sharing of mutual obligations with the other members of the commonwealth and the making of contributions to the common defence.

In the League of Nations we had the British commonwealth speaking with different voices. Other nations have never understood that, and they never will in the days that are to come. The fact of Canada declining to be consulted, Canada holding back, has resulted in Great Britain, which had to speak for herself, being taken in effect as speaking for the British commonwealth. From the statements of Mr. Eden, the British Foreign Secretary, in Washington when he was there this spring, it is clear that Great Britain does not like that; that she would like to have the commonwealth speaking as a unit. We find this press quotation in the papers of March 27 of this year from Washington, dealing with Mr. Eden's visit:

> Here in Washington the Foreign Secretary has made no secret of his desire for further collaboration between the commonwealth on foreign policy or any other matter. He has made it clear that Britain claims no exclusive representation for the empire on the various combined organizations now set up and in the process of formation—and in fact would be willing to step down in turn to make room for the dominions to represent the commonwealth.

There is danger of a Big Four set-up in international affairs, with Canada one of the smaller nations waiting around outside. The Prime Minister this very morning has told us about the leading boards, and he has said that with the exception of one, on which our Minister of Munitions and Supply is a representative, all of them are United Kingdom-United States boards. Just the other day, on June 11, announcement was made that a relief agency had been formed of the united nations. Canada is vitally concerned with that relief agency because she will have to supply a large portion of the food and other materials. Yet we find in another press dispatch from Washington, dated June 10:

> The real governing board, however, will be the central committee consisting of representatives of the big four, Britain, the United States, Russia and China.
> Although the draft agreement does not suggest Canada for membership on the central committee, despite the fact that Canada, next to the United States, will provide more relief food than any other country, there is one position of major importance that would seem to be ideally suited to Canada's unique position. That is the chairmanship of the supplies committee.

And then it goes on:

> It may develop that Canada will be selected at the Washington conference for this role, having been left off the central committee.

If Canada insists on taking her part in the councils of the nations as a wholly autonomous, independent unit of the British commonwealth, showing that the commonwealth has no common foreign policy, she can expect nothing but to end up in the position in which she has ended up on so many of these committees. She can expect at best a minor and an indirect voice in such councils. The tragic feature of that policy is that the result will be that Canada will develop a small nation complex and will never be anything but a small state.

I suggest to hon. members that it would be far better for Canada to develop within the British commonwealth, thereby greatly strengthening it, thereby giving the commonwealth a far stronger voice in world affairs, and in fact thereby making the commonwealth the basis of a broader world order. The British commonwealth needs Canada. It needs Canada just as much as Canada needs the other nations of the commonwealth. Canada is the keystone of the British empire. We are an Atlantic power, a Pacific power, an American power, and now, with the development of aeroplanes, we are an Arctic power. I would impress upon the Prime Minister that Canada is now the keystone of the British empire and that we should plan with that thought in mind.

Take for example the British commonwealth air training plan. What a wonderful thing that has been. It shows what can be done when the nations of the British commonwealth make up their minds to really work together. We can carry out plans of that type with regard to our air development in the post-war days. I do not intend to go any further into that, because the subject will be dealt with by my colleague the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I am sure that what our lads who are serving in every part of the globe would insist upon, if they could be here, would be that Canada shall develop as a great nation within the British commonwealth. After all, they are the Canadians who are really making Canada a world power—not those of us who are here at home.

The fourth principle of Canada's foreign policy should be that the British commonwealth and the United States are indispensable to one another and must be in alliance for all time. Let us face that fact and tell the rest of the world it is what we believe. There has been no war between those two groups of British peoples for over 128 years. That is a significant fact; it shows that our interests are parallel; had it not been so there would have been war between the peoples long since.

This whole question of the relationship between the British commonwealth and the United States is very clearly expressed in a book by Walter Lippmann, which has been published this last month, entitled "U.S. Foreign Policy: Shield of the Republic." It is a small book, which it would repay any hon. member to read, because it applies not only to United States foreign policy, but also to Canadian foreign policy. At page 127 Mr. Lippmann says:

> Is it not undeniable that American commitments in the Atlantic and the Pacific dictate the need for an alliance with the British commonwealth of nations and with the empire? . . . It is better to proclaim frankly that the alliance is necessary, and then to demonstrate the need for it to the common sense of the British, the Canadian, and the American people.

I suggest to hon. members that that is good advice as well for Canadians.

The fifth principle is this, that Canada, as an American nation and a nation which has always been friendly with all other nations of this hemisphere, should be an active member of the Pan-American Union, it being understood of course that we are not to be taken thereby as weakening our connection with the British commonwealth of nations. Just a few days ago, on June 28, the Prime Minister tabled an inter-American radio agreement, and it is strange to find that it was an agreement signed in Chile on January 26, 1940, over three years ago. Canada was not present at the negotiations and is not really a party to the agreement, but Canada adhered to the agreement on the 8th of May, 1943. This shows the ridiculous position in which we are placed in our dealings with other nations of this hemisphere. I repeat that we should become an active member of the Pan-American Union.

The sixth and final principle is this, that Canada should promote the closest cooperation with Russia, China, and the other united nations, and that Canada hopes eventually to see established a world organization which will include all nations. I would point out Canada's position with regard to Russia. The development of the aeroplane has made Russia our neighbour over the north pole; we have had Russian aviators flying here by that route; we are also close neighbours by way of Alaska; and we must cooperate with that great nation. China will be a great field for trade after the war and that is of particular interest to those Canadians who live on the Pacific slope, and I repeat that Canada should promote the closest cooperation with her.

These are the six principles I place before the Prime Minister and the house for consideration. There may be others that are equally important, and I hope that members will bring forward suggestions for Canada's foreign policy. These principles are clear; I believe they are sound; and they are based on what is Canada's own interest. In the last analysis that must be the basis for the foreign policy of any nation—whether it is in the interests of the people of that nation.

In conclusion, for Canada this is a turning point. We are at a turning point in the history of this country. Either we go on from here and become a real world power, or we develop a small-nation complex; and now is the time to place before the Canadian people a vision of what this wonderful nation of ours can be.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): This is the first opportunity this session which the house has had of discussing external affairs. I was hoping that opportunities might have been found to enable us to go into the question of external affairs before reaching this stage of our proceedings. On March 19, as reported at page 1398 of Hansard, I said to the Prime Minister:

> I think it would be of value if at an early day the Prime Minister would call an item in his estimates so that there might be a discussion of Canada's external affairs. It would enable us to arrive at a clearer understanding of some of the things, which, as he suggests, may becloud the issue.

[Mr. Green.]

The report goes on:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: I am anxious that the house shall get on with its business as rapidly as possible. Before we take up any new subject for discussion we should conclude with the matters in hand.
>
> Mr. Coldwell: I agree. I meant not to leave it until the dying days of the session.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I shall undertake with pleasure to see that matters of foreign policy are discussed before that time.

That was during the budget debate. Since then other departments have gone into supply and have had some of their estimates discussed, but external affairs has been left until the dying days of the session, when the house is tired and when we are faced with a great deal of unfinished business. To my mind this is one of the most important debates in the course of the session. Throughout the years we have not had that consideration of external affairs that should have been given by this parliament, and much of what the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) said this morning, a great deal of his criticism, is due to the fact that this house has not given sufficient attention to questions of external policy and external affairs.

Mr. NEILL: Would the hon. gentleman allow a question? Both he and the hon. member who spoke before him suggested that this matter should be dealt with by means of a committee. Is it not a fact that there is a standing committee that deals with international relations? It has been in existence ever since confederation, I suppose, but the government has not allowed it to meet for the last seven years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take exception to my hon. friend's statement. He says that the government has not allowed it to meet.

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not correct. There has been no request for the committee to meet. Had there been such a request the government would have acceded to it, whether coming from my hon. friend or from any other hon. member.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The committee can be set up only on motion of the government. Because there is no request, that does not relieve the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a standing committee of the house, and any hon. member may ask that it be called. My hon. friends know that and they have not asked that it be done. But to say that the government has prohibited it is completely wrong.

Mr. NEILL: I did not use the word prohibit; I said, did not allow. I have tried to bring matters before other committees and I know what success I have had.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe I have the floor. This is the 107th day of the session. It is all very well for the Prime Minister to say that there is a committee and that any hon. member may request that it be called; but, as he well knows, members of the house usually wait for some move from the government or from the government side of the house to encourage the calling of such a committee. However, I am not disputing the fact that a member of this house could have asked for the setting up of that committee. But even that does not excuse the Prime Minister, as Minister for External Affairs, for leaving this important matter until the 107th day of this session. I know that the Prime Minister is busy. I know that he has many weighty affairs to which he must given his attention, and I was therefore surprised, when the assistants to the various ministers were appointed, that no assistant was appointed to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Minister for External Affairs. It seemed to me that if there was one place where assistance was necessary it was in that particular department, and I had hoped that some additional attention would be given to external affairs by the appointment of an assistant.

There are a good many things I desire to say in connection with this debate, but perhaps, in order to put myself in the frame of mind in which I can discuss these matters with rather more careful consideration, and since I want to deal with something which is a little unpleasant, I may observe by way of preface that I have always refrained from making personal attacks. I think every member of the house will give me credit for that. It is against my nature and my way of doing things to make personal attacks. On May 14 I had occasion to refer to one of our ministers, the minister at Washington, Mr. McCarthy, and I made certain criticisms to which I shall allude in a moment. On May 17 the Prime Minister rose in the house and gave me something of a castigation for, to use his own words, "making innuendoes of a character unworthy" of myself, and making, as he said, all kinds of irresponsible representations regarding the minister at Washington. Now the only irresponsible statement made in that regard was a statement by the Prime Minister when he said:

> I am prepared to support all the representations made by Mr. McCarthy in the statement he has presented here.

Shortly after that statement, within a week of raising the matter in the house, I was in Washington. Mr. McCarthy sent me an invitation to visit him. I visited him, and on that occasion we discussed the statement which was placed before the house by the Prime Minister. Here is the statement:

> Questions asked by Mr. Coldwell may be summarized as follows:

I have no quarrel with the summary. My question was:

> (1) I want to ask him what part in this agreement and in the general agreement we are discussing under this bill the Department of External Affairs played. What part did it play in relation to this country?
> Answer: So far as the minister in charge of this legation is concerned, the answer to this question is that he played no part whatever, and he goes further and says that he has never discussed with any member of the United States administration or officer thereof.

Mr. McCarthy told me that that statement was absolutely correct, and I took his word. I said to Mr. McCarthy at the time: If agreements of this sort, involving Canada and the United States, are not matters for discussion by our legation at Washington, what is the legation there for? Of course, Mr. McCarthy told me that I must ask the Prime Minister that question, and I do ask him now: What function does our legation perform if it does not deal with matters of the description we have been discussing in this house? Then I quote again:

> (2) Mr. Coldwell says: I find it very difficult to believe that the minister at Washington had nothing to do with negotiations in regard to these matters involving Canada and the United States.
> Answer: No matter how difficult Mr. Coldwell finds it to believe, the fact is that the minister had nothing whatever to do with these negotiations, and played no part in them.
> (3) Mr. Coldwell says: He (Mr. McCarthy) is still a director and vice-president of the parent company, the Aluminum Company of the United States.
> Answer: Mr. McCarthy is not now nor has he ever been a director or vice-president or officer of the Aluminum Company of America.

I did not say that he ever was vice-president or director of the Aluminum Company of America; I said that he was vice-president and director of the parent company, which unfortunately I miscalled the Aluminum Company of the United States. When I was in Washington I drew that to Mr. McCarthy's attention and I asked him this question: Are you not vice-president and director of the parent company, Aluminium Limited?—I miscalled it the Aluminum Company of the United States. Mr. McCarthy's reply to me was: Yes, I am and I intend to remain so; the Prime Minister knew of my directorates when I was appointed minister at Washington. I characterized the original statement at the time as a deliberate concealment of the truth.

Whether Mr. McCarthy personally was responsible for that or not, I do not know, but I suggested that there was a deliberate concealment of the truth. I could not conceive of a gentleman who has had the long experience in corporation law which our minister at Washington has had, being so careless, both in this case and in the case I am going to mention, in the use of the English language as to place the matter in the manner in which it was placed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must take exception at once to the statement by my hon. friend that there has been a deliberate concealment of the truth. First of all, I want him to state whether he makes that charge in reference to myself, because if he does I wish to say that I refute it absolutely. There has been no concealment of the truth in any particular so far as I am concerned. I believe Mr. McCarthy is just as honourable a man as my hon. friend or myself, and I am quite positive that he would not be guilty at any time of a deliberate concealment of the truth. My hon. friend has said that he made a mistake in referring to some other corporation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Which did not exist.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Whether it existed or not.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said the parent company.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. McCarthy's reference was to the statement which my hon. friend made.

Mr. COLDWELL: I accept the Prime Minister's word that there was no deliberate concealment of the truth. I am prepared to say that Mr. McCarthy told me that he did not intend that there should be a deliberate concealment of the truth. I said that I had characterized it as such when I was speaking in this house on a previous occasion, and I leave it to hon. gentlemen to say whether in the light of the circumstances what I said then was justified or not. I went on to say:

> As a matter of fact Mr. McCarthy has been for thirty years legal consultant of the Aluminum Company of Canada.
> Answer: That would be a correct statement beginning with the year 1907, but incorrect as to the last probably eight or ten years, when he was superseded by Mr. Aime Geoffrion, K.C., of Montreal, who has been elected a director of Aluminum Company of Canada in Mr. McCarthy's place.

In answer to an interjection of mine the Prime Minister indicated that he too thought that this occurred eight or ten years ago, when as a matter of fact Mr. McCarthy resigned as counsel in 1937, his place being taken by Mr. Geoffrion. But he resigned in January of this year as vice-president and director of the wholly owned subsidiary of Aluminium Limited, known in Canada as the Aluminum Company of Canada. As Mr. McCarthy told me, it was not until then that Mr. Geoffrion was appointed a director of the company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. gentleman say that the Canadian company is a wholly owned subsidiary?

Mr. COLDWELL: The Aluminum Company of Canada is a wholly owned subsidiary or a company belonging wholly to Aluminium Limited of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the company whose shares are listed on the stock exchange.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. I am not going into this very fully.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend will excuse me. I think he will agree that the directors of these companies are all listed and published and were so listed at the time the statements were made in the house. There was no effort made to conceal them.

Mr. COLDWELL: The statement is most misleading. If you read the statement which came from Mr. McCarthy you will see that it clearly indicates, as the Prime Minister thought it did, and as I did the day the matter was introduced into the house, that Mr. Geoffrion had been counsel and director of this company since 1937. That is the way I read this statement, and the Prime Minister evidently thought the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a directory of directors with which my hon. friend is familiar, and he will see Mr. McCarthy's connection as director set forth in that directory. It is and always was a matter of public knowledge. Mr. McCarthy would not, nor would anyone else, wish to conceal that fact.

Mr. COLDWELL: The impression given by that answer was that he had not been since 1937.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Eight or ten years.

Mr. COLDWELL: That would be 1937. This is a rather tangled skein to follow. I am not going to comment further except to say that the impression went abroad from this house that I was incorrect in the statement that I made on that occasion. It was even said in western Canada, in my own constituency, when it was known that I had gone down to Washington, that I had been called there to apologize to Mr. McCarthy. It was rumoured around the district. I am simply going to say I have no apologies whatsoever to offer for my statements except for the slip in naming the company. On the other hand statements placed before the house by the Prime Minister, whether deliberate or not, were misleading, and misled me to the extent that I rose in this house on that occasion and expressed surprise, which I would not have otherwise done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend, during his conversation with Mr. McCarthy at Washington, and after that conversation, was he still of the opinion that there had been a deliberate intention on Mr. McCarthy's part to mislead in any aspect of this matter?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am always prepared to accept the word of a gentleman when it is given to me, but even when I do that, there sometimes remains a lingering doubt in my mind, and that lingering doubt remained because of the language that was used in connection with these answers.

I now leave that subject to come back to the Department of External Affairs. I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement made by the Prime Minister this morning. I regret that Canada has not received more recognition than she has received in the councils of the united nations in relation to some of the affairs in which we are vitally interested. This morning we had an example of it. The Prime Minister was speaking of the Bermuda conference. We received no invitation to attend that conference; and apparently, if I understood the Prime Minister aright, we have received no official report of that conference, although the Prime Minister this morning spoke at some length about recommendations. I was tempted—although I did not wish to interrupt him—to ask him how he knew of all these recommendations if we have not yet received an official report of that conference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They did not do anything.

Mr. COLDWELL: That may be true. I am not going to enumerate the other conferences to which Canada has not been accorded the representation to which our part in the war entitles us.

I was glad to hear the expressions of sympathy for the refugees in connection with the refugee problem, but I believe we might have initiated some conferences or made some attempts to solve this problem in a way which I might term more Christian. I know that many of these people who are refugees are Jews. Of course, they are not all Jews; there are a number of Gentiles among them. I remember also that two thousand years ago it was a Gentile country, Egypt, that gave refuge to a Jewish child whom to-day we honour as the founder of the great religion which most of us profess. Therefore I say, Jew or Gentile—I wish the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, every time the Jews are mentioned, would not interrupt with the hatred of the Jews which seems to fill his heart and soul.

Mr. JAQUES: Do you never make personal remarks?

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friend keeps muttering behind me, and sits two seats away.

Mr. JAQUES: You make plenty, too.

Mr. COLDWELL: I cannot go on with my speech—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. JAQUES: You say plenty behind my back, too.

Mr. COLDWELL: I want to see this country, having regard to its interests, nevertheless do what it can to relieve the conditions of people who have suffered terror at the hands of Hitler. In saying that, may I also add that many of us have been filled with a good deal of misgiving at the trend of events in North Africa and elsewhere. We saw at the end of last year, after our men had made that splendid and successful attempt to invade North Africa, compromises made with people who throughout the last several years had been friendly with the nazi and fascist regimes, indeed had taken a prominent part in preventing the flight of the government of France to North Africa after the fall of France, and had cooperated loyally, if you can use that term in connection with them, with the nazi regime and with the government which was under its control. And even to-day people wonder if what was done in North Africa is a foretaste of what will be done in Europe, and if so to what extent our country has made or will make representations as one of the united nations against the kind of policy that was instituted in North Africa, may be instituted in Italy when we have invaded it, and may be instituted all across Europe when the nazis are destroyed.

I regard this war, particularly since the fall of France and the retreat from Dunkirk, not as an ordinary war, a war for territory—no; a war for commerce—no; a war for imperial power—no; but, if I may use the term strictly in its dictionary sense, as a part of a great revolutionary struggle that has been going on all over the world for some time, and which can only culminate in the setting up all over the world of democratic governments that are strictly responsible to and controlled by the people of the various countries of the world. Because I believe that, I wonder why it is that favour has been shown to persons who have not followed out policies in accord with the general trend of events.

We know, for example, it is said of General de Gaulle that he is a difficult man to get along with. Well, we do know, of course, that after the fall of France de Gaulle was the only French general of prominence who allied himself, and those who followed him, with our side. We know also that de Gaulle has become the symbol of the underground movement of resistance in France, and the symbol of that democratic power which the people of suffering France hope will emerge when the united nations are victorious. Consequently one finds it very difficult indeed to follow what has been done in North Africa and elsewhere with any degree of optimism for the future.

I am certain that the peoples who are suffering in Europe are not suffering because they wish to reestablish the kind of Europe that was known before this great catastrophe came upon the world. Therefore it is alarming to many people to see the support accorded, particularly by our great neighbour to the south, to persons such as those to whom I have just alluded. Even to-day, while we are glad to welcome General Giraud to North America, we wonder why some time ago General de Gaulle was not accorded a similar spontaneous and hearty invitation or welcome to this part of the world.

This morning I was glad to hear the hon. member for Vancouver South say that he thought the time had come when we should, if an opportunity offers, unite ourselves with the Pan-American Union. I think that would be a forward step. I agree with him, and I think all parties in the house recognize that Canada as a free and self-governing nation ought to and must remain in the closest possible cooperation with the British commonwealth of nations. We all agree with that; we have never disagreed with it. But it seems to me that our unity with the Pan-American Union would not in any way diminish our association with the British commonwealth of nations.

I know that there are difficulties in the way. I know, for example that in 1927, I believe it was, the state department of the United States issued certain instructions to the delegates from that country that they were to oppose the entry of Canada, because they did not want the influence of a European power. I think that that was due to an entire misapprehension regarding the status of Canada. And, in any event, since the statute of Westminster there should be no misunderstanding as to the status of this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the hon. member indicate just how the statute of Westminster alters Canada's status? Is it not declaratory of what was set forth in the Balfour declaration?

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not say it altered our status. I said there should be no misunderstanding of our status. I think the statute of Westminster very clearly set out Canada's position as a self-governing nation within the British commonwealth of nations, equal in all respects to all other members of that British commonwealth of nations. And while it may have made no alteration in our status, it none the less emphasized and, probably in some quarters, clarified the situation, and removed any doubt as to what our status really was.

Mr. POULIOT: Just the preamble, and it means nothing.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have now the text of instructions from the Secretary of State of the United States to the United States delegation to the pan-American conference held in Havana in 1928. The state paper refers to the—> —colonies, possessions or dominions, whose foreign relations are controlled by European states.

And it expresses a fear that if they were present they would not be free to follow out a common policy, but rather would have to follow out the policies of European states. It ends with these words:

> Should Canada be proposed as a member of the Pan-American Union, you will be guided by the oral instructions given by the Secretary of State to the delegates at its meeting at the Department of State on December 28, 1927.

It has been said authoritatively that those instructions were as I indicated a few moments ago.

Mr. Chairman, there are several other matters I should like to discuss, but I see it is now one o'clock, and I shall therefore resume my seat.

Mr. JAQUES: May I make one remark?

Mr. COLDWELL: I have not finished.

Mr. JAQUES: On a point of order, I wish to correct a statement attributed to me by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. The statement he made was that the founder of the Christian religion was a Jew. I have it on the authority of the present Dean of St. Paul's, who ought to know what he is talking about, I imagine, that there was not a drop of Jewish blood in his veins. That is all I said. I know that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is very fond of playing to the gallery, for the benefit of the financial press.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the funniest thing I have heard in a long time.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes that are left to me there are one or two matters with which I want to deal very briefly. There are so many topics that it is difficult to pick and choose between them in a discussion of external affairs. I do, however, wish to say that Canada should be considering very carefully future policy and our relations with the world at large in regard to that policy. We cannot live apart from other nations, and it seems to me that for a country like Canada the policy we should pursue is that of the greatest possible cooperation with countries with like aims and ideals to our own. There can be no security for a small nation apart from some form of collective security. We remain close to the British commonwealth of nations because to many of us this commonwealth of free self-governing nations is perhaps the promise of better things to come in the future of the world, when nations equal in status will be able to formulate policies in cooperation with one another for the establishment of international justice and the enforcement of international law and order, and in such a community of nations Canada should play its proper part.

This morning I was discussing matters in connection with one of our legations. In my opinion Canada ought to be represented as widely as possible in the capitals of the countries with which we are in the closest contact. I am glad that the government has adopted the policy of exchanging representatives with a good many nations. I should like to see that policy expanded. I know that there has been some discussion with the republic of Mexico. It seems to me that Mexico, as another north American nation, ought to be in contact with us in a regular and diplomatic manner.

Of those who represent us in such places I would like to say that the government should endeavour to establish within the Department of External Affairs a system of training and promotion of men most suitable to represent Canada abroad. I do not regard it as either wise or good that our representatives in foreign countries should have to be rich men. Of that kind of representation one is critical, and one should not be critical of a man representing Canada merely because he is rich. A qualification for the representation of Canada abroad ought not to be that a man has a large private income. Those of us who visited the legation in Washington the other day were quite well aware of the fact that it would be very difficult indeed for a civil servant on the salary and allowances we provide to keep up the almost palatial quarters that we have in the city of Washington. I am of the opinion that we should have modest quarters, where a man living on the salary and emoluments provided by the government of Canada would have sufficient to do what is expected of him as the representative of this nation abroad. I do think we should be represented in the capitals of countries with which we are in closest contact, both politically and commercially, and that of course applies particularly at the moment to the countries of South America.

There are other matters which I should like to discuss, but since my time has expired I do not propose to enter upon another topic which would require more than the few moments of discussion that I am able to give to it. Suffice it to say that I am firmly of the opinion that we in this house must take a much deeper interest in the international relationships of our country than we have done in the past. The events which led up to the great war were very largely events over which we had no control and with which we had no close contact, and step by step we found that a government whose policies we followed deserted principles of collective security to which we should have tried to adhere closely. Finally the world went up again in flames. It seems to me that it is the duty of representatives of the people in every parliament and every legislature in the world to consider carefully the possibilities following the winning of this war, and that we should endeavour to lay the foundation of a new world order based on law and order and on peace preserved by the combined efforts of all the nations which agree to a system of collective security.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Chairman, with the closing remarks of the speaker who has immediately preceded me I think everyone in the house and in the country and perhaps in the world at large will be wholly in accord. It is so easy to speak about beautiful things that all people desire, but so difficult to make it clear how those beautiful things are to be achieved. It is easy enough to speak of collective security, for example, but when it comes to deciding with whom you are going to collect, and upon what basis you are going to collect, the problem is not nearly so simple. I surely agree, as I have already indicated, with the closing words of the previous speaker, but I am not sure that he and I would agree very much further, especially when the question arose as to how we proposed to achieve the objects we all desire.

May I turn now for a moment to a consideration of the Prime Minister's speech. The Prime Minister, I believe, is the most successful man on the earth, so far as I know, in saying beautiful things that have no meaning at all. I think everyone agrees with everything the man says. But nobody ever knows just what he means by what he says. His speech to-day was no exception. At every point where it became necessary to know just what he had in mind, his thoughts were veiled behind beautiful tapestries which hid his real thoughts from us.

I shall endeavour to be specific. Probably I am sometimes a bit too specific, because I find nearly everyone disagreeing with me. That tends to occur when one is specific and says exactly what he means.

I am going to deal with foreign affairs under three main headings; for one has to narrow the compass of his thoughts in order to get anywhere. I shall deal first with the question of international relations as the members of our party look upon international relations. We believe that primarily the first and most important thing for any nation to do is to set its own house in order, and we insist that our nation shall be left free and untrammelled from external restrictions either by contract or by implication of contract, to exercise her complete sovereignty in putting her house in order. Our greatest anxiety as we face the future and listen to the beautiful outbursts of our Prime Minister and a good many other statesmen to-day is that they are not really cognizant of all the powers which this country needs to retain in order to be able to set her own house in order. We believe that if the purchasing power within the country of Canada is raised to the right level, and that if we have fair prices so that we can have plenty for all; if we can have a rich and varied industrial development which will enable us to produce to the highest degree the needs of Canada, we shall be on our way to putting our own house in order; and that unless we have all these things we shall not be on our way to putting our own house in order. We believe too that if we provide as far as possible for our own needs, thereby avoiding the obligation of trading unnecessarily, we shall place our feet on the solid rock of substantial reality which will enable us to stand against the storms of time.

Beyond producing our own needs in Canada it will be essential that we develop our resources to a degree which will enable us to help our neighbours to obtain their needs. If I may cite as an example one of the nations with whom we are at war, all hon. members realize that Japan is not bountifully endowed by nature as is Canada. I think we realized that when we granted Japan special privileges in our fishing waters. When the war is over and we shall have beaten Japan to her knees, and further than that, the problem will arise, how are we going to build up a world in which the Japanese not yet born will be able to live and have as good a chance as the Canadians who are not yet born? We must face that problem fairly and squarely; if we do not, we shall betray the responsibilities which rest inevitably upon us in the position of trust in which our fellow countrymen have placed us.

Canadian production should make allowance not only for supplying Canada with all she needs, but for supplying Japan, and other nations less bountifully and fortunately endowed than we, with a certain amount of what they need in order that their standard of living may be what it ought to be in a world of abundance, a world as happy as ours should be if only we learned how to manage it.

Up to the present time practically everyone in Canada and the United States, and in fact all these united nations which are working together, has thought only of producing goods which he hoped to sell to somebody else, regardless of whether the somebody else wanted the goods, regardless of whether the sale would injure some other nation. We must change our outlook entirely with respect to this matter. Our aim must not be to produce the goods which we think we can crowd into other people's markets to their advantage or not, to the disadvantage of other nations or not; we must produce the goods which other nations need and which they will request from us. This is an extremely important matter. If we produce goods to obtrude them into the world's markets, we shall be encouraging an international trade competition which will result in trade rivalry, which will lead to trade war, which will bring about military war as sure as we are all sitting here in this house, just as it resulted in the war in which we are now engaged. For one of the major causes of war is commercial rivalry, trade war. If we are wise we shall build for a future in which trade wars will be unnecessary. True, that will require the application of a number of principles with which very few people in this house and in this country are familiar. There will have to be a new order established, and perforce new principles must underlie that new order.

So that the members of my party take the stand, first of all, that Canada must show the world, by putting her own house in order, that a people with the economic security and democratic freedom which our people can be brought to enjoy will not covet their neighbour's possessions, that they will be happy, not disposed to risk war, not disposed to prepare for war.

Much has been said of the fact that the United States and Canada have lived together over a hundred years without having any fortifications along their border. Not much is said of the fact that neither one of these nations needed anything the other nation had. In other words, the cause of war between the two nations had been in large measure removed. It might not have resulted so happily had conditions been otherwise. We believe that if we can enable nations like Germany after the war to have, first, security, and afterwards, a democratic freedom, they will not study war nor the making of war. We believe that Canada can be made to show, by setting her own house in order, that that is possible, and we believe that in order to enable Germany to be secure, too, there are several principles of international relations which should apply.

Canada should encourage trade with other countries of a reciprocal and mutually acceptable basis, avoiding cut-throat competition for foreign markets, which results in bitter commercial rivalry. As I said a minute ago, how to do that is the problem. May I say here that the Prime Minister has not indicated in the slightest degree that he knows anything at all about how to do that, and I will challenge any hon. member on the Liberal side to indicate where the Prime Minister has shown that he knows how to do it. The coast is free; hon. members can rise and speak after I have finished.

In addition, Social Crediters advocate the principle that we exercise and maintain unimpaired, as a member of the British commonwealth, our sovereign authority to order our own affairs in accordance with the will of our people.

May I refer to one thing that was tabled in the house not very long ago. I do so to illustrate how that sovereign power could be destroyed without our realizing it. I refer to the little pamphlet which every member has received, "International Stabilization of Currencies." I have been told that Canada has submitted a plan of her own, or at least she is preparing a plan of her own for submission, which, I take it, indicates that Canada is not satisfied with either of the plans advanced in this pamphlet, namely the Keynes plan and the Morgenthau plan. If Canada has rejected these two plans and has a plan of her own, I say that is an exceedingly complimentary thing to the dominion. For these two plans are pernicious in a high degree.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where has the hon. gentleman heard that Canada has submitted a plan? That is news to most of us.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have just heard that. If I am wrong, the Prime Minister will set me right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am interested to know.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I too am interested to know and possibly the Prime Minister will tell us whether Canada is preparing to accept either of the plans to which I have referred. If so, then Canada is preparing to yield her sovereignty in a way which will prevent her from ever setting her own house in order. Let me read three or four statements from the Morgenthau plan, and I ask hon. members to weigh the significance of these statements. Every member has a copy of the pamphlet and, I trust, has read it with care. I quote from Division VI:

Each member country of the Fund—

Which would be the name of the supranational government to which we would subscribe.

Each member country of the Fund undertakes the following:

I go down the list and read 3C, and I commend it to every hon. member of this house:

Such other measures as the Fund shall recommend—

Perhaps I should read No. 1 in order to show how that passage fits in:

To maintain by appropriate action exchange rates established by the Fund on the currencies of other countries and not to alter exchange rates except with the consent of the Fund and only to the extent and in the direction approved by the Fund. Exchange rates of member countries may be permitted to fluctuate within a specified range fixed by the Fund.

There is a great deal more in that than appears on the surface. And now 3C:

Such other measures as the Fund shall recommend—

In other words, if the Fund saw fit to recommend that Canada completely dismantle her beet sugar industry, Canada would do it. If the Fund saw fit to recommend that Canada should go out of the sheep business entirely, Canada would humbly do it. Let me read 5:

To give consideration to the views of the Fund on any existing or proposed monetary or economic policy the effect of which would be to bring about sooner or later serious disequilibrium in the balance of payments of other countries.

If Canada had signed an agreement like that, in vain would the hon. member for Davenport make that excellent suggestion of his with respect to using the waters of the Saskatchewan river in order to bless the whole of the dried area of central Canada, because the Fund could prevent that being done on the plea that it would upset the economy of Canada. Again, take No. 7:

To adopt appropriate legislation or decrees to carry out its undertakings to the Fund and to facilitate the activities of the Fund.

I mention this in passing to indicate the sort of thing to which Canada might blindly commit herself if she accepted the proposals of many of these planners who are having so much to say and to do in connection with the building up of the new order which is to be. Social Crediters are unalterably opposed to committing Canada to any such proposal, which would interfere with the ability of this country to put her own house in order and to govern herself.

Another principle which we advocate with respect to international relations is this: to maintain our armed forces at a strength adequate for national defence under the sovereign control of the people of Canada, and in no circumstances to surrender such control to any external authority. Far be it from us to accept the principle of any international police force, the activities of which might be governed by a Sir Montagu Norman or a Sir Otto Neimeyer, or a Mr. McKitrick, of the United States, or any junta of men meeting at Basel, Switzerland. We advocate that Canada maintain control of her own forces and keep them at a sufficient degree of efficiency to enable her to discharge her responsibilities in the world to come.

Another principle we advocate is this: To recognize the sovereign integrity of all other nations and to exercise scrupulous care not to interfere in the internal affairs of any other country.

Again, we believe that Canada should abolish all unnecessary barriers to trade and to travel, and that Canada should make available to the nations whose domestic needs require them, on reasonable and mutually agreeable conditions, the raw materials of which Canada has an abundance. Let me recall the importance of considering Japan in this connection. Just now, I know, our feelings towards Japan are heated, but the day will come when the world will be at peace and we must look upon Japan not as an enemy but as a friend, and look sympathetically upon the plight with which she is faced, with 77,000,000 people in the area, small and restricted as well as unproductive, in which Providence has placed her.

Further, we advocate that we strive consistently with other nations for the establishment of good-will among the peoples of the world. It is utterly impossible to establish good-will among the peoples of the world while our nation has a high standard of living and other nations are unable to procure the necessities of life; while the Japanese, for instance, are working at a low standard of living, as are the Hindus and the Indian people, and Canada at the high standard of living which is possible for us. It will be utterly impossible to have international goodwill under such circumstances.

May I say a word with regard to foreign trade. Our trade relations with other countries should be based upon the reciprocal and mutually agreeable exchange of surplus goods and surplus services. In bringing into being this policy we should observe certain financial principles. I will lay down these principles. We have no use for any such schemes as the two to which I have referred, which are pernicious from beginning to end and are designed to enslave mankind. On the contrary, we favour these principles: First, that there shall be a complete abandonment of the so-called gold standard or any gold basis for the control of the national economy. Gold has enslaved mankind for thousands of years, and gold will always enslave mankind wherever it may be used as the basis for currency. Second, that the home market shall be provided with sufficient purchasing power to buy the goods offered for sale at economic prices. This principle has never yet been applied in the history of the world, never once, and it has never been dreamed of in the Dominion of Canada. I doubt if the Prime Minister conceives of it to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where does my hon. friend get it if it has never been dreamed of?

Mr. BLACKMORE: My right hon. friend's hon. friend happens to be a Social Crediter and happens to understand the proposals of social credit. Social credit is based upon the distribution of purchasing power in a country to a sufficient degree to enable the people to purchase the goods which they produce. That is the fundamental basis of social credit, and how to do that is the chief technique with which Social Crediters occupy themselves. So perhaps the Prime Minister will realize how his hon. friend comes to know about this. The knowledge is free, and all the Prime Minister has to do is to invite his hon. friend in and he will get an explanation which will satisfy him.

The third financial principle upon which we base our ideas of foreign trade is that the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar with any other unit of currency shall be established, by mutual agreement if possible, on the basis of the internal dollar price level in Canada as compared with the corresponding price level in the other country. I submit that that is just diametrically the opposite to what is contained in these two international stabilization currency proposals. One is strictly autocratic, the other is strictly democratic. The one requires the cooperation of all the nations of the world, including Greenland, Iceland, Montenegro and Timbuktu, whether you can get them to work together or not. Our proposal can be brought into effect in Canada alone.

Another principle is that gambling in exchange shall be rigidly prohibited. If these five principles are applied to our foreign trade they will change the whole outlook of Canada in her trade with other nations and of the other nations in their trade relations with Canada. I am not going to take the time at the present moment to elaborate on the meaning of these details, but I should be pleased to do so on another occasion.

May I turn now to the question of immigration. We must face the facts with respect to immigration. I shall now make no pronouncement on the vexatious question, for example, of admitting or not admitting more Jews into the country—I have my own ideas on that—or on the matter of admitting or not admitting more Japanese, or more Chinese or more Indians. There is a basis upon which peoples from each of these countries can be dealt with and ought to be dealt with. If that basis is used there will be no further bitterness among the peoples of the world by reason of the restrictions which the more favoured nations like Canada and Australia and the United States feel obliged to place upon the entrance of nationals like the Indians and Japanese. I will not lay down that basis to-day, but I shall deal with another aspect of the immigration question.

The federal government should call a joint conference of the provincial governments to agree upon and lay down a definite immigration policy in connection with which full consideration shall be given to the following points. First, that a proper standard of physical and moral and mental health be required before any person is admitted to the country as a settler. Second, that a suitable period of probation be provided in order that an immigrant can get acquainted with our customs, learn to speak our national language, and qualify to take his place in the life of the country, before being granted the real rights and assuming the responsibilities of citizenship. It will be argued that to a large degree these two principles are in operation now. I will grant that, but they are not in operation to the degree that they ought to be.

The third principle is that full responsibility for the economic stability of all settlers shall be assumed by the federal government for a period of ten years after their naturalization. I should like to point out one important thing. In years past—I will not say that this was under the regime of the Prime Minister—the federal government has been reckless in the matter of admitting settlers into the semi-barren parts of the three prairie provinces, what is known as the Palliser shield. As soon as these immigrants were settled, they became the responsibility of the provinces. It was easy enough for Ottawa to admit a problem which no provincial government could possibly solve. It was easy enough for them to lay this problem on the doorsteps of the provinces, and from then on wrangle and continue to wrangle to the end of history with the provinces as to who should contribute to the support of these people. If the principle I have just indicated were applied, it would overcome in a large measure the inequalities which have developed because of the shortsighted immigration policy of the dominion government in the past.

The fourth principle is that each province shall be given a voice in the allocation of the settlers within its boundaries. I am not making a pronouncement one way or another on the question I now mention, but in my province we have a problem created by the Hutterites. Assume that a Hutterite colony came in and settled near Ottawa, in the outskirts. They would continue to increase, they would buy up additional pieces of land, and in due time there would be a ring of Hutterite colonies around Ottawa. The Ontario government would be helpless to deal with the problem, because to-day this is a dominion matter. Every law that Ontario might pass to deal with the question would be disallowed by Ottawa, just as the Prime Minister took action recently to disallow a law which Alberta passed in an endeavour to deal with the Hutterite situation. What would be the result if this were allowed to go on for two hundred years? What freedom, justice and liberty would there be in the province of Ontario? It was easy for the dominion government to make an agreement with the Hutterites and then leave the provinces to take the rap. The provinces are still taking the rap, and the dominion is just doing nothing about it. The application of my fourth principle would overcome this problem. It would make the dominion a little more cautious about what kind of agreement it entered into.

The fifth principle is that a proper standard of living shall be assured the present population of Canada before allowing an influx of immigrants who have no assets or visible means of support. There will arise in the minds of many the question: what is the use of admitting more immigrants into Canada when we are unable to give employment to the people who are already here? It may be proposed that we shall admit only those who can contribute to our production, of shoes, for example—I understand that certain Czechs came in to manufacture shoes. Now another question immediately arises in the minds of every fact-facing man. What are we going to do about the shoes we are at present producing and which will be displaced by the production of those Czechs? Where are we going to sell the goods? No matter from what angle we view this question of immigration, we find cause for anxiety and concern.

May I raise four questions of criticism of the Prime Minister's efforts before I sit down? There are great problems to be solved. I began to talk about these problems last night when I discussed inflation. I know I make myself annoying to many members of the House of Commons when I begin to discuss money matters; but I know positively as a responsible member of this House of Commons, understanding the money question, that it is my duty to discuss monetary matters before my fellow members, just as in 1936, 1937 and 1938 it was my duty to discuss the question of beet sugar in this country. I discussed beet sugar with very little respect from the Liberal side, but on that question I was right and they were wrong. It is possible that history may repeat itself this time with respect to money. Again, I shall probably be found right, my critics wrong. From time to time therefore I propose to raise these questions of the way in which to attain freedom from want and fear.

What is the use of having our prime ministers and presidents meet out on the Atlantic and plan a united nations Atlantic charter if we have no way in the world by which the charter's proposals can be implemented, if we have nothing to suggest to overcome what for many years has proved to be deficient? We simply must find a method of doing things in a new way.

I am going to point out the things which I find deficient in the Prime Minister's speech. He did not show us how to carry on trade without trade wars, which means, so far as he knows or has suggested to this country, the minute this war is over we shall begin trade wars again and be sowing the seeds of another war. Inevitably we ourselves will be contributing to the cause of the next war and will blame everybody else but ourselves, just as in this war, after we had abundantly caused the war we blamed Hitler because he started it.

Again the Prime Minister has not shown that he knows anything at all about how to increase home markets or how to increase home consumption—that is, to increase the purchasing power within Canada and to raise the standard of living of the Canadian people without incurring more debt or resorting to more taxation. If he did indicate any such knowledge in any of the speeches that he has delivered since the outbreak of the war, I shall be very thankful to have someone point out the time and place so that I may refer to it.

The Prime Minister did not tell how to build up international cooperation without such loss of sovereignty as will impair Canada's ability to manage her own household. May I repeat that if the new order which is to be established, if the new international cooperation, involves anything like the international currency stabilization proposal, then it will destroy all possibility of achieving the object for which it is designed. It is supposed to increase the prosperity of the world; it will decrease the prosperity of the world and render world conditions utterly hopeless. The Prime Minister has not shown how any such evil result can be avoided. He speaks of international cooperation. Finally the Prime Minister has not shown how to maintain adequate fighting forces—probably this is a bit premature—in Canada and in the British empire to put the empire and this country on a permanent basis of security.

Surely every hon. member of this committee must find his heart filled with misgiving when he looks back into the past and remembers that in 1920 and 1921 the British empire was unchallengeably supreme, and when he reflects that if the British peoples had maintained their military strength to a standard comparable with that maintained in 1920 and 1921 there never could have been a Hitler world without end, and there never could have been any attack on Ethiopia world without end. Yet what happened in the Dominion of Canada? What happened in Britain? The superb navy was in large measure dismantled; the splendid fighting forces were allowed to fall into disuse. What happened in Canada? I hope I shall not offend the Progressive Conservatives over much when I recall to them that it was under the administration of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett that the nails were driven into the coffin of the fighting forces of Canada. What was the reason? We could not afford it; we could not afford to maintain soldiers and airmen. In the light of what has happened since, what ridiculous nonsense!

If the Progressive Conservatives were to gain power after this war, have they indicated by any remarks they have made that they would know any better than to do that same foolhardy thing over again? Have they, by one single word? Has the Prime Minister indicated that he knows how the enormous sums of money can be raised with which to maintain a fighting force comparable to that in which we rejoice at the present time, and which soon will make us supreme in the military affairs of the world? It ought to be possible to maintain a fighting force which will render us secure. I do not wish to disagree unduly with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, but I should like to point out—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I wish to inform the hon. member that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this discussion I do not do so with any desire to place added criticism on the shoulders of the man who is carrying what has been truly called the awful burden of attending to the affairs of Canada in this crisis; but it is usually the custom to take advantage of this item to discuss the relationship of Canada with foreign nations, and I wish to exercise that privilege now.

British Columbia is waiting very anxiously for the words that may fall from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to-day, waiting for a lead, waiting for a declaration of policy on a matter about which they are exceedingly bitter. I have lived there for forty-seven years and I have never seen British Columbia so strongly united on one subject and at the same time so bitter about it; therefore I think this is a proper time to ask the Prime Minister what his policy will be, first as regards the Japanese who are now in Canada and second, those who are now in Japan. We had a discussion a few days ago about it, therefore I need not rehash what was said then. However, I am going to take up a little time to explain the case at least to eastern members who are not so well informed and who have come into the house only comparatively recently.

Away back some fifty years ago, when oriental immigration first began, British Columbia became annoyed about the class and numbers of immigrants that were coming from China at that time. They were of a coolie type, and they were dangerous to our economic well-being. Pressure was brought to bear on the government and they put a tax of $50 on every Chinaman who came into the country. Well, that did not do any good, and they raised it to $100 and later on to $500, and still it was ineffective for this reason. The Chinaman mortgaged his soul and everything else he possessed to some Chinese financial company which put up the $500, and the wretched immigrant was simply a peon to that company for many years, until he had paid it back. The Japanese were dealt with by some form of gentleman's agreement. We have had several versions of it which usually worked well for a little while, until the wily oriental discovered a way of evading them.

I shall now deal with the Chinese. Along about 1923 the government passed legislation excluding entirely all Chinese immigrants, or practically all. Of course members of the diplomatic corps, and a few persons of that type, were allowed in. But to all intents and purposes the Chinese—the labouring class and every other class—were prohibited from settling in this country. It has worked. I pressed the government very much at that time—I begged them—to apply the same treatment to all orientals, to use the word "orientals" rather than "Chinese". However the government did not do it. Along about 1928 or 1929 the government amended the gentleman's agreement, so far as the Japanese were concerned, to make it more effective. And yet sooner or later the Japanese found a way of shooting holes in it.

I never let up in my efforts, and along about 1938, after I had been watching all the time, trying to press this thing, because I knew how deeply it concerned the people of my province, and eighteen months before the war, I thought I saw a chance when conditions were more favourable, and as a result I brought in bill No. 11, which placed the Japanese in exactly the same position as the Chinese are. In that bill I simply used the word "oriental" instead of the word "Chinese". This was exactly the same type of bill that had been passed fifteen years earlier in regard to the Chinese. The government voted it down, saying that it would be displeasing to the Japanese, and that they did not wish to have any possibility of trouble with the imperial government.

I then introduced bill No. 38, which was entirely different. It provided an educational test, and was designed to keep out orientals. It followed largely the form of the measure recommended by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, about which the hon. member for Vancouver South spoke the other day. Mr. Chamberlain strongly urged Canada to adopt the Natal act. It was almost word for word with that act, an act which has kept the orientals out of New Zealand and Australia, and I believe South Africa, for thirty years. The government opposed it on a technicality and the bill was thrown out. Later however I had a chance to reintroduce it. It then became bill No. 112, with the technicality taken care of. This second bill forbade the immigration of anyone—it did not refer to Japanese, Chinese or any others specifically—who could not pass a reading test in the French, English or some language or dialect to be found in Europe. This excluded about seventy-five per cent of the world's population, so that it could not be said that it was aimed at excluding only Japanese. And it would have had the effect of carrying out all the principles of the Natal act. This was opposed by the government.

At this point I should like to quote a few remarks I made on that occasion. The government had declared their intention of defeating this bill also, but without giving any reasons against it—because the reasons alleged against the earlier bill were non-existent so far as this one was concerned. It was not directed against Chinese or Japanese particularly, but affected about seventy-five per cent of the world's population. This is what I said as reported at page 3410 of Hansard, 1938:

Is it because the government get political hysterics every time the name of Japan is mentioned? We dare not deal with the strictly domestic matter of our own immigration for fear—and fear is an ugly word, Mr. Speaker—that an alien heathen nation, that has no claim whatever to a grievance, might not like it, a nation whose best claim to fame at the present moment is the fact that it is raping and ravaging a friendly nation whose territory it swore a few short years ago to protect and maintain.

Now, this thing is cumulative. Where is it going to stop? If we yield five per cent of our rights to-day for the sake of peace, six months hence we shall be required to surrender ten per cent, and a year afterwards they will want fifty per cent. Other nations will imitate this policy, and we shall lose their respect.

How did we get their respect? We became a nation, not by the Statute of Westminster alone that we hear so much about, but through the blood and treasure we spent in France to prevent Canada from becoming a German colony. The Statute of Westminster did something. It gave us power to make our own treaties. A lot of good that did us. If we set our feet on the fatal, bitter path I have outlined, soon we shall not be allowed to make our own treaties; we shall not even be allowed to make our own pyjamas, because Japan will discover that she can make them cheaper because of her low standard of living, and sell them cheaper in Toronto than the cost of the raw material. If that is to be our policy, we had better tear up the Statute of Westminster and crawl back as a colony under the overburdened protection of the British nation. At least we would be safe there; yes, cheaply safe, would we not? Britain would give it to us, give it to us to the last exhaustion of her strained powers, and she would not worry and fuss because every now and again we debate whether we would be at war when she is at war. But what a humiliation it would be for us as a nation and as individuals! . . .

And further on I said this:

To-night we are at the forks of the road. We can say to Japan: "We have not passed this bill because we thought you might not like it. We have not exactly cut loose from Britain, but we have indicated that there is no obligation, that there are no commitments if she is in trouble and to that extent we have weakened her in the eyes of the world; you have our sympathy; we hope you will not be too hard on us." Shall we take that degrading and humiliating position, or shall we say to Japan and to the world, "When Britain is in trouble we are in trouble; when Britain is at war we are at war, and when Britain is at war while we cannot bind future parliaments as to the amount of participation, any more than the British parliament is bound, we will do our part; we are solidly behind Great Britain economically, financially and in every other way to the best of our ability." Then, let us say to Japan, "We are determined to run and control our own domestic affairs, of which immigration is one, and another is to decide whether people can be deported or not. That is another privilege and we are going to use it. We are solidly behind the British nation, and the British nation is solidly behind us." That would be the end of it. That would be a policy of courage, a policy of dignity and self-respect, both for us and from the other nations, and one that would make for the preservation of peace, a bold policy which would put us in standing and reputation with all the nations of the world. Whether we take the short vision of the immediate future or the long vision down the vista of time, it would be a policy that would immediately and ultimately work for the benefit of British Columbia, of Canada and of the British empire in which we are all concerned. I think the first step towards the announcement and the initiation of such a policy would be for us to pass this bill which is before us to-night.

Remember, that was eighteen months before the war. How prophetically true some of it is to-day. It was opposed by the government, and defeated by a somewhat smaller majority —much smaller—than usual.

I pause here to wonder. I wonder if when the Japanese government decided to go to war they were at all influenced by what took place that night in the House of Commons in 1938. No sane person in Canada, no Canadian, doubted that we would line up as we have lined up. But the oriental mind is not the occidental mind. When they read these repeated utterances with respect to our making no commitments, when they realized how quickly and urgently we had acted at the time of the last war but were now making no commitments, and actually voting down the bill I have mentioned—one which did not apply directly to the Japanese, but applied to seventy-five per cent of the world's population—they, in their oriental minds might have thought—and, of course, wrongly—that we as a nation were unwilling to displease the Japanese, and that we might possibly stay neutral, or have a neutral attitude in the event of a war. A firm stand then on our part would at least not have been open to any misconception in the oriental mind.

But, be that as it may, my thought in speaking now is to urge that we face the situation as it is. What we want now—and I know I speak for the people of British Columbia—is to know whether the government is now prepared to pass a bill for the exclusion of the Japanese—to prevent any further immigration. Is the government also prepared to insist at the peace conference that the Japanese in Canada will be repatriated? I would ask the Prime Minister, if he favours us with a reply, not to pass this issue off by saying, "Our first business is to win the war; it will be time enough to discuss other matters afterwards." No, it will be too late then, because repatriation will have to be one of the terms of peace, because, once peace is declared, a British subject could not be deported. But it can be done through the terms of peace. We are only asking for an announcement of the policy of the Prime Minister and his government in days to come—we are not asking him to do something which would embarrass him in his relations with other nations at the moment, but that he will prohibit the Japanese from entering Canada hereafter. We ask also for an assurance that at the peace conference—we know he cannot do everything he likes, but we do know the great influence he must possess there on account of the part that Canada has played in this war—he will use that great influence in favour of repatriation of the Japs. So the two things we ask now are that he gives us the assurance that he will prohibit Japanese immigration into Canada for all time, and use his influence at the peace conference for the repatriation of all persons of Japanese origin.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the committee's proceedings but I rise to a question of privilege. I have deferred bringing it up before because I wanted to get some dates that I have now received, and regarding which I should like to make a statement.

I refer hon. members to the statement made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury last night as it appears in Hansard at page 4533. After the Minister of Labour had spoken the hon. member said:

> Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): I have only to observe that that was not the case with respect to the government's man-power policy in the early stages.

The Minister of Labour had said that if any statement of policy were to be made he would make it in the house. Then the hon. member for York-Sunbury goes on:

> Who laid down the policy for the Department of National Defence after the mobilization act was passed? Who was the government's spokesman before the Canadian club at Ottawa but the chief of general staff of this country when the minister did not have the guts to get up and do it himself.

The hon. member refers to the policy with regard to the thirty-day training programme which was put into force in 1940, and the implication, and not only the implication but the statement is there, that the minister had not the courage to make an announcement in the house with regard to that policy but left it to the chief of the general staff to make the announcement. I have looked up the facts and the dates, and if the hon. member had been sticking to the facts he would have said that on July 29, 1940, three months before the chief of the general staff spoke on the subject, I made a very full statement in the house with regard to the government's defence programme in which I dealt particularly with the thirty-day training policy. I do not propose to trouble the committee by reading that statement of mine with regard to the thirty-day training plan. It appears in Hansard of July 29, 1940, at pages 2094 and 2096.

In order to ascertain whether there could have been any doubt in the public mind about the minister having made such a statement I looked at the newspapers and I found that the Montreal Gazette of July 30, 1940, nearly three months before the chief of the general staff spoke to the Canadian club, carried this headline right across the front page:

> Drafted militia to start training October 1 —Will call 30,000 monthly for thirty days of army drill under new defence policy.

On the same page of the Gazette appears a summary by the Canadian Press in which this paragraph appears:

> Compulsory training of men called starts October 1 with 30,000 a month called and trained thereafter.

I might add that on September 13, 1940, over a month before the chief of the general staff made his speech to the Canadian club, the proclamation with respect to the thirty-days training was issued and appeared in the papers of this country on September 19, 1940. Further, in order that it may be understood that the public was thoroughly acquainted with the thirty-days training policy which I as the minister principally concerned had announced in the house on July 29, the first camp was held on October 9, 1940, two weeks before the chief of the general staff made his speech to the Canadian club.

With these facts before him, Mr. Chairman, one can hardly understand a member of this house, and particularly a member of the legal profession, who ought to be careful in regard to the facts when making a statement, making the statement which the hon. member for York-Sunbury did last night, indicating that the chief of the general staff had to make this announcement on behalf of the minister because the minister did not have the guts to make the announcement himself.

I want to add that General Crerar was not the spokesman for the government. This matter has been brought up twice before by my hon. friend and on the last occasion he had the propriety to withdraw the statement which he had made to the effect that the chief of the general staff was put up by the government to introduce the subject of thirty-days training. The hon. member withdrew that statement and his withdrawal appears at page 1556 of Hansard of March 14, 1941.

All I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that on both counts my hon. friend's statement is incorrect and without any foundation whatever. I do not want to lengthen the discussion or add to the acidity of the remarks my hon. friend has made, but I do want to say that at least in my humble opinion my hon. friend is entirely too prone to make on the spur of the moment interjections which are not in line with facts. I want to say further that we might expect better of my hon. friend in that respect as a member of my own profession. To make a statement regarding a member which is wholly unfounded in fact is bad enough, but to make it in the language which my hon. friend used, which was both crude and offensive, is an offence against the rules of debate, and I ask my hon. friend to withdraw the statement in its entirety. I leave it to him to make any amends he thinks are appropriate under the circumstances, having regard to the relations that exist between members of this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I have this to observe, that when I made the statement I made last night in response to the statement of the Minister of Labour that when any government policy was to be announced the announcement would be made in the house, I had in mind that on very many occasions government policy was not announced in parliament but was announced through the medium of the radio, press releases and the like, and I thought that was improper. The chief offence that I have committed, if one is to characterize it as an offence, is the use of a good old Anglo-Saxon word "guts".

Mr. RALSTON: Not by any means.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that has wounded the susceptibilities of the Minister of National Defence I will substitute for it the words "intestinal fortitude", which may be a little more palatable. But I adhere in general to the observations I have made in this house on more than one occasion that government policy has more often been announced outside this house than inside.

Mr. LITTLE: Not on that occasion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not concerned with that particular occasion. I am deprecating the practice which has grown up ever since the war started of announcing government policy outside the house and enunciated outside this house by men who are not responsible to parliament.

Mr. RALSTON: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I have cited two specific instances in which the hon. member for York-Sunbury has made a statement regarding myself which is contrary to the facts. I have also quoted the offensive word which my hon. friend has used, contrary to the rules of debate. I submit this is not the time for my hon. friend to be making a general statement, going all around the subject. I ask him either as a man or as a member, and I believe he is both, to withdraw his statement or else take the consequences. I ask him to abide by the ruling of the Chair. I should have expected my hon. friend, when faced with the statement I have just made to the effect that I had announced the thirty-day training plan in this house three months before the chief of the general staff made his speech to the Canadian club, to say, "I was wrong and I withdraw". I suggest also that he might have been expected to withdraw the word he used which was offensive. By the way, Mr. Chairman, this is the same gentleman who objected to my using the word "gibe" with reference to something he had said, and which I readily withdrew. I say to my hon. friend and to you, Mr. Chairman, that we are now engaged with only one matter, and that is the question of privilege with regard to myself. I ask that the hon. gentleman withdraw.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that in a matter of this kind the hon. gentleman can ask me to withdraw. He can state his position and the matter ends there.

Mr. RALSTON: Not at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the chairman rules that I must withdraw I will withdraw, but on the general principle of the policy which I was attacking, that the government's policy has never on any occasion been announced in this house, but outside the house and by irresponsible officers of the government, I do not withdraw.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend did not even mention anything with regard to general principle. He made the statement concerning myself that I had not the guts to stand up and announce a policy in the house, but that I left it to the chief of the general staff. I have stated that, three months before the chief of the general staff made his address, I announced this policy in the house, and I have shown that it had received attention in the press of the country. I ask my hon. friend, who is an old parliamentarian, if he withdraws that statement or not. Surely anyone knowing the practice of this house should not get up and talk all around the point, the way the hon. member has.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister says that on the express item under discussion I am in error, and he has Hansard there to prove it, I will withdraw the remark, but I do not withdraw the charge which underlies the statement I made, that, as a matter of general policy, this government has more often erred in announcing government policy outside the house when parliament was not in session than when it was in session. And that is what the Minister of Labour was endeavouring to say, that he has always laid down matters of policy—

Mr. RALSTON: I am not interested in the Minister of Labour on this point.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I think I should have some rights in this discussion.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member must confine himself to the point. My hon. friend had it his own way last night when he got up and made a statement when I was not here. I say as a lawyer he is faced with the facts. I have referred to Hansard and given him the reference, and I have read him the newspaper report with regard to the matter. I should think he would have shown greater courtesy and compliance with the rules of debate had he withdrawn at once the offensive statement he made.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. RALSTON: I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: On the point of order, I submit respectfully that the only words which an hon. member must withdraw are words which are unparliamentary.

An hon. MEMBER: False statements.

Mr. POULIOT: And I submit, Mr. Chairman, what you have to decide is whether or not the language used by the hon. member for York-Sunbury was parliamentary. If it was parliamentary, he has not to withdraw it, and if it was unparliamentary, he must withdraw it. I will tell you the reason, and it is obvious. When an hon. member makes a statement about a thing which has been done by another hon. member, when it is not a thing which is against the laws of the country, and when the other hon. member rises and denies it, it is up to us to make our choice between what has been said by either member. The statement is there and the denial is there. Well, what have you to decide? We assume, sir, that when an hon. member makes a remark which is not unparliamentary about another hon. member and the latter rises in his seat to contradict him and deny what has been said, the incident must be closed. If I say this, it is because I suffered so much at the hands of a previous Speaker and a previous chairman of the committee of the whole that I took the trouble to study the whole matter. Now it is up to you to decide whether the language of the hon. gentleman was parliamentary or not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before you make your decision, Mr. Chairman, allow me to say that my apprehension of the rules is decidedly along the line enunciated by the hon. member for Témiscouata. If I have used unparliamentary language I must withdraw it. If I used unparliamentary language yesterday I do withdraw it. But with respect to the opinion which I gave yesterday and to which I endeavoured to give re-expression to-day, I adhere to it.

Mr. RALSTON: This very same statement was withdrawn a year ago—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Probably under pressure.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, under pressure or not under pressure; is my hon. friend withdrawing the withdrawal now? This statement with regard to the chief of the general staff was withdrawn a year ago. All I want to say is that the accusation of a minister not having the guts to get up and make an announcement of a policy, when it is both false and offensive, is unparliamentary; secondly, that my hon. friend does have to accept the statement of another member, particularly when he is faced with Hansard and faced with the extracts which I have read.

Mr. DUPUIS: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it the situation is this. According to the records of the house the hon. member for York-Sunbury said that the policy of thirty days' training was announced by the chief of the general staff, whereas in fact the minister proves that three months before the chief of the general staff announced that outside of the house, the minister himself had announced the policy in this house. I claim that not only is the word "guts" offensive, but the opinion which the hon. member just expressed is wrong and false, and in these circumstances I humbly submit that a false statement must be withdrawn. The hon. member for York-Sunbury is a gentleman and an old parliamentarian, whom I have often admired for what he did in the house when he was chief of his party, and I know that he will not allow it to be said in this house by future hon. members that he set a bad example for those who come after him.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a great blandishment, I am sure.

Mr. DUPUIS: That it is a false statement, if I may use so strong a word, has been proven beyond any shadow of doubt by the Minister of National Defence. He has referred to Hansard of September, 1940, three months before the chief of staff ever made a pronouncement; the statement in the newspaper is produced, everything is proved, including the proclamation; all the evidence is adduced sufficient to show to the satisfaction of the hon. member for York-Sunbury that he made a mistake. If one would not venture to say his statement was false, at any rate it was incorrect. It is the same as though I would say that the hon. member for Témiscouata came to Chambly and preached communism; it would not be unparliamentary but it would be false, and he would have the right to rise in his place and say that I should withdraw that statement because it is false. Consequently I expect, as I believe every hon. member irrespective of party expects, that the hon. gentleman will make an unqualified withdrawal.

The CHAIRMAN: The question of privilege brought up by the Minister of National Defence is indeed an intricate one. First, it implies the matter of a personal attack or reflection which must of necessity be withdrawn. It also implies a wide statement relative to a large section of our active service force or ranking military officers. I will read to the committee standing order 41, citation 313:

> It has been formally ruled by Speakers in the Canadian commons that a statement by an hon. member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted,—

Of course that will apply to the statement made by the Minister of National Defence denying that the statement made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury is a true one. In a matter of the kind there is no question of a personal attack; it is a matter of accepting a statement made by the minister. The citation continues:

> —but it is not unparliamentary to temperately criticize statements made by a member as being contrary to the facts; but no imputation of intentional falsehood is permissible.

I have listened attentively to the discussion and in my opinion the member for York-Sunbury has withdrawn his remarks with reference to the Minister of National Defence, and done so unequivocally. I suggest to the hon. member that he should accept the statement of the minister so far as he himself is concerned, and that if I understood him rightly, he also acquiesced in that statement. This is the ruling that I am applying to the point of order and question of privilege.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to say just a few words in this debate. The Prime Minister need not weary in well doing, and he may take comfort in the reflection that there has never been a subject like foreign affairs on which any two persons in this country have agreed. There will always be wide differences of opinion between those who do not and those who do take the view that the British empire has been, throughout the ages, the agency that has promoted the welfare of humanity and preserved the liberties of civilization. We have two great races in this country who were allies in the last war, and our partners of that time deserved a better fate than befell them.

I suggest that we have never had a foreign policy in Canada. This debate has shown the wavering and the doubts and fears which many members have had in this house. It seems that some hon. members have always wanted to depend on other people for our security—on peace pacts, on leagues, on doctrines of collective security, on pan-Americanism, the Monroe doctrine, the Kellogg pact, the Locarno treaty, the Briand pact and many other promises of that sort. These gentlemen have always depended upon these props for the security of this country.

Now is the time for us to recapture the spirit of the empire, because if we do not recapture that spirit when the country is at war we shall forget all about it when the war is over. There has been the same trouble in all the democratic countries, Canada, the mother country and the United States. Not one of these ever had a foreign policy. Canada has never had a foreign policy, nor has the United States, and the result is that we found ourselves in this awful war. When the great Napoleonic war which lasted for twenty-three years, from 1793 on, broke out, it found Britain unprepared. We nearly lost that war, the first half of which ended in the peace of Amiens in 1801. The British people at that time were depending on the hope of peace and on the pacifist spirit and had no adequate forces for defence, and the war that broke out again in 1801, and lasted until 1815 again saw the British people unprepared, although they won it. Again, the twenty years between these two great modern wars, 1918 to 1938, have been the most disastrous in the history of civilization. In fact, civilization was nearly ended when in 1939 this present war broke out.

If we are to continue this state of affairs we are going to have another war and it will not be very long after this one is over. I say to the Prime Minister: Do not forget, in dealing with foreign affairs, that Russia is not at war with Japan, nor is China at war with Germany. Do not forget these two principles. We are allied to two great imperial powers, splendid countries, the United States and Russia. They may not be imperial in the sense of wanting to grab territory; that remains to be seen. But if we are to judge by certain things that have been said in the United States senate and congress with reference to this question, we cannot be too sure on this point. One senator, from Maryland, wishes to have outright possession of the British Caribbean bases. Senator Reynolds of North Carolina wants Wrangel island and certain Dutch possessions in the western hemisphere to go to the United States, and other senators want Bermuda and so on. They also make reference to the lease-lend act. I say, they may not be imperial in the sense of wanting to appropriate territory, but some of their leading public men have indicated a desire for something of that sort.

Russia is in the same position. They are imperial like the United States in the sense that they want to have a much larger share in world affairs and a much larger share in the peace terms and in the new world to come, and unless Canada is wrapped up with the British empire, unless she is part and parcel of the commonwealth to which we belong, her position may be precarious, and we shall have little say in the peace terms. The Canadian people have shown unequivocally that they want to remain in the empire. The old empire may have gone but there is a new empire to take its place, and it will stand, as the old empire has always stood down through the ages, for all that will advance the cause of humanity. The people of this country, on the occasion of the visit of their majesties in 1939, showed the tremendous popularity of the monarchy in Canada. That spirit was demonstrated in all our provinces and nowhere more fully than in Quebec where the school children gave them such a magnificent reception.

I believe in a foreign policy for Canada. We have none at the present time. Can any hon. member tell me what the foreign policy of Canada was before the war? We had none. We had no foreign policy in the twenty years that intervened between the first great war and this one. As I say, there were people in this country who were depending upon pacifist agencies that preached international security and international peace, for the preservation of the freedom which we, in common with the people in the rest of the empire, have enjoyed for so long. But all these peace hopes collapsed in 1939 and we found ourselves in this greatest war of all times.

Let us not forget the lessons of history in this regard. One eminent author has made this statement. He says that we are gambling with the lives and happiness of millions, and the human race is in jeopardy. We cannot be forever blowing bubbles and talking a lot of salon sentimental nonsense about the true Germans. If that is what a voluble self-righteous section of the British intelligentsia have been talking for the past twenty years, he says, then it is hopeless.

In the twenty years between the two wars the democracies all lost the sense of self-preservation in their lunatic policies of disarmament. They no longer thought it necessary that we should have armies, navies or air forces. They simply abandoned any attempt at self-preservation, and that apathy helped to bring on this war. Political apathy and ignorance are the axis' best friends. The same propaganda is going on now, and we are faced with a total lack of any foreign policy. This is equally true of the United States and the mother country. No great country has ever existed for so long a time with so little in the form of a foreign policy as the United States. A foreign policy involves certain commitments in the way of preparedness, but the United States, Britain, and Canada as well, thought of nothing but disarmament. As I say, we had lost the instinct of self-preservation. The fact is that we have never really studied the German political soul in all its horror. As Mrs. Maxse in England has said: We are fighting against a deadweight of dead yesterdays, and Germany has been strong because we have been the ally of laissez-faire. We have fought two world wars in the space of one generation because we would not face the facts. Germany has fought five great wars in the last eighty years and there will be another war. But people will be found who will talk about poor old Germany and allow her to rebuild after this second great conflict. The German people are the same yesterday, to-day and forever. The first I learned about them was in reading Tacitus and the story of the Holy Roman Empire by Bryce and Gibbon, and then we come to the wars of Frederick the Great, at Silesia, and continue on to the last war and this one. Yes, Mr. Chairman; the German people are the same yesterday, to-day and forever, and there is no use slobbering over these people. They hate Britain, they hate Canada, they hate the British empire. They are out to beat the rest of the world because they want world domination. If we allow this thing to happen there will be a third war. That is what may happen if we accept the position that has been proposed in this house in the last few days as the basis of our foreign policy. Are we to depend upon some other international body? There will always be nations. Are we to depend upon a new pacifist league or some such thing, as was said in the house on July 1? I am absolutely opposed to this doctrine and I have been consistently opposed to it. You will have to arm all along the line and keep armed. After this war is over you will find that our great allies to the south will be isolationists again. I read the debates of the Senate and the House of Representatives and I know what is happening. That country speaks with two voices. Those people are our friends and neighbours, we are fond of them, we have good relations with them because they are our kith and kin, but after all is said and done they will respect us much more if we tell them the truth, if we tell them what we are doing to preserve peace and progress in the world. I know a great many United States people and I have a great many friends in that country. I believe the average United States citizen would be better pleased if the people of this country stood up for their own country once in a while.

We have a glorious empire and the administration of our colonial empire will be one of the glorious pages of history. I believe in what Mr. Churchill said the other day, and I think the overwhelming majority of this country do so as well. He said that he had not become Prime Minister in order to see the empire liquidated, or to see the empire go down under the hammer by default. If she does go down, what will happen to Canada? Canada needs the empire and the empire needs Canada. Great Britain needs the United States just as much as the United States needs Great Britain. I believe in what Mr. Churchill said. I know that our new empire to come after this war will do its duty towards civilization and liberty as it has always done in the past.

We are a democracy, and every democracy that I know of that has existed between the two wars has depended upon the pacifist agencies I have named. We will have the same trouble again. Now is the time to change and adopt a different policy. We were not alone in following this course. Other democracy countries became helpless. They thought that everything was over, that there would be no war, that they could disarm and depend upon the league and notes. I have sat in this house for years and I have read the debates that took place in the twenty years between the two wars. I know the attitude adopted by the isolationists and separatists; they contended that we could depend upon these agencies. I can remember March 31, 1939, when a bill was introduced by the former member for Selkirk, Hon. Mr. Thorson. When that bill was proposed if war came Canada should be a neutral country. It sought to define the status of Canada as a belligerent. At that time we had nothing to be belligerent with because we had thrown everything away. There was some support for this bill from all sides of the house, but I opposed it. I have been charged with the unforgivable sin of having been proved to be right all along on the armament question between the two wars. I was in advance of public opinion on many of these matters, and right along I was in favour of full cooperation and coordination with Great Britain.

I am absolutely opposed to any policy that will bring us into any pan-American union. We are friends in trade and for peace with them as always. That would be fatal to this country. We have no right to make some political or military agreement with the Latin powers or any other country which have been named in this agreement. Do not forget that these Latin republics are under the lend-lease act. When the lend-lease act was first conceived the United States was neutral. They had the Johnson act which outlined the status of a belligerent, and treated the axis the same as the peace nations, and they had a cash-and-carry policy, up to six months before the days of Pearl Harbor. Then the lease-lend act came into being but Germany had been given an opportunity to develop her submarine warfare, as the Neutrality Act presented Germany with an Atlantic fleet. This act was devised to enable the countries fighting the axis to obtain United States arms. Then Pearl Harbor happened and we declared war the day after. The Prime Minister acted promptly in the matter.

We nearly had a Pearl Harbor ourselves in the St. Lawrence at St. Pierre-Miquelon. This was prevented by General de Gaulle going in there at the request of the inhabitants and taking over the islands in order to prevent them from falling into German hands. The people on these islands have been friends of Britain for many years past. When congress declared war the United States declared to bring the conflict to a successful determination and they pledged all the resources of the country to that end. The agreement which the Latin countries who are recipients of the lend-lease have signed contains a clause providing for free commercial intercourse after the war and the reduction of tariffs and all trade barriers. I do not think we should enter a pan-American agreement under circumstances like that. If you do you are going to have another league of nations made up of these countries, some of which have been friendly to our enemies. I am absolutely opposed to that. We have no right to enter into such an arrangement over the heads of other members of the empire. What we want is a united empire and a united policy, not only during the course of the war but when the war is over.

Great Britain should not be blamed for all the things that have been done on foreign policy, because some of the things done in the name of Britain were asked for by the dominions. Look at the statute of Westminster, for instance. I always opposed that in this house. It was in that statute that we heard the high-sounding words "commonwealth of nations". I think I heard them for the first time, used by Lord Rosebery in 1905. In my opinion this is simply an empire-wrecking statute that divided the dominion and empire, and it is one of the reasons why we have had a second war. I do not know whether Australia or New Zealand have signed it yet, but I believe it has been up recently for discussion. We shall have to have a foreign policy based on the principle that right plus might is right. No longer can we throw away our defence. We shall have to be armed. You will find after the war certain people will again become isolationists and therefore our foreign policy with the rest of the empire should be right plus might is right. Whether or not we shall have that remains to be seen. I hope we shall not help these people to go up to Geneva near Orillia. They should take a holiday this year. I do not know why a fine county like Simcoe has to have these pacifists, isolationists and others. They are the most motley pacifist collection of people I have ever seen. All they do there is talk international pacifism and if they have their way we will have another war. Some of them are all right, but most of them were wrong during the pre-war days and have been wrong on foreign policy for twenty-two years.

I believe it is only fair to say that this country in the twenty years between the two wars was the chief drifter from empire policy

In the imperial conference of 1937 when these matters came up we said we had no commitments; parliament would decide. We were asked about a shipping policy, an empire shipping policy. The Prime Minister will correct me if I am wrong, as I have not the book with me, but it was said we had no commitments, that parliament would decide. I do not quarrel with that although I personally object to that policy. There was nothing new about it. Other countries were doing the same as to disarmament as Canada. It was felt there would be no more wars, therefore it was not necessary to have any more navies, armies or air force. What happened? We threw away our defences as well as our friends and did not see a new war coming.

I was glad to read the remarks made by Mr. Churchill the other day in connection with foreign affairs. History will show that Mr. Chamberlain was one of England's greatest men. The same applies to the whole Chamberlain family. A Munich was necessary because neither Britain nor France singly or collectively were ready for war and were no match for Germany. We heard statements in room 16 the other day about the utter lack of any defences or preparations of the mother country. Had it not been for Munich and the one year's respite, the empire would have gone, Britain would have lost the war and Hitler would have been in London in no time. Therefore we should pay tribute to the mother country for what it has done to save us in this country after Dunkirk, and also what it has done in connection with protection on the Atlantic and on the Pacific.

The keystone of the policy should be that no British territory shall be handed over to any international control. The United States will not give away any territory. They will not give away Alaska, the Panama canal or any other part of their territory. Some people want Bermuda to be taken away from the empire. Others want Russia to hand over Wrangel island. As part of the British empire our policy should be to back up Great Britain and the other dominions to the extent that the empire shall not be liquidated. Are we going to support a policy of throwing away the people in the colonies of the empire, people who have stood by the empire in its darkest days, because some other power wants to grab them?

I believe the people of this country are overwhelmingly behind the people of the mother country. They are anxious to see the right thing done at the peace conference so that the empire does not go by default.

In view of the commitments which are proposed I am pleased to see that Canada has so far kept out of lease-lend entanglements because of the grave dangers that lie ahead after the war. Owing to disarmament the empire has had to give bases from Newfoundland to British Guiana to the United States in return for some fifty-six old destroyers, many of which were obsolete. Many of them have had to return to Annapolis for repairs. It was a most unfortunate position for the people of the countries concerned and the dominions to be placed in. For the last one hundred years certain people have wanted the territory to which I have referred. Because of the lease-lend provisions it will be difficult at the peace conference to settle these empire matters. These bases have been leased for ninety-nine years, which is practically freehold.

Last Sunday there was held in Toronto a glorious fourth of July service at St. Paul's Anglican church, Toronto. The Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition were invited to be present, but unfortunately they could not be there. At that service a stone was presented to St. Paul's, Toronto, by the Bishop of Maryland. Speaking of our relations with the United States, Bishop Renison said:

> There is an unwritten bond between the peoples of the United States of America and those who live in the far-flung British empire. It is not true that the British, or even the English, are of one blood. Their various flexible types, ideas and originality bear witness to the mingling, through their long history, of the Anglo-Saxons, the Celts, the Romans and the Normans. The same thing is more apparently true concerning Americans. Some one asked whether there was a special prayer for Americans in the old English Prayer Book and the answer was: "You can find it in the petition for all sorts and conditions of men." But a wise Englishman happily replied: "That petition was made for the English and it fits them."
> Speaking generally, we have the same history; we come from the same stock; we have the same heroes between the 10th and 18th centuries. Long before there was any thought of a formal alliance of the English-speaking peoples, there was a mystic tie which united them in spite of themselves and without their knowledge.
> We are all influenced by our history. In that glorious eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews you can find the honour roll of the people of Israel. It comes as a surprise to us to learn that the old prophets did not hesitate to speak to their people of the glorious deeds of their ancestors with a religious intensity. We too easily take it for granted that we must look to the Sacred Canon alone for our inspiration and comfort in these days of world destiny. If we could reincarnate the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, he would ask us to turn our eyes to the glorious history of God's dealing for a thousand years. We can image the writer making such verses as these:
> By faith, Alfred the Great gathered the scattered tribes of Albion in the nine century, and laid the foundation of the English nation.

By faith, Edward the Confessor builded Westminster Abbey, to be a shrine forever in lands not yet discovered.

By faith, John Wycliffe translated the Word of God from a dead language into a living tongue.

By faith, Drake and Raleigh sailed the uncharted seas and carried the soul of England to distant parts of the world.

By faith, John Milton wrote of Paradise Lost, and, when he was blind, sang of the city where they need no candle, neither light of the sun.

By faith, John Hampden resisted a tyrant king and died for liberty on Chalgrove Field.

By faith, Abraham Lincoln freed the slaves and saved the Union; hopeful in disaster, in victory he was merciful, and with charity toward all and hatred toward none he strove to bind up his nation's wounds. In dying, he joined the Immortals.

By faith, Thomas Edison searched for the gifts which God had hidden for men to find; he made the deaf to hear; he made his country a family; and to those who since the beginning of life on this planet had nightly sat in darkness he turned their night into day.

He then speaks of Shakespeare, and continues:

In Lincoln in Chicago there is a statute to the greatest man that England ever produced. He was not a soldier, but a poet. Here is the inscription:

"He was not for an age, but for all time, our many-minded Shakespeare." . . .

The Niagara river is a parable of the story of the English-speaking people. It is the dividing line between the British empire and America. The waters coming from the great inland seas are compressed into the swift rapids of the Niagara river—a symbol of the early difficulties and misunderstandings of the 18th century. Then we come to the great cataract, which stands for the revolution and the separate destiny of the two English-speaking nations. Below there is the whirlpool and the gorge of the 19th century, with alternate rapids and still water succeeding each other; and then the river emerges into lake Ontario, and beyond that it flows through the great river of the St. Lawrence, ever wider and deeper, until it reaches the ocean.

Such is the story of our people.

The last war produced some great soldiers who have had a lot to do with the destiny of this country. I was at a service the Sunday before last for the Canadian corps and the Canadian legion in Riverdale park in my constituency, and all soldiers of the Toronto district. A great sermon was preached by the chaplain of the Queen's Own regiment. It was preached by a friend of the present Prime Minister, a friend of the Leader of the Opposition, and of the other leaders in the house. I refer to Lieutenant-Colonel the Right Reverend Canon H. F. D. Woodcock, canon of the Church of England, rector of Christ Church, Toronto. He spoke as a patriot about our empire, and asked that he might not be considered narrow or selfish if he were to speak about the empire's cause rather than the united nations' cause. The Globe and Mail newspaper article states:

He pointed out that the empire's cause is humanity's cause.

"We are gratified that we have such powerful allies" he said, and expressed the hope that the ties with the allies, the United States, China, Russia, might grow even stronger. And while some might ask, "Where would we be to-day without our allies?" He reminded his audience that after all it was the motherland who had "taken the deadly thrust in her heart, but did not die."

"I make a plea" he said, "for the strengthening of the imperial ties, because I believe no separate existence, however splendid, can compare with that which we now enjoy as joint heirs with the people of the motherland, of all the glorious traditions of her past, and joint partakers with them of the world prestige and power which that present partnership affords.

"Nationalism is not going to be abolished by this war" the speaker declared. "It is as natural to mankind as family life. But nationalism must not be exclusive. You cannot reconcile universal industrialization and exclusive nationalism."

And that is right. Let me say those who are planning for the world should take notice of those words. But let us not forget that the United States and Russia entered this war because they were attacked. Great Britain, the mother country, did not enter the war because she was attacked. She entered it because of the pledge she had made to Poland. She will be known as the good Samaritan of the nations. And she bore the brunt of the war for two years, and bore it alone.

Before the closing of the session some resolution ought to be passed, voicing our thanks to our troops. In the British House of Lords a similar resolution was passed on May 19, in the name of Viscount Cranborne. These were his words:

It will, His Majesty's government have felt, be the desire of parliament to record by a formal resolution its thanks to those who have contributed to this noble success. This is not the first occasion when parliament has voted a resolution of thanks to His Majesty's fighting forces. There are other famous precedents; after the battle of the Nile, after the battle of Trafalgar, after the battle of Waterloo, after the Indian Mutiny. Those are glorious names in our history. They will be remembered so long as Britain remains a nation. They will be passed down from father to son, long after we are dead, buried or forgotten. And so I believe will it be with this battle. This great struggle in which we are engaged is not yet over. Germany, Italy and Japan are not yet beaten. The road that we have yet to travel may be long and stony. But whatever trials and sacrifices lie before us we are, I hope and believe, through the mists of war beginning to see the end, and when Hitler and Hitlerism is an evil memory of the past, the tale of this great victory that has been won in Africa by free men for the cause of freedom will be handed down as an example and an inspiration to our children and our children's children.

I believe the time has arrived when the Prime Minister, who has a very wide knowledge of foreign affairs, and is a more or less learned man in connection with this work, should prepare a white paper with respect to our relations with that glorious country, France. That is the country with which we were allied in the first great war. That is the country with which we fought side by side in that war. I should like to see prepared a white paper which would clarify the situation as to North Africa, and in fact clarify our whole foreign affairs position. I do not believe in referring these matters to a committee on industrial and international relations. I believe it would be better if we had a plan under which we could ask questions every few days, when the orders of the day are called. That would surely be better, because we would discuss matters as they develop, and avoid long debates of this kind.

I believe the time has come when the people of Canada should be taken more into the confidence of the government. I pleaded for this on March 21, 1939, before the war broke out, upon which occasion I called the attention of the house to what Mr. Chamberlain had said. He pointed out that the people should be given the truth and the facts. I say they should be given the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth with respect to what is going on in connection with our foreign policy and this war, and they should be told what happened in the period of years between the two great wars. They should be given all that information. I do not believe we would have had a second world war if the people of the mother country and in allied countries had known the truth, the true state of affairs in respect of Germany, if they had known the truth about rearmament, and all that kind of thing.

On March 21, 1939 I urged that the people should be given the facts, because if they were not allowed to have the truth we would be embarking on a course fraught with great danger. I say the time has come when we should have before us a white paper setting out the details of what has happened in North Africa, in connection with General Giraud and General de Gaulle, and all that kind of thing. There has been a great deal of criticism of this in the British House of Commons, and outside that House of Commons in the British press and also in Canada to the real facts about France. I refer particularly to the Yorkshire Post, the Manchester Guardian and many other newspapers over there. The people of Canada have the right to have this information. I believe it would be a good thing if the Prime Minister would consider preparing a white paper along these lines.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Chairman, in the first place I wish to reassure the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) that what I have to say will help him spend a quiet and restful weekend. I do not think the statute of Westminster means much. I have it in my hand. It is divided into two parts, in the same fashion as any other piece of legislation. The first part is the preamble, and the second is the enacting portion, or the part that has the force of law.

The preamble contains some instructions which may refer to some understandings or agreements between the governments of the dominions, and the government of the United Kingdom, but it does not change in any way the status of the dominion. Let us consider them one after the other. The first paragraph of the preamble makes reference to past imperial conferences of 1928 and 1930. Then the second paragraph of the preamble contains these words:

> The crown is the symbol of the free association of the members of the British commonwealth of nations.

This has not been enacted anywhere else than in our own constitution. It is a consideration which is true. I admit that the crown is binding all the dominions together. Then it goes on to say:

> As they are united by a common allegiance to the crown, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position of all the members of the commonwealth in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the succession to the throne or the royal style and titles shall hereafter require the assent as well of the parliaments of all the dominions as of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

That is true. But we passed some legislation regarding the succession to the throne, and it was copied from the British act. It was a copy of what was passed at Westminster.

A great fuss was made to the effect that since the statute of Westminster His Excellency the Governor General is the direct representative of His Majesty the King. Before that he also represented the British government. We have heard some champions of autonomy declare in this country respecting the victory we have won, that His Excellency the Governor General represents only the King. What happened afterwards was that a British high commissioner was appointed in Canada, representing the British government. What difference is there between the governor general representing both the king and the British government, as obtained before, and the present condition where the governor general represents only the king and the British high commissioner represents the British government?

I should like to summarize later on a few of the provisions that are contained in the enacting part of the statute. Paragraph four of the preamble says:

> And whereas it is necessary for the ratifying, confirming and establishing of certain of the said declarations and resolutions of the said Conferences that a law be made and enacted in due form by authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

That is very important. I will repeat it:

> And whereas it is necessary for the ratifying, confirming and establishing of certain of the said declarations and resolutions of the said Conferences that a law be made and enacted in due form by authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

That is true; I admit it, and that is why I contend that what is mentioned in the preamble is part of this statute, but not of the enacting part of the statute. The preamble goes on:

> And whereas the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland have severally requested—

It was asked for by the dominions.

> —and consented to the submission of a measure to the parliament of the United Kingdom for making such provision with regard to the matters aforesaid as is hereafter in this act contained;

That is, matters such as I have mentioned. But it is not what I have already mentioned which counts in the statute of Westminster, although it does refer to some understanding between the various governments. What does count is what has been decided by the House of Commons and by the House of Lords at Westminster with the approval of his majesty. The preamble concludes:

> Now, therefore, be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, as follows.

What follows is the law, and it is not what was there before. There may have been some understanding between the various dominions with regard to such questions as the succession to the throne and matters of that kind, which have been adhered to by the British government but have not been mentioned in our constitution, the British North America Act. No change can be made to the British North America Act except by legislation at Westminster. There may be some argument regarding the new state of things that has subsequently developed which could be settled by conferences between the British government and the governments of the dominions; but so far as our constitution is concerned, it is an act of the parliament at Westminster and can be changed only by the parliament at Westminster. It is like a municipal by-law which can be amended only by another by-law and not by a resolution of the municipal council.

I never believed in the pompous designation of "dominion". It is pompous. It was something to satisfy the pride of colonials. Either Canada is a realm, as his majesty described it in speaking to the senate, and the record of that statement is also contained in our own Hansard, or we are not a dominion but just a colony.

There is no definition of a dominion in the statute of Westminster. For a definition we have to go to a book that belongs to the house and is put on the Clerk's table for our perusal. It is called "The Concise Oxford Dictionary" and it is for the Clerk's table. When there is no definition of a word in the interpretation section of a statute we have to seek for its meaning in the dictionary, not a common dictionary, but the dictionary on the Clerk's table for the use of Mr. Speaker or the chairman of the committee of the whole house when we are sitting in committee. Now what do we find in the Oxford dictionary, for use at the table of the House of Commons? I find this definition of "dominion":

> Dominion. (Dominion of Canada, name given to Canadian colonies united 1867).

That is what the dictionary says. Therefore we cannot pretend to be anything more than a colony. It is precisely because some British lord was afraid of what the effect might be in the United States if Canada were called a kingdom that Canada was given the pompous, I repeat, and false name of a dominion.

The first section of this act reads:

> In this act the expression "dominion" means any of the following dominions, that is to say, the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland.

It is precisely because some of the other dominions, especially Australia, South Africa and Ireland objected, not to the definition but to the meaning of the designation "dominion", that these countries are called the Commonwealth of Australia, the Union of South Africa, and the Irish Free State. They objected to the word "dominion" because it was a pompous designation for a colony. We should not go on stilts, Mr. Chairman, when we discuss external affairs and our status. There are some people, you know, who climb on stilts to appear greater than they are, and then after the speech is made, they drop down to earth again and become human beings. I now quote section 2 of the statute of Westminster:

(1) The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, shall not aply to any law made after the commencement of this act by the parliament of a dominion.

(2) No law and no provision of any law made after the commencement of this act by the parliament of a dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of any existing or future act of parliament of the United Kingdom, or to any order, rule or regulation made under any such act, and the powers of the parliament of a dominion shall include the power to repeal or amend any such act, order, rule or regulation in so far as the same is part of the law of the dominion.

In other words, the statute of Westminster repeals the Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865. It means that since 1931 if our legislation is in conflict with that of Great Britain it will be in force just the same. Two or three years ago, in my weekly column in a Montreal daily, I said it would be very interesting to have a check-up made of each statute passed by our parliament and by each legislature of this country from the time of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, until the passing of the statute of Westminster, 1931, and to compare each of our laws, both federal and provincial with each of the British statutes to see whether there was not some infringement somewhere. But nobody saw the joke. Moreover, I suggested that two senile judges who had been superannuated should start the work; they would have had to live as long as Methuselah to complete it.

Let us take note of section 7:

(1) Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

Therefore, sir, the statute of Westminster does not touch or change our constitution, the British North America Act, which remains the same. Then subsection 2:

(2) The provisions of section two of this act shall extend to laws made by any of the provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such provinces.

Which means that the Colonial Laws Validity Act applies not only to dominion acts but also to provincial acts. Then subsection 3:

(3) The powers conferred by this act upon the parliament of Canada or upon the legislatures of the provinces shall be restricted to the enactment of laws in relation to matters within the competence of the parliament of Canada or of any of the legislatures of the provinces respectively.

There is something extraordinary about section 3, which reads thus:

3. It is hereby declared and enacted that the parliament of a dominion has full power to make laws having extra-territorial operation.

Yes, sir, that is very fine; but what is the use of having it when on the other hand the disallowance provisions of the British North America Act are left there, in virtue of which our legislation is sent to Westminster and the British government has two years to disallow our legislation? What freedom do we have now? Or, if "freedom" is a rather stronger expression than I intended, I will use the word "autonomy".

4. No act of parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this act shall extend, or be deemed to extend, to a dominion as part of the law of that dominion, unless it is expressly declared in that act that that dominion has requested, and consented to the enactment thereof.

That is fair. But it is important to note what is repeated in the two subsections of section 2 and also in section 4—and this is why there was something serious in my suggestion about the judges. All the legislation which has been passed by our parliament from 1865 to 1931 and by our provinces from the date of their creation until 1931 is null and void, and remains null and void notwithstanding the statute of Westminster if it comes in conflict with any British law. We know nothing of the past; a check-up should be made. I say that very seriously, because the statute of Westminster had no retroactive effect on the matter.

5. Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provisions of this act, sections seven hundred and thirty-five and seven hundred and thirty-six of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, shall be construed as though reference therein to the legislature of a British possession did not include reference to the parliament of a dominion.

6. Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provisions of this act, section four of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, (which requires certain laws to be reserved for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure or to contain a suspending clause), and so much of section seven of that act as requires the approval of His Majesty in Council to any rules of court for regulating the practice and procedure of a colonial court of admiralty, shall cease to have effect in any dominion as from the commencement of this act.

The only difference between a so-called dominion and a colony is this, which we find in section 5, "Powers of dominion parliaments in relation to merchant shipping." I have read it. Afterwards there are sections which refer to dominions other than ours.

The matter was discussed at full length on June 30, 1931. I have not time to read this debate, but to students of parliamentary history and constitutional law I say, if you desire to know the views expressed on that occasion by Mr. Bennett, Mr. Lapointe and Mr. Ralston, you have only to go to Hansard. The matter was discussed on other occasions, especially on March 10, 1939. I tell you that I find that the statute of Westminster is just a kind of fictitious propaganda, the instrument of a sort of amphibious gentleman, a labour lord—I cannot conceive of labour lords—Lord Passfield, better known as Sidney Webb.

In the first place I find that the name "statute of Westminster" is the summit of absurdity to designate one statute in particular. I had it in mind to put a question on the order paper. "Besides the two 'statutes of Westminster' passed in the years 1275 and 1285, 18 Edward I, chapter 1, and the 'Statute of Westminster' 1931, 22 George V., chapter 4, were there other statutes of Westminster? If so, what are they, and how many were passed between 18 Edward I and 22 George V., during several centuries?" All enactments from Westminster are statutes of Westminster; why pick out this one and call it the statute of Westminster? "We will give you freedom; we will give you autonomy." But we find that it is very much restricted. I have heard some young men talk about the autonomy of this country; they say, "The statute of Westminster has put it in force." But it means nothing, or practically nothing; it is just fictitious propaganda to give the inhabitants of the dominions the impression that they are always walking on stilts and that they are much greater than they are.

On March 10, 1939, there was a debate on the Gariepy bill, reported at pages 1782-4 of Hansard. Mr. Gariepy was then member for Three Rivers, and the object of his bill was to establish the anniversary of the statute of Westminster as a statutory holiday. That was not enacted. On that occasion the late Mr. Lapointe spoke. He said:

> It is the bond that binds together the various parts of the commonwealth under the same crown.

I do not believe that. I believe that the bond that unites all parts of the British empire is the British crown, and I do not see how the statute of Westminster could be substituted for the crown in uniting the various parts of the British empire or the British commonwealth, or whatever name you choose to give it.

> Freedom is the cement that binds all these nations together . . . . The Statute of Westminster is a great step but it is not as final for Canada as it has been for most of the other dominions because of certain things which prevented complete nationhood, in spite of the fact that those obstacles are of our own will, are there because we want them to be there.

These obstacles exist because we want them to exist, and if we are not autonomous it is because we do not want to be autonomous. He is referring to the amendment to the constitution.

> First . . . how can it be accepted in international law that we are a fully sovereign nation when we have to resort to the parliament of another country to effect changes in our constitutional structure?

I fully agree with that. Now with regard to the privy council:

> Litigants from Canada must go to the mother country to get a final decision in Canadian cases.

I would be in favour of appeals to the privy council if the members of that tribunal were not also politicians, because they belong to the House of Lords. If the privy council were completely independent of politics, I would be for it. I would be for the continuation of our system, for a very simple reason. Everybody speaks of the independence of judges. Judges should be like Caesar's wife, above every reproach. I have no objection to having a case decided in London any more than having international settlements made at Geneva. How can men who went to Geneva or to the Hague in Holland for the settlement of their disputes object to decisions being given by the privy council in London? I am opposed to it because those judges are politicians; they belong to the House of Lords. Otherwise they would be fully qualified to act as our final judges, and the question of cost is nothing, because there is so much provided for the office of the Canadian high commissioner in London that it would be possible to engage a couple of solicitors in London at $10,000 a year to submit all cases to the privy council.

> We cannot say that we have complete equality of status and full sovereignty until we have a Canadian flag.

It is true that a flag is a symbol of sovereignty, but it must mean something. In my part of the country, when the framework of a building is finished, the custom and the tradition is to put the head of a pine tree on top, and that indicates to all those who pass by that, although the building is not completed, the framework is. But how can we put a flag in the air, like castles in Spain, when there is nothing there to support it? Only sovereign nations can have a flag. A flag must mean something, because if it means nothing, if it does not mean autonomy, I do not see why we should have it. That is my humble view. There must be a meaning to it, and so long as there is no meaning we cannot have our flag. It is not a question of not being patriotic or being a good Canadian. I find that we have enough illusions with regard to the statute of Westminster and it is time to put a stop to them and to take things as they are. What would be of greater importance for us than having a flag would be to consider each piece of legislation in a truly Canadian spirit. Our legislation should have Canadian inspiration and not inspiration from outside. It would be much better to start at the bottom and then gradually climb to the top. Mr. Lapointe then went on to say:

> The three matters I have mentioned will have to be dealt with and definitely solved before we can say that we are like the other dominions which have all done so.

They themselves, however, were subject to the illusion of autonomy in their constitutions. It was said that they could amend the constitutions themselves, but in each constitution there was provision for the disallowance of their legislation at Westminster. Where would they go? If their amendment to their constitution should happen to displease Westminster, the British government can disallow it at any time within two years. The only country where that does not prevail is Eire.

Mr. Lapointe also spoke on March 31, 1939, on the question of neutrality with reference to the subject of a foreign policy. He is reported at page 2466 of Hansard. He spoke first of a common national status. We have no Canadian citizenship, and Canadian citizenship should come before the flag. Second, he referred to the use of the diplomatic and consular functions of Britain. I did not agree with the Prime Minister when he said that the new Canadian consul general in New York should work in close cooperation with the British officials over there. We may be in conflict with regard to trade and business, but conflict in regard to trade is emulation, not war, and the duty of the consul general in New York is not to receive instructions from the British ambassador or the British consul general, but to take instructions, from this government only, for the best interests of the country.

The third point to which Mr. Lapointe referred was the foreign enlistment act; the fourth, the British preference, and the fifth, shipping legislation.

At the special session of 1939 he mentioned these matters and he is reported at page 66 of Hansard. What he said was this, in effect. For all these reasons, it is impossible for this country to be neutral. It shows also that we are not autonomous. And what I complain of is that this country is described as autonomous when it is not. I am making an argument now, and I do not say to the imperialists that it is better to be autonomous than not to be, because I want them to have a restful week-end. But so long as we are not autonomous and so long as our legislation can be disallowed within two years by the British government, I do not see how we can say that we are free and are not under guardianship, and that we should have a flag. That flag should be at half-mast.

There are some other things, but I should like to see this country autonomous in fact. I mean by that, through legislation, as opposed to the many eloquent words that we hear from so many lips. In our national acts we should always proceed with the first thought for the interests of this country. In the second place we should not feel too much impressed by outsiders who come here. At the present time some of our statesmen seem to have an unfortunate inferiority complex when outsiders are concerned. They consider that they are much better than Canadians simply because they come from outside the country. I am referring particularly to certain experts who have come here from Great Britain, the United States or other places.

Then there is another consideration, which was so well expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), about our taking part in the pan-American union. Most of us were born in this country, and many of those who were not born here have become real Canadians; they want to make this country their own for themselves and for those who will come after them. All realize that the future of the world will be mostly on this continent; I mean in the two Americas. I do not know how it will be taken, but I have a suggestion to make. I suggest that the motto of each part of the British empire, at least the colonies that are called dominions, should be the French motto of, "liberté, égalité, fraternité." By liberty I mean autonomy in legislation under the British crown. What fraternity do we practise with the other dominions? There is one dominion which has been given the cold shoulder.

I do not intend to argue this point, but when the war is over it will be over for the neutrals as well as for those who have been at war. In my humble opinion the duty of Canada, which has been doing so much for other countries, immediately after the war will be to do everything possible for Ireland, not only for Eire but for Northern Ireland as well. Help should be given to this dominion because they are the closest to us; they are between us and England and Scotland.

An hon. MEMBER: Geographically.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly; that is what I meant. On account of financial difficulties and other matters Ireland has suffered from poverty. If help is to come from this side of the Atlantic, it should come from Canada in the first place. I do not intend to discuss the war situation because a resume was given this afternoon by the Prime Minister, and I do not want to take up too much time. But I do want to burst the balloon of the statute of Westminster. It is very dangerous to give some people the impression that they have rights that they may claim when in fact they have none. If some members differed from the government on the question of neutrality and other matters at the beginning of the war, it was by reason of the undue importance that was given to the so-called rights which we are supposed to have under the statute of Westminster and which are non-existent. I thank all hon. members for the kind attention they have given me. I have spoken to them as a true Canadian who does not want his fellow citizens to be foiled any more in connection with this matter.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Chairman, I know of no more important debate that could take place in this parliament than one concerning the relationship of Canada to other parts of the empire and our foreign relations generally. I am sure that all of us were impressed to-day by the optimistic tone of the Prime Minister's speech in so far as the war situation is concerned. As he spoke I coupled his remarks with the indication he gave the other day that we in Canada, in common with other parts of the empire, are on the eve of tremendous developments on the battle fronts. The right hon. gentleman gave the warning that in the near future the blood of our own kith and kin will be shed wherever the invasion is commenced. It was not by the statute of Westminster, which merely placed in statute form the status of the component parts of this empire, nor by the Balfour declaration of 1926 that Canada gained a position of equality with other parts of the empire; it was gained by the sacrifice and service of those who gave their all in the last war, and is being maintained at this moment by the service of those who are in the armed forces in this war.

What I have to say to-day is not comprised in any set speech. Anything I have prepared has been prepared during the day and represents the results of some thought given to matters of foreign policy and our relations within the empire over a period of years. There are few Canadians who have any illusions that this nation will be able to remain neutral or isolated or adopt an attitude of being uninterested in foreign affairs during the years to come. In spite of the speeches that one sometimes hears made, such as the one made not so long ago by a member of another house, Canadians as a whole appreciating their membership in the British empire have no desire to depart from that relationship. They are prepared to accept not only that relationship but the responsibility of cooperation with and assistance to other parts of the empire in the years to come. The opposition believes and I quote:

> That the guarantee of freedom, security and opportunity for Canadians will be found in the strengthening of the British commonwealth, its closer association with the United States and the other allies in this war and in the application of the principles of the Atlantic charter.

Canadian unity is dependent upon the continuance of Canada as a part of the British commonwealth. One could not imagine the various races and creeds in this country, the existence of rights and of responsibilities as between those various peoples comprising Canada, in any other relationship than within the empire, bound together in the empire by a spirit of loyalty and affection to the crown.

I was disappointed that the Prime Minister did not deal with the matter, although he has made reference to it in the past. Having regard to international transportation and communications by air, and having regard to the fact that the circumference of the world has shrunk to the point where no nation is distant from any other nation to-day more than sixty hours, with the result that international non-cooperation, isolation or separatism can no longer constitute a policy for the nation, we must look forward to the post-war problems that the Prime Minister says are now engaging the attention of certain committees to the end that in the post-war development Canada as the centre of the universe in the new air maps which are being issued will take her proper place within this empire in advancing civil aviation.

Before I deal with that I wish to make a few general observations. I believe that in recent years we have learned one thing, as was so well expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) in his speech this morning. Canada can no longer take a negative foreign policy attitude. Her attitude from now on must be one of a positive nature. Our interests in foreign affairs geographically parallel those of the United States, and we are bound to the crown by history and tradition. The crown symbolizes the common unity, the common purpose, the common concept of institutions based on freedom and liberty. The United States of America, as a nation friendly to us and a nation whose co-operation means so much to the empire and to Canada has many problems in common with ours. To those who say the day of annexation is here, I say they do not represent the viewpoint of the Canadian people; for on this continent there is ample room for two great nations, one a free and independent member of the British commonwealth, the other the Republic of the United States of America, joined together in close association.

The Prime Minister himself must feel a source of satisfaction in the development of the relations between Canada and the United States which has occurred during the period that he has been in public life as Prime Minister or as leader of the opposition. When we look at the development since the last war; when we look at the development since this war began, we realize the changes that have taken place. I believe we must have a degree of unity in this country in connection with foreign affairs to a greater extent than in matters particularly affecting us within the nation. When one looks at the picture, Ogdensburg, Hyde Park, Casablanca and Washington, one realizes that each of those conferences has represented a milestone in the mobilization of the power of the English-speaking nations, not only for purposes of making war but for mutual development in times of peace, as is evidenced by the Atlantic charter.

I have already mentioned that Canada will hold a central position when this war is over. Having regard to the fact that the Prime Minister of Great Britain has said that Canada is the linchpin joining together the British commonwealth and the United States of America, to-day the air centre of the world, is it too much to hope for that when the peace conference convenes it should convene in the city of Ottawa, the centre of the world to-day on the air routes of the world and the interpreter of the will of the British people to the United States of America and also the interpreter of the United States of America to the people of Britain. However, it has not always been so. The war changed the attitude of the government of Canada, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I am not sure yet, Mr. Chairman, that we are far enough along the road to a positive policy in foreign affairs, nor have we sufficiently established our future position toward the British empire. Why have we to-day no imperial war council? Why have we to-day no imperial war conferences? Why did Canada in the years before the war refuse to join the committee for imperial defence? If Canada had taken the attitude in 1935 and 1936, and up to the outbreak of the war, that she takes to-day; if she had let the world and the aggressor nations know then what her stand would be should war come, would the result have been different? That will always remain an enigma of history.

Canada prior to the war had refrained from participating in affairs affecting the welfare of this empire as a whole. I am referring now to a book that was referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South, "The British Commonwealth at War". At page 63 I find the following:

> Since the war of 1914-18 representatives of Australia and New Zealand have frequently been present at the meetings of the committee and have asked for and received advice on their defence problems. The other dominions, such as Canada, at least in recent years, refrained for political reasons from attending meetings of the committee.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Who wrote that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is by Mr. H. Duncan Hall, of the British committee at Washington. He goes on to point out, too, in regard to an imperial war cabinet, that Mr. Churchill wants such an institution set up, and that he has asked for it. He refers to it in his book on two occasions, first at page 35 where he quotes the Prime Minister of Great Britain as saying the following on June 24, 1941:

> As I have told the house, we very much desire such a conference.

And later on, at page 36 he says this:

> "We have always been ready to form an imperial cabinet containing the Prime Ministers of the four dominions." Unfortunately, he continued, it had not been possible for all of them to be present at one and the same time; . . . In the last three months the Australian government, he pointed out, had been represented on the war cabinet by Sir Earle Page. The British government had now agreed to the specific requests of the Australian and New Zealand governments, that their accredited representatives should have the "right to be heard in the war cabinet in the formulation and direction of policy;" and similar facilities would be available to Canada and South Africa.

If that correctly represents the situation I would ask the Prime Minister why it is Canada adopts an attitude against becoming a member of this war cabinet in London, in order to participate in directing and controlling the war effort of the empire.

When Mr. Eden was here he was asked a question regarding the matter of a war cabinet, or a war council, and the following report of the interview appeared in the Toronto Star as follows:

Questioned as to the advisability of an empire war council, a move which Premier King has opposed, Mr. Eden glanced toward the Canadian Prime Minister before he replied. Then he said: "My own direct experience is that we've got pretty good machinery for integration of our war effort.

Then, these are the pertinent words:

Of course, if it can be improved, that would be all the better.

Then he turned, smiling to Mr. King and joked: "I think I did pretty well on that one, don't you?" The Canadian Premier nodded approval.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend mean to say that Mr. Eden was overawed in making his statement?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I say the inference is that there would be a better cooperation among the various component parts of the empire if such a cabinet were in fact set up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not agree that such is the inference at all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is my conclusion; and I point out, too, that throughout the period from 1925 on, Canada has taken the attitude of non-participation in these conferences, and has taken the stand that she ought not actively to participate in giving counsel and advice.

But it is said that these things are changed now. The question I ask is this: Are they changed? Only recently an article published on March 18, 1943, by Mr. Chester Bloom, Washington correspondent, said this in part:

Much of the readiness with which the dominions have followed the mother country's lead, however, has been due to the dire and immediate peril with which Hitler threatened the whole civilized world. Now that it begins to be clear that Germany cannot win the war, no matter how long the nazis may prolong it, and how much blood and treasure must yet be expended, the British statesmen are beginning to feel the lack of some unified British commonwealth agreement on international policy.

It is a fact that, irrespective of the visits from time to time of representatives of Canada and other parts of the empire, and despite the communications which no doubt take place several times a day, nevertheless no relationship equals that of a conference, when men put their feet under the table together, and discuss affairs together.

That is why I again bring to the Prime Minister's attention representations we have made before that Canada now, if only for the psychological effect on our people, and the people of the empire as a whole, should agree to the setting up of that council, and to the sending of representatives to Great Britain, or wherever else the council may be convened.

In the last war there were delays in setting up the imperial war council. I believe the first imperial war council did not meet until the spring of 1917, at the same time as the imperial conference of that year. There were delays. But a reading of Sir Robert Borden's memoirs leads to one conclusion, and that is that when the time was darkest, when the submarine menace was worst, and when these statesmen came from all parts of the empire to Great Britain the effect of the Canadian troops overseas and on the people of Great Britain was such that it resulted in a greater determination, a great incentive to fight the war to victory.

The Prime Minister referred to this matter himself on February 17, 1941, when he said, as reported at page 812 of Hansard:

Direct consultations have been and may continue to be necessary from time to time. They, however, are likely to be most required concerning aspects of the common war effort which necessitate detailed inquiry. Five members of the present government have already visited the United Kingdom since the outbreak of the war. Their visits have been of the greatest assistance to the government in coordinating our war effort with the war effort of the United Kingdom.

That may be true. Those visits coordinated the war effort. If they had that beneficial result, would there not also be a vastly greater beneficial result if to-morrow morning it were announced that we in Canada are going to join the other parts of the empire in what might be called a victory gathering of an imperial war cabinet, and that we were to be represented by Canada's own Prime Minister?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I will now summarize what I was saying before the recess. I was making a plea for greater collaboration with the other nations of the empire through the formation of an imperial war cabinet in order to unite more strongly the peoples of the empire. While it might be said that as a result of the developments of science and of scientific means of communication, the prime ministers of the various parts of the empire are enabled to communicate with one another and thereby make unnecessary the convening of a war cabinet, I would point out that the human touch is lacking in these communications. Churchill and Roosevelt having the same oportunities to use modern means of communication for getting in touch with each other nevertheless avail themselves of personal meeting in the interest of their respective countries.

I pass now for a moment to our relationship with the United States of America. Recently I had the privilege of being present in Ottawa when members of the various parliaments of the empire met informally with members of the United States congress, and there for the first time I learned how important it was to have such an opportunity of getting together and of ascertaining through an interchange of ideas that, after all, our problems at the present time bear a striking similarity to one another. If there is one thing more important than another to-day it is this, that anything that may cause cleavages between Canada and the United States must be avoided, that frankness should characterize all our relations and that a free exchange of ideas is the finest means known to avoid suspicion arising.

I wish to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister with a view to getting an answer thereon the situation prevailing to-day not only along the Alaska highway but in other parts of this dominion where representatives of the United States, in a community of interest with us, are stationed with a view to the improvement of the defences of our country and of North America as a whole. Last year I had an opportunity of visiting the Alaska highway and of being in the town of White Horse and there meeting with the troops of the United States of America. I can say this, that I have never seen a finer body of men than these troops representing the United States—men in a foreign land and yet at all times conducting themselves in a way that brings credit to themselves and to the nation they represent. As a result of their being in Canada a reference was recently made to the supreme court with regard to their liability to Canadian law. I am not going to refer to that matter because it is now being considered by the court, except to say that the court has been asked for an opinion on a question which reads as follows:

> Are members of the military or naval forces of the United States of America who are present in Canada with the consent of the government of Canada for purposes of military operations in connection with or related to the state of war, now existing exempt from criminal proceedings prosecuted in Canadian criminal courts and, if so, to what extent and in what circumstances?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

The stand taken by the United States is that their troops in our country are not subject to the criminal law. There is, however, another matter which I think requires interpretation from the Minister for External Affairs, namely, in connection with a United States order that was issued on June 7, 1943. It is singularly of interest that this order should have been made, and I want to ask whether or not it applies to Canadians or British subjects who are employed by contractors in connection with work on the Alaska highway. I quote:

> Paragraph 1 of Northwest Service Command General Orders No. 23, dated June 7, 1943, subject: "United States military jurisdiction over civilians in Northwest Service Command" is quoted for the information of all concerned: "Regardless of citizenship, civilian employees of the United States government, or of contractors, working under and in physical proximity to the United States army, including those United States citizens in the above categories discharged from their employment who are awaiting transportation to the United States, are subject to military law and discipline under Article of War 2 (d)."

Does that mean that Canadians who are working for contractors under or in proximity to the United States army in Canada are subject only to military law? That is a matter which I think should be clarified. It has been brought to my attention by civilians so employed, and creates a striking situation in view of the attitude taken by the Prime Minister respecting Britain's right to operate air training schools on Canadian soil. It is true that was before the war, on July 1, 1938. I think it merits an interpretation by the Prime Minister and also an explanation of the circumstances under which it was brought into effect.

There was one matter with which the Prime Minister did not deal, and in the few moments at my disposal I intend to deal with it. He stated that committees had been set up for the purpose of considering post-war problems. One of the main problems affecting Canada as a member of the British empire, and by itself, and also our relations with the united nations is the question of post-war aviation. In to-day's press is a dispatch from Washington, July 8, reading as follows:

> Discussions among British commonwealth countries on the broad subject of post-war aviation are being proposed by the British government, it was reported here to-day.
> The meeting, likely to be held in London, would precede any aviation conference among the united nations. For some time it has been reported here that plans were under way to hold informal discussions soon—probably in Ottawa—among representatives of Canada, Britain, the United States and perhaps Russia and China. However, any plans to this effect may have to be modified if the London conference is held.

As yet we in this parliament have had no information with regard to this meeting. On April 2 the Prime Minister made a statement on the subject, wherein he stated in part as follows, as reported in Hansard, at page 1777:

> The problems of international air transport are, of course, immense and cannot be solved by one country. We are determined, however, that our influence on the course of events will be in the direction of international cooperation and collaboration. The Canadian government is in complete agreement with the United Kingdom government that "some form of international collaboration will be essential if the air is to be developed in the interests of mankind as a whole, trade served, international understanding fostered and international security gained."

A study of events following the treaty of Versailles and at the time of the treaty leads one to believe that many of the difficulties which took place among the then allied nations would have been avoided had there been conferences prior to the peace treaty and during the progress of the war. Aviation is one of the most outstanding problems affecting this nation and this empire. During the last three years, in the development of the commonwealth air training scheme, Canada has become the schoolroom of the British empire in the matter of aviation. I realize that with a war on and far from ended, the main problem before us is that of the war. At the same time post-war aviation is a subject which should receive the consideration of parliament now and not be left to be considered solely by committees set up by the ministers.

The question of post-war airways is one of major concern. There have been few agreements made by Canada with respect to air rights and air transportation, and there are none, according to a return brought down, in answer to questions I asked some time ago, on May 24, which are valid "beyond the duration of the war or a short time after, or have any effect upon the control of international air routes or the operation of international or commercial air lines after the conclusion of the war." That is a quotation from page one of the return. The only pre-war agreement which seems to be binding on all is a multilateral agreement made on May 27, 1936, between Canada, the Irish Free State, Newfoundland and the United Kingdom respecting transatlantic air services. A summary of that agreement was given by the then Minister of Transport on July 30, 1936, and I am not going to refer to it. Canada occupies a situation of strategic importance in the post-war development. Prior to the war a question for consideration of several imperial conferences was the establishment of strategic naval bases. After this war a major consideration will be the establishment of strategic air bases as well. The polar projection maps show definitely that the air will be the future transportation medium in large measure after the war, and that the great transportation services of the future will be air-borne craft the size of which no one can now conceive.

What stand are we to take? What is our attitude to be? The matter comes under the jurisdiction of the Prime Minister, but I feel that the members of this house and the country at large are entitled to have information now as to what conferences are taking place and what attitude Canada will take at these conferences.

I suggest that consideration should be given now, with the collaboration of the United States and the other allied nations, to the organization of a British commercial air transport line, to commence operations after the end of the war, by which a world-girdling organization will be established, with each nation within the empire retaining its own domestic routes.

When the history of this war is written it may well be that Hitler's misconception of the character of the British commonwealth was one of the great mistakes which he made. He believed that without bonds of iron binding the empire together it would fall asunder; he did not realize the fact that what binds it together is the crown and the imponderables which go with British citizenship. I am going to quote in that connection the statement of Mr. Churchill some five months before the war, when, with that prescience which has characterized his statesmanship throughout, he used these words:

> Some foreigners mock at the British empire because there are no parchment bonds or hard steel shackles which compel its united action. But there are other forces far more compulsive to which the whole fabric spontaneously responds. These deep tides are flowing now. They sweep away in their flow differences of class and party. They override the vast ocean spaces which separate the dominions of the king.

I feel that if there is one thing we should do at this time it is to lay the foundations for welding together, still closer than ever before, the bonds of empire, and I know of no means whereby that can be effected to a greater extent, without antagonizing those of the united nations who to-day are engaged in the common effort and crusade, than by the consideration of the development of an empire air scheme. Individual members of the empire cannot do it by themselves.

The Prime Minister has made a declaration with respect to the Trans-Canada Air Lines. He states that they will operate without opposition, that in so far as feeder routes are concerned they will be, I presume, under private initiative and control. We have to-day across Canada a vast number of airports. We have trained tens of thousands of pilots who move forward to all parts of the world in an ever-increasing stream.

We have all the facilities for a world air organization. We have men who, when the war is over, will return trained as airmen were never trained before, and in the development of an air scheme such as I suggest, employment would be given to many of these men, use would be made of our airports and facilities, and the bonds of empire would be strengthened.

The question arises, how could it be governed? We have the board of transport commissioners. We could set up a board such as that, with representatives of each of the governments affected within the empire. We cannot develop a world-girdling air institution here in Canada by ourselves and without co-operation. If we look at it from the purely narrow point of view of expediency, Canada has too small a population to maintain her vast domestic set-up in connection with air transportation, and to maintain as well a world air system after the war. Other parts of the empire are very much in the same position. Nor could we individually maintain the necessary aircraft production or continue the operation of such a vast scheme. But together, and in unity of purpose, the nations of the empire, without antagonizing the other united nations, could maintain powerful air routes in all parts of the world, the bases now established permitting of the development and expansion of such an all-empire route.

Canada has an important place to take in the post-war period. Canada can never return to the days before the war, the days when we did not as individual Canadians interest ourselves as we ought to have done in the world about us. Canada can never return to its pre-war position after the vast expansion in industry that has taken place in this country during the war. There is no more important subject now for the post-war than a declaration from the Prime Minister setting forth the attitude that Canada will take, and giving to the other parts of this empire the promise that when this war is over, in the interests of world trade and world peace, the air facilities of all parts of the empire will be devoted to the welfare of mankind.

I have not endeavoured to-day to introduce anything of a partisan nature. Our foreign affairs and our attitude to the empire must, I believe, be founded upon the wishes, desires and aspirations of our people, dedicated to the end that we as an empire, when this war is over, will so gird ourselves that the new world will be free from the blights of fear, international and national.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), earlier in the day, said that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), by saying little, had satisfied everybody on the foreign policy of Canada. I do not know about everybody, but certainly one may judge by the speeches that have been rendered in the later part of the afternoon that he did not succeed in satisfying hon. members opposite. However, I do not believe that they represent the majority of Canada in their view. The Prime Minister of Canada, in the views he has expressed not only to-day, but on previous occasions, has succeeded in representing that majority view better than anyone else in the recent history of our country.

Any one who listened to the speeches to-day, or some of them at any rate, would wonder how Canada had a foreign policy at all or even whether there is a country called Canada. I wish to assure my hon. friends that there is a country called Canada. It is a good country; it is the country we are fighting to preserve; and yet to-day we had the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) advancing the doctrine, which was new to me, that he could not imagine the races of Canada, the peoples in the various divisions of Canada, getting on together in any other relationship than within the empire, though a little later he said that Canada is the centre of the world. It is very difficult to reconcile these and other points of view expressed to-day.

We have had a number of interesting speeches, and there is a great deal in them with which every one of us can agree. But I find in some of them curious mixtures of reality and myth. There is reality about the nature of the world we are living in, but something stops and fails to carry over the speaker to see completely the consequences of that reality. I suggest that what has stopped these speakers from being consistent and right is a mistaken conception of the British empire, a conception which is not in accord with reality.

Lest I be misunderstood in any of the views I am now going to express, let me say with the most complete sincerity that no one could more fully appreciate what the British people have done in this war. I believe that in four respects the record of Britain has been extraordinary.

In the first place they had political institutions which are perhaps their greatest gift to civilization and which even worked in the moment of crisis, in the supreme hour of trial, to replace Mr. Chamberlain by Mr. Churchill. And I may say here that as far back as 1937 I was one of the few people who pursued the unpopular course in Canada of advocating the replacement of Mr. Chamberlain by Mr. Churchill at a time when it was most difficult to advocate that course. In the second place, under Mr. Churchill's leadership the British people held out and literally saved the world. In the third place, they produced the best planes and possibly one of the greatest fighting instruments the world has ever seen in the eighth army. In the fourth place, from the low watermark of centuries in the early months of 1940 they built themselves up to heights which will be the admiration of decent people for all time.

In paying this tribute do not let it be thought for one moment that I am forgetting the contribution made to our cause by Russia, although Russia gained time as a result of the defence put up by Britain. Before that China had given us time by her bitter struggle and sacrifice for so many years.

Having said this, may I be just a little technical for a moment. The empire, properly so-called, is the United Kingdom and the colonial empire. The commonwealth is the United Kingdom and the self-governing dominions of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Canada and whatever division Eire may be in. The nations of the commonwealth, apart from the United Kingdom, have nothing to do with the government of the empire and nothing to do with the government of each other, except in so far as there is still the vestigal remains of the lack of autonomy to which the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) referred to-day. They are there because we choose to have them. No one in Canada or elsewhere can take any pleasure from rattling the chains of subordination because, if we have ties of that kind, we have them because we want them.

We work together when it is in our interest to do so, and it usually is. The conception which most interests Canadians is not that of the British empire vis-a-vis the world; it is of the nations of the British commonwealth working with the world. I suggest to hon. members of this committee that in this distinction there is a considerable difference between some hon. members opposite and myself. I believe that my conception of the British commonwealth and what it means and what it can do for the world is a nobler one than theirs. I believe that mine is more in accord with reality, and with the interest and welfare of all of us. I believe it is more inspiring because it is based on the principle of freedom and on responsibility which is a correlative of freedom.

If because of ties of affection, tradition, literature and common political institutions, all symbolized in a common crown, the independent and autonomous nations of the British empire are drawn together so that they have a policy which is coincident, that is a much finer and more helpful thing than if we all had a policy which was arrived at in some other way by reason of our having only one voice, as was advocated by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). Our strength is in the freedom with which we are associated. Other nations will be more ready to work with that strength as we make them see and recognize that freedom. In that connection I differ fundamentally from the hon. member for Vancouver South. The conception I have of the British commonwealth is an association of free nations working together—

Mr. GREEN: Did I say that they were not free nations working together?

Mr. CLAXTON: My hon. friend suggested that they should have a common voice.

Mr. GREEN: In foreign affairs.

Mr. CLAXTON: Oh, yes; we are discussing foreign affairs to-night.

Mr. GREEN: You are discussing whether they are free nations at the moment.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am discussing the matter of having one voice, which was the phrase used by my hon. friend. The point I am making is that the way we arrive at that one voice is of fundamental importance, not only to us but to the nations of the world with whom we are associated. I suggest to my hon. friend and to this committee that the nations of the world will appreciate us and our value, and we shall have far greater influence if we can have a common voice from a consideration of our own interests rather than if we always speak with a single voice and have a single policy on every point.

The correlation of freedom is responsibility. But responsibility to whom? Obviously in Canada we are not responsible to the people of South Africa, we are not responsible to the people of any other commonwealth country, we are responsible to the people of Canada. What brought us here, what brought our forefathers here, and why we aim to have our sons live here after us, is that we have an affection and devotion and loyalty to Canada.

Against this background may I consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre that there should be an imperial conference and an imperial war cabinet during the war. That has been discussed on a great many occasions in this house and elsewhere. My objections to it are twofold. In the first place, it is not practicable as a regular routine. The greatest usefulness any dominion prime minister or the Prime Minister of Great Britain can have is to lead his own nation in the fight against the aggressors, to direct the efforts of his own people. When it might be possible for Field Marshal Smuts and Mr. Fraser to go to London, it might not be possible for the Prime Minister of Canada and Mr. Curtin to go. It simply is not practicable to arrange to have an imperial war committee meet in London as a matter of regular routine throughout the war.

The first duty of the prime ministers of the commonwealth is to their own nations; they can make their greatest contribution to the common cause in their own nations. From time to time they may be able to meet with other leaders to discuss specific points, but the possibility of regular routine meetings by all of them is ruled out by the practical considerations to which I have referred.

Further, the experience of one commonwealth prime minister indicates a valid objection to the course to which the hon. member for Lake Centre has directed his evidence. I refer to Mr. Menzies who was away from his country so long that when he got back he found himself in a position in which he was defeated. It is impossible in these days of rapidly moving events and grave issues for any group of prime ministers to be out of their countries for any considerable length of time, to make decisions affecting their countries and be sure of being able to implement them on their return.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There was no election in Australia at that time.

Mr. CLAXTON: He was defeated in the house, of course. There is no difference whatever in that. He was out of touch with his country for four or five months, and within three weeks of his return from abroad he was defeated.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: He had a very small majority.

Mr. CLAXTON: It was quite sufficient.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It looks as if he lost it while he was away.

Mr. CLAXTON: Then there is a second important consideration; the British commonwealth at the present time has no special interest distinct from that of the other nations fighting on our side. The interest of the United States in all the affairs in which we are interested is identical with ours. Their interest is in mobilizing the utmost strength to defeat the aggressor. It is the same as ours. We have no distinct interest in the British commonwealth at this time which differentiates us from the United States with regard to doing right throughout the world or which differentiates the United Kingdom from Russia in the fight in Europe, or China from Australia, New Zealand and Canada with regard to the struggle against Japan.

I would have supported my hon. friend if he had said we need additional agencies in the united nations to combine our strength to greater advantage than has been done up to now. I believe in time it will be found necessary to work out some system of combined strategy for Europe such as has been worked out in other centres of the world. Any system of cooperation will have to involve representation in some way or another of all the forces fighting on a particular front. But running all through the statements of my hon. friends opposite, of the hon. member for Lake Centre, the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for Lethbridge is, I believe, the conception of the interest of the British empire or British commonwealth as being separate and distinct from that of the interest of the rest of the world.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. CLAXTON: Certainly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is my recollection incorrect that the Prime Minister said earlier this session that the British commonwealth of nations and the British empire are synonymous terms?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, he did.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think the Prime Minister said that either one of them might be used.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. CLAXTON: But I do not agree that they are synonymous, for the reasons which I have stated. I should remind my hon. friend that I said I was speaking technically when I described the position of the British empire.

At this moment in history it is the triumph of the members of the British Commonwealth that they have no special interest. Their interests are the same as those of other nations fighting the aggressors. If this is accepted by us it means that we have a conception of the British Commonwealth which will be welcomed by all other nations. We should appreciate that when one of the British peoples refers to the other British peoples in terms of affection, the majority of the people of the world do not have the same degree of attachment to the British Commonwealth or Empire as British citizens have.

Let us look for a moment at the purpose of foreign policy. What is it? The purpose of foreign policy of any country is to pursue the interests of that country. The purpose of the foreign policy of Britain is to pursue the interests of Britain; the purpose of the foreign policy of the United States is to pursue the interests of the United States; and any prime minister who did not pursue what was conceived to be the interests of his country would be turned out of office. Of course it should be made plain to the people, with the growing development of affairs, that the interest of a country is bound up with the interest of every other country. But still the purpose of any national policy and foreign policy is to serve the interest of that country. That is true of Canada as it is true of every other nation. What is the interest of Canada? It is, of course, to secure the security and prosperity of the Canadian people. We do not differ from any other country in our foreign policy; we do not differ from any of the countries with whom we are fighting as allies, to pursue security and prosperity. But when we seek to see how that is to be done we get into practical questions of some difficulty. There is one first step on which we all agree; that is, that we must win the war, and we must realize that for us in Canada the time of greatest strain and sacrifice lies ahead. Second, we must recognize that what we are fighting for is the defeat of aggression. The sanctity of individual life. The chance to have a good life is not only our aim in war but also our aim in peace.

And we are helping to-day to make the conditions of peace. Everything we do in this or any other country is setting the framework of the post-war world. We may be sure that there will be no new heaven or new earth except in so far as we make it to-day or later by our united work. It lies in our hands to make it. It is only the part of wisdom to look ahead and try to learn from what is happening here as well as in the peculiar past to which the hon. member for Broadview referred.

The interest of the people of Canada in foreign policy is not academic. It is measured by 750,000 men in the armed forces, and by our harnessing our whole resources to defeat the enemy. It is shown in peace by the farmers in Saskatchewan, who know that the amount of money they have in their pockets will depend on world trade, world markets and world security. The war has brought out that the world is one. That is brought home to us by our place on the main roads of the air to Europe and Asia. It was brought home to us when five tired Canadian boys got off a plane on a summer night last year at Uplands after bombing Germany that morning. That cracked old conceptions of the world. The war has shown us that no nation is far enough away to keep out of a major war or strong enough to fight one alone. This applies to Russia and to the United States as well as to Britain; it also applies to Canada.

The hon. member for Lethbridge suggested that we should arm ourselves to the teeth in order to defend Canada. He then suggested that we should do so in conjunction with the other parts of the British commonwealth. I want to have not only the strength of the British commonwealth at my back in the world that lies ahead; in the world that lies ahead I want to have the strength of all the nations of the world organized into a community at my back, because there is no other way to prevent aggression.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would my hon. friend permit a question? We wanted to have the support of all the nations in the world in 1940, but we just did not have it. If we had all been strong, the situation would have been a far different one.

Mr. CLAXTON: My hon. friend has brought up a question which would take a little time to answer. I would suggest the reason why we did not have the armed strength in 1940 and were not in a position to do in the aggressors and prevent their succeeding dates back to what happened at Geneva in 1920, 1924, 1931 and 1935. There was a long record of failures on the part of all the nations to live up to their obligations and to see their interests, to see that the only way they could avoid a war was to prevent it. The only way to prevent aggression was by combining strength, just as to-day we are having to combine our strength in order to defeat aggression. It would be much easier to prevent aggression than it is to defeat aggression.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the hon. member tell us how much he would like to contribute, and in what way he would like to contribute to that strength he so admirably wishes to have at his back?

Mr. CLAXTON: I would contribute our full share, as we are doing in the war. I would contribute our full share, whatever it may be. And because Canada has a special place in the world I would contribute more than what seemed to be our share. I would go the full limit, because we have a greater stake in security than almost any other nation. We have a finer country and we want to preserve it. We want to preserve our way of life here.

The only way to organize strength is by collective action. Surely it is obvious that if you have collective action you have to have collective instruments to direct the use of that collective strength. We are gradually building up those instruments during the war, through the instrumentalities of the united nations. We ought to try for faster progress in this, while we are united in the common purpose of defeating the enemy. If we get the habit of cooperation during the war, and develop the machinery that will work during a war, then we gradually move into the period of peace afterwards. But unless this is done during the war, then there is less chance of doing it after.

To-day the realities of geography establish that the world is one, that peace is indivisible, and also, as the Prime Minister said, prosperity is indivisible, too. The prosperity of every part of Canada depends upon the prosperity of every other part. We cannot have people in Ottawa, in Saint John, in Saskatchewan, prosperous, without other people in Canada being prosperous. The same applies throughout the world, to even a greater degree, because Canada has become more dependent on international trade during the war than she was even before the war. We can only support our standard of living, our national income, our prosperity—because that is what it is—if after the war conditions are secure through international action which will enable us to exchange our goods and services with other nations to about the same degree as we are doing during the war.

We can have security and prosperity internal and external, but we cannot have just security or just prosperity. And we cannot have it here and not somewhere else. It has all to go together. I suggest that not only is that lesson taught and preached by people like Mr. Willkie in his book "One World", but that it is coming to be the common idea among all the peoples of the world. They are awaking to the reality of it. A country like Canada can make a very considerable contribution towards this end. We can make it as a member of the British commonwealth of nations, and we can make it in working with other nations. The members of the British commonwealth of nations can make a great contribution. But we cannot make so effective a contribution if we have to speak with one voice. While we should try by consultation to have a common policy, we should not have a single policy, which is quite a different thing. The difference is fundamental to the concept of the world before us, and of the British commonwealth as I have tried to describe them.

If the British commonwealth were always to speak with only one voice to the rest of the world, then you would have the British commonwealth set off against the world, and the commonwealth countries would not be able to make their separate contributions to its welfare. Unity of this kind would defeat its own end. For example, you could not then have Canada join the pan-American Union, in the way the hon. member for Vancouver South suggested. The nations of the commonwealth can have far more influence if they happen to work together as five, six or seven nations than if they are one.

And also, this idea of a single foreign policy is unworkable. Who would declare the foreign policy? I am sure no prime minister or no government in England would agree that its foreign policy was to be determined by Canada or by Australia. They would not agree to it. Their interests are too serious to permit them to agree to it. We could not agree to it, either. But we should consult together, of course. In consequence of that consultation and in consequence of our common traditions and common interests we may arrive at policies which are the same. That may happen in nine cases out of ten, and when it does it will be more effective than if we struck out as a solid unit.

So that I suggest to my hon. friends that it is not in the interests of the British commonwealth of nations, or any member of it, that we should seek to have a single voice in foreign policy. Everyone agrees that we should work together with members of the commonwealth and other nations just as we are doing. I do not conceive of the commonwealth as being a sort of concentration of power of a collective character, such as my hon. friends seem to think it is. I think of it as a great association which has contributed much to the world, and will contribute more. But its very lifeblood is freedom. And the very principle of freedom, which gives it its character, and which keeps us part of it, demands that we should be free to determine our own policy.

Then, also, we should determine our own policy because that is the only way in which we can get support for any policy in Canada. No one could get support in Canada for a policy determined from outside of Canada. In Canada we should seek to have a policy which would lead this country to take a most active part in the affairs of the world, because that is our interest. Our interest in the affairs of the world to-day is not exceeded by that of any other country; our power is, but not our interest. The best way to get the unity of feeling among our own people, which is the necessary basis of a foreign policy, is that it should be a foreign policy which is based on Canada's interests, and appeal to Canadians as Canadians.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When the hon. member speaks about Canada's interest, does he mean self-interest?

Mr. CLAXTON: Of course, self-interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have no obligations to the rest of the world, then?

Mr. CLAXTON: Of course we have. Everything I have said should show my hon. friend that we have an obligation to the rest of the world, just as the rest of the world has an obligation to us. When I speak of self-interest I naturally assume the hon. member to think I meant enlightened self-interest; because our interest is not a selfish interest; it cannot be. We are interested in a world in which small nations will be secure. We cannot secure that condition by ourselves. We can secure it only by working together with other nations, and making our full contribution toward the common pool of security and prosperity.

This concept of the relationship was described by Lionel Curtis in his book Civitas Dei, written in 1937. Mr. Curtis is no separatist, as my hon. friends know, and he says:

> I am thus led to state a conclusion from which I have long shrunk. In spite of all that is said and written and of all appearances, the dominion have not as yet acquired the character of national commonwealths, and cannot acquire it until they have accepted in unequivocal terms the responsibility for peace or war. They cannot do this, nor feel they have done it, until they have notified to the world at large that they are not involved in war till their own governments have officially declared that they are so involved.
> The cabinet, parliament and electorate of a dominion which had once come to this point would begin to take an interest in world affairs to which they cannot be brought in times of peace, so long as the present conditions exist. They would cease to be screened from the hard facts by direct contact with which men learn what those facts are. They would have to provide for themselves the diplomatic machinery without which no government can follow the course of foreign affairs. They would lose the habit of mind induced by a satellite position—the habit of mind which prevents them from seeing the key position which they hold at this juncture of human history.

This statement was true in 1937 and has been proved to be true not only by the course of events since and by the participation of Canada in the war as the separate act of her own government authorized by her own parliament, but also by this discussion. We can only have a foreign policy which is unequivocal when we arrive at a foreign policy from considerations which are based on Canadian sentiments and Canadian interests. Among the first of those interests one would naturally say was the survival of Britain as in Canada's interest. It is important that we should recognize that we are fighting in this war because it is in Canada's interest to see the survival of Britain and ourselves rather than that we should fight automatically just because Britain is involved.

My hon. friend the member for Vancouver South suggested that there is danger of our getting a small nation complex. I must say that I do not know what a small nation complex is. But if a big power complex means that a power seeks to dominate someone else, and if a small nation complex is the opposite of that and means a desire to work together in harmony, I am all for it.

Mr. GREEN: Does the hon. member believe that it is the destiny of Canada to be always a small nation?

Mr. CLAXTON: As my hon. friend knows, Canada has great possibilities of growth, but the soundest foundation for the growth of Canada is in a conception of our country which all Canadians can share. That is fundamental to our progress. In the extremes of isolation, on the one hand, and a wrong conception of Canada's relationship with the empire, on the other hand we have extremes which make it extraordinarily difficult for us to have a united country and a united policy, although the people between the two extremes undoubtedly represent the great majority of the people of this country.

Speaking about small powers, Sir William Beveridge writing in The Observer said this, which I think will answer my hon. friend's question:

At the end of the last war, the aim was phrased by some as making the world safe for democracy. But democracy is a means, not an end. The aim for the next peace can be put better: we should decide to make the world safe for small nations.

That phrase implies all that is essential. If the world is safe for small nations, it will be safe for all nations. If the world is safe for small nations, it will be an ordered world in which the rights of each nation are determined by justice and not by relative strength, as in an ordered community the unarmed citizen is safe beneath the protection of the law. If the world is safe for small nations, it will be a world in which the human spirit can blossom in all its infinite variety of national cultures and not be beaten flat into a totalitarian mould.

How can the world be made safe for small nations? Not by their dependence on a larger neighbour, for that destroys nationhood. Not by their own arms and not by grouping themselves with other small nations; not even the largest single nation in the world to-day can be safe by its own arms, for safety does not mean living always on the brink of war, even if one survives war. It means security—being without the fact or the constant fear of war. Security for all nations, small and great, can come only through the enthronement of impartial justice between nations and the arming of justice with decisive force for her decrees. "The scales of justice", as Mr. Winston Churchill once said, "are vain without her sword". Who is to supply international justice with her sword and wield it for her?

The Prime Minister ten days ago said that Canada was a world power. While Canada is still a small power in terms of military strength and population she is great in resources, enormously great in possibilities. If the hon. member for Vancouver South by his interpolation meant that those possibilities were practically unlimited, then I agree with him completely. But the one basis on which we can grow steadily toward a greater maturity, a greater strength and a greater usefulness to the world, is that we should have conceptions of our country which can be shared by all Canadians, and not just Canadians of Anglo-Saxon descent or of French descent, or other descent, but Canadians of all descents. It should be remembered that some of them cannot have the same views of our country's relationships as some of us have. We should not go to any extreme of views in one direction or the other. In the middle there is an idea of Canada as a free, independent, autonomous nation, associated with the British commonwealth and with our neighbour, the United States, with whom we have closer relations than have ever existed between any other two nations before, a Canada willing, in fact desirous of playing its full part in the affairs of the world, because there is our interest and because our interest is not in any way separated from the interests of any other nation. We have no axe to grind, nothing to gain except security and peace for ourselves and our people; but as we gain security and peace for our people we can contribute to the security and peace of other people. Any conceptions that my hon. friends opposite have of the British commonwealth or any other association must be big enough to conceive of the world gradually growing into a community, because that is what it is becoming, and the sooner we shape our ideas and our ideals and our hopes to that conception, the better it will be for ourselves and for our people.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Some days ago he promised to make a statement with respect to the position in the Canadian northwest, and during the course of his remarks this morning he said that he would do so. He omitted to do so. I do not suggest that that was intentional at all, but I do say that the people of Canada are very much interested in that subject and would like to hear from the Prime Minister upon it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did say I would do so later.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understood it was to be done later to-day. If that was not the intention, I misunderstood.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer it right away. My hon. friend asked the following question on July 9:

Will the Prime Minister make a general statement or table the agreement between Canada and the United States covering the position of the latter as to its use of or interest in the Alaska highway after the war?

The answer to that is that the exchange of notes on the Alaska highway, tabled in the House of Commons on March 18, 1942, provided that:

At the conclusion of the war that part of the highway which lies in Canada shall become in all respects an integral part of the Canadian highway system, subject to the understanding that there shall at no time be imposed any discriminatory conditions in relation to the use of the road as between Canadian and United States civilian traffic.

Then, second, my hon. friend asked:

Will the Prime Minister make a similar statement or table the agreement as to the ownership, the interest in and use of the pipeline from the Fort Norman oil fields to the refinery at Whitehorse and in the refinery; the amount of money involved in the construction of the pipeline and the oil refinery?

The answer is:

Under the terms of an agreement between the Canadian and United States governments, the complete text of which cannot yet be made public for security reasons, the United States is paying the costs of the project and the Canadian government is providing sites for structures and rights of way essential to the project, and is also making oil rights available under proper regulations. The Canadian government has also agreed during the war to facilitate the entry into Canada of equipment, labour and personnel for construction and maintenance of the project, and to waive import duties, taxes, licence fees, et cetera. Royalties on oil produced under this project are also waived for the duration of the war. The United States government retains ownership of the pipeline and refinery until the end of the war, at which time they will be offered for sale, with the Canadian government being given prior right of purchase. Failing a satisfactory sale being made, the disposition of the pipeline and refinery will be referred to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. It is impossible at this time to estimate the amount of money involved in the construction of the pipeline and refinery.

Then my hon. friend asked:

Will title to the land through which the pipeline runs be alienated to the United States or to any company, or will it remain the property of Canada?

The answer is:

Title to the land through which the pipeline runs remains in the crown in the right of Canada.

The last question was:

Will individuals or companies other than Imperial Oil have the use of the pipeline after the war?

The answer is:

Under the agreement between the two governments, the pipeline and refinery will be offered for sale at the conclusion of the war at a valuation set by two appraisers, one named by Canada and one by the United States. The Canadian government will be given the first option to purchase. If the option is not exercised within three months, the facilities may be offered for sale by public tender with the amount of the valuation as the reserve price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: While I am on my feet I might clear up one other question. The leader of the opposition asked on June 28, when I tabled the inter-American radio agreement signed at Santiago in 1940, if the agreement had anything to do with shortwave broadcasting. I was not in a position to give an answer offhand at the moment, but the facts are as follows: the agreement deals principally with the employment of the frequencies in the band 1600 to 5000 kilocycles in a service of point to point, ship, aeronautical, police and amateur radio-communication. It does not in any way affect, nor is it concerned with the broadcasting in Canada in either the shortwave or mediumwave band.

The committee will see why I was not able to recollect the details at the time.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): It has already been emphasized that this is a very important debate. The number of subjects within the purview of the Department of External Affairs is quite extensive, and all of them are exceedingly important. Other members of this group are dealing with some of the other subjects. I wish to confine my remarks to just one subject and, in fact, to one particular phase of that subject; I refer to the problems arising out of the refugee situation, and in particular to the terrible plight of the people of the Jewish race.

There are times, Mr. Chairman, when members of this house rise to speak because we know we are dealing with matters in which there is wide and keen public interest. I think it is only realism, as hon. members will recognize, to say quite frankly that this is a subject in which there can hardly be said to be wide public interest; rather it is a subject in which, I feel, a lead should be given to our people.

I rise to speak on this matter primarily because of humanitarian instincts which, I am sure, are shared by practically all hon. members, instincts which prompt many of us to raise our voices whenever the opportunity is afforded on behalf of people suffering untold persecution.

I should like to set the tone of my remarks and perhaps give expression to my attitude on this question by reading a few sentences from the printed copy of a broadcast given over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation network last Easter Sunday by Watson Thomson:

> Retribution towards the nazi criminals is certainly not enough: any pagan, any nazi storm trooper can do that thing. Upon us is a higher and a harder obligation. Not to pity the Jews, not to sentimentalize over them, not to pass resolutions about them. But to rise up and act with all the passion of an awakened human conscience, and save Jewish lives. Save them—not to send them to Eritrea or Madagascar, but to live with them ourselves, learning to say what we like and what we dislike about them as those may who desire understanding and reconciliation, learning to listen to what they have in ancient grievance against us; so that the past may be eaten up into a tolerant present and carried forward into a creative future of living together.

It might tend to shorten my remarks if I were to give a few quotations which summarize the situation with respect to Jewish refugees. I should like to read a bit from a pamphlet entitled "Let My People Go," written by Victor Gollancz:

> Of the 6,000,000 Jews or so who were living at the outbreak of the war in what is at present nazi-occupied Europe, a high proportion—say between one and two million—have been deliberately murdered by the nazis and their satellites.
> No discrimination has been made in favour of pregnant women, babies, children, the sick, the very old. On the contrary, discrimination, such as it is, has been in favour of men from whom an adequate last ounce can be got in German war factories.
>
> The murders are taking the form of random shootings, mass shootings, mass electrocutions, mass poison-gassing, and transportation in conditions which inevitably involve death during the journey. This is over and above slow starvation by the allotment of hopelessly inadequate rations, or no rations at all. . . .
> This policy, which has been pursued since the outbreak of the war, has been greatly speeded up during the last few months. Unless something effective is done within a very few months these six million Jews will all be dead except fifty thousand or so in the countries at present neutral and perhaps a few tens of thousands whom Hitler may find it convenient to work to the last ounce of their strength in his own war factories.

I turn now to a sentence in the broadcast given by Watson Thomson on Easter Sunday. It is very brief, but it tells a great deal about the horrible plight of these people:

> The armed guards surrounding the ghetto walls have a standard rate now of one hundred zlotys for which price they will consent to give a Jew the privilege of being shot at his own request.

I should like to call the attention of hon. members to another document which I think it would be well for everyone to read. It appears under the heading, "Starvation Over Europe." Its sub-title is, "Made in Germany." The book has been published by the Institute of Jewish Affairs, and I find in the back of it eight or ten pages of citations giving the authority for the material contained in it. The material has been collected from William Beveridge, the London Economist, the London Economic Journal, "World Economic Survey" of the League of Nations, Foreign Affairs, New York Times, New York Herald-Tribune, London Times, "Survey of Central and Eastern Europe" published by the League of Nations, "Central European Observer" published in London, and a whole host of credible documents and newspapers from all parts of the world.

This book sets out the stark fact that the nazis are making terrible use of the lessons of science with particular reference to feeding. It is pointed out that it is part of the German plan so to allot and apportion food among the peoples of occupied Europe that the strongest will be of course the Germans, both in Germany itself and in other parts of Europe; the next strongest physically will be those from whom the Germans can get work in their war factories; and so on down the list of various races and nationalities under the control of the nazis at the present time.

I read that Hitler's scientists not only made a careful study of what had happened in Germany during the last war. They closely calculated the subtle distinctions between minimum protective diet, malnutrition produced by specific deficiencies, slow starvation caused by denial of cell-replenishing foods, and finally actual famine. Their research also taught them that over a long period certain deficiencies spell disaster in the form of national debilitation and a stunted generation. Accordingly on the basis of this knowledge and research the Germans are doing two things. On the one hand, they are seeing to it that their own people are well fed, scientifically fed, so that they will be strong for the conflict in which they are engaged, and also for another eventuality to which I will refer in a moment. On the other hand, they are making use of the scientific knowledge which they have gained to see to it that the peoples whom they conquer are strong enough only to serve German ends, and as far as certain nationalities and races are concerned, particularly the Jews, that they pass out of the picture altogether.

I said there was another eventuality to which I would call attention, and perhaps I can do it best by quoting directly from the book:

> In their ruthless logic the nazi leaders have not ignored the possibility of ultimate defeat. Should Germany be destined to fail again on the battlefield they are determined that their system of feeding and starving, as applied during the war years, shall result in a radical and permanent shift in the demographic balance of power.

The Germans, in other words, realize that they can lose and may lose this war. They are determined that if they lose it, when it is all over, their people will be physically so much stronger than the peoples of other parts of Europe that, as it were, in starting from scratch on the continent of Europe, they will have a better chance in the scramble that will ensue.

Just in passing, I should point to the lessons that are to be drawn from that situation. They tell us, of course, that we should be making the fullest use of the scientific knowledge we have to make sure that in so far as it is possible, with the foods at our command, we should have a strong people both for the war and for the post-war period. They remind us, too, of the problem that will face us when the war is over—the problem of feeding millions of people on the continent of Europe. It will be a case not only of getting to them so much bulk, as far as food is concerned, but of getting to them the right kind of food, which they are now denied, in order that they may rebuild a race whose physical condition will be seriously deteriorated. That, of course, has very wide implications for us in view of our situation as a largely agricultural country. May I give to the committee some of the statistics which have been compiled in this book. The material is set out in tables which are quite interesting, though they are certainly alarming.

First of all, on page 37 I find a table indicating the comparative meat rations allotted to the peoples of nazi-occupied Europe. The Germans of course lead with 100 per cent; Czechs, 86 per cent; Dutch, 71 per cent; Poles, in the incorporated area, 71 per cent; Lithuanians, 57 per cent; French 51 per cent; Belgians, 40 per cent; Serbs, 36 per cent; Poles in the general government area, 36 per cent; Slovenes, 29 per cent; Jews, zero. Then on page 47 there is another table giving the percentage of pre-war food received under present rations. These percentages are given in terms of calories per consumer unit. The Germans head the list with 93 per cent. The significance is that the Germans, both in Germany itself and in other parts of Europe, are getting 93 per cent of the calorie requirement of food they were receiving before the war. This is the table:

	Per cent
Germans	93
Czechs	83
Poles, in the incorporated area	78
Dutch	70
Belgians	66
Poles, in general government area	66
Italians	63
Norwegians	54
Jews	20

On page 48 is another table which gives the proportions of German rations received by the peoples of Europe, based on the calories per person normally consumed as of January 1, 1943. This is as follows:

	Per cent
Germans	100
Czechs	87
Poles, in the incorporated area	81
Dutch	80
Belgians	65
Poles, in the general government area	65
Finns	64
Norwegians	61
Italians	55
French	53
Greeks	31
Jews	21

There are several other tables in this book giving information along the same lines, and in each case the ratios are similar to those in the tables which I have given. I shall not take the time to give these in detail. One deals with the calories received in the present rations, and other tables indicate the amount of carbohydrates, proteins and fats being received by the racial and national groups under the control of the nazis at the present time. It is indeed a tragic use that is being made of scientific knowledge by the nazi people. There are many lessons contained in this information which we should heed, but I would point out in particular the plight of the Jewish people who are at the bottom of the list every time. I am not going to take time to recount stories of horror in connection with the sufferings of the Jewish people, because I do not consider that the way to move people to action. Rather we should consider the facts and figures such as I have given, and as human beings see if we cannot come to a decision as to what we are to do. I should like to refer hon. members to a memorandum submitted to the Bermuda refugee conference by the world Jewish congress. In the beginning of this memorandum reference is made to the conditions I have just placed before the committee and it goes on to say:

> The nazis have never concealed their determination to destroy European Jewry. As late as March 14, 1943, Doctor Goebbels, in an interview given to foreign press representatives, declared: "Germany is firmly convinced that the Jews are an international disease which must be exterminated in Europe."

Then on February 19, Doctor Goebbels made this further comment:

> "If hostile foreign countries raise a sanctimonious protest against our anti-Semitic policy and shed hypocritical crocodile tears over our measures against Jewry, that cannot prevent us from doing what is necessary. Germany in any case has no intention of yielding to this Jewish threat, but intends rather to exercise against Jewry our prompt and, if necessary, our complete and most radical suppression."

Toward the end of the memorandum appears the following:

> The warnings of retribution uttered repeatedly by the most authoritative spokesmen of the democratic world have had no deterrent effect on the enemy. There remain only two ways in which the total destruction of the Jewish population on the continent of Europe can be prevented: 1. The sending of supplies under proper safeguards to places of detention and remnants of Jewish communities which survive; and 2. To remove as many Jews as possible from nazi-controlled areas to places of refuge.

And again:

> If the gravity of the problem is not recognized, and action not taken immediately, the victory of the united nations may mean nothing to the worst victim of nazi barbarism. Dead communities cannot be restored to life.

Then I quote from the appendix as follows:

The united nations should, without delay, take steps to designate and establish a number of sanctuaries in allied and neutral countries to accommodate substantial numbers of Hitler's victims and to serve as havens of refuge for those Jews whose release from captivity may be arranged for, or who may find their way to freedom through efforts of their own.

I was glad to note, in the Prime Minister's statement this morning that he had something to say about refugees, and that he dealt specifically with the problems facing the Jewish people. I was glad to note also a suggestion to the effect that Canada would participate fully in any programme that might be worked out as a result of the Bermuda conference or of any agreement that might be arrived at by the united nations. I suppose the question of whether or not we are doing enough as human beings is a matter of degree, perhaps I should say a matter of opinion. I do not wish to throw any cold water upon what is being done by Canada for these people and for Jewish children in particular, but I rose to place before the committee some bold and terrible facts as a means of expressing my own opinion that Canada is not doing enough.

I had hoped that when the Prime Minister got to the end of his remarks on the Bermuda conference he would have indicated some further steps which Canada would take without delay on her own initiative. In this connection I should like to quote from a note which appears on the back cover of the book from which I quoted a few minutes ago, entitled "Let My People Go." This was added to the book after it had been completed by the writer, Victor Gollancz. He refers to a letter which appeared in the Daily Telegraph of Wednesday, January 6, written by Sir Andrew McFadyen. Sir Andrew was general secretary to the reparations commission 1922-24, and of the Dawes committee, 1925. This is what he says:

A few weeks ago a deputation to the home secretary appealed for permission for the entry of 2,000 children from Vichy, France. The request was unconditionally refused, partly on the ground that it might cause an "outburst" of anti-Semitism here. That is a slander on the British people. News has just been received that of 2,000 children, from two years of age upwards, deported from Vichy France in cattle trucks, half were dead on arrival at their destination and the rest were dying.

The point is, Mr. Chairman, that waiting to help these people in the best way that we can later on is, in the opinion of some of us.

really not good enough in view of the fact that many of them—thousands, perhaps millions—will not be there to help. Many of them we could not help, no matter how much initiative the government or the people of this country might display. But it does seem to me, that as human beings we should do our best to provide as much sanctuary as we can for those people who can get away. I say we should do that because these people are human and deserve that consideration, and because we are human and ought to act in that way.

I intimated when I rose in my place that I realized this is not a subject of wide popular interest to the people of this country. After all, Jews are only a very small portion of our population. According to the census of 1931, they represented only 1·5 per cent of the population of Canada. We know there are people who have a dislike for the Jewish people. To be sure, Jews are human the same as ourselves and undoubtedly there are characteristics among them that people may not like, as is the case with all of us. They are also human in the sense that they deserve humane treatment. I remind hon. members that they are part of the human race and have contributed to the race some of the greatest characters in our history. The culture that they have given to us, particularly of a religious nature, is something that our civilization would be a great deal poorer without. May I emphasize also that to help these people would do us good. I believe it would increase our own sense of humanity, and increase our own consciousness of the fact that we are trying to establish a better world in which we will get rid of racial hatred, prejudice and antagonism. Somehow we in this country should rise up and do the generous and humane thing for these people.

I dare to hope that the government, fully conscious of the attitude of many people toward this question, might seek in this instance not to do just what they are being asked to do by some small sections of the population, but to give a lead in this matter. I say again these people—millions of them—we shall not be able to help, no matter how much of initiative we may display, because of the determination of the nazi regime to do away with as many of them as they possibly can. Yet there are many who could be helped if it were made known that there are areas of sanctuary in various parts of the world. I recall that this morning when the Prime Minister was speaking on this matter he referred to the necessity of secrecy, for military reasons. I believe his remarks were to this effect, that we would have to be careful lest by making it known that we would receive Jewish or other refugees rather freely, it would result in the nazis taking advantage of that fact to send spies into this country. It is admittedly difficult—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That reference was not peculiarly to Jews; it was to refugees generally.

Mr. KNOWLES: I believe I made that inclusion in my remarks, if I did not I accept the Prime Minister's correction. It strikes me that secrecy is something behind which it is possible to do what ought to be done, or to do too little, or even nothing. I regret that the Prime Minister feels the necessity of putting secrecy upon this matter for that reason. I only hope the remarks that I have made and that others may perhaps make may convince the Prime Minister that, within such secrecy as it is necessary to have, he and the government should do everything possible to provide sanctuary for these people, because I am satisfied that, despite the feelings that there may be among our own people toward this race, an effort of this kind would do us good; it would help to increase our own sense of humanity; and it would help to make possible a better world with less of race prejudice, hatred and the things for which Hitler stands and against which we are fighting at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if I understand that he advocates doing away with secrecy, because he says he regrets there has to be secrecy used. Secrecy is only for the purpose of security. Do I understand him to say he advocates doing away with secrecy in the matter?

Mr. KNOWLES: I expressed the hope that if it is necessary to maintain that secrecy, and I have no option but to accept the Prime Minister's statement on his responsibility that it is, then within that secrecy I hope he will not make the mistake of doing too little, but that he will do all that is possible.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? In the light of the speech he has just made, at the risk of being judged as over-suspicious with regard to speeches from that group, may I ask, would he state whether they intend to put a candidate in the Jacques Cartier constituency?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That was a wise idea, was it not?

Mr. KNOWLES: It is not a question of what we intend to do; there is already a candidate in Cartier. I submit that it is an irrelevant question; it hardly deserves an answer, but I may say that there are only three federal constituencies in Canada where the Jewish people are numerous enough to hope to elect a member of their own race to this house. Any political party that would confine its interest to three constituencies only would not be politically wise.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, I rose to speak on this matter solely because my humanitarian instincts would not allow me to keep my seat.

Mrs. DORISE NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Chairman, by the look of some of the hon. members this evening it would appear that this subject is not a particularly popular one, and yet I consider it necessary to make a few remarks in support of what has been said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I am in agreement wth him that perhaps not quite as wide a section of our people are interested in this subject as should be. Yet I believe there is enough public sympathy and there are enough people in this country who are wondering why Canada is not able to take a greater lead among the united nations in helping the refugees from Europe to ensure sufficient interest in this matter to make it worth while. One unfortunate aspect of this whole problem is that the fascist propaganda has permeated farther than the nations under fascist control. If we do have to have in our own so-called democratic country a certain amount of anti-Semitic feeling, it is the product of fascist ideology and should have no place in any democratic country. The persecution of any minority people becomes, later, an obsession and madness. Intolerance is just a barbaric custom; it is a form more or less of a persecution mania which we thought we had left behind us long ago in the middle ages. To accept any form of intolerance is to debase ourselves to Hitler's level of intelligence and barbarity. I should like to quote from a book published in 1937, one which has been very widely read, and which has been acknowledged to be one of the finest statements prepared on the subject of the fascist state. It was written by Professor Brady, associate professor of economics of the university of California. He calls his book "The Spirit and Structure of German Fascism", and he quotes from a statement by Darré, reichminister of agriculture, in which he says:

> The Semites reject everything that pertains to the pig. The Nordic peoples, on the contrary, accord the pig the highest possible honour ... in the cult of the Germans the pig occupies the first place and is the first among the domestic animals ... This predominance of the pig, the sacred animal destined to sacrifices among the Nordic peoples, has drawn its originality from the great trees of the German forest ... Thus out of the darkness of earliest history arise two human races whose attitude in respect of pigs presents an absolute contrast ... The Semites and the pig are faunal and thus physiological opposites. It is not unthinkable that the eating of pig flesh by the Semite sets up physiological disharmonies in his body ... The Semites do not understand the pig, they do not accept the pig, they reject the pig, whereas this animal occupies the first place in the cult of the Nordic peoples.

This is only one small illustration of the wholesale absurdity upon which fascist theories have been built, theories which to-day are responsible for the ghastly slaughter of millions of most innocent people. It is perhaps more necessary that we should understand why the German nazis used anti-Semitism as a weapon in their hands. I shall continue to quote from the same chapter by Professor Brady. He says:

By outlawing Jews it provides a partial solution for the job hunger of loyal nazi party adherents. The bulk of these active rank and file adherents fall into the middle strata of professional and trades people on the one hand, and politically active youth in search for jobs in these fields on the other. It is in precisely these fields that the Jews, comprising less than one-half of one per cent of the total population, were the most active.

He goes on to say:

The Jews served very well as "bogeyman" for the nazi strategists. The German peasant is led to believe that the Jew stole all his hard-won earnings away from him by some devil's magic on the commodity exchanges. The petit-bourgeois classes were told that the Jew aspired to control all professional jobs, ruin small tradesmen (note the campaigns against Wertheims and other large departmental stores), and dominate for "racial purposes" all big industry and the financial machinery of the country. Labour is asked to believe that cynical and self-seeking Jews, under the guise of Marxism, stirred up labour discontent which they could exploit to their own cruel advantage and in which they did, as a matter of course, continuously betray the interests they affected to represent. Young girls and women are taught that physical contact with the Jew will corrupt them biologically.

By these means the "attention of the masses was diverted" to see the Jew as the cause of low farm prices, high retail prices, adulteration of goods, onerous tax burdens for reparations payments, low wages, unsatisfactory labour conditions, and many other crimes against the Aryan people. . . . Needless to say, not only did the Jews not "control" or set interest rates, agricultural indebtedness, or speculative activity, but also the nazis did not abolish these activities. What they attempted to do was to lead the populace to believe that in suppressing the Jews, they had corrected the abuses of which so many had with such justice so long and bitterly complained.

There is without doubt a widespread feeling among large sections of the British people that more could be done to prevent loss of life at the present time. Reference has already been made to the pamphlet published by Victor Gollancz entitled "Let My People Go". It is a significant fact that over 150,000 copies of this small pamphlet have been bought by the British people since the beginning of this year. Some of our greatest world figures have expressed horror at the continued barbarity toward the Jewish people, notably the Pope, the President of the United States, Mr. Churchill and also our own Prime Minister. We are told by some that of course the solution is to win the war. Naturally I agree with that. One cannot quarrel with the truth of that statement. But the point is that while the united nations are straining every nerve and effort to do that, how many hundreds of thousands of these people are to be left to their horrible fate until the war is won. Cannot something more be done to prevent the slaughter of these people, before we are in a position to establish control over Europe? I would remind hon. members of the committee that sympathy for these people, alone, will not save their lives.

On December 17 last year a statement was made in the British House of Commons on this problem by Mr. Anthony Eden. He said at that time that those who were responsible for these crimes will receive retribution. But retribution in a year or two years' time will not save the lives of those who to-night, at this very moment, may be meeting a fate more tragic than either you or I could conceive, and they are meeting that fate at the hands of these demented sadists.

These horrors are so far away from us they have not touched us intimately as a nation. I should like to quote from this pamphlet written by Mr. Victor Gollancz, who is himself a Jew. I do not wish to add any horror, any more than anyone else does; and yet, as I said before, these things are so far away from us that I believe if we could only bring them near to us, and try to feel ourselves as these Jewish people and other refugees on the continent are feeling at this very moment, it might help perhaps to instill into us the necessity for doing something.

I quote this from page 8 of his pamphlet:

You will read that ten thousand are being sent every day from Warsaw to the slaughter camps further east: you will read that one hundred and fifty men, women and children are being packed into a sealed coach just big enough to hold forty, so that when they arrive the living, the dying, and the dead fall out together, and the peasants fly from the stench. Forget "ten thousand": forget "one hundred and fifty"; or rather, remember them only for purposes of multiplication, and in order to grasp the magnitude of the horror. For a few brief moments, be just one of those human beings, whose body, with its nerves that can suffer so, and whose mind and soul, with all their resources of terror and despair, are concealed by the cold abstraction of "one hundred and fifty" and "ten thousand" and "six million". And then be another, and another. Be the mother flinging her baby from a sixth-storey window: be a girl of nine, torn from her parents and standing in the dark of a moving truck with two corpses pressed close against her; be an old Jew at the door of the electrocution chamber. And only then when you have been each of these for a few short moments, do the multiplication.

I would say that this is definitely not a Jewish problem. It is a problem of humanity itself. After the matter had been discussed in the British House of Commons by Mr. Anthony Eden, one of the members of the house, Miss Rathbone, wrote a letter to the News Chronicle of December 16, in which she said this:

Few people realize the rigidity of the regulations by which the home secretary now controls the entry of refugees to this country and the corresponding regulations affecting the colonies. Except for allied nationals specially asked for by their governments and a few children who cannot in effect be brought here, the door is practically barred. . . . The first step, therefore, is to demand the revision of these regulations, so that refugees for whom the only chance of escape from torture and death is a visa for a safe country shall no longer be met at every turn by the notice "you may not enter here". The whole matter has larger implications. The settlement during and after the war of refugees, especially the Jews, concerns not only the home office, but also the foreign office, the dominions and the colonies.

At least it seems that at the present time, through the good offices of some of the neutral countries, we might approach the fascist nations. I remember this morning the Prime Minister said that we can have no faith in them. I agree with him. Of course Hitler can either accept or refuse. Naturally there is the danger that he may use the method of infiltration, by sending his spies in among the refugees. Naturally the greatest care will have to be taken. It would seem to me that if we made some approach to the neutral nations it would give some comfort at least to the people in the occupied countries and even those in Germany who have still some spark of decency within them and realize the disastrous fate that is before the Jewish people and others. Surely adult refugees could be placed in concentration camps so that, with the very greatest care having to be exercised, not one of them could go outside for any purpose, and therefore the danger of spies to a very great degree would be controlled. In parts of Africa and Palestine it would appear that there must be room for refugee people. At present small numbers of refugee people are getting through to neutral countries, but the trouble is that the neutral countries are so small and are so overburdened with refugees that it is impossible for them to be continually taking more. Therefore they are forced to shut the door to further refugees. But if we were able to remove from some of the neutral countries the refugees who are already there and place them in camps in Africa or Palestine, it would make room for more of these unfortunates to come through to the neutral countries, and surely if it were only for the sake of a handful of refugees it would be worth the attempt. I quote further from Mr. Gollancz, on the question of allowing refugees into Palestine:

Palestine could absorb 50,000 Jews in its war industries immediately, to the great benefit of the allied war effort. There would also be room for thousands of children. The country and the allied war machinery are, indeed, crying out for more men. The military authorities need 30,000 unskilled and 5,000 skilled workers. Agricultural production in Palestine is gravely curtailed for lack of labour.

He continues:

In view of all this, what possible reason can there be, in common sense or humanity, for the present policy? What is that policy?

In the government White Paper of May, 1939, it was laid down that during the five years beginning April, 1939, 75,000 Jewish immigrants should be admitted into the country, and that thereafter Jewish immigration should cease permanently. This is not the place to discuss whether this restriction was compatible with the terms of the Balfour declaration, which declared the intention of setting up a Jewish national home in Palestine, or with the terms of the mandate based on it. Those who read the White Paper will perhaps feel in the very uneasiness of its phraseology the confession that, "for political reasons", a trust was being broken.

However that may be, 75,000 by April, 1944, was the number to be admitted. The number so far admitted is less than 40,000. That is to say, according to the terms of the White Paper itself, more than 35,000 immigration certificates are still outstanding during the next fifteen months. Is it conceivable that the government can refuse to grant them now, more especially in view of the economic needs of the country which have been mentioned above? Apparently it is conceivable. But if the refusal is persisted in, then the government cannot be held blameless for the fate of men, women and children who might otherwise have been saved.

It will not help any mother or any parent of a child in an occupied country to know that the murderer of the child will be punished at some future time. But we can try to save that child now, and if we fail to do so I think you and I might just as well acknowledge that the story of the Good Samaritan has fallen on deaf ears, that we have failed to apply that principle to the need which has arisen in our own day and age, and that like other nations we are passing by on the other side of the road and not heeding the cries of those who need our assistance.

We are fighting to-day the greatest robber and the greatest murderer of mankind that the world has ever known, and if you and I have a conscience we have to see that the necessary ways and means are found, even though a certain degree of secrecy will have to be maintained; for, of course, we must see that Hitler does not use anything we may do to further his own aims or help him in any way. I think it would be a good thing to let some of the German people know that we are aware of what is going on; for, after all is said and done, we have to realize that there are some, perhaps only a few, left of the German people who have a conscience and who realize what is happening. I quote again from Mr. Gollancz' publication. He says that on December 27, Reynolds newspaper:

> . . . publishes details of a manifesto issued by a conference of all anti-fascist groups in Germany, which recently met secretly, and which declares that peace will be possible only after complete destruction of the Hitler regime, that all concentration camps must be closed, that all anti-Jewish and race laws must be annulled, that religious, economic, political and press freedom must be reestablished, and that there must be a foreign policy based on peace and international cooperation. The manifesto is being broadcast by the secret German Freedom Radio, at the risk of death or torture for everyone involved, and is being directed to the German army as well as to the home front.

We must not neglect to realize that there are some people in Germany who would help if only we would let them know across the distances of the world that we were endeavouring to do something. I cannot help feeling that there is need for Canada asking Britain for a revision of the regulations regarding the entry of refugees. If we were to help the neutral countries to evacuate the refugees who are already there to parts of Africa and Palestine, it would be possible for more refugees to go into the neutral countries from the occupied countries of Europe. I believe that this country could collect money for the necessary camps, food, ships, transportation facilities and so on for this service. Broadcasts could go out from this country and from other countries, and the Catholic people of this country should ask the Vatican to send out broadcasts, because they would possibly be listened to by more people in the occupied countries than broadcasts coming from our own or from the British government. In that way we could feel that we had at least tried to do something for these unfortunate people, and we would have the satisfaction of knowing we had done our best for these people—not Jews, nor Czechs nor Poles—just people, remembering that what was said long ago still holds:

> Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Chairman, we have listened to various subjects discussed to-day. I rise more particularly to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister and of the committee a subject of vital interest to the people of Canada, although perhaps of more interest to the people of the Pacific coast.

I wish to draw to the Prime Minister's attention a matter which might affect our fisheries, particularly the fisheries of the Pacific coast. The matter I have in mind has to do with the waters off our Canadian shores and beyond the three-mile limit.

Dealing with our salmon fisheries, may I say to the members of the committee that all the salmon caught off the Pacific coast of British Columbia and in our rivers are born and reared in Canadian waters, streams and creeks. After a period there of from one to two years they go out to sea and return, according to the variety of the salmon, in either three or four years, with some varieties staying out until they are almost five years old. Then they return from the open sea and head inward to the Fraser river and other Canadian rivers.

During the time they are at sea these fish feed and grow on what is known as the continental shelf, which is a ridge rising from the bed of the ocean to within two or three hundred feet of the surface. This ridge or continental shelf runs parallel to our entire coast-line at a distance of some twenty miles off shore. It is along these banks that the salmon feed until the time comes for them to return to the place where they were born for the purpose of spawning, after which they die.

I urge upon the Prime Minister that these waters should be recognized as Canadian or United States waters for the protection of our salmon and for fishing purposes. Vessels from any country could come along and wipe out our entire salmon fishing industry by fishing the continental shelf. The United States and Canada have entered into a treaty to rehabilitate and preserve the sockeye salmon fishing. At the last meeting of the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries commission a resolution was passed which I should like to place on the records of the house, because the matter is of vital concern not only to the people of the Pacific coast but to all our people as well. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas, the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission was created pursuant to a convention entered into between the United States and the Dominion of Canada primarily for the purpose of rehabilitating the Fraser river sockeye salmon supply, and

Whereas, it is confidently expected by the commission that its projected work in the removal of obstructions and in the regulation of the fishery will be successful, and

Whereas, said convention included within its terms the territorial waters and the high seas westward from the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America within lines therein described, and

Whereas, it seems probable that it will be practical for fishermen and vessels of other nations to operate on Swiftsure banks and other places more than three miles off shore and if permitted to do so in disregard of the regulations adopted by the commission, may drastically interfere with the restoration of the salmon supply referred to.

Now, therefore, be it resolved that the attention of the governments of the two nations be called to this situation in order that such steps may be taken as, in the opinion of said governments, may appear advisable.

It is most important now, I believe, that steps be taken by both the United States and Canada in this matter, and I would ask that the Prime Minister's office start negotiations with the United States along the lines outlined in the resolution.

I would draw to the attention of the committee that the terms of the treaty concerning sockeye salmon fisheries which was concluded between the United States and Canada specify very vaguely the extent of our jurisdiction over the offshore waters, because article 1 of the treaty provides that it shall apply to the following waters:

The territorial waters and the high seas westward from the western coast of the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada.

I maintain that the limits set should be more specific and definite; as the treaty stands, these waters would extend right out to the shores of Japan. What we are asking is that we go at least as far as the continental shelf where the sockeye salmon feed for three or four years before returning to Canadian waters.

There is another matter along similar lines that I should like also at this time to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister and to the members of the committee. This has to do with the waters lying between Queen Charlotte islands and the mainland of British Columbia, and known as Hecate strait.

Queen Charlotte islands are a large group of islands extending 100 miles in length and have an area of 4,005 square miles, in size about twice the size of Prince Edward Island. The territory equals over 20 million acres of land. The narrowest width of sea is at the north end, which is only some nineteen miles from the mainland, whereas at the south end it is some fifty miles wide.

The waters between the islands and the mainland are known as Hecate strait, and at the present time these waters are fished by both Canadian and United States fishermen.

Since Canada has not designated these waters as "Canadian waters", there is nothing, however, to prevent fishing vessels from any foreign nation from fishing within the strait itself.

I wish to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister that Canada did take some steps some years ago. As long ago as 1896 Canadian patrol vessels warned foreign fishermen against operating in these waters. Captain Walbran of the D.G.S. Quadra reported that in that year he had warned United States vessels they were fishing in Canadian waters, and that these, after having been warned, left the strait.

There are many instances in the world today where certain countries claim territorial rights extending considerable distances over large expanses of water, and it may interest hon. members to know that the so-called three-mile limit, which is usually referred to as the limit which a country should have in the exercise of its rights, differs entirely throughout the world. In fact, there is no such thing as an international law on the matter. Some countries, like Russia, established a twelve-mile limit. The Bering sea tribunal in 1893 established a sixty-mile zone for fur-seals. Delaware bay, which is twenty miles wide, is recognized as within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, while Chesapeake bay, which is twelve miles wide at the entrance and extends 270 miles long, is entirely closed to all foreign fishermen. Hudson bay is another example. Canada prohibited any fishing in Hudson bay for anyone without a licence from the dominion.

Great Britain, which has throughout long years fought for the freedom of the seas, itself prosecuted a Captain Mortensen, who was operating a Norwegian steam trawler called Niobe, which vessel was seized for fishing in Moray firth. Captain Mortensen was fined for fishing five miles from shore.

Uruguay exercises control over one-half of the river La Plata, though the river at its mouth is 135 miles wide and is fifty miles wide 100 miles from the open sea.

Going back to ancient history—this may interest hon. members who may believe in the universality of the so-called three-mile limit—Venice once claimed and enforced the entire Adriatic sea, which was 500 miles long by 100 miles wide. Every ship entering there was searched; even the Pope of that day protested about his ships being molested.

The first definition of the three-mile limit occurred in 1818 when a treaty between Great Britain and United States was signed, but it is interesting to note that neither of these nations has fully adhered to this. Even the mile has differed over a period of time. The mile in Queen Elizabeth's time was 5,000 feet; in the 38th year of her reign it was 5,240 feet. The Spanish mile is 4,656 yards; the Dutch, 8,240 yards; the French, 4,263 yards; the German short mile, 6,859 yards. Therefore, when one speaks of the three-mile limit, what does that actually mean; which mile are they speaking of, the English land mile, which is 5,280 feet, or the nautical mile, 6,075 feet, or do they refer to the French, Dutch or that of the Spaniard?

Here we have, Mr. Chairman, large islands lying off the Pacific coast, and no steps yet have been taken to preserve for fishing the waters lying between them. It is my opinion that steps should be taken now to declare that the waters lying off our shores and between Queen Charlotte islands and the mainland, known as the Hecate strait, be known as Canadian waters, and I am appealing to the Prime Minister now that the matters that I have spoken of be taken seriously and that steps be taken to discuss this situation both with the United States and with our own Canadian departments.

May I point out that this is an opportune time for making an approach to the United States in the matter. It may interest hon. members to know that the United States and Canada are the only two countries in the world which have treaties with regard to fish. The treaty they put into effect to protect the fur-seals has increased the fur-seal herd from 100,000 to a flock of upwards of 2,000,000 and brought a net revenue to this country of $312,000 last year. Our halibut might have disappeared entirely by now if the United States and Canada had not entered into a treaty to protect and rehabilitate the halibut, which is fished for off the Canadian and Alaskan shores.

Coming to the recent salmon treaty signed by the United States and Canada to rehabilitate the sockeye salmon, I might point out that at one time the catch in the Fraser river waters amounted to two and a half million cases, whereas last year, which was quite a high yield year, some 600,000 cases only were canned by our fishermen.

There will be a great demand for food after the war. There will also be a great demand for fish. No steps have been taken to exclude from fishing off our shores fishing vessels of other nationals.

In 1938, at a conference on the Pacific coast of representatives from various north and south American countries, as well as representatives from Japan, it was pointed out to the delegates that the halibut was protected and had been increasing as a result of the treaty and that the salmon was also protected and was not allowed to be entirely destroyed, but the Japanese delegates at that conference said to the gathering, "We have caught salmon and other varieties of fish off your shores, but we never noticed either the union jack or the stars and stripes on their backs." In other words, they took the view that fish in the open seas belong to any national or any person who goes after them and catches them. We take a different attitude, especially as they are born in our waters. We say that owing to our protection and the treaty between the two countries, both halibut and salmon have been increasing, and we argue that they would probably have disappeared in some of the fishing banks had the two countries not entered into such a treaty. In fact, we have led the world in the matter of fishery treaties.

I am strongly of opinion that steps should be taken now with regard to the waters off our shores in the Hecate strait as well as the strait of Juan de Fuca, where our salmon feed on the continental banks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Department of External Affairs and the Department of Fisheries have been looking into the problem of the Pacific coast fisheries, both the halibut and salmon fisheries. I shall be very glad to take careful note of what the hon. member has said, and I welcome from any source suggestions that may prove helpful.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I do not propose to make my remarks of any length to-night, but I would refer to certain statements made this morning in committee. I have here a cutting from to-day's Ottawa Journal in which I am charged with hating the Jews. I will not read the whole thing, but this is not the first time that my name has been bandied about the country and has appeared in the press as a Jew-baiter by some, and a Jew-hater by others. It seems to be taken for granted that merely to criticize, in fact merely to mention a Jew, is to lay oneself open to the charge of being a Jew-baiter, and coming from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, as it did this morning, I think that only adds to the offence. Surely if there is a group in this house the members of which are wont to express their hatred for this person or that person, whenever they rise in their places, it is the group—not all of them, but some of the group—of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, as I believe the Minister of Finance remarked the other night. Apparently anybody who manages to make more than an average success of his affairs is attacked, or at least is regarded with hatred by some of the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group.

On another occasion I was speaking on the budget, and I read a list of the leading international financiers whose names were all household words. I merely read the list. Everybody knows them, and I merely asked, how many are British names, how many French names, and for that matter how many Christian? At once I was assailed. In fact, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) immediately rose to his feet and said, "No Jew baiting." That got out into the press. Later on, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was speaking in the house and he referred to my criticism of the address that Mr. Sandwell gave some months ago on the League of Nations, in which he advocated that the Canadian people should surrender their loyalty to the crown and hand it over to international control.

I have here a copy of an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press. It says:

> Mr. Jaques raised the question of whether the views of B. K. Sandwell, the Toronto editor, on a supranational world order were seditious. When M. J. Coldwell, the C.C.F. leader, who is a member of the League of Nations Society, sought to reply, Mr. Jaques interrupted by muttering, "Jewish bankers", and "gold standard." Mr. Coldwell said, "I am afraid my hon. friend has the gold standard on his brain."

I will challenge anybody in this house to find those words on Hansard. I never said that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not on Hansard, because you always mutter them and some people cannot hear them.

Mr. JAQUES: I never said that, and the hon. member will have to take my word for it. I said the gold standard, and I say it again. That is what they are working for.

Mr. REID: That is nothing to what they say about me regarding the Japanese.

Mr. JAQUES: More than that, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to stand on my reputation in this house and out of the house, too, as a loyal citizen of Canada, and I will challenge anybody in this house or out of it to find one authentic quotation of mine in which I have showed in any way that I am either a Jew-baiter or in favour of Jew persecution. I will say more. I happen to be one of the few members of this house who, in September, 1939, demanded, in the name of this group, that Canada should wage total war against the German nazi gangsters. I could quote those views if necessary, but I think that is remembered by those who were present in the house. As the Montreal Gazette in an editorial recently said, the Social Credit group was the only group in the house at that time who stood and demanded total war against the nazi gangsters. I am not saying, "I told you so." I am not making the statement in that sense; I am merely saying that actions speak louder than words. What was the attitude of those members, and especially the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation who is now such a champion of the persecuted Jews? I quote from Hansard of September 9, 1939, at page 55 as follows:

> Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid and must not include conscription of man-power or the sending of any expeditionary force.

I do not wish to rub that in at all; I am merely stating it. Perhaps I had better address it to the Jews and ask them who are their best friends. Suppose Britain had received no aid and had gone down, as she was within an ace of doing. The result might have been that Hitler would have controlled the western hemisphere as well as the eastern hemisphere, and the granting of aid to all persecuted minorities would have been impossible.

The cause of the little flare-up this morning was a remark I made which was not heard by Hansard. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was speaking as usual in a sort of global way, although I have never accepted his global authority. My own private opinion is that it is "globaloney", but when he claimed that his memory goes back two thousand years I found that a little too much to swallow. The hon. gentleman told the old story or fable if you like, about Joseph and the Jewish refugees going into Egypt and becoming the parents of the founder of our Christian religion. I merely said that the only thing wrong with that story was that he was not a Jew. My authority for saying that is the Dean of St. Paul's, who, I take it, is an eminent authority on the subject. I do not profess to be an authority at all.

Those who are so solicitous at the present time for the fortunes of the Jews in Europe are precisely those who opposed any preparation or rearmament against the growing threat of Hitler. I make that statement without fear of challenge. All minorities, including Jews, have enjoyed greater protection and justice and have received fairer treatment under British rule, under British crown, or even, if you like, under British imperialism than under any other control. I say that without fear of contradiction. But it is precisely those people who profess such sympathy for these wretched, persecuted minorities who are working and have been working tooth and nail to destroy that very British protection. That is the stand I take.

I think I can say for the party to which I belong, for that matter for the whole Social Credit movement throughout the British empire, that we anchor ourselves absolutely to the British crown. We believe that that is the best guarantee of peace and justice for the minorities and, if you like, for the majorities as well. We are utterly opposed to any scheme or any proposal or any plan that would surrender any part of that control to any international organization for any reason whatever. We believe in cooperation as there has been cooperation for the last hundred years with our neighbour to the south. Why interfere with relations which have been so peaceful and pleasant in the past?

I think most hon. members will realize that I am not likely to rise and talk merely for the sake of talking. I am talking to-night because I feel it is my duty to do so. I think that is realized by every hon. member. And I say to those outside the house that although the flesh may be weak, I can assure them that the spirit is as strong as ever. I realize the charges that will be made in the press after this morning to the effect that I am a Jew-baiter or a Jew-hater. Let me say that since the session of two years ago I have faced the grim reaper, not for a few minutes but for many months. As I lay in the hospital I thought deeply and long. I do not think I need to assure hon. members that I have no axe to grind. I have no ambitions in this world other than to establish the truth as I see it and to make conditions better for those who follow me. As I say, I have no ambitions, and, if I had, they would be out of the question, of ever leading a party or planning the order of this country, let alone of the universe. That is not for me. Perhaps I have an advantage to make up for that. I have no fear of any individual or any group of individuals. Why should I have? I have nothing to lose. The idea which is prevalent and which seems to be growing that the Jews are above criticism, or that to criticize a Jew or even to mention the fact that anybody is a Jew is to lay oneself open to the charge of Jew baiting is preposterous nonsense, and I do not propose to take the slightest notice of it. I am not afraid of any man whether he has a hooked nose or a forked tail. Why should I be? Immediately the Jew is criticized, somebody takes the attitude that nobody has any right to do it and, if he does it, he is indulging in sacrilege. That is a most dangerous idea, and it is a warning, if I may say so, of what might happen were this minority to achieve the control which some people believe, and perhaps for good reason, that they hope to acquire throughout the world. For that reason, if for no other, I and the group to which I belong are utterly opposed to any surrender of the sovereignty of the British empire or of Canada. We are all part of the British empire. We believe in it. Within the British empire all peoples, including minorities, have had better and fairer treatment than under any other that has existed on earth.

I do not feel able to continue to-night, but I hope to make a few more remarks later on in this debate.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Chairman, I hesitated to say anything earlier in this debate, although the question of external affairs is one in which I am deeply interested. There is a great deal to be said in regard to the matter that was referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and by the hon. member for North Battleford. It is amazing that any hon. member in this house could speak so lightly at this time on that question, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw did in the question he asked. It shows a callousness of mind and an emotional immaturity that is hardly understandable in an hon. member of this house.

As the hour is late I shall emphasize only two points. First, I believe that our future depends on working out a foreign policy along with the other nations of the world.

The Prime Minister this morning stated that the time was approaching when we must begin to shape the outline of the new world that is to follow after the war. It is to be regretted that he did not give us more information in regard to what the government's policies are. I believe the time has come when we must begin to formulate policies, and in that regard I would say our approach this time must be different from what it was in the period between the last war and the beginning of the present war.

If we are to have a successful international policy—and when I say "we", I mean Canada in cooperation with the other nations of the world—we must have a positive policy. The trouble with our policy in the period between the first world war and the second world war was that it was not a positive policy for peace; it was a negative policy to avoid war. I well remember the stock answer that we were given in the house when we asked questions about the government's attitude toward such matters as the Spanish affair, or about the shipment of war material to Japan. We were always told by the Prime Minister that his great concern was to avoid war, not to do anything that would give cause for offence. That was the sort of attitude that led to the present war.

I am firmly convinced that the democratic nations of Europe, Great Britain and France particularly, although they are largely responsible for the war, did not wish war, did not want war, did not consciously prepare for it. They were set on maintaining things as they were, of maintaining their privileges, their place in the world. They allowed the aggressors to prosper in order that the armed forces of Germany would crush a workers' revolution, of which they were afraid. Let me repeat that the essential thing in a new foreign policy to prevent war is that in the first place it will be a positive policy.

I am very happy to-night to find myself in accord with nearly all that was said by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I think he made a most excellent speech and said many things that needed to be said. I agree with the statement that we must put our trust in a system of collective security when this war is over. I believe also that we must begin building that collective security system now. I see no hope for security for Canada in any combination outside a collective security system that will give security not only to Canada but to every nation in the world.

I was surprised this morning to hear the hon. member for Vancouver South say that the British commonwealth of nations and the United States should form an alliance, and that they should tell the world that they are forming an alliance. I admit the sincerity of the hon. member's approach to the question; but to my mind nothing could be more dangerous at this time than for two of the powerful partners in the united nations to say that they intend to form a close alliance. If the United States and the British commonwealth of nations, two of the large units in the united nations, will form an alliance, what is to prevent Russia and China from forming an alliance? We would have again the same old power blocks, one against the other.

I may not know a great deal about international affairs, but I submit that that is not the way in which world peace can be maintained. We have before us a choice of one of two things. We have a choice of being a partner in a system of collective security, where each nation in that collective system will have protection against aggression from any quarter, or we can go along forming alliances and building up balances of power, which policy will ultimately lead to a war such as that in which we are now engaged. Any system of security will also have to be one based on the equality of the nations.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said this evening that we of the British empire, or the British commonwealth of nations, whichever you like, were a very fine people, indeed, but that unfortunately the rest of the world did not have the exalted opinion of our virtues that we have ourselves. I was recently talking to a gentleman who holds a high position in this country. Some three years ago he had taken advantage of an opportunity of flying from the United Kingdom to Australia by the usual route—Lisbon, along the Mediterranean, crossing to Egypt and Persia and India, and then along the South Sea islands to Australia. He told me that in all the places visited on that trip he did not meet any native peoples who were friendly to the British empire. He said that where they were not neutral as to which of the warring nations they would have rule them, they were definitely hostile. His statement was that their attitude was largely owing to the superior attitude adopted by the people Britain had sent to those countries as governors.

What is said by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) may be quite true, namely, that by and large the British government has given government as good as or better than any other country. The fact remains, however, that the British government was ruling larger sections of the world than any other country, and governments are usually unpopular. The government you have not is usually better than the one you have.

The British empire has a great deal for which it is responsible, because it has had tremendous opportunities.

The hour is late, and I do not wish to say anything further, except that I want again to emphasize that if we are to reap the fruits of the sacrifices of this war; if we are to get some return in peace and prosperity for the young lives that are being sacrificed in this war, we shall get it only through a system of collective security, in which each nation—Canada included—will become a guarantor for the peace and safety of all nations.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

THE WAR

LANDING OPERATIONS IN SICILY—PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN FORCES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the brief review of the progress of the war which I gave to this house on Friday morning last, I said that the North African campaign had marked the triumphal close of an important chapter in the war. I also said that the new German offensive against Russia launched earlier in the week, along with recent intensified bombings of the strategic areas over Europe, marked a place of new beginning. I intimated too that the aerial and commando assaults against Italy and the islands of the Mediterranean were parts of a single strategy which the immediate future might be expected rapidly to unfold and of which the liberation of the French empire in Africa was both an essential and a memorable prelude.

Since the house adjourned on Friday evening, events in the new phase of the war of liberation have unfolded with great rapidity. Hon. members, I am sure, will wish to have on the records of our parliament the text of the communique which announced the attack which has, as its ultimate objective, the unconditional surrender of Italy and Germany, and the beginning of the first major land operation in which Canadian forces have taken part in the present war. The communique was received at midnight from allied force advance headquarters in Algiers, North Africa. It was made public immediately, which was July 10, Ottawa time. It reads:

> Allied forces, under the command of General Eisenhower, began landing operations on Sicily early this morning. The landings were preceded by allied air attack. Allied naval forces escorted the assault forces and bombarded the coast defences during the assault.

A supplementary communique was issued by the war department at Washington at 12.20 a.m., July 10. This disclosed that the allied forces concerned were Anglo-American-Canadian forces.

Following the issuance of the communique from General Eisenhower's headquarters, an avis or notice was read on General Eisenhower's behalf to the people of France making clear that the offensive launched against Sicily was the first stage in the liberation of the European continent, but equally clear that the general invasion of Europe had not as yet begun. The people of France were asked to remember this, to remain calm and not expose themselves to reprisals by acting too quickly. They were told that when the time for the general invasion came, they would be informed accordingly.

The text of this announcement to the Frenchmen of metropolitan France was in the following words:

> Anglo-American-Canadian armed forces have to-day launched an offensive against Sicily. It is the first stage in the liberation of the European continent, there will be others. I call on the French people to remain calm, not to allow themselves to be deceived by the false rumours which the enemy might circulate. The allied radio will keep you informed on military developments. I count on your sang-froid, and on your sense of discipline. Do not be rash, for the enemy is watching. Keep on listening to the allied radio, and never heed rumours. Verify carefully the news you receive by remaining calm, by not exposing yourselves to reprisals through premature action, you will be helping us effectively. When the hour of action strikes, we will let you know. Till then help us by following our instructions—that is to say, keep calm, conserve your strength. We repeat when the hour of action strikes, we will let your know.

For all time, Canada will be justifiably proud of the fact that, when the attack for the liberation of the conquered and enslaved countries of Europe was launched by the armed forces of Britain, the United States, and Canada, on European soil, units of the Canadian army were at the spearhead of the attack.

As to the size and composition of the Canadian forces taking part in the invasion of Sicily, I am, for reasons of security, limited to saying that the force is a substantial one, and that Canada's fighting men, in this assault, have been drawn from every province of the dominion. They include both French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians.

The knowledge that the force is representative of so many parts of Canada will heighten our pride in their selection for so important a task.

It is a further source of satisfaction for our country to know that squadrons and formations of the Royal Canadian Air Force had a significant place in the operations against Sicily.

It is too early to make a statement on the progress of operations in Sicily in which our forces, together with forces from the United Kingdom and the United States, are engaged. The first reports of the allied landings indicate that the initial phases of this vital operation have proceeded according to plan, and that the allied forces are now striking deeply into Sicily. The success of the initial landings is a tribute to the careful planning which preceded this vast undertaking and to the close cooperation of the land, sea and air forces under General Eisenhower's command.

The most that can be said at the moment is that the first critical period has passed. The most critical period has still to come. It will be when the enemy counter-attacks. When that time comes we must expect severe action. There will be heavy fighting. Counter-attacks, I believe, have already begun.

Here may I say a word about the nature and extent of the information which it will be possible for the government to give hon. members regarding military operations. We are fully conscious of the deep and legitimate interest of the house and the country in operations in which Canadian troops are engaged. We should, however, not lose sight of the fact that in the present operations in Sicily British and United States troops are engaged as well as our own. All three governments must be guided largely by the judgment of the military commanders as to what information can be made public with due regard for military security. That information is necessarily and rightly made available on the spot to the press.

There is no way in which the government on day to day military operations, can be better informed than the press, except to the extent that information is available which in the opinion of the military commanders should be kept secret in order to ensure the safety of their troops or the success of future operations. I shall not attempt therefore to give day to day summaries of the progress of operations. From time to time, as circumstances warrant, statements will be made in the house either by myself or by the Ministers of National Defence as to the significance of events. In that respect the practice here will be similar to the practice followed in the parliament at Westminster.

As to information regarding the progress of operations from day to day, the army, like the air force, has made what are confidently believed to be effective arrangements to provide information as fully and rapidly as security permits. In this connection, no doubt many hon. members heard the broadcast given from Algiers by Flight Lieutenant Leslie Powell of the Royal Canadian Air Force public relations branch. Because of the excellent arrangements made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation it was heard in Canada on Saturday morning, less than an hour after the first news of the landing was released. Hon. members will also have seen or heard the report by Ross Munro of the Canadian Press direct from Sicily, which followed shortly thereafter.

The assault upon Sicily marks for Canada the beginning of a new phase of the war. The Canadian army thus far has had few opportunities for active combat with the enemy. After Dunkirk, it became a living shield of defence against the threatened invasion of Britain. For a time, the first Canadian division was almost the only land force in the United Kingdom equipped to meet an invader. In this way, Canada's troops came to have the role of defenders of Britain. As successive divisions and reinforcements crossed the Atlantic from Canada, they were fitted into that role. For the three years since, the Canadian army in Britain has helped to maintain the security of Britain. All this has been in accordance with the strategy planned by those who have had the supreme direction of the war. From the outbreak of war, our government has adhered to the position that Canadian forces, in whole or in part, should be used where and when they can make the best contribution to the winning of the war.

The presence of our army in Britain has been a means of holding in western Europe, German forces many times its size. There were combined operations of a minor character in which Canadian troops were engaged during 1941 and 1942, but it was at Dieppe that units of the Canadian army in Britain first went into action against the enemy. Dieppe was a preparation for further combined operations. More recently, in order to gain experience in leadership under fire, officers and non-commissioned officers from our army in Britain went into battle with the British first army in Tunisia. That experience was also a part of the preparation for coming days.

As I said in announcing the present attack upon Sicily, the soldiers of Canada have gone into battle exceptionally well trained, superbly equipped, keen and full of spirit, ready for offensive warfare.

In this new phase of the war for Canada, the army will share with the navy and the air force, the heat of combat and also inevitable sufferings and losses. We can expect no easy victories and no quick successes. Rather must we be prepared for fierce fighting and for a long struggle.

In thinking of the hour when a part of Canada's army would go into full scale action against the enemy, we have never imagined that there would be either an easy victory or an early victory. We realize that the enemy is strongly entrenched in his European fortress, and that so long as Hitler can draw upon a storehouse comprising occupied Europe, his forces can be provisioned for a lengthy war.

For the Canadian people, it is only human that the centre of our interest in the coming weeks should be the battle for Sicily, but all of us must careful to keep a sense of proportion. Let us not forget the much greater battle on the plains of Russia. In two years of fighting on the most titanic scale in history, the Soviet armies have inflicted grievous wounds on nazi military power. Without that weakening of German strength, the operations now in progress would have been foredoomed to failure, if indeed they could have been attempted at all. We should remember, too, that Sicily is only an outpost of Europe. Many other bridgeheads will have to be established before the final struggle even begins. These outer ramparts of nazi Germany are very strong. To reach the centres of nazi power on German soil will require a long and fierce struggle in all the occupied lands. The war, moreover, will not be ended when nazi power has been crushed. The military might of Japan will still have to be destroyed.

The battle of Europe is now joined. It must now be fought to a finish. It will be a hard fight. It will be a long fight. Something in our hearts, something emerging in the very soul of our nation must tell us that this is the greatest cause upon which we have ever been embarked.

In conclusion, I should like to repeat what I said to the press and over the radio on Saturday morning:

> The fighting men of Canada, on land, at sea, and in the air, are risking their lives to preserve everything that all of us hold dear. They are joined together, in the cause of freedom, in the service of their fellowmen, and by an abiding attachment to their homeland. All Canada will share the pride of their loved ones in their courage and in their achievements. Of one thing we may be assured. They will not fail us. We must not fail them. They will fight better for the assurance of the support of a united Canada. We, too, shall need all the strength that comes from a deep feeling of unity. I repeat, we must not fail our fighting men. In the name of Canada, I give to them the assurance that Canada will not fail her fighting men.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That assurance, I repeat this morning in this House of Commons on behalf of the parliament of Canada. Hon. members, I am confident, will all wish to join in this assurance.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think none of us in the House of Commons to-day will have failed to notice that the words which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has just uttered were received by a thoughtful, serious-minded and very solemn House of Commons. I wish to thank the Prime Minister for his statement with respect to the operations and developments on the Sicilian front. I hope, as he intimated, that from time to time when considerations of security permit the house will have the benefit of further advices and further news as it may reach the government.

Mere words seem feeble and futile in the midst of such moving events as have been taking place within the last day or two, particularly at this moment when Canada is moving past another historic milestone. I have no desire to do more at this time than to echo the words of the Prime Minister with reference to the Sicilian front. The fiercest challenge of all still lies ahead, and I am sure that the house and the country is a unit in the hope and prayer that our arms will be successful in the difficult and trying days that lie ahead, and that the loss of human life and the consequent sorrow and suffering shall be kept to the minimum that is possible so far as our armed forces are concerned.

Canada's heroism, Canada's bravery in the war which concluded just about a quarter of a century ago earned for her honour and renown throughout the world. In world war number two, Canada in the opinion of this house and of our people generally will parallel her achievements of a quarter of a century ago. We are proud of our boys who are on the Sicilian front to-day. May God bless them as they proceed with their perilous task of helping to liberate the enslaved and suffering peoples of Europe. Let this word go out to our forces in Sicily, as it goes out to our forces in other parts of the world: Canada backs you with everything we have. And may we in this house, Mr. Speaker, and in Canada as a whole, so conduct ourselves as to be worthy at home here of the services and the sacrifices which our men are making on the dangerous Mediterranean front.

I join with the Prime Minister in his statement that Canada stands united in this project, as in other projects that will follow—a united Canada with a keen and enthusiastic national feeling that we are playing our part in the interests of freedom, righteousness and Christianity in this conflict which we all hope will be brought to a victorious conclusion as early as possible.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think we have all listened this morning to the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with feelings that the occasion upon which we meet is not only one of rejoicing that our men have made a successful landing on the Sicilian coast, but also one of great solemnity. I am sure that all members of this house can say to the Prime Minister, to the government and to the men engaged in perilous operations across the sea, that Canada is a unit behind them in this hour of great struggle and great sacrifice. As we think of the casualty lists that must come in, this house should consider carefully every possible step that can be taken to ease the blow for those who will suffer, both those who will lose loved ones and the men who will return to us maimed and sick. It is the duty of this country to make adequate preparation for all this, and far more than we have done up to the present time.

One other word I should like to say, and it is this: Canada's soldiers to-day are engaged in a great adventure against Italy. I have no doubt that as they move forward, grave military and political decisions will have to be made, both by the commanders and by governments. People looked with anxious eyes and some misgivings at the political developments in Algiers after North Africa was invaded. Canada is contributing her blood and treasure in this onset against Italy, and on behalf of many people in this country and, indeed, elsewhere, I ask that our government see to it that it play its proper part in any political arrangements that are made, so that this war shall indeed become in every respect a war of liberation—not a war for the reestablishment of dynasties of the past or of governments that have lost the confidence of their peoples, but that in any understandings which are reached, Canada as a freedom-loving and democratic nation shall assist the long-suffering peoples of Europe to complete their liberation.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, we are indeed met on a solemn occasion. One thing which impressed me in this morning's remarks more than any other one thing was the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made in the following words:

> I give to them the assurance that Canada will not fail her fighting men.

The Prime Minister made those remarks on Saturday in his broadcast, to which I listened with great interest and with very serious thoughts. I recalled that while the last war was going on, many of the dearest friends that I have ever had, boys with whom I had sat in high school, normal school and university classes were pouring out their life-blood and giving their glorious young lives in a war to make the world safe for democracy—note the word. I recall at about this stage of the conflict we had solemn assurances from a number of men, including statesmen, to the effect that when the boys came back they would return to homes for heroes. Alas, what did they come home to? Far, far too many of them were not even given hovels for heroes, much less homes. It is an exceedingly easy matter for us to stand in this house and promise great things lightly without indicating in any way how we propose to provide these great things. I trust the Prime Minister will not feel too greatly offended if I ask him to tell the country what Canada has already done for the heroes who have already been maimed and injured in this war. I ask him if he will stand in this house and tell this country what guarantee Canada has given to the men who bled at Dieppe. Just what has she done for these men? Has she failed them, or has she not? If it were fitting I could bring into this house at this moment stories that should make every hon. member of this house hang his head in shame, stories of what has already been done for the men who have done their bit and who have returned to this country thus far in the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I do feel that if he has any statements that he thinks parliament should have, he should give them to parliament, but he should not make innuendoes nor should he, if I may be permitted—

Mr. GRAYDON: Not at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —bring forward indirect insinuations or innuendoes which are certain to be greatly misconstrued, not only throughout this country but by the men who are to-day offering their lives in the service of freedom. May I say to my hon. friend, who is usually thoughtful and careful about the occasions on which certain utterances should be made, that this is the last occasion on which he should make references of the kind he is making at the moment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, generally speaking, a man who faces facts and says the truth about those facts makes himself exceedingly unpopular on any occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is not giving us facts. I ask him if he has any statement to make, any facts to give, to give them and be prepared to prove them. If he is unable to do that, he should not make innuendoes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is only one thing I can say in the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, and that is this: I said a moment ago that on a suitable occasion I would bring in plenty of evidence. Now that the Prime Minister has challenged me, I shall—

Mr. GRANT: You did not say that at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Once more the Liberals are at work at their usual game of belittling the people who are trying to tell the truth in this country and in this parliament. I do not propose to say anything undignified on this occasion, but at the same time I intend to say something that is worth saying. Idle, meaningless vaporizing is of no use on this occasion. If I have said anything up to the present time which either by implication or by meaning could be construed as offensive or as inappropriate on this occasion, I withdraw it; but I give assurance to the house that at a later time I shall reassert it, because so far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, as one member of parliament I do not propose to neglect my bounden duty to the people who sent me here and to the soldiers who are fighting our war.

May I go on, Mr. Speaker? The Prime Minister indicated that the boys would be disturbed. The Prime Minister does not need to be over-solicitous as to the feelings the boys will have. If he had gone through the trains, sat in the smokers and maintained silence as I have done in order to hear the boys express their feelings as they sprang out of their burning hearts, he would have no anxiety about a further growing of disturbance in their hearts. That disturbance has already been created by the things they see and know.

May I turn to one aspect of the question which is perhaps at least as important. I, along with hon. members of the house who have spoken and those who have not spoken, am filled with gladness and relief on this occasion. For almost four terrible years we have endured as a British race, humiliation, apprehension, loss upon loss, and danger of further bitter loss upon loss, not only from the enemy whom we are fighting but from some who ostensibly were not our enemies. I need not be further specific; hon. members understand. Now at least we are partly prepared, and our hearts swell with gratitude.

I know all hon. members' hearts are filled with gratitude to the God who controlled the waters at Dunkirk, the God who prompted Hitler's dangerous decision not to attack when Britain was perhaps helpless at his feet, the God who caused Hitler, perhaps unwisely, to attack Russia, bringing into the conflict on our side an ally who would absorb so much of the shock. For these great things, and many others which have been less spectacular, we should bow our heads and bend our knees in the deepest and most reverent gratitude to the God who has brought our fathers through many, many crises perhaps comparable to this one.

We should not forget on this occasion to express words of gratitude to the statesmen who have done all they possibly could to help to salvage the wreck of the structures in which we as British people have reimposed our trust for our security, men who realized how desperately our nation had been sold out by someone and who tried with all their power to save something from the wreckage. I mention among those Mr. Chamberlain. Mr. Chamberlain died, I believe, of a broken heart. I have no brief for Mr. Chamberlain. He passed through tragic experiences, but he had the courage to go to Munich to undergo what he did in order to save a few precious months, during which time we had some chance of recouping our loss of fighting power. I think Mr. Chamberlain did a thing for which history will be grateful, and I believe he is entitled at least to the thanks of one weak voice in the parliament of Canada on this historic occasion.

I wish at the same time to give thanks to the people who have given their all in order to hold back the invader while we gathered ourselves for the fight. I think of those who stood heroically in the path of the aggressor and who by their sacrifice impeded his progress and impaired his strength. I mention Poland, Poland could have given up easily. Poland knew what she was going to suffer. Yet, did the heroes of Poland falter, or did her statesmen fail? Not for one moment. They stood out, and did all that within their power lay. They laid on the altar their lives and their bodies, and by so doing did us a great service. Let us not for a moment forget about that great nation. And Norway must not go unhonoured—or Denmark, or Holland or Belgium, or France which was bled white, and humbled and lowered in the dust. And little Albania, which stood courageously against Italy, is deserving of gratitude from us at this time, as is also Jugo-Slavia, who still fights on. And Greece, who fell under the blows—utterly insupportable—but who fell fighting in a manner which will reflect even greater credit on the glorious record of Greece, despite the fact that her history is filled with glory.

Nor must we for one moment forget Great Britain. I had the privilege of being in Great Britain in the fall of 1941. Any attempt to convey an adequate appreciation of the magnificent courage of the ordinary housewife in Great Britain, not to mention the other citizens, would simply be contemptible by its inadequacy. We shall never cease to owe a debt to Great Britain for what she did in holding up the foe and absorbing the shock of his ruthless and terrible power.

On this occasion the House of Commons, every member of it, should be filled with redoubled resolution—and I am sure they are—to redress the wrongs committed against the stricken peoples of Europe, and to redeem those stricken peoples, bind up their wounds, nourish and restore their vigour, reestablish them and set them on their feet again; give them another chance; and so that there may be rekindled in their hearts once more the fires of confidence, assurance and ambition; and so that they may express themselves in a vigorous and energetic national life through which they may make their contribution to the world. Let us convince those peoples of Europe, both by precept and by example, that there is a way of establishing in this world security with freedom. May I point out that while at present there is talk of supranational government, international currency and stabilization schemes, we are far from giving assurance that the united nations contemplate any such way of establishing security with freedom.

Let us demand of Germany adequate guarantees that never again shall she be able to destroy the peace of man. Such guarantees will render Germany helpless—a people of perhaps around eighty millions, helpless to defend themselves in a military sense and helpless to defend themselves in an economic sense. Let us not forget for a moment that those people are just as proud and as sensitive and ambitious as we are. They are just as conscious of the danger which lurks around them. We must take precautions because of that. We must guarantee Germany also, in the hour of victory which is sure to come; we must guarantee to Germany freedom from want and fear.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have allowed the hon. member to discuss many matters. I must point out to him, however, that there is nothing before the Chair, except that which may be contained in the Prime Minister's statement. I would not wish any hon. member to discuss matters extraneous to that statement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: On an occasion of this sort may I say I wish to treat your rulings and your opinion, sir, with all possible deference. But I submit to you that there has never been in the House of Commons an occasion like this one, and that there is therefore no precedent setting out what an hon. member shall say on such an occasion. If in your judgment, Mr. Speaker, it is unbecoming that an hon. member on an occasion of this sort shall discuss the kind of thing which I have been discussing, things which are of vital importance to those who are conducting the war on our side, and to those who are struggling in every way to oppose us, then I shall refrain from any further remarks on this occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I say in answer to the hon. member that there is an opportunity upon which matters of which the hon. member has spoken can be discussed. They might very well be discussed when the estimates for the Department of External Affairs are before the house. Just at this time however I think they are extraneous.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I bow to Your Honour's ruling, and shall surely avail myself of the opportunity you have indicated.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 127, for the relief of Anne Marie Garon Brown.—Mr. Claxton.

Bill No. 129, for the relief of Glendon Malcolm Robert MacCallum.—Mr. Claxton.

Bill No. 131, for the relief of Beatrice Belodubrofsky Schiller.—Mr. McIlraith.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AGRICULTURAL MACHINERY HELD IN WAREHOUSE

Mrs. NIELSEN:

1. What stocks of new and unused agricultural machinery and implements are held in Canadian warehouses?

2. Will such stocks be made available to municipalities where such machinery and implements are lacking for custom work in harvesting forage, grain and other crops this year?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The production, importation and distribution of farm machinery are under strict control in Canada to assure that the available supply is distributed to meet the most essential demands. Stocks of farm machinery are continuously arriving from Canadian manufacturers and from foreign sources and are being shipped out to meet essential demands. Available stocks are allocated to meet demands as quickly as possible. Because of the constant movement of stocks it is not possible to give totals on hand at any given time.

2. Farm equipment is rationed under the direction of rationing officers stationed at 14 points throughout Canada. Total available supplies are allocated, in proportion to past requirements, to the different regions, so as to assure to each a fair share of available supplies. Where a condition of unusual hardship arises, the rationing officers may, moreover, direct the transfer of urgently needed equipment to meet special requirements. Every effort is being made to provide necessary machinery and implements for harvesting of this year's crops.

ALUMINUM COMPANY OF CANADA—PRICE OF ALUMINUM

Mr. COLDWELL:

In view of the statement made by a responsible official of the United States government, that it was attempting to arrange a reduction in the price of aluminum from the Aluminum Company of Canada, what steps, if any, are being taken by the government of Canada to arrange for a similar reduction in price to firms using aluminum in connection with our war effort?

Mr. HOWE: The price of aluminum from the Aluminum Company of Canada to firms using aluminum in connection with Canada's war effort has no relation to the contract price to the United States government. Prices quoted to Canadian firms are regarded as satisfactory by this department. Should the situation change, appropriate action will be taken.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

ALUMINUM COMPANY OF CANADA—PRICES

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. (a) What price is the United States government, or any agency thereof, paying to the Aluminum Company of Canada, Limited, for aluminium ingots; (b) how is the price made up; (c) what is the base price; (d) what is the effect of any escalator clauses for the third quarter of 1943; (e) what was said effect for the second quarter of 1943?

2. (a) What price is being paid to the above company for aluminium ingots purchased in Canada by the Canadian government or by Canadian manufacturers working on war contracts; (b) how is this price made up; (c) what is the base price; (d) what is the effect of any escalator clauses for the third quarter of 1943; (e) what was said effect for the second quarter of 1943?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The contracts for the sale and delivery of aluminum ingot to the United States was made directly between Metals Reserve Company (an agency of the United States government) and the Aluminum Company of Canada Limited and the payments for aluminum ingot are handled directly between the two parties concerned. No department of the Canadian government participates in the arrangements for such payments. The Department of Munitions and Supply is therefore unable to supply the information requested in question 1.

2. The prevailing price for aluminum ingot to Canadian manufacturers is fixed at 18½ cents per pound in carload lots. This price was arranged for Canadian consumption of aluminum ingot. It is not subject to any escalator clause or to any increase resulting from increased costs of production.

NOTE: See Hansard, June 21, 1943, page 3829.

INTERDEPARTMENTAL PRIORITIES COMMITTEE

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Is there an interdepartmental priority committee in the Department of Labour?

2. If so, who are the members of said committee?

3. Who is the chairman thereof?

4. What are their duties and functions?

5. Did the said committee compile the list of occupations covered by the compulsory order of May 4, 1943?

6. If not, by whom was said list compiled?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Yes.

2. This committee consists of: Sheldon Ross (chairman), acting chief, priorities division, national selective service; T. H. Robinson, assistant director, national selective service; J. G. Fogo, associate coordinator of controls and labour liaison officer, Department of Munitions and Supply; R. G. Barclay, assistant director, employment service and unemployment insurance branch, Department of Labour; H. R. Kemp, economic adviser, economic research branch, wartime prices and trade board; G. G. E. Raley, director of general supplies, supply division, wartime prices and trade board.

3. Sheldon Ross, acting chief, priorities division, labour supply branch, Department of Labour.

4. Under authority of clause (f) of section 505 of order in council P.C. 246, January 19, 1943, national selective service civilian regulation, "The minister may in consultation with the Department of Munitions and Supply and the wartime prices and trade board, classify, in such manner as he deems expedient, occupations, industries, firms or establishments according to essentiality in the prosecution of the war." A committee composed of representatives of the Department of Munitions and Supply, the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Labour, which has come to be known as the interdepartmental priorities committee, meets regularly and deals with matters relating to priorities in accordance with the section of order in council P.C. 246.

5. No.

6. The list referred to was compiled in accordance with suggestions made by the members of the committee that had to do with the preparing of the compulsory employment transfer orders and the instructions in regard thereto. The lists for inclusion in the various compulsory employement transfer orders are approved by the national selective service advisory board before being issued.

NATIONAL SELECTIVE SERVICE

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Is there an experienced and representative policy-making board of permanent officials in selective service at Ottawa?

2. If so, has this board access to information as to what is happening in all regional offices and all relevant statistics?

3. Has this policy-making body been given the right to go anywhere to investigate actual working conditions ?

4. If so, do they make such investigations?

5. What steps are taken by the government to ensure that the records in the local and federal offices are efficiently and properly kept? Are same up to date?

6. Are industries obliged to inform national selective service when vacancies in their plants are filled, or partially filled, and if so, what steps are taken to ensure that this is properly carried out?

7. Does the director of national selective service hold any other public or private position?

8. Has the present director of national selective service the power and authority to select his immediate assistants? If not, why not?

9. What steps are taken to ensure that employees in the local offices are given adequate support by the simplification of orders?

10. Are there specialists appointed to each local office for the purpose of giving expert advice on job placement and job analysis?

11. Has any committee been appointed by this government to make a catalogue of industry?

12. If so, is said catalogue to be compiled in a manner similar to that of the United States?

13. Has the government conducted any classes throughout Canada under the supervision of competent and specialized instructors to teach national selective service employees at the local offices the elementary principles of their jobs?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. A national selective service advisory board has been established under the chairmanship of the director of national selective service to advise the director in reference to the utilization of man-power and administration of selective service regulations and which includes the senior officers of the employment and selective service, as well as representatives of employers and labour, agriculture, the departments of munitions and supply, national defence, finance, wartime prices board, agriculture.

2. The reports and statistical returns on employment and selective service operations prepared for head office use and other relevant data in respect thereto, which may be required from time to time, are made available to the advisory board as required.

3. It is not the function of members of the advisory board to undertake personal investigations as members of the board. Employment and selective service officers including those officers who are members of the board undertake necessary investigations and meet with employers and employees and their representatives as appears advisable in the course of their duties.

4. See answer to 3.

5. Suitable records are maintained at head office, regional offices and local employment and selective service offices under the direction of the director of employment service and unemployment insurance. These records are maintained for current use.

Local offices are assisted and guided in their work by travelling supervisors operating from head office and regional office, part of whose duties is to see that required records are efficiently and properly kept up to date.

6. Selective service permits are issued in triplicate. The local office holds one copy and hands two to the man. The man takes these to the employer who retains one and returns one to the local office. This returned copy is matched against the local office copy and thus there is an efficient check to determine that the vacancy has been filled. The copy is required to be returned within forty-eight hours, and, if not returned, the local offices make a practice of checking up to find the reason why it has not been returned.

A telephone check is also made within a reasonable time on all referrals and more particularly on referrals to war industry.

7. Yes. Deputy minister of labour.

8. Associate directors of selective service are appointed by the governor in council upon the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, who is the minister responsible for the administration of selective service regulations.

9. Necessary instructions governing the application of orders and the procedure to be observed in carrying out the administration of the same, are furnished to local offices by the director of employment service and unemployment insurance, and the regional superintendent of such services.

10. In selecting personnel for local offices, the civil service commission does try to find persons who are experienced in placement and job analysis work, but, with the tremendous expansion of the offices and personnel over the last year, if becomes increasingly difficult to find trained personnel. It is not possible to designate for each office specialists for this purpose, but the offices are assisted and guided by travelling supervisors and advisers on staff training are also located at each regional office to direct the proper training of personnel.

11. An industrial classification manual has been prepared and issued by direction of the Minister of Labour, for use of employment and selective service offices.

12. This manual corresponds in its general nature to the standard industrial classification manual issued by the United States authorities.

13. Necessary and suitable instruction in duties is given to employees of the employment and selective service administration.

From time to time local and regional schools are held to explain new regulations and procedures to the field staff, more particularly when there are any major amendments to the regulations.

[Mr. Martin.]

WOMEN'S VOLUNTARY SERVICES

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth):

1. Did the Minister of National War Services convene a meeting of women's voluntary services at any time during the last two weeks of June, 1943?

2. If so, on what basis of representation was such meeting called?

3. Were the following women, or any of them, invited to such meeting and did they, or any of them, attend: Mrs. W. E. West, Mrs. Paul Hamel, Miss Helen Doherty?

4. If so, what association or body of women did they each represent?

5. Is Miss Helen Doherty an official or member of the Women's Liberal Association?

6. Were the travelling expenses of those attending paid out of public funds?

7. If so, what was the amount of such travelling expenses?

8. Were civilian and community welfare problems discussed at such meeting?

9. Were the provinces consulted before such meeting was convened?

10. Were the provinces invited to send representation to such meeting?

11. Was the federation of mayors and municipalities consulted, and was that federation invited to send representation?

12. Was the president of the National Council of Women consulted or invited to attend?

13. Was the president of the Catholic Women's League of Canada consulted or invited to attend?

14. Was the president of the Women's Institute of Canada consulted or invited to attend?

15. Was the president of the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire consulted or invited to attend?

16. Was the president of the Federation des Femmes Canadiennes Francaises consulted or invited to attend?

17. Was the president of the Council of Jewish Women consulted or invited to attend?

18. Was the chairman of women's war work of the Canadian Red Cross Society, or the chairman of the Salvation Army Red Shield consulted or invited to attend?

19. Has the minister decided to send four women to England to enquire into the work of women's voluntary services?

20. If so, who will select them and what will be the basis of their selection?

21. Will they be representatives of Canadian women already organized and doing patriotic work?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. Yes. Business meetings of women's voluntary services were held June 28, 29 and 30, in Ottawa.

2. Provincial; all provinces were represented.

3. Yes, they attended in the course of their departmental duties.

4. See answer to question No. 3.

5. No.

6. Travelling expenses will be paid by the department when claimed and duly supported by vouchers.

7. All the accounts have not been submitted.

8. The purpose of the business meetings was to discuss, with the assistance of representatives of other departments, the many wartime problems in which women's voluntary services are interested, including methods of assisting, upon request, organizations in their many such endeavours, whether national, regional or local in scope.

9. See answer to question No. 8. As these were business meetings of the women's voluntary services, no others were consulted or asked to send representatives to the meetings.

10. See answer to question No. 9.

11. See answer to question No. 9.

12. See answer to question No. 9.

13. See answer to question No. 9.

14. See answer to question No 9.

15. See answer to question No. 9.

16. See answer to question No. 9.

17. See answer to question No. 9.

18. See answer to question No. 9.

19. It is hoped to send three or four women to the British isles to learn at first hand about the work of the sister organization, the women's voluntary services of the United Kingdom, who have offered entire cooperation.

20. In consultation with the division of women's voluntary services, selection will be made by the Department of National War Services to the end of enabling tthe department to help advance the Canadian war effort.

21. Individual selection will be made upon the basis of: power of observation, and experience or ability to make information obtained available to the department and thereby to all Canadian women, whether through their organizations or otherwise. It is not the intention that women's voluntary services should displace any other organization, but rather to reinforce and help all to carry out patriotic work.

7. Are the present properties sufficiently large to fulfil present and future requirements of this school?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INTERNATIONAL CURRENCY CONFERENCE

Mr. QUELCH:

For a copy of reports and recommendations of the Canadian representatives who attended the conference at Washington dealing with the stabilization of international currencies, submitted to the Canadian government, any department thereof, or Bank of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some days ago when this motion was called I promised to make a brief statement regarding participation by Canadian experts in the discussions which have taken place in Washington on international arrangements for the stabilization of currencies. Apparently, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) when he placed this motion on the order paper had in mind the meeting which took place in Washington in the latter part of April and which received some attention in the press at the time and later in the house itself. That meeting did not give rise to any reports or recommendations, beyond the confidential notes of the experts themselves for their own use. To have submitted a return in this sense, however, would have been incomplete and perhaps misleading, and it was for this reason I promised to make a statement in order that the house might have correct information in regard to developments in connection with this matter.

It will be recalled that early in April the government of the United Kingdom and the United States government each made public proposals which had been prepared by their experts for international arrangements to stabilize currencies after the war. These proposals did not carry government endorsement in either case but were put forward, in the words of the British announcement, "as a preliminary contribution to the solution of one of the problems of international economic cooperation after the war." For the convenience of members of this house, the two proposals were printed as a sessional paper. These two proposals, appearing at the same time, have naturally attracted great public attention, even though they represented the views only of certain groups of experts and not those of governments. They have been amongst the first concrete proposals to appear dealing with specific post-war problems. It was inevitable that the two plans would be compared and their similarities and differences analysed. In fact, there is a marked and encouraging similarity in the fundamental nature and objectives of the two proposals, but they also reveal considerable differences in detail, in the form of mechanism proposed and in the manner of presentation.

Several of our Canadian experts had an opportunity of discussing the first draft of the British proposals with the British experts in London last fall. Shortly after the publication of the American proposals, Hon. Mr. Morgenthau, secretary of the treasury, invited me to send some experts to Washington to discuss the American suggestions with the experts who had put them forward. I was glad to accept this invitation, and as a result several of our Canadian experts visited Washington for this purpose in the latter part of April. The purpose of these bilateral discussions was essentially to enable our officials to get a clearer understanding of the American proposals and to explore their significance. I understand that experts from other countries subsequently had similar bilateral conversations with the American officials. Our officials did not present any recommendations at these April discussions, or make any report upon them—other than confidential notes for their own use and a verbal report on the main points learned about the American proposals.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no truth in the statement made in the house, I think on Friday, that Canada had put forward proposals?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not as government proposals; I am coming to that. I believe it was this meeting which the hon. member for Acadia had in mind in proposing the order for return which appeared in his name in the Votes and Proceedings of the house for June 16.

Some weeks after the April meeting, to be exact from June 15 to 18, Canadian experts again participated in an informal discussion with American officials on the same subject. At this meeting experts from a number of other countries who happened to be in Washington at the time also participated in the discussions. Our experts were invited to come prepared to make such comments on the American proposals, or such suggestions concerning them, as they wished to make on their own responsibility. After careful consideration, our officials decided that they could make their comments and suggestions most useful and effective if they prepared them in the form of an integrated alternative draft proposal supplemented by some general written observations on the purpose and significance of plans for post-war monetary organization.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Was there any suggestion that the British proposals would be considered at the same conference?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that it was the subject of specific discussion, but any discussion would be impossible without taking into account the British proposals.

The government agreed to their doing so—that is, to our officials preparing comments and suggestions—on the express understanding that these proposals and observations represented only the views of the experts themselves and did not carry in any way the endorsement of the government. It has not as yet been possible for the government to give the necessary study to the principles and details of these highly technical international monetary proposals to enable it to commit itself on them at this stage and this, as I have indicated, is also the position of the British and American governments. However, it did seem eminently desirable that experts in various countries should have an opportunity of proceeding immediately to explore the possibility of working out together a sound plan of post-war international monetary organization, and it was for this reason that the government authorized its officials to proceed on their own responsibility to set down their ideas on this problem and to discuss them with the experts of other countries.

When, therefore, the Canadian experts attended the informal meeting in Washington in June, they took with them their own draft proposals and observations and upon request made them available to the other experts participating in the discussion. The Canadian proposals were presented in a form closely parallel to that in which the American plan as revised had been presented, in order to facilitate discussion. This may give them a greater appearance of similarity to the American proposals than is justified by some rather significant differences in substance.

As the answer to the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Acadia, I propose now to table the document prepared by the Canadian experts and entitled "tentative draft proposals of Canadian experts for an international exchange union." In doing so, I wish to emphasize again that the document does not necessarily represent the views of this government, by which indeed it has not as yet been considered, and involves no commitment whatsoever as to the attitude which may later be taken by the government when formal international discussions are held to deal with the problem in question. It is intended merely as a constructive contribution by some of our experts to the common endeavour now being made in several countries to work out efficient international arrangements for dealing with foreign exchange and international monetary problems after the war. In order that the document may be available for study by all who may be interested, I have had it printed and have arranged for its distribution to hon. members and to the press.

I will not attempt to-day to summarize any of the principles or points of view embodied in the document nor to express any detailed views of my own concerning these proposals or their possible relation to other post-war matters. I would merely point out that the authors of this document have, in their preamble, made certain general observations on the importance of international monetary arrangements after the war and the relation of any such arrangements to other matters including commercial policy, international investment and international arrangements for relief and rehabilitation. These general observations should be carefully considered in order to see the draft monetary proposals in the proper perspective. International currency arrangements alone will not by any means solve our post-war international economic problems, but if they are well conceived and can secure the agreement of the nations, they should provide a basis for reaching satisfactory solution of some of the more difficult and more fundamental problems that will confront us.

It should be noted that the proposals that have been advanced by our experts, as well as those put forward by the Americans and the British, involve essentially an agreement between nations to enter into mutually beneficial arrangements for the establishment of an international monetary mechanism which will aid in the restoration and development of healthy international trade after the war; which will achieve a high degree of stability in international exchange rates, and which will not conflict with the desire of countries to carry out such policies as they may think appropriate to achieve, as far as possible, economic stability at a high level of employment and income. As the authors of the Canadian draft put it, "The organization should be international, not supranational." It is not intended to supersede our ordinary mechanisms of international trade and international payments, but to supplement and complete them on the intergovernmental level.

Mr. QUELCH: May I ask the minister whether these proposals which have been submitted on behalf of the Canadian officials have been endorsed by the officials of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not as officials of the Bank of Canada, and not by the Bank of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the statement made by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. ILSLEY: I assume that the hon. member will drop his motion.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes.

Motion dropped.

CENSORSHIP REGULATIONS OR INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of all censorship orders, regulations or instructions issued under government authority since the outbreak of war.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I ask that this motion stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely the minister is not going to ask that this motion stand again. It has been up now for the last two weeks; he has asked on two occasions before that it stand, and surely he must now give some explanation of his asking that it stand again.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I believe it has not been standing two weeks. Twice last week I gave good reasons why I wanted it to stand.

Mr. GRAYDON: We are in the second week; that is what I mean.

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is right, but there is a difference. I again say that I want to see somebody about this. In the meantime I have asked other officials to get busy on doing this work. I think that in the interests of all concerned the motion should stand.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do I understand from the minister that he has given instructions in his department to have answers prepared, or has he done nothing while awaiting the return of the head of the censorship branch?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I said a moment ago that, awaiting the return of the gentleman with whom I wish to communicate, I asked the other officials to begin going through their files immediately in order to save time.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When may we expect the return?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The gentleman is supposed to be back this week. I shall see him and then make my reply here.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is important that we should have it for the debate on the minister's department.

Motion stands.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—TORONTO SHIPBUILDING COMPANY

Mr. ADAMSON:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, memoranda and other documents exchanged between the Department of Munitions and Supply, or any official thereof, and L. Sefton, of the United Steel Workers of America, relating to conditions in the Toronto Shipbuilding Company yards.

ALLOTMENT OF CARS TO SASKATCHEWAN ELEVATORS

Mr. PERLEY:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, recommendations and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the chairman of the wheat board or any member of the board, and any persons, committees or organizations, since May 15, 1943, protesting against the allotment of cars to elevators in the province of Saskatchewan under the proposed thirty car cycle system.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I suggest that this motion pass with the usual reservation regarding privileged documents.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is that "usual reservation regarding privileged documents"? I should like to have it clarified, because the expression has been used in this house on several occasions, and now is a good time for the minister to tell us exactly what it means. It seems to me that if there are privileged documents it should not be necessary for the minister to say anything about it; automatically they would not be produced, and I am suspicious when a minister puts these reservations into the answer he gives. He ought to explain what he means.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think there is considerable merit in what the leader of the opposition has just said. It occurs to me that possibly I am over-careful in mentioning that there may be privileged documents. I know of none, but I spoke as I did for fear that when the examination was being made of all documents and correspondence there might be some memoranda passing between officials of my department and myself, which are recognized as privileged documents.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is what the minister had in mind?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is what I had in mind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This motion does not call for any communications between interdepartmental bodies, such as the minister and the wheat board; it refers to communications between the minister, the chairman of the wheat board or any member of the board, and outside persons who have been protesting—

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): "Any persons."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot imagine that any of these communications would be privileged.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It covers the advisory committee.

Mr. PERLEY: Do I understand the minister to say that without a doubt he will table all communications other than certain ones which passed between himself and the wheat board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am quite sure the hon. member for Qu'Appelle knows that all the documents concerned will be tabled.

OLD AGE PENSIONS—REPRESENTATIONS FROM MANITOBA

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all correspondence, resolutions and other documents received by the government, dated since May 1, 1943, from the Manitoba conference of the United Church of Canada, and from the Baptist union of western Canada, relating to the subject of old age and blind pensions; also for a copy of all communications received from any other organizations within the province of Manitoba, dated since May 1, 1943, relating to the same matter; also for a copy of the replies made by the government to all of the foregoing.

SELECTIVE SERVICE—RESTAURANT INDUSTRY

Mr. MacINNIS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents passing between the Minister of Labour, the director of national selective service or any other person in the national selective service branch, and the Vancouver Restaurant Owners' Association or any person or persons acting on behalf of the said association, from the date of issue of the first compulsory employment transfer order to the present date, regarding the essentiality of employment in the restaurant industry.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF CHIEFS OF STAFF, NATIONAL DEFENCE, 1927

Mr. BRUCE:

1. For a copy of reports or recommendations, whether formally made in writing or in course of correspondence in 1927, by Major-General

J. H. MacBrien while he was Chief-of-Staff of the Department of National Defence, to the then Minister of National Defence.

2. Of reports or recommendations, whether formally made in writing or in course of correspondence in 1927, by Major-General H. C. Thacker while he was Chief-of-Staff of the Department of National Defence, to the then Minister of National Defence.

3. Of reports or recommendations, whether formally made in writing or in course of correspondence in 1927, by Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton, while he was Chief-of-Staff of the Department of National Defence, to the then Minister of National Defence.

Mr. RALSTON: I would ask my hon. friend to drop this resolution. The resolution calls for documents which, as he knows, and the house knows, are highly confidential. I do not consider it in the public interest that they should be produced. I have not gone over any of them but I do not think that documents of that kind from the chief of staff to a minister should be produced. Secondly, they are only sixteen years old, which would require delving into the archives. In the third place, one of them, with respect to General MacBrien, would cover all reports for six months, and the other by General Thacker would cover all the reports for nearly two years. The paragraph with regard to General McNaughton is of course wrongly dated, because he did not become chief of the general staff, as I remember, until 1929. I therefore submit that it is not in the public interest to produce these documents, and I ask that the motion be dropped.

Mr. BRUCE: In view of what the minister says I am willing to drop Nos. 2 and 3 and, to help his department, I would restrict No. 1 to correspondence and recommendations made in January 1927 only.

Mr. RALSTON: The same objection would apply.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

REPORT ON INQUIRY INTO LABOUR RELATIONS AND WAGE CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Minister of Labour yet in a position to indicate when the report of the national war labour board in connection with recent hearings on general labour problems will be ready for release? Is it the intention of the government to initiate any legislation this session in the event of the board's finding that a new code concerning labour relations in Canada is desirable and essential?

[Mr. Bruce.]

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I am advised that the board is now considering the voluminous evidence that was taken at its hearings, but I have no knowledge as to when the report will be handed in.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister any idea as to whether it may be a month or two months, or when the report will be submitted?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. GRAYDON: In that event, I presume we need not expect any legislation based upon that report this session.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course, that is a matter of government policy. I do not know. I cannot prejudge the report; I do not know what is in it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not asking the minister to prejudge the report. I had indicated that in the event of the evidence being of such a character I should like to know whether we might expect the initiation of legislation this session.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a matter of government policy.

SELECTIVE SERVICE

ORDER RESPECTING TRANSFER OF YOUTHS SIXTEEN, SEVENTEEN AND EIGHTEEN TO ESSENTIAL EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Under the new selective service set-up with regard to boys of sixteen and seventeen, is it intended to move the boys away from their homes or will they be kept in their own community?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The circumstances would determine whether they would be moved away or not, but I think my hon. friend can rest assured that the national selective service officials will use good judgment in any directions given.

THE LATE SIR HARRY OAKES

EDITORIAL COMMENT ON CENSORSHIP OF NEWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to seek information from the Minister of National War Services on a point which was raised editorially by a prominent newspaper this morning. I have already sent a copy of the Montreal Gazette to the minister at his request and I believe he has read the editorial, which is entitled, "Why the Censorship?" Were the facts surrounding the death of Sir Harry Oakes in the Bahamas delayed in publication through censorship? What part, if any, did the Canadian censorship authorities play in connection with the delay in publication of the news, and what were the underlying reasons for the delay?

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): I am grateful to the leader of the opposition for having sent me intimation of the questions he would put. He was also good enough to let me see a copy of the editorial page of the publication in question. I had a few moments to make inquiries about the matter before the house began its sittings this morning, and I was told definitely that nothing concerning the death of Sir Harry Oakes was submitted to Canadian censorship. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that the article in question seems to indicate clearly a censorship other than Canadian.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not say so.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GRANT—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON JULY 8

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. V. GRANT (Kings): I rise to a question of privilege. On July 8, at page 4533 of Hansard, after the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) had made a statement, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) rose and said:

> I have only to observe that that was not the case with respect to the government's man-power policy in the early stages. Who laid down the policy for the Department of National Defence after the mobilization act was passed? Who was the government's spokesman before the Canadian club at Ottawa but the chief of general staff of this country when the minister did not have the guts to get up and do it himself?

Then some hon. member said "Order," and then the member for York-Sunbury replied: "That is what happened." Then another member of this house said: "He has more guts than you have."

Mr. GRAYDON: Where is the question of privilege?

Mr. GRANT: I am coming to it. The hon. member for York-Sunbury replied:

> I would take somebody else's judgment besides yours.

Then the member to whom he referred replied, "You are all guts." That ended the delicate anatomical discussion, but the last interjection did not appear in Hansard of that day. I know the press gallery heard it because it appeared in the Journal and Citizen the following day. I know the reporter heard it because he looked around. I know the member for York-Sunbury heard it because he laid down his scalpel. I know all members in this house at the time heard it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is rising to a question of privilege with respect to something that occurred, as he says, on July 8. This is now July 12. There was an opportunity before this for him to raise a question of privilege.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Just as usual—a little burlesque.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out that a question of privilege must be raised immediately after the breach of privilege has taken place, or as soon thereafter as the member has an opportunity of bringing up the matter. I do not know what breach of privilege the hon. member complains of. I do not think what he has said gives rise to any question of privilege.

Mr. GRANT: The question is that I desire to have a correction made in Hansard, because when a sentence is altered or a few words left out entirely, the whole meaning is apt to be changed to the disadvantage of some and the advantage of others. I am not saying who is responsible.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish the hon. member would come to his question of privilege.

Mr. GRAYDON: There may not be any question of privilege.

Mr. GRANT: The question is that the last remark was left out of Hansard entirely.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member is taking the position that something has been left out of Hansard which should have been inserted, will he kindly state what should have been inserted.

Mr. GRANT: The words that should be inserted after the interjection by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) are the words which were said and which are not in Hansard, namely, "You are all guts."

Mr. GRAYDON: Who is supposed to have said that?

WEARING OF COATS IN THE CHAMBER DURING HOT WEATHER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this is a question of privilege—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member is in doubt he should make sure before he raises a question of privilege.

Mr. O'NEILL: How can I be sure, Mr. Speaker? I notice in to-day's paper that yesterday in one of the churches in this city a clergyman suggested from the pulpit to the male members of his congregation that they remove their coats and be comfortable. That was done without any disrespect in the house of the Lord, and I suggest that the same thing might be done here. I know that the government and the people of this country would welcome the news that the members of this house had taken off their coats, rolled up their sleeves and gone to work.

Mr. SPEAKER: I notice that the hon. member did not include the Speaker. I would rather deprecate his suggestion.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, July 8, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Administration and passport office, $270,500.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, on Friday the house was in committee of the whole on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. To-day there are items pertaining to the Department of External Affairs which appear in connection with the war appropriation bill, and it is the latter items I propose to take up at the moment. What I would suggest, if it is agreeable to hon. members, is that as the two discussions will relate to the same subject hon. members should feel free to discuss external affairs generally under the first item that will be before us in the war appropriation bill, just as if that were the item that appears under external affairs in the estimates. Hon. members will realize that there are reasons at this time why I am anxious to get through the estimates which relate to external affairs, both those under the war appropriation bill and in the ordinary estimates as soon as possible, without any desire to limit discussion upon them. It might facilitate matters for all were it understood there could be a wide range of discussion at the outset, not limiting that discussion to one particular item.

[Mr. O'Neill.]

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in this discussion at this late stage in the session, and would not have done so had it not been for one or two observations which fell from the lips of certain members of the house on Friday last. I shall be as brief as I possibly can, and say what I have to say with celerity, because I realize that the atmosphere of this city and maybe of this chamber is not conducive to calm and philosophic consideration of a matter so important as Canada's foreign policy.

Before I proceed further I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the Prime Minister and the leader of the official opposition with relation to the great world events that are now taking place. May I say regretfully that I was sorry to hear a note interjected into that discussion which showed at least—I want to be careful what I say—an element of a lack of appreciation of the gravity of the time. There is a time and, later on, I have no doubt there will be a place where complaints against the policy and conduct of the government may be made during the course of this debate. As I sat here and listened to the observations of certain hon. members I could not help but reflect they were not fully seized of the gravity of the situation which confronts the Canadian army and the Canadian people. I say that in a kindly way, because I think we ought to have a sense of proportion and a sense of propriety. I am aware that some people do not have that sense of propriety. We had an exhibition of it a few minutes ago from the hon. member for Kings with respect to myself. I could see that he wanted to make a play on words against me.

Mr. GRANT: A guilty conscience needs no accuser.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And in that way to show his dislike of me. It does not make a bit of difference to me what the hon. member thinks of me. He will disappear from the political scene in due course as men of his calibre usually do.

In reverting to the subject matter of the debate, foreign affairs, I should like to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) on the forceful and thoughtful address which he delivered on Friday morning. Hon. gentlemen may not agree with all his premises, they may not agree with all his conclusions, but they will agree that he spoke the mind of a large number of Canadian people, and that he offered to the people of Canada constructive suggestions which are well worthy of their consideration. I personally desire to associate myself—and I speak only for myself—with five of the six proposals which he made near the conclusion of his speech. I shall not cover the same ground or dilate on the virtues of the proposals which he made. I should like to reserve to myself consideration of the fifth proposal, namely, that Canada should become a member of the pan-American union. I should like to have a little more light and a little more information on the whole position before I give my personal adherence to that proposal. I know there are advantages and disadvantages. I understand that one of the reasons why Canada has never been invited, apart from seeking, to membership in the pan-American union so-called, is that we were part and parcel of the British empire, and perhaps on the theory, the unfounded theory, that Canada was not a self-governing dominion. However, I should like, as I say, to reserve to myself consideration of all the aspects of the proposal as to how it might affect this country.

On Friday I listened with a great deal of attention to the Prime Minister's statement of Canada's foreign policy, if one may so term it. I do not think he carried us very much farther than he has carried us on previous occasions, particularly in his speech of the 19th of March last in his review of the progress of the war. Of course I am more or less in agreement as to the main topic discussed by him, and by the same token I suggest to the hon. members and to the people of Canada that because we are in the war and because we are making now a great contribution to the war—I do not want anybody to say that I have denied that we are making a great contribution to the war—Canada must of necessity take a greater interest in foreign affairs with respect to the whole world. It will no longer do to say that we are being merged into nationhood and that we are a great world power and then retire into an ivory tower and say we will have no commitments, we will not tie ourselves up to this particular sphere or that. Great power, a great status in the affairs of the world, particularly in a war era, brings of necessity great responsibilities. Canada, if she is to call herself a nation, and an adult nation, must assume those responsibilities.

I have listened on many occasions to the Prime Minister's declarations with respect to foreign affairs, and have always thought that they were largely negative. I believe he summed up the position of his government and gave us his philosophic view with respect to this matter in the concluding paragraph of the speech which he made on the 19th of March. I am now quoting from page 1397 of Hansard:

> When this country went into the war it did so as a result of the action of this parliament taken on its own account, a decision reached in accordance with what it believed to be and certainly was the will of the people of Canada.

There is no quarrel with that; we all agree. But I call particular attention to the last sentence of the paragraph:

> In all our relations with other parts of the empire and with other countries, so far as the present administration is concerned, we intend to stand on the ground of a status of our own equal to that of each and all of the self-governing communities—the dominions and the United Kingdom included.

That is a positive assertion of the government's foreign policy, and that is as far as it goes. In the past if we have had a foreign policy, as I appreciate it, such as it was, it was composed of two negative positions and one positive position. The first negative position has been that we shall have no commitments at all. The second negative position, as I appreciate it, has been that we shall watch and wait to see what happens. Without desiring in any way to be offensive —and I do not wish to interject a harsh note at all—these two negative positions add up to isolation. That has been the guiding star of the Canadian foreign policy of my right hon. friend in the period in which he has been Prime Minister or leader of his party, down to the time of the outbreak of the war. I submit that is a fair interpretation. I do not think my right hon. friend will disagree.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do, most absolutely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then, of course, we will agree to disagree. But my attitude is this: the Prime Minister's fundamental policy of foreign affairs, with the one exception that I referred to, has been negative; it has been based on the assumption that this country shall make no commitments whatever with anybody with relation to our foreign affairs, and to me at any rate that spells isolation.

The third, that which I call the positive position which the Prime Minister has assumed, is that in season and out of season he has emphasized, and many times I think he has over-emphasized, the question of Canada's status within the British empire. No one has challenged the fact that Canada has equality of status within the British empire. It is true that was not always so, but we have had an evolution resulting from the growth from a colonial status up to the time that Canada went into the war of 1914 of her own volition, when she took a man's part in world affairs with respect to Europe. I do suggest to the Prime Minister that no matter what imperial conferences may have said and done, the beginning of nationhood and equality of status for Canada within the realm of the British empire was established by Sir Robert Borden and by the Canadian forces at the time of the last conflict. We asserted ourselves at the peace conference which followed the last war. We were signatory to the Versailles treaty, and the evolution was then complete and accepted by the whole world. All that remained to be done was to put into concrete form, as was done subsequently, a declaration of the status contained in the Balfour declaration. That was subsequently crystallized as a declaratory statute in the statute of Westminster, which, I believe, went a little further in respect of the section which refers to the Colonial Laws Validity Act.

So that Canada evolved as a self-governing nation in the course of time by reason of the trend of events, not by any statutory provision. She evolved as a self-governing nation by taking her place, her proper place, within the sphere of empire. And to be harping—perhaps a better word would be dwelling—upon this question of equality of status is just putting up a straw man and knocking him down. To me, coupled with the isolationist position which the Prime Minister I believe always occupied up to the time of the last war, the two together tend toward separatism. If I should wish any confirmation of my views in relation to this matter I should have only to refer to the speech of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) in the house on Friday last, and to other speeches made by the hon. member.

Mr. MacNICOL: One cannot attach any weight to them at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I might just as well deal with the position as I see it, here and now. Some sessions ago the hon. member made a speech in the house in which he said I had assumed—and I believe he was referring more particularly to me—that I was more British than the British. Well, I never claimed to occupy any such position. I am a Canadian first, as I believe he is. But since the war began, and particularly since Dunkirk, believing as we do in the ideals and principles which actuated the British when they entered this war in September 1939, knowing that as a result of what happened at Dunkirk Great Britain stood alone, as she did for many months; believing that she then assumed and still retains the moral leadership of the world—having regard to these facts we could not do anything else, it would be unbecoming for us to do anything else than to support Great Britain—indeed it was our bounden duty—during the whole period of the war. And I believe that government policy has been directed along that line.

But that is not the philosophy of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, protest as he will—and I know he hedged in his speech last Friday in respect of his previous utterances—

Mr. CLAXTON: There was no hedging at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is a matter of opinion. I assert it and the hon. member denies it. We shall have to let it go at that. I am not going to take the time to analyse his speech. But I have always understood that the hon. member belonged to that school of isolationists and separatists which is most vocal in the country, whose chairman is Professor Frank Scott of McGill university, and to that school of thought of which Mr. Underhill of Toronto university is chief spokesman.

Mr. CLAXTON: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. CLAXTON: May I ask if there is any evidence anywhere, at any time, of my ever having belonged to any school of isolationism?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a fair question, and I am bound to tell the hon. member that I am endeavouring to locate the evidence at this time. I have not got it before me now, but I believe it is there.

Mr. CLAXTON: There is no such evidence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And I believe it is there in a statement made in the Winnipeg Free Press, in which the hon. member's name is included among a list of one hundred men who demanded certain things with respect to Canada's foreign policy.

The hon. member told us on Friday that in 1937, I believe it was, he was one of those who demanded the removal of Mr. Chamberlain from the prime ministership of Great Britain. I just wonder at the, shall I say nerve, of a group of people in Canada who would tell the people of England who ought to be their prime minister. What would we in Canada say if some public man in England were to tell us that we ought to get rid of Mackenzie King, and get rid of him once and for all?

Mr. MARTIN: Some people in Canada tried that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is all right for the Canadian people to do that, but the point I make is that we would resent any public man in Great Britain telling us who our prime minister should be. And, if I may say so, I think the hon. member had a lot to do, when he told the people of Great Britain who ought to be their prime minister he was carrying a pretty big load. I was reminded of the Three Tailors of Tooley Street—"We, the people of England."

The hon. member's views appear at page 4599 of Hansard, and I have said what I think about them. Am I correct in saying that in 1938 the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was one of those who advocated the neutrality of Canada? Was he one of those who joined with the late hon. member for Selkirk in respect of a bill that hon. member introduced in the house declaring that if Great Britain went to war Canada should be neutral? Has he read the speech of the then minister of justice, one of the greatest speeches in my opinion that the late Mr. Lapointe ever made, in which he controverted that position, and as a result of which that line of thought never attained more than a premature birth in Canada?

Mr. CLAXTON: Is the hon. member asking me to answer?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. CLAXTON: At that time I advocated our taking—and we had to take, of course—precisely the course which we took in 1939.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not my information. I am bound to say I have not the evidence here, but I think it is available. I have been told it is available, showing that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, who I know is an isolationist, was at that time in favour of the neutrality of Canada. If he denies it, then I accept his word.

Mr. CLAXTON: I deny it absolutely. There is no trace of evidence that I was an isolationist, as my hon. friend has said, at any stage. There is the fact that I advocated from 1931 on, Canada's full participation in all the agencies which would make for international peace, security and prosperity. That is I think the exact opposite of being an isolationist.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the hon. member one of those who adheres to the position of Professor Underhill of the university of Toronto who declared some months ago, perhaps some years ago, at least prior to this present war, that if Britain should ever again be engaged in a European conflict and require aid, Canada apparently should thumb her nose at her? That is a matter of record. These gentlemen meet together at Lake Couchiching and they give utterance to sentiments that are shocking to Canada in these perilous times. No matter what the hon. member may profess to express at this time, he does not express the views of the Canadian people with respect to foreign policy. He did not do so in a speech which he made in another place and which is unreported; he did not express the views of loyal Canadians, nor did he express them on Friday when he took the position which he did. I repudiate the suggestion that he speaks for me or for the people who think like me.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. gentleman has suggested that in some speech upon which he cannot put his fingers I have expressed views which are not loyal. I submit that that suggestion is unparliamentary. My. hon. friend cannot find such a speech because there is no such speech.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I may have it after the recess. I have been very frank and suggested that while I asked for it I could not find it in the library before I came here, but I am told that it is there.

Mr. CLAXTON: I ask my hon. friend to withdraw that remark.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the specific remark that I am asked to withdraw?

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member has suggested that I made a statement showing my disloyalty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never said anything of the sort. What I said was that the statement on foreign policy to which the hon. gentleman gave utterance does not represent the views of the majority of Canadians, and it certainly in no sense represents my views. If it is intended to represent the philosophy and policy of the hon. gentleman, so far as I am concerned I do not belong to that school of isolationists and separationists. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is the understudy in the privy council office of the Prime Minister, and I should like to know if what he said on Friday represents the views of the Prime Minister. It would be interesting to know if the Prime Minister accepts the views to which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George gave utterance.

I should like to refer briefly to the Prime Minister's statement. I was struck by the fact that the Prime Minister indicated that while Canada had been consulted in connection with one major sphere of war time activity, namely, the production of supplies and war materials, we had never been consulted with respect to war strategy or the carrying on of the war. That is to say, we were not taken into the councils of the United Kingdom and the United States with respect to what should take place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think I ever made a statement of the kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the inference I have drawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is drawing an inference—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am entitled to draw any inference I like. That is my interpretation. I gathered from what the Prime Minister said under interrogation that while we had been consulted with respect to war supplies and war materials, we as a world power, if we are to call ourselves such, had not had any part or control in determining world war strategy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a wrong inference altogether; that is an unwarranted and wrong inference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury) Is there anybody within sound of my voice who believes for one minute that if we had been informed beforehand of what was proposed to be done at Casablanca, the Prime Minister would have neglected to tell us about it? There is not much that he neglects to tell us that reflects his own glory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend suggest that before Casablanca I should have told this House of Commons of the strategic proposals that were to be put forward at that time?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I never made any such suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what my hon. friend is saying.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What I did suggest was that while Canada was taking a major part in certain aspects of the war, and somewhat belatedly in connection with armed forces—I am not placing any fault on anybody for this—we have never been consulted with respect to war strategy or world war planning with regard to fighting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a fair inference to draw from the fact that if we had been consulted I am certain we would have been told about it. There is not much that these gentlemen ever miss in telling about their own glory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will read the speech I made at the opening of the session on the address, he will find there specific reference to the extent to which we were consulted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to refer to the speech made by the Prime Minister on Friday at the opening of this debate. He was referring to post-war concepts, and I should like to quote from page 4558 of Hansard, as follows:

> The time is approaching however, when even before victory is won the concept of the united nations will have to be embodied in some form of international organization. On the one hand, authority in international affairs must not be concentrated exclusively in the largest powers. On the other, authority cannot be divided equally among all the thirty or more sovereign states that comprise the united nations, or all effective authority will disappear.

With that last statement I am in agreement. You could not get far with an unwieldy body; progress would be hopeless. Then he goes on to say:

> Representation should be determined on a functional basis which will admit to full membership those countries, large or small, which have the greatest contribution to make to the particular object in question.

I wish the Prime Minister had enlarged on that proposal. Was that statement based upon any consultation that has developed between united nations representatives, or was he flying a kite to see what the effect would be?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the position I have taken right along.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so. I think the Prime Minister was putting forth a compromise position between joining up with one side or joining up with the other in the peace conferences or post-war consultations that will be held. Canada has made a great contribution to the war, although not as great as any of the big four, if I may use that term. She could not hope, I should think, to play a part as great as any one of the four in the consultations that will take place.

That conception has a good deal of merit, but I wish he had explained just what he means by the term he used. I noticed two editorials, one in the Montreal Gazette and the other in the Montreal Star of Saturday, commending the position which the Prime Minister indicated. But the Prime Minister did not say enough; he did not let the Canadian people know what was in his mind. Is he waiting for the reaction thereto?

Canada has become a nation by reason of the contribution which she has made. Britain has the moral leadership of the world, and she won it as a result of standing almost alone, yea, in fact, alone, at and after Dunkirk. They are our blood brothers over there. On the other hand there is the geographical propinquity of Canada and the United States. Canada, it has been said, has been the intermediary between the United States and the United Kingdom, and the interpreter of one to the other. I am not sure that that has worked out in practice, though I think to a degree it is true. But if the testing time comes, and we have to choose between the one and the other—and I pray God for the sake of the general good of the world, of peace among nations, and of the great world which we would like to see afterwards, we shall not have to do that—I say, if the testing time comes, then I tell my right hon. friend that so far as I am concerned—and I would not pretend, like the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, to speak for the nation—my vote and my voice, my advice to the Canadian people in so far as it may be asked or heeded, will be, "Let us stand by the empire."

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): I wish to make just a few comments on the foreign affairs of Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a masterly statement the other day and again this morning, setting forth what Canada hoped to do and what she is doing at the present time. He told us something of the future.

To be brief, I wish to associate myself with the remarks that have already been made by the Prime Minister and by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton). There are three main points I would like to emphasize as regards Canadian policy. The first is that Canada's policy should be Canadian, that is, a policy to which the great majority of our people subscribe and to which they give loyal support, even though they may differ in details.

No matter what hon. members may say of a lack of policy in the past, Canada was one of the few nations which answered "present" when the hour struck and when the aggressor sent his hordes into neighbouring territory. It was the United Kingdom, the Dominions and France alone, without being themselves invaded, who joined in this war against the axis powers, and they did so because of a principle for which they stood and because of their enlightened self-interest, as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St George put it on Friday. They saw their own interest threatened. We acted then on a Canadian policy.

Secondly, Canada, as a free autonomous nation within the empire, should work in close association with other parts of the British commonwealth of nations and with the United States, because their outlook is so much the same as ours. It is expressed pretty well in the Atlantic charter. The charter may be too idealistic, but it shows to what we can work, and if we know the goal to which we are going we are less likely to be lost in the maze of complicated, intricate international conditions. The commonwealth is linked in a common ideal personified in the crown, and I think we realize it now more perhaps than ever.

A distinguished journalist, Mr. Percy J. Philip, who knows his history, had this to say quite recently:

> When people talk glibly of a better world organization I sometimes wonder what they have to offer, what will surpass in gallantry, in liberality, in creativeness and in courage the living organization that has withstood for the second time in thirty years the challenge of the greatest military power in the world and, in doing so, has lost not a single essential freedom.

The third point for a Canadian policy, it seems to me, is that our own country and peace is wrapped up with the security and peace of the world community, Mr. Philip went on to speak of a new democratically organized community of nations.

Whether we like it or not, Canada is caught in a historical and geographical position that becomes more and more central with the growth of air power. We cannot escape that. I believe strongly that only a system of collective security can prevent another world war within this century. It will not prevent all war. It may itself make war to uphold law and order. Yet if it is not ready to do that, to go to that length to back up its decisions, with force perhaps, any evil-minded aggressor may again upset the world's peace.

In this era of mechanized power no nation, however strong, can hope to stand alone. We recognize that the ideal of world peace is comparatively new. Nation has warred with nation since the beginning of time, and periods of no war have been very few and scattered. But the ideal is here, and I feel that the League of Nations moved us just a little bit closer to that ideal. The league was meant to control war, and what a world it started out in! Of the seven great powers, the United Kingdom, with the dominions and France, were the only two who belonged to it throughout the years. The United States never belonged, and Russia went through the throes of a bloody revolution and its aftermath. Italy was very soon dominated by a man who preached war as an instrument of international policy. Germany belonged for a few short years, and Doctor Stresemann's death was a tragedy for us all. I do not think that Japan ever understood any of the principles that underlay the League of Nations and what it hoped to do in the score of years that intervened between these two great wars. Yet even now there are nineteen nations paying dues to the League of Nations, and the International Labour Organization.

I wish to quote from a statement of June 15 of this year, by Mr. P. G. Waterson of the League of Nations, of Princeton, where one of the divisions of the league is still in exile, just as the International Labour Office is here in Montreal. With regard to the payment of dues this is what he says:

> During the course of 1942 the following countries made contributions: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, France, Ireland, India, New Zealand, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, the Union of South Africa, United Kingdom.
> I have not as yet received full information regarding the present year but believe the payments have also been received from Mexico and Portugal. In the above I have not included states members of the international labour organization but not members of the league. The regular payers among them comprise the United States of America, Brazil, Chile, Venezuela. In addition, the United States of America also contribute to the league in respect of their participation in the work of the opium section.

That is signed by Mr. P. G. Waterson. These countries therefore must see a hope even yet in the league, and we may yet build on what has survived of that league ideal. We do not know what form the new peace treaties will take, but here is evidence of willingness to cooperate in the attempt to bring peace and security and order out of chaos through a collective system. I am not arguing for a renewal of the league in the form in which it stood. It is still too early to make any blueprints. The war itself will shape the future, will create and harden international relationships. There is a tremendous outpouring of hate now against Germany in the occupied countries. Why would there not be? Contemptuous, cold-blooded, calculated cruelty must engender hate. But on the other hand I do not think there has ever been such good-will among some of the powers of the world that are now allied as there is at the present time; and after all, good-will is a pretty good basis for any international cooperation.

I wonder if we could capitalize on that good-will now. Could we not, while the realization of what we owe is strong upon us, begin to shape that cooperation now? I believe it is being shaped quietly and efficiently, through such negotiations as the Prime Minister has put before us. Let me indicate the desire for cooperation. Take the British empire, or the commonwealth, whichever you call it. Do you not think that our allies are more friendly now than they were back in 1938 and 1939? They now see the issues at stake which they did not see in 1939. They have seen the British people stand up alone after the defeat of France to take tremendous punishment with unbowed heads and fearless hearts. Do not more people now realize the truth in the words of General Smuts when, referring to the empire, he said:

> This greatest human experiment in political organization, this precedent and anticipation of what one hopes may be in store for human society in years to come.

It is not that we think the commonwealth has failed that we advocate a wider order. Surely our allies see that British imperialism is a thing of the past.

What about Russia? Has there ever been a time in the last quarter of a century when Russia's stock stood higher? We have evidence that Russia's suspicions of her allies are much less to-day than they have been at any time in the last quarter of a century. That may be shown by the twenty-year pact of friendship between Great Britain and Russia, and by Russia's recent dissolution of the comintern. One of the ways by which Russia thought she might bring about better conditions for everybody in all the countries in the world was through the communist idea. It was revolution in Russia and world revolution, in theory. In France, before its fall, its last parliament contained I believe seventy communist members. But the Russian nation has dissolved the comintern as if it now thought that there might be better ways of collaborating than through a revolution. Russia's stock stands high.

What about China? We know now what China learned years ago, the strength and barbarity of Japan. The British, like the Chinese, have stood up under the bombing of their cities. A new bond there! We must hold fast to the comradeship which has been established in the face of the common enemy and the common danger.

In the United States we find a new realization of her position and responsibility as a great power. This is shown in the public utterances of President Roosevelt and other outstanding men. I quote just this one paragraph from a speech made in April of this year by Sumner Welles:

> And I am even more convinced that unless the American people are willing to assume their fair share of responsibility for the maintenance of peace in the world of the future, by joining in the exercise of powers when they may be determined by international agreement to be necessary, and by participating in such other forms of international cooperation as may effectively prevent the rise of economic or political dangers, the peace of the world cannot be maintained.

Take the state legislatures. A report in the press of July 3 states that in thirteen of the legislatures of the United States resolutions have been introduced and agreed upon to the effect that they are convinced that the sequence to victory in this world war must be international organization of all nations to lay the foundations of peace. These resolutions differ from one state to another, but thirteen legislatures of the United States have adopted such a resolution. Those states are: North Carolina, New Jersey, Montana, Maryland, New York, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Alabama and Florida.

It may also have been noticed that the Republican party, somewhat isolationist but not entirely, has set up the Republican Post-war Policy Association, which according to the press is making international collaboration a part of its programme.

What about our other allies? The mutilated, occupied nations of Europe, some of which were neutral back in the first great war, have a different idea now I think of how closely they should collaborate. We have all realized that we cannot have the benefit of national sovereignty in its entirety and at the same time enjoy security.

Our other allies of the Americas have shown that they realize what it is all about. They have shown it by their membership in the League of Nations, and by the joint accord they signed in January, 1942, in Washington.

I maintain that never before in the last twenty-five years has there been a time when there has been a better basis for action based upon good-will among the allied nations of the world to bring about a system out of which we may hope to attain peace and security. Not that good-will alone can give us peace and security; that is only part of it. But it is a good basis. You must have the institutions through which that good-will can act. But the war has taught us the alternative to collaboration among the countries of the world, and the alternative is another war, I believe, within the century.

Making the peace will bristle with difficulties. Let no one imagine that it can be easily done. In spite of mutual respect there will be an aftermath of bitterness and of disillusionment which may nullify the best efforts of our statesmen. Statesmen are only human, with the weaknesses and strengths to which human nature is subject. Will the democracies stand by their statesmen? You know the dangers there. National leaders at peace negotiations know that back home millions of people are watching to see that there is no sacrifice of national prestige or national sovereignty. The elected president or the elected prime minister knows how easily political opponents seize on every opportunity to denounce any concessions made. That is why we so desperately need an informed public opinion which will steadily hold up the hands of our statesmen. One does not need to go far afield to get examples of leaders who were not followed. But I did go far afield and I have here a quotation from an article by Doctor F. W. Sollmann, who was a member of the German government in 1923, an associate of Stresemann and editor of a chain of papers under Kaiser Wilhelm. He was one of the German delegates to Versailles in 1919, and fled from Germany in 1933 since when he has been a resident of Pennsylvania. He makes this statement in an article in the Dalhousie Review for May entitled "Facing the German people":

> Chancellor Stresemann often told me how he suffered under unfair attack in his own party. He and the first Reich president of the republic, Frederick Ebert, and many statesmen, died prematurely, hunted down by the attacks of a slandering opposition.

I went far afield for that.

The only hope of avoiding the danger of the demagogue's appeal is an informed public opinion. Extremists are always vocal. Can we in Canada understand that foreign relations must be removed from the realm of partisan party politics if stable relations with other nations are to be built up? How can we reconcile our democratic right of criticism with steady support of international policy? Preparation for peace should mean the awareness of our own people of the sacrifices that must be made for peace. An informed public opinion, yes, and how can it become informed? Years of study will still leave much to be desired, but we should know something of the difficulties which come through the clash in national objectives. I think we ought to realize that the basis of lack of cooperation is a fear of domination, a fear that somebody else will form your policy for you. If we are ever to arrive at collaboration we must realize that other nations feel the same way about these things as we do. Let us not forget, when we speak of democratic countries, that the German people voted Hitler into power, mainly because he promised the easy way to get rid of mass unemployment, and to place Germany in the sun again. They voted him into power, and every democratic country faces a like possibility unless we have an informed public opinion that can examine policies from a non-partisan angle as they are set before them.

I should like to read a quotation from the Christian Science Monitor. This is an editorial which appeared on Armistice day, 1942. It might be entitled "How far can we go in collaboration?"

> To-day the problem of durable peace is being discussed from so many angles that the public is in danger of confusion. If, before we can have peace, the income of every person must be guaranteed, if every vestige of racial or social discrimination must be obliterated, if every man must adhere to rules which mortals have never learned completely to live by, then peace is indeed a complicated business, and not to be achieved short of a perfect world.
> That may be true of the peace that passeth all understanding; it is not true of the peace that exists between states joined in federal union, or which are members of a commonwealth, or which have recognized their fundamental interests as bound up with other nations. Among such peoples political peace is preserved by sharing in maintenance of forces protecting order while justice is being won. The next goal for world peacemakers may well be the establishment of this concept of sharing a single force for the preservation of world order. As much justice as is possible of achievement must of course be written into the next peace, but the supreme aim is that the peace shall be protected by force as widely supported as possible.

I should like to read what Anthony Eden said about this century in an address he made on July 3 to the English-speaking union in London. He said he was more than ever convinced that "the message of the twentieth century is the utter interdependence of all nations."

There is much more that I should like to say. This is pretty much theory, but you have to have theory before you can do anything else. You require support for a policy that is to be put into force. I am very much interested in this question of peace and war; I am concerned as all people are because war makes or breaks a nation and the civilization of the world. We must build together with other nations if we hope to build a permanent structure.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that we listened with some interest and perhaps with some expectation to the Prime Minister's speech of last Friday on foreign policy. I was, however, a little disappointed to discover that within about half an hour the Prime Minister spent some considerable time in reviewing the world situation as it appears to-day, making special reference to the war in the Pacific; he spent some time on the recently conducted food conference, and on the question of refugees from Europe, and therefore in the half hour period there was not much time left for him to give to this country the foreign policy of his government for the next year. It has become almost the rule of the day for the government to say this and that is a matter of government policy; therefore we cannot announce it until the appropriate time—the appropriate time meaning when the government thinks it is appropriate.

May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we are passing estimates for the year 1943-44. We are asked to vote sums of money for the administration of the Department of External Affairs to carry on some sort of policy for the next year; therefore when we are being asked to vote appropriations for the ensuing year the country has a right to know what the government's foreign policy is for that year, and so far as I am concerned—and I think the whole house will agree—we are still at a loss to know what that policy is. I believe I could go a little further and suggest that last Friday's debate, and the debate that is now in progress can be regarded as a continuation of it, is perhaps one of the most important debates that has taken place in parliament this year. That has been referred to before, and I thought that all parties of the house would take the opportunity to announce what their foreign policy might be. But I have not heard in any very pronounced terms what the foreign policy of the Progressive Conservative party is. I happen to have in my files a printed document which came out of the Winnipeg convention, I believe. It is entitled "Freedom, security, opportunity and the British partnership policy of the Progressive Conservative party." They do not have a great deal to say about it, although they go a little farther than the Prime Minister went on Friday. The Prime Minister did not tell us what the policy of his government was in respect of future foreign relations.

I come now to the next speaker, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I expected that he would announce what the foreign policy of his party was, but I listened in vain. He spent some considerable time justifying a statement he made in respect of the appointment of one of our foreign representatives, and some little time in respect of the Jewish refugee question, but I listened in vain for a pronouncement with regard to their foreign policy. I happen to have with me an article which I cut out of Canadian Business. This article has to do with the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. I find there are six points enumerated, but I cannot see anything with regard to their foreign policy. Statements which have been made in the past indicate to me that there is one tribute I might well pay to their late leader, Mr. Woodsworth, and that is that he was indeed a sincere and honest man, and that he was candid in his pronouncements in the house. My memory goes back to a time only a few short years ago when he sat in the house, and I recall clearly that on every occasion on which foreign policy was discussed his voice was heard. I do not know that the policy of that party has changed, but pronouncements which have been made in the past would lead one to the belief that their policy, in a word, is one of internationalism. There have been a few statements which would indicate that they are not particularly definite in respect of Canada's policy in the British commonwealth of nations, but they do seem to be definite in respect of collective security of some kind. I always have asked myself the question: Collective security with whom? So far as I am concerned there is no greater collective security in the whole world than that embodied in the British commonwealth of nations. The other day the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), stated something which has great value in respect of our attitude on foreign policy. Following that up I shall read only a few sentences from a speech by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka), on February 18, 1943, where at page 521 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> To me the British crown is the heart and symbol of the British commonwealth of free and sovereign peoples. To me the British crown is the symbol of unity and the heritage of British ideals of more than a thousand years. More than that, we should prize our position within the commonwealth because we are the benefactors in all and everything that has been achieved over centuries of progress. For instance, should it not occur to us that we are equal partners in a unique association of free sovereign nations. . . . Let me point out the underlying principles of our British democratic system. It is simply this, that the extent and the power of the British commonwealth of nations are consistent with the maximum of individual freedom, the maximum of local and provincial autonomy, and the maximum of sovereignty of each unit-nation, fitting into the pattern of the commonwealth. This philosophy of statecraft has been built on practical experience, and it is opposed to other philosophies which are supported by many, and which include the surrender of our national sovereignty in favour of some super state. . . . The philosophy of the British people is diametrically opposite to that of totalitarianism in whatever form it appears.

The greatest assurance of individual freedom that can be found is expressed in those principles underlying the crown of the British commonwealth of nations. And to surrender any of that sovereignty to an outside body, and work from the top down to the people, is the very converse of democracy. Democracy, first and foremost, is the freedom of the individual expressing itself to its government and its administration. It is government exercising its powers to bring into existence the results that the will of the people desire. The setting up of international institutions does not guarantee that individual freedom. I do not say of course that there should not be some measure or some programme of international cooperation. International cooperation is one thing, but internationalism that will give over any of our national sovereign rights to a central power outside ourselves is neither democratic nor tending to assure individual freedom.

I do not know that we can properly diagnose the present world situation by simply looking at things as they appear on the surface. I am reminded of a solemn and striking portion of holy writ which says:

> For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.

That is true. Hidden somewhere in behind the scenes of human activity the forces of evil which operate backstage are the forces to be most feared. I suggest that the present world conflict, after all, becomes only an incident in the progress of history. What are we fighting for in this war? That question is often asked. It is usually answered by stating what we are fighting against, and we are usually told that we are fighting against the totalitarianism of Europe, that we stand for democracy, and that our fight is against totalitarianism with all its evils. It seems to me the dangerous situation is that in fighting against the evil powers of totalitarianism abroad, Canada and the other countries of the British commonwealth of nations may find themselves in the grip of a state-dominated system of our own making, because of powers which operate behind the scenes for eventual world domination. I am convinced that there are very powerful forces at work to bring about this disastrous condition. This is evidenced by bold assertions coming from many quarters that instead of a reconstructed democratic order after the war we must expect more government control, more bureaucratic regimentation, and all the other odious features of totalitarianism which have created so much havoc in Europe.

Much of that might be taking place in our own country, right under our own noses. But what of the world at large? I am not apologizing to the Prime Minister for saying this, but I think he should have stood up on Friday night and told the world that as far as Canada is concerned we will never countenance any move toward a supranational or world government, or any other move or utterance that would ask the people of Canada to give up any part of their sovereignty. If he had said that, I think he would have received the plaudits of this nation. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said that Canada needs the British empire—I agree with him. He said that the British empire needs Canada—I agree with him. I would go further and say that the world needs the British empire. I am convinced that there are powers that are seeking to destroy that empire, and have been for years. I am convinced that what took place in the two decades before the war was nothing more than a move on the part of unseen powers to render helpless the British commonwealth of nations.

May I say something which has been said before—this thought was expressed this morning by the hon. member for Lethbridge—I think it is nothing short of a miracle that Great Britain withstood the enemy in those years gone by. Dunkirk was a miracle, and it is a miracle that Great Britain, the British commonwealth of nations, and Canada too, have in such a short time come to be such powerful nations in respect to armaments. It is a miracle that this has been done, and perhaps the hand of Providence had something to do with it.

I have a good deal of material in my scrapbook, and I could not help but turn up a certain article a few days ago when that wonderful lady, Madame Chiang Kai-shek, was here. We applauded her, we praised the great courage of the Chinese people, and we listened to her with all the intensity of our souls. It was a great day in Canadian history when she spoke in this chamber, but while I listened to her I could not help but hang my head in shame as I thought of what had happened in days gone by when the British commonwealth of nations was powerless to help China against the onslaught of powerful militaristic Japan. I went up to my office and I turned up an article which had been written by Madame Chiang Kai-shek and which appeared in Liberty magazine of December, 1940. This was over a year after the war had started. I should like to read just a few paragraphs from the pen of Madame Chiang Kai-shek. This is not someone else reporting Madame Chiang Kai-shek; it is what she wrote herself. She said:

> Japan's easy conquest of Manchuria by unscrupulous means was but an example of how an aggressor could safely kick irksome principles into limbo and survive unscathed to enjoy not only the possessions of the "conquered" territory, but also the continued political, economic, and social good-will and friendship of those democratic nations which were originally the most vociferous in their denunciation of the aggression. Japan had tested international reactions to undeclared warfare, to the wholesale abrogation of treaties; and she found them empty of danger—either immediate or remote.

Have we reason to believe that any supranational authority can bring about treaties which will be any more sound? The article continues:

> When Japan invaded Manchuria we refrained from resisting because the League of Nations undertook to adjust matters. They lost the region for us. There was a difference, however, when the Japanese proceeded to invade China proper. Then we abandoned faith in international undertakings, and we fought. For more than three years now Japan has been gouging with ferocious intensity at the very vitals of our country. She set the example for the wholesale slaughter and destruction now running riot in Europe—an example that might never have materialized had the democracies only fulfilled their obligations to China by restraining Japan.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Without the League of Nations.

Mr. HANSELL: She says that the League of Nations broke down, that they were not able to handle the situation, that they were powerless. She goes on to refer to the power of money, the power of cartels—she does not use that word here—and the power of world trade. She refers to the fact that the great democracies were feeding Japan with munitions of war but were not doing the same thing for China. The article continues:

> America amassed profits by selling to Japan the necessities of warfare. Eighty per cent of Japan's war supplies came from America—

Mr. COLDWELL: And Canada.

Mr. HANSELL: She said that eighty per cent came from America; I can only quote what is written here. The article continues:

—and ninety-five per cent of the aviation gasoline which was used by Japan in her ruthless bombing was American.

China has thus been compelled to fight a war not of her own making with a power which has been aided and abetted unstintingly by the markets of the democracies. These markets were virtually closed to us, for no help was given us to avail ourselves of them. China has been the champion of the principles for which other democracies are now at war, but mention of what China has been able to do for the cause is seldom if ever made—an amazing situation.

And further:

What has happened, however—and what has not happened—is another great lesson to the Chinese people, another bitter lesson that they will never forget. They will remember never to believe in international promises, no matter how many imposing seals adorn the documents.

And again:

What the future holds no one can tell, of course. If, unhappily, for the democracies as well as for China, we should be defeated in the end, at least the world ought to know that we were beaten not because of lack of courage —either moral or physical—but because China was strangled to death by an economic noose fashioned by Japan out of British appeasement, American profiteering, and French fear.

There is one thing I should like to say in that respect. It was not the people of China, or the people of Canada, the United States or Great Britain, who had anything to do with that. The governments were responsible. Once again I refer you to that passage of holy writ which says:

For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.

The hidden hand of world finance is at work to destroy humanity and civilization, if possible, and one of the best ways it can do it is by destroying the British commonwealth of nations; and one of the pieces of ingenuity, I personally believe, wrought by that hidden hand is to set up a supranational world government which will have control of a world monetary unit which will in turn control if possible the internal economy of every nation in the world, the British empire included. The Prime Minister would have done a service to himself and his government had he stood up here on Friday and said, "This government will never tolerate the handing over of our sovereignty to any internationalism, no matter by what name it may be called."

This is a time in the world's history when the foreign policy of this country should be announced. It is a time in the history of this country when the Prime Minister should promise the Canadian people that no commitments shall be made and no documents embodying such commitments shall be signed until those commitments are known to this parliament, and through parliament to the people, so that the people themselves can say "yes" or "no" regarding those commitments. But, knowing what has happened, I can suggest what is going to happen. I do not know who will represent us at the peace conference, but I am sure that a number of significant things will happen before the conference. Diplomats will be running all over the place. In his speech on Friday the Prime Minister mentioned certain international conferences. I doubt whether we know what goes on there behind the scenes. I do not say that the Prime Minister should be so bold as to tell the whole world, but it is the right of the people's representatives to know from A to Z what goes on behind those closed doors, and he can tell us in a secret session if he wishes to do so. These events are happening while the people's minds are occupied with the war. The technique of evil powers seems to be to get the people's minds off the future and keep them on what is happening to-day, confuse them with this and that, worried as they are with the fate of their loved ones battling overseas, so that these evil powers can put over their designs now. I believe I can see what is going to happen. I do not know who will sit at the peace table; it may be the Prime Minister; certainly it will not be myself or any member of our group; I doubt very much whether it will be any members of the party to my right.

Mr. BRUCE: What about us?

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know whether the Progressive Conservative party will gain much power. The fact is that we do not know what is the Prime Minister's policy of the future, in relation either to foreign affairs or to domestic politics. I fear that commitments will be made, that documents will be signed, and that this parliament will be asked not what it wishes to do, but to ratify commitments which have already been made. If I am in parliament at that time I may have the privilege of reminding hon. members of this prediction.

I can only reiterate that I believe the Prime Minister owes it to Canada to give us, before the debate is ended, a full pronouncement upon his government's foreign policy.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): I have one or two words to say after the speech made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) this morning, and I am grasping this early opportunity of doing so.

The hon. member referred this morning to statements which he said I had made at some occasion or another. I asked him then if he could produce any such statements. He said he was looking for them and he hoped to be able to produce them. I notice that he has been back in the chamber since, and he has not taken advantage of the opportunity of producing them, so that I assume he has not found them. It would have been generous, of course, to say that he had not found them, because no such documents can be shown to exist, but since he has not cared to do that, I should take this opportunity of saying that there is nothing whatever in the assertions he made and that no such documents or statements can be found because they do not exist. In fact the one thing he specifically referred to, namely the manifesto which he said was published in the Winnipeg Free Press, was not only not signed by me—it was signed by a very considerable number of distinguished Canadians, including a number of Conservatives—but also it did not bear anything of the import ascribed to it. This manifesto is a declaration of Canadian unity in war and peace, and it urged that the Canadian government and parliament should put itself on record, before an occasion presented itself when it would have to declare war or not, that it had the right to do so. I remember being asked to sign this at the time, and I refused to sign it for two reasons. The first of those two reasons was that I did not think the time was ripe for it. I thought that at that time, when war seemed imminent, the document would be misunderstood—which I may say was the reason given by the Prime Minister for rejecting the legislation it advocated. Second, I felt that the course that would be pursued by the parliament and government of Canada would establish the course that was advocated and would make the point abundantly clear, as I thought it should be made in the interests of the unity of Canada and of our greatest possible contribution to the cause which at that time everyone could see lay ahead.

May I say just one or two other words on the same point. When the hon. member for York-Sunbury said that I should not have said that I advocated one British statesman in opposition to another, I admit his charge completely: I should not have said it, and I never did make that advocacy in public. I did however feel provoked by the attitude of some people to the views I then expressed. Events have justified the views I then expressed. However, I should not have said that to the house, because I never made that advocacy in public, and probably it would have been improper for me to do so.

In all this discussion there seems to be a fundamental confusion, which is so extraordinary as to be almost deliberate, between a point of view which was one of simple self-respect in Canada, and what the hon. member for York-Sunbury calls isolationism. I venture to say that if you look back over the record—and I can give the texts of all the speeches I have made, which are far too many—from 1932 on, you will find that there has been no more determined anti-isolationist in Canada than myself. You will see too that the very commencement of my taking any active part in the discussion of external affairs was my strong antipathy to the policy then being taken by the government of which the hon. member for York-Sunbury was a member. That policy was taken at Geneva in 1932. It was expressed by my predecessor in this house in a speech which he delivered at Geneva on I think December 12, 1932, and it was a policy which was then generally regarded by most students of the subject as one that was not strongly opposed to the position and the pretensions of Japan with regard to Manchuria. With that policy I disagreed, and I believe that events have proved the attitude I then took right, because it was that policy and the kind of thing it represented which led to the deterioration of international affairs everywhere.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member be a little more specific regarding that policy? We are interested to know what policy he upholds.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think the hon. member will see it in the records. I can send him the documents. It was a policy of acquiescence in the attitude taken by Japan with regard to the conquest by force of a part of China. When that policy was acquiesced in at that time it meant that several nations were allowing Japan to break her treaty obligations; and in allowing Japan to break her treaty obligations, in not assisting China, those nations themselves were not fulfilling their obligations. It was that failure to live up to obligations that led to the deterioration in the international situation which contributed to bringing about the present war. It did not bring it about but it made it possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not very clear as to what my hon. friend was referring to.

Perhaps he might enlighten the committee, whether or not he meant the position that Canada took in the League of Nations assembly and council with respect to that very problem, or whether it had to do with some opinions expressed individually in Canada.

Mr. CLAXTON: It was a speech made by the Hon. Mr. Cahan on December 12, 1932, at Geneva.

Mr. GRAYDON: At the League of Nations?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. I am speaking from memory. I do not suggest that he was alone in that at the time, but I do suggest that to be accused of being an isolationist by a former member of a former government which took that attitude at that time is a little hard and a little unfair, particularly when I went on record and have remained on record ever since as being in favour of the fullest possible cooperation by Canada with other nations to preserve the peace and prosperity of the world everywhere.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I take it that my hon. friend, in taking the position which he did in 1932, was following the policy and the line taken by his own political party?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know what line the Liberal party took at that time, to be quite frank.

Mr. GRAYDON: I cannot recall that they opposed that position.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not remember. But as I said in answer to the member for Lethbridge the other day, in going back over these things we have to have a very elaborate record before us in order to trace out events. What I am saying here, however, is quite personal, and that is that the charges made, in tones of considerable bitterness, by the member for York-Sunbury in the house against me to-day, cannot be supported by any record. On the contrary, I think the record will show that when it comes to isolation or cooperation I have steadfastly stood by the side of cooperation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would not interfere with the hon. member's fine talk. I am reassured by what he has said regarding his own stand, but I would ask a question which he need not answer at the present time unless he wishes to. Does he think that Canada took the stand she did, on that memorable occasion in 1932, because she was in the British empire? Would she have taken a different stand if she had been outside the British empire? Remember, she was in the League of Nations, and the stand she took must not have been because there was not a League of Nations. Why did Canada and the British empire take the stand they did? I am wondering if it was because they were too weak to take any other stand—that they did not have the armaments.

Mr. CLAXTON: That was a very tangled period in the history of the world; there is no doubt about that. My hon. friend can read books about it as well as I can.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have read several.

Mr. CLAXTON: He can see what there was of cooperation between the United States and the United Kingdom, which was an important element. The stand taken by Canada was close to that taken by the United Kingdom at Geneva, but that did not necessarily make it right.

Mr. GRAYDON: It would not necessarily make it wrong.

Mr. CLAXTON: Oh, no. If possible, we should take the same stand on occasion after consultation. That was the point I was trying to make.

Mr. BLACKMORE: For our purpose at the present time—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Oh, never mind that. This is an historical incident that has a considerable bearing on the question under discussion, whether we should have a supranational government. No supranational government would have done any good at all. The British empire did not have the arms with which to back a demand, and she knew she would have to put the backbone, the stomach and the teeth into the League of Nations.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is a long statement involving quite a few assertions of what my hon. friend takes to be facts, but I should say that if there was one stage in the history of the world when the nations did have the strength required to make a stand it was then, if they had been willing to use it. The fact is that they were not willing to use it —not all of them. I am only led on to this —I hope my hon. friends will recognize it— because I do not believe in isolation and I have never believed in it. I believe that every step where we have gone wrong from 1920 to date has been due to failure on the part, not of this government but of most governments to live up to their obligations. Of course, Canada cannot take a stand alone against the stand of the whole world in matters of this kind, though we have had the example of New Zealand, which in 1938 did take a stand virtually alone in the world, and I believe it has earned the respect of a great number of people by reason of having taken that stand at that time. I have been completely consistent about this. I have been accused in the past of being unrealistic, idealistic, and this and that, but never before of being isolationist. I do hope therefore that this charge is disposed of now and for all time.

Just one word and then I am through. We cannot speak for the majority of people when we are speaking in this house on a matter like this, and I speak, like any other private member, only to express my own view. All we can do is to try to put forward views that will appeal as being sound views and offering the policy that should be taken. We do that with all sincerity and should do it with all frankness. But when the hon. member for York-Sunbury says he does not think that views of the kind I express represent the views of the majority, whereas the views he expresses are the views of the majority of Canadians, he is just matching his judgment against mine, and I think he will find that the kind of views I express, and the kind of views that the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) expressed, are the views that are going to be held by an increasingly large percentage of English-speaking Canadians, just as they are by practically all those who are not of Anglo-Saxon stock, and who represent fifty-one per cent of the people. Those views come from a consideration of what Canada's interests are. I put with my friends among the very forefront of Canada's interests, the survival of Great Britain, the strength of Great Britain and the survival of everything she stands for. It is important that we should try to understand each other. It is important to the unity of Canada that we should make an approach of that kind rather than the other approach which is what is called the British front approach. The results will be almost identical in either case; we shall work together. But it is important that we should speak as a chorus, shall I say, rather than with a single voice automatically. Because if we set out to speak with a single voice the other nations will say, "It is just the old British voice. It is not the other democracies standing alongside her, and so they can be ignored." If we follow that course we in Canada shall have no foreign policy, and all the talk about national autonomy will become just so much talk. We shall be setting the clock back and we shall not be doing the things my hon. friend wants us to do as well as if we pursued the line I suggest.

I am sorry to have taken up time with this personal explanation, but I do think it is important that in these matters on which there is so much emotional attachment we try to understand each other, and if I am not understood by my hon. friends at least I hope that they they will not doubt my loyalty on this or any other occasion.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for York-Sunbury while he was speaking this morning made some reference to whether the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was expressing the views of the administration or his own personal views. I was not very clear from the hon. member's answer this afternoon as to just where he stood in that matter.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is plain that I was expressing my own personal view. I have no right to speak for the administration on this.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may raise a point that has nothing to do with the matter under discussion, I think it might be well if we could have some declaration from the Prime Minister as to whether or not a parliamentary assistant, being a member of what may be regarded as a junior cabinet, so to speak, is conveying the views of the administration or merely his own views when he speaks on a matter of government policy. Just where does the differentiation lie? How far must we separate the cabinet ministers themselves from those who are parliamentary assistants, and who, according to the explanation which was given when they were first appointed, would be spokesmen for their ministers in the House of Commons?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A parliamentary assistant is in the same position as every other hon. member in the matter of his right to speak for himself and express his own opinions. The hon. member who spoke this afternoon made it abundantly clear that he was speaking only for himself and giving his own opinions.

Mr. GRAYDON: But not on the previous occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think he did also then. But apart from that I do not think it is to be assumed that when a parliamentary assistant is expressing his views he is necessarily expressing the views of the government, though I must say with regard to what my hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George has said, I am in entire accord with him and I believe the administration also is. I wish to supplement that by saying that I am not accountable for the interpretations that gentlemen opposite may put upon his words. I have a right to put my own interpretation upon what he says, and I know it will be the proper interpretation. There are occasions when a parliamentary assistant may be expressing to the house the views of the government. Those occasions will be apparent; when, for instance, he is speaking of matters referring to the department of which he is parliamentary assistant, and makes it clear that he is expressing the views of the administration. The line of demarcation is very clear.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Just before we get away from the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I want to express my personal appreciation of his having made his statement this afternoon.

I wish to make one statement regarding the reason why the British empire did not prevent the aggression of Japan. I have it on the very best of authority, as I believe all hon. members would recognize if I were free to divulge that authority, that the reason why Britain did not take stronger action then was that they were just too weak to do anything else. Their navy and army had fallen into disrepair, and they realized fully that if they did take a stand, the whole thing would fall on them. Following the tragic experience of Munich they simply had to begin to build up their power. Before this incident can be taken as of important historical significance one way or the other it should be established whether that statement which I received in confidence is true. I believe it is true, for the simple reason that I do not see how in the world the British empire could otherwise have become so impotent as it did become in just seven short years, especially when our Prime Minister himself on coming into power in 1935, immediately began to increase armaments in this country, and other empire countries were doing the same. I cannot be convinced that we had a first-class fighting force capable of meeting Japan in 1932.

Mr. CLAXTON: If I might answer my hon. friend in a word, assuming that what he says is true, it makes even stronger than anything else could the case that I have been making—that is, that in the time that lies ahead we should endeavour to get a totality of force that will prevent aggression and prevent Great Britain or the United States from ever again being put in a position where they will have to allow an aggressor to go ahead. Therefore I advocated in my speech, as I have done for the last ten years, that in order to prevent war and aggression you must have enough force to do it, so much force that nobody will dream of committing an act of aggression. For me it is no longer possible to find that force in any one nation. It is not possible to find it in the British commonwealth, or in Britain, the United States or in Russia, the three most powerful nations the world has ever seen. It is necessary now to find that totality of force which will prevent aggression in a combination of all the nations. I should like to see that brought about. That is what I mean when I say we must have collective action to organize collective strength. There is nothing particularly idealistic in this. It is a policy based on interest, as all policy must be based. But it is in our interests that we should work together with all nations to mobilize the greatest amount of strength we can get—if possible all strength on our side against aggression. That is fundamental in any system of security which is built up after the war. I am glad my hon. friend brought out that point; it strongly reinforces the point I was making.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In my judgment it absolutely devastates my hon. friend's contention. There must have been unquestionably a reason why the British empire allowed its fighting forces to fall into disrepair. What could that reason possibly have been? It was that the British people were lulled into a sense of security by reason of the fact that they reposed trust in the League of Nations, which was supposed to be powerful enough or diplomatic enough or wise enough to deal with all international situations as they arose. The result was that, as never before in the history of the British empire, the people allowed their defence forces to fall into disrepair. The people or the governments did that. That is a fact which in my judgment is of prime importance to this parliament to-day. There was something which caused us to allow our forces to become weak. I maintain it was the fact that we were in the League of Nations. If we can reason by reference to what has occurred in the past, if we bind ourselves into a supranational arrangement we will do exactly the same, or a little worse. We shall say it is George's business; let George do it, as we said before. George certainly left it undone. My own opinion is that George had his ear bent to the very powers that the hon. member for Macleod was referring to, who were trying to render the British empire so weak that it was unable to stand up against its foes.

May I say something with respect to the actual power within the League of Nations. France was in the League of Nations, and there were half a dozen other nations who were members of the league. If there was any vitality or virtue in the League of Nations, or any supranational government as such, surely there were enough nations within that group to have stopped Germany at that time, to have stopped Japan — they certainly could have stopped Japan. Certainly they could have stopped Germany, because Germany had not yet begun to rearm. How these arguments can be propounded I certainly cannot understand. It must be borne in mind that the British empire did finally stand in the way of Hitler in 1939, after Germany had rearmed and while Japan was even stronger. If the British empire did stand largely alone in the path of Germany and held her, what could the British empire have done had she been prepared? The great flaw in the reasoning before the war lay in the fact that we allowed ourselves to become unprepared. I am sure hon. members must be simply nauseated when they think of our contemptible state of unpreparedness and the impotence which obtained everywhere in this country, in every branch of our defence services. The attitude of the Canadian people generally regarding matters pertaining to defence was almost as bad. The Minister of Pensions and National Health, who at that time was responsible for the department having to do with military affairs, well remembers how difficult was his task in bringing anything into this house with respect to rearmament in 1936. What was the matter? There is only one answer, so far as I can see. Those who should have been informing the Dominion of Canada on the state of unpreparedness which obtained everywhere throughout the empire, those who should have been making clear to the people of Canada that Germany was rearming, that she was becoming a terrible foe, that Japan was a terrible potential foe, that unquestionably there was danger of a clash between Japan and the United States—those men whose duty it was to be informing the people of Canada, and unquestionably the Prime Minister of Canada was one, were neglecting their task. What for? Because they wanted to win elections.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend, did I not stand up with the Minister of Pensions and National Health and emphasize for all I was worth the necessity of increasing armaments when practically everyone was opposing them?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is all very fine for the Prime Minister to say that to-day, but I am asking him whether he said the same thing in 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The years for which I am responsible I made my position plain everywhere.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am just wondering why the other leaders did not follow suit. I ask why the leader of the Conservative party of those days, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, did not cooperate with the leader of the Liberal party. I ask the Prime Minister if he believes for a second that if every member of his party had gone out to the constituencies throughout the country and told the truth, and if every member of the Conservative party had done the same thing, the people would have continued uninformed? It just does not make sense. I believe the trouble was simply this, that there was a reticence, I will say a culpable reticence on the part of the public—

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to ask—

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall deal with my hon. friend in a moment.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to ask a question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let me finish my sentence.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to ask a question to clear up the record. I should like to know if the Social Credit party went all over the country and discussed these questions.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall answer my friend in just a moment. First of all, let me finish my statement. There was a culpable reticence on the part of the public men of Canada in informing the Canadian people of the true situation with respect to the deplorable unpreparedness which obtained everywhere in the British empire and with respect to the appalling developments which were taking place across the Rhine.

Now, may I deal with my hon. friend? I have not the quotation, but the very first statement which the Social Credit party made in January or February in Edmonton—

Mr. DUPUIS: What year?

Mr. BLACKMORE: In 1936.

Mr. DUPUIS: What about 1930?

Mr. BLACKMORE: My hon. friend will get it in just a minute. I know it. The very first statement issued by the caucus of members of this party behind me appeared in the Edmonton Journal or the Edmonton Bulletin, where it can be obtained. If the hon. members want it I shall get it and read it to them. That statement called for extensive increases in the preparedness of this country. There is no question about the meaning of the statement. It pointed out the danger which existed. I am going to ask the Prime Minister if a group of people who had never been connected with political activity in this country at all had learned these dangers, what was the matter with him and his cohorts that they had not learned this truth? We knew the danger with which we were confronted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish my hon. friend would tell me where he learned it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: By keeping his eyes open and doing a little reasoning, that was all. That was all that was necessary, just keeping your eyes open and doing a little reasoning when Hitler came to power. There was no question in the wide world that he meant business, none whatever; and very soon he began to manifest signs of exceedingly dangerous strength. When he entered the Ruhr, that was a warning to everyone. Surely when he entered Austria, that was the handwriting on the wall. And the statements which he made in "Mein Kampf" show what he meant. Among other things he certainly definitely declared that France must be destroyed. The Prime Minister will remember that. I suppose they thought he was talking in his sleep when he said that, but he meant what he said, as he has clearly shown. What other warning was necessary to alarm anyone? Let me point out that the members of my party were not in a position to have access to the secret documents which should have been transmitted to the heads of the government of this country. Those documents must have been filled with causes for anxiety and fear. I was reading a book just last summer by Kurt Reiss entitled "Total Espionage," in which most damaging accusations are made with respect to Baldwin and Chamberlain, to the effect that these men were informed in detail by responsible authorities in England of the conditions which were developing in Germany, and they disregarded the warnings. If they were so warned it is hardly to be conceived that the leaders of this government were not warned. Another thing that is amazing to me and is amazing to everyone who thinks about it in the Dominion of Canada to-day, is this: why were these warnings disregarded?

Now, with respect to the statement made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, the one thing I am worried about as a father in this country, the father of eleven children and the grandfather of five, is this: Are these babes of mine who are now growing up going to be victims of a betrayal similar to that in the future?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the hon. member should use a word like "betrayal". He knows as well as any other hon. member in the house that the whole feeling throughout the world for many years after the last war was that there would not be another war for a long time to come. There was a strong pacific sentiment everywhere, which those who saw the danger did their best to fight. But it was difficult to do so in those times. But do not, please, talk about people betraying others. That implies a deliberate effort on their part to deceive, and to deceive for special ends, which could not have been so with any of the men about whom the hon. member has spoken.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If my word has in any way offended the Prime Minister, then I withdraw it unqualifiedly. But I did wish to use a word strong enough to cover the situation, and I can think of nothing more effective than the word "betrayal". But may I absolve my right hon. friend from that. I will say that the information adduced in the book "Total Espionage" by Kurt Reiss is sufficient to convict the two gentlemen I have mentioned of betrayal, beyond any shadow of a doubt. They betrayed not only Great Britain, but they betrayed 650 million people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest it is not fair so to speak of these honourable persons, one of whom is dead and no longer here to be heard, and the other who lives in England, having done his duty according to his own lights, and in the way he believed best. I suggest they should not be referred to in that way, in their absence, in a house of parliament which stands for fair play. I do say the hon. member has no right to say that either of these gentlemen knowingly betrayed anyone.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I withdraw once more. But, as I said this morning, the time has come for plain speaking. And hon. members at this time must do some plain speaking, let the chips fall where they may.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member may say that they were mistaken in their view; but it is a very different thing to say that these public men deliberately betrayed their trust, their country and a multitude of people.

Mr BLACKMORE: I have withdrawn the word "betrayal". I am not going to give information which would tie to them the term I have used. But I could give information which could not be answered at all.

It is my anxiety that if we become involved in some supranational government, and if consequently our people become apathetic and over-confident, not only in this country but in all other countries, including the British empire and the United States, then we shall be setting the stage for a complete eclipse in the next war. And against that eventuality it becomes my duty, as a responsible member of the House of Commons in Canada, and as a voter in this country, to take precautions. I say the doctrine the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is advocating at this time in the world's history is a dangerous doctrine. Yes, it is very dangerous. Let not hon. members be deceived. There was a member, not now in the house—she was defeated in the last election—who contended with the greatest earnestness that there would never be any more war. Anyone with sense knows she was talking nonsense. But there was the danger—a lot of people believed it. They were deceived and carried away, including many hon. members in the house and many members of the Liberal party.

I am going to turn just for a moment to the question of the prevalence of the belief that there would be no future war. Probably I should not go into detail, but judging from evidence brought to my attention when I was teaching school some years ago, I am convinced that an attitude of mind was deliberately induced by making use of a clever type of propaganda operating through certain periodicals in this country, and gaining access to the teachers in our schools. The people who issued that propaganda achieved their ends, just as they intended to do. I would rather not name the people involved, but I will tell the committee this, that they were seeking deliberately to destroy the British empire. I read one of their documents which came to my hand as principal of Raymond high school. In that document they outlined their plan, and the first thing they were going to do was to destroy the fighting morale of the British people, the Anglo-Saxon race. They surely did that; they had wonderful success. Then they reasoned that when fighting morale was destroyed the people would oppose preparation for war—which they did. This would leave the people completely helpless at some future time, if a war were developed.

The whole thing worked out. Can we give any reason why the Anglo-Saxon world went —well, there is only one word which seems to fit, and that is, haywire? My right hon. friend knows the difficulty Mr. Roosevelt had to get the people in the United States to look upon the situation with even a measure of common sense, factuality and reality. Why, one man down there—I have forgotten his name—said, "I would not go to the Georgia river to meet the foe!" What an inconceivable dolt, to make a remark like that! And he left his country so helpless that it finally became necessary for him, and it will probably be necessary for his descendants, to go much farther than the Georgia river to meet the foe. If he had used anything like common sense, he, his sons and his fellow countrymen would have been prepared, instead of being in the pitiful state of unpreparedness in which they were, when war finally came to them.

I apologize again for occupying so much of the time of the committee, but—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am surprised. I have found it a very interesting subject. But, Mr. Chairman, I am going to repeat this warning, time and again, so that all will come to know it.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, this discussion has amazed me. I was not a member of the house during the time mentioned by the hon. member for Lethbridge. In those days I was just an ordinary day worker. But I did pay some attention to the matters which have been discussed this afternoon. I have been amazed at the lack of knowledge shown by the men who represented the people in those days.

Summing up the war situation this morning, the Prime Minister pointed out the seriousness of the present situation, brought about by the fact that Canadian troops are actually engaged in combat. In his statement he said he wished to guarantee the troops and the general public that so far as the Canadian government was concerned, those troops would not be let down. I hope the government will live up to that promise.

There has been some discussion this afternoon respecting the League of Nations, its break-down, and the fact that in 1939 we were plunged into a bigger and better war.

The point which stands out clearly from the discussion is that guarantees given in all sincerity, as was the one this morning by the Prime Minister, were not lived up to. It was not the machinery of the League of Nations that failed. The machinery of the league in my opinion was a hundred per cent correct. It was the only machinery befitting this day and age. Sensible men and women sat around the conference table, arbitrating the grievances of nations, and made decisions without resort to war. Those who conceived the idea of the league were honest, and it was their belief that those who would administer the league's policy would give honest administration. Those who were administering the machinery could have made it work, but they were thinking in terms of dollars and cents rather than human needs and civilization. They are the ones who are responsible for the condition the world is in to-day. That is the one thing that stands out most clearly in this discussion so far as I am concerned. Promises, such as those made by the Prime Minister this morning, were not lived up to. The men who fought accepted the promises made in 1914-18; they believed that they were fighting a war that was to end all war. The people by and large were convinced that they had accomplished that purpose. The soldiers who had fought believed that that purpose had been accomplished. The people who are indicted by the discussion this afternoon are those who were in authority at that time, those who made the promises, those who had the administration of the world under their hands for the following twenty-five years. They fell down on the job and brought about the results we are faced with to-day.

I hope that the lesson is one that will sink into the minds of the Canadian people and the peoples of the world in general. I hope they will not place too much trust in the promises of individuals or scraps of paper such as treaties and so forth. They themselves must take an active interest in the affairs of their country and of the world in general. They must see to it that the power to bring about a similar situation in the next generation is not left in the hands of a few men who are to make the decisions.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has left the chamber, but I want to say to him that I have followed very closely the workings of the League of Nations. I did a lot of work for it in my own province, because I believed in it. I also believed that we had fought a war to end war. We all know what happened to the League of Nations. The United States, which gave birth to the idea, never became a member. That hurt the league, and hurt it badly. We all watched the manipulations from the inside. I merely have to draw your attention to the men in France and England who were responsible for the break-down of the league. These countries were the dominant factors in the league and they could have made it work. Those most prominent in bringing about the downfall of the League of Nations were Sir Samuel Hoare and Mr. Pierre Laval. They stood by and allowed Mussolini to carry on his adventure in Ethiopia. We know to-day the motives that actuated them. We know where Hoare is to-day. He is in Spain with Franco, because he is acceptable to Franco. We know where Laval is to-day.

I have no intention of going into this particular matter. It is a long story and I think everybody is familiar with it. I do not think the ideas advanced by the hon. member for Lethbridge are relevant at all. I do not believe in imposing some superstructure on the world as an aftermath of this war. We must have an organization similar to the League of Nations as a means of ironing out our difficulties. But you must have honest men and women in this organization who will stand up and fight for the proper principles. That was not done in the last war. I can remember the discussions that took place on the Versailles treaty. Some of us who were fairly young at that time knew that we were merely laying the basis for another war. The job should have been completed. Foch should have been listened to. He warned the people who were signing the Versailles treaty that they were merely signing an armistice and making it necessary to do the job over again within twenty-five years. He was ready and willing to complete the job, and it should have been completed. But the soldiers won the war and the politicians stole the peace. They manipulated things and brought about the situation we are in to-day.

When the peace is being written this time, many of the men who are actually in the field and have experienced the horrors of war should be given the privilege of sitting around the conference table and having something to say about the machinery that will be provided as an aftermath of this war. I did not get up to say these things, but the discussion which took place previously provoked me into saying what I have said. I could not help making these remarks with respect to the League of Nations. I never had any doubt as to whether it was the right machinery. If it had been made to work, we would not be at war to-day. I know why we are at war to-day. Canada was blindly led by people in whom she had confidence. It has always been my opinion that Canada blindly followed Great Britain's lead and we eventually landed in the position we are in to-day. Chamberlain, Hoare and others will have to give an account of their stewardship before the bar of justice of the future. They will be indicted for creating the situation in which we find ourselves to-day.

If Churchill had had anything to say about what was done in Great Britain in the ten years before the war, we would not be in the situation we are in to-day. He tried constantly to warn them of what was taking place. We all know why the strength of Hitler was built up. There is no mystery about it. We know why British and French money was provided. They feared social change more than they feared Hitler. They feared Russia as being the vanguard of social change. They wanted a strong Hitler in Europe to offset any efforts to bring about social change. That is why the machinery to avoid war in the future broke down. I think it is the duty of the government and of those who represent the people, of those who have access to this information, to bring these facts before the public from time to time so that there may not be repetition in the future of what we are going through to-day.

I do not think the time is opportune to discuss foreign policy. The policy of the government to-day should be to make every effort to win the war. The discussion of just how we are going to do business with our neighbours in the future should be left until the picture is clearer than it is at the present time, until we know just what kind of world we are going to be living in.

I should like to say a few words about a matter in connection with which I think Canada should do something at this time. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised a question on Friday evening which seemed to not be very popular. He asked that some assistance be given to the Jewish people. This is a matter about which the government should make some pronouncement. To hear some people talk you would think the Jews represented seventy-five per cent of the world's population, when the fact is that there are probably less than 10,000,000 Jews in the world. About 7,500,000 of these are in nazi-occupied Europe. I do not want to elaborate on some of the things said by the hon. member, but we must not forget that Hitler has a policy of complete extermination of these people before the end of the year. I am not interested in them as a race, but we are all human, and I try to place myself in the position of one of these people who are in nazi-occupied Europe. They go through the same suffering that you would if you were starving or waiting for a firing squad, if you were placed in a box-car and shipped away among the dead, if you were faced by all the horrors described by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If there is something we can do about it, we should do it. I am very critical of everything that has been done so far. The Bermuda conference which was called to discuss the question of refugees from occupied countries did absolutely nothing about the question. I have read a little about the conference. Delegates of the different countries came there with fixed policies from their governments, and it was merely a matter of doing nothing. There is no policy to-day on that question. One thing which Canada could do is to make representations to the British government. There is available in Palestine a ready and convenient sanctuary for a considerable number of Jews. Palestine is an example of 1914-18 promises which were not lived up to by the British government. Everybody in this house knows about the Balfour declaration issued on December 2, 1917, whereby Palestine was to be made a homeland for the Jewish people. They were to be given their roots in the soil of some country so that they could take on the status of a nation and be represented in the future world on that basis. That declaration has been partly put into effect, but what concerns me is that, according to a white paper issued by the British colonial office within the last six weeks, Jewish immigration to Palestine for this year is cut down to a greater extent than it has been in the past, and for next year, 1944, it is eliminated completely.

The Jews as a people are making a contribution in this war. They are serving in the allied armies at the present time in North Africa and wherever the war is being carried on. Some 30,000 Jewish soldiers are fighting in the allied forces. In relation to the number of Jewish people throughout the world and their meagre opportunities of participation, they are making their contribution, and there is no reason in the world why the Balfour declaration should not be carried out. Remember that it was backed up by the United States. I have here a declaration passed by the 77th congress, bearing the signatures of practically all the United States senators and members of the House of Representatives, entitled "A common purpose of civilized mankind". It deals specifically with the question of Palestine. I am not concerned about Palestine as a homeland of the Jewish people; that is something which will have to be decided by themselves and the British government. What I am concerned about is that Palestine offers a sanctuary for thousands of Jewish people who might make their way out of nazi-occupied Europe if they had anywhere to go. The action of the British government has closed to them a door which was opened by their own people. They are not able to go there. I cannot understand how any member of a government or any member of parliament can stand up and make the declarations that are made about serving humanity, about the better world which is to come when all this destruction and misery have ceased, and yet preclude the possibility of enabling the Jewish people who are being persecuted in nazi-occupied Europe to pass through the door which their friends in Palestine have opened to them. Canada has said nothing on this matter, and she has the right to say something. I feel we have the right to protest this action on the part of the British government. They have no right to close that door to Palestine when the Jewish people are willing to open it and to accept full responsibility now and in the future for those who may be able to escape from nazi-occupied Europe.

In the next place, entrance to neutral countries to which these people might be able to escape is practically closed. The great democracies who are engaged in the war have undetraken to liberate all the peoples of Europe some time in the future, but neither they nor ourselves have ever said that they were prepared to help to pay the bill of refugees who might be able to escape to those neutral countries. The action of the united nations regarding the Jewish people can only be described as hypocritical. I do not know how any man or any woman can presume to stand up in this chamber and make promises to those who may happen to come through this war, while they will not lift a finger to provide a sanctuary for thousands of people who could probably get away from nazi-occupied countries if they could be maintained in Switzerland and other neutral states. We should be prepared to bear our proportion of the cost of maintenance of these people and some reasonable disposition to provide for their welfare after the war. It is not a matter of leaving the neutral countries to handle the job alone.

The other evening, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was speaking on this question, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) got up and tried to give it a political significance. So far as I am concerned the human race is one family. Where you were born, what is your religion, or your nationality, or the colour of your skin, is an accident of birth; you are not responsible for it. Unless we break down this idea of merely regarding as Canadians those who were born in Canada, I can see very little hope for the future of the world on the basis of the promises which are now being made concerning post-war policies. I think we could start doing something now. I have many documents here. I am not going to read them; I do not believe in quoting too much, but they contain the assurance by people who know what they are talking about that if the doors into Palestine were opened, thousands of Jewish people could make their way there and find a sanctuary.

To my mind the handling of this question by the united nations as a whole will stand out as one of the strongest indictments against us. We have not lifted a finger to save thousands and thousands of lives. We say that when the war is over Hitler will be brought to task and made to pay for his atrocities against the persecuted peoples of Europe. That is all very well as regards the nations who are recognized as such, who will have their representatives at the conference table to present their case for them. But that is not the position of the Jews, and no other class of people in Europe have suffered such severe persecution. Where Hitler has been able to enter and dominate they have lost all their worldy goods; their families have been destroyed or scattered, and they have suffered most inhuman treatment. But they will not be sitting around the conference table; and if the attitude of the united nations now towards rescuing them while there is still a chance of rescue is to dominate at the conference table, we do not mean anything when we say that the atrocities for which the Germans and the Italians are responsible will have to be paid for. We can do something about it. But we have never even lifted a finger.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says we have not lifted a finger. Does he attach no importance whatever to all the Canadian army, navy and air forces are doing in this war to try to alleviate the situation in Europe, and in particular, the terrible position of those very people of whom he is speaking? How can he say that this country has not lifted a finger? I made very clear in the statement I put forward the other day that the difficulty of obtaining passage on ships to bring people to this side was one of the reasons why some of the refugees who have escaped could not be brought here, but I have made it equally clear that where it was possible to have them brought over, Canada was prepared to receive them.

Mr. GILLIS: The Prime Minister and myself are talking about two different things. I am referring now particularly to the possibilities of saving thousands and thousands of Jewish lives in nazi-occupied Europe. I recognize what we are doing to liberate the whole continent of Europe, but the Jewish people face a different situation altogether. We may be able to liberate to some extent the French and the Belgians. They will be able to take part in the fight. But the Jewish people have been driven into Poland, largely into ghettos, without any chance to fight for themselves, and if our attitude prevails they will not be there when the liberation takes place, because they are being systematically exterminated day by day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How can we possibly get into Germany to liberate them or to prevent them from being put into ghettos? The one hope for them is that our military action along with that of other allied nations may help to make possible their speedy release, but until that time comes what can we do for persons who are now in Germany or enemy occupied countries?

Mr. GILLIS: I am not asking the government to get into Europe in order to do this. I am asking the Canadian government to protest to the British government against their action in closing the doors of Palestine to Jewish refugees who may escape from nazi-occupied Europe. I said that I would ask the government to do only some of the things I think we can do, and I suggest that we can make that protest. If thousands of refugees who are escaping had the right to go into Palestine, they could be taken care of in that way. The action of the British government in closing that door, restricting immigration this year to 29,000 and next year completely cutting it off, is something we can protest against.

Mr. GRAYDON: How long ago was it that the British government made that decision to close Palestine?

Mr. GILLIS: Within the last six weeks. It is a white paper issued by the colonial office. That is one thing I should like to see done. Second, I think the neutral countries that are closed would get thousands of these people if those countries had some assurance that the United States or Canada or some other country could be provided as a sanctuary for them if they could be transported or that we would assist neutral countries in helping to feed them. I cannot forget the fact the Prime Minister mentions ships and railways and all these difficulties. All I ask is that the Canadian government indicate what they are prepared to do by way of helping these people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will see that I made a definite statement in that regard.

Mr. MARTIN: Read page 4560 of Hansard.

Mr. GILLIS: A large number of Jewish people did get hold of a ship themselves last year and sailed with hundreds of women and children from port to port, but they were refused entry until the ship finally broke up off the coast of Norway somewhere. What I have suggested are things that we can do. Canada has a right to speak in these matters and to protest against the closing of Palestine, not taking sides as to whether Zionism is right or wrong; but I submit that that door should be opened and as many people allowed in as possible if they can escape. They are penned in and have nowhere to go. We could say that we are willing to take them, provided they can get here; that we would see that they were looked after and that some final disposition could be made after the war of the question of their home status.

Mr. GRAYDON: What was the reason given by the British government for closing Palestine? I am only seeking information to enlighten myself on that point.

Mr. GILLIS: No reason has been given that I know of, apart from the fact that they have a mandate over Palestine and have the right to decide about immigration. My opinion is that it is a case of the old appeasement policy, appeasing the Arabs, and failing to face a realistic situation on a humanitarian basis.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was it debated in the British House of Commons?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to the hon. member that the immigration policy is still governed by the terms of the white paper which was issued in 1939. The recent statement of policy referred to was an announcement some weeks ago that the 1935 white paper policy remained in force and would not be reopened at this moment.

Mr. GILLIS: That is true, but that 1939 paper definitely sets out that at the end of 1943 there shall be no more immigration into Palestine, and immigration is badly restricted this year. It reiterates the previous policy and closes the door at the end of 1944.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is not a new policy to which the hon. member has referred—the announcement of six weeks ago?

Mr. GILLIS: It was a paper that was issued reiterating the previous policy on account of representations made to open the door. Their answer was a reiteration of that previous policy which closes it in 1944.

Mr. GRAYDON: There has not been any change in policy. This is a confirmation of an old policy?

Mr. GILLIS: Not since 1939.

Mr. GRAYDON: The only thing I am concerned about is that it did seem to me that in the last day or so the Jewish people have had a lot of champions. I wanted to bring that to the attention of the committee.

Mr. GILLIS: I will give the hon. member a file that goes back to 1939. It is not to-day that I became interested.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To supplement what I have said to my hon. friend, the 1939 document laid down an annual immigration quota for each year up to 1944 and the United Kingdom is advancing some visas, normally valid in 1944, to help some of these refugees this year.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): As the Prime Minister knows, the people of British Columbia are keenly interested in the government's foreign policy, particularly in so far as it refers to the Japanese evacuees. In fact, the feeling has been so tense that it was made clear to the government that it may anticipate trouble should there be any attempt at the end of the war to return the evacuees to the Pacific coast. However, the door has been closed, partly at any rate, in this direction by reason of the fact that the custodian of enemy property has sold to the veterans' land board some 760 odd parcels of agricultural land formerly occupied by Japanese, so that the question arises, where does the government intend to place the evacuees at the close of the war? In my district of Kootenay West there are 8,000 of them, and their attitude is apparently tranquil enough at present. But the time will come when the attention of the allies is directed exclusively to Japan, and it may be that the spirit of loyalty may prompt these evacuees to change their attitude, which would be particularly dangerous if directed to the railroads and power plants, because many of them are in that vicinity. I would ask the Prime Minister, before these estimates are passed, to tell us just what the government's foreign policy is toward these evacuees; for instance, what it is towards the 10,000 nationals? Is it the intention to return them to Japan or to have them remain in Canada? What would be the government's policy toward the 7,000 naturalized Japanese and toward the 6,000 Canadian-born Japanese? As to these naturalized Japanese, of course that is optional with the government, because they can cancel naturalization if the situation warrants it. As to the Canadian-born Japanese it seems to me that their citizenship should be respected. That is the question I should like the Prime Minister to make clear before we pass upon these estimates. We are keenly interested in knowing whether we are to have eight thousand Japanese permanently located in the interior of British Columbia.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of entering into a discussion of Canada's general foreign policy. I wish to confine my remarks to one particular phase of that policy and to something which I think Canada can do, and certainly it is a phase of our foreign policy to which Canada should give some consideration at the present time.

As one who has spent just about half his lifetime in Canada and the other half in that small sister dominion which has recently given up its dominion status, the little island of Newfoundland, I am anxious to know what consideration is being given at the present time to the relationship that is to exist between Canada and Newfoundland when the war ends. This is opportune to the subject of discussion at the present time and one of considerable importance to Canada.

If hon. members will for a moment visualize the geographical position and the strategic position which Newfoundland holds in the lower St. Lawrence, I think they will fully realize the importance of that island to Canada. We have only to think for a moment of how difficult it would be to defend Canada and this continent if to-day an enemy were in possession of that island. Situated as she is in the mouth of the St. Lawrence, the country that dominates Newfoundland is in a position to sail up the St. Lawrence and destroy Canada's lifeline of trade with Britain and Europe. There is an importance there that has not been recognized in the past.

We have been content to depend for our security upon the British navy, and upon the Monroe doctrine to a considerable extent, until this war came. But now that Canada considers herself a nation and is certainly in a position where she must assume some responsibility for her own defence in the future, and with the growing importance of submarines and air power, the strategic position of that island becomes important for Canada's defence. That importance is recognized, as every hon. member knows, by Great Britain and by the United States of America as well as by Canada. To-day it forms a vital line in North America's defence. There has taken place the peaceful invasion of the island by Canadian, American and British members of the armed forces. A writer in the Yale Review for the spring of 1943 likens the island at present to a huge anchored aircraft carrier, combined with a great natural dry dock moored to the ocean floor. That importance I need not emphasize or dwell upon.

History before now has demonstrated the strategic importance of Newfoundland to the country that held it. I think historians are agreed that probably one of the mistakes that the French made when they sought to maintain occupation of this continent was that in their interest in the fur trade they failed completely to recognize the importance of that island set squarely across the entrance to the St. Lawrence. It was not until 1662 that the French realized it would be important to them in holding Canada and North America to secure possession of that island. By that time it was too late. Great Britain had established her power on that island. Historians agree that when the French lost possession of the peninsula of Avalon that was the first step in the downfall of the French power on this continent. England's possession of that little island gave her the use of its harbours and a decided advantage over the French in the wars that followed between England and France. I need not emphasize the importance of that island to Great Britain at the time of the American revolution and the American invasion of Canada. The fact that that island was then a British possession, that British ships crossing the Atlantic could find shelter there and from there proceed up the St. Lawrence to the relief of those who were holding Quebec was a vital factor in the results that followed that invasion.

I should like for a moment to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in 1776, when Quebec was the last fortified position in British possession, when the garrison at Quebec numbered very little more than one hundred men, the presence of two schooner-loads of soldiers from Newfoundland, to the number of, I believe, 130, has generally been recognized to have been of considerable help to that little garrison on that night of January 1, 1776. I am glad to know that years later, in 1846, when the one city in that island, St. John's, was half destroyed by fire, Canada was the first to come to the assistance of its people. I well remember as a boy in the public schools many years after that learning of the gratitude of the people of Newfoundland for the assistance which had come first of all from Canada on that occasion when Newfoundland needed help. The point I wish to call to the attention of the committee is that history has shown in the past that the country which held this part of North America found it extremely important to be in possession of that outpost of the St. Lawrence, that little island which is known to-day as the watchdog of the St. Lawrence.

I am anxious to learn from the Prime Minister whether any consideration is being given at the present time to the question of the union of that island with the Dominion of Canada. I am satisfied that the future fortune of that island lies in common with Canada's future. I am anxious to see steps initiated by the Canadian government with that end in view. I have said that the time is now opportune. Hon. members will recall that back in 1933 when that little island found more than one-third of its revenue going to the payment of externally held debts they realized it was utterly impossible, on account of the loss of their markets for fish, to carry on, and they voluntarily relinquished responsible government which they had enjoyed for nearly one hundred years. I believe they are the only example of any part of the British empire, which possessed dominion status under the statute of Westminster, voluntarily relinquishing that dominion status. They were forced to do so by economic pressure. To-day there is a growing discontent with the government by commission. There are strong interests in the island at work looking toward the restoration of responsible government when the war ends. So far as the status of the island is concerned, some change will undoubtedly have to be faced. That in itself offers an opportunity for reopening the old question of union with the Dominion of Canada. There has grown up in the island during the past two or three years, as a result of the seeds of social changes which have been planted there by the presence of Canadian and American members of the armed forces, a feeling that the economic well-being and the strategic needs of that island require some kind of union with either Canada or the United States. As I say, that feeling has grown.

From all the information I can gather I believe the people of Newfoundland have come to recognize the fact that their future economic well-being lies along the road of some form of union with either Canada or the United States. Their history, first as an isolated colony and then as an isolated dominion, has been a very unhappy one. There are probably few parts of the civilized world to-day where the common people have suffered as much from exploitation as the inhabitants of Newfoundland have suffered during the periods that have passed. There are many who know the island well who fear for some reason the importance of United States influence there at the present time. The inpouring of United States dollars which has taken place during the war, the first-hand observation of United States standards of living, are all having a significant appeal to the people of that island, the people who lived through a depression when 25 per cent of the population was living on a dole of 6 cents a day. One cannot wonder that the presence of United States money and the knowledge of United States standards of living are making a significant appeal to some of the people.

There are also factors growing out of the past which give the people of that little island some reason to be a little suspicious of union with Canada, and I am confident that such a union as I have suggested will not be achieved without difficulty. It will require far-sighted statesmanship to bring about such an objective; it will require statesmen who are fully appreciative of the importance to Canada of this union, important from the point of view of the defence of this country in the future. It will depend upon the readiness of these statesmen to accord generous terms to the people of that island in order to effect such a union.

Mr. GRAHAM: May I inquire from the hon. member the population of Newfoundland?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The population at the present time is somewhere around three hundred thousand.

Mr. GRAHAM: Homogeneous population?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I would say that the inhabitants of the island are all of British descent. There has been no immigration from Europe. Up until twenty-five years ago the memory of what happened in 1895 when representatives from Newfoundland, anxious to bring about union, failed in their negotiations and when I think the whole question turned on the payment of somewhere around one million dollars by the Canadian parliament, has caused considerable opposition to union with Canada. That has been developed in the country over the years; but there are many factors that will facilitate the work of any Canadian government that will to-day undertake negotiations with that end in view. In the first place we can rely on the loyalty of the people of that island to Great Britain. I need not emphasize that loyalty; I think it has been demonstrated in every war in which England has been engaged within recent times.

The Canadian government took what is generally considered a commendable step in their appointment of the present high commissioner to Newfoundland, Mr. Charles J. Burchell. The people from the island to whom I have spoken use the highest terms of commendation in referring to the good work he has done. The fact that the people there can deal with the Canadian government through a high commissioner instead of dealing through a branch of the colonial office, as the United States government has required them to do, has raised the prestige of the Canadian government in the minds of those people, and will assist greatly in any negotiations that may be undertaken.

May I close with an appeal to the government that they recognize the importance of that union to Canada. I am not thinking so much of the interests of Newfoundland itself. Having lived in both parts of the empire, and knowing both parts well, I am satisfied that the future success of that island lies in a union with Canada. I am satisfied that Newfoundland needs Canada, and also that Canada needs Newfoundland. I should like to emphasize the importance of beginning negotiations at once because, as soon as the war ends, questions connected with the withdrawal of Canadian airmen, soldiers and members of the Canadian navy, and the withdrawal of United States members of the armed forces, as well as the question as to the disposition to be made of the bases established by both Canadian and United States governments, will be matters which will have to be determined. I would suggest that steps be initiated now toward sounding out the possibility of making Newfoundland the youngest province of Canada, after the war, and the rounding out of the Dominion of Canada by the union of that island with us.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Chairman, I wish to add a few remarks to those I made last Friday evening, but before I do so may I pay tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I should like to call the attention of people outside the house, who perhaps do not realize what he is doing, that to sit as he did last Friday—not only to sit, but to listen and, I have no doubt, pay attention—through nine hours of debate in weather such as this is, to say the least, no mean feat of endurance. I do not know how he feels to-day, but I can say that I have often felt a lot more like speaking than I do now.

Mr. COLDWELL: And we have to keep our coats on, too.

Mr. JAQUES: Well, as long as we keep our shirts on, we shall be all right. So that I am sure hon. members will overlook any shortcomings in my manner of speaking.

All hon. members listened this morning with feelings of gratitude and thankfulness to the great news from Europe. I know no remarks of mine can add to what was said in the house. I do not feel, however, that happenings in Europe should cause any diminution in our efforts to do the best we can in the House of Commons on behalf of those who are doing the fighting. The allied nations are subjecting the gangsters to a continual bombardment of two-ton and four-ton block-busters, and meanwhile the racketeers seem to be subjecting the allies to a continuous bombardment of two-ton truth-busters.

May I call the attention of the committee to a letter published in the New York Times on May 9. It is headed "A Mission To Moscow", and the authors are John Dewey and Suzanne LaFollette who, respectively, were chairman and secretary of the international mission of inquiry into the Moscow trials. I shall not read the whole letter, on account of its length; I shall read the first and last paragraphs. It begins:

> The film "Mission to Moscow" is the first instance in our country of totalitarian propaganada for mass consumption—a propaganda which falsifies history through distortion, omission or pure invention of facts, and whose effect can only be to confuse the public in its thought and its loyalties.
> Even in a fictional film this method would be disturbing. It becomes alarming in a film presented as factual and documentary, and introducing living historical personalities. Our former ambassador to the Soviet Union, Joseph E. Davies, personally introduces this dramatization of his mission as the "truth" about Russia. And the representation of President Roosevelt talking to Mr. Davies of the film seems to suggest that it is at least semi-official.

That was the first paragraph. This is the last one:

> The film is anti-British, anti-congress, anti-democratic and anti-truth. It deepens that crisis in morals which is the fundamental issue in the modern world. . . . "Mission to Moscow" is a major defeat for the democratic cause. In putting out this picture the producers, far from rendering the patriotic service on which Mr. Davies compliments them, have assailed the very foundations of freedom. For truth and freedom are indivisible, as Hitler knew when he expounded his method of confusing public opinion through propaganda. The picture "Mission to Moscow" makes skilful use of the Hitler technique. To quote Matthew Low of the New Leader: "This kind of 'truth' is on the march, and God help us if nothing can stop it."

[Mr. Jaques.]

I do not wish to add any remarks. I did not see the film, and I do not intend to see it. But I ask this: How is it proposed to build the four freedoms on a foundation of falsehoods, when truth and liberty are indivisible? I think that is a fair question, but I shall leave others to answer it. It is written, as near as I can remember, "And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." Or, as I have just said, truth and freedom are indivisible. I would advise the examination by everybody of all propaganda, of all proposals for a new order, for a new world, if you like, from that point of view. Let everyone ask himself two questions. Is it the truth? If it is not, then it will make to destroy liberty. Does it propose to curtail liberty? If so, it is not the truth.

Some months ago I raised a question in this house in connection with our loyalty to the crown. This matter had been brought up in a speech by Mr. Sandwell who advised that the people of Canada would have to surrender their loyalty to the crown as individuals to an international control.

Mr. MARTIN: He never suggested that at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: He said that we might perhaps have to surrender some part of our sovereignty.

Mr. JAQUES: It would mean a diminution of our liberty as individuals, but I am not going to argue the point to-day. The press were flattering to me and to my colleague here. I should like to quote an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press, as follows:

> There should be no mystery about where Mr. Jaques got his ideas. He is a student of Major C. H. Douglas, the originator of Social Credit theory, and Major Douglas provided the lead his students and followers require in Jew-baiting. Major Douglas wrote his main work "Social Credit" in 1924, about the same time as Adolf Hitler was completing "Mein Kampf", and by curious coincidence, both these works bore the influence of an earlier work called "The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion."

That is a very good illustration of what I have said, that truth and liberty are indivisible. But to say that Major Douglas based his ideas upon those of Adolf Hitler is about as damnable a lie as it is possible to utter. Certainly it is a credit to the opposition of social credit. Major Douglas introduced his idea in New York, either late in 1918 or early in 1919, while Adolf Hitler was still a corporal in the imperial German army. I do not suppose "Mein Kampf", or the ideas expressed therein, had entered his head, but anything to destroy truth, and see if you can link up anti-semitism and fascism to social credit. Personally I do not care. It will not make any difference to me, but I warn the people to make sure whether these statements are true or false. If they are false, you can be sure that there is a purpose behind them.

I have been told by numerous people and it has been stated in the press that I had perpetrated the greatest waste of parliamentary time in parliamentary history. This was said merely because I had called the attention of the people to the fact that there is a movement which would surrender our loyalty to the crown, which is the symbol of our individual liberties, to international control. The editor of Saturday Night honoured me with a complete editorial about myself and this supposed waste of time, and then he devoted two pages to the idea. I notice the same thing in other papers of Canada. He was good enough to end up by saying:

> Mr. Jaques further distinguished himself a few days later by upholding, in (of all places) Miss Judith Robinson's News, the authenticity of the "Protocols of the Elders of Zion," that astounding fabrication which purports to record the proceedings of a conference of highly placed Jews held for the purpose of planning the destruction of Christian civilization. Presumably a mentality which can accept the A plus B theorem can accept anything.

That is very touching. The A plus B theorem I need hardly explain is the proof that there is a shortage of purchasing power. Evidently the editor of Saturday Night, Mr. Sandwell, does not believe in it, or at least he does not believe in it by inference. But unless he is stupid beyond belief he must believe in it. The only difference between him and me is that he is paid to say that he does not believe in it. I wonder how long he would remain as editor of Saturday Night were he to come out with a confession of faith in Douglas' A plus B theorem?

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the hon. member suggesting that he is not putting his views forward honestly?

Mr. JAQUES: I am suggesting what I have already stated; I think that should be enough. One more thing with regard to the "Protocols of the Elders of Zion." Here is another editorial, headed "Disgraceful," which goes on to say:

> The House of Commons has its own way of showing its detestation of intolerance of this kind, as witnessed by Mr. Coldwell's crushing retort to Mr. Jaques on April 19, page 2312 of Hansard. Mr. Coldwell's caustic reference to the infamous "Protocols" as the kind of reading with which Mr. Jacques nourishes his mind, floored the member for Wetaskiwin and kept him floored for the rest of the day.

Well, I am on my feet to-day, anyway; and I would say that if the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) has not read the "Protocols of Zion," he cannot know what he is talking about, and if he has read the "Protocols," he is in the same case as I am.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have read them. I do not believe them.

Mr. JAQUES: The difference between us is this—

Mr. MARTIN: You do not believe them?

Mr. JAQUES: —that the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is afraid to admit it; I am not.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not afraid to admit it. I simply do not believe the fables that are to be found in the "Protocols of Zion."

Mr. JAQUES: To prove that I am not afraid of the "Protocols," I have made a few quotations from them and intend to put them on Hansard, and I challenge any hon. member to rise and say that they are false. I have never said that I guarantee or that I endorse the authenticity of them. I have never said that So-and-so and So-and-so were the authors of the "Protocols of Zion." Those who feel libelled by the "Protocols" have the most obvious remedy in the world; all they have to do is to rise and denounce the policy of them, instead of denying the authorship. Here and now I say on behalf of Social Crediters the world over that we utterly repudiate and denounce the policies contained in the "Protocols of Zion." But when you come to read them, how can any reasonable man deny the truth of what is contained in them? Let me read this one:

> Gold always has been and always will be the irresistible power. Handled by expert hands it will always be the most useful lever for those who possess it, and the object of envy for those who do not. With gold we can buy the most rebellious consciences, can fix the rate of all values, the current price of all products, can subsidize all state loans, and therefore hold the states at our mercy.

We shall have occasion at a later date to refer to that. Does anyone care to deny that? Then here is another one.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just a minute; "Does anyone care to deny that?" I do not suppose anyone cares to deny that gold can be used for that purpose, but the point is that the "Protocols of Zion" state that a certain group of people are using it for that purpose and that they are a particular nation. That is the danger of the thing.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We have been discussing this department for quite a while, and I hope that in future speakers will keep within the orbit, which is a very wide one, of external affairs. I do not think the statement of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin can be said to be included in it.

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Chairman, we were assured by the Prime Minister that we would have the utmost latitude. I maintain that the matter under discussion is perfectly germane to this debate; more than that, that my honour and reputation have been impugned, and I wish to make my answer to these charges publicly in this house. I can assure the Chairman that I shall say nothing to shock anybody's sensibilities.

Here is another one:

> In our day the power which has replaced that of the rulers who were liberal is the power of gold.
> Thanks to the press we have got the gold in our hands, notwithstanding that we have had to gather it out of oceans of blood and tears.

And listen to this one:

> We shall create by all the secret methods open to us and with the aid of gold, which is all in our hands, a universal economic crisis whereby we shall throw upon the streets whole mobs of workers in all the countries.

At a later debate, Mr. Chairman, I shall prove that by no less an authority than the Right Hon. Winston Churchill.

Here is another:

> We shall surround our government with a whole world of economists.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have them now.

Mr. JAQUES:

> Around us there will be a whole constellation of bankers, and millionaires, because in substance everything will be settled by the question of figures.

And here is another one:

> Economic crises have been produced by us by no other means than the withdrawal of money from circulation. Capitals have stagnated, withdrawing money from states—

[Mr. Jaques.]

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not see how we can properly discuss the monetary system or money problems on this item. Again I repeat that although it is very wide in its scope—there is no doubt about that—if we want to make any headway at all, I think we should keep as closely as possible within the limits of the item.

Mr. JAQUES: I sympathize with your remarks, Mr. Chairman. May I say that to the uninitiated it does seem strange; but we are now discussing, I believe, world affairs and the future policies of world government, and to leave out of that discussion the question of financial control is surely to rob it of all reality.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was discussing certain financial considerations and you wondered whether I was in order. I hope that in my concluding remarks you will grant me sufficient latitude. I said that in any discussion on international affairs, or in any discussion on any future world order, to leave out the question of finance would be to rob the discussion of all reality. I quoted from the "Protocols of Zion" and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party interjected a remark. He said:

> I do not suppose anyone cares to deny that gold can be used for that purpose, but the point is that the "Protocols of Zion" state that a certain group of people are using it for that purpose and that they are a particular nation. That is the danger of the thing.

Can it be denied? It is not a question whether gold can be used, but the fact that gold is and has been used to the great disadvantage of the vast majority of people. As for the statement that a certain group of people are using gold, and that there is the danger, surely that cannot be denied.

Mr. COLDWELL: The protocol states that only a certain group of people are using it, which is not true. That is dangerous.

Mr. JAQUES: Dangerous to whom?

Mr. COLDWELL: Dangerous to the welfare of the community.

Mr. JAQUES: Which is the most dangerous threat to world liberty—

Mr. COLDWELL: By whom?

Mr. JAQUES: —the reestablishment of the gold standard or the accusation that it will be used and put into force by certain kinds of people? I have no use for and nobody can accuse me of stirring up any kind of race hatred. But when I consider what our troops are facing in Europe at this time, how can I run away from the issue when I am safely in Canada in this house? I say there has been a deliberate plot and a deliberate plan on behalf of the international financiers to reduce the world to a state of servitude, and I am not going to run away from that issue because somebody rises and says it is dangerous to say that because, if you do, you may injure the feelings, if you like, of the Jews. If their feelings are injured they have the remedy in their own hands. Let these international financiers, these, if you will, international Jewish financiers, declare to the world that they will have no more of this gold standard and that they repent of their sins in the past. But they do not do that. Instead of denouncing the policy of the "Protocols," they merely deny the authorship. I do not think it matters who is the author of these "Protocols." I am merely saying, whatever may be said for or against the authors of the "Protocols," that no one can deny that what is contained in them is a reflection of what is happening in the world to-day.

Mr. COLDWELL: Financiers are not all Jews.

Mr. JAQUES: I do not say they are all Jews. Murderers are not all Germans either.

The leader of the opposition made an interjection and asked me if I thought it possible that Mr. Sandwell would be—how did he put it?—guilty of not stating the truth for financial reasons. Let me deal with that in this way. I have asked the members of the press gallery on a number of occasions why it is that the members of this group get practically no publicity in the press.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member will get a lot of publicity in Goebbels' press to-morrow.

Mr. JAQUES: I will come to that in a moment if I have time. The members of the press gallery tell me this: We sell our stuff by the inch, and if we sent in ten inches of Cooperative Commonwealth Federation stuff—that is the technical name for their copy, I believe—we get paid for ten inches, but if we send in ten inches of your stuff we might get paid for only half an inch, and we cannot afford that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Relative values.

Mr. JAQUES: Possibly the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party thinks that represents the relative merits of the two parties. But I think the real reason is this, that what socialists say is quite welcome to the financial press and what we say is the very opposite. That is why we get no publicity in the press.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the hon. member's idea.

Mr. JAQUES: What other reason is there? When the press were dealing with certain remarks of Mr. Sandwell on the League of Nations they quoted the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Will anyone tell me what the policy of Saturday Night has in common with socialism except the common one of finance? Why is it? Talk is cheap enough, but facts count. I am speaking now as a farmer, and I am speaking mainly to farmers and small business men whom I represent. I should like to know what they have in common as a rule with the policy of such a paper as Saturday Night. Does it cater to the welfare of the farmers? Then I will ask this? Where was Saturday Night when wheat was twenty cents a bushel? Did Saturday Night denounce that? Not that I ever noticed.

The CHAIRMAN: The discussion seems to be wandering far afield. Surely we are not going to start a discussion of wheat all over again. I am going to apply the rules strictly, because I believe the committee desires to see these items go through.

Mr. JAQUES: Very well, Mr. Chairman, I will change the subject. Let me refer for a moment to the attempt to link up social credit with fascism. People have spoken in this house to-day demanding that all the Jews in Europe be rescued and brought to America. I am not saying anything against that policy. But I know this, that three years ago the communist party in this country issued an election manifesto. I have a copy of it on my desk now and I shall quote the last paragraph:

> Join in one common front against this most criminal war of human history. Strike a blow in this federal election to save Canada, to end the war, for peace.

I am not criticising that. This is a free country, thank heaven, and everybody has a right to express his opinion. But I would ask this: Was Hitler a fascist in 1940? Was there any persecution of the Jews in Germany in 1940, or is it only since Hitler invaded Russia that he has become a fascist, and that the Jews have been persecuted?

In 1940 I fought an election for total war against all parties. I say that actions speak louder than words. Talk is cheap, and to describe our group as fascists, Jew-haters or Jew-baiters, whichever you like, when we have proved in the past that we alone in this house stood for total war against fascism, fought an election on it and lost half of our members in so doing, is typical of the "truth-busters". In passing, may I say that those of us who were defeated in the election at once put on the king's uniform.

When I brought up the subject of the League of Nations the hon. member for Essex East retorted, what about T. E. Gregory? What about T. E. Gregory? He is an old friends of ours, and if anyone cares to take the trouble to look up his record in "Who's Who", he will find that up to 1942 T. E. Gregory was known as Theodore Emanuel Guggenheim Gregory, professor of economics at the London school of economics and economic adviser to the government of India. In the last few months we have heard a lot about the economic conditions of India and that they are a reflection of British imperialism. Well, you would hardly connect Theodore Guggenheim with British imperialism. But if you look in "Who's Who" you will find to-day that Theodore Guggenheim has become Sir Theodore Gregory, Knight. That sounds like British imperialism. I should like to quote from the writings of a distinguished soldier. I am referring to Major-General J. F. C. Fuller, author of many standard books on military strategy. This is what he says:

> The many battles in which we have been defeated were not lost in Norway, France, Greece, Crete, Malaya, Burma and Libya; for years back they were lost in our foreign office and in our treasury.
> Session after session, foreign minister after foreign minister, with the pickaxe of the League of Nations swinging over his shoulder, undercut the foundation of our national and imperial security, whilst chancellor of the exchequer after chancellor of the exchequer, with the poison gases of procrastination and prevarication, all but stifled efficiency in our fighting forces.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes. Shall the item carry?

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the indulgence of the committee for one minute.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. JAQUES: Major-General Fuller continues:

> Believe me or not—as you like—yet remember that for years my endeavours were ground to powder in the treasury mill. It is not our generals, admirals and air marshals who have failed you—you, the people of this great country—it is the governments you elected and the treasury system you not only tolerated but upheld.

The quotations I have given are justification for my stand. If I did less I should consider myself not worthy to be a member of this house or to represent the people who have sent me here.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. On May 20 I put two questions on the order paper. The first question was as follows:

1. Who is in charge of Latin American affairs in the Department of External Affairs?
2. Does he speak Spanish or Portuguese?
3. Has he in his office anyone who can speak Spanish or Portuguese fluently?
4. What is his salary?

The second question was:

1. How many members of the Department of External Affairs speak Spanish and/or Portuguese?
2. In making appointments to the Canadian legations in Latin American countries, were the positions advertised? If so, how many applicants were there?
3. Is there a Canadian legation in Mexico?
4. If so, who is in charge?
5. What is his salary?
6. Who are the members of his staff, and what salary or allowance are they paid?

I formulated these questions at the request of somebody in the Department of External Affairs, and I thought the Prime Minister would be able to answer them at this time; in fact, that is what I was given to understand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, this would seem to be a convenient opportunity to make a general statement on our relations with our neighbours in the Latin American countries.

There has been a natural and very marked growth of interest recently in our contacts with Latin America. Our newspapers, magazines and radio programmes all bear witness to this growth. So also does the increased enrolment in college classes in Spanish and Portuguese. Inquiries from commercial organizations and questions asked in this house reflect the same interest, and I shall be glad on this occasion to add a little to the information which has from time to time been given to the house.

May I say at the outset that it is gratifying to note that the growth of Canadian interest in the countries of Latin America is matched by a parallel development of interest in Canada on the part of our friends from south of the Rio Grande. We have been happy to welcome in recent months the foreign minister of Uruguay, the president of Bolivia, the former president of Colombia and a number of other distinguished visitors from Latin America. We were looking forward to a visit from the president of Chile which unfortunately has had to be postponed. In addition, Canada has welcomed groups of journalists from Argentina, Chile, Paraguay, Venezuela, Colombia, Brazil, Ecuador, Mexico, Bolivia and Cuba.

This growth of mutual interest is undoubtedly due in considerable measure to the fact that, with one exception, which we all hope will not long remain an exception, the nations of North and South America have come to a clear and formal recognition of the common danger in which we stand. The democratic and Christian ideals in which we have all been nurtured are menaced by enemies more dangerous than any aggressor in the history of western civilization. Under such circumstances it is right and natural that we should draw closer to those who are our friends and, in particular, to those who fight with us. But in addition to this immediate cause for the establishment of closer relations with our Latin American neighbours there is a growing realization that in the post-war era, as well as in the period of conflict, we shall have interests in common; that our joint contributions to the peace and welfare of the world as a whole can and must be based on a joint and effective interest in the welfare and peace of our own neighbourhood. It is thus a matter of significance, and a sound cause for satisfaction, that we have constantly increasing evidence of the growth of mutual knowledge, mutual respect and mutual good-will among the nations of this hemisphere.

It would perhaps be useful at this point to place on Hansard a factual record of the official contacts maintained by Canada in the Latin American countries. As hon. members are aware, we have established legations in Argentina, Brazil and Chile. In each of these countries the officer of the commercial intelligence service who previously acted as trade commissioner is now a member of the staff of the legation with the title of commercial attache. The legations are under the supervision of the Department of External Affairs and report to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Under the Department of Trade and Commerce the commercial intelligence service maintains trade commissioners in Cuba, Mexico, Panama—shortly to be moved to Colombia —and Peru. The responsibilities of the commercial attaches and trade commissioners in certain cases extend beyond the boundaries of the country in which they reside with the result that every country in Latin America is within the field of activity of a trade representative of the Canadian government.

Our official contacts with the governments I have mentioned have been reciprocated by the establishment of legations in Ottawa by the governments of Argentina, Brazil and Chile. In addition, there are in Canada consular representatives of Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Salvador, and Venezuela. Canada has no consulates in Latin America, our only offices of this kind at present being the newly-established consulate general in New York and consulates in St. Pierre and Miquelon, and Greenland. Consideration is being given to the establishment of additional consular offices but no decision has yet been taken.

Our legations in Brazil and Argentina were established in 1941. Our first minister accredited only to Chile was appointed in 1942. The government has been repeatedly urged by representatives of business organizations and others to extend our diplomatic representation in Latin America and we have received proposals looking towards the exchange of ministers from a number of other Latin American governments.

Much as we should like to accede to these proposals, we have found it necessary to move slowly. The major difficulty has been the problem of personnel. It is an ironic fact that the very time when it is particularly important that we should be well and widely represented in friendly foreign countries is the time when the pressure on Canadian man-power is greatest and when it is most difficult to spare from urgent forms of national service persons suitable for appointment to the posts of minister and to the subordinate offices in the proposed legations. It is almost impossible at present to provide any more of the senior officers of the permanent external service for appointment as ministers abroad. We have already reduced our establishment of trained senior personnel in Ottawa and in our present legations and high commissioners' offices to the point where those who are left are carrying a burden so heavy that we cannot add to it by further withdrawals without creating more problems than we solve. Most of those outside the service with the kind of qualifications required by persons apointed to diplomatic posts are already so deeply engaged in activities in close connection with the national war effort, that they cannot justly be urged to undertake appointments abroad. Nothing would be more unsatisfactory or more likely to arouse just and severe condemnation among our people at home than to send incompetent or unsuitable persons as the diplomatic representatives of Canada in foreign countries.

The same problem exists in great measure with respect to the secretarial posts in our legations. The Department of External Affairs grew slowly for many years and the necessity for economy during the thirties precluded the enlistment and training of as many young men as should otherwise have been enrolled. Now that the necessity of expansion has arisen we find that even by spreading our trained officers very thinly over the field, we cannot cover all the ground that should be occupied. Here again the problems of recruitment have been seriously complicated at the very time when good candidates for the service are most required. A very large proportion of the best young manhood of this country is in the armed forces and selective service rules made it almost impossible —and I do not criticize the regulations—to accept applications from others who are physically fit. Moreover, if we were to fill the service now with young men who had not enlisted to fight for their country those who have joined the army or navy or air force would find their entrance to and advancement in the external service blocked or impeded by the appointments made during their absence on active service. This would be manifestly unfair.

Faced with this problem the civil service commission has held only one examination for appointments to the post of third secretary in the Department of External Affairs in the last three years. That examination, held in 1941, was arranged particularly to fill the definite need arising from our increased contacts with Latin America. It was specifically designed for candidates with a knowledge of Spanish or Portuguese. There were 134 applicants for permission to write, thirty actually wrote and of these five qualified and were appointed to the external affairs service.

Apart from this small group, appointments to the service have been temporary war-time assignments. But even if we could get enough candidates and of the right quality for such appointments, it takes time to train the new officers and to enable them to obtain the experience that is so necessary for those who serve abroad.

These are some of the difficulties with which the service is faced and I admit that I do not see any easy or wholly satisfactory solution to it. It is a simple statement of fact that in external affairs, as in certain other branches of government, in business and in some professions, there are not now available in Canada enough men of the required training and experience to fill the posts that should be filled.

Nevertheless and in spite of the difficulties which I have described it has now become apparent that we cannot much longer delay a further extension of our diplomatic representation in Latin America. Mexico is a case particularly in point. I do not think we should longer delay the establishment of a legation in Mexico City, and I hope that provision for such an office will be included in supplementary estimates to be brought down later in the session. Similarly I hope to be able to announce an agreement to open legations in Cuba and Peru. In some way the difficulty of finding personnel will have to be overcome.

Before concluding my discussion of this problem, may I suggest that hon. members who are interested in the problems to which I have briefly referred may find it interesting and useful to examine the recent British white paper on the reorganization of the foreign service of the United Kingdom. Many of the problems with which we are faced here are similar to those for which Mr. Eden and his associates have tried to find solutions. I am not sure that there is any solution that is really satisfactory during the war. But we shall continue our efforts and anything that members of the house can suggest which will assist us to meet our needs, both current and prospective, will be most gratefully received.

Before concluding my comments on this subject I should like to say just a word about one of the questions asked by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). The hon. member will see I have had him in mind right along. On May 5 he asked: "Who is in charge of Latin American affairs in the Department of External Affairs?" The Department of External Affairs is, of course, organized in such a way as to give certain officers definite duties in designated fields. In some cases these fields are based on geographic divisions; in others—questions of international law are an obvious example—they are defined according to subject classifications. The work of all the officers in the department, however, is subject to the review and decision of the under-secretary and ultimately of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Thus it cannot be said that any policy or official action of the department is the responsibility of any specified officer, nor can it properly be said that any officer is "in charge of" any particular field. Thus the only fair answer that could be given to the hon. member's question would be that the under-secretary is in charge of Latin American affairs, as he is of all other aspects of departmental activity and that he in turn is under the direction of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is finally responsible, subject, of course, to review by parliament for the conduct of our external relations. Under these circumstances I feel that it would be improper to name any individual or individuals in the department as being responsible for or in charge of any specific aspect of departmental activities.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Chairman, knowing Latin American people fairly well, and having a number of friends there, I know that one has to deal with them as they would deal with you. They are very courteous. If you go there they look after you, and give you the very best of times. I wonder whom we have here in Ottawa to look after the entertainment of delegates coming from south American or central American countries. Have we anyone who can speak Spanish or Portuguese? I ask that, because a dinner was given here in Ottawa some time ago—I do not know who gave it—but a number of people from South America who could not speak English attended. They simply sat at the table, unable to speak with anyone else. Is there anyone here who could act as host or hostess to such people when they come to Ottawa?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my hon. friend that if he had been in my position he would have known a good deal about the entertainment of some of the gentlemen who do not speak English or French any too freely. In the course of the last few months I have had both the privilege and the pleasure and, I was going to add, also the difficulty, of having to preside at several gatherings at which there have been many persons who were not in a position to speak English, while I unfortunately was not able to speak in other languages. But I am happy to say that through the good offices of different persons in the service, not exclusively in the Department of External Affairs, but through the different branches of the public service in Ottawa, it has been possible on most occasions to assemble together enough members of the public service conversant with other languages and so to place them at entertainments of the kind my hon. friend has mentioned, that the embarrassment caused by differences in language has been pretty much overcome.

From time to time visitors who must be met in the manner the hon. member has indicated come to this city. We seek to find some way of extending the expected courtesies. As the hon. member is aware, my friend and colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and members of his staff paid a lengthy visit to South America. He reported, just as the hon. member for Peterborough West has to the house, on how very courteous everyone had been, how generous in their entertainment. Since his return he has felt a certain responsibility to look after distinguished persons coming here from South America and to facilitate their business and entertainment during their stay here, and also to see that they might profit from it. It is a difficult problem.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I realize that. That is why I brought it up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend for doing so. I fear that of the many matters with which the Department of External Affairs has to do, probably the most difficult for some people in our country to understand is this matter of social entertainment of foreigners. There are many people who feel that public money should not be used for this purpose. Unfortunately the Minister of Finance has made it so that very few to-day can do very much in the way of entertaining foreigners after the manner in which they entertain us. However, I believe that this country will have to get accustomed to seeing us do in Canada as is done by us in other countries and have some special provision made for and care taken in entertaining members of administrations and distinguished persons coming from foreign countries. I thank my hon. friend for bringing this matter to the attention of the house in the way he has.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would it be possible to send some of the men in the department here to South America or Central America, so that they may become accustomed to the habits of the people there and then when people come up here they will know what they will expect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have been doing that to a limited extent. Our staffs are interchangeable and we have had some members of our service spend some time in South America. At the present time we have three ministers in South America, and each has a staff. They make a particular point of keeping us advised of persons who are likely to come here and they also assist in making arrangements for their travel and entertainment.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Do they speak Spanish or Portuguese?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One or two do, and they have secretaries who are of assistance to them. The situation with regard to our legations is quite similar to that of some of the foreign ministers who are resident in the city here. As my hon. friend knows, legations have been added recently, and in one or two cases they have been staffed in part by members who thus far have not acquired the use of the English language. But it is remarkable how rapidly they are acquiring it and how well matters have been so arranged as to avoid embarrassment on the score of language. I have just been reminded that our minister in Brazil, Mr. Desy, speaks Portuguese, and that our minister in Chile, Mr. Chipman, speaks Spanish. That is a good beginning.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): After the war is over, we shall have to look to Central America and South America for trade. If we build up friendly relations now, we will get that trade. As the Prime Minister knows, if you want to sell a bill of goods in South America you cannot do it in five or ten minutes like you might here; it may take a month or more.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree entirely with my hon. friend, and I can assure him that that is one of the purposes of our having opened these legations in South America. We desire to encourage a friendly feeling. We must do all we possibly can to train our men to become as well qualified as is possible to fill these posts in foreign countries.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Do the men just stay in Chile or Brazil or Argentina, as the case may be, or do they move about to visit Paraguay, Uruguay, Colombia, and the other countries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Our ministers have visited other parts of South America from time to time. As situations or occasions arise which are of special interest, they make it a point to visit other parts. I have in mind, by way of example, the fact that in a few weeks' time there is to be a gathering of members of the legal profession in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. I believe our minister to Chile, is to address that gathering. As my hon. friend knows, he is an eminent member of the legal profession. It is also being arranged that others from Canada will visit Rio de Janeiro at the same time, and in one or two cases they will, I believe, be able to address the meeting in Spanish or Portuguese.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is any special encouragement being given to the younger men in the Department of External Affairs to take up Spanish or Portuguese, or are any special facilities provided for the study of these languages?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are giving all the encouragement we can to the younger men, but, as I have said, most of the young men have been drafted into the armed forces. There has not been the opportunity to get into the service the number of young men we would like. Those who are in the service now are working for all they are worth and do not have much time for extra study. However, such opportuinties as can be afforded are being arranged.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would it not be wise to establish scholarships in Spanish for that purpose? We could bring men along to go into the foreign service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a large question, and I would wish to consider pretty carefully as to how it might be viewed by the different provinces, to have the dominion government begin to award scholarships. I see no reason why some arrangements could not be made with the universities to encourage students to take up these special languages.

Mr. GRAYDON: As long as the provinces are on the receiving end they will not worry very much.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Probably not. I agree that this is one of the avenues that should be explored.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked some questions on Friday last, as reported on page 4596 of Hansard, and I wonder if the Prime Minister could answer them at this time because the hon. member is unavoidably absent from the house to-night on important business: I quote as follows:

"Are members of the military or naval forces of the United States of America who are present in Canada with the consent of the government of Canada for purposes of military operations in connection with or related to the state of war now existing exempt from criminal proceedings prosecuted in Canadian criminal courts and, if so, to what extent and in what circumstances?"

The stand taken by the United States is that their troops in our country are not subject to the criminal law. There is, however, another matter which I think requires interpretation from the Minister for External Affairs, namely, in connection with a United States order that was issued on June 7, 1943. It is singularly of interest that this order should have been made, and I want to ask whether or not it applies to Canadians or British subjects who are employed by contractors in connection with work on the Alaska highway. I quote:

"Paragraph 1 of Northwest Service Command General Orders No. 23, dated June 7, 1943, subject: 'United States military jurisdiction over civilians in Northwest Service Command' is quoted for the information of all concerned:

'Regardless of citizenship, civilian employees of the United States government, or of contractors, working under and in physical proximity to the United States army, including those United States citizens in the above categories discharged from their employment who are awaiting transportation to the United States, are subject to military law and discipline under Article of War 2 (d)'."

Does that mean that Canadians who are working for contractors under or in proximity to the United States army in Canada are subject only to military law?

The hon. member points out that this question has been raised by civilians who find themselves in this category.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question asked by the hon. member was referred to the legal adviser of the Department of External Affairs and I have in my hand the reply which he has prepared.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asks:

Does that mean that Canadians who are working for contractors under or in proximity to the United States army in Canada are subject only to military law?

Canadians working for contractors under such circumstances are not subject only to military law.

As a matter of fact, the position taken by the Canadian government is that such persons, whether Canadians or not, are subject to Canadian law. In the United Kingdom persons in this position are ordinarily subject only to the United States military courts in criminal matters. The only exception is that persons who are not United States citizens do not come within the scope of the legislation unless they enter into their employment outside of the United States.

The position of contractors and their employees has not been referred to the supreme court for consideration. Some authorities take the view that persons who are subject to the military law of a visiting force are exempt from the local criminal jurisdiction, notwithstanding that they are not members of the force. This, however, is a view which has not received the support of the Canadian government.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think this item is one which provides an opportunity for me to seek some information from the Prime Minister with respect to the relationship of the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Department of External Affairs. As far as our present and prospective relations, diplomatic and commercial, with South America are concerned, it has been made abundantly clear during the debate that keen and increasing interest is shown by Canadians in the countries of Central and South America. I daresay that if the war should conclude within a reasonable time, more Canadians would be planning to visit south and central American republics than almost any other place in the world, so great is the interest in the southern portion of this continent. This of course should have its reflection in the policy pursued by the government. It has been rumoured from time to time that there may be some amalgamation or other change of relationship between the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is difficult for a layman to understand how two departments can operate hand in hand without very close relationship in respect of their personnel and the manner in which they carry on their business. Can the Prime Minister give the committee some information on this subject, particularly as it relates to the operations of the departments in the central and south American countries?

I should like to supplement this question with an inquiry whether there is in contemplation any overhaul of or extensive change with regard to, the Department of External Affairs. I notice with some interest that the jurisdiction of the parliamentary assistant to the president of the privy council, to judge from the terms of his appointment, does not cover the Department of External Affairs.

If there is to be an extension of relationships, as to both diplomacy and trade, with the central and south American republics and other nations, it would seem to me that the old structure of the Department of External Affairs, operating in one compartment, and the old structure of the Department of Trade and Commerce, operating in another, might properly be the subject of a complete overhaul to bring the two departments up to date to meet modern conditions and to prevent, in line with the Prime Minister's statement, a considerable strain upon the personnel of these two departments.

In making these remarks I am not casting any reflection on the personnel of the Department of External Affairs. I think the Prime Minister could clarify the attitude of the government and explain what it has in contemplation with respect to making these departments into a working whole, to the benefit and advancement of our relationships with the countries to which I have referred.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not in his seat at the moment, and I shall have to be a little careful of what I say about his department.

I believe, however, he will agree with me that it is most desirable that the two departments should work in the closest possible, not merely harmony, but relationship. But I do not think it would be desirable from the public point of view that the two departments should at any time be merged into one. It is true that each of them operates to a certain extent in similar areas, but there is a distinct difference between the field which has to do with the political side of public affairs in the large sense of the word, the relationship between the governments of different countries on a multitude of subjects, and that which has to do with distinctively commercial and business affairs.

Mr. GRAYDON: They are pretty closely related, nevertheless.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The commercial side is merely one phase of the work. Trade and commerce has been recognized since the time of confederation as being deserving of a separate department of government with a responsible minister, just as the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Mines and Resources might be. As a matter of fact, it would not be wise that the gentlemen in the capitals of the different states who have to do with diplomatic affairs generally should also be expected to look after the commercial interests of the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: I never heard that suggested seriously.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That they should? No, I thought not. But there are always along the way cases arising where the Department of Trade and Commerce would find it absolutely necessary, for the pursuit of its own business in a foreign country, to have very close relations with the representatives of the Department of External Affairs. I recall many years ago Canada had a business or commercial representative in Japan; I think he was Mr. Preston. He was a representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce in Japan. The then government of Japan would not receive him because he had not diplomatic standing. It was held by the government there, according to diplomatic practice, that the government itself could only be conferred with —if I may use that expression—by one who carried the status necessary to that purpose. The ramifications of the work of the Department of External Affairs are such that one finds so many matters which require the attention of that department that it would not be possible to join the two. I would say, however, that for some time the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of External Affairs have been conferring together to see to what extent it would be possible to make their relationships serve each other's purposes to a greater degree than they do at the present time, each to facilitate the other's work in as large a measure as possible.

My hon. friend has referred to the fact that there was an appointment of parliamentary assistant to the president of the council and not to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. May I take advantage of this moment to explain why, to put it in a direct way, I myself have retained the position of Minister of External Affairs while holding the office of Prime Minister at this time of war. I can assure hon. members, and my hon. friend in particular, that it has not been through any desire on my part to carry the extra portfolio. I would point out that in time of war nine-tenths of the Prime Minister's work is related to external affairs, and it would be making his task in some ways more difficult were he to try to assume the responsibility of the office of Prime Minister without being responsible as well for external affairs, when practically every decision of vital importance at this time, which has to be made by the Prime Minister, is one that is related to external affairs or would have to come as a recommendation from a minister of external affairs.

I am perhaps stating this in an exaggerated way, but it is impossible to separate the two at this time, and the more so in Canada for the reason that they have never been separated. The Department of External Affairs originated under Sir Wilfrid Laurier's administration, Sir Joseph Pope being the first deputy minister, and from that time to the present the two offices have been actually working together as one, so much so that the Prime Minister gets no appropriation from parliament and what he receives in the way of salary comes to him from external affairs. Matters of bookkeeping and many other things of the Prime Minister's office are managed by external affairs. The two have been carried on, on the business side, pretty much exclusively by the Department of External Affairs.

In not appointing an assistant to the Minister of External Affairs, I have not lost sight of the fact that I am in daily contact with my colleagues, and my colleagues, particularly those who are members of the war committee of the cabinet, are the ones immediately concerned with matters relating to external affairs, so that they are in a position to assist me, as in fact they do. They carry much of the responsibility that I have to assume in that particular position.

There have been placed under the war committee and under the cabinet as a whole, which is presided over by the president of the council, a number of new boards that have recently been appointed, such as the wartime information board. I mention that as one of the most prominent. It is not possible for any minister to keep track of the work of these different boards. There are different heads and chairmen of the boards, but I felt it was desirable to have someone who would be careful to exercise supervision over that aspect of the work, and for that and other reasons I thought it desirable to appoint a special parliamentary assistant to the president of the privy council.

I could enlarge upon what I have said, but I hope I have made clear to the committee that at this time it would be practically impossible to separate the two offices. I think they should be separated, and I hope I may have something to do with seeing that they are; but so long as the war continues I am afraid it will be necessary to keep them together.

I might point out this fact. Australia, as was mentioned by some hon. member, has established a department of external affairs. New Zealand has just done the same. The Prime Minister of New Zealand, Mr. Fraser, has recently telegraphed me that he himself will feel it necessary to hold the portfolio of minister of external affairs. I can understand that. Hon. members will appreciate the situation.

Mr. GRAYDON: I may supplement the question I asked by saying this. I think there is justifiable curiosity on the part of the public and of members of this house as to why the parliamentary assistant was given to the president of the privy council, because that did not seem to most of us to be the heavy end of the Prime Minister's department. He has mentioned the wartime information board, and I quite share with him the view that that in itself would not ease the burden that anyone would have to carry, as has perhaps been duly indicated by the discussions in the house. But in addition to that, it does seem to me that if a parliamentary assistant were needed, he was needed more perhaps in the Department of External Affairs than in the office of the president of the privy council, which seemed to be the very much lighter duty, and that prompted my inquiry in the first instance, because I have heard that suggestion made in several quarters since the appointment was made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope that neither the house nor the parliamentary assistant himself will attempt to construe his functions as so definitely limited that he does not go outside of what immediately comes under the president of the privy council. As my hon. friend knows, practically all government boards have to be kept more or less under review by the president of the council. There is not one of these boards that at this particular time is not concerned with some aspect of external relations. The war information board, for example might almost be described as carrying on a task more for the Minister of External Affairs than for the president of the council, because it is largely concerned with war information in other countries. It has a phase of work related to Canada, but a very large part of its work is the dissemination of information in regard to Canada's war effort in the United States, Britain, Australia and other countries. I might mention other boards having similar obligations. Nearly everything that has grown up in the period of the war relates in some way to external affairs, but the boards themselves come more immediately under the purview of the cabinet, and a part of the parliamentary assistant's duties, as he was told when he undertook the task, is to take on anything referred to him by the Prime Minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is a sort of roving commission, in other words.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is a very necessary person to have near at hand in times like the present, and may I say that he has been an exceedingly helpful and able assistant.

Mr. COLDWELL: I, too, was surprised that when the assistant to the Prime Minister was appointed he was not appointed as assistant to the ministry of external affairs, because it has always seemed to me that the foreign policy of this country required very careful attention by this parliament and that the Prime Minister was giving personal attention to matters about which the house and the country were not well informed. I have in mind the fact that Canada is a small country; yet Canada has played a very important role in this war; and there are many small countries playing important roles in the war, some of which are rather disturbed because they think the major powers, particularly the two English-speaking powers, tend to decide things without sufficient reference to the other members of the united nations and particularly the smaller powers.

Those of us who have attended various unofficial conferences in the last year, where we have met representatives of countries that might be regarded as small, have become painfully aware of that fact, and one of the interesting things to me has been that Canada is the small country to which they look as spokesman for the whole group of smaller nations. I think that is particularly true because we are English-speaking and many of the smaller countries do not speak the language we speak, while the two great powers, the United States and Great Britain, both speak that language.

Then, too, there have been certain disturbing events: our absence from some of the conferences; the fact that we have not been invited to some of the conferences; the fact that so much has been decided merely by conference between the Prime Minister of Great Britain, whom we all admire, and the great President of the United States. Nonetheless these two countries are only two of the major powers involved in this war. Ever since last autumn when North Africa was invaded—I said something about this the other afternoon—there has been a great deal of discussion of the situation in North Africa, and I want to ask the Prime Minister what our relation is, if any, to the French committee of national liberation. It has been recognized by some of the smaller nations, by Norway, Belgium and some other countries, as the spokesman for France. Yet undoubtedly there is a feeling abroad, and I am free to confess that I share that feeling, that far too much authority has been assumed by the state department of our powerful neighbour to the south. Indeed, in Great Britain, if you follow the British press carefully, you will read a number of articles developing that particular thought and expressing grave concern that if the same kind of policy that was apparent last autumn in North Africa is carried forward into Italy and is attempted also in France when it is liberated, there will be grave danger of discontent leading subsequently to an upheaval in Europe and perhaps even to another world war on different lines from the one in which we are now engaged. I should like to know what our policy is in relation to some of these important matters. What is our relationship, if any, to the French committee of liberation? What should be our attitude regarding the policy pursued by the state department of the United States in relation to the situation in North Africa? Are we as a parliament satisfied with that? Are we prepared to allow the same kind of policy, namely collaboration, not with Mussolini any more than with Petain, but collaboration nevertheless with people who were very close to the nazi-controlled regime in France or in other countries?

Even now there are suggestions that we might find in Italy persons who have been pretty close to Mussolini, but who are to-day not as close to him and who might head a new government in Italy. There is a good deal of discussion abroad as to what is going to happen in Europe if these near-quislings are to be recognized, and of whether instead we are to recognize the leaders who to-day are very largely underground but are conducting a great struggle against the nazi regime at the risk of their lives. I do not intend to enter into the relative merits of General Giraud and General de Gaulle, because they are together now on the French committee of national liberation and, superficially at least, that committee is functioning with both of them on it. I hope they will remain together. I hope the committee will function under the leadership of these two famous Frenchmen. At the same time I felt that I should ask the Prime Minister what consideration has been given to these problems, and what is the view of Canada in regard to the future of committees of this sort and of the desirability of collaboration with persons who to-day are either leading underground movements in Europe or the undesirability of choosing persons or committees from among the former friends of the regimes we hope to overthrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend mentioned that several small countries had given recognition to the national committee of liberation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Also Russia, I believe.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to say that he did not draw to the attention of the committee the fact that the larger powers, the United Kingdom and the United States, are not among the countries that thus far have recognized the national committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In like manner, thus far Canada has not given immediate recognition for reasons that I will make clear in a moment. We have welcomed every move that indicated that the forces under the control of General de Gaulle and those under General Giraud were drawing closer together and that these groups were coming to a common understanding on matters of important policy. We have felt that it would be unwise to take any steps which, if taken prematurely might be wrongly interpreted by one or the other of these groups. We believed that it would not be long before the position would be so clear that there would be no doubt at all as to the proper moment for recognition.

I might say that Mr. Dupuy, who has been counsellor to our legation to the governments in London from the occupied countries, has recently been in North Africa. The department asked him to go to North Africa and stay there for a time to size up the situation and give us the benefit of his immediate knowledge as well as his wide experience when we came to discuss the matter in a more final way. He is now in Canada.

The committee will have noticed that General Giraud will be here on Thursday of this week, and we have felt, knowing that General Giraud was coming to Canada, that we would wish to have a conversation with him about the situation before taking any steps.

We have had a representative in Ottawa, as my hon. friend knows, of the de Gaullists. We have been following the situation closely from both sides, and it will not, I think, be long before it will be perfectly eviden which is the right moment at which to give recognition to the French committee on national liberation. The government will take its action at that time.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I may ask a supplementary question, does the Prime Minister consider that it is in conformity with the policies of democratic countries—I will put it this way, of our own democratic country, which is the only one involved, that the French national committee of liberation should be virtually under the control of a United States general in the field? My information is, and I may say that it has come from British sources, that this has caused a great deal of misgivings in the underground movement in France itself, and I think one can understand that feeling. I should like to know the Prime Minister's view of that particular way of handing the French situation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would say to my hon. friend that this committee has two chairmen, each one of whom is a Frenchman, General Giraud and General de Gaulle, and I do not think I would be helping the situation at all by seeking to cast reflections on one or the other.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not mean that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the form in which my hon. friend's question is put makes it pretty difficult for me to answer it without doing that. I do not think he so intended.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Similarly my hon. friend asked me if I thought a certain policy of the United States state department was correct. I do not think it is for a member of the Canadian government to reflect on policies of the government of another country.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not intend to reflect on the state department of the United States, or on the fact that General Eisenhower practically had the right to approve this committee. I did not mean that. I believe that as one of the united nations we must frankly face, either here or in a closed session, some of the implications of this whole situation. I can see that we are going to be in the same situation as we were before the war when we had no independent policy, no policy of our own. I think that is true, and by following the line of least resistance we allowed our influence to be unused, when it could have been used in a more constructive way. I am anxious to see that we do not fall into that position again.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to follow the line of argument of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Because our present relations in North Africa are so delicate, I can see no useful purpose being served by discussing them in any great detail in the House of Commons.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the old story.

Mr. GRAYDON: That may be a good answer from my hon. friend's point of view, but I think the public generally will have some sympathy for the position I take. I refer now to his statement with respect to General Eisenhower's position in the North African theatre of war. I think everyone has to recognize that this is something more than a political matter; it is a military matter as well, and one which is fraught with all kinds of possibilities, particularly so at a time when we are beginning an offensive which has given us a foothold on European soil. I do feel at this time that no useful purpose can be served by discussing at this long distance the matters which were raised. In saying that, I do not desire to reflect in an unfriendly way upon my hon. friend.

I take it from the Prime Minister's remarks that our position as Canadians in the North African political situation is this: we are taking whatever steps are necessary in collaboration with the United States and Great Britain, and we are working in close harmony with them. I should be surprised to hear that that was not the situation. I should like to have assurance from the Prime Minister that the matter is being carefully and harmoniously worked out, having in mind with regard to both the military and the political situation the other great powers who are interested with us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend that right along, by that I mean ever since North Africa came into the picture, there has been the closest collaboration between our government and the British government and our government and the United States government with respect to all the questions that were likely to be of common concern; and certainly this one is foremost among the number.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, last Friday night at eleven o'clock the hon. member for Yale asked the Prime Minister if he intended to reply to the speech of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni before the item in committee is passed, or if he will make his speech on another item. The answer of the Prime Minister was as follows:

I have been making notes of the various points raised. I shall try to get them in order between now and the beginning of next week, and may endeavour to answer them all pretty much at the same time.

We appear to be drawing toward the close of this long drawn-out debate, and I was wondering if the Prime Minister would make any statement in answer to my hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was hoping I would feel sure enough of my ground after one day's discussion to take up, in concluding the discussion, the different points that had been raised, but up to this moment I have not been any too sure it is at an end. However, I had no intention of overlooking the questions which were asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and which were asked again this afternoon by the hon. member for Kootenay West. The question was as to what the government proposed to do with respect to the Japanese nationals in this country when the war was over, whether we would see that they returned to Japan. First of all I thank my hon. friend for the implied compliment that this government will be necessarily in office when the war is over and will have to do with post-war matters. I should like to oblige him at once by telling him what the government's policy at that time will be; but what I would say to him as to what the government's policy at that time will be will depend upon the times, as they may be, and upon what the situation may be at that moment. My hon. friend will realize we have to-day as one of our allies the United States of America; that in dealing with all matters relating to the Pacific our two countries have been keeping very closely in touch with each other. I should rather hestitate at this moment, without either the war being concluded or an opportunity of conference with governments of allies, to make a pronouncement upon war policies which affect the whole of the oriental situation. I do not think that I should be expected to do so or that it would be wise to do so. May I give a very clear reason as to why it would be unwise to make a pronouncement of the kind.

The hon. member for Kootenay West this afternoon said that if we reached the time where Japan saw that she was getting the better of the situation, some of the Japanese nationals in Canada might cause a good deal of trouble and we would have a good deal of difficulty with them. He said at the present time they were not causing any embarrassment. I cannot imagine that we are going to come to a time where Japan will be justified in assuming that she will have the last word in this war. I am pretty certain that she will not. However, take the present situation. At the present time, according to what the hon. member has said, the situation is quiescent, or at least there is no difficulty arising because of the Japanese in this country. But I ask the hon. member what the situation would be to-morrow if I were to make a pronouncement to-day which would be of the character that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would wish me to make. Does he think we would be able to handle the situation within Canada itself as well from now to the end of the war as we are able to do to-day, and as we have dealt with it thus far. I do not believe I can say more than that. When the time comes, if the government is in office we shall certainly have a policy that will be very clear; it will be a policy that will be the result of mature consideration with those that we believe should be consulted meanwhile, and it will be made known at the right time to the country.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the papers dealing with the international stabilization of currency will be dealt with at this time, or whether they should be dealt with when the estimates of the Minister of Finance are before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think stabilization of currency would come more appropriately under the heading of finance than under any other heading.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was a little bit surprised at the Prime Minister's answer to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni with respect to the policy relating to the Japanese situation. There is a feeling across Canada that this is a Canadian problem rather than a British Columbia problem alone. I am not desirous, as the Prime Minister knows, of raising questions that will embarrass the government in the handling of delicate problems, because I believe such a course is inexcusable at all times, but I believe that the Prime Minister ought to make it clear whether or not the policy of not declaring the government's intention with respect to the Japanese population in Canada is dictated from fear with respect to the internal situation of Canada in regard to the Japanese, or whether it is dictated by some influence it may have on the Japanese with respect to reprisals on the part of the Japanese empire. I do not want to press the Prime Minister unnecessarily on this point. I do not want to take upon myself the job of urging him to take a position that will in any way jeopardize our position as a nation or interfere with our security. But I do believe there is a strong and ever-growing body of public opinion in Canada that is asking the government to deal in some direct way with the Japanese problem which was raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I do not think the Prime Minister's answer to him will be received with the kind of approbation in Canada that a forthright statement of policies would bring from the people. I quite understand the Prime Minister will not agree with me when I say that this kind of statement has some elements of appeasement in it. I do not wish to convey that idea unnecessarily to him. Nevertheless there will be a great section in this country who will believe that it has many of the elements or factors of appeasement in it. I think in these times, if we as a nation cannot make a definite statement with respect to enemy populations within our gates, while a war is on, then it will be more difficult to persuade governments to take forthright steps when peace comes. As I say, I do not wish unnecessarily to press the point. Nevertheless I think the Prime Minister ought to know that there is quite a strong body of public opinion in Canada which feels that the government ought to make some forthright declaration on the point.

Mr. STIRLING: Before the Prime Minister answers, I should like to ask him whether he realizes the natural anxiety in the minds of those people in the southern part of British Columbia, where three-quarters of the Japanese removed from the protected area now are. They are in camps, in these empty towns which have been fitted up for them. They are in work camps in outlying places. People in the southern part of British Columbia, east of the protected area, now find themselves the recipients of 18,000 Japanese. They realize that the people in the protected area will not look with equanimity on the return of the Japanese to that part. They know that the agreements with the three provinces which have received Japanese contain a clause to the effect that the Japanese shall be removed. The people whom I represent see the danger of these Japanese being returned to that part of British Columbia where there are already 18,000 of them. I wonder if the Prime Minister realizes what I call the natural anxiety of those people, and whether he will consider making a statement which would tend to relieve that natural anxiety.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Answering the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) first. The government has already made it clear that it was appreciated that the bringing of a number of Japanese into these ghost towns, so-called, was naturally creating a situation which would not be regarded as pleasant or desirable if it were a continuing one, and that an effort would be made to see that that situation was relieved as early as possible. That was clear, and the government of course will hold to that. The arrangements made internally have been made to meet the existing emergent situation in the best and quickest possible way. They have never been intended as permanent arrangements, and certainly those communities most affected at the present time ought to be and, I believe will be, first considered when the time comes that it is possible to help relieve the situation.

Then, may I say to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that when he talks about appeasement I am afraid he is using a word in its application to the situation now existing between Japan and Canada the full significance of which he possibly has not appreciated. I assure my hon. friend this government has done nothing with any desire to appease the Japanese. But I ask him, and I ask his colleagues whether he or they believe a pronouncement on my part to-night which would indicate a vindictive attitude on the part of Canada toward Japanese nationals in this country would be welcomed by Canadians who are prisoners of war in Japan at this time. I ask him whether such a pronouncement would be welcomed by Canadian civilians who are now in Japan. It is very easy to proceed in a light-hearted way to condemn the government for not coming out and making this or that pronouncement, without so much as considering what the effect of such a pronouncement might be. It may be all very well to have one's mind on politics in British Columbia, but to forget the effect of politics in the whole of Canada, in a war-time situation such as we have at present is a serious matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the right hon. gentleman say that I had in mind politics in British Columbia?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I say that the mere mention of appeasement to-day is to use a word which is used for political purposes. It is not used for the public good.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a point of order. May I say to the Prime Minister that I felt in rising on this point that I was taking perhaps as reasonable a stand with the Prime Minister as one man could with another. So far as appeasement is concerned, may I say that I used the word with the feeling that there would be a section of the country who would regard it as an appeasement policy. And more than that, I think if my right hon. friend would recall my words he must admit that his reply was quite unwarranted. I had no thoughts in the matter, except that there are many people, in fact a great section of our people in Canada, who feel that some forthright declaration should be made by the Prime Minister. I asked the Prime Minister to reply, but I told him particularly that I was not urging or pressing him if indeed there was some question of public security involved. I thought I was being just as fair as anyone could possibly be under the circumstances.

I do not wish the Prime Minister to undertake to place insinuations on matters I discuss. I raised the matter, not with the thought of politics in British Columbia, or politics anywhere else across the whole Dominion of Canada. I do not wish the Prime Minister to insinuate unfairly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend that he knows as well as I the significance attaching in the public mind to the word "appeasement." He knows how the public view a charge of appeasement against a government in this time of war. And if he did not wish to be misunderstood he should have chosen his word more carefully. However, I am quite prepared to drop the matter there. I have made it clear, I think, first of all that there will be time enough to state what the government's post-war policy is when the war is won. I do not think the government should be expected at this time, when we are seeking to win a war, and have very close relationships with our allies in different parts of the world, to make pronouncements without even a conference with them, when the situation is one which might affect them as well as ourselves. We should not be called upon or be expected to make pronouncements of policy which have not been considered in relation to the time and the situation to which they will relate. That is only common sense in the business of government. I think the public will see the reasonableness of that position.

I do hope I have made it clear, as the committee well knows, that there are a number of our own Canadian soldiers to-day in prison camps in Japan. Also a number of our civilians are in that country. And I ask the committee whether in those circumstances hon. members believe it would be in the interest of Canada and in the interest of her men who have fought overseas and become prisoners of war, to make a pronouncement which might only serve to inflame the Japanese mind.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister's remarks partly answer the question I asked. If he will recall, I asked whether or not it was a question of an internal condition which prompted the government not to make a declaration, and whether there was any question of reprisals over there. If it is on the latter basis then, as the Prime Minister indicated, is that the only basis upon which the government is actually proceeding in connection with this line of policy?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have given two or three statements already. I said it is not on general grounds. I do not think a government that is governed by common sense would attempt to make pronouncements with respect to hypothetical situations. When we know what the situation is that we have to face, we will deal with it in the light of existing conditions.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would really do away with the question of post-war planning so far as the government is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no. It is one thing for a government to have definite plans in connection with certain matters, and it is another thing to make a pronouncement of policy with respect to unknown conditions.

Mr. GREEN: What progress has been made in the negotiations leading to a further exchange of Canadian and Japanese nationals? I understand that last year between forty and fifty Japanese were returned in exchange for Canadians. On two or three occasions during the present session a similar question has been placed on the order paper, and in each case the answer has been that negotiations are under way. I should like the Prime Minister to tell us the situation at the present time with regard to these negotiations. Would he tell us also the approximate number of Japanese nationals in Canada who have signified a wish to be exchanged during the war? I believe that quite a few have asked to be sent back, and it would be interesting to know the approximate number. A second question has to do with a statute passed in 1913 known as the Japanese Treaty Act, which really made Canada a party to a treaty between Great Britain and Japan. In one of the articles of the treaty there is a provision for termination on notice, after a certain lapse of time. I presume the fact that we are at war would cancel the agreement, but I do not know whether it would repeal the statute. There is certain British Columbia legislation which has been held to be ultra vires because of this dominion statute known as the Japanese Treaty Act. I should like to know if consideration has been given to having this act repealed. It would seem to me that that is a step which should be taken. Finally, now that we are at war with Japan, would it be possible to have the Lemieux agreement tabled in the house? As the Prime Minister knows, this agreement was negotiated with Japan in 1907 or 1908, and I think he personally had something to do with the negotiations. It has never been tabled and I am wondering whether there is any reason why it should not be now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to the exchange of nationals, I understand that a second ship is leaving Japan shortly, if it has not already done so. It will be bringing some Canadian nationals back to Canada and will be taking Japanese nationals back to Japan.

Mr. GREEN: How many are going back from Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say offhand. I am informed that the one ship is not only for Canada, but is also for the United States and certain South American countries. The second repatriation party is expected to leave this summer, returning Japanese from Canada, the United States and South America. That is the information I have and I cannot give more than that. As to the number who have applied, I would ask that this question stand and I shall try to get the information. In connection with treaties, war puts an end to them. I am not sufficient of a legal authority to say offhand whether the provisions of a statute which relates to these matters would simultaneously be regarded as coming to an end, but I shall endeavour to get definite information on that point. I certainly think in effect it would be at an end; if it is not, there would appear to be no reason why it should not be repealed.

Mr. GREEN: The difficulty is that it makes certain British Columbia legislation invalid.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend has raised the question and I shall have it looked into. I do not see any reason why the Lemieux agreement should not be tabled. I shall endeavour to get the particulars and have them tabled.

Mr. GRAYDON: Could we have the estimated number of Canadian nationals now in Japan? The Prime Minister may not have this information at the moment, but perhaps he would not mind getting it if it is available.

Mr. NEILL: I think it is about 9,000, if my hon. friend wishes to know. The Japanese in Canada are divided roughly into three. One-third are nationals still subjects of Japan; the second third are nationals who have been naturalized, and the third third are Japanese who have been born in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman is giving the number of Japanese in Canada; the leader of the opposition asked for the number of Canadian nationals in Japan.

Mr. NEILL: Like the leader of the opposition, I feel a sense of grievance at being accused in the language of the Prime Minister that any suggestion as to methods of dealing with this important subject should be put down to the cheapest form of political intrigue, or even worse than that, the suggestion that we are almost, if not wholly disloyal in connection with the steps to be taken for the carrying on of the war and the subsequent peace. The Prime Minister tells us that it is against common sense to look forward to what we should do in certain given circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend must not misconstrue what I have said. I did not say that it was not common sense to look forward to what should be done. Those were not my words at all. I spoke about stating a definite policy with reference to a situation which one did not know at the present time and could not say what it might be.

Mr. NEILL: There is really not much difference between the interpretation I put on it and the language of the Prime Minister, although his words may be more dignified. In planning an election, what is the first thing every party gets out? They get out a platform. What is that platform but a declaration of policy which, if returned to power, they are prepared to carry out. The Liberals formulated a platform, I think in 1919, and so far as I know, that platform is still being carried out, or it is supposed to be. From time to time reference is made to it. It is a long time from 1919 to 1943, and if we are still following that platform as a chart laid down in 1919, there must have been men of great vision in those days who could foresee and lay down a definite policy that would be followed out so many years in the future.

I have been associated with this question of the Japanese for many years, and I certainly do not like the suggestion that I am animated by the cheapest sense of political ambition. I am occasionally accused of that in the press, but I think I can leave it to my constituents and to my province to decide whether that accusation is justified. The Prime Minister has said that our nationals who are in Japan may suffer if suggestions similar to those which I have expressed at different times are carried out. But what should be considered is the difference between the oriental and the occidental mind. The Prime Minister thinks that if our dealings are fair, if we do not do anything unjust to the Japanese, in the same spirit they will treat our men over there in a similar manner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that. I never said the Japanese would treat our men fairly; I said they might be very much more vindictive than they are—which is a very different thing.

Mr. NEILL: Well, I was putting it on the right side: if we treated them decently they would treat us decently. Now the Prime Minister says he did not say this; he said, if we did not take care we would be subject to reprisals—if you will allow me to use that word.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I did not.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. NEILL: Well, then, it would be the worse for our prisoners in Japan if we indicated what our policy was going to be. Here I come down to the difference between the occidental and the oriental. All that Japan would gather from any action of that kind, supposing we said, "Now, we are going to give you Japs everything after the war," would be that we are afraid of them. The oriental's mind works like that; he would say, "We can do anything we like to our Canadian prisoners, because these people are afraid of us." If the Prime Minister took a bold stand and said, "We are going to do thus and so"; and if he has any suspicion of reprisals, he could add the pronounced warning that we, the people of Canada, will definitely punish those people who have not treated our men according to the recognized usage of prisoners of war; that would come home to the Jap. If the Jap thinks he is going to be punished he will be very much more careful about what he does than if you tell him that you will treat him as a gentleman and expect him to act as a gentleman. I make that very clear, and heaven knows I am the last to do anything which would imperil our men over there. But I sincerely believe that a policy of indefiniteness—for I do not want to use offensive language—will hurt our men over there, because it will convince the Japanese mind that Japan can afford to play fast and loose with us, whereas were he boldly and definitely warned, as long ago the United States warned Germany, and it would have been becoming for us to have warned Japan at the very first suggestion of impropriety—warned as to what the international rules of the Geneva convention required, and that if they were not adhered to to their utmost extent, there would be, not reprisals, but punishments accruing after the war to those who directly and indirectly were responsible, I am convinced that that point of view and that action would appeal more to their mentality than any suggestion of soft-pedalling our rights in the hope of influencing them favourably. I cannot remember the author of the poem, but there is a verse running in my mind something like this:

> Still the bold brave man is fortunate
> He keeps his object ever full in sight;
> True t'is a narrow way that leads to bliss
> But right before there is no precipice.
> Fear makes men look aside
> And so their footing miss.

Courage and boldness should be our policy, not expediency.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no sympathy with the people who want to appease Japan; in fact I have been more than a little disturbed when I have heard statements made that perhaps after the war a strong Japan in the far east may be a useful counterbalance in Asia. We should make it very clear to the Japanese that any atrocities committed on our nationals in Japan at the present time will be punished to the utmost of our power when the war is over; I believe the effect would be beneficial.

But I rose to say two things: this is one of them. I heard a very wise Chinese gentleman say a few months ago that we—that is the United States and Canada—had placed one of the finest propaganda weapons in the hands of the Japanese by our treatment of the Japanese in Canada and the United States during this war; that over the air from Tokyo to the people of the east went the story that these people in North America had torn up the roots of people, some of whom had been born of Japanese parentage in these countries, that we had taken their property away from them, and had placed them in internment camps, whereas German nationals and Italian nationals of the second and third generation had not been so treated; and over the air from Japan went the story, "that is because these people are of a different colour." There was the racial angle placed in the hands of the Japanese war lords to use as an effective propaganda weapon. Therefore I can see the point made by the Prime Minister to-night. We should, it seems to me, make it very clear that we are out to destroy Japanese power once and for all, that when this war is over we are going to punish those upon whom we can lay our hands who are responsible for any atrocities, but to my mind we should be careful lest we raise an issue in Asia which may be very difficult for us to meet in the future and moreover may interfere with our winning over of the Asiatic populations to our side during the war.

The other thing I rose to say was that a short time ago we had a visit in this chamber from a very charming lady, the wife of the Generalissimo of China, and when she was speaking to this house my mind ran over the situation in this country both before the war and at the present time. I happen to have to-night with me a dispatch which was filed by the Canadian Press as long ago as November 15, 1937, from Brussels. Hon. members will recollect that in October, 1937, a conference was held at Brussels regarding the situation in China, to give China moral support. At that time the Chinese delegation issued a statement. A part of that statement refers to Canada. I am going to remind the committee of what it was:

> Canada has been a substantial contributor to Japan's weapon of war, according to a statement issued by the Chinese delegation to the nine-power treaty conference to-day.
> The statement analyses Japan's dependence on foreign supplies for raw materials. It says that in 1936 Japan imported aluminum, used in aircraft manufacture, valued at 12 million yen ($3,480,000). Of this Canada furnished 71·7 per cent.
> In the same year Japan imported 33 million yen worth of copper, of which Canada furnished 97·11 per cent.
> In the same paper there followed a comparative table issued from Ottawa showing the increases in our sales to Japan last year.

That was 1936. It seems to me that we owe a debt to China. We have supplied her enemy with the wherewithal to make war. A few days ago, on the seventh day of the seventh month, China began her seventh year of war, and during the last six dreary years the Chinese people have suffered terrific casualties. I know, and I believe hon. members know, that wherever we meet educated Chinese ladies or gentlemen, sooner or later the conversation will drift around to the position of the Chinese in North America and in Canada. We have very few Chinese in this country and they are becoming fewer. I believe the time has come when we shall be able to make an agreement with the Chinese government so that there will be no danger of an influx of Chinese into our country. Of course no more are coming in now. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be a very fine gesture at this time on the part of Canada if we said to those Chinese who are in our midst, "We are going to treat you as we treat other people; as a token to your countrymen, we are going to treat you now as we treat all others who have come to us from other countries; thus we are going to give you equal status as Canadian citizens." I say that there is no danger of any influx. They are here. We know that in many respects they have performed useful functions and many of us, particularly those living on the western plains, have received many a kindness from a Chinese restaurant keeper or a Chinese settled in our midst. It seems to me that the sacrifices their country has made might be recognized in this way. I may say that a short time ago in Washington I had the privilege of listening for a few minutes to representations seeking the repeal of the United States exclusion law. We have few Chinese people here, and I suggest to the Prime Minister that some consideration be given to this manner of showing our appreciation of what the Chinese nation has done for us in its long struggle.

Mr. TURGEON: The hon. gentleman is making that suggestion from the federal point of view. Is there any federal legislation or regulation now that takes the vote away from the Chinese or that prevents them from voting in any province?

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that where provincial legislation exists, as it does in some provinces, our government, recognizing the services that the Chinese have rendered to the democratic nations in this war, might approach the provincial governments with a view to removing these barriers for the few Chinese in this country, thus conferring upon them the rights of full dominion citizenship.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Does the hon. gentleman suggest the same for the Japanese?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not referring to the Japanese. I made my position clear as far as the Japanese are concerned, but my hon. friend knows that their disability is felt very keenly by educated Chinese ladies and gentlemen who come to this country, and when we acclaim the distinguished wife of the head of the Chinese government in this chamber, surely the position that many of our Chinese citizens, as Chinese residents, find themselves in, is at least incongruous.

Mr. TURGEON: Can the hon. gentleman really say that there is any resentment among the Chinese against the Dominion of Canada in connection with their lack of the voting privilege in some provinces? There is against the province, but can he say there is any against Canada?

Mr. COLDWELL: Many of the Chinese fail to understand and to recognize the distinction between the provincial and dominion franchise.

Mr. TURGEON: The Chinese in British Columbia have always been without the franchise and they recognize the distinction.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I tell the hon. member for Cariboo that I am not talking about the Chinese in British Columbia.

Mr. TURGEON: But they do recognize the distinction.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am talking about the Chinese who visit this country, the Chinese one finds around our legations and embassies or who visit Canada. Those are the ones to whom I am referring, not the laundrymen or restaurant keepers one sees in British Columbia, but the educated Chinese gentleman who feels that his compatriots are not treated as they should be treated by Canada. They fail to make the distinction that the hon. member for Cariboo makes.

Mr. TURGEON: What is the benefit of saying in this house something that will confirm the feeling that a resident of China may have, which is wrong, that Canada as a nation is taking the franchise from or refusing to give it to Chinese in Canada? What is the good of making a representation of that kind in this house? His fear is only confirmed.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have made my position clear. My voice can be heard only in this chamber. I do not speak in the legislature of British Columbia. I am a citizen of Canada. I heard Madame Chiang Kai-shek in this chamber, and I am suggesting to the Prime Minister that approaches might be made by our government to the provinces in which there are disabilities for the removal of those disabilities.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Does that go for the Japanese too?

Mr. COLDWELL: I made my position clear regarding the Japanese. I am talking about the Chinese, who are our allies, and not about the Japanese, who are our enemies.

Mr. REID: With regard to the treatment which it is said we have been according the Japanese nationals in this country, I do not think we need be unduly perturbed over that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope not.

Mr. REID: Anyone who knows anything about the Japanese knows that they themselves inculcate in their children, from the day they are born, right through life, that they are a superior oriental race, distinct and apart. They are the sons of heaven in their own eyes. As I said in my speech the other day, they look down upon us as an inferior race. We need not therefore be perturbed so far as they are concerned. What I wanted to say was this, and I say it with the Prime Minister present. Very often people get up in this country, when some of us undertake to speak about the Japanese and to put before the people the facts as they are, and immediately tell us what we should do. I repeat that if any of the Japanese born in this country are to remain in this country, the first step that should be taken should be taken by the Japanese themselves; and no Japanese has so far taken the first step in the direction of real Canadian citizenship, for the reason that everyone of them owes allegiance to Japan, whether born in this country or not. We have never heard one of them stand up and say to Japan, "You are not our country; we were born here, we are Canadian citizens." I challenge any hon. member to show one instance, in the long life of the Japanese in this country, where one of them has made it apparent that he is a true Canadian citizen.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was not discussing the Japanese.

Mr. REID: I am making a few remarks along the lines of the speech I made a few nights ago, and I am pointing out to those people who blame us for not doing something for the Japanese, that the Japanese have done nothing themselves in this regard, and until they take the step I suggest—and I speak of those born in this country—I do not see how we can do anything to make them truly Canadian. The mere accident of birth does not make them Canadians, though under the law it does. I am speaking of those who owe allegiance to two countries, and I say that no man can be a truly Canadian citizen who owes allegiance in the first instance to Japan, or for that matter to any other country. I was one of those who, in the days before the war, pointed out that we had done a great injustice to the Chinese in excluding them, while at the same time we allowed the Japanese to come in at the rate of 150 a year. I could not see the sense or the righteousness of that, because both are oriental or Mongolian races; and yet we have a Chinese Exclusion Act. I and others as well advocated one for the Japanese, but there were always reasons advanced why we could not do that so far as the Japanese were concerned. Had we done so, our condition would not have been any worse to-day and it might have been better; for, if we had taken a strong stand in those days and said to Japan, "We are closing the door," we would have settled the matter. I may be contradicted in this, but we are following too much the policy of Great Britain. We should settle our own affairs and decide who should settle in this land after the war; and as regards those who are not truly Canadian citizens, I would say that they should go to the country to which they owe allegiance.

Mr. ESLING: I hope the Prime Minister will fully understand my reference this afternoon to 8,000 Japanese in my own district. I do not know about the reception they have met with in other districts; but I did say that their attitude in Kootenay West was tranquil, but that when the time came and the allies would be devoting their attention exclusively to Japan, then perhaps that attitude might change and become a dangerous one, particularly where there are so many power plants and bridges nearby. I hope the Prime Minister will not misunderstand our attitude. If he had 8,000 Japanese in Prince Albert and 4,000 recalcitrant Doukhobors, he would feel concerned about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I share the concern of my hon. friend. I do not say he is wrong in fearing possible consequences from having numbers of Japanese in his community. But I do say that a declaration to-day of the character that I have been asked to make would not help to make the situation any easier. It would make it more difficult.

Mr. GRAHAM: In justice to a very brave man and a very fine citizen of Japanese origin, I cannot let the statement made by the hon. member for New Westminster go unchallenged. I have in mind a young Japanese who served with distinction in my own company in France and who was decorated by this nation. He saved the life of one of his comrades by performing a very brave deed. He came back and settled in my district where he is now farming and is one of the most highly respected farmers in his particular area. To-day he has two sons serving with the Canadian forces in this war.

While I am on my feet I want to say this with respect to Canada's foreign policy. I could not hope to use the eloquent language used by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George the other day in describing Canada's position and its relationship to the British commonwealth of nations. I was delighted with his address. He is one of the prominent young Liberals of this house, who, given good health, may in the days to come speak with some weight in the councils of the party. I wish to associate myself fully with the interpretation he gave of the place that Canada occupies as a nation and in its very fine relationship to the British commonwealth of nations.

I want to say, too, that we are in the same danger in this country as they were in Great Britain at one period when a group known as Little Englanders arose. We must not be Little Canadians or Little Imperialists. We must be big in our mental approach to the tremendous problems that we shall have to face in the post-war period if we are to justify the fine record we have had in this war. While we think this war period is our great testing time, let us keep in mind that we are all bound together by certain ties of common purpose and that, despite our political differences, that tie is there as a moving spirit among the Canadian people. But as we approach victory there is a danger of the tie loosening, as the problems become greater. I view the future with a great deal of concern lest the Canadian people lose some of that unity which is necessary even to approach, let alone solve, the problems that will come to this world when peace is declared.

I wish to put myself on record as saying that Canada's post-war policy in relation to other countries must never be one of hatred or of revenge. It seems to me that if we think in terms of hatred and revenge we shall lose the great opportunity we shall have then to accomplish so much of what we desire to accomplish. Burke's famous statement has lost none of its truth by frequent repetition that in truth you cannot indict a nation, and it will be impossible to indict either Germany or Japan, and this despite all the cruelties and barbarities that Germany and Japan have committed. In our own enlightened self-interest we must keep in mind that there are some seventy millions of human beings living in the Japanese empire and some seventy or more million human beings who call themselves German, and our task will be to find in some way, somehow, a means of educating and training these Germans and Japanese—yes, and Italians—to fit into the new heaven and new earth we speak about. We must have within our own policy the principle of justice rather than of hatred and revenge. I hope that in this house during the war period we shall be prepared to leave these matters that are bound to create a great deal of controversy to the judgment of the Prime Minister, whose whole history shows his wise tolerance and understanding of the problems with which we are confronted in Canada. I think we can safely assume that he will deal wisely with these problems in their international aspect.

Mr. NEILL: If I may ask a question, what percentage is one out of 25,937?

Mr. GRAHAM: I might have mentioned an exception, but I remember that Japanese boy who served with me, and I was extremely proud of his record and could not allow the statement of the hon. member for New Westminster to go unchallenged.

Mr. REID: The hon. member could probably find more cases than he mentioned, but it seems rather strange that when the Japanese were being removed from the British Columbia coast, and the provincial governments were asked if they would take them, every provincial government, so far as I know, said, Yes, we will take them on one condition. That condition was that they would be removed after the war from these other provinces. Are we in British Columbia for ever more to be told that this is simply a British Columbia problem, and when we air our grievances we have it hurled at us that we are Japanese haters, when every province took the stand, we will take these Japanese only if you remove them from our province after the war? If the Japanese are all fine citizens, I would ask the hon. member to explain this stand that was taken by all the provincial governments of Canada.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Would the Prime Minister make a brief statement on the question I raised this afternoon regarding Canada-Newfoundland relations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before I reply to my hon. friend I would not like the suggestion that was made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to pass without a word of acknowledgment. May I say that I believe the people of Canada realize that we have had no more gallant ally than we have had in the Chinese, that the sacrifices which the people of China have made in the past seven years have been an immense contribution to the security of this entire continent. Our people have not only come to know but greatly to admire, and, I will go further and say, to have a real affection for the Chinese people. Knowing that, when the government opened a legation in China we expressed to our minister the hope that when he reached Chungking he would explain to the government of China that there were certain difficulties in dealing with the problems which arose between us and the people of China on account of special circumstances in our own country. We asked him to explain the situation very fully and make it perfectly clear that the present administration hoped to be able to work out a solution which would remove any cause on their part to feel that they were being discriminated against as a race.

The Chinese people understand clearly that there is an economic problem of which we on this side have to take full account. Madame Chiang Kai-shek said in my hearing that the Chinese would not misunderstand an arrangement between China and Canada which would take account of the fact that we had certain economic standards which we must carefully preserve. But what she felt was that the Chinese people very much hoped and expected that they would be looked upon by Canadians as people who are entitled to be dealt with as equals and not as inferiors. The inference was clear that she hoped some arrangement would be made to remove anything which would cause their people grounds for real offence. I would say that the government is carefully going into these different problems, and I hope that before very long some of the present restrictions, or whatever one may wish to call them, which have been imposed for economic reasons, may be removed, in a way that will take away what of offence there is in them and the economic problem satisfactorily met.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the Prime Minister indicate to us what disabilities Madame Chiang Kai-shek mentioned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One she might have mentioned was exclusion, the nature of the exclusion laws, and I must say I think in that a mistake has been made. Perhaps I should not talk about mistakes being made, but I must say I can see no reason why the Chinese should not have been treated exactly as the Japanese were treated in the matter of the gentlemen's agreement with Japan restricting numbers. I think they were more entitled to an agreement of the kind—certainly in the light of what has happened since the war—than the Japanese were.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Did Madame Chiang Kai-shek give any hint as to the number of Chinese she felt Canada should accept within her boundaries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think Madame Chiang Kai-shek felt that there were many Chinese students who would like to attend our universities, just as Chinese students have been attending universities in the United States, and that there were others who might wish to come for special reasons; that an arrangement which would take cognizance of the fact that there were certain classes or individuals who might come to our country, and that we might send similar classes of our own to their country, would be all to the good of both countries. I believe it should be possible to work out a reciprocal arrangement betweeen Canada and China which would be helpful to both countries.

Mr. STIRLING: Can Chinese students not do that now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I remember some years ago trying to make it possible to bring in a number of Chinese students and I encountered great difficulties in the matter.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What was the reason given—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for New Westminster has the floor.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What was the reason given that they were not allowed to come in?

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to the Prime Minister that in any future policy dealing with the Chinese or the Japanese the problem be not left a British Columbia problem. Too long we have carried the load in this country. We were sneered at for years and years. This is an economic problem as well as a racial one, and in any future policy I would ask the Prime Minister to see that British Columbia is relieved of the burden she has carried for forty years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Since we are on this Chinese question we may as well see if we can arrive at some sort of agreement in the matter. If the Chinese are to be admitted to this country to live, then the question immediately arises as to how many of them should be admitted. How would you determine the number? Although I have said nothing up to the present time in this house on the problem of the Chinese, yet I have given the matter considerable attention for a good many years. I should be pleased if the Prime Minister would give us some idea as to how far the first lady of China felt we should go in Canada. It is easy to see, if we opened the door to any extent at all, what might happen. China possesses almost four hundred million people. If we allow any considerable number to come to Canada, they would utterly overwhelm us so far as numbers are concerned. I should like to get some conception of the extent to which this lady would wish us to go in order that she might feel better about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that the members of this house will be well advised not to attempt to take up too many subjects that might be controversial at this particular time. However carefully hon. members may seek to express their views, there are bound to be certain expressions used which will be misconstrued in some quarters. My hon. friend has just now been referring to questions of millions in China as against small numbers here. That remark when it is read in China to-morrow will sound quite differently to many Chinese ears from what it does to those of us who know my hon. friend and know his heart and his inclinations. I think for that reason, among others, we would be well advised not to get into a general discussion or try to reach final agreements or settlements at this particular time in a consideration of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I wonder if the Prime Minister would care to answer the question I raised.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will just say the same thing to my hon. friend. While I believe there is a time to consider the question of what is advisable and what may not be advisable with respect to having Newfoundland brought into confederation, this is not the particular moment at which it would be most advisable to discuss the question. As the hon. member knows, the government of Canada is most desirous of preserving the closest possible friendly relations with Newfoundland. We have given expression to our desire in the appointment of a high commissioner of the attainments which he himself has mentioned, in the person of Mr. Burchell. Mr. Burchell has given very careful study to the questions that arise between both the Newfoundland and Canadian governments, Newfoundland and the United States, Newfoundland and Great Britain, and I think he would be the first to say that any discussion with respect to the possible bringing in of Newfoundland to confederation ought to be initiated on the part of the people of Newfoundland rather than on the part of members of this house certainly at this particular time. I took note of what my hon. friend had said, and I prepared with a little care the following words that I thought it might be wise to use if occasion should so demand. I would say that Canadians like and admire the people of Newfoundland. They are attached to them by bonds of sentiment and by the memory of dangers shared and victories won together. They look forward to a continuation of the friendship and cooperation which have increasingly marked our relations during recent years. Canadians are interested in the defence of Newfoundland which is so vital a part of the defence of the continent and the hemisphere. They hope that the people of Newfoundland will find some wholly satisfactory solution of the political and economic problems which confront them. They will be happy if, in any way, they can contribute to the solution of these problems, many of which are common to both countries.

If the people of Newfoundland should ever decide that they wish to enter the Canadian federation and should make that decision clear beyond all possibility of misunderstanding, Canada would give most sympathetic consideration to the proposal.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say this to the Prime Minister with respect to what he said a minute ago regarding the Chinese. So far as the remarks being repeated in China and having an effect upon the Chinese feelings are concerned, I would say that the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would be exactly of the kind that would greatly disturb these people. Why the Prime Minister should limit the discussion when I asked a question in an endeavour to arrive at some definite indication of what the first lady of China did request, I really cannot see. I do not know why the Prime Minister should object to that question, but if he does, then we shall pass it by. However, I should like to point out to the Prime Minister that I have sat in this house for seven years, and it is simply astounding to me how many problems are like the one the Prime Minister mentioned a moment ago. I know this is a question that is of vital concern to the country, and hon. members want to discuss it. When one tries to get something definite the Prime Minister finds some reason or another for deferring the discussion. For example, he said it was highly inflammatory to discuss sending materials to Japan, about which the Chinese now complain bitterly. If we discussed this matter before the Japanese entered the war or even before there was a war, we were told we might offend the Japanese and cause much trouble. Now, you see what happened. Instead of the house coming to some sort of definite conclusion, and the government telling the house frankly in private session, if needs be, we just let things drift. A similar thing has happened with respect to the Japanese. I am not making a pronouncement on the question of the Japanese at this time, nor do I propose to do so. But as I said on Friday, I have an idea as to how the matter should be taken care of. And it was partly because of that idea that I asked the Prime Minister a question about China.

We started many years ago to make representations with respect to the Japanese. Hon. members from British Columbia have been here to Ottawa, doing everything in their mortal power to arouse Ottawa—and with just a hundred per cent failure. The result is that the people of British Columbia have been suffering a serious injustice and have been led to feel in a way that no province in Canada should be forced to feel. And still the problem is unsolved. If we go on at our present rate, or the rate we have taken in the last twenty years, it will be unsolved seven hundred years from to-day. Surely the time should come when we might discuss these matters to a conclusion, and get somewhere.

As I said, I am not going to urge this matter upon the Prime Minister. But I am telling him how I feel about deferring the discussion of a good many of these matters. I referred on Friday night to a problem facing us in Alberta, one which is rapidly growing worse. If it continues for another forty or fifty years, it will probably reach the point where it will be beyond solution. There may be bloodshed as a result of it. Yet we can get no help at all from Ottawa. Ottawa brought the people into the country, planted them on our doorstep, went away and said, "Now it is up to you." And every move we make to solve the problem Ottawa says, "No, no, you must not do that; naughty, naughty; spank your hands!" Well, if we think that is the way to run a country like Canada, then I say our opinions are open to some considerable revision. In a general way I believe I have delivered myself of my thoughts along that line.

I should like for a moment to revert to the remarks of the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) in connection with this matter of the British empire. Friday and to-day we have heard much discussion regarding Canada's relationship with the British empire. Although I have listened with most attentive care, I have not been able to arrive at a clear conception of what hon. members have in mind. I thought the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) was trying to read a lecture to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) because of some remarks he had made in support of the British empire. When I examined with great care the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, as reported in Hansard, I found it very difficult to find any difference between the two of them. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George will not go far enough to say he wishes to cut this country right out of the empire. He arose much disturbed this afternoon because it had been suggested in the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was an isolationist. Well, where does he stand? And where do these men who believe as he believes stand? What do they want?

I would ask the Prime Minister two or three questions, to see whether he can enlighten us, or whether he will say that this is a problem which ought not to be discussed in war time. Is he prepared to accept the remarks of the Right Hon. Anthony Eden, as reported, that the British commonwealth of nations is a blueprint of the future organization of the nations of the world, or that it is a blueprint or a new order for the new organization of nations.

Before the Prime Minister answers, may I point out to him that there are a number of us who are at a loss to know what was in the minds of hon. members when they talked about supranational governments. I say the house ought to have clearly in mind just exactly what the government proposes. If needs be, it should be given us in a secret session. But, above all, surely members of parliament ought to know exactly what the government has in mind, and what it means when it uses a certain phrase.

I was much pleased when the Right Hon. Anthony Eden said that the British commonwealth of nations was a blueprint of the new organization of the nations of the world. Perhaps the Prime Minister will tell me whether I was misinformed regarding Mr. Eden's remarks, and whether he agrees with Mr. Eden in that regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not sure what Mr. Eden meant by a blueprint. He might have one thing in mind, and I might have another. However, I always have felt the British commonwealth of nations was certainly a pattern on which the world might well seek to organize itself. It would be a community of nations, all of which gained a measure of mutual security through belonging to one great entity such as the commonwealth of nations. If to-morrow Canada were to be out of the British commonwealth of nations, she would have to find some nations with which she would wish to be associated sufficiently closely to find security in that association. And I think in all probability she would return immediately to the group with which at the moment she is associated, because I doubt if there could be a better group. I should like to see that pattern extended. I think it would mean everything to the world if it could be so organized that all countries were free and independent, in a position to cooperate freely with each other, held together by a common bond of allegiance to a crown, representative of sovereignty, such as we give to our sovereign to-day.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, we are not finished yet. It is just as well not to put on pressure.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe the committee has reached the stage where we cannot much longer permit repetition. It is a fact that there is no rule precluding repetition in committee. However, I have in mind the discussion on the Japanese question, a matter which has been before us on four other occasions, and I would ask some hon. members not to repeat what they have said many times before.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, I believe I am not repeating what has already been said. I am merely seeking clarification. The reply of the Prime Minister, as nearly as I could judge from listening to him, would be exactly the concept most hon. members on this side of the house would have. I believe that would be exactly the concept of Social Crediters, and I am almost positive it would be the concept of the Progressive Conservative party. That being so, then why all the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George who seemed to be endeavouring to indicate a trace of difference between his point of view and that of hon. members opposite? You see, the reply by the Prime Minister deprives the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George of any sense. There is no question about that. I wonder if the hon. member for Swift Current will agree entirely with what the Prime Minister has said. And if he does, then how can he agree entirely with what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has said?

Mr. MARTIN: There was no difference.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If there is no difference between what was said by the Prime Minister and what was said by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, then evidently the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was trying to make a distinction without a difference. I note that the hon. member for Swift Current shakes his head; evidently there is still some confusion in his mind.

I say that in discussing Canada's foreign policy this matter ought to be cleared up. If the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, notwithstanding all that has been said, can see any difference between his point of view and that of the hon. member for Lethbridge, then I think he should explain so that the hon. member for Lethbridge can understand. I do not think I—

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No; it is not carried, and I can tell hon. members that calling out "carried" is not going to carry this item one minute sooner. In fact, it is likely to take a good deal longer. Let us have that perfectly clear.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member for Lethbridge that he has no right to use threats. I believe it is the wish of the committee that there should be no repetition and also that these items should go through as soon as possible.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no doubt that they would like to see the items passed, and so would I. But I want to have certain matters cleared up. Does the Prime Minister believe that to-day Canada has all the autonomy under the British empire that she should have? Is there room for her to increase her autonomy under the British empire?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know what my hon. friend means by autonomy under the British empire.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Within the British empire.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Within the British empire I think Canada has just as much autonomy as has the United Kingdom. I believe we are masters of our own house in all particulars, with relation to both our domestic and external affairs. As compared one to the other, we are all equal in status and united by a common allegiance to the crown.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is most enlightening, because I have gathered from the remarks of three or four members who have spoken that they can see that as a result of this war Canada is going to go forward to some fuller measure of nationhood than she had before. I have heard hon. members state outside the house—they have not said it inside the house—that the fact that Canada had declared war in her own right was a step forward in the development of the autonomy of Canada. In other words, before Canada declared war in 1939, Canada did not possess the autonomy that she would dream of possessing, or the autonomy which she will possess from now on. That, of course, takes the point from the Prime Minister's answer, and it will be seen why there is confusion in these matters. If I am wrong, I should be glad to be put right on the matter.

Item agreed to.

Representation abroad, $111,500.

Mr. GRAYDON: About three weeks ago I made an inquiry of the government based upon a report from Stockholm, Sweden, to the effect that some representation to Canada was in contemplation by the Swedish government. At the time the Prime Minister answered that so far as Canada was concerned there had been no intimation officially between the two governments, and I was wondering if there had been any change in the situation since that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Since my hon. friend asked me that question the Swedish consul general at Montreal called upon me and intimated that the government of Sweden would like to appoint a mission to Canada and wished to know whether it would be agreeable to our country to have a Swedish legation opened here and whether we would reciprocate. I outlined to the Swedish consul general, as I have to the house, the difficulties we were confronted with in the matter of personnel required for legations abroad and that we had hoped before this year to have opened a legation in Mexico and in one or two other countries. I told him I could not give an assurance that a legation would be opened immediately in Sweden, but we would be prepared to receive a mission here on the understanding that later on we would reciprocate, but that we might find it desirable to have a charge d'affaires in charge of our legation in Sweden in the first instance rather than a minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are there any exchanges of diplomatic representatives under consideration in addition to those mentioned already by the Prime Minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In these matters that relate to the representation of different countries the practice more or less followed is not to disclose in advance the intentions of the government. Possibly I had better not attempt to say more than that we do expect in the course of time to open additional legations.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can the minister tell us in a general way, with some detail, what are the duties of the legations for which we are paying under this vote? Choose any one at random and tell us what its duties are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The report of the Department of External Affairs gives rather full particulars of the services which the different legations have rendered. Perhaps my hon. friend would allow me to refer him to that report. I think he will get full particulars there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does that mean that we cannot have the answer to this question appear in Hansard?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the full particulars are in a government report, when I have given my hon. friend the information in a form that can be referred to, why should he wish to have it placed on Hansard? It is not going to alter the business of the legations in the least if the information with regard to them is given in a report rather than in Hansard.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it not the right of members when they are being asked to provide money to ask what the money is being spent for?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have referred my hon. friend to a report which will give him the full particulars. I think I am quite within my rights, and indeed I am only helping to conserve the money of the country by referring my hon. friend to a report which will give him full particulars, instead of placing the report on Hansard as he suggests.
