Mr. BLACKMORE: If every minister replied as the Prime Minister has done, by referring the questioner to reference books and reports, there would be an end of the examination of the minister in committee by members of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the year ended December 31, 1942, was prepared in order that hon. members might be fully informed in advance of any discussion of the duties and responsibilities of the officials who are connected with the legations and of the services performed by the legations. I submit that my hon. friend is asking a question which in the circumstances is wholly unnecessary. He knows in a general way that the business of a legation is to carry on official dealings and relations with governments of other countries in connection with the questions that may arise or are of interest and concern between them. Where there is public business to be carried out, it is carried out by means of diplomats who serve as officials of legations. What the details of that business may be, I cannot begin to go into at the moment.

Mr. CHURCH: In view of the war being in its fourth year, I think this might well be an off year in the appointing of foreign representatives.

The CHAIRMAN: I would suggest to the hon. member for Broadview that this matter has been discussed several times already. I do not think the members of the committee are in a mood to have a repetition of discussion.

Mr. CHURCH: As I understand it, this item covers representation abroad, $111,500. I was going to suggest that in the interests of economy no appointments should be made during this fiscal year. Several of these representatives have been appointed, and I have always been opposed to such appointments because they duplicate the work of our trade commissioners. They also duplicate the work of the British representatives in the different countries. These appointments cause divisions. I suggest that now we have gone pretty nearly far enough. I read to-day the speech of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. If this is the policy of the government, to appoint ambassadors over the seven seas, new representatives here, there, and everywhere, we might just as well get out of the British empire altogether. We have no representative in one fine country to which Mr. Churchill referred the other day, and which may be appropriately mentioned to-day. I refer to Ulster. Ulster has no direct representation in this country, nor we in hers, but we might well recall the great tribute paid a few days ago by the Prime Minister of Britain to that little country which is never mentioned here.

I suggest that in the interests of harmony in the British empire we suspend any more appointments of representatives abroad. There are one or two of them in Toronto. One of them, the representative of China, was most insulting to the city of Toronto. He went to New York, and from there to China, and allow me to say that if he causes as much division in China as he caused in Toronto he is no fit representative of this country. He has not the training. How are these ministers and others appointed? What is their background? Have they ever had any training in diplomacy? I doubt if our representative who went to China knows enough Chinese to walk into any office over there and carry on a conversation with the Chinese. We are just duplicating our representatives abroad, making believe that we are a separate state when we are not. We are part and parcel of the British empire. There is no point in multiplying our representatives abroad and indulging in all these forms of what I call separatism, particularly in time of war. It is bad enough in peace time, but even more disastrous in war time. I suggest that in this direction we take a holiday in the coming year. We have pretty well covered the seven seas already with our representatives, and I do not know any other place we can send them to at the present time. I sincerely hope that in the interests of economy there will be a cessation of appointments of ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary—and I can tell you a whole lot of them are extraordinary.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is "sundry services."

The CHAIRMAN: No; I included them.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want to delay this item, but as regards sundry services, following our usual custom on the war appropriation items, perhaps the Prime Minister would give us a break-down as to the services he is calling for here. No doubt he has a list.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe some provision is to be made for extra representation: I am informed that it includes also the cost of cable charges, teletype services to Washington, and matters of that kind.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would be satisfied if the Prime Minister at another sitting would place the information on Hansard. I do not want to delay the committee.

Item agreed to.

CANADIAN ARMY

MEDITERRANEAN OPERATIONS—PRESS REPORT AS TO DISPOSITION OF CANADIAN TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. A Canadian Press dispatch, under London, England, dateline of July 11, carried the following paragraph:

> It once was thought that when the Canadians went into battle they would go as an army, but the term "army" has changed in meaning since the beginning of the North African campaign.

I should be glad if the Minister of National Defence would inform the house if the carrying out of these Mediterranean operations means that the Canadian army has been broken up, and that its units will now be fighting beside properly reinforced and equipped British and American troops who have had previous experience in other theatres of war.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): The Mediterranean operations do not mean that the Canadian army has been broken up. I would refer the house to a statement which I made on May 13, 1943, as reported at page 2667 of Hansard. There I said:

. . . there seems to be an idea persisting in some quarters that the role of these units and formations in Canada's army is rigid. I wish to say that exactly the contrary is the case. The role of the units and formations in Canada's army is not rigid; their role is flexible. They can be taken apart on the principle of the sectional bookcase. It has always been and still is our policy that the Canadian army in whole or in part is available to be used wherever and for whatever task would best serve the common cause.

The Sicilian operations mean that this policy is being carried out by detailing from the Canadian army a Canadian force to serve in the Mediterranean theatre. The matter of future employment will of course depend upon developments.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

36. Departmental administration, $252,525.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question relating to the Norway refinery of Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited. It is a matter which has been mentioned in the house on previous occasions; in fact the Prime Minister had something to say about it on June 3. For reasons which I shall indicate in a moment, I feel that a further statement is highly desirable.

This matter was first brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on May 11. At that time he referred to a statement included in the report to the shareholders which was made by the president of the Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited, Mr. J. Gordon Hardy. The Prime Minister is well aware of the statement, which was to the effect that he, the president of the company, was glad to get the information that the Norway refinery was still in existence; they had received the information that it was still in operation, though under German control. Some days later, on June 3, as reported in Hansard, page 3282, the Prime Minister made a statement in which he expressed a view which I think is the view of all of us in this house. He said:

We know that the German government is very short of nickel, and it cannot be doubted that it would be to the advantage of the united nations if the Falconbridge refinery in Norway were to be rendered wholly inoperative.

I repeat that with that statement we all agree. The point is however that the statement made by the president of this company was the very opposite of that which has been expressed by the Prime Minister. He stated in the report as president of the company:

Incidentally, you will be glad to learn—as I was—that through indirect channels it is reported that your Norway refinery is safe so far, and is being maintained. It is in operation by your Norwegian staff, under German control, on the same Norwegian nickel-copper ore production that we formerly handled on toll basis.

I do not wish to convey the impression that I think that Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited are making any money out of the operations in Norway at the present time. The situation as I understand it, and my view is corroborated by the letter from Mr. Hardy to the Prime Minister under date of May 18, is that the company looks forward to the day, after the war, when it will be possible to regain some of the properties which have been lost because they were in countries that the nazis have overrun, and what the president was doing was to express his pleasure that, although Norway had been overrun, that plant had not been destroyed, it was still in existence; in other words, there was the possibility of the company getting possession of the plant again, intact, after the war. In the letter to which I have just referred under date of May 13 to the Prime Minister, Mr. Hardy endeavoured to say that if the context of the wording quoted by Mr. Coldwell were presented the situation would appear in a better light. However, in that letter Mr. Hardy says:

The loss of that refinery to the enemy in April, 1940, was a severe blow to this company, hence the possibility of regaining it when victory comes, has meant a great deal to this Canadian enterprise, and any news about the refinery has been most important to our shareholders.

I remind the Prime Minister again of the quotation from the report which I have already read. Perhaps a further sentence or two might be given:

In the balance sheet you will have noted an inventory item reading "Matte on hand and in process at cost". This includes the parallel item shown in your auditors' statement of assets and liabilities in Norway in—

I assume he means "in the amount of."

—$1,009,068—which has not been written off as yet, but simply covered by a claim posted with the Canadian custodian of enemy property. As a matter of fact, of course, this has undoubtedly gone into production of refined metals under enemy control, and has disappeared and hence will have to receive some sort of adjustment at the end of the war.

The point is that when your auditors give your "net working capital" at the end of 1942 as $6,238,598, the above item is included with "total current assets and metal inventories".

A reading of the context of the statement which was brought to the attention of this house on May 11 only stresses the point that the president of the company took a view directly the opposite of that expressed by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister said that it would be to the advantage of the united nations if this plant were rendered wholly inoperative; the president expressed pleasure that the plant was still in existence so that the company would be able to get it again when the war is over.

My reason for raising this again and expressing the view that the Prime Minister ought to say something further about it is this. On June 3, when the Prime Minister spoke, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked if the government would not take some further steps. The Prime Minister said in reply:

> Well, I may say that the statement which I have just made will, I believe, be more effective in its results than any other measure which the government could possibly take.

Some days later, as a matter of fact on June 23, sessional paper No. 405 was brought down in response to a motion made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar which asked for correspondence between the Prime Minister and Mr. Hardy concerning this statement. The correspondence in the sessional paper consists of only two letters. One is a letter from Mr. Hardy to the Prime Minister, from which I have already quoted, and which endeavours to explain and to justify the statement, and the other is the reply signed by Mr. H. R. L. Henry, private secretary to the Prime Minister, in which he says:

> The Prime Minister has directed me to acknowledge your letter of May 13th, regarding remarks by Mr. M. J. Coldwell, M.P., in the House of Commons, with reference to Falconbridge Nickel Mines, Limited.
> Mr. King wishes me to thank you for drawing the enclosures with your letter to his attention.

The point is that, following the tabling of this document in the house on June 23, considerable publicity was given to it throughout the country. I saw it myself in a number of newspapers from widely separated parts of the country, and, incorrect though it may be, the impression was created by the publication of the news of these letters that Mr. Hardy had made a satisfactory answer both to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and to the Prime Minister. It is true, of course, that this correspondence took place before the Prime Minister made his statement in the house, but it was tabled later, publicity was given to it later, and I repeat that the general impression is that Mr. Hardy has given a satisfactory answer to the criticisms made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and supported by the Prime Minister. I am sure that if the Prime Minister studies the documents he will agree with me that the answer is not satisfactory, that it should be deprecated in the manner in which he did so on June 3, and I hope he will make a further statement on the matter at this time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I fail to see how the impression which my hon. friend says has got abroad could possibly be the impression existing throughout the country. That is a matter of opinion. The statement I made in this house condemned—perhaps that is not too strong a word to use—the very shortsighted, unwise and, I might add, unpatriotic statement made by Mr. Hardy, and I am certain that the public have fully recognized that the government looks upon his statement in that light. The acknowledgement sent by my secretary to Mr. Hardy's letter was a perfunctory acknowledgement. It allowed Mr. Hardy to see quite clearly that the government might make further reference to the matter. This further reference I made in the House of Commons. I do submit that having stated here in the House of Commons, as Prime Minister, that a statement made by the head of a mining corporation in this country was unwise and foolish, and that by implication it was unpatriotic, was making it very clear to the country that the government had no sympathy whatever with the pronouncement and, on the contrary, condemned it very strongly.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would remind the Prime Minister that after he made his statement in the house these documents were made public, and, as I say, this sentence in particular was given wide publicity. It is a long sentence; I need not give the whole of it, because it is the last phrase that is important:

> . . . and certainly does not merit the slur contained in Mr. Coldwell's ill-conceived remarks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read the whole sentence.

Mr. KNOWLES: Very well. The sentence reads:

> I could add that, in spite of this setback, the Falconbridge effort to do all in its power to produce such essential metals as nickel and copper for the war requirements, is well known to your munitions and supply department, and certainly does not merit the slur contained in Mr. Coldwell's ill-conceived remarks.

My point is that this statement, together with the perfunctory acknowledgment by the Prime Minister's secretary, are the last words which have appeared in the press on this matter to date. That was my reason for feeling that a further statement, condemning this statement outright, should be made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I will condemn it outright now. I think it should be condemned outright, and if my condemnation on a previous occasion was not sufficient I shall be glad to repeat everything now that I said on that other occasion.

Mr. CHURCH: Just before eleven o'clock last evening I was discussing the estimates of this department and had called attention to the fact that in this item, which has to do with representation abroad, including salaries of high commissioners and so on, there is an increase of $211,000. With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, I do not see why we should have such an increase. This department has been growing by leaps and bounds. If it contributed to the war effort it would be all right, but I do not see that it does. I should like to see the Prime Minister's estimates, more than those of anyone else, go through as quickly as possible, but the opposition is not to blame for a discussion of these estimates lasting more than a day. Speeches have been made by government supporters, on July 1, on Monday of last week and again even more recently, about matters which I have said should be left until after the war, including a national anthem, a national flag and many other matters. The Prime Minister is a busy man and should receive some special consideration in view of the amount of work he is doing, but all along I have objected to the expansion of this department, to the opening of these legations and the sending abroad of ministers. We have always had trade representatives in these countries as well as other agencies, such as boards of trade and private organizations, looking after this work. It all began with the opening of the legation at Washington, when I first came into this house. I opposed that innovation, because I believed it was dividing Britain's representation.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George stirred up a great deal of opposition to these estimates by the remarks he made in this house the other day. At that time he gave one good reason why he never should have become a parliamentary secretary; for his remarks have caused wide disunity not only in Canada but also in other parts of the empire. His words received extensive publicity all over the United States. He was one of those favoured on the radio. He was also favoured with a visit to the United States, where he told the people, as Mr. Brockington told them, that King George did not declare war for us but that we declared war for him, and all that sort of separatism in the midst of the greatest war in history. I have a great deal of respect for the Prime Minister; I have always had a great deal of respect and friendship for him, but friendship cannot alter my stand on principles which I have supported in and out of this house, before the war, in endeavouring to avoid the war, and since the war began. I represent in this house, as the former leader of this party, Lord Bennett, said, a very large body of public opinion in this country which believes in the need for the greatest possible cooperation and coordination with the mother country both for the remainder of the war and particularly after the war. If we are not linked with this great empire we shall have little say in regard to the peace terms and will be simply an outcast amongst the great powers of the world at the peace table.

Here we have almost a million dollars being spent in this way, and in addition we have the four or five million dollars we have spent on the League of Nations, one of the agencies that caused this war. So far as these ambassadors go, they have not had any training for this work; they are just civilians who know nothing about foreign affairs. Our representative in Australia, Mr. Davis, is a very fine gentleman, but he went there and said that Japan, not Germany, was our principal enemy. He caused a great deal of dissatisfaction by those words, even in those dominions, because Germany is our main enemy; she pulled Japan, one of our old allies, into the war at the time of Pearl Harbor. The few mistakes Germany has made, in attacking Russia and in bringing about Pearl Harbor, no doubt will cost her the war sooner or later, but I do object to these amateur statesmen, for that is all they are. You cannot learn to be a diplomat in a day. The best diplomats we ever had in Washington were not the newspaper men we sent there, not the civilians but trained men like Spring-Rice and Lindsay. Then we have another representative, General Odlum, a fine citizen and a fine soldier; he visited the city of Toronto and caused some disunity and criticism by the unnecessary aspersions and reflections he cast upon Toronto and Ontario, the empire province of the dominion.

I have wondered why no reference has been made to what was said the other day by Mr. Churchill in his letter to the former premier of northern Ireland, Mr. Andrews. Why has it been necessary to establish embassies in the north of Ireland and not in the south? It is said that southern Ireland is a part of the empire, but it has remained neutral and that step has been very costly to our shipping, our sailors and so on. I think something might have been said yesterday about the glorious part played in the war by Ulster, because, since the war started, I have never heard one word, from the government or anyone else, about this great country and her prime minister, Mr. Andrews. A newspaper article states:

"But for the loyalty of Northern Ireland", the British Prime Minister stated, "we should have been confronted with slavery and death and the light which now shines so strongly throughout the world would have been quenched."

The full text of Mr. Churchill's letter is as follows:

My dear Mr. Andrews,—I am, indeed, sorry that the ties which have been so warmly established between us in our public work should have to be broken. After your long services to Northern Ireland as Minister of Labour, and as Minister of Finance, you became Prime Minister in December, 1940.

That was a dark and dangerous hour. We were alone, and had to face single-handed the full fury of the German attack raining down death and destruction on our cities, and still more deadly, seeking to strangle our life by cutting off the entry to our ports of the ships which brought us our food and the weapons we so sorely needed.

Only one great channel of entry remained open. That channel remained open because loyal Ulster gave us the full use of the Northern Irish ports and waters, and thus ensured the free working of the Clyde and the Mersey.

But for the loyalty of Northern Ireland and its devotion to what has now become the cause of thirty governments or nations, we should have been confronted with slavery and death, and the light which now shines so strongly throughout the world would have been quenched.

To you fell the honour of being at the head of the government of Northern Ireland not only during the supreme crisis, but throughout the two and a half years which have led us steadily forward to safety and final deliverance. I have always found you a faithful and helpful colleague and comrade, and a man who had no thought but to do his duty.

During your Premiership the bonds of affection between Great Britain and the people of Northern Ireland have been tempered by fire, and are now, I firmly believe, unbreakable. You carry with you in your retirement the regard and respect of all who have worked with you, including in a grateful spirit,

Yours, very sincerely,

Winston S. Churchill.

I say it is due these people that something should have been said in their favour. I strongly opposed the loss of these Eire ports, as did the gentleman who wrote this letter. If it had not been for the use of these ports we would have lost the last war. So much for that.

We continue to spend money on these legations, and yet Canada has never had any foreign policy. We never have had a foreign policy at any time, and we have none to-day. Just as was said last night by one of the members of the Social Credit party, we are voting this money without any explanation of what the foreign policy of this country will be in the next twelve months, or to the close of the war.

Something was said last night, and I referred to it the other day, about the condition after the war. Reference was made to Germany—poor old Germany. Some talk in the house about the great swindle of reparations in the treaty of Versailles. Well, the greatest swindle resulting from the treaty was that Germany paid in cash only £153,000,000, and yet she received loans of £1,500,000,000, which she promptly repudiated. Yes, she repudiated liabilities to that extent. Reckless loans for her rehabilitation and the blind eye on her rearmament were made, it is said, by Great Britain and France, but the United States did it too. These reckless loans to Germany for purposes of rehabilitation were turned into war making. The United States lent to hun war firms $22,000,000 to help rearm Germany, plus aid under their neutrality act, and the iniquity of it all, the myth of it all, was that we yielded to her aggression and allowed her to rearm.

These devotees of poor old Germany are still with us. They are in the old land, in the United States, and some are even here in Canada. I say we are going to have the same danger after this war as we had before. I referred to it the other day, and pointed out that it will be much greater after this war. We will have another war. Children yet unborn and those who are now infants will be called up fifteen or twenty years hence for another war.

References have been made in this debate to the United States. It would be far better for the people of Canada if they told the people of the United States the truth. They do not want us to throw all these bouquets at them. We are told by some on this side of the house that Canada is the interpreter of the United States to Great Britain. Well, as Kipling said, Great Britain does not need any interpreter; Kipling said that she knows all about the United States.

As I said the other day, it is most regrettable that in this war we have not a great poet like Kipling. We know Wordsworth said of Milton:

Milton! thou should'st be living at this hour:
England hath need of thee!

I paraphrase that, and say:

Kipling! thou should'st be living at this hour:
England hath need of thee!

He would say to the world and America what the real facts are. I have great admiration and respect for our allies. I read the Congressional Record and also the record of United States Senate proceedings, and I am driven to the conclusion that the United States speaks with two voices. She has never had any foreign policy. Until she was attacked at Pearl Harbor, what was her policy? Her policy was, as her great President has said, not to get into the war unless she was attacked. We know that their President has done a great deal for the world and for civilization, but he said that in the first two years of the war the policy of the United States was to stay out unless they were attacked. If we look back to George Washington and Andrew Jackson we find a similar foreign policy. The United States came into the war because she was attacked, just like Russia. But Great Britain was not attacked. She entered the war to honour her word on a pledge to Poland. She is the good Samaritan of the nations. So I say in dealing with our great allies we ought not to be afraid to tell them the truth. Our great ally will have more respect for us if we tell them what we think.

The views expressed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George do not commend themselves to the vast majority of the people of Canada. I believe that when the soldiers come home they will not want any such policy of isolation or separatism for the empire, because, after all is said and done, it was a great French soldier who said after the last war that Great Britain was the hardest coutnry in the world with which to make a treaty. Why was that? He pointed out that they could not deal with Great Britain as a unit, but that they had to deal with fifteen or twenty sub-dominions and colonies. He said they could never deal with her separately. And I believe that will be more apparent in the future than it has been in the past.

Under its constitution the United States always speaks with two voices. One is the congressional voice, consisting of the voices of congress and the senate. The other is the voice of the President, who has vast powers in war. From what I read, and I read extensively about the United States—I live beside that great nation, and have the greatest admiration and respect for her—I believe that after the war the United States will sooner or later become isolationist. The records show that.

We hear talk about collective security. I say there is no such thing as collective security. The only collective security was the British fleet, and the United States found that out. America had to depend on others for her defence. She depended first of all upon the French Maginot line. That fell. And then at Dunkirk, she saw herself facing invasion, with the possible loss of the British fleet and a loss of freedom on the seas, not only on the Atlantic but on the Pacific. What was the result? Her newspapers and her public men thought Britain was done and made their plea to the British empire not to surrender the fleet, or to give over that portion of it which was left. What did we do? Britain went to work without a dissenting voice and agreed to give up bases in Newfoundland and British Guiana for ninety-nine years and Canada never protested or took any part in it. The twenty years between the two great wars were the most disastrous in the history of the world; so much so that when this war came it nearly destroyed civilization. We nearly lost it, we nearly saw the end of freedom of religion and liberty. What was Canada doing during that period? The present government was in office, or a large part of it, and another government was in power for four or five years. What was the result? If you look over Hansard you will see why there has been a second war. This cannot be blamed on any one party. Canada had no policy when the various imperial conferences were held. What did we say? We said that we had no commitments, that parliament would decide. For the most part at these conferences we sided not with New Zealand and Australia, but with southern Ireland and South Africa, the separatists. I do not blame the Prime Minister for all this; he was leading just the one party.

None of these people knew anything about collective security. They all wanted to get rid of their armies and navies and air forces. I am not criticizing the policies of all the parties in trying to achieve the impossible, any more than I am criticizing the isolationist policy enunciated by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I have known him for a long time; he is an estimable younger member of the house. I understand that he works hard and I do not believe that anything I say will interfere with our friendship. But I ask him to reconsider the effect of such an announcement on isolation and separatism upon our allies and upon the peace terms; I ask him to reconsider its effect upon New Zealand and Australia and the empire. The dominion should stand first, last and at all times for the mother country. Britain cannot get on without her empire. In 1941 after the fall of Singapore I urged upon the government that there should be proper consultation and cooperation in a war cabinet set up under an empire scheme. What was the result? After the fall of Singapore, New Zealand and Australia were faced with immediate invasion.

I read the address of Sir Keith Murdock delivered in London, England, when he asked for the creation of a war time cabinet, such as we had in the last war. It would not be necessary for the Prime Minister to go to London because someone else could fulfil his functions. But nothing was done and the result is that now on foreign affairs we are just moving from week to week and from month to month nowhere.

What Canada did in the last war was done voluntarily. For the last forty years we have helped the mother country when she was attacked, and we will do the same thing to-morrow and go to her help in her hour of peril. We will continue to do what we have always done as a unit in this empire. After all is said and done, we had a previous suggestion which was similar to that made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. On March 31, 1939, a bill was introduced by the Hon. Mr. Thorson which declared to the world that if war came Canada would be neutral; she would have the status of a belligerent. This relying on status is just a pipe dream. We threw away our defences and our friends and the result was that when the war broke out we had to depend upon the mother country as in 1812 for all our defence. If it were not for Mr. Chamberlain and Munich and Dunkirk, long ago Washington and Ottawa would have had to make peace with the axis powers. When this bill was before the house on March 31, 1939, I expressed the same sentiments that I am expressing now. This bill sought to establish the status of Canada in war time. At that time I said:

> The hon. member is evidently opposed to the former leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said that when Britain is at war, Canada is at war. Let me say to my hon. friend that Canada is not going to be talked out of the British empire. If Canada could have been talked out of the British empire, it would have been talked out long ago by some of those who came to Canada a few years ago and are enjoying all the privileges and rights and liberties of this country, but who refuse to pay tribute to the mother of nations who gave us these liberties and the freedom and civilization we all enjoy. Everything we enjoy in this dominion to-day we owe to the protection of the British flag and the United Kingdom.

That bill did not pass and it did not come up again that session because within three months war was upon us. I agree with much of what my former leader, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), said yesterday about the duty of cooperation and coordination with the mother country until the end of the war and after. Any other remarks I may have to make on this matter I shall make at another time. This talk of our being a separate unit and all that kind of thing is just a repetition of what has been said before. The other day we heard Mr. Benes say that he wanted to get back after the war to his own country, Czechoslovakia. There will always be nations; patriotism is the cement that binds nations together. The downtrodden countries will be rebuilt. There is no use looking to somebody else to establish economic units in Europe, because they will never come. As a great author said long before the war, this country does not belong to those who inhabit it to-day; it is an inheritance from the past; it is a possession for the present, a trust for the future. Do not forget that we are only here to-day and away to-morrow. I believe in the British empire, past, present and future, and in the colonial empire and all that it stands for down the ages. One of the most glorious things in the history of the empire is the way the colonial empire policy has been administered, and there will be a further glory after the war in the days that are to come in the new empire.

In my opinion some of the dominions before the war were nothing but a drag on the mother country. Canadians all shouting "status" from the housetops and isolation and separatism and all that sort of thing. The people of this country do not believe in any such policy as that. The policy before the war, in 1936, 1937, 1938, and 1939 was special pleading, no overseas troops, no commitments, and so on. It would be far better if the people of Quebec knew the facts about these obligations that are being assumed by these proposed changes in the British North America Act. That is wrapped up with external affairs and the right to change our constitution from time to time. We are supposed to have separate status, which is wrapped up with the statute of Westminster. They say that they want another anthem and a flag, but the winning of the war should be the primary consideration to-day, not the secondary consideration of such matters.

This is the second time we have sent troops across the seas. This is the second time we have asked for a change in the British North America Act. We are the only dominion that has asked for a domestic change during the war. I want to draw just one other point to the attention of the Prime Minister. This is in connection with the lease-lend act and the state of affairs that will follow when we become linked up with that. It will be remembered that when the United States came into the war they loaned one hundred General Grant tanks to the British eighth army. I should like to quote what Mr. Denys Smith had to say about this. He said:

A hundred or so General Grant tanks sent to the British eighth army to aid in the defeat of Rommel were obviously welcome. A hundred or so tanks and also tank crews to man them would have obviously been even more welcome. But the lesser contribution becomes lease-lend aid and a charge against Britain, while the greater contribution would not. The Lease-Lend Act, in brief, has saddled the United Nations with an illogical principle which means that a certain type of the United States military effort is segregated and assumed to be the financial responsibility of others.

It goes on to say:

Nobody can tell what type of American Congress and administration will exist after the war or how it will employ the pressure weapon provided by lease-lend accounting. A great deal has been said about reciprocal lease-lend. It is undoubtedly useful to keep the American public aware of the fact that every nation provides its allies with aid without immediate cash compensation. But the material aid provided to the United States is never likely to be as great as that which the United States provides. It is time more attention was paid to the fundamental fallacy underlying lease-lend accounting or there may be a danger after the war of the world once again being saddled by a stifling blanket of inter-governmental debt.

It goes on to say, referring to Mr. Churchill's remark that he had not become the king's first minister to preside over the liquidation of the British empire.

What a terrible remark to make, these two groups complained. It would have been perfectly all right for the British prime minister to announce that the United Kingdom was fighting to prevent the liquidation of anybody else's territory, but to try and prevent the liquidation of British territory was the acme of selfishness.

I believe that the great masses of the American people have been right with us from the start of this war and before. But we must not forget that the United States is a cosmopolitan country. As the Manchester Guardian said before the war started the United States has quite a large population from Europe, Chicago being the second largest German city in the world. We rejoice in having this great country as our ally.

I appreciate what the Prime Minister has done. I have a great respect for him. He is a man of affairs and has worked hard on our external policy. I do not wish him to take anything that I have said this morning as spoken in a critical but constructive spirit. I am simply pointing out certain dangers to him. One of the members on the government side made a speech which I did not think was in the interest of inter-imperial relations but would tend rather to cause wide divisions among the dominions, and would not make for the good conduct of the war. I have taken a great deal of interest in foreign affairs for a number of years, and I want to say that the Prime Minister has been consistent from the start on his status policy, while I have opposed it. We never wanted this war and it was not the Prime Minister's fault alone that it came.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Can the Prime Minister tell us what the wartime information board is doing with regard to South America? I understand they are sending a Mr. Ross down there next month.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is an item under the war appropriation bill that relates to the wartime information board. When we reach that item I intend to make a full statement on the board and its work. Perhaps my hon. friend would not mind deferring his question until then.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I thought we were on that right now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Item agreed to.

37. Representation abroad—including salaries of high commissioners, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $988,990.

Mr. GREEN: Will the Prime Minister tell us whether there are any negotiations under way for the setting up after the war of an air route from Canada to Australia and New Zealand similar to the air route across the Atlantic in which Canada, Newfoundland, Eire, and Great Britain are to be partners? It is of great importance to those of us who live on the Pacific slope that there should be air connection with Australia and New Zealand and it would be of great interest to know whether any steps have been taken leading to the setting up of such a route, and if not has the government such negotiations in mind?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The whole question of air routes after the war is one of the most important and at the same time one of the largest questions which not only this government but all the governments have to face. For some time past there has been consideration of matters related to the question of aviation in its different aspects, but I would not wish to describe what has taken place thus far as being in the nature of negotiations. The stage of negotiations has not been reached, but the whole subject is being considered very carefully so that when the time does come to discuss these matters in a final way the government will be fully informed and prepared to make its own decision in respect thereto.

Mr. GREEN: Is the government giving consideration to a trans-Pacific route as well as a trans-Atlantic route?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I might say that all possible routes are being considered and their possibilities explored.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not think the Prime Minister answered a question I asked the other day in connection with post-war aviation, with particular reference to the convening of a conference that was reported in the press in a dispatch from Washington, dated July 8, reading in part as follows:

> Discussions among British commonwealth countries on the broad subject of post-war aviation are being proposed by the British government, it was reported here to-day.
> The meeting, likely to be held in London, will precede any aviation conference among the united nations.

Is the Prime Minister in a position to advise whether negotiations are at present going on with the British government for the convening of that conference?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has heard of fishing expeditions. There are members of the press in all countries who are anxious to find out what is going on in other countries. I regard the press report to which reference has been made, as I said in the house the other day, as flying a kite with a view to drawing information from this administration that might be used elsewhere for purposes that might serve certain ends but perhaps not all the ends that we would wish to see served. I prefer to say nothing at this time in reply to the question my hon. friend has asked, but he may be sure that with respect to all of these most important post-war questions careful consideration is being given to the proper steps to be taken as between the different governments concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister has covered a wide range in discussing the objectives behind these inquiries in connection with international air routes. When I raised the question he spoke of it as a trial balloon; now it is a fishing expedition, and at another time flying a kite. That covers quite a range.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am saying that it is the press correspondents who are flying the kites and balloons and fishing.

Mr. GRAYDON: Oh, quite.

Item agreed to.

39. Expenses in connection with the negotiation of treaties, $5,000.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I suppose this sum is to cover travelling expenses and so forth in connection with the various negotiations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Incidental expenses in connection with negotiations.

Item agreed to.

41. Grant to the International Red Cross Committee, $25,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the Prime Minister explain what he means by the International red cross committee? Is that a special organization outside the Red Cross Society?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the committee at Geneva, the work of which on Canada's behalf has been very much increased. In the supplementary estimates we intend to ask for a sum of $15,000 in addition to what is requested here. The committee has been giving a great deal of time and attention to matters relating to the needs of our prisoners of war in internment camps in Europe and Asia.

Mr. GRAYDON: A good deal of work has been done and excellent service rendered by some body—perhaps this committee, though I am not sure—in the forwarding and transferring of parcels to prisoners of war in various parts of enemy-occupied countries. I rather fancy this committee handles that work, but I am only supposing so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The International Red Cross is supported by contributions from governments and national Red Cross societies. As the central committee at Geneva has received generous grants from the Swiss government and the Swiss public, little if any of the funds contributed by the belligerent countries is required to support the central organization, and therefore the greater part is spent by the committee in their work on behalf of prisoners of war and interned civilians. Delegates who visit prisoner and internment camps regularly are maintained by the committee in all belligerent countries. These delegates make reports on camp conditions which are duly transmitted by the international committee to the interested governments. They also do a great deal to provide comforts and means of recreation for prisoners of war. The amount of work which the international committee is doing on behalf of Canadian prisoners of war and internees in enemy hands is steadily increasing as the number of Canadian prisoners of war in enemy hands increases. With the outbreak of war in the far east a further responsibility has been placed on the International Red Cross. Three new delegates have been named in Japan, Shanghai and Hong Kong, and reports have been and are now being received from them.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are the relationships with Japan, so far as the International Red Cross is concerned, working out favourably now, and has there been a change for the better in connection with the operations of the prisoners of war situation in that country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are somewhat better, but still far from satisfactory.

Mr. CHURCH: I would ask the Prime Minister to table a copy of the American Red Cross report for 1939 with respect to China. I ask that question for the information of the house. Secondly, has the Prime Minister further information with regard to the continued shackling of Canadian prisoners through the International Red Cross?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall have to look into the report first and refresh my memory on its contents before deciding whether it should be tabled.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the Japanese government allow representatives of the International Red Cross committee to make investigations and visit prisoners of war in that country as a normal part of their procedure?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the Prime Minister give us any information, either from Red Cross sources or from any other, as to the position of the Canadian civilian in Japan? Is he allowed his liberty, is he interned, is he working? The reason I ask the question is that I should like to be in a position to make a comparison between the way in which the Canadian is treated in Japan and the way in which the Japanese are treated in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question is a wide one. I am not in a position to give information at the moment, but at some subsequent time perhaps I shall be able to do so.

Mr. GREEN: Last night the Prime Minister said he would try to get the figures on the number of Japanese in Canada who have asked to be repatriated. Can he give those figures to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will try to have all particulars asked for last night given to the committee this afternoon when we come again to the war appropriation bill. They were asked in that connection and I was holding the information until that time. The total number of Canadians in the far east at present is approximately 1,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Civilians?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. In Europe, 1,120. Of internees, there are in the far east 163 and in Europe 300.

Item agreed to.

Canada's contributions to maintenance of external organizations.

43. Expenses of the League of Nations for 1943, including secretariat, international labour organization and permanent court of international justice, $125,700.

Mr. CHURCH: I have already expressed my opinion on the League of Nations, but I do not see why there is any reason for the league's useless existence at all at the present time. It is fulfilling no useful function. Secondly, with regard to the permanent international court of justice, I suggest that Russia is not going to wait for the establishment of any court of justice out here in America, which is thousands of miles away from the scenes of slaughter. A million Polish Jews have been taken to the abattoir in Poland and other places, and Russia will deal with the situation on the spot and execute those responsible before any court of justice can sit. As regards the other feature of this whole question, we are still expending money on the League of Nations, and all I can say is that I do not believe in it and never did. I do not believe in this form of collective security. We can see similar ideals of other great empires in the past propounded in the days of such writers as Gibbon and later Bryce, and for my part I have no confidence in them, because I am firmly convinced that nothing will ensure our safety in the future so much as the British navy and British arms. So long as Britain is armed you may be sure that we shall have collective security, and that security is immeasurably strengthened by the fleet. After all, the Monroe doctrine was just the British fleet for a hundred years. It is but an ideal.

Mr. REID: Are the members of the league meeting just now and what members are meeting? Where are they meeting and why the increase this year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The vote for 1943-44 for the Canadian contribution to the League of Nations is $125,700 compared with $97,500 in 1942-43 and $120,330 in 1941-42. Although there has been some increase in the vote, it is much lower than Canada's contribution in the years before the war. The chief reason for the increase this year is that effect has been given to a recommendation of the international labour conference held in New York in 1941, that a special grant of 1,000,000 Swiss francs should be provided for the international labour office for the study of post-war reconstruction.

The international labour office has been proceeding with its programme of study in accordance with this recommendation and the amounts necessary to cover the work done in 1942 and to be achieved this year are both included in the league budget for 1943. Another reason for the current increase has been that certain states under axis control gave, over two years ago, notice of their retirement, and this notice has now become effective, thus reducing the potential contributors to the support of the league institutions. The league is financed by assessing against each member state a certain number of units of contribution based roughly on each state's capacity to pay. Canada has for many years been assessed 35 units. Most of the satellite European states under axis control have ceased to be members of the league and the contributions assessed against the allied European governments whose territories have been overrun by the enemy have been reduced to token figures. Hence the total number of units of contribution has been sharply reduced and the member states in the British commonwealth, Latin America and elsewhere whose territories have not been overrun by the enemy bear a higher proportion of the total budget.

My hon. friend is aware that the international labour office is at present located in Montreal and is carrying on its business there, and has had various meetings. The league assembly and the council are not in being at this time.

Item agreed to.

44. Portion of expenditure of the imperial economic committee, $1,575.

Mr. GRAYDON: What are the total expenses connected with the imperial economic committee, and who share the balance of the expenses which are incurred? I see that our portion is $1,575. Perhaps the Prime Minister would give the committee some further details as to what the committee exercises its jurisdiction over.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The governments of the empire accepted the recommendation of the imperial committee on economic consultation and cooperation that the dominions should share the financial responsibilities for the joint services to be carried on, instead of leaving them to be borne wholly by the United Kingdom.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The cost of the imperial economic committee is from a fund to which the participating governments contribute on the scale recommended by the imperial committee on economic consultation and cooperation, 1933. This fund, since 1st October, 1933, has been £20,200 a year. The imperial economic committee, in the financial statement and forecast for the period 1st April, 1938, to 31st March, 1943, foresee that the work at present in view would make it desirable to increase the fund to £22,000 a year.

Imperial Economic committee, £22,000; Canada's share on scale recommended would be £3,520.

In 1940-41 we were asked to provide fifty per cent of our normal requirements and to make contributions as it was found necessary. In 1941-42 we reduced the amount to twenty-five per cent of normal requirements and were only asked to provide ten per cent. For 1942-43 we have been informed that United Kingdom and commonwealth members of the imperial economic committee are providing ten per cent of the original contribution, which in Canada's case is £352. For 1943-44 we have been informed that United Kingdom and commonwealth members of the imperial economic committee are providing ten per cent of original contribution, which in Canada's case is £352.

Mr. BLACKMORE: To what kind of work does this committee devote its attention?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the moment the committee is existing more or less in a skeleton form. In ordinary times its work consists in sharing as between the different parts of the British empire information on important economic matters of mutual interest and concern.

Mr. BLACKMORE: While I realize the Prime Minister must answer in general terms, the members of the committee have no possible way of determining what kind of work this committee is doing. Are they, for example, endeavouring to learn how the nations of the empire can trade to better advantage, how they can overcome adverse trade balances, how they can repay international debts —all that sort of thing—or are they devoting their time to finding out where they can be producing sugar, wool or other products? I should like to know what this committee is, what it has done for us, and whether we are justified in supporting it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Here again may I say to my hon. friend that, where reports are in existence, which contain detailed information, it is reasonable to expect that hon. members will consult the reports. The reports of this committee have been tabled, they are in the library, they give the details. In general terms, the work is largely statistical, the gathering of statistical information which will be of service to different parts of the empire on economic questions. I cannot tell my hon. friend from memory what particular statistics are being or have been gathered. But it is one of those organizations which is a helpful reference organization on matters of economic importance and interest to all parts of the British commonwealth.

Item agreed to.

45. Portion of expenses of international wheat council, $2,775.

Mr. MARSHALL: This is an entirely new item. Is there any relationship between the former committee, which was the wheat advisory committee, and this international wheat council, and would the Prime Minister tell us the names of the members of the council and give us any other information he may have?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is correct in assuming that this council supersedes the old advisory committee. The countries represented are Canada, Australia, Argentina, the United States and the United Kingdom.

Mr. MARSHALL: This is not an advisory committee to the wheat board? It has no connection with it whatever?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. It has been set up under the wheat agreement. It is not a local body.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Am I correct in assuming that the object of this committee is to limit production of Canadian wheat? I understand that the object of the international wheat agreement was to limit production.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; I think my hon. friend is wrong in saying that such was the object of the agreement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am merely suggesting it; I did not say so.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL: There is an item just below that in the next column, "Appropriation not required for 1943-44, $1,955." What does that cover?

The CHAIRMAN: Hon. members will please turn to page 30, item 247, Prime Minister's office.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. We have not finished the other items on page 8, have we?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The remaining items are statutory appropriations.

Mr. MARSHALL: I did not catch what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry; I thought my hon. friend had concluded what he had to say.

Mr. MARSHALL: The question I asked the Prime Minister was, on page 8 of the estimates there appears in italics the words, "Appropriation not required for 1943-44, $1,955." What does that refer to?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was for the old wheat advisory committee. This council, as I have said, supersedes that committee; we are requesting a vote for the council and dropping the vote for the advisory committee.

Mr. QUELCH: Has the wheat council a central office at some point?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Its headquarters are in Washington.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the dominion government look upon the recommendations of this wheat council as binding? Is there anything in the working of this council that at all resembles the pernicious thing that was done in 1937, when Canada agreed not to produce more beet sugar, for example?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The body is purely advisory, and all the agreements have been tabled.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN: (Mr. Golding): If hon. members will turn to page 30—

Mr. GRAYDON: Before we do that, Mr. Chairman, there is a point I think perhaps should be raised here in connection with two items which, as the Prime Minister quite properly pointed out, are statutory and cannot be reduced by a vote in committee. Nevertheless I think they must be passed by the committee in order that the amounts provided may be made actually available.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. Parliament has already appropriated the money by statute.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely that does not prevent a discussion of the items, since they are in the estimates. I think on previous occasions we have always taken the position that even though some statutory provision was made for a certain sum of money to be paid, as long as it actually appeared in the estimates for the current year we were not precluded from discussing such items.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no desire to preclude any discussion, but I thought my hon. friends' objection was raised to the chairman calling another item. There are no further items to be called under the heading of external affairs, because in connection with the statutory items the necessary supply has already been appropriated by parliament.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is the case why do they appear in the estimates at all?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They help to give the house a picture of the total expenditures, some of which represent appropriations made year by year, while others are appropriations by statute covering once and for all a period of years.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): What the Prime Minister says is quite true in all respects, except that he knows it has been the practice in other years to call these items.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is quite wrong in making that statement. They are not called, because the money has already been appropriated. However, the leader of the opposition is quite right in saying that if there is any matter pertaining to external affairs it should be open to the committee to question the government with respect to it at some time in a consideration of the estimates.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have one or two questions I should like to ask on this general item, if I may, in connection with the annuity payable to Hon. Philippe Roy. Could the Prime Minister tell me when the legislation was passed providing for this annuity, how long it has been paid, and how long it will be paid in future according to the legislation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The appropriation was made in 1938, when the Hon. Philippe Roy retired from the post of minister to France. The annuity has been paid since that time. How long it will continue to be paid will depend upon how long Mr. Roy continues to live, which I hope may be for many years.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words, it was made payable during his lifetime?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that the general practice in connection with those who retire from the diplomatic service?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In Mr. Roy's case there were exceptional reasons. Mr. Roy had been appointed years ago as commissioner-general to France, before Canada had any legations. When the legation at Paris was opened Mr. Roy was made the first minister. At the time this annuity was granted to Mr. Roy his long and quite exceptional service to Canada, as our representative in France, was taken into consideration by parliament, and it was thought appropriate to accord that recognition to one who had given so many years of distinguished service. I might say to my hon. friend that the whole question of what in our diplomatic service should be granted in the way of allowances or annuities or pensions on retirement is a very large problem which up to the present we have not faced squarely. At different times the department has tried to work out a scheme that would cover the entire diplomatic service and have it placed on a basis similar to that which exists in Britain with respect to pensions and retiring allowances. One circumstance after another has prevented us from getting ahead with that particular plan. For the last four years, of course, the war has accounted for the fact that we have not brought forward any scheme of pensions to such members of the public service on retirement.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was Mr. Roy in the public service for some considerable time prior to accepting his original commission in France?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For some years Mr. Roy was a senator in this parliament. His original appointment as commissioner-general to France was made as long ago as 1911. From 1911 to 1928, I think it was, he was commissioner; and from 1928—

Mr. GRAYDON: Was he still a senator while he was commissioner?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no; he resigned from the senate at the time of his appointment.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the Prime Minister any details as to his salary as commissioner to France?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not recall what his salary was as commissioner, but as minister his salary was $12,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: And how long was he minister to France before he retired and accepted this annuity?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I was about to say, he was minister for ten years. Before that he was commissioner for a number of years, going back to 1911.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think perhaps I am in a particularly good position to discuss this item in an entirely detached way, because I approach it without any knowledge at all of what lies back of it. It is a straight question of principle, in view of the many calls upon the public treasury. I have a full realization of what the Prime Minister has said, that this constitutes a difficult problem for the government; nevertheless I do not not think the item should be passed just as a matter of course without drawing to the attention of the government and of the public generally the suggestion that we cannot be too careful about safeguarding the position in regard to payments of this kind. There are many people to-day who come to the late years of their lives, having perhaps rendered great service to the nation, who still are not safeguarded and protected by statute or by appropriations such as this. I do not want my remarks to be taken as any reflection upon the personality involved in this instance, because I know of no reason why I should place my remarks on that basis, but I believe the Prime Minister and the government will readily recognize the feeling that exists throughout the country with respect to many of these annuities and pensions to men who have given certain service to the country. In cases where low salaries have been paid, where men have worked for the government for many years at such salaries, one can realize that such men would not be able to put very much aside for a rainy day. In previous years, before I became leader of the opposition, I have drawn other instances to the attention of the government to show the possibility of grave misunderstanding and to indicate that there does not exist any equality of treatment in this regard. Perhaps you cannot attempt to establish any real measure of equality right across the country in connection with these matters. Nevertheless it is apt to be misunderstood, regardless of the position of the person affected. I believe the Prime Minister will understand any observations I make with respect to the Hon. Philippe Roy, and that I certainly would not wish to do him any injustice in anything I say. I would point out however that the government must exercise great caution in a matter of this kind, and I raise the matter only as one of principle.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree entirely with my hon. friend as to the desirability of safeguarding a principle. But I would point out that the many considerations which prompted the granting of this annuity were carefully considered by parliament at the time it was granted. Some of the circumstances come to mind at the moment. Mr. Roy was our representative in France throughout the whole of the last war. During that time his home was open house—I believe I may use that expression—to Canadian soldiers and to visitors from Canada. Both Madame Roy and Mr. Roy devoted their time and energy, day in and day out, and also contributed very liberally from their own personal means to furthering the well-being of members of the Canadian forces who from time to time were in Paris, and in extending hospitality to members of governments, high officials and others who happened to be in Paris. It was apparent that the service Mr. Roy had rendered was a very exceptional one, and one which ought to be recognized by parliament. I would add that I believe the annuity was supported by members in all parts of the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not sure that $5,000 is either too much or too little, but I am thoroughly in accord with the principle underlying the granting of annuities to men who have given great service to their country. Perhaps this would be a fitting time to observe that there are many thousands of people in Canada who have rendered great service to the country. Ordinarily we refer to them as old age pensioners, each and every one of whom is entitled to an annuity which will enable him to live in peace and contentment. I would remind the Prime Minister that there is a considerable agitation throughout the country in favour of reducing to sixty-five years the age at which old age pensions may be received, and for increasing the pension to $30 a month. I believe the Prime Minister would do well to mention these facts to his cabinet, and at the same time to express himself favourably in this connection.

Item agreed to.

International Joint Commission—salaries and expenses of the commission, $75,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have all the vacancies on the commission been filled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one vacancy.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the Prime Minister recall whose death or removal caused the vacancy?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was the death of Mr. Kyte, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who constitute the commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. Charles Stewart, chairman of the Canadian section, is one of the members, and Mr. J. E. Perrault, of the province of Quebec, is another. There is one vacancy. Then, there are three members of the United States section.

Mr. MARSHALL: How much was expended last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the information before me, but I shall have it later in the day.

Item agreed to.

248. Privy council office—general administration, $77,925.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the Prime Minister any details of this amount?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are to be found at page 171 of the estimates.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is satisfactory.

Item agreed to.

84. Office of the secretary to the Governor General, including allowance of $2,500 per annum to the secretary to the Governor General, $104,745.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would there be any objection to carrying this item?

Mr. GRAYDON: There would be no objection, except that someone in committee yesterday indicated a desire to speak with respect to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We said we would not open another department. This is not another department; however, I am quite prepared to allow it to stand.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would rather permit it to pass, but in what I have said I am just protecting the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand. The item is the same as we have passed for some years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is still in the same department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, this covers the office of the secretary to the Governor General.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But it comes under the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. The Prime Minister usually makes himself responsible for estimates in the name of the Governor General's office. I felt I might not happen to be in the house at a time when items were being passed near the close of the session, and that it might be more convenient to pass it now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would favour passing it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, let it go through.

Item agreed to.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, July 12, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

External Affairs, sundry services, $163,000.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, last night the leader of the opposition asked if I would give a break-down of the item for $163,000. It is as follows:

Evacuation of staff	$ 5,000
Evacuation of offices	30,000
Consular services St. Pierre	5,000
Permanent joint board on defence	5,000
Joint economic committee	20,000
Evacuation of Japanese nationals	25,000
Claims allotment	50,000
Special war time assistants, Prime Minister's office	23,000
Total	$163,000

Mr. GRAYDON: Have we a consular representative at St. Pierre?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has he been there only since the seizure of the island by the de Gaullist forces, or was he there prior to that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was subsequent.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the Prime Minister answer the question I asked with regard to the wartime information board sending men to South America and Central America?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As that brings up the subject of the wartime information board, I should like to make a statement to precede discussion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Were we not to take general administration first?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We may do so if hon. members prefer. The item will be found on page 925 of Hansard of March 3, 1943:

Statutory orders and regulations division—general administration, $22,608.

Mr. CLAXTON: This item covers just one activity of the privy council office, that concerned with the registration and publication of Canadian War Orders and Regulations. In 1942 it was found that there were a great number of war orders and regulations, some of which were being published in the Canada Gazette and others by departmental means. It was considered desirable to have the orders of all departments as well as of the governor general in council registered in one place in the privy council office and printed. If they were of general interest they were to be included in a publication to be issued. Since November, 1942, this work has been carried on and this item is to cover the cost.

Mr. GRAYDON: How is it decided whether they are of general interest?

Mr. CLAXTON: General instructions were given in the order in council which set up the division of the privy council office. This is P.C. 10793, of which section 4 reads:

4. A registry shall be established in the privy council office, under the supervision of the director, in which shall be filed copies of:

(a) proclamations relating to the war and all orders of the governor in council, including minutes of council and of treasury board, relating to the war, of a legislative character or of an administrative character having general effect or imposing a penalty;

(b) all orders, rules and regulations, relating to the war, of a legislative character or of an administrative character having general effect or imposing a penalty, made by ministers of the crown;

(c) all orders, rules and regulations, relating to the war, of a legislative character or of an administrative character having general effect or imposing a penalty, made by a government board, agency, controller, administrator or other officer who may have authority to make such enactments.

That section contains the definition of the orders which are registered and which are to be published in this publication.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is legislation of an administrative character or that which imposes a penalty?

Mr. CLAXTON: Of a legislative character or of an administrative character having general effect or imposing a penalty.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is one thing for which the Prime Minister deserves commendation. Prior to the publication of these orders in council and proclamations month by month it was very difficult to have any conception of what the law was on the matters covered by orders in council without undertaking a great deal of research and unnecessary work. I have a further suggestion to make. Except for one or two returns that have been brought down during the period of this parliament and which set forth various statutes which have been amended, suspended or abrogated in whole or in part, there is no reference available either to the legal profession as a whole, to business or to members of parliament which would disclose the statutes that have been so amended. I should like to see this present publication continued, as no doubt it will be, but I would suggest that an appendix be added to each issue giving a record of the statutes which have been amended or abrogated, either in whole or in part. It would also be of great benefit to have a list containing all statutes which have been so affected up to date, and also have an addition to the statutes of Canada as they are issued each year giving this information. It is almost impossible to know the position with respect to these matters, even with the assistance of this monthly publication.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed by the clerk of the council that he and others have been giving consideration to the very matter referred to by my hon. friend, and they hope to be able to meet the problem he has raised.

Mr. STIRLING: I should like to see a reproduction of the very useful directory which was published a year and a half ago and which gave information in connection with the various boards and controllers and committees which exist as a consequence of our war activities. This was issued by the predecessors of the wartime information board and it has not been reproduced. It is hard enough when we are in Ottawa to find out who are the members of this board or that committee and where they are located, but when we go to the different parts of Canada it is utterly impossible to get this information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the suggestion of my hon. friend is a good one, and I shall make it a point to recommend that the present war information board bring up to date the information which was contained in the original publication.

Mr. CHURCH: Statutory orders are of two classes. First, there are the statutes passed by this parliament, but another innovation has crept in of recent years. Orders of controls and subcontrols and other bodies are given the force and effect of statutes. This matter has been criticized in the old land. We have spent only one or two days on foreign affairs, which is one of the most important questions before us, and I suggest that in the recess of parliament the Prime Minister consider issuing white papers on the war to inform us as to what is going on. We should have been told, for instance, about North Africa and many other matters. I think it would clear up a lot of misunderstandings and settle a lot of doubts and fears if the Prime Minister would issue white papers from time to time. I hope he will consider the suggestion in the recess of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to give consideration to my hon. friend's suggestion.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I suggest that as there will probably be a discussion of some importance on the wartime information board, we might call it one o'clock.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean that our general discussion with respect to privy council matters is closed when discussion on the wartime information board begins?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Wartime information board, $658,000.

Mr. CHURCH: Before we proceed to the discussion of this item, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a statement on a question of privilege. Last Friday I ordered one hundred copies of Hansard of Tuesday, July 6, to send out to Toronto for distribution among my constituents. They were put into sealed envelopes and mailed by a messenger. Unknown to me, the copies that arrived for distribution were French copies, and they reached their destination over the week-end of July 12. Prominent Orange leaders and others, including ministers of the gospel, received them. The hoax was on me and I received many good-natured notes from several members this morning. I do not believe that the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services had anything to do with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before saying anything about the work of the wartime information board, a word is, I think, desirable about the purpose of governmental information services in war time.

Information has two sides: one is the provision of information within the country; the other the dissemination in other countries of information about our country and its war effort. I shall first say a word about information within the country.

In modern total war, the whole of the energies and resources of the country, above those needed to maintain the health and efficiency of the people, must be directed into channels which contribute to the prosecution of the war.

This process involves a transformation of the occupations and the habits of life of a large proportion of the people; and some degree of interference with the ordinary peace-time behaviour of almost everyone in the country.

In a democracy, success in achieving these ends depends on the willing consent and participation of the vast majority. It is not as in dictatorships where despots seek acquiescence by force and delusive propaganda. It is for citizens of a democracy themselves to be convinced of the need for doing what is required of them. To have that conviction they must have the facts clearly put before them. They must know what is required of them and why. They must be told what are the ends that are sought, and how it is proposed to achieve them. They must know the results of the policies with which they are asked to comply. They must be informed of the progress of the effort of the nation in which they are taking part. They have a right to know everything connected with the war, except where lives would be endangered, or the enemy aided, or where the national interest would be hurt. Indeed if they are to set their minds to the fullest participation in war-time activities they must have the greatest possible knowledge and understanding of these activities.

Of course, all this information does not take the form of government "hand-outs," broadcasts by ministers, or interviews with the press. In this country, I venture to say that parliament itself is the greatest of all the information services. The members come here from all parts of the country; they know what is in the minds of their constituents; they reflect the views, the doubts, the questions, sometimes even the confusion in the public mind, in their speeches in the house, in questions to the government, in conversation with ministers and officials and in many other ways I do not need to recall to hon. members. Naturally the information brought out in parliament flows back in turn from hon. members themselves, through the press, the radio, et cetera, to the public.

The press and the radio, films, discussion clubs, service clubs and voluntary organizations throughout the country are all invaluable instruments of war-time information. Their contribution to information and understanding is all the more valuable because it is tempered by criticism, and by all the constructive impulses which are born of freedom.

With these free agencies operating as effectively as they do, a free country does not need the elaborate information machine of a dictatorship. Nor does it for the further reason that it is not trying to do the thinking for the people as in a dictatorship, or to supply their attitudes ready made. It has been found necessary, however, in all democratic countries in war time to set up information services to aid and supplement the work of the regular free agencies. The magnitude and complexity of national war-time activities are so great that auxiliary facilities are needed. These are provided by information services whose task it is to work inside the government machinery to help collate and bring out the facts, and make them readily available to the voluntary agencies. Thus, by filling a need to help increase the flow of factual material of all kinds to the people, information services have a vital part in democracy in war time.

I turn now to the reasons for disseminating information in other countries about the war effort of our own country. I shall say very little on this point because I believe the need is almost unanimously acknowledged both in the house and the country.

Canada is a partner in the company of united nations. The success of the combined efforts of the allied powers depends largely upon mutual good-will. Good-will in turn demands accurate, full and constant information. It is the acknowledged aim of the enemy's propaganda to sow discord among the united nations by spreading lies and half-truths in each of the allied nations about its partners. So important do the nazis consider this warfare of words, or political warfare, that they have spent and continued to spend staggering sums on propaganda. The germs of false propaganda can only do their evil work in the darkness of ignorance. They can be destroyed only with the light of truth. But it is still more satisfactory if accurate information can be supplied before the false propaganda is spread abroad. That is why every free country at war has given so much attention to disseminating information outside its own borders.

Before the present war, Canada had little or no experience of this important side of war-time activity. The government approached it with caution and hesitation. For obvious reasons, it was more important for Canada to see that accurate information was available in the United States than in any other country. Before the United States entered the war that was a matter of extreme delicacy. After the entry of the United States, the technical difficulties were not so great, but the American people became increasingly absorbed in their own war effort, and consequently relatively less interested in the activities of another country. This situation increased the danger of misunderstandings. There was a growing concern in Canada to find some means of preventing possible misunderstanding by the provision of accurate information in the United States. Several hon. members gave expression to that concern. The concern was fully shared by the government, and it was out of that concern that the wartime information board was established.

In order to secure the most expert advice as to the appropriate action to meet that problem, the government invited Mr. Charles Vining, one of the leading authorities in the field of public relations, to examine the situation and prepare a report. When Mr. Vining's report was received, no time was lost in considering its recommendations. They were wholeheartedly accepted by the government and as a measure of our readiness to give full effect to them, Mr. Vining was invited to be chairman of the wartime information board he had recommended. He was given a completely free hand in organizing the work of the board.

One of Mr. Vining's fundamental recommendations was that external and domestic informational activities should be combined under a single unified administration. Up to that time, domestic war-time information had been administered by the bureau of public information in the Department of National War Services. The bureau was well organized and had been doing good work under the direction of Mr. Herbert Lash and Mr. Claude Melancon. I should like to record the government's appreciation of their faithful service as pioneers in this difficult field of wartime activity.

It was primarily to meet the need for external activities that the wartime information board was established. Mr. Vining supervised the establishment of offices in New York and Washington, and of a headquarters staff in Ottawa which would keep these offices abroad fully and regularly informed of developments in Canada.

To the great regret of the government, Mr. Vining was obliged by continued ill-health to give up his duties as chairman of the board. On his recommendation, an alteration was made in the administrative structure of the board to provide for a general manager to act as chief executive officer. Mr. John Grierson, the government film commissioner, accepted this post in addition to the one he already occupied with the national film board. This combination of functions has the advantage of effecting a further coordination of wartime informational activities, since the work of the national film board in wartime is inevitably largely concerned with the furtherance of the war effort.

It is not my intention to give a detailed description of the organization of the wartime information board, with which most hon. members are, I am sure, already familiar. I should like, however, to say that the government feels it has been particularly fortunate to have secured the services of President Norman MacKenzie of the university of New Brunswick, and the Hon. F. Philippe Brais, as chairman and vice-chairman respectively. Their able and disinterested guidance has been invaluable in the work of the board.

Before attempting to explain the functions of the board, I think it is desirable to explain what it is not. In the first place, the board is not a "publicity bureau", as some people seem to imagine. It is not engaged in competition with the press, the radio, films or any other medium of news or publicity. Nor is the board a "news agency". It is not a competitor of the press agencies, the press gallery or any other agencies which gather and disseminate news. The board, most emphatically, is not a "censorship bureau" or a central agency or "bottleneck" for the release of governmental announcements. It was not established to supplant the regular channels of communication between government departments and agencies and the press. The object of the board is to stimulate and facilitate the flow of information from the various wartime agencies and departments of government to the public through the normal channels of press, radio, films and public speakers. Far from competing with these agencies of publicity, the purpose of the board is to help them.

In the greatly enlarged, very complicated, and very busy machinery of wartime government it can easily come about that information needs of the people in Canada, and of the nation in the outside world, are not always given the fullest consideration. The board has worked to ensure as far as possible that these are met—that the facts are brought out, and appear in the clearest way. In many subjects, for instance, several departments are concerned, and in these fields the board seeks to coordinate information and see that it is made available in useful forms.

To carry out this task most effectively, the board is particularly concerned to study the information needs of the public. The controls, restrictions, compulsory orders and appeals for voluntary action necessary in wartime inevitably raise questions and sometimes, I regret to say, even confusion in many minds. It is vital to the effective prosecution of the war to bring these questions quickly to the attention of the appropriate government agencies and to see that satisfactory answers are provided. It is even more important to clear up confusion rapidly whenever it arises. The wartime information board is constantly watching for signs of the information required by the public and keeping the government informed as to the need for providing fuller and clearer information. As a result of its labours, there is more news available to the press, better information available to the public, and a wider knowledge of the action and objectives of the wartime agencies of the government, and a greater understanding of the manifold national war activities which all Canadians, in one way or another, have a part.

As to the degree of success achieved by the board, I shall not ask hon. members to accept my own opinion. The external activities of the board were the chief new departure. As the minister responsible to parliament for the work of the board, I was particularly concerned to satisfy myself as to the effectiveness of the board's activities outside Canada and, particularly, in the United States.

Hon. members will realize that I am not able personally to give more than a very small part of my own time and thought to the work of the wartime information board. I was very anxious therefore to obtain an independent judgment from someone thoroughly competent to assess its activities.

When I learned that Mr. Vining's health would necessitate his retirement, I carefully considered asking Mr. W. R. Givens to accept the chairmanship of the board. I did not do so only because I learned that Mr. Givens did not, at the time, feel equal to assuming so exacting a burden. My reason for thinking of him in that connection, in addition to the qualifications inherent in his long and exceptionally distinguished career as a journalist and his wide knowledge of the United States, was my desire to take every precaution to see that the board should be strictly non-partisan in its activities and should concern itself exclusively with its appropriate war-time functions. Moreover, I felt that Mr. Givens' long association with the Conservative party would remove any vestige of suspicion that the government was not single-minded in its policy with respect to the objectives of the board.

When I learned that Mr. Givens planned to spend a few days in New York I asked him if he would find it possible to prolong his stay sufficiently to survey the activities of the New York office with the object of giving me the benefit of his judgment with respect to its work. This he has been kind enough to do and I now propose to read, to the house, Mr. Givens' report.

The report is in the form of a letter dated June 7, 1943, from 10 Maitland street, Kingston, Ontario:

Right Hon. Mackenzie King, M.P.,
Prime Minister,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. King:

A year ago or thereabouts I wrote to you expressing regret that the Canadian war information board did not seem to be meeting with much success in the United States in its endeavour to publicize Canada and Canada's war efforts. I have to confess that at that time I had been given to understand that the New York branch of the war information board was in existence and in full running order, when as a matter of fact as I have since learned, the New York office was not established until September last and then only with a single room, and that it did not get into real operation for several months. Consequently such criticisms, including my own, as were at the time passed upon the workings of the board were without knowledge of the facts and manifestly unfair to the board.

For this reason (and, as well, because I noted with satisfaction, while in the south this winter, the surprising and gratifying increase in the number of Canadian articles appearing in the American press) I took it upon myself at the end of May to stop off for a week in New York city to study the workings of the New York office of the board and to observe its functioning. In this, I may say, I was given a completely free hand and received the heartiest cooperation of the members of the staff. I had in mind three objectives—one, to look into the necessity of the work; two, to ascertain, if possible, whether the right kind of information was being put out and in correct and presentable manner; and, three, to see if the results were commensurate with the cost—this last because of recent criticisms, directed against the salaries of some of the staff in the New York office.

As to the organization: It will be well at the outset to point out that an organization such as the war information board operates within very definite limits. It has no organ of its own, and no newspaper of its own, but must depend upon the good-will and cooperation of the news agencies and feature syndicates to whom it offers its wares, and who act as the ultimate distributors to the various newspapers, periodicals and magazines of the country. It should be added, too, that not even the excellence and timeliness of these articles will assure their publication because of the limitation of space or, mayhap, because they have been covered in part in another field or by special writers. Thus, no matter how good the work of information boards such as the Canadian and British boards may be, they can have no assurance that their offerings will be accepted. They simply must depend for distribution and acceptance upon the independent news services and agencies—though occasionally a newspaper or magazine here and there may be approached direct—since these services and agencies serve scores of newspapers and periodicals and, because of their highly perfected organizations, are in a position to give satisfaction to the full. For the board itself to undertake the work of dealing separately with the thousands of American newspapers and publications would necessitate a very large organization and a huge outlay of money. The wisest and by far the more economical way is for the board to collect its news and features, as now, and then offer them to the news services and agencies to be assembled by these agencies, who in turn will offer them to their clientele—newspapers, supplements, magazines, etc.—after they have first been assembled in such form as mostly likely to have greatest appeal to the reading public.

The question of necessity: As to the necessity of the work; of that there can be no doubt. Canada very badly needs publicity in the United States, not alone in respect of our war work, but indeed in respect of ourselves, our position within the empire and the kind of government we have, to say nothing of our future. Astounding as it may seem, there are many Americans yet who do not realize that Canada is no longer a colony wholly free from British control and as indepedent in every respect as the United States itself. These people are astonished to learn that we frame our own laws—even tariff laws against British goods—that we make our own treaties; that in respect of the present war we entered into it of our own volition and that our government functions apart from, and wholly free of, the British government. There are even some Americans who imagine that we would be glad to become an integral part of the republic, to which one is only too glad to be able to give the answer, "Closer and more friendly relations—yes! Nothing could be more desirable and be it added, more necessary. But beyond that, no! The people of the United States fought for their independence and won it. We in Canada, who have won ours by peaceful methods, value it none the less highly than the Americans theirs, and so we shall retain it."

Then, as to what Canada has done or is doing in the war, the lack of information in the United States up to within a few months ago was deplorable. All this is now happily being changed, thanks to the work of the Canadian board as now constituted.

As to the information: As to whether the information we are putting out is the right kind, or whether we are doing it in the right way, the answer is "yes", and I speak by the book; for on my visit to the New York office I saw hundreds of articles in newspapers from coast to coast, as well as in some magazines, dealing with Canada and the work she is doing in the war. These dealt with the part Canada is playing in le[illegible]lease; with naval patrol; with the manufacture of munitions and ships, with the establishment of a huge army overseas, said to be the most highly mechanized in the world, and ready at the moment's notice to go wherever sent; with the further establishment of a huge defence army; with our gigantic air training service; with the huge loans floated here and loyally subscribed to by our people; with our second billion dollar voluntary contribution to mother England, and with the calm manner in which we are bearing our heavy tax burden which in some categories is heavier even than in England and at the moment in all respects much heavier than in the United States. Nor were these small articles, or in small newspapers and periodicals only. Hundreds of them were full pages and half pages and many of them were splendidly illustrated. The increase in this publicity has been amazing. In April and May 1942, only 566 Canadian items appeared in 425 United States newspapers, while, a year later, forty American newspapers alone printed 1,860 items in the month of April referring to Canada's war work, which represents an increase of 400 per cent over November 1942, the first real operating month of the board in the United States.

An Advertising Increase. If one considers the present situation in the United States, this increase of Canadian news items is nothing short of astonishing. In the first place, the United States is now in the war itself, following Pearl Harbor, and the American people are clamoring for news of their own kith and kin and of the exploits of their own troops, so that Canadian news might be expected to be almost wholly submerged, whereas it has been steadily increasing in presentation. In the second place it is to be remembered that as yet, save for Hong Kong and Dieppe, Canada has furnished no spectacular fighting news. While in the third place, due to the rationing of newsprint and the consequent reduction in the size of the American newspapers, there is less space available for news in these papers than in many years past, with priority necessarily given to the movements and doings of American troops.

In this connection—and I know I will be treading on the toes of some of our "higher ups"—I think it a matter of great regret that the Canadian airmen overseas and doing such wonderful work are not named as such, instead of being grouped with the Royal Air Force. In the American newspapers the American fliers are "segregated", so to speak, and given due publicity as American units for what they do. Not so the Canadian fliers. They are lost—"snowed under"— in and with the Royal Air Force, although there are literally thousands of them, whereas the American impression is that they are a mere handful.

The Matter of Cost. I now come to the final point—the cost of the service the New York board is giving, more particularly in respect of the wages paid, of which there was recently some criticism, especially the salary of Leo Casey, who acted in an advisory capacity and kept the board in close touch with the four major mediums with which it is most necessary the board should be in contact at all times if it hopes to do its best work, namely, the movie, the radio, the news services, and the news syndicates, including weekly supplements magazines, etc., to say nothing of the British war information board as well as the United States board with whom the Canadian board is working in complete harmony and understanding. As to this allegation of too high salaries, the critics have not a leg to stand on. But it was ever thus. It is axiomatic that the man on the street knows much better than the trained newspaper publisher and editor, how a newspaper should be run and wherein it falls short of the perfect article which the critic could and would produce if he were at the helm. Indeed that is so even with governments. Always, as opposition parties from time immemorial have been telling us, the government that at the moment happens to be in power is for the most part made up of incompetents, accidents and time-servers, while the really good government would be the one that is hanging around in the offing waiting for the lightning to strike. Thus perhaps it was to be expected that criticism of the information board's work and cost would be forthcoming. Unfortunately for the critics, the ground they took was quick-sandy, for it has just been disclosed that Mr. Casey has sent in his resignation effective as of June 30, in order that he may assume the position of publicity director of the Republican Post-War Policy Association, at, significantly enough, nearly double the salary that the Canadian war information board has been paying him—a fact that speaks for itself.

The simple truth of the matter, as the critics should have known, is that good newspaper and publicity men, never any too numerous, are at the moment scarcer than hen's teeth. This is due to several things—their entrance into war service, and the merger or extinction of many small newspapers, forced by the rapidly mounting cost of production, with the result that fewer and fewer young newspaper men are being developed in this once fertile small newspaper training field whence came for the most part the most useful and promising members of the profession. Hence their scarcity, and hence the insistent demand for them, naturally at higher and higher salaries.

The New York staff generally: As for the remainder of the staff in the New York office, they number exactly eight, and their combined salaries for an entire year will total approximately $27,000, or about $2,250 a month. Anyone who knows anything about newspaper or publicity work in New York and the high salaries paid for good men there will not have to be told that this total salary outlay is unbelievably small. It may be added that the New York director of the board, Harry Sedgewick, who, by the way, is president of radio station CFRB, Toronto, and chairman of the board of Canadian Association of Broadcasters, receives no salary. Everywhere he is recognized as a man of marked ability and an outstanding figure in publicity work. When one notes that this small staff of eight does all the work in the New York office—in one office alone of the British war information board, I am given to understand, there is a staff of 250, headed by high ministerial counsellors—it can readily be seen that there is no loafing on the job in New York and that, considering the work done, it is being done at a remarkably small salary outlay.

I saw numerous full page articles and scores of half pages, each one in at least 100 newspapers, while smaller articles ran in newspapers and as syndicated features from coast to coast, to the number, in some instances of 2,000 for one story. Indeed, the last number of Fortune magazine had a full two-page Canadian feature. If this were to be paid for as advertising matter the cost would be several thousand dollars, while a full page advertisement in New York newspapers runs for one insertion in any one of them, in the neighbourhood of $1,500. But ignoring the large papers entirely and taking the small papers at, let us say, $250 a page per insertion it is an easy matter to "break down" the cost and by simple arithmetic to prove that, if any one of these articles had to be paid for at full advertising space rates, a single page of Canadian war features, run in 100 papers would be worth $25,000—or, for this one feature, practically the entire salary cost for an entire year of the New York information board's staff. This presentation of these bald figures and facts is sufficient refutation of any charge of excessive salary payments and it is gratifying to note that the charges have not been repeated. Their introduction served no useful service and seemed to savor of politics. Incidentally I am glad to say I saw no evidence in the New York office of any politics, the introduction of which we would all strongly deprecate.

The board's future work: As to the future work of the board, I have an idea that once the invasion of Europe is undertaken, the pattern of the picture will change radically and a much more intensive and speedy production of features and pictures will be forced into being. Even as it is, the flood of booklets that were once put out by the Canadian board dealing with Canada's war work has gradually diminished until now it is down to less than 7,000. Eventually, it will undoubtedly be found to drop well below that figure, for as the United States war effort has increased, American editors have neither the time nor the inclination to wade through these publications, whose contents by the time they reach the newspapers are largely "old stuff". What will be needed once we are fighting in Europe is live features, spicy, pithy, brought up to the last minute and of a kind that will appeal to the masses—not lengthy or ponderous articles but "meaty" and informative, easily read and just a trifle out of the ordinary. The Associated Press, the United Press and the Canadian Press can be depended upon to furnish all the day-to-day and even minute-to-minute news, leaving a wide field to information boards and syndicates for clever special items and features which have always made a strong appeal to the masses. When that time comes, the booklets, I believe, will be largely a thing of the past and useful only for reference purposes. The "hot-off-the-griddle" features will definitely supplant them.

I need hardly add that this is not in any sense a defence of the board or intended as such, for it in fact needs no defence now that the machinery is running smoothly. It is simply a presentation of conditions as I found them and have here set out in justice to the information board itself, whose work is none too easy and deserves praise rather than censure or ill-founded criticisms on half-baked facts.

Yours sincerely,

W. R. Givens.

I think the committee will agree that this is a good introduction to the discussion.

Mr. CLAXTON: Mr. Chairman, the subject of the wartime information board has already received some mention in the house this session. On April 7, and on May 19 and 20 there were references to it, and it is my submission that those references indicated that the house and country need a good deal more information about the information board. During the discussion on those days I think it is fair to say that the general purpose of the board was not under criticism. I do not think anyone said that the working of the board was in any sense faulty. It was however suggested on a number of occasions that the salaries of the board and expenditures by the board had expanded out of all recognition. I hope to show the committee that the facts on which those assertions were based are simply not accurate. The salaries have not expanded. The number of people on the payroll has not increased, and expenditures on the board, instead of increasing, have actually been decreased as the work has changed, and as emphasis on different parts of it has changed. I hope, as I succeed in showing this, that hon. members of the committee, the press and the public will give the board and those responsible for it the credit I think is due to it for having done an exceedingly good job at a low cost—a cost lower, I submit, in proportion, than that charged to any government of which we have any knowledge.

Referring first to the work outside of Canada, as the Prime Minister has said, this was only begun with the appointment of the wartime information board, following the receipt of the Vining report. Mr. Vining indicated to the government that there should be nothing in the nature of a publicity campaign, that there should be a minimum of commotion, that the offices of the board should be small and efficient, that they should largely work through the press and other instruments, and not in any way seek to take the place of the press. That object has been achieved, to a really extraordinary degree.

First a word about the offices. We have heard a description in Mr. Givens' letter of the work done in the New York office. The staff consists of eleven persons under Mr. Harry Sedgwick, to whom reference has been made. It is attached closely to the office of the Canadian consul-general, Mr. H. D. Scully, and occupies modest offices at No. 620 Fifth avenue. At Washington there are three on the staff, under the very able direction of Mr. J. H. Campbell, formerly publicity director of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the west. These small staffs, acting as the front for the organization in Canada, and also acting very closely with Canadian newspapers, the Canadian Press and the British United Press—the two Canadian services—have really achieved remarkable results in a very short time.

The committee would be interested to know how this has been done. It has been achieved by personal service. The men in charge of the Washington and New York offices receive an advance upon a story coming through over the Canadian Press or the British United Press from Canada. They at once get into contact with the heads of the American services and the editors of the leading American papers, pointing out that this story is of the type which would interest them. Our representative may say, "There is something in this which you might like" or "Do you wish to have any further background material?" or "Do you require any cuts for this story?" In other words, our people render a service. And it is through that personal connection that these extraordinary results are obtained.

I have here tangible evidence of what this means. It is desirable that the committee should have a clear understanding because it is seldom that matters of this kind can be demonstrated physically as here. Usually we are concerned with figures and words. Here we have an interesting contrast in results due to the way news was handled. In June, 1942, Canadians went to help in the defence of the Aleutian islands. This was a news story which would have been considered news anywhere in the United States. It had dramatic value, that Canadians should be going to implement the joint defence agreement, and it was a feature which would have appealed to United States editors. But owing to an accident—and it was nothing other than that—the release of the story was delayed three days by the military authorities, and when released it took the form of a very short release to the press. This was issued in the United States. It was sent over the wires, and the reception in the United States was very interesting. There was practically no American paper which I have been able to find, after a careful search, which even referred to the story. If it was referred to it was buried as a shirt-tail at the end of some other story about the Aleutian islands. The one exception was the Baltimore Sun. On Thursday, June 18, this paper had an eight column streamer headline across the front page reading "Canadians join United States in Alaska defence." The reason why the Baltimore Sun alone of all the 1,800 daily newspapers in the United States featured this story was that by accident Mr. Vining was in the office the day before. He had received word that this story was coming through and he pointed out its interest to the editor. The editor at once saw its interest and featured the story when it came through. But that was the only paper so far as we know that had the story on the front page or in headlines anywhere else. That single case was the result of personal association, personal interest and advance information, fundamental things in the proper play of any news story.

Now, contrast the handling of that story with the one ten months later. In April, 1943, the wartime information board got word that a similar story about the Canadians assisting in attacks on the Aleutians was coming through. Because of their having got this advance word they were able to warn the editors of the press associations and leading papers in New York. The Canadian Press and the British United Press gave the story to their opposite members, the Associated Press and the United Press in the United States, who were well prepared for it. The story was sent out over the wires to all newspapers. The result of the work of the wartime information board can be seen in the contrast between the treatment given this story in April, 1943, a story which did not have the primary news value of the story which appeared in May, 1942, and the treatment given the earlier story. The results are shown by the clippings in the blotter which I lay on the table here and which hon. members may be interested in seeing. They will find page after page of clippings from United States papers all featuring this Canadian story. Here are some of the headlines:

Canadian air force join Americans in Aleutians.
Canadians join U.S. in blasting Kiska.
Canadians join raid on Kiska.
Canadians rejoin Yanks in raid on Kiska.

It goes on for page after page until you find no less than 420 clippings of this single story. Truly a remarkable demonstration of the change in results in the United States, partly as a result of the added services furnished by the wartime information board all along the line. Part of this service was to make our military authorities realize how important it was that stories of this kind should not be too long buried on a censor's desk.

Mr. STIRLING: Are all the clippings from daily papers?

Mr. CLAXTON: They are from the daily papers. These are not by any manner of means all that appeared; they are simply all that I got when I was in New York on May 19 and May 20 to look into this thing. That is why I could not join in the debate on that occasion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are they all different, or are they all Associated Press dispatches?

Mr. CLAXTON: This story could come from two sources only, the Associated Press and the United Press, and the clippings give credit to one or the other. The stories appeared in papers in every state. There is no other way in which they could get a story of that kind except through the Associated Press, the United Press or the International News Service. That is the only way they could get the story unless they happened to have a correspondent in Washington, New York or Ottawa who was in touch with us, and we know they mostly have no correspondents in Ottawa. This is tangible evidence of the changed situation brought about, in part at least, by the institution of offices of the wartime information board at New York and Washington.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does my hon. friend attribute the change entirely to the wartime information board?

Mr. CLAXTON: I said in part, but I do not know to what else it would be due. If anything, it is harder to-day to get news stories across in the United States than it was in June, 1942, when the first story appeared. To-day there is more spot news, more news of events occurring all over the world with which Canadian news must compete. I think in fairness that it must be admitted that the results are largely due to the treatment accorded the news by the wartime information board. It must be remembered that the news went out over the Canadian Press and at every stage it was guided, so to speak, so that it would get the treatment it deserved. That is an illustration of the kind of service rendered by the board.

As hon. members will appreciate, the members of the board have similarly assisted in the preparation of articles, have provided facilities and material for writers and for journalists having to do with the war effort. This generally resulted in an article being written for one of the great United States publications. Radio programmes have been arranged, such as the Jack Benny, Kate Smith and other programmes to be broadcast from Canada to the United States. Contacts have been made with all kinds of associations. Interviews have been arranged for ministers or other prominent Canadians like Doctor Best or Doctor McIntosh when they go to the United States. Such interviews have had widespread coverage through the press and press agencies.

The board replies to inquiries—and they are pouring in all the time—and it furnishes still photographs and other material. In addition to having offices established at Washington and New York, the board has cooperated in the closest possible way and has the friendliest relations with both the British ministry of information officials in the United States and the office of war information of the United States. The latter organization has helped in the dissemination of Canadian news all over the world because of arrangements made by the wartime information board. This has resulted in news about Canada being broadcast on the short wave radio all over the world from the office of war information broadcasting stations.

When the institution of offices in the United States was suggested and talked about back in 1940, 1941 and 1942, some hon. members and possibly the government were under some apprehension lest the setting up of offices in the United States might create some unfavourable incident or comment. The exact reverse has happened. The only comment received so far in the United States has been favourable; the only comment by press and government agencies and by representatives of other governments has been one of sincere appreciation for services rendered. The words of Mr. Givens are by no means an overstatement about a remarkable job done by Canadians in order to make Canada better known in the United States. They have been able to do this because of this organization. It is modest, it is not aggressive in any improper sense, it has an admirable personnel, and is doing a good job.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend mentioned correspondents who had been brought to this country under the aegis of the wartime information board. Is he in position to give the number of correspondents who were brought here, and what papers they represented?

Mr. CLAXTON: Those suggested to me now are the representatives of the Associated Press, the Chicago Sun, the New York Daily News, the NFA service and a good many others. I can give my hon. friend a list of them if he wishes to have it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to know how far that went.

Mr. CLAXTON: My estimate from the lists I have seen is that in the period under review there would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of fifteen to twenty. Prior to that, under the division of public information, there were two trips organized which included very much larger numbers. Now it is being done on a much more modest scale. People are given every facility to see what they wish to see, when not prevented for military reasons.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the wartime information board pay the expenses of these people when they come over?.

Mr. CLAXTON: Sometimes it does and sometimes it does not. I am informed that most of these people come on their own because they are interested, partly through the work of the offices in New York and Washington, and I say that this is due in part to the work of the board. I think it is in the minds of hon. members that there was in the United States a virtual vacuum of information about Canada. We are trying to fill that vacuum, and the tremendous results that have been achieved in the short period of ten months are due to the fact that there is a story to be told and the Americans are naturally inclined to be exceptionally friendly towards us.

Mr. GRAYDON: It seems to be the general idea that Australia made a much better job of publicity in the United States than we did.

Mr. CLAXTON: It should be remembered that Canada only began to have offices in the United States in October, 1942; we have had offices there for only ten months, while Australia has had offices there since the outbreak of war. I know Mr. Bailey, the head of the Australia office. He has done a remarkably good job. He is a fine journalist and has earned the respect of all with whom he deals. He has been helpful to officials of the board in giving them assistance and advice when they were getting going. A number of Canadian newspaper editors and journalists have been to see the board's office when they were in New York to see what it was doing, not at the suggestion of the board but because they were interested. I have a long list of Canadian journalists and editors who have used the resources of the board in the United States. Some of them have written about it. One of them is the correspondent of the Financial Post. Writing of the work of the board on May 29, 1943, he said:

> Results of its work to date are most impressive. Its success and achievement clearly indicate that the New York job of WIB is one that Canadians should now regard as permanent; that its contribution to North American understanding and welfare will be as great in peace as it is in war.

Further on he says this:

> Particularly important, the amount of unfavourable or inaccurate information about Canada has been reduced.

It is only right to remind hon. members that ever since the board has been working in the United States I do not know of any unfavourable publicity that Canada has received such as there was before.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend's train of thought, but some suggestion has been made that the wartime information board may be continued not only in time of war but in time of peace. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would enlarge upon that. It is a matter in which the people of this country are extremely interested.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is a matter of government policy to which the government would naturally wish to give consideration at the time, but I can tell my hon. friend it is absolutely certain that the work of the wartime information board will not go on after the war in its present form. If there are services such as those rendered in connection with Latin America which the government of the day would wish to have continued, they will be continued in some form. Perhaps it may be part of the work of trade commissioners, or some other means may be found. My hon. friend will appreciate that this work is too valuable in some aspects to be allowed to stop at the end of the war. But if the work now done by the board is carried on, it will be totally changed in character, and certainly changed in name and form.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And in personnel?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, very largely, because a great number of people who are working for the board will want to return to their peace-time job as soon as the war is over.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the general public is anxious there should be no movement made during the war which will lead to bringing about a monopoly of news services in this country in peace time.

Mr. CLAXTON: I can assure my hon. friend that there is no such tendency in the board, either now or for the future. The board is not a government monopoly; it is a facilitating agency and nothing more. It is not replacing the work of any journal in Canada or of any press agency in Canada. It aims to be of service to them and nothing else. That I think is a very important fact to remember.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that the unanimous view of the press?

Mr. CLAXTON: I would hope it is, because that is the work that is being done by the board, and I think the press is becoming increasingly conscious of the value of some parts of the board's work.

I should like to refer to the report of his visit to the board made by Mr. Norman Smith of the Ottawa Journal and appearing in the Ottawa Journal of April 20, 1943. He said:

> The weakest thing about our whole publicity scheme in the United States is that there are not offices in Chicago and San Francisco as well.

The men in New York and Washington are certainly working hard and most people down here believe they are working effectively.

Their salaries, some of them, look big from Ottawa, but with the cost of living as it is here and considering the nature of their work it is probable that most of them should be getting more rather than less.

There is no lack of documentary proof that they are getting good publicity in the papers, the movies, over the radio and the public platform. Nor is there lack of indication where and when they have prevented bad publicity, arrested harmful thought trends or planted helpful ones. The set-up could be improved—what set-up couldn't be improved?

Mr. REID: I hope they inform the people of the United States that all the snow has gone from here.

Mr. CLAXTON: A similar article by Mr. Arthur R. Ford, editor in chief of the Free Press, of London, appeared in that paper on May 7, 1943. Mr. Ford is president of the Canadian Press, and in a lengthy article he refers to the work of the board. He says:

Now we come to Canada which was the last country to set up a department of information in Washington. I have been rather doubtful of the value of such a bureau. However, after seeing the Washington bureau in operation I am inclined to change my mind.

So I submit to the committee that the work of the board in the United States has been useful beyond words in giving facts about Canada. There has been no element of propaganda about it from beginning to end. We have nothing to tell the United States except the facts and to see that they are attractively presented. That is the whole purpose of this agency, and it has no other purpose. It has never been under any suspicion of having any other purpose. It could not have any other purpose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. gentleman says that there is no element of propaganda in it. Is not the whole thing propoganda, to make the people of the United States understand what Canada is doing?

Mr. CLAXTON: If my hon. friend uses the word "propaganda" in that sense, which is its true literal sense, I agree with him. But propaganda has in addition certain unfavourable connotations, and I do not use the word for that reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When it is tinged politically it becomes objectionable.

Mr. CLAXTON: If my hon. friend means propaganda in its true literal sense, meaning to propagate information, I am completely in agreement with him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad we agree on something.

Mr. CLAXTON: In addition, the board has established an office in the United Kingdom—with a staff of four—and one in Canberra. The office in the United Kingdom has cooperated very fully with the public relations officers of the armed services—under the direction of Mr. J. W. G. Clark—who have done such an exceedingly good job in making available to the Canadian public information about the work of our boys overseas and at sea. The hon. member for Peterborough West asked what we were doing in South America.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the wartime information board doing toward acquainting the members of our armed forces overseas with general developments so far as our nation here is concerned? I think my hon. friend—

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall come to that.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am sorry; I did not know that was on the agenda.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, it is, but I thought I should deal with the other first.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am sorry I interrupted.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think I should deal with the question asked by the member for Peterborough West, because it brings up an extraordinarily interesting matter which the board has very much in mind. The organization to deal with South America is headed by Mr. Allan Anderson, who for fourteen years was correspondent of the Southam newspapers in South America.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He speaks Spanish?

Mr. CLAXTON: Oh, yes. I am sorry; he was not for fourteen years in South America, but he had just returned from South America where he was correspondent for the Southam press when he assumed responsibility for the board's work there. He speaks Spanish fluently and has a working knowledge of Portuguese. His secretary also speaks Spanish and has a working knowledge of Portuguese.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is a working knowledge?

Mr. CLAXTON: It means that he can read it and make himself understood on social occasions.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not very fluent.

Mr. CLAXTON: Not very fluent, but able to get by with it, as a good many hon. members do with the other language in Canada. He has another assistant, born in the Argentine, who speaks Spanish and French fluently and has some Italian and Portuguese. Their job is to send out articles and press releases, and they send them in Spanish. They do not send them broadcast. They send them only to newspaper editors with whom they have already established personal contacts.

Mr. GRAYDON: Where is he located?

Mr. CLAXTON: In Ottawa. In parenthesis, I should say that the emphasis of the board has varied since being an agency which at the beginning, and quite rightly, distributed large quantities of material to the public. The present emphasis in the work of the board is to give material to meet a demand that exists and a need that has been expressed, and that policy is followed in connection with the distribution of news material and articles to the South American press.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are these articles to which the hon. gentleman refers as being sent out in Spanish by Mr. Anderson and his staff prepared by the board, or are they the articles that come through from the press men attached to the different departments?

Mr. CLAXTON: These articles are specially prepared by the board, but frequently the work is that of editing other articles from government departments or from other agencies in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not quite coincide with what the hon. gentleman said a little while ago, that these articles were not prepared by the board but that a personal service was performed in New York. I understood that these articles were all canned stuff prepared by the fifty-seven varieties of press agents attached to the different departments. That is what the public thinks anyway.

Mr. CLAXTON: My hon. friend will forgive me if I say that there is a difference between the material sent out from Canada to South America and the material that is sent from Canada to the United States. Material from Canada to the United States naturally is news which goes out through the ordinary agencies, and the work of the board is to assist the flow of that news; whereas, so far as material going to South America is concerned, it must be remembered it is already serviced by news agencies from the United States and other countries, and anything that we could send would not be news in that sense. So that the articles are more background material giving long-term information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are special articles, then?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Specially prepared by the board?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, or possibly by somebody else for the board, or else material is used obtained from other government departments and services or from other newspapers in Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What control does the board exercise over writers or authors whose services it secures for the writing of articles? During the past few months some fourteen authors or writers in this country have written articles for the board. What control does the board exercise over the information contained in those articles?

Mr. CLAXTON: It would be more convenient if I were allowed to finish one subject at a time. At present I am dealing with South America, and if my hon. friend would forgive me and remind me of that later, in case I forget, I should be glad.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It fits into the discussion on South America just the same.

Mr. GRAYDON: He was speaking of special articles, and so are you.

Mr. CLAXTON: I was speaking about Latin America in reply to a question. All articles sent to South America are prepared by the board, as far as I know. They are prepared or edited and the board takes full responsibility for them. They are not broadcast but sent to newspaper editors and publishers with whom Mr. Anderson himself has already established contacts, or to one of the south American editors who visited Canada, or to a Canadian legation for use through the legation, or to a branch of a Canadian bank for use in such ways as they may see fit. But they are not sent to any others.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is any information sent to South America by means of any short-wave American station?

Mr. CLAXTON: I understand it has been, but there is not a regular service.

Mr. GRAYDON: We have no facilities here, but I thought it might have been done through an American short-wave station.

Mr. CLAXTON: As part of this work, and in order to establish better associations and more friendly relations with South America, a number of south American editors have visited Canada. The total is fifty-nine, representing ten countries, and I suppose that all of them have written, for their own publications as well as others, stories about Canada on their return to their own countries. In addition, several of them broadcast from Canada. I assume that these broadcasts must have been sent at some stage by short wave, but the exact technical operation I cannot describe. I believe that one writer has indicated his intention to write a book about Canada. There will be a special Canadian number of a publication having distribution all over South America. I refer to Norte.

There is another branch of work in South America and that is what may be called background information. This is under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Ross, who has a working knowledge of French, German and Spanish. He has had to do with arranging for broadcasts, and already one thirty-minute programme has been sent to the Argentine, Colombia, Cuba, Mexico and Peru. Some programmes have been prepared and are broadcast from south American countries. Arrangements are being made for programmes of music and talks to be given in each of the Latin American countries on their day of independence.

Then in the way of films, paid for by the wartime information board and made by the national film board, fourteen commercial films have been exhibited in South America, of which eleven, I think, were of the "World in Action" series. There are eight more in preparation. These are distributed through an agency, United Artists World corporation, and they are available to 4,000 theatres in Latin America. They have Spanish and Portuguese sound tracks. We know that 400 theatres in Mexico have taken those films. The leader of the opposition will appreciate that we are doing a good deal to prepare for the day when the short-wave station which he has had at heart will be in operation; there will be friendly contacts established with numerous South Americans, and there will be in Canada the small nucleus of a staff who can help to prepare the programmes for such a station. The work is well in hand.

Mr. GRAYDON: I apologize for interrupting my hon. friend so often, but I think it advisable to ask questions when his points arise, one by one. Do I take it that we have no representatives of the wartime information board on the ground in South America? If this is so, apparently the distribution of films for propaganda purposes and the dissemination of information, such as the hon. member has described, must all be done from here. If so, what is the normal channel through which this information goes? Does it go through the trade commissioners in the various centres in South America, or through the legations which have been set up in various South American republics?

Mr. CLAXTON: With regard to the films—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to interrupt, but the hon. member has spoken for forty minutes. However I take it that the committee will allow him to go on for another forty minutes if necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are in committee. As long as anyone intervenes, he may resume.

Mr. GRAYDON: I believe I have eased that situation now.

Mr. CLAXTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The films for South America, fourteen so far and eight under preparation, are distributed there, as I have just said, by United Artists World Corporation, which is a commercial agency. These films are commercial films; they are shown in the commercial picture theatres, and it is in the interests of the agency distributing them to see that they get the widest possible distribution. In addition, however, the visits to which I have referred result in contacts being made which are used so that the representatives of the two countries cooperate in pushing their wares in each of their countries; that is the advantage of personal association. Also we now have three legations in South America, and each of these is helping very materially in these respects.

I have only one further word to say about the South American scene. A trial set of books about Canada has been put together through the cooperation of the publishers to whom we are grateful for contributing the books free, the National Gallery, who contributed reproductions of pictures free, and the film board, who contributed "stills" about Canada. These have been put together, with a great deal of other material, including posters. One set, I believe, has been sent to Chile. Two other sets are in course of preparation to be sent to the Argentine and Brazil. If the war information board had to pay for all that material the cost would aggregate, I believe, more than a thousand dollars a set. I understand that a good deal of this is contributed, so that expense is not borne by us. It is of the nature of an experiment.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Where will they be placed in Chile?

Mr. CLAXTON: In the principal libraries, museums and other public centres. They will be exhibited in one place and then move into another, just as exhibitions of pictures rotate from place to place. They were asked for by our minister to Chile to meet demands which he had for further information about Canada, and arrangements for their distribution and display will be made through him.

That concludes what I was to say about the work of the wartime information board abroad. Now just a word about its work at home.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. gentleman said that all the news sent to South America is in Spanish; therefore Brazil would not get any of it.

Mr. CLAXTON: If I said Spanish, I was right, but it is put into Portuguese for distribution in Brazil. It is sent in Spanish to Brazil, and arrangements are made locally for its translation into Portuguese before it is distributed to the Brazilian newspapers and other recipients.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the board made use of the news item feature in the picture houses, both in the United States and in South America, to introduce Canadian news?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is done by the national film board, and my information is that it is made use of extensively, and, as my hon. friend's question suggests, it is an extraordinarily useful means of publicity.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before the hon. member leaves the work of the board in other parts, may I remind him that, so far as I know, he has not said anything about how far the board has gone with respect to introducing news features and propaganda generally in Mexico. That country has been before the house more emphatically perhaps during the last few days than hitherto, because of the Prime Minister's statement in regard to exchange of diplomatic representation. Nor has the hon. member mentioned any part of the empire other than the United Kingdom with respect to the work of the wartime information board. Has anything been done with respect to South Africa or Australia or New Zealand?

Mr. CLAXTON: To answer the third question first, we have, as I think I have mentioned, a representative of the board at Canberra, Australia, and I have seen reports from the Canadian high commissioner there that he is doing extraordinarily useful work.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Canadian high commissioner does a little work on his own, too.

Mr. CLAXTON: He certainly does.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the wartime information board take full responsibility for his statements?

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. CLAXTON: Not entirely, just credit. With regard to the suggestion that this work may extend to other parts of the world, a good deal of material is sent out either through the office of war information broadcasts or through British ministry of information broadcasts, by cooperation, but it is impossible for the board to have representatives in any other countries without the house granting the board some more money. This costs money.

Mr. GRAYDON: You might cut down on some items and extend others.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think my hon. friend would find it difficult to cut down on any of the items.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The main thing after all is to develop proper information in the United States; is not that the real purpose of this board?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is a principal purpose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If it were not for that you would not have it at all.

Mr. CLAXTON: I would not go so far as to say that, but I would say that it is a very large part of the purpose.

With regard to Mexico I did mention that we have shown these films of the national film board, paid for by the wartime information board, to four hundred theatres in Mexico, and the same close relationships of our representatives with newspaper men and publishers exist in Mexico as in other countries. A considerable number of Mexican newspaper men are included in the list that was given to me. Between December 4 and 8 there was a visit to Canada by eight Mexican newspaper men, who travelled extensively throughout the country.

Now with regard to the home front—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point, do you also send literature to Central America, to San Salvador, Costa Rica, and so on?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes; I should have said this included Latin America, and I intended to cover that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You mentioned South America but did not include Central America.

Mr. CLAXTON: I should have included it, because the work has been carried on equally there.

With regard to the home front, I have already indicated the change in emphasis from the distribution of material to a concentration on facilitating the flow of news, particularly with relation to the work abroad; but in addition a great deal more has been done in Canada. There has been instituted a reports branch of the wartime information board, the main purpose of which is to find out what the information is, what to say and how it should be said, and to advise other government departments. That work has been extensively carried on in that indirect way. This reports branch also cooperates with the censorship authorities in the reading of publications issued in Canada, including all the foreign language press, for censorship and wartime information purposes, some eight employees being engaged in that work.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the activities of the board within Canada in disseminating information, we will say with respect to the buying of victory bonds and that sort of thing.

Mr. CLAXTON: As I think my hon. friend knows, the national war finance committee handles its own publicity. However, there are coordinating committees, on which the wartime information board is represented, which endeavour to coordinate the activities of all the various publicity agencies working in connection with the war.

My hon. friend asked what was being done to keep the troops informed about news of Canada. Recently there has been issued a publication called "Canadian Affairs," the first number of which was published on May 1 of this year by the wartime information board for the Department of National Defence. The first issue ran to some twenty-five thousand copies; it was printed in England and distributed to the armed forces of Canada overseas. I have a copy of that publication here which hon. members may see if they wish. Following the publication of this first issue General McNaughton sent the board a telegram of congratulation.

Mr. WRIGHT: How often is it issued?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is issued fortnightly.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did my hon. friend say how that pamphlet was distributed?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is distributed to the armed forces in England and overseas.

Mr. GRAYDON: Entirely?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not a news distribution; it is instructional, for the Canadian armed forces overseas?

Mr. CLAXTON: Not instructional, informative.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was the information I got, that it was instructional for the Canadian armed forces overseas.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sorry; that is right, instructional in the informative sense. For example, the first number contained an article headed "Canada in the Fourth Year of War." That and other articles may be used by officers for the purpose of talks to their own men, and in that sense it is instructional.

Mr. STIRLING: Something like "Canada at War," only for use over there?

Mr. CLAXTON: Except that the matter in the numbers I have seen is much less limited to information and is devoted more to matters of opinion and to reporting on trends in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does it give any information as to the numbers and the activities of the home army?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have not seen any. Then in addition the board still publishes "Canada at War." This is a work that has been carried on from the previous agencies. Of this publication 93,000 copies are printed in English and 27,000 in French, which are sent out only in answer to requests. The mailing list is cleaned out every five or six months, by sending circulars asking if people want to receive the publication. If they do not, it is not sent to them any longer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is a question I have asked before in regard to "Canada at War" to which I have not yet received an answer. In January and February of this year this publication contained full information in regard to the intake into the armed forces, the operation of the call-up, the number of medical examination notices sent out, the number who answered the call, and general information with regard to the requisition, by military districts, of man-power; the numbers who reported for training and the percentage accepted as per requisition. That was very useful information; it gave a picture of the military situation in Canada; province by province, military district by military district, it gave a picture of the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act. That has been deleted from the issues of March, April, May and June. I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary why it was deleted, and whether it is intended that this information is to be discontinued. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is the only way the people of Canada may know just how well the armed forces are being kept up to strength and how the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act are being applied.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am informed that the reason for the discontinuance, if it was a discontinuance—because everything that appears in one issue of "Canada at War" does not necessarily appear in the next number, since the information is varied from time to time—is that during this period, when the house has been in session, the information has been given to the house in various other forms.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not in that form.

Mr. CLAXTON: However, certainly the suggestion of my hon. friend will be considered.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Was that the reason for ceasing to furnish this information—because the house was in session?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is my information, because the figures were being given here.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But I thought this publication was for the information of the people of Canada, so that they would have in ready form the facts with regard to Canada's war effort. All the other information given in the publication continues to be furnished, with the exception of the information in regard to the man-power situation. I suggest that there must be some other explanation.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have no other explanation, but I shall make inquiries for my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then do I understand that "Canada at War" is primarily for the information of members of parliament?

Mr. CLAXTON: No; but during this period the information has been given in different forms, in frequent statements in the house by the ministers concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just why was that information cut out—because it is very significant.

Mr. CLAXTON: For the reason I suggested. That is the only reason I know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not a reason at all; it is an excuse. That information was of great importance to members of parliament and to the people of Canada. It has been discontinued because it revealed certain things. I suggest that it was cut out because of the storm which arose as a result of what the figures showed, and we should like to have it put back.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have no information other than that I have given to the committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will it be restored after the house ceases to sit?

[Mr. Deifenbaker.]

Mr. CLAXTON: I cannot assure my hon. friend of that. I can only bring his suggestion to the attention of those responsible.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the responsibility is right here, not elsewhere.

Mr. CLAXTON: In addition to these publications, wartime information board issues a number of smaller publications, but, as I have indicated, the distribution is severely curtailed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has there been any criticism of the contents or propaganda of certain of these publications. If so, how did that arise, and will it ever be repeated?

Mr. CLAXTON: I think the hon. member has reference to the publication Nouvelles Catholiques. There was some criticism in the house of one article which appeared in that publication. It was a short note, probably not more than five or six lines, put in by a subordinate as a filler.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But paid for by public money.

Mr. CLAXTON: I can assure my hon. friend that that will not be repeated.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; let it go.

Mr. CLAXTON: With regard to films: during this period the wartime information board has paid for a number of films which have been produced by the national film board. Altogether there have been some 74 films, representing a total cost over the period of $675,348.10. Those films have had an extensive distribution in the United States, Canada and other countries. For example the "Canada Carries On" series has had a nominal distribution in Canada of 2,250,000. It also was distributed to 96 different territories, including South Africa and other countries, and in twelve different languages. Those films had a non-theatrical distribution of over a million. The series "The World in Action" had a distribution of 2,250,000 in Canada. Eight of those films were distributed to 6,000 United States theatres, and three of them went to 500 United Kingdom theatres. In addition the wartime information board facilitated the production of a picture used in the victory loan campaign, of which 274 prints were made. It has produced posters and pamphlets. It has handled the visits of distinguished persons and visiting journalists such as I have indicated. It has cooperated with other government departments, notably with the public relations officers of the armed services, and in other ways it has carried on much the same work that had been done by the division of public information in Canada, its predecessor.

A word with regard to staff. The staff to-day numbers 132. At the end of August, 1942, when the division of public information operated, there was a total staff of 158, including casual workers. So that the staff during this period has decreased by no less than 26. These 132 members of the staff are divided between nineteen abroad, and the remainder at home.

Mr. GRAYDON: Most of those abroad are in the United States.

Mr. CLAXTON: Eleven are in New York and three at Washington. The board is continually asked to take on extra work of a direct publicity character. It can do so only with additions to staff and additional money.

I ask hon. members to consider the size of the staff, and for a minute to compare it with the staff of the ministry of information in Great Britain which, as of February 1, 1943, numbered 2,824. At that time there were in other British government departments, staffs totalling 1,038; but to these figures should be added the staff of the ministry of information in the United States, totalling on April 21, 1943, a personnel of 537.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was that staff sent from Canada, or were they engaged in the United States?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am referring to the British Ministry of Information. So that if the British staff of 537 in the United States is compared with the Canadian staff of 14, the difference is at once apparent. The British staff in the United States is four times the total Canadian staff in all countries. The total British staffs engaged in this work stand at 3,361 or about 25 times the total staffs engaged in similar work in Canada.

Comparisons with the office of war information in the United States are difficult because of the recent reduction made in the office of war information. The last figures before the reduction showed a total staff of 4,800 of which 1,600 were engaged in domestic work. But to those should be added staffs of 153 government departments, totalling 2,895 full-time workers and 31,618 part-time workers.

The best information we have concerning Australia is that their information service carries a total personnel of 200. In South Africa it is 50. There are special reasons which will be appreciated by hon. members why the Canadian staff should be larger, rather than smaller as it is, in proportion to other staffs. For one thing, our country is wide in extent. Then, we have two languages. Forty-one members of our staff are French-speaking. In addition, we have to deal with our information needs in a nation of 130,000,000 people living next to us. So that it might have been understandable if the Canadian staff had been higher, in proportion, than the staffs of other countries. The fact is however that it is very much lower, in proportion, than the staff of any other country.

May I say a word with regard to salaries. At the time the wartime information board took over from the division of public information, salaries were approximately $20,000 a month. To-day, since adding the offices at Washington, New York, London and Canberra, with a staff of 19, and at a total cost per month of some $8,500 for overseas services alone, the total salaries roll per month is $22,000. So that despite these additions at New York, London, Canberra and Washington the payroll has increased by only $2,000 per month. In other words this additional service is being rendered at that small additional cost, while the actual cost of the additional officers in the four places I have mentioned is no less than $8,500 a month.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Perhaps we might clear up these points as we go along, if an interruption would not interfere with the hon. member's line of thought. Mention has been made on more than one occasion of the rather high salaries paid, referring particularly to the staff in Canada. Had the men who were connected with the wartime information board remained with the press, doing the ordinary work of the press, their salaries would have been very considerably lower than the salaries paid to men on the board carrying corresponding responsibility. Who fixed these salaries? In their fixation, why were they not frozen, as the salaries have been of men who have remained with the regular newspapers? We find however that salaries on the board are in many cases considerably higher. It would be interesting to know the basis upon which these salaries were determined.

Mr. CLAXTON: I was just about to come to that. The salaries are fixed on the same basis as any other salaries, that is that in no case does anyone receive any more than he got before.

Mr. GRAYDON: Oh, yes, I am quite sure—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perfect nonsense.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am quite sure my hon. friend would not want to make a misstatement. That is not the information that is generally accepted on that point.

Mr. CLAXTON: The information that is generally accepted is not accurate, because what I have just said is in accordance with the information I have received.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let the hon. member proceed; let him give his facts.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am quite prepared to discuss each case at any length my hon. friend desires, but that is the situation. The hon. member for Lake Centre, in two speeches he delivered, one on April 7 and one on May 19, referred to the salaries of nineteen officials of the board. I would point out that in some cases these men were first employed by the division of public information which was taken over by the wartime information board, and others were in the government service at the outbreak of the war.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: To whom is the hon. member referring?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have five in mind. They are A. J. McKenna, Leonard Knott, Bruce West, E. G. Smith and N. Morant. There are two who are not officials of the wartime information board at all, Mr. J. W. G. Clark and Mr. Gerald Brown. These gentlemen are employees of the departments of national defence.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not refer to them as belonging to the wartime information board; I referred to them as belonging to other departments.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know how my hon. friend referred to them, but they would not be under the estimates we are considering at the moment. There were four who were appointed by the board to the staff at Ottawa and eight to the staff at Washington, so that there are twelve who were appointed by the wartime information board among those mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre. When Mr. Vining was appointed chairman of the wartime information board in September, 1942, he decided to get the best people he could for the job and he did succeed in getting a number of people to work for nothing or for expenses. He has told me, and I believe it to be true, that in every case he worked on the principle that a man should not receive more than he was receiving before. My information is that in every case that is what happened.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does that apply to persons in the United States as well as those in Canada?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is the information which I have received from Mr. Vining. In his statements to the house on April 7 and May 19, my hon. friend gave the salaries of these various officials in Canadian dollars. Anyone reading those figures would think that the people were in receipt of sums of money which would enable them to buy that many dollars' worth of goods.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was in the government return.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I rise to a point of order. The figures I gave were in accordance with the return brought down to the house, and I accepted the figures given by the department.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not suggest that the figures were wrong; I am explaining the figures given by my hon. friend and the form in which he gave them. Of course those were the figures which the public of Canada would be charged for these services, but in the case of the eight men working in the United States it must not be thought that they receive that amount of money. Actually they receive payment in United States dollars, and the purchasing power of that dollar is probably thirty per cent less to-day than it is in Canada for persons on an equivalent standard of living. I refer particularly to those in New York and Washington. They were not as well off as they would have been had they been working in Canada for the same salary.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would they have to pay as much income tax?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is a difficult point. I believe that all the temporary employees are subject to income tax in the United States, but not at the same rates as would apply in Canada. The permanent employees do not pay income tax in the United States, but there are only one or two in that class. That is taken into account in fixing the salaries. I will be glad to look into this.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that not an answer to my hon. friend's argument when he tried to establish a point against the hon. member for Lake Centre? You must take into consideration the cost of living when you are dealing with a matter of this kind. I think my hon. friend had better leave it as it was in the first instance.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am willing to leave it that way, provided you take into account the cost of living, the rates of pay and the income tax differential. If that is done I think without exception it will be found that these people working in the United States are worse off than if they were working in Canada and in receipt of the same salary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter of calculation.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is a matter of calculation, of estimation and of the difference in standards of living. But I believe it is true. As I have said, Mr. Vining endeavoured to apply, and I think succeeded in applying, the principle that no one should receive more than he got before. This is borne out by such investigations as I have been able to make.

Just a word in conclusion about the question of expenditures. On May 20, 1943, the hon. member was referring to the expenditures of the board, reported on page 2827 of Hansard as follows:

> The situation is this, that in the first year of the war the former war information board, the bureau of public information, expended $202,672; whereas this new body has expended, during a period of a little over six and a half months, the sum of $579,000.

And a little later on he said that there had been a tremendous increase in the expenditures on publicity under this board. That left the impression that there had been a tremendous increase in the expenditures of the board during the time the board had been in existence. The hon. member took the figure $202,672, the expenditures for the first year of the bureau, and contrasted them with the last six months. He might just as well have taken the year before the war and compared it with 1942-43, because in the year before the war there were no expenditures whatever. The board and the war were getting going. It was like comparing the pre-war expenditure of Canada on the war or on munitions and supply or on anything else with the expenditure in the current year. But comparing what is comparable, namely, expenditures in the year preceding the board, my hon. friend will see that in the year 1942-43 the estimates brought down under the war appropriation bill amounted to $1,345,500. The figure my hon. friend got in a return for expenditures during six months, pretty nearly seven months, was $579,000. If he will compare the expenditures of $579,000 with an estimate of $1,345,500, he will see that in the last six months during which the board was operating it was spending at a lower rate than was provided for in the estimates, and at a lower rate than that at which the division of public information was spending, which the board succeeded on September 9, 1942.

Mr. GRAYDON: That may only show that it was a reckless estimate.

Mr. CLAXTON: My hon. friend has no justification for saying that. It is not borne out by the facts. The estimate was not so reckless, because, despite the increased expenditures on films, the total expenditure for the fiscal year 1942-43 will be in the neighbourhood of $1,400,000 to $1,500,000.

For this year we are setting down in the estimates the figure of $658,000, a substantial decrease from the figure for last year. That decrease is in part effected through the expenditure formerly provided for of $575,000 for films being taken into the estimates of the national film board. It was thought that that was the better way to do it. In addition there have been decreases right from the beginning of the wartime information board on September 9, 1942, and the proportionate part of the expenditure for the fiscal year 1942-43 expended since the institution of the board on September 9, 1942, is less than it should be, taken for the full year. So that my hon. friend's accusation of very high and rapidly increasing expenditures is not borne out, if it is related to the period immediately under review and the period preceding it, as it should be.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I cannot follow my hon. friend's mathematics at the moment, but I should like information in connection with the expenditure. The total expenditure, as the hon. gentleman mentions, for the first six and a half months, was approximately $579,000.

Mr. CLAXTON: For the last six and a half months.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Prior to the first of April.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The details are: salaries, $119,209.26; travelling expenses, $21,-194.76; printing of pamphlets, $32,405.54; radio programmes, $11,765.28. Those are the particulars except for what is called possible expenditures, including office stationery and printing, amounting to $391,775. That is the big item, and I think the committee should have a general analysis of that very large figure for miscellaneous expenditures. While I am on my feet there is something more.

Mr. CLAXTON: May I finish? I am nearly through. I shall be glad to put that break-down on Hansard, with the consent of the committee, if my hon. friend wants it.

The main reason for the difference, of course, is that the return did not ask for information that brought out specific expenditure on motion pictures. The expenditure on motion pictures during that period was $261,073.03. That will give my hon. friend the information he wants almost in a sentence, and clear up this very large item to which he refers, which undoubtedly puzzled him.

The budget that is being asked for is $658,000, and if increased demands are made on the board for additional work, I have no doubt that sum of money will not be found to be sufficient. Additional staff will be required. But that is the figure that seems to be sufficient now. If we compare that figure with the expenditure on the previous year's operations of the combined division of public information and the wartime information board we will see that it represents a considerable decrease, a decrease of between $100,000 and $200,000, in addition to the decrease credited to films alone.

There is no better way of judging the usefulness of expenditures of this kind than by seeing that we get value for the money expended. I submit to this committee, and I think now I can submit to anyone else with confidence, that the value of the work being done by the board abroad and at home shows that this money is well spent. It was spent to meet a need that was felt before, and which would immediately exist again if it had not been met by the board. The events of the last few days indicate how useful has been the cooperation of the press relations officers, the press associations, the correspondents of newspapers overseas, with the wartime information board at various points in the background, in seeing that the people of this continent got early news of the landing in Sicily, and also that the statements which were made have afterwards received early and favourable notice in the United States both in the press and over the radio.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the wartime information board taking credit for all that?

Mr. CLAXTON: I did not suggest that. I said it had contributed to it by its work in the background, by making arrangements.

Mr. MacNICOL: The newspapers would have got it if there had been no board.

Mr. CLAXTON: Honestly I cannot think that. Contrast the treatment that has been given in the United States, for example, to other stories that have broken, and you will see that something has happened.

Mr. GRAYDON: If you get a good story the press will see that it is distributed.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. CLAXTON: There have been good stories before which did not receive the attention they should have. I do not suggest that there is anything miraculous about this, but there has been hard work in the background.

Another method of appreciating the work of the board in addition to the value received, is to compare the work of the board and the expenditure of the board with the work done by other agencies. If my hon. friends would think of the proportionate figure of expenditure on the wartime information board in Canada and on corresponding agencies in Britain and the United States or Australia, and relate them in some way that is fair—I suggest to them the total expenditure on war—they will arrive at some astonishing figures.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In making that comparison you would have to take into consideration the officials connected with information branches in the Department of Finance, the Department of Labour, the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Defence for Air, and the nineteen press agents connected with the wartime prices and trade board. Has the minister a record of the expenditure being made by press units in these various other departments? That is the only way to get a fair comparison.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have taken that into consideration very fully, and the hon. member will find that in Canada the number of such outside officers, outside the regular wartime information board, is very much smaller in proportion than the number of outside officers in every other country. The figures I will give exclude those outside officers in all countries. I think that was the right way to do it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the parliamentary assistant a statement with regard to expenditures for information in these other departments?

Mr. CLAXTON: That was filed in a return to the house, P.C. 216. Information was given with regard to all civilian employees, and the rank and allowances were given for all men in the armed services. I have information about that, but my hon. friend will realize that that is a matter for the departments of defence. I could give the total number on the payroll but that is not what he wants.

Like all other comparisons, the one I am giving is perhaps open to question, but it is the simplest one we can think of and it is a fair one. In the United Kingdom the proportion is one to 615; that is, £1 out of every £615 of war expenditures goes to the information service. In the United States it is one to 906; in Australia one to 4,000, and Canada one to 6,500. If another method of comparison may be given it is the amount spent.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend suggested originally that the test was not the amount spent, or the comparable amount in relation to general war expenditures, but the value received. If he is to use one argument on one occasion, he should use it on the other.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member is a lawyer, and he knows that when it comes to a valuation case and the determination of what is of value the court will look at all the considerations that bear upon it. That is the only way of doing it here. I am advancing this in all fairness for the consideration of the committee, and I suggest that there is another method, which is of course open to objection because we are not in business. If my hon. friend compares the amount spent on advertising by large companies in Canada, he will find that the wartime information board is very modest indeed. There are from eight to ten companies in Canada to-day that spend more than the wartime information board on publicity.

I can only add this. There has been some talk about the quarters at the supreme court building, and if hon. members want to see the quarters occupied by the information board they are welcome there. Nothing has been spent on fitting them up. There is not a rug in the place.

Mr. GRAYDON: Any chesterfields?

Mr. CLAXTON: No chesterfields that I have seen. It is one of the most uncomfortable places to work in that I have ever been in. They work under exceedingly difficult circumstances.

In conclusion, I was asked to make one disclaimer. In the previous debate the Hon. Philippe Brais, vice-chairman of the wartime information board, was taxed with having an interest in some publicity firm or publishing house which, the implication was, dealt with the government.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who made that charge?

Mr. CLAXTON: One of the hon. members, the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). Of course, the hon. member for Témiscouata must be misinformed, because Mr. Brais assures me that he has no interest in any publishing house or publicity house or advertising house or anything of the kind, or anyone else, having such a relationship with the government. Anyone who knows Mr. Brais' distinguished services, as chairman for Quebec of the national war finance committee, will know that no other word than this is needed to meet a remark that must have been based on totally incorrect information.

Considering the lateness of the session, we have adopted perhaps an unusual course in giving what I hope hon. members will recognize as a very full account of the work of the board. We have done so because it was brought up in discussion before and there has been misinformation about the wartime information board. I hope that in consequence of what has been said it will be recognized that work of real merit is being done by public-spirited servants of the people of Canada who are anxious to serve their country and who are doing a splendid job. I hope that members of the house, the press and the public will not only appreciate that, but support it in every way they can, not merely by helpful and constructive work, but also by their criticisms.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member has made out at least a prima facie case, or perhaps I should say he has advanced arguments in a rather weak case, but the way in which he has handled it suggests that perhaps he has made the best of the job and I congratulate him upon that score. Farther than that my congratulations cannot go. This is the first occasion on which he has discharged such duties as a parliamentary assistant, and we do appreciate his courtesy in face of the interruptions, which were rather numerous but which were made because we desire some further information. It is difficult in committe of the whole to get the information that is really required with regard to the wartime information board. To paint a picture such as the hon. member has done is not a very difficult matter, but under some rigorous examination such statements are not always apt to turn out in the way that the parliamentary assistant may expect.

May I ask one or two questions with regard to this matter. The hon. gentleman has made some reference to the desirability of getting the best men for the jobs. Without intending any reflection on the choice made, I think we ought to know the underlying reason for the appointment of Mr. John Grierson as the general manager of the wartime information board. I should like to know what his qualifications are from the point of view of newspaper publicity, for instance. I know something of his qualifications in relation to some of the government departments, but I should like to get that information as well as information with regard to salary and expenses as well as living allowances to which he is entitled and which he will be paid as general manager.

Mr. CLAXTON: The Prime Minister in his opening statement referred to Mr. Grierson's general qualifications. Mr. Grierson, as everyone knows, was born in Scotland. That is not against him. He received his education there, supplemented by training at the university of Chicago, and extensive work in the field of public information, particularly as related to the United States. He was engaged in film work on this side, and then he returned to England, where he became one of the pioneers in the field of documentary films and government publicity in general, working for the Postmaster General in England. I daresay there is no man engaged in the business of government publicity anywhere who has been at it longer than Mr. John Grierson. He has spent his whole life in that field since leaving the United States at an early age. In the field of documentary films he has achieved an international reputation, and his work has received the academy award known at Hollywood as an Oscar.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is quite an award.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, there is nothing higher in the world.

Mr. BRUCE: The Order of Merit?

Mr. CLAXTON: In the world of films. Since he has been in Canada Mr. Grierson has made this success with films. As hon. members may have gathered, he is exceedingly interested in the whole subject of public information; he is a specialist in it. When Mr. Vining had to resign on account of ill-health, Mr. Vining himself looked about for a suitable successor and recommended to the government the appointment of Mr. Grierson. Mr. Grierson was persuaded to accept that task, on partial loan from the national film board. He receives no salary from the wartime information board; he receives his salary from the national film board. He receives only actual out-of-pocket travelling expenses from the wartime information board. His work with the national film board is, I think, well known to hon. members.

Mr. GRAYDON: The salary of the general manager is not included in the estimates of the wartime information board?

Mr. CLAXTON: No, any more than it was with Mr. Vining, who was giving his services free.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will that mean that a number of men are attached to the wartime information board whose salaries are in other estimates and would therefore swell the amount of the total expenditures?

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not understand my hon. friend when he suggests that people who are working for and at no expense to the wartime information board swell the amount of its estimates. There are five people working for the wartime information board who are not paid by it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, but they are paid out of the same pocket.

Mr. CLAXTON: Oh, no.

Mr. GRAYDON: Oh, yes.

Mr. CLAXTON: There is Mr. Crandall, who has retired as president of British United Press; Mr. A. D. Dunton, editor of the Montreal Standard; Mr. Sedgwick and Mr. Campbell, who are in receipt of a living allowance in New York and Washington, but whose salaries are paid by their companies in the same way as Mr. Dunton's is. I think those are, with Mr. Grierson, the five I had in mind.

Mr. GRAYDON: The reason why I inquired was that I was under the impression that there were a number in Mr. Grierson's category who were paid by the government in another department, but whose salaries would not appear in this particular estimate. Perhaps that should be cleared up.

Mr. CHURCH: I have been watching this particular department ever since this war started. It has been under several ministers, and I do not see how the parliamentary assistant can succeed with it at nearly the end of the fourth year of the war, after others have failed.

We do not need all this advertising in the United States. Britain tried it for a hundred and forty years, and did she educate them over there? No; they were isolationists for two years after the war began. This work was formerly in charge of the Minister of National War Services, now Mr. Justice J. T. Thorson. The similar organization in England is the most controversial government body in the old country to-day. It is linked up with the BBC, and both are continously under fire in the British House of Commons on the ground that much of the information they disseminate is not information at all.

What have we in connection with this organization? Its spokesman here is the present parliamentary assistant, who made an address in the house, of which I have taken note, on May 29, 1942. I am not permitted to read from this address this session, but I can tell you that only last week or this present week one of the editors of the Montreal Standard was appointed by the parliamentary assistant to an important position in this branch.

Before this war started, I called the attention of the house, when I was sitting at this end of the chamber, to the need of educating first our own people in Canada and of giving them information before giving it to another country, even our great ally to the south.

The British office of information started in the early days of the war and was in charge of various ministers before being entrusted to Mr. Brendal Bracken by Mr. Churchill. They went to work and scattered over Germany millions of tracts and treatises as war information with the idea of trying to convert the German people. The campaign was so ridiculous that it failed. Then they worked the same thing with the BBC, one of whose heads, Mr. Peterson, had remarked a month or two before the war started that anyone preaching rearmament should be put in gaol and fed on bread and water. Would that Kipling were alive to-day! I believe he lived in the United States for over twenty years, and he could give more information about publicity in relation to our own nation and that of our great ally than anybody connected with the wartime information board.

The question is, what is information and what is not information? Who is to judge? Is it to be some member of the government or every member of the government? If its purposes are to dispense information, it should be non-political; it should be concerned wholly with the war. The complaint and the main attack made in the British House of Commons was that the propaganda to supply information and convert the people of the United States was political and was valueless. Money spent on this kind of propaganda is simply wasted.

As I said before the war started, when we were in the tide of the status campaign which began ten or fifteen years ago, Canada was a nation on the front pages of the United States magazines and at five o'clock teas and ten o'clock dinners in Washington, and by status we had got nowhere before the war.

If we want to distribute information, let us start with Canada and supply information to our own people. Ask any citizen of this country whether in the three years before the war and during the war we have not received less information than any other people. After all is said and done, it is the function of the press and not of the government of the day to give to the public this sort of information. The very fact of the establishment of this branch of government shows lack of understanding and appreciation and of confidence in the function of the press. What do you do? You go to work and summon and appoint editors from all over the country. Some of them come in for a month or two and then resign. You bring them from the coast, the prairies, the east, and other places to gather information. Information as to what? As to the conduct of the war? Take as an illustration the Dieppe raid. Why should all these textbooks be written? Department stores are full of these productions, and parents of boys who fell at Dieppe tell me that they object to the class of information contained in books written by men some of whom were away out in the English channel and not on the shore at all during the engagement.

This kind of thing did not go on in the last war and it should not be encouraged now. When information should be given, the appropriate government officials representing the army, navy and the air force overseas should, under proper regulations, supply it to the proper authorities at the front and let it be sent across the ocean to Canada.

Before the war started we could get no information at all. As I said in this house on March 21, 1939, quoting the words of Prime Minister Chamberlain at that time, if the people are not allowed to know the facts; if they are given only so much as their rulers want them to know, then we are embarked on a course fraught with grave consequences to the people of this country, should war come.

As I have said, I read the recent remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I also read in the Cleveland Plain Dealer an address he made about May last during his visit to the United States. I keep in touch with press reports through the reading room and otherwise; in fact I have looked over five or six hundred newspapers since the war started, and I can tell the minister as regards the money he is spending to convert the people of the United States, that if it is conversion he wants, he is going the wrong way about it. All the money you spend in connection with United States weekly and daily newspapers from coast to coast in regard to this information is wasted. After all is said and done, things are not the same as in the last war. We have failed to understand the commercialization of the press that has occurred in the interval. Often the great dailies in London, New York and other cities sit on the fence and do not take sides because they do not want to be unpopular. We have failed to notice the extent to which the great weeklies of this country, who are the backbone of independent thought here, have been driven to the wall in these days of war economic stress. With regard to most of this material that is given out about the war, I would not call it information at all. Would any historian take the views expressed by the parliamentary assistant the other day.

I do not wish to delay the Prime Minister's estimates, but I do not see how the parliamentary assistant can hope to make a success of this branch at this late stage of the war, when three or four other ministers have failed with it, and when the corresponding organizations in England and the United States are continually in hot water. I hope that during the recess of parliament the whole department will be abolished. Let the press do all this work and get its information about the war from the army, the navy and the air force; let it fulfil its function, as it has since time immemorial, in peace and war alike, and transmit the information to the citizens of this country.

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I should reply to one or two points which have been raised. First, I find that I misinformed the committee in regard to the matter of income tax, which was raised some time ago. The situation is that two members of the staff of fourteen in the United States are residents of that country and pay income tax there. One member of the staff was an employee of the British government when taken over by the board, and for some technical reason he may not be liable to tax in the United States. The other eleven members of the staff pay Canadian income tax on salary and allowances, so that a good deal of the discussion we had previously might have been obviated if I could have given the leader of the opposition this information, which of course fortifies my position very greatly in regard to the salaries of the employees in the United States.

The hon. member for Lake Centre asked a question in regard to how some fourteen jobs were ordered by the board and what control was kept over the editorial work done on them. In those cases the work was actually done for the board by people expert in that work; the board assumed full responsibility for it; there was complete control throughout, and a small fee was paid for the services rendered.

In reply to the hon. member for Broadview, I can only say that his understanding of the situation with respect to information in Great Britain is not up to date. By all accounts the present minister is making an extraordinary success of his job. The debates in the House of Commons, which I have followed and which I have in my hand, are full of compliments to a minister who is doing a difficult job and doing it exceedingly well. Far from the flood of leaflets over Germany being stopped, it has been multiplied almost a thousand-fold, and is known to do exceedingly good work. The work of the ministry of information in England is more appreciated to-day than it has been at any stage of the war.

Mr. BRUCE: May I ask the parliamentary assistant if the wartime information board has in its possession a German motion picture film of Dieppe? I understand that this film is being shown in some of the training camps of the United States, and I wondered if they had a copy of it and if it would be shown here.

Mr. CLAXTON: I never heard of it; certainly it is not in the possession of the wartime information board. It is possible that the film board may have such a film, and I am sure my hon. friend could obtain that information, or I shall be glad to get it for him, from the film board.

Mr. BRUCE: The Prime Minister stated that the public have a right to know everything connected with the war, so that at this time I purpose making a few remarks arising out of what has happened within the last day or two, though I had no intention of participating in this debate. He also stated that the information brought out in parliament is a contribution to the wartime information board, and that parliament was a free agency for bringing out facts concerning various aspects of the war effort. Therefore I think nothing can be more important than to give the public information in regard to the attitude of various members of this house in respect to external affairs, and particularly towards the views expressed a few days ago by the parliamentary assistant. It is desirable that the people should have full information as to public opinion in Canada in regard to our war effort and related matters. First I wish to commend the hon. member for Lethbridge for the splendid speech he made yesterday, in which, among other things, he expressed the hope that we would do more than utter fine sounding phrases.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I should like to remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the discussion on external affairs has been completed. During that debate the hon. member had his opportunity to discuss any aspect of external affairs, but if this parliament is going to get through with its business in a reasonable time I submit that we cannot conclude the estimates of one department and later commence a fresh discussion of those subjects already completed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that we are now discussing the item having to do with the wartime information board. What the Prime Minister has said is absolutely correct, and we must confine our discussion to this item.

Mr. BRUCE: That discussion closed when I was not here, though of course that is my fault.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit that my hon. friend should abide by the rules of the house.

Mr. BRUCE: I do not wish to delay the proceedings for a moment. I had intended to speak only for about five minutes, but I shall take the opportunity of doing so on some other occasion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We must confine our discussion to this particular item.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to delay the committee for very long, either, but I want to compliment the parliamentary assistant upon his presentation in behalf of the wartime information board. When the question of appointing assistants to the various ministers was brought up, the members of this group felt that there was absolute necessity for this step being taken, and I think the way in which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is handling the matter before the committee this afternoon fully justifies his appointment.

Much could be said on the subject now under consideration. The hon. member for Broadview emphasizes the fact that the dissemination of information to the public is largely the business of the press. My personal observation is that if what we have been getting in the press for the past three or four years is any indication as to their ability to educate the public, then I am all for setting up some other agency which will see to it that the public gets all the facts in respect of any matter requiring publicity. I read all sections of the press. I have heard discussions in the house of matters of which we have intimate knowledge, and one would not recognize those discussions as they are given to the public through the medium of the press. If the press is to retain the confidence of the public and a place in the future of our country, then regard will have to be had to many sections of it, to see that it gives the public frankly and without any reservation the facts disclosed, so that public opinion may be moulded in accordance with actual conditions.

Replying to the hon. member for York-Sunbury, the parliamentary assistant said that the main function of the wartime information board was to send propaganda to the people of the United States. I believe such an observation would be misleading to the public. To-day the average person associates propaganda with totalitarian countries. Those countries have used the word "propaganda" to the world at large in order to sell something to the people which actually did not exist. They have tried to build their machines into machines representing freedom and democracy, so that propaganda in the mind of the average man leaves the impression that we are trying to sell him something phony.

In my opinion the main function of the wartime information board is to tell the people of the United States the truth about what is going on in Canada, so that we may be able to get together on a basis of mutual understanding of what is taking place. I believe the wartime information board is and has been performing a useful service in this time of war.

Then, I have kept in close touch with what has been done by the national film board. I believe the chairman of that board, Mr. Grierson, is doing an important job in an important educational field. In my view visual education is the greatest medium of educating the public. I have seen many of the films produced by the film board since the outbreak of war. They have endeavoured to inform all the provinces in Canada of what is actually taking place, in order that Canadians may see each other in their respective provinces and in their various endeavours, so that the economic operations of all might be carried on more effectively. I believe I am speaking on behalf of this group when I compliment the national film board upon the job it is doing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to make a few comments following the explanations by the parliamentary assistant. My observations will deal more particularly with my experiences on my recent trip to the United States. I believe what I learned at that time should be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister, with a view to having certain changes made which in my opinion would materially improve our relations with the United States.

The parliamentary assistant made a comparison between expenditures in Canada and those in Great Britain and the United States. I fail to see the significance of such comparisons. In the matter of propaganda, a process which to-day assumes greater proportions than ever before, there are three phases. The first is that of the home front; the second concerns friendly or allied nations and, so far as Canada is concerned particularly concerns the United States of America. The third phase is that of operations by way of propaganda directed against the enemy. In other words information may be divided into two groups, one offensive and the other defensive. The operations of the wartime information board in Canada are not of the offensive type, in that they are not primarily directed against the enemy, whereas Great Britain and the United States have to build up a counter-propaganda system against axis nations. We in Canada have not had to do that to any extent, but Great Britain must answer the propaganda of the enemy nations. That accounts in large measure for the difference in the expenditures made by information boards in England and in Canada.

I believe there is no more important branch than the wartime information board. Recent history has shown that the failure to answer enemy propaganda in allied countries, however implausible that propaganda may be, may result in dangerous divisions taking place. What Canada needs more than ever to-day is direct and truthful propaganda used as an antidote against some of the false propaganda being circulated.

If I remember correctly, the Prime Minister pointed out this afternoon that the United States has not at all times had a full appreciation of Canada's constitutional position. I feel, too, that she does not appreciate the many facets of the war effort of this dominion. There is nothing more important to-day than our relationship with the United States, owing to the fact that she is a great allied nation and our nearest neighbour. Our relations must be based upon an appreciation of what each nation is doing, and to that end the people of the United States should be told what Canada is doing in the war.

In Canada we hear every day what is being done in the United States. That information comes to us over the radio, in the newspapers and in the magazines published in the United States. However, in the short time I was there I found there were Americans in public life who had insufficient knowledge of the fact that last year this parliament made provision for a billion-dollar transfer of goods to Great Britain—the so-called gift. What is more, they have little or no knowledge of the billion-dollar mutual aid bill recently passed in the house. While the parliamentary assistant has said much regarding the improvement in conditions in the United States, so far as war-time information is concerned, I say there is plenty of room for a great improvement and for a wider dissemination of news regarding our war contribution. A moment ago my hon. friend mentioned the number of press references that had been made, I believe it was something like four hundred in the last—

Mr. CLAXTON: The minister gave those figures from Mr. Givens' letter. He said it had increased 400 per cent within a very short period.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is still room for greater endeavours in the furnishing of information to the United States. A short time ago the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said that the wartime information board was needed in Canada to disseminate information because the press was not doing its duty. That was the inference to be taken from his remarks. I submit that the press in Canada or the United States does not require the assistance of any board to point out the news that is worthy of dissemination.

Mr. GRAYDON: They know better than anybody else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My recollection is that among the persons who were most interested in having a war information board established, and who pressed most strongly for it, were the editors and publishers of most of the large papers in this country. I know from the pressure that was brought to bear on me by the press it was made clear that the members thought there should be an information board to do the very thing the parliamentary assistant has referred to to-day, namely, to facilitate the press in getting information that it needed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That merely bears out my argument. The lack of interest in the United States in what Canada is doing is owing to the fact that we had no general and efficient method of disseminating news until October, 1942.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know my hon. friend will not mind my interrupting him, because it is only a matter of having the right information. He must recall that until the United States was actually in the war there was in the United States a strong feeling against any attempt on the part of Canada to influence the people in a way which might be held to be political, namely, to make from Canada by way of propaganda an effort to bring the United States into the war. It was held the reactions might be serious. I am justified in saying that I was asked by the highest authority in the United States to see that great care was taken to avoid making any move by which it could be said that the government of Canada was trying to influence public opinion in the United States with a view to having the United States brought into the war against its will. All of that had to be carefully considered before Canada was justified in appointing any board for the purpose of distributing information in the United States with regard to the war.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All that the Prime Minister has said would apply prior to December, 1941, prior to Pearl Harbor, but after that date there was a hiatus until October, 1942, during which period little information was given to the people of the United States. It was only in October, 1942, following the pressure the Prime Minister says he received from editors and, I would submit, from members of this opposition also, that there was an extension of facilities in the United States. While we in Canada have been able to learn what the United States effort is, I repeat that in the United States there is not the knowledge of our war effort that there should be.

I think the limitation upon holding conventions in and tourist traffic in Canada should be removed. The matter of exchange is not so important to-day as it was at the time tourist traffic was almost excluded from this country. The United States and Canada are working together under mutual aid schemes and lend-lease, and the need for the restriction of tourist traffic is not as great as it was previously. There is nothing so beneficial to the relationship between countries, especially countries lying side by side, as the interchange of ideas consequent on the visit of tourists. I submit that something should be done to remove the present almost impregnable wall that exists in Canada against visits of United States tourists.

Mr. MacNICOL: Give them more gasoline.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The hon. member for Davenport suggests that consideration should be given to granting an extra allowance of gasoline to tourists. I would suggest also that public speakers from Canada should be permitted and encouraged to go to the United States. At one time there was a speakers' bureau which arranged for the payment, in whole or in part, of expenses of speakers going to the United States. I understand that this has been done away with, but I speak subject to correction. In the recent visit to the United States of some members of this house we found that the people there are anxious to know about Canada and about our war effort. I submit that there would be no better way of doing this than to remove the unnecessary financial regulations in regard to tourist traffic and to encourage the holding of conventions in Canada and the arranging for speakers from Canada to go to the United States. I make these suggestions because I believe there is nothing so necessary to-day as the dissemination in the United States of selectve information, truthful information and, finally, the repetition of the information that is being distributed. This must be done in order to refute and combat misinformation which breeds easily and is a productive source of difficulty as between nations.

There are other observations I intended to make, one of which has to do with our soldiers overseas. To-day they are not permitted to receive newspapers. I realize that for a time this was necessary, but I contend that the best way the soldier overseas can be prevented from becoming homesick is to be made aware of what is happening on the home front. There should be a restoration to him of the right to secure Canadian newspapers. If that cannot be done, the wartime information board should establish a weekly or monthly publication which would set out what is happening in Canada. The parliamentary assistant, who has displayed the essence of courtesy in the way in which he has answered questions to-day, has sent me over a copy of "Canadian Affairs". This is a new pamphlet published for the Canadian army overseas by the wartime information board. It is entitled "Canada in the Fourth Year of War", by B. K. Sandwell, and I am going to refer to it.

Mr. CLAXTON: I wonder if my hon. friend would allow me to supplement the information I gave. I have just learned that the Canadian Press overseas print virtually a newspaper, a digest of the news in Canada, which is cabled over and distributed to the troops overseas and deals with the aspect of things near home. "Canadian Affairs" is intended to deal with a different kind of thing, with background, trends and tendencies. It is material in the nature of magazine material.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then the Canadian Press was found sufficient and worthy of the distribution of the news overseas to our soldiers. The information branch apparently is not occupying the position of the Canadian Press in that regard. Now I come to "Canadian Affairs".

Mr. CLAXTON: The wartime information board does not edit any news. That is not its business. That has been pointed out time and again. Its business is to facilitate the flow of news.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It either gives news or it does not. A while ago the position taken by the parliamentary assistant was that by reason of the activities of our wartime information board in the United States the press of the United States had been made aware of outstanding events that should be given general distribution in that country, and in consequence news of importance to Canada received distribution in the press of the United States. But now he says, no.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sorry, but there is no inconsistency whatever. What I said was that the Canadian Press and the United Press, the two agencies in Canada which have correspondents in the United States, send news to the United States. The wartime information board does not originate news. It is not a news agency.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does it edit the news?

Mr. CLAXTON: No, it does not edit it. The news is sent down by the agencies over their wires to their correspondents in the United States, the Associated Press and the United Press, and it gets into the United States newspapers through the news service giving it distribution. The services of the wartime information board are in facilitating the flow of news at every point. It does not have anything to do with the collection of news or the direct distribution of news. It is a service that it is rendering, facilitating the flow of the news.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then we are down to this. So far as the wartime information board is concerned, in the United States it runs a service in cooperation with the regular press services by directing the attention of the United States newspapers to available information.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, and making available to them background information, and doing all the other things I have described.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then it does not discharge its responsibility in the United States of America to-day.

I have in my hands the pamphlet, "Canadian Affairs", which the parliamentary assistant says is information for the troops. What does the pamphlet itself say? The title on the cover is, "Canada in the Fourth Year of War". And underneath that it says, "Not to be reprinted in whole or in part without permission of the wartime information board of Canada." On the back cover it says:

> Articles which appear in "Canadian Affairs" should be regarded as expressing the views of the individual Canadians who write them. These are not necessarily the views of the Department of National Defence, the wartime information board, or any other government authority.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Therefore the information that is given in "Canadian Affairs" for the benefit of soldiers overseas may be propaganda of the worst kind, and I use the word "propaganda" in the sense of political party propaganda.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It might be the reverse!

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is expressly stated that the views expressed in this pamphlet are not necessarily the views of the wartime information board.

When I look over the pamphlet I find that it tells the story of Canada in the following manner:

> I. Things are not the same.
> III. Money Doesn't Talk.
> IV. Union Recognition. With labour thus debarred from using its highly advantageous position for the purpose of getting higher wages, it became necessary to make many important concessions to the wage-earning classes in other directions.
> VI. The Balloon Tugs at Its Rope.
> VIII. Exit the Millionaire.
> IX. Higher Taxation Here to Stay.
> X. Where are the Reapers?
> XIII. Stay Where You are.
> XV. Conflict of Authority.

My submission, Mr. Chairman, is that the information covered by "Canadian Affairs" is not the type of information that should be sent to the men who are overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend allow me to give the opinion of General McNaughton of the very number from which he has just read? The following message I am informed was received from Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton by Major-General H. F. G. Letson, Adjutant-General.

> I have just seen volume I, number I, of "Canadian Affairs" which I have read from cover to cover with greatest interest. On behalf of army express sincerest thanks to those responsible for production. This issue and the others forecast will meet a need we have long felt.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That still does not answer what I say, namely, that the information given in the form in which it is given may operate as nothing but party propaganda. I quote the heading of another article in "Canadian Affairs." It is as follows, "The Home Front in Review," and it deals, among other things, with:

> Putting the "Conchies" to work. Another item in the man-power field came when Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, Minister of Labour, announced plans to put conscientious objectors on farms and into essential industry—if they refuse such employment, they will be sent to "alternative service" camps. Only 3,401 postponements of military training have been granted on grounds of conscientious objection.

That is not objective news, Mr. Chairman; that is news commented upon.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have just explained that this was not intended to be news; that news is dealt with in another way. This material is in the nature of magazine material. My hon. friend cannot make anything out of this. There is nothing that has not been explained to him.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This pamphlet is not in that position at all. It is given to the officers overseas who are instructed to give talks based on it to their men. It says:

> Don't read the pamphlet to your men. They would be bored in three minutes. But quote liberally sections that make stimulating listening.

Mr. CLAXTON: Has the hon. member any objection to that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am just saying that in the form in which it is given, what is in this pamphlet may very well amount not to proper information but to actual propaganda for party purposes. That is what I am objecting to.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if hon. members would consider passing this item now so that we might relieve the Prime Minister? Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAYDON: In the committee on radio broadcasting, which brought in its report at the end of the last session, some time was taken up in considering the question of the dissemination and perhaps the channelling of news and information from various departments of government. The parliamentary assistant was a member of that committee and took an active part in its work. He will recall, as will other members who took part in the committee, that evidence was adduced there indicating that some change was in the mind of the government looking to a more effective channelling of information coming from various governmental departments to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. What I wish to refer to is not related to press publication but rather to the radio.

There was evidence before the committee on one or two occasions that there was no real coordination in regard to information from various government sources—the wartime prices and trade board, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Agriculture and other departments—but that these departments, by a more or less hit-or-miss method, were competing, or at least that there was possibility that they might compete, for time on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation network. Some intimation was also given by those who gave evidence that the government had in mind at that time extending the work of the interdepartmental committee which was set up, I believe, under the chairmanship of the Hon. T. C. Davis, who was later appointed as Australian minister. That interdepartmental committee's workings have been spoken of from time to time in the committee itself, and I was wondering if the hon. gentleman could tell us whether it was working in conjunction with the wartime information board, which had been set up since the radio committee had brought in its findings.

May I quote from the Ottawa Journal of April 3 of this year, from an article under the title, "John Grierson defends work of war information board". At one stage of his observations he states:

> Each department of government had its own information service issuing material to the public. W.I.B. is not immediately concerned with these services, but has the duty of seeing to it that, in consultation with the departmental officers concerned, wastage of effort is kept within limits, campaigns are related and contradictions avoided.

That seems to put the matter on all fours with what was discussed in the radio committee at the last session of the house. I was wondering if the parliamentary assistant could give some information concerning the relationship between the wartime information board's activities and those of the interdepartmental committee, or whether the wartime information board has taken over the work of that committee.

Mr. CLAXTON: The question of coordinating the activities of the various information services is kept constantly in mind. There is one committee, the national campaign committee, under the chairmanship of Brigadier James Mess, which deals with the general subject of national campaigns in the broadest sense. It has representation from the various departments concerned. There is also a publicity coordinating committee, which I think is the committee the hon. member has particularly in mind, which was formerly chaired by the Hon. T. C. Davis, and that committee actually works on the business of coordinating war-time information, whether it be from the various government departments or from the wartime information board. In addition to that, it would be fair to say that since the report of the broadcasting committee, to which the hon. gentleman has referred, there has been a considerable growth of cooperation and coordination at every level. That certainly is striven for, I believe, with a considerable degree of success. Therefore my answer is that the question the hon. gentleman has in mind is constantly before those concerned with it, and they are making every effort to see to it that there shall be the most complete coordination and cooperation on the part of the various departments concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the relationship between the wartime information board and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? How closely do they work, and are the functions of the two bodies interrelated so far as the work of both is concerned?

Mr. CLAXTON: There is no formal organization directly relating the activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the wartime information board beyond the two committees and some other committees I might mention, but there is constant communication and cooperation. The opposite numbers in all ranks, from the general manager of the broadcasting corporation and the general manager of wartime information, down, work very closely together.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to get an answer from the parliamentary assistant in regard to "Canada at War" and the omission of information from the March, April, May and June issues with respect to the call-up and enlistment of men in the various military districts. This afternoon the parliamentary assistant said he would bring the matter to the attention of the board. That is not enough. Parliament has a right to know what should be in that booklet, and an explanation is due. The parliamentary assistant said that the reason why it was omitted was that parliament was in session. I accept that explanation. Then the question was asked whether he would give an assurance that this information would be furnished in issues following the prorogation of parliament, and the answer was that the matter would be brought to the attention of the board. The omission of this item has been the subject of considerable editorial comment and is a matter of interest to people everywhere. It gives them a picture from month to month of what Canada is doing in regard to manpower in all parts of the dominion. It makes for competition between districts and arouses, on the part of those districts which are contributing men, that enthusiasm which enables them to maintain the record of leading Canada in recruiting. During recent months, when a certain military district was ahead, the people resident in that district and the newspapers were very proud of the fact that they were leading the dominion. Competition is engendered as a result of furnishing that information, which cannot be secured in any other way. If we want the man-power, this is one way in which districts would vie with one another in a competitive play to head the dominion. I ask for some assurance that this be re-included in "Canada at War". It is not information which by any stretch of the imagination can do any harm to this nation. It was given for months. I ask the parliamentary assistant to place before the people the situation. Let us know why it has been omitted and when it will be restored.

Mr. CLAXTON: I must say that I am not clear as to the specific table to which the hon. member for Lake Centre has reference. I have looked over the issues of "Canada at War" from January to date, and I see that in the June issue, for example, there is no such table.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It has been omitted ever since February.

Mr. CLAXTON: "Man-power distribution" and "Summary of mobilization statistics". The hon. member will notice, and anybody else who chooses to look at the publication will see, that the make-up of the tables varies from month to month. I have in my hand the issue for July, just off the press. It is not yet issued to the public, and it has a table, "man-power distribution" and "summary of mobilization statistics". Probably that gives my hon. friend the information he wants.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does it give the call-up, district by district?

Mr. CLAXTON: It gives administration divisions, A to N, London to Edmonton, number called for medical examination, number examined, postponements, number requested, number granted, number in effect; military training, number called, number reported, number accepted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not the same table.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sorry, I do not know what my hon. friend has in mind. If there is an omission, I do not know the reason for it beyond what I have described. The two reasons are, first, that this information is given from time to time in the house; and second, that the make-up of the publication changes from time to time so as to provide information in different forms.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish to ask the parliamentary assistant about the increases of staff of the wartime information board during the last four or five months. I understand that a substantial number of men have been taken on during that time. How many have been taken on; how many have had newspaper experience, and how many are from university staffs?

Mr. CLAXTON: When the hon. member for York-Sunbury puts the question in that vague form, I must say that I am not prepared to answer it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member has in front of him a gentleman who ought to know.

Mr. CLAXTON: "The last four or five months" is a rather vague term, but the salary payrolls which I have here indicate that between September, 1942, and March there was a falling off in the staff, owing to the changeover from the old division of public information to the present wartime information board. In the last month or two there has been an increase, but the increase is only to the figure of 132 to-day as compared with the figure of 158 at the end of August 1942. With regard to personnel of the staff, I have not in mind that there is any serious change in emphasis between members of the press and university workers or any other profession. I do not know that there has been.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course the hon. gentleman is just talking all around the subject and saying nothing. Perhaps I can help him. I understand that seventeen men have been taken on in recent weeks, not one of whom has had newspaper experience, and that this group has been taken from various university groups. I should like to know the reason why; who they are; what salaries they are getting; how long their tenure of office is to be, and what is the policy behind the employment of these gentlemen.

Mr. CLAXTON: I can answer my hon. friend in one way. If he can indicate to the wartime information board at this time two or three newspaper men who would be suitable for work with the board they would be very glad to hear from them. With regard to his question, I do not know that there is any change, except this, that as I have indicated, in the development with the march of events and the passing of time from the original set-up back in 1940 to the present date, there has been a change of emphasis in that the wartime information board is no longer concerned so much with getting out material which will reach the public direct, as with providing services and facilities which reach the public indirectly. That change of emphasis has resulted in a decrease of staff and perhaps has enabled the board to use fewer newspapermen than it had before—if that is the case; I do not know that it is the case. We have not the whole staff up to date categorized under their previous occupations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. gentleman's reply would lead me to believe that he does not know anything about it, and that is probably true. My information is that nineteen new men have been taken on this staff within recent weeks and that not one of them is a trained newspaper or publicity man. We ought to have that information; who they are; what the terms of their employment are; what their salaries are; whether it was impossible to get trained newspapermen—I think they are usually available—how long they are going to be there; what they are paid, and what their special duties are. I think we should have that information.

Mr. CLAXTON: If my hon. friend wants that information I will try to give it to him, but I must say that we had no reason to sort it out in that form, and I shall have to take the time of the committee to sort it out here, because that is not the normal way to record information of this kind.

The first name is Anderson, A. C. As I mentioned this afternoon, he is in charge of south American news. The date of appointment is January 16, 1943. He was formerly a newspaperman working with the Southam Press.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not within three or four months.

Mr. CLAXTON: My hon. friend has to be fair. Where are we going to begin?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said, the last three or four months. That is perfectly fair and quite understandable. I believe we have the record up to February 8 on a return. What we want is a supplementary record since this return was brought down.

Mr. CLAXTON: Now that my hon. friend has given me the date I can begin from it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. I am glad to help the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CLAXTON: The date is February 8?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): February 8.

Mr. CLAXTON: Mrs. I. M. Arnold, clerk grade 4, April 1, 1942.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What experience has she had?

Mr. CLAXTON: She is a clerk.

Miss S. Cloutier, clerk grade 3, April 12, 1943.

Mr. C. F. Crandall, February 20, 1943. He was formerly president of the United Press and, before that, managing editor of the Montreal Star and is president of the Dominion News Bureau.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Salary?

Mr. CLAXTON: He has no salary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is just temporary.

Mr. CLAXTON: Everyone in this board has a temporary position.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is he costing the country?

Mr. CLAXTON: He receives his out-of-pocket expenses. Mr. J. R. Herbin was appointed on February 12, 1943. He was formerly employed as a copy reader with the Toronto Daily Star.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was a newspaperman in Fredericton; he is a young man.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know his age. He was a newspaperman, like Mr. Crandall, whom I have just mentioned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is his salary?

Mr. CLAXTON: $3,300.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He got $15 a week when he was in Fredericton.

Mr. CLAXTON: How long ago?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): About three or four years.

Mr. CLAXTON: Well, something has happened since then.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know what happened; he got on the government payroll. That is the only thing that happened, as far as I know.

Mr. CLAXTON: On February 16, 1943, Miss J. Laroche was appointed as clerk, grade 1.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At $60?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, $60.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, we are not after that.

Mr. CLAXTON: I should like to know what my hon. friend is asking for. He says nineteen people have been appointed and I am giving him all there are.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many college professors? Come to that.

Mr. CLAXTON: Mr. E. L. Morris was appointed on May 3, 1943, as principal clerk; he was formerly employed with the Halifax Chronicle.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Salary?

Mr. CLAXTON: $1,920. On April 5, 1943, Mr. T. F. N. Newton, formerly lecturer in English at McGill university, was appointed at a salary of $4,200, the salary he received at McGill. On April 16, 1943, P. H. Riley was appointed office boy at $420. On April 2, 1943, Mr. C. M. Watson received $400 for a three months' survey of some subject set by the board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was brought in from New York, was he not?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He comes from Fredericton, too.

Mr. CLAXTON: He was an experienced radio man, working with the National Broadcasting company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, and a very good man.

Mr. CLAXTON: On April 9, 1943, Mr. B. Foster was appointed as mail porter; $1,020; no journalistic experience. On April 1, 1943, Miss B. V. Carruthers was appointed to the New York staff as a teletype operator; no journalistic experience, as far as I know. On April 1, 1943, Miss B. A. Roberts was appointed to the New York office as a stenographer. Those are all the appointments of which I have note.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. gentleman say that is all there are?

Mr. CLAXTON: Those are all of which I have note.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not say that is all, though.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The mystery is solved.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not solved; we have not had the proper answers.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Just before six o'clock I was referring to "Canadian Affairs" and pointing out that having regard to some of the statements made by the person writing it, this book had the earmarks of political propaganda, and the Prime Minister produced a letter from General McNaughton approving the production of this booklet. As a matter of fact, General McNaughton was the originator of it, for in the booklet I find:

> One day several months ago in a small wooden hut that housed General McNaughton's field headquarters somewhere in England, a group of officers were talking freely of their problems with the commander in chief.

Then it points out that something was missing; they did not know their homeland any more.

> . . . and out of that sense of "something missing," "Canadian Affairs" was born. It owes its existence to-day to the sympathy and the will of General McNaughton.

I want to point that out, just to keep the record clear. Then I want to ask the parliamentary assistant: Since this booklet is issued by the wartime information board; since it contains a series of statements in regard to Canada and the war effort being made by Canadians, what is the idea of denying to the men who are taught these things the right to use that information or to have it reprinted? What is the idea of the order that appears on the front of this issue:

> Not to be reprinted in whole or in part without permission of the wartime information board of Canada.

It is difficult to understand the reason for that. This particular issue was written by Mr. Sandwell; instructions are given that the pamphlet is not to be read to the men, and so on; the officers are told how to use it; but after the men have been given this instruction, the information they receive may not be reprinted or used in any way without the consent of the board. I should like to know the reason for that.

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I should have explained at greater length how "Canadian Affairs" originated, but I thought I had taken up enough of the time of the committee. There are two publications issued by the British army, "Current Affairs" and "War". They are issued to all officers and, I think, a considerable number of other ranks in the British army as well as in the Canadian forces. They are extraordinarily useful publications, and by General McNaughton and others it was thought desirable that we should supplement these publications with another of our own. Accordingly "Canadian Affairs" was decided upon, as it states, to fill a long-felt want. If my hon. friend is familiar with the other publications he will see that the set-up of this pamphlet is very similar to that of the other two. I think reference to the other publications will indicate that everything about this pamphlet is similar to them. The other publications are written in part by individuals, in the same way, and the board issuing them disclaims any responsibility for the views expressed. That is in order that they may not become totally colourless, and it indicates that they carry no official sanction. With regard to reprinting, the wartime information board has been requested for permission to reprint articles from this publication on at least two occasions, both in Great Britain; once by a newspaper and once by one of the British army publications, and that permission was given instantly. The qualification with regard to reprinting I should think appears on every publication issued for the army. There is no objection to the material being used, provided some control is kept over its use, and that is one reason for putting in that restriction. It is also intended to protect those who are asked to contribute their services for these purposes. The Prime Minister has already read to the committee the appreciation of the first number from General McNaughton. I should think the committee, and everyone else, would be completely satisfied that this was a desirable publication issued in the interests of our soldiers overseas definitely to keep them better informed and properly safeguarded in every way. It was just the kind of thing that General McNaughton wanted, and that he said in his telegram he wanted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I know those British publications, and they do not contain any of the political references this booklet contains. I will read one of them, and I would ask the committee whether or not it contains information objectively given for the benefit of the troops overseas. Here is one quotation:

> The social effects of this steeply graduated taxation will be incalculable. Only a small fraction of them is now visible, because taxpayers have not yet adjusted their style of living to their new circumstances.

And a little later on:

> Any expectation that this rate of taxation can be much lessened after the war is fast disappearing, as it comes to be realized that Canada cannot avoid sharing in the burden of putting Europe and the orient on their feet again, and as political parties vie with one another in their promises of legislation for social betterment at home. It cannot be said that there is any serious resentment about these changes, which are accepted as inevitable and as likely in the long run to be beneficial to the nation; the chief concern of the "successful" classes is to preserve some area of opportunity for private enterprise.

Then he goes on to refer to the purpose of continuing taxation at its present level, as against the demands of the socialists for the elimination of the whole profit motive from commerce and industry. There are many such quotations in the book.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that must have been written by a member of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is written by Mr. Sandwell.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We ought to have an explanation why political propaganda like that is put out in the guise of objective information to the army.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows that it is not political propaganda. What is the sense of trying to create the impression that it is political propaganda? It is nothing of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: No. I have listened with great interest this afternoon to the lucid explanations given by the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister. One thing which surprised me was his statement that Mr. Grierson had only one salary. I remember the time when Mr. Grierson received only $6,000 from the film board, but it has now jumped to $10,000. Therefore, if he has only one salary, then it is a salary with a big belly, meaning by that that instead of having a salary of only $6,000 a year, he has one of $10,000. Well, I have no objection to that; but the whole story should be told. He is there, and he looks after the film board, a very fine institution. Then, we realize the information board is not such a fine institution, and I think a distinction should be made between them. The information board does not inform people as they should be informed about everything.

In the first place, French-speaking people in this country should be informed about English-speaking people, and vice versa, so that we may come to an understanding. But nothing of that sort is done. What is the use of keeping an information board when there is an information branch in each department? There is one in the Department of Munitions and Supply and also one in the Department of Labour. Why do we have this fifth wheel called the information board? I am not saying that to be critical. I remember distinctly that the matter of information was covered by the Department of National War Services, before that department was entrusted to the hon. member who is now minister of that department. As soon as he was sworn in, it was taken away from that department, and placed under the Prime Minister. Why was such a change made? I wonder if the hon. member who is now parliamentary assistant has explained why the information board has been taken away from the Minister of National War Services, and put into the hands of the Prime Minister. I might speak again to-night as the defender of widows and orphans, but in this respect the orphan is the Minister of National War Services who has been put in charge of a department with nothing in it, except the scissors of censorship. That is the way I take it.

I appreciate that the Minister of National War Services, who has nothing to do in his department except look after Mr. Oliver Mowat Biggar's office, would have much more time to look after information than would the Prime Minister, who is a very busy man. Who would expect the Prime Minister to have the time to read all these publications? I am sure he was grateful to the hon. member for Lake Centre when he read from the publication to the committee to-night. Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister of Canada, the busiest man in the country, has time to read all these publications? Then, why was it not put under a gentleman of leisure, a minister of leisure, who has very little to do in his department, and would have the time to scrutinize the whole thing? This could be done simply, and in good order.

I have no grudge against anyone. I think Mr. Grierson is a fine fellow. But why should we always go to an outsider when we want something done in Canada? When it came to the film board we took Mr. Grierson, who came from Scotland. And he was not the only Scotsman. For radio we have Doctor Thomson, who comes from Scotland. For reconstruction we have James of McGill, from England. All these outsiders come to this country to teach Canadians what they shall do in the post-war era, and what they should do during the war. Are there not any Canadians who could do it? More than that, these outsiders are taken into the employ of the government because of the deep religious feeling held by His Majesty's Loyal Opposition for all outsiders. It is the impression of the government that so long as they hire the services of outsiders the opposition will accept them and give them their kotows in true Japanese fashion. They will put their noses together in a long embrace. The government goes to these outsiders, people coming from the British isles, and has them take these key positions in Canada so that every time something is done they may say, "Well, it was that Englishman who did it", or that Scotsman who did it, or that Irishman. And then the opposition will make kotows to them.

That is all very well. But if the opposition were not so ready to fill these boards with outsiders, it would be better for the country, and we would have Canadians in charge of important matters, matters which at the present time are run by outsiders. I do not object to Grierson as Grierson, but I do object to Grierson as an outsider coming to teach us. I object to Doctor Thomson for the same reason. And I object to James of McGill on the same grounds. I object to the fact that these people come out to teach the bloated colonials in Canada what they have to do.

Then, with regard to the film board, we know a great many pictures have been taken of our Prime Minister. At one time I said that Mr. Grierson had so many pictures of the Prime Minister that I was sure the exposures were as numerous as the sands of the seas and the stars in the sky. How many pictures does he have that are still undeveloped? How many are there in the vaults of the film board? They are fine pictures the country should see and we should like to see, but we have not yet had the privilege of seeing them. It seems to me that for these reasons we should not be excessive in our praise, and we should get some information on the pictorial side of the matter.

I have something else in mind. How much money has been spent for McKenna, for instance? McKenna is the man who was a correspondent of a United States paper in the press gallery. What were the expenditures for trips to New York, trips to everywhere, trips to nowhere? And what about payments to Paul Reading, who wears out I do not know how many pairs of boot soles walking in the corridors of this house. There are Paul Reading and McKenna, and how many others? We see them around the corridors all the time; that is, all the time they are in Ottawa. How much money has been paid to them for travelling expenses? Instead of putting forth the theory about what should be done and what should not be done in the way of propaganda, we should first know what it costs. That is the first question that should be asked by the opposition. Why did the opposition not ask how much Paul Reading had received for travelling expenses, living expenses, and this and that? How much money did McKenna get? How much money did he pass over to other journalists for travelling expenses? These would be good things to know. We should have the dollars and cents. I wonder if the Prime Minister has been informed of all these details.

Why should the wartime information board be treated as a kind of holy of holies about which we cannot get any information when we ask about the regulations and the censorship? We should be told about the regulations and about the censorship, or at least about the censorship regulations. How is it that these people can publish anything, while other papers have not the same right? What is the use of having a wartime information board if it does not inform the Canadian people? The Canadian people are entitled to the truth; that is the kind of news they should get. There are some journalists who are ready —or Reading—to go along with that kind of thing, but there are others who are honest and who realize that when they represent the press they fulfil a sacred duty to the public. Very often important news has been hidden from the public, news that should have been given to the public in order to inspire confidence in the government. Sometimes people lose confidence in the government because of the wrong this has done in connection with supplying news to the Canadian people.

Canadians have a right to expect true and reliable information from the papers to which they have subscribed. This public institution, the wartime information board, is not supported directly by the Canadian people, because there are no subscribers to the board such as there are to newspapers, but on the other hand the expenses come out of the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers and they are entitled to have value for the taxes they pay to support the board. They have a right to know what the expenses of this board are; what expenses are being paid to McKenna, whom I mentioned, and Reading and many others. We see them in the corridors of the house trying to check the news and trying to create false propaganda. I know whereof I speak.

All this is said in the best possible spirit and in order that the wartime information board may serve a definite purpose. There is a man in Canada who has done more to supply the public with information than any government institution. I refer to Emile Vaillancourt of Montreal. He has supplied the press with all sorts of information about all sorts of things. I read to the house the letter which he wrote last year to Winston Churchill, and the Prime Minister said it was a good letter in spite of the protests of the then leader of the opposition who did not listen long enough to see how much to the point it was. How is it that the government has not asked Emile Vaillancourt, not to join the board but to be the head of the board? He is a most gifted man; he knows a great deal more about publicity and Canadian history than Philippe Brais. Mr. Brais may know something about the civil code and statutory procedure, enactments and things like that, but he is not at all cultured. But here is a man who is cultured; here is a man who is public spirited; here is a man who is fully qualified to be the head of this institution and to make a success of it. But he is left aside; he is left in the shade, perhaps because he is too independent. It does not mean that he is not a good Canadian; he is a first-class Canadian. The testimonial that was given to him by the Prime Minister in this chamber is something that cannot be forgotten. Among the best things that have come from the pens of Canadians is this letter to Churchill. But he has done more than that. He has led public discussions over the radio and has had them printed at his own expense and distributed to hon. members. How is it that a man so well gifted, who has done so much at his own expense, is not asked to lead and to make a success of this board? He would make English-speaking Canadians understand that there are some French-speaking Canadians who can do as well as any men imported into the country.

We are all Canadians. I am not prejudiced; I am not biased, but in this case I think Emile Vaillancourt is the best man we could have had. I am sure that the Prime Minister, his parliamentary assistant and all the members of the committee appreciate the excellent work that has been done by Emile Vaillancourt. During war time there is a need to unite Canada, instead of dividing it for the benefit of a few people and to the detriment of the community at large.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the Prime Minister be good enough to place my name on the mailing list for "Canadian Affairs"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall direct the attention of the board to my hon. friend's request.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a public document published by the wartime information board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not interfered with the board or its work, and I prefer to maintain that attitude. I shall be glad to refer my hon. friend's request to the board, and I am sure they will be happy to meet it.

I should like to say a word in regard to one remark made by the hon. member for Témiscouata. He asked why it was that the information board was placed under the president of the council immediately after the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFlèche) had been appointed, the implication being that this was done because the Minister of National War Services happened to be a French Canadian. That is as I understood the impression the hon. gentleman was seeking to leave. He suggested that as soon as the minister had taken over this portfolio, the board was transferred from his responsibility to that of the president of the council. I hope I am not misconstruing what my hon. friend had in mind and intended to convey.

I should like to make clear to the committee the reason why the board was placed under the president of the council. Mr. Vining was asked to prepare a report for the government on the whole question of war information and the best way of facilitating the distribution of information. He recommended that the board should be under the president of the council rather than any other minister in order that interdepartmental cooperation might be more effectively obtained. This was not likely to be the case to the same degree if the board remained under any one other particular minister. That recommendation was made while an English-speaking minister was at the head of the Department of National War Services and before the present minister took office. It is only fair that these facts should be made perfectly clear.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not want to convey the impression that I was complaining because the wartime information board had been taken from the Department of National War Services at the time of the appointment of the present minister because he was a French Canadian. That was not the question at all. What I said was that as soon as the gentleman was sworn in, the board was turned out. I thank the Prime Minister for his explanation, but I did not mention either the race or religion of the present Minister of National War Services when I made my statement.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Reference has been made to the fact that there are information boards or publicity offices in a number of the ministries and in branches of the armed services. I wonder if we might have information as to just what other ministries maintain offices of this kind, and to what extent the wartime information board serves to coordinate the work done by these other offices, or whether there is no coordination between these separate offices and the wartime information board.

Mr. CLAXTON: The material required to answer that question has already been given in the return which was brought down to the house some time ago. So far as I know, the situation has not changed since. I will refer the hon. member for York South to the return if I may, on the adjournment.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like the parliamentary assistant to be kind enough to tell us how much money was paid for travelling expenses, living allowance, and all that, to Mr. McKenna and Mr. Reading.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: May I ask if the return to which the parliamentary assistant referred touched on the question of coordination between the different publicity offices and the wartime information board.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sorry; it just gives factual information about the number of press representatives in the various departments of the government. I have already said something at the beginning of the sitting to-night on the question of coordination. There is every effort made at coordination, and that coordination is very close with the public relations officers of the board. Mr. J. W. G. Clark, director of public relations of the department of defence works closely with the wartime information board, and the same is true of the other departments. In addition, there are, as I mentioned before, a number of provisions which are specially designed to accomplish what my hon. friend has in mind.

In reply to the question of the hon. member for Témiscouata, return No. 176, which was brought down in the house on March 2, 1943, discloses that no expenses were paid to Mr. McKenna and none to Mr. Reading since the organization of the board. I am informed that since that date Mr. McKenna has had one trip to the United States to see people with whom he has to deal there and those in charge of the distribution of foreign news going to the United States, and that Mr. Reading has had no travelling expenses since then whatsoever.

Mr. POULIOT: How much was paid to Mr. McKenna for his travelling expenses.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have not that information here.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the hon. gentleman please give it to me later?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Mr. HANSELL: I think there should be some little correction made of an impression which the hon. member for Témiscouata may have left, though I do not know that I am the man to make the correction. The hon. member seemed particularly vociferous in his condemnation of the government for bringing in from outside this country men of expert knowledge. I do not know all the men that he mentioned, but he did mention Doctor Thomson, who to-day is the managing director of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and the impression one might get from the hon. member's remarks is that the government sent over to Scotland for Doctor Thomson, which of course, is not the case. I think with all due respect for Doctor Thomson that should be made perfectly plain. I happened to be a member of the radio committee of last year and I think, if the evidence is examined together with the reports of that committee, it will be found that we were particularly anxious that should there be a change in the managing directorship of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the position should be filled by someone from Canada. I am not attempting to come to the assistance of the government in saying this, but the fact is that Doctor Thomson was released from the university of Saskatchewan, I believe at the request of the government, in order that he might assume the duties of managing-director of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for this year. He was not imported for that job.

While I am on my feet I should like to say that there is a principle involved that was well stated by the hon. member for Témiscouata. It does seem that very often we import what we may regard as experts, while perhaps many experts in our own midst leave us to work in other countries, particularly in the country to the south, where the fields may appear to be greener. I see no reason why Canada should be one whit behind any other nation in the world in producing experts in every possible field of modern civilization. I have mentioned before, and I think I should mention it again now, that the Prime Minister is in his seat, that we have doctors of philosophy in the various sciences working in our civil service to-day for wages that are less than what is paid to a grade 3 stenographer. That should not be so.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe that for some little time I have been remiss in my duty. I allowed the hon. member for Témiscouata to mention persons born outside Canada. That was my mistake, and I shall be compelled from now on to keep speakers to the item before the Chair.

Mr. HANSELL: Very well, Mr. Chairman. I have always regarded you as being fair, and I think you are fair now. Your point is well taken, but I am of the opinion that the hon. member for Témiscouata must not get away with anything more than any other private member of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: I made it very plain that some part of his discussion was out of order, and that it was my mistake in not calling him to order. I believe it is the sentiment of ninety-nine per cent of the committee that we should stay within the orbit of the item we are discussing.

Mr. HANSELL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Now may I get back to the wartime information board. I have no fault to find with the board, but I want to make this observation. The Prime Minister took exception to a remark a little while ago from the official opposition in regard to political propaganda. I do not know that that was precisely the term used. I am not going to say that the wartime information board is used for political propaganda, but I make this observation, that there can hardly be a piece of literature issued by the wartime information board on what is being done in Canada to-day without carrying with it a psychological impression that the Liberal government is doing a good job. "Canada at War" comes out once a month and I like to read it; I get a lot of information from it. But anyone reading that publication is apt to say that it is simply a build-up for the present government. And it is. I am not saying that it is intentionally so, but the fact is that it is, and the result is that the department has all the advantage that this publication gives.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A corrective, so far as that is concerned, if any be needed, is furnished in full measure by what appears in some organs of the press. I rose to comment upon one matter mentioned, namely, with respect to certain persons holding positions in the country, the suggestion made being that such positions are necessarily to be reserved for persons born in Canada. I am as strong a Canadian as anyone in this house, but I should be very sorry if the day ever came when we decided to make it even an indirect condition that a person, in order to hold a high position in Canada, must necessarily have been born in this country. I think of the positions of hon. members in this house. There is no more honourable position in Canada than that of member of parliament. When I look diagonally opposite I see a good many gentlemen who would not be in this House of Commons to-day, if the people had not sent them here, notwithstanding the fact that they were not born in Canada. It is one of the glories of this country that any man may come to Canada and feel that he has a chance to help to serve not only the people of Canada, but if he has the ability, mankind itself, men and women of all classes and creeds and countries. I do not forget that the great leader of the Conservative party, the first Prime Minister of this country, a man whom all of us honour, irrespective of party, was from the old country; I do not forget either that he was a Scotsman. When you find gentlemen in high positions and you are told at the same time that they come from Scotland, you may feel pretty sure that the appointment is a fairly good one.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know why the Prime Minister was facing me all the time, because I did not make the charge; it was the hon. member for Témiscouata who made it. I rose to say just about what the Prime Minister has said, in defence of Doctor Thomson, a man already in Canada. However, I do not mind the Prime Minister looking this way once in a while.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In regard to the publication "Canadian Affairs", can the parliamentary assistant say how many copies have been distributed?

Mr. CLAXTON: The last issue was 23,000. They are printed in England by the wartime information board for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the cost of that issue?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know the cost. It is charged to the Department of National Defence.

Item agreed to.

Privy Council.

Advisory committee on reconstruction, $47,250.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is a vote for the advisory committee on reconstruction. Most hon. members are acquainted with what the parliamentary committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation is doing. It has an able chairman and an able vice-chairman, both of whom deserve a good deal of credit. But what is this advisory committee doing? I have been a member of the parliamentary committee and we have had some of the members of the advisory committee before us, but I do not know what they are doing. The war may be over at any time, and I hope it is; but if the war ended to-morrow, just what plans and specifications are ready to give men jobs? We have been talking now for the last four hours about publicity. Publicity is very necessary, I admit, in the conduct of government, but the providing of jobs when the war is over is infinitely more important. We shall get a good deal of unfavourable publicity after the war if there are many thouands of men unemployed as there were after the last war.

There is a multitude of opportunities to provide jobs. I know of a multitude myself, but I will not enumerate them. However, let me give one small project as a sample of what can be done, and what I believe should be done, if this advisory committee is the one that is to prepare for the provision of jobs. If it is to submit plans and specifications to provide jobs, it ought to be preparing right now. I do not know that much has been done so far. I have read speeches by members of the committee who are doing good work in their way, but we have to go much farther than that. We have to get together a large number of plans and specifications of jobs to which men can be directed immediately the war is over, or we shall find ourselves in the same boat as we did after the last war.

I was closely associated with business after the last war, and I know that business closed up tight and men did not get jobs. I had so much to do with jobs that perhaps I talk about this subject more than I should, but one cannot overemphasize the importance of providing work, and the men cannot get it by talk but by careful preparation. They cannot be paid for the work they do by talk but by money, and to be paid money they have to render some service in return.

Recently there was an article in the newspapers about the riding represented by my leader, the riding of Peel, where somebody in the town of Brampton had given to the press a plan for a proposed diversion of a small creek running through the town. It is called Etobicoke river. North of that town the watershed of the river is very small, about twenty-five square miles, but to give an indication of what a small watershed like that can do if there should be a cloudburst or a heavy three-day rain, the amount of water that would fall on it could be 160,000,000 cubic feet. That quantity of water rushing through the town would wipe the main street off the map. They have had severe floods there beginning away back in 1878 and down through the years, in 1909, 1929, and last year again, 1942, and the big floods have averaged from $80,000 to $100,000 of damage each time. The whole work on that river to flood-proof it could be done for $100,000. That is one small project. I would ask the Prime Minister courteously to direct this committee, for which this money is being voted, to inform members of parliament and the country what they are doing, and I would ask him to request them in the kindest way to provide plans and specifications for jobs to which many thousands of men could be sent to earn an honest dollar when the war ends.

Mr. CLAXTON: This committee was appointed by order in council P.C. 609 in January, 1943. It is working with sub-committees, a number of which have made reports. It is hoped that all the reports in the course of preparation will be in, in the month of August or September, and they will be made available as soon as it is in the public interest to give them. There are other committees working on the subject of reconstruction—the committee on rehabilitation and demobilization, the advisory committee on economic policy, the Canadian section of the joint economic board, in addition to the three parliamentary committees. They are all working and are bringing their work to the point where it will be possible for some agency to draw up the plans and specifications to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are there prepared plans and specifications for a single specific job? Can the hon. member name one solitary job that everything is prepared for?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes; a number of specific jobs have been prepared. A great many are under consideration. There is a sub-committee of the advisory committee on reconstruction, on post-war construction projects. The chairman is Mr. K. M. Cameron, chief engineer of the Department of Public Works, and that committee has made an interim report, I understand, and will make a further report at an early date.

Mr. MacNICOL: Can the hon. member name one job?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A survey of the whole country.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes; but have they named a single place in this country for which blueprints, plans and specifications have been prepared, to which men can be sent immediately the war closes, as soon as material can get on that job?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not think they have gone as far as my hon. friend would want on that, because the war is not over yet, but I think they are at the stage where they have considered in one way or another a very large number of projects plus a whole system of dealing with specific jobs, and I hope the wish of my hon. friend will be met by the progress that is being made.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope so.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I ask the Prime Minister or his parliamentary assistant whether or not this committee is devising ways and means of finding money?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope it is not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Did I understand the right hon. gentleman correctly to say that he hoped it was not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I submit that if it is not devising ways and means of finding the money, it is simply not worth five cents to this country.

Mr. CLAXTON: The point raised by the hon. member for Lethbridge is under constant consideration by the advisory committee on economic policy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What we should like to know is whether or not it is getting anywhere or whether it is just "advising."

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to ask the Prime Minister or his parliamentary assistant whether this amount of money, $47,250, goes to salaries for those on the advisory committee, or if that is a straight matter of expense; if so, perhaps the assistant would have a break-down of the amount.

Mr. CLAXTON: Salaries $15,317.28.

Mr. GRAYDON: To whom does that go?

Mr. CLAXTON: To employees of the committee. The members of the committee give their services without remuneration. The next item is cost-of-living bonus, $414.64; unemployment insurance, $28.08; stationery and supplies, $1,500; fees, $10,000; transportation and travel, $20,000. The reason for the relatively large item for transportation and travel is that there are six subcommittees, with geographical representation, and while meetings are cut to the minimum, there is an absolute necessity for members of the committee to get together now and then.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Can we have the names of this committee?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. The names of the advisory committee on reconstruction are: chairman, Doctor F. Cyril James, president of McGill university; P. R. Bengough, acting president, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; Hon. D. G. MacKenzie, chief commissioner, Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada; J. S. McLean, president, Canada Packers; Arthur Surveyer, civil engineer, of Montreal; Doctor R. C. Wallace, principal Queen's university, ex officio and coordinating members on the committee on economic policy, the chairman of the Canadian section of the joint economic committees; Mr. K. M. Cameron, chief engineer of the Department of Public Works, vice-chairman of the advisory committee on demobilization and rehabilitation. The research adviser is Doctor L. C. Marsh, who of course is paid, and the secretary is J. E. McKay.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Do they submit a report to this house?

Mr. CLAXTON: They submit a report to the government.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: To the government only? Are the reports available to the parliamentary committee on reconstruction?

Mr. CLAXTON: Some reports have been made available to the parliamentary committee on reconstruction. Those are the factual reports so far received. Other reports will be made available from time to time as it is possible.

Mr. POULIOT: Is Professor Marsh of McGill on that reconstruction committee?

Mr. CLAXTON: He is an employee of the committee. He is research adviser.

Mr. POULIOT: And is there a Mr. Firestone, a professor?

Mr. CLAXTON: Doctor C. J. Firestone has been employed by the committee to make special studies for it.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes; and is that his real name? Did he change his name, or is "Firestone" his real name?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is the name we have.

Mr. POULIOT: No; but I ask you—

Mr. CLAXTON: We have not required that—

Mr. POULIOT: I want to know if that is true. I have been told he had been for a time in an internment camp. I wish to know if it is true or not, and I do not want a denial; that is, I want something definite.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have no knowledge that can support that idea at all.

Mr. POULIOT: Where does he come from? The committee should know where he is coming from. Is he a manufacturer of tires, Firestone tires, or what is he doing? Where does he come from? If he is to bring us the light, we should know where the light comes from. I am sure the parliamentary assistant will be kind enough to tell us that.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have given the hon. member all the information I have. I will be glad to get it for him.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes; but that is not satisfactory. Here we have an important matter. We must know where they come from, these people who are to guide the people of Israel into the Promised Land. They are supposed to be the stars of the sky, the light to guide us into the Promised Land. Where do they come from? What is their experience? It is time to know who they are.

I remember that a long time ago, about nine years ago, I was campaigning in Ontario—this is by way of comparison—and I was talking with a friend of mine, who by the way is Billy Gordon, now a minister in the Ontario government. I said "Billy, here in Ontario are there people who work on the roads at election time?" He said, "Oh, yes." This was in 1934. I went along the road. The weather was fine; the road was well paved, one of the finest between Wallaceburg and Chatham. At one corner I saw an elevation about one hundred feet from the road. There were people standing there who were clustered as thick as ants. They had shovels and picks in their hands to demolish a little hill, and they were so numerous that they could not wield their shovels or picks for fear of hitting each other. They were too numerous to work. It reminded me of the present situation in Ottawa. What do we want now for reconstruction and planning for the future? We want order at the present time. If we have not order now, what shall we have after the war? We shall have disorder. The only way to have order is to reduce by one half the number of civil servants, and then it will be possible for the others to work. There are so many people in Ottawa that it is almost impossible to walk on the streets; there is a crisis of housing—

The CHAIRMAN: Order: I have been criticized this evening for not calling to order some hon. members, and clearly the hon. member is out of order in what he is discussing under this item at present. Surely it should be found possible at this stage of the session to stay within the limits of the item before the committee. I know that it is easy for the hon. member for Témiscouata to do so.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely. But what I say is that we need order now if we are to expect order in the future.

The CHAIRMAN: We need order here, too.

Mr. POULIOT: In saying that, it seems to me that I am in order. And the only way to get order is to have space to work, to give the opportunity to all those who are in the civil service to show their ability to do something. If they are so numerous that they cannot move their arms, there is nothing they can do. But I can tell you more than that, sir. I regret very much that two committees have been set up to study post-war problems, especially if we are to have reports like the one that was laid on the table of the house the other day. What is the use of hon. members studying these matters if, when the report comes in, we are given no data or recommendations to come to a decision on the matter, nothing definite on unemployment or anything else, which will be settled by parliament and the government later on? That is the suggestion we received concerning post-war planning; it amounts to nothing at all, and the last report of the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment is empty. I do not see the use of hon. members meeting together and discussing future plans, when the reports they make are as poor as the one that was laid on the table the other day. It is incredible; the only suggestion with regard to post-war recovery was to have an inventory made of our natural resources. Surely we must have such an inventory already in the Department of Mines and Resources. It was also suggested that we should make an inventory of all public works, dominion, provincial and municipal—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The committees to which the hon. gentleman refers are sitting at the present time, and I do not believe it is in order to discuss their activities. We must confine ourselves strictly to the item under consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to support in part what has been said by the hon. member for Témiscouata. I have been investigating the activities of these various committees on post-war rehabilitation and reconstruction, and I find that invariably there is not the least hint of where the money is to come from to pay for the projects recommended. Just to give one little illustration which comes from my own constituency, let me point out that over twenty years ago the plans were completed for the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project, but nothing was done because there was no money. Last year the plans were revised and brought up to date, but nothing was done because there is no money. So far as I can see, if the mentality which appears to prevail in high places in the government of Canada to-day continues to prevail after the war, there will not be any money for these things, and as a result all the efforts put forth by reconstruction and rehabilitation committees will have been wasted.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe I should point out to the hon. member for Lethbridge that his remarks should be made to the standing committees instead of to the committee of the whole.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is utterly impossible for any hon. member to bring up these matters in those committees, because if he tried to discuss the question of money he would be ruled out of order. I ask: what is the use of having committees like these if no use is to be made of their work? There are hundreds of agencies throughout the country that can tell us plenty of things that ought to be done if the money were forthcoming. There is not a province in this dominion that could not spend a great amount of money on roads, for example, and put thousands of men to work. We do not need high-class committees to plan work for people to do; what we need is to find some way of getting the money to pay for the work.

Just before we leave the Prime Minister's department, I should like to ask if there is any item under which we might discuss the draft agreement for the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration. I had the impression that it might be in order under this item, but I presume it is not. I intended to bring it up previously, but I did not wish to be talking all the time in the committee. Could the Prime Minister give me an idea as to whether or not there is an item remaining under which this matter could be discussed properly? I believe it should be discussed with some care.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no doubt there is an item somewhere, but I cannot put my finger on it at the moment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It might be in order to discuss it on the estimates of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend had better ask the Minister of Finance.

Just before we go on to the next item, there is some information I promised to give the committee. During the discussion of the external affairs estimates this morning the hon. member for Camrose asked how much had been expended last year by the international joint commission. The expenditures by the international joint commission during the last fiscal year amounted to $32,291.53.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver South asked with regard to applications for repatriation to Japan. Applications for repatriation to Japan are made to the consul general of Spain as the representative of the protecting power for Japanese interests in Canada. The consul general has not informed this government of the number of applications he has received. It is expected that the Japanese government will ask for the repatriation from Canada of between sixty and one hundred Japanese on the next exchange ship which will take back Japanese nationals resident in the United States and Latin America as well as in Canada. The number of Canadians in Japanese hands is estimated at a thousand. In addition, there are about three hundred persons of British nationality, not being Canadians, whose next of kin live in Canada or who have some special connection with this country.

Mr. GREEN: In connection with that question may I ask why the government has not taken some steps to find out how many of these Japanese wish to be repatriated? There have been dispatches in the press stating that certain numbers in certain camps had asked to be repatriated. Would it not be wise for the government itself to find out the number who wish to go back?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I see no reason why that should not be done, but as to its practical value, that at the moment, would depend entirely upon the ships that might be available to take them back. The number are exceedingly few. Those who have applied already would exceed the number that can be taken back for some time. However, I think my hon. friend is right in suggesting that we might seek to ascertain how many would wish to go back, and I shall seek to have that done. The hon. member also asked about the tabling of the documents making up the so-called Lemieux agreement. The under-secretary of state informs me that it will take a day or so to prepare the papers, but I will undertake to see that they are tabled very shortly.

Mr. GREEN: Would that include the papers covering the agreement in 1928 or 1929?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My thought was to have everything covered.

Mr. Chairman, this is the first occasion on which the parliamentary assistant to the president of the privy council has had occasion to make a presentation to the house in connection with any part of the government's business. I should like to express my warm appreciation of the excellence of his presentation this afternoon on the functions, the personnel and the services of the wartime information board. Hon. members will agree, I am sure, that from the point of view of giving in a concise and clear manner the fullest possible information on the work of the board, and matters relevant thereto, the parliamentary assistant left nothing to be desired. I also think that the manner in which my colleague has dealt with the estimates generally is an indication of the value to the house of having parliamentary assistants specially qualified to assist the administration in this House of Commons. I should like personally to express my thanks to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George for the great assistance he has been to me in matters connected with the privy council and the many boards over which it must necessarily exercise supervision.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that conclude all the answers the Prime Minister was to give?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it does.

Mr. STIRLING: The Prime Minister was good enough to say he would give me some information with regard to Canadians resident in Japan, to enable me to compare the conditions under which they live with the conditions under which Japanese live here. Perhaps that will be done on another occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought I gave the figures this morning. As for a comparison of the conditions in the two countries, I should think that might come to be one man's opinion as against another's. Perhaps my hon. friend would be in a better position to suggest how they are living than I would be. However, I shall endeavour to get some statement which will be helpful.

Mr. STIRLING: I asked my question because we had been discussing the Red Cross, and the Prime Minister had intimated that they did receive information through the Red Cross from enemy countries. I asked whether through that source or some other source he was able to say to what extent Canadian civilian residents in Japan are at liberty, whether they are interned, or under what conditions they live.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I shall be able to get some of that information from the reports of representatives of the Red Cross.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Chief architect's branch.
Temporary building No. 8, $10,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Where is this building located, and to what use is it put?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, building No. 8 is on Carling Avenue. We have there the records division of the Department of National Defence (Army) which was transferred from the Daly building to this one. The space in the Daly building was used to consolidate the offices of the Department of Pensions and National Health, formerly in the Plaza and Transportation buildings. Ninety thousand square feet in this new building now house the registration divisions in connection with the Department of Labour, formerly in the Rideau winter club, the Confederation building and 193 Sparks street. In addition, postal censorship is in building No. 8. It has 194,000 square feet of office space, and 6,000 square feet of storage space.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the $10,000 for?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): For ground work around the building. This work could not be done during the winter when the building was completed, or when it was being erected.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this a permanent building?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No. There are nine of these temporary buildings built on the same model. They are to be seen on Wellington street.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was wondering why we were spending $10,000 for ground work around a temporary building in war time.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The building could not be left without levelling the ground and having it maintained as government buildings are generally maintained in Ottawa. This building cost $760,000, and this amount of $10,000 does not seem unreasonable for the work involved.

Mr. GRAYDON: What kind of work does this cover?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is for levelling and for filling in around the foundation. There is a similar building on Sussex street, built on the same model. What we are spending in this instance is based on what was spent in other instances. This includes levelling the ground, putting down sod, and filling in.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch.

Ottawa, hostel for junior female employees in the public service, $5,000.

Mr. BOUCHER: What is this for?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The same explanation applies in this as in the former item, namely for levelling, filling and putting down sod. This hostel has just been completed, and this work could not be done with the estimate provided last year, because it was built during the winter.

Mr. BOUCHER: Is that Laurentian terrace?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: What is the housing capacity of this building?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It was built for 360 young women, living in single or double rooms.

Mr. QUELCH: Have any moved into the building up to the present time, and, if so, how many?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I was advised yesterday that 196 young ladies are now actually in residence. Allocations have been made to others who have to give notice at their present domiciles. It is expected that within a few days there will be 300. The total capacity is 360.

Mr. QUELCH: What is the charge for board and lodging in this building?

Mr. McLARTY: In a double room it is $8 a week, and in a single room, $9.50. All single rooms have been rented.

Mr. QUELCH: Has there been any criticism to the effect that the charge is too high?

Mr. McLARTY: There might have been some criticism, but nothing serious. Certainly there is no criticism from those who are enjoying the convenience it provides.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the $5,000 for?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): For levelling off the ground, refilling and grading, and sodding.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Was this built by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Have any of these buildings been built for the army, navy or air force?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Some buildings are built by the army, navy or air force, as the case may be.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. A. Fournier.]

Chief architect's branch.

Repairs, alterations, operation and maintenance of buildings occupied for war purposes, $1,530,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there a lengthy list of buildings on which repairs, alterations and the like have been made, under this item?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I have an estimate, based on previous years' estimates for the same types of maintenance and repairs. It is divided up in this way:

Salaries and wages	$650,000
Cost of living bonus	110,000
Alterations	400,000
Light and power	160,000
Water and water rates	30,000
Fuel	140,000
Supplies for char service	30,000
Sundries	10,000

Mr. GRAYDON: This covers buildings throughout Canada?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes, absolutely.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is the cost of living bonus $110,000?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Mr. MARSHALL: How much is actually spent on alterations in these two items?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is $400,000. This is the estimate for 1943-44. It compares with the item last year for the same purposes.

Mr. SHAW: Does this apply to buildings acquired since the outbreak of war and utilized strictly for war purposes? I have in mind the cases where it is found necessary to enlarge post offices on account of war conditions.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We have not enlarged any post offices since the beginning of the war.

Mr. SHAW: There is one in my own constituency where extensive alterations were necessary because a military camp had been established there. Would that come out of this vote?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Could the hon. member give me the name?

Mr. SHAW: Red Deer, Alberta.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I have not that information here but I shall get it.

Mr. SHAW: When we are considering the post office estimates we are unable to get the correct picture because alterations, repairs and so forth of buildings are carried out by the Department of Public Works.

The CHAIRMAN: This is an item under the war appropriation measure, and it would be impossible for the Minister of Public Works to give information pertaining to public buildings and post offices.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): All post offices are under the control of public works. We do the maintaining and repairs and alterations.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Who is responsible for the valuation of the different properties, and who makes the recommendation that the amount of rental asked is reasonable?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The resident architect in each district makes the valuation and reports on the rental and the space.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understand the Department of National Defence has its own real estate man.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): They look after their own buildings.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In some cases you build buildings for the navy and army?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Do you rent buildings for the navy and army?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why the distinction?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We do not interfere with the active services; but if they need office space, say in Calgary or Toronto, they will ask us for it. Then we try to rent space or give them space in one of our public buildings if it is available. We take care of the space, see that it is kept in good repair and provide caretaker service.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Do you rent for Wartime Housing?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That is a separate corporation.

Mr. CHURCH: A return brought down to the house last June showed the public property which had been turned over by the provinces and the municipalities to the government for war purposes. I should like to know the policy of the government in this connection. I notice that the school board in Toronto has turned over some property, and the exhibition grounds, other public buildings and parts of the university of Toronto have been turned over. Some of the space in this exempt property should be used instead of paying these rentals. Last session the minister said that during the recess he would have a survey or study made to see what economies could be effected. You have a large building for the post office in Toronto which has been taken over by the ordnance department. The ordnance department should have gone out to the exhibition grounds or they could have used some of the huts erected by the air force in the central part of the harbour improvements. There is considerable wastage there. What are you going to do after the war? Are these temporary leases? After the last war there was considerable trouble between the government and the lessees and the lessors in getting the property back with the accrued rent. There is no reason why public buildings which house three or four departments in time of peace should not be able to house three or four departments in time of war, but all three military services have separate buildings. Surely there should be some coordination, especially when the municipalities are most generous in offering property for the use of the government. The city of Toronto and the province of Ontario have been most generous in offering buildings to the government for use in the war. The minister stated last session that he would make a study of this matter in the recess, and I should like to hear from him.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I hope it is understood that the three service departments have their own buildings, their own engineers and their own staffs. They have more experience in the erection of the particular type of building suitable for their purposes. Of course, if they need office space they apply to the public works department. All departments apply to public works for space, and during the war we try to rent space where we can. Sometimes we purchase a building, but not very often. It is only when we cannot get a suitable building to rent that we erect buildings. The situation in the city of Ottawa has now become stabilized to a certain extent. I know the situation in Toronto about the post office, and we are trying to find suitable space for housing the ordnance department so that the post office will have the use of that building. We cannot, however, have buildings just for one department. We generally house many departments in the same building in order to economize.

Mr. CHURCH: In the city of Toronto there are a great many properties that could be used, on Toronto street, for instance, on the north side of King street, between Toronto and Church streets, and other property back of the post office around Adelaide and Church and Lombard and Victoria streets. Some of that property is not being used at all. There is also the old York chambers at the corner of King and Court streets. You are opening up a big terminal in Montreal to-morrow, costing $29,000,000. Why should it not be used for war purposes? There is a great deal of crown lands which could be put to some useful purpose in war time.

Seymour Narrows, B.C.—Removal of ripple rocks and construction of dam, $200,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister be good enough to give a report of the progress made in this work and indicate whether it is anticipated that this sum will be sufficient to complete it, and when he expects completion?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am informed by my officials that the work should be completed within eight months. It has been a running contract, and the amount that is voted this year is to complete the contract. The contract was modified last year to meet representations that were made on behalf of the United States government. I might read a memorandum I have here:

Representations were made on behalf of the United States government that the safety of their vessels using these waters makes it desirable to provide for a depth of 33·8 feet instead of 30 feet as provided for under the contract. The contractors have agreed to execute the whole work including this additional work requested, at an estimated cost of $473,894 plus a fee of $35,000.

The fee in the first contract was $25,000, but we had to revise the contract because the depth of thirty feet provided for under the original contract was not considered safe for large vessels passing through. The revised contract provides that the fee of $35,000 is to be reduced to $28,500 if the estimate is exceeded. The contractors are to receive an additional ten per cent of net savings affected from the estimate of $473,894 less salvage received for the drill boat.

We asked for tenders in this case and nobody would tender, and this was about the only way in which we could find somebody to do the work on the basis of cost, plus a fixed fee. The amount set out in the estimates this year is to complete the contract.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister mean another $473,000 on top of this?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No; that is the total. The first contract was for $300,000. In 1942-43 we expended $158,646.40. The revised estimate of the total cost is $473,000.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister mentioned that the work is expected to be completed within eight months. Does he mean it will be finished in the spring, eight months from now?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Saint John harbour (Courtenay bay), N.B.—Dredging, $100,000.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Would the minister give a brief explanation of this item? How is this work progressing?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We have a contract with the Canadian Dredging and Dock Company, which was authorized in 1941. The amount of the contract is $553,122. This company was the lowest tenderer in answer to public advertisements.

The dredging was requested by the British admiralty technical mission to enable capital ships to use the Saint John dry dock with safety. The work consisted of widening the outer leg of Courtenay bay channel and deepening a section of Courtenay bay turning basin, both to a grade depth of seventeen feet. The original total estimated cost is $559,970. The estimated balance for 1943-44 is $100,000.

Contingencies, $50,000.

Mr. MARSHALL: Would the minister give a break-down of this $50,000?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We cannot give a break-down, because we would have to foresee everything that would have to be done with this money, but it is based on the former year's estimates, war appropriations. Last year under this item we spent $20,534, and now we are voting the amount asked for. It is to meet any unforeseen need.

Mr. MacNICOL: You may not use it at all.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We shall now proceed to the Department of National War Services. Two of the ministers whose items were mentioned last night are unavoidably absent to-night.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

Departmental administration, $91,335.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): As explained by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, I come on with the consent of this honourable house because other gentlemen are not prepared at the moment. May I begin by saying that should we be fortunate enough to get down to censorship, I would not propose going into that matter now because there are some questions from the loyal opposition which I wish to satisfy.

There is a decrease of $9,165 as compared with last year. That is made up of a decrease in salaries of $11,000 odd. What we ask for this year is: salaries, $53,895; travelling expenses remain at $6,000; printing and stationery at $20,000, and miscellaneous at $5,000. These figures remain the same as they were last year. The difference is to be found in a decrease in salaries, with slight increases in some very small items to arrive at $9,165 net decrease.

Mr. KNOWLES: Most of the other ministers made a general statement as to the work of their departments. Will the minister do likewise?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I had thought of that, and I made inquiries and was advised by friends that it would be better perhaps if I waited until questions came up in connection with each vote. I come prepared as best I can to-night to do so. I have no general statement to make to-night, but I shall do my best to try to explain each vote as we reach it, as has been done in some of the other departments.

War charities division

General	$ 46,000
Auxiliary services	7,000,000
	$7,046,000

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister a statement to make with regard to a general national appeal for war charities this year? Will it be continued on the same basis as in previous years? Will the charities included in that appeal be the same as those in other years?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The auxiliary services during the present fiscal year will again be dealt with as they were in the year 1942-43. In regard to a joint appeal, I take it the hon. gentleman refers to the Red Cross?

Mr. STIRLING: There are six or seven of them.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I think my hon. friend has in mind the Canadian Legion, Knights of Columbus, Y.M.C.A., Y.W.C.A., the Salvation Army and the Navy League. Those are the six national organizations that have been doing, from very early in the war, what are termed auxiliary services. Funds were first provided for these purposes by an appeal to the public. A little over a year ago it was decided that these services being necessarily and directly for the members of the armed forces, in the interests of all concerned they should be provided by means of funds voted by this house and paid by the Department of National War Services to each of these six national organizations, and in the current fiscal year the method adopted last year will be followed again.

Mr. STIRLING: The same sum of money to each?

Mr. LaFLECHE: We have provided for $500,000 more in the vote now before the committee than last year, because the number of members of the armed forces has increased very considerably, as all hon. members know. I cannot give the figures, but there is a direct ratio between the number of members of the armed forces and the extent, and therefore the expense, of the auxiliary services. One does not know definitely in advance just how much money will be required, for this very good reason. One or more of the six national organizations known as auxiliary services is assigned the duty of carrying on auxiliary services as the need arises in one of the three defence departments, that is, in connection with the navy, the army or the air force. Then there is an interdepartmental committee upon which the representatives of the armed forces themselves have a majority of votes. In fact, it is the armed forces that really decide whether it shall be this particular organization or another. Finally, the duty and the honour of serving a particular new requirement is assigned to a particular organization, and that is the beginning of what turns out to be an expense. The organization charged with that particular duty then prepares and submits a budget. It has all the information which the armed forces can furnish. It knows how many members of the service concerned will be stationed at such and such a point. They submit their budget, and it comes before what is known as the national war services advisory board, upon whose recommendation the Minister of National War Services approves or does not approve, as the case may be, and sometimes questions with a view to getting more information. I am trying to explain that there is an increase of $500,000; it is the amount as best can be estimated in advance to be used for requirements which may arise throughout the year.

Mr. STIRLING: That extra half a million dollars is allocated by the minister to some of the six auxiliary services after receiving the advice of the committee to which the minister refers; is that it?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Precisely. The requirement is first stated, and the job is assigned to one of the six organizations by the armed forces committee already mentioned. The chosen organization submits the budget to the national war services advisory board; that board recommends to the minister; it is upon the minister's approval that the money is made available, and of course each one of these organizations must account to the Department of National War Services for the money paid to it.

For fear that I may not have as good an opportunity later on this evening, I should like to express my admiration of this national war services advisory board. I have been to their meetings, I have watched them work; I have seen men there who are known from one end of Canada to the other for their achievements in the business world and in the spheres of charity and philanthropy, and I should like to say publicly how solicitous they are to see that all established requirements for the boys and girls in the armed forces are attended to, and how careful they are with the country's money. What I am particularly pleased about, and I make bold to say, what every hon. member will be happy to know, is that approval was given nearly two months ago to set aside and make available a sum of $250,000, I believe, so that these national organizations, the auxiliary services, could follow Canadian troops, the navy or the air force when they take the offensive. I was a very proud man when I saw in the newspaper to-day that one of these auxiliary services is now in Sicily with our fighting forces.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give a break-down showing how much was paid to each one of these six organizations last year, and how much he estimates they will need this year?

Mr. LaFLECHE: With pleasure. The latest figures I have, which I must impress upon hon. members were made up before the final figures were completed for last year, although very nearly correct, I understand, are as follows, representing financing for auxiliary service work:

Canadian Legion	$1,455,549
Knights of Columbus	869,951
Salvation Army	1,080,195
Y.M.C.A.	2,527,154
Y.W.C.A.	335,607
Navy League	281,119

I might explain that the Y.W.C.A. do not operate on as wide a field as the Y.M.C.A. They are an organization of ladies looking after, particularly, the families of men in camp. They receive them and look after them. I know they were established at Valcartier camp: my wife went there to see a member of the family, and she told me how nicely these ladies looked after her.

The Navy League, of course, operate in only a few places in Canada. They do a marvellous work for marvellous men—the merchant seamen particularly, as of course, the navy men, and they do not require to be financed in the amounts needed by the other four principal associations.

Mr. STIRLING: The Red Cross has not come into this arrangement of the auxiliary services. I believe it declined to do so last year, and it is not yet in. Therefore does the minister anticipate that there will be a national Red Cross appeal in the coming year?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am sure the hon. member for Yale will not mind if I attempt to explain the situation somewhat. The Canadian Red Cross society is not one of the auxiliary services financed from the public treasury, as these other six associations are. There was, I understand, at the time some question of a joint appeal when these associations were raising funds to do auxiliary services work with funds raised by public subscription. I do not know sufficiently well to say why the Red Cross did not come in, but I have every reason to believe that the Canadian Red Cross society and the other associations are quite happy at the way things are going and quite satisfied with their present status in relation to what I am trying to explain. It is true that this year there was a national campaign for the Red Cross. They set their objective at $10,000,000, and all are glad that they went beyond the mark. We know there is always plenty of good, patriotic work of this kind which can be done if the funds are available. There is rarely too much money either in the church or in charitable or patriotic societies. I would expect, although it is not yet settled, that there will be another public subscription campaign for the Canadian Red Cross society. The dates have not yet been fixed; I am not even sure that they have applied for permission to hold their public campaign, but I take it for granted that they will again request permission to do so. I hope that the Canadian people will as generously support the appeal.

Mr. ROSS (St. Pauls'): Is it not the fact that the Red Cross cannot receive, by virtue of the Geneva convention or some other provision, grants from government or public funds; that it must be independent?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member for St. Paul's has correctly stated the attitude and contention of the Canadian Red Cross society. I should like to be able to say definitely whether that contention is in all respects correct. I would rather put it in this way, that it is really a matter which has to do with international relations, if not international law, and I am sure the hon. gentleman will not hold me to an absolutely definite answer one way or the other. The Canadian Red Cross society hold that the fact that they are part of the International Red Cross organization prevents them from being financed by or with government funds. That is the position they take, and I should think there is much to be said for their contention.

Mr. CHURCH: I have had a long connection with this charity business, and in the last war things were done differently. About six weeks ago I asked the finance department to give me a statement in regard to the War Charities Act, which was passed in the fall of 1939, I think about a month after war broke out, laying down certain rules and regulations in regard to all charities and auxiliary services. I find that the act is not being carried out. The figures the minister gave to-night are a little at variance with the information I received about six weeks ago. At that time the figure given me was $6,000,000, while for the coming year the minister says the amount will be about $7,000,000, and he has given a list of the charities which are included. The Minister of National Defence appointed a commission to go to England and look into these war services, to ascertain if there was any duplication between the Red Cross, the Y.M.C.A., the Knights of Columbus, the Navy League and so on; I think the I.O.D.E. were in it originally but withdrew after a meeting with the minister.

No doubt these organizations have done a great deal of good work; I am not here to criticize them at all, but I say there is much duplication. The report made by the late lamented leader of this party, Doctor Manion, was a good report, but it was never tabled in this house. Looking over it, I find that some of these organizations are overlapping in their work in England and elsewhere. The minister says these people are well satisfied. Of course they are satisfied; they are getting from this fund far more than they expected. We understood that there was to be one fund, and that the victory loan was to have precedence over all war charities. At the time the Minister of Agriculture was in charge of this department he had a meeting with these bodies, at which he told the Red Cross that was the last year they would be allowed to run their own campaign for the raising of money. The Red Cross has always done very fine work at home and abroad, in peace and war alike; there is no criticism of it or of any of the other fine war charities, but it is up to the government to find out if there is any overlapping. Some of this work which originally was done exclusively by one organization has now been extended so that six or seven different bodies participate in it, and they all seem to have their ways of raising money. Take the one at the foot of the list, with some $200,000. They go to work and raise funds in the city of Montreal; then in Toronto they have a Navy League compaign; then they come along and have a tag day. When the War Charities Act was passed the minister was given power to make rules and regulations which would have almost the force and effect of law, in order that the activities of these organizations might be controlled; yet these charities are appealing to the public for additional funds. The hon. member for Temiscouata was given an answer about a week ago, which appeared in Hansard, in regard to war charities, and I think the figures he obtained are about the same as those which were given by the minister a few moments ago.

[Mr. Church.]

I believe further study should be given this matter. After all, $7,000,000 is a great deal of money to be taken from the taxpayers, especially in view of the fact that almost every day of the week they are asked for some donation or other, and almost every Saturday there is some kind of tag day to raise money for war purposes. In addition, I believe the Y.M.C.A. made a public appeal last spring for about $250,000, with advertising on billboards and so on, which must have cost a good deal of money. I should like to mention one other fund which does not cost the state a cent; I refer to the Toronto Telegram's fund for British war victims, which has been administered without a cent of cost to the people, which is supported by old and young alike and which serves a commendable purpose.

In the report prepared by Doctor Manion reference was made to private organizations collecting money to provide the forces with sporting goods and equipment, but we find that this work is also done by the Y.M.C.A. and other organizations. During the last war we had a very fine organization in Toronto which carried on this work; I refer to the sportsmen's fund. Yet in spite of what is being done by these organizations we find that provision has been made in the estimates of the armed forces for expenditure of up to $175,000 for equipment of this kind. At the end of the fourth year of the war, with very heavy income taxes, business taxes and sales taxes, with nearly $5,000,000 a day being spent on the war, the public are getting sick and tired of all these funds, and their pockets are being drained. When the taxes are paid; when the orders of the controllers and subcontrollers are obeyed, I do not know anyone who has any money left to subscribe in this way.

The minister says these people are very happy about the whole thing. Of course they are happy; they come to Ottawa and sit down on the chesterfields or comfortable chairs we have heard about, put their feet on the rugs we have read about, and ask for a little something extra this year, raising the estimates sky-high. There should be some public control over these charities. I regret to have to say this, but it is in the public interest. I am sorry I have not my file here to-night; I cannot carry it with me all the time, but from what I have seen of this work in some of the camps and some of the services I know there has been duplication. I believe it was the present minister for air who introduced the War Charities Act just before the war session of 1939 concluded, and at that time he said the act would be strictly enforced, that we would not repeat the mistakes we made in the last war, with local funds, provincial funds and federal funds all mixed up, to the detriment of the victory loans. I do not blame these people for being satisfied; of course they should be satisfied. Take the Y.M.C.A.; they are doing very good work, no doubt, as all the charities are doing good work, but I contend that there is duplication and waste in connection with some of these funds; duplication of service and waste in connection with overhead charges.

Some of the equipment that has been supplied has been donated without charge. They go around the streets and collect equipment of all kinds. No doubt this is done to effect economy, and no doubt they are doing a good work. I am not here to criticize these funds, because they are supported by public-spirited citizens who go down in their pockets liberally. But I do say that because of the mistakes at the time of the last war there should be more coordination of the funds of these various organizations. No doubt the work they are doing is excellent, but I cannot see why it is necessary to have separate real estate, separate staffs, separate stenographers, separate advertising on the billboards and in the newspapers and all that kind of thing, for seven different funds, with a vote of $7,000,000. If it goes on for another year or two it will be up to $10,000,000. I urge upon the minister that he bring about more coordination in the interests of economy and efficiency, and to protect the taxpayer who, almost every day, has a hat placed in front of him, and is asked to chip in and to subscribe to many different funds for war purposes.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is the minister responsible for the operation and supervision of canteens? If so, under what item might they be discussed?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Is the hon. member referring to canteens operated by military units, or those operated by the auxiliary services? If the former, then that is entirely a regimental matter, and under the control of the Department of National Defence. As I recall—and I hope I am right—they have a special canteen committee which looks after these matters. But that particular kind of canteen does not come under this vote, or under my department.

Mr. MARSHALL: It is under the Department of National Defence, then?

Mr. LaFLECHE: If it is a military canteen, yes.

Mr. MARSHALL: What about the Navy-Army-Air Force Institute?

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is a British organization.

Mr. MARSHALL: But there is a Canadian Branch?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The N.A.A.F.I. is a British organization, although it may have branches in this country. I am not sure about that. Again I must say it is not in my department. I wish I had the information, but unfortunately I have not.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is this $7,000,000 in addition to moneys which might be raised from drives for funds?

Mr. LaFLECHE: These moneys are given from public funds, in lieu of public subscription. A moment ago the hon. member for Broadview referred to the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire. I might point out that last year of their own accord they preferred to raise funds through public subscription and, of course, their wishes were met. Last year, to the extent of $281,119 the Navy League financed from this vote, for particular wartime purposes. Then they went to the public for the funds which they would require in ordinary times, with the possible exception of certain commodities and other things which they require for the men of the sea.

Mr. MARSHALL: On what basis are these moneys allocated to the various organizations?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The moneys are paid following the assignment to a particular piece of work for the armed forces. The association in question puts it into a budget, which is gone over very carefully. When found correct, it is approved by the Minister of National War Services, and in that way the particular task is financed.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): At the present time the Department of National War Services appears to be trying to bring the different auxiliary services in the different cities together under what they call a coordinating war services auxiliary or committee. I understand the department expects that committee to look after the entertainment of soldiers, sailors and airmen in the different cities. Does the department supply the money, or do the cities have to raise that amount?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member for Peterborough West has referred to local coordinating citizens committees. At the moment they are not financed. Some have requested consideration of their difficulties in finding relatively small sums of money to pay for postage, for clerks or even for the rental of office space, and that matter is under consideration. At the moment, however, these committees which answer local needs, or which are developed because there is a need for work in a particular community, are supposed at the moment to finance themselves. I might say that, generally speaking, they do not have to spend so much money. I will grant, of course, that if a properly ambitious and patriotic local committee does go in for meeting trains bearing members of the armed forces who pass through a town, or who come to a city or town for a week-end, it would run into considerable money. But in many places there are other organizations to do that work. Coordinating committees are rather well described by the word "coordinating". I trust that is the information the hon. member wants?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In Peterborough we have a recreation centre for the armed forces. This has been carried on by the Kiwanis club, and at least 150,000 men of the armed forces have been entertained in that centre. Other activities in Peterborough are being carried on by other organizations. Do I understand that someone in the Department of National War Services has asked that dances be arranged for the soldiers? Under those circumstances I wonder whether financial arrangements would have to be made locally, or if they would be made by the department. A dance costs a lot of money, if one has to hire an orchestra.

Mr. LaFLECHE: If anyone on behalf of the Department of National War Services has requested that recreational or amusement features be entered into, it is really to answer a need proclaimed by the armed forces themselves. We do many times make known to local communities, through the agency of one organization or another, that at such-and-such a spot the boys are lonesome, and it would be a fine thing if something were done about it. The department does not anticipate organizing dances.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I placed a question on the order paper in regard to Miss Helen Doherty, and I should like to know if that would come under this item.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Miss Doherty is general assistant in the Department of National War Services.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That matter would be discussed under the civil estimates.

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is right.

[Mr. LaFlèche.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the women's volunteer services come under this particular item or under the civil estimates?

Mr. LaFLECHE: That would come under sundry services, not because it is not important but because the treasury board lumped a number of lesser sums together. If the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss the women's volunteer services under this item, I am perfectly happy to have him do so.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no desire to alter the sequence at all.

Mr. HANSELL: We are being asked to vote $7,000,000 for auxiliary services. Have any of the organizations which would come under this vote made a popular appeal for funds during the past year and, if so, what amounts were collected?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have stated already that last year the Red Cross went to the country and got over $10,000,000. That was their objective and they got it. Among the organizations that I mentioned is the Navy League which did go to the public for some money. However, that was not to carry on any of the work covered by this item.

Item agreed to.

Salvage division, $396,965.

Mr. WRIGHT: At sidings and railway stations of western Canada are to be found hundreds of tons of scrap iron which were collected by voluntary organizations. Some two and a half years ago the government made an appeal for the collection of scrap and passed a regulation which made it illegal to have more than 300 pounds of scrap on any farm. Voluntary organizations collected this scrap metal but, judging from what one sees when travelling on the train, apparently very little of it has been shipped. The result is that many of the organizations have become discouraged after having expended considerable efforts in collecting this scrap.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I believe the hon. member is referring to small quantities of scrap iron. These have been left where they are until some economic arrangement can be worked out to move this scrap material. Throughout Canada there are piles of salvaged materials of one kind and another which have been collected and which are immediately available. The location and availability of these materials are known to those concerned. These piles are a very necessary reserve. Could the hon. gentleman give me more precise details as to the localities, and then I should be glad to have the matter looked into and to give him full information. If it is a matter of two or three hundred pounds—I think the hon. member mentioned that figure —it would hardly be worth shipping.

Mr. WRIGHT: The three hundred pounds I mentioned had reference to the limit on the amount of scrap which could be left on a farm under the regulations passed by the government. The other scrap I am referring to runs into hundreds of thousands of pounds. These piles of scrap are to be seen at almost every station and on almost every loading platform in western Canada, and the people wonder why it is not being used.

Mr. LaFLECHE: It is these large quantities of scrap which have been gathered together that I had in mind a moment ago. These are reserve piles, and their whereabouts and availability are known. They form part of the inventory of the industry concerned.

Mr. MARSHALL: A perusal of the figures covering the operations of this particular branch of the Department of National War Services would seem to indicate that the costs are mounting and that we are building up more or less of a bureaucracy. The auditor general's report for the year ended March 31, 1942, shows expenditures in round figures of $160,000. This year it is proposed to spend more than twice this amount, and I should like to have a break-down of this item into the following divisions:

Salaries.
Travelling expenses.
Publicity.
Printing and stationery.
Telegrams and telegraphs.
Miscellaneous.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The break-down I have does not show telegrams separately, but otherwise I think it gives the information desired by the hon. member. Salaries amount to $79,715, which is an increase of $8,715 over last year. The other figures for last year and this year are as follows:

	1943-44	Last year
Cost of living bonus....	$ 3,000	$ 2,000
Unemployment insurance	250	130
Travelling expenses.....	50,000	34,000
Printing and stationery.	4,000	3,750
Publicity	250,000	195,000
Miscellaneous	10,000	7,000

Mr. MARSHALL: I think it would be interesting to the committee for me to place on Hansard for purposes of comparison the amount actually expended on this work for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942. These figures are from the auditor general's report and are the only ones available to me.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have the figures for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, if the hon. gentleman would like them.

Mr. MARSHALL: Are they authentic, from the auditor general?

Mr. LaFLECHE: They were given to me by the chief treasury officer of my department, and I take them to be correct. May I put them on record?

Mr. MARSHALL: If the minister would.

Mr. LaFLECHE: These are the expenditures for the fiscal year to March 31, 1943: salaries, $69,636.83; cost of living bonus, $1,813.96; unemployment insurance, $133.45; travelling expenses, $29,580.34; printing and stationery, $9,454.86; publicity, $149,922.18; miscellaneous, $6,419.40; making a total, as given me, of $266,961.02.

Mr. MARSHALL: I think it would still be of interest for me to place on Hansard for purposes of comparison the expenditures for the previous year, when scrap was more difficult to get.

Mr. LaFLECHE: It is more difficult to get it now.

Mr. MARSHALL: There is plenty of scrap in the country to-day.

Mr. LaFLECHE: It is more difficult to get it now, and the country needs it so badly.

Mr. MARSHALL: The expenditures for last year were: salaries, $15,680.22; travelling expenses, $7,342.34; publicity, $127,349.71; printing and stationery, $2,728.97; telegrams and telephones, $854.65; miscellaneous, $5,-262.34; making a total of $159,218.23. To-day the figures are more than double that, and I see no justification for such an increase in the amount that is being asked for this year.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I hope I can explain it to the satisfaction of my hon. friend. It has been necessary to go farther afield for many commodities that can be salvaged. The whole of Canada is now pretty well covered, and a greater variety of goods is being collected. It is more difficult now to get the quantities of materials required by the different industries in Canada for the simple reason that the bulk of the salvage has been taken off; the back yards have been cleaned out to a much greater extent than they were two years ago. Junk has been picked up and turned in. Fats and bones, while not a romantic subject, are extremely important in providing glycerine which is necessary in making explosives. We have to ask and train the whole of Canada into a routine to save fats and bones on account of the necessity of making available to the fighting nations explosives which are derived from some of the ingredients of fats and bones. Scrap metals of all kinds are also wanted, and rubber; we are far from being out of the woods in regard to rubber. The time will come, and the quicker the better, when it will not be necessary to ask all the citizens of Canada for the sake of victory to turn in their rubber tires and other articles made of rubber. I agree with the hon. member for Camrose that it is difficult to become enthusiastic about salvage. But these materials are of vital necessity in the war. At one time during this war I had the honour of wearing the king's uniform and it was not so easy, I assure the committee, to change from one role to the other. Yet I must express my deep admiration to the citizens of this country who are doing their best in this way to help win the war. I would not be a party to an extravagant organization, nor would I appear before this house if I did not think salvage was necessary.

One more thing. At this moment in the history of the world money is not worth anything compared with the blood of our boys in Sicily who maybe are being killed to-night.

Mr. MARSHALL: Hear, hear.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Then let us not hear about money against blood.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not want to hold up the item, and it is getting near eleven o'clock. We all agree with what the minister has said about the comparison between blood and money, but I do not really think that enters into the picture at all.

Could the minister give to the committee, perhaps not to-night but some other night, the value of the materials that have been salvaged, because it may be a pretty expensive job if we are spending nearly $400,000 to get these materials? Is a record kept of the value of the salvage at all?

The minister mentioned rubber. The minister perhaps does not travel extensively throughout the country and may not know how much rubber there is lying around this country. I asked the Minister of Munitions and Supply a few weeks ago why this rubber was not being reclaimed, and he said that the reclaiming plants were overstocked now and that we have not enough plants to care for the old rubber we have on hand. I am not overlooking the fact that we may need rubber just the same.

A word about scrap iron. The farmers have hauled in tons and tons of scrap iron to their various communities. They have to do it by the regulations and at their own expense. I am going to suggest to the minister what I suggested to his predecessor, that it would be a magnanimous thing, and yet only what we might expect, if the railway companies would at least haul that scrap iron free of charge to some central point where it is needed. The few gallons used by the farmer in hauling in the scrap iron means more to him than one carload in a thirty or forty-car train means to the railways. I make that suggestion and I hope the minister will give it consideration. At some future time—I am not asking the minister to do it to-night—I hope he will also tell the committee the value of the salvage that has been collected in this country.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall be very happy to put on the record the information desired by the hon. gentleman. I can give a very rough total figure to-night. We have recorded in the books of the department something over 300,000 tons of salvaged material. It is difficult to put a market value on it. I repeat, when you badly need a commodity in war time, if you have the material the cost is of secondary importance. Nevertheless, I shall bring the information down.

Item agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CENSORSHIP REGULATIONS OR INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of all censorship orders, regulations or instructions issued under government authority since the outbreak of war.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Stand.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): How long is this going to stand, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have stated three times, I think, last week and earlier this week, that the gentleman concerned is expected back in town to-morrow. As soon as he arrives I shall see him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister be good enough to explain why this has to await the return of Colonel Biggar?

Mr. GRAYDON: When does the minister expect to bring down this information?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall give the answer as soon as I can possibly arrange to do so; as soon as I can consult this gentleman.

Mr. CHURCH: And where is the return on the same subject which was ordered last week?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall then explain to the house.

Motion stands.

CHRISTIE STREET HOSPITAL—VOLUNTARY NURSING AIDES

Mr. BRUCE:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Pensions and National Health and, (a) war veterans' associations; (b) other organizations or boards of trade; (c) private individuals, since January 1, 1943, in regard to Christie street hospital.

Also a copy of reports of inspections made of Christie street hospital since 1938.

Also a copy of all correspondence passing between the Department of Pensions and National Health and the national commandant of the nursing auxiliary of the Canadian Red Cross Society and the lady-superintendent-in-chief of St. John Ambulance brigade in Canada, since January 1, 1943, regarding the employment of voluntary nursing aides in the Department of Pensions and National Health hospitals.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In regard to the first part of the motion I must make the usual reservation in regard to any confidential documents. I do not think there are any, but that will apply in case there should be. This seems to be a sort of double motion; there is no connection between the second portion and the first part; I think perhaps there should be two separate returns, though it really does not matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the observations of the minister?

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX

CLAIMS FOR EXEMPTION IN REGARD TO ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, in view of the fact that many public bodies and private citizens have been protesting against what they believe to be a hardship occasioned by a recent ruling of the Department of Justice which means that, a parent supporting an illegitimate child cannot claim income tax exemption in respect of such child. I understand the minister has the matter under consideration at the moment. Will he inform the house what steps, if any, he is taking to amend the law in this regard?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The only answer I can give is that this is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course. However, I have advised those who have written me that I did not think it would be practicable to open up the Income War Tax Act again this session.

CANADIAN ARMY

DISTURBANCES AT SUSSEX MILITARY CAMP—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TAKEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence with respect to the recent unpleasant occurrence at Camp Sussex. He will recall that on at least two previous occasions I made inquiry about this matter, at which times I was told that it was still under investigation. When may we expect some statement with respect to that affair?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I can make a statement now as to the progress that has been made. The government of the province of New Brunswick advised that after investigation they had not sufficient evidence to warrant them in going ahead with any criminal charge, and left it to the military authorities to take such steps as they thought advisable. The military authorities immediately reconvened the court of inquiry; as a matter of fact I think there were some new officers on it from headquarters, in order to elicit the facts as fully as possible, not only with regard to the shooting incident but also with regard to the matter of discipline. That court of inquiry has reported; the matter now I think is in this stage, that charges are being laid and I am not sure that the court martial has not been constituted. Charges are being made against a number of individuals and I think one officer with respect to the matter of discipline in the camp and offences which may have been committed with reference to internal organization, as they appear to have arisen out of that unfortunate occurrence. The matter is being carried forward with the utmost celerity. It may seem to have taken a long time, but I can assure hon. members of the house that no time has been wasted. I have taken a personal interest in the matter, and when I say it has involved the examination of at least a hundred individuals, if not more, I think hon. members will understand that a considerable amount of time has had to be taken.

THE WAR

OPERATIONS IN SICILY—OFFICER IN CHARGE OF CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I ask the Minister of National Defence if he is prepared as yet to announce the officer in charge of Canadian forces in Sicily?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): No, I am not able to do that, I am sorry to say. That is not because of any reluctance to give the information, naturally, because I should be very happy to give it if I could. It is because of the arrangement that exists, as between the various forces concerned, with the commander in chief, under which announcements of the kind are not made until the commander in chief advises that in the interests of security he is able to do so.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a remarkable situation, because I have read in the press the names of all the allied commanders and Canada just is not in that picture. I do not understand it, and I do not think that should be the case. I hope there is a Canadian commander of some prominence and standing, so that we may not be left out of this show altogether.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think Canada can complain of being left out of the show altogether, in view of the publicity she has been given—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I mean with respect to commanders.

Mr. RALSTON: —and the fact that Canada's participation was fully announced at the very beginning. As a matter of fact I think perhaps the Prime Minister's statement was made before the leader of any other government made a similar announcement. With regard to the names of the officers in charge, of course hon. members will note that the announcement was not made with regard to the officers commanding formations but with regard to staff officers in charge of the whole operation. That is to say, there is the commander of the allied forces and the deputy commander; there is the commander of the combined British and Canadian forces, and the commander of the United States forces, but the announcement did not go down even to commanders of corps or commanders of divisions, in any case. I do not want to add fuel to the flame of public desire, but I must say that sometimes I am irked at the security regulations which it is thought necessary to enforce. Like the rest of us I have to trust that those in charge of this matter will realize how anxious the public are not only for the name of the commander but for the names of the units involved; and I have to believe that just as soon as they consider the interests of security permit, the announcement will be made.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sorry the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has asked the question he has just asked. I should like to supplement what my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has said, by a word with respect to making announcements on the progress of the war, on matters pertaining to our own troops in particular, and also on many matters which pertain to Canada's participation in the war.

I wish to say quite frankly that repeatedly I find myself in extremely difficult positions. From time to time, along with others, I have received confidential information as to what was about to take place, so that I might be fully informed. But I have also at the same time received word that this information on no account was to be released until receipt of further word. Such further word does not always come as rapidly as one might like it to come.

There is the fact that other nations, and other parts of the empire, are also engaged in this war. They also have troops on active service, and in some instances, of necessity, announcements have therefore to be restricted to those who are recognized as being in supreme control of the direction of the war. I believe we are all only too ready and too happy to recognize that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Mr. Churchill, and the President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt, are the two men to whom all parts of the united nations and of the empire look as the two who have under their control the supreme direction of the war. Announcements will undoubtedly from time to time be made by these two gentlemen. Members of the house and people throughout Canada may say to themselves that it is rather singular that the Prime Minister of Canada has not made an announcement on this point, seeing that Canadian forces are so immediately involved and concerned. I have to choose between recognizing that other parts of the empire and others of the united nations would not wish to have Canada placed in a position more favourable than that which they occupy in connection with announcements of the kind, and leave those announcements either to Mr. Churchill, to the President or to both, or—as the other alternative—make a fuss about it, and see if the matter cannot be changed. I have felt that at least one of the greatest services I could render to all concerned at this time is to find as little fault as I can, and do as much as I can to avoid embarrassment. From time to time I have had to take that position, at the risk of great misunderstanding.

I do not mind telling the house, now that the event has passed, that all day Friday I had full knowledge of what was being planned. I was waiting for an opportunity to make an announcement on Friday, and until eleven o'clock at night I had hoped to be able to make it before the house adjourned. I had received a communication pointing out that for reasons of security no mention was to be made at all of the participation of the Canadian forces. And I might say that it was even contrary to the request I had received that no word was to be given respecting the participation of the Canadian forces in the invasion of Sicily until late Saturday—I say it was in spite of that that I made the announcement shortly after midnight on Friday. I made it because an announcement that Canadian troops were involved came, over the air, from military headquarters in the United States.

In justice to myself, and with a view to possible future situations, I feel I should make it clear that sometimes we in Canada are placed in very difficult positions. Let it be understood that I am not criticizing anyone. I do say that perhaps those who felt reasons of security would demand that there should be no mention of the participation of Canadian troops took that position for the best. But I have been asking myself what the House of Commons and the country would have had to say about the Prime Minister of Canada if he had not made any mention of the participation by Canadian troops in the attack upon Sicily until midnight on Saturday, instead of making it immediately after midnight on Friday.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 13, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war.—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Canadian wool board, administration, $500,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May we have a break-down showing how it is proposed that the $500,000 will be spent?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): This is merely an estimate of possible losses in the operation of the Canadian wool board. There is no break-down.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is the policy of this board? What good is it to Canada? What is it really going to do?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Canadian wool board, a crown company, was established in March, 1942, for the primary purpose of providing a ready and stable market for Canadian produced wools, to eliminate the delays in moving the Canadian clip into production, and to stimulate improved grades and increased production. Its purpose was in part to stimulate an increased production of wool in Canada by assuring sheep growers of a stable market at known prices for all their production during the period of the war and one year after. In addition, it was intended to control supplies and distribution of imported wool for civilian purposes and to exercise any necessary controls over the supply and distribution of related products.

The wool board exercises its powers under the direction of the wartime prices and trade board and the Minister of Finance, and the wartime prices and trade board was empowered to delegate to it such powers as it found advisable. The wool board was empowered to deal in and allocate domestic and imported wool fabrics, fibres and other commodities, and was subsequently empowered by the wartime prices and trade board to fix the prices to be paid for Canadian produced wools, subject to the concurrence of the wartime prices and trade board.

The wool board is the sole purchaser of Canadian-produced wools. It buys only graded wool and only through registered warehouses. Agents, collectors, or wool growers' associations may be licensed by the wool board to operate on behalf of registered warehouses, but payments for wool purchased are made directly to the grower by the registered warehouse on the basis of grade at the prices set by the wool board. The latter allows the warehouse a uniform commission. The wool board sells the wool so purchased for civilian requirements at prices in conformity with the domestic ceiling.

As the need has arisen the wool board has operated in the field of yarns, fibres and other related products as authorized in its charter. It has imported quantities of fleece wool, usually doing so in close cooperation with Melbourne Merchandising, its counterpart in the field of war requirements. On all importations, whether of fleece wool or yarns, fibres or other products, the wool board assumes the position of any private importer as regards import subsidies. On operations of this type it applies to Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation for any required import subsidy and takes no loss for its own account.

The wool board has purchased quantities of rayon tops and Peruvian cottons of types suitable for mixture in wool fibres. An important aspect of its activities has been its arrangements with the wartime prices and trade board under which it uses the facilities of United States spinners and weavers to convert supplies of wool which it controls in excess of domestic capacity into piece goods. It supplies the United States converters with both Canadian-produced and imported wools and purchases from them the finished piece goods. On these transactions Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation pays any required import subsidy to enable the piece goods to be sold at prices in conformity with the Canadian ceilings. The wool board has also from time to time imported quantities of yarn and finished fabrics by direct purchase, the necessary subsidies again being paid by Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What has been the result of the attempt to stimulate increased production of wool in Canada? I am tempted to ask this question because one of my colleagues suggested to me—I think I communicated the suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture—that there should be a prohibition of the slaughter of ewe lambs in Canada at least until the flocks can be built up. Is the minister able to say whether any effect has been given to a suggestion of the kind?

Mr. ILSLEY: The production of wool in Canada has increased substantially, but I have not the figures before me. I presume Canadian production was discussed when the agriculture estimates were before the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What steps have been taken by this board to increase production? That is stated to be one of the objectives.

Mr. ILSLEY: It provides a ready and staple market for Canadian produced wool.

Mr. ISNOR: Where is that market?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Canadian wool board buys all wool of the proper grades that is produced in Canada. It also imports a lot of wool, but it is not the exclusive importer. It is the exclusive buyer of domestic production.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is not able to tell me what steps this board has taken in that regard.

Mr. ILSLEY: A bonus of four cents per pound on graded wool is paid through the Department of Agriculture, not through this board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister any information as to what these import subsidies amount to?

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount of subsidy on wool as defined in tariff items 549 and 549a, from the inception to March 31, 1943, was $135,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: On imported wool?

Mr. ILSLEY: Right; to be exact $135,913.08. Those are the subsidies that are being paid out by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. No subsidies are being paid by the Canadian wool board. They would receive part of that subsidy as an importer. It includes all importers. I do not know how much of that amount the Canadian wool board received.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is any of it paid to the board? Is not the subsidy paid to the manufacturers or processors?

Mr. ILSLEY: We are talking now about importers, and the wool board assumes the position of any private importer as regards import subsidies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But they are not wool growers.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The wool centre for imports is in Boston; I think that is well understood. What is the modus operandi of getting foreign wool, say Australian wool, into Canada? I understand that the British government controls the wool clip and that a certain portion finds its way into the United States. So far as I know none of it is imported direct into Canada, or formerly was not so imported. If I as a wool manufacturer decide to import through the Boston market, do I get a subsidy, or is it only when the wool is imported through the agency of the wool board or this government corporation?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are some importations by private importers, and they would be entitled to a subsidy if the price that it was necessary for them to pay was higher than the price provided under the ceiling at which they were obliged to sell.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the factor, the ceiling price?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: How does the existing price of wool under the Canadian wool board compare with the price say in 1918? I have in mind the relation of the price to-day to the ceiling price on goods. With further reference to the question raised by the hon. member for York-Sunbury as to importations by private manufacturers, is it necessary for the private importer to secure a permit to import wool? My third question is as to grading and warehousing. In what sections of Canada are the warehouses located? Is the grading working out satisfactorily in all sections of the dominion?

Mr. ILSLEY: The private importers can import only under permit.

Mr. ISNOR: Permit from whom?

Mr. ILSLEY: From the wool administrator. I will answer the other two questions in a moment.

Mr. ROWE: Has any consideration been given to raising the ceiling price on wool, in view of the minister's statement that we are paying about $130,000 in subsidies to those who can produce wool much more cheaply than it can be produced in Canada? I think for economic reasons and to meet the demand for increased production the minister and the government should give careful consideration to this question of subsidies. A large portion of the half million dollars that we are paying out in subsidies goes indirectly to producers of wool in other countries where wool can be produced at half the cost in Canada, and wool of a much higher quality. You are also giving the private importers the advantage of an opportunity to get a higher quality of wool at practically the same price as their competitors. As the senior member for Halifax has more or less suggested, the best results in increased production were secured by giving our own farmers a reasonable price compared with their cost of production, instead of subsidizing wool growers outside this country where wool can be produced much more cheaply.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no half million dollar figure. The amount of the subsidies was $135,000.

Mr. ROWE: There is $500,000 for Canadian wool board administration.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is possible losses, and it is just an estimate. That would all be on domestic wool. In reply to the senior member for Halifax, the best figure I can give as to the relative price of wool during the last war at the same stage is a percentage figure, not the actual price. In December 1917 the index number representing the raw wool price was 329·9 as against 100 for the year before the war, August, 1913, to August, 1914.

Mr. ISNOR: What was the index price for the three years before that?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the prices for 1914 to 1917, but I have the percentage increase. It increased by three times.

Mr. ISNOR: What I wished to bring out was that owing to the wool board's operations there has been this very beneficial effect on prices of manufactured articles containing wool, and if the minister would ascertain the figures I think he would have a good point in favour of the wool board. Now may I follow the suggestion made by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe in regard to prices? In his statement the minister referred to the fact that they were purchasing rayon and other types of thread to be interwoven with wool, but these were being used by the United States spinning operators, if I recall rightly. Does that mean that they are being sent to the United States to be produced?

Mr. ILSLEY: Some.

Mr. ISNOR: My thought was as to whether we could not have this spinning done in Canada. There are operators and very fine mills throughout every part of Canada. In eastern Canada, we have Stanfields, one of the finest firms in the dominion dealing not alone with woollen products but with rayons as well. Perhaps the Canadian wool board could investigate these with the thought in mind of encouraging our home spinners to enlarge and thus make use of the rayons and other threads in the manufacture of woollen, and rayon and woollen, underwear.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is wool for the most part, practically altogether, that is sent to the United States for conversion, and it is sent there to be converted into woollen cloth. There may be some inter-mixture of these other fibres, but that would be very incidental. The reason we are availing ourselves of the United States facilities is that Canadian facilities are operating at capacity, and in order to get the cloth made—mostly or wholly, I think, for work clothing—we have to avail ourselves of such facilities as there are on this continent.

Mr. ISNOR: Yes, that is an answer in part, but I still feel that if the wool board would make a survey of the possibility of enlarging some of these plants it would be a good thing from the general Canadian point of view as well as for the operators.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to the price of wool and the index figure which the minister gave, I think the whole picture ought to be shown. In 1917 the United States was not in the war. The wool trade on the north American continent is centred in the United States. Boston is the great mart for the whole of North America. There was much inflation in the United States owing to largely increased buying power, resulting largely from the mass of treasure which was poured into the United States by Britain for the purchase of armaments. There was no control of prices in the United States, and prices in Canada, without any control over there, naturally had to soar to a point commensurate with the level in the United States. When my hon. friends across the way are drawing comparisons between prices today and prices in the last war of the same articles, they should never lose sight of the fact that conditions are entirely dissimilar. I commend to hon. gentlemen the reading of a letter written by Sir Thomas White which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail a few weeks ago, setting out clearly the whole position. We have to keep it in mind. The intention of course is to show how much better the Murphys are than the O'Rourkes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I tell the minister that I think his wool board this year has not done for Canada what it should have done. It has left the price to the producer of wool altogether too low.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is 119 per cent greater.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I read to the minister a few figures to show what that means?

Mr. ROWE: It was 100 per cent too low before.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to read figures showing prices paid in Canada and the United States during the past few years. They have been given to me by Mr. W. S. Benson, of the Southern Alberta Sheep Breeders Association, whose headquarters are at Lethbridge, a man who I believe is quite dependable. The following prices per pound obtained: The United States between 1930 and 1939 was paying on the average 23·6 cents, and Canada was paying 10·59 cents. In 1939 United States was paying 22·3 cents while Canada was paying 11·8 cents—much to be proud of, our country has! The average price for 1942 in the United States was 39 cents, and in Canada 25·9 cents. So that with all the great percentage increase in prices of wool to Canadian producers, they still were being neglected as compared with their fellow wool producers across the line. The increase in the United States over 1939 was only 74·4 per cent; the increase in Canada was 119·4 per cent, but even at that, the United States was paying in 1942 practically 14 cents per pound more for wool than Canada was. I think the minister will recognize that these figures disclose a situation which is not to the credit of the Canadian wool board. It is a situation which it is difficult to find language to describe adequately.

I am going to give a few more figures for the minister to think about. I have here from the same gentleman, Mr. Benson, a set of prices taken from the books of a Manitoba sheep grower. These prices go back over the years. The 1923 price was 20·6 cents. The 1924 price was evidently not recorded. Then follow: 1925, 22·4 cents; 1926, 16·1 cents; 1927, 19·8 cents; 1928, 33·7 cents; 1929, 16·5 cents; 1930, 7·5 cents; 1931, 3 cents. I believe the wool board would at least have done itself justice had it taken into consideration some such matters as these, but evidently it did not. I continue: 1932, 3·1 cents; 1933, 12·1 cents; 1934, 6·7 cents; 1935, 12 cents; 1936, 14·5 cents; 1937, 13·8 cents; 1938, 10·7 cents; 1939, 15·6 cents; 1940, 19·8 cents; 1941, 24·3 cents; 1942, 27·1 cents. This return of course is based on Manitoba conditions. I believe the minister himself will be astonished to find that such a set of prices prevailed in Canada. I am not blaming the minister; probably it has never been brought to his attention what questionable practices his wool board have been guilty of during the last year or so.

I am going to draw to his attention one or two other small matters which probably will be food for thought. In the first place I notice he said that the price for wool in 1943 was to be the same as the price for wool in 1942. Has it been brought to his attention —he is an exceedingly busy man and probably it has not—how greatly the costs of producing wool have increased during the last year? I have here a letter dated March 16, 1943, from the gentleman to whom I referred a moment ago, Mr. W. S. Benson, secretary-treasurer of Southern Alberta Sheep Breeders Limited, in which he points out to me several important increases in the cost of producing wool. In the first place the "1942 wages for farm help have increased tremendously, in some cases as much as 100 per cent. The growers would be prepared to pay these increased wages if they were obtaining increased efficiency, but unfortunately the reverse is the case, because experienced men are very difficult to obtain. One has to rely on inexperienced and inefficient help." This fact, however, did not register with the wool board although it was brought forcibly to their attention. Secondly, "The cost per head of shearing has practically doubled during the last two years and growers feel that the coming season they will have to pay a 25 per cent increase in order to get their shearing done." That is another matter that did not register with the representatives of the wool board when they visited Lethbridge.

Mr. REID: What is the cost of shearing?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have a letter in which it is given, but I cannot state it offhand. I read again:

> During the present winter, ranchers have been put to much more expense than usual on account of the long feeding periods as a result of the unfavourable winter.

That is another point which apparently entirely escaped the doctrinaires who have been called to responsible positions on the Canadian wool board, men who apparently have no contacts with the producers. The fourth point is this. The people generally in the Lethbridge area—and, if I am correctly informed, all through Alberta and other parts of the west—asked that the price be increased at least ten cents per pound over what they received in 1942. I know that this request was made of the representatives of the wool board at Lethbridge and was completely disregarded, in many cases without much respect being shown.

This quotation is important:

> The present income tax schedule as outlined in the budget does not give the rancher a chance to pay off his debt, even if he were so inclined.

I do not wish to take up the time of the committee by reading the minister a lecture on the inequities and the injustice of his income tax structure, but I will draw that statement to his attention with the request that he think it over before he builds his next budget. The minister, in fixing his income tax rates for the sheep growers in Canada, made no allowance at all for the tremendous losses suffered and the debts incurred by sheep growers when they were passing through the dreadful times in which they received 3 cents, 3·1 cents and 6·7 cents per pound. He simply clamped on a tax that would ruin them, and if the war goes on for five or six or seven years, and the men continue to be treated as they are at the present time under the income tax, the minister will squeeze them out of existence. If that is what he wants to do, he is on the high road to the achievement of his goal.

These matters are weighty; they have been entirely overlooked by the wool board, which has been travelling around the country and telling the farmers what they ought to be able to do. I would call the minister's attention to this fact. The main wool producers, the representatives of sheep producers' organizations, have been outspoken on this question of price in several parts of Canada. I would refer the minister to a little publication called "Country Life in British Columbia," of March, 1943, at page 16, wherein there is printed an article entitled "Words from President Harrison re treatment of B.C. sheep industry." In the fifth line of the first paragraph these words are attributed to Mr. Harrison:

> Bluntly he states that the producers of wool were not receiving a fair price for this essential commodity, that the price of lambs had been reduced unduly last summer, and that if the dominion government's urgent request for the raising of a million more sheep in Canada was to be satisfied, something had to be done about assuring a supply of labour, prices in line with costs of production, and protection against predatory animals.

We have nothing to do with the first and last of the list at this stage, but we have a good deal to do with the matter of price. I call attention too to an article in "Country Life in British Columbia," March, 1943, at page 17: "Wool price too low, so sheep breeders charge." I quote from the second main article on the page:

> At the annual meeting of the Ontario Sheep Breeders' Association, about the only complaint heard was that the price of wool was too low. The sheep breeders thought they should have 50 cents a pound.

In order to get some idea of the situation, all the minister has to do is to compare 50 cents a pound with the contemptible 25¼ which now is paid. If it were a purely western voice speaking, the voice of British Columbia, probably the officials at Ottawa would use their habitual restraint towards that province. But here is a statement from Ontario which should sound loud in the ears of the men at Ottawa. How a statement like this could have missed the attention of members of the wool board, I am not at the moment able to conjecture. May I also call attention to an article which appears in the Farm and Ranch Review of January, 1943. This article appears under the title, "Sheep industry is stifled," and is written by T. C. Glaspell, vice-president of the Canadian Sheep Breeders' association. It was written for the Farmers' Advocate and is quoted in the Farm and Ranch Review. I would call attention particularly to the words near the end of the article:

> I challenge our agricultural supply board to prove to the sheep breeders of Canada that wool can be raised under 50 cents per pound under present conditions.

We have here two voices, each one estimating 50 cents as the lowest suitable price. The Alberta request to raise the price ten cents a pound is in the light of the other two exceedingly moderate, and should have merited some respect from the visiting wool board representatives. But it did not.

In view of these statements the minister would be well advised to call the chairman of the wool board on the carpet and have a serious talk with him and point out to him that not long ago there were passed, at the Hot Springs conference, a number of resolutions, which demanded, and practically agreed, that all those who were going to cooperate were to do everything in their power to increase agricultural production of all kinds. The report of this Hot Springs conference has been published and was distributed recently to the members of the House of Commons. It is called, "International Conference on Food and Agriculture." The minister would do well to pass a copy of that report to each member of the wool board, and ask them to give the matter more than ordinary consideration or at least a great deal more consideration than they gave the request from the wool growers of Alberta this year. I think perhaps that is as much as it is necessary to say just now. May I repeat that in my judgment the wool board has failed in its trust this year and is not entitled to be reemployed next year. As was indicated by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, $500,000 was spent in subsidizing Australian and New Zealand production and distribution.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct.

Mr. ROWE: I do not think I made that statement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe I said the hon. gentleman indicated that; but such money as was used of the $500,000 to help any producers was used to help others and not Canadians.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is not correct either.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then was any of this money used to help Canadian wool producers?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, most of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then I should like to know about that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The trading losses of the Canadian wool board were practically all on account of Canadian wool. I do not know that I want to follow my hon. friend in detail—

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member means the Canadian subsidies.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It might be a hard thing to follow me, and it is also rather bad practice to laugh too often.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, my hon. friend frequently makes remarks like that in the house. If ministers do not answer him it is not because they have been tremendously impressed with his arguments; it is because of the reverse, and they assume that the impression on others will be the same. The hon. gentleman talked about the doctrinaires who composed the wool board. The president is Mr. D. C. Dick, who has had a lifetime of experience in the wool trade.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Did he ever produce sheep?

Mr. ILSLEY: He is an official of the wartime prices and trade board. I do not know that he ever produced sheep.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is the point; he never raised sheep.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that we would be justified in appointing a wool board composed entirely of producers of sheep, because the main purpose of the board is to see that we get a supply of wool at reasonable prices to meet civilian and war demands, which the board has been most successful in doing. The wool supply situation is very satisfactory indeed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: People are producing in spite of the board.

Mr. ILSLEY: The next doctrinaire is Mr. G. E. O'Brien, who I think is president of the Cooperative Wool Growers' Association.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has he ever produced wool?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that, but he is an official of the cooperative. Then we have another official of the cooperative, Mr. W. H. J. Tisdale; I suppose he is a doctrinaire.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is his record?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman should know as well as I do. Then I find that this matter of prices was considered and thoroughly argued when the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture were before the committee. Apparently it is true that prices in the United States have always been higher than prices in Canada, but as I have said before we simply cannot tie our economy to that of the United States any more than we can tie it to that of Australia or New Zealand, where the prices of wool are very much lower than in Canada. For 1942-43 the average price of wool in Australia was 21 cents, when their currency was converted into Canadian funds. In New Zealand it was 22 cents and in Canada 25·9 cents. The percentage increase in Canada since the low prices of the thirties is 119·4, or more than double. In the United States, prices have gone up by 74·4 per cent, in New Zealand by 53·5 per cent and in Australia by 49·5 per cent.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But the price in the United States was pretty high before; I mentioned the figures.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but I think the hon. gentleman would have to talk quite a long time before he could make a prima facie case against the wool board for injustice or failure of trust, when it is found that they have increased the price to the farmer in Canada by 119·4 per cent as against an increase of 74·4 per cent in the United States, 53·5 per cent in New Zealand and 49·5 per cent in Australia.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The price before the increase is important.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a matter as to which there could be endless argument. All I can say is that at the moment the supply situation is very good indeed. We are able to get the wool. We do get it at a little lower cost by buying from Australia and New Zealand, even though we have to pay these very heavy charges for war risk insurance and freight rates. In addition to the price I have mentioned we are also paying a subsidy of four cents per pound, which brings the price up to 30 cents. Our price is such that, quoting my colleague the Minister of Agriculture, while the price in the United States for the same grade wool runs from 37 to 40 cents a pound, when we consider freight charges, duty and everything else, the return to the Canadian farmer is slightly better than it would be if he sold his wool in the United States. The price to the farmer in Canada has more than doubled, while the price of woollen goods to the consumer has been kept down remarkably well when we consider the experience of the other war.

Mr. ROWE: There appears to be some misunderstanding about my statement in regard to the $500,000. I thought I made it clear that $500,000 had been spent under that item covering the administration of the wool board. I also mentioned that $130,000, which is the minister's figure, had been spent for the subsidization of imported wool.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not right; $500,000 is the estimate of total requirements for the current year.

Mr. ROWE: I cannot subscribe fully to the suggestion of the hon. member for Lethbridge that the wool board should be discontinued.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, not discontinued—replaced.

Mr. ROWE: Or even replaced at this time. However, I must say that I take the remarks of the hon. member much more seriously than the minister appears to take them. I followed his words closely, and I agree with a great deal of what he has said in regard to this issue. As he pointed out, very little consideration is given to the rancher so far as income tax is concerned. If a man invests his money in industrial stocks or gold stocks and there is a substantial increase in the value of those stocks, he can put that away as capital gain and pay no income tax on it. But if he has $5,000 worth of sheep held at ridiculously low prices, he is not even afforded a living wage when he looks after them. The minister has mentioned an increase of 119 per cent, but if a man makes an investment in a range, and finds that he has a gain, doubling his value, he must pay an income tax, as he turns those sheep into money. Therefore I say he does not receive the same privilege in that regard as is accorded to others. I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Lethbridge when he says we should be fair to the sheep growers of Canada.

I believe the wool board should be urged to increase the price of wool. For many years in this as in other countries, sheep have been recognized as the golden hoof of agriculture. Yet in Canada to-day we have very few more sheep than we had in 1896 or 1898. It is true that we have a few more than we had in 1890, but between the nineties and this date there has been no substantial increase in the sheep population of Canada. Any increase there may have been has been effected in the hope of receiving a higher price for wool, in view of the development of the Canadian textile industry under the imperial preference of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

In recent years we have been practically at a standstill so far as our sheep industry is concerned. It has been almost static; there has been scarcely any increase at all, with the exception of the last year or two. I must say in fairness that I have no fault to find with the wool board's administration. But I am in agreement with the hon. member for Lethbridge in what he has said about the general policy of the government with respect to agriculture. I believe it is necessary to have a wool board, because every other industry in Canada is regulated, controlled and strait-jacketed and, whether it is sound or unsound, it would not be fair to leave one out from under the cover of the strait-jacketing machinery. I do suggest however that careful consideration of the matters in hand should be given by these boards, and that more men with a knowledge of agricultural production, men who understand the different branches of agriculture, should be given places on them.

To compare prices received back in pre-war days with prices received to-day and say that they have increased by 119 per cent is not a fair statement. I do not know all there is to know about sheep production, but for many years I have kept sheep, and I know something about their cost of production. It is ridiculous to compare production costs in Canada with those in Australia, a country where the sheep may roam over land worth only a fraction of what a similar area would be worth in Canada. Then, in Australia housing is not required the year round.

Mr. REID: It might help if the minister took the income tax off sheep and put it on dogs running at large.

Mr. ROWE: Yes. Well, there have been a lot of hounds who have hurt the sheep industry. We have witnessed several setbacks, and most of them have developed because of government policies.

Mr. GRAYDON: Sheep dogs.

Mr. ROWE: Someone says they are sheep dogs. Often they are watch-dogs of the treasury. There is no class of live stock more indigenous to Canada than sheep. We have a cold country. We must build expensive farm buildings to house other types of live stock, in which sheep could be housed. They can be produced in this cold country more economically than any other type of live stock. We have plenty of pasture land. There is no country in the world with such vast areas of pasture, and in such a cold climate, that has such few sheep.

All hon. members know that Canada needs foodstuffs. We have meatless Tuesdays and, if the war goes on much longer, we may have meatless Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays. We compare ourselves with Australia with a sheep population of 40,000,000, while ours is only around 4,000,000, and for many years it was only about 3,500,000. That is our sheep population, in a country so vast. There must be some reason for this. I am not going to say what the price increase should be. We have been told for many years that we would have a great opportunity to sell our live stock if we had free trade with the United States. We have been told what a great outlet that would be. We find to-day however that in the United States farmers are receiving around 17 or 18 cents a pound for their beef, while in Canada we receive only 12 to 13 cents for the same quality. The hon. member for Lethbridge has pointed out that in the United States market they are receiving 14 cents a pound more for wool than is received in Canada—and this at a time when we need wool for our armed forces, and despite the fact that in Canada we have a cold climate and require woollen clothing. For half a century we have failed to increase the flocks of one of the most important branches of our live stock industry—sheep raising. We have failed to increase our sheep population for almost half a century.

I suggest the government should give careful consideration to increasing the ceiling price on wool. Other ceilings have been broken and have been increased. I am confident we will increase the production of wool in Canada much faster if we give the farmers some encouragement through an increased price than we would by following what I believe is going to be a most vicious policy if carried much further, namely that of handing out huge subsidies and bonuses. Some consideration should be given along these lines.

Mr. CHURCH: I notice that in this item the cost of administration has gone up from $200,000 to $500,000.

The CHAIRMAN: We are dealing with wool at the present time, and the hon. member's observations are not in order.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, we are dealing with the wool board, for which there was an allotment of $200,000 last year and for which there is one of $500,000 this year. I suggest that perhaps the hon. member is in order.

Mr. CHURCH: My objection is that there have been some changes in this wool board. For some time Mr. Dick of Cobourg was chairman of it, but changes have been made, and I should like to know why. Why did Mr. Dick retire? What is the representation on the board of practical men in the industry, men who are engaged in this very important branch of agriculture? I have watched the ups and downs of sheep raising in Ontario for years. Many attempts have been made to increase production in that province, and to follow the development of the textile industry there. I remember that some years ago the Hon. George Washington Ross, then premier of Ontario, referred to his dream—"Ye who have sheep on a thousand hills." Well, I go around through Ontario quite a bit, and I have failed to see any evidence of increased sheep production on those hills.

What is the set-up in connection with this $500,000 item? How many of the men on the board are practical men? The other day inquiry was made as to whether a report is submitted to each separate minister and what minister of the crown is responsible for these announcements and public utterances. I said that I did not expect him to know it all but the answer was that the wartime prices and trade board, of which this is a sub-board, was responsible and that public addresses, and I suppose reports and announcements, are not normally first submitted to the minister. I fail to see where there has been any effect in the way of increased production on the sheep market in Toronto or Montreal, for instance. I notice from the Globe and Mail of this morning that prices are holding back and the market is very dull. The prices in Chicago yesterday were dull at $8.50. Buffalo is down to $8.50. Montreal was stationary and very little offering. The market was quite dull for live stock. The Toronto figures for sheep were:

13, 130 pounds, $10; 7, 130 pounds, $9; 4, 120, $8; 1, 250, $7.50; 3, 120, $7; 1, 120, $5.

There has been very little expansion in production. My last objection is that in the dying days of this parliament a report like this is brought down. Are we to carry on like we have in the last few days, like we did yesterday? Are we just a sounding board, are we to be a Charlie McCarthy for some outside ceiling control board that should be criticized far more than I am criticizing it this morning? We passed an item for another board all day yesterday and this morning they had the band playing outside the buildings, they were taking moving pictures and putting out propaganda to the public. This committee should have some control over expenditures of this kind; we are not getting the return we should for the money expended, because the market remains very shaky, dull and unsteady. If this matter had been treated in the proper light by practical men in the industry production in Ontario would be far better.

They are talking about closing the house and we might just as well close to-night for all the control we have over these expenditures. We are simply sounding boards, we are simply Charley McCarthys for the ventriloquists on the treasury benches and their control system. Some of them do not know any more about it than I do, and I am not an expert on agriculture. However, I am just as much of a farmer, I know just as much about farming as some of the gentlemen sitting in front of the minister this morning. I doubt if they know anything about sheep, I doubt if they can quote the scriptures on it. The scriptures say, "Feed my sheep", and I think the minister is treating us as though we were a lot of sheep. We may as well go home because we have no control over the administration of affairs or over all these expenditures. We are sitting here to-day and to-morrow morning they will probably be taking moving pictures of the sheep in front of the parliament buildings. The hon. member for Davenport has not spoken for five days, I believe, and I have no doubt that when we pass this item his picture will be among those taken to-morrow, as are Charlie McCarthys to control.

Mr. FAIR: As the hon. member for Broadview has now exhausted his second wind, perhaps we can proceed with the shearing of the sheep. I am in agreement with the hon. member for Lethbridge and the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. This question was discussed when the Minister of Agriculture was before us on at least two occasions, but we have not made much progress as far as dollars and cents for the producers are concerned. The percentages which have been quoted by the minister will not mislead the producers in any way. Two wrongs never yet have made a right. The fact that a certain percentage of an increase has been paid for wool does not justify anybody standing up in this house and saying that the producers are getting their cost of production. The argument made or attempted to be made the other night by the Minister of Agriculture was based entirely upon what the Canadian wool grower could get if he sold his wool in the United States. That does not convince any of us that we should have to go to the United States in order to find a basis for the cost of production in Canada. Surely there are statisticians here who can figure the cost of producing wool just as they can figure the cost of producing ships and planes and guns and bullets. I feel satisfied from the information I have received from wool growers in my constituency that the amount received last year, which varied from 25 to 26 cents per pound, plus the fact that the dominion government is paying half of the four cents subsidy on wool, does not satisfy the producers of this commodity. The figures given a few days ago by the Minister of Agriculture were to the effect that the price paid for wool this year, including the subsidy, would be 34 cents per pound. I hope that is correct. I should like to see the price increased to return the cost of production without the use of a subsidy. I do not say this because I am opposed to subsidies as such, but because I believe that if the producers of wool were given that to which they are entitled, there would be no need for a subsidy and there would be a better return in dollars and cents.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has the minister the total amount of wool imported last year and what it cost the government in the way of subsidies and other payments? I should like to know also the amount of wool produced in Canada last year and what it cost the government for subsidies and other payments.

Mr. ILSLEY: From the beginning of the price ceiling up until March 31, 1943, the amount of the subsidy was $135,000. That will be found on page 105 of the report of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. WRIGHT: And the amount of wool?

Mr. ILSLEY: The officials tell me that the figures are not published.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is the rate per pound of the subsidy?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the difference between what it costs the importer to lay it down in Canada at the time of importation and what it cost him to lay it down in the basic period.

Mr. WRIGHT: What was the production in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: I thought the hon. member was talking about imported wool.

Mr. WRIGHT: I asked two questions, one with regard to imports and the other with regard to wool produced in Canada. I wanted to make a comparison between the two.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only payment in the nature of a subsidy for which the Canadian wool board is responsible is the trading losses.

[Mr. Fair.]

These amounted to $34,246.67 for the period from March 18, 1942, the date of the incorporation of the Canadian wool board, to March 31, 1943. That is largely losses in the handling of domestic wool. The four cents subsidy by the Department of Agriculture is an entirely different thing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There are one or two matters I should like to discuss a little further. The minister thought that probably I was speaking a little too harshly. I am going to read to him a letter from a wool grower in my constituency, and he will find that I was speaking for my constituency, which is one of the best wool growing constituencies in Canada. There was a meeting in Lethbridge last year. I heard that what went on at that meeting probably should have been a little different, and so I wrote this man for details of the meeting. He says in his letter to me of March 5:

> At the meeting you refer to Dick, O'Brien and Brown were present. Mr. Longman, deputy minister, presented the case very well for the sheep men and asked for a 10 cents raise, 35 cents against the present price average of about 24½ cents. J. H. Walker—

He is the member for Warner constituency in the Alberta legislature:

> J. H. Walker told how wages had practically doubled, shearing was 50 per cent up and lumber and posts were much higher, as was hay. We had to pay very high wages to put up feed this year. Help was scarce. The concentration camp at Lethbridge got most of our help. Ninety cents for jack carpenters and 50 cents an hour for common labourers. Two of my sheep herders left and went to work there.
> This man Dick when he rose to speak told the wool growers to "shoot all they had as his hide was thick." He and O'Brien ignored everything that was said and continued to talk back. We got nowhere. They just came out west for a trip.

That is the impression which this gentleman made on men who were present at that meeting, and the men who were present were sober, solid substantial citizens of the Lethbrige federal riding. The writer goes on:

> The sheep men at the meeting were mostly all large flock owners. The man across Canada with 15 or 20 ewes isn't much interested.

The minister will find that probably a good deal of his increase is coming from that source, from the small flocks:

> Their costs are about the same but the range men feel the "pinch."
> Jack Bowlen, M.L.A., only received 22 cents for his wool as did many others present but all the satisfaction they got was that they shipped to the wrong grading house.

May I interrupt the reading of this letter to ask the minister, what kind of management of the wool situation in Canada he thinks this is when the individual wool producer does not know to what wool buyer to ship his wool? Does that indicate orderly management of the whole affair? If there are different buyers throughout Canada who are buying wool and paying different prices, while we have a wool board in Canada which is supposed to be taking care of the whole matter of buying wool, that stands as a condemnation of the wool board or condemnation of the powers given to the board when constituted. The board seems to have plenty of power with respect to everything else; the marvel is that it could not take care of marketing. The writer of this letter continues:

> Dick did promise to investigate the 50 odd licensed dealers. Many of the growers got a raw deal. Bowlen shipped to a dealer in Saskatoon.
> The range men supply most of the foundation stock to farmers, small breeders, et cetera. Put the range men out of business and what is left of the "sheep industry" in the west would collapse. The small man is an "in and outer" in the prairie provinces. As a rule the man with one or more bands is taking an awful walloping right now because of high wages, scarcity of help, et cetera.

I hope the minister will grant that my remarks were no more heated than the spirit of that letter, and if he knew this man and how calm he ordinarily is and how fully experienced he is in raising sheep, I think the minister would be impressed too.

I wish to say a word or two more about this whole matter, because we are not finished with it yet. May I pause here to say that it is too bad to have to talk to the minister about these things, because I know what a lot he has to think about, and he should not have to be worried about matters pertaining to agriculture. But it so happens that the wool board appropriation is under his department; consequently he is in a measure responsible for it. The only thing I can do is to turn to the man who is responsible. One reason why we did not urge this matter further upon the Minister of Agriculture is that during the last three years he has reminded me of a horse tied up helpless to a post with children beating him. He has no choice but to take the blows, because somebody else is tying him up. I have pretty well grown weary of talking to the Minister of Agriculture, and I am talking now to the man who perhaps has authority to do something about this matter.

The Minister of Finance said something about agriculture being tied to Canada's economy. There is plenty of evidence of that. I do not think you will find in any other civilized country of the world the treatment that Canada is according to her farmers, although the United States comes a close second, or did until a short time ago. The trouble is that the United States and Canada and a great many other nations have for a number of generations been scanting their farmers, shoving them and kicking them around, and then thinking the farmers ought to take it smiling and continue to do good work! The minister says that we are getting the produce, and I will grant that, but it is killing the farmer, and just as soon as they get a chance to move, the minister will have a hard time to keep them on the land.

In connection with this food and agriculture meeting at Hot Springs, I want to urge the minister to reconsider his attitude towards agriculture. May I show him what the results of Canada's method of dealing with her farmers have been. I have in my hand the latest copy of "U.F.C. Information," a booklet published in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, for the month of June, 1943. At page 3 of that booklet there is a discussion of the debt question, which the minister still has ahead of him. This is the matter to which particularly I wish to direct his attention. It says:

> It had been said that agriculture with about a third of the population of Canada had received only 17·8 per cent of the national income in 1926, 5 per cent in 1932 and 15 per cent in 1940-42.

If the minister thinks that is good enough, may I respectfully tell him that he has quite a lot to learn yet. Professor Hope, of the university of Saskatchewan, takes these figures and considers them probably a little too dark and gloomy, and so he proceeds to apply four correctives to them. He finds this after he applies his four correctives to these figures, which in no way reflect credit upon Canada:

> Taking these adjustments into account, it appeared that agriculture's share of the national income during the period 1926 to 1942 was at its highest point of 26·1 per cent in 1926. In 1929 it was 22 per cent, and thereafter it dropped to the low point of 13·1 per cent in 1932.

One thing which, among others, I was particularly anxious to impress upon the minister was that the agriculture industry, and particularly the wool industry, has gone through a terribly hard experience. Not sufficient allowance is being made for that. If Canada's economy is definitely arranged on the basis that the agricultural population of the dominion, large as it is, is to receive in normal times only 26·1 per cent of the national income of Canada, then Canada has to revise her ways a great deal before she is ready to qualify under the recommendations of the Hot Springs conference.

May I read a brief statement from the most recent letter, that of June, 1943, of the Royal Bank of Canada, to show where the minister's policy is getting Canada:

Whereas in Canada at the beginning of the century 63·5 per cent of the total population was engaged in agriculture or living on farms, in the census of 1941 this proportion had declined to 45 per cent.

True, a lot of things enter in: I could give them all. I was born and raised on a farm and I know a good deal about the farm. I am not talking entirely without contact with these matters. Even though there has been a great deal of industrialization, the trend away from the farm is not a healthy trend, and certainly is not the kind of trend to be—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member himself has mentioned that we have already discussed wool on three or four occasions. I do not think it should be permissible under this item to raise again all the problems of agriculture in Canada. I ask the support of every member of this committee to see to it that we remain in order in discussing the items which are before the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I would not have mentioned it at all except that the minister made a remark about Canada's particular policy, her economy.

Mr. GRANT: It is too hot.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I know it is too hot, but the farmers on the land, though they find it hot, are toiling; the sheep rearers and sheep shearers are toiling too.

I wish to bring one other matter to the minister's attention. Is there a surplus of wool in Canada? Has Canada more wool than she needs?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not so far as I know. The supply situation is satisfactory.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is, we need an increase in wool, do we?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think we do, particularly.

Mr. GRANT: Not this summer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well now, the information I have indicates that there is a surplus of wool in Canada. I have under my hand a letter signed by one of the very members whom I have been talking about. I did not make a few minutes ago extravagant and ill-considered remarks about the wool board. The letter right here indicates that they have so much wool in store that they do not know where to put it.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether the letter shows that or not. They have taken pains to accumulate quite a lot of wool because they know they will need it. How can you say it is a surplus? Certainly there is wool in the country all the time, and I have said repeatedly that the supply situation is satisfactory at the moment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The reason I mention it is this, that the member in writing this letter is trying to excuse the board for its indifference to the farmers' feelings with respect to price; in other words, endeavouring to convey to the man to whom this was written that after all the wool board is not particularly concerned about increasing the quantity of wool in Canada, that we have all the wool we need and that we do not require to take any special measures to get more wool.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All right; I should not be surprised. That is one thing I wanted to get. I gathered that from the statement of the Minister of Agriculture. Now I want to ask the minister this question: was the amount of wool which Canadian consumers could use restricted in 1942? In other words, were the manufacturers forbidden to use the wool which they would normally have used in 1942?

Mr. ILSLEY: The use of wool for processing is controlled by permit. Processors can process only subject to permit. I do not know whether any particular processor wanted to get more than he was able to get a permit for. There was some sort of rationed distribution of wool among producers.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What I want to find out is whether or not the processors of wool were limited in the matter of the amount of wool they could use.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is, did they run short of wool? Was there an artificial scarcity of wool induced among the manufacturers in Canada in 1942?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will have to get the information for the hon. member, if I can.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Is it not true that there was a scarcity of wool in retail stores throughout the country? That has been generally accepted, that certain yarns—certainly could not be bought.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is hand-knitting wool?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I may tell the minister that there was an artificially induced scarcity of wool.

Mr. ILSLEY: Artificially induced by whom?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, that is what I want to find out.

Mr. ILSLEY: Facilities in the country are limited; there are only so many. I said that before. We have only so much capacity, and that is the reason we are getting some of our stuff made in the United States.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the minister will be astonished to learn that the very same gentlemen who were storing wool, apparently getting ready for a condition under which they could restrict the price advance and resist the request of the producer for an advance, are the same gentlemen who are restricting the amount of wool that the Canadian people can use.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is utter nonsense, and I believe I shall be able to say so definitely at three o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall be right here to hear the minister say that.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Lethbridge suggested before one o'clock that the wool administrator or the Canadian wool board, or both, had curtailed or limited the production of woollen goods in 1942 for the purpose of accumulating a large surplus of raw wool so that they might use that fact as a means of keeping down the price to the Canadian farmer. I indicated that I thought there was nothing in that contention. I believe the figures of production of woollen goods in Canada from 1935 on, up to and including 1943, furnish a conclusive answer to that statement. The yards of wool cloth produced in 1935 were 16,767,000; in 1936, 17,542,000; in 1937, 18,088,000; in 1938, 14,346,000; in 1939, 17,190,000; in 1940, 26,394,000; in 1941, 24,693,000; in 1942, 26,850,000; in 1943, estimated, 27,500,000. The figure of 26,850,000 shows the largest yardage since 1935. I have not the figures for the years prior to 1935, but that figure indicates what was the fact, namely, that the woollen mills were running to full capacity.

The object of the permit system which was instituted in 1942 was not in any way to curtail output. It was to allocate output as between military requirements and civilian requirements and as between what were regarded as more essential and less essential civilian requirements. The capacity of the country was fully utilized, and that being true, there was of course no curtailment of the production of woollen goods for the purpose of accumulating a stockpile of wool. A stockpile of wool has been accumulated for very good reasons. One has not known right along, and one is not yet sure, whether the supply lines between Australia and Canada will not be cut. If the Japanese got a little further south we would not get any more wool, and for that reason the Canadian wool board did the sensible thing. They aimed to get two years' supply of wool in Canada so that they would have the wool. They had a hard time getting wool in 1939, and since that time the situation has been kept well in hand. I think the Canadian wool board are entitled to the appreciative gratitude of the Canadian people for the way they handled it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can the minister tell us whether the 26,000,000 yards were strictly for civilian use or for civilian and military?

Mr. ILSLEY: Civilian and military.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is a great difference.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not make any difference whatever. My hon. friend's contention was that a stockpile of wool was accumulated by the curtailment of production in Canada, and the complete answer to that is the fact that the full capacity was utilized. Whether it was utilized for military or civilian purposes has no relevancy whatever, and the suggestion that the board would deliberately curtail production for the sake of accumulating a stockpile, with the sinister view of beating the Canadian farmer down, is a wholly unworthy suggestion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is difficult to understand is why the wool board, or some member of the board, used the fact that we had such a store in Canada to produce upon certain wool producers this very effect, to give them the idea that the wool board was being generous to them in accepting their wool. I have a letter which will indicate that very thing. I am not disagreeing with the minister with regard to the wisdom of the board in accumulating a supply of wool. I agree that that is wise. They should have two years' supply of wool on hand, and above all things there should be production of wool in Canada at maximum capacity, which we certainly have not. That ought to be perfectly clear. As to restriction of the use of wool, I think the minister will agree with me that there was such a restriction.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said for certain purposes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: One thing I cannot understand is why persons who were writing apparently with the authority of the board would indicate to the producers that the fact that there was so much wool on hand was pretty good evidence that the price ought not to be raised.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suppose someone said: You want to get wool; you have to have wool, and you have to pay the price. That is the argument frequently used by a good many Canadian citizens—we will not produce unless we get more money. It seems to be regarded as a perfectly legitimate argument. I cannot see it myself, though I have adapted myself to it. It is used by member after member as a legitimate demand: You don't get us to produce unless you pay more money. I suppose something like that was said to the wool board and they replied: In your particular case we have a surplus of the product already, so that the argument does not carry there. And so far as I am concerned I am glad we can say that once in a while.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hon. members will remember that the prospective and potential producers of war materials were the very first to say: We won't produce unless we get so much, and five per cent is not enough.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not singling out any particular class of Canadian, mind you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What would be a thoroughly legitimate thing for the producers of war goods, munitions, to say, ought to be a thoroughly legitimate argument in the case of the producers of wool. There is no answer to that. I wish to indicate to what extent some of the producers and manufacturers were restricted in the matter of wool. I will read an excerpt or two from a letter.

Mr. ILSLEY: After this I want my hon. friend to put his letters on the table of the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is right here; you can come and see it.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I want him to lay them on the table.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is not necessary. All that is necessary is that I should vouch for the letters, and I do vouch for them.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I rise to a point of order. If my hon. friend is going to read from letters, which he has been doing freely, and I have not insisted on the rules, he should produce the letters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the rule.

Mr. ILSLEY: Isn't that the rule?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a rule made by the government since the war began. The rule is that if a member of the government reads from an official document, he must table it, but the reverse is not the case. I can quote from a letter if I want to and I do not have to put it on the table. That rule has been made by gentlemen opposite to suit their own convenience.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is correct.

Mr. QUELCH: Paragraph 316 of Beauchesne reads:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the house, if it can be done without injury to the public interest. The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda. On the 18th May, 1865, the attorney-general, on being asked by Mr. Ferrard if he would lay upon the table a written statement and a letter to which he had referred on a previous day, in assuming a question relative to the Leeds bankruptcy court, replied that he had made a statement to the house upon his own responsibility, and that the documents he had referred to being private, he could not lay them upon the table. Lord Robert Cecil contended that the papers, having been cited, should be produced; but the Speaker declared that this rule applied to public documents only.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And that is the general rule.

The CHAIRMAN: I have stated previously that I hold very strong views on this matter. Personally I feel that any member of the committee quoting from a letter should give the source of his information. A year or two ago the hon. member for North Battleford was compelled to produce a letter which she had read in committee; and I am sincere in my conviction that any members of the committee quoting from letters should give the names of the writers, for the information of the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is a question of what is the rule.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the justification for your decision, Mr. Chairman, based on the rules? I know that has been the practice since 1940, but I should like to say to you, sir, with great respect, that prior to 1935 that rule was never even suggested in this house, and there is no affirmative rule to support that position.

The CHAIRMAN: To a large extent it is a question of precedent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then that means we make the rules as we go along.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe it would be in the interests of the committee that members quoting from letters should give the sources of their information.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is not a matter of opinion, Mr. Chairman; it is a question of the rules. While we may not like to have long letters read in the house, if an hon. member takes the responsibility of quoting a letter, under the rules that ends the matter so far as this house is concerned. I do not think there is any doubt about that, nor do I think the opinion of the chairman can decide an issue of this description, which should be dealt with under a rule of the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am prepared to table the document if necessary; there is nothing secret about it, but I would just as soon keep out the names as far as possible. Now I want to read this little excerpt from the letter:

> Mr. Moore, manager of the Golden Fleece Woollen Mill, told me he was only allowed to put twenty per cent of wool in blankets for civilian use, the rest had to be shoddy. . . . No wool, no underwear, say the manufacturers. I could send you a dozen letters from firms who have no wool.

This is from the manager of a department store. Then he gave me two letters from other firms. One is dated February 8, 1943, in which it is stated:

> Production of civilian goods will be restricted in 1943 for two reasons. First, army requirements will be larger than in 1942. Second, wool available for the production of civilian goods has been restricted by the government to sixty per cent of the quantity of wool used by this firm for civilian production in 1941.

Then from another letter dated January 29, 1943, I quote the following:

> We are now prohibited by the wool administration from making a reversible blanket, and as a matter of fact have no stock whatever, and our wool ration is used up for the balance of this period.

The point that is interesting to me, and which I think ought to be interesting to the committee, is that whereas in Canada the wool production could be greatly increased by a few common sense devices, such as raising the price in order to permit producers to operate at a profit, nothing is done. Production of wool in Canada is restricted, apparently deliberately; at the same time consumption in Canada is restricted, also apparently deliberately. The two do not go together and make sense.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have said, and I suppose I shall have to repeat, that the over-all production was not restricted in 1942. I think in that year it was the highest in the history of Canada, or certainly far higher than in any year since 1935. In 1943 it will be slightly higher again. The full capacity of the wool-producing industry has been used in those years, and the limitations placed upon the use of wool for certain purposes is simply in order that more facilities may be available for other purposes. That is the reason for the restriction.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When the minister mentions production I presume he means production by the factories, not by the sheep producers. I have positive knowledge of at least a dozen men in my own constituency, whom I could name right now, who have restricted their flocks by as many as one or two thousand sheep simply because of the intolerable situation in which they find themselves, and they will further restrict their production. Certainly this is a dangerous situation to have existing in Canada. I say the wool productive capacity of Canada is not being used as it should be, and that is so as a result of the activities of the wool board, or the activities of Donald Gordon or someone else who is dictating to the wool board. If that board has full authority with regard to prices it must accept full responsibility. If it has not full authority, then whoever has that authority must accept responsibility. It is a serious responsibility, because if the contingency to which the minister refers should develop; if some difficulty should arise as a result of which Canada was cut off from supplies from Australia and New Zealand; if we should be thrown upon our own resources, many people in Canada would suffer from the cold because of a shortage of clothing. That would be the result of foolish, shortsighted mismanagement by whoever is in charge of Canadian wool production.

I have very little more to say, but I should like to put on record a set of figures to show the validity of my contention that the price of wool is too low. These figures were prepared by the executive of the Canadian Sheep

Breeders' association and used by Mr. T. C. Glaspell in his article, "Sheep Industry is Stifled," printed in Farm and Ranch Review, of January, 1943, which in turn reproduced the article from the Farmer's Advocate. The article is on page 13. These are significant words, coming from the vice-president of the Canadian Sheep Breeders' association:

Here is a table showing the cost of raising a sheep for a year, prepared by the executive of the Canadian Sheep Breeders' Association:

	Min.	Max.
Purchase price of good ewe....	$12 00	$15 00
Depreciation yearly	1 66	2 00
Ram service	50	75
Interest on investment.....	60	75
Grain 150 to 200 lbs.	3 00	4 00
Hay 400 to 600 lbs.	3 00	4 50
Veterinarian, worming, etc. ..	50	75
Pasture	1 50	1 80
Labour	3 00	4 00
Building investment	1 00	1 50
Shearing	25	25
	$15 01	$20 30

$15.01 plus $20.30 divided by 2 equals $17.65.
Death loss will balance ewe at 6 years.

Average cost to keep a ewe.....	$17 65
Sale of lamb crop at 125 per cent
90 lbs. lamb at 12 cents.....	10 80
Plus ¼	2 70
	$13 50
$13.50 from $17.65	4 15

Fleece should sell for at least $4.15.
Average for Canadian fleece 8 lbs. should be 50 cents per lb.

The above table shows that lamb at 12 cents and wool at 31 cents does not yield a profit.

I have no more to say on this matter, but I urge upon the minister that he take it up earnestly with the wool board, and point out to them that in the interests of Canada there should be an increase this year of 10 cents a pound in the price of wool. That price should go to the producer—right straight to him, whether he has sold his wool, or whether he has not. Because it is not altogether a matter of whether or not the producer is going to make a profit this year; it is a matter of whether he will be encouraged to raise sheep next year. That is the vital question.

In addition, I suggest that the minister take steps at an early day to see to it that the actual producers of wool are represented on the wool board. I refer to producers of wool such as the man who wrote this article I have just quoted. And I want one more thing: I do not believe the price to the consumer should be increased in any way. In my opinion this whole matter should be taken care of by bonus and by subsidy, so that the cost to the consumer will not increase, but the price to the producer will be increased, so that he may have something in addition to his cost of production.

Sundries, $102,000.

Mr. REID: I do not know whether I might ask my question properly under this item, but for two years I have been endeavouring to get an answer from the Minister of Finance in connection with the 10 per cent discount on Canadian funds as against the United States dollar. It has been stated on fairly good authority by people in the United States that this is a matter entirely for the Canadian government. The United States is perfectly willing that our dollar should be equal to their dollar in value. When one considers we are all in this war together, and that last year it cost us upwards of $50,000,000 to balance our accounts, I think it is time the minister gave some statement to the house and country as to why our dollar cannot be on a par with the United States dollar.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know that on one occasion the hon. member indicated that at a later stage in the session he would ask me for a statement in respect of this matter. I must say however the matter is a most delicate one, and one does not like to make an impromptu statement. I am not prepared to make one to-day. The only position I can take, when people talk about exchange between Canada and the United States, is a perfectly non-committal one, because any indication of what might or might not happen can be used so widely both by hon. members and by the public in both countries. It is not a matter about which I should like to say very much. I might point out however that naturally a change in the final exchange rate would cause a vast amount of dislocation. I cannot myself see how it would affect the position of the Dominion of Canada as a whole, in any way. A change in the rate of exchange would certainly affect the position of many industries; some would be benefited and others would be injured. But it seems to me that from the point of view of the whole nation, stability is more important than the exchange rate being at any particular level.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What would the effect be, on balance? Would we not derive a benefit?

Mr. ILSLEY: My knowledge of economics may be bad, but I should think that if exports were roughly equivalent to imports there would be no balance, one way or another.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not exactly what I had in mind. I agree with the minister when he says that stability is the most important factor, from every point of view. Those who are engaged in business and who understand what this means will agree I am sure with the policy of the government and its advisers, namely that there shall be stability. But I have often wondered, and have interrogated several people who ought to know, why there should be this arbitrary ten per cent one way and eleven per cent the other. I have never gone to officials of the department, because I never felt free to do so, but I have wondered why these arbitrary percentages were established so early, and have been so rigidly adhered to. There must have been some basis for their establishment, but I do not think the reasons have ever been made public. I am not using the word "arbitrary" in any critical sense, nor am I offering any condemnation. But why the ten per cent and eleven per cent were so rigidly adhered to I cannot say. As a matter of fact the quotations show that the true rate has not always been stable. It has varied, as it did on previous occasions. But for the action of the Canadian government, in fixing it at an arbitrary rate, the rate at one time might be much higher and at another much lower. I agree that stability is all important. If the balance of trade were adverse, then of course we would have to pay for it in various ways. But if the balance of trade is somewhere nearly even, surely then the exchange rate should approach something like the equilibrium of trade. I believe the Canadian people would like to have from the minister an explanation of the reason for the inflexibility of the rate, having regard to changed conditions.

There was a time when we were told that the situation was precarious and dangerous. Then we were told that as a result of government policy and transactions which had taken place between the two countries, that situation had eased off. I should hope that that would be the position to-day. To most people, perhaps I should say uninformed people there does not seem to be any real good reason for this rigid and arbitrary rate. I invite the minister to make an explanation to the people as to why this policy is in effect.

Mr. REID: The hon. member for York-Sunbury referred to trading balances. In the speech I delivered at this session I gave exact figures of imports and exports. On a comparison of imports with exports there was a differential of $45,000,000 in last year's trading account. While stability has been given as a reason why this cannot be adjusted, that has not always been the reason given in past years. I can remember that at one time we were told that gold had something to do with it, in the days when we were on a gold standard. Then, again, we heard that it was the balance of trade, more Canadian dollars being sold on the world exchange. Now we hear from the Minister of Finance that it is stability. But if we are losing $45,000,000 a year, I think it is about time we received a complete answer. There may be a reason for it, but we have not been told what it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: Ten per cent was set because that was the market at the time. During the early days of the war the Canadian dollar went down in terms of United States dollars until the United States dollar was at about ten per cent premium. It was at that stage that the foreign exchange control board was set up. It was set up on September 15, 1939, shortly after the outbreak of the war, and it froze the exchange rate at ten per cent, which was just about the market rate at the time. The question is asked: Why is it adhered to? The answer is the same as the answer I gave to the question as to why has it not been changed, and why has it not been reduced. Stability is an extremely important thing, more important perhaps than anything else. If anyone can point out to me any national gain that would be made by reducing the spread, then the matter could be considered, but I think for every national gain there would be a national loss. I do not think the nation as a whole loses anything or is impoverished in any way by having these currencies in their present relation one to the other. While I am prepared to admit that a change would benefit certain industries, it would hurt other industries. The result of the whole thing would be dislocation and the necessity for readjustments. I do not want to talk about any particular industry, but it would be a blow to the newsprint industry to change this. If our friends in the west get to exporting quite a lot of grain to the United States, it would hurt them. The exporting industries would lose, at least at the outset, and the importing industries would gain. To the extent to which the government is an importer, the government would gain. To the extent to which interest is being paid, the persons paying the interest would gain. We do know that stability is a good thing for a nation, and when we try to balance the gains and losses against each other it is pretty hard to know what conclusion to come to.

Mr. QUELCH: So long as Canada is competing with other countries whose currencies are far below that of Canada, it would hardly pay us to appreciate our dollar. It does seem to me that exchange should be based upon what a dollar will buy. If the Canadian dollar will buy a hundred units in this country, and the American dollar will buy only ninety units in the United States, then the Canadian dollar is really worth more. As I understand it, at the present time our price level is lower than the price level in the United States, so that in reality the Canadian dollar is worth more than the United States dollar because it buys more goods. I am not advocating that the exchange rate should be washed out so long as we have to compete with countries like Australia and South Africa whose currencies are depreciated below ours; to do that would place us at a disadvantage.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before the minister leaves his estimates there are one or two matters I should like to call to his attention, and I do this without opening up any matters which were previously closed. I do not expect him to give an answer immediately; I want to leave these with him and he may have an opportunity later of answering them. During a previous debate he informed me that he would look into the matter of the differentiation in the sugar ration for canning purposes in the United States and Canada. At that time I sent the minister a newspaper article referring to the ration in the United States, and since then I have been informed that there is a programme three times a week over the national broadcasting network of the United States, which refers to a maximum of twenty-five pounds of sugar per person for canning purposes. I merely leave this with the minister, because I do not want to open up the discussion.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: While we are on the question of exchange I should like to call the attention of the minister to a number of representations I have received from imperial war veterans. I am informed that the value of the English pound sterling has depreciated by about 43 cents in Canadian funds, and this adversely affects imperial veterans' pensions, amounting in some cases to a loss of about $2 a month. This may not seem a great deal to a government dealing in billions of dollars a month, but to the imperial war pensioners it is of some value. I understand that some years ago an attempt was made by the Canadian government to offset this, but nothing came of it. Has anything been done recently, or can anything be done to enable these men to receive their pensions in Canadian funds?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Surely that would not be a responsibility of this government; it is a responsibility of the United Kingdom government, and we must keep our jurisdictions separate.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Some few days ago the minister was good enough to suggest that he would look into a question with regard to the auditor general's certificate in connection with revenues received. I intimated to him that a slight change had been made since 1937, and he indicated that he would probably make a reply. I will put on the record the observations I have in mind. At the present time the certificate reads:

> In accordance with the provision of section 45, subsection 1 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, I have satisfied myself that the above revenue for 1941-42 has been fully accounted for.

That is to say, the revenue referred to in the auditor general's report. Since 1937 the auditor general does not go behind that. In other days the certificate was that all revenues were being fully accounted for. The way we are set up now, with the comptroller of the treasury taking in the accounts from the different departments, the auditor general cannot go behind that and check on the accounts receivable or the accruals. The result is that the auditor general's report has not nearly the value it had previously. I raised this question some three or four days ago and I was hoping that either the parliamentary assistant or the minister would make a statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no recollection of the hon. gentleman raising it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I raised the question of there being a lag in the audit, and referred to the fact that the terms of the certificate did not cover all revenues, that they covered only the revenues actually in the auditor general's report.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not get any information about it. I do not know why the form was changed, but perhaps I can get that information and give it to my hon. friend on the main estimates.

Item agreed to.

Auditor general's office—Audit of war expenditure, $281,500.

Mr. HARRIS: I raised a question which might properly come under this item, I think, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, if I had the information here. The main estimates will be coming on later, and then I will have the information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There has been a controversy with respect to the powers of the auditor general. The matter was raised by me in the public accounts committee, and we took some evidence. We had the auditor general and the comptroller of the treasury before us, but the inquiry is incomplete because we did not have time to finish it. A controversy arose in days gone by in respect to this matter of the auditing of accounts, as the minister knows probably much better than I do. The correspondence is referred to, I think, in the auditor general's report. We had a statement from the auditor general in the public accounts committee as to his jurisdiction in certain matters, but I think this is a matter which ought to be studied further by the public accounts committee and by the members of the house. I do not want to delay the committee by entering into a discussion now, but there is some question as to the legal authority of the auditor general under the Consolidated Audit and Revenue Act. The question was raised, I think, by Mr. Gonthier after he became auditor general, and the justice department has given an opinion adverse to the position taken by the auditor general. I think this matter might well be a subject of further review by the minister during the recess, if he ever has time to look into it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I looked at the submission of the auditor general to the public accounts committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not saying that we agreed with it at all, but we had it before us. There is another side to the story, and we were not able to get it.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Pensions branch—treatment and pensions examinations—members and ex-members of the defence forces (present war), $4,225,000.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to say something with regard to the insurance principle. I endeavoured to say something on the subject when the estimates of the Department of National Defence were before us. The two departments are closely associated. The question, of course really comes under the department of pensions.

A person who volunteers for service must obey orders and serve where instructed, whether it be overseas or in Canada. With respect to the men serving overseas the present Pension Act may be considered fairly satisfactory, although there are some difficulties which are probably due to interpretation, more especially in the case of widowed mothers. But the Pension Act is anything but satisfactory so far as our men on active service in Canada are concerned.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but there is another item for pensions. This item is for treatment.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Can we not have a general discussion on this item and then deal with the other items separately as we reach them?

The insurance principle in pensions originated during the last war. It was found necessary in order to prevent injustices which prevailed at that time. In 1919, when the Pension Act was first enacted, the insurance principle was included after due deliberation by the parliament of Canada. A few years after the last war, as a result I believe of the urgings of ex-service men's organizations, a commission was set up headed by the then Colonel Ralston, now the Minister of National Defence. That commission sat for a couple of years and after a great deal of work recommended that the insurance principle should be restored and applied to all those who had served, and the Pension Act was amended accordingly.

At the outbreak of the present war the government pledged itself to apply all the benefits of the existing act including the insurance principle to those enlisting for active service. A special order in council was passed under the War Measures Act giving effect to this pledge. However, on May 21, 1940, the government changed its policy, repudiated its pledge, and definitely excluded from the benefit of the insurance principle all those whose service was in Canada only. True enough, provision has been made whereby a pension may be granted on compassionate grounds in cases of serious disability or death arising on service in Canada where those concerned are in necessitous circumstances. I do not think that that should be the law applying to all those who offered their services. But the fact remains that the benefits of the insurance principle have ever since May 21, 1940, been denied to those whose services in the present war have been in Canada only. Parliament later passed a bill which makes that the law. The pledge given by the government at the outset of this war should be lived up to. I think most people in this country believe in that principle. A soldier injured in Canada is discharged as soon as possible in order to get him off pay and allowances. He receives no pay or allowance while receiving hospital treatment, other than one dollar a month to purchase comforts.

There is also inadequacy of dependents' allowances and unfairness in the "means test" investigations under the present system. It is a downright shame that a widowed mother whose only son and support has volunteered for service overseas should have to submit to a means test in order to secure an additional amount of $5 a month over the $20 a month she is now allowed. She should not be put on a charity basis if her son was her only support before enlistment.

On June 18 an estimate was passed granting as of that date war widows' pensions. Provision was then made whereby a pension at the rate of $20 a month, might be awarded to war widows fifty-five years of age and in necessitous circumstances. While this is a step in the right direction, in my opinion these pensioners and the old age pensioners should receive at least one dollar a day or $30 per month.

I also think that provision should be made to give these widows free medical treatment on the same basis as treatment is now given to the recipients of the war veterans allowance. It will be realized that many of these widows are not able to earn other money to provide clothing for themselves and live on the present meagre allowance, and certainly they cannot pay medical and hospital expenses. Free treatment should be given them on the same basis on which it is given to recipients of the war veterans' allowance. If we cannot provide for these people and their dependents in these difficult times, I do not know how we are ever going to create this better world in the post-war period about which we hear so much and which people all over the world are studying, including a committee of this house. If we cannot set an example to men who have offered their all in defence of our way of life, it is difficult to see what the post-war period may bring forth.

I also think that there has not been proper coordination of medical man-power with respect to our civil and military needs. There is a serious handicap in many districts where the civilian population are not able to get proper medical attention. It would have a distinct bearing on the morale of those in the armed forces to-day if they were satisfied that their dependents were assured of proper medical attention when they need it. An effort should be made to establish greater cooperation between and coordination of medical services for the armed forces and the civilian population.

With respect to rehabilitation, some improvement could be made. Under present conditions the clothing allowance is not sufficient. With due respect to our price control board, everyone knows that you do not obtain the same value in purchasing clothing to-day as you received before the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is my hon. friend referring to the clothing allowance on discharge?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is a matter for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Well, much of the responsibility for rehabilitation falls upon the minister's department. As I said in the beginning, the two departments are so closely associated in these matters that it is sometimes difficult to separate them.

As I was saying, when a man is discharged nowadays he cannot purchase for the same money the type of clothes which he was used to when he enlisted. Probably the same price prevails, but you do not get the same quality. That fact should be taken into consideration.

I am also of opinion that there should be some difference, based on length of service, in respect of the allowances granted when a man is discharged. He should be allowed at least one month's pay and allowances for each year of service that he has rendered. I served on a committee which drafted a measure dealing with compulsory reemployment after the war. There were ambiguities about the bill which did not satisfy me; obviously some of the problems involved cannot be easily overcome. For instance it is not always possible for an employer to reengage all his old employees when they come back. In this connection I suggest that every man who comes back, especially if he has served in a theatre of war, should be granted a month's leave in order to visit his family, look around, and get his bearings. Then he should report back, and if there is not a suitable job for him, his pay and allowances should be continued until such time as he has received proper vocational training or is able to fill a proper job. Definite provision should be made in this respect.

In the matter of the welfare divisions which, I believe, are now operating through the country, great care should be taken to select suitable persons as chief officers of the various branches. They should be people with ex-service experience—I assume that in most cases, if not all, they are. They should have a human understanding of these difficult problems. When a man has seen active service overseas, particularly if he is a young airman, it is difficult to get him properly rehabilitated. All these officers, therefore, should be endowed with humanitarian understanding of such cases.

In the matter of hospitalization, all hospitals should be located in quiet areas, to avoid undue disturbance of our nerve-shattered ex-service men, and should be surrounded with proper grounds. Too often that is not the situation to-day. I am happy to say that in my native province we have a fine hospital in an admirable location. But that is not the case in many other sections of Canada. I am informed that generally speaking the surroundings are unsatisfactory. I believe that Christie Street hospital, Toronto, was originally a factory, and was taken over during the last war as temporary quarters. It is most unsuitable: on one side are the railway tracks, and on the other the street cars; it is in the midst of a manufacturing centre where there is tremendous noise at almost all times, and all the surrounding conditions are anything but conducive to the welfare of the patients. I do not believe that many improvements have been made to that hospital since the last war. I am informed that it is not properly staffed, that in some cases there are fifty to seventy-five men in a ward, that the ventilation is inadequate, the toilets and baths are practically the same as they were in 1918, and that there are many other defects. Such conditions as these are not good enough for those who have offered their all and as a result have become casualties. They are entitled to the best treatment and the most generous consideration possible. If we cannot provide fitting conditions for these casualties, it does not augur well for that post-war period of which we hope so much. I could spend a great deal of time discussing Christie Street hospital, but the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, who himself was a war casualty and a patient in that hospital, knows something of the situation there and will speak on it. Also the hon. member for Parkdale, who is an eminent physician and surgeon and knows a great deal concerning this matter, will deal with it in greater detail.

I trust the minister will give some consideration to the points I have raised and those with which my colleagues will deal as we go along. The minister, being an ex-service man, is sympathetic. He may have his difficulties in these respects, but I trust he will take measures to alleviate conditions which are not satisfactory.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): I wish to say a few words with regard to pensions of returned men of the present war. I agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat that in the present Minister of Pensions and National Health we have one who is sympathetic to the men and who gives prompt attention to any cases which are brought to his notice. Nevertheless I am afraid there are still some in his department, dealing with matters of pensions, of men now returning from overseas in the manner in which many such cases have been dealt with since the close of the last war, who have not the humanitarian views that he has.

I have two cases in particular which I wish to bring to the minister's attention and which, I think, bear out this contention. One is the case of a young man who was called up in Saskatchewan and who was suffering from stomach ulcers. He told the doctor of his condition when he was called; nevertheless he was ordered to report for military training, and did so. In the course of about three months because of the more violent exercises which he had in the army, and the change in his diet, he was hospitalized, remained in the hospital for a considerable period of time, and was discharged. When he returned home he again had to be hospitalized twice. The third time he was examined by his local doctor, who stated that his condition was so serious that he did not think an operation could be performed in the local hospital and recommended that he be taken to Winnipeg. His mother accompanied him there, and he was placed in a hospital and put under the care of a specialist who was recommended by his local doctor. His position was brought to the attention of the pension officers in Winnipeg, and they visited his mother in the hospital and asked that he be transferred to Deer Lodge hospital and placed under other medical attention. You can realize the position of that mother, with her son in a serious condition, in hospital in a city some five hundred miles from her own home, and having had a certain doctor recommended to her by her own physician. Naturally she wished to have the operation performed by the doctor who had been recommended; nevertheless these officials insisted that if she was to receive any assistance she would have to consent to the patient's removal to the other hospital. The result was that under this pressure she agreed. They said they would not accept the responsibility, so far as hospitalization and the operation were concerned. The operation was performed in Winnipeg General hospital. The minister's officials wrote to the department that the lady was quite satisfied with this arrangement, but immediately upon her return home she wrote me an entirely different letter. I cannot understand how she would say that she was entirely satisfied on February 23, and on March 23, on reaching home, write to me stating that under the circumstances—I would not say she had been forced, but certainly pressure had been brought to bear which she could not resist—she had agreed, because she had already paid $40 as a deposit on hospitalization in the Winnipeg General hospital.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I have the name privately?

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes. I do not think that is a fair way to treat men who have been discharged from our services. I have another case of the kind, though it is slightly different. A man returned from overseas where he had become a mental case. He was sent to Canada and placed in Ste. Anne de Bellevue hospital. His papers were lost, his people did not know where he had disappeared to, and the mother's share of his pay, which had been going to her regularly, ceased, and she received no further communications from her son. She wrote to me with regard to the matter and I took it up and found that this man was a mental case. I went to the hospital, and in conversation with the doctor in charge, as well as with the patient, I found that he was getting very fair attention, but the doctor stated that his case was such that, in his opinion, insulin treatment would have beneficial results. He informed me, however, that there were no facilities for giving such treatment at that hospital and that he would endeavour to have this man sent to Saskatchewan to one of the mental institutions there, where this treatment might be given. I pointed out to the doctor at the time that these institutions in Saskatchewan are filled to the doors, and that there is no room for patients there. It is a shame that our men returning in such a condition should not have the best treatment that science can give. It is something that should be taken up.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): These facilities are now being installed in Ste. Anne's hospital.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am glad to hear that, because it is certainly necessary. With regard to this particular chap, I had a letter yesterday which I have sent on to the minister and I know it will receive his attention. As proof of what I am saying with regard to certain officials, this man's mother received a letter the other day stating that the hospital authorities were of the opinion that if the man were returned to his native village under familiar conditions he might be better off than he would be in the hospital where he was, but that she would have to sign a form which would free the authorities from any responsibility, not only with regard to his conduct, but with regard to pension. If that is correct, it is a matter that should be looked into. These men returning from overseas should be given sympathetic attention and treatment in this country, and I hope that the minister will see that the officials in his department give that attention and that treatment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Has my hon. friend sent me that case?

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, I did. I sent it either yesterday or this morning. With regard to widows' pensions, we have an act whereby the widows of men who served in the last war and who are receiving pensions, or receiving benefits under the war veterans' allowance provisions, will receive consideration. I think that this should be extended to all widows of veterans of the last war, not only to those who are receiving pensions and those who are receiving war veterans' allowance, but to any who are in necessitous circumstances. We can well afford to take care of the widows of men who served in the last war, who find themselves in such circumstances to-day. They are all advanced in years, for the most part fifty-five or fifty-six, and the department might well consider granting a reasonable pension to all widows who are in necessitous circumstances to-day.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I wish to make a few remarks dealing with two subjects. First, I join in what the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) has said in connection with the insurance principle as it relates to soldiers' pensions. He outlined briefly when and why the change was made, by which soldiers injured while on furlough in Canada would not be entitled to the benefit of pension. It is hard to understand why the department has adopted this arbitrary condition regarding pension to a soldier who is injured while on furlough in Canada, because if he were injured on furlough while serving beyond Canada he would receive the benefit of the pension act. To-day there must be many soldiers in Canada who were injured while on furlough. I know personally of a number of men in Christie Street hospital who have been injured while on leave; they have been in motor car accidents and some have lost a leg or an arm or other parts of the body. Some of them are in very bad condition. Not only are these unfortunate soldiers not eligible to receive the benefits of the act, but soon after their misfortune they are discharged from the army, thereby losing their pay and allowances. It is quite true that the soldier continues to receive medical and hospital treatment as long as his injuries demand it, but in the meantime he is drawing no pay or allowances. It would seem to me only fair and reasonable that any soldier who has the misfortune to be injured while on leave, and who is not entitled to pension, should at least continue to receive pay and allowances until such time as he is discharged from the hospital. Take for instance the soldiers at Christie Street hospital who were injured in motor car accidents and who have since been discharged from the army. These men are drawing no pay and allowances. I understand that the only allowance they draw is $1.75 a month, which is granted them for hospital comforts. If that is wrong I hope the minister will correct me. When I heard of this condition, which seemed almost unbelievable, I took the trouble to consult an official of the department stationed at Christie Street, and he confirmed the fact that a soldier in hospital not eligible for pension, who had his pay and allowances cut off on being discharged from the army, would draw $1.75 a month.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is my hon. friend familiar with the new regulations applying on and after the 1st of May this year? They have entirely changed that.

Mr. WHITE: How much is he drawing now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The same as the rehabilitation benefits. I will deal with that in detail later, but they are substantially larger than my hon. friend says.

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister say how much he would draw in a lump sum while he is in the hospital?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If he is single he would get $10.20 a week, and if married $14.40, plus allowances for his children.

Mr. WHITE: Is that paid while the soldier is in hospital, or after his discharge from hospital?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is paid to his family while he is in hospital.

Mr. WHITE: But take the case of an unmarried soldier in Christie street hospital. While he is in hospital, drawing no pay and allowance, what does the government give him, if anything, over and above the $1.75 per month I have mentioned?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is the case referred to by the hon. member that of a discharged man or of a man still in the service?

Mr. WHITE: It is the case of a discharged man still receiving hospital treatment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He gets $10.20 a week.

Mr. WHITE: When did that start?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On May 1 of this year.

Mr. WHITE: I am very glad to hear that, because it seemed to me a most disgraceful condition that a soldier could be sent to hospital and given only $1.75 a month. A country which can raise billions of dollars a year for war purposes should be able to provide pensions for all soldiers who are injured while in the armed forces. I think the minister would be among the first to agree that any court of law would hold the department responsible to some extent for a soldier injured while on leave. Take the case of a soldier in Ottawa going on leave to Toronto, who is injured in a motor car accident. If that soldier had not been in the army he would not have been in the city of Ottawa; he would not have been on the highway between Ottawa and Toronto, and therefore he would not have been there at the time the accident occurred. Even though a soldier is on leave he is subject to recall at any time, and it seems to me a most decided hardship that a soldier who, through no fault of his own, is at a certain spot at a certain time and thereby is injured in an accident, as a result of which he is discharged from the army as soon as possible, is given only hospital and medical treatment, and he and his family receive no pension.

To illustrate what I mean, last Sunday in the small village in which I live a sergeant-major home on forty-eight hours' leave had the misfortune to be drowned. He left a widow and one child. As I understand the regulations, since that man was on leave or furlough his widow and child would not be entitled to any of the benefits of the Pension Act. I understand there are certain provisions under which a pension may be granted on compassionate grounds, or under section 11 (3) of the act, but that is only of a temporary nature. My understanding of that provision is that it is not permanent, that it is a pension granted only a short time and as a charitable gesture, while it is subject to review at any time. I suggest to the minister that this is not good enough. Take the case of this unfortunate soldier who was drowned last Sunday. Surely his wife and child should not be placed in the position of having to accept charity. I submit that in this case the widow and child should receive all the benefits of the Pension Act. A moment ago the minister said the clothing allowance was not under his department. I do not know whether the rehabilitation grant is under his department or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not the grant given at the time of discharge, but the rehabilitation benefits are under this department.

Mr. WHITE: Then I should like to tell the minister that the conditions which exist at the present time, under which an amount equal to a month's pay is granted, are entirely inadequate.

I should like to say a word about Christie Street hospital in Toronto. During the past few weeks various articles have appeared in the press, and no doubt most hon. members have received a document from the soldiers' organization, dealing with conditions at the Christie Street hospital. These articles in the press have been prompted by an announcement by the department that an addition is to be erected to this building in the near future. I should say to the committee that any remarks I make in regard to Christie Street hospital are not based on information contained in these various newspaper reports but are made as a result of my personl observations and visits to this hospital. I was a patient there for some time in 1919, and from that time until 1939 I visited the hospital on various occasions. Since November, 1942, I have been at the hospital twelve different times. To-day this hospital is in much the same condition as it was when I was a patient there in 1919. It is the same old factory building that was taken over by the government at the end of the last war, to meet a temporary emergency. Since that time it has been patched up in various ways; additions have been constructed, and so on, but the same overcrowding exists to-day that existed in 1919, except that it has been considerably intensified. It still has the same large, barren, poorhouse type of wards, with lovely old steel girders exposed, with wiring and plumbing running across the ceiling, and so on, for the sick patients to stare at day and night. There is no system of ventilation or air conditioning; perhaps those are luxuries which we cannot supply to our soldiers. Many of these wards have large glass windows facing south, east and west, and most of these windows are without awnings. I was at Christie Street hospital last week. Anyone who has been in Toronto in hot weather will agree that there is no hotter place in Canada, but in that hospital I saw many boys in bed, seriously ill, with the sun streaming through these large glass windows without awnings, with only blinds to keep out the bright light.

I have been in various hospitals in England and Canada, but in my experience I have never seen a place so depressing, so drab and cheerless as the wards at Christie Street hospital. There is not a single bright spot of cheer in any ward. The beds are crammed tightly together in very large wards, and generally there is a second row of beds up and down the centre of the floor. Some wards have from sixty to eighty patients, and I doubt if such conditions would be permitted in many public wards in civilian hospitals since the time of Cromwell. Such things as easy chairs, chesterfields and so on just do not exist. In some of the wards the hardwood floors creak every time anyone walks across them, and the effect on a very sick patient of these floors creaking continually can be readily imagined. I know of boys in that hospital who have been seriously ill, boys who have undergone very serious operations and who, immediately after, have been placed in wards containing from four to six beds, while others have been placed in wards containing from thirty to fifty beds. I understand there is no such thing as a private nurse for any patient at Christie Street hospital, no matter how sick he may be. The entire hospital is understaffed so far as doctors, nurses and orderlies are concerned, and it is only because of the great and tireless efforts put forth by the staff that the hospital has been able to carry on. But each doctor and each nurse has only one pair of hands, and any visitor to that hospital can soon see that with the hundreds of patients there, a great deal of care and nursing attention is required. The hospital is overcrowded in every way. As I said before, it is greatly understaffed. On my visit last week-end I saw a young boy who had a very serious operation on Friday of last week. He did not have a private nurse, because private nurses are not supplied. And on Saturday morning, while he was in a very highly—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but private nurses are supplied frequently at Christie Street hospital. The fact is that there were 613 vacant beds on June 30 of this year.

Mr. WHITE: Early on Saturday morning this young boy was there, in a delirious condition, and, while no one was attending him, he got out of his bed. Fortunately he was stopped by another patient before anything serious happened. I was glad to hear the minister say that there are private nurses at Christie Street hospital. Will he tell the committee how often soldiers are provided with private nursing accommodation at that hospital?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): At any time a particular condition requires it.

Mr. WHITE: Has the minister any record of the number of times each month private nurses are supplied to soldiers, and for how long?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have not that information with me, but I shall get it for the hon. member.

Mr. WHITE: I should be interested in seeing it. The toilets and washrooms in the hospital on the third floor are simply a disgrace. On one floor, the third, with at least eighty to a hundred patients, there are four toilets and a bathtub. This is the same equipment that was there at the time of the last war. If there are any shower baths on the floor, I did not see them. The elevators look to be the same old freight elevators that were installed when the building was used as a factory. They are very large and clumsy and slow. In a case of fire these slow, clumsy elevators would be of little assistance in facilitating the removal of patients who are considered bad cases. The staircases, which are quite wide, are in the centre of the building. Probably that is not the best location for them, in the event of fire. Whether the building is fireproof or not, I cannot say, but I did observe that there are many things in the building which would burn.

The hospital lacks recreation rooms, or rooms where soldiers may visit with their mothers, sisters or lady friends. The word "privacy" is unknown in this hospital. There are no grounds where the patients can rest outside, on days such as this one when the temperature is very high. There are no trees affording deep shade. The hospital is close to the tracks of the Canadian Pacific railway, where plenty of noise is provided both day and night. On days such as this, when most of the windows in the hospital are open, a cloud of soot and smoke comes through the windows every time trains pass. There are many other factories in the district, all of which add to the quiet of the hospital by their steady noise, day and night. From the hospital window one can easily see the factory buildings of the Dominion Bridge company, which are located only a few blocks west of the hospital. This factory operates day and night and patients in the hospital can easily hear the noise at all times. Street cars are only a short block away. In fact there is not one good feature or one good thing that can be said of the present location of the hospital. At its best it was only a temporary makeshift arrangement, taken over at the time of the last war. But through the years it has been patched up and added to, until to-day it is a patchwork with many additions and rambling buildings. If the addition now proposed is proceeded with, it will mean that Christie Street hospital will remain in its present location for many years to come, and that many boys who are now serving overseas will in the years ahead spend many dreary days and nights in this old ramshackle factory building. I suggest to the minister, who, I admit, has always taken a keen interest in soldier affairs, and has always given his most sympathetic attention to their grievances, that at this time, before the new addition is started, he should see that a survey is made to ascertain whether or not other locations can be found, either in Toronto or immediately adjacent thereto, where an entirely new hospital can be provided. It should have plenty of space, green grass, plenty of trees, running streams, sunlight, air free from dust and dirt and smoke of trains, and it should be a place free from noise and the eternal clatter which surrounds Christie Street hospital. I think the minister will agree that Canada must do better for her soldiers than to provide them with treatment in a place such as this hospital. In my opinion it is not good enough for the boys who are serving overseas.

At each session hon. members in all parties outline the very fine things they wish to do for the rehabilitation and reestablishment of the soldiers who return from overseas. Yet when we are dealing with disabled, crippled and wounded returned soldiers, instead of giving them the best in the country we are content to place them in a building which at best could be classed as no better than third or fourth grade accommodation. The various defence departments since the beginning of the war have built some first-class buildings and camps. Anyone who has been through the air force training centre at Trenton, or the Vimy barracks at Kingston, just outside the city of Kingston, or anyone who has seen pictures of the fine new naval building at Cornwallis, Nova Scotia, or has been through any of the fine training centres established from coast to coast, will realize that these buildings are most satisfactory in every respect. It is right that they should be. But they were all built for the purpose of training men for war. Surely if the defence department can spend so much money on buildings of this kind, it is not asking too much to ask the Department of Pensions and National Health to provide an entirely new hospital for men who will need it in the years to come.

Much has been said this session about the purchase of rugs, chesterfields and office chairs. Perhaps they were needed in the places in which they were located. But a few of those chesterfields distributed around Christie Street hospital would not be amiss. To-day at the hospital there are many boys who served at Dieppe. It is a disgrace to Canada to have to admit that the best possible accommodation that can be supplied to the heroes home from Dieppe is space in an old factory building like Christie Street hospital. One can easily imagine the feelings of any mother who goes to visit her son for the first time on his return from overseas after being wounded, and finds him in a place with the atmosphere of this hospital.

I appeal most sincerely to the minister to give his serious consideration to the question of the addition to Christie Street hospital. If the department insists upon going ahead with this addition, and insists that the hospital must remain in its present position, then I can only say to the minister that at some time in the future, public demand and clamour will be so great against Christie Street hospital and the conditions existing there that the government in power, no matter what the party may be, will be forced to build a new hospital in some other location.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall confine my remarks at this time to one matter. I join with others who have referred to the subject with which I wish to deal, and I do so because of the minister's kindness yesterday in giving an interview to ladies who represent the people on behalf of whom I should like now to say a few words. I refer to the widows of veterans of the last war, for whom a special allowance was provided by this house on June 18. I understand that certain matters were brought to the attention of the minister yesterday, and no doubt he has had time to think them over. My hope is that he may be able to make some statement this afternoon with respect to three points which I should like to bring to his attention.

Before I do so, I should like to take a minute to offer a word of appreciation to the minister, or to the person responsible, for action taken on June 21. Hon. members will recall that on June 18, when we were discussing the appropriation of $400,000 for this purpose, I along with others had a great deal to say about the effective date of the payment. I was most insistent that it should be made retroactive to April 1. The minister sympathized with my point of view, but found it impossible that night to promise that my request would be met. However, when the order in council was passed on June 21 setting out the regulations under which these payments will be made, it included a provision for making the payments retroactive to April 1, although this was left to the discretion of the war veterans' allowance board. Like other hon. members I am still not satisfied with the amount, a mere $20 a month, but I am grateful for the action taken on June 21.

Mr. MacNICOL: On a point of order, is the matter now being discussed by the hon. member in order? I want to say something on this myself, but I did not see anything in the list that would permit me to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think it has been the custom with all departments to permit a general discussion before the first item is specifically dealt with, and I understand that that is the practice we are following this afternoon.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was particularly anxious that the minister should answer these questions that I intend to put to him, because the ladies representing the women affected by this grant are in Ottawa at the present time, and it would mean a great deal to them if they could take the right word back to their organizations.

The first matter I should like to speak about is the administration of these allowances. It would mean a great deal to the administration if ladies representing what is known as the non-pensioned widows' associations could be given some say. I should like to see this representation just as effective as it possibly can be. I should like to see these women represented on whatever board is set up to administer these allowances. If there are technicalities which prevent the government from going that far, I trust that the minister will devise some means whereby ladies who represent the members of this organization, as well as those who are not members, may have some say in this matter. These women have been dealing with the problems of their fellow women for many years. They have at heart their interests, and, as I say, it would mean a great deal to the administration of the act if they had some effective representation. I believe it was the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) who emphasized on June 18 that the success of a venture such as this would depend largely upon the administration. I hope that the minister, as a result of the thought he has given to this matter during the last few days, may be able to tell us that these women will be given representation in the administration of these special allowances.

The second matter about which I hope the minister may say something has been referred to already, I believe by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). It is the question of hospitalization for the women who will receive these special allowances. So far as I can discover no provision has been made as yet, unless the reference in the order in council of June 21 to the provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act covers this phase. If it does, I hope the minister will say so; if it does not, I hope he will give us some assurance that such provision will be made.

The third point about which I hope the minister will have something to say relates to the necessity, as I see it, of providing a larger sum of money out of which payments may be made to those who are to receive this special assistance. On June 18 the minister gave us a figure of between 1,800 and 1,900 women who were on the list of the department awaiting the passing of this grant.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I recollect aright, I said that the estimate made by the officials of the department of the number who would qualify immediately or almost immediately was 1,839.

Mr. KNOWLES: In any case the $400,000 which has been voted will provide $20 a month for only about 1,800 women.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is probably the basis of the estimate.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hon. members will realize that in various parts of the country there are many women who are deserving of this consideration, and that their number must greatly exceed 1,800. I hope the minister can give us assurance that if the department finds that there are going to be more than 1,800 women who will qualify, a supplementary item will be brought down to cover the additional women.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The first point raised by the hon. member was as to the possibility of giving definite authority to some of these women's organizations in the administration of these allowances. I do not think it would be feasible for the government to escape complete responsibility for the administration. I have told these ladies, and I think I have indicated also to my hon. friend, that we should be very glad to avail ourselves of their services in an advisory capacity in the various districts. The procedure adopted is to refer these cases to what we call the local war veterans' committees, which I believe consist of the district administrator and two or three others. We should be most happy to have the cooperation of these women on these local committees, or to have them bring to our attention any cases of unfairness which should receive immediate attention. I do not think at the moment we can very well escape complete responsibility for the administration.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister try to see to it that these local committees to which he has referred get in touch with these women right at the start? The point I should like to emphasize is that it would be a much happier arrangement if these women were brought in at the start, rather than later on when certain grievances may have grown up.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to see that instructions are sent out to the local committees to extend the utmost cooperation to the various women's organizations.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not only to extend it, but to solicit it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The second point raised by my hon. friend was in connection with hospitalization. The men who qualify for war veterans' allowances are entitled only to examination and not to treatment. I do not know of any country in the world that provides hospital treatment for the dependents of its soldiers. In reply to the third question as to the amount of the appropriation, steps will be taken if necessary to see that the amount is ample to meet the cases which come to our attention.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I am going to deal with only one phase of the work of the Department of Pensions and National Health. It is with respect to a matter that has already been dealt with very effectively by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White). He has spoken of the situation that exists in the Christie Street hospital, from the point of view of a patient who spent several years there. I can only speak of it from the point of view of one who has frequently visited the hospital and has also been made aware of many complaints in regard to it over a period of many years.

To begin with, perhaps I had better refer to the number of petitions that have been sent in to the minister dealing with Christie Street hospital. One was sent by the Canadian Corps association. I shall not read the whole text, but I wish to refer to one or two items. They say among other things:

It is with the conclusion reached, that in war time adequate steps cannot be taken to effect a remedy, that we must take issue. In war time, when the need is most urgent, many seeming impossibilities may be accomplished with good will and energy. Since nothing was done during more than twenty years of peace, there can be no assurance that, with the conclusion of hostilities, the present situation will be corrected. The outlook is made still more uncertain when the proposal to build a new wing of permanent construction is considered.

Many hon. members will have received through the mail a letter from Mr. P. B. Mellon, honorary national secretary of the National Council of Veteran Associations in Canada. I shall not read the document but will refer to one or two passages. This letter was directed to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and it says in part:

At the meeting of the National Council of Veteran Associations in Canada, held to-day in Toronto with the following member organizations represented: The Canadian Corps Association, the Canadian Pensioners' Association of the Great War, the War Amputations of Canada, the Sir Arthur Pearson Association of War Blinded and the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada, I was directed to communicate to you the unanimously supported conclusions reached in respect to appropriate hospitalization of war casualties by the Department of Pensions and National Health.

His concluding words are these:

We are conscious of the duties and responsibilities devolving on us as citizens of Canada and as ex-soldiers. We cannot rest content and leave the wounded soldiers of to-day to the inadequate facilities and unfortunate surroundings of the present Christie street hospital. We believe you will understand and appreciate how strongly we feel in this matter and we earnestly hope that the evidences of your concern for the welfare of the men who have served as otherwise apparent will not be wanting in this instance.

I have put on the order paper a number of questions to which I should like now to refer. To one of them, regarding inspections, I have not yet received an answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): One appeared on the order paper to-day for the first time, so that naturally it could not have been answered by now.

Mr. BRUCE: Yes; the minister was not here the other day when I asked a question with respect to an inspection of this hospital, and whether regular inspections were made, and whether I might have a report of a recent inspection. I was particularly anxious to find out whether an inspection had been made with a view to determining the suitability of Christie Street hospital for the purposes for which it is at present being used, and as to its suitability as a permanent site for a hospital, and further as a site upon which the government would be justified in spending over $500,000 for additional buildings. I asked if such a report had been made, and if so, that the minister lay it on the table. Is there such a report?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to answer that now. A weekly report is made on every hospital under our jurisdiction. Recently a special investigation was made by four medical officers, three representing the defence services and one from our own staff, who went fully into the whole question of the availability of sites in Toronto, and it was on their recommendation that it was decided to proceed with the extension that has been authorized. But there was no written report to me by this interdepartmental committee.

Mr. BRUCE: Thank you. From what the minister has just said I assume that the responsibility for going ahead with this construction rests upon the report of this committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I may interrupt again, I am not able to approve any hospital project except on the recommendation, first of all, of the wartime hospital committee.

Mr. BRUCE: Would not the final responsibility for what is done rest on the minister's own shoulders?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes; undoubtedly.

Mr. BRUCE: Then the minister bears a terrible responsibility if he goes ahead with this project. A cursory examination of the Toronto city directory will show that there are from sixty to seventy factories immediately surrounding this hospital site. In the city of Toronto certain areas are set aside for certain purposes, and this particular area for a considerable distance around the hospital is set aside as a factory district. Any factory therefore may be built at any time in this district around the hospital. To erect further additions upon the already overcrowded grounds of this hospital site, as the minister proposes, is to disregard what is due to our soldiers who have returned wounded and maimed after defending us against the most cruel barbarism.

I should like to refer to some answers to questions that I received a few days ago. I asked:

What factories or industries are located outside the Christie Street hospital within a radius of half a mile, (a) to the west of the hospital; (b) to the south of the hospital; (c) to the north of the hospital?

The answer to that question was:

Not on record within the department.

If what the minister has just told us is true, that an inspection has recently been made by certain officers who have reported favourably on the suitability of this site for an addition to the hospital, surely they have been derelict in their duty if they have not reported to the minister that this hospital is surrounded by factories.

Mr. MacNICOL: And coal yards.

Mr. BRUCE: Yes; not only factories but coal yards, and immediately adjoining, to the south, is a double-track railway, within seventy-five feet of the building, I am told, although the return says 115 feet. I shall come to that in a moment. Then I ask:

4. Do any of these factories operate continuously day and night?

The answer is, "yes".

The fifth question is: "If so, how many?" and the answer is, "No information". Will anyone argue that an inspection of this district is a proper inspection when that important information is not disclosed? Surely it would be the simplest thing in the world to find out whether any of these factories operate at night. As a matter of fact the nearest factory on the west operates day and night.

Mr. MacNICOL: Seven days a week.

Mr. BRUCE: Seven days a week, as I will mention in a moment.

6. Does any factory work at night with the help of donkey engines and searchlights?

The answer is:

The department has no knowledge of donkey engines or searchlights being used at any plant in the proximity of the hospital. An overhead crane, in use by a nearby plant, does not make enough noise to cause any interference, and the neuropsychiatrist states that the sleep of the patients is not disturbed thereby.

The first part of that answer, in fact the whole of it, is contrary to the information which I have received. These searchlights are used in the proximity of the hospital; there is a crane which works at night, and a donkey engine which operates it, and the noise does cause such interference to the patients who sleep in the psychiatric wards that many of them are forced to go home and sleep in the afternoon—at least those who live in the city of Toronto and can do so—to get more sleep.

Mr. HOWDEN: The donkey engines the hon. member mentions are switch engines, I presume?

Mr. BRUCE: I suppose so—engines which operate the crane. These are in the McGregor McIntyre yard adjoining the hospital. I asked in question 7 if the neurological wards were on the west side of the hospital. The answer is, "yes". Question 8 is:

If so, what distance are those wards from the nearest factory or industry?

The answer is: "Over the fence." Just the other side of the fence! And yet we are told that these factories, operating in the way which I have described, can cause no interference with or disturbance of the patients in those wards. That answer to me, as a medical man, is incomprehensible.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is based on a report of two doctors who live there.

Mr. BRUCE: All right; I get a very different story when I go home to Toronto.

9. Have any complaints been made of the patients in these neurological wards not being able to sleep at nights because of the noise from these factories or industries?

The answer is:

No complaints have been received by the department.

I asked if complaints have been received. They say, no. Well, that may be so, but if they have not received any, the department has not read the newspapers in Toronto, because letters from patients and friends have appeared on a number of occasions in the press of the city, complaining of this very thing.

11. Are casualties from the present war placed in the wards with chronic invalids from the last war?

The answer is "yes."

12. If so, does the Department of National Health consider this a satisfactory and proper arrangement?

The answer is:

The only satisfactory distribution of patients (and the practice in general hospitals) is on the basis of their illness or injury, with the proviso that casualties of the present war are housed by themselves whenever expedient.

Unfortunately it does not happen to be expedient to house them by themselves very often in the Christie Street hospital. I have had numerous complaints from friends of patients, young men returned wounded in this war, who were placed in a bed adjoining a chronic helpless invalid who has slept in that bed for the last twenty years. I wonder if that has not a depressing effect upon the young wounded man who has just returned. I leave it to medical men who are in the house if it would not also militate against the recovery of that patient.

The minister has already answered another question, having to do with the personnel of the wartime committee on hospitalization, which has had the responsibility of investigating this site and reporting upon it. These answers clearly show a pathetic ignorance of the real facts concerning Christie street as a site for a hospital—facts which could have been obtained in a few hours by a competent investigator. In view of the minister's insistence upon this site, I cannot believe that he has ever visited the hospital himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes; several times.

Mr. BRUCE: Well, he is observant and humane, and I do not understand, if he has visited it, why he would still insist upon continuing this monstrosity.

After what has been said so well by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough I can skip a good deal of what I had intended to say, because he has covered the ground. This building, as he has stated, was originally a factory. It was taken over during the last war and converted as an emergency measure for the purposes of temporarily housing casualties arriving at that time. The building is of mill construction, with the extra fire hazard which attaches to this type of building. It was never intended to be a permanent military hospital. The neurological wards, as I mentioned a moment ago, are on the west side next to the steel company's yards. Even the patients on the south side of the hospital are disturbed at night because of the noise of the trains passing a few feet below the building. There is very little space to enable the patients to get out and enjoy fresh air and sunshine, and if other buildings are put up adjoining the present ones they will still further curtail the grounds which are necessary and should be available for patients occupying beds in this hospital to enable them to get outdoors, particularly in the good weather of the summer and autumn.

Although the accommodation provided for veterans of the last war has been inadequate and unsatisfactory, I should like to say here that any criticism which I make does not apply to the medical or surgical staff of this hospital, which has been a most efficient one. I think we have at Christie Street hospital some of the best skilled surgical specialists to be found anywhere, and they are doing extraordinarily good work under very difficult conditions.

I am at a loss to know why the minister seeks to perpetuate a situation which for a quarter of a century has been only an unsatisfactory makeshift. I do not agree with him when he says that it would not be possible under the conditions which pertain during the war to provide better care, for the patients for whom his department is responsible, than is available at Christie Street hospital. The erection of a new building on another site, where there would be ample grounds for recreation and fresh air in pleasing surroundings away from factories and trains, can proceed with great speed, as has been shown by the erection of other buildings during war time, and without the annoyance to patients which building operations would cause patients in the already over-crowded Christie Street hospital if the building were gone on with there.

There will be no question of duplication of staffs until the new building is completed. It should be large enough to house all patients from Christie Street hospital who can be ultimately moved there, when it will be possible to have them there all under one administration in buildings of a permanent character with modern facilities and equipment if we are to give our wounded men who served us so well in this and the last war the very best accommodation that can possibly be provided. Nothing less than this will satisfy the people of this country. I do not believe that the argument which has been advanced, that materials and construction cannot be obtained for a military hospital, is a valid one. Recently the department of defence for the navy has announced its intention of building in Toronto a naval station of permanent construction. Surely such a building would not be given priority over a hospital to provide adequate care for our wounded men. What a hollow mockery it is to speak of a new and better world following this war if we fail at this moment to provide the most up-to-date accommodation for the care of those who risked their lives in their effort to save us!

I urge the minister, with all the force at my command, to alter his decision, even now at the eleventh hour, in order to avoid inflicting additional suffering on our brave wounded men and forcing them to live indefinitely in a makeshift hospital with surroundings of which he and this nation should be ashamed.

To erect additions to the present hospital, where already ten additions have been made, will encroach still farther on the limited grounds on this site; and what will you have at the end? Buildings cluttering up almost every foot of the ground, with no space for the patients to get out and enjoy the sunshine and fresh air, but daily compelled to endure the noise, smoke and dirt incidental to a through railway line passing close by and numerous factories.

If the minister insists, our people will be outraged and he will have committed an offence against the gallant boys who are returning wounded and sick after giving all they had in defence of our liberties. Surely they deserve a better fate than this. What right has the minister to deny these wounded boys the best possible hospital facilities in spacious, attractive surroundings with the maximum of sunshine and fresh air that will help to restore them to health again? Their relatives and friends, yes, the Canadian people generally, insist that this simple justice be done. Although the minister's term of office will come to an end in due time by the will of the people, this hospital upon which he proposes to spend over half a million dollars will unhappily remain to perpetuate the memory of the Mackenzie folly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Taken over by the Tory government. If the hon. member wants to talk politics I will give him plenty of politics about how that thing was acquired.

Mr. BRUCE: I understand that the city of Toronto has offered two sites—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They did to the union government, but they were refused. They offered them High park in 1919, but were turned down.

Mr. BRUCE: I think they have offered them since then. I believe they would give sites now. I understand there are half a dozen sites in Toronto available, good sites, with plenty of ground in suitable surroundings and near enough to meet the criticism that medical men and specialists would not be able to go to a hospital situated at a great distance from the centre. I should remark that one of the visiting medical men at Christie Street hospital told me recently that he was unable to use his stethoscope when examining patients there on account of the noise and vibration made by passing trains.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): As a medical man, does the hon. member think that is possible?

Mr. BRUCE: I do not hear the hon. gentleman. I am going to make a proposal in regard to what might very well be done. It is to establish a convalescent hospital or home to house the very large number of patients now being taken care of at Christie Street hospital. I believe that eighty per cent of the patients there, who have been there since the last war, could be better looked after in a convalescent home where it would be very much less expensive to take care of them. In the first place, they would not require operating rooms or X-ray equipment or expensive laboratories, nor would they require the services of surgical specialists and physicians, nor would they require the same nursing care. It should be possible to procure such a place. I have not canvassed the situation in the city of Toronto, but I would suggest that one place that might be secured is Casa Loma, a very large building used at present for show purposes. I am informed that in one room in that building they can place a thousand soldiers at one time. I should think it might very well be used for some such purpose as I have indicated. If this were done, it would be possible to remove a great many of the old patients from Christie Street hospital and enable it to take care of new casualties arriving in this war until such time as the new hospital I mentioned could be built.

I have dealt with the question of convenience to doctors. It is claimed that first-class specialists could not spare the time to treat stricken soldiers who might be moved to a cleaner, quieter but less accessible site. I do not believe for a moment that the leading orthopaedic and other specialists would be so unpatriotic as to refuse to treat wounded soldiers if they are housed in a suitable building, even though it entailed a slightly longer drive in their motorcars. It is an unjustifiable reflection upon the members of my profession.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Would it not take longer for specialists to go, if it is farther away? And in that case they could not do as much work.

Mr. BRUCE: I think it is only a matter of a few minutes' difference, in any event. I should like to ask how this proposed treatment of our wounded men fits in with the declaration made by the Prime Minister two days ago when, speaking of our soldiers overseas, he said, "Canada will not fail them." Perhaps this is not the time to discuss whether the government has provided sufficient reinforcements, but this is the time and place to make good the Prime Minister's promise and see that a modern hospital is built immediately, with adequate facilities, on a suitable site with sufficient grounds to provide sunshine and fresh air in order that these patients may have every assistance in recovering their health. This much the Canadian public demands of our government, and nothing else will be tolerated.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I may change the subject a little, but before I make the proposition I have in mind, I should like to ask the minister if a burnt-out soldier now unfit for work receives a pension of $20 a month, irrespective of age.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, provided that he served in a theatre of actual war as defined by the Pension Act, in dealing with the great war.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to endorse what has been said by various hon. members with regard to widows of soldiers. There is no doubt that when our soldiers went overseas they took a great deal of risk, but the wives at home take considerable risks also. They are alone; they have to manage; they have sacrificed a great deal. If, in addition, they lose their husbands, I think they should receive every consideration at the hands of the minister. I should like to pay my respects to the officials of this department, from whom I have received nothing but courteous treatment. The only difficulty was that I did not always know the act thoroughly.

There is one matter I should like to bring before the minister; I am not sure whether this is the right time, though I know this is the right place and the right minister. In the city of Winnipeg an old friend of mine, Doctor J. R. Davidson, against whom I used to play soccer, has been conducting a clinic for the cure of cancer. In my hand I have a booklet which contains a reprint from the Canadian Medical Association Journal of 1941, and I am going to give this pamphlet to the minister so that he may become familiar with the work being done at this clinic. Doctor Davidson is doing a work that is touching upon the nation as a whole. Many cases which had been given up by a well known clinic in the country to the south have gone from Fort William to Winnipeg for treatment by Doctor Davidson, with very good results.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask where Doctor Davidson's clinic is located?

Mr. McIVOR: It is in the city of Winnipeg. The hon. member for St. Boniface is acquainted with it and he may be able to endorse what I say. Let me give an example a little closer to us. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie went to this famous clinic in the country to the south. There he underwent an operation and was sent home to await the last roll call. But hon. members saw him when he came into this chamber a short time ago, before he went back to Winnipeg for his last treatment by Doctor Davidson. He has been made almost new, and is very much encouraged. I am bringing this matter to the attention of the minister on this occasion because Doctor Davidson is not a young man any more; he is over sixty, at least, and I think the work he has done should be continued for the benefit of all Canada. I am sure the minister will see that this is done.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I am not going to deal with more than one subject at the moment. I should like to say something about Christie Street hospital, but there will be other estimates under which I can deal with that subject. I wish to thank the minister very kindly for his several references to my efforts, extending over quite a number of years now, on behalf of non-pensioned widows. It has been my pleasure to attend meetings of various non-pensioned war widows' associations in Toronto, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary and elsewhere, and for many years I have been interested in their efforts to foster what I believe is the proper view in regard to this matter. During all that time I have found the minister most sympathetic. He deserves the praise not only of the women's organizations but of all who are helping these women to attain their objectives. He has been consistent in his support, though apparently until this session he was unable to do what he has told me on many occasions he wished to do, namely, to give consideration to non-pensioned widows. I am glad that this year he has been able to persuade his colleagues to let him introduce an item—I hope it is only an initial vote and that it may be increased later on—on behalf of non-pensioned widows. On the 18th of last month, when this matter was before the committee, I was unavoidably absent on an important mission in Toronto. I want to thank my leader for asking the minister on that occasion, even though the vote had been passed, to give me permission to touch upon the matter later. Perhaps I have no right to speak on it now, but I do so because the minister said he would permit me to speak at this time, and I thank him for that consideration.

On April 8, 1941, I appeared before a committee of this house to which had been referred various pension matters, including the question of non-pensioned widows. I was given a courteous hearing by that committee, and on that occasion I asked, first, that pensions should be granted to widows of soldiers who during their lifetime had received less than 50 per cent pension. I believe at that time 50 per cent was the amount above which pensions were paid to non-pensioned widows and below which pensions were not paid. Secondly, I asked that pensions be granted to widows of soldiers who, during their lifetime, had received pensions of 50 per cent or over 50 per cent, but who apparently had recovered to such an extent that the pension had been discontinued. This would make the wives of such soldiers ineligible for pension at the death of their husbands.

In the third place, I felt that consideration should be given to non-pensioned widows of soldiers who had served in any theatre of war. I approved the vote passed the other night, so far as it goes. It is an advance over what we had. In the vote I find these words:

. . . compassionate allowances awarded by the Canadian pension commission to widows of persons who served in the naval, military or air forces of Canada during the war, 1914-18, who are in necessitous circumstances, at such rates not exceeding, however, $240 per annum (or $300 per annum in certain exceptional circumstances to be prescribed by the governor in council).

And so on. During the debate which ensued this was further elaborated upon. The minister stated, as reported at page 3798, of Hansard, by way of explanation of the class of widows who are to benefit under this vote:

The widows eligible will be those whose husbands' service records can be thus described.

Earlier on that page they are described as follows:

(a) Widows of disability pensioners not now provided for and (b) widows of deceased recipients of war veterans' allowance.

On the next page something further is stated with respect to what is to be done under the vote. The minister states:

These conditions will be applied to the widow herself, but the age mentioned will be fifty-five instead of sixty.

I compliment the minister upon reducing the age limit from sixty to fifty-five. I am sure he would have been supported had he reduced it to fifty, because when a war-widow reaches the age of fifty years, in many cases, because of anxiety, she may not be in a very satisfactory state of health. However, a reduction to fifty-five years is something for which we may be grateful.

After interrogation by the hon. member for Vancouver South the minister gave a further statement, and outlined to the committee what I thought was some interesting and worth-while information. The following discussion ensued between the hon. member for Vancouver South and the minister:

Mr. Green: The vote does not read that way; it reads as though the maximum a widow can get is $300.

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre): That is income; but casual earnings are not classified as income. Casual earnings are in addition to the permissive income of $365.

Mr. Green: The widow, then, can get $490?

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. Green: Just the same as a veteran can?

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

That is a big step in the right direction.

Mr. GREEN: She has to earn the difference.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes; the hon. member said that. She is permitted to earn up to $490. That can be increased later, of course, if the house so decides.

That is what the vote allows, but some provisions have been left out. The submission by the war veterans' association before the committee on April 8, 1941, asked that three classes receive pensions. I believe the first two classes have now been taken care of, but the third class, namely indigent widows of ex-service men who served in a theatre of actual war, have not been included.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They have been covered.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that. The minister has gone a long way in thus including widows of war veterans who served in any theatre of war. That is very satisfactory news, but I had not understood it from the remarks made the other day. However, it is something really worth while.

I know a number of returned soldiers who, perhaps on account of pride, and perhaps on account of a certain amount of stubbornness, have refused to accept war veterans' allowance. I do not find fault with them, because I like to see evidence of pride in any man. I like to see a man fight for what he believes is right. I have in mind one or two who have refused war veterans' allowance because they believe in their hearts—and I am not saying they do so either rightly or wrongly—that they are entitled to pension. Would the widow of that class of soldier be entitled to a pension, under the vote passed the other night?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If he qualified for pension she would qualify for widows' allowance, provided he served in a theatre of actual war.

Mr. MacNICOL: The fact that he had refused it would not disqualify her, provided he was entitled to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that, too. I know of soldiers who served in the great war, who recovered from their disabilities acquired at that time, and who since that time have refused to apply for pension. They not having applied for pension, in the event of their deaths would their widows be entitled to the benefit of this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Replying to the hon. member, I can give only my opinion. I am not sure, but I would venture the opinion that if one had been entitled to a pension at any time, his widow would qualify.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are entitled, but they have refused to apply.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I doubt if in that case the widow would qualify.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then that is one class I would ask the minister to investigate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Does my hon. friend refer to a man who had served in a theatre of actual war?

Mr. MacNICOL: I refer to the soldier who has served in an actual theatre of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The widow would be eligible in that case, certainly.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then I think the minister has covered nearly everybody.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, I think so.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought two or three classes had been left out, but I am glad to find they have not.

The amount of the pension was the subject of discussion at the last meeting. I have in mind what the Australians do. There the controlling factor is that a widow is granted a pension equal to the amount received by her husband during his lifetime.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think that is correct, but I also believe they are reconsidering that in Australia.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not want to talk about something about which I know nothing. In the United States I believe they grant $30 a month to the widow of any soldier who in his lifetime received $10 a month. I had hoped that when this vote came up these women would be allowed more than $240 a year. I hoped that it would be at least $365, or $1 a day. Now that the minister has gone so far this year, perhaps he will consider an increase by next year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) is going to fire me.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am speaking for Davenport riding which has many thousands of returned soldiers in it. I hope the minister will go farther and allow $1 a day, which would be $365 a year. The minister has rather taken the wind out of my sails by including nearly everything I thought was not to be included.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. MacNICOL: It will be carried in just a second if the hon. member will possess his soul in patience. I have been interested in this matter for a long time and I am glad that some results have been achieved. Perhaps at this juncture I should commend the non-pensioned widows and their associations for having worked so persistently over the years. They have come to Ottawa on many occasions at great expense to themselves, and if the minister has not done so already, I hope he will express to them the government's thanks for what they have done to help him and his department to bring about the results that have been achieved.

Someone else has said that these non-pensioned widows should have representation upon whatever board is set up to look after this matter. One or more of the prominent non-pensioned war widows in Canada might be appointed to serve on these boards or committees and to help to set up the machinery for the administration of these grants.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Chairman, considering that there is a treasury board operating in Ottawa I think it will be agreed that the Minister of Pensions and National Health has gone a long way toward meeting the demands of the ex-soldier. I doubt if we could find a stauncher friend of the ex-soldier than the present Minister of Pensions and National Health.

I should like to speak about something that is a little local in character. Last year I referred to the general hospital situation and the lack of cooperation between other departments and the Department of Pensions and National Health. Since coming to Ottawa this year, I have carried on negotiations as quietly as possible in the hope of arriving at what I consider would be a satisfactory solution of the hospital situation on the southern end of Vancouver island. I would continue to work in that manner, because I think it is the most effective in the end, but the end of the session is quite close and there would be no opportunity for me to express publicly my opinion and to ask for the minister's co-operation. I think I shall get it when I have explained the general hospital situation in Victoria.

We have two fairly large and efficient hospitals, one operated by the Catholic church and one as a general hospital. They are both located in fairly large grounds and are free from the type of disturbance referred to by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) as affecting Christie Street hospital. At the beginning of the war the medical director of the army visited Victoria to look over the situation. We tried to persuade him to erect an addition to either one or both of these hospitals to take care of soldiers while in uniform or when they are returned from overseas, but we were not successful. Since that time a hospital has been erected in the naval barracks at Esquimalt. This was found insufficient to take care of the needs, and they have added to it. It is a good hospital with efficient equipment, but it is located in the heart of the barracks and is subject to the same noises that certain other hospitals are subjected to. Then they built a hospital at Work Point barracks for soldiers in uniform. However, this was not sufficient and they took over the normal school, which is located some distance out. The minister said the other day that it had cost $70,000 to convert this school into a hospital. It is a fine building, but it is not serving the purpose it was originally built to serve. It will cost another $75,000 or possibly $100,000 to reconvert it to its previous use, and I hope that will be done.

In addition, a hospital was built at Gordon Head, which is about six miles from the centre of the city, to serve the officers' training camp. They are pretty well taken care of there. It is now proposed to build a hospital at Royal Roads which it is expected will cost in the neighbourhood of $500,000. This is the site of the naval college and is about nine miles from the centre of Victoria. There are no facilities to look after nurses or other attendants. They will not only have to build a hospital; they will have to provide transportation facilities, which are poor at the present time, and accommodation for nurses and other attendants. It is claimed that this will cost another $500,000.

They could build a unit of equal size as an addition to the Royal Jubilee hospital, which is the general hospital. This is situated in a twenty-acre piece of grounds. The hospital has sufficient facilities to furnish the required heating, as well as laboratory and other electrical equipment. This has been offered to the department, but they insist upon going on with their plans to build at Royal Roads.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not this department.

Mr. MAYHEW: No; the department of naval affairs. I understand that this would not be acceptable to the Department of Pensions and National Health when completed, so that we would have at the very least three-quarters of a million dollars, and I would say that one million dollars would be nearer the amount, spent on this hospital, which in my opinion would not be properly located for the boys when they return from overseas. It would mean that the patients would be at least nine miles from the city, and their friends and relatives who wanted to see them would have to travel that distance to do so. If conditions prevailing in the city of Victoria were anything like those that have been described as prevailing around the Christie Street hospital, or even the general hospital in Toronto, which I believe is pretty noisy, I would not object to going a certain distance out of the city to find a quiet and suitable place. But those conditions do not exist in Victoria. The buildings are modern and have every facility. They are both classed as A1. I am told that the cost per bed in the addition to the Royal Jubilee hospital would be at the maximum $1,250, while the cost per bed in the other hospital would be some $1,500 at least, and then the building would be of no value afterwards.

I think there has been a lack of cooperation between the three services in building their hospitals from the start of this war. I had hoped that that would be stopped by this time, but apparently they are still not ready to cooperate with the Department of Pensions and National Health and locate hospital additions where they can do the most good. I think the hospitals built in war time for the soldiers should integrate with the civic hospitals, so that they will be of benefit to the general public when the war is over. But that is not so in this case. I do not know whether the Minister of Pensions and National Health or his department has agreed with the other three departments on this proposal. If he has, I say to him now that as far as I am concerned I am going to oppose it, but I do not believe he has. If, however, he has taken a stand and is opposing the proposal of the other three departments to build this hospital, I will support him.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): So far as hospitalization is concerned, we are back where we were in 1918. We are just going to make the same fatal mistake in regard to hospitalization that we made in the last war. I was chairman of the hospital commission for the city of Toronto with Doctor Hastings and Mr. Thomas Bradshaw in the last war and for three years after. The city had been most generous to the government in giving it public buildings free in the last war because we were anxious to help, so that at the close of the war the troops would have proper hospitalization, adequate housing and proper treatment.

I should like to take five minutes to refer to the mistakes that were made as regards hospitalization at that time. In the last war we had a survey made of the hospitals in the city of Toronto. We had the old Base hospital on Gerrard street, located there when the Old Trinity and university of Toronto medical faculties were separate. Then the large, new Toronto General hospital was built, and these two faculties had been amalgamated for some years. The city joined with the Toronto General and the university in the new hospital. The result was a new General. The city paid about a million, the cost of the site near the great university of Toronto which has done so much for medicine. The result was a new hospital. I was on the board for seventeen years and on the executive committee with Sir Joseph Flavelle and the late Mr. Larkin. I was acting for the city of Toronto. The hospital was opened by Sir James Whitney about a month or two before the 1914 war. It was built then for to-morrow, and the city was generous and for years carried the deficits.

The war came and we found we had no proper hospital accommodation for the soldiers in the epidemic of 1917. I had a run-in with the government of that day, of which I was a great supporter. The late Doctor Hastings and myself and Mr. Thomas Bradshaw, who composed the hospital commission, were told that we were meddling in federal affairs. We were not. All we wanted was hospital accommodation for our soldiers and housing accommodation for themselves and their families when they returned from the war. I do not blame the Minister of Pensions and National Health altogether, except for not seeking new sites now. He is a Scotsman and I am an Irishman, and we do not often have so great a difference of opinion. I also appreciate what his doctors, both past and present, have done, and his nurses and whole staff for years at small salaries.

During the flu epidemic in the last war I forced an investigation into the disgraceful hospital conditions for soldiers in the city of Toronto. I saw at Niagara camp, boys of sixteen, seventeen, eighteen and nineteen years of age down with pneumonia, and where were they? They were lying in camp at Fort George in tents, with only a bit of canvas underneath them to protect them from the ground. I talked to General Logie and to Ottawa about it. He was then the officer commanding that military district. It was not his fault at all. I asked him, "Who is to blame for this lack of hospitals for soldiers?" The old Base hospital on Gerrard street had been closed up. It was not fit for civilians, and yet they wanted to open it up to accommodate soldiers. General Logie said in reply to my question at the inquest that a mysterious person at Ottawa was to blame. I asked who he was, but he could not tell me. I said to him, "If you had pneumonia, would you want to go and lie down at the back of your lot in a tent, with nothing underneath you but a canvas?" and he said "yes". I said, "No; you would go to the Toronto General hospital."

The result of lack of proper accommodation all over Canada for soldiers was that public opinion forced the government of the day to establish a hospital service across Canada at a cost of $35 millions, I believe, in connection with the municipalities, because when all is said and done in civilian hospital work, it is the municipalities that are putting up most of the money and paying a per diem allowance in support of the civilian hospitals, used by soldiers also. The per diem was fifty cents, but under Doctor Hastings it went as high as $1.75 to $2.25 for per diem patients.

The hospital situation now, even in all Canada, is a very serious one. I said that when the war started. I know that mistakes have been made; I have seen them. We have no modern plan of hospitalization. Some wanted to rebuild the old Base hospital on the old site, but we would not allow that, and it was torn down. What is true of civilian hospitals is more true of military hospitals. You can save a great deal of money by capital expenditure on the proper site and buildings, and later effect great economies in operation. We started out to look for new hospital sites after the above experience. I went out on the Lake Shore road with federal officials to look at a hospital site where the new Goodyear plant was about to be built. The roads were not as good then, and the doctors, who were only part-time doctors, would not go out that far, so that we had to look for a new site. We went up to the district for which I have sat in three parliaments, in 1921, in 1925, and in 1926, and looked at the site of the present Christie Street hospital, the National Cash Register's new plant. It was opposed by the fire chief and other municipal officials who came out and looked at the site. The city at that time had absolute control over the property, residential districts and others, and hospitalization, and the law of the province did not allow them to ride rough-shod over the municipality in this connection, but Ottawa decided to get this National Cash Register place for a start, temporarily. It was opened about March 1, 1918, in the darkest hour of the war. There were votes for hospitals for soldiers all over Canada when parliament met for the next session, 1918-19. In every military district they were then at least waking up all over Canada to the requirements with regard to the returning troops. I opposed even then the use of this property. I did not think it was right to establish a hospital there. I supported the idea that a property be acquired, the old St. Andrews college, in the district of North Rosedale, near where I lived for eighteen years. The local residents did not want it, but I was glad it was secured. The quarters which were obtained on Christie street were to be occupied only temporarily. I remember the discussions of the subject at the meetings of the city council. I have a report of the medical officer of health, Doctor Hastings, who gave the government and the soldiers the most wonderful support, during and after the last war, of anyone I ever knew.

Well, what have you done? You have made ten changes in and additions to this property at a cost of $344,000. Great sums amounting to $444,000 all told, have been spent in converting the National Cash Register property, though neither the walls nor any other part of the building were suitable for a hospital. Other points were considered, including the exhibition grounds. In 1914 the new Toronto General was opened. If you had not had that hospital at the close of the last war, I do not know where some of the patients could have been taken for operations or special cases. Afterwards it was all done at Christie Street expanded. I say this while recognizing how splendid a staff Christie Street hospital had and has, and the grand work done there by all the staff and the civilian volunteer workers so long and cheerfully.

The present minister has done a lot of good work, and I am very much surprised at him as a Scotsman allowing the use of a building like this as a convalescent home. I have been there several times. The building should never have been used as a hospital, and I am sorry we were not successful in defeating the various expansions which were approved by three parliaments, instead of new and other plants. I consulted the city officials on the matter, and I was very sorry that we ever allowed the key to be turned in the door for hospital purposes, but there was no option. I have seen the shell-shocked troops. I went last winter to visit a young patient whose father is a prominent citizen of the maritime provinces. For several years he was a member of this house and was on the committee which deals with war pensions and similar subjects. He sat as one of the more important supporters of the Liberal government. One of his children, a fine young soldier, was being treated there as a shell-shock case, and I was very much surprised at the condition of affairs in the ward, because the site was not fit for such cases.

The whole situation is, however, becoming intolerable, and a new plant is now required. I say that although I have nothing but admiration for the officials of the Department of Pensions and National Health, and for the doctors, nurses and committees that have dealt with this subject, because they know more than I do about it. But speaking as a layman who was on the hospital board for seventeen years and saw a great deal of the work done during epidemics of all kinds, when we had not quite enough hospital accommodation to look after the civilian population, I am much concerned at the condition of affairs and the industrial development which exists in the Christie street area to-day. The whole district is a factory area. I remember the great separation of the Canadian Pacific from Yonge street right across to the junction in northwest Toronto. With the coming of the new right-of-way of this railway came factories, mills and other industrial plants. You ought to see the smoke and the dust and the dirt.

I am sorry to have to differ with the minister, but I am even more sorry at the mistake which has been made. Toronto has expanded its hospital accommodation at vast expense. The new Toronto East General hospital was opened and expanded, also Grace hospital, and in Toronto East it was intended that there should be a sufficient tract of land to provide a park. Then we have the splendid Western hospital on Bathurst street, which has been a big expansion. The university of Toronto is close to the new General property, and it is a revelation what has been done there in the past few years as a school of clinics for the university and the wonderful Sick Children's hospital of the Telegram.

I repeat that the site of Christie Street hospital is not and never has been suitable. The city authorities, I believe, are against this new expansion. All the business men I know of who have been connected with the various hospitals and have done so much for them are against it. I hope that the government will give the subject further consideration, because unless they get busy with more plants we shall have a serious situation after the war. I have talked to many officials of the city, and I believe that the city of Toronto or some private organizations would donate a site if the government would undertake to construct elsewhere a decent building. A plant with only 343 new beds will be of no good at all. To-day you cannot get into any hospital, public or private, in Toronto. You ought to see how crowded they are; some semi-private wards and public ones have twice the number they were intended to accommodate.

I am ashamed at what I have seen at times in the way of accommodation at Christie Street hospital. You have a fine staff of doctors and nurses. If the obstacle is a question of money I would say to the minister, never mind the money. These men who went to the front and faced danger and death night and day should not have their welfare and restoration to health dependent upon a matter of money. You have spent $29,000,000 on a station in Montreal, a building devised for material ends only, which is being opened to-day, and yet you will not give proper accommodation to the troops who have served you so well in this war.

No municipality could get plans passed by the province for such an extension as this. I would not call it a convalescent home at all. I was at the Christmas dinner last year and saw the way it was crowded, away in a building at the rear in the smoke and noise and dirt.

Again I plead with the minister to reconsider his decision. You have to abandon that whole plant before long; you might just as well scrap the whole of it, the way we did with the old Toronto General hospital, and erect a good modern building. We cannot do without it. The new Toronto General has been built for to-morrow. The result is that it is recognized as one of the finest institutions of its kind on the continent. Although I should like to support the minister, I cannot do it this time. I feel very sorry when I see the parents, the wives and the little children of the patients going in there. It has not the proper accommodation, and Christie street is no place for a hospital. You will soon have to abandon it and supply up-to-date accommodation. It is demanded by the progress of the science of preventive medicine, surgery and modern medicine; it will be demanded after the war with the numbers of shell-shocked air force and other casualties which will result from the war. I speak seriously, as one who has had a great deal of experience in this work. I have talked to eminent authorities and to members of the medical faculties of various universities, and they are astonished that we as a parliament sit here and take such action as this. It is a wrong step; it is a leap in the dark, and the money will be wasted—$500,000 thrown away on a place which should be scrapped as quickly as possible for a new site.

The minister has always been on friendly terms with the municipal authorities, and I believe that he could procure another site, which Toronto, I am sure, would provide, and the building now in use could be diverted to other necessary hospital purposes. I have suggested a location twelve miles out along the waterfront, or away up in the Don valley in North York, where the city has a lot of park land, near where the hon. member for Parkdale used to live in Bayview; it would make a fine site. If it is out a little farther, it would not make much difference because you have good roads. Toronto owns the street railway, the harbour property, the radials, the buses and a great many things. I know of no city which has given the last government and this government more splendid cooperation and support than all past and present city councils and public officials of Toronto. If there is urgency to have some immediate buildings, go ahead and build your temporary quarters for other hospital purposes, but provide a new site for these patients, for a convalescent home. I have seen some of the air force men who have come home, and some are suffering in a terrible way in this new war.

I did not wish to speak in this debate, but I felt it my duty to say to the minister that he is making a great mistake.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I find myself lining up behind the last several speakers with regard to the hospital policy of the government. My attitude is not so much one of criticism as one of discussion. Certainly it is unwise for one to discuss matters of which one has but unfamiliar knowledge; still reports have come to us in the newspapers with regard to Christie Street hospital, and I am inclined to feel that factories and coalyards are not good bedfellows for hospitals. The factory of my early memory was, of course, the factory of the smokestack, and that would be out of the question in the neighbourhood of hospitals. I presume, however, that the factories abutting Christie Street hospital are operated by the ordinary hydro-electric power and for that reason are less offensive.

It is not, however, so much to discuss the hospital matter that I rise. One of the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale referred to the establishment by the government of convalescent homes for some of the old pensioners. I regard that as an excellent suggestion. I am very well acquainted; I have a most friendly acquaintance, with a number of medical men in the city of Winnipeg who are on the staff of the Deer Lodge hospital which is some five miles from the city of Winnipeg. We often discuss these matters in the anteroom of the hospital, and some of these gentlemen have said to me that it is just pitiable to think of turning out some of these old war veterans who have nothing to depend upon but the war veterans' allowance. They are not sick enough to take up hospital room any longer, and on the other hand they have nowhere to go. When they are told by the doctor that it is time for them to leave, the frequent remark is, "Where can I go, doctor; where can I live on $20 a month?" They are not strong enough or well enough to look after themselves, but they are too well to take up hospital room.

There is a dearth of hospital beds all over the country. In Winnipeg we have five or six first-class A1 hospitals, and so far as the mental ward is concerned there is a waiting list of about fifty, so that it takes several days to get a room in any one of our general hospitals. There is a great shortage of beds in Winnipeg and I presume that is true everywhere.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): All over Canada.

Mr. HOWDEN: All over Canada, if you like. We have a hospital problem in Winnipeg. Deer Lodge, as I have said, is five miles from the centre of our city. The Department of Pensions and National Health built a hospital there. As a matter of fact, it was the old Deer Lodge hotel originally, a recreation place. It has been overcrowded for years, and the contemplation now is, I believe, to extend it at considerable expense. That will require additional staff, and goodness knows there is a shortage of medical staff, techincal staff and nursing staff everywhere. All hospitals are short of nurses. All districts are now beginning to be short of doctors, and the addition of this large wing to the Deer Lodge hospital will require maintenance in the form of nurses, technicians and medical men. I do not know where they will be found. I know that in the instance of Deer Lodge hospital, as in that of Christie Street hospital in Toronto and the hospital at Victoria, it is the wish of the local people, those who live at the site in question, that these hospitals should be erected in connection with the institutions at present carrying on.

I believe the feeling in Winnipeg is that the extension to the Deer Lodge hospital should be erected at the General hospital in Winnipeg, because the General hospital there is, after all, the largest institution we have. It is the centre of medical learning and treatment for that part of Canada. The feeling is that after this war is over, there will not be any need, twenty-five or thirty years hence, for a military hospital, and then the room will be occupied by patients from Winnipeg. The same feeling prevails, I believe, with regard to Victoria. They are short of hospital room and badly in need of hospital equipment of all kinds, and it is felt that if the extension that is being put up out there, and those already put up, had been combined with the hospitals in Victoria it would have been a very much better piece of business. That is as it may be, but it does seem a pity that these men, veterans of this war and of the last war, who are occupying and will occupy Christie Street hospital, should be left in crowded surroundings of that kind. Any moneys that are to be spent and must be spent could readily, and to much better avail, be spent in a location affording more desirable surroundings.

The hon. member for Fort William this afternoon mentioned Doctor Davidson of the city of Winnipeg and his cancer cure, this cancer cure of Doctor Davidson is not a joke. If the late Doctor Banting and Doctor Best produced at least a partial cure for diabetes, certainly Doctor Davidson has formulated a form of treatment which stays and does clear up cancer. I do not know that I should be giving the committee a lecture in clinical medicine, but at all events, since many have expressed curiosity with regard to this matter, I might say that Doctor Davidson has been experimenting with mice for the last thirty years. For some singular reason, mice, rats, rabbits and guineapigs, the family of rodents, are most like human beings in their reactions to disease and therapeutic measures, and for the last thirty years Doctor Davidson has been experimenting with whole families of mice. He has produced hundreds of families of cancerous mice and hundreds of families of non-cancerous mice. He has fed certain mice with cancer-producing foods and has produced cancerous mice, and he has fed other mice with non-cancerous food and obtained cancer-resisting mice to such an extent that when a new cancerous growth was implanted in the cancer-resisting mice it failed to take hold, and after a time he treated cancerous mice with the blood serum of non-cancerous mice and the cancerous mice cleared up. They overcame their cancerous new growth and recovered.

That hypothesis has simply been carried into effect, and at the present time there are fifteen or twenty cases on record, positively on record, as presented to the medical society. This is not a dream but something that has been presented from time to time to medical associations throughout western Canada and even as far as Rochester in the United States. The mice have definitely cleared up with injections from the system of cancer-resisting families of mice and from non-cancer producing forms of diet.

Doctor Banting and Doctor Best were given assistance by the federal government and by other bodies in public control, but Doctor Davidson has worked for thirty years on his own premises. He has been a prominent doctor in the city of Winnipeg; he has been a prominent internist; he has given much of his time to the hospitals and is a well-known public figure; yet in his spare time and at his own expense he has carried on this personal research, and he has obtained results. I would not have thought of bringing this matter before the committee, but it was mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Fort William who referred to me as probably being in possession of some of the facts, and that is so.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may ask the hon. member a question for the sake of information, did I understand him to say there were certain types of diet which induced cancerous growth?

Mr. HOWDEN: Quite; that was the basis of his investigation. He found that by feeding certain families of mice on certain diets, they became cancerous, and for generation after generation produced cancerous mice. Then he found that by feeding other families of mice on other diets, they became cancer-resistant, and produced cancer-resistant offspring generation after generation. Then he used the blood of the cancer-resistant mice to cure the cancerous mice, and from that he used it on cancerous human beings. That is the whole story.

Mr. McIVOR: Will anything be done in regard to this matter? I do not wish to press the minister too hard, but the people who have been cured are most anxious that all the scientific research which has been carried on by Doctor Davidson shall not be lost.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is a committee functioning now in conjunction with the national research council which investigates cases of this kind, and I am sure it is important that this be done in connection with this matter. Certainly I shall bring this discussion to the attention of that committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has this work by Doctor Davidson been under consideration by the national research council?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not to my knowledge.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): I think we were all very glad to hear the statement made by the hon. member for St. Boniface; the members of the medical profession can make valuable contributions to the debates of this house.

I wish to join with other hon. members who have expressed the desire that everything humanly possible should be done to bring economic security with freedom, medical treatment and other amenities to the men and women in our fighting services who are doing such a wonderful job at the present time. It is encouraging to hear members of all political parties say that financial considerations should not be allowed to block the work now being done by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. For many years we in this group have been saying that what is physically possible can be made financially possible, and I believe that idea is concurred in by the minister.

As I listened to certain members of the Progressive Conservative party describe the conditions which exist in Christie Street hospital in the city of Toronto, I wondered if they had not made a mistake in the name and location of the institution. I thought they were confusing Christie Street hospital in Toronto with the Colonel Belcher hospital in the city of Calgary; for many of the things that have been said about this hospital in Toronto could be said with equal truth about the Belcher hospital in Calgary. On former occasions I have drawn to the attention of the government the situation prevailing in the Colonel Belcher hospital and have urged that improvements be made; in fact I have urged the government to find a more suitable location than this for a hospital. I have not been to the Colonel Belcher hospital for two or three years, and as a result the information dealing with that period has come to me at second hand. For about ten years following 1920 I visited the Colonel Belcher hospital about twice a year. I realize that much has been done to improve conditions there since that time, but still they are not what they ought to be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Has my hon. friend seen the new hospital at Calgary?

Mr. MARSHALL: No; I have not seen the new hospital; I am talking about the Colonel Belcher hospital, which is still in use.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct, but I believe the new one will be finished in September.

Mr. MARSHALL: I realize that, but I just want to bring to the attention of members of this committee the conditions which exist in the Colonel Belcher hospital. Some years ago I wrote the secretary of the Calgary branch of the Canadian Legion asking if he would be good enough to tell me whether any action had been taken by the legion with respect to this hospital. In reply he stated that this question had been the subject of many resolutions which had been adopted by the Alberta command and endorsed by various dominion conventions. Here is the resolution which was passed by the Alberta command for a number of years, and endorsed by several dominion conventions:

> Whereas the Belcher hospital is entirely and completely unsuitable for the purpose for which it is now utilized, our opinion being formed on the following grounds:
> (1) That only one of the three buildings used as a hospital is fireproof.
> (2) That incessant noise from street traffic annoys the inmates and retards the progress of the patients.
> (3) That the proximity of the Canadian Pacific railway adds not only noise but smoke and dirt to the institution.

I should like hon. gentlemen to notice how closely conditions in the Belcher hospital parallel those said to exist in the Christie Street hospital.

> (4) For its absolute lack of facilities for light exercise in the open air.
> (5) That it contains no suitable facilities for psychopathic or neurotic patients, and owing to this lack many mild psychiatric cases are compelled to go to Oliver or Ponoka for treatment where they are obliged to mingle with practically incurable insane patients.
> Whereas the Belcher hospital is totally unsuitable for a soldiers' hospital as at present used on the grounds outlined above;
> And whereas the need for a soldiers' hospital is certain to become more acute for the next twenty-five years rather than to diminish;
> Now therefore be it resolved that the Canadian Legion, Alberta command, humbly petition the cabinet of this country to give urgent and immediate consideration to the erection of a modern soldiers' hospital with suitable and adequate ground accommodation in order that these men, who fought and suffered, and who are still suffering, for their country, may receive that care and attention which we respectfully believe to be the wish of the people of this dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the date of that letter?

Mr. MARSHALL: That resolution was sent to me in 1937, but the same conditions exist to-day as existed in that day. No change has taken place, as I shall proceed to show.

What is the principal objection? It is that this hospital is built on one of the main thoroughfares, perhaps I should say the main thoroughfare in Calgary. At the back of the hospital are the tracks of the Canadian Pacific railway. In his letter the secretary of the Canadian Legion states:

> The principal objections to the present hospital have been that there are streetcar tracks in front of the hospital and railway tracks at the rear, and it would seem impossible to obtain the quiet that is required by men who are sick.

When the former Minister of Pensions and National Health, the present Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) was in Vancouver a number of years ago, addressing a convention in that city, this question was brought to his attention. It was intimated to the delegation that waited on the minister that if the Colonel Belcher hospital were closed, then the Edmonton university hospital would be the only one in Alberta in which soldiers could be treated. Because of this attitude on the part of the minister the delegation did not press the point farther.

In 1919, the Great War Veterans' Association, which is now known as the Canadian Legion, objected to the building which had been erected by the dominion government. Because of the violent objection raised by the Great War Veterans' Association the then Conservative government moved the hospital to the building next door. It is rather strange to hear members of the Conservative party criticizing severely the Liberal party for carrying on a hospital under conditions and circumstances similar in many respects to those which prevailed in this one. This building was an old warehouse, before it was taken over for hospital purposes. While no criticism is being levelled in respect of the care of the patients, the food or the service, yet it appears it would be more satisfactory if a new site were obtained, and if the hospital were closed down. There are no grounds where convalescents may take an airing; there are no verandahs; and the noise is practically continuous throughout the whole of the twenty-four hours.

Down the years I have talked to many returned men in Alberta, and they are unanimous, without a dissenting voice, in condemning this building. It fronts the main thoroughfare of the city. At its back are the lines of the Canadian Pacific railway. If a patient wishes to take a walk he immediately steps out on a main thoroughfare. Surely that is not right. It has been pointed out that the rental of this building over the years, at $25,000 a year—as a matter of fact it is in excess of that—would have built a modern hospital. I say the minister owes it to the committee to give a full and complete explanation of the situation and what he proposes to do with respect to it in the near future.

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): With much that has been said with respect to the unsuitability of Christie Street hospital as a building to be used for hospital purposes, I am in accord. Like the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White), I, too, can speak from actual experience. I was an out-patient at the hospital, and attended there for treatment for some time after the last war. Since then I have frequently visited soldiers who are patients in the hospital. It was taken over during the last war by the government of that day as an emergency hospital. It was built originally as a factory; it was a factory when it was taken over and, in structure, it is still a factory. It is about as suitable for hospital purposes as a modern hospital would be for factory purposes.

I believe an article in a recent number of News, written by Judith Robinson, describes the hospital very well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member had better be careful about his literature. The Minister of Munitions and Supply told me he was very careful about reading that sort of thing.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I read all types of literature, and cull the good from the literature I read. I believe the article describes the hospital very well. This is what it says:

> Christie Street hospital stands on a factory site, in a factory district. It is built 75 feet from the right of way of a through freight line, beside a number of switches and sidings. Its wards are overlooked on two sides by a factory and a warehouse and, on the third, overlook a steel yard. They are not fireproof construction. The district is noisy and dirty. The hospital's only grounds are small and without outlook, surrounded by its own buildings. There are 700 patients in Christie Street now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That ought to condemn it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I thought the noise feature was somewhat overemphasized in the discussion which has taken place thus far. Many hon. members are familiar with the General hospital at Toronto, which faces College street, one of the busiest streets in that city. Street cars are passing almost continually, and in normal times the automobile traffic is steady. On one side is University avenue, and I would suppose that more automobiles travel along University avenue than along any other two streets in that city. The noise there is considerable. In referring to Christie Street hospital the hon. member for Parkdale said that the noise from the engines prevented the doctors from using their stethoscopes. I think the same would apply to the Toronto General hospital. In that case there would not be noise from engines, but there would be noise from automobiles honking and from the street cars going by. I think the hon. member for Parkdale overexaggerated his description of the hospital; in fact I think his whole address was one of overstatement. His attack upon the minister was absolutely uncalled for. I was amazed that a man of his eminence should stoop to personalities in a debate as serious as this one.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): On a point of order, I do not think the hon. member for Parkdale went into personalities at all.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): That is my hon. friend's opinion, but if he will read the address of the hon. member for Parkdale, he will see that the hon. member said some things which were pretty close to being personalities.

Mr. GRAYDON: This looks like an exchange of opinions.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): This may be an exchange of opinions, but I am not indulging in personalities. This is a serious debate and, that being so, we should not stoop to personalities. The minister should take great satisfaction from the fact that every hon. member who has spoken, irrespective of party, has used the highest terms in referring to the work he has done. To that I would add the voice of the returned soldier. I should like to refer to the Legionary of May, 1943, which had the following editorial:

. . . we know the minister of pensions to be a man who is sincerely interested in the welfare of his old comrades-in-arms and on many occasions has championed their rightful claims before the treasury board with his well-known forceful eloquence.

What is said there with respect to his old comrades-in-arms can also be said about those who are fighting this war.

Let me refer again to Christie Street hospital. It is proposed to expend $500,000 on this hospital. If it were possible I should like to see this amount spent somewhere else. I should like to see a hospital built in spacious grounds in a better part of Toronto, but we must remember that there are men who will be returned in the near future and who must be looked after. There is not time to build a new hospital.

Mr. QUELCH: You could do both.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): "You could do both," my hon. friend says, and I agree with him. But we must have a place prepared for these men when they return wounded and shell shocked from this war. It would be absolutely impossible to put up a new hospital to look after them. Although this hospital may not be in a location suitable for hospital purposes, under the circumstances it is the best we have and we must be prepared for these men. I would say that this should be done as an emergency measure, but we should look to the future and plans should be made now to build a new hospital in a suitable place, not only to look after the wounded and shell shocked but also to look after those men who will recover slowly from their wounds after they have returned with victory.

This afternoon the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) referred in complimentary terms to the work the minister is doing, but he said that some of the men in the department—I have not his exact words, but they were to this effect—were not entirely sympathetic to the returned man.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think my hon. friend is mixing the member for Souris with the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). I did not make any reference to departmental officials.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I apologize to the hon. member for Souris; I am glad it was not he. But whoever did make that statement I can only say that his experience has been different from mine. Colonel W. S. Woods, who administers the War Veterans' Allowance Act, has been absolutely sympathetic to the returned men. I have found complete sympathy on the part of the men who administer the pensions, although I have not always agreed with their decisions. There are a number of cases from my own city where I am not in accord with the decisions rendered, but I have found the chairman of the pension committee most sympathetic. He has tried to administer the act with a sympathetic eye on the returned soldier. Let me quote the opinion of the returned man with respect to the chairman of the pension committee. I should like to quote from the Fragment, the official organ of the war amputations of Canada, which states:

The kindly personality of our distinguished comrade—General McDonald—is known to members of the association from coast to coast. The contribution he has made over the last six years and more as chairman of the Canadian pension commission has earned the lasting gratitude of all pensioners and their dependents —indeed of all Canada.

That is the opinion of those who served with General McDonald in the last war, as I think it will be of the men who will soon be returning from this war. The view has been expressed by practically every one in this house that we cannot do too much for the returned man. Does anyone think the returned man can be paid for the suffering and trials he has undergone? Money can never repay him, but we can try to be fair; we can try to restore him to the same, if not to a better position than that which he had prior to enlisting.

What has been done thus far? The government—by the "government" I include parliament; I include all parties in parliament —has done a few things which I should like to mention. The post-discharge reestablishment order was issued which provides that every man who returns from overseas will be given an opportunity to learn a trade, and while learning that trade he will receive certain allowances. Every man will be given an opportunity to complete his education. If he has not started upon higher education and is able to prepare himself within a reasonable time, his tuition will be paid and he will be given a living allowance while he is completing his education. Maintenance grants will be paid to men who start up in business but who are not able to support themselves during the initial period. The same provision is also being made for men who return to farms.

Maintenance grants will be paid to men who are temporarily out of employment, men who are able to work but who cannot find employment. There will be maintenance grants for those who are totally incapacitated for work. These will be paid while their injuries are being repaired, as it were, while their health is being restored. The man who served overseas and comes back and takes employment will be in exactly the same position in so far as unemployment insurance is concerned as though he had been working in Canada all the time. These are only a few of the things which we as a parliament have been doing to prepare a place for these men when they come back from the war. Some may say that is not enough; we all may say that that is not enough, but I would point out that in many respects it is more than has been done by our sister dominions in the British commonwealth. In many respects out-of-work benefits are larger, in the amounts paid out in Canada than in Australia and New Zealand. I have a table here which I think hon. members would like to have put on the record. It sets out the out-of-work benefits in the three countries I have mentioned, the benefits for a single man, for man and wife, for man, wife and one child, and so forth, and with the unanimous consent of the committee I should like to place this on the record.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the hon. member say where the table emanates from?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The table was given to the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment on June 10 of this year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And appears in the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: By whom was it presented?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): By the associate deputy minister of pensions and national health. If hon. members would like to have it on the record of this committee, with unanimous consent I will place it on the record. It is as follows:

OUT OF WORK BENEFITS

	Single	Man and wife	Man, wife and 1	Man, wife and 2	Man, wife and 3	Man, wife and 4	Man, wife and 5	Man, wife and 6	Total benefits single	Total man, wife and 6	Max. period protection (weeks)

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not rise to take part in this debate, but I do want to ask a question of the minister on a matter of policy. In Canada we have the Department of Pensions and National Health establishing and maintaining hospitals at various centres throughout the country. Then we have the Department of National Defence erecting and maintaining a great many hospitals throughout the country, most of them of a temporary nature. We have the Department for Naval Services erecting and maintaining hospitals, and the Department for Air erecting and maintaining hospitals. Here we have four government departments doing hospital work, and so far as I have been able to observe there is no concerted plan of action between them. There must of necessity be a good deal of overlapping of services between them, and my question to the minister is this: What consideration has the government given to what is largely a duplication of services in connection with the three armed forces, and may I add the permanent service also, of which the minister is the head, and which I think is doing pretty good work. I am not going to flatter the minister, but I should like to say a good word for some of his officials. I wish to say this, that the department is so very different now from what it was twenty-one years ago that it is most refreshing. I recall that in the earlier days the pension department was in an evolutionary stage; the law on pensions had not become so stabilized as it is to-day, and the problems confronting the department were perhaps more difficult of solution than they are now.

What I want to know is, what consideration has been given by the government toward the question of hospitalization all over the country with a view—this is the thought that is in my mind—to saving a very large sum of money by removing the duplication and trebling and quadrupling, we might say, of hospitalization services? This problem of hospitalization is going to be with us for a long time. I have no doubt that eventually, when the war is over, one hospital after another will be closed up, and finally the department will take over all these hospitals. I recall that during the last war, when Christie Street hospital was set up, another hospital was set up at Ste. Annes. Nobody ever contemplated, I think, that it would be a permanent hospital going on for as long as it has, or a better type of building would have been put up, and it would have been put in a different location. It is near the main line of two great railways and must of necessity be a noisy place. Whoever was responsible for setting up a hospital for mental cases within close proximity of two great lines of railway did not have much idea of the proper location for a hospital for people suffering from that ailment. I have often wondered at that; but there it is.

I think I have got my idea over to the minister sufficiently. What consideration has been given to the question, and what effect has been given to that consideration? To the onlooker, and I can qualify only as that, there does not seem to be any coordination at all of these hospitalization services. The Department of National Defence built a hospital in my city. The site was donated by well disposed people—I am not going any further than that —but the hospital is not now big enough for the number of troops in the locality. I understand that the ratio of hospital accommodation to the number of troops has to be over five per cent. They are building a new hospital in that city, and it is a structure of a most temporary nature. There is no foundation under it; it is built on posts but I assume it can be made warm by the usual methods of banking and that sort of thing, and it will be heated, of course, from one central heating plant. But it is essentially a temporary structure. I do not think the Department of National Defence would contend otherwise. The whole point is, why is there not a long view taken of this question of hospitalization? So far as the long-term cases are concerned, it seems to me they ought to be under one department.

Then there is this extraordinary situation. Every one of these hospitals has to have its own medical staff and its quota of nurses. The country is denuded of nurses because there are so many of them in these military hospitals. In one place at least that I know of these girls do not have enough to do to keep themselves warm at times; there are too many nurses there. I am speaking of the little hospital at Fredericton.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not under this department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite agree that it is under the national defence department. That hospital has seventy beds, ten nurses and twenty orderlies. It seems to me to be overstaffed. All the important surgical cases are taken to the Victoria public hospital.

I think I have elaborated sufficiently to let the minister know what is in my mind. I am not quarrelling with anybody or laying any charges of extravagance. But it seems to me that each one of these defence departments wants to run its own show irrespective of the others, and I consider that there is a good deal of duplication, which means waste, too.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think my hon. friend has contributed a pertinent and important suggestion to the debate. I would say that until two years ago what he has said was very largely true. The hon. member for Danforth sat on one of the committees which went carefully into the question of hospitalization in Canada and made certain recommendations. I myself remember writing a strong letter pointing out exactly what the hon. member for York-Sunbury has just now said. But it was largely inevitable with the development of new services. There was a lot of ambition there, and there was duplication in the early stages of the war. That is exactly why this interdepartmental committee on hospitalization was formed. That is their exact function. Their duty is to prevent duplication and, in consultation with our department, to develop a long-range policy so that we shall be able, when the war is over, to take over some of their buildings, of which they are to-day lending the staff to us in many cases, and thereby assisting this department which here and there is short of staff. So that I think, both in regard to personnel and in regard to property, there is now a pronounced improvement, and in my opinion it is a long-range policy, so much so that none of the ministers individually has the power now to develop a policy for his own department without the recommendation of this unifying and coordinating committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Which is all to the good.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think it is all to the good.

The CHAIRMAN: May I say that I have had a long day, and I should like hon. members to take note when I call them to order.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): In the debate under this item we have had some discussion on Shaughnessy and a great deal on Christie Street, and Deer Lodge hospital, located at Winnipeg, has been mentioned. It so happens that Deer Lodge hospital is in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and it is an institution in which I have always taken a great deal of interest.

As I heard the discussion to-night touching upon Christie Street hospital, an old factory with pipes sticking out all over in places where they should not be, having in general an appearance to the patient within that would tend to be depressing rather than helpful—that is, at any rate, according to what was said here this afternoon and this evening—I could not help comparing it with the very much better institution which we are fortunate enough to have at the western edge of Winnipeg. I have watched the development there over a number of years. Recently there have been some improvements, and I have been greatly pleased to see the care which has been taken in an endeavour to make a hospital which would actually have a therapeutic value for the individuals who are in it. The surroundings are not such as I have heard described relative to Christie Street hospital, and the place itself seems to be in every way better. So that I would commence by commending the department for the general development which has gone on there.

Before saying anything further with reference to that hospital on a matter which is a controversial one, I wish to record agreement with the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) in his remarks touching on a convalescent home. I believe that practically all countries agree that Canada has done an excellent job over the years in looking after its soldiers, and that Canadian pension laws are among the best, if not the best. But it really is very sad indeed to see the lot of some of these old veterans, discharged, as the hon. member for St. Boniface said, from Deer Lodge hospital or one of the other places, having the war veterans' allowance and no place to go, not thoroughly able to take care of themselves, and certainly not being able, with such a pittance, to have themselves taken care of. The department was always very good in granting domiciliary care to such persons during the difficult years before 1938, but I suppose that pressure upon the accommodation has sometimes prevented the department from doing everything which might be done for such men. I urge most strongly that the minister as soon as possible deal with the erection of a place which may be described as a convalescent home, with some sort of secondary hospital accommodation.

The hon. member for St. Boniface also mentioned that in my city there is a dispute as to whether Deer Lodge hospital should be further developed, as the department desires, or whether a wing should be added to the civilian hospital, Winnipeg General hospital. I believe that both newspapers of the city, in a reasonable and well-reasoned manner, have supported the idea of not adding to this military hospital but of adding to the civic hospital, so that eventually that hospital will benefit. I believe the hon. member for St. Boniface is right in saying that in all probability popular opinion in the city of Winnipeg would favour that idea.

I know it is always easier to agree than to dispute, and for my part it certainly would be easier to agree, because so many of my friends have the view that the department is wrong and that Deer Lodge hospital, should not be extended, but rather that extension should be made to the civic hospital, so that eventually the city would get the benefit. But members of parliament are not sent here as delegates. They must express their own views. Sometimes these will be truly representative of the district from which they come; sometimes, I suppose, they will not. At any rate, at whatever risk there may be, I must say that I think the decision of the department with regard to the building of the extension of this hospital in the way in which it is now being extended and the plans which are set down for it, is right and not wrong, and I think at this stage of development it would be wrong to try to build an extension to the Winnipeg General hospital instead of extending Deer Lodge.

Perhaps, if we could have had time at the commencement of the war to develop a policy whereby these military and pension department hospitals could have been fitted in with the general hospital scheme of the country, it would have been a good thing. At any rate that is the way it seems to me, looking at it in retrospect, and knowing it is very easy to be wise after the fact. But if we could only have foreseen the very great hospital development which would be necessary, probably we would have worked in our soldiers' hospitals with the civic hospitals throughout the country. But after we had a certain amount of development in the Department of Pensions and National Health, it was not feasible to place a section on the Winnipeg General hospital consisting of probably 200 beds and to send our men there from the army, the air force and the navy and probably some from the Department of Pensions and National Health itself.

In the first place I am reminded of this, that all of the returned men with whom I have ever spoken have objected strenuously to going into a civilian hospital. Now that is just their opinion, some person might say. Yes; it is just their opinion, it is true, but I do not know of anything that is more important in the hospitalization of troops than having the troops satisfied with the place to which they are sent, and I think the veterans, both of the last war and of this war, those men who are sick from time to time, in the army, the air force or the navy, and who have to be hospitalized, should have their opinion consulted and very great weight given to it.

That is the first reason why I think the department is right at the present time in extending the hospital rather than in building a wing to the civilian hospital. There are other reasons. If you put 200 men out of the forces in a civilian hospital you put them where their records are not, and I suggest that you have to have an administrative staff in the civilian hospital as soon as you put the patients there. If you put 200 beds in some civilian hospital and have the records of all the patients five, six or seven miles away, at the other hospital, immediately you run into all manner of problems and there will be a great deal of trouble.

I believe also that Deer Lodge having been already extended by the addition of one pavilion holding a considerable number of beds, 100 or 125, it was necessary already to put another clinical wing there, which was done, and one such step does call for another. If we could retrace our steps back to the beginning, we might make a decision in favour of establishing the military hospital as part of the civilian institution; but unfortunately after certain steps have been taken, I do not think that is any longer possible. Maybe we should have been wiser at the start, but I imagine that everyone will take his share of the blame for lack of foresight. I understand that the same problem exists in two or three other cities. Apparently it does in Victoria, and I have heard it mentioned as existing elsewhere.

Having said that much upon that one subject, I should like to direct the minister's attention to certain features of life at Deer Lodge hospital with respect to which it seems to me some correction is necessary. I know that in labour matters in the hospital the minister is not fully in control. That is to say, all matters of employment nowadays appear to be handled by one, two, three, four or five agencies. First of all, there is the minister himself; then the civil service commission; then the labour department through selective service, and finally on top of it all you have the treasury board, which gets damned here so frequently. In so far as this department can help the labour difficulties at Deer Lodge, I urge that this be done. Let me give an illustration of the sort of thing I mean. There are firemen in that hospital now doing much more work than originally they were engaged to do. There is no additional remuneration. They are firemen who are engaged, let us say, as the lowest grade type of firemen, and they find themselves pretty soon, as a result of the extension of the place, doing work that is usually called grade 3, or a higher grade of firemen. I use language in this manner only as illustrative of the problem. You have men in that hospital doing the work not of one man, not the work that one man ought to do, but two men's work, and there is no hope of relief at all. That makes for dissatisfaction. It is not good for the hospital.

There are men whose circumstances are different. I am thinking of one man in particular who was persuaded to leave a certain job on the understanding that he would get such-and-such a position in this hospital. That is a couple of years ago and he has not got it yet. Where lies the trouble? I do not believe it lies right with this department. I think that one of the superagencies has some way or another imposed a bar against this person getting what he should.

I mention these instances as illustrations of the type of thing I mean. I go to Deer Lodge hospital a great deal and I meet the people there. I suppose I know most of them by name. It is a large staff. If I do not know them all by name I know them to see them, and I must say I have found them throughout the years not a complaining class of people. But recently I have been hearing a good many such stories as the sort I have been speaking of to-night. I urge the minister to try to clear up all that kind of thing in this hospital. It may be the same somewhere else, in Christie Street, for example. I am sure the minister will agree with me that it is not the sort of thing in an institution that breeds and develops a good spirit, and if there is one place where a good spirit is needed it is in a hospital.

There are a number of other matters with reference to this hospital that could be touched upon, but I know there are many other problems besides this particular one, which is very dear to my own heart. I do not think I will extend my remarks further to discuss the other matters that might be brought forward, but I would urge upon the minister that special attention be given to these labour problems in Deer Lodge hospital, because it will redound to the credit of his department and result in better service being given to the men out of the forces already and those coming out of the forces, than whom certainly there are none who deserve better treatment.

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): I have before me order in council P.C. 1/5028 dated June 21, 1943. In this order in council, under the head "regulations", it is provided that the war veterans' allowance board may allow to the widow of a veteran compassionate allowance not exceeding $240 per annum except in such exceptional cases where the board may deem it proper to increase the amount to $300 "subject to the following conditions".

Then follow nine conditions which I do not propose to read. Section 2 of the regulations then reads:

For the purpose of these regulations "veteran" means veteran as described in subparagraphs (1) and (3) of paragraph (j) of section 2 of the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

I turn to the War Veterans' Allowance Act, which is chapter 48 of the statutes of Canada, 1930, as amended by chapter 48 of the statutes of 1936 and by chapter 16 of the statutes of 1938. Examining paragraph 2(j), subparagraphs (i) and (iii), I find that this compassionate allowance is limited to the widows of soldiers who served in the last great war, namely, the war of 1914-18.

I wish to ask the minister why that should be the case. In my opinion there is no principle upon which it can be confined to the widows of soldiers who served in that war. The widows of those who served in the Boer war should be entitled to similar treatment, for they must be even more in need of this compassionate allowance than the widows of soldiers who served in the last war, since they are older and, as a result, in most cases less able to provide for themselves. The definition of a veteran in the War Veterans' Allowance Act includes any former member of the Canadian contingent who served in South Africa during the South African war, and also any person domiciled in Canada immediately prior to the 11th day of October, 1899, who served in the forces of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in South Africa during the South African war. The widows of our Canadian soldiers who served in the Boer war should be treated just as the widows of soldiers who served in the great war are treated. I would ask the minister to give that matter consideration and see if something cannot be done to correct that situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I may deal with that point immediately, before my hon. friend proceeds further, I am very glad indeed that he brought up this matter. It may be recalled that the hon. member for Vancouver South asked me a question in this regard during a previous discussion, and I said it was certainly the intention to include the widows of veterans of the South African war. What happened was that the title of the vote was altered by an amendment, it being the intention at first to have it administered by the Canadian pension commission, and then at the request of the Canadian Legion this amendment was introduced. Inadvertently it dealt only with the veterans of the great war, but steps have already been taken to have that situation corrected, and I trust it will be corrected by a supplementary estimate. Three classes were accidently omitted: widows of veterans of the South African war, the widows of imperial soldiers who were domiciled in Canada in 1914, and the children of such widows. My hon. friend will recall that under the War Veterans' Allowance Act widowers are entitled to twice the amount given to single people.

Mr. GREEN: Is the widow with children to be so treated now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; that is the intention. These three classes were inadvertently left out when we changed the style and title of the vote in the house.

Mr. GREEN: We told the minister that night they were not covered, but he would not believe us.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend did develop certain doubts about it, and after I retired from the chamber that night I became convinced that he was right.

Mr. HAZEN: I am very glad to hear the minister say that the situation is going to be corrected along those lines. That was practically all I rose to say, but while I am on my feet I should like to support the suggestion advanced this evening by the hon. member for St. Boniface, that veterans' homes be established to care for the men of our armed forces who, on being discharged from hospital, are not capable of earning a living on account of their physical condition or on account of their age, and who have no homes. As the hon. member said, when some of these men are notified that they must leave the hospital they say, "Where am I to go? How can I live on $20 a month?"

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I may interrupt my hon. friend again, the Department of National Defence is now developing institutions like convalescent homes for the duration of the war, and in all probability this department will take over those homes when the war is finished. I believe there is now one in every province.

Mr. HAZEN: That, I hope, will be satisfactory.

There is one further matter I wish to deal with. I should like to support the statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Souris that the insurance principle should be applied to members of our armed forces who have volunteered for overseas service but who have not left the shores of Canada or, in the case of navy and air force personnel, who may have left our shores but are still stationed in Canada. The figures I am going to mention are not official, but I believe that at the conclusion of a similar period during the last war some two hundred thousand or more pensions had been granted, while up to the present time in this war I believe only some thirteen thousand pensions have been granted. Of course in many respects this war is different from the last one; the casualties have not been as high and they are not likely to be as high; but apart from it being the right thing to do, I think the government could easily afford to introduce the insurance principle in connection with members of our armed forces who have volunteered for overseas but who remain in Canada. Any man who volunteers for service overseas and who sustains injuries which result in disability, or whose health is affected while serving in Canada, should be entitled to a pension while incapacitated, provided his injury or illness was not caused by failure to obey orders or by his own misconduct. If death ensues as a result of such injury or illness, provision should be made for the dependents. It seems to me that this is the least this country can do.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Recently I received a letter from one of my constituents who told me that he was a veteran of the last war with an eighty per cent pension for gunshot wounds and nerve deafness. He sought relief in what is commonly called a hearing aid. He went to an electrical concern in Victoria, and for that hearing aid he was asked the sum of $189. I placed the matter before the officials of the department of pensions and was gratified to receive a reply in the next mail stating that this man had been communicated with and directed to report to Shaughnessy hospital to have his hearing tested and to receive an appliance. Then, as I understand it, the department is evolving an improved and extended system of testing for deafness and eventually hopes to establish stations at the principal centres, in order that proper tests may be conducted and hearing appliances provided. I am also informed that, aside from the Department of Pensions and National Health, people who are afflicted with disability in their hearing are endeavouring to form a dominion-wide association, to such end that there may be some comfort or relief from their disability. The understanding is that people who suffer from deafness, because of the discouragement and distress of being unable to know what is going on in their presence, commit suicide in numbers many times greater than do those who have the disability of not being able to see. The hope is that when such organization is perfected there may flow from it the good results which have been achieved by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, under the direction of Colonel Edward Baker.

May I return to a discussion of the price of this appliance, namely $189. Not long ago I was in touch with a civil servant, grade 2, who had been supplied with one of these appliances for $160. Then, I know of a man in this building who was approached within the past week, and who was asked $175. I am quite sure hon. members will realize just how eagerly a person so afflicted will reach out for any kind of relief. The people who sell this type of apparatus are high-pressure salesmen, and they put pressure on the government, just as they do on individuals. They will approach a man in a quiet room. These salesmen will have good, clear voices, and the experience is that when the appliance is tried out under those very favourable conditions the person who is interested can hear much better. But when he goes on the street with the same appliance, and is confounded with street noises, he gets no more satisfaction from the appliance than he would if an overhead or elevated railway were running above his head.

I appeal, first of all, not to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, but to the Minister of Labour. I ask him to have the combines branch look into this matter. It is generally conceded that these prices are maintained solely by reason of the patents controlled by the manufacturers. It is all very well for a person to pay a high price for a radio. That is a luxury, and it is one's own fault if he gets stung. Nothing could be so low, however, as the vulture who, as a manufacturer, takes advantage of his patents to prey upon the afflicted, and perhaps sell them something which in a short time will become useless. I am told that every part of the apparatus in more general use is made and patented as a non-standard or irregular size. Those parts are not turned out in standard sizes or types. The plugs, terminals, tubes, sockets, amplifiers and the cases in which the batteries are placed are of such sizes that, if anything goes wrong, one must return to the company to obtain a replacement. It is impossible to make repairs otherwise.

I have gone into this matter extensively with people who understand what they are talking about. First of all, I am asking the Minister of Labour to put his combines branch to work on this matter. That may require some time. Accordingly I would go to the Minister of Finance, and request him to make inquiries of the wartime prices and trade board in order to determine just what a fair price for this instrument would be. I have been advised that I need go no further than to a man versed in electronics or to a good radio mechanic, either of whom could tell me the price for which such an instrument could be constructed. I may be wrong, but I place before the minister the information as I have obtained it.

I have said that one could obtain the information from a radio mechanic. May I point out, in passing, that at huge expense the government maintains a national research council. In their laboratories they have all the equipment for manufacturing signal outfits. To-day they are responsible for millions of dollars' worth of equipment of that kind. I am told that the signalling outfit is simply a hearing apparatus on a larger scale. Why not go to the national research council, put their engineers to work and find out at what price this apparatus can be supplied. Then let the government take hold of these patents, and pay the owners a royalty. If the patents belong to them they are entitled to some compensation. But they are not entitled to prey upon those who suffer. An affliction of that kind is bad enough; but on too many occasions a man spends his last cent of savings in the hope of getting just a little relief from the apparatus. I say the government is justified in asking the national research council to ascertain at what price this instrument can be produced. I have been told, on the very best authority, that the instrument which is in general use in Canada to-day can be sold at a profit for as little as $25—and that is very much different from $189. While it may be said I am talking at random, I am simply asking the proper authorities to have the research branch look into this matter, to ascertain just to what extent I am wrong.

There are other matters of a somewhat similar nature which require attention. I think, first, about artificial limbs. Anyone who suffers from the loss of a limb must feel the sting from the expense connected with the purchase of the relief which he must have. The government maintains such a plant, and manufactures these articles. Belts, limbs, hands, shoes and the like would be in the same category. My suggestion is that while the government has such an institution in Toronto, it might very well establish two or three across Canada. Let the government employ in such plants the men who have been conducting business independently. Pay those men good wages. They are experts in their line and are entitled to proper compensation. But I contend it is the duty of the government to see that unfortunate people are not made to suffer.

The other day I came across a poor boy who is supporting a widowed mother. He has a small job but, on account of infantile paralysis it is necessary for him to wear a special shoe with a steel support, for which he must pay $28. It is true that this may have nothing to do with the department of pensions; but I would suggest that inasmuch as this department has specialists who make these shoes, the government should be generous enough to let unfortunate people like this boy buy these at actual cost. To have to pay $28 makes a considerable dent in his little weekly cheque.

I realize that the minister's intentions in this direction are good, but I wish particularly to emphasize the importance of the government taking over these patents and providing the general public with such apparatus as may be necessary at a price which is fair and then paying an equitable royalty to the patentees.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I thank my hon. friend for his constructive suggestions. I think he largely answered himself the question which he asked in regard to hearing aids. The department has set up a board of experts who will approve all hearing devices. The intention is to issue and maintain hearing devices to those who suffer from this disability as a result of service. I think we have the newest devices and appliances available. We have also taken measures to control the prices at which these will be bought. They will be issued, without cost, to those who are pensioned for this disability.

Mr. ESLING: As Minister of Pensions and National Health, does the minister not think this service should be extended to those unfortunates who are not ex-service men?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I doubt very much if we would have jurisdiction in regard to civilians. We are primarily concerned in this department with questions of pensions. We have certain fields of jurisdiction in connection with health, but I doubt if we would have any power to take such action at the present time.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was sorry I was not here on June 18 when the question of grants to widows of ex-service men came up. It was found necessary to reduce the qualifications from eighty per cent disability to fifty per cent, but I think it might have been reduced to thirty per cent. These women are getting older, and I do not like the principle of making this appear like charity when it is their right. A short time ago the hon. member for Brantford City referred to Toronto General and Christie Street hospitals and tried to compare them as far as noise in the immediate vicinity was concerned. They are not comparable. The Toronto General hospital is of fireproof, concrete construction. It is true that there is some noise from College street during the day when the windows are open, but you do not get that noise at night.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): They go to bed early in Toronto.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Some of them do. Perhaps, when the hon. gentleman comes to Toronto he has nothing to do and has to go to bed. I do not think the impression that these two places are comparable should be allowed to get abroad because they are not. Christie Street hospital was originally built as a factory; it is mill construction. One thing that has not been mentioned and that is very important is the number of trains that pass there. The hon. member said that when he was in Christie Street hospital he did not find it so bad, but conditions then were not like what they are to-day. There were not hundreds of trains passing at that time.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I did not make any such statement.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I thought the hon. gentleman said that, but some one did. Conditions to-day are entirely different from what they were before. Think of the traffic there is passing along those lines and the traffic that will continue to pass until the end of the war. I venture to say that a large train passes there at least every half hour, and then there is shunting and other traffic. I should like the minister to tell me how many trains pass there per day or per hour. I want to know how thorough this survey was. I want to know whether he or any of those who made the survey ever visited the hospital and spent a couple of days there to see what conditions were like. Did they spend a night there? There is a bridge factory quite close where riveting is going on all the time. I visit that hospital a great deal and I do not think the survey that was made was complete. It is true that we shall probably have to continue using Christie Street hospital because we are short of beds, but to spend $500,000 for, I believe, 340 beds—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Over 400.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. member for Brantford City said that this would have to be done as an emergency. Office space has been required in Ottawa and we have put up temporary buildings of one kind and another. The Department of National Defence built a hospital at Camp Borden containing about a thousand beds. I do not think that cost any $500,000, even fully equipped, and it is a good hospital. If we have to have temporary hospitals, let us have them, but do not let us put up a permanent structure in a factory district where there are all kinds of noise all the time.

Can the minister state what locations have been offered by the city of Toronto? What is the construction of this hospital to be? Will he tell me anything further that he can in connection with the survey? I do not suppose this is the time to discuss the question of salaries paid to the staff, because that would come under non-war estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The building proposed will be of fireproof construction and will contain 460 beds. I have no information as to the number of trains that pass in a day. The experts who were there made a most thorough survey. They were men of the highest calibre, as will be seen by looking at their names which appear in the return tabled the other day. There were also members of the staff who live in the hospital and whose opinion should have some weight.

I have listened to the debate to-day, and with but one exception I cannot complain of the tone or tenor of the debate. I am largely in sympathy personally with many of the sentiments which have been expressed with reference to Christie Street hospital. If one listened to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) one would think that I was the author of some enormity known as Christie Street hospital, whereas it was a legacy which I received from the government of which he was a strong supporter. I am far from advocating that this is an ideal location. On going through the order in council passed in 1918 I found that the city of Toronto actually offered a site in High Park as an alternative to Christie street, but that was rejected by those who were advising the government of the day.

The proposed extension is urgent; it is required immediately, it is imperative that it be built. At the present time, on account of the difficulty with regard to priorities it would be impossible to commence the building of a large hospital in a preferable place. That is the simple fact. In the second place, we could not have a duplication of staff at the present time because we could not get the trained personnel. As I said previously this evening, we are being assisted by national defence services who are supplying some staff to help with the more serious cases in our own hospitals. These are the two major reasons. I can see no possibility of commencing a major hospital at the present time. We have been in consultation with the authorities in the city of Toronto and have offered to send our officers to confer with the city authorities about a site and possibly to draw up plans so that they will be ready at the proper time. That, in my judgment, would be immediately after the war is concluded. The hospital could be constructed as a priority construction project on the site which the city of Toronto and the soldier organizations consider the most suitable. At the present time, however, no matter what my wishes may be, and I am as sympathetic as any hon. gentleman who has spoken in favour of better facilities, it is absolutely impossible to do anything but what we are doing in regard to this extension costing $500,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister speaks of the drawing up of plans and the selection of a site for a new hospital to be built at the conclusion of hostilities. Has he any information to give to the committee as to how long it would take, after the conclusion of hostilities, to erect a hospital and put it into operation fully equipped to handle perhaps the large numbers of men who will have to be hospitalized during this war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think it would take at least two years to construct a hospital of the dimensions mentioned. I might say that there is other hospital accommodation in the vicinity of Toronto. The national defence department has a hospital at Oakville. We are to build an occupational centre on the lake shore, with about 400 beds. We have also recently purchased from the Oddfellows' association in Toronto a 200-bed hospital. So that there will be during the war many supplementary hospitals. Chorley Park is also being used as a hospital.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister not think the problem, which he is facing now and which he readily admits, and which I think has been pretty well established by the addresses made by hon. members who have taken a great interest in this problem, will become more acute than it is now as the war progresses?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think so. With this extension and the supplementary facilities, I think we shall be able to meet any problem that arises. We have envisaged a certain reserve capacity in all our hospitals and I believe we can meet any situation that will develop.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. STIRLING: As to the extension am I right in supposing that the proposal is to build stories on top of the present building?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is a new wing.

Mr. STIRLING: An entirely new wing. Is it to be a one-storey building alongside the large building there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It goes over the top of the kitchen.

Mr. STIRLING: Then it is proposed to build other stories on top of the existing foundation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. STIRLING: With regard to that foundation, am I right in supposing that when it was laid down it was built with the idea of carrying a great deal more than its present load?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask where these sites are that were offered by the city? I understand that three were offered by the city.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not one so far.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How much would it cost per bed to build a hospital that would be a temporary structure, not permanent like what is proposed to-day? I have another suggestion. There are many clubs around the city of Toronto which might be used for convalescent homes. I am sure that the citizens who belong to these clubs, golf clubs and so on, that are not too far out of the city, would be only too glad to let the department have the use of them. There was a great friend of mine in Christie Street hospital for about fifteen or twenty years only because he did not have any other place to go. It seems to me that with very little staff some of these clubs could accommodate a lot of beds. There is one hospital in Rosedale at the present time under the Department of National Defence, and the old government house in Toronto is also being used as a hospital. I cannot see the point in putting up a permanent building, in view of the length of time it would take to build a fireproof building on the present site and the difficulty of getting materials and labour. I think it would take a very long time to build, and I suggest that temporary buildings be put up instead of a permanent structure.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: The minister has been speaking of the difficulty of getting materials, of priorities and such matters. May I ask what progress is being made in the building of a soldiers' unit in the University hospital at Edmonton? I hope that is one hospital that will be satisfactory. The hospital is a wing of a civilian hospital there. It is in a district well chosen, quite easy to get at, and an easy place for relatives and friends to visit. It has been overcrowded. I saw the blueprints a short time ago, and I believe the money has been voted. When will it be completed? Might I make one suggestion. There is plenty of territory around there for convalescent homes. Convalescent homes of the cottage type might be built near the soldiers' wing in Edmonton.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The specifications are about completed for the Edmonton extension, and the contract will be advertised in about a month from now.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): A return that was brought down, sessional paper 327, shows that there are women in Christie Street hospital. Can the minister tell me how many there are there, and in this new addition will there be a separate wing set aside for women?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I understand that there are twenty women there, but most of them have been removed from Christie Street to Chorley Park.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is that the only place where women of the armed forces are treated?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In every district they are receiving treatment.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There is no special hospital for them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): This item amounts to $4,225,000 and is described as being for "treatment and pension examinations—members and ex-members of the defence forces (present war)." This very item brings up, I think, the key problem with regard to the men who are discharged from the forces. For that reason I am sorry that the minister has not seen fit to explain the stand of the government with regard to a suggestion that has been made by many of the members of the house to-day that the insurance principle should be reinstated in dealing with pension applications from men who have not served beyond Canada. So many men have been discharged from the forces during the present war as medically unfit. I think every member of the house has found it difficult to understand why such a large number of men taken in as category A should become unfit during their service in the forces. Yet that is the case. Thousands and thousands of men have been taken in as category A and discharged as category E, but only a very small proportion of them have been able to qualify for pension. I am not blaming that particularly on the minister's department; I think perhaps it was because of the law; and I suggest that the law should be altered. As the minister knows, throughout the whole of the last war the men in the forces were protected by this insurance principle. That principle is to be found in section 11, subsection 1, paragraph (a) of the Pension Act, which states in effect that a man can get a pension where the injury or disease or aggravation thereof—and "aggravation thereof" is important with regard to disease, particularly—was attributable to or was incurred —these are the key words, "or was incurred"— during such military service. In other words, in the last war, if men were taken in as fit, and they became unfit on account of injury or disease, whether they served in Canada or overseas, they were entitled to a pension. The same principle applied during the present war up to and including May 20, 1940. At the outbreak of war the government by order in council made that principle applicable. But then, for some reason or another, a change was made, and now the insurance principle applies only where a man has served out of Canada; if he has served within Canada only he must show that his injury or his disease or the aggravation thereof arose out of or was directly connected with military service. I know in my own experience, particularly in the case of disease, time after time the man cannot qualify for a pension. He enlists category A; he comes out category E, perhaps disabled for life, but he cannot qualify for a pension. One cannot explain that to the public, nor can one explain it to the man. People take the view, "This man was perfectly fit when he enlisted; he has been in the army and has come out unfit; he should get some pension." I suggest to hon. members that this provision must be changed, and changed without any further delay.

We had an argument about that in the committee on returned soldier problems which sat in 1941, I think it was. As a result a compromise was reached and subsection 3 of section 11 of the Pension Act was inserted. That deals only with hardship cases, where a man is in necessitous circumstances and where his disability is serious; in the discretion of the commission he may be awarded some pension; the commission also has discretion as to the amount. Some cases have been covered under that section, so that it was of benefit. But I suggest that the time has now come to go the whole length and restore the insurance principle to the pension law of Canada. I suggest to the minister that where a man enlists, is qualified to go overseas, and is ready to go overseas, or in other words is regarded by the public as ready to go and do the fighting, that man should be covered by the insurance principle. I do not ask it for the men who are going to stay in Canada, but on behalf of the men who enlist to go and fight.

I do not want to weary hon. members, but there was a return brought down on April 1, 1943, order No. 98, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Lake Centre. It shows that, as of December 31 last year, 64,401 men had been discharged from the three forces as medically unfit. Of that number, 57,118 were men who had served only in Canada. The same return shows that, as of January 31, 1943, just a month later than the army figures, there had been only 3,286 pensions granted and another 1,500 had been allowed but were not actually in payment, making a total of 4,786.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is 7,000 now.

Mr. GREEN: Well, there have been more men discharged since those dates.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes.

Mr. GREEN: And of course more pensions have been granted. But the proportion is very, very small. My submission is that that shows there is something wrong with our pension law as it stands at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: All the 64,000 must have been A category when they went in.

Mr. GREEN: I asked a question back in March to get that information. An order was passed on March 29, but I have not yet got the answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Does my hon. friend say that an order affecting our department was passed in March?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. GREEN: On March 29 an order was passed for an answer to these questions by myself:

1. How many men who were taken on the strength of the Canadian army as being in category "A" have been discharged as category "E"?
2. Of this number, how many became category "E" during service abroad?

In other words, they would be covered by the insurance principle.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is another department.

Mr. GREEN: The next question:

3. How many of the last-mentioned group have been granted pensions?
4. How many have been granted pensions who became category "E" during service in Canada?

I have not yet been able to get an answer to those questions.

This defect in the pension law has a further result. The man who is discharged as medically unfit is handicapped in getting treatment. If he gets a pension he is entitled to treatment, but in other cases he can get treatment, I believe, only for a period of a year. I believe he can now get free treatment for a year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Every discharged man can. But in some cases a man cannot be cured in a year. I have on my desk now the papers in the case of a man who has had to take expensive treatments running for more than a year, and he is unable—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He can get treatment to the completion of the treatment.

Mr. GREEN: This man has been unable to get it. The treatments were stopped at the end of the year. I took the matter up with the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Could I have the details of that case?

Mr. GREEN: I will give the minister the case. If these men had been granted pensions they would get the treatment.

Finally, one other point which I wish the minister would clear up is with regard to the programme for reconditioning men. We were told about a year ago last Easter that there was some great plan on foot for reconditioning men. If a man had hernia or some other trouble which could be cured, he was to be taken in to a departmental hospital and treated so that he would become fit. We have never been able to find out just what was done along that line. I wish the minister would tell us now how far the government has got with this reconditioning programme, both for men who were about to enlist and for men who were already in the forces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In regard to reconditioning cases, of course that is no longer proceeding under this department. There is a subsequent order in council to which I referred the other day, whereunder they are taken in in lower categories, and this work is being carried out under national defence department auspices. That is under order in council 2291 and order in council 2229. Up to January 1, 1943, there were 689 cases altogether.

Mr. GREEN: How many was it expected would be treated under that provision? We thought there were going to be a good many thousands.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have no estimate now.

Mr. GREEN: Has the plan broken down, or is it being carried on actively?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It has been taken over by another department and the reconditioning is done direct by national defence.

Mr. GREEN: What about this Pension Act and the insurance principle?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is an old question of discussion between my hon. friend and myself.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister would agree with me if he could speak sub rosa, or under the table.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I will not contradict my hon. friend on that point at all. My hon. friend knows that we discussed it thoroughly, as he mentioned, in 1941. Without a question of doubt a substantial body of opinion in the country favours the adoption of the insurance principle, and among ex-servicemen themselves, I believe, opinion is more or less unanimous, as indicated at various conventions of ex-servicemen.

I think the broadening we were able to effect in 1941 did a tremendous amount of good. About ten per cent of the cases were allowed under section 11, subsection 3. Of the 7,000, roughly 719 were allowed, which has proved to be beneficial in difficult cases. My hon. friend is aware that we did extend substantially the definition of theatre of active war, so that the only people excluded to-day from the insurance principle are those who never left Canada. Those who go overseas and come back are protected for the rest of their service in Canada until the conclusion of the war, and in regard to the air force, the navy and the army, they are all protected outside Canada and in certain cases, as referred to by my hon. friend, within Canada, although those cases are not likely to arise.

Whether the insurance principle should be adopted or not is a question of government policy on which I am not free to say more than I have said, but I am fully aware of the demand for it, especially on the part of ex-servicemen, and my sympathies might be strongly in favour of it if I were free to express them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to add a word to the discussion that has taken place between the member for Vancouver South and the Minister of Pensions. Speaking as a returned man, I am pleased to hear the hon. member for Vancouver South echo my own thought, that the returned men generally could hardly hope to have a more sympathetic minister handling the affairs of this department than the present Minister of Pensions and National Health. We are all agreed that he is moved by a great desire to be not only fair but very generous, and that is as it should be in our attitude to the men who enlist for active service.

I suggest to the minister that in this particular war the ability to determine health conditions and the true category of enlisted men is much greater than it was in the last war. I can see that in the last war, owing to the difficulty which the medical officers had in examining men on enlistment, there would be some cases that would be open to doubt whether the injury or illness had resulted from service conditions. But in this particular war, it seems to me, we have so improved the X-ray examinations and other methods now known to medical science as to exclude the possibility of certain physical weaknesses not being detected, and we have taken such great care in the application of these new safeguards against men getting into the armed services who are not physically fit that I, like the hon. member for Vancouver South, feel that the time has come definitely when this country should embark upon the insurance principle which he has discussed so ably. As a returned man and a member of the Liberal party, I join with him in urging the minister to continue the struggle to have that principle adopted, knowing how difficult it is for the individual to discharge the onus of substantiating his case before any tribunal if the facts are difficult to ascertain. On the other hand, the department has the records and all the ability to determine at the time of enlistment a man's physical condition, and having given him a category and accepted his services, we should assume the responsibility that goes with that acceptance and see that the principle is adopted as a basic principle in the Canadian treatment of soldiers, sailors and airmen on active service.

Mr. EDWARDS: I would be heartily in favour of what has been advocated by the two previous speakers but for the doubts and misgivings I have arising out of the high proportion numerically of those who have been mustered out of the army, the navy and the air force within a comparatively short time after their enlistment. Those figures would surely give a layman an impression contrary to that suggested by the hon. member for Swift Current.

Mr. GRAHAM: I believe there is a provisional period that still permits of further examination, and some of those figures will refer to those persons who are further examined and found not to be in a proper state of health.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is of recent origin, I am told by my advisers. In regard to those discharged, it is only fair to point out that up to March 31, 1943, 19·5 per cent in the army had less than three months' service, 42·9 per cent had less than six months and 69·4 per cent had less than one year's service.

Mr. GREEN: And over one year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is 30·6 per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS: On the basis of those figures it does seem to me that if you are to adopt the insurance principle, using that term in its best sense, there would need to be considerable tightening up in the medical examination of the men at the time they are inducted into the Canadian army. The fact that there is such a high proportion suggests to my mind at least that the medical examination of these men at the time they were inducted into the service was not of the kind to which the hon. member for Swift Current has referred; otherwise surely there would not be those numbers or that proportion of men discharged from the army in category E within such comparatively short periods. It seems to me inconceivable that a proper medical examination would not have disclosed a much higher proportion of those who were diseased or suffering from other disabilities than the records apparently show. I think there is some criticism to be directed to the medical officers in the three armed services who admitted these men. I had an example of one man who was certainly away over the age limit specified during the first year of the war, who got as far as England and was then returned to this country. In speaking to him in an effort to help him I said, "It is perfectly obvious, sir, that you have one eye that is bad; I would judge that probably you cannot see out of that eye." He admitted that this was correct. Then I said, "The question naturally arises, how did you get by?" The suggestion was that he had memorized the chart and was able to fool the medical officer.

Mr. BLAIR: Did he falsify his age?

Mr. EDWARDS: I have not the slightest doubt he did, and in that he was aided and abetted by others in the armed forces, a practice which is not unknown to old soldiers. He was a fine patriotic citizen, but the fact that he was permitted to pass, I believe, three medical examinations before he was eventually sent back to this country as unfit for service raised doubts in my mind as to the propriety of the medical examinations that are given brave men who offer their lives in the service of their country. I think the figures quoted disprove the foundation for the argument advanced by the hon. member for Swift Current. But it was not with respect to that that I rose to question the minister. I was prompted by the question directed to the minister by the hon. member for Edmonton East. I did not know this department had a wing of the civic hospital, which, apparently, it built and operates or to which it contributes. In Calgary we are fortunate in having what we are led to believe will be, when completed, one of the most modern and most completely equipped hospitals to be found anywhere in Canada or perhaps on this continent, for all of which we are duly grateful and appreciative. I commend the minister and his department for having provided, even at this late date, a fine hospital for our pensioners. I think it was a disgrace that the building on 8th avenue should have been used as a hospital all these years; I am sure the rents paid would have been sufficient to build two or three first class hospitals.

I come now to a question which has bothered me, as a result of the discussion which has been precipitated here by hon. members from the fair city of Toronto, in regard to the location of these hospitals. I was of opinion not only that the hospital in Calgary was badly located from every point of view, but that the new hospital might properly have been located where I, as a layman, naturally would think a hospital should be situated—in some place with broad grounds, away from the noise, dust, smoke and distraction of city life. But every doubt or misgiving that I had in regard to the location of the new hospital in Calgary was answered, to my satisfaction at least, by one consideration, namely, the representations of the pensioners themselves. When the Canadian Legion and the representatives of these invalid soldiers come forward and say, "We want a hospital, not out in the foothills, not out on the shores of a lake but as centrally located as we can get it, so that we may have access to the movies and to the attractions afforded by a downtown district, where we will be readily accessible to our friends and relatives who want to come and see us," that settles it for me. When I am told by the men and women whose duty it is to wait upon these soldiers that the men undergoing treatment want to be downtown in the city, for the reasons I have mentioned, I say that where the soldiers want it is where it shall be, as far as I am concerned. I believe that that consideration should outweigh all others, because if the soldier undergoing treatment would be unhappy or lonesome, no matter how beautiful the grounds might be in some remote district, where his friends would have difficulty in getting to him and he would not see the people going by, then I say the wish of the soldiers should determine the location of the hospital. I should like to hear some expression from the minister as to what the soldiers undergoing treatment in Christie Street hospital have to say with regard to the location of the hospital and what they would say if, as has been advocated, the hospital should be located six or eight miles from downtown Toronto.

I should like the minister to state also the policy of his department in regard to the suggestion I have heard enunciated and which I would understand has been carried out in some cases at least, that at certain points his department cooperates with the municipal authorities in building additions to civic hospitals, and under what circumstances that will be done, if at all. I am reminded now that at the time the new hospital in Calgary was being considered, very strong representations were made to the department that it might well cooperate with the city of Calgary in building a new civic hospital, so that I should like to know whether there is any principle underlying the policy of the department of not going into partnership with municipal authorities in the construction of hospitals for pensioners.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In the first place the policy of the department is to utilize as far as possible the hospitals they have had through the years, and to extend them, because as a rule the men themselves prefer those hospitals to any others. In the second place, where the pension department has no hospital facilities at the present time, we may agree, as we have done in two instances already—in Edmonton and in Ottawa—to take steps to extend existing hospital facilities in these places. That step is in contemplation at one other point at the present time, but that only happens where there are no hospitals of our own as such.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot let the argument of the hon. member for Calgary West go unanswered. He suggests that my argument in favour of the insurance principle is not borne out, because some figures might seem to indicate that medical officers employed by the government may not have performed their duties thoroughly in examining men who offered themselves for enlistment. I submit that his very statement, accepting his inferences as correct, places the onus still more squarely upon the government and this country. What is the position? In a moment of patriotism a man comes to offer himself for enlistment in the service of his country. Such men know that if they were accepted they will have to give up their ordinary work and leave their homes. I do not think it is possible for any person to say what will be the result of service in a theatre of war, particularly to those who were not examined thoroughly enough to have any defects discovered; but I believe the principle should be recognized that the onus is on the country to say to that man, when he appears to enlist, "You are well enough to undergo the service we expect of you" or, after examination, "You are not fit to undergo that, and therefore you can not enlist and must return to your civilian environment and occupation". But if we as a country accept the man in a given category, despite the fact that the medical officers who examined him may have been careless, or even derelict in their duty, I think the onus is upon us, and that no man can thereafter say just how much that man's disability has been increased by reason of active service. Certainly it would be unfair to the individual to say, "We made a mistake; we were careless in our examination. We should never have accepted you. And because of that we refuse to accept the responsibility of recognizing that your duties may have added to your physical disabilities." So that I do not think the argument advanced by the hon. member for Calgary West in any way changes the principle I urged upon the minister as one which should be recognized in dealing with those who enlist in our armed forces.

Mr. COLDWELL: In the discussion I have heard I agree with the hon. member for Swift Current. However, that is not what I rose particularly to say. I understand the minister has allowed a great deal of latitude in the discussion of this item, and as I have been unable to be in the house because of other matters perhaps I might be permitted to say a few words on another problem. I wanted to bring the attention of the minister again to a condition which exists by reason of the number of medical men taken into the army, particularly from our rural districts in the west.

I have heard medical men say that if our armed services had one medical service; if it were united instead of being divided four ways, there would be ample medical attention for both the armed forces and the civilian population. I know that during the winter the minister made every effort to meet the conditions in the rural areas, and for that I wish to thank him. However, his efforts were unsuccessful. I am thinking of the situation which applied in my own constituency at Lucky Lake, a very large area in which there are some 7,000 people and two or three hospitals, but no doctor, no nurse and no medical aid of any description. During last winter, which was a bitter and a long one, there were occasions when people were actually unable to get medical assistance before they died. This is a very serious situation, and one which exists not only in my own province, but also in other provinces, including that represented by the minister himself. I am wondering if some plan cannot be worked out whereby aid could be given to the rural districts to relieve this situation. It is indeed a terrible situation when we find people living twenty, thirty and forty miles away from a doctor, sometimes in communities where there are hospitals, and yet unable to obtain attention when that attention is needed.

I am not criticizing the minister, because I know that in the past winter he did endeavour to relieve the situation, but without success. It is true that, owing to the fact that medical men have moved away from some of the cities, others have gone in to take their places. I am told by medical men —of course, usually by the well-established ones—in these large cities that there are quantities of doctors in the cities, and that the men who are coming in are really not needed in those areas.

One hesitates to suggest that anything in the nature of compulsion should be exercised. However, we are exercising compulsion in respect of men required to join the army, and it seems to me that if voluntary efforts fail we shall have to work out some scheme of compulsion applied to medical men and nurses, so that they may be placed in districts where they are needed, districts in which the emoluments and living conditions may not be quite so attractive. Would the minister say a word on this point?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I thank the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar for bringing this matter to the attention of the committee. We had some correspondence in the winter months about the situation in Saskatchewan. Since that time I have been reading some dispatches describing the condition in the United States. I find that the situation in parts of that country was much more intense than it has been in Canada. The trouble has been, first of all, on account of doctors moving away from the country to the cities. That difficulty is pronounced. For instance, the city of Winnipeg, with the greatest number of medical enlistments of any part of Canada, has actually more doctors at the present time than it had before the war. The medical procurement board has been conducting a national survey, as my hon. friend knows. I understand that the report has nearly been completed or is about to be completed, and that it deals with this situation. However, I have not yet seen the report myself, and I do not know what has been recommended.

In Australia compulsion has been exercised, giving medical doctors the rank of major. They have been compelled to serve in districts where they were required. Similar action has been taken in Great Britain, so that doctors might be moved to certain places, and I understand such action is about to be taken in the United States. That may be the only remedy in Canada, unless we succeed in meeting the situation in another way.

Our conditions have been greatly helped by defence service doctors who assist us in the hospitals. But the greatest difficulty has been experienced in remote areas, like Lucky Lake. However, I shall look into the report on the matter and see if there is any further information I can give my hon. friend at a later date.

Mr. MARSHALL: Will the minister make a statement with respect to the future policy of the government in connection with the Colonel Belcher hospital?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I forgot to answer the hon. member. I believe his question was as to what future use would be made of the old Colonel Belcher hospital? I understand that as soon as the other one is opened, about September, it will be used as an emergency hospital for emergency cases, and that later on it will probably be used for administrative headquarters, and for other purposes.

Mr. MARSHALL: I understand it is under lease?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. MARSHALL: How long has the lease to run?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): One year still remains in the lease.

Item agreed to.

Treatment, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, $110,000.

Mr. SHAW: Since this appropriation of $110,000 is a war appropriation, I would assume it does not apply to the regular members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force. We know that following the outbreak of the war many of the old ex-members of the force were invited to rejoin the service for a period of one year at a time. Then, certain special constables were taken on strength to act as guards. Does this appropriation apply only to men who have been taken on temporarily since the outbreak of war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is more or less correct. That is the explanation why there is a vote in the war appropriation measure. There is another one in the civil estimates.

Mr. SHAW: On what basis is assistance given to those individuals so employed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The same treatment as for constables. The basis of the estimate is as follows:

The estimated per capita cost of treatment for members of the force is $25 per annum.

2,550 regular members of the force at $25 per capita	$ 63,750
500 new members at $25 per capita	12,500
2,500 special constables (veterans) at $12.50 per capita	31,250
150 special constables (security service), at $12.50 per capita	1,875
Unforeseen expenses	625
Total	$110,000

The families of these men are not entitled to free medical attention; the per capita cost is, therefore, approximately one-half.

Mr. SHAW: The first figure refers to regular members of the force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, regular members, taken on as a result of the war.

Item agreed to.

Pensions, defence forces, fishermen, seamen, special constables R.C.M.P., civil servants, auxiliary services and A.R.P. workers, $3,500,000.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister tell us how many in each classification are receiving pension, and how the vote is split up ?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The figures for last year are as follows:

Mariners	284
Fishermen	nil
Mariners—supplementary	38
Fishermen—supplementary	nil
Auxiliary service	1
Civilian employees	4
R.C.M.P. special constable guards	nil

R.C.A.F.—R.A.F.	550
	6,294
C.W.A.C.	3
R.C.A.F.	2

Mr. GREEN: Is that the total number getting pensions as of June 1, 1943?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The return is dated June 1, but it gives the situation as of March 31, 1943. The amounts are:

Pensions—
Active	$2,252,385 35
Reserve	22,720 29
Seamen	183,460 63
Auxiliary services	1,244 04
Civilian employees	2,188 49

R.C.A.F. (W.D.)	133 22
	$2,759,871 27

Mr. GREEN: What about the navy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They are included in the active forces.

Mr. GREEN: Are the fishermen, airmen, special R.C.M.P. constables, civil servants, members of the auxiliary services, A.R.P. workers covered by the same order in council?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Several orders in council have been tabled, but there is a specific one for each branch.

Mr. GREEN: Are the terms different in each case?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think they are.

Mr. GREEN: How about the amounts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am told that they vary in some cases, but not substantially.

Mr. CHURCH: I am surprised that this particular portion of the pensions scheme is just $700,000 less than the scheme to provide for those who are overseas fighting. This subdivision covering defence forces, fishermen, seamen, civil servants, special constables and A.R.P. workers contains a vote of $3,500,000, and the item for those who are actively engaged is only $4,225,000. How many A.R.P. workers are getting pensions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): None at all as yet.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do all those covered by this item receive pensions on account of disabilities suffered in military action?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Either caused by enemy action or while on duty.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would that apply to fishermen as well?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Enemy action.

Item agreed to.

Investigations—dependents allowance board, $80,000.

Mr. SHAW: I understand that the field men, in my part of the country at least, or supervisors of the soldiers' settlement board, carry on investigational work for the dependents' allowance board. In certain instances they are given the authority to appoint representatives in various communities to make investigations for them. I understand that these special investigators are paid on the basis of so much per investigation. I am not satisfied with that arrangement. I feel that a supervisor for the soldiers' settlement board has his hands full with soldier settlement work. I do not wish to cast any reflection upon any individual supervisor, but in many cases these men have developed a certain type of mentality as a result of having dealt with soldier settler problems. They have built up certain prejudices from dealing with returned soldiers, and very frequently this is reflected in the treatment recommended for applicants for dependents' allowances. Since we have the new Veterans' Land Settlement Act I feel that these supervisors or field men, whatever you like to call them, should not be asked to undertake inspection work for the dependents' allowance board. I believe the two things should be kept separate and apart.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is done to a lesser degree to-day than it was formerly, but it is really a question of manpower and our having to use what we can get. We have rendered similar services to the soldier settlement board. I think the point of view advanced by my hon. friend would be the ideal one.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I believe you are paying the children's aid society $2.50 per investigation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Per case.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In some cases that really is not enough.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The provision for the cost of investigations carried out by the departmental staff is at the rate of $2.50 per case, but provision is also made for the payment to social agencies who carry on similar investigations at the rate of $3,50, plus travelling expenses in both cases.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There are some cases where they have to go back two or three times.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We pay for that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know that the children's aid societies throughout Canada have had to take on extra staff on account of the work they are doing for the department, and I think a great deal of praise is due them for what they have done.

Item agreed to.

Post-discharge reestablishment—payment of out-of-work benefits (P.C. 7633), $400,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Could the minister give us the amount paid out last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The amounts are as follows:

Out-of-work benefits	$ 65,781 12
Vocational training	87,175 53
Farmers or others awaiting returns, benefit No. 3	12,295 92
Temporarily incapacitated benefit No. 4	113,831 21
Educational, benefit No. 5	4,872 58
	$283,956 36

The number of beneficiaries was 9,579.

Item agreed to.

Sundry services, $15,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: What does this cover?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Treatment of Canadian fishermen and seamen, $1,000; committee on demobilization, $9,000; contingency fund for temporary assistance, ex-members of the forces, $5,000.

Mr. MARSHALL: There is a sum of money included for the demobilization committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. MARSHALL: What are the names of the members of the committee, and how much has been allotted for that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The amount this year is $9,000; last year it was $8,000. It is to provide for a secretary at $6,000; a stenographer at $1,380, and sundry office expenses, transportation and travelling expenses of the committee's staff and consultants.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the name of the secretary?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Robert England.

Item agreed to.

Health Branch.
Air raid precautions, $6,589,650.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): On what item may we discuss vitamin B in Canada approved flour?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On the vote for laboratory analyses and services under the health branch.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Thank you.

Mr. CHURCH: I have had considerable correspondence with the minister regarding air raid precautions. With all due respect, there should be some revision in central Canada of this work. The government has given a lot of money to the provinces and municipalities for equipment in connection with A.R.P. work. No doubt they have done a great deal of good in connection with the war so far, especially on the two coasts and on the St. Lawrence, but in central Canada they have gone too far altogether with blackouts of one hour's duration. We had one in Toronto on the zero night, January 27. In England, which has now almost achieved air supremacy, and where there was a real need for air raid precautions, Mr. Morrison, the Home Secretary, made a statement in the British House of Commons last January that blackouts were to be curtailed and more lights permitted on the streets.

I have had a lot of correspondence with the minister regarding the very elaborate system of blackouts that we have had in the central cities in Canada, in the Toronto and Ottawa districts, and other places in the province of Ontario where there is now practcally no danger. Some people have been talking for years of an invasion by air from the north, from Hudson bay. I see that Mayor LaGuardia, who is on the joint defence board, made a statement in Edmonton to-day that there is no danger now of air raids from Japan on this continent. What he knows about it I do not know, but he is a member of the famous joint defence board. What I say is that this air raid precautions work should have been under the control of the military authorities in the different military divisions if there were any grave danger to the civilian population. When the war started I doubt whether there was a gas mask in many of the districts in Canada.

I think we should have a statement from the government with respect to these hour-long black-outs, which take up so much of the time of the police force and take county judges away from their judicial duties. Some of the police force spend two-thirds or all of their time on this work of air raid precautions, so much so that they have not the time to attend to their proper functions of protecting the civilian population, with the result that several people have been killed on the highways by cars travelling at excessive rates of speed when there were not sufficient police to attend to their heavy civilian and other police duties. But now those in authority are beginning to hearken to the call. Queen's Park has announced that the black-outs are to be cut down to twenty minutes or a half-hour. I think the minister should amend this order in council in this district and make a statement about the whole thing. What is the necessity in central Canada for these long black-outs which cause a lot of suffering to people in hospitals and the sick? It may be necessary and is wise to provide air raid precautions equipment for the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the St. Lawrence. I want it clearly understood that I am not criticizing the splendid work of the volunteers who engage in this work. They are patriotic people who are giving their time free, but we should have some more reasonable situation in reference to black-outs in central Canada.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the minister give us a breakdown of this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I may reply first to the hon. member for Broadview, possibly some other people share his opinions, but I certainly do not. I would like him to recall the early days of the war when the cry was practically unanimous that we were not doing enough in civilian defence, and even a year ago, faced with a menacing situation, the department which is responsible for this work was criticized for not having made ample preparations. Under the most efficient and devoted work of the late Doctor Manion, an organization has been built up of one-quarter of a million splendid voluntary workers throughout the dominion, men and women who are rendering magnificent service, and who should have the eternal gratitude of the Canadian people for the work they are doing outside of their regular working hours for the most part and doing it without any compensation whatsoever and with very little glory attached to it, their satisfaction being the knowledge that they are rendering a fine service to their country.

Most of the equipment that will be required is provided for in this year's estimates. I anticipate that later on the same amount of equipment will not be required as justifies the amount here. This equipment was ordered last year and has not yet been delivered.

In regard to the second point mentioned by the hon. member for Broadview, I agree with him as to the length of the black-outs. I think an hour's black-out is too long, but that is left entirely to the provincial authorities. There is no interference from the director's office in Ottawa in regard to the length of the black-out. The authority is delegated to the provincial premier or the provincial attorney-general as the case may be, whose officers are in liaison with the defences services. They arrange a time which they consider prudent for holding a black-out. I understand that in Toronto they have decided that in future the black-outs will not be of such long duration as the last one, which lasted one hour.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. CHURCH: I appreciate what the minister has said. So far so good. But if the minister wants to delegate these powers to the provinces and give them such wide jurisdiction over the liberty of the subject in time of war, he must take the responsibility for it. I can tell him this, that placards are put up in every residential district in every municipality in central Canada which are issued, according to the wording on them, under the authority of the minister. These long black-outs may be all right on the Pacific coast and along the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic seaboard, but there is not the same danger now in central Canada, and whoever it was announced that there might be an invasion by air from the north from Hudson bay had no basis for his apprehension, because there are no enemy bases there. A lot of it was simply ridiculous. I can tell you this, as a former chairman of the police commission of Toronto, that the police were so much occupied with all this federal work that a large number of them did not have the time to attend to their own police duties. Mounted police and others were so engaged, with the result that there was no way of checking reckless speeding all over Toronto district. Cars and trucks were passing my house all night long; they were going fifty to sixty miles an hour, and people were being knocked down and injured all over the city, while a great many police were away on this work. I ask only for more reasonable enforcement in central Canada. The minister is well meaning and the A.R.P. people are very good citizens, but they could be given more useful work of other kinds as well in the cities of central Canada such as Toronto and Hamilton, than they are doing.

As regards the order in council relating to black-outs, people of all classes have been summoned and some of them fined. Some of the fines are so large as to be ridiculous as well as inequitable. In the Toronto district the order was enforced to the letter; they were peeping in keyholes and back kitchens and all that sort of thing, whereas in England some of the streets and cars and buses are now lit up. Many people were haled to court. One of our own ministers of the crown was summoned to the police court and fined. A lot of this is not at all reasonable. I do not believe the minister himself believes in it. It has gone altogether too far. All the dominion did was hand over a whole lot of equipment. Now, some of these A.R.P. gentlemen want an increase of gasoline. It is time to make the black-out regulation more reasonable in central Canada, and the order in council should be amended to provide a curtailment of the unreasonable exercise of these powers, which are delegated by the dominion, when it should retain the power itself and hand the matter over to the various military districts all over Canada.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Can we have a break-down of the item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. I have the figures here:

Ontario		654,241 04

Mr. HAZEN: When did this commence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): From the very start of the scheme.

Mr. HAZEN: Well, when is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The commencement of the war, September, 1939.

Mr. MARSHALL: What was the amount allowed last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Allowed to provinces?

Mr. MARSHALL: No; the amount allowed for this particular item.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was $5,450,000.

Mr. HAZEN: The total amount which has been spent for respirators, if I understood the minister correctly, is $2,250,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: There are some questions I should like to ask about those respirators, or, as I think I am correct in calling them, gas masks. How many gas masks or respirators are there in the country? Who supplied them? How much was paid to each firm that supplied those respirators? Where are they kept? What steps are being taken to distribute them? Who is looking after the distribution?

When I was in Saint John about three weeks ago I saw some respirators or gas masks, which I presume were the ones that the government had obtained, on sale in the windows of some stores, and if I recollect correctly, the price was $1.75 each.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is $1.25.

Mr. HAZEN: To-day I received a letter from the common clerk of the city of Saint John enclosing a resolution which was passed by the common council of the city of Saint John on the 8th instant. I should like to bring it to the attention of the minister; it has to do with these gas masks or respirators:

> Resolved that the federal government be advised that the common council feel that respirators should be supplied free to all citizens of vulnerable areas, and that therefore neither the city of Saint John nor its citizens should be required to meet the expense incurred by the supplying of respirators but that all Canadians should share equally in this cost.

I bring this resolution to the attention of the minister in the hope that he will give it his serious consideration. I believe, although I am not speaking positively, that in Great Britain the gas masks or respirators were furnished free of charge to the citizens of certain districts. Why should the citizens of this country living in vulnerable areas be compelled to purchase these gas masks? It would appear that the government has spent, as I say, $2,500,000 for these masks, and they are not required by all Canadian citizens. There is some need for them possibly for citizens who are living in certain areas of Canada, but it seems hardly fair that in those districts where they may be required the government should ask citizens to purchase them at $1.25 each, when in other parts of Canada they will not be required. It is of course extremely difficult for many people with large families to purchase these masks at that price. It means that people who are well to do will get them while others who are not so well off will have to go without. The principle is not fair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This matter was carefully considered, and the solution adopted was to issue the masks free to those who could not afford to purchase them but to make them available at the price mentioned to those who could. The idea behind it was that greater care would be taken of the masks if people had the privilege of paying a small amount for them, if they could afford it. As to how many there are in Canada, I would rather not answer that question at the present time, if my hon. friend does not mind. They were supplied to us through the Department of Munitions and Supply. I do not know the source, but I will find that out. They are principally on both coasts and in reserve at the present time, those that have not been distributed. They have been distributed free to voluntary workers in the organization, and a certain number of civilians. It may be necessary to have a change in policy.

Progress reported.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to standing order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, the 17th July, 1943, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock a.m., and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays.

Motion agreed to.

WARTIME INFORMATION BOARD

DISSEMINATION OF NEWS OF LANDING IN SICILY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council. I intended to ask this question yesterday, but I do not think the hon. gentleman was in the house at the time, and I do not want to delay the matter further. It is in connection with a point he made in his defence of the wartime information board the day before yesterday, when at page 4722 of Hansard he stated:

The events of the last few days indicate how useful has been the cooperation of the press relations officers, the press associations, the correspondents of newspapers overseas, with the wartime information board at various points in the background, in seeing that the people of this continent got early news of the landing in Sicily, and also that the statements which were made have afterwards received early and favourable notice in the United States both in the press and over the radio.

I am informed that in the dissemination of the news of the landing in Sicily the wartime information board did not play a part, that the news came from the military press relations branches and then was disseminated in the usual way through the Associated Press and United Press and their Canadian associates, the Canadian Press and the British United Press, and other official news channels. The statement of the parliamentary assistant has caused considerable speculation, and I have noticed since preparing this question that there have been numerous editorials dealing with the matter—I see one in this morning's paper—as to what was actually meant by the phraseology the hon. gentleman used, as above mentioned. I should be glad if he would clarify his statement and indicate in what way the wartime information board played a part in the news of the landing in Sicily. I sent him notice of this question, and I should be glad to have this clarification whenever it is convenient to him.

[Later:]

Mr. GRAYDON: A few moments ago I directed a question to the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council. I did not notice at that time that he was not in his seat. Perhaps he could now give me an answer.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (Parliamentary Assistant to the President of the Privy Council): Unfortunately I did not receive my hon. friend's notice of the question before I came into the house, and I should like to take this as notice and give him an answer to-morrow.

Mr. GRAYDON: I sent my hon. friend notice of my question.

Mr. CHURCH: That department ought to be abolished.

CANADIAN FORCES

LANDING OPERATIONS IN SICILY—ANNOUNCEMENTS RESPECTING PARTICIPATION AND COMMAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question either to the Minister of National Defence or to the Prime Minister. I do so, not for the purpose of raising any controversy, but to place before the government the necessity of safeguarding Canada's place in the common war effort.

I understand that Canadian newspaper men were prevented from using the information that our first division had landed in Sicily. The Canadian Press dispatch from London last night states, under yesterday's date:

The Canadian first division which landed in Sicily last Saturday and now is fighting as part of Sir Bernard Montgomery's 8th army, has had more than three and a half years' training experience.

I am asking why announcements with respect to operations of the Canadian forces are made from London or from Washington. Does the Minister of National Defence not think that announcements regarding our Canadian commanders or Canadian troops should be made from Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The question of my hon. friend is a very natural one at this time, and one the asking of which I appreciate. He will understand, and I believe the house will understand that in these military operations, where the armed forces of three or more countries are involved, there has to be in advance careful consideration not only of the plans, but also the manner in which and the time at which matters arising out of the plans are to be announced. The procedure which is adopted is that the governments concerned receive some notice in advance of what is to be expected, and are also told that they will be advised of the time at which an announcement may be made. I think it is perfectly evident that an arrangement of that kind is essential.

But the difficult part of the whole procedure is that, of necessity, these plans are made in the first instance by the combined chiefs of staff, who meet in the United States, and also the chiefs of staff in Great Britain. They are the ones who indicate the information which is to be given out, and the time at which it is to be given out. That information is passed on to our military authorities here. From time to time additional information is sent by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to myself, personally, in a message which is marked "personal and secret" and in one or two instances "for your eye only." These are very secret communications, to keep the ministry informed of what is to be expected. They are to be kept very secret, indeed. That enables one to be prepared to make an announcement when the moment comes.

In preparing these statements the military authorities take into account what they regard as being important in the matter of secrecy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And security.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and of security—secrecy that is necessary for purposes of security.

In regard to the recent movement of troops to Sicily, our government was informed that for reasons of security it was the opinion of the military authorities in Great Britain that no reference should be made to Canadians participating in the assault upon Sicily. It is not for me to give to the house the reasons why the military authorities took that view, but the fact is that they did take it. It may be that it was felt to be inadvisable, for example, to let Germany know that Canadian troops had left Great Britain. There may have been other reasons. At any rate such information as I received indicated that the announcement would simply refer to allied forces. The first communique to be given out was to be given out practically in the following words, "Allied forces" under the command of General Eisenhower—I do not remember the exact words—have attacked Sicily. It was also mentioned that General Eisenhower would make a statement to the French people. I had advance notice of that statement. The statement General Eisenhower was to make to the French people was to the effect that "Anglo-American armed forces" had attacked Sicily.

As soon as these statements came to my notice, and to the notice of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), we immediately communicated with the military authorities in Great Britain, pointing out that since we knew our forces were participating, Canada should be specifically mentioned. I asked and urged very strongly that the announcement should refer to "British, United States and Canadian forces" and that the announcement made to the French people by General Eisenhower should not be in the terms "Anglo-American forces" but rather in the terms "Anglo-American-Canadian forces." Might I add that I did that two days before the announcement was made. If I recollect aright, the announcement was made about midnight on Friday, and this was done on Thursday morning, when I had the first intimation. I took steps immediately by communicating with the High Commissioner for Canada, asking him to assist our military authorities in obtaining permission for the making of an announcement here, the moment the assault took place, that Canadians were among the forces attacking Sicily. I could get no satisfaction from the replies received either through the high commissioner, or those sent to the Department of National Defence by the military authorities.

As I said the other day, so far as the word from Great Britain was concerned we were left in the position where any announcement I was to make should be made on Saturday evening, some twenty-four hours after the Canadians had landed. I believe it is only fair that I should tell the house that on Thursday, realizing the seriousness of the whole matter, realizing that these communiques were to be issued by General Eisenhower, and that the United States government, as well as the British government, would have to take the responsibility for omitting any reference to Canadians, through one of our officials at Washington I got in direct touch with the President of the United States and pointed out that I thought it was an extraordinary thing that a communication should go from General Eisenhower without any mention of the participation of Canadian troops. The President said at once that he agreed entirely with the point of view I had taken, and that he would see to it that General Eisenhower was instructed to include mention of Canadian troops in the communiques he sent out. General Eisenhower was so instructed. Just why in the first announcement the words "allied forces" were used, instead of "forces of Great Britain, the United States and Canada," I cannot say. But in the announcement made to the French people almost immediately after, I noticed that General Eisenhower did make specific reference to Canadian, as well as to British and American troops. That undertaking had been given during Friday, and had been communicated by me through the high commissioner in London to the British authorities—that the President of the United States had said he would see that in the announcements which were made by General Eisenhower mention would be made of the participation of Canadian troops. In the light of that undertaking I stated that I could not see why we in Canada should be precluded or why I should be precluded from telling the Canadian people that Canadians were participating. Despite that I was not authorized to alter the position to which I was committed by the information that I had received earlier from Britain. Then, as I told the house yesterday, an announcement was made by military headquarters in the United States which carried out the undertaking which the President said he would see was carried out. There was an announcement from military headquarters at Washington that Canadian, British and United States troops had made an attack upon Sicily. That arrived at a late hour, just immediately after midnight on Friday. When I heard the announcement made I felt that there was no obligation on my part, which would bind me further not to make an announcement to the Canadian people. I immediately made the announcement which I had hoped I would have had the chance to make to this House of Commons before it adjourned on Friday night.

I said yesterday that I am not criticizing anyone. I notice that one communication in the press has indicated that I was criticizing the United States authorities for having disclosed this information. I made no reference capable of that interpretation. I only thank the United States authority for having made public the information they did. What I cannot understand is why at the last minute I, as Prime Minister of Canada, could not get authority to make any statement and as a consequence was bound by the confidential information which I had received from British sources.

I am going to keep all the military secrets I can, but certainly so far as Canadian forces are concerned I am going to regard their services as being on a par with those of the British and United States forces, not necessarily in the extent of service they may render because of numbers, but from the point of view of quality and efficiency, and of right they are entitled to equality in all the statements that are made in reference to military service.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just thank the Prime Minister for his very frank statement, but I would point out that he has not answered the question I asked regarding the announcement that the troops of Canada are taking part. I believe the Minister of National Defence said the other day that he could not give that information to the house, and yet this dispatch from London appears in the papers without any reference from our own government, from the Minister of National Defence or from anyone else. That was the point.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can say to the house that as far back, I think as July 1 or July 2, knowing of the operation which was impending and having regard to what I know to be the desire of the Canadian people to have as much information as possible with regard to Canadian participation, I sent a wire to Canadian military headquarters, which I think was followed up shortly afterwards by a wire to the high commissioner in England, specifically mentioning that it was highly desirable that as soon as the first communique was issued the Canadian Prime Minister or the minister should be in position to give the Canadian people, first, some idea of the number of troops involved; second, the identity of the formation and, third, the name of the commander. There were telegrams back and forth indicating that this was information which it would not be desirable to give at the early stages. On the eighth—I have some of the telegrams under my hand—we received a definite wire to the effect that information of that kind could not be released until it was indicated by the commander in chief at headquarters that it was not against the interests of security to do so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be the headquarters in Africa?

Mr. RALSTON: Headquarters in Africa. That refers to the subject I have mentioned. As I say, that was on the eighth. On the ninth we got further confirmation of that, this time from Washington. Nevertheless, on the eleventh I again sent a communication pointing out that I thought the time had come when we might possibly release this information. I may say that no reply has come to that message which was sent on the eleventh. In addition to that, another message was sent asking that if we could not make the first announcement with regard to the numbers, the identity and the name of the commander, might we be informed as to when that information would be released by allied headquarters in North Africa so that it would be possible for the Prime Minister to advise the house that notwithstanding the fact that we were not able to give the information, it was anticipated that the information would be released within a short time or on such and such a date. No reply has been received to that either.

Then comes the dispatch to which my hon. friend refers, from a Canadian Press correspondent, which evidently was and must have been passed by the censor at allied headquarters and which I have to regard as a release by the allied commander of that particular bit of information. So far as information with regard to the name of the commander or the approximate number of troops involved is concerned, that still is under wraps, to use a colloquial expression, but it may be that at any time that may, to use another colloquial expression, "break" from allied headquarters. I wish we were in position to give the information here. It is difficult to understand entirely why this information cannot be given. I can imagine that there are good reasons why. And I am not assuming for a single instant, as I said the other day, that people are just being fussy about these things or trying to make it difficult or to be secretive. There is some good reason for it, as I said yesterday, and I think we have to believe that when the time comes the information will be released. That is the position in which the Department of National Defence finds itself.

I just want to close with this one statement. There was an indication in one of the newspapers yesterday that the Department of National Defence had had some hand in the withholding of this information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It said that the censorship was here. I could not understand it.

Mr. RALSTON: Censorship in the Department of National Defence; I think that was the indication. Not only has there not been the slightest bar put in the way of the release of this information, but, in the reverse, we anticipated that the Canadian people would like to have it and we were most anxious that it should be released. As I have said, a week before the operation we began to lay the grounds so that we might have an opportunity to make that announcement. I only wish it could be made publicly and officially now. I should have liked it if the Department of National Defence could have had the opportunity of doing it from Ottawa. But there is the situation. I should add this that I feel that if in any way the security of even one individual soldier in the Canadian forces is involved in the withholding of this information, then that is paramount to any consideration of the public getting it an hour or two earlier, or from one source or another. I have to be content with that.

I only hope that the information will come in some way. What I do hope above all is that it does not come irregularly, that is to say, that it does not come from some place when it has not been authorized by the commander in chief. I always fear that possibility when information is withheld so long. However, that is the situation. I have to believe that those who are in charge understand the reasons for the action which has been taken and the attitude which they have had to assume, and that the information will come as soon as possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask this question? Is this the position, that the department has information as to the numbers and units involved and as to the commander in chief, but that it is not permitted to divulge the information as yet?

Mr. RALSTON: That is the exact position at the present time. We have had that information, I should say, for more than four weeks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any information with respect to Canadian casualties?

Mr. RALSTON: The only information that has been given is what is in the press reports—casualties slight.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That, I suppose, is subject to the same limitations. The information with respect to casualties will be given through the same channels. Will there be details with respect to them?

Mr. RALSTON: I endeavoured in a statement given to the press the other morning to indicate the position in respect to casualties. A combined casualty list will not be published for some time; but notification of casualties will be given immediately to the next of kin in the regrettable and unfortunate cases in which there are casualties. The next of kin will be quite free to tell the local newspapers about it, and any reference which is desired may be made in the newspapers. The thing that is objected to, and the thing with regard to which a definite arrangement has been made and an understanding given, at the express request of those who are in charge, particularly the British, is that for a considerable period compiled lists of casualties will not be published. People may gather together the local lists, but we will not publish a compiled list for some considerable time. One exception to that is that in the case of the missing; it is not desired that even the names of the missing be published by the next of kin, for the reason that was given at the time of Dieppe namely, that it may be possible that the man reported missing is still at large, and if his name is published it might give some lead which would accelerate action to apprehend him.

In answer to the direct question of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, I was going to say that our position in the Department of National Defence at the present time is that by express advice to us the names of the commanders and the formations and the numbers are not to be the subject of reference, but that these facts will be released at allied headquarters in North Africa when security permits.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It seems to me that one matter we ought all to keep in mind is that evidently the whole attack on Sicily has been executed with superb success. I gather from the bulletins this morning that our troops are at least twice as far as they expected to be at this time. Whatever the devices were which were considered necessary by the men in authority to obtain that laudable object, they certainly have been successful, and I believe that until we hear all the details it will be well for us here to contain ourselves in patience.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DELIVERY OF PARCELS AND LETTERS TO TROOPS IN SICILY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Can the Postmaster-General inform the house if parcels as well as letters addressed to members of the troops now serving in Sicily will be forwarded to them?

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster-General): I am glad to advise the hon. member that arrangements have been made for some considerable time for parcels and letters to be handled wherever the Canadian troops move. He will understand that naturally it will depend on the transport available. Mail will have to go first, and any available space which will be allotted, I presume, by the representatives of the British admiralty to the postal authorities in Britain will be used as far as possible equitably for the handling of parcels to the extent that space warrants it. Of course necessities, munitions and food, will come first, but any extra space will be utilized for the purpose mentioned.

JACKSON BUILDING

INQUIRY AS TO ELEVATOR ACCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works? I understand that the Jackson building in Ottawa comes under his jurisdiction. May I inquire what steps have been taken to investigate the accident which occurred in that building yesterday when one of the elevators went out of control and caused injuries to a number of persons?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I wish to thank the leader of the opposition for giving me notice of his question, but I received it just as I came into the house. I have not full information yet as to the accident, but an official of the department is investigating it at the present moment. The Turnbull Elevator company, which has charge of the maintenance and repair of these elevators, if I am rightly informed, has also an investigator at the Jackson building now inquiring into the accident. Later I shall make a further report.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is any inspection carried on by the Department of Public Works of the elevators in the public buildings here?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Oh, yes. In addition to inspections by the company which has charge of the maintenance of the elevators, we have our own officials inspecting them regularly.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the municipalities have some inspection system as well, and I wanted to know if the department had an inspection system in addition to that.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I shall have full information in a day or two.

BUTTER BOXES

REFERENCE TO SHORTAGE IN QUEBEC PROVINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. LECLERC (Shefford): I wish to draw the attention of the government to the very serious shortage of butter boxes in the eastern townships in Quebec and perhaps in the whole province. Most of the creameries carry a stock of butter boxes through the winter, and we had an order for a lot of butter boxes to be delivered just as soon as the roads opened up in the spring. These boxes have not yet been delivered. On Monday I called up all the box manufacturers in the eastern townships and was informed that they were all running behind in their operations by about twelve weeks and that we could not get butter boxes. I know that all the creameries are in the same position. The Megantic Manufacturing company, which is quite a large manufacturer of butter boxes, informed me that they were running at only fifty per cent of last year's capacity owing to the shortage of labour. Because of high wages elsewhere they cannot keep their help. The Cooperative Fedérée of Montreal, at Victoriaville, are manufacturing butter boxes, but will not deliver any to us. The situation is very serious, and I hope the government will do what it can to provide a remedy.

There is another question I want to bring before the house, the shortage of fuel wood in Granby.

The SPEAKER: Order. I allowed the hon. member some latitude in regard to butter boxes, because he stated that there was an emergency situation.

Mr. LECLERC: So there is in wood.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that question might be raised at some other time, and placed on the order paper.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I know nothing about the butter box situation referred to by my hon. friend, but I shall endeavour to get the information for him to-morrow.

TUG "M. V. ERG"

INQUIRY INTO SINKING IN BEDFORD BASIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Is the Minister of Transport prepared to make a statement in respect to the findings or report on the inquiry conducted by Captain A. W. Hilton concerning the recent sinking of the M. V. Erg in Bedford Basin, with the loss of nineteen lives?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): Captain Hilton has made a report on his investigation into the sinking, and on reading the report I felt that a public inquiry should be made. This morning orders have been given for such an inquiry immediately.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 14, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Industrial hygiene, including inspection of industrial plants, $24,000.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This item is for only $24,000, and I think it should be at least ten times that amount. I mentioned this in the house before, and I say again that industrial workers throughout the whole of Canada should have—

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order. I wanted again to call a matter under the previous item to the attention of the Chair last night, but it was five minutes past eleven. I wish the hon. member would allow me to say something; he interrupted me three or four times last night. On a point of order I draw attention to the fact that five minutes past eleven last night I wished for two or three minutes to refer further to the views of the minister regarding blackouts. I waived my opportunity to speak because of the lateness of the hour. I shall occupy only two minutes this morning. I could rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. CHURCH: I understood from the minister himself that the last item did not carry.

The CHAIRMAN: I gather that what the hon. member contends is that item 7, air raid precautions, did not pass. Is that his point of order? Well, I was not in the chamber at the time; the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare was in the chair; but I believe it would be in order for the hon. member for Broadview to make a short statement.

Mr. CHURCH: Has the minister any objection?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Go ahead.

Item stands.

Health branch—
Air raid precautions, $6,589,650.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed, I would say that I have no objection to blackout precautions or to the A.R.P., and I never had any. My contention is that they should be instituted only if necessary in central Canada. To show my position in the matter, let me say that I was the first person who raised in this house—in September 1939—the question of a home guard and the protection of provincial and municipal property on the same lines as in the last war. I find that the minister has been very fair in this matter. I call attention to the fact that away back in 1938 I raised this very subject during the discussion of the minister's estimates, on March 24. I then said, in part:

More consideration should be given to air defences. There is not only the possibility but a great probability that air raids will occur in the next war in which Canada is involved. The defence of our population from air raids should be considered. These raids will be the chief source of danger in all future wars, and we shall be living in a false paradise if we do not adopt measures to protect ourselves. Abyssinia was recently a theatre of war, and we all know the destruction of civilian population that occurred through this means of attack. Abyssinia is an open country with only a small density of population as compared with what there is on the island of Montreal and in other parts of Canada, and yet great damage resulted.

Air raids can work great havoc in time of war, and the menace will be a very real one in Canada, especially to the people of Quebec, the maritimes and British Columbia. I am glad that some preparation, although it may be only a beginning, has already been made by the minister to meet this danger. I know he has been out looking over the camps. A fleet of aircraft could pass up the Ottawa river without a moment's notice and blow up these buildings, the Chateau Laurier, the railway station and other large buildings. We should have very little warning of the approaching attack.

I was urging the establishment of a home guard.

Consultation and advice are words that are much used by the government nowadays, but we would not be consulted about any air raids that were contemplated against Canada. The enemy's aircraft would be upon us before you could say "O Canada," or sing God Save the King. An aerial bombardment is one of the dangers most to be apprehended in time of war, particularly in large cities with their dense populations; the protection of cities from aerial bombardment should be one of the chief objectives of the national defence department and proper equipment for defence against this menace should be provided. Probably the minister will have something to say about that later on.

Large quantities of poisonous gas could easily be spread over a large area as was done in Abyssinia, and incendiary bombs dropped on our large cities, with great destruction and slaughter, and the enemy aircraft could get back to their base in practically no time. These attacks would not only bring ruin to our cities and towns but break the morale of our people and prevent us from developing a proper defence and mobilizing our man-power and armaments.

In conclusion, I have never made any criticism of A.R.P. I referred last evening and last session nine or ten times to the good work they are doing. I did urge, however, that in central Canada the one hour blackout is too long. The British government has removed most of these restrictions, as Right Hon. Mr. Morrison, Home Secretary, said. In the Toronto district however one hour blackouts are enforced very strictly, and as we know, one of our own ministers was fined here for smoking his pipe. Yet, as has been pointed out by the Toronto papers at the time, a year ago:

Over in London, where they are a lot closer to nazi bombs and airmen than we are, and where they know a lot about blackouts, people are not forbidden to smoke pipes, or even cigarettes, in the streets. Actually, there are lights—green and red light crosses—at all the intersections of London streets, and most people go about with pencil flashlights. More than that, on Britain's country roads people drive about at night with suppressed or limited headlights on their motor cars.

I have not objected on any occasion to my friends the A.R.P. people. The statement I made was clear and I think it was quite fair. As I said, there is no such thing as home defence, as was proved when the mechanized hordes of Germany invaded the low countries. I do object to some of the newspaper reports. I refer to references in two or three papers in the Montreal district, regarding my stand on this and other questions. I ask the minister if I have on any occasion objected to the A.R.P. people. I have been a warm supporter of home defence and the good A.R.P. work and the minister's policy.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I am very glad to agree with my hon. friend. I have received from him complete cooperation at all times, although he thinks that blackouts have been carried out too extensively over the whole area; apart from that I have had complete cooperation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was this item passed last night?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, it was carried last night.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not so shown in Hansard; I have just looked it up.

May I say that I have always thought that A.R.P. was a good precautionary measure in the early stages of the war, but I do suggest that the thing might very well taper off now, when the danger of invasion has passed. As long as there was danger of invasion our people were quite justified in going as far as they did, and I would not like to see our precautions relaxed on the Pacific coast. I do not speak with any authority, but my partner happens to be the head of the A.R.P. organization in my constituency; I know the interest he takes in the matter, and he now thinks it ought to be washed out, and I hope it will be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend was not here last night when I made reference to the very happy change in conditions in Canada. He will recall as well as I do that I was severely criticized a year and a half or two years ago, and there was an eloquent appeal from the leader of the opposition that the government form a ministry of home security.

Mr. GRAYDON: I meant every word of it, too.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not critical of that; I thought it was a constructive suggestion, but I am pointing out the change in conditions in the dominion and the change in the thinking of our people. At the same time, the responsibility is mine and we cannot afford to relax our efforts. I do not think we should expand any more. As I pointed out last night, as regards equipment, this year's estimates provide for practically all that we shall require, and the estimates will go down from now on for A.R.P. work. There is no intention of expanding, but, I repeat, it is my responsibility to support the volunteers, especially on the two coasts, in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and parts of Ontario, in the splendid voluntary efforts they are making on behalf of the nation. We cannot afford to be extravagant, but on the other hand we cannot afford to be complacent.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am fairly close in my own part of Canada to A.R.P. work. In parts of my own constituency there is an excellent organization. There has been, from the early part of the war until now, a sort of esprit de corps among the civilians flowing from A.R.P. precautionary measures, and I am inclined to think that whatever else they may have contributed, and I am not by any means limiting their contribution to this, they did provide an outlet for patriotic and serious-minded Canadians to make some physical move such as is manifested in the work they are doing in this field, which was particularly within their scope. Many of these men were of course veterans of the last war. A good many of the leaders in A.R.P. work throughout Canada are returned soldiers. It was a normal and a natural thing therefore for these men, when this war broke out, to wish to get into work of some kind, into the army if possible but having been denied that on physical grounds they sought some other means of helping their country, as they had done in previous years.

The A.R.P. work has developed to the point where, in my opinion, Canadians may properly take a good deal of pride in the organization. I realize that one of the great troubles with the minister, and the late head of air raid precautions, was the fact that when the reserve army had been brought to the point where public recognition was given it in any major degree, and where the public, by various public relations measures and by appeals, had contributed to the enhanced importance of the reserve army in the estimation of the Canadian people, especially when the men were given uniforms and were thus more closely approximating actual war activities, the A.R.P. organization felt the drain very heavily upon their ranks, when men began to move into the reserve army. That naturally made it more difficult to keep the A.R.P. organization alive. But there was another factor which entered into the picture, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury has pointed out, namely, the growing conviction in the public mind of the danger of air raids to Canada. That was another factor which must have made it still more difficult for the head of the A.R.P. organization to keep it functioning.

We may properly pay tribute to Doctor Manion and his organization in connection with A.R.P. work. I mentioned before, and I refer to it again, the indomitable enthusiasm of Doctor Manion. Whatever may be said about the late lamented Doctor Manion, one fact that does stand out, in addition to the many other qualifications he had, was that when he undertook a job he threw every bit of energy and effort into it, and, what is more important, he devoted to it all the enthusiasm he possessed. I remember when he was first appointed how satisfied the minister was because he had been able to induce Doctor Manion to take on the work. I can remember too the time, two or three sessions ago, when I must confess I shared the view that was held by a good many people, and I am not so sure that it was not also the minister's view. At any rate, he kept his head cool while the debate was going on, but I must admit that I felt at that time that Canada was in a very dangerous position in regard to air raids. There was plenty of evidence from time to time to show that from various parts of the western coast of Europe German bombers could come over with their loads of destruction and return. That caused a great deal of fear in the minds and hearts of Canadians generally, and I for one felt—as I say, I am not so sure that the minister did not also feel—that some real move should be made to safeguard our people in the event of some untoward action, so that they might be adequately protected as far as humanly possible. Having in mind the steps that were then taken, and the renewed effort that was made in connection with A.R.P. work and its development to the point where Doctor Manion left it, I do not think that we should relax our efforts at this time. When we are nearing the end of hostilities we may be able to form a different judgment, but particularly in my own part of the country, which is the only part I can speak of with any degree of accuracy or of actual knowledge, I do not think it would be regarded as a wise move on the part of the government to relax the efforts that are now being made. I say this not only for security reasons but because A.R.P. work has proved an outlet for the activities of those of our citizens who wish to contribute to the war effort.

May I point out that we are not by any means out of the woods. It is quite true that we have reached the end of the beginning and are now at the beginning of the end, but we may find this period through which we are now passing a grave one for our people, however optimistic we may feel. We may have to go through several periods of great difficulty so far as the war in general is concerned. It may be that we shall have set-backs which to-day we cannot envisage. In the days that lie ahead we may find that this continent must suffer air attack, because before Germany is beaten to her knees she will take many long chances and many retaliatory measures, one of which may be the bombing of defenceless people on this continent. If that is the case, and I am only throwing that out as a possibility, then I suggest to the government that we should not relax until we have seen the war move closer to a successful conclusion. Until that time I believe we should continue all these precautions which are necessary for the security of the average individual in this country who is doing his best on the home front.

Mr. REID: It is not my desire to hold up the estimates of the minister, but I should like to add my word of praise of that great band of workers who have done so nobly in connection with A.R.P. work. It is not generally recognized, nor do I think it has been mentioned during this debate, that if a raid should take place the A.R.P. workers will be the first line of defence. Some people seem to think that our home defence army will be called into action first, but in the event of a raid the A.R.P. will be in the front line of battle, for they will be called into action immediately the raid takes place.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury pointed out that the government might relax its efforts in some districts. If that should be done I suggest to the minister that he should strengthen the organization in other districts, because to my mind the danger on the Pacific coast is not yet gone. I speak as a layman, but sometimes a layman may have a better understanding of the situation than some of our generals. I remember very well that when General Stuart went to the Pacific coast about two years ago and was told about the Japanese on Kiska, he laughed and said, "Oh, that little thing; that does not mean anything." Yet the other evening in his address to the House of Commons the Prime Minister stated that Kiska was a very important strategic point for the Japanese, and to-day no one can tell what may happen in the Pacific area. According to my information the strength of the Japanese remains intact; therefore I would suggest to the minister that if there are districts in which A.R.P. precautions may not be necessary, he take the money from those districts and spend it where we believe this organization should be strengthened. Those who are doing A.R.P. work have never received official recognition. Rifles and uniforms have been given to all other voluntary bodies, but the A.R.P. workers have had to put up a long fight in order to obtain the assistance they are being given to-day.

I just wanted to take this opportunity to expresss my thanks to that body of willing workers who are not officially recognized and who I think deserve such recognition.

Mr. GRAYDON: You will have plenty of support in that.

Mr. HANSELL: I wonder if the minister could enlighten the committee in regard to what A.R.P. work is being done in the smaller communities. The hon. member for New Westminster has mentioned the Pacific coast, where there are some large cities. When we think of bombings we usually associate them with cities such as Vancouver, Halifax and so on, but I believe there are many very important small communities that might become the objectives of the Japanese air force, let us say. I need make no secret about it; I do not suppose it is any secret that in Alberta, for instance, there is a chain of air training schools running from the United States boundary all the way up to Edmonton and perhaps beyond that point. These schools are closer to Kiska island than either Vancouver or Victoria. These air training schools are not built out in the wilderness; they have very fine locations, and some are adjacent to small communities. Of course I do not know whether these schools would be regarded as military objectives; I do not know what value they would have as such. I know they do not constitute forts; they do not constitute munitions works, but they are highly specialized schools for the training of airmen, and there are many of them; make no mistake about that. Not very long ago I told one Liberal member here that I had six air training schools in my constituency. He was very much surprised, and wondered what I had done to get so many of these establishments located in my territory. I did not do a thing about it, but I believe the authorities used good judgment in putting them there. That is just my constituency; there are many other schools right along the mountains, where facilities for air training are good. If those air training schools should become the objectives of the Japanese air force, certainly the small communities near by would get it also. So far as I know the only thing that has been done is to train the people of those communities to put out their lights during blackouts. I do not know whether it is a very difficult undertaking to train people to turn out their lights, but in any case I should like to know whether anything more has been done.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask the minister for further information on another matter. This may not come under his department, but I am sure his knowledge extends beyond his own department. Are facilities available for giving plenty of warning in case a raid is made? I have in mind that a fleet of bombers, starting from somewhere off the Pacific coast, could follow a route clean across southeastern Alberta. Those bombers can fly several hundred miles an hour, as we know; they could cover a thousand miles in a very short time. How are these small communities to be warned in time to give adequate protection? I should like the minister to tell us what facilities have been established in that regard. I have no doubt there is some organization looking after that matter, but there is a great danger of focusing our attention upon some large metropolis and forgetting these small but strategic places.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Referring to the first question, there are certain areas in Canada which have been designated by the chief of staffs committee as either subject to definite risk or lesser risk. Of course the two coasts would be subject to definite risk, and practically all the coastal areas are under the A.R.P. system. In regard to the other areas, in British Columbia alone there are 139 local centres where they have air raid precaution organizations. In Canada altogether there are 633 areas.

In regard to the second point raised by the hon. member, having to do with training camps, may I say that the air force authorities have organizations of their own which are trained along similar lines to the air raid precautions organization, and they look after situations such as have been described by the hon. member. That area as such, however, does not come within the definition of a designated area, under the jurisdiction of this department, or the air raid precautions system.

As to the further point raised by the hon. member, may I point out that the air raid detection corps in Canada works in absolute liaison with the air raid precautions authorities. I know that in British Columbia, after some experiments, we found we were able to have the whole area blacked out inside of three minutes, through the use of most excellent telephonic communications. I believe, roughly speaking, I have replied to the points raised by the hon. member.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to make one or two references to this item. Before doing so however may I say that in my opinion the work being done by air raid precautions wardens is of so commendable a nature that it has earned the gratitude and approval of all hon. members. Recently I had the opportunity of seeing what is being done in Ottawa. I visited an exhibition given one Sunday in connection with fire-fighting, and at that time I saw some of the work these men are doing. There is no glamour in the work they do. But they give hours of patriotic service, with no incentive other than the desire to contribute something at this time so that they may prepare themselves to protect us, should conditions make necessary the use of their knowledge. Nothing destroys discipline in any organization so much as the work of that organization becoming merely routine. In those circumstances enthusiasm may be lost, and all they have left to impel them to continue their efforts is their own appreciation of what they are doing. I do feel that there should not be any relaxation in the efforts of these men, many of whom were soldiers in the last war, and who in this way find an opportunity of doing something which otherwise would be denied them, namely the opportunity of serving in the only capacity for which they are fitted.

While at the present time we are in a period of what might almost be described as apathy in Canada so far as the danger of air raids is concerned, I cannot help recalling that only three months before Pearl Harbor a former member of Japan's intelligence service informed the members of the united nations that there would be a Pearl Harbor. He warned, too, that the Aleutians would be occupied. The hon. member for New Westminster has pointed out the strategic importance of the occupation of those islands. In addition to that he warned it was part of Japan's plan to bomb Pacific coast cities, down into the United States.

As the leader of the opposition has said, when the war approaches a crisis and the axis nations begin to appreciate that the sound of doom is about them, they may commence air raids merely because of their nuisance value. They may distribute gas in this way, and at such time, if it ever comes, the efforts of these men will be appreciated by the people of Canada. If we were to relax in this work or give it up we would invite the very thing the air raid precautions organization was intended to prevent.

May I ask the minister whether or not the various munitions plants in Canada, or any of them, have been warned about the dangers of air raids, and the necessity of making an appeal for volunteer blood donors?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Both things have been done. They have been warned in regard to both points mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Very well. In that connection I shall read a paragraph from a magazine published by the war plant at Cherrier, Quebec, operated by Canadian Car and Munitions. I shall not read the portions which I have already brought to the attention of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, but I would draw attention to the following advertisement:

> In our last issue we made an appeal for volunteer blood donors. . . . We want volunteer blood donors to form a blood bank, in case of emergency. Your blood—
> I delete a few words—
> —will serve here in Canada, if ever we undergo air raids or other war calamities. We have no guarantee that before the war is over Montreal, Joliette, Three Rivers will not be bombed. Suppose these air raids take place and that your wife, girl friend, or a loved one is hurt, and that a blood transfusion would save her or his life, if there is no blood, because when it was time, you did not volunteer to create the necessary blood reserve.

Is there any blood donor campaign in Canada to-day, in any of the war plants, where blood is being asked for, to be used only in Canada in the event of air raids, and not to be used in the various theatres of war overseas? If, as the minister says, the plants have been warned about the dangers of air raids in Canada, then the situation must be a great deal worse than most people in Canada believe it to be to-day. If a warning has been given as to the necessity of securing blood bank supplies to be used only in Canada, then the minister or the government must be in possession of information which would indicate that there is a serious danger that air raids may occur. Would the minister give an answer to the committee and to the country in regard to this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As to the hon. member's first question, I understand there is a security division in all munitions plants operated under the Department of Munitions and Supply. The main function of such divisions is exactly that mentioned by the hon. member. May I inform the hon. member that we have produced, to date, approximately 100,000 bottles of blood serum, part of which has been distributed to strategic centres in Canada, and all of which is available for any eventuality.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: For overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Part of it has gone overseas. There have been received from the Connaught laboratories 79,174 bottles or cans of dried serum, 1,561 bottles or 223 boxes each containing seven bottles of serum, an equal number of distilled water and four giving sets have been dispatched overseas to date. Supplies are now in hand to dispatch similar boxes at the rate of 1,000 units of dried serum per week. There have been distributed in Canada and Newfoundland at strategic points for the armed services and civilian use when necessary through national catastrophes or enemy action, 39,131 bottles. The exact distribution is not disclosed because of the need of security. Competent authorities in every district and command, including A.R.P. and Red Cross, have knowledge as to their availability. There have been transported overseas 40,043 bottles.

Mr. GRAYDON: Having in mind what has been said in the committee this morning and which represents, I believe, the general view throughout the country, as to the necessity of keeping our air raid precautions intact in view of a possible dangerous situation arising a little later, I suggest that it would be advisable for the government not to postpone any longer the appointment of a successor to the late Doctor Manion, who was acting as director of air raid precautions. I am afraid that if this appointment is delayed for any considerable length of time, those who are connected with this work may take it as evidence that the government has in mind the disbanding of the whole organization. That is not the proper attitude to take. If the government is desirous of keeping up the esprit de corps of this organization it should appoint as quickly as possible some outstanding Canadian citizen, as it did in making the previous appointment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I made a recommendation to council a week ago, but because of other duties I was not able to be in council for the last two days. I may say that council has approved the appointment of General Alexander Ross, of Saskatchewan, formerly president of the Canadian Legion.

Mr. McIVOR: I rise at this time on behalf of the people in my constituency to pay a tribute to the former director of A.R.P. We were heartsick when we heard of the sudden call of Doctor Manion to his "well done, good and faithful servant." That was his last task, and with all his brilliance he carried it out most efficiently. I do not think any public man from the head of the lakes has received a greater tribute from the public generally and from the press than did Doctor Manion. I was sorry I was not in the chamber before, but I take this opportunity of paying my tribute to him because he was one who was worthy to be trusted, and he was one who merited commendation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I agree with the minister that this A.R.P. work should not be disbanded. We should not have any feeling of complacency about it. Things change quickly these days; new methods come along, and we do not know from day to day what is going to happen. As the minister remembers, during the early stages of the war I was most insistent upon something being done in connection with A.R.P. The people of Toronto were upset because of the number of factories in their immediate vicinity and their proximity to Niagara Falls. We cannot say that all danger of bombing has disappeared so far as our city is concerned; it is still within the bounds of possibility that something of the kind may happen.

I should like to pay a tribute to the men and women of Toronto who have given of their time to this work, and also to the members of the police force. The inspectors of the different divisions have given lectures which were most helpful, and generally an esprit de corps has been built up which is a credit to the citizens of that city. These people have attended lectures after doing their day's work to learn about gases, first aid, fire fighting and so on. We should consider this expenditure as an insurance premium and hope that we will never have to make a claim. In order that this esprit de corps may not be lost, in order that these A.R.P. wardens may retain their enthusiasm, something should be done toward directing their efforts in some other direction. They could be used in some other form of useful war effort, especially in those places which are not in such great danger. I do not want it to be thought that the policemen and the firemen of Toronto are tired of this work; they have been most enthusiastic about it, and I think they welcomed an opportunity to participate in A.R.P. work.

Mr. GREEN: The turn the discussion on this item of $6,589,650 for air raid precautions has taken is disquieting to me. Some hon. members have contended that we should cut down on our expenditures and relax our A.R.P. work. That is a most dangerous outlook, one which I wish to repudiate at once. Many hon. members have adopted an apologetic attitude toward this work; they do not seem to understand why it is still necessary. My home is on the Pacific coast, and in that regard the minister and I are in the same position. When I wake up in the morning frequently one of the first things I think of is whether my home city has been bombed. That is no idle fancy. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) referred to the statement made by the Prime Minister on July 9, and I quote his words as reported on page 4556 of Hansard:

> Kiska remains a potential centre of attack upon our shores, and upon other parts of this continent.

Larger planes are being built, and planes that can fly greater distances, and it has been admitted that it would be comparatively easy for an aeroplane carrier to slip up to within bombing range of the Pacific coast. It might not get away again, but the planes from such a ship could do great damage. I urge upon the minister that he pay no attention to these doubting Thomases. I urge him not only to carry on the air raid precautions work that has been initiated, but to go much farther. For example, I believe it is only within the last few days that the air raid wardens on our coast have received uniforms, and I understand that only a small number of them have been fitted out with these.

Some complaint has been made about blackouts being too long. For goodness' sake let us put up with a little inconvenience in order to make dead sure that we can have an efficient blackout when the need arises. The organization of air raid precautions is not yet perfect; it is far from perfect, and I think the minister would be the first to admit it. From the start, it has been difficult to organize because there has been divided authority between the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities. It has been a great stuggle to get this work going at all, and I do urge upon the minister that further efforts be made to improve the general organization.

The government is to be congratulated on appointing General Alex. Ross as director of air raid precautions for Canada. I had what I consider one of the greatest privileges of my life in being able to serve under General Ross in France during the year 1918. He is an outstanding leader of men, probably one of the finest leaders of men that Canada has produced in our generation. That at least is my personal opinion. I believe in General Ross—Turkey Ross, as he was known to the troops—I believe in him right through the picture. He is no yes-man—the minister knows that, the men of the Canadian Legion know that. He will make demands on the government and he will be pretty tough about those demands. He will want to get proper backing, and I urge upon the minister that he stand behind General Ross in this work. The minister has already had an excellent director in the late Doctor Manion; he could have had no better man. May I urge upon him that he stand behind Doctor Manion's successor, and if he does we may take it for granted that the air raid precautions work in Canada will be carried on in an efficient manner.

Mr. BRUCE: I wish to associate myself with the tribute which has been paid by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party to the work done by Doctor Manion and by the wardens and others who have assisted in carrying out the air raid precautions work throughout Canada. Amongst them were members of the St. John Ambulance Brigade, who have been very active in every part of Canada and have done excellent work.

May I say a few words in support of the statements made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) yesterday, when he called attention to some dangers and difficulties in connection with the blackouts. While I would not for a moment wish to disagree with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) in regard to the necessity for blackouts on the Pacific coast, and also the Atlantic coast and in Quebec province, yet I think that the blackouts in the interior of Canada might very well be shortened in duration; for instance, in the big cities like Toronto, Kingston, not forgetting Ottawa, and perhaps Montreal. But that is a matter for the department, and having said a word in regard to it I am quite willing to leave it to the judgment of those in authority.

I have asked a few questions about A.R.P. work which have not yet been answered, but I presume I may expect an answer shortly from the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have a memorandum here, but I have not yet analysed it.

Mr. BRUCE: Then I will not ask for it at this time; it can be supplied later.

I am satisfied with the statement made earlier this morning by the minister when he said that this work would be continued in the maritimes, in Quebec and on the Pacific coast just as actively as it had been done heretofore, but less so in the central provinces where less expenditure may be made. It was this question of the reduction in cost to which I wished to call attention in one of the questions which I asked in regard to this work. I want to commend the minister himself for the work he and his department have done in initiating and carrying through the work of A.R.P.

I would like while on my feet to refer—if it is necessary I will do it on a question of privilege—to what was said by the hon. member for Brantford City last night in my absence from the house. He apparently got the view that I was making a personal attack on the minister. I want to disavow any such intention, and if my words created any such impression I am very sorry. I only wished to bring to the minister's attention as forcefully as I could the reasons why I, in common with a large body of opinion in Toronto and elsewhere, was opposed to his going ahead with additions to Christie Street hospital. Perhaps he had reference to the words I used in regard to a monument in Toronto. If so, I would say to the minister that he can very well change the character of that monument if he will do as we suggest, put up a new building, and I am quite willing then to propose that it be called the Mackenzie Military hospital.

Only one word further in regard to the argument of the hon. member for Brantford City in support of his opinion that noises would not interfere with the use of a stethoscope. I think possibly the word of a consulting physician who complained to me would be taken as of more value than that of the hon. member for Brantford City.

Item agreed to.

Health branch—Industrial hygiene, including inspection of industrial plants, $24,000.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Chairman, I hope we are on the right item now. This item was read out before and I rose to speak but I was interrupted. I said when I spoke before that I think the amount of $24,000 is entirely too small for this purpose and that it should be at least ten times that much. The reason I say that is that the health of the workers in our plants is not really looked after as it should be. That is why we have so much absenteeism. Many of the young boys and young girls who go into these plants have not had their fathers or mothers teach or show them the proper methods of keeping in good health. Therefore it is up to this government to do it. An article in a Kitchener newspaper of July 14 says that ten cases of active tuberculosis have been discovered in the plants there. A complete survey has been made of over seven thousand workers, among whom ten active cases of tuberculosis were discovered. These ten active cases can be checked if taken in hand now, and these people can be built up into first-class shape. This survey was made by a Doctor Fraser—he is no relation of mine—who is evidently the medical health officer of Kitchener. But in most cities the medical health officer is so busy that he has not a chance to do this work. I spoke of this matter in the house last year and I am bringing it up again because I do feel that the government should maintain a proper supervision over all the workers in these plants. The Department of Agriculture have a check-up on the live stock in Canada, but our human beings are neglected. If these people were checked we would have a better Canada after this war is over; and if we ever intend to have social security we should start in now to improve the health of these people.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to add a word to what has been said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I too feel that the appropriation for this particular phase of the department's work is insufficient and inadequate. After all, the Department of Pensions and National Health is interested in labour conditions as well as in health conditions, because the conditions under which workers work may lead to good health or bad health as the case may be. For example, back in January I was in a plant which makes acids and gases and so on, and I asked the manager of this very large plant, because I was there at noon and saw the men sitting around eating their lunch on any packing case or barrel which happened to be in the furnace rooms, whether there was any provision for a cafeteria or restaurant where they might take their lunch under conditions which would be cleanly and healthful, and the answer was no.

I am not complaining about our government plants. I must say that a few days ago I was in our small arms ammunition factory near Quebec city, and there I saw a splendid cafeteria, rest rooms and lavatory accommodation and excellent food provided in this government plant, and I was deeply impressed by the care that had been taken to look after the health of the workers there. But in some of the other plants—and I have no hesitation in mentioning names; I was in the Canadian Carbide plant at Shawinigan Falls—there was no such accommodation where men could eat at noon under cleanly conditions. Of course the Department of Labour is interested in the matter, but this is a department of health, I think the appropriation is insufficient for the kind of work which the department needs to undertake, and I miss my guess if the minister, who is giving a tremendous amount of attention to this sort of thing, does not agree with that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I thank both hon. members for their observations. I might point out at once that we are not limited to this amount—this is a war appropriation—and if the department finds it necessary to increase the amount beyond $24,000 I do not think we would have much difficulty in obtaining the necessary money. I am informed that we have already inspected about 300 plants for such purposes; and from a nutrition point of view we have inspected 500 industries. That is not under this vote, but the nutrition aspect is also being given attention. Eighteen of these plants had no medical or safety services of any kind, and in over fifty others the first aid services were very inadequate, with no provision for medical care or safety control. All these things have been corrected. We started this work in 1942. I can say that the most rigid attention is paid in all the plants over which the government has control to carrying out the regulations and the provisions of the Geneva code.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): May I say that in Kitchener 8,700 workers were X-rayed for tuberculosis. It is important now to check for tuberculosis, especially at this time when meat and other foods are rationed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is not the X-ray work done by the provincial government?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It may be done by the provincial government, but this government should ensure that it is done. People are not getting the nourishment which they were getting before the war, and that is why there is a greater risk of tuberculosis among our young people. With regard to one plant which I know of, and I suppose the same conditions obtain all over the country, they have nurses to look after their workers; in the rooms where the nurses are they will have large jars of aspirin tablets, and if a girl comes in and says she has a headache the nurse will say, "Help yourself." Many of these young girls will take one, three, four, five or ten aspirin tablets, not knowing what is wrong with them. If there were a doctor or someone qualified to check the condition of that girl she could be fixed up right away. I know of two girls who were seriously unwell because, not having been examined, they took aspirins until they got in such a weakened condition that it required months for their recovery.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am glad to get that information.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: There are a number of things in connection with the minister's department on which I can very frankly and sincerely congratulate him. One of them is the health services which he has initiated in these factories. I am thinking particularly of the plant at Malton and the improvement which has been made in the facilities for safeguarding the health of the workers since it came under direct government ownership and supervision. The set-up there is the finest I have seen in any plant which I have visited.

I have noticed that there is a considerable degree of difference in the facilities available as between one plant and another, and I would just like to remind the minister, although I do not think it necessary, that the collection of large numbers of men in war industries is giving his department an opportunity for improving or for taking the first steps in the improvement of the health of the nation—an opportunity which probably will not be available in peace time. We now have plants which are directly under government supervision and working on government orders. Large numbers of men are congregated in these centres. I urge upon the minister that he take advantage of that opportunity to give the nation a start on the road to better health. I need not emphasize the fact that the war has shown that we have been very neglectful of that in the past.

There are one or two other topics upon which I should like to occupy a minute, Mr. Chairman, if you will be gracious enough to permit me. I wish to second the suggestion made by the hon. member for Parkdale. I was astonished that a Progressive Conservative representing a Toronto riding would suggest that Toronto would be willing to call a military hospital the Ian Mackenzie military hospital.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Only on certain conditions.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I presume it is because they have a personal attachment to the minister, rather than to the government which he represents.

Mr. GREEN: It is because they want the hospital.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: It almost persuades me that the Conservatives are becoming progressive.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They have been, right along.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: However, I hope the minister will take it into consideration. I did not have an opportunity to speak when the subject was under review, but everyone who knows anything about the situation in Toronto —those in charge of the war veterans' associations, the doctors, and various welfare organizations—has made representations. The minister is familiar with these representations, and I am sure we need not take time to try to impress him with the need of remedying that situation. I think the remedy suggested, the necessity of finding a new site as soon as possible to begin the erection of a new hospital, is the solution. I thank you Mr. Chairman, for permitting me to make this remark on this item.

Item agreed to.

Health branch—Laboratory analyses and services for the Department of National Defence, $37,000.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There are a few questions which I wish to ask with reference to this item. I have already pointed out that, in my opinion and in the opinion of many other people as well, the Canadian people are not getting the nutrition they were before the war, and the reason for this is rationing. Reports from Montreal indicate a rising death rate from tuberculosis. I was wondering what the government would do with regard to vitamin B in Canada-approved flour. This is a matter which concerns the department, and I submit that something should be done. I have here a series of questions which I should like to submit to the minister:

1. In view of the unsatisfactory results attained by the government's programme to introduce a vitamin B white flour made exclusively by the so-called "long extraction" milling process, as evidenced by the testimony submitted at the conference held in Ottawa, January 5 and 6 last, does the government now purpose to modify the restrictions against synthetic enrichment of flour with such vitamins as are deemed deficient, by your nutritional advisers, in the national dietary; particularly under war conditions?

2. Since approximately fifty per cent of the flour used in Canada is baked by the housewife and the larger proportion of it in the form of bread, and since she has become accustomed to using the so-called "top patent" or "family" grade as being most satisfactory for the purpose, and since this grade carries the lowest natural vitamin content of any of the hard wheat flours milled, namely 50 to 100 I.U's per pound, how is it proposed to increase the vitamin intake of the Canadian people unless this grade of flour is improved by synthetic addition?

3. In Ontario and generally in eastern Canada most cakes, biscuits, pastries are made from soft winter wheat flour, both commercially and home baked. Ontario winter wheat is much lower in vitamin value than hard spring (bread) wheat flour. How can the vitamin intake from this source be increased except by the use of synthetics?

4. Since it has been established by the testimony at the January session above referred to that spring wheat flours of the 1942 crop will average 100 units or more per pound lower than the previous crop in natural vitamin B-1 content, and since even from the 1941 crop wheat many mills had great difficulty in attempting to meet the 400 international units per pound requirement in the flour, and also since, to a great many bakers, this flour was entirely unsatisfactory in its baking qualities, how can it be hoped to produce a satisfactory flour with the ·50 to ·55 ash from the new (1942) crop wheat, at even the modest level of 400 I.U's per pound, unless synthetic enrichment is resorted to?

5. In view of the established success of synthetic enrichment-of-flour programme in the United States and the requirement of the cereal import committee in Great Britain that all Canadian flour shipped to that country shall be synthetically enriched with vitamin B-1, why have we in Canada held back from adopting this scientifically improved means of increasing the vitamin intake in the national dietary with respect to breadstuffs?

Some people say that vitamins have a tendency to produce certain weaknesses, but that has never been proved. In the foregoing questions the word "synthetic" is not quite appropriate because the vitamins that are added to the flour are natural vitamins. If you added the so-called synthetic vitamin B to flour and baked a loaf of bread with it, and used the wheat berry to increase the vitamin B content in another batch of flour, baking a loaf of bread from that flour, I do not believe there is a man in the country who could tell the difference. I do not think there is anyone who could say which was the synthetic product and which was the bread made from the natural wheat berry, because if both samples were subjected to the fluorescent lights which are used for testing they would fluoresce in the same way. I should like the minister to tell us what is being done, because the people should have these extra vitamins and they will not buy bread unless it is white, though when it is made in the ordinary way the vitamins are killed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend has raised a highly technical question which I doubt that I am competent to discuss in technical terms. A year and a half or two years ago we had a committee of the greatest nutritional experts in Canada, including the dominion cerealist and experts from our own department, and they agreed, after consultation and various experiments, scientific and otherwise, upon this standard of Canada-approved flour. It has been very well received though there was some resistance from some of the millers. I know, from information given me by experts from other countries, that it is the opinion of the highest nutritional experts in Great Britain that our Canada-approved flour, which comes from the natural wheat, has a finer nutritive value than any synthetically induced proportions of vitamin that go into any other flour. Britain herself to-day is not using synthetic flour to the extent that she was; she is exporting quite a bit to other countries. It is the opinion of experts in the United States and Britain that our high extraction flour is superior for the health of the nation, and I should not be surprised to see them reverting to our standard of flour before this argument is over. There is some resistance from certain millers at the present time, but I must rely upon the best scientific and technical advice I receive, not only from the officers of my own department but from those of other departments and from many eminent experts outside. The standard represents a great advance forward from what we had before, and there are certain definite constituents, such as iron, phosphorus and calcium, which are all of great benefit to the health of the individual and consequently to the health of the nation as a whole. I personally know little about the subject but the best advice I have received is as I have indicated.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But you get those same constituents, iron, calcium and phosphorus, in the synthetic product, which is bakers' yeast.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My information is to the contrary. Of course, I am only speaking from information I have received. The note I have on the point is that no evidence has been produced to show that these constituents, in the same percentage, are present in the yeast which was under consideration at that time.

Item agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Processing, storage and distribution of blood for transfusions, $120,000.

Mr. FULFORD: I presume this has to do with the processing and distribution of blood obtained through the blood donor clinics operated by the Red Cross. I should like to tell this committee of one of the finest examples of civilian cooperation in an international way that has come to my knowledge. Recently the good people of the city of Ogdensburg, New York, decided to open a blood donors' clinic and give their blood to the American Red Cross. It was found, however, that owing to the geographical location of that city, it was not practicable to send that blood to an American processing laboratory. The Ogdensburg chapter of the American Red Cross thereupon applied to the parent organization to see if it would be possible to send that blood to the Canadian Red Cross This permission was granted, and they applied to the Brockville branch of the Canadian Red Cross for assistance in setting up their clinic. Naturally that assistance was gladly given. The necessary formalities in regard to customs and immigration on both sides of the line have been settled, and the people of Ogdensburg are now in process of signing up nine hundred donors. They hope to have their clinic in operation on or about August 1, at which time the blood will be collected by members of the Brockville branch, brought across the river and sent to Toronto for processing.

I think it is generally recognized that blood plasma is vitally needed at this time; and to me it is an inspiration to think that our American friends, when they found it impossible to give blood to their own organization, of their own free will should ask if they might present their blood to the Canadian Red Cross. As I say, I know of no finer example of international civilian cooperation, and I believe that we as Canadians could learn a lesson here. Even some hon. members of this house could learn a lesson from this incident. We have not enough blood donors in this country; I think anyone connected with the Department of Pensions and National Health will support that statement. We need more blood donors. I have already suggested that hon. members should go to the Ottawa branch of the Red Cross and donate their blood, and again I would urge them to do so. Surely if our American friends are willing to donate their blood to the cause of Canada and the cause of the united nations, we Canadians should intensify our efforts and have more people give their blood for the same cause.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I want to thank my hon. friend for his reference to what is really a magnificent gesture, for which we are profoundly grateful.

Grant to the Canadian Nurses' Association to increase the supply of qualified nurses in Canada, $250,000.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Will the minister give us a brief statement of what has been done in this connection?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Last year the grant was $115,000; this year it is being increased to $250,000. Last year the grant was made for the following purposes: $15,000 for administration expenses and to provide staff and travelling expenses, to stimulate the recruitment of student nurses and the expenses of publicity in connection therewith. Last year $75,000 was allocated to hospitals or other teaching institutions to provide additional facilities for the tuition of teachers, supervisors and administrators in schools of nursing, and for the training of the increased registration of student nurses. Then $25,000 was devoted to scholarships for graduate nurses for education as teachers, supervisors and administrators. As a result of the recruiting campaign the number of students in schools of nursing was increased by 1,402. Some forty-five scholarships, ranging in value from $265 to $500, were awarded to approved candidates, eighteen for post-graduate work in nursing and twenty-one in public health.

The grant of $75,000 for teaching institutions was allocated through the provinces, to be used for the following purposes: refresher courses for graduate nurses, summer courses in public health nursing, teaching, supervision of hospitals and hospital administration; special clinical post-graduate courses for three months; field work for universities and schools of nursing; to assist smaller schools in providing additional staff, teaching equipment and text books to take care of the increased registration; to provide for smaller schools travelling specialized instructors in psychiatry, dietetics, pediatrics and communicable diseases.

The need for more graduate nurses and specialists has increased so that it is considered desirable to increase the assistance to the Canadian Nurses' Association as follows:

(a) $25,000 for administration, to increase campaign for recruitment of student nurses, and for increased publicity.

(b) $155,000 for direct assistance to schools of nursing to provide for increased registration. The present grant did not permit assistance to many schools where such aid would have provided for larger registration. It is planned to increase the number of students in many more training schools as soon as money can be provided for increased training facilities.

(c) $40,000 for scholarships. The need for specialists is increasing. The grant last year permitted forty-five scholarships, but this took care of only half the eligible and desirable applicants.

(d) $30,000 for direct assistance to schools of nursing in universities and in public health organizations in order to extend their facilities for giving post-graduate specialist training. Present facilities are taxed to capacity and direct aid will provide for increased output of trained specialists. The method of distribution of the direct assistance to teaching institutions and universities is subject to the approval of the department.

Mr. HOWDEN: Has the minister any knowledge of the means that were employed by the nursing organization to encourage young ladies to enroll as pupil nurses? This seems like a good deal of money, and I was wondering if a canvass was made of the schools or anything like that, in order to encourage young ladies to become nurses.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, that was done by a field secretary employed by the nurses' association.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe this is another very important appropriation. I have had the opportunity in the last three years to know something of this training, and it seems to me if we are to make the nursing profession more attractive to the right type of girl, facilities will have to be provided so that more of them may be engaged in the work in unit hospitals, in order that they may not be overtaxed and their health may be protected. Not only here, but as a member of the hospital board in Regina, I have known that a large number of girls have broken their health during training. And when one considers that girls in training are not only doing hospital duties, but are also studying and preparing for examinations, it will be realized that their duties are those which only a girl in fairly robust health could possibly stand.

I am not complaining about the hospitals. But, as I say, I have had personal contact with one in the city in which I lived, and I have known something about the local situation. I do believe an attempt should be made by the government to encourage more young girls to come in so that they may relieve, at least to some extent, those who are already in training. This may mean that grants will have to be made for increased accommodation for student nurses attached to hospitals with approved training schools. Because, after all, in many such hospitals the number of student nurses who can be enrolled will be governed by the amount of accommodation the hospital has for student nurses in residence and in class rooms. I suggest this is something to which attention should be given by the government when it is making grants. The institutions themselves should be assisted to provide accommodation so that there will not be quite such long hours for some of the girls in the hospitals, and that more care—if I may put it in that way, although I know supervisors give all the attention they can—shall be given to the health of the girls in training. In a number of instances a very high percentage of student nurses have failed to complete the course, not only because some of them were unfit, but because of a breakdown in health, often the result of very strenuous work and the long hours.

I know that in most hospitals an attempt is made to limit the working day to eight hours. I also know, very well indeed, that it is almost impossible in some of these institutions to live up to that eight-hour regulation. The girls have to work nine and even ten hours sometimes. In addition they must study, which means that they cannot withstand the strain. In my opinion some consideration should be given to the provision of accommodation in training schools attached to our hospitals, sufficient to ensure that there will be an ample supply of student nurses in the future, and that none of the girls in training shall be overworked. I believe we should pay some attention to that aspect of the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We agree.

Mr. SHAW: In his break-down the minister referred to scholarships for graduate nurses, so that they may take special training. Has any provision been made to assist student nurses who, because of the lack of a few dollars, might not be able to enroll for training purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I believe a definite statement was made on that subject by Miss Ellis before the social security committee, of which the hon. member is a member. My recollection is that there was no direct grant to student nurses. I am instructed they are expecting some assistance from one of the training schemes, but it had not been forthcoming before she gave her evidence.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I was pleased to hear the last report of the minister. My information is that the chief drawback to the securing of more nurses is, first, the fact that a great many girls cannot afford to take the three years, and, in addition to receiving no compensation for their work in the hospitals, be called upon to provide books and uniforms. Anything that could be done to relieve that situation would be helpful. I understand there are some hospitals in which a small remuneration is paid, but that condition is not general. That is the first big drawback. The second drawback is the number of hours these girls are asked to work. If the minister can do anything to relieve those two situations, he will go a long way toward achieving the end he has in view.

May I commend the minister on the amount of money he has set aside for this purpose. I certainly agree it is something that is very much needed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are not all arrangements with regard to pay and the terms of apprenticeship standardized? Are not the hours of labour in standard hospitals all the same? They were at one time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am under the impression they are not. I think the objective has always been that they should be standardized at the level mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. But I believe conditions do differ across Canada, even in our best hospitals.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have served on a hospital board for a number of years, and I thought it had always been recognized by the hospitals association that these things were standardized. However, I am glad to be informed on the point. If they are not, they ought to be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not speaking definitely, but I am under the impression that my statement is correct.

Mr. HOWDEN: I think I can say definitely that all major hospitals have adopted the eight-hour day. For many years it was a twelve-hour day, but even at that I am happy to say that with the regular hours of sleep, the regular meals and the like, ninety-five per cent of the nurses put on flesh and gained in health during their course of training in the various hospitals. In those days there was a small monthly payment of $5, but I do not know whether or not that is paid to-day. But I believe I can allay the fears of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, because I have been connected in the west with a nursing school for a great many years, and I know that the vast majority of nurses who went into training gained in health in the first five or six months. And that was the condition in the early days, when they spent twelve hours a day, and sometimes more, at their work.

Mr. SOPER: While I realize that what I am going to say is to some extent a provincial matter, yet I notice that the federal government is making a fairly substantial contribution to nursing, and there is one point I should bring to the minister's attention. One of the greatest causes of the shortage of nurses is that training privileges have been taken away from the small hospitals. Girls in the smaller towns cannot now train in most of the small hospitals, but are compelled to go to the larger cities. In many instances this is not looked upon with favour by their parents. I think the experience has been that many of our better nurses have been trained in some of the smaller hospitals throughout the country. I believe if the training privilege were restored to smaller hospitals we would not now have this shortage of nurses.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is that not entirely a matter of provincial registration?

Mr. SOPER: Yes, I think it is.

Mr. COLDWELL: I cannot quite agree with what was said by the hon. member for St. Boniface. My personal observation has been that while care is taken of the young nurses in training, yet owing to the pressure upon them, break-downs have developed.

Mr. HOWDEN: Very few.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hesitate to mention anything that I might have observed during my own daughter's training which she has just completed, but in the class in which she trained there were, I believe, 54 pupils, and at the end there were some 38 left, the remainder being on the casualty list to some extent on account of break-down in health.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Probably some got married.

Mr. COLDWELL: None of them got married, so far as I know, while they were in training. This does not seem to be much improvement over what I know was the case some years ago when I myself was on a hospital board. While I am not blaming the hospitals, because I know the pressure is tremendous, I do say that if we wish to get student nurses in our hospitals we shall have to see to it that the hours are not prolonged.

Mr. HOWDEN: I am not advocating prolonged hours.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understand that quite well; the hon. member advocated shortened hours. It frequently happens that the hours are unavoidably extended beyond eight because hospitals are under pressure and understaffed.

Mr. HOWDEN: They overlap.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some overlapping does occur. I do not want it to be thought that I feel that this matter does not need remedying, because, in my opinion it does.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): A wrong impression might be created in the minds of those who have occasion to review this particular debate. We must not get it into our heads that an eight hour day in an institution means eight hours of work for the nurses. That is to say, you could not possibly operate under three eight hour shifts and find work for the nurses to do. There must be quiet periods in a hospital, otherwise your patients will not get along as well as they should. This idea of talking about a twelve hour day or an eight hour day is all wrong. I do not know of any institution that might be said to work on a twelve hour basis, where the nurses work a twelve hour day. They have their rest periods, particularly at night. The institution must be quiet. It is not a factory you are running; it is an institution for the healing of those who come to your door. There is a great deal of confusion in the minds of people who feel they should run three eight hour shifts. You will be running a factory, not a hospital. I do not know of any place where they actually work, where they are on their feet for twelve hours. There is a rest period in the afternoon and a long rest period at night when the other work is off.

Mr. HOWDEN: The busiest time for hospital nurses is between ten o'clock at night and eight o'clock in the morning.

Mr. HANSELL: Is this appropriation of a quarter of a million dollars for the training of nurses for the armed forces, or is it for the training of nurses for all the services? I realize that this is a war appropriation. To a large extent nurses, when they are available, are having to take the place of doctors because of the present shortage of doctors. I do not mean that they are doing all the work the doctors would do, because we know they do not. In Alberta they have certain health units which are made up of a number of communities. A doctor is the health officer for the entire territory. A number of doctors have joined the forces, others have moved away, and the result is that some of these health units are without doctors. The nurses have taken their places, not to do all that a doctor would do, but to substitute as much as possible. I hope that part of this money is to go for the training of nurses who will eventually find their way into civilian service. How is this money distributed? Is any of it given to the provincial governments to handle in connection with the training of nurses?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The moneys are distributed by nurses' associations and hospital associations with the approval of the director of public health services, Department of Pensions and National Health. This appropriation is for the training of nurses for all purposes, both military and civilian, so they would be available for the health units to which my hon. friend has referred. This necessity has been occasioned by the depletion in the ranks of the nurses caused by the war.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to say a word in support of this grant. There is no body of professional people in the country more worthy of support than are our nurses. They are doing a magnificent job. The period during which they can work is limited and any assistance we can give toward the carrying out of their duties should be given. I do not know to what hospital the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was referring, but might it not be possible that the examination made of the nurses before they went into training was not sufficiently thorough to determine whether they were in category A? In most hospitals an X-ray examination of the chest is made, and as a consequence this has practically eliminated the incidence of tuberculosis among nurses which used to be quite prevalent years ago. There is no standard of medical examination adopted by all hospitals; it depends upon the examiner in each hospital as to how rigidly the requirements of physical fitness are enforced before a student is admitted for training as a nurse. I thought possibly this might explain the casualty list amongst the student nurses to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They did find a rather high incidence of tuberculosis among nurses in training, and that is why X-ray examinations are now made.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not complaining about the hospital to which I referred, because I believe it is probably one of the best in the country and is giving the best of training. My own daughter has completed her course without a break, but I happen to know that others have not been able to do so.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Expenses in connection with the administration of the defence of Canada regulations, $35,000.

The CHAIRMAN: The item will be found on page 923 of Hansard of March 3, 1943. Shall the item carry?

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, we are anxious to facilitate matters, but we should not try to go too fast. At least we want to see the item. When other departments have been up we have been furnished with a memorandum giving a break-down of the item, and I do not know whether the minister has provided that in this case.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): There are only three items. One is for $35,000 in connection with the defence of Canada regulations; the other is $10,000 in connection with prize courts, and the next is $5,700 covering sundry services. These are the salaries and cost of living bonus of three temporary employees who have been added to the service of the department. I did not think it necessary to have a memorandum prepared covering these small items, but I have one prepared for the larger item.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Mr. Chairman, I have for a very long while wished to have the opportunity to discuss democracy in this country. Now the opportunity has come, and I welcome it; for after the winning of the war there is no subject more important than the maintenance of democracy. On July 9 the Prime Minister, speaking in the house, said this:

> Our conception of nationhood rejects, as it must always reject, any attachments to ideas which are non-democratic or to usages which would constitute the negation of free institutions or the untrammelled expression of the free souls of free men.

Those are very wonderful words, Mr. Chairman. I should like to see these things a living reality in this country. I must admit that resentment has been burning inside me for many months now because of the lack of an opportunity to discuss this very question, and I intend to use all the force of which I am capable to speak against the sort of administration we have had under these defence of Canada regulations.

I do not think I need emphasize the fact to any hon. member of this house that I was brought up in a country which is known as the mother of parliaments and the home of democracy. My freedom of speech and the right to associate as I please was something which was to me just like the air I breathe. It was my inalienable right. I am not unmindful either of all the things that were endured by my ancestors in days gone by and the price they had to pay for the freedom which they finally attained. I am not unaware of many who met their deaths in days gone by from the force and violence of those who sought to rob the common people of their freedom, and I should be untrue to those who have gone before and untrue to myself if at this time I failed to protest against a new form of despotism which is growing up within the boundaries of this country to dominate us and which like a cancerous growth impairs democracy. These may seem strong expressions to hon. members, but I can find no words too strong to express my feelings in this regard.

We do not miss the air we breathe until we gasp and choke for lack of it, and some people do not appreciate the rights and privileges they have until they have them snatched from them by force and violence. To see other little groups of people lose their privileges and rights does not affect us at all.

It is only when we ourselves lie broken in spirit under the fetters of despotism that we realize its full calamity, and then, my friends, it is too late. While I have breath to protest against some things which have gone on in this country in the administration of the defence of Canada regulations I shall do it.

I should like to give one instance in which within the last few months the rights of one section of our people have been denied them, even though the Minister of Justice wields extraordinary power under these regulations. The question this time is that of freedom of speech. It is in connection with a meeting which should have been held in the city of Montreal on May 3 of this year. A large mass meeting had been arranged for in that city. Various trades union leaders were to speak and the leader of the communist party of Canada, who had spoken previously in every other large city across Canada, was also to be there. Although the hall had been engaged—I believe it was the Atwater market—at the last minute the meeting was cancelled. Nobody seemed to know why. The citizens who were interested in this meeting gathered themselves together for another meeting to protest. Peculiarly enough the second meeting was not allowed. Then this same group of citizens, swelling in numbers as the people gradually became aware of what had happened in their city, gathered together, and, roughly calling themselves "The Defenders of the Four Freedoms," arranged for a well known journalist in Montreal to prepare a broadcast on the question of freedom of speech for the people of that city. The journalist in question prepared a broadcast. It was accepted by the censor, and yet at the last moment he was not allowed to make that speech over the air. Finally, after some time, this group of people did get a conference together. I went down myself that evening. At that conference there were represented roughly 131 organizations in the city of Montreal, which would mean representing over 130,000 of Montreal's citizens. They met to protest the right of freedom of speech being denied to them as it had been accorded to the citizens of every other great city in this country. At the end of that conference they sent a letter to the Minister of Justice. They asked that they might have freedom of speech in their city the same as the people of any other city, well aware that no nation can live with its people half slave and half free. I have here a copy of the minister's reply to that group of people representing over 130,000 citizens. He says:

I have duly received your letter of June 4, with attached thereto copy of a resolution appealing to the Prime Minister of Canada to instruct his Department of Justice that freedom of speech, press and assembly, such as is permitted to the rest of Canada, should also be accorded to the citizens of Quebec, and praying him, moreover, to employ the utmost latitude in assuring for all citizens of this dominion opportunity to exercise this fundamental right of a free people.

A similar letter has also been referred to me from the Prime Minister's office.

Then listen to this last paragraph:

I wish to inform you that the Department of Justice has nothing to do with the according of freedom of speech, press and assembly to the citizens of Quebec, any more than it has to do with such privilege in other provinces of Canada, and has not acted in any manner to which the criticism implied in this resolution would seem to be applicable.

In other words, although our Minister of Justice wields tremendous power, he claims that he has nothing to do with the privilege and right of freedom of speech in this country. I fail to understand why our Minister of Justice has not acted. Perhaps it would help the members of this house to understand one reason why the minister did not act when I say that finally it was known that a little group in Montreal were responsible for the stopping of this great public meeting. One of them particularly, a Mr. Raymond, a member of the other place, closely connected with the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, and other groups in the province of Quebec has been most vocal against Canada's greatest and all-out participation in this war. They were the groups who were responsible for the stopping of these meetings in the city of Montreal. This is an astounding fact.

I would say that the minister's action, or rather his lack of action, to protect the democratic right of freedom of speech in that one city of Montreal, amounts to nothing more or less than appeasement of anti-war groups in the province of Quebec. After all, if there is one thing in this world worse than no justice, it is that there should be justice without a sword in her hand. We have witnessed the lights of Europe go out one by one. We have witnessed people lose their freedom little by little. We have seen the calamity which overtook those who viewed too carelessly this question of their democratic rights. It should be a lesson to us. We should resist these things in time. Whether or not we have any particular liking for the views of those who wish to speak is not the question. It matters not whether it be trades union leaders or the leader of the communist party who may be expressing views which may not be palatable to some. The fact remains that freedom of speech is the right of the people of this country at all times, provided that speech is towards a democratic end. It so happens that the speeches that were to be made were on behalf of the victory loan. "Back the attack" was to have been the spirit of the meeting. Yet we find groups who have been most vocal against an all-out war effort by Canada being the ones to prevent this meeting in the city of Montreal.

I charge that under these defence of Canada regulations the Minister of Justice has not protected the rights of all the citizens of this country. Yet the purpose of his administration of these regulations is supposed to be that we should be protected from those who seek to destroy democracy within the boundaries of this country. It is pretty clear today all the world over that whoever denies the rights of the people is against the people, and whoever is against the people is their enemy. Let us not make any mistake about it.

So much then for the protection which should have been afforded to the people of Canada under the defence of Canada regulations. We accepted as a nation these regulations as a war emergency, designed only to protect us from the machinations of the enemy within our own country. But the minister has failed to use the authority which we have placed in his hands, to protect the citizens of Montreal. I will go further and say that while he has failed to protect us under these regulations, he has in some other ways used them to bar the progress of democracy in this country.

I would quote from the Toronto Telegram of June 24, which contains a dispatch that on June 23 Canada's Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in an address prepared for delivery to the Midwest Farm Bureau conference, said:

> Reviewing war developments, Mr. Gardiner said that it might be said that Hitler declared war on the world when he started his brownshirts marching on German roads. If this interpretation were correct the only country which realized the situation was Russia which turned out to be the only nation ready for the attack. . . .
> "In my opinion it was the move of Stalin into Poland in 1939 and not the move of Hitler into Russia in 1941 which saved Britain," said Mr. Gardiner.
> "When the British returned from Dunkirk in 1940, if all the troops in Britain had been given all the arms and ammunition left and commanded to start firing, they could have continued to shoot for one hour."
> The preparations made by Stalin compelled Hitler to risk all in an attack upon Russia in the hope he would crush that country before the democracies could arm. . . .

It is quite alright now, in the year 1943, for the Minister of Agriculture or any other hon. member or private citizen of this country to make statements like that; but my contention is that the people who stated this same fact at the time it happened, in 1939, in other words the communists of this country, were under the defence of Canada regulations rounded up. We all agree now that it was the vast preparations made for war by the Soviet Union which saved Britain and forced Hitler into an attack on the Soviet Union. But as I said before, the people who realized this fact in 1939, and did not wait until 1943 to say it, were arrested under the defence of Canada regulations; they were herded into concentration camps, often with force and violence; they were hounded like common criminals, some of them snatched out of their beds in the middle of the night, and their wives and families had no knowledge where they were to be taken or what was to be done to them.

Some of the Ukrainian people of this country had their organization, the Ukrainian Labour-Farmer-Temple association, banned under the defence of Canada regulations, because it was said that certain of them, some leaders among them, were communists. Some of their halls, as you know, were sold. It is a ghastly thing that in some instances their halls were sold to a rival Ukrainian organization whose leaders, though I do not say all the people belonging to it, to say the least had had questionable alliances with pro-fascist terrorist groups in Europe. It is perhaps not very well known that this Ukrainian Labour-Farmer-Temple association had some of its property not only taken by the custodian of enemy alien property, but actually destroyed by him, instead of being kept. I thought the word "custodian" meant a man who takes things in custody and keeps them until the time arrives to hand them back, but that does not appear to be so. This custodian destroyed property belonging to Ukrainian people in this country whose only fault was that some of the leaders of their organization were supposed to be communists.

I should like to read something which I believe will be of interest to every hon. member, who, before he is Liberal, Conservative or of any other political faith, is a Canadian. I have with me two documents produced by witnesses, sworn statements before notaries, of what happened to some of the property belonging to this organization. It will take only a short time to read them, and I think they should be read:

> I, Steve Solonynka, of the city of Toronto, in the county of York, in the province of Ontario, make oath and say as follows:
> 1. I reside at 259 Crawford street, in the city of Toronto, in the county of York.
> 2. I have full and personal knowledge of the matters hereinafter by me sworn to except when same are stated to be based upon information and belief.

3. I was formerly employed by the Pullan Paper Stock Ltd. at Trinity and Parliament streets, in the said city of Toronto, and was employed by the said firm for about five years until about six months ago.

4. I remember distinctly in the early part of 1941 a load of books, containing about five tons, was brought to the yards of the said company, and the said books were torn and destroyed by the workmen of the said company. These books bore the stamp of the Ukrainian Labour-Farmer-Temple Association.

5. Many of these books were in the Ukrainian language but many others were in the Russian and English languages.

6. I remember definitely seeing the following books printed in the English language: works of Victor Hugo, Anatole France, Robert Burns, William Shakespeare, Jack London, Upton Sinclair, Karl Marx, W. Lenin and the History of Canada.

7. I also remember seeing books printed in the Russian language by Leo Tolstoy, Turgeniew, Maxim Gorki, Pushkin, and books in the Ukrainian language by the following authors: Taras Shewchenko, Ivan Franko, Olga Kobylianska, Kulish, Wasil Stefanyk.

8. While these books were being destroyed by the workmen of the said company, the destruction of same was being supervised by plainsclothes police officers of either the dominion or provincial government.

We have heard about the wholesale destruction of books in Germany. I grew up in a country where no one dictated to me what I should read, and as long as I have breath in my body I will defend the right of the Canadian people to read what they please.

Here is another sworn statement:

I, Mike Andrichuk, of 2272 Wellesly Boulevard, in the city of Windsor, in the province of Ontario, Ford worker, make oath and say as follows,—

1. I am by nationality a Ukrainian and was employed from the middle of the year 1938 to on or about April 1, 1941, as a janitor of the Ukrainian Labour-Farmer-Temple Association Hall at street number 10628 96th street, in the city of Edmonton, in the province of Alberta.

2. In the said hall at the time of my said employment was a library belonging to the said Ukrainian Labour-Farmer-Temple Association consisting of approximately 1,000 library books some of which were used in a schoolroom and some of which were used for general library purposes amongst the membership of the said association. Amongst the said books were works of Gorki, Marx, Tolstoy and other great Russian writers as well as works in English by Shakespeare, Burns and Winston Churchill. There were also works by Shevchenko, the Ukrainian national poet, and by Jack London.

3. In or about the month of April, 1941, the said hall was sold by the custodian of enemy property to the Ukrainian National Federation, a pro-fascist organization. By instructions given to me by a Mr. Wenspir and a Mr. Hamilton, representatives of the said custodian, I was ordered to burn, and did burn, approximately 500 of the said books in the furnace in the basement of the said hall.

Mr. MacNICOL: None of the volumes of Burns, surely?

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

Mrs. NIELSEN: Yes, volumes of Burns were burned.

Mr. MacNICOL: Sacrilege!

Mrs. NIELSEN: Sacrilege! I should say so.

The said burning took place about one month prior to the sale of the said building and I was further ordered by the said Wenspir and Hamilton to assist in loading the balance of the said books into a truck and the said books were taken by the said truck to the said garbage disposal plant of the city of Edmonton and there destroyed. At the time of the destruction of the said books the same were in good, usable condition. The said Wenspir and Hamilton or an auctioneer were present with me in the basement of the said hall when I began to burn the said 500 of the said books in the basement furnace according to their instructions.

I was being paid by the custodian of enemy property a salary or wage of $35 monthly together with the use of three rooms from the beginning of July, 1940, to April 1, 1941.

The said Wenspir and Hamilton told me that the said books were being destroyed because the custodian did not want the people to be reading them any longer.

Have you ever heard anything like that in a country that calls itself democratic?

The said library was in process of being gathered together over a period of fifteen (15) years and there were from 500 to 700 Ukrainian anti-fascists making use of the said library month by month.

I verily believe that it was a very great cultural hardship to the Ukrainian community in the city of Edmonton to be deprived of the said books, the majority of which were in the Russian and Ukrainian language, which language many of the said community could read much more easily in the said Ukrainian or Russian language.

In addition to the destruction of the said books the said representatives of the custodian's department also conducted an auction sale of some of the furniture and equipment of the said hall, the same being sold to the general public.

I should like to know what evil intelligence thinks that it can dictate to British subjects in this country what they may or may not read. What Goebbelesque monstrosity dares to destroy the works of some of the greatest authors the world has ever known?

I should like to read you another letter. This is pitiful. Its English is not very good but you will understand it:

Dear Mrs. Nielsen:

I am Ann Galangey. I want to bring to your attention the following.

In the midsummer of 1940 the officer of R.C.M.P. raided our house, 13 Clarence, without reading the warrant to search the house, and without any reason they seized a number of literature; among these were number of my music books consist of famous composers of music, despite of my request they have never been returned to me.

Snatching the music books from children under the defence of Canada regulations!

History has taught us something. It has taught us that the Ukrainian people do not retreat or surrender to the enemy when they fight. They are among the immortals of the world, and they have died for freedom's sake. Those Ukrainian people in Canada, too, have been fighting against the enemy, not a foreign enemy but the domestic enemy in Canada. They have been fighting, not with force and violence, but with all the forces of democracy which they can muster. They have been fighting with petitions and letters to the government, letters to the Minister of Justice, and it is to our everlasting shame, the shame of members of this House of Commons, that we have not fought harder with them and made their fight our own.

Under these regulations the communist party of this country was banned. Now, every member of this house can think exactly what he pleases about me; I do not care one bit what people think of me. One does not have to be a member of the Salvation Army to agree that the Salvation Army should have the right to exist in this country; one does not have to be a member of the communist party in this day and age to agree that at the present time they should have the ban lifted from them.

Although much has been said in the past about the Soviet Union, you, my friends, know perfectly well how history has disproved those lies. You remember what was said about communist Russia years ago. I should like to quote something that was said a few years ago about communist Russia. It is not necessary to say who said it because it is the kind of thing that was said by so many people:

> The world has learned two important truths about Russia. One is that Stalin is the very spirit of evil incarnate and the other is that the armed might of Russia is a myth.
> The equipment in air force, army and navy is plentiful but out of date. The training and morale of the troops is bad. The army and navy have few trained officers and agriculture is badly disorganized. As a nation they are in every respect unfitted to engage any great power.

That is the kind of rubbish we heard circulated around the four corners of the world—lies generated and distilled in the minds of the people by the fascist leaders. They were repeated by fools and knaves all over the world. It was the communists who said that if ever we hope to preserve democracy we should join with the Soviet Union, but that was not published in those days. Just as history has proved all that foolishness to be incorrect, so I am perfectly sure that history will also prove something else to be incorrect, and that is another fallacy and lie which originated with the same fascist sources. I mean the lie that communists believe in and will use force and violence. I would refer you, my friends, to the brief which was submitted by the communist party of this country to the Rowell-Sirois commission on dominion-provincial relations. It was admitted by unbiased readers at that time to be one of the finest briefs submitted, one of the finest types of analyses ever made of social conditions in Canada. I quote from page 14 of the brief:

> The Communist party stands for socialism. But the Communist party repudiates now as in the past all theories or proposals looking to the forcible imposition of socialism upon the majority of the people. Such concepts are utterly and completely foreign to the Communist party. We never did and never will hold to a programme of forcible establishment of socialism against the will of the people. Anyone who proposes the attainment of socialism other than through the democratic will of the people is alien to the Communist party. The Communist programme and policy rests exclusively upon the democratic will of the people. No genuine democrat need harbour any fears of the Communist party.

Let me come to a more recent publication, which I am sure all members must have seen. I refer to the magazine Saturday Night of June 19, in which the leader of the communist party had his life story written up under the title, "Name in the News—How Tim Buck Got That Way". Many prominent men in Canada have had their lives so written up. I quote:

> It is the same "Tim Buck", and just as was the case when the Rowell-Sirois commission was sitting, he recently rose before the national war labour board to present the outstandingly finest brief that has been submitted. Its merits lay in its clarity, scholarly documentation, thoroughly adult attitude toward a complex problem on which it endeavoured not to vituperate, but to shed light. It was aimed not at the overthrow of democracy, but at the establishment of a realistic, comprehensive dominion labour code. Mr. Buck produced a document that even the most conservative-minded legal experts in Ottawa consider well worthy of study. . . .
> Canada, he says, is so widely integrated politically that such a measure as is usually credited to him as his objective, namely, a small group grabbing physical power and enforcing communism upon the unwilling mass of citizens, would be quite out of the question. Support of the majority of the people for communism would be necesary in order to enforce it, and this they must show, in our parliamentary system, by voting for those who advocate it.

I should like to remind the house that the truth and only the truth will set us free, even if the truth falls on our ears and sounds strangely after the lies to which we have been accustomed for many years. If any member feels it incumbent upon himself to get up and defend the Minister of Labour in the administration of the defence of Canada regulations—

Mr. MITCHELL: Not the Minister of Labour.

Mrs. NIELSEN: The Minister of Justice; I beg your pardon. I hope that no member of this house will insult our intelligence by declaring that the communist party believes in force and violence or will consciously or unconsciously peddle the lies of Hitler and Mussolini in this chamber in this regard. If there are two things more necessary now than ever before they are these. We must win the war for our own sakes, and to do that we need two things. We need international unity and the faith of our allies in us, and we need also national unity and the faith of the Canadian people in the democratic leadership this government should be giving them.

On June 22 of this year I went to Toronto, just as the Prime Minister did, to the great gathering that took place in the Maple Leaf Gardens for the "Salute to Russia," and I listened with considerable pleasure to the speech which he made on that occasion. Let me quote from the speech he made on June 22 as reported in the Globe and Mail of June 24. I quote:

"Apart altogether," he said, "from our comradeship-in-arms there are many reasons why friendship between our two countries should be particularly close," and he foresaw in the promotion of such understanding and friendship between nations "the beginnings of the new world order."

The editorial in the Globe and Mail goes on to say:

The views and sentiments which Mr. King expounded were quite impeccable, and altogether his speech was a commendable performance.

But it was surely a very unfortunate coincidence that on the day Mr. King was hymning the praises of Russia his Minister of Justice was reported as explaining to the House of Commons that he still regarded the Communist party of Canada as an illegal organization, and had no intention of lifting the ban upon it. Now the ruling spirits of the soviet union may have decreed the dissolution of the Comintern, but they have not foresworn communism, and are still in theory firm adherents of that creed.

We hope that Mr. Feodor Gousev, the Russian minister, has a strong sense of humour and can laugh at the farcical coincidence of our Prime Minister's elaborate eulogies of communist Russia and his Minister of Justice's reiteration of his determination to keep the Canadian Communist party suppressed.

What happened at Singapore in the last few tragic days before that city fell? They released the communists from the prisons. Why? Because they knew those people would defend Singapore to the very last drop of blood in their bodies. When crisis overtook India and there was need for national unity, what was done? The ban on the Communist party was lifted. What is being done now in the efforts to unite the Free French? I quote from the New York Herald-Tribune of June 25, as follows:

The French committee of national liberation at a meeting to-day completed the personnel of the permanent military commission and declared invalid the acts of German-dominated courts in France against French patriots. . . .

The anti-communist laws adopted by the Edouard Daladier government on September 26, 1939, were abrogated and amnesty granted for sentences passed under these laws.

That is fine, but, I ask, who is out of step? Are all the other united nations out of step or are we? Last year wide sections of the Canadian people signed petitions headed "We Stand for Freedom", which appeared as full page advertisements in nearly all the great newspapers across this country. Leading churchmen of the protestant churches have asked, on behalf of themselves and their congregations, for the lifting of the ban on the communist party to promote national and political unity in this period of Canada's war emergency. Professors in our universities; business men; well known people such as Sir Ernest MacMillan, Clifford Sifton and Sir Ellsworth Flavelle; artists; leaders of farm and trade union organizations; Mr. Bracken, on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party of Canada; Liberal members, individually—all have expressed their feeling that this ban should be lifted. Every hon. member is familiar with the recommendation which was brought down in this house last year, but which has been absolutely ignored since that time. The issue is not whether or not we are in favour of communism; the majority are not, and we all know that. The point is that there are only two alternatives before us to-day; and we must be on either one side or the other. Either we want a united Canada to win the war, with full democratic privileges to all who fight against nazi tyranny, or we are willing to allow a small group in the province of Quebec who oppose full participation in the war, and who do not really represent the people of Quebec, to dominate our government and our Minister of Justice, and to destroy the democracy which is the heritage of the Canadian people.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, democracy is allergic to despotism; it is allergic to the abuse of power. Democracy cannot live in the kind of atmosphere we have in Canada. Either the Minister of Justice obeys the will of the democratic majority of the people of this country or he becomes a despot and misuses the power which has been entrusted to him as a war emergency measure, to protect us from the machinations of the enemy within. It is true—and I hope the Hansard reporter gets this statement correctly—that communists all over the world are a menace. Yes, they are a menace, but to whom? Communists all over the world are a menace to fascists, to fascist-minded people and to those who propagate fascist propaganda. Because of that I say we should allow the communists to fight with us, legally, and should lift the ban upon them in this country. On behalf of the people of Canada my friends, hundreds and thousands of them—the great majority of them, I am convinced—I would ask the Minister of Justice before the end of this session to lift the ban from the communist party and all other democratic groups who have been denied their privileges and rights under the defence of Canada regulations. I ask that he grant them full freedom and give them every opportunity to participate in the winning of the war, or resign his position as Minister of Justice. It may be true that the communists are forming a new organization; there are reports to that effect, but that does not alter the fact that as long as the ban remains on the communist party, all Canadians are in danger; because any time any group of people advocated something with which the Minister of Justice does not agree, it would be the easiest thing in the world for him to say, under the defence of Canada regulations, "Representations have been made to me that you are a communist," and once again we would have a round-up. In Italy and Germany it all started with the rounding up of the communists, but it did not end with that. First the people gave away their rights to protect that minority; then little by little any liberal-minded person who dared express an opinion contrary to that of the powers that were, also found his way—as did Niemöller and thousands of others—into a concentration camp.

These things are not new; you are all familiar with them. I would say to you very definitely that our Minster of Justice has full command of the letter of the law, but in my opinion he has failed dismally to appreciate the spirit of democracy, and never in my life have I said anything about which I was more sincere. He has failed to capture the essential spirit of democracy. I would ask the support of every hon. member of this house; I would ask you to be Canadians first and forget your party; for the party must come second to the fact that we are all Canadians. I would ask that you support the idea that the people of this country should have the opportunity for full political unity. You will remember that a great deal has been said about how wrong it is for people to join this communist party. Some time ago I noticed an item in the New York Times which was an eye-opener to me, and it may be that other hon. members have not seen it. It came from San Jose in Costa Rica under date of June 20, and reads:

> Catholic workers may belong to the new political party, Vanguardia Popular, formerly the communist party, according to Archbishop Victor Sanbria, but catholics may not join nazi or fascist organizations. This information was given by the archbishop to Manual Mora, who was elected to congress by the communist party, of which he was secretary. He is secretary of the new party.
> The archbishop indicated that while communism seeks world happiness and economic well being, and respects political, social and religious institutions, catholic workers may belong to Vanguardia Popular. Regarding nazism and fascism the archbishop quoted Father Juan Maria Restrepo Jaramille of Columbia as follows: "No Christian can be a nazi; no Christian can sympathize with nazism."

Perhaps, my friends, some of you may think what I have said to-day is a little stronger than it should have been. There is nothing too strong to be said in defence of those principles of democracy which alone will give us the power to win the war and build the new world in which we all believe so earnestly and for which our men are fighting. It is necessary that within this country we preserve the rights and privileges that belong to all free men and that no small section of our people be denied these things; for if you and I deny to one small section of the people the rights and privileges of democracy, it may be our turn next and, as I said before, when that time comes it will be too late.

Once again I would beg every single member of this house, whatever his party, whatever his position, to forget his party and to remember only one thing, that he is a Canadian and that he believes in democracy. I would urge their support to the end that before this session is concluded the Minister of Justice shall guarantee political unity for the winning of the war by lifting the ban on the communist party and all other democratic parties who have been denied their freedom under the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I need not tell you that I do not agree with the views of the hon. member for North Battleford. Far from it, I urge the hon. the Minister of Justice to maintain the ban on communism in Canada. We do not want the communist revolution to cause, soon or later, simultaneous outbreaks in a hundred places, as happened in the country where that perverse and Godless doctrine originated.

I shall avail myself of this opportunity to call once again the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the imprisonment of Mr. Camillien Houde, former mayor of Montreal and member for Montreal-St. Mary in the Quebec legislative assembly. The arbitrary nature of the prolonged imprisonment of Mr. Camillien Houde is not consistent with the democracy for which Canada is now waging a relentless fight. Neither is it consistent with the principles of freedom which we claim to be upholding in this war, or with the spirit of British criminal law which we have always observed. I will go farther; I do not hesitate to say that the powers given to the Minister of Justice under the defence of Canada regulations mean the sabotaging of our judicial institutions. They mean the discard of the habeas corpus principle, one of the most sacred rights of every British citizen. What is the reason of such relentlessness toward Mr. Houde? Has he not long since paid his penalty? He has languished during two years and ten months in a concentration camp. He was taken from an internment camp, wearing the prisoners' uniform, and escorted by two constables as if he had been the lowest scoundrel, and he was brought before the advisory board at Fredericton. Tim Buck and his confederates have been freed, as well as Franceschini and others. Why has Camillien Houde not been given his freedom? That is what parliament has a right to know. The return of which I demanded the production a few days ago would certainly have enlightened us on that point. Powers should not be exceeded, Mr. Chairman, and there should be no persecution. So far as I know, that is not included in the war aims of the allies. Neither is it in accordance with the clauses of the Atlantic charter. I shall not say anything more.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I have a few words to say, with a view to securing information respecting the operation of the defence of Canada regulations, this being the only opportunity upon which such information will be forthcoming. I would ask the minister to state how many prosecutions have taken place under the defence of Canada regulations in the past year, how many convictions there have been, and how many searches under the powers of the regulations have been executed in the past year. Furthermore, I believe a general statement on the defence of Canada regulations is due at this time.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

If there is one thing to be considered more than another in connection with the administration of regulations which grant extraordinary powers in a time of war, it is that they be administered fairly and in such a way as not to interfere with any person's right of speech, or freedom of speech, so long as that freedom of speech is not exercised in a manner likely to prove detrimental to the welfare of the state. Furthermore the powers must not be used, nor must there be any suggestion of their being used, to stifle the religious beliefs of any group or body of people in Canada. This, again, subject to the condition that such religious beliefs are not being propagated in such a way as to interfere with the safety and integrity of the state. We go a long way farther under the administration of these regulations than do the British people. At one time the Minister of Justice was president of the Canadian Bar association, and on many occasions before that association he has heard outstanding lawyers from all parts of the dominion request that which I now request, namely, that the administration of these regulations shall be administered so as not to interfere with the religious beliefs of any person. At the last bar association meeting Sir William Monckton, counsellor of the duchy of Lancaster and representative of the British bar to the meeting of the Canadian Bar association, set out the point of view of the British bar and bench respecting the administration of the regulations in England which are analogous in their nature and effect to our defence of Canada regulations. He said this:

> Democracy still prevails except where suspended to guard the national safety. When we became involved in this conflict there were many who prophesied that total war would prove incompatible with the essential civil freedoms. When they saw the wide powers which the British government assumed, they warned us that we were in danger of losing our liberty, but it has not been so. We have indeed been glad to give up for the purposes and period of the war a large measure of our freedom to choose our work. But this we recognize as inescapable if, as we wholeheartedly desire, the best use is to be made of our services to win the war.

And these words particularly I bring to the attention of the minister:

> On the other hand freedom from capricious arrests and freedom of speech have been sedulously preserved.

That has been the attitude of the British people throughout the war. They deny the right of anyone to endanger the safety of the state, but they preserve freedom from capricious arrest, and freedom of speech.

I have in mind the situation with respect to Jehovah's Witnesses. I do not uphold their doctrines, nor their tenets or beliefs. But I do uphold their right to worship their God as they please, so long as they do not thereby interfere with the safety of the state. Last year a committee of parliament recommended the removal of the ban on Jehovah's Witnesses. Yet the ban still remains. The experience of most of us has been that these are harmless people, devoid of any intent to do wrong to the state. Their beliefs are similar to the beliefs of conscientious objectors belonging to other religious groups. Why has the ban not been lifted? It cannot be because of any fear that this organization is detrimental to the welfare of the state, or that its actions are subversive to the war effort. There has never been even the slightest evidence that such is the case. If my recollection is correct, a number of outstanding lawyers in this dominion have made the statement that there was no such danger from this body. Why has the ban not been lifted? Why are these people still considered to be criminal simply because of the fact that they worship their god according to the tenets of their belief?

I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which was brought to my attention within the last four or five days, a matter which I think requires some explanation. A woman by the name of Mrs. H. H. Mullins, of St. Georges de Beauce, in the province of Quebec, endeavoured to distribute some literature. I have a couple of samples of the type of literature she was distributing. It is in French, but I translate:

The Holy Bible is the Word of God. Read it.

Then follow a number of quotations from the New Testament according to the Crampon version. There is nothing in this literature other than quotations from the Holy Bible. But what happened to her? Around the fourth of this month the R.C.M.P. entered her premises. I speak subject to correction by the minister in what I shall say of the facts, but my information is that they made a search. They entered and removed the literature she had been distributing. There is nothing in the literature other than quotations from the Holy Bible. Is there anything in that type of literature that is detrimental to the welfare of the state or subversive in any way? While I have not the charge here, I am informed it was that she was distributing literature upon which the printer's name did not appear. This literature contains quotations from St. Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians, chapter 1, verse 3; the Epistle of Paul to the Romans, chapter 15, verse 4; the second Epistle of Paul to Timothy, chapter 3, verse 16, and so on. On July 8 this woman was taken into custody and placed in the gaol. I do not know what has happened to her since. I think an explanation is due as to why this search took place and why this woman was incarcerated instead of being brought before the court by summons. Most proceedings may be commenced under the defence of Canada regulations, but they cannot be continued unless the attorney general of the province or a representative of the Minister of Justice concurs. These are things which require the strictest consideration by parliament, because parliament exists for the purpose of redressing wrongs. Are prosecutions still taking place of Jehovah's Witnesses? If so, why are these prosecutions taking place? Why have the defence of Canada regulations not been amended in accordance with the recommendation of the defence of Canada regulations committee, which was composed of distinguished lawyer members of this house and men of experience from every province in the dominion? One year after this recommendation was made it is apparently still an offence to belong to an evangelical body, even though that body is preaching doctrines which none of us believe. I ask the minister to explain these things.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, what I am going to refer to to-day I have referred to before, and as I do not want to hold up the committee I shall not make any extended remarks. This committee has before it now a matter which has been before parliament since we adjourned at the end of last session, and I think it is something on which we should give an expression of opinion. It seems to me that the action of the Department of Justice or of the government is not in accord with democratic procedure. I refer to the lifting of the ban of illegality which was imposed on certain organizations in June, 1940. A number of organizations are included in this group, among them being the communist party of Canada. There are other organizations which might be termed subsidiaries or affiliates of this organization, and which were declared illegal because of their connection with the communist party. There is also the sect referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), Jehovah's Witnesses. I make a plea to-day for the lifting of the ban on the communist party. I am sure that no one in this house will accuse me of being a member of that party or of having any association with it. I have had to contest three elections to this house and on each occasion I have been opposed by a member of the communist party. At times they have not minced their words in opposing me, it having been stated that my election would really be more of a detriment to the interests of the workers than would the election of a member of one of the old-time parties. Up until now my constituents have not agreed with that point of view.

The communist party of Canada was in existence before June, 1940, when it was declared illegal. Up until that time it had carried on its activities in the same way as other organizations. If it went beyond the laws of the country, those laws were there to check either the party or the individual member. It was declared an illegal organization in June, 1940, not because of anything in its constitution but because of its opposition to the war. That is why it and other organizations with it, were declared illegal. They advocated opposition to the war. As a matter of fact the candidate of the communist party opposing me in the election of 1940 opposed me because I was, he said, a warmonger who was supporting an imperialist war. There would be sufficient justification to declare such an organization illegal, because we cannot allow people who are opposed to the country's war effort to obstruct that war effort. I am sure that anyone speaking here to-day in favour of lifting the ban on the communist party would say that any organization or any individual who opposed the country's war effort should be put under restraint.

The communist party's attitude to the war, not only here but in every part of the world, remained the same until June 22, 1941. I am not greatly impressed by the suggestion that that sort of attitude saved us from destruction at the hands of the nazis and the fascists. It is my opinion that, if the democracies of the world had accepted the policy of the communist party, Hitler would have overrun the world long before now—let us make no mistake about that.

I was saying that the communist party was declared an illegal organization for a certain reason, and that reason was that the communists were opposed to the war. But now, having changed their opposition to support of the war, I maintain that any reason that existing for declaring the communist party to be an illegal organization has disappeared. I can see no possible reason for maintaining that attitude other than a certain prejudice against communist doctrines. I am myself opposed to communist party philosophy. Nevertheless I submit that as Canadians we cannot maintain that position and still hold that we are democrats, that we are trying to save democracy with all that word implies. Canada is the only member of the British commonwealth, so far as I am aware, in which restrictions are imposed on the communist party.

May I submit this, that even if the ban was lifted, the country would not be exposed to any danger, because the Minister of Justice would still have just as much jurisdiction in the matter as he had before. There are laws in this country outside of the defence of Canada regulations to take care of subversive activities. Even under the defence of Canada regulations the minister could act. I have taken that position since the change in the communist party's attitude to the war. In November, 1941, at the first opportunity I had in this house, I proposed that the government should seek an exchange of representatives with the Soviet Union. I am glad that the government has done that. Although it is not a question at issue now, I am satisfied, because of the attitude of the communist party to the Soviet Union, that good relations between the democracies of the world and the Soviet Union is one of the ways by which we can assure orderly change through democratic procedure.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I did not quite catch that last sentence. Did I understand my hon. friend to say that good relations with the Soviet Union were necessary for the establishment of international order, that such relations would be promoted by the relations of the communist party to the Soviet Union?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is what I intended to say, whether I put it clearly enough or not; and for this reason. The actions of the communist party since the war began are clear proof of the fact that they accept Russia as their fatherland. They have no regard for the countries in which they live. Their whole policy is concerned with safeguarding the interests of the Soviet Union. I submit that the way they undertook to do that at the beginning of the war was wrong. If I were a communist I do not think I would have taken that position, because once Great Britain was defeated—let me make this clear—once Great Britain was defeated I do not believe there was any other country on earth that could save the Soviet Union from being overrun by Germany. The difficulties are great enough as they are now, and if Great Britain were defeated to-day the Soviet Union could not be saved from Hitlerism. I realized that at the time, in the same way as I felt within me that the only assurance, the only hope of attaining the kind of world I had worked for these many years, could not be realized without the defeat of Hitler and all that he stands for.

There are other organizations, such as the Ukrainian Labour-Farmer-Temple association, whose properties were confiscated, and in some cases sold, and as the hon. member for North Battleford has said, had their property destroyed. People do that sort of thing. Some people for one reason or another have a violent antipathy to knowledge and understanding, and at the first opportunity they seek to destroy it, just as Hitler sought to destroy the culture of Germany by destroying all that was constructive in the literature of Germany. There are many countries the people of which are not given access to the literature of the rest of the world. We are not working in the interests of Canadian unity now by treating the Ukrainian Labour-Farmer-Temple association as an illegal organization. We are not working to extend unity in our country if we refuse to take whatever action is in our power to return their property to the people who formerly owned it.

May I point out to the Minister of Justice and to the government that there is grave danger of our going off on the wrong track in another matter. I refer to the property of persons of Japanese origin who were moved from the defence area on the Pacific coast. I know it is not popular in certain quarters to say a word for these people; nevertheless I am going to say it. I believe the Minister of Justice and the government are proceeding on a most dangerous course, a course a democracy should not take. These people, with a very few exceptions, were not moved because of charges made against them. A great many of them are Canadian citizens, either by birth or by naturalization, and although they were moved as a defence precaution, we are dealing with their property exactly as though they were enemy aliens, which they are not. I draw that to the attention of the minister, because it is most important.

I support the hon. member for Lake Centre in what he said regarding Jehovah's Witnesses. These people presented their case to the defence of Canada regulations committee last year, and the Department of Justice also presented its case—if you can call it a case—against them. As I have said here before, never have I seen a weaker document upon which to declare an organization illegal than the document which was placed before the defence of Canada regulations committee last year as a justification of the action against Jehovah's Witnesses. I get letters almost every week from members of this sect who are being molested by the police while exercising their religious rights. I do not care what a person's religion is, or whether he has any religion at all; that is his business and nobody else's; as long as in the exercise of his beliefs he does not interfere with the rights and liberties of others, he is entitled to hold whatever beliefs he sees fit. I should like to see the Minister of Justice, before this house prorogues, do what should have been done a year ago, namely, lift the ban on all these organizations. Then if any action has to be taken, the minister has all the scope for action which the safety of the country requires.

Mr. HANSELL: As a member of the defence of Canada regulations committee last year and this year, may I express the views which I hold and which are held also, I believe, by the party of which I am a member. Last year the committee went carefully into this whole subject. They held a good many meetings, they had before them champions of these various organizations and heard the best arguments which they could submit. I do not think I shall be telling tales out of school if I say that I reported to the party I represent—for, believing in democracy as we do, I was not desirous of acting on the committee merely on my own behalf, but sought instructions from our party—and they told me that I should vote on that committee for the lifting of the ban on Jehovah's Witnesses, Technocracy Inc., and the Communist party. I say that and in the same breath say that I do not think anyone in Canada could accuse the Social Credit party anywhere of being communists. That was done because we believe in the rights of free assembly and free speech in a democratic country. The lifting of this ban would not prevent action being taken against any individual who spoke or acted as though he were an enemy of the state. That goes without saying. The police can pick up anyone, whether an unattached individual or a member of any organization, if he is assumed to make utterances or do things which obviously or otherwise are detrimental to the safety of the state. But the fact that people are not free to assemble themselves as they choose, whether for public worship or the discussion of issues, is something which we regard as the very antithesis of democratic freedom.

The communist party, of course, has been referred to a good deal in this connection. However, it is only one of the organizations the ban on which is recommended by the committee to be lifted. Take Jehovah's Witnesses, for instance. I cannot for the life of me see why, because a body of people hold an interpretation of scripture which is adverse to war, the whole body of them should be declared illegal. If we carry that theory to its ultimate conclusion, probably the Doukhobors should be declared an illegal body. They do not believe in war. They do not fight. The evidence was brought out in the defence of Canada regulations hearings that very many adherents of Jehovah's Witnesses were and are in the king's uniform fighting for the country. Are we going to say that Jehovah's Witnesses are enemies of this state? I do not believe they are. I believe they are loyal citizens with a certain religious belief. They are honourable citizens and I see no reason why such an organization should be banned.

I am not here pleading the cause of Jehovah's Witnesses as a religious body because I am not one. As I have said over and over again in this chamber, I do not believe in their religious doctrines, but I do believe that every individual in this country has a right to interpret the scriptures as he desires. People have the right to meet on the Lord's day and assemble for worship as they desire. To say that such people are enemies of the state becauses they hold a certain belief is nonsense. I might just as well say that the pacifist in 1939 and since then has been and is now equally an enemy of the state. I might as well say that those who voted for a reduction in the defence estimates right up until almost the time of the war are as much enemies of the state as Jehovah's Witnesses. I believe they are enemies of the state. They did more harm to the country in sabotaging the country to the enemy than did Jehovah's Witnesses. These people are not regarded to-day as enemies of the state, however; they are honourable citizens holding certain convictions. That is all. I simply bring that to the attention of the committee.

One thing more I would say and that is in regard to the government's refusal to accept the recommendations of the committee. They had a perfect right to do so. It was within their purview; it was within their authority to refuse to accept the recommendations. But obviously it was a reflection upon the work of that committee. Unquestionably it was. The committee had all the evidence and it comprised men of average intelligence in this house, and those men arrived at their conclusions. To refuse to accept their recommendations can be regarded pretty much as a slap in the face.

I am not going to make a charge, but I am wondering how that committee will vote on the same question this year if they get a chance to vote on it. The committee was not set up until well on in the session, and when it was set up the meeting of the committee was delayed and delayed until it was only a few weeks ago that they began their sittings. Somebody is responsible for that. At one of the first meetings we had a communication was read. I believe it was from Mr. Tim Buck; at any rate, it was either from him or from his organization. That communication requested that they be heard. I do not know whether they will be heard. Of course, the minister can say, "You are a member of the committee; why don't you insist on its being done?"

Mr. St. LAURENT: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but I suggest that his remarks are not in order at this time. As he has said, he is a member of the committee and I assume that in due course the committee will make a report, and the matter can be discussed then. But there is a standing order which prohibits the discussion of the work of a committee until it has made its report. My second objection, with which I think the hon. member will agree, is that this is hardly pertinent to the matter now under discussion here.

Mr. HANSELL: I realize that one cannot discuss the work and the report of the committee that is still sitting, but my point is this. We are asked to vote a sum of money for the operation of the defence of Canada regulations. The committee of last year made recommendations, and those recommendations were not acted upon, and now we are asked to vote a further sum. All I am asking is this. If the committee this year brings in the same recommendations, will they be acted upon? The minister is not going to answer that question, I know, because he cannot do so now; but I am not now discussing the report of the committee. I am discussing the fact that the committee has been delayed in its operations, for some reason or other, and something should be done about it before it is too late. The committee is set up to deal with the defence of Canada regulations. Here is an appropriation we are asked to vote for the operation of the department under those regulations.

I will conclude by reiterating that what we are concerned about is to preserve the democratic right of free assembly and free speech in Canada. I think it does more harm than good to stop free speech, because when you stop free speech you do not know what is going on in the people's minds. When they are permitted to say what they think, we know where these various bodies stand. We know what this man or that man believes because he is permitted to express it. But how can you deal with anything properly and effectively if it is not permitted any expression? You cannot do it; that is all. I submit that to this committee and I urge that the recommendations be acted upon. It is not too late for the minister to follow that course.

Mr. NEILL: I was not able to catch all that the hon. member said, but so far as they relate to Jehovah's Witnesses I endorse his remarks. I hope that if the minister is not disposed to make some concession to these people he will be in a position to inform the house and the country very definitely as to some reasonable reason why the ban should be continued against them. No man will support the minister more loyally than I in regard to anything he may do to suppress activities of a subversive character, but I know a number of these people, I live not far from them, and I have never known of any disloyalty among them, nor do I know anyone else who had any charge of that kind to make against Jehovah's Witnesses. They happen to have peculiar religious beliefs with which I do not agree, but that does not make them harmful or subversive. They may condemn my religious beliefs, and while, in times like these, we must be careful not to permit any underground work to go on under popular names, at the same time it is equally essential in these days when we are fighting for freedom that we should not go to the other extreme and penalize people unless we are sure that their doctrines or the methods they propose for carrying those doctrines into effect are subversive.

So far as my considerable knowledge of these people goes, I can say that there are a number of them in the district I represent and that they are decent, respectable people. Whatever their religious beliefs may be, that is beside the point. If the minister is not willing to take the ban off, I wish he would give us something to carry home to our people so that they may know why their organization is banned. It sometimes happens that while what you might call the ordinary people are quite blameless in their actions, some of the heads of the organization, perhaps in a foreign country, have done things which were improper. If that is so, let us know it; at least let us have something that will justify—if the ban is to be continued—the action taken by the government.

Mr. ADAMSON: Since I was the first member of this house to recommend the recognition of soviet Russia and the establishment of diplomatic relations, I cannot allow this debate to continue without saying a word or two in regard to this matter. First I will quote just one sentence from what I had to say in February, 1942, with regard to the soviet philosophy; it appears at page 299 of Hansard for that year:

> We are going to have to admit that the soviet philosophy exists and that it has done great things; let us admit it openly and above the broad tables of government rather than have snivelling, subversive agents peddling anarchist literature to the adolescent minds of the students in our schools, universities and training camps. We have seen what anarchy has done in other countries. It can happen here.

We are the only part of the British empire to prohibit the communist party. The question of lifting the ban now has become a political football, and I do not propose to discuss that question to-day. I stand by everything I said in 1942, but I should like to say a word or two about communism. The history of the communist party during this war, outside Russia, has been almost what might be called ludicrous. At first they said this was an imperial war, a war for capitalists; it was this kind and that kind of a war, until Russia was attacked. Now the same people who urged young men in our training centres to have nothing to do with the war are saying this is a holy war. But all that does not mean that communism is not a world force and must not be considered as such. To try to pretend that this force does not exist is to be an ostrich, to bury our heads in the sand. That is what I object to in the present policy of the government. When France fell, one of the most disturbing features of the destruction of the French army—and this is particularly true of the army in the south—was the fact that it was riddled with communism. Statement after statement has been made by French soldiers who said, "The first thing we did when the Germans attacked was to shoot our officers. Then we did not know what to do." That was the effect of communism.

But what has it done in Russia? The study of Russian history and of Russia itself is something that should be taken out of the realm of politics. We study the French revolution; we study all the revolutions that have occurred in the history of the world including the one during which Charles I was executed. There is every reason why the same study should be given to the Russian revolution that has been going on since 1917, no matter what we may think of it or how we may disagree with certain of its tenets. To try to gloss over the facts; to keep this movement under cover, in my opinion creates a great danger to this state, and that is why I oppose the policy of the government. I am wholly and absolutely against communism, but it is a world power, a great movement, and we must recognize it as such. Let us not cover it up; let us bring it into the open, so that we may understand what it is. Let us not have one man saying that the salvation of the world depends upon communism and the man opposite saying that communism is the worst possible thing that ever happened to Russia. Let us evaluate the thing; let us get the proper facts; let us make a study of them; let us bring it into the open, so that we may all see what we are dealing with.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have in my riding many Ukrainians, of whom there are large numbers in the city of Toronto. They belong to various associations, one of which is called the U.L.F.T.A. I know many of these people personally. It may be that at the beginning of the war they were communists; I do not know what they are now. They seem to be good citizens, or at least I believe they could be made into good citizens. In June, 1940, their organization was declared illegal and all its properties became vested in the custodian of alien property. They tell me that no formal charges were made by the government at any time, and that aside from the language of regulation 39C of the defence of Canada regulations they were given no indication as to why the ban was imposed. That regulation reads:

> The following associations, societies, groups or organizations are hereby declared to be, and shall be deemed to be, illegal organizations. . . .

I imagine they were against the war and that was why the ban was imposed at that time. However, I understand that a change has taken place in the interval. All their properties were confiscated. In Toronto they had a very fine building which had been erected with the nickles, quarters, fifty-cent pieces, dollars and hard work of the people themselves. It was unfortunate that they got under communist control. Perhaps at that time the confiscation of their property was the right thing to do, but the mistake was in selling that property. As I understand it, other property belonging to Germans, Italians and Japanese is still held by the custodian of alien property, but in this case a different procedure was followed. As a matter of fact, I believe many of the members of this association were Canadian citizens at the time. They had been here for a long time, and had taken their part in the development of Canadian music, and various Canadian activities. As I say, their property was confiscated. There were many protests in the newspapers, and from the civil liberties' association. Things have changed since then. What is the government going to do about the situation? I say that the fact that these properties are sold, and not held for them, is a great injustice. Are they to be treated forever as outcasts, and their property kept away from them, or is some restitution to be made to them, in the event of their behaving themselves and becoming good Canadian citizens.

While I am on my feet there is another matter to which I should like to refer. I suggest there should be a more elaborate ceremony in connection with naturalization proceedings. When a man or a woman takes upon himself the responsibilities of citizenship, he or she is accepting a heavy responsibility.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ross, Calgary East): May I direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the item before the committee deals with expenditures in connection with the administration of the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understand that.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ross, Calgary East): I hope the hon. member will confine himself to the item.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member will have a full opportunity to discuss naturalization when the civil estimates of the Secretary of State, under whose department naturalization is administered, are before the committee. This department has nothing whatsoever to do with it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has not this question connected with taking property away from these people something to do with it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; but the hon. member was discussing naturalization.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Perhaps the committee would permit me to complete what I began to say. I believe there should be a more elaborate ceremony for naturalization. It should be more impressive. I point out, too, that those people who are good Canadian citizens, who have been deprived of their property, who have been banned, and all that sort of thing, are still good Canadian citizens, and they should have proper consideration.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, in view of the discussion which has taken place in connection with the custodian, it might be proper for me to say a few words. I do not intend to speak at length. It just so happens that while I have been custodian it was not necessary either to destroy a book or to sell a single piece of property. So far as books are concerned, I had no information as to what books, if any, were destroyed. And, as a result of the question placed upon the order paper a few days ago by the hon. member for North Battleford, we have written to ascertain whether a list was made at the time the books were destroyed, at both Edmonton and Toronto. The hon. member's observations this afternoon were the first intimation I had that any books whatsoever had been destroyed at Toronto, and I have not had an opportunity to investigate upon that point.

However, I did investigate the situation in regard to the sale of the labour temples. I believe that out of 111 some seventeen have been sold. But my advice is that not a single labour temple which was able to carry itself was sold. This is not a dominion-wide organization; and I mean by that that one cannot transfer funds from a central source to protect the individual temples. Each temple had to stand on its own feet.

Now, not one single labour temple was sold, except for one of three causes: First, there was a mortgage against it, and usually heavily overdue. The revenue was not sufficient to pay the mortgage. In that event foreclosures would inevitably have followed, and the whole thing would have been a complete loss. Second, there were other cases in which there were heavy arrears of taxes. If sales had not been made in respect of those cases, again there would have been complete loss to the owners. Third, some of the buildings were in an extremely dilapidated condition. There were no funds of that branch available to put them in proper condition, and they were becoming more dilapidated day by day. In other words, before any property was sold, at least one of those conditions had to exist.

In connection with the sales, I am advised that none were sold without advertisements for tenders being carried in the newspapers. In all cases I believe tenders were asked for. Then they could not be sold to any organization which stood in the same position as the owners of the temples.

I mention these facts so that the public may not gain the impression that the custodian was out to try to effect sales. That is not correct. The only sales effected were to preserve the equity which might exist in the property which will, when the ban is lifted, be returned to those who are entitled to receive it. In other words, I am advised the custodian did not look for purchasers. He was not anxious to sell it, and in fact where it paid its own way, had no carrying charges and would not be a complete loss, he refused to sell it. I think hon. members in the committee will agree that where the assets were wasting, it was much better to realize what could be realized, rather than just let it go by default, and realize nothing at all.

I believe that is the whole situation in connection with the sale of labour temples. They were not sold because the custodian wanted to sell them. They were sold because, if he did not sell them, there would not be anything left for the owners.

It is needless for me to point out that the custodian was and is a purely administrative officer. The government of Canada placed the ban, on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice of the day. Once that was done, the custodian did not act under section 39 of the defence of Canada regulations. The custodian acts—must act—under the authority of the trading with the enemy regulations. Consequently, I should like to make it abundantly clear that I am not arguing for the return of the property to the labour temples. Frankly, I am told it would be a relief to the custodian if they were returned, because they have been a considerable burden and care. But I do wish to make the position clear, because the suggestion was made that we were simply trying unfairly to rid ourselves of the temples, by selling. That is not correct.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the Secretary of State be good enough to refer to a subject discussed by the hon. member for Vancouver East, namely the sale of Japanese property. Is it correct to say that no Japanese properties have been disposed of, except with the consent of the owners?

Mr. McLARTY: No; that is not correct. I do not think the consent of the owners was ever requested in respect of the rural property sold to the soldier settlement board. In that connection may I explain that we set up two advisory committees. One was to deal with urban properties, and was headed by Mr. Justice Sydney Smith; and the other, headed by Judge Whiteside, was to deal with rural properties. Japanese sat on each of these committees. One felt, however—and I believe one could scarcely criticize him for the feeling—that they were being placed in an extremely embarrassing position. The result was that he resigned. But to say that we got the consent of all the owners in connection with the sale of 769 parcels to a value of $850,000 would not be correct. What happened was that the sale was negotiated by the local representative of the custodian acting in the first instance, and Mr. McPherson acted in the second. The price was tentatively agreed upon. It was then submitted to the advisory committee, and the advisory committee unanimously recommended its acceptance. Those are the only properties of Japanese evacuees which, so far as I know, have been sold.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN: (Mr. Ross, Calgary East): Shall the item carry?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No; we would expect the minister to reply.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am waiting until hon. members have concluded their remarks.

Mr. SHAW: On July 7 the minister gave certain information in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) and referring to Charles Brandel Crate, who was designated as the former leader of the Canadian Union of Fascists. I was greatly surprised that this statement should have been made, inasmuch as the impression was conveyed that this man, who had become quite famous prior to the outbreak of war on account of his assertions against the democratic form of government, had been allowed to go free simply because he had dissociated himself, so to speak, from the organization by signing a declaration to the effect that he was no longer a subversive agent dangerous to Canada and to our form of government. I am just wondering how many cases there are where a similar situation developed. Following the signing of the declaration, Crate was employed in Newfoundland, then by a Toronto construction company and later on he went to Dawson Creek in British Columbia. Whether this man reported periodically to the mounted police is something about which I am not certain, but I have reason to believe that he did not. I understand that for three months prior to June 1 the Royal Canadian Mounted Police lost track of this individual.

I happened to meet Crate quite by accident early in June. I did not know the man; I had never met him before, but I soon realized what he was on account of the assertions he made at that time. Crate is definitely an exponent of fascist and nazi principles. He makes no bones about that. He stated definitely within my hearing that the only mistake he made was to permit his organization to be designated as a fascist organization. He said that one of the finest things that ever happened to him was when the government of Canada had been led to believe that the Canadian Union of Fascists no longer existed. He laughed about that. He stated to me that much effective work had been carried on since the banning of the organization in June, 1940. He agreed that the things which Hitler and Mussolini were endeavouring to do were proper things to be done, not only in those countries but here in Canada. He stated that he disagreed to a certain extent with some of the methods used, but he did not disagree in any sense with their objectives.

I think this committee is entitled to information, not only with respect to Crate and Crate's organization but also with respect to the treatment which has been accorded such persons who established reputations in this country prior to the war as fascists or nazis. I do not wish to say more at this time, but I am definitely not satisfied with the statement the minister gave to the house on July 7, 1943.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Did the police receive copies of letters written by Mr. Crate to people in northern Ontario some time last summer in which he definitely stated his intentions to carry on his fascist activities?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall make inquiry, but I think I can say at once that the police did not receive such letters. I recently examined the file in the department concerning this man and I saw no evidence of any such letters. Perhaps the hon. member would be kind enough to give me further identifying particulars which would facilitate the inquiry. Perhaps I may be allowed to deal with the matters raised by hon. members not quite in the order in which they were submitted, but taking the last first and the first last. The information supplied by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) about the statements which he himself heard will be of much interest to the police, because this man Crate is at present being prosecuted. I am sure the attorney general of the province in which he is being prosecuted will be glad to know that he will be able to get evidence from the hon. member which may be pertinent to the prosecution.

Mr. SHAW: I think the minister will find that this was shortly before Crate's apprehension. It may be that he was apprehended as a consequence of certain things he said at that time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Possibly, and that will make them all the more interesting to the attorney general. He will be glad to know that not only will the hon. gentleman be available himself as a witness but will be able to supply the names of other persons who were present.

Mr. SHAW: I am perfectly willing to support any assertions I have made to-day.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not implying the contrary in any way. This information will be communicated to the attorney general and to the police who have been investigating the situation. It is said that this man was allowed to work in Newfoundland and in Dawson Creek, but these were not protected areas and being a Canadian citizen he would be allowed to go to these places as long as he was not interned. The hon. member asked for information about the members of this party. I may say that of the thirty or so who were detained, fewer than ten have been released. In the case of other groups that were interned since the outbreak of the war, more than half have been released.

There seems to be some misapprehension with respect to the defence of Canada regulations. I have heard it said several times that the Minister of Justice was to be asked to lift the ban on the Communist party and other subsidiary organizations. That implies power and jurisdiction in the Minister of Justice which he does not have. These regulations were brought into being by the governor general in council. All the Minister of Justice could do would be to recommend to his colleagues in the first instance, and if he got their approval, then a recommendation could be made to his excellency for the modification of the regulations. A recommendation was brought in by a committee toward the end of the session last year, but no attempt was made to have that recommendation adopted by the house. Had it been adopted by the house, it would have been the duty of the Minister of Justice to recommend its implementation. It was well known to members of the house last year that there was serious doubt as to what would have happened to the recommendation had it been put to a vote.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of Justice does not suggest for a moment that a condition precedent to government action is that the house should take action?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not at all. I am answering the reproach that I disregarded the view or recommendation of this house. I have not been here long, but I have been here long enough to conceive—that was true even before I came here—such a respect for the house that I should not like to be put in that position. I should not like anyone to feel that I would attempt to set up my own views against those of the majority of the house. But from what knowledge I had of what took place last year I did not feel that it was the view of the majority of the house that this recommendation should be implemented, and I felt I was at perfect liberty to wait until the house had expressed its views upon it.

There were other matters. I did give consideration to the way in which these regulations were drawn. Hon. members know, of course, that I was not here when they were originally set up. They were in such form that it might appear they imposed restrictions upon religious liberty, and I recommended to my colleagues, and in turn it was submitted to his excellency and approved, that the regulations be amended in such a way as to provide that no person shall be guilty of an offence against the regulations by reason only of his attending a meeting the sole purpose of which is religious worship or instruction.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That does not cover the situation at all. It used to be prima facie evidence of guilt, and this just removes the evidence of guilt and nothing else.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My learned friend will have an opportunity of criticizing what we did. I want to give a factual statement of what was done.

There was a further amendment made which could properly be open to the criticism my hon. friend has just suggested. Formerly anyone who was an officer or member belonging to one of these organizations was guilty of an offence. This was amended to provide that anyone "who acted" as an officer or a member would be guilty of an offence under the defence of Canada regulations, subject, of course, to the provision that it would not be an offence against the regulations to attend a meeting for the purpose of worship or instruction. That is the factual situation, and it is the only point I wish to make at this time.

As to why the ban was originally imposed upon Jehovah's Witnesses, among other organizations, I have only hearsay information about that, because the regulations were passed at the very outbreak of the war, and this particular provision was adopted in June, 1940, a year and half before I left my professional activities in the city of Quebec. I have ascertained, however, that this is a very large international organization and the amount of literature that is put out from the Watch Tower on behalf of this organization is something fabulous; it runs into tens of millions of tracts and various other publications. It is also well known that thousands of phonographs with recorded speeches of their great leader, the so-called Judge Rutherford, are being used to further enlighten the people. There are also, or there were, very large numbers of motor trucks fitted out with these phonographs and loud speakers to blare to the population at large the merits of that particular doctrine and the demerits of all religions. All religions, according to their theory, are satanic missions to establish and maintain the dominion of his satanic majesty over the whole earth. I do not imagine that was the reason why the regulation was originally enacted, but rather because their doctrine is, of course, against war. There is no war, according to their theory, that is anything but the machinations of the devil himself, and not only that, but their view is that human-made laws have no binding force upon the individual if they happen to contravene what these gentlemen regard as being proper human behaviour. This doctrine is certainly subversive of organized society.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does it go quite that far?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am informed that it does.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not think it did.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The United States supreme court did not find that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not on the evidence submitted. The supreme court, of course, had to deal only with the evidence that had been properly submitted in the case. That is the danger of the thing we are now being asked to do, that when you do not make the affirmation that a thing is illegal, the reverse is often asserted as being the effect of that decision, and what has been sought with respect to communists and all these others is something upon which they could declare that this house or this parliament had declared the party to be a legal organization.

With respect to the Ukrainian Farmer-Labour-Temple association and the Finnish organization, they were two incorporated bodies which were used by the communist party as the holding companies for all property acquired for the purposes of the communist party, and the situation with respect to those two organizations is the same as it is with respect to the party itself. No one will attempt to justify the burning of books. I do not know when or where or how that came about. The Department of Justice had nothing to do with the property of the banned organizations. The Secretary of State as custodian is a trustee accountable for the property temporarily vested in him as the result of the banning of an organization or the detention of an individual.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What department ordered the destruction of these books? Their destruction must have been ordered by somebody. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police would not act without instructions.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know how, when or where it was ordered or even that it was ordered or that it was done, other than the information submitted through the reading of affidavits this afternoon by the hon. member for North Battleford. No one would attempt to defend the burning or destruction of property, whether it be books, music or anything else; and if the property has not been cared for properly by the custodian, he will in due course be required to account for his administration as a trustee of this property.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Have no letters reached the department from groups, such as the Ukrainian Farmer-Labour-Temple association, stating these things?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There have been hundreds, thousands of letters and petitions, very often on mimeographed forms, indicating clearly that they came from one central spot and were the result of propaganda to achieve the object being pursued. But the hon. member will pardon me if I do not believe everything which is written in that kind of material which comes to the department.

As regards the communist party and the eloquent address we listened to earlier this afternoon, the reminder that they were the people who were saying in 1939 the things which everybody else is saying in 1943 or was saying in 1942, I have material which is in language as brilliant, as striking, as forceful as the language used by the hon. member to-day, and I would call the attention of the committee to some of it. It is from the election manifesto of the communist party of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: What year?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In 1940, or subsequent to 1939. I think it was probably in relation to the election to which the hon. member for Vancouver East made some reference in his remarks this afternoon.

> They are conniving with the imperialist warlords of Europe to make war against the Soviet Union, the land of socialism, so feared and hated by the blood-drenching rulers of decayed capitalism. Because of this plan, they have been advised by Chamberlain to hold a quick election. . . .
> The King government and the capitalist warmongers intend to use this fake election to extend their lying propaganda about the war. . . .

In this war, the Canadian capitalists plan to revel in luxury at home, raking in the mounting piles of profits, while sending our best sons to rot and die in the trenches of someone else's war on a far-off continent. Greedily they count the millions that they will make from the life of every Canadian boy sacrificed on their barbarous altar of profits. A degenerate, besotten, parasitical class, they are carrying on a traffic in death. In exchange for war orders they are bartering Canadian lives. . . .

Then summing up the platform:

. . . Bring Canadian boys back to Canada! Not a man must leave Canada's shores to die in imperialist war!

Repeal of the War Measures Act! The real fight for democracy is here in Canada against the war dictatorship of reaction! Freedom for the honest working class press! Release Douglas Stewart of the Clarion! . . .

The communist candidates, fearlessly taking their stand upon this platform of your interests appeal for your support. Capitalism and the capitalist class, breeding crisis, poverty and the horrible slaughter of war, are your enemies, are the enemies of humanity. . . .

Unite your ranks, build up your popular united front to defeat the war offensive upon your living standards and democratic rights! Never submit to the virtual military dictatorship that has been established by capital! Not all their lies, nor all their persecution and suppression can defeat you!

That is the kind of stuff which was being broadcast throughout Canada at a time when most of the Canadian people were realizing that the security and the very existence of the country were at stake, and a ban was placed by the defence of Canada regulations upon the organization whose views were thus expressed. These regulations were afterwards brought to the House of Commons, were considered and received the approval of the house. Now the effort is being made not only to lift the ban but for a declaration legalizing the communist party.

The statement is made that this is the only place in the British empire where communism is illegal. I take issue with that. There is no place where the common law of Britain prevails that communism is not illegal as a subversive doctrine, and the members of the Labour party in the United Kingdom do not seem to have had very much doubt about that when they were recently called upon to vote upon the proposal that since the dissolution of the Comintern they should admit the Communist party over there into their ranks. The same situation exists in the United States. Even if this were not on the books in the form of a defence of Canada regulation, the party would still be an illegal organization if, as its thesis always contended, and as was printed not more than fifteen months ago by the secretary of the great Civil Liberties League in Toronto, Mr. A. E. Smith, there is no other way, they themselves say, to institute their system than by violence. They say, "Of course the bourgeois, the capitalist class are never going to submit; we can only by violence overthrow them; we cannot get anywhere without it."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to interfere with the minister's speech, but I should like to ask one question which I think is pertinent. The underlying principle of communism, as I understand it, is the overthrow of government by force. Is there any evidence in the files of the department which would lead the government to believe that that principle has been repudiated by this body?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There have been statements from individuals—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Individuals, yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —repudiating it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But not from the body?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The case of one man comes to my mind—I have not the file here—who answered, when these theses were put to him, well, of course he was prepared to suffer for those ideas.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the minister a question? I think he should be careful in naming organizations. I think he is mistaken in Mr. Smith's connection with the organization; I do not think it is the Civil Liberties' League. Probably it has some other name.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The communist party have changed the name and the gentleman still continues in office. It is merely a change of names.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Civil Liberties' League is a different organization.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I stand corrected.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it the National Council of Democratic Rights?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Possibly. That is the name.

Mr. MITCHELL: They change their name so often.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am informed that at one time it was the National Council of Democratic Rights, and another time it was the Canadian Tribune Civil Liberties' Bureau of Toronto.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; I think the minister is wrong there. I hold in my hand an advertisement under the auspices of the Civil Liberties' Association of Toronto headed, "Help Canada to do justice," and the first signature is the Hon. H. C. Nixon, premier of Ontario. So that I think there is some error. Surely he is not in that bunch.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not want any mistake over the designation to cause discomfort.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has not in mind interning the head of these signatories?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Department of Justice never has in mind interning anyone until facts are brought to its attention that cause the minister to come to the conclusion that such action is necessary for the safety of the state.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has an open mind on him anyway.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And on all Canadian citizens.

That situation was dealt with. Section 98 of the criminal code was repealed, and those who were in the house at that time will remember that the late lamented Mr. Woodsworth taunted my predecessor with tendering with one hand what he was taking away with the other by reason of the amendment which at the same time he caused to be inserted in the code as to what amounts by statute to a seditious intention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course, his reason was that a deal had been made for the repeal of section 98. Yes; a deal was made for the repeal of section 98, and the other correlative part which I think the minister is about to read was not a part of that deal. I remember it very well.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There was in section 98 practically a whole code which I do not think very many could support in its entirety. But what was inserted was section 133:

> Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression "seditious intention" everyone shall be presumed to have a seditious intention who publishes, or circulates any writing, printing or document in which it is advocated, or who teaches or advocates, the use, without the authority of law, of force, as a means of accomplishing any governmental change within Canada.

That is the common law doctrine in the United States, and it was on that doctrine that the attorney general of the United States gave his celebrated opinion in the Brydges case, because anyone is deportable if it is shown that at the time he entered the United States he belonged to an organization that advocated the use of force for the overthrow of American institutions.

To get back to something more within the scope of what is sought from this committee at the present time, this is an appropriation of $35,000 to cover the expenses of advisory committees that act under the defence of Canada regulations. The amount expended last year was almost twice that, because soon after I assumed office I came to the conclusion that there would probably be a large number of those interned who, upon examination of their cases, would be released, and I felt that if it were so in general, it was my duty to see that they got their hearings just as expeditiously as possible. I had three committees sitting practically all the time and about a thousand cases were considered. The situation now is that it will be only occasionally that committees will be required to sit and act, and it is for that reason that the amount of the appropriation asked for at the present time is considerably less than what was expended in the past year.

I was forgetting to speak of the special case referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre. The defence of Canada regulations are a part of the law of the country and are administered in general, as is the criminal law of the country, by the attorneys general of the provinces. There arises frequently a confusion out of the fact that in some provinces the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has contracts with the provincial government to do provincial policing, and whenever there is something with which a member of the force is apparently connected the impression gets abroad that that is something that is being done by the Department of Justice. Most of the time that is quite wrong; it is something in which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is carrying out duties and responsibilities of the attorney general of the province.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And responsible, under the Minister of Justice, to account to this parliament.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is responsible to the Minister of Justice if he does something which is not in accord with the contract entered into by the department with the province under the authority granted by this parliament. This parliament has provided under what conditions contracts may be made with a province or with a municipality to make the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police available to that province or that municipality for the ordinary police work in that locality.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the situation with respect to the use of the mounted police in the province of Quebec?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In the province of Quebec there is no contract, nor do I think there is with any municipality in that province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do they execute any authority in the administration of justice, in the province of Quebec, under the attorney-general's department?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They do as sworn police agents, just as we expect the constables who are sworn under provincial or municipal organizations to cooperate in enforcing peace and order. However, I will make special inquiry with respect to the case to which my hon. friend has called my attention. I had heard nothing at all about it and was certainly aware of no instructions from the department to take these proceedings. I cannot say whether there were instructions from the attorney-general or from the mayor or what you will, but I will inquire and find out what is being done. I can assure my hon. friend, however, that there were no instructions from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in that connection. The hon. member was under a misapprehension when he suggested that, though proceedings might be started by anyone, they could not be continued without the concurrence of the Attorney-General of Canada or the attorney-general of the province. That would be true under regulation 39, but prosecutions under 15 (a), for distributing pamphlets that do not show the printer's name and address, are not subject to that special requirement, and that article can be enforced under the ordinary terms of the summary convictions provisions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the minister suggests that as far as Quebec is concerned, taking the instance referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre, the attorney-general's department of that province would have no jurisdiction and no right to command the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No right to command the services of the mounted police, but the factual situation is that the mounted police making investigations in any part of the province report them to the attorney-general of Quebec or his accredited representatives, and sometimes they are asked by the attorney-general or his representatives to make a complaint upon which proceedings are originated. But that is as peace officers and not because they are subject to any direction by the attorney-general.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Full responsibility for their action is still here.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Full responsibility for the action of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police acting as such is here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or in any capacity, I should think.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not say in any capacity, because there have been judgments where damages were claimed; for instance, where it was contended that a peace officer did not engage the responsibility of those who appointed him when he was exercising statutory powers given by the criminal code or other like legislation to a peace officer.

Mr. GRAYDON: We pay them and they should be responsible here.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They should be responsible for what they are required to do, and as a matter of fact the commissioner holds them responsible to him for whatever they do.

Mr. GRAYDON: Which means that you hold him responsible to you?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hold him responsible to me, and I attempt to defend before this house the discipline he enforces among his men.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Would it inconvenience the hon. member if some other item were proceeded with at eight o'clock? There is a dinner this evening at which the Prime Minister has asked me to accompany the guest of honour, and it would be inconvenient if I were not able to attend. So that if it does not inconvenience hon. members, perhaps trade and commerce and mines and resources might be proceeded with this evening.

Mr. GRAYDON: In that sequence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Trade and commerce first. There are two other items, one under the Secretary of State and one in the Post Office Department.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do I understand that trade and commerce will come first?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; then those two other items, and then mines and resources.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope to be back some time later on, when the hon. member for Lake Centre is here, to continue this discussion.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Export permit branch—
Administration, $144,160.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to hold up these items at all, but seeing there has been no explanation made in connection with the various items, I thought I would make a brief explanation as they are called. In connection with the export permit branch I would inform the committee that at the request of the Department of Munitions and Supply, the wartime prices and trade board and other branches charged with conserving Canada's supplies, a great number of Canadian commodities are placed under permit before they can be exported. This branch considers the application, and either issues or refuses the necessary permit, after consultation with the various administrators and controllers.

Permits are refused for one or more of the following reasons: To conserve materials for Canada's own war effort, or that of the united nations; to conserve supplies for Canadian civilian use; to conserve supplies in order that our commitments to the United Kingdom may be fulfilled; because of dangerous destinations or undesirable consignees.

Mr. PERLEY: Will there be an opportunity to discuss the report of the wheat board, or should that discussion come under some other item?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think there is any possibility of discussing wheat under any of these items. I hoped that the civil estimates for my department would be up within a short time.

Mr. PERLEY: When is that likely to be?

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I cannot promise what may happen in the house, but I hope they will be before us shortly. I shall do my best to have them before the committee as soon as possible.

Mr. MARSHALL: What were the expenditures last year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): To a great extent this is a new development in the Department of Trade and Commerce. In the past year or two we have been talking over matters connected with the war. Those are the items under consideration to-night, and they are entirely separate and apart from the ordinary estimates of the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is purely an administration item. How big a staff has the minister? I thought a good deal of this work was being done by permanent officials from other departments?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes; there is quite a substantial staff. But a substantial number of them are officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce who have been holding other positions throughout the world as trade commissioners or assistant trade commissioners. These men are in Ottawa, having returned from overrun countries and, as the hon. member has said, they are being used very effectively on this work.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister deal with permits issued for the export of feed grains to the United States?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The export of feed grains does not come under this item. This item refers to export permits granted to the departments I mentioned.

Mr. CHURCH: This is the first opportunity this year we have had of dealing with the Department of Trade and Commerce. As hon. members are aware, these items refer entirely to war appropriations. The war has made a great many changes in the functions of this department. The chief difficulties I see in the work of this department are those which can be traced to the war. We must remember that, so far, trade has always followed the flag. To a great extent our trade has been carried on within the empire, and that portion of it carried on outside the empire has developed extensively through most-favoured nation agreements.

This is the first opportunity the committee has had to discuss our export and import trade, a process upon which the whole empire has developed. We have had many agreements affecting exports and imports. Trade is closely related to other problems of the empire to which we belong, and to the world at large.

For instance, defence is closely connected with trade. We have export and import trade. As we know, our development on the seven seas has been built up largely by our trade with the motherland and the empire. We did have an empire agreement with all the dominions and the crown colonies. The Department of Trade and Commerce has sent its commissioners throughout the world, and as a result we are very closely connected with our best customers.

Our best customer, however, is the mother country. She cannot any longer exist unless she is linked up with the empire. During the war we have seen the result of the disarmament policy, one which nearly finished Great Britain and nearly finished Australia and New Zealand. It also nearly finished the trade of this country.

I suggest that under this war appropriation measure the minister should state what Canada's policy and position is. We should be told our position now, as a result of the war, and as a result of our trade with our best customers. This empire had its being by the sea, and it cannot exist without the sea and the dominions. The senior dominion is Canada. We are still linked up with our best customer, and without that bond I do not think the empire could exist. As hon. members know, we have in Canada an abundance of raw materials.

The minister has done a very good job in expanding Canada's trade. He has developed to a greater extent trade with South America and with other parts of the outside world. We would hope, too, that our trade with those countries might continue after the war. I believe, however, that in connection with the war appropriation estimates the minister should sound a policy which would be well recognized and admitted. As I have pointed out on other occasions, the mother country has to import twenty-five out of twenty-seven of her raw materials. To a great extent she has to depend upon the empire for her supplies of those materials. I believe in the old policy of accepting an exchange of manufactured goods from her for raw materials.

Let us not forget that New Zealand, Australia and all the rest of the empire is linked up in this great fight. They have fought a good fight, and the empire has nearly beaten their enemy from without. The enemy from within, the war losses and depressions and that sort of thing, may still have to be faced. I would point out to the minister that last year Great Britain made a strong and binding agreement with Russia, under which Britain becomes what might almost be called, with Russia, the police constable of trade and commerce on the seas at both ends of Europe. The dominions are not parties to that treaty. The Anglo-Soviet treaty affects only the United Kingdom. It was signed without committing the other dominions in any way. The influence which Britain will have in the post-war period and in discussing the peace terms will depend largely upon the unity of her dominions. If the dominions try to stand alone as independent countries in trade and for defence purposes, they will not get on because none of them can stand alone without the empire. The dominions and the empire must be a unit in a military way, in a trade way or in a commerce way, because they are absolutely correlated and coordinated. I am one of those who believe that notwithstanding what has been done there will always be nations and international trade. We are largely dependent upon the motherland which has been our best customer in peace and war alike.

The empire must be maintained. I was glad to see the announcement made of an empire civil air conference—I do not know whether it is official—about the part that civil aviation will play after the war. We nearly lost the lead in civil aviation to the United States. I hope the Department of Trade and Commerce will look into this, because civil aviation is going to be one of the greatest agencies of trade. I hope it will be free from the war ministry. The dominions have had agreements for inter-imperial trade. We want to trade with South America, but we must not forget that we are part and parcel of the British empire. I am opposed to these ideas of internationalism that would force us to give up the sovereignty rights to our bases. I believe we should conserve our rights in these bases since in trade and commerce under our shipping laws the world's ships can go into any British port to do trade with us, provided these ships obey our port and municipal laws and do not attempt to engage in coastal trade. We should conserve the rights to these bases, and be ready to co-operate with our allies in trade, but no sovereignty over any of them should be given away to any other nation. They are empire ports.

Britain and the dominions have flourished as a result of trade carried on. The British empire has been a great customer of this country and it must continue to be. Great Britain is highly industrialized and we must continue to do business with her and give her liberally of the raw materials she needs. She has been one of our best customers. She must import twenty-five of the twenty-seven essential raw materials she uses, such as oil, iron, zinc, copper, tin, rubber, cotton, wool and timber. We never realized how important were our relations with the mother country until the far east was lost. As individual members of the empire we can do nothing, but collectively we have a great advantage. The British colonies under the colonial policy of the mother country have provided raw materials for the whole world without let or hindrance or interference. Notwithstanding the fact that the colonies in the West Indies and the far east had trade agreements with the mother country, nothing was done to prevent them from supplying raw materials freely to the rest of the civilized world. We must do everything to help our empire trade because we cannot get on without it.

We should be ready to cooperate with our allies and allow them to use these air bases, but we should not give away sovereignty over them. The empire has thrown back its enemies from without and in my opinion she will go on to destroy them. Now is the time that we should try to recapture the spirit of empire and our faith and pride in our dominions and in our trade and commerce. The empire is a living thing and should not be allowed to go by default or into liquidation. The mother country and the dominions fought this battle alone for two years. Our soldiers carried on with those from India, New Zealand, South Africa, Australia and the empire training plan. We stood shoulder to shoulder in the snows of Labrador and Newfoundland and in the heat of India and the far east.

In the days before the war you could go into any large port and find fifteen or sixteen ships from different parts of the empire carrying on their trade. I believe that this same spirit of empire cooperation will continue in the years that are to come. Canada should be ready to go along with the dominions and the empire. The time has come when the Minister of Trade and Commerce should tell this committee and the country what our relations are with the other sister dominions who fought along with us for two years to save civilization. One of our great allies stood aside for two years with Germany, but Russia has since made a glorious record. To-day she is practically fighting her battles alone except for some supplies and munitions that are being sent in. Poland fought her battle alone, but now the dominions are united together in this fight in North Africa and in other parts of the world. Now is the time to build up our empire trade. The empire is our best customer. It stood by us when we were a small dominion. I should like to conclude by quoting what has been said in a great textbook by Professor Macneile Dixon, a great Scotsman, who has been interested in our empire and our trade. He said:

> Civilizations arise, and continue to exist—and all history is witness to the truth—when conditions are hard, only when they are continually threatened, only when they are determined to maintain and defend their rule. They decline and fall when the external pressure is removed, or the inner spirit . . . decays. If an individual or a people ceases to believe in itself, its aims and ideals, others with firm aims and beliefs will climb into the saddle. The decline and fall of England, which will rejoice our enemies, will not be England's decline and fall only, but of all for which she stood, and not till then shall we know the extent of our miseries. I, at least, am not of the opinion that humanity, justice, freedom, no, nor Christianity, will be the gainers in that fall.

Up to now our sister dominions have borne the brunt of the war, and we should rejoice to have attained the success we have recently in driving back the enemy. We should also rejoice to get into a close partnership with the other dominions and with the mother country with a view to making a better world.

I do not believe altogether in all this international policy. If we had had an international policy which meant the giving up of empire ports like Gibraltar and Suez, the Cape, the far east and the West Indies, where would we be to-day? The empire would have been destroyed, and that would have meant the fall of civilization. Let us cooperate in matters of trade along the lines of the old shipping laws, allowing other countries to use our ports, but as to giving up our sovereignty —no.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is this the item under which export permits are granted for shipments of coarse grains?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No. I did not want to interrupt the hon. member for Broadview, but his remarks would have been quite proper on the ordinary estimates of my department. I do not think they were quite appropriate on this particular item. I do not mention that in criticism of him but just as a suggestion to other hon. members.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I desire to deal with the question of the export of lumber, which is a matter of great importance, particularly to western Canada, where a number of small mills had from the beginning of the war contracts for the shipment of lumber to the United States to be used in various defence projects. The contracts allowed for a price to the Canadian producer that assured him of his costs and a profit. But some time ago, I think it was in October last, an order was made forbidding the export of lumber to the United States, and an order in council was passed by the terms of which relief was given to the Canadian producer from the consequences of his being thus prevented from carrying out his contract in the United States. I should like to have a statement from the minister as to the policy being followed with reference to the export of lumber. That is a subject which is causing a lot of ill feeling in the United States to-day. They feel that they should have the privilege of receiving at least a portion of the lumber that is being produced in western Canada in order to permit of the completion of their defence projects, which are of direct benefit to the united nations. I should like also to know from the minister whether it is the intention of the department or of the board charged with the responsibility of setting the price to set the price at a higher level so as to ensure to the Canadian producers a reasonable profit. On the basis of present prices it is almost impossible for the small producer to get out the lumber at a profit, having regard to his production costs for labour and the like, which have materially increased within the last year.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The hon. member for Lake Centre refers to a situation with which I am familiar through the department and because I know of the difficulties of the lumber producers, particularly in the northern portions of the three western provinces. The matter has had to be decided on the basis of where is the greatest need for lumber. We reached the point where lumber exports to the United States had to be stopped on account of the need for lumber at home in our own war construction projects, not only in western Canada but in all parts of Canada. I do not think there is any misunderstanding in the United States over our action in this matter. We have had conversations with United States authorities, and they are fully aware of our peculiar position and of our requirements for more lumber than we can produce. I am sure the hon. member knows that arrangements have been made to assist the lumber producers at least in part, in compensation for the loss of the higher prices in the United States market.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is being done?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): A bonus is being paid to the producer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the amount?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not sure at the moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does this bonus operate through the minister's department?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No; it is paid through the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What percentage of our lumber is being exported to the United States, and what percentage is being retained in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): My understanding is that practically all our lumber is being retained. For a while we allowed lumber to be exported to the United States for purely war purposes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The point I am endeavouring to make is this. Our producers in the northern parts of western Canada got out a great deal of lumber in the expectation of receiving a certain price under contracts which they had in the United States at that time. Now they are required to deliver that lumber to Canadian consumers in Canada at a considerably lower price than they were receiving on these United States contracts. The result is that many of our small operators are losing money on the sale of their lumber at the Canadian price, even taking into account the bonus that is given.

I have another question to ask the minister. Exceptions are made from time to time. I am not going to name the company unless the minister asks me to do so, but exceptions have been made. There is an exception made in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, where one large producer is permitted to export to the United States. I should like the minister to explain the basis upon which one company is given an export permit, while another company in the same position is denied the privilege of exporting to the United States and is required to sell to the Canadian market at a lower price.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): So far as my department is concerned I do not think that situation exists. I am familiar with the situation my hon. friend describes. I know that the producers to whom he refers in the northern parts of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba were enjoying a lucrative market in the United States. But Canadian needs made it imperative that we stop these shipments to the United States. Recompense has been made in part to these producers, and their loss in part is consequent to the war and is accepted as such.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That still does not answer the question as to the basis upon which consideration is given to one company to make exports from Canada that is denied to others. I know the minister is very much interested in this problem because it is one which affects him, as it affects all members from western Canada. It has caused a great deal of difficulty in these areas of northern Saskatchewan I speak of now, where the export market made possible the production of a great deal of lumber on the basis of the prices which were contracted for. There is a great deal of lumber available in northern Saskatchewan—the same applies in Alberta and Manitoba—which could be got out if only the price were fixed at a level considerably higher than the present price.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Labour is the real difficulty.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: These lumber producers had certain definite commitments in the United States. The contracts permitted them to pay higher wages than otherwise would have been the case. Last fall the situation in Saskatchewan was this, that many of these smaller lumber producers were ordered to ship their lumber to wholesalers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba at a price considerably lower than the prices which the producers had contracted for in the United States. But the benefit did not pass to the consumer. The producers had a certain fixed price designated by the Department of Munitions and Supply, I assume, in cooperation with the Department of Trade and Commerce. They were directed to deliver lumber at such price to wholesalers in the western provinces, and the wholesaler in turn took that lumber, at a price of $34 including the freight, or of around $28 or $30 at the place of shipment, but the price paid by the consumer, the farmer who required lumber to build granaries and the like, was considerably in advance of the price which was paid by the wholesaler.

My suggestion is this, that in order to induce and accelerate production of lumber, the producer should be allowed to sell to his own customers instead of being directed to sell through the medium of other wholesale concerns. In that way the producer would be induced by the extra price to produce more lumber than he is producing to-day, would be able to secure a fair profit, and the consumer would be assured of receiving lumber at a price considerably lower than now prevailing. I realize that there was a necessity for putting into effect an embargo against the shipment of lumber outside Canada by reason of needs within Canada, but I submit that in making that determination of policy the government should have set a price so that the producer would be assured of a fair and reasonable profit, which is not the case to-day, I make a plea to the minister that consideration be given to increasing the price by increasing the bonus. There is any amount of lumber available; all that is required is a price which will assure the small producer of a profit, and I think the needs of western Canada, particularly for granaries for the crops this fall and for necessary defence projects, will be secured. But to follow the present policy will mean an ever-increasing shortage of lumber production, which is something we want to guard against at this time.

I should like the minister to explain the basis upon which the board determines that certain companies shall have the privilege of exporting whereas on the other hand others are denied that right.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not sure that the hon. member understands that the Department of Trade and Commerce in its handling of export permits is the machinery through which those permits are issued or refused. We handle them at the request of various other departments of government. Most of the hon. gentleman's argument is based, I think, on the reasons those departments have for asking us to put the export permit against those products. At the same time I have been in very close touch with the operation of this, and I would be greatly interested in hearing that any individual lumber producer in any of the western provinces or elsewhere in Canada has a preferred position in relation to any other. I shall be very glad to make inquiries of the department having to do with that.

I do not want to get into any long argument upon this, but I think the hon. gentleman was more or less advocating that there should be higher prices paid for lumber so that a higher wage scale could be paid.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He did not say that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No—so that a profit will be returned to the producer which will accelerate production.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And compensate him for the lost contracts.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): As I have said, compensation is paid to a certain extent. I am quite aware of the fact stated by the hon. member for Lake Centre that the lumber producers are not satisfied with the bonus which has been given to them. I have heard from too many of them to have any doubt about that. But I also am under the impression, and I am quite satisfied I am correct, that these producers can sell direct to retailers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How large is the bonus paid?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is not in my department, and I have not the figures under my hand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the item should stand until the minister gets the information.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the item ought to stand until we have the information.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has said that it is not in his department. He should not be expected to answer that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But this is an administrative item, and therefore every phase of the position is capable of being discussed under this item. If a bonus is being paid under this export system, information of the amount should be available under this item.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I just want to reiterate what I have said: it is not a matter of this department at all, it is a matter of another department for which we are handling export permits.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not wish to be misunderstood as saying that they do not have the right to sell to consumers, but they have not the available methods of distribution, having no yards, and therefore are required by order to deliver to the distributing agencies.

Mr. LITTLE: They can start a yard if they like.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. They could start a yard if they liked; that is true enough. Lumber companies in Ontario are allowed to export to the United States to-day, are they not? They have that right even at the present time, provided the lumber is going to users who are working on direct war orders. Why, then in view of the fact that Ontario producers of lumber have that right, have western Canadian producers of lumber not the same right? There is one lumber company in the province of Manitoba that has the right to export fire-killed lumber to the United States. I should like the minister to look into this matter. It is one that vitally affects many small operators in the northern parts of the three western provinces. They ask why it is that they are denied the privilege, which to-day is extended to operators in the province of Ontario, of shipment to the United States.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): May I reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall). As far as my department is concerned, this branch carries itself. The total expenditure of the branch to March 31, 1943, was $99,842.11, and the total revenues for the same period were $139,727.53.

Mr. MARSHALL: The minister stated that the payment of the bonus on shipments of lumber to the United States was not a matter which concerned his department. Would this be the direct concern of the war-time prices and trade board operating under the Department of Finance?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I believe the particular question under discussion has been a matter for munitions and supply.

Item agreed to.

Canadian shipping board—
Adminisration, $92,435.
Revolving chartering fund, $500,000.
Total, $592,435.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this a new item?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This requires a substantial explanation.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The responsibility and functions of this board are to advise the government, or government departments concerned, on matters relating to war-time shipping; to ensure that the Canadian merchant marine is used to maximum efficiency in the war effort; to service and to control the movement of Canadian waterborne trade; and to administer its own regulations governing Canadian vessels; to work in cooperation with the United Kingdom ministry of transport and the United States war shipping administration; to ensure that neutral shipping shall operate as far as possible in the interests of the united nations. There is a revolving chartering fund in connection with the operations. The purpose of the vote is to provide a fund upon which the Canadian shipping board can draw for necessary war-time chartering operations in the national interest. The money is not actually expended but only loaned. It is returned to the government by payments for space et cetera.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the set-up of the board which is to have this $500,000? Who is the head of the board? The minister's statement is a very general one dealing with principle; there are no details in it at all. What is the name of the board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The Canadian shipping board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who is the head of it?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. MacCallum. He is an able and experienced man on loan from one of the shipping companies.

Mr. REID: Does this board cooperate with the Park Steamship company who are chartering out to merchants or traders ships built by the Canadian government, and likewise loaning ships to Great Britain and operating, besides, twelve or fourteen ships for the Canadian government?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This board handles the vessels to which the hon. member refers. Some of them are operated by the Park Steamship company and some by other agencies.

Mr. PERLEY: Do they control shipping on the great lakes?

Mr. WRIGHT: Has this board anything to do with inland shipping on the great lakes?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will the minister give some idea of the situation with regard to the boats necessary for the movement of grain on the great lakes? At present there is a considerable demand for coarse grains in the United States, but apparently there is lack of shipping space. The other day the Minister of Agriculture stated in the house that there was a tremendous shortage of railroad cars for the movement of grain, and I was surprised at what I read in the evidence given before the special committee on reconstruction and reestablishment, on July 8, by Mr. Vaughan, chairman and president of the Canadian National Railways. In answer to a question with reference to this point he stated:

> We can handle a lot more grain than is being offered. There was a time at the first when we were rather short of cars; but Mr. Walton attended several meetings on that and I think he can give you more information than I.

Mr. Walton then made this statement:

> We attended the meetings of the grain committee of the cabinet and other meetings. The situation is this, that during the severe winter weather handlings were naturally cut down. Ever since the cessation of bad weather we have been in a position to handle a considerably greater quantity of grain than has been rolling. Various causes contributed to it but as far as the railway position is concerned we can handle more than is being offered to us at the moment —I am speaking only for the Canadian National, of course.

Later on, Mr. Walton made this further statement:

> But again there was a marked increase in the rail movement of feed grain to eastern Canada, of which we can handle any reasonable quantity they offer us.

We all know that the price of these grains in the United States is much above the Canadian price, and as a result of that a considerable premium is paid in the form of an equalization fee on these grains being shipped to the United States. In the Rural Cooperator of Tuesday, July 13, this statement appeared:

> To-day the government is asking 34 cents per bushel for export permits on barley going to the United States, and 17 cents per bushel on oats. . . .

In view of the price the western farmer has been receiving for his coarse grain, below cost of production, the government should make every effort to see that this grain is moved at this time so that the premium may be obtained. The railway companies state that they have cars. Will the minister explain what the situation is on the great lakes as regards the movement of this grain? I am referring not only to the movement of grain to the United States, because large quantities of grain should be brought to eastern Canada for consumption this winter. There will be a scarcity of these grains, and if we have a severe winter, as we had last year, the railroads may find themselves unable to handle the grain. The shipping situation on the great lakes is of vital importance to the west. Apparently there is a shortage of bottoms. What are they being used for? Exactly what is the situation?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The boats on the great lakes which in pre-war days handled wheat more or less exclusively to-day are handling munitions and war supplies, principally ore which they take to eastern points. The situation is being given careful attention by the people who are interested in moving coarse grains and wheat from the west to the east. Some time ago I saw statements which were made by the railway companies before one of the committees of this house to the effect that more grain could be carried by them, intimating they had cars available to carry more grain from western Canada. I immediately took up this matter with the wheat board in Winnipeg, who replied expressing their surprise that such statements should be made, since that was not their understanding, and as a matter of fact according to their information the car shortage remained very acute. I wrote to at least one of the railways, pointing out these facts and referring to the statement that had been made before the committee here, and I asked for an explanation. I believe that letter went out only yesterday, and as yet there has not been time for a reply. The hon. member knows western Canada, and I am sure he realizes that there is a very great shortage of box cars there. At the present moment I believe there are, between the head of the lakes and western Canada, cars loaded with thirty million bushels of wheat. There has been delay in unloading those cars on account of an acute labour situation at the head of the lakes. Through the Department of Labour and other departments of government we have brought all possible pressure to bear on the situation, in an effort to take care of that bottleneck. Everyone recognizes the seriousness of it; everything possible is being done, yet we are not meeting with very great success.

Mr. PERLEY: I wanted to ask a question with regard to shipping on the great lakes and the control of the United States vessels engaged in that trade. I also wanted to know if this board had control over the rates charged, but when I asked whether this shipping board had any jurisdiction over lake shipping the minister said, no.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I did not understand the question.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister said the shipping board had nothing to do with that matter, but then he allowed the hon. member for Melfort to bring it up again. So that I think he was just a little hasty in replying to me.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am very sorry; I just did not understand the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. PERLEY: Then would the minister tell us how many United States boats are taking wheat from Fort William at the present time?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I cannot give that information.

Mr. PERLEY: Has there been any increase in lake rates on grain carried by United States vessels from Fort William to United States ports, since the opening of navigation?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I cannot give that information, either. I believe all these questions could be answered when my own estimates are brought down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister has not the information before him?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. POTTIER: I understand that this board must either approve or disapprove when one of the defence departments desires to acquire a vessel; that is, the Canadian shipping board is asked to consent or otherwise when a vessel is chartered or acquired by one of the defence departments. It seems to me the board can be of great service in guarding the interests of the ship owners on the Atlantic coast, in particular, if it performs its duties as it should. I would suggest that before a vessel is either purchased or chartered, this board should go into the question very carefully, to see whether or not a boat cannot be built for the purpose, or obtained from some other source, so that commerce and trade will be disrupted as little as possible. We find that a boat may be acquired from an individual who has no other means of earning a livelihood. I urge the minister to make representations to the board so that careful attention may be given to these matters, with a view to causing as little disturbance as possible when boats are required by the defence departments.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister said that thirty million bushels of grain were loaded in cars because it was impossible to get labour to unload them. To me that is a serious matter, just when we are approaching another harvest; certainly it is going to be a tremendous worry to many western producers. I wonder if the minister would say what space is available for grain in the terminals, provided it can be unloaded from the cars. He might tell us also how long those cars have been loaded, either at Fort William or in transit. I think that would be useful information for the producers, who would like to know what they will be up against during harvest time.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am speaking from memory, but I think at the present time there is space for something like sixty to seventy million bushels. Within the last twenty-four hours permission has been secured from the proper authorities to increase the pay of the men who are doing this difficult and dirty job at the head of the lakes. Then we thought we might be able to get some surplus labour from internal elevators throughout western Canada, and that position has been explored very thoroughly. As I stated, we have been in close contact with labour, asking for a high priority; we have had these units classed as war units, and have been doing everything possible to get the necessary labour. I quite realize that the situation is serious, as the hon. member for Souris has said, with another crop coming along in western Canada. I might add that only today I had further assurances, though they were not too definite, that the officials are hopeful that the whole quota can still be taken before the end of the crop year.

Mr. WOOD: I shoud like to ask the minister a question in regard to these permits. The minister has said that the issuing of permits does not come under his department, but as the hon. member for Melfort has suggested, the export of feed grain does come more or less under this department, and it seems to me we have two serious situations in Canada, both of which are aggravated by the shortage of shipping. We have an abundance of grain out west, which I am led to believe has been stored in the fields, while in Ontario and eastern Canada we have empty granaries, and the prospects are that there will be a crop only in Ontario. The farmers of this province have increased their live stock since the beginning of the war, and it is essential that a good deal of that grain be moved east. I know that will be a tremendous job, with the serious car shortage, but I feel that some effort must be made to work out a scheme under which the farmer in Ontario with the empty granary will be able to relieve the western farmer of his abundance which he cannot store. It seems to me essential that some shipping space be made available, or else both the farmer in the west with the surplus of grain and the farmer in the east with the abundance of live stock and an empty granary are going to lose. I do not think we can lightly pass over this problem; I believe we must so direct our efforts and energy that we can relieve both these serious situations, or in other words kill two birds with one stone.

I should like to have something fairly definite on this, because I live in a live stock district, and I have received many inquiries from farmers who are very much worried over the prospect of this grain not coming to Ontario, in view of the fact that there is such a demand in the United States at a higher price. It is true that the farmers of eastern Canada are protected by the ceiling price. I noticed that the hon. member for Melfort quoted from the Rural Cooperator. I brought along a copy of the same paper, from which I intended to read; then the hon. member went on to say that he was anxious to see the government make haste in order that the western farmer might get the benefit of the premium which is being offered. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that the eastern farmers are just as anxious to get some benefit from that premium, too, because if that grain is to be brought here and fed to live stock, it is necessary that the eastern farmer be able to purchase it as cheaply as possible. We are prepared to share the benefit with the western farmer, but we do not want him to have all the benefit. I think some way should be worked out under which this benefit could be shared equally as between east and west.

Mr. WRIGHT: I was not saying anything against the eastern farmer getting the grain. As a matter of fact I was anxious that he should get it, and that is why I was asking that the shipping situation be investigated and more boats made available. Certainly it is a serious situation when twenty thousand of our railroad cars should be tied up because they cannot be unloaded. That is what it means, if we have thirty million bushels of grain in transit; twenty thousand railroad cars are tied up, storing grain, when they should be moving the grain to the head of the lakes. If it is the labour situation, selective service should certainly get some of these men who are at present working in non-essential industries, and put them where they would be doing something useful for the war effort. We have a labour department and a selective service organization in the dominion to attend to people engaged in non-essential industries, and it is time selective service got to work and used a little bit of compulsion to see that necessary things are done first.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to have a little more information with respect to this new departure of establishing a revolving fund of $500,000 for this Canadian shipping board. I assume that this is working capital for the board. Why is it necessary that government funds should be put up for this purpose? I venture to suggest it is the first time the government of the day has supplied working capital for chartering ships and carriers by water for domestic and foreign transportation. We know that all ocean transportation is under the control of the British ministry of shipping, so that of necessity the operations of this board must be confined to the domestic situation. I find it difficult to understand, although there may be good reason, the necessity for this new departure. Have we to charter United States bottoms to carry our goods on the great lakes, and is it a government movement that is being carried in those vessels? If that were so, I could understand there would have to be a certain amount of working capital advanced through this department, or some other agency, to take care of that position. However, the minister did not make clear what the position was, and since this is a new vote involving a substantial sum I believe we ought to have some further explanation.

I wish to make sure that this evidence of working capital will come back to the treasury. That, to my mind, is important. If this is a business proposition, I would be in favour of it; but I should like to know something more about it.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): As I said, the money is used as a fund from which to draw when chartering vessels. At times when a vessel is chartered certain advances have to be made. That money is recovered by the carrying charge on the freight.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Out of the freight?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has been talking about elevator space. Would he tell the committee what space is available in government terminal and other public terminal elevators, east of the great lakes? For instance, I am informed within the last week that the terminal at Prescott is practically empty. Why should that be?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think we are getting pretty far afield. However, in answer to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle I would explain that I have been checking up recently on spare capacity or space in elevators in the east, and I am informed that whereas there has been a certain amount of space available recently, it is expected that this will be used very shortly, through the operations of the wheat board.

Item agreed to.

Shipping priorities committee—
Administration, $59,960.
Gift of wheat to Greece, $6,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister explain these items?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The work of this committee is to ensure that shipping supplies will be made available for essential war supplies, and that non-essential supplies will not take all available shipping space. This committee cooperates closely with the controllers and administrators, and its work dovetails with the work of the Canadian shipping board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a new agency, is it?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are these civil servants, or are they new men brought in to do the work?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Trade commissioners are in charge.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is being charged as a war appropriation, and not to civil estimates. Will there be a corresponding reduction in the civil estimates of the department?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes; that is correct.

Mr. PERLEY: This item includes the shipment of wheat to Greece. I understand the minister was at an eastern terminal recently celebrating the loading of a vessel. Would he inform the committee—

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Are we considering that item?

Mr. PERLEY: I understood the Chairman to read it.

The CHAIRMAN: I called the two together because, generally speaking, the lengthy discussion takes place on the administration item, and the shipment to Greece is rather closely connected.

Mr. PERLEY: Out of what crop year was the wheat taken? Was it from the 1940, 1941 or 1942 crop?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am sorry I have not that information. Here again I do not wish to become involved in the discussion of a matter which might more properly be discussed at another time. However, I imagine the wheat board took it on the basis upon which they have been delivering grain, namely a percentage from one year, a percentage from another, and a percentage from another. As the hon. member knows, wheat is wheat, and a particular crop cannot be identified except as to quantity.

Mr. PERLEY: If some of the 1939 or prior crops, of which they have quite a surplus, were taken at the price indicated, it would make quite a difference. There would be a considerable difference if it were taken at last year's price.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I believe it is well known that this gift of wheat has been made to relieve suffering and privation caused by the German invasion of Greece.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We understand that.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is a free gift of 550,000 bushels of wheat per month to the people of Greece. To date these shipments total well over 5,000,000 bushels.

Mr. PERLEY: What will the total bushelage be for the $6,000,000?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We are continuing to give Greece this quantity of wheat per month.

Mr. PERLEY: Is the board taking up any of the options at this price in the open market?

Mr. FAIR: What return will a wheat grower get from this $6,000,000 worth of wheat being sent to Greece?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The hon. member means those who have an interest in participation certificates.

Mr. FAIR: The actual grower of the wheat.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): He will get the market price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will he get the market price, or will he get the price which is allotted to the particular year, depending upon what wheat is shipped? Are futures bought and filled out of this year's crop? What is the position?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This is a gift of wheat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We all know that. The minister does not need to tell us that again.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not in position to say from which crop this wheat will come, nor am I in position to say what price is agreed upon, but I have no doubt it is the proper price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is not good enough.

Mr. DONNELLY: When the wheat board officials were here they told us that in making shipments out of the country they took wheat from different years. They did not want to take it from one year because, if it were sold at a good price, that year would make a profit, but if it were sold at a loss, that year would make a loss. Therefore, in selling any quantity of wheat they would allocate a certain amount to each year, so that each year will be suffering together or making a profit. I presume in making the shipment of $6,000,000 worth of wheat to Greece they will allocate a certain portion to each year and charge it up to the government accordingly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that the position? I should like to have my information from the minister, and I say that with all respect for the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) who probably knows more about it than the minister.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Quite possibly.

An hon. MEMBER: He is doing pretty well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is not doing prettty well at all. The minister just knows that this is a gift of $6,000,000 worth of wheat; but where it comes from or where it goes to or from what crop it comes from or what price is being paid, the minister does not know any more about it than I do. I make that statement and I think I am pretty near within the mark.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not think the question has been properly answered. While what the hon. member for Wood Mountain has said is the fact to some degree, the practice is to average the sales from the years from which the wheat is taken, and until settlement is made no one can say what the price will be.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is this not a gift of wheat which will be shipped within the next twelve months?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This sum is to purchase wheat that will be shipped.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it intended to limit the amount of wheat to be shipped to Greece to $6,000,000 worth or will the government continue to ship as long as there is a need and shipping space is available?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): As long as shipping space is available and as long as we have the wheat to give, we will send 26,000 tons to Greece every month.

Item agreed to.

Shipping priorities committee—

Steamship subsidies war stabilization fund, $500,000.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It has been necessary to grant increased subsidies to various steamship companies in order to enable them to carry on under war-time conditions. Additional bonuses are paid in the operation of such services, namely, first, to provide for war bonuses to crews of vessels; second, war risk insurance on the vessels; and third, increased expenditures on fuel, marine insurance, et cetera. People who have contracts with the department which are expiring are coming to us with their audited statements to show that they cannot possibly carry on with their present contracts. This fund enables us to pay, after investigation, increased bonuses for the continuation of services where necessary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is just another bonus on account of the high cost of living and operation. Who is to get this $500,000?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There will be different amounts to different people.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose there will be; I do not suppose that one man will get it all, but the minister must have details in front of him of the various ship companies, local and otherwise, which will get this $500,000. We should like to know how it is to be allocated.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall have that information available on my ordinary estimate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister does not have it now?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The point is that this half million dollars is being taken out of the war appropriation instead of the civil estimates in order to carry on civil operations, the increased cost of which is on account of the war. Is that the right explanation?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is right.

Item agreed to.

National research council—
Special war activities, $2,114,708.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The reason for this item appearing in the war appropriation is obvious. There have been increased investigations on account of the war, and this vote is to permit the national research council to carry on investigations into war problems and to permit the expansion of investigations into certain problems which are now in progress. There is an item under national research council in my ordinary estimates. I have been asked by many people, both inside and outside the house, for a more or less detailed report on the work of the national research council. That is a report which it is difficult for a layman to give; that is a report in the preparation of which great care must be taken because of the many war investigations and experiments that are being carried on by the national research council. Anticipating that there would be a great deal of information that hon. members would like to have, I have had a statement carefully prepared covering the operations of the council and it is my intention to ask the consent of the committee to place this on Hansard so that hon. members may have an opportunity to read and study it. Questions can be submitted when my ordinary estimates are up for consideration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it very long?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes, it is.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have asked for certain returns in this connection, and there is one in particular to which I should like to have an answer. This was in connection with the manufacture of synthetic rubber. I have never been able to obtain the exact comparison between the cost of using wheat alcohol and a petroleum base in the manufacture of synthetic rubber. If this information could be obtained, I think it would be most beneficial. A recent article was put out by the line elevators stating that this could be cut in half.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I believe the information the hon. member for Souris is anxious to get will be found in what I am asking to be placed on Hansard. If it is not, the hon. member can tell me within the next day or so, and I shall be glad to see that it is prepared for him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there anything in the report with respect to alcohol produced from potatoes, which is a live question in my part of the country? You cannot have it all wheat and petroleum.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think the hon. member will find a comparison of figures in the report.

The CHAIRMAN: Then by unanimous leave of the committee shall the report be inserted in Hansard. Is that the pleasure of the committee? Carried.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The report is as follows:

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Industrial Uses of Wheat

The possibility of using wheat for the production of war chemicals is a question which has often been raised and is a problem which has received a great deal of consideration. Alcohol has been produced from starchy materials for a very long time and the processes involved are well known. Production methods have been developed to the point where increased yields of alcohol per bushel of grain cannot be expected. However, improvement in manufacturing technique might slightly reduce conversion costs. Wheat yields alcohol in proportion to the amount of starch present, and in most Canadian varieties the maximum possible yield is in the neighbourhood of 2 gallons per bushel. Since the conversion cost is from 15 to 17 cents per gallon, it is evident that the total cost of producing alcohol from wheat is chiefly dependent on the initial price of the wheat. Therefore when wheat sells for 90 cents per bushel, the manufacturing cost of alcohol would not be less than

$$\frac{90}{2} = 45 \text{ cents} + 17 \text{ cents} = 62\text{c per gallon.}$$

The recovery and sale of the feed portion may reduce this cost by 5 cents per gallon. In normal times alcohol can be produced from molasses in Canada at a total cost not exceeding 25 cents per gallon. It is evident that only when cheap fermentable materials such as molasses are in short supply can wheat be used to advantage in this field. At the present time practically every distillery in Canada is making alcohol from wheat; in these circumstances there is no need for pilot plant studies on this problem.

However, other chemicals more valuable than alcohol can be produced from wheat by fermentation processes. The national research council has made a very intensive study of the production of butylene glycol from wheat. This chemical can be more advantageously converted to butadiene than alcohol, and also has many other possibilities, for example in the manufacture of solvents, plastics, pharmaceuticals, and particularly as an anti-freeze. The production method has been fully worked out at the national research council and at the present time a pilot plant is being built to make large scale studies applicable to commercial practices and to obtain an estimation of production costs. The design of this plant is flexible enough, with minor changes, to permit the investigation of all types of fermentations including alcohol production if such should be required under any new circumstances which may arise.

Shortages of starch and starch products formerly made principally from imported products have aroused interest in obtaining starch from wheat. The national research council has developed an improved method for separating the starch and gluten fractions of wheat flour. Wheat starch is equally as suitable for the manufacture of sugars and syrups as is corn or potato starch and is known to be suitable for other industrial uses as in sizings for papers and textiles, adhesives, et cetera. The national research council is making a pilot plant study of the separation process and is investigating methods to improve industrial products made from wheat starch.

Wheat starch was included in an extensive study of the relative merits of several starches for various industrial purposes, carried out by the national research council several years ago. A great deal of data is available for application. Some experimentation has also been carried out on chemical derivatives of starches, with the particular object of their utilization as plastics. Fundamental studies of the drying, pasting and dextrinization of starch have also been made.

It will be seen from the foregoing that wheat is a costly raw material for industrial use and is only practicable when cheaper raw materials are unavailable or specialized products which command premium prices can be manufactured from it. The pilot plant investigations which are being undertaken by the national research council will provide information as to the commercial feasibility and costs of various fermentation processes and the production of starch, starch derivatives, and gluten from wheat. It is not possible at this stage to make any exact computation of the quantity of wheat or any other raw material which would be required, if used exclusively for the production of the entire Canadian requirements for the aforementioned products, as there are at present too many unknown factors. However, it is quite clear that the maximum quantity of wheat which might be used for such industrial purposes would make only a very small contribution to the solution of the wheat surplus problem.

Rubber

(A) The Extraction of Natural Rubber from Native and Introduced Plants.

The national research council has made a study of methods for extracting the rubber resin fraction of a number of the more promising species of native plants. A simple mechanical procedure has been developed for extracting rubber resin gum from the common milkweed. Laboratory experiments have shown that this gum when blended with synthetic buna S rubber greatly increases such properties as heat and tear resistance. The national research council is now erecting a small processing plant which will provide 5 tons of milkweed gum this fall to be used in a further experimental study of its value as a compounding agent. Attention is also being given to the extraction of rubber from the Russian dandelion (kok saghyz). However, present indications are that although the rubber is of good quality, the cost of production in this country will make its use impractical. Under a cooperative arrangement between the dominion Department of Agriculture and the national research council, the department is responsible for experimental production problems and the investigation of native rubber bearing plants, and the council is working on the development of a suitable extraction process and on problems relating to the testing and compounding of such rubber. With financial support from the national research council, fundamental problems relating to the production of natural rubber are being investigated at the university of Toronto, including the breeding and selection of plants on the basis of rubber content and the development of improved methods for determining the quantity of rubber present.

(B) Synthetic Rubber.

The division of applied biology of the council has successfully developed a fermentation process for the production of butylene glycol from wheat. This chemical can be converted to butadiene, which is an intermediate material required in the process of manufacturing the synthetic rubber known as buna S. Intensive work on this problem has been carried on for a year past, and has reached the stage where pilot plant investigations are being initiated to make large-scale studies applicable to commercial practices, and to obtain information as to production costs.

In the division of chemistry butylene glycol produced by this new process has been successfully converted to butadiene and thence to buna S.

(C) Rubber Specifications and Testing.

Since the outbreak of war a very large number of rubber specifications have been prepared at the request of all of the three fighting services, numerous acceptance tests carried out, investigations made to conserve critical materials such as zinc oxide and (recently) rubber itself while producing a product of required quality. Articles worked on include: rubber components of depth charges, ground sheets, motor-cyclists' suits, aircraft shock absorber glands, machinery mountings, thermo-electric propeller de-icing in particular has been a major investigation.

National Research Council

Researches in Agriculture

The Research Council Act places on the council responsibility for undertaking "researches, the object of which is to improve conditions in agriculture".

From the outset, work carried on by the council in this field has been undertaken in close cooperation with the dominion Department of Agriculture in order to insure that there was no unnecessary overlapping or duplication of effort or of expenditure. Work undertaken by the division of applied biology in the laboratories of the council, has been restricted largely to problems arising after the crop or the animal, has been grown on the farm. In addition, the national research council has made a great deal of use of the facilities for research, existing in other institutions. It was recognized that in the universities there are gathered together groups of highly trained men, who can consult together conveniently and who have good libraries at their disposal. The skill and experience of these men can be more fully utilized and their capacity greatly increased by providing a little extra equipment and help. This the national research council undertook to do, and its policy of assisted researches has produced, very economically, a rich harvest of results of the highest practical importance to agriculture. This extra-mural work has been carried on almost entirely under associate committees, established by the council to direct each major project. The dominion Department of Agriculture, and the universities or other organizations directly concerned, are fully informed of these activities, and have a voice in the direction of the work through their representatives, who are appointed members of each such committee.

Under this plan a very large amount of extremely important work has been undertaken, existing facilities have been utilized, and duplication of effort has been avoided in so far as has been practicable.

Recognizing the urgent and special problems of prairie agriculture, many of which could be more advantageously investigated on the ground, i.e. in that region, rather than in the council's laboratories at Ottawa, the council made a survey in 1939 of opportunities for large expansion of its work in cooperation with the western universities. Unfortunately, the war supervened, and this proposed development was temporarily arrested, except for the establishment of an oil seeds laboratory at the university of Saskatchewan. The delay has, however, given opportunity for further study and planning of a substantial programme to be launched at the earliest possible time.

A more specific summary of the activities of the national research council in the field of agricultural research is given hereunder as follows:

(A) Projects in progress in the division of applied biology.

1. Army rations

Object—to assess the value of available foods for regular and emergency rations.

The standing committee on nutrition of the Department of National Defence requested that the components of the mess tin and emergency rations used by the Canadian army be examined to assess caloric value, keeping qualities, etc. This has been done for the army mess tin biscuits and incidental services have been rendered for various items included in the ration. At the request of the Department of Munitions and Supply, advice has been given on the value of a number of foods offered for sale, and specifications have been drafted for the majority of some 20 items included in the mess tin and emergency rations as well as for many items in the regular ration. An additional service is provided in that these goods are tested against the specifications.

2. Bacon

Object—to determine the best treatments for preserving bacon when transported under ordinary unrefrigerated conditions.

Investigations on modified curing practices resulted in the adoption of a standard cure by Canadian packers. This practice has proved so successful that Canadian bacon is now held in higher favour on the British market than ever before. Even under the uncertain conditions of wartime transport and storage the proportion of Canadian bacon degraded by the British ministry of food has been so exceptionally small that rigorous inspection is no longer considered necessary. The Englishman's prejudice against Canadian bacon, founded on the definitely bad curing practices of the last war, has been overcome, and there should be no difficulty in holding the British market for Canadian bacon after this war.

3. Blood storage

Object—to ascertain the best storage conditions for human blood.

A container for carrying human blood was designed for use by the Canadian Red Cross and the results of investigations to determine the best conditions for storing blood have been published.

4. Butylene glycol (see rubber).

5. Eggs.

(a) Dried.

Object—to determine methods for assessing quality and the best conditions for the processing and storage of dried eggs.

Methods of assessing the quality of dried egg powder were developed. Specifications for the processing and storage of dried eggs have been prepared for the special products board and the Canadian army, and have been accepted by these bodies as well as by the industrialists and the British ministry of food. The result is that Canadian produced egg powder is recognized in Britain as having the highest average quality of any egg powder available.

(b) In shell.

Object—to extend the storage life of eggs under the uncertain storage and transport conditions occasioned by war.

Treatments for dipping shell eggs have been investigated and recommendations have been made for the handling of shell eggs under adverse conditions should the necessity arise.

6. Fats.

Object—to find alternatives for vegetable oil shortenings now in short supply.

Investigations are being conducted on the improvement of the stability and other properties of lard and studies are being made on the conversion of linseed oil to an edible shortening. The processing of oil from sunflower seeds and other oil seed crops including certain weed seeds is being undertaken.

7. Gas indicators.

Object—to assess the value of biological indicators for the detection of poisonous gases.—Results secret.

8. Irish Moss.

Object—to find a method for the processing of native Irish Moss (seaweed) as a substitute for jellying substances used in canning.

Processing procedures were developed to produce an odourless, tasteless, light-coloured preparation which would give a strong jelly. Difficulty has been encountered in the drying of extracts by any commercially applicable methods, but efforts are being made to overcome this difficulty. It is expected that several million pounds of Irish Moss will be harvested on the east coast annually.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

9. Meat.

(a) Canned.

Object—to develop a canning process to improve the nutritive value and keeping quality of meat.

Army and civilian requirements demanded large cans (6 pounds) of a canned meat product that would keep under all temperature conditions likely to be encountered. Previously most canned meats had to be kept under refrigeration. It has been possible to work out processing procedures to give a product that will withstand high temperatures for long periods.

(b) Cured—see bacon.

(c) Dehydrated.

Object—to determine a suitable method of preparation for dehydrated pork and other meats and to ascertain the storage life of the resulting products at ordinary temperatures.

Investigations on the drying of pork have been carried to a point where an excellent product can be prepared, retaining about 75 per cent of its natural vitamin B_1 content after cooking and drying. This material can be pressed into blocks, and since it contains about 30 per cent fat it has the same caloric value as the army emergency ration chocolate bar. Since a tasting panel rated it more palatable than the chocolate bar, blocks are being prepared for test by the army.

10. Oils (see fats).

11. Packaging.

Object—to develop substitutes for metal containers with special reference to the packaging of dehydrated foods for export or use by the armed services.

Recommendations for the packaging of Canadian dried egg have been accepted and put into practice. Tests have been conducted on a large number of packaging materials and recommendations as to their relative suitability for army mess tin rations and other uses have been made.

12. Refrigeration, emergency.

Object—to develop suitable equipment for refrigerating ordinary cargo space for the transport of perishables, combining economy of operation and rapidity of installation with other requirements.

The emergency refrigeration proposed consists of prefabricated equipment suitable for converting an ordinary cargo hold of 50,000 cubic feet to a refrigerated space without delaying the vessel. Storage practice was modified to avoid ductwork, employ the minimum of insulation, and still secure a satisfactory temperature condition. Experiments were successful and several vessels ex Canadian and United States ports have been so equipped and also a coastwise vessel has been adapted for the transport of frozen meat for the quartermaster-general's department.

13. Rubber.

(a) Butylene glycol from wheat.

Object—to study fermentation methods for the production of butylene glycol, an intermediate in the manufacture of synthetic rubber and a substitute for other war chemicals.

Bacteria are used to act directly on ground wheat to produce butylene glycol. This glycol can be converted to butadiene which is a precursor of synthetic rubber. Several other important uses of butylene glycol as a substitute for war materials in short supply as well as for new industrial uses are being investigated. A pilot plant capable of handling 25 bushels per day is under construction and is expected to be completed about the end of June.

(b) Natural.

Object—to investigate methods for the extraction of natural rubber from promising native and introduced plants.

When the rubber situation became serious, a cooperative investigation was undertaken with the Department of Agriculture to determine the rubber content of Canadian grown plants. The responsibilities of the research council were confined to extraction and subsequent quality tests. So far only two plants appear to have a useful rubber content—the natural milkweed and the introduced Russian dandelion.

Methods have been developed for extracting the gum from natural milkweed mechanically, and while this gum contains both rubber and resins, it shows promise as an agent for improving certain properties of synthetic rubber.

14. Vitamins.

Object—to find food carriers in which vitamins will remain stable over the wide range of conditions encountered by an army in the field.

A survey of rations as consumed in army camps showed vitamin C to be limited. Recommendations made to the standing committee on nutrition to correct this deficiency have been accepted.

Serious problems arose in connection with the army mess tin ration where all the foods are dried and concentrated. Suitable carriers for vitamin C have been developed and recommended. Work is proceeding on the other vitamins, including vitamins A, B_1 and B_2.

(B) Extra-mural Agricultural Research.

One outstanding example, of particular interest to western Canada, was the organization, beginning in 1924, of a cooperative scheme by which new wheat varieties produced or introduced by plant breeders were tested at a large number of places throughout the prairie provinces, for disease resistance as well as yield, earliness, and other field characters, and finally for milling and baking qualities. The dominion Department of Agriculture, the universities of Alberta, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan, and the board of grain commissioners cooperated in this work. The council's part in the scheme was to subsidize the plant breeders, plant pathologists, and cereal chemists in the three universities mentioned, and to organize the associate committees on grain research and field crop diseases which coordinated the work.

The scope of the enterprise was extended in stages, as when the council installed durum wheat testing equipment in the university of Manitoba (later moved to the grain board laboratory); then equipment for testing malting barley, also in the university of Manitoba; and finally established (in 1940) an oil-seeds laboratory in the university of Saskatchewan. The annual appropriation of the council to the two committees concerned is now about $46,500.

In 1929 the council organized a committee on weeds expending $35,000 over a period of three years in assisting weed research in the prairie provinces. With the onset of the depression, work was concentrated at the university of Saskatchewan, where the distinguished work of Professor Pavlychenko is now supported by the council to the extent of $5,000 per year.

The significance of all this work lies in the progressive protection from weed and disease losses afforded western farmers as knowledge advances, and the maintenance of high standards of industrial quality in the products. No new varieties of grain or flax are admitted to the standard grades by the board of grain commissioners without the approval of the associate committee on grain research.

Rust-resistant wheat varieties, an outcome of the foregoing programme of work in which the council shared, have been a prime factor in ensuring the bumper wheat crops of recent years.

Answering the imperative demands of war, the associate committees on grain research and field crop diseases have largely swung over for the time being to war projects. For example, the entire group working under these committees at the university of Alberta have devoted themselves for over a year to problems connected with the manufacture of rubber from wheat. This is not out of line with the peacetime programme of the grain research committee, which has always emphasized the industrial qualities of grain crops, and has aimed to broaden and diversify the scope of their utilization.

The associate committee on wool, established in 1927 has devoted itself to problems of wool-growing and manufacture throughout the whole country. Special attention was paid, however, to securing hardier stock and finer wool in western range sheep. Breeding work at the university of Saskatchewan was subsidized by the council. By 1933 it was demonstrated that carefully graded wool from selected western flocks could be spun and woven into cloth fully equal to the best imported English worsted. This work laid a sound basis for the present war-time expansion in wool production. In recent years the council's committee has been merged with the national sheep committee set up by the dominion Department of Agriculture. The wool quality tests are still made in the council's laboratories.

In 1932 the council established the institute of animal parasitology at Macdonald college, Quebec, carrying almost the entire maintenance cost for a period of six years, when McGill university and the dominion Department of Agriculture each took over the support of one member of the staff. The annual appropriation of the council to the institute is now $15,205. A single example will illustrate the significance of the institute's work. The phenothiazine treatment for sheep worms, developed in the institute during the period of 1935-38, and subsequently pressed to field use by the Department of Agriculture, has been vital to the wartime expansion in sheep production. About 300,000 sheep have already been treated with phenothiazine in this country, with spectacular success.

1. Aircraft operation

Object—To explore means for diminishing frost deposition and adherence on grounded aircraft.

The only hope seems to be to find a method of treatment which causes frost to form in a loose condition permitting easy removal. A very large number of compounds have been investigated and some found promising. Work is continuing.

Out of the above has come investigational work on de-icing pastes, the construction of an experimental "ice rate indicator" and an anti-dim paste.

(See also under "rubber")

2. Chemical warfare

Object—To keep abreast of developments in this field in the event of chemical warfare being initiated by the enemy.

This work is carried out in close cooperation with and supplementary to that done by the chemical warfare directorate, Department of National Defence. While the work is necessarily secret, two senior men have been working full time and several other senior men part time on the various projects submitted to the division.

3. Colloid Chemistry.

Object—To apply this branch of chemistry to the needs of Canadian industry.

Fundamental work has been carried out on the properties of starch with a view to extended industrial utilization. Aid has also been rendered industry on problems of casein manufacture and utilization, special adhesives, activated clays, etc.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

4. Corrosion.

Object—To aid government departments in solution of problems concerning corrosion—one of the greatest troubles in modern industry.

A long range programme concerning corrosion of aluminium and low alloy steels in sea water has been carried on for some years. This is of particular interest to the admiralty.

An increasing number of tests and minor problems are coming in from the armed services. These include work on rust preventive oils, electrolytic polishing of duralumin, corrosion of water filters, lamp socket bases, cap badges, etc., strength of aircraft members, and so on.

5. Customs and excise laboratory.

Object—To conduct tests as required by statute on imports and domestic products subject to excise taxes.

Formerly operated under the Department of National Revenue, this work has recently been placed under the direction of the division of chemistry, of the national research council.

6. Explosives testing laboratories.

Object—In addition to conducting tests on explosives as required under the Explosives Act (this is done by the staff of the Department of Mines and Resources), laboratories have been established to test war-time explosives, new explosives produced under the extra-mural research programme, and to aid the services in problems relating to application of explosives.

7. Leather.

(a) Natural.

Object—To aid purchase of leather and leather goods by the services through preparation of specifications, acceptance tests and development work. In addition to routine acceptance work, tests were made on efficiency of waterproofing treatment of boots, possible stuffing greases for leathers to substitute for wool grease, modified formula for dubbing, waterproofing shoe thread, and several specifications for leather articles.

(b) Substitutes.

Object—To relieve scarcity of leather.

Plastic soles of cotton fabric and suitable plastics have been made up and, after successful laboratory tests, are now being given field tests. Apart from saving sole leather which is in short supply, these soles have the advantage over leather of not being required to be stamped in rights and lefts since both surfaces are identical.

8. Magnesium.

Object—To aid Canadian production and utilization of magnesium.

A small pilot plant and foundry are operated on problems arising out of the operations of the large commercial plants and for further study towards possible improvement of the recovery process and the handling of the metal itself. This work will be of value after the war as well as at present.

9. Organic chemistry.

(a) Alkaloid research.

Object—To isolate and identify alkaloids present in various plants.

This is a long term project initiated over ten years ago. While not directly pertinent to war use, the possible use of new alkaloids in medicine should not be overlooked.

(b) Micro-analysis.

Object—To identify organic compounds available in too minute quantities for normal analytical methods.

Prior to the war, all this work was done in Germany. Our laboratory now handles all of our own work plus that sent in by chemical warfare, explosive research laboratories and Canadian universities.

(c) New organic chemicals.

Object—To facilitate Canadian production of chemicals not previously made in Canada and to search for improved ways of manufacturing organic chemicals.

The production of ethylene oxide from ethylene has been carried out on pilot plant scale.

An investigation on the production of monoethanolamine has been started.

Conversion of 2, 3-butylene glycol (as produced by division of biology) to butadiene is being investigated in a preliminary way.

Other possible products from butylene glycol are being investigated; one in particular shows considerable promise.

10. Paints.

Object—To aid Canadian manufacturers and users of paints.

A great number of samples of paints, dopes, lacquers, compositions and shell-filling materials, etc., are given acceptance tests for the inspection board and services. Specifications for paints and application methods are prepared on request. Development work is carired out on such subjects as non-toxic paint removers, heat reflecting paints to lower-external temperatures in armoured vehicles, shellac substitute, paint removal from naval vessels, special finishes on metal surfaces, fluorescent paint, camouflage paints, fire-retardant paints, anti-freezes, et cetera.

11. Plastics

Object—To utilize plastics in place of other scarce materials—to utilize newer developments in plastics.

A novel method for curing resins used in manufacture of plywood articles has been developed and shows much promise of speeding up production. Work is being done on plastic scabbards, goggles for general service use, identification tags, crash helmets, moulded plywood units for Carley floats, sponge plastics, utilization of plastics in place of rubber, metals, etc.

12. Rubber

(a) Natural

Object—To provide independent development services for rubber products and their compounding ingredients.

Since the war a very large number of specifications have been prepared at request of all fighting services, numerous acceptance tests carried out, investigations made to conserve critical materials such as zinc oxide and (recently) rubber itself while producing a product of required quality. Articles worked on include: rubber components of depth charges, ground sheets, motor-cyclists' suits, aircraft shock absorber glands, machinery mountings, thermo-electric propeller de-icing in particular has been a major investigation.

(b) Synthetic and substitutes

Object—To conserve natural rubber.

Substitutes for cellular rubber have been investigated. Rubber-like materials from Canadian plants have been investigated: in particular "milkweed rubber" produced by our division of applied biology and rubber from the Russian dandelion, although quantities available to date have been limited.

Fundamental and practical work on synthetic rubber has been carried on as far as staff and facilities permit. Close touch has been maintained with U.S. work by attendance at technical conferences.

13. Textiles—including laundering and dry cleaning

Object—To serve the government and buying public by textile research, issuing of specifications, testing and standardization.

(a) Specifications and acceptance tests on materials for the armed services. Numerous specifications and several thousand tests are conducted yearly on request of inspection board or specific services. This helps to assure the forces of uniform and adequate quality of supplies. Numerous tests are required before making up a specification.

(b) Textile treatments—Investigations have been carried on mildew and rotproofing (sandbags, tarpaulins, etc.) waterproofing and flameproofing.

(c) Substitute materials—Alternatives to silk for parachutes was the first project taken up and when its immediate aims were achieved, attention was turned to cover cargo, flare and other special chutes as well as parachute design.

Substitute for rope fibres, kapok, binder twine (in cooperation with Department of Agriculture) are also under investigation.

(d) Wool standards—A cooperative project with the Department of Agriculture, aimed to improve and increase Canadian wool production. The national research council is concerned with the fibre quality measurements.

(e) Chemical defence—Five projects are under investigation for the chemical warfare directorate.

14. Miscellaneous Service Problems

Object—To assist in solution of minor problems met by fighting services.

There are a number of investigations of short-term duration but nevertheless important to the services concerned. Some of these include: (a) an improved solution for treatment of trench mouth was developed; (b) a detergent was suggested for removal of oil from survivors of torpedoed vessels; (c) The purification of sea water for drinking purposes; (d) A transparent dope to protect field service maps from moisture and soiling; (e) Manufacture of testing cards for inspection board, etc.

National Research Council

Summary of Major Projects, Division of Mechanical Engineering

(A) Aerodynamic

1. Construction and wind tunnel tests of models of aircraft used in the British commonwealth air training plan

The purpose of this project is to be able to make, when necessary, modifications of the models and from wind tunnel tests predict quickly changes in performance and stability of the aeroplane caused by these modifications. A number of modifications that have been recommended for various reasons by the R.C.A.F. have been made and from wind tunnel tests the effect of these modifications on the flying qualities of the aeroplanes have been predicted. These wind tunnel investigations assist in saving time and in safeguarding the pilots on the initial flights.

2. Wind tunnel tests and full scale ground handling tests of aircraft skis

The purpose of this investigation is to obtain data sufficient to design aircraft skis for military aircraft in order that the aeroplanes equipped with skis will have the best possible performance both on the snow and in the air. The wind tunnel research has as its prime object designing skis which will reduce the aircraft speed by the least amount. The full scale aeroplane handling tests on snow are to determine which skis will function satisfactorily on various snow surfaces. The information from these tests has been used for designing aircraft skis.

3. Wind tunnel and full scale aircraft tests on the balancing of aircraft controls

The purpose of this research is to obtain information on the behaviour of aircraft ailerons in an attempt to make fighter aircraft more manoeuvrable. Already extensive wind tunnel tests have been made and the results will be compared with measurements made on an aircraft in flight. This information will be of value to aircraft designers.

4. The calibration of the new horizontal wind tunnel

Before a wind tunnel can be used for accurate research or test work the wind tunnel must be calibrated. This calibration, which is proceeding at present, consists of measuring the characteristics of the air flow through the tunnel. When this calibration is completed, work that cannot be done in the present horizontal wind tunnel may be undertaken.

5. The calibration of the new vertical wind tunnel

The calibration of this tunnel is in progress at the present time. This tunnel will be used for tests and research on the spinning of aeroplanes which at present cannot be undertaken in Canada.

Other projects in progress in the aerodynamic section are of a secret nature and cannot be disclosed at the present time.

(B) Hydrodynamic.

Model basin tests have proven of inestimable value to the naval architect and shipbuilder in enabling them to predict the performance of water craft and to effect improvements in designs resulting in greater speed, economy and safety. In the case of aircraft hulls or floats the performance of new designs or the effects of changes in existing designs may be determined cheaply and safely.

In testing water craft accurate scale models are towed through the water in the model testing basin at known speeds by a car running upon rails along the sides of the basin and the forces acting upon the model are measured. The results of these model tests are extended to full scale by mathematical computations.

The information derived from model tests includes:

(1) Resistance at different speeds, attitudes and drafts.

(2) Attitude and behaviour under different conditions.

(3) Cleanness of running and wave formation.

(4) Influence of controls on behaviour of running.

Experience with the existing model testing basin at the John St. laboratories which was designed primarily for testing models of aircraft hulls and floats has indicated that the majority of models submitted for test are ship models. The new basin which is nearing completion at the Montreal road laboratories is 450 feet long by 25 feet wide by 10 feet deep and has been designed for ship model work although a great deal of work may be undertaken in connection with high speed craft such as hydroplanes, aircraft hulls and aircraft floats.

Tests and investigations are undertaken as required for the services, government departments and manufacturers.

(C) Aircraft de-icing.

The work of this section is concerned with the development and testing in flight under actual conditions of aircraft de-icing equipment to increase the range of weather conditions under which our aircraft may operate and to enhance the safety of flight through icing conditions which are at present serious hazards to winter flights over Northern Europe and the North Atlantic, as well as over Canada and Alaska.

The following projects are undergoing development and testing at the laboratory:

1. Propeller de-icing (details secret).

2. Windshield de-icing and de-frosting to ensure vision under all weather conditions.

3. Wing de-icing employing heat from the engine exhaust.

(D) Aircraft engines.

1. Cracked aviation gasoline.

In the past, it has been considered that only straight run aviation gasoline could be used in aircraft and that thermally cracked gasoline, similar in many respects to that used in automobiles, was unsuitable for aircraft engines. This reluctance to use thermally cracked gasoline has been based upon octane number and gum formation.

Tests have been made in a 900 horse-power aircraft engine, using cracked aviation type gasoline which was made by Canadian refiners and it was found that the fuel was entirely satisfactory for training aircraft. This investigation was followed by tests in flight for a period of three months.

It has now been decided that for training aircraft, fuels of this type are entirely satisfactory and a specification has been prepared for this fuel.

Further work is to be done on this investigation so that information will be available to the refiners regarding the limits within which the cracking may be done.

It is understood that with the exception of a little work which has been done on this subject, Canada is leading in this investigation which should materially assist in increasing the aviation gasoline supply.

2. Cold starting of engines.

Cold starting of engines has been receiving a good deal of attention in recent years and a considerable amount of this work has been done in Canada.

The laboratory is experimenting with equipment to assist in the starting of engines at low temperatures.

3. Single cylinder engine for lubrication investigation.

A single cylinder engine is being built in the laboratory to study the lubrication of aircraft engines and allied problems. The use of a relatively small engine will simplify the study and be more economical. As the engine is being constructed of aircraft engine parts, the effect of lubricants should be similar to that on full scale engines.

4. Full scale engine detonation investigation.

Work is being done on a programme to correlate tests on full scale and single cylinder engines. Engines of representative British manufacture are being used for this work and representative high octane gasolines are being examined. A very comprehensive programme is proposed.

5. Ice prevention in aircraft engines.

A thorough investigation is being made of the whole problem of carburettor icing. Several materials are being added to the fuel or injected into the engine and the effect on engines being carefully noted. A great part of this work has been completed.

6. Endurance tests.

A number of endurance tests have been done for the Royal Canadian Air Force on various engine types.

These tests are, in general, designed to prove the serviceability of the engine, propeller or accessory under consideration. In addition, tests have been done to indicate whether or not engine parts from sources other than the original manufacturer, are suitable for use.

Indicative of the usefulness of the tests is the fact that not all parts pass the acceptance tests.

7. Engine cooling investigation

A study has been and is being made of the cooling of armoured vehicles for the Department of National Defence.

8. Other projects are under investigation, but because of their confidential nature, they may not be disclosed.

(E) Gasoline and oil

Two general classes of work are done in the laboratory:

I. Analyses and tests of lubricants, aviation fuel, motor fuel, greases, extreme pressure lubricants, aircraft hydraulic fluids, and other petroleum products for the Department of National Defence. The purpose of the tests is to ensure that such products used by the armed services comply with the technical requirements for these products, and that they will give the performance required of them in the equipment in which they are used. The major portion of this work is done for the R.C.A.F.

II. Development and research. This phase of the work is concerned mainly with the development of petroleum products which will give improved operation in service over ever-widening and more severe conditions of use. Two of the more important are the development of aircraft hydraulic fluids and lubricants with improved performance at very low temperatures.

The laboratory undertakes many specific problems of this nature for the defence departments.

(F) Aircraft instruments

Apart from routine tests the main activities of the instrument laboratory are:

(1) Type approval tests of types of aircraft instruments being manufactured in Canada for the first time.

(a) The equipment of the laboratory enables these tests to be carried out under conditions of vibration, low temperature and of other extremes likely to be encountered in actual service.

(b) The experience of the laboratory enables it to offer useful advice as to details of design of various instruments and thus aid the development of these instruments in Canada.

(2) Test of luminous compounds, plastic tubing and parts in relation to their use on aircraft instruments.

(3) Advice and assistance rendered to officers of the R.C.A.F. and N.R.C. in connection with the design and construction of special instruments and equipment.

(G) Aircraft structures

In this section structural tests are conducted for the three services, Department of Munitions and Supply and the Canadian aircraft industry.

As the structures laboratory is an official research station for the R.C.A.F., it is the only building in Canada equipped with the facilities for the testing of aircraft structures. For example, there are now being tested three sets of wings and tail surfaces for a Canadian training aircraft. In order to prove the strength and airworthiness for all conditions of flight, carefully calculated loads will be applied to these components. Such tests are essential when new aircraft are developed; existing types are to be employed in operations for which they were not originally designed, or when the structures are modified to utilize materials of reduced priority.

In addition to tests, investigations of a more fundamental character are conducted. Work of this kind at present includes the design and construction in moulded plywood of an aircraft widely employed in the air training programme. The object of the undertaking was to produce an aircraft which would reduce the drain on duralumin and steel, to draw upon the considerable woodworking labour potential in Canada and to demonstrate inherent superiority of this type of structure from the standpoint of aerodynamic performance and ease of production.

As a useful by-product of this enterprise, the structures section functions as a pilot plant. When one of the services requests the design of a novel article or construction of a component in a substitute material, then interested firms are at liberty to follow the development in the laboratory so that the subsequent commercial production may be initiated with a minimum of delay. The staff are at present engaged in a number of developments of this kind.

Incidental to the test and development work is the accumulation of much basic data on the strength of materials, current practices, improved constructural techniques and so forth. Thus one of the general functions of this section is as an advisory body to the services and to industry.

(H) General mechanical engineering and armament.

1. Cams for automatic gun sights for coast defence guns.

A few months prior to the war, the supply from the United Kingdom to Canada of cams for gun sights had to be discontinued. Since the United Kingdom had been the only source of supply, the department of national defence requested the national research council to develop a method for manufacturing the cams. The profile of each cam depends on the location of the gun so that each cam had to be shaped individually. The cams produced in the national research council shops cost less than those supplied from the United Kingdom. The national research council has supplied a large number of these cams and is continuing to do so as required by the department of national defence.

2. High velocity gun and projectile.

A high velocity gun and projectile is being developed in the laboratory. High velocity is very desirable for anti-tank and anti-aircraft guns. Further details can not be disclosed.

3. Fuze.

Certain components of a new type of fuze are being developed at the national research council. A large number of these components are being made in the national research council shops for firing trials. Further details can not be disclosed.

4. Fire control system (navy).

The royal Canadian navy has requested the national research council to develop instruments for directing gun fire from the bridge of a certain class of ship. The design has just been completed and the construction of the pilot model will soon be started in the national research council shops.

5. Fire control system (coast defence).

An instrument for converting range into gun elevation is being developed at the national research council. Range is received by electrical transmission from a range finder. Any necessary correction to range can be applied by adjusting a dial on the instrument. The resulting gun elevation is transmited electrically to the gun.

Another instrument which is a form of range finder with a built-in-range-to-elevation converter is also being developed by the national research council for coast defence.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

National Research Council

Summary of major projects in progress in the division of physics and electrical engineering

X-rays, radiology, strength of materials.

This project includes experimental investigations on radiographic technique. Considerable assistance has been given Canadian foundries in the matter of X-ray examination of aircraft castings and component parts of other war equipment. Hundreds of strength of materials tests are conducted for the inspection board and defence departments. Such tests are a prerequisite to acceptance of materials to go into war equipment.

Optics.

The optics section is engaged on a programme of research in aerial photography for the air force. In addition an optics shop is very active turning out many optical components for military instruments on order from the Department of Munitions and Supply. By the medium of a joint R.C.A.F.-N.R.C. research committee a very close liaison is kept with actual war requirements and all the work of this group has a direct and immediate war application.

War metrology work.

This project includes the design and development of apparatus used in coastal defence. Many hundred routine tests on sextants, binoculars, etc., are done in this section annually. All are direct requests of war organizations.

Coastal defence instruments.

When the main N.R.C. shops moved out to the Montreal road it was found necessary to set up a small auxiliary workshop. The men employed here are engaged on construction of instruments for coastal defence, and other secret army, navy and air force gear.

Electrical engineering.

All problems in electrical engineering are referred to this group which is most active on the design of secret naval gear, investigations concerning electrical characteristics of substitutes for rubber, shock tests on naval apparatus and many other tests and investigations.

Ballistics.

Work consists of the design, development and construction of ballistics apparatus necessary for proof of ammunition and weapons. This also covers work to proceed in the new rifle range building where actual tests are being conducted.

Gunsights.

As the name implies, this project covers the study of improved gunsights. The immediate practical application of such results is obvious.

A.R.P.

This project covers assistance given in a consulting capacity to the A.R.P. organization in Canada with respect to its technical problems.

Secret projects.

A number of secret projects have been undertaken by this division, at the request of the armed services, i.e. research on a thermal problem being pursued in collaboration with England and the United States; the construction of secret apparatus required by the R.C.N. for harbour protection, etc.

Item agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The understanding is that all these matters may be reverted to when the minister's civil estimates come up, because we really require more information.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): So far as civil matters are concerned, but I do not think the hon. member would wish to discuss again purely war items.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to have a break-down of some of these items. However, I know what will be done. About Friday or Saturday of next week, when everybody wants to get home, items will be railroaded through at the rate of a million a minute.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I hope we are through before that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I am not optimistic enough. But I say that that practice is not good enough when we are dealing with expenditures taken from a tax-ridden people.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Canadian postal corps, $183,020.

Mr. FAIR: I wish to ask a question in regard to the men in uniform who comprise the Canadian postal corps. I have not all the details, but perhaps the minister would set the matter straight. I understand that a number of the corps are married men living in Ottawa and that they are compelled to live in tents at Lansdowne park. That does not seem like common sense to me because it requires a lot of extra help at Lansdowne park which might be put to some other useful purpose.

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster-General): This item amounting to $183,020 is made up as follows: temporary assistance, $8,280; cost-of-living bonus, $1,440; travelling expenses, $2,000; printing and stationery, $50,000; equipment and maintenance, $20,000; telegrams and telephones, $600; sundries, $100; mailbags for overseas mail, $100,000; contributions to unemployment insurance fund, $600. There is a decrease from last year of $11,720 in the salaries of these temporary employees. That is due to the fact that the field post offices have now all been placed on an active service basis, and it is therefore no longer necessary to provide an amount for temporary assistance.

The men in uniform in the postal corps to whom the hon. member for Battle River referred are part of the armed services of Canada and have to carry out the orders given to them by the Department of National Defence just as men in any other branch of the armed services have to do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are we to understand that they were civilians and have been transferred to national defence?

Mr. MULOCK: When the corps was set up it was necessary to open post offices in a hurry to give mail service to the troops in the camps, and we had to assign civilians from the different post offices throughout the country to get the service started. But now recruits have been trained in postal work and have joined the postal corps. They are active service men and have replaced the civilians.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are charged to the Post Office Department and paid out of the war appropriation?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes; the civilians.

Mr. DONNELLY: Do some of these employees look after the mail in the internment camps?

Mr. MULOCK: This is the army postal service. When we started to set up the service men had to be trained in the work. In the meantime we had to provide a postal service for the different camps, and so we took civilian personnel from the different post offices across the country and put them in to get the service started. They proceeded to train men who had enlisted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Men of a lower physical category than A1?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes.

Mr. FAIR: Am I right in assuming that the Postmaster General has no control whatever over the men in uniform in the postal corps?

Mr. MULOCK: Only so far as directing and looking after the distribution of mail is concerned. In every other respect, discipline, rationing and so forth, they are under the national defence department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Post Office Department superintends their activities qua the post office.

Mr. MARSHALL: Who is the officer in charge?

Mr. MULOCK: Colonel E. J. Underwood. He is at present in England.

Mr. MARSHALL: Who is in charge of the postal corps in the dominion? Somebody must be in charge in his absence.

Mr. MULOCK: Colonel Underwood was sent over to carry out certain duties. Preparations were made well in advance. He is in charge of the personnel of the corps whether they are stationed in England, Canada, North Africa or anywhere else. The man who is permanently in charge of the postal corps in England is Lieutenant-Colonel Ross.

Mr. MARSHALL: And in Canada?

Mr. MULOCK: Colonel Underwood.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Who is in charge when he is away in England?

Mr. MARSHALL: That is what I was trying to get. Who carries out his duties in his absence?

Mr. MULOCK: Captain Warwick.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is the minister prepared to make any statement as to the better handling of mail for overseas?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I understood that the minister was sending someone overseas to investigate and make a report. There were a great many complaints a few months ago with regard to delays in the delivery of mail from Canada to the British isles, and from the soldiers back home to Canada, letters often taking ten weeks or more to get from Canada to England and vice versa.

Mr. MULOCK: I think the hon. member will realize the nature of our transportation difficulty. Our space is allotted to us. We cannot say we are going to occupy so many cubic feet on board a ship or that we are going to put on board so many thousand bags of mail. Space is made available to us and we have to take the space which is allotted and when it is allotted. I think the hon. member will realize what a strain is put upon shipping owing to the African campaign and, now, the operations in Sicily, and that this is bound to slow up the mails at times. But it is purely a question of shipping. We can get the mail to the ports, but we have to wait until there is some ship to put it on. Often we can ship only part of the mail which is available or has been posted on the same day; the rest has to wait until there is space available.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is this not a correct statement, that for a considerable time —I hope they are not doing it now—the Post Office Department accepted mail to go by air when there were no facilities to convey it by air, and that their so doing really amounted to a deception as far as the senders of that mail were concerned; they had paid for and consigned it as airmail and the department accepted it as such, though during a considerable period it had not the facilities to convey it by air. That was a justifiable grievance on the part of the senders in this country and of those in the forces overseas.

Mr. MULOCK: I agree in part, but not fully, with what the hon. member has said. He is talking about the thirty cents?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The thirty cents, and the ten-cent airmail as well.

Mr. MULOCK: There was not much of that. He is wrong in saying that there were no facilities; there were, but not sufficient to take care of the demand. When it was found that the volume could not be handled, notices were sent out and postmasters told to discourage the use of the thirty-cent airmail. We could not tell people that they could not send it that way, because some could go.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The public were not advised, though?

Mr. MULOCK: Oh, yes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The people who were sending the mail?

Mr. MULOCK: Not as individuals, but they were advised through the press.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is much of this mail lost crossing the seas, through the torpedoing of ships?

Mr. MULOCK: In the calendar year 1942 we dispatched 14,536 bags of letters, made up of 20,116,360 items, having a weight of 502,909 pounds. The loss owing to enemy action was sixty-five bags of mail.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very small.

Mr. MULOCK: Those are letters—made up of 2,577 items, sixty-four pounds in weight. Of registered mail sent overseas, 43,687 items were dispatched, and only fifty-six lost.

Mr. MacNICOL: Fifty-six items?

Mr. MULOCK: Fifty-six items. Of news, 40,120 bags were dispatched, and 496 lost through enemy action.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A little over one per cent.

Mr. MULOCK: Parcel post, 295,911 bags dispatched, and 3,187 were lost owing to enemy action. Tobacco parcels, 125,017 bags dispatched, and 3,109 lost.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a remarkable tribute to our naval and air services that such a small amount of mail matter was lost through enemy action.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The department announced some time ago, if I recollect correctly, that a real Canadian airmail service was about to be established. What progress has been made with that?

Mr. MULOCK: The service has commenced. The ship has made one westbound trip, but as yet it has not yet completed the round trip.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just beginning.

Mr. MULOCK: Just beginning.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Following the question by the hon. member for Cumberland, I had a return brought down on February 16 along the same line, and it shows that last October thirty per cent of airmail letters went by boat, and thirty-four per cent of the Christmas airmailings in December went by boat. I wonder if the minister would be able to state the amount of additional revenue paid by the public on the difference between airmail transported by boat and the ordinary postage rate. I should think it would amount to quite a considerable sum of money.

Mr. MULOCK: I know the hon. member will appreciate that at that time of year flying conditions are sometimes very difficult—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I realize that.

Mr. MULOCK: —and the planes just cannot go, and airmailings have to wait till the planes can fly. As I stated at the time, a very large accumulation was built up, but it was cleared as quickly as possible. The amount was abnormal and we ran into bad flying weather. The system is greatly improved. But during that time, if I remember correctly, every airgraph message was sent by air; none was sent by surface. I do not think any airgraph message has ever been sent by surface, and perhaps we are the only country in the world which can say that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Perhaps it was as a result of this that you had the public switch to airgraph. You sent out advices to the public to switch completely to airgraph as a result of this.

Mr. MULOCK: We can send so many more messages by airgraph than by any other form of transit. Even the armed forces air letter takes up more space than the airgraph. I might say that we are bringing out a new form, which is airgraph, but which resembles the armed forces air letter. It is on paper so that, if necessary, it can be turned into an airgraph to avoid delays. If it can be handled as air letter in its ordinary form, it will go that way. I think the hon. member for Souris will understand the importance of that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes.

Mr. MULOCK: We might be able to get sufficient transport from here to Great Britain, but from Britain to some other theatre of war we might be able to move it only in small amounts as far as space and weight are concerned, and that we might have to turn letters into airgraphs to get them the rest of the way.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): From that point on.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I think we realize that the minister's department have done the very best they can, and probably under the circumstances they have given splendid service. On the other hand there was a great deal of dissatisfaction and justification for this dissatisfaction. I should like some further information from the minister.

As I understand it, there are three classes of airmail communications; one is the regular thirty-cent airmail letter; another is the ten-cent airmail letter, and the other is the airgraph letter. Would the minister inform the committee for how long a period at any time such letters were held by the Post Office Department for aeroplane service, and in what instances and to what extent such letters were transferred from aeroplanes to be conveyed by ships. There must be some more explanation than the minister has given as to why airgraph and airmail letters, the ten-cent letters, are delayed for at least ten weeks. I should like to know whether in every case such letters went by aeroplane, or were assembled and then went by ordinary mail by steamer.

Mr. MULOCK: I am glad the hon. member has brought that up. As I mentioned once before in the house, while we try to do everything we can to expedite mail coming from Great Britain to Canada, we are not responsible; the British government are. We cannot handle that mail until it arrives at a Canadian port.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member is not talking about that movement.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am referring to mail from Canadians to overseas forces.

Mr. MULOCK: I will give that information. At present, as far as armed forces' air letters are concerned, there is virtually a daily service by air. That is in effect now, subject of course to weather conditions.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am asking what is the longest period air mail letters were held by the postal department before they were provided with conveyance overseas to our forces and whether such letters were finally conveyed by steamer or by aeroplane.

Mr. MULOCK: Is the hon. member referring to the ordinary air letter, the thirty-cent letter, or armed forces letters?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The ten-cent armed forces letters. There was notification with respect to the thirty-cent letter, but there was none with respect to the ten-cent letter.

Mr. MULOCK: That is correct. I have not that return. The hon. member for Souris asked for that information and a return was brought down. He referred to that a few moments ago. We gave the amount at that time when he inquired as to what delay there had been in connection with airgraph and armed forces letters, the percentage and so on. It was given then by months and amounts. That information is available on the records.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Will the minister answer this direct question? In any instance was such mail, after having been held up by the Post Office Department, conveyed by steamer rather than by aeroplane?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes; there was a small amount. It is shown in that return. It could not be handled. It would have held up other air letters for a long time on account of the accumulation that had been built up owing to bad flying weather. The planes were not moving in sufficient numbers to handle it, and for days the letters were delayed.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): How long were such letters delayed and finally conveyed by aeroplane?

Mr. MULOCK: My officials advise me that the longest period was ten days.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I repeat what I have already said. Many people in the armed services did not get their mail for at least ten weeks, and there have also been periods when residents in Canada did not get mail that was sent by those in the armed services in Great Britain for ten weeks or perhaps longer.

Mr. MULOCK: As regards the latter part of the hon. member's statement, I have also dealt with that. The Postmaster General of Great Britain advised me of their difficulty and of the accumulation they had on hand. I discussed the whole matter with him last September when I was in England. Their difficulty was this. A substantial number of planes were going to Britain, but there were not nearly as many coming back this way. Space had to be reserved on the planes to bring back aircrew to ferry more planes back across the Atlantic, and space was not available to the extent that the Postmaster General of Great Britain required.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that is east to west.

Mr. MULOCK: The hon. member mentioned east to west also.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister's statement is that there was better service from Canada to Great Britain than from Great Britain to Canada. I should like to get some further information. What service does the department now undertake to give in connection with different classes of air mail: thirty cents, ten cents and airgraph mail? In what time does the department undertake to deliver such communications in Great Britain? I do not say distribute them in Great Britain, but when does it undertake to deliver them in Great Britain, as far as our service is concerned, so that they may be distributed there?

Mr. MULOCK: I presume the hon. member is still talking about air.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Yes; the three classes of air mail communications.

Mr. MULOCK: As far as airgraph is concerned, weather permitting, it goes daily. It is a comparatively new service. At the beginning, for west-bound airgraphs, we did not have the processing equipment in Canada, and our messages had to be sent to the United States to be processed. They were processed with the American messages in the proportion the number of ours bore to the number of the American messages coming in. If they had a large mail, our processing might be held up for some days, and there was also the additional time of sending it down and getting it back. I am glad to say that now they are processed in Toronto. We managed to get the service performed there, and that has speeded things up considerably, not only for the messages being turned into airgraph on this side but for those processed on receipt from Great Britain or other parts of the world. As regards armed forces air letters, they are going every day subject to weather conditions. As regards the thirty-cent letters, they are going five times monthly.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister said a short time ago that an improved service was being put into effect by his department. Is he prepared to give further information in that regard?

Mr. MULOCK: Perhaps the hon. member is referring to the statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply when he announced the new service being operated by a department of government. We are making use of that.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The postal service uses that?

Mr. MULOCK: We use that. At least, we have used it westbound. As a matter of fact, we have brought ordinary mail from the troops back on that. We will speed matters up as far as we can. I cannot say we will handle all mail coming back that way, but we will handle as much as there is space available for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that Trans-Canada?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes, Trans-Canada.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Department generally, $39,950.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the necessity of this?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): In a sense this is to pay for the added staff of the bureau of translations. There is one justification for its being here, namely, that the translators are used by the war departments, but that is not the reason for it. The reason is that all this has happened since the estimates were made up last fall, and consequently next year it will not appear in the war estimates at all, but will be a civil estimate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is really a civil estimate, but you tucked it in here in order to get it through?

Mr. McLARTY: That is correct.

Item agreed to.

Commission re revocation of naturalization certificates, $5,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am a little curious about this item.

Mr. McLARTY: I think I can explain it. During the war a great many allegations are made against citizens of Canada who had their origin in enemy countries, to the effect that they are disloyal to the king or disaffected or something else of that kind. Under the Naturalization Act they have the right to have their case heard by a commission before it is acted upon by the Secretary of State. The commissioners under this are Mr. Justice Robson of the court of appeal of Manitoba, Mr. Lee Kelley of Ottawa and Mr. Aldous Aylen, also of Ottawa. They serve entirely without remuneration. Last year the vote was $10,000; this year it has been cut in half, to $5,000, and the only purpose of the vote is to cover expenses. For example, a great many of these allegations come from various internment camps and other parts of Canada from which the applicant could not possibly come to Ottawa. Consequently, as occasion requires and as the number of cases becomes large enough, the commission visits them at those points and then makes recommendations to the Secretary of State.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is just for travelling expenses, then?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am wondering how many naturalization certificates have been revoked, if the minister has that information.

Mr. McLARTY: Not many under this provision. There have been quite a few revocations of naturalization papers since the beginning of the war, and one reason for that is that the United States made a complete survey of the citizenship of all its citizens. When it found, for instance, that a person had been naturalized in Canada and had not taken out his papers in the United States, though he might have lived there for quite a number of years, they would notify the naturalization branch to that effect. We would write the person concerned asking if he was prepared to have his naturalization certificate cancelled. I think in all cases it was upon notice, and in the majority of cases they did not even reply. In other cases they said they wished to have their certificates cancelled. I do not think there have been many cancellations of naturalization by this commission, and of course this vote is purely a contingency vote, depending upon the number of applications that are made.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask by whom the commissioners are appointed?

Mr. McLARTY: By the Secretary of State.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are they yearly appointments?

Mr. McLARTY: I speak from memory, but my impression is that they are.

Mr. MacNICOL: At how much per day, or what salary and what allowances?

Mr. McLARTY: There is no salary and no per diem; it is merely their actual out-of-pocket expenses, which consist largely of travelling expenses.

Mr. MacNICOL: It certainly is pleasant to hear that in war time somebody is willing to work for the country for nothing.

Mr. HAZEN: Can the minister say how many cases were heard last year?

Mr. McLARTY: I know there were no cases at all heard outside the city of Ottawa, and I do not think there were many cases heard even in Ottawa. Of course as I say this is a contingency vote. The only cases heard would be those of people notified that their naturalization was to be cancelled on such and such an allegation. Then they would be notified that if they wished to do so, they could elect to have a hearing before the commission in connection with their cases. I am sorry I cannot advise the hon. member as to the number. When the vote in the civil estimates is under consideration I shall be glad to give him that information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When that vote comes up, would the minister be good enough to make a statement on the naturalization position, that is with respect to applications for naturalization. I remember inquiring of the previous Secretary of State, and I believe we should know just what that position is..

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. COLDWELL: At the same time would the minister make some statement on the position of persons who leave this country, go to the United States and there take out their first papers. The oath that is taken in the United States when a foreigner takes out his papers is that he definitely foreswears allegiance to His Majesty King George VI, his heirs and successors. That would seem to be a foreswearing of Canadian citizenship, and I am not sure just what the position is. I have been asked on occasion what is the position of such a person, and perhaps the Secretary of State can tell me.

Mr. McLARTY: I think I might answer that question immediately. In that case the United States authorities advise the naturalization branch of what has occurred. We proceed to notify the person concerned that unless he has some reason to allege against it—and it is hard to imagine what it could be—we will revoke his naturalization certificate.

Mr. COLDWELL: You do that?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the meantime he is a man without citizenship.

Mr. McLARTY: He has made his application in the United States.

Mr. MacNICOL: But he does not lose his citizenship here until he completes the papers which are required by the country in which he takes them out.

Mr. McLARTY: Quite true.

Item agreed to.

Civil service commission—
Supply of personnel for war services, $597,443.

Mr. MacNICOL: The appointments made by the civil service commission under this item will not be permanent appointments, I presume, or for more than the duration of the war?

Mr. McLARTY: Some of them may turn out to be permanent, but I think they are appointments to war departments and consequently, for the time being at least, they would be temporary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understood that all these people were notified that their appointments were purely temporary.

Mr. McLARTY: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And they could only take their chance of becoming permanent after the war, as occasion might arise. This is a large sum of money, and perhaps the minister could give us a little more explanation about it.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be glad to give the break-down. In the matter of salaries, $405,460 is provided. The amount voted last year, including the supplementary estimates, was $300,000, so that in that regard there is an increase of $105,360. In connection with war duties supplements there is a net increase of $300. For the cost of living bonus, $59,263 is provided as against $40,000 last year, or an increase of $19,263. For printing and stationery, this year $30,000 as against $35,000 last year, or a reduction of $5,000. For the cost of holding examinations, $22,000 this year as against $20,000 last year, an increase of $2,000. For sundries and miscellaneous, $21,000 and for travelling expenses $41,000, a total of $62,000 as against $65,300 last year, or a reduction of $3,300. Contribution to unemployment insurance fund, $5,520, which is a net increase over last year. Minimum railway fares, $13,000 this year as against $16,700 last year, or a reduction of $3,700. The total of all increases is $132,443 and of all decreases $12,000, or a net increase of $120,443. I might just supplement that with a little information which I think the committee might find interesting. To show the tremendous development the war has entailed, may I quote the figures supplied to me. In 1938 the commission made 6,406 appointments to the public service; in 1941, they made 31,061 and in 1942, 48,000. I am advised that that figure of 48,000 is running on a pretty even keel at the present time. I give them to show the tremendous growth.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): About 4,000 new appointments a month.

Mr. McLARTY: Correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is gross, of course. What would be the net increase?

Mr. McLARTY: I cannot advise the committee as to what the net is, but I shall get the figure when the civil estimates are before the committee. But it does not matter whether it is gross or net, as far as the work to be done is concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many employees were in the civil service commission branch before the war, and what is the total to-day?

Mr. McLARTY: I shall have to give that information too, when the civil estimates are being considered.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there a quorum in the committee?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes, a big quorum.

Mr. MacNICOL: No; I count only nineteen.

The CHAIRMAN: I find there is just a quorum present.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many government members in the house?

Mr. COLDWELL: Six.

Mr. McLARTY: Not many in quantity, but the quality is high.

Mr. CRERAR: I think there is a quorum.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There will not be one, if the minister leaves the chamber.

Mr. MacNICOL: I can count only nineteen.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A lot of the cream is here, anyway.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Mines and geology branch—to provide for development work to be undertaken by Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited, in connection with tarsands located in the province of Alberta, $150,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister explain the item?

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this vote cover an amount spent this year, in addition to what was spent last year?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): This covers an expenditure that was initiated in the Department of Munitions and Supply, I believe on the recommendation of the oil controller, something over a year ago. Under the arrangements made, an agreement was entered into with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company to do certain work in connection with drilling, and for the purpose of determining the extent of the tar sands and their quality. It also covered certain expenses in connection with laboratory work carried on to ascertain the best methods of treatment of sands, or the bitumen recovered from the sands. The total amount paid under the agreement up to March 31 last year was $1,234.15. This amount is to reimburse the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company for the expenditures it incurred under that agreement. It will be payable during the current year. That is why the item appears.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sorry this work was not undertaken by the tried, trained and experienced men of the Department of Mines and Resources. They were more competent than any other engineers in Canada to do this work of investigating tar sands. They have made investigations along these lines for many years. I repeat that the minister's own engineers were best qualified. They have been doing it, and I am as sure as I am standing here they would have done it for less than the amount mentioned in the item. I cannot understand why outside engineers were sent to do what the minister's own engineers were best qualified to do.

Mr. CRERAR: The work was undertaken at cost by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company; that is, they did not plan to make a profit out of it. I suppose one might say it was a contribution from their experience and knowledge.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of what?

Mr. CRERAR: A knowledge which, apparently the hon. member for Davenport questions. At any rate that was the idea when the arrangement was made with the company. May I add that this arrangement was not made by the Department of Mines and Resources, but rather by the Department of Munitions and Supply on the recommendation of the oil controller. The work of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company has terminated.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is now ended?

Mr. CRERAR: In effect, it is terminated. The current work is not being conducted by that company. This estimate is required to pay the company for the work which to a great extent was done last year, but which was not paid for by the end of the fiscal year. It is also for the completion of some tests being made under their supervision.

Mr. COLDWELL: By whom is the current work being done?

Mr. CRERAR: That was all set out in a document tabled in the house some weeks ago. It is being carried out under an agreement between the Department of Mines and Resources and a company known as the Abasand company at Waterways in northern Alberta. The terms of the agreement are set out in the return tabled in the house. The work will really be under the direction of the Department of Mines and Resources from the time of the agreement, on. The agreement contains provisions not only for the operation of the work, but also for the liquidation of the agreement when it is terminated. If I recall correctly, termination is to be six months after the declaration by the government that a state of war with the enemy has ceased.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would not want either the minister or the committee to infer from anything I said that I have not the highest opinion of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company, because I have. They are a fine company, and they have splendid engineers. But I was perfectly satisfied with the departmental engineers. They have been in the field for some thirty years and have rendered excellent service. They made a thorough investigation for the department, if the department pamphlets are correct, and I believe they are. I have been over this area on several occasions and I know what the departmental engineers have done. They were competent and did splendid work, and I feel that this work should have been done by the mines and resources department. This is no reflection upon the Consolidated, but I feel that the department should have done this work because their men knew where to go and just what to do. They had the equipment, which the Consolidated did not have when they started. I presume that is why this account is so high. I doubt if the department would have spent $150,000; they might have spent up to $50,000 or more. It all goes to show that there was not the cooperation there should have been between these two departments of government.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

The munitions department sent in outside engineers, and I feel that they should have asked the Department of Mines and Resources to send in their engineers. They were thoroughly qualified; in fact there are none better qualified in North America to carry on tar sand investigations. It is too bad that the munitions department did not ask the Department of Mines and Resources to send its men out there to make inquiry.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could the minister give us any idea as to how this work is progressing? The agreement has been in effect for several months, and I should like to know what success the company is having.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister answers, I should like to make one observation. The wording of this item does not correspond with the ministers' statement. He said that this was to cover work that had been done already, but the item reads that it is to provide for development work to be undertaken. The two statements do not quit jibe. Is this a new undertaking, or is it a continuation of a previous undertaking?

Mr. CRERAR: The point raised by my hon. friend is quite pertinent, but the facts are as I have stated. The estimate may not be as well worded as it might have been.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have to take it as it is.

Mr. CRERAR: A great deal of expense was incurred last year which this vote is to cover. There are also continuing expenditures to be made for experimental work. The Consolidated Mining and Smelting company arranged for this work with two concerns in the United States, one in Chicago and one in Louisiana.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar wanted some particulars as to how the work is progressing. This agreement was entered into a few months ago—I have not the precise date—with the Abasand company which was operating in the Waterways area. Abasand had been conducting operations largely of an experimental nature for some years past, but as their work progressed they found that changes were necessary in their plant and equipment. An arrangement was entered into between the government and the Abasand company which gave the government complete control of the operation. In fact the department takes over temporarily the assets of the Abasand company.

It is estimated that about $300,000 will be required to remodel the buildings and plant and equipment of the Abasand company. There will be drilling operations to be carried on as well as experimental work in the plant when it is rebuilt or revamped. Work will also have to be carried on to determine the best method of treating the bitumen when it is recovered from the sands. There is a great deal of experimental work to be done in this regard. It is definitely known now that excellent road-building material can be secured from this bitumen. It is known also that certain heavy oils can be secured, but I am informed that there is a great deal of testing work to be carried on in order that gasoline of sufficiently high quality to be of commercial value may be extracted from the sands. This work will be carried out under the agreement.

The agreement provides that within six months after the declaration of peace or the ending of a state of war the government shall have the option of buying out any equity that Abasand may still have in the plant. If there are differences of opinion provision is made that these shall be referred to the exchequer court. On the other hand, if the government does not care to exercise this option the property will be returned to the Abasand company, which will have to reimburse the government, not only for the moneys advanced to cover operating expense but also for any losses that have been incurred, with a rate of interest of 3½ per cent on the money so advanced. I think those are the essential points of the agreement.

Mr. MacNICOL: The next item of $500,000 would cover the revamping of the plant?

Mr. CRERAR: That has nothing to do with the Abasand agreement.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is no item here that pertains to the revamping of the plant.

Mr. CRERAR: It was impossible to determine any definite amount, because the whole thing is really of an experimental nature. The funds required for the carrying out of the Abasand agreement will be available from the general war appropriation vote.

Mr. MacNICOL: This vote has nothing to do with that?

Mr. CRERAR: Not with the Abasand agreement.

Mr. MacNICOL: Abasand in the agreement merely means the government. The government is operating the plant under certain gentlemen who were associated with Canadian Oils Limited.

Mr. CRERAR: It is entirely under the control of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any private capital in it at all? Is there any equity to be bought?

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who has control of that?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not definite knowledge as to where the capital originated on which Abasand operates.

Mr. COLDWELL: How much private capital is there in the Abasand company?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know. They state they have spent $900,000 on development. We do not reimburse them for that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): According to the minister, if it turns out to be successful, they have a chance to recoup that $900,000 or whatever it is.

Mr. CRERAR: Not all of it, because part of it will be operating losses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You do not undertake to provide anything for that?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the matter was up previously, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, speaking about the work that had been done by the Abasand company, mentioned the hydrogenation system for the extraction of the oil from the bitumen. It is quite easy to get the bitumen out, but the difficulty has been to get the oil out of the bitumen. The money that is to be spent by Abasand is not to be spent on a hydrogenation system, because that would cost a great deal of money. I am in favour of that system. If the next vote has nothing to do with that plant, I have nothing more to say at the moment.

Item agreed to.

Mines and geology branch—

Investigations of petroliferous deposits and of potential petroliferous areas in Canada, $500,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: In the early part of the session I placed questions on the order paper with regard to oil deposits at Fort Norman and the pipeline constructed from there to White Horse. The minister asked me to take the questions off the order paper because it was not in the public interest to answer them. But within a very short time afterwards I found information in certain United States papers which answered many of the questions I had asked, especially those related to the pipeline. I believe that since then certain documents have been tabled in this house giving details with respect to the pipeline and the arrangements made for its return to Canada after the war. But we have never had a statement from the minister with respect to the oil deposits at Fort Norman, informing us how much money has been spent there, whether the dominion government or the Imperial Oil company is drilling wells, or what companies are interested in that field. From information we have received from other sources it is apparent that this field may develop into one of the larger oil deposits in Canada, if not on the north American continent. The minister should make a full statement on the situation, as to who is making the development and under what conditions, and how much is being spent by the government and how much by private companies.

Mr. CRERAR: With regard to the questions which my hon. friend put on the order paper a few months ago, as I recall it now, we were not in a position to give the information asked for at that time as a result of an understanding with the United States authorities.

Mr. WRIGHT: They published the information themselves within a few days.

Mr. CRERAR: Not a few days, but the information was given out at Washington some time later. It was their option to give out or withhold the information.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has Washington the authority to issue statements with respect to our own resources. It is a serious state of affairs if that is so. It seems to me that we should have the authority.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is getting the thing all twisted and distorted.

Mr. WRIGHT: I have not got it twisted at all.

Mr. CRERAR: There was an understanding reached with the United States government concerning the Canol project, with respect to which a statement was made by the Prime Minister the other day. Certain drilling operations were carried on there for which the United States government, I understand, although I have no definite assurance on this, provided the capital. This whole development was to ensure a supply of oil for defence purposes, and since the United States government were carrying on this project we respected their wishes that publicity should not be given to it. That is why my hon. friend's question could not be answered at the time he asked it. This federal government has not spent one dollar in development work at Fort Norman. There is not a dollar in these estimates or in the estimates of last year for that development. What we did do was to give the Imperial Oil company permits to drill for oil over a certain area. The Imperial Oil company already had leases at Fort Norman, obtained many years ago.

Mr. MacNICOL: And had wells operating, too.

Mr. CRERAR: And already had a few wells there producing oil, as well as a small refinery. There was a certain amount of fuel oil produced, and I believe some gasoline, at that refinery. I happen to know that the mining operations at Great Bear lake, where radium is produced, were carried on by means of power from diesel engines run by fuel secured from these Fort Norman wells. It was known there was oil there. The United States wished to make certain of an additional supply of oil and gasoline for war purposes and their geologists and engineers examined the territory. I do not know just what arrangements they made with Imperial Oil company. That was no particular concern of ours. We gave the Imperial Oil company some additional territory under permits. They had an area under lease there for their old development, and additional wells are being drilled. I understand that enough oil is being secured to justify the building of the pipeline. Let me repeat, that these permits were given for the purpose of finding sufficient oil to pipe to White Horse and from White Horse on to the defensive works in Alaska.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will the minister table information on the areas and the concessions that have been given to the Imperial Oil company?

Mr. CRERAR: We have drafted a set of regulations, which have been tabled, covering the granting of permits for oil in the Northwest Territories. The permits have been issued to the company going in there to drill. We have not encouraged; we have discouraged what might be called purely speculative interests; that is, people who might think there was oil up in that country and would reserve a certain area, pay a ground rental on it for a year, and then try to sell it off to someone else who would develop it. We have discouraged that.

Mr. WRIGHT: And given it to one company.

Mr. CRERAR: We have given permits to responsible people who would go in there and develop it. There is no use in giving a permit, for instance, to some person who would go in and use it for speculative purposes. After all, the government were not prepared to do the drilling there. There is not much prospect, I can assure my hon. friend, of developing oil at Fort Norman for uses other than those involved in this increased development for defence purposes, which is costing a considerable amount of money per gallon of oil when it is delivered, and for such operations as there are at Bear lake. It is not an economic proposition at the present time to develop an oil well at Fort Norman, 1,400 miles north of Edmonton. How would you get the oil to Edmonton, for instance, where it could be used? When you had got it out, transportation would cost so much that it could not for a second compete with oil from other sources. Unquestionably this development was stimulated by the state of war which existed with Japan and the need of getting oil supplies to the Alaskan frontier. That is the whole reason for this increased development. It is quite true that the government might have said, "No; because it is the Imperial Oil company we will not have anything to do with it," and we would have blocked the war effort, and that would have been that. I do not think there could be any justification for the dominion government going into an oil development 1,400 miles north of Edmonton, that might cost hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars, for uses in ordinary times.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister has stated that the dominion has turned over these deposits to one company to develop. None of us is quite naive enough to believe that this one company are in there for their health; that they are not getting anything out of these deposits; that they are simply developing it for war purposes without any chance of ever making anything out of it. They are certainly getting their share out of it, or they would not have developed it, and they are given a monopoly as far as this development is concerned. Whether it is economic or not depends on how much oil is there. In the United States oil is being transported great distances, from Oklahoma, near the gulf, right up to the northern states. It depends on the quantity of oil that is in the field, and if reports we hear are correct this may be a very important field. I certainly do not think the government are doing what is right in giving the company a complete monopoly of that field.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend, of course, is quite entitled to his view; there is no doubt about that. As a matter of fact, as a purely commercial proposition you would not get one oil company in ten to look at that field. I venture to say that the Imperial Oil Company have spent more money there by a long margin than they have recovered, or will recover for a good many years. That is for the simple reason that, as I stated a moment ago, it is not feasible commercially to take oil even in the quantities they have, at Fort Norman, 1,400 miles north of Edmonton, to the places where it can be used. The United States government in respect of its interest in this development asked that the permits be granted to the Imperial Oil company. Under the permits, when the war is over, we have the right to have half the area they have prospected and developed come back to the government, including half the wells and half the equipment. When my hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation come into office, as they hope to do some day, they may find this all ready for operation by then.

Mr. WRIGHT: They will find it tied up pretty well by one particular company. The minister's statement hardly holds water. In one breath he tells us he has to give it to one company to prevent speculators going in—

Mr. CRERAR: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. WRIGHT: Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. CRERAR: I said that the Imperial Oil company were in there years ago; that they had developed certain works at Fort Norman, and that when this idea developed for the supply of oil and gasoline for Alaskan defence, the United States government asked that the Imperial Oil, who had had experience in the field, be given some additional territory, and that additional territory was given under terms which I mentioned a moment ago, that when the war is over, the government secures, without cost one-half the development which has taken place. What my hon. friend was speaking about a moment ago, as to permits being issued, did not refer, as I understood it, to the Imperial Oil company. We could have to-day numerous speculative interests, who probably are not oil developers at all, to go in and, if we gave them a permit, preempt a certain territory in the hope that later on they could turn it over at a profit to someone who would develop it. Now we have effectively prevented that sort of thing.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps I can set the matter straight. I mentioned the subject a short time ago. I have not any brief for the Imperial Oil, but I commend them for what they have done in that part of the country.

They went in there quite a few years ago, and got nothing out of it commensurate with what they invested in it. They deserve credit for drilling wells at Fort Norman. I believe that up to the time that war broke out they had had six wells more or less that perhaps could produce an average of, I understand, 300 barrels a day, at any rate not a large number. The wells did not operate for a few years, so that the company received no return outside of what oil they have sold to the radium mine on Great Bear lake and to the mines at Yellowknife on Great Slave lake. Their oil barges came up the Mackenzie river and sailed over Great Slave lake to Yellowknife and to other mining centres on Great Slave lake. Also they sent oil up the Bear river which they had to move around the rapids of Bear river, and then on Great Bear lake to the radium mines at the east end of that lake. After the United States became embroiled in the war with Japan they wished to have oil for their war activities in Alaska. It was then they considered running a pipeline from Fort Norman over to White Horse. Other wells had been drilled by or for them, I believe, and I assume that what the minister refers to as to the United States investing in that part of the country is what they have invested in the wells they have drilled since they went there and the pipeline. From what the minister said I understand that the United States government or someone representing it has taken over for the time being the wells which were formely operated by and for the Imperial Oil company. Am I right?

Mr. CRERAR: No; that is not correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the Imperial Oil also producing oil?

Mr. CRERAR: The United States government made an arrangement or reached an understanding with the Imperial Oil company—

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what I said.

Mr. CRERAR: —to carry on drilling operations. That is according to the information that has been supplied me. What the nature of that arrangement is, how the United States government assisted the Imperial Oil company financially, or the terms upon which they assisted them, I do not know. That is a matter between the United States government and the company.

Mr. MacNICOL: The United States government takes over all the oil produced at present at Fort Norman.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. CRERAR: They buy oil from the operating company. The United States has not acquired title to a single oil well.

Mr. MacNICOL: They take the oil produced.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to obtain more information about the item. How much of this money is spent in Saskatchewan and how much in Alberta, and where is the money spent in Saskatchewan?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand there is only one project that is under consideration in western Saskatchewan. There is some expenditure being incurred at Wainwright in Alberta. This is to cover the investigation of petroliferous areas in Canada; that is, possible oil areas.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Generally?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: I want to know the areas that are being investigated in Saskatchewan. How much is expended in that particular province? How much is earmarked for it?

Mr. CRERAR: I regret that I cannot give my hon. friend the precise location of that area. There is only one area in the southwestern part of the province.

Mr. BENCE: Is no work being done in northwestern Saskatchewan in the direction of Lloydminster?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is it proposed to drill for oil at the town of Peace River or down the river from Peace River?

Mr. CRERAR: We have quite a number of geological parties—seventeen. We have ten parties prospecting for oil in Alberta, largely in the northern part of the province and also some over the border in British Columbia.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was referring to the oil site at or near the town of Peace River. The minister is undoubtedly familiar with the oil formations, or evidences of oil, on the Peace river, right at the town of Peace River and down the river some twenty-five miles. Last summer I went down the river about twenty-five miles.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot tell my hon. friend the precise places where these geological parties are making surveys, but I should think it likely that the area he speaks of will come under their work.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are survey parties? This vote just covers survey parties?

Mr. CRERAR: It covers more than that.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it cover the actual drilling of wells in any area?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. BENCE: Can the minister give me that information as to how much of the money is being spent or is earmarked for Saskatchewan?

Mr. CRERAR: There is an estimate of $10,000, but it may be more or less than that. We get a vote of $500,000. There is great urgency for oil, and consequently we have arranged for as many survey parties to go out for oil as we can get. It is impossible when you get your estimate to say just how much money you will spend here and how much you will spend there.

Mr. COLDWELL: You have $10,000 earmarked?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. Whatever is necessary for the party in Saskatchewan will be available out of this vote.

Mr. BENCE: I am interested to see that enough money is available to ensure that the work is done completely in that province.

Mr. CRERAR: I can give my hon. friend the assurance that this party will have all the support financially that is necessary for it to carry on work throughout the summer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it just one party going out in Saskatchewan?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand that is correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister was asked if work was being done in southwestern Saskatchewan. Are there not some leases to be worked in southeastern Saskatchewan?

Mr. CRERAR: No. I do not think we have had any warrant for carrying on work there. After all, the department is guided by its trained men, its geologists, as to where the money will be spent.

Mr. FAIR. Can the minister give information with regard to the development at Wainwright?

Mr. CRERAR: I should have said a moment ago that work is being carried on on the seismograph principle. I hope no hon. member will ask me to explain it, because I do not know anything about it; but it is, I am informed, a scientific method of prospecting by means that are somewhat new, and some of that seismographic work is being carried on in the Wainwright field.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is that by dynamite and recording machines?

Mr. CRERAR: They drill holes in the ground and set off a blast of dynamite, and that is recorded on machines. Those who are qualified and experienced in the work can determine from the records made on the machines, or at least they can make a pretty shrewd guess, whether or not there is any oil underneath.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe they can find out what kind of formation it is geologically.

Mr. CRERAR: Probably.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many parties does the minister propose to send out this year on this particular work?

Mr. CRERAR: There is a total of seventeen parties prospecting, geological parties looking for oil, and there are seven topographical parties in addition.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Are they made up of parties that are going out under the auspices of the Imperial Oil? There are parties going out drilling, sent by Imperial Oil. Is a part of this going to assist them?

Mr. CRERAR: Not a cent of it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is that all done on their own?

Mr. CRERAR: That is all done on their own.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I understood that a portion of this grant was being used for that purpose.

Mr. CRERAR: There is nothing in this vote for purposes of that kind.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are we helping Imperial Oil? Are we paying anything towards the Imperial Oil's exploration?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What amount of assistance is given to Imperial Oil for testing the structures around the country?

Mr. CRERAR: We are not giving them any assistance.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): None at all?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. BENCE: What is the extent of the collaboration between the minister's department and the minister of natural resources of Saskatchewan? Is there any unity of purpose in the work of the minister's department and the work of that particular provincial department in connection with the explorations for which this money is being provided?

Mr. CRERAR: As far as the officials of the Department of Mines and Resources are concerned, they are carrying on discussions from time to time with their opposites in the provincial field. Let me repeat that these parties are sent into certain areas on the recommendation of the experienced geologists of the department.

Mr. BENCE: Of the minister's department.

Mr. CRERAR: Of our department. Doubtless they have obtained all the information that might be available in the provincial department; it would be their business to have all the information they could possibly get.

Mr. BENCE: Does the province of Saskatchewan contribute in any way to the sort of work the minister's department is doing in this regard?

Mr. CRERAR: No; we bear the entire expense of the geological parties.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do I understand that this is the first time the federal government have resorted to the use of the seismograph in testing the oil potentialities of the various areas? I believe that for years past they have examined potential structures from a purely geological point of view, but now I understand that as a result of the present need the activities of this particular branch are being enlarged, and it is actually testing by the use of the most recent and best recognized system of seismographic test. Is that correct?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; this is the first time the seismograph has been used at federal government expense; I think I am correct in that. Our own officers do not do this work; we make agreements with experienced seismograph companies who do certain work under contract, in certain areas that we designate.

Mr. COLDWELL: What has Doctor Hume been using for the last several years in some of these surveys? Has he not been using this method?

Mr. CRERAR: He has been examining structures, but not by seismographic methods. It may be that the seismographic methods will attain a higher state of perfection than has been the case in the past. After all, these methods are tried out and tested thoroughly, and improvements made, and it may well be that the federal government, this government or some other government in the future, will consider it a wise expenditure to get the necessary equipment to carry on this seismographic work at government expense, but we do not have the experienced operators at this time. We recognized that there were possibilities in this method, and arrangements were made with experienced seismograph companies who, I understand, have been largely employed in the United States.

Mr. COLDWELL: The arrangements were made with seismograph companies, does the minister say?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are these instruments costly? I do not think they are very expensive, relatively, considering the use one gets out of them. In fact I think our own department has been experimenting with them for a number of years, and I find it difficult to understand—

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think my hon. friend is correctly informed there. I understand there are seismographic companies, principally in the United States, though no doubt they operate in other parts of the world as well, who have the instruments and trained personnel necessary for carrying on the work. At any rate our work is being carried on under an agreement with an experienced operator.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the agreement? Do you pay them so much per month or so much per year or so much per day?

Mr. CRERAR: We pay them so much a week or so much a day; at the moment I do not know the precise terms of the agreement.

Mr. MacNICOL: You send them to an area and they take their equipment and carry on their investigation, and when they report they are paid for the length of time they have taken, are they not?

Mr. HAZEN: Does this item include the cost of the investigation recently made into the shale deposits in Albert county?

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct.

Mr. HAZEN: Could the minister tell us what was the cost of that investigation, who made it and how long it took?

Mr. CRERAR: We provided $50,000 for that purpose, of which $42,611 was spent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the province of New Brunswick contribute anything?

Mr. CRERAR: Twenty-five per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was that work done under the direction of Doctor S. C. Ells?

Mr. CRERAR: It was under the direction of another departmental geologist.

Mr. EDWARDS: I presume the information gained through this seismograph work is made available to the public as soon as it is obtained, and I should like the minister to tell us how that is done. I wish to know also whether there is any general policy in regard to doing seismograph work in areas already leased to development companies. I have in mind one area west of Rocky Mountain House, for instance, where there is a very large potential field. One well has been drilled there at tremendous expense, costing something over $500,000. I should assume that it would be desirable to do more intensive work in examining the potentialities of that area, but I can see also that such work would be to the benefit of a company which is already in there with a very large leasehold. The work being done by the department is desirable and commendable, but I was wondering whether the department was confining its exploratory work to areas not already leased, or whether it was giving some assistance to companies possessing areas not yet proven up.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe this is the first year the federal government has spent money on the seismograph method, though I understand that certain oil companies which have areas in Alberta under permit or licence have used the method, which is a common practice in the United States. However, we are not spending any money now in areas under the control of private companies. I am informed that our tests by the seismograph method will be confined almost wholly, if not entirely, to Wainwright national park, which is still under the control of the federal government. The survey may be carried outside the boundaries, but it is a new thing. The officers of the department think it has possibilities, and my judgment is that it will probably pay the government to incorporate permanently in its geological survey work the seismographic method.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is money being spent in eastern Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: There have been investigations in New Brunswick, and some in Nova Scotia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Anything in the Gaspé district?

Mr. CRERAR: No, nothing in the Gaspé district.

Mr. FAIR: Is any work being done in the Lloydminster or Vermilion oil fields?

Mr. CRERAR: Some work is being done in the Vermilion district.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. COLDWELL: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. CRERAR: Did the item not pass?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, July 16, 1943

The house met at eleven o'clock.

THE WAR

MESSAGE OF PRIME MINISTER CHURCHILL AND PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT TO THE PEOPLE OF ITALY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this morning Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt issued a proclamation addressed to the people of Italy, setting forth that the sole hope for Italy's survival lies in honourable capitulation. The following is the text of the proclamation:

1. At this moment the combined armed forces of the United States, Great Britain and Canada, under the command of General Eisenhower and his deputy, General Alexander, are carrying the war deep into the territory of your country. This is the direct consequence of the shameful leadership to which you have been subjected by Mussolini and his fascist regime.

2. Mussolini carried you into this war as the satellite of a brutal destroyer of peoples and liberties.

3. Mussolini plunged you into a war which he thought Hitler had already won. In spite of Italy's great vulnerability to attack by air and sea, your fascist leaders sent your sons, your ships, your air forces, to distant battlefields to aid Germany in her attempt to conquer England, Russia and the world.

4. This association with the designs of nazi-controlled Germany was unworthy of Italy's ancient traditions of freedom and culture—traditions to which the peoples of America and Great Britain owe so much.

5. Your soldiers have fought not in the interests of Italy but for nazi Germany. They have fought courageously, but they have been betrayed and abandoned by the Germans on the Russian front and on every battlefield in Africa from El Alemein to Cape Bon.

6. To-day Germany's hope for world conquest have been blasted on all fronts. The skies over Italy are dominated by the vast air armadas of the United States and Great Britain. Italy's sea coasts are threatened by the greatest accumulation of British and allied sea power ever concentrated in the Mediterranean.

7. The forces now opposed to you are pledged to destroy the power of nazi Germany—power which has ruthlessly been used to inflict slavery, destruction and death on all those who refuse to recognize the Germans as the master race.

8. The sole hope for Italy's survival lies in honourable capitulation to the overwhelming power of the military forces of the united nations.

9. If you continue to tolerate the fascist regime which serves the evil power of the nazis, you must suffer the consequences of your own choice. We take no satisfaction in invading Italian soil and bringing the tragic devastation of war home to the Italian people. But we are determined to destroy the false leaders and their doctrines which have brought Italy to her present position.

10. Every moment that you resist the combined forces of the united nations—every drop of blood that you sacrifice—can serve only one purpose; to give the fascist and nazi leaders a little more time to escape from the inevitable consequences of their own crime.

11. All your interests and all your traditions have been betrayed by nazi Germany and your own false and corrupt leaders; it is only by destroying both that a reconstituted Italy can hope to occupy a respected place in the family of European nations.

12. The time has now come for you, Italian people, to consult your own self-respect and your own interests and your own desires for a restoration of national dignity, security and peace. The time has come for you to decide whether Italians shall die for Mussolini and Hitler—or live for Italy and for civilization.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the Prime Minister any information as to the means by which that message is to be conveyed to the people of Italy?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that it was distributed by aircraft, and I have no doubt that it has also been communicated over the radio.

FARMERS' CREDITORS

CONSOLIDATION OF ARRANGEMENT ACT OF 1934 AND AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 132, to facilitate compromises and arrangements between insolvent farmers and their creditors.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the hon. gentleman to explain?

Mr. ILSLEY: As the House of Commons knows, it was announced some time ago that a consolidated Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act would be introduced as soon as the war appropriation bill was passed. This is that bill. I think the statement as to the principles upon which the bill is built and founded had better be postponed until the second reading. In the meantime the bill will be circulated.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COFFEE

PRESS REPORT AS TO DISCONTINUANCE OF RATIONING IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Finance. An Associated Press dispatch from Washington under dateline of July 15 predicts that coffee rationing in the United States will come to an end on or about August 11. Will the minister be good enough to indicate to the house if this will mean any change so far as coffee rationing in Canada is concerned?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Anticipating that this question would be asked, I asked the wartime prices and trade board for information on the subject. The wartime prices and trade board has no official advice of any proposed change in the United States coffee rationing and has only seen the newspaper reference. The situation in Canada regarding coffee rationing is quite different from that in the United States, because in normal times Canadians use approximately equal amounts of tea and coffee, while in the United States only a comparatively small amount of tea is used. It was possible to ration coffee alone in the United States, while in Canada the two had to go together.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is no tea rationing in the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that; it is separate, at any rate. Coffee is dealt with alone in the United States.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought the minister was indicating that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure about it. The supply position of both tea and coffee is dependent upon shipping; in the case of tea, from India, and in the case of coffee, from South America. Until the stock position of both commodities is assured and future supplies are reasonably certain, it is not possible to increase the present ration allowances.

CENSORSHIP

NEW DIRECTIVE WITH RESPECT TO RADIO BROADCASTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National War Services. I understand that a new censorship directive has been issued, I think yesterday, placing on radio stations the responsibility for keeping off the air any statements that might injure Canada's war effort. I would be glad to have the minister inform the house as to the details of this new directive and to lay a copy of it on the table of the house.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): The leader of the opposition was kind enough to send me an intimation that he would put this question, but unfortunately I got it only just before coming into the house. May I say at this time —I shall go into the question in detail by to-morrow—that on June 28 a new directive was issued by censorship, after the matter had been considered for a number of weeks. The purpose of the new directive was to clarify and simplify the matter of censorship in regard to broadcasting. This is one of the matters mentioned in a motion moved by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). Colonel Biggar is now back in town. I spoke to him yesterday and I hope to have some details from him very quickly when I shall be in a position to reply to the hon. member for Peterborough West.

ONTARIO ELECTION

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "THE GRENADE" OF JULY 10, 1943

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of National Defence to an article which appeared in an official army newspaper called The Grenade, the issue of July 10, 1943. The editorial page is headed, "Official organ of units and training centres, Petawawa military camp". The editorial to which I should like to refer is headed "The Forthcoming Election", and one paragraph reads:

> Your choice is between a government headed by Colonel George Drew, Conservative, or by Honourable Harry Nixon, Liberal. Both are well known and the decision may be a close one. It is up to each of us to see that that decision is truly representative of the current trend of opinion among men in the armed services.

There are three parties contending in the Ontario election. In my opinion it is incorrect and political propaganda to say that only two are contending, and I draw this to the attention of the minister.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I shall find out the authenticity and the authorship of that paper. I must say that personally I do not know of it, but I would assume that it is published by the units themselves.

WARTIME INFORMATION BOARD

DISSEMINATION OF NEWS OF LANDING IN SICILY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (Parliamentary Assistant to the President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the leader of the opposition asked, first, for a clarification of a statement I made on Tuesday and, second, in what way the wartime information board played a part in the news of the landing in Sicily. His question referred to newspaper editorials, presumably those in the Ottawa Journal, the Montreal Gazette and the Globe and Mail, which said or implied that credit had been claimed for the wartime information board for the fine stories of Ross Munro. Such a claim would have been preposterous, and such an interpretation was not justified by the record. The actual words referred to by the leader of the opposition were:

> The events of the last few days indicate how useful has been the cooperation of the press relations officers, the press associations, the correspondents of newspapers overseas, with the wartime information board at various points in the background, in seeing that the people of this continent got early news of the landing in Sicily, and also that the statements which were made have afterwards received early and favourable notice in the United States both in the press and over the radio.

What the statement did was to name specifically the other agencies which had to do with this early and favourable notice, and then to add that the wartime information board had done useful work in the background. The limited nature of this assertion was emphasized in two further references, and the general relationship of the board to the press was made plain in numerous references in the speeches of the Prime Minister and myself.

The statement quoted speaks of the "early news of the landing in Sicily". This referred particularly to the first news of Canadian participation, given in the United States war department communique, and to the Prime Minister's statement, both of which were issued in the first hour of Saturday morning. The dispatches from correspondents with the troops only came more than twenty-four hours later. The facts that word of the Canadians taking part came with the first announcement of the invasion, and that the Prime Minister's statement was issued immediately afterwards, were of prime importance.

The role that the wartime information board had in these early announcements can now be better understood in the light of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday.

The board was in continuous consultation with other officers of the government in endeavouring to see that the first announcement of an invasion included mention of Canadians. It also made arrangements to ensure that the Prime Minister's statement immediately afterwards was quickly and effectively distributed, particularly in the United States. Hon. members will appreciate the importance of the quick distribution of the first statement of Canadian participation from a Canadian source. Had the news about Canadian participation been delayed for a day, the facts would never fully have caught up with the first impression of the world that only British and American troops were involved and Canadian stories would not have been as well received.

In the statement nothing whatever was said to detract from the work in Sicily of Mr. Ross Munro or other correspondents, or of the Canadian Press itself. Mr. Munro's despatches were superb. They have done much to tell the Canadian people vividly about their troops in action, for which I did not for a moment claim credit for the wartime information board. In this case the board had to do with the early announcements and the quick and effective distribution of the first statement about Canadian participation emanating from Canada.

The extreme importance of the work of the war correspondents stands out and is fully recognized. In the field the three services maintain public relations officers who were formerly trained newspapermen themselves. The British and American armies also maintain public relations services. Their full-time duty is to assist war correspondents in obtaining and transmitting material and facilitating their work in every conceivable way. The public relations officers of the armed forces, under Mr. J. W. G. Clark, work in very close cooperation with the wartime information board. Working together they supplied background material on the Canadian army to supplement news from the front and gain credit for the people to whom it should be given, namely, the Canadian soldiers who are at this moment in battle with the enemy.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is still not very clear to me how the wartime information board had anything to do with respect to the news which reached the Prime Minister and was then disseminated, because it would come through the ordinary press channels. The Prime Minister then gave his statement to the public. Therefore it is not clear to me how the board can still claim to have taken any significant part with respect to what happened last Friday night or last Saturday.

Mr. CLAXTON: My hon. friend must appreciate that the full story cannot be told or the usefulness of a good deal of the board's work might disappear. I could tell my hon. friend this, that even on Thursday officers of the board were in almost continuous consultation with officers of other departments considering the situation and working towards the end that the Prime Minister achieved. On Friday the office in Washington was kept continually manned with ticker services from various directions, and possibly the first word to reach Ottawa of the American communiques from Algiers and the Pentagon building were sent in from Washington. Then the statement of the Prime Minister was sent back to Washington and was given very early and favourable attention in the American press.

DOUKHOBORS

POWERS OF POLICE TO ARREST FOR DISREGARDING NOTICE OF ALTERNATIVE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask the Minister of Justice if he has delivered a ruling on the question whether a police officer has authority to direct a Doukhobor bodily to report if such Doukhobor has ignored his notice for alternative service, or is it necessary for a court order to be first obtained?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I will make inquiries and find out if any opinion has been given by the Department of Justice, and if one has been given whether it is in such form that it can be tabled here.

TRANSFER OF LANDS

MEASURE TO CONFIRM TRANSFER TO ONTARIO AND QUEBEC EFFECTED BY ORDER IN COUNCIL

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to confirm the transfer of certain lands to Ontario and Quebec effected by order in council of the 26th day of January, 1943.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not sure whether the minister has given any explanation of the object of this resolution, or any statement of the principle of the bill to be founded upon it. I think this is the appropriate time for a short statement from the minister.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, I think before making a statement I should table a bill of the legislature of Ontario assented to on February 19, 1943, and a bill of the legislature of Quebec assented to on May 20, 1943, both dealing with the ratification of an agreement made between these two provinces and dated January 2, 1943.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister also table the order in council referred to in the resolution?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The order in council has already been tabled, and copies of it are printed as annexes to the bills of the two provincial legislatures. For the convenience of members of the committee who may be interested I have secured additional copies of these bills and I will now make them available to hon. members, a certain number of them having been made available to me by the clerk of the Ontario legislature and likewise by the clerk of the Quebec legislature.

To state very shortly what is involved, the resolution refers to water powers on the Ottawa river. The Ottawa river, as all hon. members know, is interprovincial. There have been developments on that river but there are still available water powers susceptible of developing as much as 900,000 horse-power. Those powers could not be developed without an agreement between the provinces. The Ottawa river is regarded as a navigable river, and the extent of the private rights in the Ottawa river depends, of course, on the respective laws of Ontario on the one side and of Quebec on the other. The Ontario government was desirous of developing additional water powers on the upper reaches of the Ottawa river, and the governments of the two provinces came to the conclusion that it would be more practical if they made an exchange of their respective rights so that one province would have the whole of the water powers at one point and the other province the whole of the water powers at the other point. They could then set about developing their respective properties in the manner which would suit the requirements and convenience of the people of their respective provinces.

Mr. GRAYDON: There are five power sites involved?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are five power sites involved, and the arrangement they arrived at was that Carillon, which is the one lowest down, Rocher-Fendu, which is the third, and one-half of Paquette, would go to the province of Quebec, and that Chenaux, which is between Carillon and Rocher-Fendu, would go to Ontario, and that the two upper sites, Des Joachims and Cave and Fourneaux, also go to Ontario.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The effect of that would be to alter somewhat the interprovincial boundaries?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, not to alter the interprovincial boundaries but to alter the property rights vested in the crown in the right of each respective province. The arrangements do not provide for permanent grants; they are very long-term leases.

Mr. GRAYDON: That, I think, raises one of the principal points in connection with the proposed legislation. There are those who believe that this is a device, though I do not use the word in an offensive way, by which the boundaries of two provinces are being changed, not by an exchange of deed of land, but nevertheless on an extremely long-term lease which actually has the same effect in the end as an exchange of properties, and by virtue of that it is an alteration in the actual boundary lines between the provinces. The point involved, which the minister will see very quickly, is that to set such a precedent goes to the root of the British North America Act; for I think it is generally understood that provinces by agreement cannot alter the boundary lines set by the British North America Act, which is a statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom. Whether or not the government has succeeded by virtue of a device with respect to a long-term lease in avoiding the constitutional point which would be raised were deeds to be given and the boundary line thereby changed, constitutes one of the main constitutional legal points which this legislation raises. I should like the Minister of Justice to give his views about it, because it is in the minds of many people at the moment.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think the discussion of the point requires any very long debate. The bill before this house would not have been necessary at all had there not been some proprietary rights of the dominion in connection with one or other or several of these sites. The agreement between the provinces purports to vest on the one hand in the Quebec streams commission and on the other hand in the Ontario hydro certain leasehold rights. The Ontario hydro can come into Quebec and acquire leasehold rights without affecting in any way the territorial boundaries of Quebec, and the Quebec streams commission can likewise acquire in Ontario leasehold rights without that having any effect upon the boundaries of the two provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are both corporations.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are both corporations acting and holding for the crown in the respective areas of the two provinces. But that would no more alter the boundaries of the provinces than if the Ontario hydro were acquiring a farm to raise produce to feed the employees attending one of its undertakings. The arrangement between these two provinces would have been made without any reference to the federal government at all had it not been that the government of the united Canadas prior to confederation had made some improvements to assist in navigation and in the floating of logs, and by virtue of the distribution of proprietary rights at confederation retained such improvements as had been made for that purpose. Hon. members will recall that a few years ago there was a reference to the supreme court to determine which government would own water powers which might be improved or increased or made available by the existence of these federal improvements, and the court, following opinions which had been expressed by the privy council, was very guarded in its language and it is not easy to find any definite pronouncement in that regard in the judgment which was rendered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was that a reference?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was a reference to the supreme court.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Therefore it was rather ineffective.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There was no concrete case involved. The court, in a learned discussion of the old law, refrained from making a pronouncement which would have any concrete effect on any specific water-power.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My recollection is that the effect of the judgment was practically nil.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think it might be put in this way: the dominion asserted, through counsel representing it before the supreme court, that it had proprietary rights in water powers, and the court refused to accept the view put forward by the dominion government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One other question. As I appreciate the situation on these interprovincial streams, the minister stated that the river is declared to be a navigable river; therefore we have a substantial interest under that question of navigation. What is the position with respect to that in this matter? Is there any interference or anything of the kind?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. The agreements all provide that all these plans will have to be submitted for examination and approval under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Nothing can be done without the detailed plans being submitted and the usual undertakings being made. The plans will not be approved, of course, if they provide for any interference contrary to public interest with navigation at the time they are submitted. There is also an undertaking on the part of those who submit plans for approval that if in the future conditions should arise where public interest would require modifications to be made, the owner of the works will have to make them.

This legislation does not envisage the Quebec streams commission on the one hand and the Ontario hydro on the other as anything more than companies, corporations, and the reason for the legislation is that the Dominion has certain proprietary rights, not the same on the two sides. Under Quebec laws, as hon. members know, along navigable waters the riparian rights stop at the high water mark, whilst I understand that under the common law it is at least contended that even in navigable streams they may extend out to mid-stream.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. It depends somewhat on the original grants.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The federal government did own some portion of the shores along these various stretches of river which would be affected by the development of the water powers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is at Carillon.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At Carillon and also above Des Joachims; and the developments could not prudently be made without acquiring these shore rights.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words, the federal government has a proprietary interest in part of these power sites.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Possibly in a small part of the Carillon power site; probably not in any other of the power sites, though it may have shore property.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Flowage rights.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. The companies or corporation, or commissions, whatever they may be, to make the development would have to acquire these rights from individuals by mutual arrangement or by expropriation proceedings. They could not expropriate against the dominion government, the federal crown, and the arrangement that was made was that the federal government would cede to them such riparian rights, flowage rights, or whatever it may be, as would be necessary for the execution of development work. The view was taken that the people of Canada whether inhabitants of one province or another, were Canadians and that if this was something that constituted a valuable natural resource it was in the interests of the Canadian people that it be developed and used when there was need for the power that could be produced, and that it would not be proper for the dominion government to take an attitude that would prevent the use of these water powers in the interests of the public generally when the proper time arrived for development.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words, we could not adopt a dog-in-the-manger attitude—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and say, "You cannot appropriate against us"; that would retard development. When the minister uses the word "cede" does he mean give, or are they to pay?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; they are transferred. They are not properties of considerable value outside of their, shall I say nuisance value in connection with the development of water power.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have they no strategic value?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No strategic value for purposes of defence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I mean, for the purpose of water power. I do not know the situation; I am just asking.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member, as a lawyer advising a corporation, would say, "Well now, don't attempt to go ahead until you get that; it is something without which you would not have the kind of title I would recommend for a bond issue."

Mr. POTTIER: It might be valuable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is valuable.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: How that kind of value can be measured it is very difficult to determine, as was shown in the famous Cedar Rapids case, which was for years before the courts and went twice to the privy council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The value is the value to the owner, not to the taker.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The value to the owner is something very difficult to measure, but under these conditions we thought it would not be proper for the dominion government to be very particular about that. At the time this was done the provision of additional power was looked upon as of considerable interest to the war effort of the country; the Ontario hydro was prepared to make an investment which it was estimated might run into $40,000,000 to provide power, and perhaps the few hundreds or thousands of dollars that might have been established as value to the owner of these rights was not looked upon as a consideration that should stand in the way at all; after all the federal and provincial purses were all purses of the people of Canada, so that it was not very important to have any exact figure assessed. What was arranged was that in order to facilitate this exchange between the two provinces, and to allow each to have control of a certain portion of the sites, the federal government should abandon such rights as it might have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The question of joint development was not considered, or not agreed upon?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was found that because of the difference in the situation between the two provinces the interests were not similar. Quebec at the present time does not consider that it is in its interests to develop any more water powers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): After Arvida or Shipshaw you have quite a surplus.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: After the war we shall have quite a surplus there, and there is always development on the St. Lawrence. That is looked upon as a possibility, and if that were done it would provide such an enormous block of power that it would not be of practical advantage to have these other sites developed now.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): And there is the location of the power.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Ontario did feel that it would suit the conveniences of its public and of its commission to develop these upper sites of the Ottawa immediately.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask a question in reference to the development of the Ottawa river? The federal government apparently has nothing to do with the development of electricity, but it has to do with everything pertaining to navigation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps not in this generation, but in some other generation in the future, I have no doubt the Ottawa river will be a great commercial highway. In the construction of these dams that are to be erected by the Ontario hydro commission, does the federal government intend at this time to see to it that some provision is made for future locks in these dams, or is any consideration being given to the future levels of the river so far as navigation is concerned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: All I can say is that these questions have not yet arisen, and they will arise under the Navigable Waters Protection Act when the plans are drawn and submitted for approval.

Mr. MacNICOL: They would have to be approved?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They will have to be approved by the federal government before they can be carried out. They have to submit detailed plans of what is to be constructed in a navigable stream; they cannot place any obstruction in a navigable stream without prior approval of the project by the governor in council, and the governor in council can stipulate all such facilities as appear to be necessary.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not know at the moment, perhaps the minister knows, whether in the construction of the Chats dam up the Ottawa river any consideration is being given to future navigation facilities at that dam.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. I think the only thing that is provided there is log slides for the floating of timber. I do not think any provision has been made there for a lock that would lift a boat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Were any private interests involved in the upper Ottawa, and how are they being dealt with?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know that there were private interests involved in the upper Ottawa. There was a private interest at Carillon, for which express provision is being made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Protection is given to private rights?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, yes; full protection is given to private rights, and if there are any private rights in the upper regions they will have to be acquired by the Ontario hydro.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 133, to confirm the transfer of certain lands to Ontario and Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a second time?

Mr. GRAYDON: We have not seen the bill yet, and of course we cannot give second reading to a bill we have not seen.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the house.

[Later:]

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): When the bill to confirm the transfer of certain lands to Ontario and Quebec was read the first time this morning, it was ordered to be read a second time at the next sitting, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) suggested that after it had been distributed and hon. members had had an opportunity of seeing it, it might be taken up later in the day. If that is agreeable I would move:

That the order made this day for the second reading of Bill No. 133, an act to confirm the transfer of certain lands to Ontario and Quebec, at the next sitting, be discharged, and that the bill be now read a second time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Schedule agreed to.

Section 1 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. GRAYDON: The preamble is incomplete and should not be passed as it is. The bill as presented to the committee left in blank line 10 where "20th" and "May" should be inserted. In order that the committee's procedure may be perfectly regular, an amendment should be made to the preamble.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was my intention that the bill as distributed should be amended by inserting in the blanks in line 10 the words "20th" and "May".

Mr. MICHAUD: I move accordingly.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say, Mr. Chairman, that I think we must regularize this. I dislike rising from time to time on petty technicalities, but the amendment as proposed means absolutely nothing so far as the preamble is concerned. What the minister must do, I think, is first of all indicate the words which are to be inserted and the words immediately preceding the insertion in each case, and the words immediately following, otherwise the amendment does not mean anything.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move:

That the preamble of Bill No. 133, an act to confirm the transfer of certain lands to Ontario and Quebec, be amended by inserting on page 1, line 10, after the words "assented to on the" the word "20th" and after the words "day of" the word "May".

Amendment agreed to.

Preamble as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO TAKING OF AFFIDAVITS ABROAD

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 74, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I read this bill some weeks ago, and if I remember correctly its effect is to extend the principle of the secondary evidence rule, in a degree, in regard to certain oaths taken abroad and that sort of thing. Is this a practice that has existed in the provinces? I understand it has been adopted in the province of Quebec, but have any other provinces adopted it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I had inquiries made in that regard. In the province of Quebec it is article 1220 of the civil code. In British Columbia it is chapter 90 of the revised statutes of 1936, the Evidence Act. In Alberta it is chapter 87 of the revised statutes of 1922, the Evidence Act. In Saskatchewan it is chapter 67 of the revised statutes of 1940, the Witnesses and Evidence Act. In Manitoba it is chapter 65 of the revised statutes of 1940, the Evidence Act. In Ontario it is chapter 119 of the revised statutes of 1937, the Evidence Act. In Nova Scotia it is chapter 225 of the revised statutes of 1923, the Witnesses and Evidence Act. In New Brunswick it is chapter 167 of the revised statutes of 1927, the Registry Act. In Prince Edward Island it is chapter 2 of the statutes of 1939, the Affidavits Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is an extension of the principle—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I submit to the hon. member that it is not an extension of the principle; it is an addition to the number of officers abroad who would be entitled to take the affidavits that could be used. It is to enable the representatives of Canada abroad to take these affidavits with the same effect as though they were taken before the British ambassador.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask two questions arising out of that explanation. In the first place I think this is the first bill I have seen for a long time with no explanatory note attached to it, and when the bill was introduced I wondered at the omission of the customary explanatory note, which is a very important matter to hon. members generally in dealing with legislation. Obviously for some considerable time the situation which this bill purports to rectify must have been well known to the government. What actually has been done in foreign countries with respect to the taking of oaths, affidavits, declarations and so on? Was all this work done by one or two principal officials in those countries, and is it the intention of this bill to increase the number who will be allowed to exercise that power and authority as envisaged by the legislation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. Prior to this the affidavits in practice were taken by the officials for whom this bill makes provision; but there is this difference. The provisions of the provincial statutes only apply to matters governed by provincial legislation. It sometimes happens that in the same case the Canada Evidence Act might be applicable to one portion of the litigation while provincial legislation would be applicable to another portion. This is merely to add to the Canada Evidence Act a provision in connection with the same officials who come under the various provincial acts, so that no question may arise on an affidavit as to whether the provincial act or the Canada Evidence Act applies. Under this an affidavit will be in such form that it will be immaterial whether the provincial act or the Canada Evidence Act applies to its validity.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister did not answer the other question I raised.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This motion is for second reading. Perhaps these questions could be asked in committee. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. NEILL: No, Mr. Speaker; I rise to a point of order. I have a painful recollection of this point in connection with the lack of an explanatory note being raised against me some years ago, by the predecessor of the present minister and others. At that time my bill was thrown out because it lacked this explanatory note, and it was far more important than this bill is.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. NEILL: No, Mr. Speaker. I rose to a point of order, and my point is that the bill cannot be introduced while it lacks an explanatory note. At that time the government had eight bills on the order paper, all of which had to be withdrawn and reintroduced. The principle involved at that time was that what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander; I am sure hon. members will recall the situation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is for second reading of the bill.

Mr. NEILL: I was told definitely that the motion for second reading was exactly the point at which I should have taken this objection. I had let the matter go a little beyond that, and for that reason my objection was ruled out. However, my bill was ruled out of order on the motion for second reading because it lacked an explanatory note. At that time the government had eight bills on the order paper which also lacked explanatory notes. My bill was of such a character that no explanation was required; for it simply struck out a section and reinserted it, and it was not possible to put in any explanation. However, my bill was thrown out on that ground. The next day, or a few days later, I raised an objection to one of the government bills and the reply was that I should have made my objection on the motion for second reading, so that my protest was thrown out. But I noticed that the government withdrew the eight bills and then reintroduced them. I do not want to press the point unduly, or unnecessarily delay the house, but the principle should be acknowledged that if it is good on one occasion it is good on another. It is definitely stated that these bills must have an explanation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Would the hon. member be so kind as to direct my attention to the rule which so states?

Mr. NEILL: I am sorry to say I do not carry all the rules in my head. This occurred in 1938; I believe the bill I introduced was No. 11, making certain amendments in connection with Japanese immigration. The Prime Minister raised a point of order, that my bill lacked an explanatory note. I gave the explanation I have just given here, that no explanation was required, because the whole thing was so obvious; a whole section was struck out and another section inserted, and the explanation was self-evident. However, the Speaker of the day ruled that it was out of order, so that my bill fell by the wayside, though I later introduced it with the required amendment. A few days later I raised the same objection on some government measures, and I was ruled out of order, because I had not taken the point of order on second reading. Thereafter the government withdrew their eight bills and introduced them, with the lacking explanation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the hon. member has waited for an opportunity ever since.

Mr. NEILL: I have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps it can be waived on this occasion, so long as the majesty of the law has been vindicated by its assertion.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The rules relating to the preparation of bills are stated at pages 356 and 357 of Doctor Beauchesne's book as follows:

> The rules of the House of Commons as to the preparation and printing of bills, adopted 14th June, 1923, must be followed by all departments. They are as follows:
> 1. In the preparation of bills amending existing enactments the amendments shall not ordinarily be made by clauses which add or leave out words or substitute words for others, but by clauses which reenact the section, subsection or other minor division, as it is amended.
> 2. In the text of the bill, on the left hand page, new matter shall be indicated by such typographical means as may best suit the varying circumstances of each case, such as brackets, italics, underlining, asterisks, etc. Opposite each clause, on the right hand page, the enactment amended thereby, or so much thereof as is essential, shall be printed with the proposed changes to be made therein similarly indicated.
> 3. When a clause repeals an existing section, subsection or other minor division of a section, that section, subsection or division, or so much thereof as is essential, shall be printed opposite the clause.
> 4. A memorandum by the draftsman explaining briefly the reasons for each clause, shall be appended to the bill, or distributed therewith. Whenever practicable the memorandum shall be printed on the right hand page of the bill, in paragraphs opposite the clauses referred to and numbered correspondingly.

Mr. NEILL: That is the rule.

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

5. The above rules shall also as far as practicable apply to the reprinting of bills.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is merely a rule of convenience.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is, no doubt, the fourth paragraph the hon. member has in mind, where it states:

A memorandum by the draftsman explaining briefly the reasons for each clause, shall be appended to the bill, or distributed therewith.

It is clearly a rule of convenience. In this instance I have endeavoured to give explanations to the house. It does not change any existing text. It is new matter, and self-explanatory. Any explanation would simply be saying the same thing in other words. The text itself enumerates those before whom affidavits may be made. I believe there can be no other explanation than that.

Mr. STIRLING: There could not on the other occasion, either.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I was not here at that time, and I should not like to take personal responsibility for the objections which may have been taken then.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Speaking to the point of order, I think the rule may perhaps be read as mandatory. But, after all, it is merely a rule of convenience, so that hon. members may be able to learn what a bill is about. I believe the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) was strictly right in the position he took. But, having vindicated his position, perhaps he would waive his objection, so that we can get on with the bill.

Mr. REID: On the point of order, I believe the house will gladly waive the printing of the explanatory notes. But the principle should be laid down that there cannot be two rulings. A ruling was definitely given against the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and, Mr. Speaker, if your ruling is to the effect that the present procedure is the proper one I suggest you are setting up a new precedent. In such event your ruling would be in contradiction of the ruling given a few years ago. I raise this question of principle because it seems to me that at times it is like asking advice from officers of the crown. You can get from officers of the crown any advice the government wants. I have spoken on the point of order to support the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think I can let the hon. member's statement go unchallenged by the Department of Justice, if he purports to include the Department of Justice in the expression "officers of the crown".

Mr. REID: I wish to make no reflection upon the Minister of Justice, or any minister of justice. But I believe it is generally understood at least by laymen—and I shall leave the lawyers out of it; sometimes laymen see more clearly in matters of justice or matters of law—that when the government want information from the crown they generally get the information they ask for. I shall leave it at that.

Mr. NEILL: May I express my willingness to waive the point of order I have taken, because, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury has said, justice has been vindicated by my having drawn attention to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I point out to the member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) that I had not ruled upon the point of order. All I had done was to say that we were dealing with the motion for second reading. Then the point of order was raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and he was entirely correct in raising it. Having waived it, the question now before the house is: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Application of part III.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, it is some time since I looked at the Canada Evidence Act, but I would gather that as it stands to-day we have no provision in it such as is contained under the caption "Part III" in the bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): No; the Canada Evidence Act stops at section 46.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And does not cover this particular precedure.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, not at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that the variety of classes of officers mentioned in paragraph (a) is exceedingly wide. It covers ambassadors, envoys, ministers, charges d'affaires, counsellors, secretaries, attaches, and some others. I cannot conceive that an attache would be a proper officer to take these affidavits. He might be a sailor or an airman, for instance. Then it refers to consuls general, consuls, vice-consuls and pro-consuls and consular agents. I should think they would be very properly included, because they take affidavits under other statutes. I believe acting consuls general might be included in the same category. I cannot however understand why attaches should be included. Would it be wise to include them?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Attaches in legations are high ranking officers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But have they any legal training. A consul general is a man who is always dealing with legal documents, but a military attache, for instance, would not be in that category at all. That is the only objection I can see to it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The only function they have to perform is to hand the Bible or the New Testament to the person.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have to sign the jurat. I do not know whether they are as technical in the courts of Quebec as they are in my province, but any alteration in the jurat which is not properly attested to is inadmissible as evidence. I am not going to press the point. My purpose has been served by bringing this matter to the attention of the minister but I do think he should delete the word "attaches". In line 27 of paragraph (c) appear the words, "His Majesty's dominions outside of Canada." Does the word "dominions" include crown colonies, or is it used in its technical sense and meant to refer only to dominions such as Canada or Australia? I would assume that it is all-inclusive.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is what is intended.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does the minister think of my objection to the word "attaches"?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have no personal experience in the administration of these offices, but the attaches are quite high ranking officials. This is for the convenience of those who must have affidavits taken. If they had to wait until the ranking member of the office was free, it would take more time. If there is more than one person who can do the thing that is required, it will be more convenient for the person who requires it done. I have no other reason for urging that it remain. They are officers of equal rank to the first, second or third secretaries, and it would be more convenient if all those who are entitled to be left in charge could receive affidavits. If anyone were left out it would be proper that the chief of the office should not leave the office in his care because it would be inconvenient if he were not able to do one of the things that might be required to be done.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

ACTIONS BY OR AGAINST THE CROWN—STATUS OF MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Exchequer Court Act to provide that for the purpose of determining liability in any action or other proceeding by or against His Majesty, a person who was at any time since the twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-eight, a member of the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty in right of Canada shall be deemed to have been at such time a servant of the crown.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister state what the scope of the bill will be?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The scope of the bill will be only as set out in the resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This resolution arises out of a decision of the exchequer court in the King v. McArthur which reaffirmed the principle that a member of the naval, military or air forces of his majesty, being an enlisted man, was not a servant of the crown in the sense of the Exchequer Court Act. I think this legislation is a measure of justice, but it does not go quite far enough. I have no quarrel on legal grounds with the decision in the King v. McArthur, because I think it is based on the English decisions, and I believe also there have been one or two Canadian decisions. My point is that the right to sue the crown is still being limited to actions in the exchequer court.

I suggest that the day has arrived in Canada at least, if not elsewhere, when consideration —I shall limit it to that—should be given to providing for the subject the right to sue the crown in any provincial court. I recall the reasons why this has been limited heretofore to the exchequer court. One of them is that it prevents fictitious or small claims being raised against the crown through the necessity of having to go to the exchequer court and having to obtain a fiat before the crown can be sued. We are living in a changing world. To-day the crown is engaged in big business. To-day the crown is spending in its activities, including of course the armed forces, over half the national income. Never in the history of the nation has the crown been so much engaged in business as it is to-day, and not in the business of government alone. The crown is engaged in commercial business through various channels and organizations and agencies and commissions. I think the time has come when the right should be granted to the subject of his majesty, resident in Canada, to sue the crown in any court of competent jurisdiction based upon the domicile or residence of the claimant. Vice versa, the crown should have the right if it so wishes to sue the subject in any of these courts. I put this on the ground of changing operations of our national economy. There was a time when you could not sue the crown at all, and there are certain provinces which still deny to the subject the right to sue the crown. I think in my own province, unless the law has been altered within recent months, there is no opportunity of suing the government of New Brunswick on any ground, contractual or in tort, and that is very often a denial of justice. What does a man have to do? He has to go with his hat in his hand to the government of the day in the province of New Brunswick and get redress ex gratia, not as a matter of right. That is an intolerable situation. As my hon. friend the member for Rosedale remarks, it is a relic of the feudal system. We have in Canada a better system. We have a petition of right. But even there a man is not always certain that he will be able to get his case before an independent court. He has to run the gauntlet, we will say, of the Minister of Justice. I am bound to say that I have never known of a case, and I have had a good many cases in days gone by considering the limited practice I had, where, if one were able to make out a prima facie case, a fiat was refused. But there has been such delay, at times, and expense. You have to employ an agent in Ottawa and brief him with the facts if there is any dispute about the matter, and it is a costly system, a cumbersome system.

I am making a plea here and now for a change in the system so as to put the crown which now is developing into such a big business manager in the same category as the subject. The days of the feudal system are over; the days when the crown can be said to do no wrong are long since past. The crown is often through its servants guilty of malfeasance and of non-feasance, and why should it not be subject to the jurisdiction of the provincial courts? Surely it cannot be that the crown would not get justice in the provincial courts, especially in this day when trial by jury of civil actions in the provincial courts has been very largely abolished by statute. I hold quite strong views on this subject, and I am stating them now in the hope that those charged with authority will give some consideration to them. I should like to have an expression of opinion from the membership of this house, especially those who belong to the legal profession.

I have in mind the case of a widow whose husband was killed through the allegedly gross negligence of an army truck driver. I have been endeavouring to obtain through certain departments of the government an explanation of the facts, what the inquiry disclosed, in order to permit the widow to get redress. I am not going into the details of the case, but if that woman has a cause of action, what redress will she have? I do not think she can ever bring action in the exchequer court. She has to depend on the good will, shall we say, of the authorities here in Ottawa if she can show that she has suffered the loss of her support by reason of the negligence of a servant of the crown. If this bill passes she has to go to the Exchequer Court of Canada to assert her rights. I suggest to the membership of this house that in this enlightened day and generation that is not good enough. She should be allowed to sue in the courts of her own province and have the case tried at the most convenient point in the county in which she lives. Anybody who has had anything to do with trials in the exchequer court knows that in the provinces the court sits once a year—oftener, I assume, if there is any quantity of litigation, but as a rule in New Brunswick it sits once a year, and if you start your action after the last session of court you have to wait a year for it to be tried. I could go on and argue this at great length and support the argument with cogent reasons, but I do not propose to delay the committee further. I hope that consideration will be given to the matter now, because it is important. It is a matter of justice to the subjects of His Majesty in Canada who may have a cause of action against the crown.

I think this bill is a matter of justice—that is, justice in the abstract. I am going to support the bill. The matter is already covered I think by order in council, but this will make it part of the permanent substantive law of the country and it can be repealed only by act of parliament. I am sorry there are not more members of the legal profession here to-day, because I should like to hear their views. As for me, I have no manner of doubt at all, having regard to the multiplicity of activities in which the crown is engaged to-day outside of war altogether but due to the war, that the crown should be made liable for actions in tort for negligence on the part of its servants and in actions ex contractu and be answerable in a court of competent jurisdiction in the province in which the complainant resides.

Mr. HAZEN: I think the Minister of Justice is to be commended for introducing this bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act. When it becomes law, claims against the crown for death or injury to the person or for damages to property caused by the negligence of a member of the armed forces can be adjudicated by our courts.

There are one or two other amendments which in my opinion should be made to the Exchequer Court Act. One is the amendment which has been suggested by the hon. member for York-Sunbury. The crown can go into any of the provinces of the dominion and start an action against a citizen in any of our courts, and there is no reason why the citizens of any province should not be in a similar position. It seems to me that a citizen of any of our provinces should have the right to commence an action against the crown in any court of the province having jurisdiction in civil actions.

There is one other amendment to the act which I think should be made. The exchequer court was created by an act which came into force on October 30, 1887. Section 19 of that act provides that the court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction to hear and determine certain matters therein set out. Then follow a number of clauses setting forth the nature of the claims that can be adjudicated.

To quote from the judgment of Mr. Justice Newcombe in the case of the Canadian National Railways v. St. John Motor Line Limited (1930), 72, S.C.R., p.488:

> These clauses must be read in the light of the decisions, of which the earlier leading examples are mentioned in the case of Ryder versus The King; and by these and the later authorities it is well established in this court that not only does the Exchequer Court acquire jurisdiction to adjudicate the classes of claims above described, but also that in such cases liability is imposed upon the crown to respond in damages for the negligence of its officers or servants where, in the like circumstances, such a liability would rest upon a subject corporation or individual—

Here are the important words:

> —according to the law of the province in which the claim arose, as that law existed at the time when the Exchequer Court Act began to operate.

The exchequer court began to operate in 1887. Or, to put the matter in other words, when an action is brought for any of the claims enumerated under section 19, "liability was to be determined by the general laws of the several provinces in force at the time such liability was imposed," to quote the words of Mr. Justice, afterwards Chief Justice, Davies, in Armstrong v. the King (1908) 40 Can. S.C.R., 229.

The law of negligence in some of the provinces has been changed in more than one important particular since the year 1887, when the exchequer court came into being. In 1887 in all the provinces in which the common law prevailed a person could not succeed in an action for damages based on negligence if it was proved that he had in any degree contributed to the accident, or perhaps it would be better to say, if he was guilty of contributory negligence. To-day this principle has ceased to be law in several of the provinces. The admiralty rule that in such cases the damages were in proportion to the degree that the parties to the action were at fault has replaced the common law rule.

Again, in 1887 a person was entitled to damages if while being driven as a guest or invitee he suffered injuries through the negligence of his host. In many of the provinces to-day, under our motor vehicles acts, we have what is known as the guest rule, which provides that a person who has accepted an invitation to be driven in an automobile cannot obtain damages for the injuries he sustains through the negligence of the owner of the vehicle or his servant. Neither of these laws is recognized by the Exchequer Court of Canada because they were not in force in 1887.

A resident of one of the provinces where these statutes are in force—let us say New Brunswick—brings an action in the exchequer court against the crown under section 19 of the act. The plaintiff claims he is entitled to damages because the law of the province in which he lives provides that under the state of facts that he can prove he is entitled to damages. The court says no, that does not necessarily follow; it is not what the law is in your province to-day that matters, but what matters is what the law in your province was in 1887.

The law of the province should govern in such cases. It is unsatisfactory for a citizen in any province to learn that the law of his province does not necessarily apply to actions which are brought by him in the exchequer court.

I feel very strongly that the Exchequer Court Act should be amended to provide that the provincial acts, such as the Contributory Negligence Act and the provisions of the motor vehicles acts respecting guests who are driven in cars, should be binding on the exchequer court, and I would ask the minister if he will not give that matter some consideration, discuss it with the officials of his department, and perhaps with the judges of the exchequer court as well.

It is an extraordinary situation, it seems to me, as I have said, that after a person brings an action for negligence in the exchequer court and states that under a certain set of facts he is entitled in his province to damages, the exchequer court says no, you are not entitled to damages because in 1887 the law of your province was not as it is to-day, or, because the law of your province was different. I submit that that is a wholly unsatisfactory state of affairs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Anomalous.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, it is an anomalous state of affairs.

I was going to speak about the matter which the hon. member for York-Sunbury brought up, that the subject should have the right to sue the crown not only in the exchequer court but in any other court of Canada. I think that steps should be taken to have an amendment or amendments made to enable that to be done.

Mr. POTTIER: I wish briefly to support the hon. member for York-Sunbury in his representation to the minister that consideration be given to having the Exchequer Court Act amended or power given to our various provincial courts, according to their jurisdiction, to try actions against the crown. I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury that the time is coming when we shall have to give these conveniences to the Canadian public. We are developing to the extent that we should leave behind this idea of having to come to Ottawa, go through a long procedure, issue a petition of right, and get the consent of the Minister of Justice to start an action. We should be more realistic.

I am glad also that this particular resolution has been brought in by the Minister of Justice. I think it is due and proper.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to endorse the stand taken by the hon. member for York-Sunbury and the hon. member for St. John-Albert. I hope the Minister of Justice will explain fully to the committee why it is that provision has not been made along the lines they suggest. If our courts are to serve the public it is high time that these changes were made; and certainly it is very inconvenient that people living in the distant provinces can sue only in the exchequer court. It hits us particularly hard. I do suggest that provision be made for suing in our provincial courts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to urge upon the minister that the two matters referred to, first, by myself and more particularly the point raised by the hon. member for St. John-Albert are reforms that are long overdue. I am glad the hon. member for St. John-Albert brought up that point. It escaped my attention. I am pleased that he has made such a lucid exposition of the point. It is an anomalous situation that while jurisdiction is given under a statute to entertain an action, the statute creating the jurisdiction is so rigid that it fastens the claimant to the legal position as at the date of the passing of the legislation. It has neither flexibility nor regard to the changing conditions and the changing state of the law. I think the hon. member for St. John-Albert is to be congratulated upon raising that point, and in my opinion it is really of more primary fundamental importance than the point I raised myself. But the two points together should be considered by the minister and he should give effect to them.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): They are both very important.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I cannot speak as a lawyer on this question, and I am not versed in the legal technicalities involved, but as a layman I have received, since coming to Ottawa, considerable correspondence regarding cases such as those referred to by the hon. member for York-Sunbury and others, and I have reason to know that there is a great deal of discontent in the public mind at the present time regarding the inability of the subject to get justice where the crown is involved. The hon. member for York-Sunbury called attention to the case of the King v. McArthur. I have a considerable amount of correspondence on that case from people who knew that man, who knew the circumstances and followed the case through the lengthy trial and read the lengthy report given upon it.

What is the significance of the date mentioned in this bill, June 24, 1938; and, secondly, will this bill provide any means of redress for those whose cases have been thrown out of court between that date, say, and the present time? I am thinking of the McArthur case. Will there be redress under this bill?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As to the first question which the hon. member who has just taken his seat has raised, the date is the date when the Exchequer Court Act was amended to make the crown liable for the negligence of its servants, so as to operate as if at the time the negligence of the crown's servants was accepted by the crown it had included men in the armed forces. As to the second question, this bill does not make provision for any indemnity to the claimant in the McArthur case. In the McArthur case the reason that a member of the armed forces was not looked upon as a servant of the crown was not the only reason for the dismissal of the claim. The judge expressed the opinion that on the facts there was not sufficient evidence of negligence, so that it would be quite improper to deal with that in this bill. If there had been nothing but the legal point involved—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the crown did raise this as a defence in that case.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The crown used to raise as a subsidiary defence that members of the forces were not servants of the crown within the meaning of the act. The learned judge in the McArthur case decided on both grounds, that there was not sufficient evidence of negligence and that in any event a member of the armed forces was not a servant of the crown within the meaning of the act. Had there been only that reason given it would have been proper to say, "If you are going to amend the act we will give the man in connection with whose case the matter arises the benefit of the amendment." But to determine or have determined by parliament, without consideration of the evidence, that that judgment was wrong on the facts would be something I would not care to recommend to the house.

About the other matters, I do thank hon. members for expressing their views upon the point. I will not make any long statement but will merely explain that the reason for the decision, that it is the law of 1887 that has still to be applied by the exchequer court, is of course the logical conclusion from the rule that the crown is not bound by legislation unless expressly mentioned. The crown accepted liability in 1887 for a certain situation as it then existed. No amendments made since can bind the crown unless the crown is specially mentioned and unless it is passed by competent authority. The provinces could not, even if they wanted to, extend their legislation in such a way as to increase the liability of the crown in the right of the dominion government, and the suggestion that is made is that we cancel that additional rule with respect to liability arising out of negligence. The old rule that the crown is not bound unless expressly mentioned is being applied—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It could be done another way.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, it could be done from time to time; we could say: We will accept the situation as it is to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or as it may be in various jurisdictions.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, that would be a contradiction of the rule and future legislation would affect the crown without its being specially mentioned. With respect to these prerogatives, they are sometimes referred to as having come down to us from feudal times, but there are still prerogatives in the crown that cannot be lightly wiped out of the general system of our laws. This matter will be given serious consideration. It would be of course a matter of government policy because it involves increasing the liability, but consideration will be given to the question whether or not it will be proper to accept the legislation as it exists at the present time. We know what that is. We know how far it goes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At least that would bring us up to date.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That would bring us up to date; and I do confess that since 1887 there has been a substantial change in conditions to which it is worth giving careful consideration. On the other point, as to whether or not jurisdiction to extend the claimant's case against the crown should be given to all provincial courts, that will be given further consideration, though I must say that it has been given careful consideration by several departments of government, and the reason the bill as it is was drawn in that way was that it was felt it would not be proper to have a system whereby in one section of the country an individual could recover from the crown, while, if he happens to live in another section of the country he would not recover from the same crown under exactly the same circumstances.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is that? I did not hear that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We want uniformity of liability on the part of the dominion government. The dominion government raises its funds from the whole Canadian people. We think it only proper that the liability of the crown to the subject should be the same no matter where the subject lives, and we feel that if we did not have the exchequer court to apply uniform rules to claims against the crown we might have claims being maintained in one portion of the country on facts with respect to which claims would not be maintained in another part.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words you say there would be different rules of law in different jurisdictions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There would be different rules of law and different degrees of latitude or elasticity in the application of the rules, and that was thought undesirable when dealing with the federal crown. Whether or not that be a good and sufficient reason, that is why no provision was made at this time for extending jurisdiction to the provincial courts. In that connection I may say that the officers of the department will confer or are conferring—I think the matter is already under way—with the exchequer court officers to bring about a scale of costs that will not be out of proportion to what costs would be incurred in provincial jurisdictions. Moreover, a rule has been established that in motor accidents or things of that kind, where there is apt to be a counterclaim, we would not proceed in provincial courts, and thus put the defendant in the position where he could not assert a counterclaim. If we should proceed in a provincial court against a defendant because of a collision, and he should contend that the collision was the fault of our servant and that he should be the one to recover, he cannot urge his claim against us in a provincial court.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under the present system.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under the present system. There were some cases in which that point had arisen, and we decided to withdraw those cases from the provincial courts and institute them in the exchequer court because we consider it only fair that if we are claiming we should make our claim in such form that if the defendant has a counterclaim to assert, he may submit it at the same time and have them both passed upon in one decision.

Mr. GRAYDON: Otherwise he would be very seriously prejudiced.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He would be prejudiced; he would have to meet our claim in the provincial court and then submit a new claim in the exchequer court and go all over the whole thing again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That principle is sound.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is something we are going to avoid. We will not now, in connection with these claims, go to the provincial courts; not because we do not think we would get justice there, but because if we do go there we put the defendant at a disadvantage and in some instances prevent him from asserting his counterclaim.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that could be taken care of by legislation here.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It could be taken care of by legislation, but still it would involve restricting the prerogatives of the crown. Before I came to the department I had views on that matter, but I have not been in the department long enough to feel entitled to be too drastic in wiping out prerogatives which have come down through the centuries and which have justification to a certain extent. I confess that circumstances are not what they were in 1887. That is something to which we shall have to give serious consideration, but how far we can go is a matter to which we must give not only serious but careful consideration; for what we do is done for all time. You can never increase a royal prerogative, or at least I do not foresee that for many generations there will be any opportunity to add to these prerogatives of the crown. So that whenever you take something away it is definitely gone, and that makes it necessary to proceed with care.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am in agreement with the last observation made by the minister. I am no iconoclast, yet I am not very much impressed by this question of the prerogatives of the crown. The crown still has a great many prerogatives. If you listen to what goes on in this house in connection with the expenditure of money you will realize that theoretically not a dollar can be spent unless the king's representative first recommends it, and that is a pretty strong position to take.

I think good may come out of this discussion. If time permits I hope the minister will discuss the matter with the officials of his department and if the opportunity offers I hope he will take it up in council. I am not very hopeful, for "out of sight, out of mind." I am of the opinion that one reason why jurisdiction has never been conferred upon the provincial courts in connection with any of these actions is that there is a feeling in government that the present restrictive jurisdiction to bring actions against the crown does away with vexatious and frivolous actions. That may be true, and perhaps otherwise the crown would be sued very much more frequently than it is to-day; yet the case I have attempted to describe shows the hardship that may be imposed upon the subject. Here is a woman who is claiming under Lord Campbell's act, with her husband killed through the alleged negligence of what is now a servant of the crown, and she has to go to the exchequer court to get redress. I think in this twentieth century we ought to facilitate the position of people in that category.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): The hon. member for York-Sunbury made a strong plea in favour of dispensing with the petition of right in the exchequer court. Is there any reason why that practice should be continued in the present day? Would not thirty days' or sixty days' notice that the man intended to sue be sufficient, without having to go to the expense of a petition of right?

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 134, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 134, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL REVENUE ACT

AUTHORIZATION OF APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY MINISTERS FOR TAXATION AND CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 108, to amend the Department of National Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Deputy ministers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I gather that this is purely an administrative bill. The explanation made some time ago by the minister would seem to be satisfactory. I understand the status of the commissioner of income tax and commissioner of succession duties has been raised to that of deputy minister.

Mr. GIBSON: That is so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Heretofore he has not had the status of deputy minister.

Mr. GIBSON: He has had the power, but not the rank and status.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But not the title.

Mr. GIBSON: Correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the promotion carry anything with it? Will he receive an increase in salary?

Mr. GIBSON: Not unless an increase is provided by order in council appointing the deputy minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the salary of the income tax commissioner?

Mr. GIBSON: $9,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the salary of the commissioner of customs?

Mr. GIBSON: They are both at $9,000. Other deputy ministers range from $8,000 to $12,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand $9,000 is the minimum?

Mr. GIBSON: I understand that there are some at $8,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is now a very important position. With the amount of business passing through his hands, the chief taxing officer in the country carries heavy responsibilities. I should think his duties are as heavy as, if not heavier than, those of any other deputy minister, with the possible exception of the deputy ministers in the defence departments. I suggest, so far as I am concerned, that consideration be given to placing the salary at least at a point equal to those of other deputy ministers. It ought to be $10,000. I do not believe the salaries of our chief executives, notwithstanding what some people may say, are excessive. I do not think we could hire legal men with their training for $10,000. Speaking for myself, I would say they ought to be paid good salaries.

TAX CONVENTION ACT

CANADA - UNITED STATES CONVENTION AND PROTOCOL FOR AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION AND PREVENTION OF FISCAL EVASION

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of bill No. 119, respecting a certain tax convention and protocol between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Washington in the United States of America, on the 4th day of March, 1942.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is an important bill and I must confess that I have not been able to give it the consideration it deserves. The minister ought to take advantage of this occasion to explain the effect of the various provisions of the convention, especially upon international business and firms and enterprises that are international in scope. I gather that this convention has some ameliorating effect upon taxation, although I am not sure as to that. I hope there is an effort to avoid certain features of double taxation.

Mr. GIBSON: The convention and protocol was considered by this house and approved by resolution on June 8, 1942. At that time all the details of the convention were explained and dealt with. It was felt at that time that a resolution of this house was all that was required, as that is all that had been passed in connection with a previous convention in 1936. However, the Department of Justice expressed the opinion that this should have the approval of both houses, and consequently this bill has been brought in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the basis of their opinion?

Mr. GIBSON: It affects finances to some extent, because there is a change in taxation rates as between the countries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Heretofore it has been considered that only a resolution was necessary to give effect to what really is a treaty, but the Department of Justice now rules that it should be done by an act of parliament. There is an important distinction there, as the minister will appreciate. I think perhaps the department is right in principle.

Mr. GIBSON: The opinion we received was that "in order to give legal effect to the convention it is necessary that it be confirmed by statute." That was not amplified in any way. There are parts of the income tax act, especially the secrecy provisions, which are being overridden by this convention, and I think possibly that is one reason for the opinion.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister said that on a previous occasion a resolution of this house was considered all that was necessary with respect to a convention or protocol of this kind. What would be the position now of that previous convention or protocol in view of the opinion of the Department of Justice?

Mr. GIBSON: The convention of 1936 provided that each country would charge five per cent tax on the incomes going to residents of the other country. When we raised our tax, the previous became non-operative, and it was replaced by the convention passed in 1942.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Convention and protocol approved.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Apparently the minister is of the opinion that the previous discussion was quite sufficient, and perhaps he is right. Will he indicate in a general way the changes which are being effected by the various articles?

Mr. GIBSON: A previous convention with the United States provided for a five per cent tax on income going into either country. Eventually Canada raised that tax to fifteen per cent, with the result that the previous treaty was abrogated and automatically a sixteen and a half per cent tax went on against Canadians, this being raised later to twenty-seven and a half per cent. This tax was deducted at the source in the United States from dividends coming to Canada. This convention was then entered into with the United States to restore the equality of treatment and bring the tax down to a level of fifteen per cent in each country.

Mr. GRAYDON: We were getting the worst of the bargain.

Mr. GIBSON: The United States now charges thirty per cent in the case of countries which do not have an agreement.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the bill is reported I should like to ask one question. Does a wholly-owned subsidiary of a United States company—General Motors is a case in point—pay a tax on dividends going to the parent company in the United States, and is the reverse the case also?

Mr. GIBSON: They do not pay a tax; we can tax them, but we do not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it reciprocal?

Mr. GIBSON: We have a reciprocal right to tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have the right to tax the dividends of General Motors of Canada going to General Motors in the United States, but we do not do it. The minister might elucidate that point. Are the dividends paid by a subsidiary of a Canadian company operating in the United States to the parent company taxed?

Mr. GIBSON: There is a five per cent tax on dividends coming from the United States to a parent company in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The situation does not seem to be wholly equitable.

Mr. GIBSON: It is a matter of policy for this government that the tax has never been applied in this country, although we have the right to put it on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should not there be equality?

Mr. GIBSON: It is a matter of policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Upon what is the policy based?

Mr. GIBSON: The policy is set by the government with the advice of the Minister of Finance. It may be as an encouragement to United States companies to establish subsidiaries in this country. That would be one reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be one basis for the policy, but I am wondering why Canadian parent companies have to pay taxes on dividends from their United States subsidiaries when the United States companies do not have to pay on dividends from their subsidiaries in this country. It seems to me that they should be on exactly the same basis. There may be a good reason, and if there is I should like to know what it is. If it is merely to encourage capital to come into the country, then that argument will have to stand on its own feet. Why should there not be reciprocity in the matter?

Mr. GIBSON: We have reciprocity as far as the right to put on the tax is concerned. Under this convention we have the right to put on the same tax as the United States does, but this country has not seen fit to put on such a tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the reason is the one given.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MINERAL RESOURCES

MEASURE TO RATIFY AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA RESPECTING ORE DEPOSITS ON INDIAN RESERVES

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of bill No. 78, respecting the British Columbia Indian Reserves Mineral Resources Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Agreement confirmed.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, it may be of assistance to the committee if I make a few brief comments on the bill now under consideration.

There are at present over 1,600 Indian reserves in the province of British Columbia. To relate the history of these reserves and the various discussions and negotiations that have taken place down through the years between the provincial government and the federal government would fill a good-sized volume. The first reserves were set aside when British Columbia was a colony, in pre-confederation days. Under the British North America Act, as hon. members are aware, the responsibility of looking after the Indians is a federal responsibility. In British Columbia provision was made at the entry of that province into confederation for setting aside additional reserves as they became necessary. Various commissions of investigation were set up, one in 1875-76, to select reserves, but generally speaking the laws of British Columbia provided that the complete reversionary interest in the lands set aside for Indian reserves remained with the province. As a result of that, legal obstacles existed to the use of the reserves for the benefit of the Indians. For instance, if a portion of a reserve were surrendered it reverted to the province, and the province could sell it. If there were merchantable timber on the reserve, no disposition could be made of it without the proceeds going back to the province. That condition of affairs continued, generally speaking, until 1912, when both governments recognized that it was necessary to clear up the situation with regard to the resources on these reserves. Accordingly the McKenna-McBride commission was set up to determine the extent of the reserves and to consider matters generally affecting the Indians. That commission reported, and in 1919 an agreement was drawn up in accordance with the recommendations of the commission providing for the settlement of many of the outstanding difficulties. For some reason or another action was not taken on this agreement for many years, and it was not until 1938 that the lands were conveyed by the provincial government to the federal government.

To go back a little, a question arose as to the ownership of the minerals which might be found on lands transferred to the dominion in British Columbia, and a test case was taken to the privy council to decide the ownership of the precious metals. The privy council gave judgment that the precious metals belonged to the crown in the right of the province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister the citation?

Mr. CRERAR: The case was decided in 1889. An extract from the judgment of the privy council reads:

> The precious metals in, upon and under crown lands, are not incidents of the land but belong to the crown, and, under section 109 of the British North America Act, 1867, beneficially to the province.

That judgment, of course, established that if precious metals were found on such lands, the dominion had no claim to any benefits arising from the exploitation of these precious metals.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They belonged to the crown in the right of the dominion?

Mr. CRERAR: No, the judgment was that they belonged to the crown in the right of the province, and consequently on Indian reserves they could not be utilized by federal authority for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I see.

Mr. CRERAR: But that left the ownership of the base metals undecided. The government of British Columbia has not receded from the position that the base metals also belong to the crown in the right of the province, while the dominion government has held that they belong to the crown in the right of the dominion for the benefit of the Indians concerned.

During Premier Pattullo's tenure of office in British Columbia I had several discussions with him on this point with a view to having it cleared up. The result of all the discussions which have taken place is really crystallized in the bill which we have before us.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not in the bill but in the agreement.

Mr. CRERAR: In the agreement, yes; I accept the correction of the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask on what grounds you separate the base from the precious metals in a contention of this kind? Both are underground; would not both be subject to the same jurisdiction?

Mr. CRERAR: The case before the privy council which I mentioned a moment ago covered only precious metals. As I stated, the province of British Columbia had refused to concede that it had not possession of the base metals as well.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understand that.

Mr. CRERAR: On the other hand that can be settled only through the courts, because the federal government held—I am not familiar with the precise legal reasoning in the matter—that the right to the base metals is with the crown in the right of the dominion for the benefit of the Indians. To cover this point an agreement was reached with the province of British Columbia relating to the manner in which the mineral resources on these Indian reserves might be developed. I am bound to say I think that in the agreement reached the British Columbia authorities have taken a fair position. Perhaps from their point of view it seems a generous agreement in this regard. At any rate the agreement has been reached.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it a fair agreement from our point of view?

Mr. CRERAR: I shall deal with that in just a moment. If a difficulty arose, if it were determined that ownership of the base metals rested in the crown in the right of the dominion for the benefit of the Indians, we would have the dominion government for the Indians controlling the disposal of the base metals, and under the privy council judgment we would have the province of British Columbia controlling the disposal of the precious metals. Precious metals and base metals are frequently found in combination, and it does not require much imagination to see the problems and the difficulties which would arise under that condition. Consequently the agreement covers this. The provisions of the agreement which is being ratified under this legislation are that the prospecting and the development of minerals on the reserves shall be under the laws and regulations of the province of British Columbia; that is the province will issue permits to prospect, permits to develop, but only after the Indians concerned have given their agreement to it in the ordinary manner which is provided for in the Indian Act.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the meaning of the reference here to getting the permission from the Indian agent? I understand that getting permission from the Indian agent means that the Indians themselves concur?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, that is provided for in the Indian Act. The matter is placed before the Indians and they vote in the manner determined in the Indian Act as to the surrender of these minerals, and then the prospecting and development follow and are done under the laws and regulations of the province. There is a provision that the royalties or the revenues which are derived at present by the province under its laws from mining development cannot be reduced so far as these reserves are concerned without the consent of the federal government. In other words, those royalties and dues, if one may term them such, at present in force in British Columbia, are, I believe, as high as or higher than they are in most of the other provinces, and they cannot be reduced by the province as regards the minerals on these reserves without the consent of the federal government. The revenues derived from the exploitation of these minerals on reserves, whether they are derived from gold or from base metals, are divided equally between the provincial authority and the federal authority; the federal authority using them, of course, in trust for the Indians concerned.

Mr. COLDWELL: What use may the provincial authority make of the funds?

Mr. CRERAR: They become part of the ordinary revenues of the province, and can, I suppose, be used in any way in which the province wishes to use them. What is sought in this bill, then, is confirmation of the agreement reached with the province of British Columbia covering the disposal and handling of these minerals on Indian reserves which may be found from time to time. I do not think there is anything I need add in explanation of the measure.

Mr. GREEN: Is the share of the money which comes to the dominion held in trust for the particular tribe living on the reserve where the mine is situate?

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, it is held in trust for the Indians on the particular reserve.

Mr. STIRLING: The basis of the agreement arrived at between the dominion and the province results in an arrangement by which one-half of the revenue collected goes to the one and one-half to the other. Is that arrangement arrived at by an understanding that the values of the precious metals and the base metals are similar? The question arises in my mind, what to-day is a precious metal? Of course, gold and silver; but several other extremely valuable metals are now mined, a good many of them in British Columbia, which to-day may come under the category of precious metals. I should like the minister to explain on what basis the arrangement of fifty-fifty has been arrived at.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, ordinarily in the past such metals as gold and silver have been regarded as precious metals.

Mr. STIRLING: Platinum?

Mr. CRERAR: I am unable to say whether or not platinum comes within the definition of precious metals. I am inclined to think that it does. In any case, whatever the regulations of the province may be in regard to royalties or the revenue secured from gold or silver or platinum or any other metal, base or precious, that scale of royalties and revenues cannot be reduced, as I have stated, without the consent of the dominion. Now, that maintains the existing scale of fees or royalties upon which the province derives revenue from the development of these minerals, that is over the province generally. In the second place there is no need, it appears to me, to draw any distinction between gold or minerals carrying gold and ores carrying, say, copper. I cannot at the moment say what the provincial government scale of royalties is, but assume for the sake of argument they have one scale of royalties for gold, another scale for copper, another scale for zinc. In any case these royalties apply whether the development on the reserve is gold, copper, zinc or all three, and consequently the interests of the Indians in that regard are fully protected. There is a definite advantage to the Indians of British Columbia in this arrangement, because it clears up any doubt that may exist as to the degree to which they might be able to participate in the development of minerals on the reserves. It establishes clearly and definitely what I think is a fair, if a somewhat rough and ready, rule for the benefit of the Indians. I will admit at once that if on these reserves base metals were found in large quantities and it could be established that the federal government had the right to the development of these for the benefit of the Indians, then possibly on balance the welfare of the Indians might suffer a little. On the other hand, if any future development were mainly in the precious metals, then the province would not do so well. As I have already stated to the committee, this is a rough and ready method of settling what has been a contentious subject and on a basis which, on the whole, I believe, will not detract anything in the end from the total revenues of the Indians by and large, having regard to what the situation would be if the matter were left in any uncertainty or doubt.

Mr. NEILL: The general principle of this bill is undoubtedly good because it does away with the objection that has been in existence for many years in British Columbia, that if the Indians—or anyone acting for them—discovered a valuable mine, it could never practically be worked because the other party, the provincial government or the dominion government, would step in and say, "You may take out your silver but you must not touch our lead, for instance." It ended practically in the Indians being deprived of any benefit whatever.

There are a couple of discrepancies, as I understand the bill. The explanatory note does not accord with the agreement. I was given to understand, in conversation with some of the officials, that the first procedure would be to obtain the consent of the particular band of Indians to surrender these minerals, and it was so stated in the explanatory note. The note has no legal effect whatever. It reads:

> Briefly the arrangement provides that upon surrender by the Indians the administration, control and disposal of the minerals and the mineral claims shall be subject to the laws of the province.

That appears in the explanatory note which, as I say, has no legal force whatever. The real thing that does bind these people is to be found on page 3 of the bill:

> The administration, control and disposal of all minerals and mineral claims, both precious and base, in, upon, or under all Indian reserves in the said province shall be subject to the laws of the province. . . .

"Shall be": in other words, the moment this bill is passed the Indian has no say at all in the matter. On the other hand the minister may point to the following provision which appears lower down on the same page:

> And provided further that no prospecting or right of entry on the said Indian reserve shall be authorized or permitted until permission so to do has been obtained from the Indian agent for such reserve; such permission shall be subject to such terms and conditions as the said Indian agent may specify and shall be granted only to such persons whose application for permission has been approved by the gold commissioner for the mining division of the province in which such reserve is situated.

That takes care of the white man and of the provincial government but not of the Indian. Elsewhere it states that on the passing of this act all these minerals shall come under the control of the province. I maintain that the procedure hinted at in the explanatory note, which, I repeat, has no force, should have been maintained, to surrender all the rights of the Indians in that particular reserve and, in the regular way, to have the Indian agent call a meeting of the band, whereupon he would ask if they would surrender the minerals on the reserve. Of course they know then what the deal is, and they would give their consent with a knowledge of the terms and so on. Anyone can come to prospect on the reserve—that is quite all right—but only with the consent of the Indian agent, and he may make such terms and conditions as he thinks fit. The act should be so worded as to provide that the protection afforded the Indian with regard to their consent will be safeguarded as in the Indian Act.

There is another objection I see, to which I would call the attention of the minister. I am sure it was not intended that we should arbitrarily take away the ownership of these minerals from the Indians without their consent. It is provided in the old act that nothing may be alienated without the consent of the band being obtained, and that is as it should be; but in section 7 of this bill it is provided that the province shall run the whole thing, collect all royalties and so on, and give the dominion government one-half. That, too, is all right; but it enacts that the province shall not be liable to the dominion for failure to collect the revenue or any portion of it by reason of the neglect or failure of any officer or servant of the provincial government or of the department of mines of the province to carry out his duties in connection therewith. That is a very unfair provision. By force of law you will take the minerals from the Indians, admittedly a good thing, and make a deal with the province by which they will run the business and give the dominion one-half. But if they fail to do it, if some official neglects his duty, some servant of the province, the Indian is out of luck.

If you make a deal in a business way you are under obligation to carry it out; and it is not sufficient for me, if I enter into an agreement with someone and my servant does something that contravenes the agreement, to turn round and say: "I am not responsible; you had better see him." The deal is between the dominion and the province, and if the province agrees to collect the money, it should be responsible except where it is impossible to make the collection. It should not apply where there is wilful neglect on the part of an officer or servant of the provincial government. He might steal money, for instance, and the province might very well say that section 7 absolves it from liability. If the province fails to collect the money it should be liable. It is not sufficient for the province to say that one of its servants ran away with the money. As I say, the provision should apply only where the failure to comply with this part of the agreement is unavoidable. If they made a deal with a mining company and the company went bankrupt and could not pay, then I would say it was not the business of the province to pay what should have been collected; but where it is a matter of sheer negligence or malfeasance on the part of an officer, a man stealing money, for example, the dominion as trustee and careful guardian of the rights of the Indians should protect these people in such a way as to enable them to collect from the province whose servant was responsible.

Mr. CRERAR: On the face of it there is some force on the point raised by my hon. friend. I do not see, however, where there could be any failure by which the Indians would suffer. It could not arise without the province suffering equally. If the servant of the province who has to do with the administration stole money he would be stealing the province's money as well as the Indians'. If he were negligent he would be negligent in his service to the province as well as to the Indians.

This agreement was the result of a rather rough and ready way of settling a contentious dispute. There is this to be said, that the province bears all the cost of administration and yet 50 per cent of the revenues derived are paid in for the account of the Indians.

Mr. NEILL: Is it the gross revenue or the net revenue?

Mr. CRERAR: It will be 50 per cent of the revenues received, according to the information supplied to me on that point. So that I do not think there is really any very serious obstacle to the ratification of this agreement in the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, though I recognize that there may be some force to it.

Mr. NEILL: What about the surrender?

Mr. CRERAR: On that point the agent will be governed by the instructions of his superiors. The Indian Act provides the basis upon which surrenders may be made, but as I recall it the act also provides in certain cases that if a band of Indians persists for some reason in pursuing a course that is really detrimental to their own interests, action may be taken to overcome that situation. I should say that in the actual administration of this matter the general terms and provisions of the Indian Act will govern, as they govern in other, similar matters.

Mr. NEILL: Quite so; that would be the case if you had left the act as it was or if you had said that this procedure would be subject to the ordinary provisions of the act. But here you are devising something to take the place of the section of the Indian Act which now says you cannot take land away from a band of Indians without their consent, without calling a public meeting, and so on. There may be provision for dealing with extreme cases, in regard to the right of way for a railway, for example, but that is an extraordinary circumstance. The general principle laid down is that Indians may not be deprived of anything belonging to them without their consent, but now you are going to substitute the power of the Indian agent who can make conditions under which someone may go prospecting. I think it was intended originally that the right of the Indians should be surrendered in the usual way, and the explanatory note says so:

> Briefly the arrangement provides that upon surrender by the Indians the administration, control and disposal of the minerals and the mineral claims shall be subject to the laws of the province. . . .

But that is only in the explanatory note, not in the bill. Nothing is said in regard to the surrender, however; it only states that the Indian agent may do certain things.

Mr. CRERAR: I think it may be assumed—

Mr. NEILL: Well, we cannot assume things.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, I think it may be assumed that in the administration of this matter the provisions of the Indian Act will be observed. It is quite true that it does not say so specifically—

Mr. NEILL: Why not?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know why, but that has been the practice in the past. The Indian Act provides for surrender being obtained from the Indians under certain conditions; but if a band of Indians, through some mistaken idea, follow a course that is against their own interest, I think I am right in saying that the administration has the right to overrule the Indians.

Mr. NEILL: That is only in an extreme case, and it is left to the judgment of the department, not to the whim of an Indian agent.

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, well; this will not be left to the whim of an Indian agent. An Indian agent would not act in a matter of this kind without consulting his superiors.

Mr. GRAYDON: As I see it, the question is not whether an Indian agent would or would not act. The question is, can he or can he not act; because if we give the Indian agent power, neither the government nor anyone else can say to him that he should not take this particular step. The fact is that we should so frame the legislation that there is no question of interpretation or assumption connected with it. The whole situation comes down to this, that if, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has pointed out, the Indian Act makes certain provisions, we should have something more than the minister's statement that he assumes the provisions of the Indian Act will be followed, or that he is quite sure nothing will be done contrary to its terms. It seems to me that good legislation, well drawn, would leave no room for doubt and would make it unnecessary for the minister to interpret the legislation, as he is attempting to do now. That is a job for the courts, not for the minister.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not attempting to interpret anything.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, the minister has mentioned certain assumptions, and so on. I think the point of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is well taken. If the terms of the Indian Act are to be read into the statute by those administering it, then they should be written into the statutes by those who are enacting it.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest an amendment, and a few words would do it. I would suggest that section 2 be amended, to begin with these words:

> Upon the surrender of the minerals in any reserve, according to the terms of the Indian Act, the administration . . . shall pass to the province.

Then the surrender would have to be obtained in the usual way.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course this agreement has been confirmed already by the legislature of British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: But we are legislating in behalf of the Indians. We are their guardians; we are not worrying about what the province has done. We are putting through legislation that will affect the Indians, and I say they are not getting the full protection to which they are entitled. If you inserted the words I have suggested, they would be protected.

Mr. CRERAR: As a matter of practical observation I think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is tilting at a windmill.

Mr. NEILL: Well, I was an Indian agent for ten years, and I know how the Indians look at these things.

Mr. CRERAR: I know also how the Indians look at these things. In actual practice what would happen to an Indian agent who, of his own volition, gave away rights in connection with these matters? He would not long be there. My hon. friend knows as well as anyone that the Indian agent must carry out his duties in conformity with the instructions issued to him.

Mr. NEILL: Oh, no.

Mr. CRERAR: Absolutely; and in this case the procedure unquestionably will be that provided in the Indian Act for the disposition of assets on reserves. While it does not so state specifically in this agreement, I think to assume anything else is not in accordance with the practice of the Indian department or with common sense. It may be that my hon. friend is quite right when he says the agreement could have been drafted in clearer terms on that point. I am willing to concede that, but the province of British Columbia has passed legislation approving this agreement. It took a great deal of effort and persuasion to bring them to that point, and now if we should say, "We are not quite satisfied with this agreement and we want to amend it further," they might reply, "Well, we are through with it." I have no hesitation in saying that the settlement of these contentious points by this agreement is in the interests of the Indians of British Columbia. I think my hon. friend will agree with that; there can be no question of it.

Mr. NEILL: I have said so already.

Mr. CRERAR: That being so, I am prepared to recommend to the committee that we pass this confirming legislation now.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course the fact that the minister has brought in the bill indicates that he is recommending it to the committee, but I think he has to go a little further than that. I am interested in this. I know that the minister and the government, to put it in a more or less vulgar term, are rather on a spot in this matter, because of the fact that the agreement has already been signed. The bill itself is a matter of only two or three lines stating that the schedule to the act shall be confirmed and shall take effect according to its terms. I should like to ask the minister if, in the negotiations between the province of British Columbia and the dominion government, the question raised with respect to the provisions of the Indian Act applying in the event of surrender was discussed.

Mr. CRERAR: No, not so far as my recollection goes. It was not mentioned at all, because how the Indians might give it up was not a question of concern to the province. What the province was interested in was the question of the disposition of a contentious matter, and the question of clearing up the matter of revenues, and the development of resources, should they be found. That was what the province was mainly interested in. I have not the slightest doubt that if we had put into the agreement the most stringent possible terms to the effect that the vote of the Indians would be required, or a three-quarters vote would be required, or anything of that kind, the province would not have raised the slightest objection.

The point of criticism raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is that we are giving too much power to the agent on the reserve.

Mr. NEILL: Too much power to the Indian agent.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Instead of to the Indians, to whom it belongs.

Mr. CRERAR: But my answer to that is that, in effect, we are not giving power to the Indian agent. The Indian agent must carry out the instructions, regulations and conditions of the Indian Act. I have not the slightest doubt that these surrenders will be secured in all cases from the Indians in accordance with the terms of the Indian Act, and in accordance with the practice that has obtained in connection with Indian administration all through the years.

Mr. NEILL: If I were an Indian agent this is what I would look at:

> The administration, control and disposal of all minerals and mineral claims, both precious and base, in, upon or under all Indian reserves in the said province shall be subject to the laws of the province.

Does the minister say that that conveys any instruction to me to go out and get the consent of the Indians? Not at all. The old Indian Act states that before any disposition of Indian lands shall take place, the Indians shall be called together, and that their consent shall be obtained. This deprives them of that opportunity, because it says the administration from this day on shall be subject to the laws of the province. What is the use of asking the Indians to release something that has already been taken away from them? The minister says he is sure that the Indian agent will do so-and-so. Well, if he knew Indian agents as well as I do he might not be so sure. Why bring legislation here if the form of the whole procedure is to be based on someone presuming that somebody else will do something else. The Indian agent does not have to do it, because the moment this bill becomes law and this parliament passes the legislation the administration and control will be subject to the laws of the province. What is the use of asking a group of Indians to give up their rights on a reserve which, so far as this bill goes, have already been taken from them?

The minister was wise in bringing this bill in and, as I said, it is a good thing and it will be beneficial to the Indians and the province as well. But the province is looking after the province, and we are looking after the Indians, and we are taking away from them something which is a fundamental right. You do not take property or land away from the Indians, without the consent of the majority of Indians. The procedure is laid down. A meeting must be called by the Indian agent—I do not remember whether every adult votes or only male adults, but anyway it is a procedure which has to be taken.

Mr. CRERAR: The agreement deals, at page 3, with the question of prospecting, or the right of entry to an Indian reserve. These are the words used:

> And provided further that no prospecting or right of entry on the said Indian reserve shall be authorized or permitted until permission so to do has been obtained from the Indian agent for such reserve; such permission shall be subject to such terms and conditions as the said Indian agent may specify.

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: And it continues:

—and shall be granted only to such persons whose application for permission has been approved by the gold commissioner for the mining division of the province in which such reserve is situated.

Mr. NEILL: That applies only to prospecting.

Mr. CRERAR: And it states further:

And provided further that base minerals and mineral rights shall only be subject to this agreement upon being surrendered pursuant to the Indian Act.

I overlooked that provision when I spoke a moment ago in reply to the hon. member. But it will be noted that it is specifically stated there that surrenders are subject to the provisions of the Indian act, in that regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Certainly it does.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not going to protest about the bill, or argue whether it is right or wrong, nor shall I speak about its virtues. But I do protest against the procedure being adopted. Perhaps this procedure has been taken for a long time, but the fact is that we are asked to pass a bill approving of an agreement already signed. I am at a loss to know what would happen if the house were to refuse to pass the bill. Would the minister care to tell us, or would the Minister of Justice, who is in his seat, give us his opinion? It appears to me that a bill of this kind makes a member of parliament a sort of rubber stamp. This agreement has already been signed, and the bill is to be passed simply to ratify the agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If the hon. member will read the last paragraph at page 2 of the schedule he will find this:

Now therefore this agreement witnesseth that the parties have mutually agreed, subject to the approval of the parliament of Canada and the legislature of the province of British Columbia.

So that it is clear that the agreement is invalid unless approved by parliament.

Mr. CRERAR: I can tell the hon. member what will happen. If parliament does not confirm the agreement by this measure, then the agreement falls to the ground and we revert to the old state of confusion and uncertainty.

Mr. GRAYDON: It could be renegotiated.

Mr. CRERAR: What position would we be in to go back and renegotiate it? But that was not the point raised by the hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister suggests that there might be some difficulty in going back to the province. But only a moment ago he said that if we had asked for this, the province would have allowed us to put it in.

Mr. CRERAR: But it is in the act now. My hon. friend had better read the bill. The point raised by the hon. member for Macleod is this: He says, "You have an agreement; what is the sense or the need of having an act of parliament to confirm it?" The agreement expressly states that it shall not go into effect until confirmed both by the legislature of British Columbia and by the parliament of Canada. The legislature has confirmed it, and we are now asking parliament to do the same.

Mr. HANSELL: In other words I understand the minister to say that the agreement is not at present in effect?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It cannot be.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

AUTHORIZATION OF ANNUAL PAYMENT OF $200,000 FOR TEN YEARS FROM APRIL 1, 1943

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 71, to amend the Federal District Commission Act, 1927.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Period for payment of annual grants extended.

Mr. REID: I thought that this appropriation would be dealt with by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), but as the bill is now before us and we have an opportunity of discussing it I should like to make one comment. Personally I think it was a mistake to place the care of the grounds in Ottawa in the hands of the federal commission. I understand that this year for reasons of economy, they are not placing flowers in the different grounds, but we should not forget that there are sixteen or eighteen representatives of different countries located in Ottawa, and with the visitors who come to this city there should be no lack of flowers.

Mr. ABBOTT: There will be an opportunity under public works estimates to discuss the maintenance of the grounds about the parliament buildings and other public buildings in Ottawa. This grant of $200,000 has been made for some years to the federal district commission, primarily for the maintenance of the parkway system. Under the Federal District Commission Act, 1927, provision was made for a grant of $250,000 for ten years. Subsequently, in consideration of a capital sum of $3,000,000 which was made available for large scale improvements, largely in central Ottawa, the grant was reduced to $200,000 a year in 1928. That grant expires this year and the bill now before the house provides for the continuing of this grant of $200,000 for another ten years.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand that this bill is a replica of the one passed in 1928, which expired on March 31, 1943, except that the term in the previous bill was fifteen years, whereas in this bill it is for ten years. I should like to know the underlying reason for this change in the length of time during which the grant is to be paid.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that there is no special reason except that it was not thought appropriate to ask for an increase in the grant until the war was over. As the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has indicated, because of war conditions the work being carried on has been cut substantially. It was felt that authority should be asked to appropriate $200,000 for ten years, and the matter could be reconsidered after the war is over.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not opposing the bill, because I am not anxious to be continually reducing expenditures. We get beauty by spending money, not by saving it. I am in favour of the bill, but I would make one suggestion. When parliament is ready to grant $200,000 a year for the purpose of beautifying Ottawa, I think the city should try to follow suit in some little things. It takes more than parks and driveways and canals and green grass and flowers and trees to make a capital city. I hope I shall not be criticized too severely for what I say, but if you take the parks and trees away from Ottawa you will not have much left. The reply will be made that we cannot do anything without getting money from somewhere, but money is the hardest thing in the world to get under the present arrangement. If the Department of Public Works would spend a little more money upon our buildings it might be to the advantage of this city. There are some nice buildings in Ottawa, such as this one, but some of the dirtiest places in the city are those owned by the government. For instance, I never thought much of the Daly building. I do not know why they have the windows in that building painted green, but there may be some reason for it. For the most part the windows in our public buildings are very dirty, and that is not a good advertisement for government ownership. When some great operatic star comes to Ottawa, what happens? She has to go to a dirty old skating rink.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who was put in there?

Mr. HANSELL: Jeanette Macdonald. When a world famous star comes to Ottawa the city turns out as it should, because it is a cultural event, but then they have to go to a skating rink which is called the auditorium.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is war time and we have to put up with a lot of things.

Mr. HANSELL: I know my hon. friend does not mean that, because this thing has gone on for a good many decades and will continue to go on for many more decades. I see no reason why the capital city should not be beautiful, not only from the point of view of parks, flowers and trees, but from the point of view of architecture and other matters. The main reason why this has not been done is the claim that we cannot do a thing unless it is stamped with the almighty dollar sign. If the city council were asked to do anything they would say that they would have to tax to get the money. It is all a matter of knowing where to get the money. Perhaps some day we shall be in position not only to tell you where to get it, but actually to get it for you.

Mr. MARSHALL: We are getting it now.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Camrose says that we are getting it now. That is the peculiar thing. We are getting it now, for purposes that are most necessary I admit, but in the end it will be gone.

There will be nothing to show for it. We do not seem to be able to get money to put up substantial buildings which would be of value to the cultural civilization of this country. I am in favour of the bill.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $6,046,300 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1943; to make provision for the purchase or refunding of capital obligations of the company, or of any company comprised of the Canadian National Railway system, during the said calendar year and for the issue of substituted securities for such purpose; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, interest and sinking funds of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $6,046,300 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the parliamentary assistant who is piloting this resolution through would give some details. We ought to know, for instance, whether this is new debt, what amount is being refunded, and any other details that can be given.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be very glad to do that. The bill to be founded on this resolution is for the purpose of providing authority for the capital expenditures of the railway system and the retirement of miscellaneous maturing obligations, either by way of loan from the dominion or by the issue of securities of the company and guaranteed by the dominion.

The total amount to be provided for this purpose is limited to $6,046,300, divided as follows:

Additions and betterments (less retirements)	$12,200,000
Acquisition of securities	1,294,300
Retirement of maturing capital obligations, including sinking fund and equipment principal payments	9,552,000
	$23,046,300
Less: Available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization	17,000,000
	$ 6,046,300

In the 1942 act it was provided that the railway company, subject to the approval of the governor in council, could retire debt of any of the companies comprised in the railway system in any amount and issue new securities in exchange for such retired obligations. The power conferred by the 1942 act is a continuing one and it is not necessary to reenact it.

That is a general break-down of the $6,046,300 but I shall be glad to give hon. members details of the various items if they so desire.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the break-down of these items lengthy?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not very lengthy. I have here, for instance, details of the total expenditure of $12,200,000 for additions and betterments in the different regions in which the railway operates.

Mr. GRAYDON: If it is a lengthy list perhaps the break-down might be put on Hansard for the convenience of hon. members.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to put it on Hansard, also details of the acquisition of securities, and of the retirement of maturing capital obligations. The details are as follows:

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 135, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways System during the calendar year 1943, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Abbott.]

On the motion for the second reading of the bill:

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to facilitate as much as possible the passage of this bill, but I am compelled to take the position that no bill should ever be passed by this house until the members have had an opportunity of reading it. That I think is a fundamental practice which must never be departed from. I believe that a lengthy discussion of the subject matter of this bill was had in the railway committee, where full details were provided, and that perhaps will save at least some discussion in the committee of the whole. Perhaps the second reading could be taken later to-day. I would have no objection to that unless there are unusual provisions or terms in the bill that require our attention. But I do not think the house or the committee would feel that they were discharging their obligations properly if they attempted to deal with the bill before it had been printed and is before us, even though we desire to facilitate the business of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the order for second reading should stand, and then perhaps later to-day by unanimous consent we may proceed with it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would also point out to the members of the government that while there is a disposition towards the end of a session to facilitate the passage of legislation more perhaps than at other times, we must always bear in mind that this is the country's business and that every item must receive the same care and attention at one stage of the session as it would at another. I think only with that proviso and on that condition should we facilitate the passage of measures through the house.

Motion stands.

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill No. 77, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment of auditors.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that this is the same bill which has been before the house every year since this legislation was first introduced in 1936?

Mr. MICHAUD: Exactly, word for word.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS TO EMPLOYEES IN RECEIPT OF UP TO $2,400 A YEAR

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Unemployment Insurance Act to facilitate its operation and to extend its provisions to employees in receipt of remuneration up to $2,400 a year, under one or more contracts of service, thereby raising the present ceiling of $2,000 to the amount above mentioned.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is carried, this brings up, of course, the whole question of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I should like to have a statement from the minister as to the underlying reasons for the introduction of this new extension of the principle of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I do not rise to make any objection to the provisions which the minister envisages in this resolution, but I would ask if there is anything in the bill in addition to the generalities set forth in the motion which is before the house. That is rather important.

Mr. MITCHELL: I could make a lengthy statement if my hon. friend desired, giving the whole background of the Unemployment Insurance Act, but this particular bill contains only one fundamental change in the operation of the act, namely, to increase from $2,000 to $2,400 per annum the earnings of those persons who may come within its orbit. I may say that this increase was recommended by the advisory committee on unemployment insurance composed of employers and employees, after public hearings had been held. That is all that is proposed, that one fundamental change in the application of the act, to increase the amount from $2,000 tc $2,400.

Mr. GRAYDON: The resolution states that the measure to be introduced is intended "to facilitate its operation." That was the point I had in mind. If the proposal is only a matter of raising the present ceiling from $2,000 to $2,400, it may not be necessary to have any lengthy discussion on it.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the object.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there anything else in the bill?

Mr. MARTIN: That is the main purpose, and it was agreed upon after hearings.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask under what auspices the hearings were held?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will answer that in committee. The Speaker is in the chair.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. HAZEN: When did these hearings take place of the advisory committee on unemployment insurance, as a result of which the committee made the recommendation to which the minister has referred? At the hearings did any employees appear who objected to this increase? I feel convinced that there are a great many people in the country earning $2,400 a year who will object most strenuously to coming under the act. Many are employed by companies who have insurance or pension schemes and are making contributions to those schemes, and it is going to be hard on them. If consulted they must have strenuously objected to being brought within the act.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no knowledge of any representations made with reference to the increase from $2,000 to $2,400, but we have received representations from certain labour organizations urging that it be increased to $3,000. The figure $2,400 was decided upon after representations had been made by employers and employees who appeared before the committee. If I might express a personal opinion, I think it should be $3,000. In view of increased earnings in some sections of the country, the more persons we bring within the orbit of the legislation the more constructive the act will be, and possibly it will be helpful in the post-war period. After these extended hearings there was an agreement between the parties, employers and employees, through their representatives and $2,400 was agreed upon and recommended.

Mr. HAZEN: When did these hearings take place, and what labour organizations asked that the increase be made?

Mr. MITCHELL: Perhaps my best course would be to read the report in which a list of the organizations is given. After that, if there is anything I can do to clarify matters I shall be glad to answer questions. The report reads:

To His Excellency
The Governor General in Council:

By order in council P.C. 10156 of January 7, 1942, the unemployment insurance advisory committee was instructed under the provisions of section 86 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, "to investigate and report upon the provision of unemployment insurance for all or part of the employments excepted from the operation of part II of the act by the said item (n) of part II of the first schedule by extending thereto the provisions of part II of the act."

Prior to this instruction, the advisory committee had discussed with the commission the problems of administration out of which the reference arose. The committee met in Ottawa to consider this reference on February 18 and 19 and March 16 and 17. In order that interested parties might have an opportunity to present their views, notices, in English and French, were printed in the Canada Gazette of January 31, 1942, advising such organizations or persons that the advisory committee would receive written representations and would hear those who desired to appear on February 18. The notice was drawn to the attention of all the larger organizations representing employers and employees and they were asked to draw it to the attention of the members. Those who made representations were subsequently advised that the advisory committee would continue its deliberations on March 16 and 17 and further written and oral representations were received. In all, representations were made by the following organizations:

Trades and Labour Congress of Canada,
Canadian Congress of Labour,
Confederation of Catholic Workers of Canada,
Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers,
Order of Railway Conductors,
Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen,
Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen,
Brotherhood of Maintenance-of-Way Employees,
Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks,
Canadian Manufacturers Association,
Canadian Chamber of Commerce,
Canadian Bankers' Association,
Canadian Life Insurance Officers' Association,
Dominion Mortgage and Loan Association,
Retail Merchants Association of Canada,
Montreal Board of Trade,
Toronto Board of Trade,
Calgary Board of Trade,
Hamilton Chamber of Commerce,
Windsor Chamber of Commerce.

I think that is a fair cross-section of the organized employers and employees of the dominion.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will the minister specify which of these organizations asked for an extension to $2,400 and which were against it?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall come to that in the report.

At the request of the committee, the unemployment insurance commission submitted a statement of the administrative problems arising out of item (n) together with a report from its actuarial adviser on the results which might be anticipated from a removal of this exception.

Under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, the highest earnings class for which contributions and benefits are prescribed is class 7, persons "earning $26 but less than $38.50 in a week or $2,000 a year." Among the employments excepted from insurance under part II of the first schedule of the act is: "(n) Employment at a rate of remuneration exceeding in value two thousand dollars a year or in cases where employment involves part-time service only at a rate of remuneration, which in the opinion of the commission, is equivalent to a rate of remuneration exceeding two thousand dollars a year for full-time service."

In considering the evidence and views placed before it, the advisory committee reached the conclusion that there were three groups of problems involved in this reference:

First, the administration of any such exception as that made by item (n) is fraught with difficulty and productive of undesired results in respect of employees whose weekly earnings fluctuate by reason of lost time, overtime rates, piece rates, production and other bonuses. An employee may earn from $35 to $45 a week depending on the supply of material, the amount of overtime, and the speed of work attained. In the weeks in which his earnings were $38.50 or more he would contribute nothing to the unemployment insurance fund, and would build no credit in benefits. In the weeks when his earnings were less, he must contribute out of that smaller income. In respect of those in this range of income, it is clearly undesirable that they should pass in and out of insurance as their weekly income varies. They should be insured continuously or not insured at all.

Second, since the enactment of this legislation and even since the beginning of contributions in July, 1941, weekly and annual earnings of many employees have risen. Icreases in basic rates, cost of living bonuses, and additional overtime have contributed to this. As a result, considerable numbers of workers, who it was thought would be insured, or who in the initial months actually were contributors, have found that their earnings are in excess of the maximum prescribed by the act and that they are thereby excluded from insurance. Nearly all such workers, whether in war plants or not, are in employments in which earnings and continuity and duration of employment have been beneficially affected by the war and will to un undetermined extent be adversely affected by the cessation of hostilities. They are in large part persons for whom the risk of unemployment is real and substantial.

A system of unemployment insurance based on graded contributions ending abruptly in a "ceiling" has these illogical results. As an employee in a middle or lower earnings group is able to improve his earnings by reason of scarcity of labour he moves up the contribution scale and greater reserves are provided in the fund against the time when he may be unemployed. An employee in a higher earnings group under the same circumstances will also increase his contributions but when he reaches the limit of the highest earnings group his contributions cease and he abruptly passes out of insurance unless he had contributed for one hundred and eighty days in the two years immediately preceding his claim for benefit. Substantial numbers of workers whose jobs will be in jeopardy at the end of the war would thus be excluded from insurance were it not for the temporary provisions of P.C. 10156.

Third, quite apart from the increase in earnings, many workers are excluded from insurance by the exception of those earning in excess of $2,000. In some cases, these workers wish to be included; in others, they wish to be excluded. In some cases, their fellow workers think that they should not be exempt.

IV. Proposals made to the committee.

The proposals advanced by organizations in respect of these problems were of three types. The employee organizations representing the largest numbers favoured removing exception (n) altogether and insuring all employees regardless of earnings in respect of $2,000 of such earnings.

That is a cross-section of the opinion expressed by the employees' organizations.

This was generally opposed by employers' organizations. It was opposed also by some employee groups who preferred to be excluded from insurance since they considered their jobs were highly secure.

A second type of proposal was to raise the excluding figure ($2,000) in item (n) to such moderate degree as would take account of the war-time increase in earnings. There was no proposal to do less than this in practice though some considered that order in council P.C. 10156 was itself satisfactory and that no further legislation was necessary. These groups urged further that the period of experience under the act was too brief to permit of a sound recommendation on other than a war-time emergency basis.

A third type of proposal was to raise the excluding figure substantially from $2,000 to $3,600 or $4,800 and thus change the intended coverage of the act to include all employees except executives of the higher ranks. It was argued against such a change, as it was also argued against the first type of proposal, that it would bring under insurance many in highly secure employments, comparable, in security to the civil service, whose risk of dismissal, except for cause, was slight and who received on dismissal compensatory payments much in excess of what would be paid under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

V. The committee's views on the proposals.

In the course of its deliberations, it became clear to the advisory committee

(a) that if all employees with annual earnings exceeding any fixed amount are thereby excluded from insurance the commission will continue to encounter administrative difficulties as well as anomalies in the operation of the act. These would be reduced but would not disappear if the maximum earnings limitation were raised.

(b) that the complete removal of the earnings limitation would create other anomalies, since the present act is restricted in two ways on the model of United Kingdom legislation. Under the Canadian act certain relatively secure groups are excluded from insurance by item (n), the earnings limitation. Other relatively secure groups are excluded by other items in Part II of the first schedule. Any attempt to make the act universal in its application would require examination not only of item (n), as referred to the advisory committee, but also of all other excepted employments.

(c) that if the earnings limitation of item (n) were removed entirely from those employments in which, by reason of the basis of payment or fluctuations in the hours worked, earnings vary from week to week, the administrative difficulties occasioned by item (n) in its present form would in the main disappear and considerable numbers of workers subject to the risks of unemployment would be protected by insurance.

(d) that the general upward movement in employee earnings since the enactment of the legislation justifies some increase over $2,000 in whatever maximum earnings limitation is applied.

(e) that any raising of the earnings limitation would probably benefit the fund.

VI. Recommendations.

The advisory committee unanimously makes the following recommendations:

(a) that the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, be amended as follows: Second schedule (rates of contribution) earnings class No. 7 now reading "Earnings $26.00 but less than $38.50 in a week or $2,000 a year (First schedule (First schedule (n))" to read: "Earnings $26.00 or more in a week."

First Schedule, part II (excepted employments) (n) now reading:

"(n) Employment at a rate of remuneration exceeding in value two thousand dollars a year or in cases where employment involves part time service only, at a rate of remuneration which, in the opinion of the commission, is equivalent to a rate of remuneration exceeding two thousand dollars a year for full time service.

"Provided that any person in respect of whom contributions have been paid as an insured person for two hundred and sixty weeks may continue as an insured person notwithstanding anything in this paragraph contained."

To read

(n) Employment under one or more contracts of service at a total rate of remuneration exceeding in value two thousand four hundred dollars a year or in cases where employment involves part time service only, at a rate of remuneration which, in the opinion of the commission, is equivalent to a rate of remuneration exceeding two thousand four hundred dollars a year for full-time service.

Provided that any employment in which the contractual rate of remuneration is an hourly rate, a daily rate, a weekly rate, a piece rate, including a mileage or other rate, being a sum of money per unit of physical measurement of work accomplished or service rendered, or any of such rates in combination with other rates, shall, notwithstanding the amount of the remuneration, be insured unless otherwise excepted. And provided further that any person in respect of whom contributions have been paid as an insured person for two hundred and sixty weeks may continue as an insured person notwithstanding anything in this paragraph.

(b) that, when and if the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, is amended as recommended, order in council P.C. 10156 shall be rescinded.

The effect of such amendments will be to remove the maximum earnings limitation from all industrial employments except those of which the contractual rates of remuneration are based on periods of time exceeding one week and to raise the maximum earnings limitation where it would still apply from $2,000 to $2,400 a year.

The committee is of the opinion that such action will remove most of the serious administrative difficulties, and will bring and retain under unemployment insurance substantial groups of workers without creating important anomalies by reason of the employments excepted by other paragraphs of part II of the first schedule.

In the proposed amendment of paragraph (n) the words "under one or more contracts of service" are inserted at the request of the commission whose assurance that they will clarify the clause and simplify administration is accepted by the committee.

The committee proposes to bring to the attention of the unemployment insurance commission the representations it has received concerning other excepted employments.

Respectfully submitted on behalf of the advisory committee,

W. C. Mackintosh,
Chairman.

Mr. HATFIELD: How much has been paid out, and how much has been collected to date?

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, I have been called to attend a special meeting of cabinet. I was wondering if I might be excused, and this matter continued at eight o'clock?

Mr. GRAYDON: I realize the urgency of the matter about which the hon. member has spoken. One of the cabinet ministers was good enough to speak to me about it. I would suggest that the minister might come on after the department succeeding him is completed. I think we ought to avoid breaking up our discussions any more than is absolutely necessary. Perhaps the Minister of Mines and Resources would go on until that department is finished.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps the Minister of Labour might be excused, and his parliamentary assistant might take over in the absence of the minister. If that understanding is agreeable, we shall proceed in that fashion.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection to that.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the ceiling in Great Brtiain and in other British dominions, particularly in Australia and New Zealand, where they have unemployment insurance measures?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): I am afraid I have not any information for the hon. member respecting the situation in Australia. However, in the United Kingdom there is no ceiling for men who might be regarded as being engaged in laborious endeavour.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. JACKMAN: The reason I asked—and I should hope the parliamentary assistant might give us some information later—is that when the committee was considering the original bill in 1940 requests came from several miners' organizations that the limit be raised from $2,000 to $2,500, in order that they might come under the terms and, as they saw it, the benefits of the proposed enactment. That was, for good and sufficient reasons, turned down by the committee; and I believe the report of the committee at that time was unanimous. I am bearing in mind, however, that there has been some advance in wage rates since that time.

However, if I recall correctly—and I hope the parliamentary assistant will check me on this matter, because the incident is now some three or four years old—the reason why groups earning more than $2,000 were not included in the original unemployment insurance scheme was that the labour exchanges, which were an integral and important part of the whole enactment, did not feel that they could provide jobs for the type of men who would earn over $2,000 a year. It was considered to be more in the nature of a fairly well-paid job, rather than a matter of mass employment which could be dealt with suitably by the labour exchange. There must be some change in that situation now, if this is being applied.

In a constituency like mine I have a great many salaried people who would receive somewhere between $2,000 and $2,500. My understanding is that they will now come under the proposed amendment. Would the parliamentary assistant state how much a worker earning $2,500 will pay during the year? These are people of a class who are already making a real sacrifice in this time of war. This salaried class has not been receiving the wage increases which wage-earners, such as those in my own riding, have been receiving in order to cope with the increased cost of living, which to some extent is off-set by the cost of living bonus. Then, the wage-earners have benefited as a result of the longer hours they have been permitted to work, and the considerably increased rates of pay allowed.

Mr. MARTIN: It would cost about $18.72 a year.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is not as much as I thought it would be. Perhaps the hon. member will confirm that figure, if he has any doubt about it.

Mr. MARTIN: I am advised by our officers that it is fifty-two times thirty-six cents. I will send the hon. member the table of payments.

Mr. JACKMAN: If that is the total amount I shall not labour the point unduly. Nevertheless a great many people will now come under the limitation, when it is increased to $2,500. These people's jobs are not only relatively secure, I believe they are very secure. They receive lower incomes than they otherwise would, on account of the stability of those jobs, and, on account of the nature of their work, they are not likely to receive any benefits under the unemployment insurance measure. That is why I asked how many of the associations who delivered briefs at the time of the hearing were in favour of the proposal, and how many were against; and I should like to know the names of those associations.

I should think, for instance, there would have been a recommendation from the bankers' association. A manager in a small branch may not receive a large salary, but the bank provides well for his retirement. That man will now have an extra impost of $18.72 to pay. That is another bit out of his income, at a time when he is already scraping to make ends meet.

Then, I would ask the parliamentary assistant to bear in mind the fact that the person who prior to the war received $2,500 was relatively free from income tax. However, the income tax now reaches down to a much lower level, and the rate has risen so quickly that people are paying very high income taxes, with the result that their expendable income has been greatly reduced.

My understanding of the unemployment insurance legislation is that it is not only insurance for those who may lose their jobs. In it are included a great many classes of workers who have no fear or prospect of losing their jobs, and it is virtually a donation by every job holder in order to provide some insurance for those who may lose their jobs. The people in the higher brackets, above $2,500, are supposed to make their contribution to the steady work of their fellow men, or to afford them something when they are out of employment, through the higher scale of income tax they pay.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think much needs to be said about this amendment. It is a desirable amendment and should have the unanimous support of the committee. When the bill was before the special committee in 1940 numerous requests were made that the maximum should be raised, some hon. members suggesting a limit of $3,000 or $4,000. My memory is that the committee was favourable to increasing the maximum, but the government was opposed because the schedules had been worked out and the actuary claimed that it would upset the actuarial basis of the bill. I never thought that that was correct because the inclusion of these higher paid employees under the act would have benefited from an actuarial point of view. As the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) mentions, the purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Act is to spread the hazards of unemployment over all workers, those who have fairly permanent employment and those who have only seasonal or part-time employment. If we were to eliminate from the act those who are in the higher wage brackets, then we are making a case for excluding from the act those who are in sheltered employment. If the insurance scheme is to apply only to those who are bound to be out of work for part of the year, it would not be possible to make the rates high enough to carry the insurance on an actuarial basis. I insist that all workers should come under the act, that there should be no exception or no ceiling as far as annual wages are concerned. In the meantime I think it would be wise to accept this amendment. If the department or the government feel that the maximum should be increased, I think it will meet the wishes of the labour movement in general. I am in favour of the amendment.

Mr. GERSHAW: This resolution proposes an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I regret that the act cannot be further amended at this time because there is a great need in this country for insurance against sickness and invalidity. If a worker is injured and comes under the benefit of a workmen's compensation act, he has the chance of having an income, but if he is disabled on account of sickness, his income generally stops at once. Plans are under way for a comprehensive health insurance scheme and for other forms of social security, but this would seem to be the most suitable place to attach an amendment which would meet the hazards of sickness and invalidity in the homes of the workers.

Mr. GREEN: When the Unemployment Insurance Act was passed three years ago there was quite a lengthy debate about including loggers in British Columbia. At that time the government could not see fit to include them, but promised that an investigation would be made by the advisory committee which was to be set up. Could the parliamentary assistant tell us whether a report has been received and what is going to be done by the government with regard to the logging industry of British Columbia?

Mr. MARTIN: An interim report—it is more than an interim report, but that is the best way to describe it—has been received. Just as soon as it becomes administratively possible they will be included. Power is being sought under the proposed amendment by the unemployment insurance commission and the governor in council to include them at as early a date as possible.

Mr. GREEN: When is it expected that it will be possible to include them?

Mr. MARTIN: I would hope well before the next session of parliament.

Mr. JACKMAN: One of my colleagues asked how much had been paid into the insurance fund and how much had been paid out.

Mr. MARTIN: The payments in are as follows:

Employer and employee contributions	$ 93,871,960 55
Government contributions	18,774,392 11
Interest	1,861,625 09
	$114,507,977 75
Benefit payments	743,810 68
Balance	$113,764,167 07

The amount invested in government bonds as of May 15, 1943, is $107,376,737.57.

Mr. STIRLING: I understand the rate paid by the employee is thirty-six cents a week when he is earning $2,000.

Mr. MARTIN: That is the maximum, but it could be lower.

Mr. STIRLING: What would the employer's contribution be?

Mr. MARTIN: The employer's contribution would be twenty-seven cents maximum. The rates vary from eighteen cents minimum, in the case of the employer, to nine cents for the employed person, depending upon the amount of salary received. If my hon. friend cares to look it up, he will find this set out in the second schedule of the old act or at page ten of the present amended bill.

Mr. JACKMAN: The parliamentary assistant has not made it as clear as I should like to have it why the maximum was raised to $2,400 and not to $3,000, especially in view of the fact that the original request made when the bill was first discussed three years ago that the maximum be $2,500 was turned down. One of the chief reasons for turning it down was that the labour exchanges did not find themselves able to provide jobs for people in that range, because the jobs were too individualized once a man gets above $2,000. What is the present philosophy of the Department of Labour in that regard? If they have changed their ideas so far as providing jobs is concerned, why not raise the ceiling from $2,400 to $3,000 or some other figure.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member, I take it, was not in the house when the minister made his statement on that very point. He stated that, expressing his own wish, he would certainly agree to the $3,000 figure. The $2,400 figure was arrived at by the unemployment insurance advisory committee which held hearings at which employer and employee groups were represented, and the figure of $2,400 was the figure recommended to the minister on the basis of that inquiry. That is the reason why the $2,400 figure was accepted. It was the result of a compromise between employer and employee groups. So far as the minister himself was concerned, he said that he would have gladly gone to the $3,000 figure and expressed the hope that as many classes as possible could be brought within the act.

Mr. JACKMAN: I endeavoured to point out that the ceiling was fixed at $2,000 before, because the labour exchanges did not feel themselves adequate to providing jobs for workers above that figure because their jobs were too specialized. But you are now raising it to $2,400, and I want to know what the general principle is and whether the committee in charge of this matter feel that jobs could be provided for men in the $2,400 range; and if they can go that far, why not include men in the $3,000 range? I am interested in knowing the general principle behind the act, not what the committee's final decision was, but what their reasoning was for increasing the present ceiling to $2,400. Before the parliamentary assistant is through, I hope that he will let us know which of these associations were for and which against the ceiling of $2,400.

Mr. MARTIN: Replying to the last question, I have not that information before me. I would have to get it from the minutes of the committee, and that I shall endeavour to do. With regard to the other question, whether it is thought that jobs could be obtained, the answer is, yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Through the labour exchanges?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: Pursuing further the question raised by the hon. member for Rosedale with respect to the representations made by various bodies appearing before the advisory committee I have in mind the representations that were made by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. If I remember correctly they were against unemployment insurance in the first instance, but finally they came in line with the majority and favoured its introduction, although they felt that the time was not opportune. That was in 1940. But when they made representations before this committee later on they did definitely take the stand that the ceiling should not exceed $2,200. Is there any record of their representations on that occasion? I should also like to know what were the representations made by the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada, along what lines they argued as to the amount that should be fixed.

I have always been in favour of unemployment insurance and have advocated it from the very first, but there has been considerable criticism of bringing under it clerks who are permanently employed. They feel that there is nothing they can look forward to in unemployment insurance. That feeling is widespread, and in view of that I should like to know what stand was taken by the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada when they made their representations.

Mr. MARTIN: The Retail merchants' association did not object.

Mr. ISNOR: But did they make any represntations one way or the other?

Mr. MARTIN: I have to answer my hon. friend as I answered the hon. member for Rosedale. I have not the minutes of the committee before me, but I hope later to be able to give the hon. member that information. The Retail merchants' association did not object to the final conclusion.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand the parliamentary assistant to say that over $93,000,000 had been contributed by employers and employees. Could he tell us how much has been paid in by employers and how much by employees? Or did he give those figures? If he did, I did not get them.

Mr. MARTIN: I have not the exact figures before me, but it breaks pretty much fifty-fifty. I will try to have the exact figures later for my hon. friend.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Martin thereupon moved leave to introduce Bill No. 136, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, July 15, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to his majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Transport services—
1. Departmental administration, $26,960.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister propose on this item to make a statement with regard to war expenditures?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, there is no elaborate statement to be made about war expenditures of the Department of Transport. These are really incidental expenses in connection with the ordinary services, but additional services are being provided. They are merely increases in some of the branches: for example, transport controller, merchant seamen, canals service, marine service, and railway and steamship service, and a special item for railway equipment; providing for loans to the Canadian National Railways for two purposes, namely increasing the equipment, and the development of the Vermilion oil field.

I believe these estimates would be disposed of more quickly if on each item the desired information was requested, and I would attempt to give it.

Item agreed to.

Director of merchant seamen—
Headquarters administration, $73,190.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give the committee some account of the progress being made by the director of merchant seamen particularly with regard to the schools of seamen which have been set up, and how they are prospering?

Mr. MICHAUD: As hon. members know, this service is required in order to furnish the supply of merchant seamen required for the boats which have to be manned from our several Canadian ports. Also the pool is operated to accommodate British as well as foreign seamen who arrive on our shores on either British or foreign ships. This is being done through a working arrangement with Britain, and the expenses of the upkeep and payment of their basic wages while the seamen are here in the pool are reimbursed by Britain.

We have our pools in Halifax, Saint John, Montreal, and Vancouver, and we are establishing one at Sydney, a subsidiary pool to Halifax, in order to accommodate the merchant ships which come to that port. In each place we have what we think are, what we are trying to make, suitable quarters to take care of these seamen, who, when they arrive at our shores, never know, owing to the exigencies of war, when they will be called upon to go back. They cannot be expected to live on the ships, while they are waiting for the return trip. They receive their basic wage, and they are boarded and lodged in the pool until they receive employment. The great difficulty is to get trained officers in Canada. Heretofore we had a very small merchant navy. For the obvious reason that there was no great demand for officers, few of our boys trained. With the immediately increased demand we had to resort to Britain for our requirements, and I am happy to state that Britain has provided so far, and has given assurance that we shall be provided at least until September, sufficient officers to man the ships, and the crews will be Canadian. In view of the large requirements we have taken steps to provide for the training of some engineers and navigators. We have a school at Prescott, Ontario, and another school at St. Margaret's, Nova Scotia. Both schools have done exceedingly well and have provided quite a number of officers, who have been absorbed, as fast as they got their certificates, into our merchant navy. I may here give some details which might be of interest to the committee.

Each ship requires either forty-three or forty-seven officers and men. We get the officers from Britain and certified engineers and firemen from our schools. We expect that, if things go well, we shall have seventy-five ships manned by August—and not only manned, but sailing the high seas. We provide the ordinary seamen from Canada, and the officers, masters and other special officers, from Britain. The supply, as I have stated, has been practically guaranteed up to September next.

Mr. STIRLING: This is from the pools?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, the officers are not taken from the pools.

Mr. STIRLING: No, not the officers, but the men.

Mr. MICHAUD: All the men are taken from the pools.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. GRAYDON: When the minister moved into his estimates on the Department of Transport war appropriations, I was out for a moment when departmental administration, which is the item upon which I should really be speaking, was passed. I had previously spoken to the minister and told him that I had a remark or so to make with respect to the general transportation situation, and if I may be permitted to give it now, I should like to do so.

Much has been said in the house from time to time since the war commenced about the major contribution being made on many sectors of our civilian front. I desire briefly to speak of and to pay tribute to the yeoman service being rendered by these scores of thousands of our Canadian people engaged in the railway transportation services of Canada. In my young days I had the honour of being an employee of one of the Canadian railway systems. I know something of the esprit de corps and the tradition of the railway transportation services, and I felt that I could not let this opportunity pass without saying a word on behalf of a great and important section of our people who on the civilian front are rendering a magnificent service under most difficult and trying conditions.

We take these services, I fear, too much for granted, largely because they operate without seeking to draw the attention of the public in any comprehensive way to the work which they are quietly and constantly performing.

Outside of agriculture, railway transportation is perhaps Canada's biggest war industry, and has shouldered a burden of war activity the extent of which few people in this dominion seem to realize. In 1939, the year war was declared, our Canadian railways carried 17,000,000 passengers, while in 1942 the number had increased to 42,000,000. Strained as the facilities were to meet these constantly increasing demands, with a man-power situation which left much to be desired, the employees of our railways may take much pride in the fact that, out of the 42,000,000 passengers carried last year, only 380 lives were lost from one end of Canada to the other in railway accidents. If we bear in mind the swollen conditions of passenger traffic, and the added responsibility of moving special troop trains, the loss of life is amazingly small, constituting less than one person in every 100,000 persons carried. The efficient care and constant concern of the railwaymen for the safety of their passengers has been so maintained in these war years that the ratio of death through accident is actually much lower than it was in the leisurely years of peace.

In 1939, our railways carried 69 million tons of revenue freight; in 1942, this was increased to 107 million tons.

What more could be asked of, and what more could be given by these loyal employees of both railroads? They deserve the undying gratitude of a thankful Canadian people who have seen them measure up on the civilian front in the same way as their brother-employees are doing on the sea, on the land, and in the air in our armed forces.

Among Canadian National employees who have joined up, there are in the navy sufficient to man nine destroyers; enlistments in the active army are sufficient to form six infantry battalions; and Canadian National men in the air force would establish eleven air squadrons. Add to this, 1,000 officers and men of the Canadian National Steamships on active service on all the seas.

As of November 30 last, which is the last record I could obtain, and perhaps these numbers must be increased because of lapse of time, Canadian Pacific Railway employees enrolled in the armed forces from the eastern and western lines, and from the overseas office included: 4,263, army; 1,039, navy; 1,622, air force and 586 others, making a grand total of 7,510. On active service from Canadian Pacific Steamships, express and air lines, there are another 6,087.

On the war front, and on the home front, Canadian men of the rails are giving their best, are giving their all, in the cause for which this nation fights so that it may be brought to a successful conclusion.

Hats off! to the railway employees of Canada. No tribute which this House of Commons or the people of Canada can pay them will do justice to the contribution which they are so quietly but so effectively making at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: I had hoped that the minister, in describing what had been accomplished by the director of merchant seamen, would tell the committee something with regard to the school recently set up to which youngsters can go and be trained.

Mr. MICHAUD: I was about to come to that. I was going to describe the way we are trying to recruit crews for our Canadian-built ships. We have two training schools, one marine engineering instructional school, opened on January 1, 1942, at Kingston, but transferred on April 1 of that year to Prescott, Ontario, in a government-owned building. We have been training boys in marine engineering, the capacity being eighty trainees each six weeks, although the average has been about sixty. I am glad to be able to say that these boys have all been absorbed and have given excellent service, and had it not been for these facilities we would not have been able to get the engineers required. The age limit is from eighteen to thirty.

Mr. STIRLING: What length is that course of training?

Mr. MICHAUD: Six weeks. While they are in that school they are lodged and fed. After they graduate from that school, if we have not immediate employment for them they are transferred to the manning pool waiting to be called for service. Besides this school at Prescott, we have one at St. Margaret bay, at Hubbards, Nova Scotia. It was opened in July, 1942. The capacity is 115 to 140 trainees over a thirteen-week period. The age for admission to the school is from seventeen to twenty-two. So far we have had an average of about 125 for each course, and these graduates have volunteered for service on completing their course. These are the two schools that are operated under the director of merchant seamen for the purpose of giving initial training to boys and men for the Canadian navy.

Mr. STIRLING: With regard to the second school the minister mentioned, does he mean that 125 are turned out every thirteen weeks?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to draw to the attention of the minister complaints that were forwarded to me by certain persons on behalf of the crew of the ss. Lady Laurier. The minister will recall that members of the crew of this ship some time ago staged a walk-out on account of the conditions prevailing on the ship.

I have a statement signed by two members of the crew which I should like to read to the committee. This indicates conditions which in my opinion are really disgraceful and which should not be tolerated if we are to have any hope of building up a merchant marine in this country. Though I did not go into the question of working conditions when we were dealing with questions of transport on the estimates of the Department of Munitions and Supply, I may tell the committee that practically the same conditions prevail on the Pacific coast. This statement reads:

To whom it may concern:

We, the following members of the crew of the ss. Lady Laurier, operated by the Department of Transport, do hereby swear the following to be true and correct.

After we had protested on several occasions against the wages and conditions on the above mentioned vessel, we gave fourteen days' notice of our intention of leaving the job, unless the said wages and conditions were improved. At the end of that time we signed off the articles, leaving the ship.

Having left the ship, several of us attempted to obtain employment on other ships through the selective service. We were told by the local agent of the selective service that we must either return to the Lady Laurier or go into the army.

Although only seven days' notice were required to leave a job and we had given fourteen days' notice, we were refused good discharges, were reported "DR" as to character.

I do not know what those two letters mean in seafaring parlance.

This discharge was issued without any shipping master being present, although the Canada Shipping Act states very clearly that it is an offence to give any such bad discharge unless entered in the official log of the ship and issued in the presence of a shipping master.

As I have already said, this statement is signed by two members of the crew. I should be glad if the minister would make a statement in regard to these charges.

Mr. MICHAUD: I have never seen the declaration which has been read by the hon. member. If the members of the crew of S.S. Lady Laurier presented their case to their superior officers of the naval service of the Department of Transport, their grievance never came to my attention until a copy of a letter written by an officer of the Canadian Seamen's Union in Halifax to a member of this house was shown to me, in which letter this gentleman, acting in behalf of allegedly dissatisfied seamen, brought their case to the attention of the hon. member in question. When the matter was brought to my notice a few days ago I made some inquiry and found that on June 3 a certain number of the crew of the S.S. Lady Laurier informed the master that they would not proceed on the next trip unless they were granted a bonus of $44.50, which bonus should not be subject to the income tax. On the return of the Lady Laurier to port, these men were informed that their demand for an increased war bonus could not be met, and then on June 11 fifteen left the ship. They received discharge certificates marked "DR", which in the naval vernacular means "declined to report." The men were directed back to the ship by national selective service, a few days later, and apparently have resumed their work, and I have not heard from them except through the hon. member for Cape Breton South and this afternoon through the hon. member for Vancouver East. It is possible that these dissatisfied members of the crew of the Lady Laurier brought their grievance to the attention of the master, but the facts which I have related were brought to my notice only a few days ago.

The allegations set out in their sworn declaration are substantially what has been reported to me by the officer of the marine department. Their wages could not be increased on demand, because they are subject to the war labour board and also to the schedule of pay received by all seamen on government boats. I know that some of these ordinary seamen feel that they should receive higher wages, and in some respects I am inclined to agree with them. So much so that when this matter was brought to my attention I caused some action to be taken with a view to increasing some of their allowances as much as was permissible within the rules. If this cannot be done to the extent I feel it should be done, then the matter will be brought to the attention of the war labour board and a request will be made for the increase which I believe they should be given.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to continue with respect to the matter I was talking about when the committee rose at six o'clock. I believe the minister said that after making some investigations in regard to the walk-off by the employees or sailors on the Lady Laurier he was satisfied there was some ground for complaint. I hope the minister, having come to that conclusion, will see that the abuses are rectified. Indeed, my opinion is, and I think it will be substantiated by any comparison of wage rates on Canadian and United States ships, that conditions and wages on Canadian ships are no credit either to the Canadian government or the people of Canada.

I will just give the minister and the committee a few figures with respect to wages paid on the ss. Lady Laurier. A fireman receives $80 a month. Added to that is board amounting to $19.50. Then, there is a bonus of $13.60, making a total of $113.10. But by the time the fireman is paid his wage, with the various taxes and deductions amounting to $43.80 he has only $69.30 left for the month. I think the minister will agree with me that that is not sufficient for a working man to live on.

In the month of June, the month in which the dispute on the Lady Laurier took place, the men had worked twenty-seven days on the ship. All in all, able seamen on the ship averaged fifteen hours a day. That is, for the twenty-seven days in June they worked 374 hours. For that they received a pay cheque amounting to $53 and a few cents. Is it any wonder that the dispute developed, and that the men gave notice to quit? May I point out that the men did not strike. They gave fourteen days' notice, although only seven days is required by law. Yet, when they went to apply for other jobs the selective service would not place them. In other words, one department of government pays such miserable wages people cannot live on them, and another department of government, after the employees have carried out all the instructions under the law, refuses them the protection of accepting other work. They were told, "You go back on the job, or go into the army." I say to the minister that that is not good enough. It is not the sort of thing for which the young men of our country are spilling their blood in Sicily to-day.

Would the minister inform the committee as to the amount of the war risk bonus paid on the Lady Laurier?

Mr. MICHAUD: Does the hon. member mean the war risk bonus?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes.

Mr. MICHAUD: The war risk bonus is twenty-five per cent of the basic wage. I am afraid the information the hon. member has just presented to the committee does not conform with the information I have just received regarding the same situation, and having to do with the men on the steamship Lady Laurier who were dissatisfied. My information is that these men did not work 374 hours, as was mentioned by the hon. member. I am told that in May they worked 266 hours and in June, 242 hours, a daily average of slightly over eight hours. This works out at approximately forty-two cents an hour for May and forty-five cents an hour for June, for the actual time worked during those two months.

With respect to the complaint by a fireman regarding a large deduction from his pay cheque in June, I would say that in compiling his wages, or the different figures which make up his wage cheque, he did not take into account the deduction of $19.50 for his board, which was not paid to him but was paid to the steward of the boat, and also his basic wage rate plus war risk bonus and cost of living bonus. Also there was a retirement fund deduction of $4. It is not fair to claim that that was taken off his cheque. It was simply held back, to be paid to him later on. I am informed that the actual deductions amounted to $24.30. Of that sum, $20.30 was for income tax, and $4 for retirement fund. So that instead of a deduction of $43.80, the actual deduction from the pay cheque was $24.30.

Mr. MacINNIS: The $19.50 does not matter so much, because it is counted in his wage in one place, and counted as a deduction in the other. So that the man will have a wage of $80 and a bonus of $13.60, making a total of $93.60. The income tax was $20.30, which left him $73.30. What is the war risk bonus on the Pacific coast?

Mr. MICHAUD: The war risk bonus for Canadian government merchant ships is $44.15. The Lady Laurier is not a merchant ship; she is a buoy-lifting ship which is doing some work on the coast and in the gulf of St. Lawrence. The figures for firemen, both single and married, are as follows:

	Single		Married
Basic wage	$80 00		$80 00
Cost of living bonus	13 60		18 42
Board allowance	20 15		20 15
War risk bonus	10 64		10 64
		$124 39		$129 21
Deductions:
Income tax	$24 10		$13 40
Retirement fund	4 00		4 00
Board allowance	20 15		20 15
		48 25		37 55
		$ 76 14		$ 91 66

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the war risk bonus on the Lady Laurier been increased since this complaint was made?

Mr. MICHAUD: Negotiations are under way for increasing the war risk bonus, but I do not think the order increasing it has actually been made.

Mr. MacINNIS: Some weeks ago I directed attention to the difference in wages paid by the Park Steamship company—that is on government boats—and privately-owned ships on the Pacific coast. I should like to make another comparison. Sailors on the Pacific coast operating Canadian ships continually meet sailors from United States ships and of course working conditions and wages are compared. I should like to put on the record the wages paid by privately-owned Canadian ships on the Pacific coast, and those paid by United States ships, and I would ask hon. members to note also that the rates paid by the Park Steamship company are considerably less. These are for privately-owned ships, not government-owned. The wages are:

	Canadian	United States
Quartermaster	$80 00	$105 00
Winchman	80 00	110 00
Able seaman	75 00	100 00
Ordinary seaman ...	55 00	82 50

The wages paid by the Park Steamship company are less than those paid by privately-owned ships and are little better than one-half what are paid on United States ships. When you come to the officers the situation is as bad, if not worse. The salary paid to the master of a United States ship is not given, but the master of a Canadian ship receives $250. The other officers are paid the following:

	Canadian	United States
First mate	$165 00	$316 25
Second mate	135 00	253 00
Third mate	110 00	224 25

The wages paid to below-deck officers bear the same relation to each other. I suggest to the minister that he should take some steps at least to bring the wages paid by the Park Steamship company into line with those paid on other Canadian vessels.

Mr. NEILL: Since this item has to do with merchant seamen, I presume I am in order to speak on it, although I did not know that the Minister of Transport had anything to do with this subject. It appears that on December 19, 1942, order in council P.C. 11397 was passed. Perhaps I might invite the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to this, because it seems to be under his jurisdiction. Apparently there had been an order passed some eighteen months before that, known as the merchant seamen's order. The purpose of it was to expedite the departure of ships, but apparently it was not working very well for it was amended five times. Then, in December last they wiped out the whole thing and started afresh. My opinion is that they have not made things much better.

The order works something like this. The Minister of Justice may nominate two men, and two men only, to compose a committee of investigation which may inquire into the conduct of any seaman, picked up when and where you like. This investigation is preliminary to an inquiry which may be held later on. One man represents the naval services and the other the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but it really means that one man is the committee, because subsection 3 of section 3 of the order states that the naval service man shall be the chairman and his decision shall prevail. In other words, he is the whole committee. As I say, this committee has authority to investigate the conduct of any seaman wherever he may be.

The evidence may be taken by way of affidavit. Any lawyer will know how unfair that type of proceeding is to the accused, because the man who is giving the evidence by affidavit cannot be cross-examined, and there is no chance to have him modify the affidavit which he may have made weeks or months before. The case might arise when some captain or mate is busy loading a ship and is anxious to get away. A seaman comes along, perhaps after having a drink or two, and gives the officer some impudence. Next day the officer goes and makes an affidavit, but the case does not come up for a week or a month. By this time the officer may be at sea, and the affidavit cannot be modified as perhaps he would like to do. As I have said, there is no opportunity to cross-examine. It will also be remembered by those of us who are familiar with the naval and marine services that there is a vast difference in discipline between the two. Is it not Shakespeare who says:

> That in the captain's but a choleric word,
> Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy.

In any of these shipping towns you can hear language among seamen which would be very different from what would be allowed in the naval service. Their relationships are much more easy in the merchant service.

This investigation is to determine whether a prima facie case has been made out against the man, but nine times out of ten the man is not there and knows nothing about it, and the investigation is held in his absence. This investigation is held on the strength of the affidavit of a man who made it weeks or months before and has probably gone away and forgotten all about it, or, if he thinks about it, wishes he had not made it.

I particularly call attention to the circumstances under which the committee can order a man arrested. He is not summonsed; he is arrested and put in gaol. Under the various subsections of section 6 of the order this one-man committee can issue an order to arrest a seaman if this one-man committee is satisfied—that is the criterion—that he is "likely to be" responsible for causing any delay in the departure of a ship or is "likely to refuse" to sail on a ship or is "likely to refuse" to perform his duties on a ship or is "likely to induce" other seamen to interfere or is "likely to carry on" any subversive activities. The committee does not have to be satisfied that the man has done any of these things—not for one minute. It has only to be satisfied in the man's absence that he is "likely" to do them. I suppose the committee looks at a man's photograph and says: "This is a bad man; we do not like his looks; we will send him to gaol because he is 'likely' to do anything." We are all "likely" to do anything, and if all of us here had to go to gaol because of things we are "likely" to do, it would be just too bad.

A sailor can be arrested without warning simply because this one-man board thinks he "is likely to" do something. Is it anything approximating British justice to arrest a man because somebody thinks he "is likely to" do something wrong?

Having ordered the man's arrest, the committee finds a prima facie case against him and submits it to the board of inquiry. The board of inquiry is appointed in the same way —no; it is even worse because the procedure there is this. The board of inquiry supposedly consists of a representative from each of three different departments, but it is provided that two will suffice and that where a quorum consists of two only, the decision of the chairman shall prevail. Another one-man court, and it all boils down to an officer in the naval service.

It is also provided that the original committee, or one member of it, shall be a competent witness before the board of inquiry. There is another case of making the thing a hole-in-the-corner affair. There again the board is empowered to convict this man just because he is likely to do something or to refuse to do something. How in the name of providence can you know what a man is likely to do until you tell him to do it? You take a look at him, I suppose, and say: "He is bad medicine; we will put him in gaol for three months." They can give him three months in gaol, but before the end of the three months he is brought forward again, and after taking into account the seaman's "attitude"—they take a look at him, I suppose, and say, "we do not like his looks"—if he comes up smiling, he is impudent, and if he looks gloomy, he is sullen —in any case he is a bad egg—after taking into account his attitude, if they think his attitude is not exactly what they like, they can send him back to gaol for six months. It is three months the first time, then six months, and if a total of nine months is not enough they can recommend his internment. They can at any time adjourn, and in the meantime the seaman has to stay in gaol. There is no sworn information laid as we know it in ordinary cases. There is no trial by a magistrate. The trial takes place before this self-appointed board of inquiry where the seaman has no advocate and no choice at all. He is not tried before an ordinary magistrate. Does not magna charta preserve the right of everybody to be tried before a jury of his peers? Can you call a naval officer a suitable man to be the peer of a seaman in the merchant service? I am not a lawyer, but I can see that there is no protection there for the seaman.

I would ask, is this procedure fair; is it just, or is it justified? Because some drunken sailor, perhaps meeting the mate off his ship in a saloon, using sailor language says to him that he will be so-and-so if he sails under such a slave driver, he can be railroaded into gaol for nine months and interned thereafter.

I am not exaggerating at all, because the committee:

> . . . may in any case wherein an investigation has been conducted, direct in writing that any seaman be temporarily detained, if it is satisfied that there are grounds for believing that such seaman—

Remember it has only to be satisfied that there are grounds for believing; it has not to be convinced at all.

> (a) has been responsible or is likely to be responsible for causing delay in the departure of a ship.

A telegraph boy carrying a telegram may delay the sailing of a ship. Is he to go to gaol or be interned? Then (b):

> (b) has deserted or is absent without leave in Canada from his ship.

That is reasonable. Then (c):

> (c) has refused or is likely to refuse to sail on a ship;
> (d) has refused or is likely to refuse to perform his regular duties on board a ship;

(e) has induced or attempted to induce, or is likely to induce or attempt to induce other seamen to interfere in any way with the proper operation of the ship.

If one man says to another, "This is a h—— of a hole," that, I suppose, is attempting to induce another seaman to interfere with the operation of the ship. Then (f):

(f) has carried on or is likely to carry on any subversive activities, whether on board his ship or otherwise.

And then the same process is repeated all over again. We are supposed to be fighting a war for liberty. I remember that some years ago the then Minister of Mines and Resources, at the instigation of an Indian agent, brought in a bill making it a criminal offence liable to six or twelve months in gaol for a man even to think of holding a potlatch, which is an illegal ceremony, banned by the government, quite properly, in connection with certain Indian rites. That was to give the Indian agent some help in securing a conviction, because before that you had actually to catch the Indians doing it. So that he got the government to bring in this clause which said that a man could be hauled up and punished if he only had it in his mind, and the person who decided whether it was in his mind or not was the Indian agent who had him arrested. If you call that British justice! It only had to be presented to this house to be laughed out of court; it was so utterly against every principle of justice. Suppose there has been some trouble with a ship getting away; then by all means punish people who do anything subversive in the way of holding up a ship or trying to induce other men not to work; but why should a seaman be subject to all these restrictions and injustices? Are we to go back 200 years, and restore the methods of the press-gang, when they went along and dragged away a likely-looking man and put him in the hold and he found himself 200 miles at sea a day or two later. They used to do those things, but we do not do them now. Why should we inflict such a severe penalty without anything being proved against a man except that he may be likely or he is likely to do so-and-so? I do not expect the Minister of Transport to answer; possibly he knows nothing about it; but I should like the Minister of Justice to give us his idea as to whether he thinks that is justified.

Mr. MICHAUD: I did not catch the first few sentences that the hon. member stated. Would he be kind enough to give me the number and the first few words of the order in council of which he is complaining?

Mr. NEIL: Yes.

[Mr. Neill.]

P.C. 11397

At the Government House at Ottawa

Saturday, the 19th day of December, 1942.

Present: His Excellency the Governor General in Council:

Whereas by order in council P.C. 2385, dated 4th April, 1941, an Order Affecting Discipline of Merchant Seamen was made, to be cited as "The Merchant Seamen Order"—

That is under the authority of the governor general.

And whereas the purpose of the said order is to prevent delay in the departure of merchant ships from Canadian ports during the present emergency, and to provide that if delay occurs or is anticipated as being likely to occur by reason of the activities of a member or members of the crew of any such ship, there can be taken in respect of such member or members of any such crew such action as will prevent delay in the departure of any ship, and which will serve as a deterrent to members of the crew of any other such ship who might contemplate like activity.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think that explains the reason for the order in council. That is a war measure, passed to prevent mutiny, delays in sailings or departures from ports, through some members of the crew who might be on board as spies, or unfriendly, thereby developing a situation which would hold up the whole crew and the boat. These rules are made to assure the disciplining of that person or those persons, and at the same time prevent during war time the delaying of merchant ships which might have to depart at a certain moment and, indeed, must depart at the moment which is stated, on account of the difficulties of sailing on the high seas through enemy interference. The order is made for that purpose. It is a war order.

Mr. NEILL: The minister used the word "mutiny." Lord bless me; we have never been in sight of mutiny. It says, if you are "likely to do" these things, "likely to refuse" to sail—

Mr. MICHAUD: Well?

Mr. NEILL: Not, that the man has refused to sail—

Mr. MICHAUD: That is mutiny.

Mr. NEILL: —but that he "is likely to." Has anything happened in the last few years in connection with sailing ships which would justify such an extreme measure? I recall an occasion when a Turkish sultan boasted to the English ambassador, "I know how to stop crime. There was a baker discovered giving short-weight in his shop one day, and we put the baker in his oven and baked him, and there has not been any case of short-weight since then." But that was a long time ago, and that is not the British system of doing things.

Mr. MICHAUD: My hon. friend understands that during the war all kinds of nationalities are represented in the crews of these ships. When foreign ships or British ships arrive at the port of Vancouver or Halifax or Saint John we do not know the character and background of these men. This was passed to prevent any possibility of any one or two or more men on board a ship holding up the ship for a few days and preventing its sailing when the road is clear.

Mr. NEILL: The minister says that we do not know the background of these men, and their character, and what they are likely to do. I do not know the background of half the hon. gentlemen in this house and I do not know what they are likely to do.

Mr. GRAYDON: You have a pretty good idea in some cases.

Mr. NEILL: We do not know what we would do under temptation. Some of us are likely to do anything.

Mr. MICHAUD: My hon. friend does not suggest that we apply these rules to the members of this house.

Mr. NEILL: Absolutely. If it is good for one man it is good for another. You cannot show that there is any mutiny or delay on ships, and you are taking an enormous power which cannot be justified. I will sit down and say no more if the minister says that it is a square deal. I ask him if he thinks it is.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. NEILL: Never mind its being carried.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Has the hon. member any factual case to which have been applied any regulations which would violate the rights of a man concerned? It sometimes happens that these war orders are drawn by gentlemen who have recently come into the service and who make them just as stringent as the English language can provide. I have been concerned about the terms of some of these orders. I have had a number of them redrafted, and have expressed to those who are charged with enforcing them that mere convenience was not enough to justify departure from the ordinary rules of procedure, that it is only when it is necessary for the security of the state that there should be any such departure, and many of them have been "toned down," shall I say, in expression. If the hon. member knows of any case to which rules have been applied which have really prejudiced the man's rights and the manner in which he should be treated, I should be glad to know the facts and I would at once follow the matter up—

Mr. GRAYDON: You might tone it down a bit.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —and point out how this power should be used. I have had to make, at the request of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, quite a large number of appointments to committees of this kind, and no instance has been called to my attention of harsh or unfair treatment having been meted out to anyone. But even that, I would admit, would not justify some of the terms which apparently are included in this order. I do not remember when it originated, but had it been one of the orders submitted to the department recently for redrafting it would not be in that form; and had there been any case in which a man's rights have been interfered with it would have come to my attention.

Mr. NEILL: Not necessarily. The statement made by the Minister of Justice is entirely satisfactory to me. If he makes the statement that he will look into that particular order in council I shall be quite satisfied with what he does with it. I have not any specific case before me. I am not familiar with what goes on around Montreal, or even Vancouver, but the very fact that the order is in effect indicates that it will be used from time to time. If the minister will look at it and agree, if in his judgment it is necessary, that it be redrafted, I would be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. MICHAUD: Since the order has been passed, no case has been brought to the attention of the Department of Transport where any seaman has had occasion to complain, or where it has been necessary to apply these rules.

Mr. NEILL: But take a man from Yugoslavia, or Russia, or Liverpool as far as that goes, and he gets a raw deal in Montreal or Vancouver; can the minister tell me what facilities an ignorant man has for reaching him?

Mr. MICHAUD: I think they can find channels, and they do complain.

5. Marine service—

Marine service steamers including reconditioning of C.G.S. Lady Grey, and war risk bonus, $275,000.

Aids to navigation, $50,000.

Compensation to Canadian crews for loss of personal effects, $100,000.

Nautical services, $63,460.

Mr. REID: Can the minister tell us the number of Canadian crews, and the amount of money paid last year for compensation? I notice in the estimates this year there is $22,000 odd of an increase. How many seamen received compensation, and what is the total amount paid?

Mr. MICHAUD: In 1940-41 there was an expenditure of $4,972; in 1941-42, $21,649, and in 1942-43 the expenditure was $77,893. The total is $104,514, the average being $135 per claim.

Mr. REID: How many claims were there?

Mr. MICHAUD: I have not the number of claims, but the average was $135.

Mr. MacINNIS: This is a queer mixture of items; marine service steamers, including reconditioning of C.G.S. Lady Grey, and war risk bonus. Would the minister give a breakdown of the item. How much is for marine service steamers, how much for reconditioning the Lady Grey, and how much for war risk bonus?

Mr. MICHAUD: The amount estimated for this year is $275,000. The estimated requirements will be for the Canadian government steamship M. B. Maclean, $30,000; C.G.S. Brant, $11,150; Canadian government steamship Druid, $18,850; operating costs of miscellaneous steamers to cover out-of-pocket expenses, extra fuel and supply while engaged in incidental war work for Department of National Defence, navy, air and Newfoundland government, salvage by civic authorities, which are not provided for in the regular vote. At Halifax we have the Franklin, the Lady Laurier and the ice-breaker Sorel; at Saint John, the Dollard and the Laurentian; at Quebec, the Bernier and the Ernest Lapointe; at Montreal, the Safeguarder; at Prescott, the Granville; at Parry Sound, the St. Heliers; at Victoria, the Estevan, and at Prince Rupert, the Alberni, $50,000. The estimate for repairs is $25,000, and the allotted amount for unexpected extra costs, $15,000. Of course the Lady Grey had to be reconditioned, and the amount estimated to be spent on her was $25,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: How much is for war risk bonus? There cannot be very much left.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. MICHAUD: The amount for war risk bonus is $80,000.

Mr. REID: Where is St. Charles river?

Mr. MICHAUD: That is near the city of Quebec.

Item agreed to.

6. Railway and steamship service—

Degaussing equipment for Canadian registry vessels, $300,000.

Additional harbour facilities at Halifax, $481,000.

Assistance to Canadian National Railway for development of Steep Rock mines, $400,000.

Refloating and repairing ss. Cornwallis, damaged by enemy action, $600,000.

Government Employees' Compensation Act—administration, $61,500.

Mr. REID: How many vessels were degaussed last year? Is it the policy to degauss all vessels of Canadian registry? What is the average cost?

Mr. MICHAUD: The Canadian government absorbs the total cost of degaussing all Canadian registered ships as well as foreign conflict vessels either seized as prizes or requisitioned by the Canadian government, which have been or may be fitted with special defence apparatus. This applies to all ships of Canadian registry and foreign ships either seized or requisitioned.

Mr. REID: I notice that assistance is being given to the Canadian National Railways to the extent of $400,000 in connection with the Steep Rock mines. I am not objecting to the appropriation to put the line through, but that should come under ordinary estimates.

Mr. MICHAUD: First, as to degaussing, the total number of ships last year was twenty-six.

Mr. REID: And as regards the Canadian National appropriation, I suggest that that is hardly an expenditure that should come under war appropriation. It is a long-term expenditure for plant.

Mr. MICHAUD: This is an expenditure that need not necessarily be paid except in instalments on requisition from Canadian National Railways. It is an advance to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do I understand that this is an advance for the current year and that further payments are to be made?

Mr. MICHAUD: This is an estimate for the current year.

Mr. COLDWELL: But that will go on for several years.

Mr. MICHAUD: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the total amount that will be paid on this account? Is this an instalment?

Mr. MICHAUD: This is the estimated cost of construction of a spur line to the main line of the Canadian National at a point 150 miles west of Port Arthur to the Steep Rock mines property. The estimated cost is $400,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the total cost?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes; that is the total cost.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like the minister to break down the item of $481,000 for additional harbour facilities at Halifax.

Mr. MICHAUD: The original estimate was $281,000, and it is represented that an additional $200,000 will be required to complete the work.

Mr. ISNOR: What particular work is it?

Mr. MICHAUD: The break-down is as follows: construction of scows, $30,000; repairs to scow dock, $15,000; rental of tugs, $36,000; miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, to provide for new works and improvements that may be authorized during 1943-44, $200,000, making a total of $281,000. The $200,000 estimated for further requirements will be in connection with the construction of living accommodation for additional freight handlers and stevedores.

Mr. JACKMAN: In connection with the item of $400,000 in regard to Steep Rock, is there any provision for getting that money back as ore is shipped over the line, and does the money go to the Canadian National or does it come back to the government indirectly, through the Canadian National?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is an advance of capital to the Canadian National Railways in order to make possible the building of that spur line. As no doubt the hon. member is aware, the cost of this work is to be refunded to the Canadian National Railways by Steep Rock Mines Limited, when it is in operation, at the rate of twenty cents per ton. Here are the details. This is to help meet the cost of construction of a spur from a point on the main line of the Canadian National railway about 150 miles west of Port Arthur to the Steep Rock Mines company's property near Atikokan, and the construction of an ore dock at Port Arthur. The estimated cost of these facilities is from two to two and a half million dollars; such sums or amounts as may be earned by the railway company in respect of assistance toward the transportation of ore, to the extent of twenty cents per ton on the first five million tons of ore handled, subject to having reserved therefrom an amount of six cents per ton to be applied to amortization of the cost of construction of the above mentioned spur and ore dock. There will be six cents per ton retained for the amortization of the cost of building the dock and the spur line.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does that six cents go to the Canadian National, and is it in turn refunded to the government? In regard to the $400,000, does the government take back a note from the Canadian National, or is it simply a war expenditure for which no tangible evidence is retained by the government? What are the transactions when you deal with this $400,000? Do you simply give it to the Canadian National for the construction of the spur line, or do you take back a note from the Canadian National, which note will be liquidated out of the six cents per ton on the ore which may be handled in future?

Mr. MICHAUD: We make a contract with the Canadian National, and these are the terms of that contract.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is the $400,000 a liability on the books of the Canadian National?

Mr. MICHAUD: No.

Mr. JACKMAN: Or is it for the time being a gift by way of a war expenditure by the government?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is not a liability on the books of the Canadian National; it is a war expenditure, and the agreement provides that if the Canadian National are recouped, then they recoup the crown.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is something like the aluminum deal; if the property is used, the money will be paid back, but if it is not used, the money will not be paid back.

Mr. MacNICOL: It will never be paid back anyway.

Mr. JACKMAN: Then, in regard to the item of $300,000 for degaussing equipment for Canadian registry vessels, who does this work? Is it done by the government, or is there a contract with somebody else?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is done by the technical officers of the Department of National Defence for Naval Services.

Mr. JACKMAN: I should like to ask a question in regard to the steamship Lady Grey. Is that boat owned by the Canadian National West Indies steamship line?

Mr. MICHAUD: No; it is owned by the department.

Mr. JACKMAN: I thought all the Lady boats were supposed to be owned by the West Indies line.

Mr. MICHAUD: The modern Lady boats were owned by the West Indies line, but not old boats like the Lady Laurier and the Lady Grey, which were built for the government service thirty-six years ago.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did I understand the minister to say that included in the $481,000 for the port of Halifax, there is $200,000 for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenditures?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes; $200,000 is provided for unforeseen expenditures during the year.

Mr. COLDWELL: That seems rather a large amount for unforeseen expenditures.

Mr. MICHAUD: It would be at any other place than Halifax during the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: Saint John, for example?

Mr. MICHAUD: Well, in connection with Saint John we might find that we have to make many expenditures that were unforeseen a few months ago.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister be good enough to explain this item of $600,000 in connection with refloating and repairing the steamship Cornwallis? Whose ship is it?

Mr. MICHAUD: It belonged to the West Indies line. It was torpedoed, and it was thought by both the underwriters and the officials of the company that it would be cheaper to refloat and refit the boat and put her back into service than to build a new boat to take her place.

Mr. JACKMAN: Who owns the ship now?

Mr. MICHAUD: The crown will own the boat, and I suppose will have to fight it out with the Canadian National as to whether the salvage would have been greater than the amount spent to refit her. But that matter has not been determined yet, because the boat is not in commission.

Mr. KINLEY: Was she insured?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: I think this would be an appropriate place for me to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport the disaster which took place in Bedford basin a short time ago, in which nineteen lives were lost. I realize, of course, that a public inquiry is in progress at the present time. I am most interested in providing equipment in the future, such as diving equipment, so that it may be on hand to be used immediately for rescue work, in the event of our being so unfortunate as to meet again with such a disaster. I am informed there is no suitable equipment at Halifax or at Bedford basin, and I believe there should be. I have received letters asking me to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, and I do so knowing that he will realize the importance of Halifax harbour, and the dangers which must lurk there on account of the heavy traffic passing in and out. I would ask him to take these points into consideration, having in mind the possibility of procuring diving and other equipment which might be required.

Mr. MICHAUD: This question is now under consideration.

Item agreed to.

Purchase of railway equipment for Canadian National Railways, 1941 orders, $4,883,664; 1942 orders, $24,543,000.

Mr. ISNOR: We have very little opportunity to discuss either in the committee or the house matters affecting the Canadian National Railways. Therefore I shall take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the committee a condition existing in respect of trains operating out of Halifax. I recently made an inquiry of the minister, in reply to which a return was tabled a few days ago. My question had to do with the number of trains operating between Halifax and Moncton and Moncton and Campbellton. The reply I received was that whereas there were three trains operating between Halifax and Moncton, there were four operating between Moncton and Campbellton.

This is not a question of my province against the minister's native province; it is not a question of Nova Scotia against New Brunswick. But the minister cannot help being aware of the heavy traffic being carried at the extreme eastern end of the Canadian National Railways. He knows that practically no train leaves Halifax which is not overcrowded; and that applies to all trains. The Ocean Limited and the Scotian leave in the morning, and the Maritime in the afternoon; and all are crowded. I would urge that the minister take into consideration the providing of extra trains to fill the much needed requirements from Halifax northward.

I do not wish to take up the time of the committee in giving details as to population, the number of stops and the places served by these trains, but I would say that the three trains running between Halifax and Moncton serve a population of 127,000 along the line, as compared with a population of 43,000 or 44,000 served by the trains running between Moncton and Campbellton.

Then, I would bring to the minister's attention the matter of the running time, particularly as it applies to the Maritime. The running time of that train is eight hours and thirty minutes from Campbellton to Halifax. It appears to me, and also to a great many railwaymen who have been in the service for a long time, that this train could be speeded up to a certain extent. This would help to relieve the situation, and give the minister an opportunity to provide additional trains between the others I mentioned, namely, the Ocean Limited, the Scotian and the Maritime. It might be possible to put on additional trains, or to add second or third sections to the trains now running.

We in the maritimes certainly appreciate the good service we receive from the Canadian National Railways, so far as they are able to serve us. This observation applies particularly, I believe, to train crews and the handling of freight. But I must say we are not satisfied with the passenger service, because we do not think the community is being served in the manner in which we believe it should be served.

Mr. MICHAUD: I can appreciate what has prompted the senior hon. member for Halifax to present his case. I know that on many previous occasions he has described the situation to me, and of course he is more familiar with local conditions than I am. Nevertheless he must realize the situation which exists on the railway lines between Moncton and Halifax. If there is any shortage of passenger facilities between those points, he will understand it is not owing to any ill-will, negligence or antipathy on the part of railway officials. It is owing to conditions which are well known, and cannot be overlooked. However, I shall be pleased to direct the attention of the administrators of the line to the remarks of the hon. member.

Mr. ISNOR: May I thank the minister for his reply. However, I would emphasize one point I made in only a casual way. There are four regular trains serving the district between Moncton and Campbellton, whereas there are only three between Halifax and Moncton. In view of the respective populations of these communities, I say that service should be reversed, and there should be four trains between Halifax and Moncton and three between Moncton and Campbellton. I leave that point with the minister.

Mr. MICHAUD: I agree that in normal times what the hon. member has said might be so. But he must realize that there is a tremendous congestion of traffic between Moncton and Halifax, a much greater amount than on other sections. Three lines meet at Moncton. There is a single track from Moncton to Halifax.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is this amount for rolling stock and equipment?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it for passenger and freight engines and cars? May I say, incidentally, that I believe the Canadian National Railways are giving a splendid service. We have to use the railways a great deal in travelling from here to the west, and I can state that both railways are doing their best. However, there is a terrific shortage of equipment, and perhaps we have had a good opportunity to note that fact. The senior hon. member for Halifax has probably noted the shortage in respect of dining-cars. I have seen people standing two or three hours in line to get into the car for their meals. I believe that is due not only to the shortage of dining-cars, but also to the shortage of help. How is this sum divided? Are freight cars receiving priority, or does the priority go to passenger cars or to engines? What is being done?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am afraid the hon. member will be disappointed. There is no provision for passenger accommodation. We have to give priority to other equipment, and in these days it is impossible to get passenger equipment out of the shops. I shall give a list of the requirements covered by these amounts.

Out of the 1941 appropriation of $25,000,000 there is a balance of $4,863,664.23 unexpended. This is to cover the cost of 742 box cars and fifty baggage cars. On the 1942 programme there is an amount of $24,543,000 to cover the cost of thirty locomotives, 300 refrigerator cars, 1,750 hopper cars, 200 flat cars and 4,000 box cars.

Mr. COLDWELL: I realize that under war conditions freight cars should have a priority, but the fact is that there have been lay-offs in some of the railway shops. I do not know very much about the Canadian National shops, but I do know there have been lay-offs in the Ogden shops at Calgary and I believe there have also been some at the Transcona shops. I wonder if we have not reached the point where, if we can get steel, we should be able to utilize some of these men who are experienced in building railway cars to build more passenger cars, even if we have to make a larger appropriation. As I said before, the railroads are giving the best service they can under very difficult conditions, but the travelling public is feeling the effect of the shortage of railway accommodation.

Mr. MICHAUD: I fully appreciate what my hon. friend has said, but he has touched the point when he says, "if we can get steel." If we could get steel, we would do it.

Item agreed to.

8. Loan to Canadian National Railways for development of Vermilion oil fields, $600,000.

Mr. FAIR: Could the minister give us some particulars of the work that is being carried on in the Vermilion oil field and the progress that is being made?

Mr. MICHAUD: This is a loan to be made to Canadian National Railways. On October 1, 1942, an order in council was passed authorizing the incorporation of a company to be operated by or on behalf of Canadian National Railways to carry on the development of the Vermilion oil field. The Canadian National Railways investigated this oil field and alternate sources of supply and recommended the development of this field of over 600 acres, which is sufficient to support fifty productive wells. Another order in council was passed authorizing an advance by way of loan to Canadian National Railways of a sum not exceeding $1,000,000, with interest at three and a half per cent per annum, repayable in five years. The subsidiary company is to refund to the railway company the net proceeds from the sale of oil after proper royalties, interest, operating and other incorporate expenses have been paid, the railway company in turn to apply such proceeds to the reduction of such loan. Any remaining obligation to the government when the operations are wound up are to be discharged by Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the Canadian National Railways actually drilling wells and producing oil?

Mr. MICHAUD: That is what I am informed.

Mr. MacNICOL: For its own use?

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not know to what extent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Surely it would not be producing oil to sell in competition with other producers?

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. MICHAUD: Not to compete against oil producers.

Mr. FAIR: Why was it necessary for the Canadian National to go in there? Was the company which is in there already not producing sufficient oil?

Mr. MICHAUD: This matter was discussed on a former occasion by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. The actual working would not come under our supervision; we have it incidentally because the sum was advanced through the Department of Transport to Canadian National Railways.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do I understand the minister to say that drilling is actually being done by the railway company?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, I am not saying that. I know they have commenced to explore or to get something under way, but I do not know to what extent.

Mr. EDWARDS: I understand that a separate company was incorporated to carry on this work?

Mr. MICHAUD: That is true, authorized by the order in council.

Mr. EDWARDS: And this money is being advanced to that company?

Mr. MICHAUD: The subsidiary company, through the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): What is the name of the company?

Mr. MICHAUD: Cannar Oils Limited.

Mr. JACKMAN: Do I understand that $600,000 has been given to Canadian National Railways, directly or indirectly, to gamble on the development of oil in this field, and a further $1,000,000 at three and a half per cent to permit the development of oil? Have any results been shown so far? This seems to me to be an extraordinary step, one in which a major policy is involved.

Mr. MICHAUD: As I said before, the Minister of Munitions and Supply who is responsible for this project has already given an explanation. I understand that the dominion geologist, the oil controller and officials of Canadian National Railways were satisfied that the purpose for which this oil might be required would justify an investment of $1,000,000, and the Canadian government has agreed to lend the money to the Canadian National Railways at the rate of three and a half per cent per annum, to be repayable in five years. Canadian National Railways are authorized to advance money to the subsidiary company, Cannar Oils Limited.

Mr. JACKMAN: What particular facilities have Canadian National Railways for the development of oil? If the Minister of Munitions and Supply is the instigator of this expenditure of public moneys, why does he not set up a company which would be able to retain professional oil people who might know something about the business? I know of no one on the staff of the Canadian National who could qualify as an expert in oil drilling. This is an extremely hazardous business. A great deal of money has been sunk in attempting to bring in wells in western fields, sometimes with success but naturally more often without success. I think the committee is entitled to know what reasons there were for advancing $600,000 in one case, and $1,000,000 additional by way of a loan with the expectation that some oil might result.

It may be true that dominion geologists say there is a prospect of developing oil in a certain field, but geologists have often said that a structure is such that there might be oil there and nothing results. Everyone knows there is perhaps no greater gamble than attempting to extract oil from the bowels of nature. I think the committee is entitled to a full explanation of the reasonableness of this appropriation and the method by which it is proposed the money shall be spent, namely, by the Canadian National instead of by a separate government-owned company, or perhaps by private enterprise. The house argued for some time when the budget resolutions were being considered in an endeavour to make it more feasible or more possible for private enterprise to develop oil with some expectation of profit where wells were discovered in western fields, but without much success. The Department of Finance did not hold out much prospect of the venturesome capital which might be successful in producing oil retaining fairly adequate profits. Yet we find the government putting in its own money through an organ of the government, namely, the Canadian National, which to my mind is fitted in no way whatsoever for the development of oil in this country.

Mr. MICHAUD: That may be so, but the Canadian National is a great consumer of fuel oil, especially in western Canada, and is equipped with a department of national resources of its own to investigate sources of supply for its requirements.

Someone has asked if this is to compete with private producers. This is a development of the Canadian National Railways to provide its own oil requirements for its operations in the west. Those who come from the west know that in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan the railway needs large quantities of fuel oil for its operation, and this is an investment made to assure, if possible, a supply of oil for the requirements of the railway. It is being undertaken by the railway itself just as it looks after its other requirements, and we consider that the railway should take the responsibility of undertaking this development. I understand that the Canadian National have taken the precaution of consulting government geologists and the scientists of their own staff, and I have no doubt they have retained the best brains possible to help bring this field into production in order to assure a sufficient supply of oil for their requirements in the west. The fuel oil supply in the west is a difficult problem, and it may become more difficult. The Canadian National Railways have had to import large quantities of oil, and if the source of supply were cut off, it would be very unfortunate.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think the Canadian National Railways are taking any chances, because the Vermilion field is already proven; anyone passing on the train can see dozens of derricks all through that district. It is a good proposition.

Mr. MacNICOL: And they are producing the oil.

Mr. FAIR: Yes, and there is a refinery there, too.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the railway is to be commended for undertaking this work and developing that field. I am very glad to see it, and if the railway can provide fuel for its engines, so much the better for itself and so much the better for the country. I hope it will strike oil richly.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member who spoke a moment ago should not confuse the Wainwright-Vermilion field with the Turner valley field in regard to the cost of drilling. The wells in the whole Vermilion area are shallow, and the cost of drilling a well there is negligible as compared with the cost of drilling in the foothills area farther to the west. As the minister has just said, the oil produced in the Vermilion area is a very low-grade crude oil and cannot be treated in the same way that the finer oil nearer to the mountains is treated and refined into gasoline. I do not think the Vermilion oil is refined before it is used in the railway's locomotives.

It should also be borne in mind that practically all the locomotives on the main line of the Canadian National Railways are oil-burning.

Mr. FAIR: I believe that the depth of the wells in the Vermilion area is under 2,000 feet, so that it is not as expensive to drill there as some people may imagine.

Mr. STIRLING: I have been trying to make the estimates for transport services under the war appropriation measure as set out on March 3 in Hansard tally with the items which are on this sheet before us.

Mr. MICHAUD: Air services are not included in the main estimates.

Mr. STIRLING: Take, for instance, item 3 on this sheet: Director of Merchant Seamen. The amount on the sheet is a little over one million dollars, while the item given in Hansard on March 3 is just under one million dollars. Again, with regard to item 6, additional harbour facilities at Halifax, the amount on the sheet is $481,000, and the amount in Hansard of March 3, $281,000. What explanation is there for the items not agreeing?

Mr. MICHAUD: New requirements.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there an increase here over what the Minister of Finance put before us in Hansard?

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not think so.

Mr. STIRLING: They do not agree anyway.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Mines and geology branch—

Investigations of petroliferous deposits and of potential petroliferous areas in Canada, $500,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: Last night we asked the minister what exploratory work was being done for oil deposits, and the minister in reply covered pretty exhaustively the work that is being done on the prairies and in the north. I was wondering what was being done on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and in other parts of Canada in the way of exploration for new fields.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister said last night that $42,000 had been spent on an investigation of the shale deposits of New Brunswick?

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the Gaspé peninsula?

[Mr. Edwards.]

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): None of this expenditure is for the Gaspé peninsula.

Before I answer my hon. friend's question I want to correct an impression that was given last evening when we were on these estimates and I was speaking of the number of parties that would be financed out of this vote. We have made provision in the ordinary estimates for a number of parties; they will be paid for out of the ordinary estimates, but additional parties may be sent out and paid for out of this vote. I think I mentioned last night that seventeen parties would be taken care of out of this vote, but that is scarcely an accurate statement. I am not able to say just how many parties will be taken care of out of this vote, but I shall have more information when the main estimates are before us later.

In reply to the question of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I find there are a number of parties here, but generally speaking the search for oil is being carried on in Alberta and northeastern British Columbia. I mentioned last evening one party which was working, I think, in southwestern Saskatchewan. In addition, there was an expenditure in New Brunswick on the oil shales, and also some expenditure in Nova Scotia, but not of a very large amount.

Item agreed to.

Mines and geology branch—

To provide for special exploration and development work in connection with the supply of strategic minerals, $500,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where is any development work going on—not exploration, but development?

Mr. CRERAR: This is for special explorations and development work in connection with the supply of strategic minerals.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand that. What I want to know is, where is any actual development going on, under this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: It was approved on the recommendation of the metals controller and the director of the mines and geology branch. Before any of the money is spent, the metals controller has to make a recommendation and it has to be concurred in by the director of the mines and geology branch. When these two officials agree, the matter is submitted and certain projects or explorations are undertaken and are cared for out of this vote.

Mr. COLDWELL: Was there an item under the same heading last year?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; last year there was released from the war appropriation $413,500, and I think $323,520 was spent. I do not know whether all the $500,000 will be used this year or not. It is simply an estimate of what may be required. It may be that not more than half will be spent.

Mr. COLDWELL: How much was exploration and how much development last year?

Mr. CRERAR: Pretty nearly all was development work, loans to companies, to be repayable out of their earnings, in the search for strategic minerals. There were administration costs, which last year ran to over $13,000. Then there was an equipment pool; that was a pool of diamond drills, drilling machinery, and the like, which could be used and directed from one point to another point. Many of the concerns did not have equipment of that kind and could not get it, so that this pool was provided. Let me repeat that all this was done on the recommendation of the metals controller.

Then, fluorspar was a mineral in considerable demand and of considerable importance, and arrangements were made with several companies for the development of fluorspar deposits which they had, but which they were unable to proceed with unaided. Money was advanced under agreements recommended by the metals controller, the advances to be repaid out of the proceeds of the fluorspar produced.

Chromite was another one. An arrangement was made with the Base Metals Mining corporation to carry on certain exploratory and testing and drilling work on certain zinc deposits in one of the western parks.

Mr. ADAMSON: That was not a Base Metals mine; that was another mine?

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct, I am advised. Then, $5,000 was provided to the British Columbia war metals research board to carry on certain work.

Mr. MacNICOL: That was returnable too?

Mr. CRERAR: No; that is not to be returned. That was really for scientific investigation work by this board.

Mr. REID: What board is that?

Mr. CRERAR: It is the British Columbia war metals research board.

Mr. REID: Is that under the provincial government bureau of mines?

Mr. CRERAR: It is connected, I understand, with the university of British Columbia.

Then we have scheelite, from which tungsten is derived. That is very important. Some of the gold mines have scheelite in association with gold. That is particularly true of the northwestern part of Quebec. Therefore the scheelite concentrator at Val d'Or in northern Quebec was assisted to the extent of $7,000.

The manganese deposit in Nova Scotia was assisted to the extent of slightly over $19,000. There was another tungsten deposit in Nova Scotia, upon which almost $29,000 was spent. There is another item, Orford Mining company; I think that was for chromite. Chromite Limited received $82,000. Another manganese concern received a very small amount, $927. Then there was a molybdenite deposit in northern Quebec.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where was it?

Mr. CRERAR: At Quyon, Quebec, not very far up the river. I understand it received assistance to the extent of almost $7,000. Then there was a molybdenite deposit in British Columbia which was examined, on which $4,000 was spent. An examination of the possibilities of tin was made at a place called Rush lake, in Manitoba. There are tin deposits there, and examination was made as to the quality or grade of the deposit.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was any money advanced in connection with the discoveries of manganese in the vicinity of the Manitoba lakes?

Mr. CRERAR: No. I am just running over the various projects, in reply to the request of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister give in each case the name of the company and the amount received?

Mr. CRERAR: The Rush lake investigation was carried on, I am informed, by officials of the department. I do not know who owned it. Then there was the Regal Snowflake concern in British Columbia. That involved $3,200. Then there was the H. C. Miller fluorspar deposit in eastern Ontario, $26,000, and another fluorspar deposit, Trent, Fluorspar company, in which $3,700 was spent. That generally describes the nature of the expenditure. In some cases this would be recovered; in other cases, if the deposit is not a commercial proposition it will not be. The need for all these so-called strategic metals has been very pressing, and in no case was the work undertaken except on the recommendation of the metals controller, whose recommendation was concurred in by the director of the mines and geology branch. There were a good many proposals put up that were not considered worthy of investigation. That is briefly the type of thing that has been going on.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does this department or the national research council do any work in connection with the finding of aluminum clays in Canada? If so, with what success? Some work has been done in the Dakotas south of Saskatchewan and stretching towards Manitoba. There are clays, I know, in the Dakotas, of the type we have in some parts of the prairies, which contain not as much aluminum as bauxite, but a considerable amount. If supplies were difficult to get, or if the submarine menace increased, which I do not suppose it will now, that might be a strategic mineral. Has the department done anything in experimenting with these clays, or have we any such clays in Canada? I am told that such clays exist immediately south of the prairies, in the states to the south.

Mr. CRERAR: So far as Canada is concerned I have no knowledge, nor has the department any knowledge, of any bauxite.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not bauxite.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, no, not bauxite, but any clays of a kind that will produce the raw material for aluminum.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe that some slight investigation has been made by the university of Saskatchewan and they have discovered some very low-grade aluminum clays. I believe I am right in that.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course, no specific search has been made. Perhaps that is not the correct way of putting it, but there has been an alertness to learn of any deposits anywhere that could be utilized in the production of aluminum. Certainly, however, it has not been brought to my attention if there are such, and I know that no recommendations have come from the metals controller for the development of such deposits. That does not say that they may not exist in Canada, nor does it say that somewhere in Canada at some time we may not find bauxite. I think it unlikely; but as hon. members know, there have been developments in the last year or so, which were discussed by the Minister of Munitions and Supply when his estimates were up, out of which has developed the production of magnesium metal. I understand that there is a considerable quantity of raw material, ores or clays, out of which magnesium metal can be made in Canada, and it may well be that such metal in the future will be a competitor with the aluminum metal. I understand that magnesium metal has the qualities of aluminum and the virtue of being lighter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Of the amount expended last year, how much went to private companies? I understand that under the regulations any work that is undertaken other than by the Department of Mines and Resources must be under agreement or contract approved by the governor in council. How much was actually expended by grant to private corporations? How much has been expended in Saskatchewan in connection with this work, and has not the department of natural resources of the province brought to the attention of the minister certain possible areas where strategic metals can be found? If so, where are those areas?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not the detailed information to answer the first part of my hon. friend's question, as to how much was spent through the agency of private companies. I read the names and gave the assistance they received. These advances to companies are all made by order in council on my recommendation, but that recommendation is not made to council until a request is received, supported by the metals controller.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are they all repayable?

Mr. CRERAR: Some are repayable. For instance, we may make an advance to some company and the judgment in regard to it may prove to have been wrong. There is a certain element of risk, but wherever a company gets into an operating position and can repay, it is expected to repay, and the agreement calls for repayment with interest.

In regard to the other question raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I doubt if there has been anything in the nature of an active search for strategic metals in Saskatchewan. I think it is a fair assumption that the northern part of Saskatchewan, and particularly the northeastern part of the province, which is in the so-called pre-Cambrian shield, will undoubtedly in time develop mines. There is on the border of Saskatchewan and Manitoba the mine of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting company at Flin Flon. But these expenditures for strategic minerals were directed to the places where it was thought most likely they could be found. That again was done on the judgment of the officers of the department, who are supposed to know. None of these investigations was carried out simply for the pleasure of spending some money. They all had behind them some reasonable prospect of being valuable in supplying these metals, some of which were in very short supply and were greatly needed in the war effort.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did the department of mines of Saskatchewan not bring to the attention of the minister or his department certain strategic metals which it believed could be found in certain parts of northern Saskatchewan, at the same time designating where those metals were believed to be available?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot recall at the moment, but I think I am correct in saying that all the provinces have been bringing to the attention of the department here the possibilities in their respective provinces. I dare say there were hundreds of these prospects placed before us, a great many of which were not acted upon. The investigations that were actually made, or the engagements that were entered upon, were on the recommendation of the metals controller, as I said a moment ago, supported by the director of the mines and geology branch.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Apparently there were no investigations carried on in Saskatchewan, since, if I understood the minister aright, no expenditures were made in that province. There is widespread complaint in Saskatchewan because it seems impossible to get any cooperation from the metals controller for consideration being given to northern Saskatchewan. An outstanding friend of the government in northern Saskatchewan—I am not going to mention his name unless the minister asks for it—has brought to the attention of the metals controller certain metals that he believes exist there in such abundance as to be of assistance to the war effort of this country, but he has been unable to get any consideration whatsoever. I feel that if the provincial department of mines brings these matters to the attention of the government, its recommendations should be acted upon. We in Saskatchewan have a large area in the pre-Cambrian shield. There is now an opportunity under this vote to determine whether or not these areas contain metals which are needed at the present time. The provincial department of mines and resources has devoted its energies over a period of years to ascertaining these localities; yet that province has not been given any assistance under a similar vote last year, and we have been afforded no opportunity whatever to assist in the war effort in this regard.

I ask the minister during the coming year to see to it that we receive at least some consideration in this connection. As far as the war effort is concerned, little industry has been established in Saskatchewan and little consideration has been given the needs in this regard of that province. I quite realize that there should be some probability of success before an area is examined and prospected under this vote. Many areas in northern Saskatchewan have been carefully examined by the provincial department of mines, and I ask the minister to see to it that this year some of this money is spent in that province, to the end that we may be enabled to contribute our share of the mineral needs. Apparently no money has been advanced and no assistance has been given to mining development in Saskatchewan, and no official in Ottawa can determine, without some investigation, whether or not strategic materials are available there.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course I shall give heed to the plea advanced by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I do not know that he would suggest that the department should go over the head or back of the recommendations of the metals controller, or act in these matters without those recommendations. I am not exaggerating when I say that scores of these prospective mines have been brought to the attention of the department. Naturally people who have mines of this kind, who think they have fluorspar or scheelite or molybdenite, believe there is a possibility of getting some public funds to assist in the development of their properties, and my hon. friend has had sufficient public experience to know that one must be very careful in, shall I say, resisting some of the requests that come in that way. I have confidence in the metals controller; he is a man of great experience in the mining business, and I think is a mining engineer by profession, and I have every confidence in the technical officers of the mines and geology branch of the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And have they recommended against Saskatchewan?

Mr. CRERAR: No; they have not recommended against Saskatchewan, but I would say that no proposals have come to my attention concerning Saskatchewan which have been recommended by the metals controller and the director of the mines and geology branch. It is not a matter of recommending against something; it is a matter of recommending in favour of, recommending positively instead of negatively. I may have erred, and the government may have erred, but we felt the safe course was to follow the advice of the people who we thought were qualified to give advice in these matters. This does not mean that the provincial department of mines and natural resources has not been active. As I said a moment ago, I think all provincial governments have brought to the attention of the department here the possibilities that existed in their provinces, and have asked that something be done to explore those possibilities. Rightly or wrongly, however, we have adopted the rule that we would recommend to council only those proposals which, in the judgment of the experienced men who were advising us, were entitled to consideration.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister if there are not large deposits of dolomite in northern Saskatchewan?

Mr. CRERAR: There may be; I cannot say.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have been told there are; and if there are large deposits of dolomite, perhaps the government should take the same action to assist in the production of magnesium metal in Saskatchewan that they took in regard to the production of magnesium metal in the Ottawa valley. In Saskatchewan the government would have to find power, just as the Ontario hydro electric commission found power for the magnesium plant at Haley station. I am firmly convinced that there must be a distribution of industry throughout Canada, and if there are large deposits of dolomite in northern Saskatchewan, power can be developed. I know where a substantial block of power can be developed, and if you put the two together you get magnesium metal.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not have quite the confidence in some of the controllers that the minister has. I believe that when this exploratory work is being undertaken, the northern part of the province of Saskatchewan does offer a field for exploration for a good many of these things, as the hon. member for Lake Centre has said. When the minister pins his faith entirely upon the metals controller, I do not think he is wise. I remember that a year or two ago the matter of iron ore on the Pacific coast came up; but in spite of the forceful presentation made by hon. members from the coast, and in spite of the fact that to me the evidence they presented was fairly conclusive, the only reply they could get was, "Well, you have not a ghost of a chance," merely because there was an established industry in another part of Canada. That is, virtually, the point of view. I think I would put much more faith in the report of the minister's own geological branch, as a matter of fact. They are public servants, who cannot look at it from the point of view of established industry.

But I think we need to diffuse industry across the country. It is perfectly true, as the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, that in Saskatchewan, with all our resources, we have been unable to get any development during the war, for war purposes, which would assist us after the war in solving some of our problems in that area. We have potential power on our rivers, much more, I believe, than is generally supposed. And we certainly have an extremely large potential power supply in our very large deposits of comparatively low-grade coal, a kind of coal which has been used in Russia and in Germany for the production of power. And probably with the resources we have developed, industries could be established in some of these areas. I saw one hon. member shake his head when I spoke about the low grade of coal utilized in Germany for power purposes. They utilize brown coal, which has even fewer British thermal units than the gray coal which we use in the southern part of our province.

I know that the Alberta coal is much superior. But in our gray coal we still have a source of power. I was not speaking from guess-work, when I spoke a few moments ago about the possibility of finding not bauxite, but clays which do contain a fair, and perhaps a commercial percentage of aluminum. I was surprised that the minister knew nothing about it, because I know some work has been carried on in connection with testing some of these clays.

Mr. CRERAR: By private parties?

Mr. COLDWELL: By the university. I am surprised the minister did not know anything about it, and I would suggest that some inquiries be made.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the hon. member know where they are making alumina from clays?

Mr. COLDWELL: No; but I can say this, that we do know that there is more than one process of making aluminum. The process being used at the present time is the established process, because all the equipment made and used by the company which has the monopoly of that business is of the one type. But it is known that there are other processes which might utilize the lower grade clays. How economical that would be, I cannot say.

Mr. EDWARDS: I agree. I was interested in the hon. member's statement. I believe it is well known that all clay contains more or less alumina.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some.

Mr. EDWARDS: Some clays are much richer than others. There is a gentleman right here in Ottawa, I believe, who for a number of years has been doing research work throughout the continent. But I have yet to find any instance where a process of extracting alumina from the aluminum clays has been demonstrated to be economically feasible.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is, of course, an important point for consideration.

Mr. REID: I have two questions to ask the minister, the first of which has to do with the long list of metals which he enumerated. In view of the expenditure of money, my first question is this: Is the minister in a position to tell us if help has been given to companies for development work, and if some of these moneys have been expended in that way? If so, have those expenditures been the means of producing certain quantities of the metals he enumerated?

My second question has to do with exploratory work in connection with iron ore. It is a well-known fact that the iron ores in the lake Superior area may not last longer than another ten years. I am speaking of the openpit method. It may be that we shall require all the iron ore we can get in Canada, and I am wondering if in the exploratory work the minister is seeing to it that the deposits or iron ore in Canada are being tabulated as to quantity, location and iron content. To my mind it is extremely important to do that sort of thing. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, we in British Columbia have been endeavouring for many years to develop a steel industry in that province. Time and again we have been met with contradictory reports—reports from private mining companies, provincial reports and federal reports, all conflicting. In view of the seriousness of the iron ore situation, and the extent to which iron ores may be required in this country, I say it is incumbent upon the government to see to it that exploratory work is done. Under this or any other grant, what has been done with regard to iron ore? Then, of the various metals enumerated, have any quantities been produced?

Mr. CRERAR: In some instances substantial quantities of these strategic metals have been made available as a result of this work. I do not know the exact amount of tungsten, for instance, that has been produced in Canada in the last year; and I do not believe it would be wise for me to give that information if I did know. Generally speaking, however, it may be said that this expenditure has justified itself for the purpose for which it was initiated, namely to aid in the war effort. Probably if there had been no war, nothing of this kind would have been done in Canada at the present time, because we would have been getting our tungsten, molybdenite and chromite from other sources.

With regard to the hon. member's second question, there has been, of course, the general geological survey work, such as has been carried on in Canada for many years. This work has been done not only by the federal government but by many of the provincial governments, as well. All those geological reports are available. Iron ores of a very good grade indeed—I might say of a high grade, and in considerable quantities—are available about 130 miles west of Port Arthur. This is an ore similar in quality to that produced in the Duluth area. The total amount, however, is not yet known. It would require some years of exploration to ascertain that fact. A few years ago the development of a large body of low grade iron ore was undertaken in the Michipicoten area. A considerable amount of the iron and steel used at the "Soo" comes from that development. It may well be that there are other deposits of iron ore in Canada.

Here I would add that, certainly as a post-war work, this country should do a great deal more than it has done in the past—in my judgment, at any rate—by way of carrying out geological surveys and geological mapping. It has not always been easy to get the appropriations which those acquainted with the possibilities of this country thought were necessary. But I do say that I have great confidence in the future of mining developments in Canada. We may reasonably expect to find mineral-bearing rock all the way through this great pre-Cambrian shield from Labrador, skirting northern Manitoba and northern Saskatchewan right through to the Arctic ocean. There are mines scattered all over that area and certainly, when the war is over, this development will be a means, not only of adding to the national wealth and providing employment but also to furnish all the benefits that come from such a development. Undoubtedly the possibilities are very great. One of the things needed for development is that as accurate knowledge as possible be secured from geological surveys and mapping.

Mr. ADAMSON: There is just one suggestion I should like to make. This appropriation of $500,000 is wholly inadequate. More money should be spent on exploration for and development of strategic minerals. This vote only goes to show how difficult it is to find and develop a mine. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand the procedure is that a prospector comes to the department with evidence of a certain deposit, shall we say of scheelite, cinnabar or one of the strategic base ores necessary for the development of required metals. The department will then decide to send an engineer or surveyor to inspect the deposit based upon geological maps or whatever is known already of the district. If the department decides to go ahead and considers the deposit worthy of exploration, is it developed by the department, or does the department assist the prospector to develop it? How does the prospector develop it?

If an established mine, say in the Porcupine camp, finds, as many of them have there and in northwestern Quebec, that there is a deposit of scheelite in their property which is not normally workable, does the department agree to assist that mine in the development of the scheelite? Does it tell the mine to develop the scheelite, the department paying for the out-of-pocket expenses? Does the taxation department say that it will reimburse the mine for the expenditures or allow them to consider it as development work which would be deducted from their taxation? This development work is one of the most important things that can be carried out, both now and post-war.

Before the war we knew nothing about what we could do in the way of magnesium, in the way of the development of iron ore, the development of mercury or of many other metals. These metals are being developed to-day, although it is true that some are being developed on an uneconomical basis. We who are in the business believe that the production of these strategic metals will continue, that they will be a part of the Canadian economy from now on. That is why I say this sum of $500,000 is inadequate.

I do not think the committee realizes just how little we are doing in the way of geological surveys as compared with other countries. I do not want to belittle the geological survey of Canada, because the work being done by Doctor Camsell is simply magnificent, but it is quite small when compared with what is done in other countries. Either the year immediately before the war or the year before that, the United Kingdom actually spent more on geological surveys than did Canada. We think of England as being a small country which has been prospected over quite a bit, but this fact shows the importance of the geological survey. When the story is finally written I think it will be shown how difficult it is to discover a mine. Considerable money has been spent on many prospects, but I do not know how many actual properties have been brought into production. I gathered from the minister's statement that it is not much more than one in a hundred.

I do not think we appreciate how difficult it is and the amount of money that must be expended in finding a mine and bringing it into production. This shows how wrong and how stupid it would be for the government to go into the mining business and develop mines as government property. The government should do everything it can to assist individuals in developing mines, so that every ton possible of useful ore is produced, but in my opinion the government has no business to go into the actual mining of metals and ores. As I say, this $500,000 is in my opinion a very small amount to be expended on the discovery and development of strategic metals during this war crisis. I should like to see the amount increased, but I hope the minister will state that it is not the policy of the government to go into the mining business and develop these things as government properties, except perhaps under extremely exceptional circumstances.

Mr. CRERAR: I think it is well to keep in mind that the expenditure under this vote is necessitated by the needs of war. This expenditure does not, except perhaps indirectly, have a bearing on what might be described as the general development of mining in Canada. The united nations and Canada were short of certain strategic materials, and we sought to see what could be done in Canada to supplement these needs. Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said, I have entire confidence in the integrity of the metals controller.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not questioning his integrity.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think the metals controller has been doing chores for any person in connection with the work he has carried on. I think it is only fair to say that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was not referring to that.

Mr. CRERAR: I quite understand that. The hon. member for York West inquired if assistance would be given to a prospector who might bring in a prospect. If, upon inquiry, it were found to have merit, we might decide to carry on diamond drilling, as has been done in other cases, but the prospector would not be reimbursed for any expenses which he might have incurred up to the time he had brought the matter to the attention of the government. In a few cases further exploratory work has been undertaken by the government in order not to pass over any possibility of adding to the store of these necessary metals.

As to the general question of the basis of mining development in the future, it will be the aim of the government to carry on the necessary services, geological and mapping, by the best men we can get, so that we may get as complete information as possible on the geology of the country, and then make that available to prospectors and developers and let them do the rest of the work. That at any rate is the basis upon which our mining development has been done in the past, and though it may change in the future, I am expressing my own view of what is the wisest course to pursue.

Item agreed to.

Mines and geology branch—
To provide assistance to provincial governments in construction of transportation facilities into strategic mineral, including oil, properties, $200,000.

Mr. HAZEN: Can we have a break-down of this amount by provinces?

Mr. CRERAR: Does my hon. friend have in mind the projects under this vote?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: I have the expenditures for last year. The amount made available from the war appropriation was $109,000. We spent approximately $41,000; and at the Jerome mine, $13,000, at Renabie, $11,000, and at the St. Anthony mine, $1,273.20. Then $25,000 was made available to assist in winter transportation.

Mr. HAZEN: In Ontario?

Mr. CRERAR: None in Ontario. In Quebec we made available $3,100 in connection with three molybdenite properties, and $6,000 to improve transportation to the Mercury mines in northern British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

Bureau of mines—
Construction of new metallurgical laboratory, $115,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Where is the new laboratory to be constructed, and when is the work to commence?

Mr. CRERAR: It will be in Ottawa, on Booth street.

Mr. EDWARDS: Have we not a national research council? Do they not do metallurgical research? Is this a duplication of work carried on by the national research council?

Mr. CRERAR: No. Metallurgical research and the determining of the best method of treating ores is all worked out in our mines branch. There is no duplication of that work by the national research council.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is this to be a permanent structure?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then how does it happen to be in the war appropriation?

Mr. CRERAR: It probably would not have been undertaken at the present time if it had not been for the war.

The work of this bureau has had largely, if not wholly, to do with the war during the past few years, and in an ever-increasing way. I might indicate in a general way the kind of work that is done. For instance, we carry on tests to ascertain the resistance of certain types of armour protection. We are working not only for our own government but for the British mission here, and a good deal of the work is of a secret nature. The facilities they had were not sufficient to carry on their work effectively, and accordingly it was decided less than a year ago to put up an additional building. Owing to the severe winter the work did not progress as rapidly as had been intended. Funds were released from the war appropriation, and expenditures were made amounting to $40,000 before the end of the fiscal year. We need additional funds to complete the building.

Item agreed to.

Metallic minerals division—
Services to war departments, $210,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the nature of the services which the Department of Mines and Resources renders to the war departments?

Mr. CRERAR: The branch does work for the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What, for instance?

Mr. CRERAR: It carries on certain tests. For instance, tests are made in connection with motor vehicles for army purposes. Research work that was done on vehicles moved by caterpillar treads effected a considerable saving; it is not a thing that we broadcast to the world. Work is also done for the United Kingdom and for different branches of the armed services related to various types of munitions and all that sort of thing. I can assure my hon. friend that it has been a valuable work.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who looks after this? The national research council?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, why should this be allocated to the Department of Mines and Resources?

Mr. CRERAR: Because it relates to the type of research work which has been carried on by the bureau of mines for many years. They had the trained skilled personnel to do this work.

In answer to the hon. member for Calgary West I mentioned a moment ago that certain research work having to do with the treatment of ores and with the matters relating to that has always been carried on in the bureau of mines. It was established in the bureau of mines before we had the national research council and has been carried on there since, and that work is not duplicated by the national research council. Consequently, when these needs arose, not only for our own services, but for work for the British government and for our munitions and supply department, it was carried on in the bureau of mines because there was in that bureau the personnel most experienced in that kind of work.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many persons has the minister engaged in this work?

Mr. CRERAR: I could not answer that question accurately.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The expenditure proposed is $290,000.

Mr. CRERAR: That is paid for out of this vote. There is a vote in our ordinary estimates for the maintenance of the laboratory work and of the bureau of mines. That has been expanded to take care of this additional work that has been thrown on it, and I repeat what I said earlier, that I think practically all or almost all of the work that is being done by the bureau of mines and the laboratories associated with it is in connection with the war effort in one direction or another.

Item agreed to.

Lands, parks and forests branch—
Bureau of Northwest Territories and Yukon affairs—
Expenses of liaison officers in connection with the Alcan and Canol projects, $10,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister set his face against the further use of this word "Alcan"? There is a real name for the highway and it is a beautiful name—the Alaska highway. The public is resenting this word "Alcan" more and more, and I very much regret to see it used in this official document and fathered by the Minister of Mines and Resources. What will the minister do about it?

Mr. CRERAR: I agree wholly with my hon. friend. I think "Alcan" is really an atrocious word. I give the assurance to my hon. friend that it shall not appear hereafter in the estimates of the department.

Mr. STIRLING: Splendid.

Mr. CRERAR: I think "the Alaska highway" is a much more descriptive and accurate term.

Item agreed to.

Dominion forest service—
Forest products laboratories, $34,435.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is this item for war purposes, or is it in addition to the item in the general estimates of $145,717?

Mr. CRERAR: We have a vote in the general estimates. This is for war purposes. It has to do as I recall, with the testing and development of plywoods used in the manufacture of aircraft, glues, and testing these when they are made, and generally testing fibreboard, compregnated wood and other wood products such as munitions containers and that sort of thing. The total amount estimated for this year is $34,435. The amount released last year under the same vote was $31,395, and out of that $27,079 was spent.

Item agreed to.

Dominion forest service—
Alternative service work camps, $79,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This item and the next item might be considered at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps we might take the two items together.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Very well.

National parks bureau—
Alternative service work camps, $500,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: These two items are, in my opinion, unjustifiable. Last year, according to the auditor general's last report, there was expended for alternative service work camps the sum of $235,463, in connection with the detention of groups eligible for military service and known as conscientious objectors.

Mr. CRERAR: That was for the year ended March 31, 1942?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. Expenditures charged were as follows:

Banff park	$51,820 57
Cape Breton Highlands park	28 85
Jasper park	46,193 00
Kootenay	16,939 00
Prince Albert park	50,711 00
Riding Mountain park	63,564 00

The expenditure on salaries and wages was $131,233; printing and stationery, $1,344; travelling expenses, $2,369; supplies and materials, $91,607; sundries, $8,908. In addition to that, there was an allotment for alternative service work camps in the dominion forest service of $12,848, of which $10,858 was expended.

I can see no justification whatever for the expenditure of this money in utilizing the services of conscientious objectors. These men are paid fifty cents a day and remain in these various camps at work for a period, generally speaking, not exceeding three months. At a time when there is a shortage of man-power which has been so frequently referred to, in connection with the production of firewood, pulpwood, and for farm labour, I think there is no justification for the utilization of the services of these men in the national parks, particularly when this vote is considered as a war expenditure. Conscientious objectors should be permitted to serve in some service other than active war participation; as to that there can be no argument. But as far as the work being done in the national parks is concerned, it is a use of man-power for purposes unconnected with the war effort, and, I submit is an unjustifiable waste of man-power when regard is had to the needs and requirements of man-power in more necessary kinds of work. I cannot understand the justification for increasing the expenditure this year by approximately $250,000. Only recently in Saskatoon some seventy-five Doukhobors came before the national selective service board. They were allowed to work on their own farms; yet, with the imperative need of mobilization of our man-power, many of these people serve in connection with work in national parks. Their services could be used in agriculture. According to the statistics given in "Canadian Affairs", to which I referred the other evening, there are 3,401 in this country. An amount of $500,000 seems like a terrific expenditure to make for a matter of a few months' alternative service in parks. I move that this amount be reduced to one dollar.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to say a word endorsing what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said and at the same time to ask some questions in regard to the item. I cannot see any reason for this amount being expended at the present time. Last night we listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce as he pointed out that we had 30,000,000 bushels of grain standing in cars on the tracks which could not be loaded into terminal elevators because we were short of man-power at this particular time. We have had radio broadcasts and what-not with regard to the shortage of fuel for next year, and municipal officials pointed out to the government, last fall and in the winter, that wood camps should be set up for the purpose of providing fuel for the coming winter. There is certainly plenty of all-year-round work to do now which would be of greater advantage to the nation as a whole than this proposed expenditure of public money. It is essential work that is required if the people are not to freeze this winter. In the fall we shall have to store grain, which is vital for feed, because the transport system is tied up as a result of the falling down of the selective service in that respect. I suggest that we should not waste this amount of money with the man-power muddle right on our doorstep at the present time.

I believe the government received communications last fall, in December and since then, from provincial and municipal organizations, pointing out that lands should not be sold to conscientious objectors at this time, but that they should be held until after the war for our veterans. So far I have not heard any answer from the government in that regard, and this might be a proper item under which to ask the minister what the stand of the government is in this respect. In his province and my native province the department of mines have intimated that they will not sell land to anyone until the war is over, so that the returned soldier shall have the first option on any lands they hold. We should have a statement from the minister as to the policy of the government in this matter. In all seriousness I suggest that we should consider eliminating this item, because it is a waste of public money and involves a waste of man-power which is so essential in other callings at the present time, in the national interest, if we are to obviate a great deal of suffering in the coming year.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Lake Centre spoke, I believe, without that reflection which he usually gives to his observations. He based his criticism wholly on expenditures that had been incurred prior to fifteen months ago, indeed, incurred over two years ago. The figures he read from the auditor general's report were figures that appeared in the report tabled this year, but for the year ending March 31, 1942.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what I said.

Mr. CRERAR: The situation two years ago in respect of man-power was vastly different from what it is to-day. My hon. friend knows that, as does every other hon. member in the house; and the problem when these men were called up was to find employment for them. At that time the national parks constituted one place where they could be employed and they rendered excellent service. They did very good work in the national parks. The situation has now changed altogether. I have stated in regard to other votes that they were estimates, and so is this vote an estimate of what might be required for this purpose in the present fiscal year. That estimate was prepared nearly seven or eight months ago and was ready for parliament when it met in January. Now, I repeat, the situation has changed, and I can tell the committee that there will not be anything like that amount of expenditure involved for the conscientious objectors in the present year.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many conscientious objectors does the minister expect will work in the parks this year?

Mr. CRERAR: At May 31, there were 190 conscientious objectors working in the national parks, and on June 12 there were seventy-six in forest experimental stations. What were they doing? They were employed largely in Alberta to cut pit-props which are necessary in coal mining in that province. That is work which everyone will agree has to be done, because if you are to mine coal you must have pit-props. These men were engaged also in some parks cutting lumber and cordwood. So that if my hon. friend persists in the motion, which would have to be voted down, we would interfere at once with the production of necessary pit-props for the mining of coal, and we would cut down substantially the quantity of cordwood that is now being cut by these conscientious objectors and which is necessary to meet the fuel shortage next winter. I would ask my hon. friend, on reflection, to withdraw the amendment to the motion.

What I have said is, I believe, a partial answer to the hon. member for Souris. There is one point, however, with which I wish to deal that touches on his remarks. I refer to his statements regarding the sale of lands to conscientious objectors in the various provinces. The sale of land comes wholly within the jurisdiction of the provinces. It may be that under the War Measures Act—it would be stretching it to a very great degree, as I think hon. members will agree—it might be possible to take some action federally, but it would be a pure invasion in a matter which it is solely the right of the provinces to deal with, and I think it would be resented by the provinces.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not entirely, if the federal government owned land.

Mr. CRERAR: We are not selling any federal lands. If my hon. friend will give me one instance—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is what I am asking.

Mr. CRERAR: There have not been any such sales. Why does not my hon. friend ask if there are instances?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The policy is what I want to know.

Mr. CRERAR: He rises and makes a statement that can only be regarded as a criticism of the government because we have not done something in this matter.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I did not make any such statement; I asked the direct question. What was the policy of the government?

Mr. CRERAR: Very well, then; I will say this, that as far as the federal government's policy is concerned, it has no lands to dispose of excepting certain crown lands, and I am sure none are being sold to conscientious objectors. I think those are all the lands it has, unless we go away up into the north-west territories, where conscientious objectors do not wish to settle.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There are other lands which I cannot discuss under this item, but which come under the same minister. I refer to soldier settler lands, and there surely would be a policy covering all the lands owned by the federal government.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think any soldier settlement lands have been sold to conscientious objectors.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am asking the question.

Mr. CRERAR: As far as my knowledge goes, not a single foot of any land under the control of the federal government has been sold or disposed of to conscientious objectors; I am sure I am correct in that statement.

I think that covers the points I wished to mention, but let me tell the hon. member for Lake Centre once more that there are no more of these conscientious objectors working in the parks or in forest stations than are able to do useful work, either by way of providing wood fuel or producing pit-props to be used in the operation of our coal mines.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I asked if these men could not be employed almost all year, cutting wood in the winter months and doing agricultural work in the summer, and perhaps in unloading grain at the terminals and work of that kind. It would not cost the government anything more to keep them employed the year round.

Mr. CRERAR: I think that disposition is being made of them. I believe I am correct in saying that many of these conscientious objectors are now placed in farm work across Canada. I have not the exact figures in regard to placements in that connection, but I know they have been so placed. I think some of them are working in the coal mines of Alberta. At any rate their labour is not being utilized in the national parks or in forest stations except in the manner I mentioned a moment ago, and I gave the number engaged in that work.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the anticipated expenditure this year? The estimate is half a million dollars, but what is the anticipated expenditure?

Mr. CRERAR: That will depend on how long the men stay in this work. For instance, it may be that the number of men in the parks will be reduced, particularly at harvest time. I think they have been cutting wood almost up to the present time and certainly up to the date mentioned here, May 31, but that work is probably over now. I am not sure, but I do not believe there is much good in cutting green cordwood in the month of September, for instance, if that wood is to be consumed in the months of October or November. In that case, however, the men will be moved to some other useful employment. The point I wish to make is that they have been employed in a very useful and necessary part of our general economy, and they are not now employed in the parks or in the forest stations except in the work I have mentioned, and forest conservation and protection.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many were employed in the parks during the past year? What was the maximum number?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not those figures, but I said that as of May 31 the total employed in all the national parks of Canada was 190, and seventy-six in the forest stations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many were there a year ago?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not these figures, but I should say the number was substantially larger. I am advised that there were probably about 400, but I would not wish that figure to be taken as final because I have not that data here.

Mr. QUELCH: Did I understand the minister to say that the prohibition of sales of land to certain classes of people was purely a provincial matter?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; the disposition of land, the sale of land as between two individuals, is a matter of property and civil rights that comes within the control of the provinces, and the federal government has no jurisdiction.

Mr. QUELCH: Then will the minister explain why the federal government disallowed the Alberta bill which would have prohibited the sale of land to the Hutterites?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that I understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. QUELCH: Some time ago the Alberta government passed a bill which would have prohibited the sale of land to certain classes of people, I think particularly the Hutterites, and the federal government disallowed that bill. Now the minister says that is purely a provincial matter.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The discussion is on the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre, to reduce the amount of the estimate to one dollar.

Mr. QUELCH: But I am referring to the statement made by the minister on this amendment; I am trying to get a clarification of that statement. The minister said it was purely a matter for the provincial government if it wanted to prohibit the sale of land to certain classes of people; yet when the province of Alberta passed a bill doing that very thing the federal government disallowed it, and I am wondering why.

Mr. CRERAR: At the moment I am unable to give my hon. friend the reasons why that particular legislation was disallowed. That is a matter for the Minister of Justice.

Mr. QUELCH: The Minister of Justice is in his seat; perhaps he could clarify the situation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should not like to give from memory the report that was prepared which necessitated the disallowance of that legislation. It was tabled here at the time, and then a summary of it was tabled this week, not more than two or three days ago, in the list of all legislation disallowed since 1920.

Without attempting to be exhaustive at all, I may say that one reason why it was disallowed, and the main reason, was because it was contrary to the express declaration of the defence of Canada regulations. It was not legislation dealing with the Hutterites only; it was legislation dealing with enemy aliens, and was contrary to the positive declaration in the defence of Canada regulations that enemy aliens who registered and who conformed with the formalities prescribed by those regulations, would not be interfered with. This was provincial legislation which ran counter to the formal declaration in the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. QUELCH: That being the case, the statement made by the Minister of Mines and Resources was not correct, and this is not a matter entirely under the control of the provincial government.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; the hon. member is putting an entirely erroneous construction on what I have said. The general principle is that property and civil rights are within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, but in war time it is felt by the Department of Justice that under property and civil rights the provinces must not be allowed to nullify war measures adopted by the federal authorities.

Mr. QUELCH: I quite agree, but the matters we are discussing now are in relation to the war. We are not talking about after the war; the matter we have raised at the present time is in connection with the war, and the minister's statement was in relation to the war.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Those in favour will kindly say, aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

The CHAIRMAN: Those opposed will kindly say, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the amendment is lost.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, it was eleven o'clock before you put the vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Progress reported.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Saturday, July 17, 1943

The house met at eleven o'clock.

THE WAR

PROGRESS OF OPERATIONS IN SICILY—PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN FORCES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A week has now passed since the landing of Canadian troops in Sicily. I should like to make a brief statement on the progress of operations.

During the week, our thoughts have been mainly with the army. No account of the Canadian share in operations would be complete, however, without a reference to the other two services.

The battle for Sicily really began weeks before the landing of the allied troops on Saturday last. Ever since the close of the Tunisian campaign the allied air forces in North Africa and the middle east have been "softening up" the island of Sicily for the coming invasion. In those operations, Canadian airmen, in R.A.F. and in R.C.A.F. squadrons, have had a large share.

Operating under the immediate command of Major General James Doolittle of the United States Army Air Corps, an R.C.A.F. bomber wing composed of an unstated number of squadrons helped to pave the way for the allied invasion of Sicily by terrific bombardment of the island. During the landings and as the allied forces have continued to strengthen their position in Sicily, Canadians in the air have been blasting enemy troop concentrations, strong points and supply columns.

In addition to the bomber squadrons, a Royal Canadian Air Force Spitfire squadron which distinguished itself in the Tunisian campaign is participating in the Sicilian action. It cannot be revealed whether this squadron is yet based on a Sicilian field, but it is known that many members of the R.C.A.F. are among the aircrews which are now operating from captured aerodromes on the island.

There are, of course, thousands of Canadian personnel included in the Royal Air Force squadrons operating in the Mediterranean as there are in almost every R.A.F. unit around the world. No reports on their participation are available, but it is safe to assume that there are few, if any, Royal Air Force squadrons operating in the aerial forces being thrown against Sicily in support of our armies which do not include Royal Canadian Air Force personnel. Other Canadians are flying Wellington bombers, harassing and disrupting enemy supply routes from the African mainland.

While operations of our air units and our personnel out of the United Kingdom are not directly linked with the Sicilian campaign, their activities are having the effect of tying a great part of the Luftwaffe to Western Europe. Were these Luftwaffe units released for service in the Mediterranean they could make our operations there far more difficult.

In the Sicilian operations, the Royal Canadian Navy has also been represented. We have been advised that several hundred Royal Canadian Naval Officers and men acting in conjunction with and under the direction of the Royal Navy, took part in the hazardous work of safely effecting landings for the troops engaged.

For many months now, almost two thousand Canadian Naval personnel have been training at a combined operations base in England, preparing themselves to take part in landing operations. Their ships are known as "assault landing craft". A number of Canadian sailors took part in the combined operations when landings were made in North Africa in November last. This week, they took their craft, under enemy fire, and ferried in troops who were part of the first wave of the invading forces to move on to the beaches. We shall await with interest a more detailed account of their hazardous work.

Coming now to the army, its operations began at dawn, Sicilian time, on Saturday, July 10, when the British, United States and Canadian troops commenced landing on the shores of Sicily. The landings on the beaches had been preceded by allied paratroop landings beyond the coastal defences.

According to statements made by prisoners, the landings were a complete surprise and caused much confusion. The element of surprise, combined with the fact that the landing areas were defended only by static or semi-static Italian troops, resulted in very light casualties for the landing forces. The bulk of enemy operational divisions were in the central part of the island.

The Canadian division, now identified as the first division, landed at the southeast tip of Sicily. Two and one-half hours after landing they had captured their first objective, and made contact with the British division on their right flank. Meanwhile British and American forces had landed to the east and west of the Canadians.

Canadian troops captured the airfield at Pachino six hours after landing, and a short time later were in Pachino itself.

On Monday, July 12, General Eisenhower visited the Canadians on Pachino peninsula. He sought out Canadian headquarters, but headquarters was moving forward so rapidly that he was unable to make contact. That day the Canadians captured several inland towns. The first enemy counter attack was met and beaten off.

At Ragusa, an important inland junction about 25 miles northwest of Pachino, the Canadians made their first contact with the American forces.

I believe that this is the first occasion on which Canadian and American troops have been fighting side by side. We were, of course, both engaged in the last great war together, but I think this is the first time that Canadian and American troops have actually been fighting shoulder to shoulder in action overseas.

Shortly before midnight, Augusta, an important naval base, nineteen miles north of Syracuse was captured by British and Canadian troops. The port is stated to be in perfect working order.

On Tuesday, July 13, Canadian troops made further advances, repulsed counter-attacks and captured the first Italian general to surrender, together with his headquarters staff.

On Wednesday, July 14, Canadian armoured forces landed at Syracuse and moved north, while other Canadians were making progress over forty miles northwest of their landing places. It was revealed that day that the Canadians formed part of the eighth army, under the command of General Montgomery.

On Thursday, July 15, the eighth army including the units of the first Canadian division continued its advance along the east coast towards the Catania plains repulsing strong counter-attacks.

Yesterday, July 16, the advance continued on all sectors, and by the end of the day which completed the first week of operations, a wide arc enclosing about a quarter of the island had been occupied by the allied forces. Over 20,000 prisoners and a large quantity of arms and material had been taken.

So successful, within the week, has been the combined operations of the armed forces of the United States, Great Britain and Canada that yesterday morning, Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt felt justified in addressing to the people of Italy the proclamation which I read to the house at the opening of the morning sitting. The proclamation stated that the sole hope for Italy's survival lay in honourable capitulation, and that the time had come for the people of Italy to decide whether Italians would die for Mussolini and Hitler—or live for Italy and for civilization.

It is eminently fitting that the first division of the Canadian army should have been given the honour of taking part in the first major Canadian land operations of the war. The men of the first division were the earliest to volunteer; they have waited longest for action. They are the most seasoned formation of Canada's army overseas.

It will be a satisfaction to General McNaughton, who led this first division when it sailed for Britain in the autumn of 1939, and who led parts of it to France in the summer of 1940, to have seen these officers and men, after three years of waiting, now carrying the fight into the enemy's camp with such conspicuous success.

Having this in mind, and realizing that the people of Canada would wish that an immediate word of congratulation should reach our troops upon their initial success, together with an assurance of our unfailing support of them, I sent the following message to General McNaughton on Monday last:

I know you must be exceedingly proud of the fine results of your long and ardous tour of duty. I congratulate you most sincerely on the achievement already evident in Sicily. Please arrange to have transmitted the following message to the Canadian Force Commander:

Message begins: Major-General Guy Simonds, Commanding Canadian Forces, Mediterranean.

"All Canada rejoices in the news of the initial successes of Canadian troops in Sicily. Will you please extend to the officers and men under your command every good wish for the complete success of the hazardous operations in which they are engaged. Here at home, in Canada, the eyes of all are fixed on Sicily. We know that there is heavy fighting ahead. We know, too, that the Canadian forces will do honour to themselves and to our country. Please give to all the assurance that our hearts are with them, that Canada is proud of the patience and courage of her army overseas, and that Canada will not fail her fighting men." Message ends.

We have reason to be thankful that the Sicilian landing operations were completed with very light casualties. Also that the resistance encountered during the first week of operations has ben comparatively slight. The successes of Canadian forces in the field should not, however, leave us unprepared for word of much heavier fighting which may follow at any time. There are strong enemy forces on the island and already stiff resistance has been encountered. Provided we guard against undue optimism, the people of Canada have every reason to rejoice at the results so far achieved in the first major operations in which the Canadian army has taken part. It is not too early to say that Canadian soldiers in Sicily are upholding the traditions established by the Canadian Corps of a quarter of a century ago.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, following the statement just made by the Prime Minister, I take it to read that the message to the Commander in Chief of the Canadian forces in Sicily was a message from the government and people of Canada to the forces under his command. I should like to ask the Prime Minister to couple it with a message from the parliament of Canada if that has not already been done in his message.

What the Prime Minister has said I think is most apt and appropriate in the circumstances. The upholding of the splendid traditions of our Canadian troops in these most recent operations is a matter of great national pride to Canada. While our troops have fought on many occasions with valour beside the troops of Britain and the other dominions, on this occasion our troops were fighting side by side with our American cousins to the south, and I think this will be hailed as another milestone in the close cooperation between these two members of the united nations who are engaged in this war.

We as members of the Progressive Conservative party want to join with the Prime Minister in the message which he has sent overseas and to ask him also to cable the good wishes and a good word from parliament itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I just say that any of these messages I have sent are sent on behalf of the entire country. I hope that that will be understood. In the messages I am speaking both for parliament and for the people of Canada.

GENERAL HENRI GIRAUD

VISIT TO OTTAWA OF COMMANDING OFFICER OF FRENCH FORCES IN NORTH AFRICA

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is another matter or two which I think should be recorded in our Hansard

During the past week, as hon. members are aware, the government has had a visit from General Henri Giraud, the commanding officer of the French forces in North Africa, and co-president, with General Charles de Gaulle, of the French committee of national liberation. General Giraud is known to all for his heroism as a soldier, for his brilliance as a general, and for his complete devotion to the cause of France and of the united nations. He is the highest ranking representative of France to visit Canada since the black days of the summer of 1940. As a brave French officer, General Giraud is among the foremost of those who, throughout the war, have kept alive the military honour of France. In his own personality he embodies the heroic spirit of the French people.

After his escape from Germany and German-controlled France, General Giraud's presence in North Africa, immediately prior to the allied landings, became a powerful factor in helping to rally all Frenchmen in Africa to the cause of the united nations. Without the liberation of North Africa, the invasion of Sicily, which has been so brilliantly commenced, could not have been undertaken.

General Giraud's visit enabled our government to receive at first hand a full account of developments in North Africa, and to discuss means whereby, in the coming months, Canada may be able to contribute aid to the French forces which now are taking their place with British, American and Canadian forces in the liberation of Europe.

Among the measures of cooperation which it is hoped to extend to the French national committee in Algiers is that of assisting, under our mutual aid legislation, in the training as aircrew, of a number of young French cadets from North Africa, in the schools in Canada of the commonwealth air training plan.

An especially pleasing feature of the visit of General Giraud to Canada's capital was the wholehearted way in which representatives of all groups of the supporters and friends of France joined in demonstrating the unity of their support for the French committee of national liberation of which General Giraud and General de Gaulle are the co-presidents.

RIGHT HON. H. V. EVATT

VISIT TO OTTAWA OF ATTORNEY GENERAL AND MINISTER OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS FOR AUSTRALIA

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker during the week, as hon. members are aware, the government has had a visit from the Right Hon. H. V. Evatt, Attorney General and Minister of External Affairs of the Commonwealth of Australia.

When Doctor Evatt last visited Ottawa, in the spring of 1942, Japanese threats to the security of Australia were very great indeed. During the months since, the combined efforts of the armed forces of Australia and the United States have held the Japanese enemy at bay and have frustrated his attempts to consolidate his hold on the land base which most nearly threatens the Australian mainland.

During his visit, Doctor Evatt discussed with my colleagues and myself possible means by which, under our mutual aid legislation, additional supplies might be made available by Canada to Australia. We also discussed means whereby assistance might be given in other ways which would serve to further the common interests of Australia and Canada in the destruction of enemy power on the Pacific. Some aspects of post-war planning were also discussed. Doctor Evatt's visit served to emphasize how clearly the defence of Australia and the defence of Canada are both part of the world-wide fight for freedom. In particular, it helped to underline the extent to which the control of the northeast Pacific by American and Canadian forces, including the destruction of enemy forces in the Aleutians, is aiding in the final defence of Australia, just as the control being achieved by American and Australia forces in New Guinea, the Solomons, and elsewhere in the southwest Pacific, is aiding in the final defence of Canada.

BUTTER BOXES

STATEMENT WITH REFERENCE TO SHORTAGE IN QUEBEC PROVINCE

On the order for motions:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): A few days ago the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Leclerc) directed an inquiry to the Department of Agriculture on a shortage of butter boxes in Quebec province, especially the eastern townships, and I promised to get him what information I could on the matter.

I am advised by the Department of Agriculture that an officer of their dairy branch has been in the province of Quebec looking into the matter of a shortage of butter boxes. It is further advised that the trouble is due largely to a shortage of labour; there is timber available, but not the workers. The question has been taken up with national selective service and it is hoped to remedy the situation.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

TABLING OF EXCHANGE OF NOTES IN 1907 BETWEEN JAPAN AND CANADA

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I now table exchange of notes between Japan and Canada on the restriction of Japanese immigration into Canada. I promised the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that I would do so.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HANSELL

EXPORTS OF COAL—QUESTION AS TO DISCLOSURE OF DESTINATIONS

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, which, I think, will be discovered to be a privilege affecting every member of the house. I asked a series of questions some few days ago, which questions were passed as an order for return; it was in respect to the production and export of coal. The second question was:

What is the total tonnage of coal exported, and to what countries, for each of the years 1939 to 1943?

The answer comes, from the Department of Trade and Commerce I think, to this effect: In keeping with the present practice in the United States and the United Kingdom it is deemed inadvisable to state the importing countries. My point of privilege is that I am unable to get the information as to what countries this tonnage of coal was exported to. May I now ask a question of the minister on the basis of the answer which I received here. Is the practice not to reveal countries to which we are exporting coal a temporary policy of the government on account of the war, or is this a permanent policy, that we are never to know what countries coal is exported to?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the policy of the government not to reveal destinations of exports is purely a war matter. I may say at the same time that this matter gives us a very great deal of trouble. There are certain exports the destinations of which should not be revealed. I personally do not see much harm, if any, in letting anybody know to what country coal and certain other articles are exported, but it is hard to draw the line, and the practice generally followed is to maintain secrecy as to all exports.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS—OUTSTANDING ORDERS FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, while I have no idea how long the session is to last, there are a number of matters passed as orders for returns and some questions on the order paper the answers to which I would like the Secretary of State not to defer too long. Perhaps on Monday, if he does not mind, he might do as he did prior to the Easter recess, and that is give the house a list of matters which have not been answered or orders for returns which have not been complied with; so that we shall know exactly where we stand in respect to this matter.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): It runs in my mind that of 522 returns ordered, all have been returned except 54. About a week ago I asked the official in my department having charge, in view of the fact that we are approaching the close of the session, to do everything possible to expedite these returns. I know he has done so. I shall be very glad to do as the leader of the opposition requests. I take it that what he is asking for is a return as to each item, not just the figures as to it, but each outstanding order?

Mr. GRAYDON: That is right.

Mr. McLARTY: I will see that it is done.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO BETTING, PREVIOUS OFFENCE CHARGED, ETC.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 107, to amend the criminal code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Escapes and rescues.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The words "or subsequent" are added—"or subsequent to his conviction." I assume that some case has arisen which makes this necessary in the administration of justice. Perhaps the minister will explain.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It came about in this way. There was a test case before the court of appeal; the magistrate dealing with another case wished to have the benefit of the decision that would be given by the court of appeal before pronouncing sentence, and when the time arrived to recall the convicted person for sentence difficulties arose over this section in the code.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—"Common betting-place" defined.

Mr. NEILL: The same principle is involved here as I was discussing last night in connection with another bill. It presses to an extreme degree the liability to prosecution by the use of language that is so conclusive and comprehensive as to take in almost anybody under any conditions whatever. The section as it stands now in the old act, giving the definition of a common betting-place, reads:

. . . opened, kept or used for the purpose of facilitating or encouraging or assisting in the making of bets upon any contingency or event, horse-race or other race, fight, game or sport, by announcing the betting upon or announcing or displaying the results of horse-races, or other races, fights, games or sports, or in any other manner. . . .

And so on. That is the present definition of a common betting place, and it is now sought to be amended by putting in the words "used or intended or likely to be" used for the purpose, and so on. That embodies the same vicious principle to which exception was taken last night. Section 8, the next section, applies the same principle to newspapers that circulate information calculated to assist people in betting, and now the mere fact of advertising the results of sports—baseball or any other sport of that sort—would render them liable to a heavy penalty. This is an indictable offence, making the accused liable to a year in gaol without apparently the option of a fine. "Used or intended or likely to be used." We know of places such as pool rooms and cigar stores where it is the custom for men to gather in the evening to learn, over the radio or otherwise, the results of sporting events of the day. It is now going to be made a penalty, a very serious offence, if you have a place where you do that, even if it is only "likely" to be used for that purpose—"intended or likely to be used." Is not that going rather far in restricting the liberties of the people? The explanation given on the opposite page is this:

The object of this amendment is to make more practicable the enforcement of the provisions of the criminal code with respect to betting.

I respectfully suggest that instead of making it more practicable it simply makes it easier and more convenient for the officers of the law. It is intended to make it easier for the officers of the law to secure conviction because at present they have to break into a place and find people engaged in betting and so on, and of course the material is there, whatever it may be. Now, however, it is simply sufficient to allege that the place is "intended or likely to be used" for the purposes mentioned. Surely that is carrying things too far. It is the old and evil doctrine of convicting a man first and letting him prove himself innocent if he can. Last night, speaking of a similar bill, the minister in charge, the Minister of Transport, was able to invoke the war as an excuse. It was a war measure, he pointed out, and we have to submit to certain restrictions of our liberty in war time, but that afterwards these restrictions would be removed. But this is not such a case, because we cannot conceive that the success of the war depends in any degree upon some petty cigar store being prosecuted for running a betting-place. And, as I say, the penalty is severe. Such places are classed along with common bawdy houses as disorderly houses, and the penalty is up to one year's imprisonment and on repetition two years without a fine.

I suggested last night that in modern times the custom has been not to inflict very severe penalties with the idea of preventing crime. We have found that it is better, both from a humanitarian standpoint and as a matter of common sense, and moreover it is more effective, to make the punishment fit the crime without being excessive. Look back over history and you will recall that a hundred and fifty years ago it was quite a common thing to deport people to Australia as criminals, and sometimes, going further back, to hang women for stealing a loaf of bread. Many instances are on record where such things were done. The idea behind such penalties was that extreme severity prevented crime. But the inhumanity of it dawned gradually upon people so that we no longer inflict such penalties.

I was curious to see what definition the dictionary would give of this word "intended," and I found it meant affianced lover. That did not give me much light. I want to know how anyone can tell what I "intend" to do under any given circumstances. I wonder the press gallery are not interested in this, because they also are liable under section 8.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have not reached section 8. If the hon. member will allow me to intervene at this stage I have an amendment to section 7 which will meet for the most part the objection he has voiced. Perhaps it would save time if I were allowed to put the amendment now. With respect to section 8 I shall have a modification to suggest which may facilitate discussion, but as regards section 7 I would move:

Strike out the second word "or" in line 35 and substitute therefor the following: "to be used or outfitted or equipped in such a manner as to be."

As amended it would read:

Used or intended to be used or outfitted or equipped in such a manner as to be likely to be used.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think that that carries the minister very far. It is a little more qualified, that is all; but the objection on principle remains. It is a question of intent. What is the equipment or outfitting that is had in mind? A telephone in a library or living room, or a radio might, in the opinion of the convicting magistrate, be sufficient to constitute a common betting-place. I do not know what gives rise to this particular class of legislation. I assume it arises out of the failure of the provincial authorities to get all the convictions they desire. It may be that they are justified in asking the consideration of parliament to this type of legislation. But I do suggest that it is a type which smacks of prohibition days, about which the hon. member for Essex East so often reminds me, and concerning which he expresses some surprise. While I do not think a high court judge would be influenced by this type of legislation to any very great extent, it is the sort of legislation which gives prosecutors and the type of magistrate we sometimes see on police court benches an opportunity to go much farther than they might otherwise go. That might be the effect, if the police magistrate had that particular type of mind which happens to be out on a witch hunt, where he would convict one of anything.

I should like to know the reason for this legislation. I remember in the days of prohibition having been shocked when I read of the sort of procedure, and the sections relating to prosecutions arising from temperance legislation of days gone by. In my early days as a lawyer I had a great deal to do with prosecuting, as well as defending, and most frequently came in contact with the old Canada Temperance Act. I was glad to lay down the burden when prohibition came in, because I did not want anything more to do with it. I suppose that in my lifetime I have been connected with at least five hundred cases having to do with violations of the liquor laws.

Mr. MARTIN: That is, law cases.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes, not the other kind of cases. I was shocked to see the type of legislation these legislatures put into effect. It seemed to me that a good deal of it must have come from some of those fundamentalist states we read about, down in the south, where—

Mr. MacINNIS: Where they do not believe in evolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, where they do not believe in evolution, and where they frown on everything. In principle, this is the same kind of legislation; and unless the minister can show some real cause for it, I do not think he ought to proceed with his amendment. I was surprised to find this provision in the bill, because from his statement upon introduction I understood there was to be in this measure no new substantive law. This is legislation of that kind, and I do suggest that it is a widening of the definition of a betting house or a gaming house, and that therefore it changes the substantive law of the country.

Unless the minister can make out a case, I am opposed to this type of legislation. There is a burden of proof placed on the crown or upon the prosecution, and that should not be eased through the lifting of that burden by parliament, or by making it easy for a magistrate to elect that in the exercise of his judicial discretion he may place an interpretation upon a set of circumstances or a certain position which a reasonable man would not do. That, it seems to me, is the possibility under this amendment. The effect will be to make it easy to get convictions, in lieu of a position under which it was more difficult to do so. I hold no brief at all for betting, or anything of that sort. I do not take part in it.

An hon. MEMBER: You should.

Mr. KINLEY: Everybody does.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not this type of betting, bookmaking and the like. I do not think we ought to make it easier. I suggest further, that there is a principle involved. Before proceeding I say the minister must justify the use of this language.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister explain, when he rises to reply to the hon. member for York-Sunbury, what the amendment is going to be to section 8, so that we may discuss it now?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to section 8 I had intended, if section 7 is adopted, to ask the committee to add:

> Provided however that the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to the publication of news or records in relation to any race, fight, game or sport, or to contestants therein, in the ordinary course of publishing a bona fide newspaper.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That helps.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Before proceeding further may I make my position clear, because I believe what I shall say will be informative. The criminal law, including criminal procedure, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of parliament. But the administration of criminal law is within the jurisdiction and is the responsibility of the attorneys general of the provinces. It is perhaps the one instance in connection with which legislative jurisdiction is in one body and administrative jurisdiction is in one or more other bodies. This is the only place where an amendment can be made to the substantive law, or to the procedure. The attorneys general of the provinces have the responsibility of enforcing the law, and therefore they are closely connected with the application of the rules of procedure we lay down. From time to time they make representations to the federal department that, in their view, certain improvements should be made in the procedure. The stand taken by the federal department is that when a plausible case is made out for one of these representations it would be improper for the department not to bring it before parliament. Parliament is composed of people representative of the population of the whole country. They are at the same time inhabitants of Canada and of their own respective provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is carrying that doctrine further than his predecessor. He had to be convinced it was a proper change before he would bring it in.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That may be; but my view is that when a plausible case is made out by an attorney general or by attorneys general for an amendment with respect to procedure I feel it my duty to bring it before parliament, because parliament is the only body which can deal with and pronounce upon it. I would not take the same view with respect to the creating of substantive crimes. That, in my opinion, is on a different footing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister thinks this is a matter of procedure.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The principle behind this amendment is the desire that betting should be curtailed. The section which it is now proposed to amend is not one which creates a crime, but rather one which defines a common betting house. There is another provision which says it is an offence to keep a common betting house.

Mr. BOUCHER: It really enlarges the crime, though.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I submit not. It does not change the thing which parliament wished to curtail.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Therefore it is a matter of procedure.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is a matter of procedure, as to how we shall go about it, to lessen what was looked upon as the evil of betting.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not quite that; it is the intermediate stage.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It has to do with the evidence upon which convictions may be secured.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Of course that is practically the same thing. These provisions of the criminal code cannot be expressed only in the form of pious wishes; they have to be accompanied by provisions whereby they can be enforced against those who would not give way to the expression of a pious wish. There have been representations from the attorneys general of three provinces that the, to them, evil of betting was increasing, and that it would be of advantage to tighten up the methods of restriction provided by the code; and the form in which the amendments were first presented here was the form suggested by those gentlemen. After the bill was printed and became known, representations were received by the department making objections of the kind voiced here this morning by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. On considering the matter I thought the objections were well taken and that the mere word "likely" was too broad. For that reason I have brought in this morning the suggestion that it should not be left so that anything at all could be held to be "likely", but that it should be confined to a place outfitted or equipped with the things usually found in places used for that purpose. I do confess that this removes the necessity of proving subjective intent on the part of the person prosecuted, but the purpose of the law is not to assure the purity of mind of the person charged; what is aimed at is to curb the effect, and this would make it sufficient to prove objectively that what had been provided was a thing that brought about the result we wished to eliminate. My position in that regard is that I am going to suggest that section 9 be dropped. That section concerns the telegraph and telephone companies. We in the department had thought that by using this language we would be giving them further protection, but they do not think that is so, and for that reason I am going to ask the committee to allow this section 9 to be dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was section 9 asked for by any of the attorneys general?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: What was asked for by the attorneys general was much more drastic than I would care to submit to the house; I do not think there was a plausible case made out for it. What was asked for by some attorneys general was that it be a crime to let any of this news come over the wires. I did not think there was a plausible case presented, because that would curb legitimate activities at the same time that it would eliminate the thing these attorneys general wanted to eliminate. I thought that on balance the inconvenience of curbing legitimate activities would be greater than the inconvenience of being unable to prevent the facilities from being used from time to time for purposes that may be undesirable.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What attorneys general suggested the changes that were made in sections 7 and 8?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Section 7 was suggested by the attorney general of Ontario and the attorney general of British Columbia, and concurred in by the deputy attorney general of Alberta. Section 8 was suggested by the deputy attorney general of Alberta, concurred in by the attorney general of British Columbia, and favourably commented upon by the former attorney general of Ontario.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who was that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Conant. My position with respect to what is to be left of sections 7 and 8 is that I bring them before the house, and represent to the house that they have been suggested by the attorneys general of two or three provinces; that they appear plausible, and that this is the only body which can deal effectively with the matter. I am going to listen, to see if the proposals receive support from any of the representatives of the population of Canada, and if they do not receive that support I think I shall be entitled to conclude that the evil suggested by the attorneys general is not sufficiently apparent to have created a very great impression. That is the position. I do not think it would have been proper for me to say to them, "No, you cannot even get this before parliament." They are the ones who are administering these laws, and they say it would appear to them desirable to have them tightened up in this way. They have pointed out that there was a growing evil of increased betting by people who should not be using their resources at this time in that way; that large sums were being lost, and the suggestion was made that it required conversion into American exchange for the profits arising out of these transactions to be transmitted to those to whom they were finally destined. But if the situation is not such that members of this house have seen the evil and recognized that something should be done about it, I do not intend to insist upon the passage of even these modified sections 7 and 8.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. BOUCHER: Could the minister give any figures that would indicate the number of unsuccessful charges that have been laid, and the number of successful charges? I speak with some experience in the matter, and I have in mind that it is more difficult to get the principals to lay charges against the keepers of common gaming houses than to secure a conviction once a charge is laid. That being so, I do not know that we are getting anywhere by taking this action. I think perhaps the minister could persuade us of the necessity of this amendment if he could show us that there has been great difficulty in securing convictions, that in spite of so many charges having been laid, few convictions have been registered. That would definitely indicate that an amendment to the procedure was necessary, that communities desiring to stamp out this evil had done their best but that something in the law made it so difficult to obtain convictions that the social reform desired was impeded. Unless that situation is made evident, however, I do not think we should so extend procedure as to enlarge the crime and thus make it more difficult to institute an action and secure a conviction. I think it is generally acknowledged that if a penalty is very severe it has the effect of lessening the number of charges laid. If the provisions dealing with intent are made very wide, it leads to great variation in the way in which these matters are dealt with by various judges or magistrates. It may be found that in certain communities, where revenue is sought, they revert at times to a loose and easy way of getting convictions, the purpose being to secure fines rather than to bring about a moral uplift. We should look at that carefully and not facilitate the securing of convictions by magistrates or judicial officers who may be seeking to obtain revenue rather than to raise the moral standing of their community. I think all of us know that in certain communities for many years the gambling interests have been prosecuted periodically. They pay their fines and the next day return to business and carry on for some time unmolested. It is hard to convince the public that there is a wholehearted desire to stamp out gambling, that there is not just a desire to obtain revenue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely that is not done in Ottawa.

Mr. BOUCHER: I shall not make any comment as to where it is done. Perhaps if we read the news about the Ottawa district we might find some reference to this. I do not think we should make it easier for those who go after convictions to obtain them in the court.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I find it difficult to follow the argument which has been advanced by the Minister of Justice as to why these amendments were introduced. In my opinion this amendment does not result in the constitution of any new offence or in the widening of an offence. It is purely procedural; it provides an opportunity for the crown to establish that an offence has been committed without having to prove, as has heretofore been the case, that the premises are kept or used for the purposes of making bets. As originally set out in the bill the proposed section would have constituted the most dangerous invasion of the rights of the individual that could possibly be imagined. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni pointed out the situation quite clearly, not only to-day but last evening. However, the amendment which is now suggested does not appear to me to be open to the objection that could be taken to the original amendment.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Certainly not to the same degree.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Not to the same degree. The words of the amendment are, "intended to be used," in other words intent must be established. Then the amendment reads, "or outfitted or equipped in such a manner as to be likely to be used." The operation of a gaming house where people resort or have the opportunity to lay bets is a crime according to the law of the land. As I see it, all that is being asked for by this new amendment is that the crown be not required to prove something that it has been almost impossible to prove affirmatively, namely, that the premises have been kept or used for the purpose of facilitating bets.

There have been quite a number of cases in which courts of appeal have held that the evidence was not sufficient to bring the charge within the strict provisions of the code. I cannot understand the minister's attitude when he says that if hon. members of the house do not think that betting is serious and widespread the amendment will not be proceeded with. As I say, this does not constitute a new offence; it does not make a crime of something which has not been a crime heretofore; all it does is to facilitate the conviction of the wrongdoer who heretofore has been able to secure an acquittal.

Generally speaking, these particular provisions have been the statute law of the land for over forty years, or for almost one hundred years under the common law, without amendment. The modern bookmaker is able to evade the law as it stands at present. I feel that the objection which was pertinent when the bill was introduced, namely the words "or likely to be used" has been removed. As a matter of fact, I think the Minister of Justice is to be commended for having introduced the number of amendments he has. The criminal code is hopelessly out of date in many of its sections. There are a great number of anomalous sections and there has been no endeavour since our criminal law was first codified to revise it with a view to bringing it up to date. Different interpretations have been placed upon the same section by different courts. We continue year after year to use the same code, making only a few changes or adding a patch here and there instead of once and for all bringing it up to date after a period of fifty years. We should appoint a parliamentary committee, or a committee representative of the attorneys general and composed of outstanding counsel, to go over the code and bring it up to date, to the end that the purpose of the codification may be secured, namely, that the law shall be clear so that justice shall be done. Sections have been permitted to remain in the statutes which have no meaning whatever. "Or" has been interpreted as "and", an interpretation that is contrary to the actual intention. This is but one example of a section that should be revised.

I do feel that the minister should give consideration to the desirability of having carried out a piece of work that would be monumental in its results, that would be tremendous in its scope. It would require some years of effort, but it would make our criminal code something worthy of our country. Codification is intended to represent the law as it actually is at the moment it is codified. I ask the minister to give consideration to taking what I believe would be one of the most forward-looking and advanced steps that could possibly be made, namely, the removing of the anomalies that now exist in many sections and the recodifying of the criminal law thereby bringing it up to date and in accordance with modern practice.

Mr. REID: I do not think an attempt should be made to intimate that members of the committee are in favour of the encouragement of betting or gaming houses. I do not think that need be stressed at all. My chief objection to the amendment is that it places a greater burden on the accused to prove further that he is innocent, and that is something which I believe we should not do. The old adage that a man is innocent until he is proved guilty would not obtain under this legislation, and the amendments proposed only make the position of the accused worse in his having to prove himself innocent.

The minister has said that two attorneys general have asked for this amendment, including the attorney general of Ontario. Has the minister brought his information up to date? There is a new attorney general for the province of Ontario, and he might not approve this amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who is he?

Mr. GRAYDON: They change so often.

Mr. REID: I think these amendments might very well be left over for a time at least, although some of the amendments proposed may seem to have considerable merit. I am glad that the minister is open to suggestions, but the amendments proposed do not in my opinion take care entirely of the situation. I have in mind that in British Columbia there is published the B. C. Breeders' Gazette and Racing Manual, and under this amendment a man might be charged simply because he had this publication in his possession as betting or aiding betting material. I suggest that delayed consideration be given to the amendments.

Mr. NEILL: I must agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury that the amendment proposed by the minister does not do much to relieve the objections. I look at it in this way. It says "used or intended", and there is a comma there. That settles that. That brings within the act the person who uses or intends to use. Then if it had gone on to say "and equipped" it would have been different, but it says "or". A man "intending to use," can be convicted on those words, even though not "equipped". That is a separate offence so to speak. I do not see a great deal of improvement in it.

The hon. member for Lake Centre suggested that the minister had left it for the house to decide whether it wanted gambling or otherwise, but that was not my view. I think the minister was doing a very fine thing when he proposed to take away the support of the government from the measure and leave it to be decided by those who are the representatives of the people. Certainly the question as it presents itself to my mind is not: Do we want betting? The question is: Do we want a worse evil created as regards the liberty of the subject than would be created by doing away with this section altogether? As the minister has been kind enough to put it up to the house, I would move, in order to crystallize the situation, that section 7 be struck out.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. HAZEN: In my opinion the amendment proposed to be made by section 7 to section 227 of the criminal code is most objectionable, and I think the amendment which the Minister of Justice moved this morning, if I understood it correctly, is almost equally objectionable. This amendment is a departure from one of the fundamental principles of our criminal law—that before a person can be charged with a crime he must have committed an overt act or must have failed to do something which the law says he shall do. This amendment makes it a crime for a person to have a wrongful intent. It is a retrograde step, an encroachment on the principles of British justice. If this amendment becomes law it places in jeopardy the freedom and security of the citizens of this country. It seems to me that if there is one duty more than another that members of parliament owe to their constituents, it is to be zealous in guarding their freedom and security and maintaining the fundamental principles of British justice.

In the fourteenth century the opinion was held by some legal authorities in England that the intention to commit a crime constituted an offence. In the sixteenth century such an objectionable doctrine was overruled, and the principle was established that the intention to commit a wrong was not in itself a crime. The reason for this change in the law, I think, is obvious. It was made, I believe, because of the extreme difficulty, if not impossibility, of proving what was going on in another person's mind at a particular time, and because of the fact that even if that were proved, it was impossible to find that that person might not on further consideration change his mind and commit no offence. This amendment, if it becomes law, is a step back towards the middle ages.

In Holdsworth's History of English Law, volume 8, page 443, I read the following:

> It was well settled in the 16th century (in spite of the opinion to the contrary held in the 14th century) that a mere intention to commit a crime, unaccompanied by any overt act, entailed no criminal liability. "The imagination of the mind to do wrong" it was held in Hales v. Petit (1563) Plowden, page 259, without an act done, is not punishable in our law, neither is the resolution to do that wrong, which he does not, punishable but the doing of the act is the only point which the law regards; for until the act is done it cannot be an offence to the world, and when the act is done it is punishable.

That case quoted by Holdsworth was decided in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

I turn now to a judgment delivered in the twentieth century, to a judgment of Mr. Justice Riddell, of the Supreme Court of Ontario, in the case of Rex v. McCarthy, decided a few years ago, and I read these words:

. . . an intent is not enough for as Chief Justice Bryan said in Year Book 17 Edward IV, 2 pl. 2—

I might say that this case was decided before the reign of Queen Elizabeth:

"The devil himself cannot try the thought of a man".

And Judge Riddell adds:

It would be hopeless to look for greater subtility in the courts. Intending to commit a crime is not the same as attempting to commit it.

Our criminal code provides that a person is liable to a year's imprisonment who is found guilty of keeping any disorderly house; that is to say any bawdy house, common gaming house, or common betting house. A common betting house is defined by section 227, which is the section now proposed to be amended, as:

A house, a room or place (d) opened, kept or used for the purpose of facilitating or encouraging or assisting in the making of bets,

And so forth. That is a good definition. That is a real definition of what a common betting house should be. But this amendment would change that definition. It would define a common betting house as a house, office, room or place used—and here are the words to which I wish to call attention—"or intended, or likely to be used, for that purpose". The definition goes altogether too far; it makes an intention a crime.

I would ask hon. members what they would think if a person in their constituency was summoned to court charged that between a certain day and a certain day in a certain month he did unlawfully intend to keep a disorderly house, to wit, a common betting house at a certain named place for the purpose of betting contrary to section 229 of the Criminal Code of Canada. A man is charged with the intention of doing something, charged with an idea he has in his mind and which he may subsequently change. The whole thing is absolutely wrong and is absolutely out of place in this age.

What a man may intend to do and what he actually does are, very often, two entirely different things. Second thoughts are often best, yet under this amendment it is an offence to intend to do an act even though that intention is not carried out and the act is never done. It seems to me that this is going entirely too far, and that you cannot justify upon any principle a law of this kind.

There are various classes of crimes. Some are more serious than others. Betting is not one of our more serious crimes; in fact some corporations are permitted under certain statutes, restricted as to time and place, to operate pari-mutuel systems of betting. Why should it be necessary to make such a drastic alteration, for a minor crime, in the principles of our criminal law? It seems to me that that is a question which is hard to answer. A precedent should not be established. We are told, in the explanatory notes to this bill, page 2, that under the code as at present worded—

. . . the crown, in order to obtain a conviction, must prove that the house, office, room or place alleged to be a common betting house was actually opened, kept or used for the purpose . . . of facilitating or encouraging or assisting in the making of bets. . . .

I submit that that is exactly what should be proved if justice is to prevail in this country. A man is presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty, and it seems to me that the onus should be on the crown to prove that the house, room or place alleged to be a common betting house was in fact used for that purpose by the accused, before it can obtain a conviction for the offence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the law to-day.

Mr. HAZEN: That is the law to-day. That is the law they propose to change by this amendment. This explanatory note goes on to say that:

Under the amendment it will be sufficient if the crown proves that the house, office, room or place was used or intended or likely to be used for such purposes.

This clearly shows that the amendment proposes to make an intention an offence, and I say we should have none of it.

We are told that the suggested amendment was submitted by the attorney general of Ontario and concurred in by the attorney general of British Columbia, and I think the minister said to-day that a third attorney general had suggested this amendment, although the name of the province he represents does not appear in the notes to the bill. But I would say this, that there are some crown prosecutors who take an exaggerated view of offences which, when all is said and done, are not very serious offences. They take an exaggerated view of them on some occasions when they fail to secure convictions. Some crown prosecutors are over-zealous, and look for easy ways and short-cuts to obtain convictions when they believe offences have been committed. To change a fundamental principle of our criminal law to make it easy to obtain convictions against citizens of this country, who may be innocent, is a step in the wrong direction; it is a departure from British principles of justice and a step towards a new despotism.

Under our criminal law a person must do an overt act before he can be charged with a criminal offence. That principle is based on reason and common sense. It has stood the test of time. It should not be encroached upon to enable over-zealous crown prosecutors to obtain convictions for a crime which cannot be regarded as a very serious one. There may be parts of Canada in which a good deal of betting is going on at the present time, but to take a step of this kind to put an end to it is, it seems to me, introducing a cure which is and will prove to be much worse than the disease. So far as I am able to, I protest strongly against the proposed amendment, and if I am in order I will second the amendment to the amendment made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. GREEN: I rise to support wholeheartedly the section as it has now been submitted by the Minister of Justice. I praise him for bringing in this amendment to the code and also for making the improvement which has been made to-day. I suggest that he will not go very far wrong if he listens to the points made this morning by my colleague the hon. member for Lake Centre, who is one of the outstanding defence counsel of Canada. I was very much impressed by his submission this morning, and when he said that the amendment as it now reads is a reasonable amendment I think that may be taken as gospel truth.

Some suggestion has been made that this is only a matter of a minor offence, that there is nothing much to it, that it is only a little bit of betting on the side. Well, actually in British Columbia, and I believe in Ontario, this is a big-money racket, having, I believe, widespread connections with the underworld; and the betting is not on local horse races but on races held in the United States.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Kentucky derby.

Mr. GREEN: It is on races of all kinds conducted in the states. It is estimated that from the city of Vancouver daily there has been wagered a sum of $30,000 under this scheme. The bookies who are in this business are not inoffensive, ignorant, innocent people; they are mighty keen business men who have figured out a way to defeat the law. That is the situation, and surely the parliament of Canada can face it and can put through an adequate remedy. I know that in our province the attorney general has been trying for several years to get an amendment put through to this effect. As hon. members know, he is Hon. R. L. Maitland, K.C., who also is one of the leading defence counsel of Canada and is thoroughly acquainted with the criminal code. He has been convinced for years that this amendment is needed. He is convinced that if such an amendment is not made these bookies will run wild.

That is the feeling in our province. I have here a press clipping of May 28, the day after the Minister of Justice introduced this bill, in which we find the following statement by the chief of police:

> "Bookmakers have had their innings in Vancouver," says police chief Donald Mackay. "They're on the defensive now. It's been a long, hard struggle to curtail their activities, but if the proposed amendments to the criminal code are passed the bookies will be forced out of business."

The next day there appeared in the Vancouver Daily Province, one of the leading newspapers of Canada, an editorial under the title, "Teeth in the Law", the last two paragraphs of which read:

> There is no doubt about the evil or the difficulty. Bookmaking on horse-racing and some other popular forms of sport has literally found its way into innumerable holes and corners from which the ordinary processes of the law have been increasingly impotent to dislodge it.
>
> It is bad enough when it is honest if illegal bookmaking within the gambler's code—bad in its demoralization of the lives of its addicts. It is worse when it becomes, as all experience shows, that it increasingly tends to become, a conscienceless racket. It is time long past due that the laws against the exploitation of gambling were provided with effective teeth.

It is all right for us to argue about what happened in Queen Elizabeth's time.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not argue about what happened in Queen Elizabeth's time.

Mr. GREEN: Then I withdraw that. It is all right for us to look back over the centuries and try to maintain the majesty of the law, British justice, and so on and so forth; but here is a condition, an evil that must be met, and it cannot be met by the provinces but only by the dominion parliament. I suggest that the law-abiding public of Canada are entitled to receive this protection from parliament at this time and I urge on the minister that he carry out his original intention and put through this amendment.

Mr. KINLEY: The idea expressed in this legislation seems to violate my sense of fair play. I am a layman, but I have had experience with amendments to the criminal law, both in the provincial legislature and here, and while I realize that the minister is dealing with organized crime to a degree, and therefore must use drastic means in coping with it, I suggest however that when, instead of throwing out your net to catch criminals, you throw that net over a citizen and say to him, "Get out of it if you can," that is hardly British fair play. The thing that bothers me about this betting legislation is that the principle involved is that it is a criminal offence to take a chance. But everybody in the country does it. I cannot find many people in my section of the country who do not in some way or other take a chance or who are not in some way entertained by getting close to the border of this betting law. In order to satisfy public opinion we invoke the church and say that if the church does it it is permissible, or if the mayor of the town allows it you can have a bingo game or any of the other games usually played at fairs and exhibitions, which are therefore gambling places.

The difficulty about these provisions is that they affect all the people of the country, and when you make a law of this kind so drastic that the natural frailties of the people in a community are apt to be made crimes, that is not a good thing. It seems to me the minister might take into consideration the fact that he is dealing with a subject that has a great many applications. Even persons who play bridge may be affected; numberless people have bridge games where they give prizes and gamble a little. When you bring all these people into the net of criminal prosecution, I suggest that you are doing something about which we can hardly be enthusiastic. I trust the minister will consider this matter carefully.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has told us that when this amendment saw the light of day he received many representations from the public. We know the opinions expressed of three of the attorneys general, and I should like to know whether he has received representations from the other six. If so, have any of them opposed this suggestion?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The only other attorney general who has made comment to the department in respect of these classes since the bill was published is the new attorney general for Ontario, who said that in his view it would be desirable to postpone this until at least another session so that it might have further consideration. He was, I think, the only other attorney general who communicated with the department about these sections since the bill became public.

Mr. POTTIER: The member for Lake Centre indicated that there was no new offence, that the offence was not enlarged, but that it was a matter of procedure. Are the words "likely to be used" left in the section?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. POTTIER: I submit that we are enlarging the offence. The original section used the words "opened, kept or used." This amendment uses the words "intended or likely to be used"—I am leaving out the other words about outfitting and equipping. The words "likely to be used" are left in the section.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are left in but are qualified by the amendment, "equipped in such a manner as to be likely." The likelihood is to be judged not generally but from the amount of equipment and outfitting that is found on the premises.

Mr. POTTIER: I still submit that we are creating a criminal offence which would not have been there before this amendment was introduced. On the general policy, I rather agree with the member for York-Sunbury and the member for St. John-Albert. We have to be careful about these amendments where we try to bring in by procedure what could not be got under the general common law. We saw what happened in the amendments to the customs act. The officials of the national revenue department found it difficult to obtain convictions. We saw one amendment after another, until it got to the stage that they could call in anyone, and he would have to answer all kinds of questions, and in some instances be asked to sign a statement. The result was that this procedure became wholesale, and they answered nothing. The law defeated itself. By trying to bring about convictions through matters of procedure they got no convictions at all, and the law was abused to such an extent that it received no respect.

I am always suspicious and afraid of these amendments which have as their fundamental purpose the making of convictions which otherwise could not be obtained. In some instances an offence may be enlarged so as to make it easy for officials who otherwise could not obtain a conviction. The suggestion of the new attorney general for Ontario, who I am sure must be a good one, should be examined, and it would be well to wait until next year. If he has not already been consulted, I should like to have the attorney general for Nova Scotia consulted in the matter.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have very little to say, because in a certain sense this is a matter for lawyers. Yet I think it is dangerous to leave it with the lawyers, because there may be more than one vested interest in a matter of this kind. To my mind, so long as the word "intended" or "likely" is in the section, I do not think it can be satisfactory. I must confess to knowing nothing about gambling or betting houses. I shall put the case in another way. If we were dealing with some matter affecting labour, a subject about which I claim to know something, and we found there was a section in a labour law providing that a trade union or an officer of a trade union were guilty of an offence if he intended to or was likely to advocate a strike, I would object to such a law. For the same reason in this case I shall have to vote against the amendment. Nevertheless I believe there is a great deal in what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Lake Centre as to the evils with which we are dealing, and the facility with which the law can be evaded. I believe it has always been an axiom with us that a guilty person should go free rather than that an innocent person should be convicted. Because of the two points I have mentioned I shall have to vote against the amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As I expressed some opinions on the section at an early stage in the discussion, I should like to say one more thing. The minister brings in a government measure which has the approval of council. This is government policy. It will not do for the minister to say, under our system of responsible government, "Here it is; take it or leave it".

Mr. MARTIN: We ought to grasp at the opportunity to kill this thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Probably so. However I am taking exception to the principle upon which the minister is sponsoring this bill. He should never have brought it in unless it had his approval. In dealing with criminal law under our system of responsible government, it will not do for the minister to come to parliament and say, "Here it is; take it or leave it." I have seen that happen before, and it is not responsible government at all.

I was inclined to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. However, a startling statement has been made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, one which makes me uneasy. If in the city of Vancouver there is a system of organized crime with which the authorities have difficulty in dealing, under legislation now existing, admittedly that is an evil for which the Department of Justice is responsible, because it is the department clothed with the responsibility for enacting substantively or proposing criminal law in this parliament. Under these circumstances we are given occasion to pause and consider.

I have a suggestion to make to the minister. In my opinion he must assume responsibility for the bill. He ought to be sure there is a real case in support of it, one which cannot be met by the ordinary provisions of law as they stand to-day. He ought to satisfy himself on that point. If it cannot be dealt with, and we cannot stamp out that which is admittedly or at least is alleged to be a substantial evil—and I am impressed by what the hon. member for Vancouver South said in that regard—then he ought to put this bill through. But he ought to be seized of what the facts are. If in the opinion of those charged with the responsibility of administering the law in Vancouver this is the only way of dealing with it, with the modifications suggested by the minister, then parliament should not lightly throw this out upon the statement of a mere academic principle. Because there is no doubt that to a large extent we are doing away with the question of guilty intent if we pass this legislation. We must not forget that which the lawyers call mens rea, something which varies with various crimes. Very little of it is required in certain classes of criminal cases, and in other cases one must show very strong criminal intent.

My suggestion to the minister is that he let this matter stand until next session, that in the meantime it be reviewed by the Department of Justice, and further information obtained. The statement that $30,000 a day is leaving the city of Vancouver, through an organization of bookmakers, is a startling one.

Mr. HAZEN: It would have to get by the exchange board in some way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have been wondering about that. How in the world do the foreign exchange control board let this money go out of the country for this purpose? The whole position ought to be reviewed, and I suggest that the minister let this section stand over until next session. If the department is convinced that the law as at present worded cannot be enforced, then let the minister come before parliament, with the support of the government behind him. I do not believe we know enough about the factual position to pass the legislation this year, or to vote one way or another. From what I have heard, I would be embarrassed if I were to vote either way, because I have never yet knowingly supported the wrong. I may have been wrong, and I may have often supported the wrong, but I never have done so knowingly, and I do not wish to be put in that position to-day.

Mr. KINLEY: They are so relative.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is so. My suggestion therefore is that the position be examined more fully by the minister, and that then he should take the ministerial responsibility for either putting it through or not putting it through. The minister, under our system of government, must accept responsibility. He cannot fly kites. That is not responsible government as we understand it in Canada. Before bringing this provision before parliament he should have known that a great evil existed, and that it could be dealt with only in this way. Then he should put the force of the executive authority behind this in submitting it to parliament and say, "This is what we believe is absolutely necessary to eradicate the evil."

Mr. COLDWELL: It seems to me there is a great difference of opinion. I think we all want to tighten up this legislation in order to wipe out the evil; for evil it is. I was going to suggest to the minister that if there is to be some delay, or if the suggestion just made is to be carried out, information should be obtained from some of the cities in this regard. I have noticed in the newspapers, for example, that an investigation is going on in the city of Hull, which is right beside this city of Ottawa, dealing with gambling and other conditions. I have noticed from some of the evidence that has appeared in the newspapers that during the course of that inquiry bookmaking and betting have been mentioned from time to time. It seems to me that if the department has not gathered the information upon which it is able to base its desire for legislation, then that should be done. I would vote for anything that would stamp out this evil—

Mr. MARTIN: You would not want that done by violating principles which are fundamental in our whole society?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, but I would say that all law restricts the liberty of the individual to some extent, in the interests of the public good.

Mr. BOUCHER: It should extend the liberty of the individual.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, inasmuch as it restricts the liberty of the individual to do wrong, it extends the liberty of the individual to live in a manner that is right.

Mr. MITCHELL: You should have been a lawyer yourself.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not know; I am sometimes glad that I am not a lawyer.

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East): Why?

Mr. BOUCHER: Let us not have a confession.

Mr. COLDWELL: I sometimes listen to lengthy dissertations by lawyers, and perhaps that is why I am glad I am not a lawyer. However, I rose to say that I do think the minister should be given every support in trying to stamp out this evil, but in doing so we should be sure of the premises upon which we act.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to add just a word as to the principle of criminal law which I am sure interests everyone who has had anything to do with the administration of justice in this country. I must confess that I agree with those who oppose the introduction of the principle of finding a person guilty on the basis of an intention, or on the basis that a certain thing is likely to occur. I do so for two reasons, one of which has been touched upon already by the hon. member for St John-Albert. The safest principle for criminal law, which is a penal statute, is to have an overt act a necessary ingredient of the crime. We all recognize that almost every human being has his moments of anger, his moments of ill-advised passion, and that often, mentally at least, he contemplates what would be a crime, serious or otherwise. In the great majority of cases, thank heaven, that intention is never carried into effect, and no overt act is committed. If we attempted in our criminal code to punish every person who intended or had thought of doing a criminal act, it would be merely a farcical attempt to enforce an impossible law.

I agree with other speakers; I know of no habit that will so surely sap the strength of a nation as widespread gambling, yet it seems to be inherent in human nature to wish to gamble in one way or another. There is, therefore, a certain similarity between this evil and that of bootlegging, let us say; and from the experience we gained in attempting to control the liquor traffic we know that in the last analysis all law must have a measure of public support. If you do not have that support your law will not be efficacious in its application. I suggest to the Minister of Justice that even in the cities where this evil of gambling is prevalent, nothing would set public opinion more against this law than the conviction of a man because of some intention or some likelihood that he was going to commit an offence. I agree that this is a great evil; I fully appreciate the minister's desire to cope with it, but we should remember that we are lawmakers, and that fairness and justice in the law are much more important than to attempt, in a way that is offensive to our sense of justice, to cure an evil, when the cure may be worse than the evil itself.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask the Minister of Justice whether under this amendment the Winnipeg grain exchange would be classed as a gambling house?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The facts concerning the Winnipeg grain exchange would have to be proved before a court, and the court would determine the position. Certainly it is not the function of the Minister of Justice or of any member of this house to apply a law to any specific case until the facts connected with that case are proved.

Mr. BOUCHER: Could the minister give us any information as to the difficulty of obtaining convictions under the existing law, in respect to equipment?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I cannot give any statistical information. General representations have been made that the situation was such that these attorneys general did not care to attempt prosecutions because of the difficulty of having to prove criminal intent subjectively, having to satisfy the court beyond any reasonable doubt that there was criminal intent.

I wish to add just a few words. I do not think any new principle is being introduced here. As the paragraph is to be amended, it would be legislation of the kind which forbids, for instance, the carrying of offensive weapons, firearms and things of that kind. It is not a matter of intent; it is the overt act of being in possession or control of the dangerous thing that is forbidden.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury has suggested that before bringing such legislation before parliament the department should make sufficient investigation to enable the minister to come here and say, "Well, now, this is government policy and you must take it." I do not think that is really the doctrine that should apply in amending the procedural part of the criminal law. If the Department of Justice had the sole responsibility of applying the criminal law, then we could come here and say, "Our experience convinces us that it is necessary to do this," but when it is not our own experience; when it is the experience of the provincial attorneys general, I think the department is entitled to come before this house, which after all is the grand inquest of the nation, and ask this house if, from its knowledge of the situation throughout the nation, the suggestion made by some of the attorneys general should be acted upon.

I should like to assure the hon. member for Swift Current that the advisability of having the criminal law revised and consolidated, and many of the existing inconsistencies removed, has been considered, and some serious thought has been given to it. I do not feel at liberty in these times to ask that that be undertaken. The matter will require the serious attention of quite a large number of people who during these critical times are otherwise engaged. It would be something similar to the decennial revision of the statutes. It has been some fifteen years since the last consolidated statutes came into operation, and it is always a matter of four or five years to prepare a new consolidation. Therefore it will be over twenty years before there is a new consolidation of the statutes of Canada. Thought is being given to this matter and some work has been done already.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the criminal code?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On the criminal code.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who is doing the work?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Some work has been done by the law officers of this house, Mr. Ollivier and Mr. Fraser on the criminal code, but I have not felt that it would be proper at this time to ask parliament to set up a commission and to take the kind of men who would be required to do a proper job away from the occupations they are in at this time. I can assure my hon. friend that all lawyers realize the great benefit there would be to the Canadian public as well as to the bench and to the profession in having this work done.

Section stands.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Progress reported.

The house having reverted to government notices of motion:

WAR EXPENDITURES

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, and for other services directly connected with the war, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein, and that notwithstanding standing order 65 the committee shall consist of twenty-four members, as follows: Messrs. Black (Cumberland), Blackmore, Boucher, Pinard, Cleaver, Coldwell, Donnelly, Dupuis, Fauteux, Ferland, Gladstone, Golding, Graham, Homuth, Hurtubise, Jackman, Hill, Nixon, O'Neill, Picard, Pottier, Reid, Sissons, Winkler, with power to send for persons, papers and records; to examine witnesses and to report from time to time to the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference of this motion are similar to those of the motions in two previous years for the appointment of the war expenditures committee, the only difference being in the personnel of the proposed membership. Along with other members of the house I regret that the committee has not been set up earlier, but hon. members who follow the proceedings will, I am sure, appreciate the reasons for that. At an earlier stage in the session I indicated that I was most anxious to have all the standing and select committees set up at as early a day as possible. Indeed, such a request was made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), and the government sought to meet it. I believe the standing committees were appointed earlier this year than they have been at any other session for years past, and the same is true I believe with respect also to the special committees. But it did happen that on the motion for the appointment of one or two special committees there were long debates, and as the government had before the house financial matters respecting the war which it was recognized were all-important, it was thought inadvisable to present this particular motion at a time when it was likely to hinder the progress of the government's financial measures. The most important measures, as members will recall, were the mutual aid bill, the war appropriation bill and the budget. The budget, which was brought in at a very early stage of the session, occupied time that would otherwise have been taken for the appointment of this among other committees.

I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the statement which I made in the house on April 10 and, which will be found in Hansard at page 2290

Another matter which was stressed at the beginning of the session was that the government should appoint the committees at an early stage. Our attention was drawn to the fact that in other years some of the committees did not meet until well on in the session. We took great pains this year to have the personnel of the committees in readiness and sought every opportunity to have them appointed at an early date. But there is still on the order paper, as hon. members are aware, notices for two committees, one with respect to war expenditures and the other with respect to radio broadcasting. Thus far we have not been able to get these committees appointed.

I think I did mention at an earlier stage of the session that we took about a week in appointing the committee on social security and the committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation. Those committees might have been appointed in five or ten minutes and we could have had the discussion at a later stage. The main purpose is to get the committees appointed. If it is at all possible I should like to get the committee with respect to broadcasting and the committee on war expenditures appointed before we adjourn for Easter. I do not know whether we can do so, but I hope we might be able to. There will be plenty of opportunities throughout the session to discuss matters with respect to them when the committees bring in their reports. But that rests entirely with the house. I am pointing this out now in order that hon. members may see just why it may be that in some of the business we shall be later in meeting their wishes than might otherwise be the case.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition will recall that before the house rose for the Easter recess I did make an effort to have the committee on war expenditures set up, but I was informed that there were members opposite who wished to participate in the debate and that the debate might take some little time. It was for this reason I did not introduce the motion before the Easter adjournment.

Members will also recall that there was an understanding between the leaders of the different parties in the house as to the order of business which should be followed with respect to the financial measures, and that it was agreed that every effort should be made to get the mutual aid bill and the war appropriation bill through with as little interruption as possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may interrupt for a moment, I hope the Prime Minister was not under any misapprehension as to the setting up of this committee, because any arrangements that were made certainly were never made with a view to having the setting up of the war expenditures committee delayed until the end of the session. That was never intended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not mean until the end of the session, but anticipating that there would be a debate of some length on the motion for setting up the war expenditures committee it was felt that it was desirable not to permit at that time a lengthy debate which would delay consideration of the war appropriation measure.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think there was any suggestion that there would be a lengthy debate on this motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was my understanding. I certainly did gather from the statements that were made that there would be a lengthy debate. I should add that, as hon. members will recall, during a considerable part of the session the government found it difficult to make headway with its financial measures, because when an effort was made to move into committee of the whole we were often met by an amendment from hon. members opposite in one of the three groups, and the effect of that was to delay considerably the time at which we were in a position to go on with pressing war measures. The house will recall that with respect to the mutual aid bill the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) explained that because of obligations which he had to be in a position to meet, or give an understanding to meet it was all important that that measure should not be delayed, and this being appreciated by the house, we proceeded with it without much in the way of interruption.

On May 10 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) addressed a question to me. He said:

> I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will endeavour some time this week to arrange for the setting up of the war expenditures committee. The session is getting on.

I replied to him at that time.

> I should not like to enter into the reasons which have made it impossible to reach that particular item on the agenda before this, but certainly almost every time the government has moved to get on with some of its most important legislation there have been interruptions for one reason or another. Other matters or measures have been brought up which have taken up a considerable amount of time. I understand the resolution referred to by my hon. friend is one that it is expected will take up some considerable time in discussion. In that event I think it should stand over until we have completed the measure which the Minister of Finance has introduced with respect to war supplies and also the war appropriation bill.

There was no exception taken to that statement from anyone in the house. That is why this committee has not been appointed earlier. The government held to the order of business which had been agreed to at the time I mentioned.

It may be thought by some hon. members that there can be no particular advantage in appointing the committee at this stage of the session, as we will be adjourning very shortly; but previous committees have had the opportunity of sitting through the period of adjournment, and I assume that this committee, once it is formed, will ask for that privilege, and also that the house will be prepared to grant it. So that the effect of the passage of this resolution at this time will be that the committee appointed will have, from the time of its being constituted until this session is over and parliament prorogues, a much better opportunity of going into the whole business of war expenditures, than it could possibly have had thus far; I mean, a much freer opportunity, because, as hon. members know, throughout this session there have been many committees sitting, and the time of hon. members has been pretty fully occupied.

I do not think there is any necessity at this time to discuss the resolution itself. As I have said, the resolution is similar to those which have previously passed this house, and it is on all fours with the resolution which has been adopted at Westminster during this present war and which was similar to the resolution adopted, after three years had elapsed, at the time of the last war.

I would just say in conclusion that if I should be in this particular place when another session of parliament meets I should gladly join with hon. members in seeking to have this committee appointed at the earliest possible stage of the new session.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I was disappointed that this committee was not appointed earlier in the session. As the Prime Minister remarked, I suggested it to him, and I think the facts that he has brought to the house this afternoon are sufficient proof that the house regards the committee as a very important one. I know that on several occasions when the house moved into supply other matters were brought up for discussion. No doubt that did to some extent delay the business which the government anticipated would be done at the time, but may I remind the Prime Minister that not all that discussion was promoted from the opposition side of the house. I remember distinctly that his own followers were active in the discussion of the mutual aid bill, and, I believe, had a great deal to do with the prolongation, if not the initiation, of the debate. There have been few opportunities this session to discuss some of the important matters which affect our constituents. The only opportunity we have of bringing such matters emphatically before the house is when we move into supply, and there have been few occasions of the kind this session.

In my opinion at least some of the discussion, perhaps a great deal of it, on the war appropriation bill might have been curtailed had this committee been sitting, because a number of problems that we discussed on the floor would have been discussed in the committee, and those who were active in the discussion of various phases of the war appropriation bill were in many instances, I noted, hon. members who are suggested for this committee.

It is unfortunate that this committee was not set up earlier, and I am glad to hear the Prime Minister say that in other sessions, he hopes, opportunities will be afforded for the earlier establishment of this committee. Those of us who had the privilege of meeting and discussing with the chairman of the British war expenditures committee the work of that committee at Westminster will have been deeply impressed by the importance of the British committee. When Sir John Wardlaw Milne was here the other day he was good enough to tell us something of the work of his committee, which also sits between sessions; and I only wish that ours might prove to be as effective and as efficient.

I think it is asking a great deal of hon. members to expect them to sit on this committee almost continuously between the sessions of parliament. Speaking for myself, last year I was unable to take even a few days' holiday, but I feel that during this time of war, members who are appointed to the committee regard it as something of a duty.

I shall not on this occcasion go into the matter at any considerable length. I wish to refer only to the report which was presented when this house assembled on the 27th of January. I think it was a good report, a report which showed that the subcommittees —all of them—had given close attention to the matters which properly had to be looked into, and that certain of the recommendations would be of far-reaching effect. I shall not quote the recommendations; they will be found on page 758 and succeeding pages of Votes and Proceedings of January 27, 1943, but in my opinion they are important. I do not know to what extent they have been carried out. Into that we should inquire.

I was a member of the committee last year but in spite of that I would like to say that members of our party in the house appreciate the work which was done by all members of the committee, and the considerable sacrifice they made in remaining in Ottawa after the rest of the members of the house had gone home.

I hope that the committee this year will go thoroughly into certain phases of our expenditures and will see to it that the various departments are closely checked. Even if the committee never reported to this house, the very fact that it does meet and does inquire and does call before it witnesses from the departments, who cannot appear before parliament itself, has a good and salutary effect upon the departments. For these reasons among others I support the appointment of the committee.

Mr. G. R. BOUCHER (Carleton): Now that almost four years have elapsed since the beginning of hostilities, and about nine billion dollars have been spent in the prosecution of the war, it is obvious, I think, that some check on war expenditures on behalf of the members of the House of Commons is important. It is difficult to reconcile the importance of the war expenditures committee with the fact that the session has run from January 26 until the present time without this committee having been set up; indeed, that with such colossal expenditure going on the committee has not been in deliberation since about the middle of last November.

The composition of the war expenditures committee, consisting as it has done of twenty-four members, eighteen of whom are appointed from the government side of the house, and six from the opposition, shows that the opposition members have very little control over the workings of the committee. This is the third year of operation of the war expenditures committee, and so far no opportunity has been given members of this house to discuss the matters which the committee should investigate or the recommendations they have made. This is the sort of opportunity that is afforded us, in the dying days of the session, on a Saturday afternoon, when a great many members have already gone home. Add to that the fact that this war expenditures committee, from its inception, has been sitting in camera and that the individual members of the committee are in honour bound to observe secrecy, to make their inquiries without the help of expert evidence, without technical assistance, to get what information they require as best they can, and on information so obtained to base their recommendations, having little or no opportunity to carry out any real research before submitting their findings to the membership of the House of Commons. So far as I am concerned, that is not just democracy. It is not representative government, and it does not represent to the members of the House of Commons the true functions of the war expenditures committee.

There are no doubt occasions when secrecy and sittings in camera are necessary. The war expenditures committee could and perhaps should deal with many matters that carry with them possibilities of giving aid or comfort to the enemy, and in that event no publicity should be made possible so that information may go to sources that should not have it. I fully appreciate that. But I well recall, as a member of a subcommittee last year, a motion being brought before the committee to discuss war-time housing in public, and that motion was defeated—despite the denial of the member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver)—and the committee went into the subject of war-time housing.

Mr. CLEAVER: Would the hon. member permit an interruption?

Mr. BOUCHER: To ask a question, but not to make a speech.

Mr. CLEAVER: Does the hon. member not recall the fact that, notwithstanding that we sat in camera, the subcommittee, including two Conservative members as well as Liberal members, brought in a unanimous report?

Mr. BOUCHER: True. The hon. member for Halton seems to think that because the committee brought in a unanimous report, the statement he made in the house some time ago denying the making of a proposal that we should not sit in camera with regard to housing, has no effect. The main committee was divided into three parts, so that the official opposition could have only one member on each of two subcommittees and two on the third. Under the circumstances it did not seem to me, as an individual, that I could properly discharge the functions of a member of a political party, a member of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition—the official opposition—a member of the House of Commons of Canada and one who, representing a constituency in this house, has a duty to perform to his country beyond his constituency, beyond his party, beyond the official opposition. For when committees meet in camera, one must keep one's information to oneself. Every member of such a committee must observe the conditions of secrecy, and therefore cannot be given a proper chance to discuss or explain matters in the house.

Let me discuss, as I see them, the advantages or otherwise of sitting in camera. There is no doubt that when you sit in camera certain information can be given to the committee, which would not otherwise be obtained, with regard to matters on which the enemy should not be informed. But there are other aspects as well. We all know that, even when meetings are held in camera, witnesses come before the committee in almost every instance with a brief prepared either by themselves or by the departments they represent or by companies or corporations for whom they are working. Such briefs are prepared with the minutest care, and on many occasions they were read to the committee. On a few occasions briefs were left with the committee for discussion and evidence was taken from them. Not only were briefs prepared in advance, before witnesses came before the committee, but on many occasions the Department of Munitions and Supply, and sometimes solicitors representing a company, were there with a watching brief to see that nothing was said that should not be said. There was therefore ample safeguard against undesirable material coming before the committee, without the necessity of sitting in camera.

In my particular subcommittee, as I believe in others, when secret information was given we were warned, and I believe the members of my subcommittee were particularly cautious not to disclose anything of a secret nature. On this point, I suggest that any gentleman is unworthy of membership in the House of Commons if he cannot use his own discretion to observe secrecy where necessary. Many committees sitting in camera can on occasion hear evidence that should not be repeated to the public, evidence that should be withheld from the press and kept off the record. But let me point out that when the witnesses give evidence before the subcommittee it is taken down by shorthand reporters and a copy is given to the witness. They have every privilege of changing it or of deleting from it anything they consider should not be in it. They can check it or modify it. But one thing I did observe and did resent was the fact that the members of the subcommittee sitting in camera could not obtain for their own use a transcript of the evidence taken from day to day. To be sure, they could go to the branch and look it over and leave it there, and sometimes they could take it out and bring it back; but in my opinion, doing the work that I felt called upon to do, as I am sure every member of the subcommittee on which I served also felt bound to do, through long periods of the holiday last year, and going through evidence of all sorts, the members of the subcommittee should have a transcript from day to day of the evidence taken so that they might peruse it carefully and make comparisons. They would then be in a better position to verify their reports, because they would be more conversant with all the material that had been submitted. But in analysing the evidence that was given my powers were very limited. Indeed, I was very much impressed by the extent to which that limitation went, and many times I felt how futile it was for me to give an opinion and back up that opinion with any assurance without having expert or technical assistance to that end.

Let us take for instance a production plant —Toronto Shipbuilding, let us say, or the Noorduyn aviation plant, or any plant you wish. We look over their payrolls and see that they have 9,000 or 10,000 men, with salaries ranging all the way from high brackets to low brackets. These workers are producing intricate mechanisms costing hundreds of thousands of dollars. How can we analyse the financial set-up of a company of that kind, without the assistance of someone versed in financial matters? How can we go into their books to find out if their excess profits taxes are correctly paid, what profits they are making, whether their costs are proper and economical, or whether their subcontracts are efficiently handled? For members of a subcommittee to go to a war production plant, in which colossal production is being carried on, a committee asked to produce an analysis without the assistance of expert evidence or expert help, is just like glossing over the surface. It is like putting wax on an already veneered surface.

Before we continue we should look into that phase of the matter. I do not cast any reflection upon the honour or the integrity of any witness coming before the committee. I have no reason to do that; but it has been argued to me that if the committee sits in camera a witness can give evidence which is open and frank and complete. As a practising lawyer I have always felt that the best test and assurance of veracity and exactness is a sworn oath given in public. The whole set-up of our courts in Canada is based upon public hearings, and it has been done in that way for the protection not only of the witnesses but of the public. In my view the test of publicity is a most advantageous factor in any discussion of this kind. We know that our courts decline to accept evidence given on affidavit, because they realize that in respect of those affidavits there is no opportunity for cross-examination. The rules of evidence applying in our courts have been framed after years of experience in trying to get the best possible evidence. A person giving evidence before a subcommittee on war expenditures should be sworn. That person's evidence should be transcribed as sworn. Then it should be given to the members of the committee for their deliberation, and it should be given the test of publicity, so far as it can be given. It should be given to the scrutiny of persons specially skilled in analysis of cost accounting, to a chartered accountant, or to some expert of the kind.

The subcommittee on which I have served has on a number of occasions called in people who were specially skilled in respect of certain work, and have asked them for their point of view in respect of problems brought before us. That itself is illustrative of the necessity of having expert technical assistants before these subcommittees. If one were to look over last year's report of the subcommittees and to investigate closely the ground they touched upon and the work with which they were charged, he would realize at once that thirty subcommittees, let alone three, could not properly discharge their duties. I repeat that before the committee on war expenditures can make a thorough investigation and report its findings with certainty and with assurance —and it should be in that position before it reports to the house—it should have at its disposal every possible facility for going into all the minute details with the utmost thoroughness. Here we are setting up, during a recess, a committee of twenty-four members. Undoubtedly it will be subdivided into three subcommittees. One of the subcommittees will be asked no doubt, to deal with government corporations, shipbuilding and aircraft production. To ask a subcommittee to handle that amount of work is to ask it to do not the work of a few days, not the work of a few hours a day, but the work of years.

It is my frank opinion there is no limit to the amount of work the committee on war expenditures could do. There is grave danger in asking a subcommittee to deal with subjects much too involved and too intricate for their consideration, unless they have expert assistance. Some time ago the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) stated in the house that the war expenditures committee was investigating contracts. Well, if any hon. members present to-day remember the big books of contracts we had placed before us—books laden down with contracts—they will realize at once how utterly impossible it would be for any subcommittee even to scratch the surface of investigating such contracts. And the fact that between November 13 and this date the committee has not sat cannot help but reflect an opinion held by the government either that there is a lack of necessity for the setting up of the committee, or that the committee could not do its work well.

As we enter the fifth year of the war we should take some of these facts into consideration. I believe that at least some advantage can be gained by a subcommittee on war expenditures sitting in camera, even though its findings cannot be passed on. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said, the very fact that the committee on war expenditures is sitting may do some good. But that is not good enough for the people of Canada, and it should not be good enough for the 245 members of the House of Commons. A committee on war expenditures, if it is to be adjudged worthy of its existence at all, is worthy of serious consideration, serious discussion, and the serious analysis of hon. members of the House of Commons.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of the committee on war expenditures since it was first established. As such I recognize I have a considerable responsibility to the house and to the country. Parliament has been most generous in voting money, and the people of Canada have supported its parliament in those expenditures. In fact in their desire to have the greatest possible effort made in the carrying on of the war, our people are ahead of the government. It is the responsibility of parliament, one which has been passed on to a committee composed of representatives in parliament, to see that these moneys are properly expended.

I was not anxious to serve on the committee on war expenditures. In fact I can say I was adverse to serving on it. I was not able to attend at all times. I had responsibilities to discharge to my constituency, to my home and to my business, with the result that I was unable to attend at all times when the committee sat. I feel that there must be some greater appreciation than obtains at present as to the immensity of the work devolving upon this committee. If the committee is to discharge its duties properly it should have been sitting continuously.

The hon. member who preceded me said that billions upon billions of dollars have been voted for war expenditures. In the fiscal year 1942-43 the vote for war expenditures amounted to three and a half billion dollars. When we reassembled in January we had to provide for a deficit of $858,000,000, nearly a billion dollars. Surely that is a great responsibility to be placed upon the committee charged with examining expenditures, to see that they are properly made. This parliament for the fiscal year 1943-44 is voting five billions of dollars for war expenditures and another $500,000,000 for civil expenditure. And if the experience in other years is repeated we will be faced with another deficit in this fiscal year. This means an expenditure of $15,000,000 a day. To a great extent the public will hold this committee responsible for the proper expenditure of these tremendous sums of money. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that as a member of that committee I must admit that I have not fully discharged that responsibility, and I can make the further admission that as a member of parliament I do not think I am capable of discharging that responsibility to this parliament and the people of Canada as it should be discharged.

There has been a great deal of adverse criticism of expenditures. The people are willing and prepared to have us vote all the money necessary and put the entire credit of this country at stake; but there is a great deal of misgiving in the province of Nova Scotia and all over this country that this money has not been always properly expended, and that there has been waste and extravagance. I have heard that said a hundred, a thousand times. The country was full of rumours of extravagance and waste at the time the construction work was going on at Debert, and we have not checked up on that. There were rumours of extravagance and waste in connection with Deep Brook at Windsor and the eastern passage airport. It was suggested that this latter work should have been investigated by our committee, but a special commission was set up, consisting of the late Hon. W. N. Tilley, K.C., who investigated the project and made a report. Nothing has been done with respect to that report, either by the war expenditures committee or by parliament, though it contained a very damaging finding to the effect that the successful contractor had obtained inside advance information. Apparently he was allowed an arbitrary advance classification of materials in connection with the eastern passage airport, which the other contractors were not given. The explanation was that he had asked the government officials and they had given him this arbitrary classification, which I think was ninety per cent earth and boulders, six per cent earth and four per cent solid rock. He also figured on a much greater yardage than the other contractors, expecting that additional yardage would be removed. That was unfair to the other contractors; that was not a proper standard to set for contracts involving the expenditure of millions of dollars; yet nothing has been done about it.

If we are to have a committee of this kind it should be in continuous session. No evidence has been taken by this committee since last November, though it is true that the committee sat for a few days prior to the opening of this session in January, to draw up a report, and it is also true that the committee came to a unanimous conclusion. None of us on that committee is looking for scandals; certainly I am not, but we have a duty to see to it that the money is properly expended and that sound policies are laid down by the government. We have a duty to safeguard this country against waste and extravagance, but we have not been able to perform that duty; we have not done it, nor are we now capable of doing it. If we were to undertake to discharge that duty we would have to sit continuously, and not have an interval of eight months with no sittings at all, while expenditures are being made at the rate $15,000,000 a day, with an over-expenditure or deficit of $858,000,000 last year and a war appropriation this year of $5,000,000,000, with probably another over-expenditure or deficit of a billion dollars coming, to judge by the experience in the past.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe the members of this committee are capable of performing the duties expected of them by the people. I have nothing but good-will toward the other members of the committee. Our relations during the sittings of the committee have been exceedingly friendly, and I believe we have given each other our complete confidence. But the public expect more of the opposition members than they expect of supporters of the government. On one occasion this session the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) took the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) to task for not having fulfilled his duty in this regard as leader of the opposition. I believe the public hold us responsible to a greater extent than they do members of the government party to see that these public moneys are properly expended. There are only four members of the official opposition on this committee with three subcommittees—four out of twenty-four on the committee. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) made an appeal, I think to this house but certainly to the committee, for a larger representation from the opposition. It is true that we have a representative of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. It is true we had last year a representative of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), with whom we worked in close accord. The responsibility placed upon those six representatives of the opposition parties, if you want to style us all in that way, is an impossible obligation which I, as one member of parliament, with my responsibility to parliament, to my electors and to the people of this country, have not been able fully to discharge no matter how greatly I desired to do so.

I have nothing but goodwill for the other members of this committee, but many of them have obligations to the government. As our first chairman we had a very capable member, but I think I am fair in saying that his primary duty was to see that the interests of the government were protected. I refer to the former hon. member for Selkirk, now Mr. Justice Thorson, who became a member of the government. His successor was the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), the present Minister of Public Works, his primary and immediate duty also was to see that the government's interests were protected, that we brought in a proper report reflecting credit upon the government at all times. We also had as members of this committee hon. members who have since become parliamentary assistants, and others who are looking for favours from the government.

It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that this committee, as it has been set up, cannot investigate these enormous expenditures and safeguard the public interest as the public expect it to do. Now the question arises whether at this late date, under existing circumstances, it is proper that we should once more assume this responsibility, whether in doing so we can do justice to ourselves, to parliament and to the people of Canada. In view of the information I have; in view of what has taken place; in view of the decision of the committee to sit in camera on matters such as war-time expenditures for housing, and so on, I have grave misgivings as to whether I should continue as a member of this committee. I owe some duty to my constituents, to my family and to myself. More is exacted of those of us who come from the far east and the far west, in discharging our duties here, than is required of members from central Canada. I have been away from home practically continuously for six months, and I do not know that very much more should be expected of me. I gave the assurance to my electors, as I have given it to parliament, that I would make any personal sacrifice in order to discharge my duties and contribute in every way possible to the winning of this war, and I am prepared to stand by that undertaking, but I am doubtful about serving on this committee further.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a few observations on this motion. First may I say that if the proposed committee had sat every day in the year I doubt if it could have investigated properly the war expenditures now being made by this government. I am informed, however, that the last meeting of this committee was held on November 13 of last year, more than eight months ago.

Mr. GOLDING: That is not correct.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is my information, with the exception of a meeting to prepare the report which I think was submitted on January 27. At any rate, this committee has not been constituted so far this session, and I am quite sure no evidence was taken after last November. I have never been able to understand why the investigation of property purchases should be conducted in secret in this country. It has given some people cause to believe that it is possible to get easy money from the public treasury, and I am sorry to say that there are some such people in the country. I have pointed out already that this committee has not been constituted this year, that it has not taken any evidence since early last November. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Leclerc) pointed out on February 10, this year, as will be found on page 322 of Hansard for that date, that in Granby a farmer had purchased a property which had originally been offered to the government for munitions work and resold it to the government at a profit of some 400 per cent per acre. It is items such as these that should be investigated. I simply mention this as a concrete example. If the committee had been constituted at that time this matter might have been investigated. But this committee has not had an opportunity of investigating this transaction, nor has any other committee.

Speaking before on other matters I referred to the argument presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) concerning the installation of equipment in the cordite plant at Transcona. This discussion took place on March 11, 1941, and will be found reported at page 1452 of Hansard of that session. A heated discussion took place between the hon. member and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) who pointed out that the proper body to investigate that matter was the war expenditures committee. In due course when the committee was sitting the same question was raised. The then chairman, Hon. Mr. Thorson, pointed out that the terms of reference would not permit the investigation and it was never carried out along those lines.

There is another matter to which I should like to make some reference, that of the Gimli airport, the site for which was purchased last year at an average of $72 per acre.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is proposing to deal with something that may be the subject of discussion before the committee.

Mr. GOLDING: It did come before the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no knowledge of that. What we are dealing with now is the motion to set up the committee and nothing else.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The committee is not constituted at the present time. The committee of last year has wound up its work. Am I debarred from making any reference at all to this matter?

Mr. SPEAKER: The only matter before us now is the setting up of the committee. What may have happened in the previous committee cannot be a subject of discussion, and what may happen in the future as a subject of discussion before the committee is a matter which may be referred to the committee when it is set up but is not a proper subject for discussion now when the setting up of the committee is being considered.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have great deference for your judgment and your ruling, but I find it difficult to understand why I cannot make any reference to any public expenditure when we do not know whether it will come before the committee or not.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Speaker, may I rise to that point of order? I suggest that on a motion to set up a committee the custom of the house has always been to discuss the work of the previous committee. It will be agreed by all that we did that in connection with the committee on the defence of Canada regulations and the committee on radio broadcasting. In fact I made a forty-minute speech when we were considering the setting up of the broadcasting committee. So far as I am concerned, if we are not to be permitted to discuss the work of the committee there is nothing to talk about. I might just as well take the names of those members that are here and tell you what colour their eyes are, where they were born, and so on. Unless we are able to discuss the work of the committee, as we have done in the case of other committees, there is nothing to talk about.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member who has just spoken will realize that there is nothing before the Chair except the motion for the setting up of a committee. The matter to which the hon. member is referring is something which in his judgment should come before the committee when it is set up. The debate so far has dealt with the question of the appointment of the committee, and its administration when set up, but the hon. member is now introducing something which may be the subject of discussion and investigation by the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I be permitted to say a word in connection with this point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already given my decision.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have the report of the committee which sat last year. May I refer to that?

Mr. SPEAKER: That would be similar to the reference the hon. member is making to Gimli airport, which may be a subject of discussion in the committee. When that matter comes from the committee to the house, the house will have an opportunity to discuss it. We are dealing now only with the setting up of the committee. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher), dealt with matters of administration and the methods of approach to be used, I think in an accurate manner. I suggest to the house that the only subject we have to discuss now is the setting up of the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a point of order. Perhaps Your Honour has not recalled the discussion that took place when the question of setting up previous committees was before the house, notably the radio broadcasting committee. At that time a discussion took place similar to that which has been initiated now by some hon. members. On that occasion Your Honour permitted full discussion with respect to certain aspects of the report of the previous committee and its work, whether they were related to the points then being discussed in connection with the setting up of the committee, or whether they were interrelated subjects. I know that speaking to the motion I referred to many matters; I referred to the report and to other things which I felt were relevant. There is not likely to be an opportunity this session for the house to deal with the report of the previous committee, and surely we should not be prevented at this stage from dealing with matters which are relevant to the setting up of the committee. I implore Your Honour not to enforce your ruling under the circumstances, particularly when this practice has been carried on in connection with other committees this session.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, may I say just one word. This committee is to be set up to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services. If we are arguing pro and con concerning that, we cannot discuss intelligently the value of this committee to this house unless we are permitted to refer to the matters which ought to be looked into by the committee. It seems to me that that is quite relevant to any argument regarding the committee. With due respect to Your Honour I submit that any other ruling would deprive this house of a right which is inherent in it. I suggest also that the procedure in this parliament—it may be wrong—is such that when reports of committees are brought here they are usually presented without a motion for concurrence. It is therefore only on the motion to reappoint the committee that we have an opportunity to discuss the value of the committee and sometimes even to refer to matters which were considered by the preceding committee. I hope Your Honour will not rule that the discussion must be restricted to the setting up of the committee.

Mr. STIRLING: On the point of order, I should like to look upon Your Honour's intervention as an admonition to the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). It appears to me that he is expressing his opinion with regard to the motion before the house for the setting up of this committee, and he is basing his argument upon what he has seen happen in the past in connection with setting up similar committees. It would appear to me that it is a reasonable way of explaining to this house the opinion he holds if he bases it on actions of the committee which finished its work last year and is again to be set up. I hope that Your Honour will not prevent him from discussing the matter from the point of view of past happenings.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Before you give your ruling, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that unless one is permitted to discuss the possible functions of this committee in the light of the experience of those of us who have been members of the committee in the past I cannot see that there will be a great deal of value in setting up the committee at all. I think hon. members of the house should be informed as to the functions of the committee. But if we can discuss merely the setting up of the committee, as Your Honour intimated, I must agree with the hon. member for Macleod that the only thing we can discuss here would be the individuals whose names are mentioned as composing the committee, and that would be nonsensical. One of the matters that was brought before the committee last year was Gimli airport. The committee decided that it had nothing to do with Gimli airport and that that matter should be referred to the public accounts committee. I understand that the hon. member for Souris was going to discuss the possibility of Gimli airport being the subject of inquiry by the war expenditures committee. I cannot see why he should not have every right to discuss that, because surely we must follow the same procedure in setting up this committee as in setting up all the others.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, may I have a word on the point of order? I think there is a misapprehension among members of the house, especially members who have not served on the war expenditures committee, as to its proper functions. In Great Britain all the sittings of the war expenditures committee are held in camera, and in Great Britain consequently no debates have taken place—I have gone through the entire British Hansard of the war period—in regard to committee reports founded on evidence taken in camera. It is obvious that the house cannot intelligently debate a committee report founded on evidence taken in camera—evidence which is not before the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the good of the reports, then?

Mr. CLEAVER: Pardon me a moment; I am coming to that. Referring to the British Hansard I find as late as 1942 a member of the British house rising in his place and complaining that two and a half years have passed and on no occasion have the reports of the war expenditure committee been debated. I have a suggestion to make which I think will amply meet the express desire of hon. members who wish to discuss the Gimli matter. I am going to suggest to Your Honour a way in which I think it can be done quite within the rules of the house. Any member of the house who wishes to discuss a report of a committee which has been tabled may move concurrence in that report. I am free to admit that I anticipated, from what had been said in the house on several occasions, that some members would like to discuss the committee report with respect to Gimli, and so far as I personally am concerned as chairman of the subcommittee which inquired into that matter, I would welcome such a discussion. In order that the discussion might be an intelligent one I myself moved for an order of this house to produce all the evidence with respect to Gimli that was in the hands of the department. That material is now on record in the house and the Gimli matter can be intelligently discussed. But I do not think we should break any of the rules of the house to discuss it. The hon. member for Souris has plenty of time to move the adoption of the Gimli report, which was a unanimous one. If he does not care to move it, some of his friends can move for its adoption, and then the report would be properly before the house for discussion. But I urge upon Your Honour that it would be most unfortunate if any member of the house could rise and without notice bring forward for debate any matter which had been considered by the war expenditures committee, because the other members would not be prepared for such a discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order raised by the leader of the opposition was as to the right of a member to refer to a report of a committee in which concurrence had not been moved. As I understand it, the hon. member for Souris was proposing to deal with the question of Gimli airport on its merits. If that be so, I declare without any doubt in my mind that it would not be within the rules of the house to discuss now the merits of the Gimli airport question. But if he wishes to refer to it as an illustration and without entering into the merits, simply to support his viewpoint and for the guidance of the committee in their deliberations, he would be in order. The reason I interrupted the hon. gentleman was that he was proposing to go into the merits of the question, which certainly he would not be in order in doing in a motion for setting up the committee.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was endeavouring to point out the manner in which I think this committee should function, and I was citing some examples to prove my point that the committee should hold open sittings.

Mr. SPEAKER: So long as the hon. member does not enter into the merits of the question but merely refers to a particular matter of inquiry before the committee in support of his argument that open sittings rather than secret should be held, I think he would be in order.

Mr. GOLDING: Just on the point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already ruled, and there is only one method by which my decision can be challenged.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was saying that I could not understand why the war expenditures committee should hold secret sittings to investigate the purchase of any property in this country for war purposes. I have given one or two illustrations. I referred to Gimli airport because it is in my native province and our citizens are very much interested in that particular deal, which was on everybody's tongue throughout the province. I am trying to make the point that inquiry into all such matters as these which certainly would not give useful information to the enemy should be conducted in open sittings throughout the country. I am sure that the government would be in much better grace had this been done, and if it were done in the future, provided always that information useful to the enemy is not made public. I shall not go into all the ramifications of Gimli airport, but if I did I can assure the house that that deal is one of many which suggest the desirability of open sittings.

I do not think I need take up any more time, although there is a great deal I might have said in respect to purchases of property through this country; some of them have been good, many of them have not been good and the public have been greatly dissatisfied. I cannot see the justification for not having set up the committee during eight months of the year, when the house has been in session three-fourths of that time. Now, in the dying days of the session, when this committee is constituted, it is certainly top-heavy with government members, eighteen out of twenty-four. The time available to carry on investigations from now until the beginning of the next session is, I am sure the people of the country realize, utterly inadequate for a thorough inquiry.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): There is only one thing I wish to say in respect to the setting up of this committee. I think I can say it, not being a member of the committee. This committee has been sitting between sessions, and sitting between sessions involves considerable expense to the members. There is an amount appropriated for their expenses while they are sitting between sessions and away from home, and I do not believe it should be subject to income tax, as part of it is. Perhaps if there is an appropriation this year we could discuss it more fully when that appropriation comes up for consideration. But I am certain of this, that when these members travel across the country, as they do, and have to buy berths and meals on trains, the portion which is not taxed does not even meet those expenses. Besides, a precedent is being created which I do not think is desirable. As I am not a member of the committee I do not have any expenses paid, but I simply raise the matter now in the form of a suggestion that the committee's expenses should be free from income tax.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): There are one or two points about which I should like to say a word or two. Most of the comments I had in mind have been mentioned already, so that I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible.

In the first place, I think it is a matter of some concern to the people of Canada that this committee has not been functioning during the earlier part of this session, and now the members of it must serve during the interval between now and the calling of the next session in 1944. I know that the house has been busily engaged on other matters of importance, but surely, inasmuch as this committee on war expenditures has to do with the day-to-day expenditures which are being made and have been made every day of this session, the examination of those expenditures, and any economies which might result from the findings of the committee should take precedence over the work of such committees as that on social security and reconstruction and rehabilitation. Not that I do not give the fullest importance to those committees, but after all, both of them have to do with post-war conditions, and as the Prime Minister has said, nothing is more important than, first, the winning of the war, and shall I say, the winning of it with some regard to economy if it does not interfere with efficiency. But we have seen over half the year go by with this committee not in session at all, with hon. members who might have been able to spend time on the war expenditures committee having to devote their time and services to other committees which might better have waited until the war expenditures committee had been set up and work had been done on it from day to day, so that the fruits of that committee—if any, and we might hope for some—could have been made effective with large savings to the people of this country.

When the committee was originally set up, some years ago, I had what was then regarded as the effrontery to write a letter to the Globe and Mail complaining about the set-up in regard to the numbers from each party; not that the numbers did not accord fairly with the proportion of party representation in this house; and as I recall the Prime Minister at that time rapped me on the knuckles as a new member of the house for suggesting that hon. members on the government side might not carry out their duty to their country as well as hon. members of the opposition. However,

I leave to the people of Canada the interpretation of that suggestion which I made and the implication which might be contained in it. Certainly no one holds the membership of this house, of all parties, in higher regard than I do, and I might say that that regard is much higher than the regard which the press of the country would lead the people of the country to hold. There are no finer and more public-spirited citizens than the members of this House of Commons.

Nevertheless, the Progressive Conservative party have only four members out of twenty-four, and the other groups have one member each; that is, six out of twenty-four. Even if all hon. members as individuals were equally aggressive in ascertaining where economies might be made effective, nevertheless you have four subcommittees, and to have only one member appointed from the official opposition to each of those committees means that that member must make himself available for every meeting. That, as we know, with the other parliamentary duties, and also the duties which some of us have of endeavouring to make a living as well as being a member of parliament, makes it extremely difficult to sit on the committee at all times. Surely some consideration should be given to allowing a greater representation on the part of the opposition than the Prime Minister has seen fit to accord it. I should hope that he himself would volunteer to increase that representation.

I am informed that there are some subcommittees of the committee on war expenditures in Great Britain on which the proportion of labour members—a minority of the national government—is greater than the proportion of members of the Conservative party, which is the majority party.

Mr. POTTIER: To which subcommittee does that apply?

Mr. JACKMAN: I am reliably informed that that is so, and I shall find out later for the hon. member.

Then again, as to the matter of secrecy: it is a severe handicap on this committee when matters which do not interfere with the national security are up for consideration, because one of the ways in which we get information is through the public coming forth and volunteering information to us. As it is, we occasionally hear of matters of gross wastefulness; unless they are backed up one does not put much credence in them, but if one is developing some matter which deserves investigation, and the public know of it, one very often finds that he gets further evidence from the public, much of which evidence is worth sifting to find out whether it contains a germ of truth. As I understand it, in setting up the committee the government is as eager as we are on this side of the house to find out whether economies can be put into force. Everyone understands that when the government has spent nine billion dollars in connection with the war, haste is sometimes more important than economy, and therefore we cannot always expect that every possible dollar will have been saved that might have been saved if time had not been of the essence of the undertaking. I should think therefore that the government would be just as eager as we are to find any possible means of obtaining a greater output of war materials with as great a saving as can be effected. I repeat that this committee should be allowed to hear its evidence in public, except when some question of national security is involved, and I believe that as liberal an interpretation of that condition would be given by opposition members of the house, whose sole concern is with the war, as would be given by the government. But, as the hon. member for Souris pointed out, surely the purchase of land in this country for war purposes has very little to do with national security.

A point which I think should be emphasized, and which has already been brought up by several members, is that a permanent secretariat should be established for the committee, a secretariat consisting of accountants and possibly an executive secretary, such as committees in the United States congress engage—the Truman committee, for example. It is impossible for members, with the numerous duties which they have to perform, to be also a sleuth in the finding out of matters which require investigation. These accountants and secretaries who can devote their full time to matters that are deserving of investigation by all members of the house who may sit on the committee would be a most useful addition, because I submit that until we establish a proper committee system, with permanent secretariat, this parliament cannot function in as useful a manner as it should. It is impossible now, with the complexity of modern government, which is almost synonymous with modern business, for the average layman, who has not had experience in business affairs on a large scale, to go into the various details that should be looked into; so that some trained and permanent secretariat is absolutely essential. While we may say that there is a great scarcity of accountants and of men who have the ability and capacity to serve on such a committee nevertheless there is hardly any committee, or any phase of our war work, which is of more importance than this committee or than it can become. Therefore, if it is necessary to draft expert help from other government bodies, it should be done in order that this committee may function to the best advantage.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): The hon. member suggested that in the British parliament party lines were not followed. May I take a moment to show the composition of the various committees in the old country. I have here a report of the organization meeting for the session of 1942-43, and the various committees, or inquiries, as they are called, are set out. I will enumerate them:

1. Finance and establishments inquiry: Conservatives, 3; Liberals, 2; Labour, 1.

2. Production and supply inquiry (a): Conservatives, 4; Liberals, 1; Labour, 1.

3. Production and supply inquiry (b): Conservatives, 3; Labour, 3; and there is a Sir Edward Cadogan whom I cannot place.

Mr. GRAYDON: He may be C.C.F.

Mr. REID: Not in Great Britain.

Mr. POTTIER: The fourth committee is that on fighting services: Conservatives, 6; no Liberals and no Labour.

5. Departmental inquiry (a): Conservatives, 4; Labour, 1.

6. Department inquiry (b): Conservatives, 5; Labour, 1; no Liberals.

7. Special inquiry: Conservatives, 5; Labour, 1; no Liberals.

So that over there apparently they are not looking for Liberals or Conservatives or Labour in composing their committees.

Mr. GRAYDON: They are all together over there. That is the answer to that.

Mr. POTTIER: The hon. member who preceded me suggested that we should follow the practice in the old country where on some committees government members were not in the majority. I have shown on the contrary that, as we are doing, they are appointing a majority of the major party. They appoint a minority of Liberals, a minority of Labour and a majority of Conservatives, who happen to form the majority party in the house, in practically the same proportions as we do here. I bring this to the attention of the house so as to clear up the situation.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is hard to make that parallel.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): As a member of the war expenditures committee I wish to say a word or two on the resolution, in view of some of the remarks that have been made. Considering the importance of the committee I think that certain information should be given to other members of the house who are not members of the war expenditures committee, because the question has been asked by members of the House of Commons, how did we employ our time; and there was a feeling that we were not utilizing all our time as members of the committee.

Subcommittee No. 1, of which I had the honour to be a member, studied all agreements and put on record a synopsis of them. They had every company making aeroplanes appear before the committee and the fullest opportunity was given every member to ask questions. We visited every aircraft plant and took a record of the financial set-up, going into the matter of profits and capitalization and looking over the balance sheets as best we could. We investigated salaries and high wages. We investigated hours of work and wages paid and made recommendations accordingly, because we did find in some instances that salaries had been greatly increased. We checked up on all these matters and reported on conditions generally. We found out how the employees did their work, the hours of labour, employment of women, cafeterias and restaurants, and whether the call-up by the draft board was affecting production. These are some of the things done by members of that subcommittee. The work was most interesting.

With reference to the expenditures that Canada has made on the war the question has been asked how a small committee such as has been set up could ever begin to look into all these outlays that have taken place. I would compare what we are doing with what has been taking place in Great Britain. In Great Britain they are spending an average of $60,000,000 a day and have a total committee of thirty-two members. Our expenditures will be between $14,000,000 and $15,000,000 a day and we have a total of twenty-four members; so that we are not very far out of line. As a matter of fact, if the argument advanced to-day is sound, Great Britain has not nearly sufficient members on the committee there; yet there has been no complaint from Great Britain regarding the work of that committee. I would have liked to see, and would still like to see, the members who go on that committee adopt the attitude of members of the British House of Commons. It was stated, and one will find it in British Hansard, that the select committee over there felt that they were the trustees of the House of Commons as well as of the country, not the trustees of any party. They were not only the trustees of a constituency, but the trustees of the entire country. And when I acted as a member of the committee—I believe those who were members will support what I am going to say—I did my utmost on behalf of the people of this country, not on behalf of a constituency alone or a party, to find out what those companies were doing.

I am somewhat annoyed to hear members of the committee complain that there are not enough Conservatives on the committee or not enough Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members on it. I think we should be adopting an attitude such as was adopted in the British House of Commons—and it is to be seen in Hansard—where when they joined the committee they left their politics behind them, and represented the whole country. They did not represent any party or constituency.

We have heard some talk this afternoon about secrecy. Well, I have been long enough in the House of Commons to realize what has taken place and what does take place in committee meetings, so that I am in a position to compare open meetings with those held in secret. While I find no fault with the press at all, I do remember one committee which sat this session, which I think illustrated the point I am going to make. At the time I have in mind, during the present session, two committees were sitting on one day. One of those committees was deliberating on social security, but not a single press reporter was present. The committee was alone. The press reporters were to be found in the committee which was endeavouring to find out where the rugs were located. While I could not see one press reporter in the committee where they were discussing the welfare of our people, there were sixteen in the other committee. One could hardly get in where they were investigating Colonel John Thompson, and finding out who had got a rug or an armchair. I say then that if we had held our meetings openly, apart from the inadvisability of doing so, I doubt if we would have conducted any business at all. And I say without fear of successful contradiction that if we had held open meetings we would have had press reporters there, and members rushing in with prepared speeches stating that they had heard so-and-so, or rumours here and rumours there. To my mind the business was conducted splendidly in camera. If every member would go to that committee, with the idea in mind, not of party but of the House of Commons and the people, there would be no need to complain about any lack of representation.

The committee in Great Britain did not even report to the Prime Minister of Great Britain or to the cabinet ministers. They were not allowed to do so.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, yes.

Mr. REID: They did not report to the British House of Commons. One committee which sat discovered one thing so serious that they said they believed it advisable not even to breathe a word of it to members of the other subcommittees.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was just one case.

Mr. REID: Yes, one case. But no report was made to the Prime Minister or to members of the cabinet. And yet there was not a word from Great Britain as to these things not being done well or in secret. Are we less honest than the people of Great Britain? I say no. And in my opinion the criticism we hear in this House of Commons is lowering the morale of our people. They may get the idea that everyone who is in business in this country is a rogue and needs watching. Surely we must have some faith and trust, if we are going to carry on; and especially must we trust members who are on the committee, even though they are conducting their deliberations behind closed doors.

I have one or two suggestions to make to the Prime Minister and to the committee. He was correct when he said the committee should have been set up earlier. I think it should be set up at the beginning of a session, and a report should be made periodically to the house. I think too, that we should have a chartered accountant connected with our committee. It is not possible for the ordinary member of parliament to understand some of the balance sheets that are brought before him, and I believe the services of a chartered accountant should be placed at the disposal of that committee, to do much of the work we have been doing. A great deal has been accomplished, and we can take pride in what has been accomplished since the report was laid before the house in January. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been saved through the deliberations of that committee. I believe that the committee should deal with all accounts, and that the committee should be empowered to go into the affairs of concerns engaged in war work, with respect to their set-up and their balance sheets.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two observations before the motion carries. In the first place I have been at a loss to understand the Prime Minister's reason for not having set up the committee before. I recall that from the very first he said this committee would be set up as soon as the war appropriation bill was passed. That was the main reason for not having set it up. Well, he did go ahead and set up a lot of committees of much lesser importance than this one.

Those of us who sat on the war expenditures committee—and I can speak with greater authority for subcommittee No. 1, because that was the one on which I served—were almost unanimously of the opinion that the committee should sit continuously. If it was to do beneficial work, it should sit not only when the house was in session, but when the house was adjourned; it should sit all the time. I am in agreement with hon. members who have said there is a tremendous amount of work to be done. Unless the committee is sitting continuously it cannot perform its duties in the proper fashion.

As to the work of the committee last year, I believe that after all our work we had just reached the point where we could thoroughly perform our duties. We had just got to the place where we knew what to look for when we went into a plant; we had just reached a point somewhere near efficiency, when the meetings of the committee were suspended. That was most unfortunate. The excuse or reasons the Prime Minister has given for not setting up the committee are at least ill founded.

There is one other thing I think should happen, if this committee is to perform its duties properly. I agree with the hon. member for New Westminster when he says that periodical reports should be made to the house. I believe the work of the committee is of such importance that members of the House of Commons generally should know something about what is going on. In that connection it should be possible in some way—I do not know just how it would be done—to inform members of the committee as to what action the government has taken or intends to take as a result of recommendations made by the committee. I feel quite certain that when the committee made recommendations last year the government acted upon them immediately. The committee, however, was not informed of that action. As a member of the committee I do not know that the government acted upon one solitary recommendation. Surely that is a wrong procedure. Members of the committee would receive a great deal of encouragement if they knew their recommendations to the government were receiving serious consideration. Whether such report from the government should be made to the house or to the committee would be a matter for the government to decide. But certainly there should be some means of knowing what action was being taken.

It is true that the work of that committee is very important. I was one who thought it should sit continuously, and while it sat I pressed for that very thing, along with other hon. members. I do not wish to leave the impression that I was the only one. I wish to commend the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) for his statement that he at least viewed the work of that committee in a non-partisan way. I believe he did, and I believe other members did, also. I believe that was the attitude of most of the members of the subcommittee on which I was working, and of course I became better acquainted with them than with the members of the other subcommittees, because we were in daily contact. Generally speaking the members of that subcommittee, including the chairman, performed their duties not from any political point of view but with the desire to see what they could accomplish.

That brings me to the question of the representation on the committee. I made this objection when the committee was set up a year ago; I repeated it when the committee had its first meeting, and I make it again to-day. I do not think the representation of the members of the house on that committee is fair and proper, though in this my view is probably contrary to that of the hon. member for New Westminster. Take the Social Credit party, for instance; we had one representative out of twenty-four. You may say that was fair in proportion to our membership in the house, but let me point out how it was unfair. The main committee was divided into three subcommittees, each of which had its own work to perform. We went for days without seeing the members of the other subcommittees at all; we might be away on the other side of Canada when subcommittees one or two were sitting, and in fact that very thing did occur. One of the other subcommittees brought in a report, which was accepted unanimously, though the members of the other subcommittees knew nothing about it. That is the position in which I was placed, as a member of the Social Credit party. There was the report of a subcommittee, of which I knew nothing at all but to which I was expected to give my consent; and apparently I did give my consent, because the report was adopted. That should not be the case; certainly I should not be asked to give my consent or approval to something of which I had no knowledge. Therefore I am going to repeat the suggestion that I have made several times previously. If the main committee is to be divided into three subcommittees, there should be at least three members on the committee from each party in the house; three from the Social Credit party, three from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and three or six or whatever is considered to be fair from the Conservative party. I do not think I can be accused of being politically-minded in making that suggestion; I make it purely from the point of view of fairness to the different parties in the house.

Then there is another matter to which I should like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker; that is, the way the business of the committee is conducted. I am not so particular whether the meetings are held openly or in camera; I can see some advantages in holding them openly, and I can also see advantages in holding them in camera. There is no doubt that sometimes more information can be obtained when the meeting is held in camera. The Gimli affair has been referred to. I do not think there was anything in connection with that matter which could not have been brought out in an open meeting, and probably our work would have been more effective, but on the other hand there are times—

Mr. CLEAVER: If the hon member will permit an interruption, does he think, by any stretch of the imagination, that subcommittee No. 1 could have reached a unanimous report on Gimli if the meetings had been held in public?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I may just say, without discussing the matter at length, that we did not investigate the Gimli situation, so that I do not see how the hon. member can ask me that question.

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, the report is on the table.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It was definitely understood that we would not investigate it. There is another matter which I think is extremely important in connection with these committee meetings. I believe when witnesses appear before that committee they should be sworn to tell the truth. In my opinion it is an absolute waste of public money, and a waste of the time of hon. members, to have people appear before the committee and give evidence which is not evidence at all but merely their own little story. They may be right or they may not. I could point to two occasions, in connection with important matters having to do with the expenditure of large amounts of money, on which the evidence given was entirely contradictory. We did not know which was which, and no blame could be placed upon the witnesses because they could simply reply that they thought it was so and so, or something like that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the hon. member suggest that a man only tells the truth when he is sworn?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I shall leave the Prime Minister to determine whether a man tells the truth when he is not sworn, or whether he does not; I am not going to argue that point. I am not accusing anyone of not telling the truth, but if the Prime Minister's argument is good there would be no sense in swearing witnesses in courts of law, even in murder trials; their simple word would be accepted. But that is not done.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister had better get together with the Minister of Justice with that point.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am afraid they would find it difficult to agree.

Mr. CLEAVER: I wonder if the hon. member would indicate why, when he was sitting as a member of that committee, he did not ask that all witnesses should be sworn. This is the first I have heard of it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The chairman of subcommittee No. 1 must have a very short memory, because I did make that request.

Mr. CLEAVER: Then I have no recollection of it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, I am not responsible for the hon. member's recollection, but I do not think the point he has raised is well taken, anyway. I am trying to suggest improvements for the next committee, and I think that is an essential improvement. When this government is put to the expense of bringing witnesses all the way across this country, or, on the other hand, of sending the committee across the country, the evidence that is given should be absolutely correct; there should be no misunderstanding about it, and witnesses should be held responsible for the evidence they give. I am not going to refer to the instances I have in mind, but they were outstanding, and this is one of the matters that should be dealt with first by the new committee.

There is another change that I think should be carried out by the new committee; that is, I do not believe the legal adviser of the Department of Munitions and Supply should be sticking around all the time. He was the biggest nuisance we ever ran across. Personally he was a fine fellow, but he was always there, trying to protect the department. As a matter of fact in some cases the witnesses were so confused that they would not give their evidence, and that is not a good thing. The new committee will find that unless they rectify that situation and keep this gentleman away, they will not get the evidence they should get. I remember that on one occasion we had to ask him to either get out or shut up, he was becoming such a nuisance, but that is not the important thing. The important thing is that when you have legal representatives there it throws a psychological atmosphere around the witness which you do not want present.

There is another thing—I seem to be finding a lot of fault with this committee—which I believe is quite important. Hon. members will recall that when this committee was being set up a year ago I stood in the place in which I am standing now and asked that a proper secretariat be appointed. I think the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) supported it. But we did not get any support in the house. When we went into the committee we again asked for it, but we did not get it. But when the committee had finished its sittings last year, I believe I am correct in saying that the members were almost unanimous in their approval of the appointment of a proper secretariat for the committee.

It is an overwhelming job for the ordinary layman to investigate these tremendous amounts and the way in which they are spent. Few members of the committee were capable of properly analysing an audit sheet or of saying whether the audit sheet brought before the committee was the one shown to the directors of the company. I am informed that that was not the case in many instances, that the audit sheets shown to the committee were not the audit sheets shown to the directors of the company. Only a legal man or a chartered accountant would be able to discover that. Every precaution should be taken to see that the information brought before the committee is authentic and that the committee is given the opportunity to delve as deeply as possible into these matters. I do not believe that can be done unless the committee has at its disposal a proper secretariat. Last year we found ourselves handicapped on many occasions because of the lack of that service. It is unfortunate that such a secretariat has not been set up long ago.

Another objection which was raised last year when the committee was first set up was that it was exceedingly difficult for members to be here all the time. After sitting continuously in the house for six or seven months, hon. members found it exceedingly difficult to sit here another three or four months. I was here last year for nine and a half months, and that is a long time to be away from home. You have to let your other work go. Members from the west had to stay here; they could not get home for week-ends as some hon. members can when the house is sitting.

There is no reason why this committee should not have been set up the first week the house opened. I think every member of the committee last year was in agreement that it should be set up just as quickly as possible so that they could perform the duty assigned to them. I am not a member of the committee this year, but I wish to express the satisfaction I had in working on the committee. I found that the members were conscientious and endeavoured to investigate these expenditures to the best of their ability. They did good work, and they saved the government a large amount of money. The exact amount I do not know, because the government has never reported back to indicate that it has acted on the recommendations. It would greatly encourage the members of the committee if they knew that the work they were doing was appreciated and had been acted upon.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before this motion carries I should like to make one or two observations about this motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). We are now in the one hundred and thirteenth day of this session of parliament. In other words, almost six months have expired since the house first convened for this session. This motion of the Prime Minister to set up a committee to examine the expenditures defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services has been standing on the order paper of the House of Commons since February 24.

I have just made reference to the orders of the day of Friday, February 26, and under government notices of motions I find four motions for the setting up of committees. The first appears in the name of the Prime Minister and had to do with a committee on social security; this first appeared on February

16. The next motion, which appeared on February 19 in the name of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFlèche), was for the setting up of a committee on radio broadcasting. The third, which appeared on February 19 in the name of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud), had to do with the committee on Canadian National Railways. The last one appeared on February 24 in the name of the Prime Minister, and has now been reached on July 17.

It is well known that the progamme of legislation is in the hands of the government. If this committee is essential now in the view of the government, it must have been essential in February of this session. It was fourth on the order paper to which I have made reference, and it has been the fourth or last to be called. But the government had it in its power to have altered that sequence, and this allegedly most important of the committees which were to be set up could have been called before any of the others. That was a matter which lay entirely in the hands of the government and the government must take the responsibility for it.

Mention has been made in previous debates —not in connection with this motion because there has been no debate on it—by the Prime Minister to the delays which have occurred, partly owing to the fact that amendments had been offered to the motion to go into supply. I do not suggest that the Prime Minister was blaming the official opposition for this; in fact I know that that was not in his mind, but I am bound to say that the official opposition has not moved an amendment to the motion to go into supply during this session. I think that ought to go on the record, because if there is blame attachable to any group for delaying important legislation, it should be attached where it properly belongs.

It is interesting to note the delays which occurred in connection with the setting up, prior to the Easter recess, of the reconstruction committee and the committee on social security. I checked Hansard and, speaking of delays, I found that in the reconstruction committee debate, 65½ columns of Hansard were used by government members, 42½ columns by the official opposition, 31½ columns by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and 49½ columns by the Social Credit group. I am not finding special fault with that; but since mention had been made in a previous debate of delays that were said to be attributable to other parties than the government and perhaps to ourselves as the official opposition, I thought the Prime Minister and the government would like to have the record straight. A similar situation existed in the debate on the social security committee. I have not the figures before me, but I am safe in saying that a similar situation existed there. I hesitate to raise this question and would not have done so, had it not been that some mention was made of delays on a previous occasion.

The Prime Minister to-day in launching his motion made quite a proper reference to certain financial matters of importance which perhaps should have the right of way over some other matters that the house might wish to discuss, including the setting up of committees. I think no one in the house would have any quarrel with the Prime Minister with respect to the importance of the financial measures because, after all, it depends very largely on the situation in which one finds oneself and the programme of the house. But prior to the budget debate there were debates on the setting up of the reconstruction committee, the social security committee, the radio broadcasting committee, and now we are debating the setting up of the war expenditures committee. I can recall that there was some lapse of time between the beginning of the debate setting up the reconstruction committee and the social security committee and the commencement of the budget debate.

I think the house generally was of the opinion that the budget and certain other legislation had to come before this house and be passed before March 31. I quite understood, and I think members of the house generally understood that there were provisions in the budget which made it essential that it should be brought before the house and passed before that date. But, as it subsequently turned out, there was no such necessity. As a matter of fact the legislation which was supposed to be so essential was not passed by that date. In that connection may I point out, Mr. Speaker, that if we had taken an extra half-day or even a Saturday, because one Saturday is as good as another for doing the country's business, or if we had given up a Wednesday evening or a Friday evening, these matters which some members regarded as important could have been disposed of earlier. So that the Prime Minister's argument that the war expenditures committee could not be set up earlier because it would interrupt or delay the passing of the war appropriation measure falls to the ground. Even to-day we have set aside the war appropriation measure, which we said previously we could not do, in order to discuss this very motion. It seems to me there is not very much difference between intervening on July 17 and intervening some time in May or March or April in the debate on the war appropriation measure or the budget.

We have now lost ninety-three sitting days so far as the setting up of the committee on war expenditures is concerned. If the government consider that this committee is doing the kind of job it ought to be doing, it seems to me that those ninety-three days were precious, and if they were precious, the committee should have been set up. If they were not precious, there is no particular reason why the committee should be set up now, in the last moments of the dying days of a dying session. Whether by design or by accident, the fact that the government have not attempted to set up this committee before is a tacit recognition on their part of the weaknesses of the committee itself.

What opportunity will there be to deal with the report of the committee that is being set up now? We shall be into another session before there is an opportunity to deal with the report of this session, and surely we are not gong to be put in the position of having to deal with the report of a previous session as well as the report of the current session.

But there are other reasons which I think I ought to bring before the government why the motion should not have been presented at as late a date as this. It has been mentioned by other members of the house, and I shall not repeat at any length their arguments. A distinct and important advantage would have resulted if parliament had taken advantage of the ninety-three days we have been sitting here, during which members could have conveniently served on the war expenditures committee because, if the committee is to sit between the adjournment of this session and the beginning of another, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), not only is it inconvenient to bring twenty-five members of the house to Ottawa to sit on the committee during the recess, but there is also the question of the expense, and expense to-day is an important matter. The expense of carrying this committee during the recess will be very much greater than if it were sitting during the session. That is an additional reason why I think the government will have to accept a heavy responsibility for not having brought this motion before the house sooner.

There is another angle with which I should like to deal. I have never had the privilege and responsibility of serving on the war expenditures committee, and perhaps may deal with it in a more detached way than those who are close to the work. The views I express could perhaps be taken as the views of those who look upon the committee as the public would do.

One of the features of the operations of this committee in the past which has aroused public dislike—and I say this very kindly to the committee and the government—is that it has abused its privileges, particularly in having recklessly gone into secret session much too frequently. I realize that the Prime Minister and other hon. members will have their own answers on this point, and I am quite willing to maintain an open mind with respect to it. But in dealing with expenditures, whether for war or any other purpose, supreme care should be taken lest people get the idea that you are trying to cover up something when you are trying to find out what is wrong. I have never yet been able to comprehend why the majority membership of a committee allow subcommittees to sit in camera on such a wide variety of subjects.

Mr. REID: I gave the hon. member one reason.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know. I am not going to argue with the hon. member at the moment. But as regards the holding of secret sessions, why was there any necessity to deal, for example, with wartime housing in a secret session? How is the national security menaced as far as wartime housing is concerned? That is only one subject which might be brought up.

After all, hon. members have a sense of responsibility with relation to national security in time of war. Not one of us would willingly allow a single bit of information to go from him or from any committee on which he sat, or from this house, which would give one iota of aid or comfort to the enemy. But with respect to matters which might almost be termed peace-time activities, such as the housing investigation, I believe the action of the committee in sitting in camera has done more than anything else to bring its operations into disrepute. I am not making any charge, but here is what people will say: a committee entrusted with the investigation of the expenditure of public funds, of money which is actually collected in the open, are pursuing their inquiries behind closed doors. The public do not want the committee to be just a plaything of the government; they expect it to be a watchdog of the people's interest. That is something which we as members of parliament must carefully bear in mind.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), in interrupting the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) made what I thought was a significant statement. I was suspicious of the situation and I think his remark would convince almost anyone on the point. Surely we have not arrived at the position so far as these committees are concerned that in order to have unanimity in a report we must sit in camera. Let us not have unanimity in reports of committees if in order to obtain it we must pull down the blinds and close the shutters on the committee's structure.

Mr. CLEAVER: Would the hon. member permit an interruption?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes.

Mr. CLEAVER: Does not the fact that a unanimous report is reached suggest to the hon. gentleman's mind that the correct solution of a contentious problem has been found?

Mr. GRAYDON: I would say that as far as the government is concerned a solution of a contentious problem has been found, but as far as the people are concerned it may be an entirely different matter.

The same principle seems to me to apply in connection with other subjects. Take the debate with respect to the wartime information board, whose expenditures relative to publicity were before this house not long ago. Hon. members will recall at once the answer returned by the government to the two motions which we made, in order to get before the public accounts committee the matter of the expenditures of the departments on publicity. "We do not want to send it to the public accounts committee," the government said in effect, "we want to send this to the war expenditures committee." How are you going to have an investigation of the wartime information board if you allow the setting-up of the committee to be delayed until the end of the session? That surely is not an argument worth speaking about. Further than that, was there any reason why the wartime information board's activities should not be open to public scrutiny? Was there anything to the argument that national security is in any way affected? I do not think any hon. member would go so far as that. After the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had made an impassioned speech in this connection in defence of the government, and had said in effect, although not in so many words, that perhaps it was not advisable that the investigation should be held in open in the public accounts committee, I asked the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), who was temporarily leading the house, "Will you undertake that, if the matter goes before the war expenditures committee, that committee will not sit in secret with reference to the wartime information board?" And he said, "I will give you no such undertaking." Technically, perhaps, that may have been right, but in every other respect, viewing the moral aspect of the matter, it was wrong. So that we find that the wartime information board, instead of being investigated by the public accounts committee, was shifted to the war expenditures committee, which has not been set up until now. I need not point out in any further detail the difficulties and the delays involved in this proceeding.

I know the sort of answer which will be made from time to time as regards public sessions of committees. I realize as well as the Prime Minister or anyone else the frailty of human nature. But in all seriousness I point out that, with the public gaze directed upon expenditures generally, while perhaps here and there a subject may arise which the government would feel should be dealt with in camera, there are thousands of places as to which the bringing of the facts into the light of day will not only have a beneficial effect on the particular transaction, but it will do more. If every department of government recognizes that it may at any time be drawn into a wide-open investigation, with the blinds up and the doors open to the public, that will have as salutary an effect on departments generally as anything I can at present conceive; because the very threat of having the light of day shed upon any department of government makes for good government and discourages the opposite. That governments and parliaments are constituted as they are, with the checks and balances of government and opposition, with oppositions being given in peace time at any rate, and to some extent in war time too, a measure of freedom to criticize, subject to the national interests generally, is the reason why democracy has functioned as well as it has. The people realize then that their representatives can open up and turn the searchlight on wrongdoing, and it is a good thing for the government, because in every action they take behind closed doors of the cabinet council there is always in the back of their minds that they must come into the chamber and defend the expenditures they have made and stand up for the policies which they have put into effect. That is why democracy has functioned as well as it has. But the very moment people get the idea that there is such a thing as closed doors, even though it may be argued that there is no harm in going on, as will no doubt be argued by this government, they will say that where-ever there are investigations to be made, they must be made in such a way that the public of Canada shall know what is going on and what the remedies are.

Here is the hon. member for Bow River this afternoon making a speech in which there is evidence of a good deal of knowledge with reference to this matter, which of course he could not disclose, and going so far as to indicate that although his subcommittee had made certain recommendations for a better policy in certain departments, he had not even heard whether the government had entertained any of the recommendations submitted or made use of the information and advice given. These are matters, too, which we must consider in connection with a motion such as this.

The object of publicity is to prevent wrongdoing. Let me make my position quite clear. I do not want to be raising scandals against this government in war time. I may as well tell the government that. Every move that I have made as leader of the opposition or as a private member has had regard to that principle. I have not made a single move, so far as I am aware, that has had behind it the intention of raising scandal. More than that, I have no use for those whose only object is to go on a fishing expedition or a scandal-mongering expedition or to try to do something of this kind in order perhaps to weaken the government's position in war time. I have no use for that type of public or private citizen at a time like this. We cannot afford, in a serious war-time period, to have enemies in Canada. Our enemies are not Canadians; they are in Japan, Italy and Germany. I often think that we should re-orient our position in regard to our petty differences so as to recognize the importance of this point. It should be recognized by people in public life generally. That is important. But as regards just and honest criticism of the expenditure of public moneys, criticism that is made not for the sake of going on a fishing expedition or a scandal-mongering expedition, we should be sensible, because it is the people's money that is being spent, not the government's money or our money. Keeping that in mind, we should let the people know what is being done. Surely that is not too much to ask of the goverment and of this parliament at this particular time.

A relentless scrutiny of public expenditures is essential to proper war-time administration, and it is more essential from the point of view of the government than from that of any other section of the whole dominion, because the responsibility rests upon them.

I was very much impressed by some of the arguments brought forward this afternoon by those who have had some experience on committees such as this, who felt their helplessness and their inability to study in detail the various contracts that had been entered into and the expenditures made. We are spending money at the rate of eleven times as much as we did in 1936 when the budget was brought down. We can realize, therefore, with the vastly swollen expenditures to-day, the result of the war, with all the ramifications of government business, that even the government itself must find it very difficult to keep abreast of developments. And yet twenty-five members of parliament are trying to investigate these expenditures, hardly any of them having any really technical knowledge of the various subjects into which they are inquiring. No matter how capable they may be in their several ways; no matter how conscientious, surely it is not necessary for me to tell the members of this house just how far the committee can make a detailed investigation and give a report which would be really intelligent, having regard to the tremendous volume of business in which the country is now engaged. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) admitted his helplessness, and I am sure the members of the committee generally are conscious of their incompetence for want of technical assistance. As the hon. member for Cumberland and others have pointed out, there is not the proper technical help; there is not a proper secretariat, which would bring to these various matters the kind of advice that is so essential if the work is to be carried on as it should be.

I think that ought to be fairly well recognized by everyone in the committee; and that, I suggest, is one of the weaknesses of the committee. The committee has to open the door and let in the light of day. Sittings in camera have become the rule rather than the exception, and that is the reason for the abuses against which I so strongly and vehemently protest this afternoon.

I wish to say this, that I am unable to support the motion of the Prime Minister; and the reason why I am not going to support the motion of the Prime Minister with respect to the setting up of this committee revolves around the necessity, I think, of some party in this house rising up and taking some decided, definite and effective stand as a protest against the secrecy of the sessions of this committee on war expenditures. In addition to that, I do so in order that we may also effectively protest against the lack of adequate representation of our party on that committee. Another effective protest, or reason for protest, lies in the failure to set up the committee at a previous time in the session. The Prime Minister himself must recognize that most, if not all, of his reasons for setting up the committee are all gone, because we are now in the last week of a long session, and the committee has not yet been constituted. We take this position, too, as a protest against the lack of proper technical organization in the committee, and proper organization so far as the question of secretariat and experts to assist the members of the committee is concerned. That, it seems to me, too, must be protested against. We felt that the most effective means by which we can protest against these abuses, and against these irregularities which are going to reduce materially the effectiveness of the committee, would be to oppose the motion which has been made.

And more than that, I wish to say clearly that if the government proposes to go on, and the committee is set up, we must reserve our rights, as members of the Progressive Conservative party, with respect to making a decision to sit on those committees, particularly where they are being held in secret, and dealing with questions where actual national security in our opinion is not involved. In this way I place before members of the house our position. I do so because I feel that after all, great as were the aims and ideals of this war expenditures committee, the abuses which have crept in and the situations which have arisen from time to time have placed our party in the position where we have felt that some effective protest in the national interest is essential at this particular time.

Therefore, at this time, in closing my remarks, I desire to say that for the reasons which have been advanced we shall oppose the motion of the Prime Minister.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have listened this afternoon with a great deal of interest to what has been said from the floor of the house with respect to this war expenditures committee. I have listened to the reasons why the committee was not set up sooner, as expressed by some hon. members, and reasons why it possibly should not be set up at all.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has made a strong appeal against the setting up of this committee. He is a man for whom I have the greatest respect and regard. As a matter of fact, so much do I regard him that I say this now, without fear of successful contradiction, that unless Mr. Bracken gets a seat for himself in this house very soon there will not be any necessity for him to be here at all. That is the kind of a job I think the leader of the opposition is doing.

There were several objections he made which were not clear to me. First of all, he regrets exceedingly that the committee was not set up. Then, in his last words, just before he took his seat, he tells us that he opposes the setting up of the committee. That is the opinion that was going around this house just before Easter, namely, that if the government attempted to set up the committee the opposition would oppose it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who said that?

Mr. O'NEILL: The hon. member asks who said it. I am telling him that that was the popular rumour in the house. That is who said it. But now the leader of the opposition tells the house he is going to oppose the setting up of the committee. It does appear that there must have been some foundation for the rumour going around the house. So that it does seem to me the government cannot be blamed very much because of the failure to set up the committee, when the opposition were going to oppose its being set up.

Just now reference was made to a unanimous report being brought in by the committee. The leader of the opposition has said that, so far as the government is concerned, yes; but so far as the public is concerned—well, that is another matter. I was not a member of the committee last year, but I was the year before, and I resent that remark a little bit. It seemed to me that he sort of cast a reflection upon those members of the committee who were from the government side.

Then the leader of the opposition complained about the percentage of representation of his party on the committee. So far as I am concerned I cannot see that there is any difference between the percentage of representation of Progressive Conservative members on that committee and the percentage on other committees. There is no different attitude taken toward the Progressive Conservatives from that taken toward any of the other parties. It is all based on percentage. It may be urged that that percentage is wrong. But my belief is that it follows the representation throughout the country. For instance, Ontario has a certain number of members in the House of Commons, and it is based—or is supposed to be—on a percentage of population. The same applies in setting up committees of the house. The Progressive Conservative party has twice as many representatives as the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or the Social Credit party, because of the number of members in the official opposition party in the house.

Then some hon. members—and among them, I believe, the leader of the opposition—have complained about lack of control in the committee. It does not seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that any party should have control of a committee, and I do not think there was any attempt to have control. Certainly on the committee on which I served no attempt was made to have control of the committee. So far as I am concerned, in all the committee meetings I attended there were only one or two occasions when in my opinion it would have been quite all right to hold the meeting in public; or at least I could see no very good reason at the time for its being held in camera. But there was this point to be considered at all times, that we would get far better information, and get it more readily from the witnesses, if they were assured, before giving their evidence, that the meeting would be held in camera.

It was our idea to get that information. We were not trying to uncover any scandal, because we believed that the people in this country were just as sincere in their war effort as we were. Therefore there should not be any scandal to uncover, and we were not trying to uncover any. What we were trying to find out was if there was any way whereby we could improve methods employed in doing their business. One particular instance I have in mind had to do with the head of one of the large hospitals in Canada, a man who did not have to come before the committee at all. Quite definitely that man would never have appeared before the committee, unless the meeting had been in camera. The things that he might say might be misconstrued by some member of the press. He was not in there to give information, unless it was on the understanding that the meeting would be in camera. I did not see any reason in the world why we should not hold that meeting in camera. Certainly no information was going to develop which would be of comfort to the enemy, but that was not the point. We wanted to get information, and the only way in which we could get it was to guarantee to that gentleman that the meeting would be held in camera. That was done; we secured the information, and I think some good came of it.

Some hon. members, including the leader of the opposition, have complained because the government brought in a motion like this on a Saturday afternoon, when everyone had gone home. I ask, why have they gone home, with the house still in session; why are they not here? That is what we have to contend with all the time with these "T-to-T" members —Tuesday to Thursday; those of us who come from the maritimes or from the west are here from the middle of January until the middle of August, while these other hon. members slip out on Thursday and do not come back until the following Tuesday. Now they have the audacity to complain in this house because something is brought up on a Saturday afternoon and they are not here. Well, they should be here. I maintain that it is absolutely wrong to blame the government for bringing in this motion at this time. I may be a little dumb, but I do not see how the government could have done anything else, because on the very statement of the leader of the opposition it would seem that this matter would be opposed no matter when it was brought in.

Something has been said about publicity. In my constituency I have not heard one person, whether he belonged to the Liberal party, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party or the Progressive Conservative party, say anything that would lead me to believe he was suspicious that this committee was trying to cover up something. I never heard any such suggestion. Publicity, you know, at times is very much abused by all political parties, and sometimes it seems to me that we make too much use of it. I was at a League of Nations' meeting not very long ago at which one speaker said the public men of this country were destroying the confidence of the people in them. That speaker was a university professor, and he said one of the things that was undermining the confidence of the young men and young women of this country in our government was that the Progressive Conservative party had made too good a job of tearing down the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). That is the kind of stuff that is going on in the country; that is the sort of thing that is making the people believe there is something wrong in our government institutions. I have not seen anything of a crooked nature since I have been here. There are many things about the government of the country that seem wrong to me, but I have seen nothing absolutely crooked. Yet there is a great deal of talk in this house, coming from all political parties, trying to make out that there is something wrong with those who belong to the opposing parties.

There is not very much else I wish to say in connection with this motion. I was not on the war expenditures committee last year, though I was on it the year before last and I saw nothing wrong at that time. So far as I am aware no graft was proved, and I have no knowledge of what was done in connection with the report last year, whether or not it was acted upon. However, I am sorry that this committee was not set up long ago, for there is no doubt that people are going to wonder why that was not done, and why the committee must sit while the house is not in session. Personally I feel that there is so much business for that committee to attend to that it should sit all year, whether or not the house is in session, and we should not have to wait until the house meets again to have the committee reconstituted. It should go right to work and keep on working, and even then it would not be able to look after all the business.

There is another complaint that is often made, in connection with the attendance of hon. members in this house, which I think might be answered at this time. We have had five or six special committees, in addition to the regular committees of the house, and very often when you come into this chamber you find only from twenty-five to forty members in their places. I have had visitors sitting in the galleries who have asked me where all the members are. Well, the members are attending these various committees, and I suggest that if this committee had been set up as well, with twenty-four or twenty-five members, we would have had a hard time to get a quorum There is a limit to the number of committees that can be set up with only 245 members, and there is a limit to the efficient work that can be done by those committees. Personally I am very sorry the committee was not set up sooner, but certainly I am going to support the motion, and I would suggest to the Prime Minister that, if it can be arranged in any way, the committee be set up again as soon as we meet next session, or that the present committee be continued, so that it may go right on with its work.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the members who have served on war expenditures committees how deeply the government appreciates the services they have rendered in connection with the committee's work. I was reserving what I wished to say on that point until the conclusion of the debate. I believe there are very few tasks more important or more onerous than the task which is assigned to hon. members who sit on the war expenditures committee, particularly when that committee is obliged to hold its meetings not only while parliament is in session but practically throughout the year. As some hon. members have mentioned this afternoon, this means a very great sacrifice not only of time but of personal means and in relation to their own business affairs. I believe this service merits the thanks of all members of the House of Commons. In the name of the government I should like to express very sincere thanks to the members of the committee for the efficient and helpful service they have rendered.

I am at a loss to understand the attitude of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) in saying that he does not propose to support this motion, for the reason, as alleged by him, that he wishes to make a protest in the matter on behalf of his party. Well, in listening to him, I thought he was protesting a good deal. If that is the real purpose behind my hon. friend's decision not to support the motion, I should certainly feel that purpose had been adequately served by what he has said. However, I would point out to the leader of the opposition that he like myself is a salaried officer of this house. He has his duties as leader of the opposition and I have my duties as Prime Minister. One of his duties as leader of the opposition is to see that the house is informed at any and all times when there is reason to believe that the government is not doing its duty. I ask hon. members to look through the proceedings of parliament of this session and see if they can find at any time in any place where the leader of the opposition asked that the committee on war expenditures should be immediately appointed. He may have done so in some general statement with respect to the calling of committees generally, but he has seen this motion on the order paper; he has heard it called from time to time, and never once has he risen in his place to say that it was in the public interest that the war expenditures committee should be appointed, that its setting up should not be delayed and that he would ask the government to set apart a time when the committee could be set up. I say that if he had done that there might have been some reason to believe that his intention not to support the setting up of the committee was based upon the reason that the government had not done its full duty in the matter.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, did not rise in his seat to express the hope that the committee would soon be establshed. The reason I gave him at the time for its not having been established was that an agreement had been reached between the leaders of the different parties in this house that certain other business would be proceeded with first. As leader of this house I feel myself to be bound by agreements reached in matters of procedure of business of the house as in all else between the different leaders in the house. As hon. members know, there was a distinct understanding between the leaders that the financial measures would be disposed of as rapidly as possible and that the order of procedure would be as set forth in the agreement which had been reached between us.

If I had been asked to waive that agreement; if I had been told that there were special reasons why it was desirable that it should be waived, I would have been the first to have met the request. I was anxious to get the committee appointed. I made that perfectly clear in statements which were made when the house was about to adjourn for Easter. I said that I was very anxious to get the remaining two committees established before we adjourned, the one on radio broadcasting and the other on war-time expenditures. The radio committee was appointed, as I recall it within a certain length of time, but I was told by some hon. member opposite —I think I am right in saying that it was my hon. friend the leader of the opposition among others who told me—that there were certain gentlemen on his side of the house who wished to debate this matter and that he hoped I would not take it up before the Easter recess.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know the Prime Minister would not want to put words in my mouth. I cannot recall having said that and I am quite sure that I did not. It may have been someone else who made mention of that, but so far as I am concerned any intimation with respect to hon. members having something to say applied as much to the radio broadcasting committee as it did to this one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We were drawing rapidly to the moment of adjournment at Easter, and I repeated a previous suggestion that it should not take any time at all to set up the committee and that if hon. members wished to discuss matters relevant thereto later on, it could be done on a report of the committee or when the committee was making its report. But I know—I am not sufficiently clear in my mind to say positively that it was from the leader of the opposition—I certainly received an intimation from some hon. gentleman opposite in the clearest manner possible that there were hon. members on the other side who wished to speak on this motion and that the debate would take a considerable time. It was that reason and that reason alone which prevented me from bringing forward this motion before the Easter recess. As I say, it was the duty of the leader of the opposition, if he regarded the setting up of this committee as of national importance, to have risen in his seat and asked me as leader of the government to see that the motion was placed before the house before the session got along too far.

Mr. GRAYDON: Another leader did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just said that I gave an answer to him and it was accepted by him and by my hon. friend. I have thought all the time since that the leader of the opposition was accepting the answer which I had given to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and for that reason was not making any special request because he knew—he was a party to it—that there was an arrangement as to the procedure of business, as to the order in which the several measures were to be taken up, and that I was following out that order.

Mr. GRAYDON: There has been a great deal of talk about the order of business. The Prime Minister knows as well as I that the order of business with respect to the budget and the war appropriation bill was not a question of interfering with the present situation in connection with the war expenditures committee. Actually we could have taken a Wednesday night, or a Friday night, or a Saturday if necessary, without interfering in any way with the sequence of business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We could not have done anything of the kind. If my understanding was correct, there was likely to be a long debate on the question.

Mr. GRAYDON I do not know where my right hon. friend got that idea. It may have been, as he says, that someone intimated that some hon. members wished to speak, but I never knew that there was going to be a long debate. There has not been a long debate at this stage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The same conditions are not existing at this time. I am telling the house quite frankly and honestly that that is what governed me in the matter. I felt that hon. gentlemen opposite understood, along with myself, a certain procedure was to be followed and I was adhering to that procedure. I sought to find a way to get the committee set up by saying that I saw no reason why we could not appoint the committee in a very few minutes and then if hon. members wished to have a discussion later, it could take place on the report.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that was in the back of my right hon. friend's mind why did he not put this committee first on the list? He put reconstruction first; then social security, and then radio broadcasting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the order of committees was established by the way requested names for memberships were received from the different parties in the house. I cannot tell the house why, but there was special difficulty in certain quarters opposite in obtaining the names of members for the war expenditures committee. The desire of the government was to get all these committees set up as rapidly as possible. As I said this afternoon, the committees for the most part were set up at an earlier date this year than has been the case for many years past in this parliament. I come back to the position that if the committee was not set up earlier the leader of the opposition is responsible more than anyone else for not having asked the government that it should be set up at an earlier time. I repeat the challenge I have made, to look at the records of Hansard to see whether my hon. friend at any time asked that this committee because of its importance should be appointed without further delay.

In regard to the points that have been raised in the course of the debate this afternoon I should like to say this. With the exception of the changing of a word or two, the reasons for which I mentioned when the matter was being discussed before, the resolution before the house to-day is in the identical terms of the resolution which has been passed by the House of Commons at Westminster every year since this war began, and which was adopted in the first instance in the third year of the last war. The British parliament has had experience in dealing with public expenditures unequalled by any other free parliament in the world. The war expenditures at Westminster are colossal compared with the war expenditures made by this parliament. I personally have felt that the reasons which have governed the powers and procedure of the committee at Westminster must be very strong indeed, or the government at Westminster would never have consented to having the powers given, limited in some respects as they are, and the particular procedure adopted which exists in respect to the war expenditures committee of the United Kingdom. Everything that has been done with regard to the war expenditures committee at Westminster has been done for the best and soundest of reasons. I make that statement the more emphatically because there are many hon. gentlemen opposite me who, when Sir John Wardlaw Milne was here, who is chairman of the war expenditures committee and a leading Conservative in the British parliament, had conversations with him on this very matter. They asked about the procedure in the British house and the powers of its war expenditures committee and received from him direct the reasons which governed at Westminster in having, not some sessions of the war expenditures committee held in camera, but all its sessions. There have been no sessions of the war expenditures committee in Great Britain held in public. The British parliament, which is most zealous in its supervision of expenditures and is the custodian of the interests of the people of the United Kingdom, has not reached that decision without the very best of reasons, and I am convinced that they are the very soundest reasons in time of war.

There is one thing I have tried to do in the discharge of my responsibility here, and that is to have nothing done in this parliament which was merely to embarrass the British parliament or the British war effort or the war effort of the United States or that of any of our allies or our own war effort. I have had to ask myself time and again: Will I remain misunderstood in regard to a particular attitude I am taking because I do not come out and say something that would be very popular and meet with general acclaim, or shall I remain silent, and follow the procedure that I know to be wisest, though it may not be generally understood to the degree one would wish among the people?

This is a case in point. I should like to see all these inquiries made in the open. I am just as anxious to have publicity on these matters as anybody could be, more anxious indeed than any other member in the house, because I have more to lose than any other man if scandals should develop in our war effort; or anything improper take place as a result of inadequate supervision on the part of the government. I want to see this war expenditures committee carry on its duties. I want to see it go into all matters of war expenditure just as fully as it possibly can. I want to see the opposition join with members of the government in seeing that the investigations of that committee are made just as thorough as they can possibly be made. But I do not want to make a departure here which is going possibly to result in something happening in Canada which is the very thing which the British parliament has sought to avoid having happen as a result of investigations in time of war. I take my stand on the experience and wisdom of the parliament at Westminster in dealing with expenditures in time of war, and I am prepared to say to this house and to the country: any right, any privilege, any opportunity that is given to the committee on war expenditures at Westminster I would like our committee to have and I will support in this house. Surely that is going as far as any committee could wish to go. I am ready to have any power given to this committee or to any of its subcommittees that is given to the war expenditures committee in the United Kingdom. I not only would be willing to give it to our committee but I wish them to have it.

I could go at some length into the reasons why meetings are held in camera and as to the other points raised, but in a previous debate I discussed, I think, every one of them and I do not wish to detain the house by a discussion at length this afternoon.

I shall speak therefore only on one other matter that has been mentioned here this afternoon, namely the composition of the committee. The composition of this House of Commons is determined by the country, and the composition of committees of this house is based upon the composition of its membership.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is not this an extraordinary committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, and if it were, are hon. gentlemen opposite any more honest than hon. members on this side? Why were the members on this side of the house sent to this house in the numbers in which they were? It was because the people of this country had more confidence in them than in hon. gentlemen opposite who were returned in the minority in which they are at the present time. I will not for a moment admit that any hon. gentleman sitting on the opposition benches in a minority is more honourable or more honest or more concerned for his country's well-being and its good name than are the men on this side who have been returned to represent the people of this country in the numbers they have. Such an argument as is being suggested reflects on every member.

Mr. GRAYDON: Nobody put up the argument in the first place, and that is why I wonder at the Prime Minister answering it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has been put forward time and again, and I think it has now been sufficiently answered.

I shall not take up more time. But I say to the leader of the opposition I would hope that on second thoughts he would realize that there can be no duty more important at the present time than the careful supervision of public expenditures, and that he would reconsider whether he is really doing something in the national interest in saying that he is not prepared to support the reconstitution of a committee as all-important as is the committee on war expenditures.

Motion agreed to, on division.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO BETTING, PREVIOUS OFFENCE CHARGED, ET CETERA

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 107, to amend the criminal code—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is considering section 7. There is a subamendment and an amendment.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Before the subamendment and the amendment are put to the committee, I would ask leave to substitute for my amendment an amendment to be moved by the hon. member for Mercier.

Mr. JEAN: I move to withdraw the amendment and substitute therefor the following:

To strike out the first portion of line 35 and substitute therefor the following words:
"opened, kept or used or outfitted or equipped in such manner as to be likely to be"

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That eliminates the words "intended to be used", and I do not think it would in fact make any difference in the application of the provision, but it removes all possibility of there being any conviction on an intention without an overt act, which was one of the objections raised earlier in the day when the paragraph was being considered. I do not think there could have been any possibility of a conviction without an overt act, because the condition of the premises still had to be proved, and it was the possession or control of these premises which would constitute the offence. But the elimination of the words "intended to be used" would not affect the purpose we seek to achieve by the provision, and it does avoid the objection made by some hon. members, that it provided a possibility of conviction on intention without any overt act.

Mr. REID: But you have left in the words "likely to be", and so leave it to the imagination or the interpretation of whoever is prosecuting or laying the charge. Is there any other act in which the words "likely to" occur?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know that there are any statutory provisions which have the words "likely to be used", but there are statutory provisions which make it a crime to have a thing which is likely to cause damage. It is for that reason that the carrying of arms is forbidden. It is for that reason that it is forbidden to have explosives in certain places. It is because the possession or control of the thing which is likely to be harmful is forbidden.

Mr. NEILL: In view of the fact that I moved the amendment to the minister's amendment, I might be allowed to say a few words. The amendment as he now proposes it does away with practically all the objection which I had, and which was shared by other members, which was to the idea of convicting a man because he might have had an intention in his mind without, to use the legal expression employed by the minister, committing an overt act. I think in view of that, and of the desire of some hon. members that some more restrictive regulations should be put in, I would ask leave to withdraw the amendment I moved.

Subamendment withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Jean) agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Section as amended carried.

Mr. REID: On division.

Section as amended agreed to on division.

On section 8—Betting, pool-selling and book making.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should like to suggest that there be added to section 8 the following words, after the word "place", in line 13:

Provided, however, that the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to the publication of news or records in relation to any race, fight, game or sport or to the contestants therein in the ordinary course of publishing a bona fide newspaper.

Mr. MULOCK: I so move.

Mr. STIRLING: Has not the word "or" got to go in somewhere, either before or after?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, the word "or" should remain. This amendment should go in between the words "place" and "or" in line 13.

[Mr St. Laurent.]

Mr. STIRLING: The amendment should finish up with the word "or", should it not?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, and it does in the form in which I moved it.

Mr. STIRLING: It was not so read by the Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—Betting, et cetera.

Mr. JEAN: I move to strike out the whole clause and renumber the following clauses accordingly.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think I was in the chamber at the time when section 9 first came up. Perhaps the minister would explain.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Hon. members will see on the right-hand page in the explanatory notes a provision which is already there:

(i) wilfully and knowingly sends, transmits, delivers or receives any message. . . .

Section 9 was to replace that by the clause as redrawn. It had been pointed out that as it existed it made the situation rather difficult for telephone and telegraph companies required by law to transmit messages handed to them by the public, and it was felt that by redrawing it in this form we would be easing the situation for these utility companies which are required by law to transmit messages given to them by the public. But the telephone and telegraph companies, after reconsidering it, have said that they would rather not have it in this form; that, even in the form in which we have suggested it, we would be imposing additional burdens of supervision upon them at a time when they have not a sufficient number of employees.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words, they are willing to take a chance?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are willing to take a chance on the old text rather than take the new one.

Motion (Mr. Jean) agreed to.

Section withdrawn.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Bodily injuries and acts and omissions causing danger to the person.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the purpose of that section?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The purpose of the section is to meet a difficulty which arose in the province of Ontario, where a magistrate held that the Windsor tunnel was not a highway, and that things happening there were not governed by provisions with respect to happenings on highways.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That widens the ambit very considerably. "For the purposes of this section 'highway' shall include any road to which the public has access..." That really covers a private road—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —where the public may have temporary right of access.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, "right of access" —yes; but that would not be a private road, if there were right of access.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The right of access might be gained by agreement.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To the public?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If it were an agreement with the public, it would then cease to be a private right of way.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have in mind at the moment a road which is used by the public practically every day in the year except for one day in every year, when the company which I happen to know of closes the gateway into their particular grounds. There is no doubt in the world that the public has access to that road. They use it at all times. I cannot see the distinction the minister makes, from what the hon. member for Lake Centre says. What is the difference between having right of access and access? It is straining a point, I submit. In one case you have a right of access, and in the other you use the right of access. In the case of a road such as I have described, where the public undoubtedly has access, through the permission of the owners, if you like, of the property, the road in question connecting two streets and being very handy for persons with motor vehicles and bicycles as well as pedestrians, the use of that road cuts off a considerable distance for people in the town I have in mind. In making a claim for liability under an insurance policy, I am doubtful whether the word "highway" could be applied to that road. If an accident were to take place on that road, I do not believe that the terms of an insurance policy, which would cover only the owner of a vehicle on a highway, would enable the claimant to recover, because while in one sense it is a private road, the public certainly has had access to it. I suggest that this section might make it possible for this road to be regarded as a highway, and I am not so sure that the rights and obligations flowing from such a change might not have perhaps some disadvantageous effect upon the people using it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I call my hon. friend's attention to what section 285 covers. Section 285 provides:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, having the charge of any carriage or motor vehicle, automobile, or other vehicle, by wanton or furious driving, or racing or other wilful misconduct, or by wilful neglect, does or causes to be done any bodily harm to any person.

"Highway" is not mentioned in that subsection, but it does appear in the second subsection, which provides:

> Whenever, owing to the presence of a motor car on the highway, an accident has occurred to any person or to any horse or vehicle in charge of any person, any person driving the motor car shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars and costs or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding thirty days if he fails to stop his car and, with intent to escape liability either civil or criminal, drives on without tendering assistance and giving his name and address.

It also appears in subsection 6, which deals with driving a motor vehicle recklessly on a street, road, highway or other public place.

Those are the only subsections with respect to which this amendment would have any effect. The word "highway" also occurs in the third subsection but only in the enumeration, which ends with: "street, road, highway or other place." So that with respect to the third subsection this amendment would have no effect. The amendment is suggested at the instance of the deputy attorney-general of Ontario because of a decision there in which it was held that the Windsor tunnel was not a street, road, or highway within the meaning of subsections 2 and 6 of section 285. I do not think it could have any effect as to civil liability. It is a matter of rather restricted application.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister sure it is of restricted application? Has he given thought to what might perhaps be covered by this extension of the purview of the word "highway"? True, the attorney-general of Ontario may have in mind the curing of one particular defect, but what this legislative body has to bear in mind is that in effecting one cure where a difficulty has arisen, care must be taken as to how far we are opening up the whole question of highways to which the public has access.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the hon. member not admit that it is wise to have the same principle recognized in that section of the code applied to such a road as he has described, even if it were a private road? Surely a person commiting an offence, such as that which we are guarding against, on such a road as the leader of the opposition described would be properly punishable as upon an open highway. Would the hon. member not agree with that?

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not so sure that I would agree with that under the circumstances. I do not want to go into the case, but I do not think my hon. friend has clearly in mind the geographical situation I have described, or perhaps I was not very clear myself in the description I gave. Under the circumstances, however, I would not be able to agree with the hon. member that it would be necessary or proper to make the change suggested.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I submit that this widens the section far too much. Take, for instance, a situation such as this, where there is not a fence around a property and there is a trail or road across a person's property. That trail is used, even though the users are in reality trespassing. In that case the public would have access. I suggest that the minister consider amending the section to read, "shall include any road to which the public has the right of access." The public might have access, even if they were trespassing, but they would not have the right of access. I suggest that the addition of these words would cover the situation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will so move, I have no objection to accepting such an amendment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I move that after the words, "public has" in line twenty-five the words "right of" shall be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 12—Definitions in part VII.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In checking this with other departments it was found that the words inserted were not sufficient to cover all cases. It will be noted that the words underscored are the words we have inserted. There is in part II of the Trade Mark and Design Act, a provision which must be taken care of. So that I suggest adding in line 33 after the figures "1932" the words, "or part II of the Trade Mark and Design Act". It is only one part of the Trade Mark and Design Act that is replaced by the Unfair Competition Act, 1932. The departments have checked, and they agree that with this change it will be sufficiently covered.

Mr. STIRLING: I suggest that the word "act" must be changed to the plural in line 34.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The "said act" there is the United Kingdom act, known as the Patents and Designs Act, 1907.

Mr. GRAYDON: This does not seem very clear. It states:

> "Trade mark" means a trade mark or industrial design registered in accordance with the Unfair Competition Act, 1932.

Then we have added, "the Trade Mark and Design Act". Then the paragraph continues:

> And the registration whereof is in force under the provisions of the said act.

The "said act" normally would not refer back to the third preceding act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I stand corrected.

Mr. GRAYDON: Registration is, I think, completed in either of the acts. So that the plural form should be used.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: How does the amendment read? Does it simply change the word "act" to "acts"? It seems to me it should be "either of the said acts".

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That would be preferable.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the minister is going to do that I suggest the words "either or both of the said acts".

Mr. JEAN: I move:

> That section 12 be amended by adding after the figures "1932" in line 33, the words "or part II of the Trade Mark and Design Act", and that in line 34 the words "of the said act" be replaced by the words "either of the said acts".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 13—False pretences.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister give an example of a case which would fall within the amendment. It is rather difficult to think of an advertisement arranged or worded so as to be deceptive or misleading.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This was asked for by the Better Business Bureau, and we were told that there were signs being published with the word "no", in small type, and the words "fire sale here" in larger type. Such a sign would have in large type the words "fire sale here", but if one looked at it closely he would see that it read "no fire sale here".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who asked for it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Better Business Bureau of Toronto.

Mr. GREEN: Does this apply to political advertising?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Political advertising, from my experience, is never deceptive.

Mr. STIRLING: Always pure.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think we can rely upon the public to see to that, without any amendments to the criminal code. I presume the minister does get many representations from organizations such as the Better Business Bureau. But nearly all these amendments have been suggested by somebody else. I was wondering whether the suggestion from the Better Business Bureau was based on some case in connection with which they had had some difficulty in obtaining a conviction. Or is it just one of those cases where, for their own purposes, and for the protection of the public, they would like to tighten up the provisions of the existing law?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think there was any prosecution, because the section, as it appears on the right side of the page, is left exactly as it was. The only new words are those underscored, namely, "or which advertisement is intentionally so worded or arranged as to be deceptive or misleading". Without that, whatever the form of the type, if the statement were true it would not come within the section. The representations made were that with the section as it was there were deliberate attempts being made to stay within its terms, and still create a deceptive impression.

The hon. member has said that these amendments are the result of suggestions made to the government. It must be remembered that it is not the federal Department of Justice which administers the criminal code. That is done by attorneys general in the provinces. It is when representations come from those who have to do with the application of the law that we must consider whether or not a plausible case has been made out. There would have been no bill brought before the house for the purpose of making only this change. But because a bill was to be introduced making several changes, and representations having been made that there had been resort to this misleading form so as to avoid the consequences of the statute, we thought it proper to insert the additional words. It then becomes a question of fact for the magistrate to decide whether or not it was intentionally worded to deceive. To convict, the magistrate would have to find that it was intentionally worded or arranged to cause deception.

Mr. GRAYDON: "Worded or arranged."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, or arranged.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the section not be improved by leaving out the word "intentionally"? Mens rea must be an ingredient, anyway. I am very much in favour of this section; I think it is quite proper and advisable, but I was wondering whether it might not be strengthened and improved if it read, "or which advertisement is so worded or arranged as to be deceptive or misleading."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should be afraid it might be held that if in fact it happened to be worded or arranged in a manner that did not convey the correct information, the very fact that it was so worded or arranged, without mens rea, might be held to constitute an offence. I think the hon. member will agree that there should not be a conviction unless there is mens rea, and I do not know that there is any harm here in making it apparent that the intent to deceive must be found as a fact by the magistrate.

Mr. GRAYDON: I can think of a case, for instance, in which a printer might make a typographical error of some description. In the absence of the word "intentionally," it might be possible that some innocent person would be brought before the court without the proper prctection being given.

Section agreed to.

Sections 14 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

On section 20—Trial without consent of person charged.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with sections 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22, I would suggest for the consideration of the minister that during the coming year something be done by way of recasting sections 773 to 777 of the code. They have been productive of much doubt, of much divergence in interpretation, and there is always great difficulty in understanding clearly the jurisdiction of the various courts under these sections. They have been built up by amendments from year to year until to-day it is almost impossible to achieve any unity of decision in the various courts throughout the country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member refers to sections 773 to 777 inclusive?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall be glad to see that they are considered by the law officers of the department.

Section agreed to.

On section 21—Trial without consent.

Mr. POTTIER: I quite agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre that sections 773 to 777 should be examined. If you try to read them together you have to keep going from one to the other. I take it that section 21 of this bill is to correct the anomaly we find now in section 774 of the code, in which New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island were left out; that is, in connection with certain offences where the procedure had to be by summary trial. I take that to be the purpose of section 21, to bring Nova Scotia in with the other provinces in reference to consent in certain offences?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 22—Trial without consent.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This change is merely to leave Nova Scotia out it having been dealt with under the previous section.

Section agreed to.

Sections 23 and 24 agreed to.

On section 25—Procedure in cases of corporations in summary trials of indictable offences.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There has always been a great deal of difficulty in connection with corporations brought before the courts, and I would ask the minister to explain just how these amendments will deal with the difficulties that have arisen since the last amendments were introduced. I have read the explanatory note, but I am not able to follow exactly the situation that is contemplated in the explanation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Section 782 deals with the case where a corporation is charged:

When a corporation is to be charged the summons may be served on the mayor or chief officer of such corporation, or upon the clerk or secretary or the like officer thereof, and may be in the same form as if the defendant were a natural person.

2. The corporation in such case shall appear by attorney, who shall on its behalf, where the charge cannot be tried summarily without the consent of the accused, elect, as in the next preceding section provided in respect of a natural person, and thereupon the case shall proceed as if the defendant were a natural person.

That is, if the election is made.

3. If the defendant does not so appear, or, so appearing does not, where consent is required as aforesaid, by its attorney elect to be tried in the ordinary way by the court having criminal jurisdiction, the magistrate may proceed in the absence of the defendant, or upon its not so electing to be tried as aforesaid, as upon a preliminary investigation.

It is that third subsection that is proposed to be replaced by the new provision.

3. If the corporation—

This word is used instead of "defendant" as heretofore.

—does not so appear, or, so appearing, does not, where consent is required as aforesaid, by its attorney elect to be tried summarily the magistrate may

(a) where the charge is one that can be tried summarily without the consent of the accused, proceed with the trial in the absence of the accused. . . .

I think the hon. member would agree that this is proper.

(b) where the charge is one that requires consent as aforesaid, proceed, in the absence of the accused or upon its attorney not so electing to be tried as aforesaid, as upon a preliminary investigation.

That is to say, if it is a case in which consent to be tried summarily is required, if there is no appearance or if there is an appearance by attorney and the attorney does not elect that the corporation be proceeded against summarily, the magistrate must proceed in the ordinary way, as upon a preliminary investigation. I think this is merely to clarify what was intended by the section as it stood before, but as it stood it did not clearly distinguish between cases in which the magistrate could proceed without the consent of the accused and cases in which he could not proceed summarily unless he had consent.

Section agreed to.

Section 26 agreed to.

On section 27—Speedy trials of indictable offences.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am going to ask that this section be struck out and replaced by another section.

Mr. JEAN: I move:

Strike out all the words and substitute therefor the following:

"26. Subsections 3 and 4 of section eight hundred and twenty-seven of the said act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'(3) In such case or if the prisoner has been brought before the judge and consents to be tried by him without a jury, the prosecuting officer shall prefer a formal statement in writing setting forth as separate counts therein the charge or charges against him for which he has been committed for trial and any charge or charges founded on the facts or evidence disclosed in the depositions and any charge or charges preferred against him pursuant to the provisions of section eight hundred and thirty-four.

'(4) No charge for an offence for which a greater punishment may be inflicted by reason of a previous conviction or convictions shall contain any references to such previous conviction or convictions.

'(5) If upon being arraigned the prisoner pleads guilty to any count, the prosecuting officer shall draw up a record as nearly as may be in form 60, and such plea shall be entered on the record, and the judge shall pass the sentence of the law on such prisoner, which shall have the same force and effect as if passed by a court having jurisdiction to try the offence in the ordinary way'."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is to achieve the purpose we were seeking to achieve by section 29. It has been held by the supreme court that on proceedings of this kind there had to be separate counts and a separate trial on each count. In rendering the decision the supreme court expressed its regrets that it had to decide in that way and said that the only way in which the inconvenience of having to have a separate trial on each count could be overcome would be by an amendment to the code. Section 29 was drawn up to bring this about. The crown prosecutors in Montreal and Toronto and other counsel gave it their consideration and came to the conclusion that the proper way to achieve this object would be in the manner provided by this amendment, and that it should be an amendment to section 827 instead of to section 835. It was felt that the amendment suggested in section 29 of the bill would not be the proper way to achieve the object in view. The purpose of the amendment is to require that in proceedings before a judge without a jury there shall be a charge sheet made up indicating separately the several charges, but that they may all be tried together, that there may be one trial dealing with several charges as can be done in trials upon indictment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister mentioned section 835. Is that section intended to apply only to trials before a judge, or does it apply to trials before a judge and jury?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Trials before a judge and jury are already covered by provisions of the code. It was held by the supreme court that a judge proceeding without a jury could not try more than one charge in one trial and that the provision in the code which states that the provisions relating to jury trials mutatis mutandis shall apply to speedy trials were not sufficient to bring in the special provision that more than one count could be included in the indictment and the trial proceeded with on more than one charge at the same time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Section 29 contains the words, "try together any number of charges against an accused." Why should that not be "counts" instead of "charges"?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The word "count" has technically been appropriated to charges under indictment, and it might be improper to call a charge on a charge sheet, a count.

Section 28 agreed to.

On section 29—Charges tried together.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Section 29 as it appears here is no longer necessary because provision has been made for this in section 29. But I am suggesting that this section be struck out and a new section substituted.

Mr. JEAN: I move:

Strike out all the words and substitute therefor the following:

"Section eight hundred and thirty-nine of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor.

'839. The provisions of part XIX in so far as they are relevant and not inconsistent with the provisions of this part, shall apply mutatis mutandis to a formal statement in writing and to a trial under this part'."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This procedure was indicated to us as being necessary by the crown prosecutors in Toronto and Montreal in order to make the procedure in speedy trials before a judge without a jury similar to that already provided in the code, under part XIX, for trials by jury.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 30—Procedure by indictment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the nature of the change brought about by this section?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Sections 30, 31 and 32 restore in Manitoba, at the request of the authorities of that province, juries of twelve men instead of six in criminal cases. In Saskatchewan a jury of six is still substituted for one of twelve. Manitoba now wants to go back to twelve, and this provision is to take Manitoba out of the clause which provides for six jurors instead of twelve.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I realize the circumstances under which this change took place. In the year 1935, conditions were rather difficult in Saskatchewan and every endeavour was made to save costs and expenses. To that end it was desired by the attorney-general of Saskatchewan that the jury be reduced from the normal number of twelve to six. Having practised under both systems—and I know that my view is shared by a great many lawyers in Saskatchewan—I think it is felt that the restoration to the twelve-man system should be considered in that province. The six-man system has resulted in a considerable saving. On the other hand, if one can expect the same degree of justice from a six-man jury as from a twelve-man jury what reason is there why the jury should not be reduced to three or an even lesser number.

Mr. REID: Is it as fair a trial as with a twelve-man jury?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Speaking for myself and for other counsel—I know there is a divergence of opinion as between the six-man and the twelve-man jury—I should like to see our province restored to an equality with the other provinces in the matter of the number of jurors. In saying that, I do not want to be considered as saying that a six-man jury arrives at a different verdict from what a twelve-man jury would, but the effect of the judge's charge on a six-man jury is necessarily greater than it would be on a larger jury. While I understand the reason for the change that was made, personally I should like to see restored in our province the jury system as it has been in British countries since time immemorial, and I ask the minister to give consideration to that before the next session.

Mr. MARTIN: Do you have a six-man jury on capital cases in Saskatchewan?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Just to show that there is a difference of opinion in the province on the point touched upon by my learned and hon. friend, I must say that my experience has led me to the other conclusion, that no real value of the jury as an institution has been lost by the reduction in number. In addition, as my hon. friend has pointed out, the change has made for a considerable saving not only in the cost of jury trials but in the time that the local citizens who are called for jury service have to spend on an important duty. As a matter of fact, there has been widespread discussion as to the efficacy of juries in criminal trials. I rather think the attitude taken by my hon. friend is owing to the fact that as a rule he acts for the defence. I have had considerable experience for the crown. While you may get an occasional verdict from a jury that might appear not quite in keeping with a lawyer's technical sense of justice, I am very much in favour of the jury system because it humanizes justice and brings it down to a close and reasonable relationship with the community in which the offence and the trial take place. I do not object to the Minister of Justice taking cognizance of my hon. friend's request, that the restoration of a twelve-man jury be considered, but in order that the minister may not think my hon. friend is speaking for the whole province I submit that the jury of six has considerable value. A jury of twelve citizens is a fairly large group of men to decide questions of fact, and my conclusion—I admit that it is a matter of opinion and I may change mine later—is the opposite of my hon. friend's.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have listened to the two lawyers from Saskatchewan with a great deal of interest, and to my mind the hon. member for Swift Current has given the best argument why the jury should consist of twelve persons. He says that the hon. member for Lake Centre likes a twelve-man jury because he usually acts for the defence, and the hon. member for Swift Current likes the six-man jury because he frequently acts for the prosecution. That seems to me a conclusive argument in favour of a twelve-man jury. After all, when one examines the basis of the system of trial by jury, it was originally established so that a man might be judged by his peers; in other words, it was to give a man a fair trial and an opportunity of real defence. It seems to me that the argument between the two learned counsel is all in favour of the hon. member for Lake Centre, and as one who is not a lawyer but represents perhaps a very large group of people who from time to time fall into the clutches of lawyers—I have yet to have my first experience—I suggest to the minister that consideration be given to the plea made by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I can assure the three hon. members who have spoken that consideration will be given to the matter, and that in doing so the attorney general for the province will be requested to express his views and be asked to endeavour to obtain for us the views of the profession and also of the public. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says that he finds in the argument of the hon. member for Swift Current much to support the view of the hon. member for Lake Centre. There probably is something also in the fact that in these days, to get a jury of twelve men, you have to summon a fairly large panel, and in an agricultural province, particularly at this time when agricultural man-power is needed as it is in Saskatchewan, that is a consideration.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What reason did the attorney general of Manitoba give for asking that the twelve-man jury system be restored?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think it was that the majority of both the profession and the public, after experience of the six-man jury system, preferred the old, traditional twelve-man jury. But because Manitoba has gone back to the old system does not detract at all from the value of the argument made by my hon. friend. The example may be contagious.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are women excluded from the jury panel, whether it be a jury of twelve or a jury of six?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hesitate to give any answer. I am under the impression that the qualifications of jurors are determined by provincial law and that it is the provincial law which determines whether or not only those of the male sex may be jurors. This provision would not make any change in that respect, and I believe that in practice there are provinces where women are qualified as jurors and do sit on panels of jurors.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They are not qualified in Saskatchewan under our jury act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, but that is on account of the provincial legislation of Saskatchewan.

Sections 31 and 32 agreed to.

On section 33—Evidence on the trial.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to point out to the committee that here is the same thing we were speaking of earlier. It is made prima facie evidence that a house, room or place is a common gaming house if it has any means or contrivance for "announcing or displaying the results of any horse race". A radio does that. Can you convict a man of having a gaming house because he has a radio on his premises? The radio may be in a cigar store or a club. Why are the makers of this legislation so deadly down upon these people who "display" or "announce"? Every time I go to bed at night I hear the radio tell us what the baseball results are and so on. Should it be a criminal offence to have a radio?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is easier for me to answer the next to the last question of my hon. friend than to deal with his first objection: why have these provisions been inserted in the bill? It is on account of the situation which was described earlier in the day by the hon. member for Vancouver South. There are cities in Canada where, according to information which comes to us from reliable sources, rackets are being exploited, and the reason for tightening up was to comply with suggestions from the attorneys general of the provinces in which those cities are located that there was a growing evil to be curbed. I certainly would not like to be responsible for introducing into this house any legislation which would make any premises where there is a radio a gaming house or susceptible of being declared a gaming house, even prima facie. It shifts the onus, and it is confined to horse races taking place in Canada or elsewhere.

Mr. MARTIN: It goes after publication. That is the intent of this.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; it was intended to deal with these places where they have boards and teletypes to display at once the entries of the contestants into races, the odds that are being quoted on them, the past performances, the selections of those who claim to have some knowledge of horseflesh, and the tips which have been given for the purpose of placing bets. That is what it is intended to aim at.

Mr. REID: They are not forecasting races; they are just announcing results, and yet they come under the section.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the minister misunderstand me if I suggest that he is very well informed on the matter?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have received many representations, and my information is really second-hand. I am not boasting about it. It is quite possible that, with what was done in section 7, this would not be necessary, and I fear it might be open to the objection that it is drawn in language which goes too far. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has rather frightened me off the text as it appears here. There might be in many innocent places apparatus that could be used for announcing or displaying the result of a horse race, and I would not want to make the section so drastic as not to be susceptible of proper application. I would be disposed to ask the committee for leave to withdraw this section and reconsider it, and draw it up for another session in language which will not be open to the criticism made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Section withdrawn.

Section 34 agreed to.

On section 35—Procedure on appeals. Shorthand notes of proceedings and evidence.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to ask the minister what was the recommendation which was made by the attorney general of Saskatchewan in this regard. I cannot understand how a judge without having a transcript of the evidence would be able to determine whether the court should have the transcript of evidence before it at the hearing of the appeal. As a matter of fact it is not a costly proceeding to have a transcript of the evidence.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is in some localities.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is, in so far as Saskatchewan is concerned. The court reporters are available. Provision is made for transcription, under another section, at, I believe, five cents a folio. I point out this, too, that in the western provinces, in fact in all the provinces, it would be necessary for counsel for an accused to be present on the occasion when the question was decided whether a transcript would or would not be necessary, and to be present again at the hearing of the appeal—which is adding materially to the costs of appeal. Personally I feel that consideration should be given to an automatic appeal, particularly against sentence where the sentence is over two years in the penitentiary, in order to assure of appeal poor persons who to-day are often denied the opportunity for appeal. Of course they have an opportunity of doing so by themselves signing a notice, but a case which is argued without the presence of counsel does not fully place before the court the points in issue in the case, and anything which can be done to keep the cost down as far as an appellant is concerned should be done.

On the one ground alone, namely, that it will mean that counsel for the accused will have to be present on two occasions, that is either by himself or by his agent, I am opposed to this amendment.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This was designed to diminish costs of appeal and to facilitate appeals to convicted persons. I do not know what the situation is in Saskatchewan. In my own province of Quebec, the accused, unless he gets an order from the court to have the transcription made at the cost of the crown because of his indigency, is required to pay for the transcription of the evidence, and it sometimes happens that the appeal is based upon questions of law which do not require for their decision the evidence taken at the trial.

In the province of Quebec hearings of appeals are frequently delayed a considerable time to have the notes transcribed, and after they are transcribed the appeal turns upon matters with respect to which the transcript is of no assistance. At the present time, if the appeal is by the convicted person, he either has to pay for the transcription or get an order from the court, upon cause being shown, that the evidence be transcribed at the cost of the government because he is unable to pay for it. The suggestion was that if it appear to the judge of the court appealed to, on the papers submitted, that the case could probably be decided without having to refer to the evidence, he might dispense with the necessity of having the notes transcribed. They are not automatically transcribed, at least in our province, and I know from having been present in court that frequently applications are made to the court for an order that the transcription be made at the cost of the government on account of the indigent circumstances of the convicted person. I think appeals will be facilitated. When the crown appeals the crown is not prevented from going on because of the cost of having the notes transcribed, so that it is designed to be helpful to the convicted person in making it easier for him to get before an appeal court if he has a point of law upon which he relies and which does not require the consideration of evidence.

Sections 36 and 37 agreed to.

On section 38—Coming into force of certain sections.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move that this section be amended by striking out the words "thirty, thirty-one and thirty-two" and substituting therefor "seventeen, twenty, twenty-nine, thirty and thirty-one." Seventeen and twenty are with respect to Nova Scotia and Manitoba, and the attorneys-general of those two provinces have asked that the date of coming into force be the first of August.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the minister right in saying "seventeen"?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Seventeen renumbered. It was eighteen in the printed bill.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS TO EMPLOYEES IN RECEIPT OF UP TO $2,400 A YEAR

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of bill No. 136, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Designated officers may administer oaths.

Mr. MARTIN: I promised yesterday that I would give the committee some information which I was not able to give then. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert asked how the figure of $93,871,960.55, representing employer and employee contributions, was divided. It is divided as follows: employer contributions, $44,861,409.95; employee contributions, $49,010,550.60.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Are there any changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act applicable to the lumber industry in Nova Scotia? When this legislation was first enacted there was an understanding that it would not apply to the lumber industry in eastern Canada. It did apply to all or part of the industry on the Pacific coast, inasmuch as the industry there was on a year-round basis. I have received a number of complaints, some quite recently, that the unemployment insurance commission are gradually extending their scope, and to some extent involving the lumber industry of eastern Canada in Nova Scotia. For instance, lumber mills doing custom sawing are being brought under this act, while lumber mills employing the same class of labour, which changes a great deal in my part of the country, do not come under the act if the operator is sawing only his own lumber. But if he saws custom lumber he comes under the act. As I understand it, those operators were exempted when this bill was enacted and first administered.

There has also been an enlargement of the scope of the act, as it applies to the operating of motor trucks in eastern Canada. In some cases lumber operators who had trucks of their own are being compelled to come under the act, against their understanding and their wishes, and against the wishes of operators of the trucks. In other cases trucks which are hauling lumber, but which are not employed directly by the operator, do not come under the act. What is the ruling of the department with respect to these two complaints? Are there any changes in the act affecting its application to the lumber industry in eastern Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: Under the act the commission has power to bring other industries in when, in its judgment, it is practicable to do so. The lumber industry, generally, does not come within the jurisdiction of the act; that is, the cutting of the logs in the woods. But the sawmills and planing mills do, because it is considered their operations are more or less continuous. The regulations laid down state that if they operate seven out of twelve months they come within the jurisdiction of the act. I believe the formula which has been laid down is seven months out of the twelve.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is that the arbitrary decision of the commission, or was the industry consulted? Has the commission obtained the approval of the operators? It certainly was understood that they would not come under the act, and this means an arbitrary discrimination between one operation and another. A man might be working right alongside another man, and it is creating an adverse feeling against the administration of the act.

Mr. MITCHELL: This decision was taken after consultation with employees and employers in the industry. The cure is to take them all in. Speaking personally, I would say that if they all came in, it would be to the advantage of the industry, and of the employees concerned. These decisions are not made until after consultation with the industry.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): A great many of these workmen are transients. Quite a number are men who operate farms, and who go into the lumber woods for only a few months in the fall and winter. Many of them cut their own lumber off their own property or their own woodlots. It is making a discrimination between one operator and another. I doubt very much whether the lumbermen's association in the maritime provinces have given their approval to this. The minister states that they have been consulted, and that they have given their consent or approval. However, that is not the information I have, up to now.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do I understand that if the section carries it will include the acceptance of section 11A? What is the underlying reason for this change in connection with the administration of the department? I see nothing in the original act dealing with this matter. I presume this is in addition to section 11, where the cost of administration is set out. I would understand that this is just a matter of facilitating the work of the department.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is to save the money of the applicants. The same type of section appears in the Excise Act, where affidavits can be taken.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is within the scope of the work of the department?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Contributions for periods other than weeks.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the reason for this amendment?

Mr. MITCHELL: The present section permits the commission to prescribe contribution rates for periods greater than a week, but for administrative convenience it is desired to have the power to prescribe contribution rates for periods less than a week, the rates to be substantially equivalent to those set out in the first schedule to the act. By this means the difficulty of dealing with fractions of cents will be to a large measure obviated. This will be of assistance in publishing, for the use of employers, contribution tables which will show clearly the proper amounts of contributions and deductions and will greatly assist the employer in his bookkeeping records.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is a matter of administration. Has it been asked for by employers?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does this meet the wishes of employees?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Person in control of employees an employer.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the explanation of this?

Mr. MITCHELL: The idea behind this is that the main contractor is responsible for the subcontractors. He is responsible for contributions by employers under the act. For instance, in the building trades we find main contractors and a number of subcontractors. Also in factory work we would find a main contractor and a number of subcontractors. This makes the main contractor responsible for the contribution.

Mr. GRAYDON: Prior to this, I suppose a subcontractor might, to use a vulgar expression, go broke, without a contribution having been made. In those circumstances a workman would find himself unable to collect, or at least in a position where the contribution would not be paid. No one having made the contribution, of course, he would not be entitled to any benefits. This, then, places the responsibility upon the main contractor as well as the subcontractor, I take it, because they are both concerned with the transaction.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Does it apply to other than a contractor and subcontractor? It seems to me the wording is much broader than that, and I wondered to what other cases it might apply. If it applies only to contractors and subcontractors, why were not those words used, instead of the language in the section?

Mr. MITCHELL: It would also take in a branch of a chain store, for instance, or one of a chain of banks, or anything like that. It makes the main organization responsible for the contribution.

Mr. GRAYDON: That was not a very happy illustration, because the headquarters of a chain of stores is always responsible. I fancy the minister really had in mind a sort of combination of independent stores joined together in some way. Perhaps one of these independent stores might not be able to make the contribution, and now the liability is assessed also against the main organization.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like some further explanation from the minister as to how this act applies to the transportation of lumber by motor truck. Would that come under this or some other section? As I said a few moments ago, I understand the scope of the act has been enlarged, so that it now applies to a lumber operator who has trucks of his own, but that it does not apply to an independent truckman, say an individual with one or two trucks, though they are doing the same class of work and each is in competition with the other.

Mr. MITCHELL: From the bush to the mill the act does not apply, but it does apply from the mill to the railway.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would it apply to every truck that hauls lumber, or would there be any differentiation between a truck operated by an individual and a truck operated by a lumberman?

Mr. MITCHELL: If the truck is operated by the owner, it does not apply. If the truck is operated by employees, it does apply.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Insurance officer may declare claimant disqualified from benefit.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the minister explain the effect of this amendment, and have the regulations under which the commission may disqualify a person from benefits been drawn up and published? I think this is giving too much power to the commission, or to an officer pursuant to the regulations of the commission,. unless there are general safeguards through appeals from such rulings.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are appeals to the referees.

Mr. MARTIN: The procedure covered by the proposed amendment is based pretty much upon the English practice. The proviso to the present section 56 definitely limits the power of an insurance officer to disallow a claim for benefit or to disqualify a claimant. This results in a rather cumbersome and slow procedure, and the amendment proposed is designed to give the commission power by regulation to extend the power of the insurance officer to disallow and disqualify. This disallowance or disqualification by the insurance officer will be subject to the provisions of section 57 of the act, which gives the claimant the right of appeal to a court of referees. The amendment does not therefore cut down the right of the claimant but should expedite the adjudication of his claim. If the circumstances so require, the insurance officer may disallow the claim or disqualify the claimant, notifying him at once as to his right of appeal. There are many cases where it is amply evident to the insurance officer that the claimant is not qualified, as for example where his state of health makes it evident that he is not capable of taking employment. Under the present provisions the insurance officer may not disqualify a claimant under such circumstances, though it may be perfectly plain that the claim will without doubt be disallowed by the court of referees.

The suggested amendment would assist the claimant in knowing at the earliest date possible, and not fooling him, as sometimes happens, what disposition is to be made of his claim, and if he wishes he may appeal that decision to the court of referees. The situation now is that an applicant because the officer has no power to deal with the matter, may be led to believe that he may qualify, when in many instances it is obvious that he cannot. From the point of view my hon. friend has suggested, however, there is the right of appeal; the man is notified of that right, and his appeal goes to the referees.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am sorry we have not this act before us in printed form, so that we might compare it with these amendments. We are placed at a disadvantage in trying to give careful consideration to these sections. I think the parliamentary assistant to the minister will understand that any regulations which disqualify a beneficiary from insurance put that much more burden of proof on the individual, who is not accustomed to going through all this procedure in order to find out his position. He has made contributions and he feels that he is entitled to benefits if he becomes unemployed. My only concern is that this amendment shall not increase the number of hurdles the claimant has to surmount before he can get his insurance.

Mr. MARTIN: This really simplifies it. I realize that my hon. friend is handicapped in this matter, and I should have provided him with full information, but the fact is that this really helps the man he has in mind. Formerly he might be led to believe that he would qualify, and he might have to wait a long time before ascertaining the true position. Now he is told by an officer, and he does not lose any of his rights at all. I think my hon. friend may feel that this is intended to simplify and help rather than hinder.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Insurability decided by commission.

Mr. GRAYDON: Could the minister give us some information as to why this addition is being made. It reads:

> If any question arises as to whether a person was or was not employed in an accepted employment, that question shall be decided by the commission under the provisions of section forty-six of this act.

Mr. MITCHELL: Under the original act there was some doubt as to the coverage. The commission is to have exclusive jurisdiction over coverage.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there an appeal from the commission?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, to the board of referees.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Penalty for contravention or non-compliance.

Mr. GRAYDON: Could we have some explanation of this section?

Mr. MARTIN: As my hon. friend knows, under the criminal code, an information must be laid with regard to each charge. An employer may be guilty—I have one case—of eighty minor offences in connection with the operation of the law, and that would require the serving of eighty separate processes. This particular amendment will permit the consolidation into one.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Additional investigations.

Mr. GREEN: Is this the section which will give the governor in council power to include the British Columbia logging industry?

Mr. MITCHELL: There are some words being deleted from the first section. These words were a mistake in the drafting of the original legislation. If my hon. friend wishes to talk about logging under this section, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. GREEN: Yesterday as reported on page 4936 of Hansard, I asked the parliamentary assistant whether or not the logging industry in British Columbia was to be placed under the act, and he replied that there would be a section in the bill which would give the governor in council the power to include this industry.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is the section.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister make a statement about that?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can only say that the matter is under investigation by the commission, in consultation with the interested parties. No decision has been arrived at by the commission with respect to the inclusion of the logging industry in British Columbia. The view taken by the commission is that as soon as it becomes administratively possible to bring them within the provisions of the act, it will be done.

Mr. GREEN: The parliamentary assistant said:

> An interim report—it is more than an interim report, but that is the best way to describe it—has been received. Just as soon as it becomes administratively possible they will be included.

Was the parliamentary assistant correct?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is absolutely correct.

Mr. GREEN: They are to be included?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. MacINNIS: Has any employment which was excepted from the provisions of the act in 1940 since been taken in under the act?

Mr. MITCHELL: No excepted employments have been included.

Mr. GRAYDON: I can recall that when the act was being considered in 1940 many interesting suggestions were made to the government in connection with excepted employments, and the reply was that consideration would be given by the commission to their inclusion. If my memory is correct, when that legislation was before the committee the commission was given power to review certain excepted employments and I believe the list of excepted employments was fairly lengthy. I am surprised to hear that none of these excepted employments has been included. I am inclined to think that on that occasion the bill went through the committee perhaps more quickly because an undertaking was given—perhaps it was not expressed, but it came very close to being implied—that some of these excepted employments would be included later on. It is quite true that the government may say that this is a question entirely for the commission, but I am still surprised to learn that none of these employments has been included. Can the minister tell us how many have been reviewed by the commission?

Mr. MITCHELL: Under the original act the commission had no power to include them, although they had power to review.

Mr. GRAYDON: Somebody had the power.

Mr. MITCHELL: They did not. That is the strange thing. This amendment is to give the commission, not only the power to review and investigate, but to extend the coverage of the act.

Mr. GRAYDON: It may be that the commission did not have power to include them, but they did have power to review and recommend. I should like to know how many have been reviewed by the commission and how many have been recommended for inclusion in the act.

Mr. MITCHELL: They may have investigated some, but since I have been minister they have not recommended any to me. Subsection 2 gives the commission power to extend the coverage of the act to those employments of which my hon. friend speaks.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words, this amendment actually gives the governor in council legislative power with respect to this particular matter, but of course under the War Measures Act the governor in council could do it anyway.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Travelling expenses.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is to provide for the travelling expenses of the local committees. At the present time the act merely provides for the payment of the expenses of the national committee.

Section agreed to.

On secton 15—Regulations.

Mr. GRAYDON: These amendments are rather important from the point of view of the employee and the employer, and I wonder if the minister could give an explanation of the change in these regulations.

Mr. MARTIN: The explanatory note is fairly complete, but I can add to it. The act does not at present provide for a means of determining the contribution payable where a worker is paid on a basis other than straight salary, wages or commission. For example, where an employer is paying wages and board and room there is no method of determining the contribution payable. This will authorize a method of determining the amount payable under those circumstances.

Mr. GRAYDON: You determine a certain amount for board and room?

Mr. MARTIN: That is it.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Special order may be varied or revoked.

Mr. MITCHELL: Under the act the commission has power to make orders or give directions, but has no power to revoke them. This gives them the necessary power.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Annual report by commission.

Mr. MITCHELL: This extends for one further month the time in which the annual report may be made. The financial year ends in March.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this in line with general governmental policy with regard to making annual reports?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Failure to keep records or make returns an offence.

Mr. MITCHELL: This section is to take care of the delinquent employer who does not keep proper books. It gives the commission power to go in and institute a bookkeeping system so that the employer may comply with the act.

Mr. GRAYDON: Section 97 of the 1940 act provides:

> The commission may require any person to make written returns of information deemed by the commission to be necessary for the purposes of this act.

Then it goes on to provide penalties for failure to comply. Has the commission found in its administration of the act that this power is required?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. They have found that some employers are not keeping timesheets and proper books. This section is taken from the Excise Act and gives the commission power to see that the necessary books and records are kept to comply with the law.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that legislators will have some large degree of sympathy with people in business to-day. Most of us who have friends in business realize that a large part of their time to-day is taken up with keeping records for the government, and this, I suppose, is just an extension of the privilege, if I may call it so, accorded to employers generally to take some further share in carrying the burdens of the country. There are a great many people, particularly working people, who rightly or wrongly regard the unemployment insurance contribution as an extra tax, and in a sense I suppose that is true. If the minister, who has been fairly close to labour, talks to the average working man, he will know that is how he feels. He sees deductions from his pay envelope for instalments on victory bonds, war saving certificates, income tax, unemployment insurance and perhaps other deductions, and he lumps them all together and says: Look here, I am getting less than I did before. That brings to my mind the situation from the point of view of the employer, who has to keep all these books and records and accounts. It seems obvious that more attention will have to be paid in our educational system to the study of bookkeeping because, if a man does not know how to keep a set of books—I confess that is one of my own weaknesses—he is in danger to-day not only of losing his business but of being consigned to gaol. I point that out as one of the risks people in business are running to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I might answer in the same vein, once the platform adopted by my hon. friend's friends at Winnipeg is implemented there will be a great deal more bookkeeping to do. I agree in a way with what my hon. friend says. There are three great fears in the life of the average working man and working woman—the fear of destitution in old age, the fear of destitution through sickness, and the fear of destitution through unemployment.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why confine it to the working man?

Mr. GRAYDON: And the fear of being appointed to the senate!

Mr. MITCHELL: Perhaps when the Minister of Finance is through with us we shall all be in the same category. It is a question of organization to provide protection against these three great fears of the working man. I am a comparatively young man and I hope to live to see the day when this will be accomplished. Of course, it implies bookkeeping. This amendment is to regularize the bookkeeping of the employer. What my hon. friend says about the employer is true so long as he is on the paying end, but he does not complain when he is on the receiving end. Proper records must be kept to ensure that the benefits are due in conformity with the law.

Mr. ISNOR: I am not quite sure what the minister meant by saying it is just a question of organization. The unemployment insurance machinery must be pretty well set up to-day. The system is fairly simple. The employee has a check against the employer, and the commission has a check against the books in which the stamps are placed. What further books is it necessary for an employer to keep? If the minister has any particular type of book in mind or a certain form to be looked after by the employer, I wish he would outline it. But I would point out that the book in which the stamps are pasted is a check in itself. The employer is obliged to put the employee's book before the employee at least once a month. There you have a check by the employee against the employer. The employee can see the value of the stamps that are going in his book, and that also furnishes a check for the unemployment insurance commission on the employer. In view of that, I am wondering if there is any need of putting a further burden on the employer by compelling him to keep another set of books.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend who is an employer keeps, I take it, fairly accurate books, but many other employers do not. Some carry their office records in their inside pocket.

Mr. ISNOR: You still have your own check.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend says that the book is a check. That is not a check. Our inspectors come along and find that an employee has left a certain employer, gone to another employer and taken his book with him. We want a record of how long he worked for his previous employer and whether he made the necessary contributions to the fund.

Mr. ISNOR: It is absolutely necessary for the employer to keep a correct record of his employment of every individual, because it is necessary for him to make a return to the income tax office.

Mr. EDWARDS: This section states:

> The commission may require any person to keep such books, records and accounts as the commission may direct and may require any person to make written returns of information. . . .

To whom?

Mr. MITCHELL: To the commission.

Mr. EDWARDS: If it is rendered only to the commission, how about the employee? I had a communication only two or three weeks ago from the father of an employee who, as I recall it, was unable to obtain from the employer how much or on what basis the deduction was made from the employee's pay envelope at the end of each fortnight, in this connection, and upon requesting the information he was told by the employer that he did not have the time to be bothered. That puts this employee in an embarrassing position. Presumably, if she did not care to carry on without getting the information which every honest employer should have been ready, able and willing to have given, she could just quit. It seems to me that no employee should be put in that position. If the employer is under this act authorized and required to make deductions, there should be some obligation on the part of the employer to provide that employee with a statement if necessary, or make his books available to the employees, so that he or she will know as a matter of right how much has been deducted from the pay envelope or cheque, and the basis of it. It is for that reason I think the section might very well be amplified so as to provide that the employee will be entitled to receive that information at reasonable times—once every month or two months, or as the period of employment may be. I for one am sorry the section is not amplified in that way. I do not think any employee should be put in the invidious position of having to go and beg to obtain information which ought to be his or hers as a matter of right.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was going to give an extemporaneous reply in a couple of words to my hon. friend, but perhaps I had better read the section of the regulation dealing with the question raised:

22. (1) Every employer shall from time to time upon request give each insured person in his employ an opportunity of inspecting his insurance book or contribution record as long as it is in the custody of the employer, but no insured person shall be entitled to inspect his insurance book or contribution record more than twice in any month, nor except at such reasonable times, either within or before or after the insured person's working hours, as may be fixed by his employer for the purpose.

That answers, I think, my hon. friend's question.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the penalty?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am coming to that:

(2) Every employer who fails to give any insured person in his employ such an opportunity of inspecting his insurance book or contribution record shall be guilty of a contravention of these regulations.

I will get the penalty looked up for my hon. friend.

Mr. MacINNIS: What I am going to say now is prompted by a remark made by the leader of the opposition. He said that a contribution under the Unemployment Insurance Act is looked upon by many workers as another tax. Probably that is so, but I think anybody who has anything to do with this matter should avoid giving a worker the impression that he is paying another tax. As a matter of fact, he is paying insurance in the same way as he would pay fire insurance on his house, insurance on his automobile, sickness insurance, or any other insurance he takes out. It should be pointed out to him, too, that every cent which goes into the insurance —his contribution, the employer's contribution and the government's contribution—goes in benefits to the insured.

The worker will get, generally speaking, whatever impression of this act that people from the sources from which he gets his information are going to give him, and it is of the utmost importance that he should have a proper understanding of the social value of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

When I returned to Vancouver following the session of 1940 I found many members of trades unions were objecting to the act. I was asked on several occasions to meet with the unions and go over the provisions of the act, with them, and in every case after I had done that there was general satisfaction with the act. I believe that all hon. members—and I am not saying that the leader of the opposition is not doing this—should take every opportunity of explaining the act in its proper aspect to those whom it concerns.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Amendment of first schedule.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have been advised by the Department of Justice that we have not the power under the act to insure employees of the British government and other governments in Canada. My hon. friend probably knows that they run into some thousands. This gives the power to the British and other governments to place within the jurisdiction of the act their employees in the dominion. I have in mind more particularly what I think is called the United Kingdom inspection board, which has over 10,000 employees.

Section agreed to.

Section 20 agreed to.

On section 21—Part II of first schedule, substituted paragraph (1).

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister be good enough to explain exactly what is meant by this section? In particular, does it, as the information on the right-hand side of the page would seem to indicate, mean that the civil service of Canada is now to come under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. MITCHELL: No; this section provides that public utilities shall come within the provisions of the act. Let me give an example: In the city of Winnipeg, where there is a private power company and a publicly owned power company, the private power company comes within the provisions of the act and the public company does not. This regularizes it; it places all public utilities within the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, with the exception, which still exists, of provincial and municipal employees, such as—these come to my mind at the moment—employees of water works, sewerage works and that sort of thing.

Mr. JACKMAN: The question comes up then as to what is a public utility. Would the minister throw some light on the situation in the city of Toronto, for instance, where there is a municipally-owned hydro electric system? Would the employees of that system now come under the Unemployment Insurance Act? And what of the employees of the hydro electric system, which is the supplier of wholesale power to the various municipalities; do those employees now come under the Unemployment Insurance Act? Furthermore, has the Department of Labour received an opinion from the Department of Justice as to whether it has the constitutional right to tax them?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the best definition occurs in the section itself, on page 8 of the bill:

(i) "public utility" includes any gas, electric, heat, light, or power works, telephone lines, transportation system, and works for the transmission of gas or electrical power or energy and such other works, lines or systems as may be declared by special order of the commission to be public utilities for the purposes of this paragraph.

(ii) employment in connection with a public utility includes the employment of all employees whose employment is considered by the commission to be reasonably necessary or incidental to the operation thereof.

So that it places the power within the jurisdiction of the commission, as I read it from that amendment, to decide whether the undertakings to which my hon. friend has referred come within the jurisdiction of the act.

Mr. JACKMAN: What I am asking for is an interpretation of the words, which, if I may suggest, I can also read for myself. I cannot interpret them, however, unless I know exactly what is in the minister's mind. All that the minister has said to me is that the committee which will have to interpret it will be able to interpret it as it likes. But there are other matters to be considered: for example, the question whether there is the constitutional power to do it. I do not understand this small paragraph under section 21 in the explanatory notes:

(i) In the public service of Canada under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Subparagraph (i), according to the explanatory notes, making employment in the public service of Canada under the provisions of the Civil Service Act an excepted employment, is repealed and is not reenacted. It might be taken from that that the civil service will now come under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I think we should have something more definite than that.

Mr. MITCHELL: The important part of the act is on the other side.

Mr. JACKMAN: The left-hand side?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is the enacting side. The other is explanatory.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. STIRLING: It includes the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MARTIN: That should not be underlined. It is obviously a mistake.

Mr. STIRLING: That is what it says here. Reading from subsection 1, and deleting the proviso "other than" we have:

Employment . . . in the public service of Canada . . . upon certification satisfactory to the commission that the employment is . . .

And so on.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the old act.

Mr. STIRLING: It is the new act.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; the new act is on page 8.

Mr. STIRLING: But I am reading from page 8, section 21, referring to subsection 1. I was leaving out the words beginning "other than," which are a proviso. With that omission it reads:

Employment . . . in the public service . . . upon certification satisfactory to the commission.

Mr. MITCHELL: If the hon. member wants an interpretation, I will give it as it is drafted in my notes, and I will stay with that. I do not care about that; I am staying with my notes.

Mr. HAZEN: We have to get back to paragraph 2 of the first schedule and see what it says, and then read from there down. That may explain it.

Mr. MacINNIS: The words, "in the public service of Canada under the provisions of the Civil Service Act," have been repealed or deleted—

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: —and the following is substituted:

Employment other than employment in connection with a public utility, in the public service of Canada or of a province or by a municipal authority, upon certification satisfactory to the commission that the employment is, having regard to the normal practice of the employment, permanent in character.

In paragraph (i), on the right-hand page, under section 21, the Civil Service Act is mentioned, but "in the public service of Canada" is included.

Mr. HAZEN: I have here schedule 1, part II and that is headed "excepted employments" and it gives a list of such employments. You get down to paragraph (l) and the amendment is to paragraph (l).

Mr. MITCHELL: Exactly.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the civil service of Canada within this?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. STIRLING: It says it is here.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister did not say whether or not an opinion of the Department of Justice had been obtained.

Mr. MITCHELL: You need not take an opinion of the Department of Justice; I am telling you it is not.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member for Yale has not the act before him. I will put this on the record. Look at page 39 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, a copy of which I will see that he gets. Under part II there are certain excepted employments, and when it comes to paragraph (l) among the excepted employments you find the words "in the public service of Canada". The reason for the difficulty is that the preceding excepted employments are not listed in the explanatory notes. That causes confusion.

Section agreed to.

On section 22—Proviso.

Mr. KINLEY: This is an important section.

Mr. MITCHELL: This raises the maximum from $2,000 to $2,400.

Mr. KINLEY: How do you arrive at the figure?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is the recommendation of the advisory committee. I gave a long explanation when the resolution was before the house. If my hon. friend wishes me to repeat it I will.

Mr. KINLEY: Does the minister think it covers the conditions? I do not think it does.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am under the impression that this increase from $2,000 to $2,400 is not enough. I say that from conversations I have had with workers. They would like to have the amount raised above $2,400. Has the minister sought the opinion of the workers engaged in the industries and ascertained that this is generally satisfactory?

Mr. MITCHELL: I expressed the same opinion as my hon. friend does when the question was in the resolution stage. After public hearings by the advisory committee, composed of employers and employees—and I think it may be fairly stated that those who gave evidence before that committee were about as good a cross-section of organized employers and employees as one could find in the dominion—it was agreed by the committee that the ceiling should be raised from $2,000 to $2,400. This, of course, covers only what one might call the white-collar class. There is no ceiling on the weekly-paid employees and piece-paid employees. While at some later date it may be necessary to raise the ceiling to $3,000, my hon. friend can rest assured that if a recommendation in those terms should come from the committee, it would certainly receive the favourable consideration of the government.

Mr. KINLEY: That is the point. The ceiling for labour is not $2,400. It is for what the minister calls the white-collar class. Why should there be that difference?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is easily explained. Under war conditions, with overtime and cost of living bonus, the original calculations have been more or less thrown out of balance, and unless an amendment of this kind is made it is fair to assume that there will be thousands of workers who, when the act was originally passed, were under its jurisdiction, who would be forced out of its provisions. An amendment of this kind is therefore necessary. It may be in the course of the next year we may have to fall in line with the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver East. We cannot tell. But I think that it is absolutely necessary, that it is in the best interests of the working people themselves and also that it is good government policy that as many as possible should be brought within the jurisdiction of this legislation. Where we have what might be described as a wage structure on the upgrade, every effort should be made not only to maintain but possibly to increase the coverage, so that when war is concluded there will be at least one cushion to take care of any possible dislocation which may take place in the industrial or commercial set-up of our country.

Mr. KINLEY: The minister has said he thinks as many as possible should be brought under the coverage of the act. I quite agree, but I have two men working in my plant, one holding a clerical position and the other running a machine. The man who runs the machine at an hourly rate does not come under any ceiling. The man who works in the clerical position has a ceiling of $2,400. I do not see why there should be that difference. They should all come under it, and the coverage should be on all employees. Then, as the minister has said, that coverage should be as large as possible.

Mr. MacINNIS: My memory is that in 1940 when we were discussing the act I had communications from the typographical unions in Vancouver and Victoria stating that they wanted the maximum to be declared at $2,500. I believe the Victoria communication set the figure at $3,000. The higher paid workers in the typographical union have been excluded, because of the ceiling.

Mr. MITCHELL: This was the most contentious point which came before the committee. After considerable discussion among the parties this was the figure agreed upon. When the workers and employers are in agreement, as they were in this instance, I am always loath to go counter to their advice. If my memory serves me correctly, I received representations stating that the maximum should be $4,800 a year, and I am inclined to agree with that. I do not know why I should not be included within the provisions of the act, or why all other hon. members should not —looking forward to the next general election. But, be that as it may, I followed out what I thought was sound advice given to me by this committee, after mature consideration of all the factors involved in the briefs submitted by employee and employer organizations.

Mr. KINLEY: There is only one good reason I can see why a clerk, for instance, should have a ceiling, namely, that perhaps he has better continuity of employment than the man in the workshop. But there are many people in Canada employed in big organizations, such as banks, who never want to come under it at all. They are what might be described as white-collar men, and they are getting clear. It seems to me that this is leaving out a class. People who say they have no hazards do not want to come in at all. One pays insurance, and hopes he will never benefit from it. That is the state of mind in which insurance is paid. If interests are to be pooled, then people who do not have hazards should be pooled with those who do have hazards, because the people who have the hazards are necessary to the community. I cannot understand this difference, and I do not think it should be there.

Mr. REID: What classes have been taken in under the unemployment insurance scheme since the measure passed the house? Have any classes been taken in which were exempt at the time the bill was passed?

Mr. MITCHELL: No, none.

Section agreed to.

Sections 23 and 24 agreed to.

On section 25—Daily rate.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask two questions, the first of which has reference to line 7 in the tables on page 10 of the bill. That line reads, "earning $26 or more in a week." I understand that in the table as it stood before the amendment was proposed it read, "earning $26, but less than $38.50 per week." I believe $38.50 represents the former $2,000 ceiling.

Mr. MARTIN: The ceiling has been raised.

Mr. KNOWLES: Since the ceiling has been raised, why is it not still necessary to give that ceiling in this line, in terms of so much per week? Line 7 as it now reads implies that there is no ceiling. It might suit our purposes fine, but I believe it does not leave the proper impression.

Mr. MARTIN: The ceiling is provided for in section 22 of the act for a certain definite classification.

Mr. KNOWLES: The previous ceiling of $2,000 was then provided in the act. Yet it was thought necessary to interpret that ceiling in line 7 as $38.50 a week.

Mr. MARTIN: There is no ceiling in respect of the hourly rate.

Mr. ISNOR: Did it state that?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes; that was stated in the act. As a matter of fact, $38.50 was $2,002 a year.

Mr. MARTIN: It cannot very well be put in when there is no ceiling.

Mr. KNOWLES: But there is a ceiling of $2,400.

Mr. MARTIN: For one group; and they are covered in section 22.

Mr. KNOWLES: But previously it read "$26, but less than $38.50 in a week."

Mr. MITCHELL: Then $38.50 was the ceiling.

Mr. KNOWLES: The ceiling is now $2,400.

Mr. MARTIN: That is for certain groups. For hourly labour groups there was no ceiling. For the so-called white-collar class there is a ceiling of $2,400. Perhaps the hon. member has not borne in mind those two classifications.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does the Unemployment Insurance Act differentiate between the white-collar class and others?

Mr. MITCHELL: No; possibly I should not have used that expression.

Mr. MacINNIS: Why does the minister say there is a white-collar class?

Mr. MARTIN: One is on salary and the other is on piecework or on a mileage basis. In line 7, "earning $26 or more in a week", sets out the ceiling. That includes the man earning $2,400 for assessment, as well as the hourly or mileage worker, or the piecework rate worker, who at present has no ceiling. That is, line 7 is from that point up. It is from $26 up.

Mr. KINLEY: It means that the white-collar man who earns over $2,400 does not come under it?

Mr. MARTIN: Correct, provided he is on salary.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was consideration given to establishing another bracket in this list? As it now stands, we find spreads within these brackets of $3, $4, $5 or $6 a week. Then there is a spread of $20 a week, paying the same insurance and, if unemployed, drawing the same benefits. I wondered if consideration had been given to creating a new bracket in which there would be a slightly higher rate of contribution and a corresponding higher rate of benefit.

Mr. MITCHELL: Consideration was given to that, but we did not want to upset the actuarial status of the act. We were advised by our actuaries against creating another class, and it was not undertaken, but we did give consideration to it.

Sections 26 to 28 inclusive agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. MARTIN: Before that is done, I want to make one correction. Yesterday the senior hon. member for Halifax asked me if the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada had registered an objection, and in error I stated that they had not. I now wish to correct that statement. The Retail Merchants' Association of Canada did object because of the effect on their members; they argued that workers in retail trade receiving over $2,000 should not have to assist in insuring workers in war industries unless all exceptions were abolished.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe there were a few questions asked yesterday which the parliamentary assistant said he would undertake to answer to-day. One was: what is the ceiling in Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand; and the other was: which of the associations that put in briefs were for and which were against the extension of the ceiling from $2,000 to $2,400? Would the minister be good enough to give that information to the committee now?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. In Britain there is no ceiling for manual workers; for non-manual workers the ceiling is £420 a year. In New Zealand unemployment benefit is part of the social security scheme which covers all persons sixteen years and over, regardless of earnings or income. It is, of course, not an insurance scheme, and the payment of benefit is subject to a means test. In Australia, unemployment insurance in Queensland covers the majority of employees in organized industry, and there is no wage ceiling. There is no national unemployment insurance scheme in Australia as yet. What was the other question?

Mr. JACKMAN: Which of the various organizations putting in briefs were for and which were against the extension of the ceiling?

Mr. MARTIN: In favour of no limit there was the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada—

Mr. JACKMAN: You mean even above the $2,400?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Then are there to be three categories, those who would hold to the $2,000, those who would go to $2,400 and those for whom the sky would be the limit?

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps the hon. member would let me complete my reply to the question.

Mr. JACKMAN: I just want to know what I have to bear in mind when listening to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN: The Trades and Labour Congress, Canadian Congress of Labour, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees argued for no limit. Those arguing for or proposing a higher limit were: the Confederation of Catholic Workers, $2,500; the Windsor chamber of commerce, $3,000 with insurability for earnings between $2,500 and $3,000 being optional; the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, $3,600. The latter, however, would regard complete abolition of the ceiling as acceptable. Then the following were opposed, because of the effect they alleged on their members: the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the Order of Railroad Conductors; the Retail Merchants' Association, which I mentioned a moment ago. The following objected because of the fundamental nature of the change: Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Canadian Life Insurance Officers' Association, Canadian Bankers' Association, Dominion Mortgage and Investments' Association, Canadian Chamber of Commerce, Calgary board of trade and the Hamilton chamber of commerce. These associations considered a slight increase in the ceiling would be permissible to meet the war situation, on the understanding that the $2,000 limit would be restored after the war. In this connection the Canadian Life Insurance Officers' Association suggested a temporary ceiling of $2,200. The Toronto board of trade and the Montreal board of trade made recommendations which dealt only with the war situation, but which implied opposition to permanent raising of the ceiling. I think that completely answers the question which my hon. friend put to me yesterday and which I said I would answer to-day.

Mr. ISNOR: In other words, there were a great many more objecting to a change than were in favour of it.

Mr. MARTIN: No, there were not.

Mr. KINLEY: I think that bears out my suggestion about the reason for the ceiling on the office workers.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 135, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1943, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Power to issue securities for capital expenditures.

Mr. JACKMAN: I recall that in the railway committee it was stated that some twelve or thirteen million dollars was set aside for deferred maintenance, an item which would not be allowed to any private company but which was set up by the Canadian National because it made no difference to their statement, inasmuch as they were not subject to taxation. What would become of that money, and why would it not be available to the company to finance these capital expenditures, instead of asking the government for authority to issue $6,000,000 odd in securities?

Mr. ILSLEY: The deferred maintenance reserve is for deferred maintenance rather than for capital additions and betterments. I may add that the $17,000,000 is available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization, but nothing is taken from the deferred maintenance reserve, because the purpose of this expenditure is not maintenance.

Mr. JACKMAN: I appreciate that the purpose is capital, but inasmuch as the railway company must lean on the government for all of its capital expenditures, nevertheless there is this amount for deferred maintenance which is an extraordinary amount and one not allowed to private companies. I am suggesting that unless it is absolutely necessary for its working capital account—and I do not think that it is because it has ample working capital—it is hard to understand why this money is being made available to the railway company for its capital expenditure instead of borrowing more through the government authorization.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has not answered the hon. member's question.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be an exact repetition I gave to the previous question. The amount carried to deferred maintenance reserve is for deferred maintenance, not for capital additions and betterments. This expenditure the house is being asked to authorize is for capital additions and betterments. It is proper to take money out of reserves for depreciation and discount amortization, but not proper to take it out of reserve for maintenance.

WAR EXPENDITURES

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE STANDS

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton) presented the first report of the special committee on war expenditures, as follows:

Your committee recommends that it be empowered:

1. To sit while the house is sitting and notwithstanding any adjournment of the house, and to adjourn from place to place.

2. To determine the manner and extent to which the evidence, proceedings and reports shall be printed or typed, and that where the same are ordered to be printed there be printed 500 copies in English and 200 copies in French, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

3. To appoint subcommittees, to fix the quorum of any such subcommittee, and to refer to such subcommittee any of the matters referred to the committee; any subcommittee so appointed to have power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses under oath or otherwise, to sit while the house is sitting and notwithstanding any adjournment of the house, to adjourn from place to place, and to report from time to time to the committee.

4. To employ such secretarial, reportorial, clerical and other assistance as it may deem necessary.

5. In cases where considerations of national security preclude the publishing of certain recommendations and of the arguments upon which they are based, to address a memorandum to the Prime Minister for the consideration of the war cabinet, provided that the committee shall, whenever it has exercised such powers, report the fact as soon as possible to the house.

Your committee further recommends that during any adjournment of the house, its reports shall be deemed to have been tabled when filed with the clerk of the house and seven days have elapsed after the date of such filing.

Your committee further recommends that six members constitute a quorum, and that standing order 65 (3) be suspended in relation thereto.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. CLEAVER moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Halton, who presented the report and now has moved concurrence in it, was good enough to speak to me this morning privately with request to the facilitation of the passing of this motion. At that time I did not know that there would be quite such a comprehensive report of the committee, and in view of the fact that it deals with a number of subjects, and that the committee has asked leave to continue to sit while the house is sitting and also in the adjournment, I would ask that the motion stand over in the usual way, so that the notice which is ordinarily required can be given.

Motion stands.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

TABLING OF SUPPLEMENTARY AGREEMENT CONCLUDED IN 1928-29

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

OUTSTANDING ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the hon. leader of the opposition asked for a statement on the number of orders outstanding. The orders passed this session number 527, and the returns tabled 475. The returns outstanding are 52. I now table a specific list of the outstanding returns to orders.

Mr. GRAYDON: May we expect the rest to be tabled before the end of the session?

Mr. McLARTY: There is certainly no intention to hold back any information. Every possible effort is being made to see that as many as possible of the returns are tabled before the house adjourns.

5. If not, why not?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. Mr. H. C. Singer, formerly a major in the Canadian Army, who had been dismissed from His Majesty's service by a sentence of general court-martial held in England and of which Brigadier C. B. Topp was president, in a letter dated July 11, 1942, from Lethbridge, Alberta, to district officer commanding, military district No. 11, Victoria, B.C., and to the judge advocate general, Ottawa, Ontario, (information), enclosed what said letter described as "a charge sheet and particulars against Brigadier C. B. Topp". The letter went on to state that "they will furnish a basis for investigation or court of inquiry; the matter of which is left in your hands". The judge advocate general considered that there was no foundation, either in law or in fact, for the so-called charges made by Mr. Singer. The appropriate military authorities took no action against Brigadier Topp.

3. The movement of Alberta eggs to British Columbia would result directly from orders from British Columbia buyers to Alberta shippers. The government exercises no jurisdiction.

SALE OF WHEAT TO CANADIAN MILLS

Mr. PERLEY:

How much wheat has the wheat board sold to the mills in Canada since 1st September, 1942, to date, and at what price per bushel for No. 1 northern basis Fort William?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The Canadian mills buy the great bulk of their wheat requirements on the Winnipeg grain exchange. The Canadian wheat board is one of the sellers on that market and makes its sales at the ruling market prices. Therefore, it is quite impossible for the board to separate its sales to mills from sales made to other buyers in the futures market. Likewise, the mills buying in the futures market could not separate purchases from the board and purchases from other sellers.

PURCHASE OF GOLD FROM PRODUCERS

Mr. MacINNIS:

What amount of gold, in ounces, was purchased by the government from the producers in each year, 1932 to 1942?

SELECTIVE SERVICE—OPEN PERMIT SYSTEM

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East):

1. When was the open permit system first adopted under the national selective service regulations, and why?

2. How many of such open permits have been issued since the system was first put into effect?

3. Is a record kept of each open permit when issued and when returned?

4. If so, how many of such permits have been returned to date?

5. What steps have been taken to check up on those to whom open permits have been issued and which have not been returned?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. The introduction of open permits came into being in September, 1942, when all persons had to have permits to secure employment. The open permit idea was largely due to the volume of people going to offices to obtain permits, in some offices particularly. Other offices which had sufficient staff would not issue so many open permits.

2. No figures available, since information is not kept separately from information as to ordinary permits. They are not widely used at present and policy is to keep number down.

3. The usual record of all permits is kept.

4. Information is not kept separately from information as to ordinary permits.

5. Usually the permits are issued for a certain duration of time only and automatically are cancelled at the end of that time, very often good for only seven days.

2. If so, how many in each category?

3. Have any men been laid off in war industries during the same period? If so, how many?

4. Were these men transferred to shipyards or other war industries?

5. If not, why were they not so placed?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes.

2. Detailed information not available.

3. No general lay-offs.

4. All available men have been referred to shipyard and war industries.

5. Not applicable.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CENSORSHIP REGULATIONS OR INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of all censorship orders, regulations or instructions issued under government authority since the outbreak of war.

Mr. LaFLECHE: For security reasons, and because our censorship works with censorships of other countries, while I should be very happy to supply this answer, there must be some reservations.

Mr. GRAYDON: This matter has been before the house for some little time. I think the minister has spoken to this motion at least three times, asking that it stand over. This is the first intimation we have had that for security reasons or for any other reason than that the minister was waiting for someone in the censorship department to come back, the matter would not be fully answered.

So far as security reasons are concerned, in view of the fact that the whole matter of censorship is one which is brought to light by a letter published in a newspaper from one who was prominently identified with the division of censorship in Ottawa, and that one of the directives was actually published at that time, surely the minister should be in a position to table these regulations and orders. The public has a perfect right to know what is being censored so far as this country is concerned. Even in war time there cannot be any real objection to tabling the regulations, the instructions and the censorship orders, because, though there may be security reasons in respect to what is being censored, there can be no objection to tabling the regulations and orders and instructions issued under government authority and no possible reason why the government should decline to produce them. The public has a right to know what the government is doing with respect to censorship. There is confusion and conflict on every hand with regard to this matter. Even the Minister of Justice stated the other day in this chamber, in connection with a candidate in the provincial election in Ontario having made some remarks about judges in this country, that he was going to have the censorship applied. Surely the public is entitled to know what is going on in the censorship department. If it is suggested that there are security reasons behind it, that is an excuse and not a reason. The minister ought to take a different attitude from that.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I must reject the reasons or many of the reasons given by the leader of the opposition in his remarks just made. The position I take is that censorship is one of the arms of the services with which we cannot possibly win this war, and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Laugh, if you like. Evidently you are not particularly intent on winning the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: I object to that. The minister made an error in his first sentence, which was rather amusing, and members laughed, and I object to the interpretation which he is putting upon it.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am very sorry; of course the word should have been "without". I should have laughed with hon. members at myself, and I am capable of doing so. May I suggest to the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party that it is good to be able to laugh at oneself. I find that very amusing in regard to my own slip of the tongue. I come back to the serious matter of winning the war, and the necessity of censorship working properly. I wish very much that the leader of the opposition should understand that censorship is as necessary, as essential as battleships, aeroplanes and cannon.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I told him originally this morning—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is a non-debatable motion. It is not in order for the minister to make an argument but only to give his reasons for not making the return.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the house should press this motion as it stands. We are not discussing the advisability or inadvisability of censorship. We are asking for the tabling of orders, regulations or instructions under which censorship is done. This house has a right to know what those orders, regulations and instructions are. We have no right to ask for censored documents but we have a right to ask for the orders, regulations and instructions in question. May I say this while I am on my feet. Ministers have no right to say that they are exercising the usual reservations. There are no usual reservations.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the minister takes the position that he does not intend to table these orders, regulations or instructions, this party wishes to vote against that decision in order to show what its position is with respect to the whole matter involved.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have altogether too much resistance to the desire of the house for documents. We are in a position to judge what is in the public interest and we should have these orders returned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a very important motion. There is no intention on the part of the government to deny the house any information it should have, but I do know that there are some orders and regulations that have been a matter of correspondence between the British government and our own touching upon subjects that should not be made public at this time. What I would ask is that the house do not press this motion to-day but allow it to stand, and the leader of the opposition, the leaders of the other parties, the minister and I could have a talk about the matter together and we could bring it up again to-morrow.

Mr. GRAYDON: In answer to the Prime Minister, I have no objection to acceding to a reasonable request with respect to anything which might involve secrecy and security in connection with arrangements between the United Kingdom government and our own; but the Prime Minister will readily understand the position we take to-day on this question. The motion has been on the order paper for some considerable time, and what should have been done in the first instance by the minister responsible was to make the answer he has now made. Had that been done we should have had an opportunity at least of giving the matter some consideration. I would agree with the Prime Minister's suggestion on one ground only, that is, that this matter be dealt with by the house to-morrow. We are getting near the end of the session and cannot have delays because these matters cannot be deferred from day to day. We have delayed far too long on this motion as it is and the debate on the war appropriation estimates may come on at any moment. We are now denied even such information as might normally be given apart from considerations of security in relation to the United Kingdom. In the meantime, I do not think it is fair to ask us to postpone the motion any longer than to-morrow. On that basis, perhaps I would be in agreement with the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Notices of motions do not appear on the order paper to-morrow.

Mr. GRAYDON: I realize that, and that is why I raised the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Notices of motions appear on the order paper on Wednesday, and I do not wish to change the order of procedure; it might involve some other matters. I wish the house to understand that there are certain reservations that have to be made in the public interest in regard to this motion. I should be quite prepared to have the motion pass with those reservations.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am sorry to have to reply so often. Do I understand it this way, that the government is prepared to allow the motion to pass to-day on the condition that those matters which affect the United Kingdom in its relations with this country shall be subject to the reservation indicated? If that is so, I suggest that scarcely anything will be brought down. For security and other reasons which the government may advance, this motion would be rendered almost a negative one so far as we are concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said I knew specifically about the United Kingdom. There are equally, I am perfectly sure, some reservations that would have to be made in connection with communications that relate to the United States and other allied countries. Anything that must be reserved in the public interest, for reasons of public security, should be reserved under this motion. I am quite prepared to have the motion carry now, or be voted upon now, with that reservation. That is what the government is prepared to have done, to have the motion pass subject to the reservation of the right not to bring down anything which is not in the public interest in relation to the war and matters pertaining thereto.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is one matter the Prime Minister mentioned to which I would refer. We regard this as one of the most important questions that have come before the house for some time, and I suggest that rather than carry the motion on the terms suggested, it be brought up on Wednesday, seeing that it cannot be raised to-morrow, and that it should be the subject of conference among the leaders of the various parties; because I am not satisfied to allow the motion to go through with such a wide reservation as is asked for. There would be nothing left but a skeleton by the time the meat was all taken off it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. gentleman has no confidence in the government and in my words as Prime Minister, let him vote on the motion at once.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Fraser (Peterborough West) moved, seconded by Mr. Ross (Souris):

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all censorship orders, regulations or instructions issued under government authority since the outbreak of the war.

Those in favour of the motion will please rise.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On a point of order, before the count is called I suggest that the question be put to the house, first, on the motion and, second, on the motion as amended with the reservations that are necessary in the public interest.

Mr. STIRLING: Can that be done?

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion was put and the reservations were made by the Prime Minister. No amendment was moved to the motion. The reservations were refused by the leader of the opposition, therefore, only the motion is before the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): So long as that is understood by hon. members, I am quite satisfied.

The house divided on the motion Mr. Fraser, (Peterborough West), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made it perfectly clear, I think, to the house that the government had no desire to deny hon. members any of the censorship orders, regulations or instructions other than those which it was not in the public interest because of the prosecution of the war to have brought down. I wish now to make it perfectly clear that the government will bring down all the orders, regulations and instructions which the motion calls for other than the ones which I indicated it would not be in position to bring down. Hon. gentlemen opposite would not accept my request for the necessary reservation or my statement that the government was prepared, subject thereto, to bring down these orders. I hope they will now accept my word that the government will bring down the orders and instructions that have been issued under government censorship, other than those which it is not in the public interest to bring down because of the prosecution of the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may say a word in reply to the Prime Minister, the objection I had to the original proposal was based largely upon his own suggestion that the leaders of the parties might get together and see what was or was not in the public interest. Having in mind the fact that this suggestion was made, the Prime Minister at once jumped to his feet and said that we were impugning the honesty of the motives of the government, which of course no one had any desire to do, and the matter was put to a vote. I do not think there is anything very much separating us on that point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The record in Hansard will speak for itself. I think I made it perfectly clear that the government was prepared to accept the order immediately, subject to the one reservation that we would withhold anything that it was not in the public interest to disclose because of the prosecution of the war. Notwithstanding I had made that perfectly clear, my hon. friend pressed the matter further and said he was not prepared to accept what the government was prepared to give.

Mr. GRAYDON: But the Prime Minister must not forget that he suggested the leaders of the parties would get together to decide on that point, and I was perfectly agreeable to that.

NATIONAL SELECTIVE SERVICE—RESIGNATIONS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, memoranda and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Labour, the deputy minister of labour, or any official of the Department of Labour, and any or each of the following persons: S. T. Garside, E. L. Grabill, L. Holland, L. McGillivray, K. McTaggart, Carl Reinke, Robert Taylor and L. A. Wright, since November 1, 1942, relating to the resignations of the said persons from the national selective service branch of the said department.

NATIONAL PHYSICAL FITNESS ACT

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNCIL FOR THE PROMOTING OF PHYSICAL FITNESS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to provide for the promotion of the physical fitness of the people of Canada, the constitution of a national council on physical fitness to carry out such purpose, the establishment of a special account in the consolidated revenue fund out of moneys appropriated by parliament and the disbursement from such account of moneys required for the purposes of the act, including grants to the provinces under agreements that may be entered into.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I realize that I am out of order in saying anything at this time, but I thought perhaps the minister would wish to make some statement with regard to the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): At the next sitting of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: That will suit me fine.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO ADJOURN TO JANUARY 26, 1944, ON COMPLETION OF CURRENT BUSINESS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns, on completion of current business of the session, it stand adjourned until Wednesday, January 26, 1944, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with His Majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.

He said: Hon. members will observe that except as to the date mentioned this motion is in identical terms with the motions which were carried at a similar stage during the last two sessions of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

BINDER TWINE

INQUIRY AS TO DELAY IN DELIVERIES TO WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I was anxious to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), but when I got in touch with his department I found that he would be unavoidably absent to-day. Therefore I desire to direct the question to the Minister of Finance, and I wish he would see the proper authorities and perhaps make a statement to-morrow. It is with respect to a serious situation which has developed in western Canada in regard to binder twine. I have received letters from two different firms, one an implement company and the other a hardware company, and to put the case clearly I should like to quote briefly from one letter, coming from a merchant at Langbank, Saskatchewan:

I have to-day received a letter from the Brantford Cordage Company, Winnipeg, regarding a car of binder twine which was ordered in June for immediate shipment. The company states that the dominion government have unexpectedly and without previous notice taken over from the Canadian manufacturers four million pounds of binder twine . . . and that it was necessary for this company to turn over all stocks of twine already at the head of the lakes.

He goes on to say that fall rye will be ready to harvest early in August, and that the situation will be serious if they cannot get binder twine. Will the minister look into the situation and make a statement?

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand the acting minister has a reply ready.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Acting Minister of Munitions and Supply): The hon. member sent notice to the department, and a reply was prepared and placed in my hands, as acting minister.

At the beginning of July an urgent request was received from the British raw materials board for the supply of 4,400,000 pounds of binder twine to meet a shortage which had arisen in the United Kingdom owing to an exceptionally early and heavy crop. The Department of Agriculture agreed to the release of this binder twine, and immediate steps were taken by the general purchasing branch of the Department of Munitions and Supply to requisition the necessary amount. It was found that insufficient quantities were on hand in the plants in eastern Canada, and large amounts had to be shipped from the head of the lakes. This caused a temporary dislocation of distribution in the western provinces, but will not result in any delay in deliveries to the farmers when the binder twine is needed. The British authorities have agreed to release immediately to Canada sufficient fibre to replace the twine shipped to England, and Canadian manufacturers are making every effort to increase their production of binder twine to avoid any possible shortage in Canada for the 1943 crop.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO CIVILIAN INJURIES CAUSED BY DROPPING OF BOMBS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for Air based upon press dispatches from Brandon, Manitoba, which indicate that one man was killed and several injured when a night practice bomb was released from an R.C.A.F. machine and fell in the midst of one hundred civilians who were attending a Red Cross dance on a farm near Roseland, Manitoba, on Friday night. Will the minister inform the house what steps are being taken to investigate this matter, and I should be glad if he would also give such information concerning the accident as he has been able to obtain.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): My hon. friend gave notice of this question. This unfortunate accident occurred Friday night. News of it was received on Saturday afternoon, and immediately a court of inquiry was assembled. The court has not reported as yet, and when it has reported I shall give to the house such information as I am able to obtain from it.

FARMERS' CREDITORS

CONSOLIDATION OF ARRANGEMENT ACT OF 1934 AND AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 132, to facilitate compromises and arrangements between insolvent farmers and their creditors.

He said: In February 1943, the judicial committee of the privy council held that the Alberta Debt Adjustment Act, 1937, was legislation in relation to insolvency and constituted a substantial invasion of the exclusive legislative powers of the parliament of Canada in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency and obstructed and interfered with the actual legislation of that parliament on those matters, and therefore was ultra vires. The decisions of the privy council served to confirm the decisions of the lower courts on the Saskatchewan Debt Adjustment Act and likewise threw grave doubts upon the Manitoba Debt Adjustment Act.

As a result, representations were made to the dominion government by various delegations, including a delegation from the Saskatoon conference of representatives of the three prairie province governments and farmers' organizations and representatives of the mortgage and investment companies and insurance companies, as well as other individual creditors and debtors. Various representations were made to the government from private citizens of the prairie provinces, including a considerable number of farmers who represented the point of view of both debtors and vendors of land. The need for a means of adjusting the old and onerous debt loads of depressed farmers in the west was admitted, but various opinions were advanced as to the best method of doing this. I think it is fair to say that general emphasis was put on the importance of safeguarding the credit of western agriculture and ensuring the necessary flow of new capital for the development of that industry. The position of the farmer as a potential creditor was emphasized, for instance, the case where an older farmer wishes to retire and sell his farm under an agreement for sale to a young man about to start in farming.

Experience has shown certain limitations of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, and it was urged upon the government by representatives of both debtors and creditors that these defects should be remedied by new legislation under the bankruptcy jurisdiction of the dominion. Manitoba pressed for the extension of the act, or similar legislation, to that province as well as to Alberta and Saskatchewan, and indeed the Saskatoon conference suggested that there be enacted legislation which would provide for continuous adjustment of farm debts.

The government has given careful consideration to these representations and to the question of the best way of meeting the problem that existed in the three prairie provinces without doing irreparable harm to the credit of western agriculture. After careful deliberation, the government reached the decision that it was inadvisable at this time to reopen the fundamental issues of the western debt problem. To embark upon legislation so highly controversial during the stress of war, when the energies of parliament and the country as a whole are being taxed by immediate war emergencies, was felt to be unwise. A constructive solution of the particular problem of western debt, and of the problem of agricultural credit generally, should be attempted only when we can see more clearly the conditions that are likely to prevail after the war. Moreover there is already on the statute books the Central Mortgage Bank Act, passed in 1939, and designed to provide a permanent solution of the farm debt problem, while at the same time safeguarding the credit of the farmers and ensuring that the future capital needs of the farming industry would be met and at moderate interest rates. Owing to the outbreak of war in September 1939, this act has never been brought into force, and it was considered inadvisable to implement it during the war years because of the uncertainties which the war interjected into such fundamental matters as the values of farm lands and the real value of farm income. Moreover, it was considered that the national credit must be utilized to the full in the prosecution of the war.

The government, however, felt it desirable to meet the immediate need of preventing farmers from being dispossessed of their lands when food production was of such vital importance to the nation, and to that end an order in council was passed following the announcement of the privy council decisions, which provided that in any action by a mortgagee for foreclosure, or by a vendor under an agreement for sale or cancellation of the agreement, the court may stay the action, postpone the payment of any moneys due, vary or extend any order previously made with a view to retaining on the land during the state of war now existing an efficient and industrious farmer and at the same time protecting all other persons having any interest in the land of the debtor.

At the same time the study which has been made of the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, and of the representations received earlier this year, has induced us to introduce the bill which is now before the house. This bill is designed to rescind the 1934 act and substitute for it an act which will continue, with important changes, the system of farm debt adjustment which has on the whole worked successfully in the past. I shall call attention to the more important changes. The bill extends the system of farmer-debt adjustment to Manitoba, retains the limiting date line of May 1, 1935, but provides that if two-thirds of a farmer's debts were incurred prior to that date he may seek an adjustment of all his debts including those incurred subsequent to that date; allows cases to be reopened where farmers made a composition prior to January 1, 1939, and establishes a new machinery for the administration of the act by substituting for the boards of review the county or district courts of the provinces with appeals to a single judge of the superior or appeal courts of the province.

That is a brief statement of the principles of the bill. I presume there will be some discussion of those principles, and at the conclusion of the debate, if it is not too long, I may have something further to say.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, following the example of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) I do not intend on this occasion to speak at length. Taking the measure as a whole, I believe it represents an endeavour on the part of the government to meet a condition the seriousness of which has not been much lessened in western Canada with the passage of years. With the point of view he expressed, that there is a desire to assist a farmer who may find himself in a difficult position owing to circumstances over which in the main he has had no control, I agree. I agree also with the principle that the credit of the farmer, in his own interests, should be considered.

This is a most important piece of legislation, in that it is intended to bring up to date legislation introduced by Mr. Bennett in the house on June 4, 1934. At that time he pointed out the purposes for which it was intended. This is what he said:

> We should endeavour to secure a cheap and speedy method by which a farmer in difficulty could provide some arrangement or composition with his creditors. It is a well-known fact to members of the house engaged in business that under the common law no compromise could be made with a man by his creditors to pay less than one hundred cents on the dollar unless all creditors agree.

Later in his speech he said:

> The object, of course, is to keep the farmer on the farm; if possible to keep him cultivating the land upon which he has lived. In making the arrangement we contemplate, through the assistance of those who have loaned him money, it follows of course that we can go only a certain distance in determining how his security can be dealt with.

When the bill came before the house certain changes were made in it, and during the years in which it has been in effect since 1934 it has afforded much assistance to the western farmer. In many cases it has spelled the difference between continuing or discontinuing farming operations. We had difficulties in Saskatchewan during the years 1931-1936 by reason of crop failures, low prices, which placed the farmers in such a position that they could not pay their debts. Conditions were not as acute subsequently as they had been prior to 1934 when the act was passed; nevertheless, however honest a farmer may have been, and however desirous he was of paying he could not during these years meet his liabilities. And I want to say here and now to some who assert that the western farmer has not been honest in his debt relationships, that there is no foundation for the suggestion; for during the past year or two, when the farmer has found himself in a better financial condition than he had been in for a period of years, he has been meeting his debts in a manner and to a degree that has not been excelled in any other part of this country.

Mr. GRAYDON: He will always pay when he can.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As the leader of the opposition says, the farmer will always pay his debts when he can. But during a period of eight or ten years such as he passed through, with no crops or small crops in some years, and with low prices in the years when he had good crops, it was impossible for the farmer to pay.

Now we come to the war period. While there has been an increase in the income of the farmer since the war began, that increase does not assure him of an income equal to what he had in the years 1926 to 1929. This legislation is important because it is one method whereby the war effort of this dominion may be assisted. It is actually in the nature of a war measure, although it will be effective after the war. Production must be kept at a height commensurate with the great demands of our army overseas, of our people in Canada, and of the other nations. The overwhelming load of debt that even now rests on the western farmer is in its nature detrimental to maximum production.

I shall not go into much detail, except to say that up to April of 1940 there were 5,094 proposals made under the act since 1935; secured debts were reduced by $18,547,051 and unsecured debts by $1,926,819 during that period, or an average reduction of 41·9 per cent per farm. In the province of Saskatchewan there were 142,000 farmers with a debt load in excess of $482,000,000 according to a computation made some time ago by Doctor Hope of the university of Saskatchewan. That is a tremendous load of debt, and the result of it has been to destroy hope in the hearts of many who would have desired to continue as farmers. They have had the opportunity of coming before the boards of review in Saskatchewan and in the western provinces, other than Manitoba. Manitoba has not been under the act for some considerable time, and debts have been written down. But the act up to the present time has not covered certain situations that it should cover. So intense has the movement become in the western provinces for a reconsideration of the debt problem that the submission to the federal government in 1943, to which the minister referred, asked for the setting up of a tribunal or tribunals, to be created by proper legislative authority, in order to:

(a) Write down the principal of farm debts, secured and unsecured.

(b) Reduce the interest rate on farm debts, secured and unsecured.

(c) Alter the terms of payment of farm debts, secured and unsecured.

(d) Review and revise its own decisions in the light of events subsequent to the making of the decision.

(e) Extend to individuals in any particular year or circumstances, the protection of any of the provisions of this legislation available to any debtor whose affairs are being administered under it.

(f) Stay proceedings arising on debts or securities after an adjudication has been made.

(g) Make the foregoing remedies available with respect to any farm debts regardless of the time at which they were incurred.

That submission was made in March, 1943.

The minister has mentioned that the debt adjustment act of Alberta was declared beyond the powers of the legislature. It was felt that the debt adjustment acts of Saskatchewan and Manitoba would be in the same position; therefore the government was requested to consider legislation in the form of an order in council to be passed under the War Measures Act in order to protect farmer debtors against foreclosure and cancellation. An order in council was passed by the governor in council along the lines of section 15 of a Saskatchewan statute known as the Limitation of Civil Rights Act. I shall not discuss the details of that order in council, but under it provision was made that in actions by a mortgagee for foreclosure or by a vendor of land for cancellation of an agreement of sale the judge might, after making inquiries concerning the income and assets of the parties and all other relevant matters, grant a stay of execution, postpone payment of any moneys due, and prescribe terms and conditions to which any order shall be subject.

I believe that the legislation before us, except for some changes that I should like to suggest, will go a long way towards meeting the farmer-debtor's position in the western provinces, provided that the order in council is kept in effect to operate alongside of the new act. I repeat the order in council must be retained. I would rather it were incorporated as part of the present statute, but if the government refuses to do that and wishes to continue it in effect under the War Measures Act, I shall have no serious objection to that course. It will be in effect only for the period of the war, and it may be justifiable under the circumstances to have it in the form of an order in council. But I would point out that if the order in council is allowed to lapse—and in the province of Saskatchewan there is no effective debt adjustment act; the Alberta Act was declared ultra vires—serious results will follow in the matter of the loss of land by foreclosure and cancellation, in cases where the farmer is entitled to be kept on the land as being an efficient producer, although his inability to pay is due to conditions under which he has no control.

I think commendation is due for making provision for an appeal from the decision of the district court judges, who now will take the position of administering the act. One principle which must be upheld is the right of an individual to appeal, for the purpose of having his rights established and his rights secured from administrative bodies, whether headed by a judge or any other person; otherwise orders arbitrary in their effect may be made. To make no allowance for appeal would be a denial of justice. Provision has been made for that, and I think it is a worthy provision. I also think that the inclusion of estates, by allowing executors or administrators to seek adjustment of debts, is also worthy of commendation. I feel however that provision should be made whereby executors or administrators, the personal representatives of deceased estates, should be permitted to apply for a readjustment irrespective of the date of the death of the decedent in the estate.

He has just mentioned the fact that the date line for the application of the act to personal representatives goes back to July 3, 1934. I ask him to give consideration to extending that date line still further beyond that date. He has mentioned that provision has been made for allowing the reopening of cases which came before the board of review prior to January 1, 1939. That, too, is a worthwhile step. The great difficulty in connection with the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has been that there has been no general principle, or body of jurisprudence —if I may be allowed to apply that to the orders of a board of review—brought into being. One of the great objections to the board has been that in certain cases there have been tremendous writeoffs and reductions and in other cases in the same locality, where farmers were entitled to similar writeoffs, the reductions have been less. The result has been a feeling of inequality and inequity which will now, I believe, be done away with by reason of the fact that a right of appeal has been set up which will ensure uniformity of administration all over the province. This provision for appeal is worthy of high commendation. I repeat that if one thing is more important than another in an act such as this, and for that matter in all legislation, it is that there shall be equality of application and administration as much as is humanly possible.

I shall refer to various other matters when the sections are taken up; we shall come to that in the discussion in committee. With the general principle of the bill I agree. With the changes which have been made, the alterations in set-up, I feel that a forward step has been made. I think that if the act is properly applied, if an invitation is given to farmers who, through no fault of their own, find themselves unable to meet their debts, to take advantage of the act, it is—subject to certain objections which I shall take later on—a measure which goes a considerable way towards relieving the difficulties of farmers who are in debt in the western provinces. I know there are those who will say it should go much further. I too could say that, Mr. Speaker, for I feel that in certain directions it does not go far enough. But having regard to all the circumstances, to the need of legislation being passed, to the fact that the government has seen fit to go so far and will, I suppose, go no further, and that there is in this legislation some hope for the farmer who is in difficulty, who is honest and straightforward and desires to pay his debts if only he has the income so to do, I am going to support this bill. It is a step in the right direction.

The government should appoint the most outstanding judge in each of the provinces who can be made available for the purposes of administering this act by way of appeal. It will depend in its application and its administration, not so much on the letter of the law, but rather upon the judge who will be charged with being the appeal court, whose decision will be final. It places a large responsibility in the hands of one judge. If the judge who is chosen is an outstanding judge, appreciative of the terrible difficulties through which the western farmer has passed through a period of some twelve or fourteen years, realizing the necessity that something must be done and that a liberal interpretation should be given the provisions of this act, then I feel that much good will be done. On the other hand, if the administration of the act is placed in the hands of a judge who will not give a liberal interpretation, while the act may promise much, it will effect little actual good. I do ask that the minister give us during the debate, an opportunity to find out who the judge will be in each of the provinces. I do not think there is anything unfair in that suggestion. The judge will be charged with being the custodian of the future of western agriculture, and in Saskatchewan there are 140,000 farmers. In setting up the administrative boards, in setting up an appeal court, parliament has the right to know who will be appointed, the right to discuss the appointee's qualifications, and the right to inform the minister and the country whether or not the appointees whom the government has in mind will meet with the approval of those who will be most affected, namely, the farmers.

I ask the minister to give the house and the country an assurance that the order in council passed under the War Measures Act will be continued in effect until the end of the war. For unless that order in council is continued in effect, while there will be legislation provided for the writing down of debts, and for the granting of extensions where the farmer comes under the act, there will be no protection for the farmer such as was guaranteed to him under the provisions of the debt adjustment act.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): In considering the problem of farm debt it is well to remember at all times that this problem exists to a very large extent as a result of the failure of federal governments in the past to maintain a sound national policy, especially in its relationship to western agriculture. I think it is well also to remember that western Canada was not opened up especially for the benefit of the people who settled there, nor for the benefit of the west, but to a considerable extent for the benefit of the central provinces, and if you will read Hansard of 1903 and 1905, taking the speeches of Clifford Sifton and Frank Oliver, that becomes perfectly plain.

I would say that a national policy which forces any class of society, and I have the farmers in mind, to sell their products at world market prices, while on the other hand incurring their costs in a highly-protected market, brings about a condition that is almost certain to lead to the bankruptcy of that class of people. And that of course is exactly what happened in the years from 1930 to 1939. The failure of the federal government in those years to pass legislation to protect the farmers against those conditions brought the provincial governments into the field, and protective legislation was put into effect for the purposes, as far as possible, of guaranteeing the security of tenure of the farmers. That legislation, while it was incapable of bringing about a compulsory reduction in the amount of debts owed, did nevertheless give the farmers a bargaining power, and as a result of that legislation, many farmers were able, by mutual agreement with their creditors, to get a reduction of their debts, because the creditors did not have the power to force farmers off their land or to seize their chattels.

The decision of the privy council in wiping out the provincial debt legislation has, I am afraid, a little weakened the people's faith in the administration of law and justice in western Canada. In that regard I would quote from the Hanna Herald, which by no stretch of the imagination can be called a radical paper. It is a very orthodox one. In the edition of March 11 appeared this editorial:

> Nevertheless it must be admitted that the disallowance of the Alberta debt legislation has not been received with approbation by the majority of Alberta people. Whatever the defects of the method undertaken, the people of this province always had the idea that they had the right to run their own affairs in this respect at least. A large number of Alberta people are coming to the conclusion that the courts of justice are always on the side of property rights in that they will consider such rights ahead of the welfare of the people. It may be that is what the law says. We do not know. But we do know that it will be an unfortunate day for the whole judicial set-up in Canada if the people of the west come to the conclusion that the courts will always be against them when concentrated wealth is on the other side.

I would add, Mr. Speaker, that when the people's faith in the administration of law and justice in any country is destroyed, you are paving the way for internal strife.

Now it is up to the federal government to deal with the matter. The provinces apparently, for the time being at any rate, are out of the picture. And so we come to this bill. In my opinion, after reading the bill through very carefully, it does seem that the government has almost entirely disregarded the recommendations of the western debt conference and given way to the recommendations or pressure of the mortgage companies.

I will give three examples to show where, in my opinion, the federal government has definitely sided with the mortgage companies against the three western provinces: Substituting courts for boards of review, thereby increasing costs to the farmers, and also doing away with a great deal of the sympathetic consideration which they have received of recent years from the type of commissioners appointed to these boards. Failure to treat debt as a recurring problem, and that was strongly emphasized by the western debt conference, and it was also fought quite strenuously, on the other hand, by the mortgage companies. The government apparently has decided to side with the mortgage companies on that question. Then the right of appeal against the decision of the court. That will further add to the costs of the farmers. The inclusion of Manitoba is of course a concession that was asked for by the western debt conference and was opposed by the mortgage companies. It seems to me that that is the only point in connection with which the government has favoured the west as against the mortgage companies. There is unfortunately in the west, and it is only to be expected, a feeling that in the past there has been some form of conspiracy between the government and the financial institutions progressively to dispossess the farmers of their land. I am afraid that this bill will not give the farmer any more confidence in this regard.

The members of the western debt conference stressed the fact that the actual conditions under which western agriculture labours makes debt a continually recurring problem. Debt will continue to be a recurring problem in the west until such time as we bring down a policy whereby the farmer is guaranteed parity prices, that is, prices for his farm products which are commensurate with the prices he has to pay to meet his cost, and, secondly, until a comprehensive scheme of crop insurance is brought into existence. I know that in the past the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has emphasized the difficulties of bringing down a scheme of crop insurance, but the fact is that such a scheme has been working satisfactorily for the past three years in the United States. If it is possible to introduce crop insurance in the United States I cannot see why it could not be introduced in this country. Unfortunately the government has shown no intention of introducing a long-term agricultural policy embodying these essential proposals; so I say that debt will continue to be a recurring problem in this country.

The proposals put forward by the western conference appeared to me to be fair, but, as I said already, this bill completely or nearly completely disregards those recommendations. The proof of this is the fact that the farmers are allowed to make only one proposal. Two thirds of a farmer's debts must have been incurred prior to 1935 before he can make another proposal. I shall not take the time to deal with individual sections; in any event that can be done better in the committee stage.

I should like to refer to two pamphlets which were put out by the dominion mortgage companies and which I believe were circulated throughout the country. The people responsible for these pamphlets showed either a distressing lack of knowledge of western conditions or a callous disregard thereof. Anyone familiar with conditions in Saskatchewan and Alberta and taking the stand set out in these pamphlets proves himself to be one of two things, either a fool or a rogue. If these people were not familiar with conditions, they had no right to pass judgment. The depression lasted from 1929 to 1939 or 1940. Many farmers entering that depression period were carrying heavy mortgages, many of them incurred in the previous depression of 1921 to 1924. Prices fell to the lowest point on record during the previous four hundred years. Debts contracted when wheat was $1.50 a bushel had to be paid with wheat bringing sometimes only 20 cents a bushel. The price of live stock fell to a similar degree. The result was that the bare cost of production could not be made, and the farmer was being forced steadily into debt. Interest payments could not be met, taxes piled up, and machinery and buildings depreciated. Men who were looked upon as highly efficient farmers in 1928 found themselves no longer able to farm efficiently. Yet we are asked by the people who put out these pamphlets on behalf of the mortgage companies to believe that two or three years of good prices can offset the ten long years of the depression and drought.

I should like to examine briefly some of the propaganda which was put out by the mortgage companies and which apparently has been so effective with the federal government in drafting this bill. The first pamphlet is entitled, "Abuses of Arbitrary Debt Adjustment", and was issued by the Dominion Mortgage and Investments Association. I quote from page 4 as follows:

> Since 1938, when it was decided to withdraw the application of the act from all provinces except Saskatchewan and Alberta, the situation has changed very materially. It can no longer be argued that agriculture in these provinces is in a depressed condition. Production has expanded, farm output has been greatly diversified and prices of farm commodities have risen.

And again:

> The extent of the improvement in the position of Saskatchewan and Alberta farmers is indicated by farm cash income figures and the increase in live stock on the farms. Farm cash income in Saskatchewan in 1942 was $99·4 millions higher than in 1938 and in Alberta $40·2 millions higher. Farm cash income in both Alberta and Manitoba in 1942 was $11 millions higher than in 1929. In Manitoba it was $20 millions higher than the yearly average for the prosperous 1926-29 period.

I wonder why they had to take those particular years. Prices in 1938 were low, and it was easy to take a low year and then say that prices have risen. The prices in 1929 did not represent the average of prices from 1926 to 1929. If these people had really been endeavouring to present a fair picture, they would have given average prices rather than select one or two years which specially suited what they were trying to put over. I should like to quote from a pamphlet which was put out by the Manitoba Federation of Agriculture, entitled, "Finance-Credit". On page 10 is shown the cash income from the sale of farm products for the calendar years 1926 to 1941 inclusive. I am going to give figures which are based upon averages. These show that the average cash income from 1926 to 1929 from the sale of farm products in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta was $537,913,000. The average for the succeeding ten years, that is from 1930 to 1941, was $260,006,000. In other words, during those ten years the income of the western farmer was reduced by over fifty per cent, but in some of those years his income fell to exceptionally low levels. For instance, in 1931 the income of the western provinces fell from an average figure of $537,913,000 to $169,780,000; in 1932 to $168,550,000 and in 1933 to $171,100,000. It was not until 1939 that the income of the three western provinces reached a figure of over $300,000,000, which was still $200,000,000 below the average for 1926-29. Yet we are asked to believe that three short years of good prices can overcome ten years of depressed prices, a period when the income of the farmer was fifty per cent of what it was during the period 1926-29.

But that is only part of the story. What about the depreciation of equipment and buildings that took place during that period? It is interesting to note that in their briefs the mortgage companies entirely disregard what happened in that respect. Again I would quote from page 11 of the pamphlet prepared by the Manitoba federation of agriculture:

> One of the direct consequences of this decline of western Canada's farm income has been the depletion of the farmer's capital evidenced by the decline in value of his buildings and equipment . . . the value of farm land and buildings has declined steadily from a figure of $2,166,000,000 in the year 1926 to a figure of $1,227,000,000 in the year 1941. Throughout this entire period the decline has been a steady one. In no year has the value of the buildings been as great as it was in the year immediately preceding. The same is true of the farmers' equipment, the figures for which are: in the year 1926, $343,000,000; in the year 1941, $253,000,000.

From these figures it will be seen that on their buildings the farmers suffered a depreciation of around 44 per cent during those years, and on farm machinery a depreciation of 26 per cent. It goes on to say:

> The coincidence of widespread and recurring drought was the final blow, for it prevented resort to the traditional defence of the individual producer—expansion of production.

Taking these matters into consideration, and in view of the fact that if the farmers to-day do receive a fairly substantial income they will have to pay a heavy income tax and, under this legislation, will have to pay a large amount of debts—that is to say, if they come within that category—one may well ask how the farmers are to build up their reserves and replenish their supplies of machinery, reconstruct the buildings on the farms and make up for the depreciation which took place during those ten years. The mortgage companies also say that no consideration should be given to farmers who are not efficient. In the pamphlet entitled "Abuses of Arbitrary Debt Adjustment," I find the following, at page 14:

> The application of the act should be limited to efficient farmers who reside on and personally operate the farm, who are in difficulties through no fault of their own, who have tried to the best of their ability to pay their obligations, who have sufficient land, equipment, industry and ability to produce substantially and whose difficulties are essentially due to a debt burden beyond the capacity of an average efficient farmer.

Back in 1926 to 1928 I knew many farmers who were considered highly efficient; who had money in the bank, life insurance, good stocks of equipment and no debts. I knew some of those same farmers in 1939, before the war started, who had used up their cash resources, who had sacrificed their life insurance, whose machinery had become depreciated, whose buildings were becoming dilapidated and who had gone heavily into debt, as a result of which they were no longer in a position to farm efficiently. Are we to say that because for ten years we have allowed a condition to exist which has forced efficient farmers to become inefficient, we are not going to give them any consideration in regard to the adjustment of their debts? Yet that is what is urged in this pamphlet issued by the mortgage companies, that no consideration should be given to a farmer who is not efficient.

There is another worse aspect to it as well, and what I would call a very dangerous aspect. Many of the older farmers, when power machinery came in, sent their sons to technical schools or agricultural colleges to learn how to operate that power equipment, combines, engines and other equipment of that type. When these boys came home they assumed the responsibility for running that equipment, and in many cases the older men knew nothing at all about it. What has happened? On thousands of farms you will find that these boys are in the army, perhaps overseas, and the older men who are left at home have to carry on as best they can, without the help of their sons. Very few of them are in a position to hire a mechanic to look after these machines, and as a result these men are not able to operate efficiently. Yet the mortgage companies say that if a man is not an efficient farmer he should receive no consideration. What are those boys to think if, when they come home, they find that as a result of their enlistment their fathers were not able to carry on efficiently and the farms were sold over the heads of the older men? I am satisfied they will feel that they have done only half their job in fighting overseas, that there is another battle to be fought out in this country. Why should any boy be asked to go overseas and perhaps sacrifice his life for his country while we have a bunch of bloodsuckers of this kind doing everything in their power to have the government give them the right to seize the farms of men who, just because their sons have gone away, are not able to operate efficiently? Neither of these pamphlets contains one word in regard to the situation which has been brought about by the enlistment of these boys throughout the west, and the recommendations coming from the west in this regard have been ignored. I should say that the only justification for refusing to deal with a debtor should be either dishonesty or rank idleness; those should be the only two reasons.

The mortgage companies very bitterly oppose permanent debt adjustment machinery. In this connection I would quote from page 7 of another pamphlet issued by these companies, entitled "The Prairie Farmer and His Debts," as follows:

> It is often urged that peculiar and specialized western conditions make the lot of western farmers more difficult and uncertain than that of the farmers in the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, and that, for this reason, permanent mortgage debt adjustment machinery, having power to revise and reduce debts indefinitely or periodically, must be provided. This argument will not stand up under examination. . . . The contention that western agriculture is more hazardous is based on the assumption that all western farms are almost entirely dependent upon wheat production and are what are generally called "grain" farms. The production figures and the 1936 census classification of farm holdings disprove this. The majority of farms in Manitoba and Alberta are certainly not grain farms.
> Manitoba farmers secured only 21·7 per cent of their 1942 cash income from wheat; Saskatchewan farmers, 39·4 per cent; and Alberta farmers, 24·2 per cent. According to the 1936 census, 125,583 farms, or 42 per cent of the total, are under 200 acres in size. These farms, comparable in size to eastern farms, should be considered as diversified farm units and as economic units are similar to mixed farms in eastern Canada. Many of the larger farms are also engaged in mixed farming. There are 45,939 farms over 640 acres in size. These are essentially large-scale business enterprises.

Well, I think it would be hard to find anywhere a paragraph as short as that one containing as many completely misleading statements—in fact, I might say so many misstatements of fact. It states that the majority of farmers to-day are not grain farmers. But in making that statement the reference is to the year 1942, when, as all hon. members know, there was a quota on wheat; therefore the farmer was not able to sell the total amount of his wheat in any one year, and naturally his income from wheat was reduced. If a comparison between wheat and live stock income in western Canada is to be made, then surely the comparison should be with income from these sources before the wheat quotas were put into force. If we do that, again referring to the pamphlet issued by the Manitoba federation of agriculture, we find at page 10 that in 1939 sixty-three per cent of the farmers' income was derived from wheat. That is very different from the 21 per cent stated by the mortgage companies.

That, however is not my chief point. I have dealt with it only to refute their suggestion. My main point is that the mortgage companies try to stress the point that the majority of farms are diversified, and that therefore in respect of hazard they can be compared favourably with farms in eastern Canada. I wonder what the people who drew up this pamphlet really think that stock in western Canada lives on. Do they think stock lives on hot air? When there is a drought the grain crop and the hay is destroyed. What do these individuals think the stock lives on? It cannot live on stones and water alone. It is only necessary to go back to the years 1936 and 1937, when the great drought hit western Canada, and when live stock became a distinct liability, to understand the situation. What happened? The situation became so serious that a lot of stock had to be moved out. Feed had to be moved into that area. Before the federal government would move feed into the drought area for the farmers, every farmer obtaining feed was forced to cut down his stock to three or four head per family.

What did he get for that stock in those days? What did he get for it between 1935 and 1937? Perhaps in that connection I might read from a statement which appeared in The Budget, issued by the Alberta Wheat Pool on May 29, 1943. This is what they say:

> Cattle Prices Then and Now
> Good money is being obtained for cattle at the present time but during the 1930's cattle raising was most unprofitable and those who were engaged in it suffered heavy losses. As proof we reprint the following dispatch which appeared in newspapers some eight years ago:
> "Edmonton, February 22, 1935—An average net return of only $1.17½ a head was obtained by the provincial government on sales of 9,881

head of cattle purchased in the drought areas of the province last year, it was revealed in a return brought down in the legislature by Hon. F. S. Grisdale, minister of agriculture.

The return showed that 6,535 of these cattle were brought to Edmonton at a transportation cost of $13,050 and sold for $20,856, or an average of $1.19 a head. Total number of cattle shipped to Calgary was 3,346 at a transportation cost of $7,284. Sales of these cattle yielded $11,319 or $1.22 a head."

When the mortgage companies suggest therefore, that since western Canada is now becoming diversified there is no longer any hazard, it shows just how little they understand the western situation.

The last sentence of the paragraph I read a moment ago is just as misleading as the rest of it, when it says that there are 45,939 farms over 640 acres in size, and that these are essentially large-scale business enterprises. Anyone familiar with the dry belt of the west knows that practically all the farms in that area are of 640 acres or over, and that many of them are over 3,000 acres. And, they are not large business enterprises; they are just ordinary farms. If one is farming in that area he has to have a large one, if he is to make a living at all. And those men need consideration, just as much as the farmers on the half-sections in the park belt, or elsewhere.

Therefore I say it is quite evident that unless the government is prepared to stabilize prices at a fair level, bring down a comprehensive scheme of crop insurance and take steps to adjust debts at the present time, debt legislation to deal with debt as a recurring problem will have to be brought down. If that were done I would be willing to see all farm debt legislation done away with. I should be glad to see the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act repealed, and no more debt legislation brought down, in the event of those measures being taken, because I believe we would then have solved the problem. But until that problem is solved, the question of debt will have to be regarded as one which will recur from time to time.

Another point, and one which the minister referred to and which is emphasized by mortgage companies, is that mortgage debt legislation destroys credit. It is well to remember that debt legislation is an effect, not a cause. The cause is depression and drought. Stabilize farm prices, institute crop insurance, and to a very large extent you will be stabilizing credit, because you will be removing the hazards connected with lending money in western Canada. But until that is done it will continue to be a hazardous procedure. Do not place the blame upon debt legislation; place it where it fairly belongs, namely upon the hazards to western Canada as represented by low prices, drought and the like.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Speaker, in closing I wish to make a few remarks regarding the funds of the mortgage companies. It is generally said that these funds represent the savings of the people and therefore should receive special consideration. But investments are placed where returns are high, and generally speaking the higher the returns the higher the risk. Money is not placed on farms from philanthropic motives. Mortgage funds are placed there because in the past the returns have been high. The interest rate on mortgages has run all the way from eight to as high as twelve per cent, nine and ten per cent being the general rule in the early days. A farm mortgage is a commercial venture and should be treated as such. Commercial failures have access to the Bankruptcy Act and to the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. The farmers should be entitled to similar legislation to suit their special type of business. But the farmer's is the one type of business for which no suitable legislation has been provided by which arrangements may be made to liquidate debts incurred through no fault of his own. A permanent solution, therefore, must be to remove as far as possible the cause of these debts. That is a federal responsibility. Until then suitable debt legislation must be maintained to deal with debt as a recurring problem, and in my view this legislation does not take care of that.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, ever since the Supreme Court of Canada declared the debt adjustment legislation of Alberta to be ultra vires, those of us from the west have been most anxious that the federal parliament should pass legislation to give a measure of protection to the farmers of Canada and particularly the farmers of the prairie provinces. The legislation which is now before us is in my opinion a pitiful reply to a crying need for some action in this regard.

The whole question of debt legislation for the prairie farmers is of long duration. It is a problem which has grown over the years. I do not intend to make a long review of the debt situation. I had intended doing so, but in view of the fact that the session is nearing its close and members are naturally anxious to go home, I think it is unnecessary to make a long review of the debt situation, with its cumulative effects piling up over the last thirty or forty years. Suffice it for me to draw the attention of the house to the submission made on March 15, 1943, to the federal parliament by the western debt conference. That was not a political conference; it was not made up of persons who could by any manner of means be described as radical. It was made up of representatives of the governments of the three prairie provinces, one a liberal government, another a coalition government, and the third a Social Credit government, and representatives of farmers' organizations from the three western provinces. I think that conference represented a fair cross-section of the opinion of western Canada on this debt problem and they placed their views succinctly before the government.

They point out first of all that this debt problem was attributable in part to the rapidity with which land settlement took place in western Canada from 1906 onwards. They point out that most of the equipment and land and buildings were obtained at high prices on borrowed money; that land was purchased at inflation prices; that interest rates were uniformly high, as is characteristic of any pioneer area.

They point out, in the second place, that the ten depression years had their effect on this debt problem, and that the average gross cash income on the prairies from 1926 to 1929 was $537,913,000, while the average corresponding figure from 1930 to 1941 was $260,600,000. They point out that while the index of prices dropped from 100 to 86 in the protected industries, in agriculture it fell from 100 to 48. They also point out that during the drought years, five years and in some parts of Saskatchewan ten years, drought was a contributing factor to debt accumulation and that during that drought period agricultural income in certain areas of the west declined very materially.

Another thing which this debt conference pointed out was that in spite of the fact that farm prices were better during the war, agricultural income on the prairies for the year 1942 amounted to $462,200,000, and comparing this with the average agricultural income for the three prairie provinces from 1926 to 1929, amounting to $537,913,000, they point out that there is still a deficiency to make up of some $75,000,000 before farm income for the prairie provinces is brought up to that of the average period.

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not include the bonuses, the wheat acreage bonus and the prairie farm assistance, in the $462,000,000, do they?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No, they do not. But they say in the next paragraph that the bonus is more than offset by the increased cost of living from 1926 to 1929.

Mr. ILSLEY: The index was higher.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They point out further that at the present time there is a definite limitation on the amount of grain which the farmer may deliver, and consequently a decided restriction of his income.

These have been some of the factors which have contributed to the present debt situation. It would surprise most people to go over the tables which are found in appendix 4 of the Sirois report entitled "National Income", which was a study prepared for the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. I have put together three of these tables which show the farm debts of the provinces respectively in 1931, 1936 and 1937, as being typical years, and with the permission of the house I should like to put these figures on the record in tabular form.

The SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to have the tables appear on the record?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The tables are as follows:

These tables show first of all the interest payable each year on mortgages in each of the provinces of Canada. They show, secondly, the total amount of operating expenses. It will surprise most hon. members to realize that in 1931 28·89 millions of dollars or 38·8 per cent of the operating costs of the Saskatchewan farmer, was interest; in 1936 it was 31 per cent, and in 1937 29·7 per cent. That is a tremendous charge on operating costs. It is even more alarming to find that, as related to the total cash receipts in the province of Saskatchewan, in 1931 41·4 per cent of the farmer's total receipts went to pay interest, 16·5 per cent in 1936, and 23·1 per cent in 1937. I think hon. members will recognize that in a fluctuating economy such as ours in the west, with incomes varying from year to year, and with so large a percentage of the farmer's operating costs and so large a percentage of the total income going to pay interest on mortgages, the problem is a very serious one indeed. That is why all the prairie provinces have been forced by the pressure of public opinion and by the needs of the situation to pass some debt adjustment legislation.

In 1934 the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed by the dominion parliament, and amendments have since been enacted from time to time. The creditor class of this country have always been opposed to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act; they have done everything in their power to have the scope of its activity limited, and it was limited in 1938, with the result that for some years only the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta came within the benefits of that legislation. As public opinion developed in western Canada and it became more and more apparent that every government in the west was going to pass debt adjustment legislation which would give greater benefits to the debtor class, this legislation was taken to the courts, and last year the Supreme Court of Canada declared the western debt adjustment legislation to be ultra vires. I think it is significant that there was no question of challenging the validity of that legislation until such time as it became apparent that the pressure of public opinion was going to force that legislation to become more and more useful in the interests of the debtor class. As that became apparent the power has been taken away from the western provinces where the pressure of public opinion in that direction is so strong, and is now to be vested in the dominion parliament.

When it was learned that the matter was to be referred to the dominion parliament, the three prairie provinces joined together for the purpose of making representations to the government, and this they did last summer, last fall, and again this spring. They presented "an act to provide for the adjustment and settlement of debts of farmers." I think it is interesting to notice the difference between that title and the title of the legislation now before the house. The legislation which this house is about to decide upon is "an act to facilitate compromises and arrangements between insolvent farmers and their creditors." It might better have been called "an act for the liquidation of farmers."

It is significant to read the proposed act which was submitted to the federal government by the debt conference and compare it with the legislation which is now before the house. I wish to draw attention to some of the differences in the two pieces of legislation.

First, may I draw attention to the difference in the powers which it was proposed should be given under the debt conference proposal and the powers which are to be given under the legislation before the house at this time. The act recommended by the conference suggested, under a proposed section 9, that—

(1) Upon application of any farmer who is unable to meet his liabilities as they become due, the board shall have the power to formulate a plan of settlement with respect to any debt or debts of the farmer which will, in the opinion of the board, ensure that the farmer will continue to farm the land and be an efficient producer.

(2) Without derogating from the generality of subsection (1) and regardless of when the debt was incurred or whether the debt is secured or unsecured, the board on formulating the plan of settlement may:

(a) alter the terms of payment of any debt;

(b) reduce the principal and/or interest of any debt;

(c) reduce the rate of interest on any debt. . .

In the proposed act the powers which were to be given to the board that was to settle and adjust debts are definitely set out. Under the bill now before the house—I shall not read from it, because we will do that in committee—the matter is to be referred to the courts with power to compose, arrange or extend. This is a serious departure. The board which was set up in 1934, headed by a judge, started out with a judicial aspect on this question, with all the sense of property rights peculiar to the judiciary. The result was that the adjustments in the first few years were pitifully small and inadequate. The government itself recognized that. Later a new board was set up, and as that board went around the country and became familiar with conditions its adjustments became more generous, with the result that some of the adjustments made in recent years have been fair and proper. The reasons to my mind are twofold. First, this was a board which had moved around among the people and become aware of conditions. I personally have listened to cases being heard before them, and that in places where the atmosphere of the neighbourhood would have its influence upon the decision. Second, on that board there would be other than the judiciary and it would be possible for the farmers' representative to present the farmers' point of view. But under this new act the whole matter is to be left to the judge; there will be no farmer representation sitting in, no board which has been able to develop a liberal and sympathetic view over a period of years. I think that the setting up of this court with its limited powers is a retrogressive step.

In the next place I want to point out that under this proposed legislation which was placed before the government there was a provision by which the farmer's equity would be preserved in the event of any adjustment which might take place. In section 15 of the proposed act we find this:

In exercising its jurisdiction and powers and powers to formulate a plan of settlement and without limiting its discretion in any way the board may consider and determine inter alia the following matters:

(1) The value of the farmer's interest in the farm lands as represented by the amount of money, principal and interest paid by him to the vendor, mortgagee, encumbrancee, or other creditors in respect of the land, and the amount of cultivation, improvements or labour made or expended by him in bringing the lands to their present productive capacity;

(2) The ability of the debtor to pay and to that end to arrange the payments of his creditors in such amounts and at such times as the debtor may reasonably be expected to meet, having regard to his present and prospective capability to perform the terms and conditions of the plan and having regard to the productive capacity of his farm;

(3) The cost of maintenance of the debtor and his family at a reasonable standard of living and the current expenditures reasonably necessary in the operation of his farm.

There are three fundamental principles: (1) that in the adjustment of any debt the farmer's equity shall be preserved and guaranteed; (2) that his ability to pay shall be taken into consideration on the basis of the productive capacity of his land; (3) that the cost of maintenance of himself and his family shall be regarded as one of the vital considerations in making an adjustment. I find nothing like that in the proposed legislation. The whole power put into the hands of the court shows an ingrained sense of property rights, with no provision at all to guarantee that the farmer's interests and his equity shall be maintained.

I call attention to another point, and that is that in the proposed act submitted to the federal government there was a recommendation that would take care of future contingencies. No board and no judge can say to a debtor and a creditor: "Here is a settlement. You, the debtor, will pay to the creditor a certain amount of money per annum. This case is now closed once for all." That cannot be done because such a settlement is based on the assumption that the farmer's crops will continue to materialize and that his income will remain more or less stable. But we know from sad experience in the west that that does not happen. We have had periods of drought and periods of depressed prices, and an adjustment made to-day may be impossible of fulfilment five years from now.

The proposed act placed before the federal government dealt with that contingency. Section 24 provided:

A farmer, in any year in which his income from agriculture together with any other income he may have is not sufficient to meet his liabilities payable in that year as they become due, may apply to the board for directions as to how he shall distribute that income. The board, after allowing for the reasonable needs of his family and the requirements of farm operations until the next harvesting season commences, may direct how his income from all sources shall in that year be applied, and upon the farmer's compliance with these directions, the farmer, notwithstanding any contracts he may have made, shall not in law be regarded as in default with respect to that year's liabilities, and unless with the consent of the board no action or proceeding shall be taken in respect of such liabilities and the farmer's said income shall not be subject to garnishment or attachment or seizure or any legal process.

I submit to the Minister of Finance that the absence of any provision such as that in this bill, or in the regulations which will be issued under the act, will jeopardize the success of this legislation. I refer the minister to a statement which appears in "Prairie Population Possibilities: A study prepared for the Royal Commission on Dominion-Provincial Relations by W. J. Waines." I call the minister's attention to the following, on page 54:

Farm Debt—the need for a more flexible instrument than the Mortgage.

The burden of this rigid interest cost fluctuates greatly from year to year. Since 1928 it has varied from less than a tenth to nearly a third of the total gross cash receipts (8 per cent in 1928, 31 per cent in 1932 and 14 per cent in 1937). It is, however, net operating income, not gross income, out of which interest on debt and the living expenses of the farm family have to be met. Between 1928 and 1932 the share of the net cash operating income taken by interest rose from a tenth to nearly three-quarters. In 1937, after considerable amounts had been written off and interest rates reduced, it still amounted to about one-quarter of net cash operating income. In years of good crops and higher prices, the interest cost can be met relatively easily; in years of low income, resulting either from poor crops, low prices, or a combination of both such as was experienced during the depression it becomes an almost impossible burden. Defaults and the accumulation of arrears are the ways of escape. Under these circumstances there is a very strong case for the use of a more flexible instrument of farm finance than the mortgage—an instrument which will give the "lender" a proprietary share in the income of the farm enterprise rather than a fixed annual claim against it.

Failure to provide some flexible instrument for future settlements will condemn this legislation before it is many years old.

Let me indicate another serious omission. Subsection 2 of section 18 of the proposed act submitted to the government by the debt conference had this provision:

(a) Every proposal under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act may be revised by the board upon the application of the debtor within five years of the date of this act coming into force.

(b) Upon the application of the debtor to revise a plan of settlement made under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the board shall have the same powers and the revised plans shall be subject to the terms and conditions as if made in the first instance under the provisions of this act.

That was a good suggestion. I do not know that five years is the right length of time; it might be longer or shorter; but if we are to allow for a probationary period during which they could see how the settlement worked out, and if in the first five years it were found impossible to fulfil the conditions and terms of settlement, the creditor could bring his case once more before the board and have some adjustment made. If, however, the plan of settlement operated successfully for five years, they suggested that from there on it should be accepted as a fixed settlement. But they did provide for some probationary period.

I see no provision of that sort here, and I think that is a serious omission. That is certainly what ruined the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in the early years. Proposals were formulated when those who were formulating them had little or no experience in administering legislation of the kind. The result was, if I remember rightly, that the average cut in debt was about 16 per cent in the first year or two. That grew in some instances to as high as 47 per cent in later years, because the first boards were timid and were feeling their way. But the fact remains that the people who came before the boards were penalized because they happened to be the first to come under the legislation. The settlement was final. I appreciate the fact that under the new legislation those people who came in prior to 1938 will be able to have their compositions reexamined, but I do suggest to the minister that there should be some provision for a revision of a case in which the debtor finds that the terms of settlement are beyond his powers to fulfil.

One more observation I have to make with reference to this bill. There is a provision of the bill now before the house which does not appear in the proposed legislation placed before the government by the western debt conference. I should like to know who is responsible for it. I refer to the right of appeal to the appeal court. It is no secret that ever since the proposed act to which I refer was placed before the government by the western debt conference a persistent and determined lobby has been carried on throughout this country in editorial columns of the newspapers, and in the form of brochures that have been sent to members of parliament and scattered widespread throughout the country, against the type of legislation proposed by the debt conference and seeking either to prevent any such legislation being passed or so to weaken and dilute it when it did come to the house that it would have little or no value.

In my opinion section 23 of the bill is nothing more or less than a sell-out to the lobby that has been carried on by the creditor class across Canada. Who is going to receive benefits from this provision? Certainly not the debtor class. The people who can best afford to appeal, the people who can best afford to wait, the people who can best afford to go through the legal procedure will always be the mortgage company and the trust company. I think this measure can be condemned on that section alone, because it would appear that the only proposal that will be formulated is the proposal in which the creditor feels he has more than an even break. When he feels that he has not more than an even break, he will put the debtor to all the trouble and expense of taking this matter to the appeal court. No matter to what extent you may try to save him legal expenses by providing legal services, there are other expenses which must be met by a farmer travelling to town when his case is to be heard. Other trips will have to be made to see other parties; he will have his travelling and living expenses when he has to stay in town a few days while his case is pending. These things may not seem important, but they are important to people who have not much money to travel long distances. Every time you grant the right of appeal, that is a privilege to a privileged group rather than to the people whom this legislation is supposed to assist.

In my opinion the farmer has become the victim of both ends of the economic process. He has become the victim at the one end because we have failed to give him parity prices for his products, and at the other end we have failed to give him adequate protection against the loss of his home. All that this bill proposes to do is to provide debt postponement. It is not a solution; it is simply debt postponement which will put off the day of reckoning so that the farmer may be kept on the farm as a producer and as one upon whom the creditor class may levy a tribute. But in the way of solution by removing the debt, in the way of reinstating a farmer on his farm as the owner or operator of that farm, there is nothing in this measure to provide for that. I agree with the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) when he says that if the government established a system of parity prices and crop insurance for the farmer we would not need debt legislation, because the farmer could take care of himself. I maintain that as long as the government is going to continue to make the farmer the orphan or the stepchild of our economy, he has a right to expect legislation which will not merely postpone the day of reckoning but which will deal with the fundamental problem of debt. I fail to see anything of that nature in this bill.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the very important part which the farmer plays in our economy entitles him to any adjustment of debt which was incurred during those difficult times known as the depression. Reference has been made to the conference held by the three prairie provincial governments. I propose to take only a few minutes to make some general remarks, and then when the bill is in committee I shall probably ask a few questions with respect to some of the sections. I think the proposals put forward by this conference should have received a little more consideration, because they represented the general opinion, not only of the farmer of western Canada but of the merchant and the other classes which are dependent upon the success of the farmer.

I do not think it is necessary to give any figures with respect to farmer debt or the portion the farmer receives of our national income, because these figures have been placed before the house on many occasions. I think we are all agreed that the farmer should receive a little larger share of the national income. It is generally recognized that there must be some means of adjustment by which the farmer may be taken out of his debt difficulty. All we want is something that is fair. When we consider this bill we realize that it will mean bankruptcy to many farmers. They might just as well go bankrupt and be done with it. I admit that a number of reasonable adjustments have been made under the previous act, but that was due to a great extent to the fact that the farmers had representation on the board of review; that the proposals were made by someone representing the farmers and who had had personal experience in farming and knew the difficulties under which agriculture was being carried on.

As the previous speaker (Mr. Douglas) has said, this bill substitutes a district court for the board of review when the creditor and debtor cannot come to an agreement. There is an appeal to the appeal court. I think there must be some final appeal, and there is no question that it should be to a court. Debts incurred prior to 1935 are really in a special class. They were incurred during the previous ten years, or at least during the previous eight or nine years when farmers were passing through a most difficult period. This bill provides that if in making a proposal two-thirds of the debt has been contracted prior to 1935 and is taken into consideration in the proposal, then they will consider all debt up to the present time. I think that is good as far as it goes, but some special consideration should be given to this debt, or there ought to be some means of handling debts contracted prior to 1935 because they are in a different class.

There are one or two principles in the bill with which I cannot agree. One is that the farmer cannot sell his farm within five years after a proposal has been made; if he happens to find a purchaser he cannot sell without the approval of the receiver. Also he cannot sell any of the products from his farm unless he accounts to the receiver. Therefore he is practically in the hands of the receiver in regard to selling any of his farm products.

The rate of interest is dealt with at page 14 of the bill, and I feel that this section must be revised and a lower rate substituted. I want to make a plea also for those in the west who are operating farms though not residing on them. Many men who have retired, either because of age or as a result of physical disability, are living in towns but are still operating their farms, and the definition of a resident farmer should be cleared up. As I understand the bill, a man must actually reside on the farm. I recall that in 1934, when the first Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was being considered, I made a special plea on behalf of these people and received quite a good deal of support from various hon. members of the house. Men who, though not residing on the farm, pay all the expenses, own the machinery and have to meet the debts incurred in previous years, cannot take advantage of this bill, as I understand it, and they should be given some consideration.

The bill also provides that no farmer shall be entitled to make more than one proposal, and I believe that provision should be repealed. As I have said, I am not going to take much time in this debate; I desired to speak generally just for a moment or two. However, I have received some letters in this connection, one of which I have in my hand, coming from the council at Balgonie, in Saskatchewan, asking me to make certain representations in regard to the interest rate, which I have done. These letters, I may say, were written before the bill was printed. They also suggest that applications be accepted from executors, which I think is provided in the bill, and they think the farmer should be permitted to make a second proposal. These letters also mention one or two further suggestions which I do not think are quite reasonable; therefore I am not presenting them at the moment, though I may do so at another stage. All I have to say now is that I hope the minister will give consideration to amending some provisions of the bill as we go through it in committee.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): We have waited quite a long time for the bill now before the house, and I must say that I am just as much disappointed in it as any of the hon. members who have already spoken. Being one of the victims of circumstances over which I had no control, I feel that I might give a few instances that would be of interest to the house. I started in western Canada in 1914, working on a farm to get experience while somebody else got the profits. I worked on that farm during 1914 and 1915. In 1916 I started on my own, and during 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919 I did not thresh as much grain as I had put into the ground for seed. That was the start I had as a practical farmer; and over that period I had to work at anything and everything I could get to do in order to pay the interest on the money I owed. Needless to say I was much further in debt at the end of that four-year period than I was when I began, though I had put in four hard years and somebody else had reaped the benefit.

I do not think there is any particular need for me or anyone else to waste much time in telling of the trials and tribulations through which the farmers have gone, because the representatives of the three western provinces laid their case plainly before the government, backed by all kinds of statistics. But we find that another group has been to the government and presented its case, and from the make-up of the present bill I feel that this group must be the power behind the scene. The farmer is being used to produce, and somebody else reaps the profits. From my own experience I can truthfully say that if I had not worked at anything and everything I could get to do outside of the farm, I would have been on the road many years ago. However, I built up the most economical farm unit I could; I made use of every bit of help I hired. I worked every hour I could, more than once going for thirty-six hours without sleep, and I am still on the farm; but if it had not been for money I earned in other work I would have been on the road with hundreds of others who have had that unpleasant experience during the years I have been in Canada.

When I was home on my last visit, just before getting on the train to return to Ottawa a farmer told me his latest experience with the mortgage companies. He had obtained a loan of $9,500 on his land and buildings; he had paid back $6,500 and made improvements to his farm worth $1,200, but finally was forced on the road. To show that land values change very drastically, immediately after this farmer was put on the road, his farm was sold for $2,400, though some time previously he had been able to get a loan of $9,500 on it. Only this morning I received a letter from a soldier settler who has been served with thirty days' notice to vacate. He gives a little of his history, and then says:

> Following the 1929 crop failure, I was clear of debt in the spring of 1930 and had $600 cash. Although I had five thousand bushels of wheat that year. . . .

[Mr. Fair.]

I know the district in which this man resides, and I know there was a crop failure in 1929.

> . . . I went $1,500 in the hole on the crop; 17½ cents for wheat, 9 cents for threshing, 5 cents for hauling, leaving 3½ cents for all other expenses. Before I got over that I had lost a new binder and a threshing outfit I had bought, and the years of low prices which followed, combined with the outside work I had to do to keep the farm running at all, broke my heart and I was in hospitals and bed for two years and couldn't work for two more. But I am just naturally optimistic. This spring I went to work against doctor's orders and I put in 250 acres of crop with very little help. And although I am played out right now I think I will get over it in time for harvest.

This is only one of the instances which could be cited to show the adverse conditions through which the farmers have been passing. I remember distinctly that in 1930 on my own farm I threshed 10,600 bushels of wheat and over 5,000 bushels of oats. The wheat averaged me 12½ cents a bushel, and it cost 11 cents a bushel to thresh. I believe we paid 7 cents for threshing the oats, and sold them for 14 cents. While those things were happening I continued to pay eight per cent interest, and nothing was said about it. A number of other farmers were paying exactly the same rate. The bill before the house to-day is one of the results of the policy carried on at that time, and the condition then allowed to develop.

While we were getting those prices for our grain and other farm produce, when we were selling hogs for two cents a pound, eggs for three cents a dozen and butterfat for nine cents a pound, when we were receiving prices of that kind for our products, the price of our farm machinery climbed every year, with one exception. In that year there was a reduction of about $5 in each implement we had to buy. So that I do not feel that the bill introduced to-day goes far enough. At present we have a ban on communism, and unless something is done perhaps we will need one or two other bans in the very near future; because from the way farmers are being treated to-day, and have been in the past, there is no possibility of their getting out of debt. When the farmer is compelled to produce below the cost of production, and pay up principal and interest on debts accumulated some time ago, during depression and previous years, there is no possibility whatever of his getting out of the hole, despite the fact that he works 150 per cent of the time worked by other labourers in Canada. Before farmers can even begin to put their house in order they will have to have an equitable debt adjustment act. In addition we must have parity prices for agriculture, because, as I pointed out on several occasions, regardless of what conditions may be brought about, when the farmer is compelled to produce below the cost of production he must of necessity go on the rocks.

As the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) made out a strong case this morning, I do not intend to add anything further at this time. I shall content myself with dealing with the sections of the bill when they are before the committee.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words respecting the general principles of the bill introduced a few days ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). The measure is a new one, but it seems to me it follows closely the previous act known as the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. This it seems to me is a desirable feature in that the principles of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, so far as it was applicable in the different provinces of Canada, are reasonably well understood. Under these circumstances the machinery of the organization now to be set up will also be understood before it begins to operate. The fact that people are familiar with the operation of the old act will assist in the operation of the new one when it becomes effective.

I do not think any useful purpose would be served at this time in going over the history of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and what has happened in connection with its operation, particularly as it has affected different sections of Canada. When that act was first introduced it was applicable to all of Canada. At different periods, from then on, action was taken by which various provinces were removed from the application of the act, and eventually it reached the point where it was applicable only to the three western provinces. In 1938 its operation in Manitoba was discontinued. That, however, was not because of any action on the part of the House of Commons, but because of one particular feature which has been attended to in the present measure.

The new legislation differs from the old in that it provides a change in the machinery of administration from the principle of using official receivers and boards of review to that of using county clerks and the judiciary. So far as I am concerned, I am bound to say I would much prefer to a continuance of the use of official receivers. I believe official receivers, when carefully selected, would have a different approach to the matter than would many of the county court clerks. Moreover, as I understand the set-up of judicial districts, particularly those in western Canada, they cover large areas. So that if there is to be only one county court clerk in a judicial district, to act as an official receiver, it will cause great inconvenience to many farmers who would have to reach a particular centre to make application under this measure. I submit therefore that that particular feature of the machinery should have further consideration. I understand that for certain purposes provision is made for additional appointments; but I submit that in this particular regard judicial districts are too large for administrative purposes, and particularly for farmers wishing to have their cases in order.

The other change in the measure, having to do with the arrangements for appeal, presents the difficulty which developed when the old act was under consideration, and particularly when it was considered in another part of this building. There should not be any objection to the right of appeal. It has many things in its favour, and while some may believe that to some extent it is a hardship on the farmer to have him subjected to further appeals in that regard, yet it has the advantage of at least assuring greater uniformity. So far as additional costs are concerned, as I understand the provisions of the measure such costs need not be charged up against the farmer. It is more likely that they will be charged against the mortgage company or the creditor who will exercise the right of appeal. So that I do not believe the farmer's position is prejudiced to any great extent in that regard.

The other change appearing in the new measure which is of great importance to Manitoba is the provision through which that province may be brought within the scope of the act, along with Saskatchewan and Alberta. This has been one of the controversies among farmers in Manitoba for some time. They claim, and with sound grounds I believe, that Manitoba has just as much entitlement to the provisions of the act as the other two western provinces. We are therefore gratified to see that this measure is made applicable to Manitoba.

Like the earlier legislation, the principle of the measure is founded upon the idea that the efficient farmer shall be maintained on the land. It might be just as well, when we are considering the bill, to refer to some of the declarations that were made when the act was under consideration in the session of 1938. Following some observations I had made at that time, Mr. Bennett used these words:

It was predicated upon two considerations. The first was that it was desirable to keep the farmers on the land. That was part of the preamble of the act, that they should be retained in possession of their farms. The second was that inasmuch as under section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act a farmer could not take advantage of the provisions of that statute, we should without making him bankrupt give him all the benefits which would accrue if he were able to take advantage of that statute.

Later on the same hon. gentleman used these words:

> Just as soon as it was apparent that this legislation was on the statute books, these voluntary arrangements became the order of the day. As soon as it was apparent that by voluntary effort and cooperation these arrangements could be carried out, when the extent to which the statute went was not generally known, these settlements were made.

That is a principle of this legislation which I think it is desirable to have in mind and which I, and I think many of us, hoped would be the scope of legislation by which voluntary settlements could be arranged and then given the force of law. We have had experience in the past of voluntary arrangements being made with no provision for bringing them into effect by law, and occasionally difficulties arose with respect to them later. But with this machinery many settlements may be effected and given final approval by the court.

I recall the discussions when the previous act was under consideration. One of the things that stood out at that time was the circumstances of a farmer who had placed a mortgage on his farm and then ran into a certain amount of difficulty and found himself unable to keep up his payments, which got further and further behind until the burden became altogether too great for him to carry. We have all seen cases where the mortgage company or whoever had a financial claim on the property exercised the right of foreclosure and obliged the farmer to leave what was virtually his homestead property, the home to which he had become attached during his lifetime, the home that had a great deal of sentimental value for him, and in so many cases we have seen that farm which the farmer was forced to leave resold to someone else at a lower valuation. When one considers the sentimental attachment one has for his home, it is a pretty hard thing for anyone to be uprooted from the place where he has been living a lifetime and then see the property turned over to someone else at a lower price than that at which it would be given to him to enable him to carry on. Machinery of this kind can take care of such cases.

So far as Manitoba is concerned, I confess that from a factual point of view I am not in a position to say to what extent the legislation is required or is desirable or necessary. We have had in our province, as in the other provinces, provincial debt adjustment boards which have had a very considerable effect. They have, however, no authority, and it was not intended that they should have authority, to compel adjustments except to a limited degree. But they did have the effect of taking care to a very considerable extent of conditions that were to say the least provoking and pressing. In the main that is a very satisfactory type of legislation, particularly if it could be understood that it would be adhered to. But in view of court decisions with respect to the Alberta legislation the general feeling in Manitoba is that it is only a matter of time before our provincial debt adjustment legislation will be challenged and declared ultra vires, and then we shall have no debt adjustment machinery and no machinery at all for controlling the debt situation in Manitoba. We are therefore very anxious that some machinery shall be set up to take care of the debt situation among the farmers of that province, if for no other reason than the possibility of the provincial debt legislation being discarded. The legislation is supported, perhaps not in exactly this form, by the provincial government which joined with the western debt conference in representations to the federal government for legislation, perhaps not exactly like what we have before us, but in principle something akin to it. The federation of agriculture in the province of Manitoba has also been strong in its advocacy of debt adjustment legislation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not like this.

Mr. WEIR: Perhaps not exactly this type of legislation, but I think we must have regard in this house to what happened to similar legislation elsewhere, and while the house may be prepared to go further than this legislation does, I am not too sure that it would result in the measure becoming law.

I want to give one or two illustrations which the secretary of the Manitoba federation of agriculture has been kind enough to forward to me. First is the case of a man who borrowed $7,500 to erect buildings. The buildings erected amounted to $9,100. He paid in principal on that loan $1,500, and in interest $6,500. Through a series of dry years he found it impossible to meet his obligations, and at the same time he was compelled to reduce the number of his live stock considerably, until finally he found himself in such difficulty that he was obliged to give up his farm before it was foreclosed.

Another case is that of a farmer who in 1909 borrowed $9,000 at seven per cent interest. He paid off in principal and interest—there is no division between the two in this memorandum—over $22,000, and when he tried to effect further adjustment was refused any consideration although the loan had been reduced to $3,100. So that we still have plenty of cases in Manitoba which need adjustment.

I mentioned a while ago that we have a provincial debt adjustment board in Manitoba. It has done very good work and has been of real benefit to the farmers who were having difficulties in financing their operations. I have not a full record of what they have accomplished since the Manitoba debt adjustment act was enacted, but I have before me a summary of the operations of the board for the past two years. In the year 1941 the board dealt with 315 mortgage cases, 59 agreements of sale, and 784 tax sale applications, a total of 1,149 cases, in which certificates were requested to take foreclosure proceedings but were refused. In 1942, 333 mortgage cases were dealt with, 103 agreements of sale, and 588 tax sale applications, a total of 1,024 farm cases where certificates were refused. All the board was able to do in these cases was to refuse a certificate to allow a sale, whether it was a tax sale, or foreclosure proceedings were to be instituted. In addition to that the board has been able to effect many compromises and agreements with the creditor class. In all, with the cases dealt with by them over a two-year period, they claim to have effected, in principal and interest by mutual arrangement, reductions to the extent of $444,000. So that while some may argue, and I suppose they will, that Manitoba, having got along without this debt adjustment legislation for some time, can continue to do without it, that is not the case; I contend that Manitoba is just as much entitled to legislation of this kind as are the other western provinces.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) referred to what he called the propaganda which had been instituted by different organizations in connection with debt adjustment legislation, and particularly the application of the act with respect to certain cases. The pamphlet to which he referred, published by the Mortgage Loan association—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There are several.

Mr. WEIR: —has cited cases in which it contended that there was extreme unfairness and lack of stability in types of settlement which were arrived at. I just want to say that I hope it will not be thought that an accusation of this sort was directed to the application of the act in the province of Manitoba. In support of that submission I would quote the following from an editorial article in the Winnipeg Tribune of May 29, 1943, dealing with Manitoba farm credits:

> In Manitoba it is generally conceded that administration of the act up to its termination in this province on June 30, 1939, was eminently satisfactory. Of the forty cases cited in the pamphlet, "Abuses of Arbitrary Debt Adjustment," not one occurred in Manitoba. This pamphlet, issued by the Dominion Mortgage and Investments Association, is based on representations made to the Dominion government by the association in answer to submission made by the three prairie provinces governments.
> The cases cited, therefore, do nothing to refute the Tribune's contention that the operation of the act should be restored in Manitoba as requested by the government of Manitoba. In view of the excellent reputation of the government of Manitoba in the matter of safeguarding credit and upholding the fulfilment of contracts, its request for restoration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in this province should be met by parliament.

I just refer to that as an assurance that in the general opinion the act has been fairly administered in Manitoba, and that no cases have come to our knowledge wherein abuses in its administration could be charged.

I believe the chief value of legislation of this kind is the settlements which can be made under voluntary arrangements. When these voluntary arrangements can be arrived at and given the effect of law, it is a desirable method of effecting adjustments of debt—which after all, is a pretty serious matter.

I want to say just two or three other things with respect to the set-up proposed. Provision is made for an appeal to a judge sitting as an appeal court. I hope the minister will exercise great care in the selection of men for these positions. I confess I am not sufficiently familiar with the personnel of our provincial courts to make any particular comment, but it seems to me that the successful operation of this act will depend a great deal on the type of men who constitute the appeal courts. I suggest that this question is sufficiently important to justify the minister in going further than he has done with respect to dealing with appeals. I have no knowledge of the set-up of the judiciary even in Manitoba, let alone the other provinces, but I submit this is an important enough feature of the administration of this act to place it in the hands of a board. Leave your judge on it if you will; I think that is quite proper; but let there be associated with the judge experienced, practical agriculturists, persons who will give some assurance of a wider background including the agricultural set-up in the province. It would mean a good deal to the administration of the act and would constitute, I believe, an important improvement in the general administration.

I would even go so far as to say that the minister might well consider providing for the supervision of cases after adjustment. We have in the west mortgage companies which are using agricultural field men; they have found it profitable to do so. These men are advising their tenants or land operators on methods of farming and matters of the kind. We also have in all the western provinces agricultural representatives who are in a position to give practical advice on farm administration and kindred matters. In addition there are farm loans appraisers in Manitoba, and soldier settlement board representatives in the various provinces. Therefore I think it would be quite proper to include a provision in this legislation that men whose debts are adjusted under it shall be placed for a period of years under a measure of supervision by some responsible organization such as I have suggested.

That is all I desire to say in this respect. I repeat that I am glad that the legislation is to be made applicable to my province.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I do not wish to take up the time of the house in repeating what has been said, but I should like to support entirely what has been said by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas).

I regret very much that the minister has waited until the dying hours of the session to bring in this bill, because it affects many hundreds of thousands of people and is of tremendous importance to our people in the west. It may appear to the minister and to the government that the type of legislation which they are bringing down at this time fulfils a certain need, but that if a longer range view is taken of this question it will be found that you are destroying the fundamental faith of our people in the land. We in Canada have always considered that agriculture is our basic industry, that it supports large numbers of people, and that the general prosperity of the country depends to a very great degree upon that foundation of our agricultural population. I know that in the future we are going to become a far greater industrial country, but still there is a future also for the vast prairies and the people who live on them.

I have received much correspondence on this question and it seems to be always the same type of complaint more or less that is voiced. Only on June 30, from someone living in my own part of the country, I received the following letter. My correspondent is a woman. After a few introductory remarks she says:

We have just received a summons from the Saskatchewan farm loan board re foreclosure on our homestead filed thirty years ago in 1913. There is no need to tell you what we have gone through these last years—depression and relief. Of course, payments were not made and interest accumulated. We began on this land with four children and no cash at all. We were glad to work out to keep the family, and have worked on the land with the time we have had left. Together we have raised fourteen children. We have one hundred acres broken now and we are going to lose all that and the work we have done through the years, because the years were lean and the crops failed. There does not seem to be much relation between a thing like this and the words spoken in mid-Atlantic by those two men, Churchill and Roosevelt—that all men should have the privilege of living their lives in freedom from fear and want. Do you know what will happen to this land of ours? It will be sold for a hundred dollars or so to land-grabbers who happen to have the ready cash. It has been done in three instances. One farm was sold for $25, another for $75 and a half-section, nearly all broken, for $400. But we who have done all the work—not a penny will be left for us. We have to pay in full or lose our land.

This courageous couple who raised fourteen children are going to make a start now in their old age in a new part of the country and build a new home for themselves. It seems to me that rural children and the farm people have supplied, and will continue to supply, and continue to be the reservoir for the supply of many fine citizens to this nation. But in the bill we have before us at the present time we are destroying the faith of the people in their ability to live and make and maintain a home on the land. This particular couple raised fourteen children—what a contribution to Canada that in itself was. We say we want more Canadian-born people in Canada—Canada for Canadians; but is this any encouragement to people to raise large families? In the future our farm people will not go in for large families. If this couple had not had fourteen children they might have been able to get along better, to maintain themselves and keep their home. But they did their best to feed, clothe and bring up fourteen children, and to make them decent and law-abiding citizens, and now in their old age they find that their home is gone—everything is gone.

I cannot help feeling that the scheme embodied in this bill, although in a short-range view it may appear to satisfy the needs of the moment, will be found in the long run to be one of the most disastrous measures brought into effect for the rural people of Canada.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): I rise to make a few observations on the proposed debt act now before the house. The farmers of Canada, I am sure, have been waiting with a great deal of impatience for the federal government to pass adequate debt legislation which would once and for all time solve their debt problems and offer them some means of protection. But as we see it this afternoon, and judging by the bill which has been brought in, the proposed legislation was drafted not for the protection of our farmers but for the protection of the interests of finance. I should like to make that statement as plain as I possibly can, because members who come from western Canada have to deal with a great number of debt cases. It is almost impossible for one to realize that farmers, who have given their best to the upbuilding of Canada, are finally thrown out on the road. The people of western Canada in particular will be greatly disappointed that the government did not see fit to bring in a measure which would adequately take care of the debt situation in Canada for all time.

It seems futile to argue with the minister or with the government or to point out that this debt legislation falls far short of what our people were expecting and to what they are entitled. The government seems to follow a traditional policy of ignoring the pleas and the demands of the farmers. Let me read a short clipping from the Calgary Albertan of May, 14, 1943. I believe it will throw light on the subject:

> Edmonton, May 13.—Edwin Broder, 51-year-old farmer of Edmonton went to gaol for seven days to-day at the order of Police Magistrate A. I. Millar on conviction of a charge of obstructing eviction proceedings which left his furniture piled on a public highway and his wife and eight children without a home. The eviction order was made in the supreme court. The evidence indicated Broder tried to stop the sheriff's bailiff from carrying it out. "You had been told to get out?" asked the magistrate. "Yes," replied Broder, "but no one likes to lose his home. He will stay as long as he can." "The supreme court must have had a good reason for issuing the order," said Mr. Millar. "There may have been a reason and there may not have been a reason," the farmer answered. "I bought a quarter section of land for $4,800 on time in 1916. I raised a family of eight children, paid the owner of the land $5,600, and I still owe $5,600. I had to go through the depression years and I was hailed out a year ago." Neither Broder nor the court disclosed the circumstances surrounding the eviction order. Meanwhile the farmer's wife and family were taken in to be cared for by neighbours.

That is the sort of thing we have to contend with in the prairie provinces. The proposed act brought in by the minister is not good enough. It may have been a good start ten years ago, but to-day, after our farmers have been struggling for more than ten years under the most adverse circumstances, it is not good enough to bring in a measure of this sort, which does not contain a single recommendation made by the farm debt conference. Let me ask the minister this question. If he is not going to listen to our farmers and accept their suggestions, whose suggestions is he going to consider? When dealing with farm debt or with farm problems the government should take the advice of members of our agricultural communities and farm organizations. This idea of forcing anything at all upon our farmers, whether they like it or not, is entirely out of date. I am certain the farmers will not receive this bill with any hope or encouragement.

At this time, more than ever before, the farmers of Canada are expected to produce more than ever before. This they must do with depleted machinery, shortage of labour, and having to pay high prices for everything they buy. Whatever he may get in return, even though fair prices are being paid for a number of commodities, the average farmer in western Canada is still not in a position to carry on and pay off his debts. It is pitiful that, while farmers' sons are serving this country overseas, the financial institutions are taking advantage of the situation and are foreclosing upon farmers by thousands. It is most unfair.

The suggestion has been made both in the press and in this house that there are farmers who are inefficient. Anyone who dares to call our farmers inefficient, I do not care who he is, does not know what he is talking about. The farmers of Canada have produced all the foodstuffs that were required, and they are producing all that is required to-day. They are carrying their burden nobly and at great sacrifice. Yet some men even dare to suggest that there are inefficient farmers. Surely the farmers have never failed this country. For many years they were placed in such a position that they could hardly exist, and this would discourage anyone from continuing to produce without a fair return to which one is entitled.

I have clippings here which show that the farmers of Canada have done their best to meet their debt obligations. The Globe and Mail of May 9, 1942, contains an article by Mr. Wellington Jeffers, financial editor, which reads:

> Farmers in both the United States and Canada have been paying off their farm debt as a result of better prices received during the war. The figures are not available, but insurance men who have this situation always under their eyes report that a considerable effort has been made in the last three years by farmers. Even in Alberta, in spite of moratoria, farmers have been coming forward of their own free will and paying what they owed whenever they could.

That is a fair indication of farmers' willingness to pay their debts. I maintain that whenever the farmer has undertaken a debt obligation he has done his best to meet it. I have here another clipping from that great Canadian daily which has always stood for the farmer and for adequate debt adjustment, the Edmonton Bulletin. Mr. Harold L. Weir, one of the editors of that paper, had this to say on March 4, 1942:

Since the year 1930, the farmers of this province have encountered a series of misfortunes, due to no fault of their own, which have now culminated in a situation which virtually amounts to their economic disinheritance.

Further down it says:

At last the Bennett government brought in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act with the purpose of so adjusting the farmer's debts that the farmer could remain on the land in the public interest as a free man and not as a serf.

Everyone hailed this piece of legislation as a measure of vital interest to the farmers and to the country at large which depended upon agricultural prosperity to promote and assure its own welfare.

What has happened to this act which was designed to rescue the farmer from economic oblivion? What has been its effect in this province?

Well, the Alberta board of review started in to make adjustments and cut interest rates on loans down to seven per cent. Later on, adjustments were made with interest rates at six per cent until, finally, Chief Justice C. R. Mitchell, chairman of the Alberta board of review, announced that all future adjustments would carry interest at no more than five per cent.

It would be interesting to the public to know exactly how these adjustments are made.

The board first adds up all the farmer's liabilities, which, let us assume for the sake of example, total $7,500.

The board's inspector next evaluates the farmer's assets—his land and equipment and improvements—which, for instance, may amount to $5,000.

The board then wipes off $2,500 of the farmer's liabilities so that these may not exceed his assets. In short, the act generously provides that a man need not owe more than the value of what he owns.

But the farmer, under this adjustment, must pay five per cent interest on the newly established value of his assets and since his liabilities are fixed at exactly the same level as his assets, he is not left one dollar of equity in those assets.

The adjustment may appear to be fair on the face of it. But when the farmer is required to meet his living expenses, to pay taxes and attempt to carry out the terms of the adjustment with five per cent interest, he inevitably finds that, owing to the price of his products being below cost of production, he cannot possibly meet the terms laid down by the board.

[Mr. Hlynka.]

The vast majority of more than 200,000 farmers living in the three western provinces, in spite of all the adjustments, find themselves economic slaves with no possible chance under present conditions of ever getting out of debt.

This indicates the almost hopeless situation in which a great many of our farmers in western Canada find themselves.

May I quote one more reference which appeared in the Edmonton Bulletin, the champion of the farmer, on a front page editorial on August 8, 1938:

The farmers and home owners of Alberta have been ruthlessly exploited by the highest interest rates charged anywhere in the British commonwealth of nations. Usury at seven, eight, nine, ten and up to fourteen per cent has been the rule during the entire history of Alberta.

That such interest rates are legal under our laws does not alter the fact that the people of Alberta have been and are being systematically robbed by a small but powerful group of financiers in private control of Canada's monetary system.

Farm loans in the United States are on a long term basis of twenty to thirty years with interest rates of three to three and a half per cent. Home owners pay three and a half to five per cent.

This is another indication of the situation which exists in western Canada. Our munition manufacturers and others received subsidies from this government to enable them to produce with the greatest possible speed and in great volume, but no such subsidies have been given to our farmers. Some may say that many farmers received the acreage bonus, and what not. That was not enough to buy salt for their ham and eggs. Most of that money had been used up in administrative costs, and the farmers received very little. Almost all industries receive support and subsidies from the government; why not place the farmer on the same basis? Then there will be no objection to paying off outstanding debts; for if the farmers were in a position to pay off their debts, they certainly would do so. We all know that incomes of our farmers during the ten year period from 1929 to 1939 were so disgracefully low that it was absolutely impossible for any man, no matter how honest he might have been, to meet his debt obligations and carry on. Listen to what Mr. Jeffers has to say in an article which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 8, 1943:

The census of 1941 shows that the farmers and farming in Canada are in nothing like the parlous state which might have been expected from recent propaganda at Ottawa from those who want farm credit arrangement acts stiffened in the prairie provinces, and measures taken to forgive a great deal of the debt that already exists.

He goes on to point out that there has been a decrease in farm debt, as follows: in

New Brunswick, by 7·6 per cent; in Ontario, by 14·8 per cent; in Manitoba, by 22·1 per cent; in Saskatchewan, by 6·3 per cent; in Alberta, by 5·3 per cent and in British Columbia by 14 per cent. That decrease took place during the ten year period from 1931 to 1941. In the province of Prince Edward Island there was an increase in farm debt amounting to 22·8 per cent; in Nova Scotia an increase of one per cent and in Quebec an increase of 19 per cent. It may be all right to quote these figures, but the writer of the article overlooks the fact that the decreases he mentions have resulted largely from so many farmers being dispossessed of their land.

I am sorry I do not possess strong enough language adequately to condemn this bill. In time of war, when the farmers have sent their sons to offer their very lives for this country, there is no reason why the government should not give at least adequate protection to agriculture, our basic industry. Were it not for agriculture where would we be? The majority of our people are dependent upon agriculture for their very livelihood; yet we listen to complaints by members of the opposition with perhaps only a yawn from the government, and the ministers say nothing when cases are recited about people being dispossessed of their land and that they are losing their life-earnings. Surely it is time even for this reactionary government—which is perhaps the most reactionary government in the history of Canada—to see to it that no farmer is thrown off his land. Why not come out and propose a complete cancellation of interest on all debts until the end of the war and one year after? Why not propose the cancellation of compound interest, which after all is nothing more than a penalty for failure to meet a debt obligation, though we have recognized that it is through no fault of the farmer that he has not paid his debts on time? If it is not his fault, why then should we ask him to suffer this penalty? Nothing has been said about farm credit, which should be extended to farmers on easy terms; for unless the farmer has this credit he cannot meet his debt obligations.

I have only a further word to say. To my mind the most important problem facing the farmers of western Canada to-day is the question of tenancy. If you examine the latest figures available you will find that less than half our farmers own their own homes. Surely they are entitled to a more serious consideration than that. It would be a most dangerous thing that can befall this nation if we permit our people to lose equity in their homes, which it took perhaps all their lives to build up. Yet we give them only the consideration of referring them to the courts. Well, the house heard what happened to the man about whom I have been quoting. That is what is going to happen to others, unless the minister and the government take advice from farm organizations in the future. I appeal to the minister even at this late date to revise the whole measure, and to place it on a basis which will include some of the recommendations placed before the minister a few months ago by the farm debt conference.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the farmer in this instance may be compared to a swimmer who is out of his depth and is drowning, with a millstone tied around his neck, and is looking to the House of Commons for assistance. He finds that instead of legislation being introduced which will relieve him of his difficulty, the minister is making arrangements for a pulmotor, or even for the funeral in the event of the body being recovered from the water.

This is a measure to facilitate compromises and arrangements between insolvent farmers and their creditors. Why wait until a farmer is insolvent? Why not do something before he becomes insolvent? I wish the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) could visit some of the debt-ridden farmers in my province and listen to their comments respecting this type of legislation. They know perfectly well it was in a period of high prices that they incurred much of the debt now loaded upon them. They incurred that debt during the last war, and when prices fell they found they could not meet their obligations. When another war loomed up there was the possibility that they might again be able to get some of the high prices they had obtained before. But the minister who is piloting this bill through the house is the man whose legislation has put the ceiling on prices. I am not saying that that is all bad; but I do say it is one thing which has prevented the farmer from paying his debts. Since the government saw fit to interfere at that time and to introduce legislation which has prevented the farmer from paying his debts, then that same government ought to give him more consideration than is being given under this measure in respect of his indebtedness. Particularly is that so in respect of conditions now existing in western Canada, where grain-growers are finding so much difficulty in obtaining cash with which to pay their debts.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), who is now in his seat, knows perfectly well that farmers were not allowed to deliver their grain, because he says facilities were not available for taking that grain out of the country, nor was there room in the elevators to store it. But it was cash from that grain which the farmers must use to pay their indebtedness and the interest thereon. The farmer produced the grain, but he could not possibly sell or deliver it. Did the government take steps to see that no interest was piled on farmers' indebtedness during that period? No. Did the government do as was done in the United States? Did it say to the farmers, "We will give you an advance on the grain which you have properly stored on your farms", so that the farmer could make interest payments? No. That was done in the United States. On the basis of the security of the grain stored on farms the United States government is advancing this year an amount equal to $1.22 No. 1 northern wheat. Even when the farmer is allowed to deliver his wheat in western Canada the ceiling price is only 90 cents Fort William.

Sometimes we hear it said: "Oh, the farmer has other products." Yes, he could turn his grain into cattle, hogs and dairy products. But again this government has prevented his earning money in that way, particularly in Saskatchewan where the national selective service board, an instrument of this government, has in some instances taken the last boy off the farm. The records prove that Saskatchewan has been badly hit in that way.

A study of the debt problem illustrates some of the basic injustices of the whole economic system under which we operate. Debt is the natural result of the capitalistic system. Under this system the reward to capital always comes first, and the reward to labour is left to take care of itself. It is not recognized. Under this system Shylock demands his pound of flesh—"the law allows it and the court awards it." The last dollar of production is taken off the farm, whether the mother needs medical attention or the children need clothes. There should be some law in the land establishing a basic income for all families. The mortgage contract is the machination of those who have been given the power to extract the last dollar a man may earn. It has no basis in justice, in humanity or in fairness. If this bill contained the proper provisions it would be an effective agent in restoring the equity of the farmer on his farm and would guarantee to him that so long as he worked his farm well he would have the right to live in security so far as his farm debt was concerned. This bill does not touch that problem at all, and I believe the minister will admit that that is so.

Farm debt, may I say to the minister, is a national problem from coast to coast. I have been in farming communities in eight of the nine provinces of Canada, and I find the same story told everywhere. If the government does not initiate some legislation to remedy this injustice, some day it will have to make way for a government which will do it. Democracy will not permit that state of affairs to continue much longer.

I shall never forget the story told by a medical doctor at a convention in Saskatchewan some years ago. He had to tell a mother that she was dying of cancer. He said, "Why did you not have this condition cared for a few years ago?" She replied, "I remember your telling me I needed the attention, but that year we had a short crop. We did have some return, but the mortgage company took it all. The next year the children needed clothing and I put it off again. The next year the mortgage company came along and took practically everything we had." "Well," the doctor said, "your three years' delay has cost you your life." If a farmer, his wife and family, labour all year and through no fault of their own have no return, either because of price, because he is not allowed to sell his commodity, or because of drought, rust, hail or storm, surely that man has lost sufficient for one year. Why should a mortgage company supplying the capital required on a farm always be guaranteed a crop, irrespective of whether the farmer gets a crop or not? Surely this is basically wrong; surely it is something which must be changed. Instead of taking care of the farmer, instead of giving him some assurance that compound interest will not be piled up, instead of ensuring him that the interest in a bad year will be taken care of in some other way, the farmer is further penalized by having interest piled on him as a load of debt. Then the next year the interest is loaded on that of the year before, and interest is piled upon interest, the debt rising and rising until the farmer cannot find his way out.

There are some who say debt adjustment is not necessary. "Why," they say, "the agriculturist is in the best position he ever had." The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven) shouted across the floor to me one evening that the farmers in my district were better off than they ever had been. I have here the quarterly bulletin of agricultural statistics, and at page 200 I find that the total cash income from the sale of farm products from January to June, 1942, as compared with the same period in 1941 decreased by 23 per cent. In spite of the fact that 1942 was one of the greatest years for the production of farm products, particularly in the west, the province of Saskatchewan shows the lowest increase in cash income of any province in the dominion, the increase in 1942 over 1940 being about twenty-five per cent, while in one other province it went as high as seventy-three per cent.

I know the argument which will be put forward by those who oppose this measure. They will say: You have to take care of credit and think of the widows and orphans who have put out their money in farm mortgages. I have examined some twenty cases taken at random, and I find that in only three of them was the farm mortgage held by private individuals, and that in every one of these cases where the creditor was an individual, an ordinary human being like the farmer who is working on the land, they recognized that there was such a thing as justice and made no injurious demand. But in the rest of the cases, where a mortgage or trust company were the creditors, that is where the injustice occurred.

The basis of the tremendous farm debt of the western provinces was the ten years of depression through which they went. The drought in those years should have been recognized as a national calamity, and national measures should have been taken to cope with it. There is no reason why debt should have been allowed to pile up in that period year after year. Surely the farmer suffered enough in those dried-out areas in those crop-less years without having to have everything taken away from them, with no relief provided for them with regard to their debt.

Some people may say: If you adjust farm debt, you will destroy farm credit. Well, it could not be hurt very much more than it is under the present system. If proper measures had been taken by the federal government the farmers would have paid off every cent of this Shylock-like indebtedness. We need an entirely new set-up with regard to farm credit, and federal funds should be available to agriculture on a production basis.

The farmers will pay their debts if they can. I have known farmers who have done without the necessities of life, gone without food and medical attention, and many of the things that ordinary people consider absolutely necessary, and starved their families, in order to pay interest. I have seen too many hundreds of good farmers lose their whole life's earnings for anyone to tell me that there is no need of debt legislation—and I do not mean bankrupt legislation.

Some people say: Leave the debt problem alone and it will work itself out. But notice this. As long as money is easy, prices are high and the farmers go into debt. As soon as money is tight, prices are low. A farmer goes into debt when wheat is worth $2 a bushel, as it was in the last war. A debt of $2,000 then means 1,000 bushels of grain to pay it off; but when grain goes down to 40 cents a bushel, to pay off his debt the farmer has to pay back 5,000 bushels of grain. There are, admittedly, some farmers who perhaps extended a little too much and who may not have been quite as saving as they should have been. But you do not need to talk about saving to the farmers of western Canada. They have saved and scrimped far more than anyone should have to do in this land of plenty. I know farmers in the west like the one who borrowed $8,000 and paid back $10,500. This particular farmer wrote to the lending company and asked, "How much do I owe now?" He got the reply "We will settle for $7,500." A friend of mine borrowed $1,700. He paid back $2,100 and I said to him, "You must be paid off now." He said, "Pretty nearly. All I owe now is $2,600." In the Prime Minister's constituency last fall I talked to a group of farmers and asked one how he was getting along. He said, "This is a great country. I came here thirty years ago and took a half-section of land all covered with bush, but there was no mortgage. To-day it is all covered with mortgage but no bush on it."

A debt conference of the western provinces was called which asked this government to do something to remedy the debt situation. But this legislation does not even recognize the basic causes of debt. Somebody has said something about the operation of the old act. If you study the figures, you will find that at the rate we are going, the act which has so far covered about 2½ per cent of the indebted farmers during each year of its operation, will take forty years to get them all dealt with, and there will be a new crop of debtors by that time.

I have attended the sittings of some of these boards, and the kind of thing I have heard has not given me very much confidence that conditions will be much better under this set-up. I sat in the court and listened to a man who was making his plea. He had hired a lawyer to present his case. The chairman said to the man, "How much is your debt?" The man replied, "It is $800 and I have paid back $650." "How much do you owe now?" asked the chairman. The man said, "I owe $1,100". "What do you want done about it?" The man replied, "I would like to get it down to six or seven hundred dollars." The chairman said, "What would be the good of that? Can you pay it off then?" The man said, "I think so. I work hard and want to get it cleared off." "When are you going to pay it off?" And the man replied "Just as soon as I get a good crop and a good price." The chairman said "When are you going to get a good crop?" "I do not know," the man replied, "it will be as soon as the Lord sends rain." Then the chairman asked, "When are you going to get a good price?" But the Minister of Finance was not there to tell him that.

It is not the farmer's fault. He labours on his farm. Why should all the risk be taken by the farmer? Why should labour always take the risk in that way? Does the farmer deserve no protection for all he has done in those years when he did all he could? I hold no brief for the farmer who is dishonest or for the man who will not work. Those things can be proved, and if a man has been found to be deliberately dishonest or unwilling to work I would say, let the courts take action in such cases. But where it has been proved that a man is not guilty of these things, he has a right to be secure on his land and to some recognition of the fact that he has toiled on his farm for practically a lifetime. Why is it that the law will permit a man who has paid all but a few hundred dollars of his debt to be foreclosed, and the creditor to take everything, recognizing nothing of those years of labour and toil which that man has put in? The same applies to a good many city dwellers, men who having bought a home, perhaps mortgaged the place to get the money to buy it, and have paid off all but a few hundred dollars when the property is foreclosed and they receive nothing. These things are wrong.

Let me also point to some of the adjustments which have been made under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. The minister may not know what kind of contracts the board sometimes makes with farmers. Here is a typical case: first, to get the farmer where he owes a couple of thousand dollars which he cannot pay under existing conditions; they then reduce it to $1,500, which also he cannot pay under existing conditions because he is not getting parity for his produce. They say, "Well, you sign a sort of crop-lease agreement. Under this one-third of your crop for the next three years is to be delivered to the creditor; we will sell it and the value will be credited to you, part to pay interest, and if anything remains, the balance to pay part of the principal. Then at the end of three years a readjustment of principal will be made on that basis. After that, for the next three years you are to pay three per cent of the principal and all of the interest. For the next three years you are to pay five per cent of the principal each year and all the interest. For the next three years you are to pay seven per cent of the principal and all the interest, whether you get a crop or not"—except in certain bad years where adjustments may be made—"and the next year you are to pay the balance of the principal and all the interest that is due, which is 55 per cent of the principal and all the interest." What does that amount to? As well as that, there are certain regulations which state that the creditor shall tell the farmer what he shall grow; how he shall farm the land; how much summer-fallow he shall put in each year. It may be that in the thirteenth year, when the farmer has to pay 55 per cent of the principal, the creditor will tell him to put in all summer-fallow so that he shall have nothing with which to pay the 55 per cent. That is a common settlement under the act, and that is why farmers do not flock to get all their debts adjusted under this set-up. It is nothing less than a thirteen-year sentence of servitude with a boss ordering you around and in the end you are to be foreclosed.

I suggest that, if you want to make this act something which will work, all farm debts, where application is made, should be adjusted after there has been a search to determine the extent to which the present debt is a result of crop failure, and in years when the farmer has no production over and above enough to sustain his family, no interest should be charged and there should be no interest charges compounded. Also, all excess charges which have been loaded on this farm debt should be carefully checked. When some of these mortgage and loan companies get a farmer in debt and send him a bill of what he owes on his mortgage, it makes interesting reading. I have here a copy of a bill which was sent to me, and which includes these items: first of all, interest, $320; interest on interest; insurance premium; another years' interest; interest on interest; interest on disbursement; interest on account January 1; inspection fees. Then he had to pay these amounts every year: interest on interest; inspection, $5; hail premiums, $29; insurance premiums, $28; interest on "loan sundries" to date—whatever those are—$320; interest on interest $37. All the inspections and other items which are set down here grow larger and larger. Interest climbs up, plus inspection fees, solicitor's fees, long distance calls and so forth. No wonder farmers' debts grow. When not paid, these are compounded.

In all contracts there should be a clause which permits a farmer who makes his living on that land to have some basic living costs which he can hold back, something on which his family can live decently. If you recognize that claim, it will be at least a step forward. There should be no interest in those years when his production does not bring him a sufficient income for this.

Further, I would say that there should be a provision, effective while the war is on, prohibiting foreclosure on any farmer whose son or hired man has been taken away from him, as has happened in so many cases. Foreclosure should not be permitted in respect of any farm where the state in this time of struggle has had to call upon the farmer to send his boy to the armed forces, or any such man who goes voluntarily. Surely those men who are willing to go and fight should receive legislative protection at least to the extent that there should be no foreclosure or issuance of writs permitted against their farms during that time or when the farmer is not allowed to deliver the produce of his toil. I have had cases of this kind in my own district. A farmer came to me and said, "Look at this. The sheriff is threatening to issue a writ against me, and I have to deliver that grain; yet the government tells me I cannot deliver it." As a result of a little correspondence I finally got them to say that they were not going to proceed with the business of foreclosure, because the farmer had the grain on the farm and could not deliver it, but he would have to pay the cost of issuing the writ.

I say to the minister, make some alterations in this bill in the interest of those who work and produce the good things of the world. Do something which will save these people in time of stress. Put a little real justice in this bill. If this government does not see its way to do that, it is time that it made way for a government that will.

Mr. J. H. SISSONS (Peace River): I wish to speak briefly on the principles of this bill and to support those principles, because I believe that they are advantageous to the farmer. I acted for farmers for twenty years before I went into politics. I expect to be acting for them many years after I am out of politics. I am only a small-town lawyer; I have no interest in the big interests or financial barons or the Dominion Mortgage and Investment association; I am interested only in the farmers of my constituency.

I was surprised at some of the attention paid this afternoon and this morning to memoranda and statements and briefs submitted by the Dominion Mortgage and Investment association. I certainly do not think these briefs merited anything like the attention which my hon. friends have given them.

Mr. QUELCH: We were judging by the results in the bill.

Mr. SISSONS: I am judging by the results of the bill. This is a bill not framed in the interests of financiers but framed entirely in the interests of the farmer.

The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) interrupts. He based his stand, as I understood it, on three points. One was that the courts have been substituted for the boards of review, and that in this way the costs would be increased and the sympathetic attitude which the boards of review had displayed would be lost; second, that there was failure to consider debts as a recurring problem; and third, that there was right of appeal, which would also, according to my hon. friend, add to the farmer's costs.

I am not going to bother to deal with the second of these points, but I wish to deal with the first and third. The second point raised by the hon. member was, as he admitted, a problem really beyond the scope of this bill; it was a problem concerning the whole question of western agriculture, of a market for western produce and of credit facilities. That is a problem, and I am entirely in sympathy with him so far as that is concerned. But it is certainly not a problem that can be dealt with in the consideration of this bill, and for that very reason I feel that ninety-nine per cent of what the hon. member who preceded me had to say was quite irrelevant to the discussion of the bill.

I wish to deal with the first point raised by the hon. member for Acadia, as to the courts having been substituted for the boards of review. The first thing a farmer does now under this bill is to file his proposal with the clerk of the court. I do not think for a moment that any member for Alberta would object to that, bearing in mind that these clerks of court have been the local representatives of the debt adjustment board. They are the men appointed by the province who have been acting for years past in the adjustment of debts in Alberta. They are men who know the local conditions and who have had considerable success in working out adjustments. Surely there is no man to whom my hon. friends from Alberta would rather have the proposal made than the clerk of the court. Certainly that is a feature of the new bill which in my view is very much superior to the old act.

From the clerk of the court, who replaces the official receiver, the proposal then goes to the district court judge. My hon. friends from Alberta apparently feel strongly that it should not go to the district court judge. Apparently they would prefer boards of review. I have had considerable experience with the workings of this act during the last nine years and I know how it works in my own area. We have a board of review that comes into the district possibly once a year—it has been usually once every two years. That board includes a supreme court judge, a lawyer, and a member representing the farmers. They come to my judicial district and stay there for about two days. They handle a dozen or more cases a day, often nineteen or twenty. They are not acquainted with local conditions; yet they make their proposals, and then they are gone. I do not think that is as satisfactory an arrangement as to have the proposal dealt with by the district court judge who is resident in the district, who is acquainted with the district and acquainted largely with the farmers of the district, and who has a responsibility and a duty to that community.

I would point out this to my hon. friends. When they are dealing with a district court judge they know exactly what they are dealing with. They are dealing with British justice, which has been hammered down over the centuries. When you are dealing with British justice and a Canadian court you know what you can expect. You know you can expect justice and fair play. I emphasize that, because there is a fundamental difference between a judgment of a court and a decision of an administrative board. Remember that a board is not bound by rules of evidence; it is not bound by court procedure. All that a board has to do, as I recall the law, is this: it must not act in a manner offensive to the general principles of justice.

I would point out that even the boards of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act had the right to hold and did hold meetings in secret, which is not permitted in any court of law. They heard confidential evidence, received confidential reports on the value of the land, and had the authority to receive and did receive confidential reports on the character of the farmer; and acting for that farmer you had no right to see that confidential report as to the value of the land or the confidential report as to the character of the farmer. That offended a fundamental principle of law, the main principle which all courts follow, that no man shall be tried or have his case determined without the right of seeing and hearing the evidence upon which he is tried or upon which his case is determined. There is a fundamental difference between a court and a board, and I find it strange and hard to believe that any hon. member, or anyone purporting to speak for farmers, would say that he would prefer such treatment for his farmers to the open and above-board treatment which the farmers can and do receive and must receive in any court of law.

The hon. member for Acadia said that the cost would be increased by this procedure of taking away the board of review and substituting the court, overlooking entirely the provision in the bill which states that no costs shall be payable.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It does not say that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Read section 43.

Mr. SISSONS: I will deal with the question of appeal later. Ordinarily, either in the hearing before the district court or in the hearing before the court of appeal, no costs are payable apart from exceptional cases, and the exceptional case is all to the benefit of the farmer. I will come to that later. My hon. friends also contend that the farmer would be handicapped. I would remind them that, as far as Alberta is concerned, the farmer will have assistance in preparing his case for the clerk of the court. He will have assistance, if he wishes it, before the district court judge; he will have assistance, if he wishes it, on appeal.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Provided by whom?

Mr. SISSONS: By the provincial government.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We are dealing with a federal act now.

Mr. SISSONS: At the last session of the provincial legislature bill No. 46 was passed, the debtors' assistance act. That provides for the setting up of a board to assist debtors. That board has been set up and is composed of the very men who formed the old Debtors' adjustment board.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What about the other provinces?

Mr. SISSONS: I am concerned only with my own province, the one I know best. Let other men worry about their respective provinces. I should like my hon. friend to pay attention to this clause, which reads:

The board shall have the following powers, duties and functions;

(a) to advise and assist debtors in adjusting their debts and in working out satisfactory arrangements;
(b) arrange meetings between debtors and creditors in endeavours to bring about amicable arrangements.

This is the paragraph I particularly have in mind:

(c) to advise and assist debtors in the preparation of any plan or scheme or settlement of their debts before any dominion board or court which may have been or may hereafter be set up for the settlement of debt.

That act was passed just a couple of months ago, and I think that section clearly indicates that Alberta anticipated that when this Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was being amended it would be so amended as to leave the working out of the act in the hands of the courts.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn) Would the hon. member not agree that that provision ought to be in the act and should apply to all provinces?

Mr. SISSONS: I should have to give some consideration to that, but it could be done under the regulations if it is desired. I am not so sure whether the farmers themselves will take advantage of that board; in fact, I do not think they will.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But it should be there.

Mr. SISSONS: I believe that my farmers would much rather have me act for them before the district court judge and before the court of appeal than they would this debtors' assistance board. But it is there and will be of help to the farmer if he needs any in the preparation of his case, either for the official receiver, before the district court, or before the court of appeal.

An hon. MEMBER: That is their privilege.

Mr. SISSONS: That is their privilege; it is there. The hon. member for Acadia referred to an argument which had been advanced, I believe he said by a mortgage association, that the act should be limited to efficient farmers. He should pay no attention to a contention like that, but he submitted it to the house. The hon. member went on to say that only dishonesty and rank idleness should be barred under this act. I think the act goes even a little farther. I do not think anything short of that is barred when it states that a proposal shall be based upon the present and prospective capabilities of a farmer to meet his debt, consideration being given to the productive value of the farm. That is the principle which is laid down for the guidance of the district court judge.

The district court is an inferior court, and in rendering his judgment the district court judge must show jurisdiction upon the face of his order; he must show on the face of the proposal which he makes that it was based on these considerations. The act certainly goes far enough to take care of most of the inefficient farmers. It takes care of the inefficient farmer on a good farm; it takes care of the efficient farmer on a poor farm; it considers the capabilities of the man and the productive value of his farm. It is not the productive value of that farm as joined to some other farming unit, or some other circumstances; it is the productive value of that farm as worked by that farmer, with his limited capabilities.

I do not think there can be anything stronger or fairer than that. I would expect that those opposed to this act would say that the provision goes very far. I think there can be brought under the provisions of the act the farmer who is idle, the farmer who may be somewhat inefficient, just so long as he has not acted in bad faith in the management of his farm or the disbursement of his income. There would have to be fairly strong evidence to keep any farmer outside those provisions.

My hon. friends object to the provision for appeal. I want an appeal for the sake of the farmer. I am not interested in any mortgage company, but I do want an appeal for the farmer. If that provision to which I have referred was not loaded in favour of the farmer, I might agree that we should not have an appeal. But we have a provision which is loaded in favour of the farmer in that the district court judge must base the proposal upon the present and prospective capabilities of the farmer and the productive value of the farm. The district court judge must furnish the appeal court with a statement of all the information upon which he bases his decision. If a proposal shows on its face that the district court judge did not base his decision upon those ingredients, then I want the right of appeal. I want the right to go to the appeal court and be able to say that the district court judge erred, that he based his proposal upon something which is not favourable to my client. I do not think there is any doubt about what would happen; the proposal would be corrected until it was based upon the foundation set out in the act.

Then there is the question of cost. My hon. friend interrupted me a moment ago to say that there would be certain circumstances under which costs might be given against the farmer.

Mr. QUELCH: I had in mind the costs of a farmer represented by a lawyer.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Which are considerable.

Mr. QUELCH: Could be considerable.

Mr. SISSONS: Where you have dealings before the board of review or before the court, in the province of Alberta, in which my hon. friend resides, the debtors' board takes over that responsibility.

Mr. QUELCH: It is a federal responsibility nevertheless.

Mr. SISSONS: The costs we are dealing with would be insignificant when you take the picture as a whole.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If you cannot pay them, they are not.

Mr. SISSONS: I do not know what the farmer friends of my hon. friend are like, but I have been acting for farmers for over twenty years and they have paid me. Of course, I may have in the Peace River district farmers who are superior to those in certain parts of Saskatchewan, for I certainly could not picture my farmers as being of the type that have been referred to as living in certain parts of Saskatchewan.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is a pity they did not demonstrate that when they were voting.

Mr. SISSONS: They did. I want that appeal provision left in the bill, because it is in the interests of the farmers, and that settles the matter as far as I am concerned.

I find that in its broad principles this is a bill which I can absolutely approve, because I believe it to be in the interests of the farmer for the most part, though not entirely.

Here I come to a strange thing. I am very much surprised that the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) did not draw the attention of the house to one feature which in my view is not a fair provision to have inserted in this measure. If they did mention it I shall apologize to them, but certainly I did not hear them. I refer to the entirely new principle contained in section 33, which I consider is inconsistent with the other provisions of the bill, and which I believe is bad in law, unfair to the farmer, detrimental to the public interest, and altogether impractical and unworkable.

Mr. BOUCHER: It loads the dice the other way, does it?

Mr. SISSONS: It is a principle which I do not think should be in this bill, but my hon. friends passed it by entirely. They attacked provisions of the bill which can be well defended, but overlooked entirely a provision under which every proposal that has been made by a court of review must be brought before the courts again if a sale is made within five years from the time the proposal was confirmed.

Mr. QUELCH: If I may ask the hon. member a question, if he is opposed to that principle why did he not oppose a similar provision in the Veterans' Land Act?

Mr. SISSONS: I admit that this provision is in that act, and that may be an argument which will be advanced in support of its insertion in this bill, but I do not think that is sound ground for adopting this principle.

Mr. QUELCH: But the hon. member never opposed it in the Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. SISSONS: I quite agree, and an argument can be put up in favour of it. However, I do not think the position under the Veterans' Land Act and the position under this measure can be compared at all; and even if there were arguments why such provision should be inserted in the Veterans' Land Act, I do not consider that those arguments apply with equal validity to this bill. There is that one provision of the bill which I do not like, but taking it as a whole I want to say that I most heartily approve the principles of the measure. I think they are a vast improvement over any provincial debt adjustment acts we have had in the past, and a great improvement over the old Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I intend to support this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Edwards in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to say a few words on the bill in general. I am not going to take very long at this time, because we shall be able to take up the various items in detail as we go along, but generally speaking I think this bill is not as good as the old act, for several reasons which have been pointed out already and into which I am not going in detail. The only feature that I think is perhaps an improvement over the old act is the fact that Manitoba is included. The hon. member for Peace River was speaking of the concessions that were made under a bill passed by the Alberta legislature, and he said he was not concerned about the other provinces but was primarily interested in the province of Alberta. In considering a measure of this kind, I do not think it is proper for any federal member to consider only how it will affect his own province. Legislation of this kind should be general, and should apply to all parts of Canada. Therefore I think the minister is to be congratulated upon this one point, in any event.

One objection I should like to make is to the fact that only one proposal can be made. I am not going to begin to recite all the cases I could mention, for I believe I could keep the committee here for a week if I brought down my files and went through the cases of this kind that have come to my attention. Many of these personal incidents have been pointed out; I think they are very much the same in all three prairie provinces, at all events, so that I do not see that any good purpose would be served in bringing down further cases of the same kind. Supposing a proposal is made which becomes unsatisfactory to the debtor as a result of circumstances over which he has no control. For instance, there might be an emergency year, when the government would recognize that the individual farmer was not to blame for his inability to meet his debts. That possibility is completely ignored under this bill. Surely it is unjust to say there may be only one proposal, and not take into account the possibility of circumstances arising, such as drouth, hail, or destruction of the crop in some other way. Under this act only one agreement or composition can be made. It may be that the farmer undertakes to pay $500 a year in reduction of the principal and interest at five per cent; then it may happen that the farmer is hailed out. How in common sense could the farmer pay that $500 a year? On the face of it that is ridiculous, and I am sure hon. members of this committee will not permit such a provision to remain in the bill. I believe that since this has been drawn to the minister's attention, he will see the absurdity of having such a clause in the bill, and an adjustment will be made. There are many other cases in which the farmer may be placed in a position where it is utterly impossible for him to pay. For instance, in war time he may be a grain farmer, raising wheat, a delivery quota which is set by the dominion government. How can he dispose of sufficient crop to take care of that payment? "Oh, well," someone may say, "when the court is setting this proposal they will consider his quota." But the point is that the government here may see fit to change that quota. For instance, the farmer may have fourteen bushels this summer; then later in the fall the regulation may be changed to the point where he would have only a five-bushel quota. Yet the act says definitely that there shall be only one proposal, only one settlement, and that the farmer is obliged to comply with that.

It will be seen that the farmer is placed in an impossible position, and that he has no alternative. The proposal has been completed and agreed to, and therefore he has no recourse whatever. I might even go so far as to say that I think this is purely mortgage companies' legislation—and in that statement I want to be fair. As I see it, everything is set to favour the creditor.

Let us review the situation for a moment. One proposal is to be made. I believe it will be generally recognized that when the courts are setting these proposals they will take into consideration the financial circumstances of the farmer, the prices prevailing and the general market conditions. The settlement will be made on that basis. If it is agreeable to the company, they will let it go; and in those circumstances it would probably be agreeable to the farmer. But if it is not agreeable to the company, then the company will appeal. I think hon. members of the committee will understand, generally speaking, that if one has an insurance policy on his car, and has an accident, the general policy of the insurance company is to appeal, or to take the insured to court, if the owner is not satisfied with their offer of settlement. Of course they run the chance of not coming out on top, but they can afford to do that. They may lose some cases, but from the point of view of principle, they will go to the courts. They do that, because in all cases they have one or two solicitors hired continuously to handle their litigation. I am not complaining about that, because it is a matter of good business procedure. But the fact remains that in every instance the company will be in a position to appeal. On the other hand, the farmer is not in that position. It will cost him money every time an appeal is lodged, and he just cannot afford that extra expense.

I believe the principle behind the measure is wrong. Rather than forcing the farmer to pay, the purpose should be to keep the farmer on the farm. Especially in wartime the government, I suggest, should follow the principle of keeping the farmers where they can produce the goods required. One might say, "Oh, well, these will be only occasional cases." But that is not so, when one considers the number of farms in western Canada on which there are mortgages.

The hon. member for Peace River referred to costs. I shall not deal with that point other than to say that the matter of costs is dealt with in section 37. It is true the section does say:

No costs shall be awarded on any application, motion or hearing before the court or the appeal court—

That is, no costs shall be made on any application before the court of appeal, except —and then it goes on to give some exceptions. So that there may be costs attached to this.

Mr. EDWARDS: Read the rest of the section.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It states:

. . . except that the appeal court may, if of opinion that there were no reasonable grounds for bringing an appeal. . . .

And so on. Of course that is decided entirely by the court. If they contend that there were no reasonable grounds for appeal, the charges will be allowed. So that there is the liability of paying costs.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. member like that exception taken out?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No; I think the exception is all right.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so, too.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But the point I am trying to make is that there is a matter of costs to consider. When we start adding costs to a farmer we are placing him in an awkward and difficult position. I shall go on to read the whole of the section, so that it may all appear on the record. It is as follows:

. . . except that the appeal court may, if of opinion that there were no reasonable grounds for bringing an appeal, order the appellant to pay the costs of any other party appearing on the appeal.

Mr. ABBOTT: To pay the farmers' costs, if the creditor brought a frivolous appeal.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And it could be reversed the other way.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is purely discretionary.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, but the payment of costs depends entirely upon what the court decides in that regard. But to say there are no costs is definitely wrong. However, I shall not discuss further items in the bill, because they will be discussed when we come to them.

One other point I wish to make in passing is the lack of regard given to the western debt conference proposals by those who drew up this legislation. That is very serious, because as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Acadia, that was not a political conference, in any sense of the word. In fact, it was about as conglomorate as one could find. There were Social Crediters from Alberta and Liberals from Saskatchewan; and the representation from Manitoba consisted of two groups. Those three governments got together, and after extended and deliberate consideration of the debt problem, from the point of view of the three agricultural provinces, and after a great deal of careful consideration, deliberation and thought, the draft bill was drawn up. I have them before me, but I shall not go into them, because the hon. member for Acadia placed them on the record.

The conference went to a tremendous amount of work and, with one exception, namely where they expressed their desire that Manitoba be brought in, not one of the proposals was accepted. When legislation is especially designed for the three prairie provinces, and when at a conference are found representatives of a Social Credit government, a Liberal government, and another government of combined Conservative and Liberal members; when we find representatives of those groups getting together and drawing up what they consider to be the type of legislation most suitable and applicable to the prairie provinces, and when we find the government at Ottawa ignoring all these facts, then it seems to me that that is the wrong way to give satisfaction to the people for whom the legislation was intended.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN ALLIANCE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on bill No. 54, to incorporate Canadian Alliance Insurance Company—Mr. McIlraith—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Classes of insurance authorized.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not see war risk insurance listed here. Is there any reason why it should be left out?

Mr. LALONDE: I have been asked to sponsor this bill in the absence of Mr. McIlraith. The bill is in the standard form, and the only question raised except as to the name was with respect to the amount required to carry on different kinds of insurance. The bill has been approved by the superintendent of insurance and has been drawn up in accordance with the standard form.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why is war risk insurance not covered by the incorporating clause?

Mr. LALONDE: I received the bill just a few moments ago. I think section 6 speaks for itself. A company cannot go outside the different classes of insurance enumerated here. War risk insurance is not among the classes of insurance covered.

Mr. ILSLEY: War risk insurance within the Dominion of Canada is conducted wholly by the Dominion of Canada. No company on its own behalf carries on the business of war risk insurance within the dominion. It may have the power in its charter to carry on the business of war risk insurance outside the dominion, but if this company does not desire that power I do not know that we should be concerned with giving it to them.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not concerned with giving them the power. I was simply asking for information.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Subscription and payment of capital before commencing business.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The first sentence of subsection 1 says that the company shall not commence any business of insurance until at least $100,000 has been paid up, and it may then transact fire insurance, falling aircraft insurance, earthquake insurance, and so forth. These are also covered by clause 6. Is there any need for this repetition, or is there something included in subsection 1 of section 7 that is not covered by section 6?

Mr. LALONDE: This is simply a restriction on the capital with respect to special classes of insurance. The company cannot commence to cover these special risks without having $100,000 in cash.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Can it carry on any of the business covered by section 6 before it has $100,000 paid up?

Mr. LALONDE: No; I do not think the company can carry on any other business than those included in section 6.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In section 7?

Mr. LALONDE: Sections 7 and 6.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Why, then, are the insurances which are mentioned in section 6 repeated in section 7, subsection 1? For instance, fire insurance is mentioned in both.

Mr. ILSLEY: It stipulates the conditions.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member will find that section 6 is merely enumerative of the classes of insurance that the company will have power to carry on, and then section 7 says it shall not carry on insurance of any of these classes until it has $250,000 subscribed and $100,000 paid. When that is done it can carry on part of the undertakings mentioned in section 6, but before being authorized to carry on the others it has to comply with the additional conditions.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The hon. member will thank the minister for that.

UKRAINIAN FRATERNAL SOCIETY OF CANADA

The house in committee on bill No. 68, to incorporate the Ukrainian Fraternal Society of Canada.—Mr. Hlynka.—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Convention of the society.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I have some explanation from the sponsor of this bill as to what is meant by:

(1) The society shall be governed by a convention which shall constitute the final legislative and governing body of the society.

Is the convention a sort of executive body, or what does it mean?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is defined in the next subsection.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think subsection 2 answers my question.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to have some further explanation as to that convention, as to how often it is going to meet. It merely mentions "a convention."

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the meaning of "supreme arbitration court"?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: There are a number of unusual terms and provisions in the constitution and the convention, and I wonder what is the meaning of " supreme arbitration court." But I am not objecting to the bill.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Temporary directors.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am not objecting to this bill, either, but I believe that we should have some explanation of it and that the hon. member who is sponsoring it would like to have an opportunity of explaining it. I suggest that the bill be postponed until later in the agenda, so that the hon. member in whose name it stands will be here to deal with it. I believe he will be in the chamber in a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must understand that I have not the right to suspend this debate.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member has not raised that objection; he has only asked that it be put on to the end of this discussion.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am willing to let the section carry.

The CHAIRMAN: It will have to be with unanimous consent. Is the section carried?

BETHEL FULL GOSPEL ASSEMBLY

The house in committee on bill No. 109, to incorporate Bethel Full Gospel Assembly—Mr. Reid—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On section 15—Investment of funds.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: May I ask the sponsor to explain the last clause?

Mr. REID: What does the hon. member wish to have explained?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think it is disgraceful that these bills should be passed in this way. I wish to object. The bills are called more rapidly than members can find the numbers of the bills, and any effort to find out where we are is met with criticism.

Mr. REID: I hope the hon. member is not referring to me. I have been following the bill clause by clause. I am never left behind like that.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was referring to the way in which the bills are put through, and I still think it is wrong. I am not referring to any remarks the hon. member made.

The CHAIRMAN: The word "disgraceful" has been used in the committee. I would point out that these bills have all been discussed on two different occasions. They have been before the special committee.

Mr. CRERAR: I think it should be pointed out to the hon. member that all these bills we are considering were before the private bills committee and received careful consideration there. It is quite obvious that we have not an opportunity to study the bills in detail as they are passed here in this committee, but I think all hon. members will agree that the private bills committee was the committee that should give them careful scrutiny, and it did.

Mr. MacNICOL: Were they not passed by the senate also?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Unless this procedure has some meaning, it is farcical to carry it on. I was a member of the private bills committee, and it happened that other committees were sitting at the same time which I attended. But even the fact that these bills have been considered by the private bills committee does not mean that members should not be given time to look through their bills to see what is being passed.

Mr. KNOWLES: In connection with the bill we have just dealt with, as well as the previous bill, may I say that the committee on private bills made certain amendments. Is it not possible for us to have before us copies of the amended bill. I happen to know that the amendments were made, but not all hon. members are in that position.

The CHAIRMAN: The bills were read as amended.

Mr. KNOWLES: But they are not before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; they are on the file.

The CHAIRMAN: They were all distributed on July 8.

Mr. McCANN: He needs an assistant.

MARION ELLEN TOPP DORE

The house in committee on bill No. 23, for the relief of Marion Ellen Topp Dore—Mr. Casselman—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask for an explanation of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No. I have asked for an explanation and I want an explanation. I presume the hon. member sponsoring the bill is in his seat.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

FREDERICK HUBERT FAIRBANKS

The house in committee on bill No. 25, for the relief of Frederick Hubert Fairbanks—Mr. Hill—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am going to object again. Either I am right, or I am wrong.

An hon. MEMBER: Wrong.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: When the members have had their amusement I will continue. I cannot pronounce the name, but the bill is under the name of Mr. Whitman.

The CHAIRMAN: The bill to which the hon. member refers has already been passed. We are now on Bill No. 25.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: According to my copy of Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day, Monday, July 19, order No. 25 stands in the name of the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Whitman).

The CHAIRMAN: That bill has been passed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have asked for an explanation. I should like to know who is this man Lazarowitz Cohen.

The CHAIRMAN: This evidence was taken before a committee of the senate where it was thoroughly discussed, and a decision given on all these bills.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have been waiting for that opportunity for a long time. Can another place decide how I am to vote in this house?

The CHAIRMAN: A committee of this house has also discussed the evidence.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is another place to tell me how I am going to vote? I want to know the details. I am interested in this. I will be frank and admit that previously I wanted to embarrass a certain member from Montreal, but now I want to know how another place is going to tell me how I am to vote? This bill will be tied up if it takes me two weeks to get an explanation, because that other place is not telling me how I am going to vote, when we have wasted the time of the House of Commons for two or three weeks on these bills.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No; I have asked for an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member objects to its being carried, I shall have to ask for a vote: Those in favour, please say, aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

The CHAIRMAN: Those against, please say, nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have no idea what this calling of "yeas" and "nays" is about. We have not heard the motion; we have heard nothing at this end of the chamber. We have witnessed a conversation going on across the benches. It seems to me that the hon. member for Fraser Valley is asking for some information with regard to this bill, and he is entirely within his rights to do so as a member of the house before he casts his vote for or against it. I should like to know what we are voting on, because I have not heard any motion whatsoever. May we have the motion read?

Mr. DONNELLY: The sponsor of this bill is not in the house at the present time to give an explanation. All these divorce bills have been heard by a senate committee where evidence was taken under oath. That evidence was printed and sent to every member of this house. If anyone does not know what took place, all he has to do is to look up his file and read the evidence. And not only that, but there is a private bills committee of this house. Two members of that committee attend at the sittings of the senate committee to listen to the conduct of these cases and to report back any proceedings which they do not think are being handled properly. The sponsor of this particular bill is not here at the moment.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am referring to bill No. 25, sponsored by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Whitman).

An hon. MEMBER: That has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN: This is bill No. 25. Bill No. 24 has been passed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is bill No. 25 the next one?

The CHAIRMAN: We are on Bill No. 25. Shall section 1 carry?

JOSEPH FERNAND ST. LOUIS

The house in committee on bill No. 33, for the relief of Joseph Fernand St. Louis—Mr. MacInnis—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I presume I am in order at this time. I ask the hon. member to explain.

Mr. WHITMAN: I am at a loss to understand why the hon. member for Fraser Valley should have such an interest in these divorces. This bill appeared before the senate committee and the evidence was fully discussed. A copy of the evidence was presented to the hon. member for Fraser Valley, and if he was interested in this particular divorce he could have got all the information he needed since it was available to him or to any other hon. member. I have not any further information to give him than was given before the committee. I am at a loss to understand why he wants any further information. If he had read the evidence he would have the full facts before him.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I appreciate the lecture given me by the hon. member for Mount Royal, but I presumed that when a bill was sponsored by a member he would be conversant with the facts, and would not base his decision upon what he had read or upon hearsay evidence. I am not a lawyer, but I know that hearsay evidence is not the law, that evidence is not what one has read or heard. I do not want to ask too many questions of the hon. member, but I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) agrees with the stand I am taking. I am being told that because some evidence comes before me in a certain form from another place I am supposed to vote. Parliament is supreme and I believe I am entitled to this information. I may have been somewhat annoying to my hon. friend before, but this is really serious. I do not want to go back to my riding and tell my people that I am asked to make a decision in this chamber on some evidence that is handed to me in printed form. I do not always agree with my hon. friends to my left whom I sometimes accuse of taking up time in this chamber in discussing matters not concerning farmers, but thousands and thousands of dollars have been spent on printing such nonsense as these reports. We are asked to consider them and base our decision upon what has occurred in some other chamber or some other place. I am expected to take what they offer in the form of evidence as being right. I strongly object to doing that. I think at least my hon. friends to my left will be with me, even though my hon. friends in one or two provinces may be afraid to agree with me.

LEO GUAY

The house in committee on bill No. 88, for the relief of Leo Guay—Mr. Tomlinson—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I respectfully ask Mr. Chairman, that consideration of this bill be deferred and that you continue with the others, for the reason that in the private bills committee a vote was taken which, as I recall it, was six to five. Under these circumstances we feel that this bill should receive further consideration by the members of this house.

The CHAIRMAN: I must say to the hon. member for Wellington South that this is the last bill for consideration in committee and third reading; the other bills are for second reading.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say this, that these bills have gone through quickly to-night. I should like to associate myself with those who have made at least some token opposition with respect to the passage of some of them. I am pleased that the hon. member for Wellington South, and some other hon. members who have spoken, have shown at least that this is an independent institution, operating under our parliamentary system. If nothing else has been accomplished to-night in the great rush of legislation, at least through this medium we have established our position, so far as the independence of the House of Commons is concerned.

It is all very well to rush these bills through, but the public does not understand the situation when so many pieces of legislation are going through so quickly. They have no idea that these matters have been dealt with in other places. But, whether they have been or not, I say that does not relieve us or discharge us from our duty of dealing with these bills in this house as we see fit.

In most instances there is no need for opposition to the bills. The terms in respect of them are well understood. Nevertheless I say it is important that this House of Commons shall not take for granted decisions which have been made in other places, or made even by committees of this house. The point now taken by the hon. member for Wellington South ought to be taken into consideration by this committee, if there is any doubt with respect to it. If that does exist, then it ought to be given proper consideration.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was waiting until these bills had been read before rising to make a similar protest. Some of us have protested about this procedure year after year. This practice is really a reflection upon our whole system of government. To-night I believe we have passed something like seventy-five bills in about half an hour. True, these bills have been discussed in another place, but if we pass the bills to-night we are taking the responsibility for dissolving about ninety marriages. I say that responsibility is one which should not be imposed upon the House of Commons or upon this parliament. It is about time we got down to a consideration of ways and means of removing this blot from parliament itself. I am not one who does not believe that there are occasions when the compulsory living together of people may be a crime against society. But I do say that this method of dealing with divorce cases in Canada is a scandal, so far as this country is concerned, and one which ought to be stopped. I want to join in the protest made by the leader of the opposition.

I am not so sure that I can support the objection by the hon. member for Wellington South, because I know nothing about the matter. Someone will say, "Why do you not read the evidence?" Well, I must confess I never have had the time to read the printed evidence in these cases. I doubt very much whether any hon. member has read the printed evidence in respect of the cases we have before us to-night; and I rather suspect that if we did read the evidence in the ninety cases, we would find that in all it was pretty much along the same lines—which, also, I think, is rather a scandalous condition.

I join in the protest which has been made. A similar protest is made year after year. As I said last year, if this were peace time instead of war time, I would demand that every one of these bills be discussed, clause by clause, and passed separately. In that way we might take up so much of the time of the house that the house might eventually decide that there could be another way of handling this problem. To-night we have made our protest again, one which I think is quite proper. As I have said, this procedure is a blot on the institution of parliament, and it imposes upon members of parliament a responsibility which only judges in our civil courts, in the provinces which deal with these cases, ought to have placed upon them. In my opinion this house, in any event, should not be called upon to assume that responsibility.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I just add one further word. There is no reason that comes to my mind why we should be faced with so many bills at one particular sitting of the house. That is a point which I thought perhaps the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar might mention, but one which apparently he overlooked. We have no right to be asked in an hour's time devoted to the passage of private bills, in the last week of a session, to deal with so many bills. It is impossible to give them the attention to which they are entitled. Without directing any special criticism to the government in this respect, I say that I hope it will not permit this to happen at another session, because it is not fair to the committee and it is not fair to the public, when they read a report of a sitting of this kind.

Mr. BLAIR: I am sure hon. members do not wish to have all these divorce bills trailed through the house, and have all this vulgarity and slander discussed before the house day after day. I believe hon. members are looking for some job which we should not have to do. These matters could be left with the senate, very easily, and with our own parliamentary committee. I would seriously object to having this trailed through the House of Commons, and taken up, day after day, before the general public. It is something which should be discussed in camera.

Mr. GRAYDON: Either we should deal with it, or we should not deal with it; that is my point.

Mr. CRERAR: I sympathize with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in the point he has raised. However, I do not know that this is the proper stage at which to raise it, namely when we are discussing the passage of these bills.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do it every year.

Mr. CRERAR: Undoubtedly it would be much better if some other procedure could be found for dealing with these cases, rather than have them dealt with as we deal with them in the house to-day. We could, of course, discuss each bill. There might be some merit in the hon. member's suggestion that we should so tax the patience of the house that some other way would be brought about for dealing with them. But, after all, it appears to me this is not the proper time to raise that point.

In regard to the point raised by the leader of the opposition, these private bills have stood over from time to time. Ordinarily we take an hour each week for the discussion of private bills. But the amount of work which has been brought before the house as a result of the war, including the war appropriation measure, the discussion of which has so far required over twelve weeks, has precluded the possibility of having these bills considered in the ordinary way. That is why they are being considered to-night. I do not think my hon. friend's objection is on very solid ground in that respect.

Mr. REID: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has mentioned having these cases decided in the courts. I would point out, however, when the courts are mentioned, that any who have visited the courts when these cases have been heard will realize how little consideration is given in those courts. I have seen them go through the courts in two minutes, which is far less time than when they are considered by a committee of this house.

Mr. GRAHAM: I believe the hon. member for Wellington South was referring to bill No. 88. I would join in his request that that bill be not dealt with to-night, because there are some matters in connection with it requiring further consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: In answer to the hon. member for New Westminster I would say that the last person in public life in Canada who dared say something about the courts, and their consideration of cases, received at once from the Minister of Justice the threat that he would apply censorship. I just tell my hon. friend that he had better watch out.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. FAIR: On behalf of this group I wish to add my protest.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nine o'clock.

Mr. FAIR: On behalf of the Social Credit party I wish to add my protest to those who have already protested to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nine o'clock.

Mr. FAIR: Since I have been a member of parliament I have seen these bills rushed through in the same way they are being rushed to-night It is now time to take some stand, and have these bills dealt with in the proper manner.

Motion agreed to.

FARMERS' CREDITORS

CONSOLIDATION OF ARRANGEMENT ACT OF 1934 AND AMENDMENTS

The house resumed in committee on bill No. 132, to facilitate compromises and arrangements between insolvent farmers and their creditors.—Mr. Ilsley.—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When the house rose at six o'clock I had been expressing my regret that the government had taken no notice of the recommendations of the western debt conference in drafting this bill. It seems unfortunate now that the three prairie provinces went to all the trouble of studying economic conditions in regard to agriculture and calling a convention in Saskatchewan to confer on matters relating to debt adjustment only to find, after all their trouble, that their recommendations received no recognition except in the one instance by the inclusion of the province of Manitoba.

I had also made reference to the fact that under this bill only one proposal is allowed. Once a proposal is made and the terms of the agreement are fixed, no matter what new conditions may arise, whether it be a crop failure on account of drought, grasshoppers, hail or for any other reason, there can be no revision of that proposal. That one proposal stands and cannot be changed.

The Minister of Finance the other day, speaking of agricultural prices, said that he believed it was next to impossible to set parity prices for farm products, because costs of production varied so much from farm to farm and from province to province. Following the minister's own argument in that regard, surely he must see the discrimination that will result from a bill such as this which provides no opportunity to revise a proposal from time to time as conditions change. If, as has been indicated, this bill is to put things on a business basis; if the farmers will have to conduct their agricultural operations on a businesslike basis, surely we must make it possible for the farmers to meet their obligations on a business basis. It is ridiculous to ask agriculture to be the only industry in Canada that is not working on a business basis, not because the farmers themselves are to blame, but because the government refuses to give them parity prices. We must put the blame where the blame belongs. There is no other industry in Canada that is not receiving its cost of production and a fair commission. Take, for instance, the aircraft industry, or the automobile industry, which is now producing transport vehicles for the armed forces, or take a gun factory, or anything you like, and you will find that every one of these industries is working on a business basis and receiving cost of production plus a fair commission. That does not mean that an aircraft plant in Montreal that may be making the Bolingbroke is getting the same price as a Toronto factory making the Bolingbroke, because the costs will vary with each plant. Nevertheless both plants get the cost of production plus a fair commission. Now apply that to agriculture whose costs, according to the Minister of Finance, vary from place to place and from one province to another. The cost of production in Saskatchewan may be different from the cost of production in Alberta or in Manitoba, and the cost of production at one point in a province may be different from the cost of production at another point. Yet, if it is possible to give the cost of production and a fair commission to other industries whose costs vary from place to place and province to province, why should it not be possible to do that for agriculture?

Now we are saying to the farmers by this bill: We are going to make a proposal and we are going to make you live up to it. Then I think in all fairness to all parties concerned we must make it possible for these proposals to be revised from time to time.

There is another thing that I think is exceedingly unfair. By section 7 of the bill the cut-off date is made December 31, 1938. Section 7 states:

> Where a farmer . . . is unable to meet his debts as they become due, if two-thirds of the total amount thereof are owing by him in respect of debts incurred before the first day of May, 1935, he may make a proposal under this act for a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement.

If you make the cut-off date December 31, 1938, it is unfair to recognize only two-thirds of the debts incurred before the first day of May, 1935. It would not be quite so bad if the government said that December 31, 1938, was to be the cut-off date for all debts incurred up to that time. I cannot understand why, when the cut-off date is made December 31, 1938, a farmer's whole debt up to that date is not included. The proposal here is exceedingly unfair, because agriculture has not had the same treatment as other industries in this country. Since 1938 the farmer has had to pay higher prices for the things he has to buy. He has sold his products at less than cost of production. Surely we should have brought the debt adjustment up to date and made it at least to 1942. I cannot see why we should have brought it up to the beginning of the war and then stopped there. I think the minister should consider changing this section to bring these debts up to 1942; or, failing that, the least he could do would be to make the full adjustment of the debt up to December 31, 1938.

I am not going to discuss the general principle of the bill any longer, but will content myself with dealing with the sections as they come up.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I assume that this is the only opportunity one will have to ask certain general questions that would not arise in connection with the several sections. I should like to know why the Central Mortgage Bank Act, which was assented to on June 3, 1939, under which the government was given the power to cooperate with lending institutions in the reduction of debt and in providing a considerable sum of money in order to permit farmers to borrow money or to have their debts amortized at a low rate of interest, has not been brought into effect. Under that act the farmer would have been given an opportunity to have his debt written down by agreement; he would have been given the privilege of borrowing money at a low rate of interest; and in that way the measure, operated in connection with the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, would have been of great advantage to the farmers of western Canada as a whole. That act has been on the statute books now for over four years. It represented, I think, a serious endeavour on the part of the government to meet the situation prevailing in the western provinces and generally throughout Canada, and I should like an explanation from the minister why it has not been made operative. Had it been, it would have proved of inestimable value to farmers finding themselves in a position where they are unable to meet their debts in full. It would have given them an opportunity to consolidate their debt at a rate of interest which would have made payment possible.

Mr. ILSLEY: In my opening statement to-day I dealt briefly with the matter of the central mortgage bank. The language I used was, I think, this:

> Due to the outbreak of war in September, 1939, this act has never been brought into force, and it was not considered advisable to implement it during the war years because of the uncertainties which the war interjected into such fundamental matters as the values of farm lands and the real value of farm income. Moreover it was considered that the national credit must be utilized to the full in the prosecution of the war.

When the war broke out it was not possible to foresee what might happen to farm values. A great deal of work was done in valuing farms in western Canada in 1939, and it was on the basis of those values that the mortgages were to be adjusted under the central mortgage bank legislation. Moreover, the act entailed a large obligation on the government. I was not Minister of Finance at that time, and I do not know too much about the central mortgage bank legislation, but my recollection is that it meant a payment of $200,000,000 or something like that to lending institutions.

Then, of course, the act was very controversial. A great many hon. members were opposed to it; and it did not seem to be the appropriate thing during a war, when values were certainly not static, and when values which farm lands might take on would not necessarily bear much relation to the values set in 1939 for the purposes of the act, to go ahead with the act.

The act was a most difficult one to put into operation. It would require a large organization. My recollection is that it also involved a widespread writing-down of interest rates on mortgages in the cities. Altogether, the problems raised and the difficulties entailed were so great that it seemed to be inappropriate to proceed with the act in an unsettled period such as war time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In view of the wide changes which are now being made in the present act, is it not considered appropriate now to bring that act into operation in order to render more effective the bill before the committee?

While I am on my feet there is another general question I should like to ask; it has to do with the order in council which was passed, including the terms of section 15, subsection 1 of a statute of Saskatchewan, in order to enable the provincial debt adjustment boards to protect the farmer from actions. Is it the intention of the government to continue that order in council in effect until the conclusion of the war?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would ask, if it is, why were its provisions not included in this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: The only way they could be included in the bill would be by fixing a period during which they would be in operation. That would be the only section of the bill which would have any such limitation in it. The bill is a continuing measure, while the other is limited to the duration of the war. That is, it must be limited to the duration of the War Measures Act. The War Measures Act will be in force until there is a proclamation by the government declaring that the war is at an end, and it is the intention of the government that this order in council shall remain in force until that time. But when I say that, I am not giving an undertaking. The terms of the order in council themselves indicate that that is the intention, because the order in council, if I remember correctly, admits the desirability of keeping efficient producers on the land for the duration of the war. But I have no right; I have no power to bind the government of Canada as such not to change that order in council, or for that matter, any order in council. All I can say is that it is the present intention of the government to leave that order in council in force as long as the War Measures Act is in operation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the minister secured an opinion from the Department of Justice as to whether or not the debt adjustment legislation now in effect in Saskatchewan is valid, when taken in conjunction with the order in council passed by the governor in council pursuant to the War Measures Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think we did secure any such opinion, but the general assumption is that the privy council decision was a decision that the debt adjustment legislation of the western provinces was ultra vires. It may be that some sections of that legislation are intra vires, and while I did not go into the matter thoroughly it occurred to me, and I remember arguing at one conference, that possibly the section of the Saskatchewan act which is reproduced by this order in council was itself intra vires inasmuch as it was a step to be taken in proceeding and that it was different from the legislation which was impeached by the privy council. But my own argument did not altogether convince me and it certainly did not convince others. I do not know whether it is intra vires or ultra vires, but what is the difference? We can deal with it effectively under the War Measures Act and we did so, and there is no question about a measure passed under the War Measures Act being intra vires.

Mr. GRAHAM: On rising to speak to this particular piece of legislation, I have been wondering whether the farmers of Saskatchewan need to be more on guard against the hon. gentlemen who sit in the two parties to the extreme left of yourself, Mr. Chairman, or the so-called big interests who are pictured as such a plague to western Canada. I feel that those in this house who take the individual extreme case and upon that case paint a picture of utter destitution and utter futility of attempting to cure by reasonable methods the ills of the people of western Canada must alienate to a considerable extent the intelligent opinion of members of this house and of the people generally who reside in provinces other than the three western provinces. I am proud to say that I have followed the course of this legislation with a great deal of interest and with one desire only, namely, to be of practical use and to further the attempt to meet the real necessity that faces the people particularly of my own province.

We have heard about the necessity of this type of legislation. I think the farmers of western Canada themselves would readily agree that it is a most regrettable fact that this special type of legislation was needed, or is needed or will be needed in the future. But I believe that any fair-minded person who studies the history of the economy of the west, particularly during that period of drouth accompanied by world-wide depression, must long since have come to the conclusion that some particular type of legislation was needed to deal with an extraordinary situation, national in its dimensions and affecting a great number of very fine citizens, and that not only in the interests of those farmers themselves, but in the interests of Canada as a whole some such legislation as the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was necessary. And it was, as hon. members know, a Conservative government under Mr. Bennett who initiated this particular act.

I believe, too, that all hon. members can readily understand that at the commencement of a drouth or of a depression period it slowly comes home to all of us that the drouth period or the depression period is going to extend over any great length of time. It is a truism of human nature that hope springs eternal. We all think that this year or next, conditions will again be normal and that the necessity for some special provision will not apply. That explanation is one of the reasons for the type of proposal made by the boards of review which were set up under the act as first passed.

The hon. member for Weyburn, in the first part of his address this afternoon, suggested that it was a judicial sense of appreciation of property rights, but later I believe he gave the real reason, namely, that it was simply a combination of inexperience and failure to appreciate the job that had to be done that gave rise to the incompleteness of the early proposals. Simultaneously with the introduction of this act in fact before this particular act was passed, as one would expect, the legislatures of the three western provinces, being closer to the problem, introduced their debt adjustment legislation, which operated unquestioned for a number of years. Even to-day, despite the fact that the privy council has ruled that the Alberta act is ultra vires and, as a result, the legislation of the other two provinces is likely to be in the same position; notwithstanding that decision, I say, in my province the creditor class goes to the debt adjustment board for the necessary permission to initiate any proceedings. It is clear, therefore, the act that was passed in my province worked to the reasonable satisfaction of both the creditor and the debtor class.

There was, however, this profound difference between the two types of legislation. The provinces never claimed any right, except possibly the province of Alberta, but certainly Saskatchewan never did claim any right to cut down compulsorily either the principal or the rate of interest in any contract. It realized that it did not have that particular power and authority. This act passed by the dominion authority did give the tribunals entrusted with the administration the power to reduce both principal debt and interest. We all know, despite the willingness of the creditor class generally to cooperate with the provincial legislation, that it would be highly inadvisable to rely on legislation upon which the privy council had passed an adverse opinion. Some day somebody will claim in the courts the right to question the validity of the act and, as a result, will be granted a favourable decision. So that I naturally, with other western Liberal members, followed with close interest the attempt of this authority, the dominion, to deal reasonably with the problem that was thrust upon it as a result of the privy council decision.

In the first place, it has already been called to the attention of the committee that this government has passed an order in council which provides that under an agreement for sale or under a mortgage the court with jurisdiction may stay action if it sees fit, or may postpone the payment of the debt, or, if the occasion arises, may vary or extend the order, all for the purpose of retaining the farmer upon the land. That order in council was very important to us, and we are assured that it is the intention of the government to permit that order in council to remain in force for the duration of the war.

We must, therefore, consider what the dominion government has done, under the provisions both of this bill and of the order in council which has been in force throughout the three western provinces. A number of members, particularly from Alberta and also from my own province, have referred to the submission made by the three western provinces after the conference on debt and have suggested that the government has made no or very little attempt to carry out the recommendations of that conference. Let us examine just what the three provinces recommended in principle. They recommended "that a tribunal or tribunals be created by the appropriate legislative authority in Canada, first, to write down the pincipal of farm debts, secured and unsecured"; that is to be found in this bill; second, "to reduce the interest rate on farm debts, secured and unsecured"; that principle is to be found in this bill; third, "to alter the terms of payment of farm debts, secured and unsecured"; that principle is to be found in this bill.

Fourth, "to review and revise its own decisions in the light of events subsequent to the making of the decision." Western members have pointed out frequently that one of the things that caused irritation in the administration of the act was the fact I have referred to earlier, that decisions were made by those who were inexperienced or, as the hon. member for Weyburn has said, timid in approaching the problem of actually making a proposal. It was considered extremely unfair that those who had come before were subject to the terms of early proposals that were not properly fitted to take care of the debtor's position. It is true that this bill does not go so far as to give to the new tribunal the power to review every proposal made by any board of review, but I think it goes a long way. It gives to the new tribunal the power to review any proposal made prior to December 31, 1938.

All of us know that 1937 was probably the most disastrous year that came to western Canada. Since that time our farmers have not been offered credit on anything like the same scale, and very few have been able to get into any substantial amount of debt since that particular period. In addition, a great many farmers have learned the lesson that getting into debt is a much easier task than getting out. I think, having in mind all the circumstances, the provisions of the bill with regard to review substantially grant the requests of the three provincial governments. In any event it is a distinct improvement over the old act and, if circumstances and time prove that it is not sufficient, then parliament still remains one of our institutions to which we can come and present our case again.

Fifth, "to extend to individuals in any particular year or circumstances the protection of any of the provisions of this legislation available to any debtors, whose affairs are being administered under it." This bill does not meet that particular request, and it seems to me that this legislation could not possibly deal with that. We would have to be prepared to bring in special legislation to deal with solvent persons who happened to meet a particular difficulty that might require assistance of this kind. Sixth, "to stay proceedings arising on debts or securities after an adjudication has been made"; that provision is in the bill.

Seventh, "to make the foregoing remedies available with respect to any farm debts regardless of the time at which they were incurred." Again the bill only partly grants the seventh proposal. As hon. members know, that particular request would make this legislation a continuing act, applicable at any time to farmers who had got into financial difficulties. The bill provides that any debt, two-thirds of which were incurred before May 1, 1935, may be brought before the tribunal. The bill goes farther in that it gives consideration to the fact that one of the contributing factors after 1935 to the difficulties of the farmers was the accrual of interest. Possibly two items, interest and taxes, would go a long way to make up a very substantial portion of all new debt incurred by western farmers after May 1, 1935. The bill provides that included in the computation of this two-thirds of the debt shall be not only the mortgage principal but the interest that has accrued upon the mortgage or the agreement for sale, whether it occurred before May 1, 1935, or afterwards. In connection with taxes we have provincial legislation dealing with this particular matter. It is not nearly as important as that of accrued interest on mortgages and agreements for sale. Again I submit that the government is to be commended upon going a long way to satisfy the request made in the seventh clause by the provincial governments.

I may say that when making presentations to the Minister of Finance with other western Liberal members we tried to persuade the government that the time had now come to recognize the peculiar conditions under which farming was carried on in western Canada, and while at the moment—we had not then the news of the drouth that is now appearing in western Canada—farming conditions were reasonably good, common sense told us that sooner or later we would again have a drouth period in which the farmers might face difficulty. I have had always in mind the primary need of getting this legislation through parliament—I use that word advisedly, having in mind that parliament is more than the House of Commons—and I know that a great many people, in eastern Canada particularly, would not be in favour at this time of passing permanent-type bankruptcy legislation aimed directly to satisfy farmers' needs. When we consider the real advantages that are being offered to farmers of western Canada by the amendments contained in this bill I believe we can feel a sense of healthy appreciation of the difficulties which have been presented and a realization that the problem has been approached in a realistic way with a desire to go as far as possible along the road toward the solution of these difficulties.

I accept in toto the arguments of the hon. member for Peace River with respect to the change in procedure. I do not look upon that as a loss to the farming community in which I live but rather as a distinct gain. I have in mind that, as he pointed out in connection with Alberta, the clerks of the court have been the provincial representatives of the debt adjustment bureau in Regina for a great many years, during which time they have gained considerable experience in negotiating settlements between debtors and creditors. They are now made the official receivers under this measure. Their experience; the fact that they are completely detached, in all personal respects, from both debtor and creditor, should enable them to be of considerable help in bringing about settlements before matters reach the district court judge or the appeal court. I believe also, with the hon. member for Peace River, that the fact of the district court judge being available to hear all such applications, and to deal with them as quickly as possible, will be of benefit as well. If, perchance, there should be any interlocutory applications necessary under the provisions of the act, he is available to hear such applications, which should be of great advantage to farmers who unfortunately have to take advantage of the protection of the provisions of this measure.

Then, as my hon. friend pointed out, and in this I wish to support the argument of the hon. member for Lake Centre, if the appeal judge is chosen wisely; if he undertakes the permanent task of going through a certain territory—my own province, for example—ironing out differences which may arise in the interpretation of these provisions by the various district court judges, making the application of the act uniform, giving every farmer who comes before him the full protection of our courts, with all the precedents that bind those courts in matters of fairness and justice, the farmers whom I represent will get a great deal more service under this particular measure than they could ever hope to get under the old act.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is just for insolvent farmers.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, of course the word "insolvent" is especially defined in the act; as the hon. member knows, it means a farmer who is unable to meet his liabilities when they come due. A crop failure, or any disaster occurring to an ordinary farmer without liquid assets, of course would bring him within the terms of this act.

To continue for a moment with the matter of judges, I think placing the administration of this act back in the centre of each judicial district will mean a great saving in time and worry on the part of our farmers if, as I say, they are so unfortunate as to have to come under this act. We all know that the boards of review had a great deal of work to do. The hon. member for Mackenzie said they were able to deal with only two or two and a half per cent of the cases.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Per year.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is quite right, but I would remind him that some eight thousand farmers only in the three prairie provinces made application under the act.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It was such a poor act.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think that is the explanation at all. This measure has had two advantages. In the first place it has dealt with the applicant for relief, and in the second place it has acted as an inducement to the creditor class to make voluntary settlements with their debtors. As my hon. friend knows, I come from the very heart of the drouth area of Saskatchewan, and I can say to him that in the last year or two there have been many settlements of debts as between debtor farmers and the creditor class. I am very happy to say that. I agree, however, that when the mortgage companies say that fact alone is sufficient to justify the repealing of all such legislation, they miss the whole point, which is that a year or two of reasonable prosperity in regard to both production and price levels cannot possibly hope to take care of the debts which have accumulated over a great many years. I always regret when the financial houses of this country place themselves in opposition to measures which would meet some of the real problems with which our agriculturists are faced. I am quite certain these companies do themselves no service by attempting to influence parliament from dealing fairly and reasonably with the farmer class. As a creditor myself I am absolutely convinced that it is a good thing for the creditor class as well as the debtor class for us to get this terrible structure of debt brought down to a position where the farmer may regain his hope of paying it off, by harnessing himself to that job. In the long run it will be found that the creditor class will benefit, together with the farmer class, when that position is reached, and that is what we are attempting to accomplish.

Someone in the Social Credit party, I think, said it was impossible for any farmer in western Canada to pay off his debts. Let me give the hon. member one example that came to my notice when I was home at Easter. I recall a farmer coming to my office about four years ago, telling me his troubles and asking if I thought he should go under this act. I knew the man well; he was an old-timer and a first-class farmer. I said, "No, I do not think your financial position warrants your going under that act." Then he asked if I thought he should quit-claim title to a particular half-section of land. I said, "No. We are in the depths of the depression as far as agriculture is concerned. It can only improve; it cannot get worse. Stick to it; you are a good farmer, and if things break a little better, you will come out on top." When I was home at Easter that farmer was able to report to me that he had completely wiped off the debt on that particular half-section of land. This does not mean, however, that man is living in wealth and luxury. As someone has pointed out, farmers throughout Canada for many years have had to practise thrift to a degree which I do not think is consistent with the fine profession they follow. Nevertheless there are men in western Canada who are making progress. The situation in regard to the payment of current debts proves that; and the large reduction in past indebtedness is also an evidence of that fact. Unless we meet another period like that which we went through from 1930 to 1939, we shall find that the debt structure will be steadily reduced. Nevertheless, that problem is there; and I say to the mortgage companies and to the creditor class generally that they would be doing themselves a service if they would join with those of us who take a reasonable attitude in this matter, who do not aim for the moon but who strive for an act that will be reasonable in its provisions to both creditor and debtor, in order that conditions in western Canada may become much improved.

Finally, while I have unsuccessfully urged upon the government the adoption at this time of a measure designed to meet permanently the conditions under which the people of my province have to carry on farming, I am aware that more and more our legislation must recognize that out west we do not work on the basis of an annual turnover but rather on a much longer cycle; that periods of drouth are followed by periods of very good production, and our economy must take that into account. I hope that some day this or some other government will recognize the need and give us legislation of the kind I have mentioned. I would say to the minister also that I endorse everything that was said by the hon. member for Peace River in regard to section 33, for I think this section detracts from what I have said with regard to this bill. I do not think the section is wise or practicable, and I think the act would be greatly improved if this section were removed. If, however, for reasons which I cannot appreciate, the minister does not feel that this section can be wholly removed, I sincerely hope he will give consideration to amending it to make it not applicable to proposals that have been made hitherto, and that the period of five years may be reduced to two years.

Mr. SHAW: There are certain general observations I should like to make, while this particular section is before the committee. Ordinarily one would hesitate to occupy the time of the committee, particularly at this late stage of the session; but when one stops to consider that a matter of such extreme importance as this has been introduced during the dying days of a session, then I for one feel thoroughly justified in taking whatever time I consider necessary to discuss the matter.

Those of us who come from the west represent, in the main, agricultural sections of Canada. We come in daily contact, weekly contact, yearly contact with the farmers, and we have been able to develop an understanding and an appreciation of the difficulties confronting them, not for a period of only one year but throughout the years. Personally, I would feel extremely remiss in my duty if I were to permit this opportunity to pass without expressing my views.

Before doing so, however, may I say I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Swift Current indicate that the government of Saskatchewan knew that authority to pass a debt adjustment act did not rest with that province; because I have in mind the important part the government of Saskatchewan played when the Alberta government appealed against the disallowance of the Alberta acts. If I am not mistaken, the attorney-general of Saskatchewan proceeded to England in that connection. I was also disappointed that the hon. member did not discuss more fully the recommendations of the western debt conference with respect to the recurring aspects of the farm debt problem.

If my understanding is correct, I believe the recommendation was that these debts would be reviewed every five years. When one stops to consider our general economic instability as applied to agriculture, and when one recognizes that from time to time most unexpected things occur, he will realize that it is not the proper thing to place a farmer in a position where he is obliged to accept a proposal for settlement, and then, regardless of conditions which may develop in the future, he must still abide by the terms of that settlement. I think, when we consider this aspect of the measure, all we have to do is to reflect upon those cases which were considered shortly after the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act became effective, where we found farm debts reduced by approximately sixteen per cent, and where, later on, owing to experience, I have no doubt, on the part of boards of review, and also on account of conditions which had developed, the average reductions amounted to approximately thirty-four per cent.

From time to time we have protested most vigorously about the fact that those farmers who came under the act, in the early years of its operation, were not permitted later on to have a further adjustment made. I cannot agree with the point of view opposed to the recognition of the recurring aspect of this debt problem. I would have been pleased if the hon. member for Swift Current had given us some indication of how we should treat debt created during the drouth period around 1936 and 1937, since the provisions of this measure will not give any consideration to that aspect of the problem.

I consider the farm debt problem one of the most important with which we have to deal, apart from the actual prosecution of the war; although it is an integral part of our actual war effort. The future of our basic industry will depend very largely, if not almost entirely, upon the nature of the legislation we pass at this time. Every industry in Canada, every business in Canada and, I dare say, every individual depend directly upon agriculture for existence. Therefore, in the light of that statement, it is not difficult to appraise the importance of agriculture in our national economy. The history of the farm debt problem is not fiction. I believe there is not an hon. member in the committee who is not thoroughly familiar with the difficulties encountered by our western farmers, especially in the past decade. We characterized that period as our pre-war depression, when the majority of western farmers worked without pay. I say that they worked without pay because the prices which prevailed during those years hardly, and in many instances actually did not pay the cost of production. I know that during all those years practically nothing was done to correct the condition which had developed.

It is a well known fact that many of our farmers exhausted their credit and had to assume the position of serfs. That is not an exaggerated assertion. All we have to do is reflect upon the conditions which developed in our own communities, and give a moment's consideration to the many farmers who either had to leave their farms or accept the position of tenants or serfs, operating those farms for someone else. I know that even in 1931, before we entered the most difficult part of the depression, only fifty-two per cent of our Canadian farms were free from debt. Therefore we could say that only fifty-two per cent of farms in Canada were actually owned by the individuals residing upon them. I know some may argue that if a small debt rests against a farm, that does not change the individual's status with respect to ownership. However, I cannot agree with that.

I know also that in 1931 about one out of ten of our Canadian farmers were tenants—and I use that term because some may take exception to the word "serfs". I do not know exactly what the picture was between the years 1931 and 1942, but we do have sufficient information to come to the conclusion that fifty-two per cent of our farmers resided upon farms in 1931 upon which there was no debt. That percentage had been materially reduced by 1940. The reason for that is obvious.

I say it is evident that there are certain organizations in this country which evidently welcome a trend toward this condition which I have described. It would seem that there are some who feel that if the individual occupies the position of tenant, being less independent, he may be more easily manageable. I have a quotation which I should like to give from a bulletin issued by the United States department of agriculture, entitled "Getting established on the Land", and I quote it because I think it is quite applicable to our own country:

> Thousands of farmers, large and small, have been unable to keep their heads above water under the impact of adverse forces since the world war. The small owners, burdened with debts, faced with competition, selling their products at low prices when depression hit, toppled into the ranks of the tenants. Tenants on the other hand found themselves squeezed out time and again as landlords were forced to cut them loose to find work as day labourers, if possible.

Very frequently we discover that becoming a tenant on the land which a farmer formerly owned is just one step toward having to leave the farm completely. I have always asserted that the finest situation which could develop for agriculture in this country would be to have the farmer own his parcel of land under a set of conditions which would guarantee that, as long as he was willing to play his part and do his best, he would continue to be the owner of that property.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would the hon. member concede the same for every other man in Canada?

Mr. SHAW: If I say that a farmer should be guaranteed a set of conditions which will enable him, as long as he plays his part, to remain the owner of his property, I would say that it is perfectly true so far as the business man or storekeeper and others are concerned, provided, however, that the individual does not engage in practices which are detrimental to his fellow men. I have in mind probably a monopoly which develops and exerts its evil influence upon the lives of a great many of our people.

We know many of the debts of our Canadian farmers were incurred while money was plentiful and while prices of the produce they raised were relatively high. I know it is often argued that if you make money available to farmers or anyone else, they will take it whether they need it or not. But that is a weak argument. My contention is that when many of our farmers secured loans, the prices of their farm produce were high and they had every expectation, in the majority of cases I know, of being able to repay the debts even at the rates of interest they had agreed to pay, which often were exorbitant. I believe that the large majority of our people are honest, but frequently we judge them by the very few who indulge in questionable practices. Many of those persons who secured loans while money was plentiful, were obliged to try to pay it back when money was scarce. All we have to do is to contrast prices in 1929 and 1933. The farmer who borrowed money in 1929, when wheat was standing at a fair figure of $1.40, was confronted with a most deplorable situation when in 1933 the price of the same wheat had dropped to about 34 cents a bushel for No. 1 northern at Fort William, and we know many farmers received as low as ten and twelve cents for the quality of grain which they grew. We must recognize and appreciate a position of that kind.

But the farmer struggled on. He was exploited in many respects. I should not like hon. members to take any wrong inference from my use of the word "exploited." I have in mind, for example, that farm machine prices went up and up and up, while produce prices went down. The farmer was also confronted with an increased tax burden in many instances, and I would even include in my term "exploited" what I regard as price manipulation. The farmer during that period lived in constant fear of losing his home. I had the opportunity of spending about one-third of my life in a community where the farmers were probably having more than the usual difficulties. I do not believe there was anything with which they were confronted that created more desperation in their hearts than the fear that to-morrow or the day after they might be evicted from their property. We have heard that one of our goals after the war is to be freedom from fear, and I would be hopeful that it would apply not merely to a cross-section of our population. No industry except agriculture, manned by the hardy fighters of the calibre of which our Canadian farmers are, could have survived the treatment they received during those years, and I definitely state that it is a credit to those people for putting up the fight which we all know they did put up during that period. The agriculture industry survives, and therefore we hear certain people advancing the argument that, if it survived once, it will survive again, and probably again and again. But while agriculture survives, there is not an hon. member here but would agree that it was badly crippled. However, in spite of the fact that it was crippled, it performed magnificent achievements when it was called upon to do so following the outbreak of war in 1939. Not only has it continued through the following years to make great achievements; it has also been committed to the tremendous task of providing foodstuffs for the countries of Europe which have been subjugated by the enemy. In spite of all that, regardless of the farmers' magnificent achievements, the best that we seem able to do is, first, pat them on the back, appeal to their patriotism, and tell them what fine fellows they are. No doubt the Minister of Agriculture has devoted a good deal of energy to patting our Canadian farmers on the back and appealing to their sense of patriotism—

Mr. LaFLECHE: Getting them markets.

Mr. SHAW: —in order to have them continue to carry on this magnificent production. I am not forgetting, with regard to the interjection, the unsatisfied markets here, during the depression years, when the farmer begged to sell his produce and the people begged for it, but we seemed unable to solve the problem. But I say we must give our Canadian farmers immediate assistance through adequate debt adjustment legislation. If this government will not do it, who is expected to? We know the provinces have tried, and we know the situation which they are confronted with. I am not endeavouring to argue as to whether the province has the right or not; I am simply asserting that if the province has not the right, the federal government has not only the right but the duty to do it.

With respect to our western debt conference, it is significant that, as has already been indicated by previous speakers, three of our prairie governments, supported by quite a number of organizations, submitted a comprehensive debt adjustment proposal, and I regret that the government has not seen fit to give greater consideration to it than we have done. I am not one who is going to condemn the present bill. Surely, if you cannot have all you want, it is better to take something rather than discard it all. But I am hopeful that while this bill is in the committee stage, the government will be prepared to accept certain amendments.

We hear the argument frequently advanced that farmers are now paying their debts. The hon. member for Vegreville indicated to-day that when the farmers—I speak of the great majority of them—can pay their debts they will do so. I recall one branch of the Canadian Legion indicating to me, "We are not asking for charity; all we are asking for is an opportunity to pay our debts." It is right that the farmers are under present conditions paying their debts. But is it not unfortunate that we should go along through these desperate years and then have to have a war to partly solve our problems for us? This war, we hope, is not going to last long. If it comes to an end this year, let us say, I wonder what situation may develop? When someone speaks of the farmer paying his debts during war time it brings to my mind a little report which I saw in the Ottawa Journal. It reproduces a report which appeared in the Carbon Chronicle. Carbon is a little town in Alberta. The item, reprinted from the Edmonton Journal, states:

> J. A. Hannaford, of Howie, Alberta, sold a carload of steers last week for which he received $3,000. Six years ago he sold a similar carload which netted him $300.

The Edmonton Journal comments:

> No wonder a lot of Alberta farmers are reported paying off farm debts now, and little wonder they were unable to do much along that line some six years ago.

I read that for two reasons: it indicates that our prices have definitely improved and that farmers are paying their debts; it further gives a very fine reason why many of them plunged hopelessly into debt during those so-called depression years.

I do not wish to take a great deal more time, but I say that our debt adjustment legislation must be evolved, not in the light of these abnormal conditions which we are passing through now, but in the light of previous experience and also of the situation which we may reasonably expect to develop from time to time after the war. I am quite in agreement with those who have urged that there is only one sensible manner of preventing colossal debt within the framework of the agricultural industry, and that is for us to endeavour to lay down a national agricultural policy. Only through a national agricultural policy can we establish that industry on a sound and prosperous basis, and only by laying down a sound policy can we hope to see agriculture occupy the position which we shall expect it to occupy during the post-war reconstruction period.

I do not think it at all unreasonable that our farmers ask for parity of price. Surely there cannot be any argument against a farmer's demand that the price he receives for his produce should bear some fair relationship to the commodities which he is obliged to buy and the taxes which he is compelled to pay. I say, furthermore, that unless we can establish some scheme whereby our farmers can secure credits in order to carry on their operations at lower rates of interest than many of them have been obliged to pay, we shall have a repetition of the conditions which developed.

In addition to proper debt adjustment legislation, which must come, we must have adequate marketing facilities. I am not thinking so much of the present moment as of the period to come when I make that assertion. The hon. member for Swift Current indicated this evening that you cannot quote one case and try to arrive at some principle based upon that case. I have the particulars of one case which I believe is significant. I say it is significant because this farmer, who is a good farmer, agreed to pay, not so much cash every year, but one-half of his total crop. He lived up to his obligations 100 per cent, and what, Mr. Chairman, do you think his situation was? On October 12, 1926, this man bought a farm made up of 324 acres at a total cost of $13,766, which was approximately $42.50 per acre. He made a cash payment of $2,000, and the remainder was to be paid, as I have already indicated, over the years by giving one-half of his crop and paying interest at the rate of six per cent. This man did not miss one payment. By 1935 he owed over $13,000. Do not forget that he had paid $2,000 to start with and was giving half of his crop; yet in 1935 he had approximately the same debt he had started out with. Prices in 1926 when he started were: wheat, $1.51; oats, 49·6; barley, 63·9. These were the average. But before 1935 had arrived wheat was 54·3; oats 26·4, and barley, 32·2. That was at Fort William, less approximately seventeen cents a bushel, and he did not grow No. 1 grain. He was forced to sell feed wheat at 10½ cents and feed oats at 7 cents. In 1935 he went to the board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. They were "very kind" and reduced his debt to $12,000. Do not overlook the fact that he had paid $2,000 cash and half his crop every year from 1926 to 1935, and yet they reduced his debt to $12,000.

An hon. MEMBER: What was the original debt?

Mr. SHAW: The original debt was $13,766. He cleared forty acres of land and ploughed an additional forty acres, and he also gave them one-half the crop from these acreages. I should also say in fairness, to complete my story, that the board of review reduced the rate of interest from six per cent to five per cent and said, "You shall pay only one-third of your crop instead of one-half." But in spite of all this, after sixteen years of toil, not only on his part but on the part of his wife and of his sons, this was his situation. He had not missed a payment; he lived up to the letter of his contract; but now he owes them slightly over $12,000 plus some taxes. He estimates that the farm is probably worth $6,500, but he has paid far more than that. He has paid over $9,000, and he is still right where he started. If you worked out the interest which he was obliged to pay in 1933, it would be approximately $720. That meant that he had to give 7,200 bushels of wheat at 10½ cents, which was the price he received for his wheat at that time, or 10,285 bushels of oats at 7 cents. That meant that to pay interest on his debt in 1933 he had to guarantee twenty-four bushels of wheat from each acre. I give that case because it is not the case of a man falling down in payment at any time. It is not the case of a man who had contracted to pay so many dollars each year and had not done so. It is not the case of a man who said, "Conditions are so desperate that I am not going to try to pay anything." He lived up to his contract to the letter of the law. He is getting on in years. His sons and his wife have worked hard, and still financially he is right where he started. He is threatened with the loss of his home.

My argument has always been this. You can talk about the sanctity of contracts all you like; but if I go and buy a farm which is for sale at $6,000, and I have only $3,000 and have to borrow that additional $3,000 from anyone, from a bank or a mortgage company or anyone you like, the one from whom I am trying to secure the money will evaluate me in the light of his previous business experience with me. Surely he will look over the parcel of land and, if he considers it a good business proposal, he lends me the $3,000 at six or eight per cent. I am reasonably sure also that it is a good proposition. In effect, we are partners as far as that parcel of land is concerned. When wheat fell from $1.54 to 34 cents my income was reduced by the proportion indicated, but he, in most instances, demanded his full interest payment plus full payments as far as the principal was concerned.

There may be some who have a different point of view in that regard. Some may argue that two men in such a case are not partners in effect, but I feel that they are.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not partners in gains but in losses.

Mr. SHAW: I would say it was a partnership where one always lost and the other always gained.

Mr. ILSLEY: Face it; do not run away from it. The hon. gentleman does not mean that if the value went up, the lender would profit as a partner.

Mr. SHAW: The minister may have an argument there; I realize that. But, after all, there are few cases, in the light of the past ten years' experience, where the returns to the farmers went up and up; they have always been down and down with the exception of probably an abnormal period such as a time of war. His partner demanded full payment.

I did have one or two other things to say, but I do not care to impose myself on the committee farther. I am not one who is going to assert that I am definitely opposed to bill No. 132. It is probably in some respects better than the previous act, but in my estimation it falls considerably short of what the governments of the prairie provinces, supported by many organizations, requested as being a proper basis for farm debt settlement.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I do not take up much time in speaking in the house, but I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion of bill No. 132, and while I agree with much that has been said, I disagree with some. I disagree with any implications that have been thrown out to the effect that western Canada is down and out. Western Canada is not down and out, and I think I can give a few facts that perhaps will be illuminating to some hon. members.

Hon. members from Saskatchewan have every right to speak of conditions in their province and so have those from Alberta to speak of theirs; but I claim the privilege of saying a few words with regard to debt conditions and reductions as regards Manitoba, that good old province of which I have been a resident for over thirty-two years, and which I think I know at least as well as any other member of the house.

I wish to speak first of reductions in debt that have been made by the Manitoba government, and I shall go to the best source available, to the remarks made in his budget speech last April by the premier of Manitoba, who has also been treasurer of that province for a good many years. These are some of the facts he disclosed, speaking of the public debt. He said that on April 30, 1941, the gross public debt of the province was $126,000,000, and that during the year ended April 30, 1942, the province had paid off $2,500,000 of that debt. Then he said that on April 30, 1942, the gross public debt of the province had been reduced to $124,000,000. He went on to say that the further reduction from May 1, 1942, to December 31, 1942, amounting to $1,267,000, reduced the gross debt to $123,000,000. He added that in the thirty-two months ending December 31, 1942, the gross debt of the province had been reduced by $7,000,000. Those are the words uttered by the former provincial treasurer of Manitoba, now the premier, in his budget speech.

I should like to add a word as to the municipalities. I have not the figures for last year, which were undoubtedly more favourable than those for 1941 which I shall quote. There are 170 municipalities exclusive of cities, with an annual levy of about $8,000,000, on an assessment of $238 million, being a rate of 34 mills. During 1941 no less than 151 of these municipalities operated on a cash basis; that is, they raised the money and they paid cash. There were only nineteen out of the 170 which had deficits at the close of the year. What about their debt reduction? Records show that between 1935 and 1941 they reduced their debt by $7,000,000. Municipal reduction was $7,000,000; provincial government reduction, $7,000,000. I think that is an extremely good showing for any province, a showing of which the people of that province might well be proud. At the end of 1941 there were 108 municipalities out of the 170 which had cash surpluses of over $1,000,000; and, in addition to that, they had special reserves in cash or investments, other than sinking funds, of $661,000. The mortgage foreclosures for Manitoba were as follows:

1933	397
1941	128
1942	106

I think those figures constitute a record of which Manitoba might well be proud. But what about discharges of mortgages? Here, again, I think the figures will be illuminating. Premier Garson is authority for the statement that in 1942 there were 5,432 farm mortgages discharged, paid off, wiped out. In other words, in 1942 there were 106 foreclosures as compared with 5,432 discharges, a ratio of fifty to one. Why was this possible? As the people drew away from the awful years of the drouth and heart-break, they set themselves resolutely to the task of applying their increased income to reducing their indebtedness. What about farm income? They were in a better position to reduce their indebtedness, and they did it. Here are the round figures for farm income:

1938	$ 62,000,000
1939	63,000,000
1940	64,000,000
1941	80,000,000
1942	100,000,000

We must not forget that the outlay of these farmers was considerably increased because they had been compelled to let their equipment run down during the drouth years; their buildings had got into disrepair, and many expenditures were needed. If these had not been necessary, they would have been able to reduce their mortgage indebtedness still farther.

Something might be said with regard to improved methods of farming. Manitoba, more than any other western province, has adopted diversified farming and, strange as it may seem, the farm income last year from wheat was only one-quarter of the total income. Then, again, I would not have hon. members forget that some of this mortgage indebtedness reduction is owing to the fact that the dominion government paid to the farmers of the west in the form of bonuses and payments of one kind and another some quite substantial amounts. From August 1, 1941, to July 31, 1942, $14,000,000 was paid in prairie farm assistance; $34,800,000 in wheat acreage reduction, and $18,000,000 in prairie farm income. There was a total in one year of $67,700,000, without including expenditures on prairie farm rehabilitation.

I wish to make my position clear in a very few words. I bow to no man in my support of the farmer or anyone else who finds himself down because of reasons over which he had no control. I am not one to stand idly by and see a man or his family almost down and out and treated with unfairness, sometimes with downright cruelty. We do not want that, and our citizens are not going to stand for that sort of thing. On the other hand, I am not one who will stand up and see the creditor defrauded by the double-crossing of some dishonest or oftentimes defiant debtor. We want to see fair play and justice in this country, and I am satisfied that the members of this committee will agree one and all with what I say.

I agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that consideration should be given to the creditor who, by reason of age or infirmity, has taken up residence in town and is operating his farm perhaps by crop lease or hired help. That man should receive some consideration for himself and his life partner. Many of them have had some crushing experiences under the old act, and we do not want to see those repeated under this act. We should protect these unfortunates who, owing to crop failures or other causes over which they have no control, are likely to suffer. We do not want to sweep away the whole fabric of confidence in this country. Manitoba, and the west in general, have developed by credit, and that credit has been based upon confidence. Any hon. member or any individual who would sweep away that confidence is doing his best to bring a tragedy upon this Canada of ours. I believe the average man is fundamentally honest. I believe the average man is a square-shooter. I believe the average man wants to hold the confidence of his associates and will agree with the sentiments I have expressed. But in speaking of confidence let us not forget that western Canada has been built up on a feeling of confidence, and in past years perhaps there was too much credit, though I may be mistaken. In a certain committee of which I have the privilege of being a member we have heard many references to post-war problems, to the new order for which we all long, to the treatment our boys should receive when they return from overseas, and so on. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that all these things will require money, and a lot of it. If we are to raise that money, we must retain the confidence of the people, young and old, rich and poor. I do not think I could find better support for this view than in quoting again from the conclusion of that budget speech delivered by the premier of Manitoba, who said:

> We have not reached the limit of our development in this province. A great deal still remains to be done. If there were no other reason, much still remains to be done in order that we may reach full employment in the post-war period. If we are to have rural electrification or housing or a direct connection through Manitoba with the Alaska highway to attract tourists or if we are to have a multitude of other things for which public expenditures will be required, there are only two methods by which the province can make the money available; in some cases by taxation and in other cases by borrowing in order to spread the cost over a period of years. No matter how heavily the people may ask to be taxed for these worthwhile purposes, some of the moneys required will still have to be raised by borrowing. Whether we can get this money will depend upon our credit. This is true no matter what the means of raising it may be. Whether we can get it from the investor in the open market will depend upon his faith in whether or not we can be trusted to repay him. If some less orthodox method of making the money available is provided by the Dominion of Canada creating credit at no interest cost, as recommended by some citizens in our country, then we still would have to be considered reliable before even on such a basis the dominion government or any other body such as the Bank of Canada, would lend us money at no interest or low interest.
> Finally and most important of all, the Manitoba government must have credit with Manitoba citizens. Our own people of Manitoba must consider that their provincial government will carry out its promises and undertakings. If we are going to have any worthwhile post-war projects we cannot hope to succeed if we do not have the active cooperation of Manitoba citizens. Rural electrification, for example, will not be a success if the farmers of this province, relying upon the government's ability to carry out its plans, do not make preparations to receive and use the power which is delivered to them. We may wish to ask them to buy some of our bonds for this purpose. I suggest that if we had broken our promises and ruined our credit, we could not expect the Manitoba people to buy our new bonds in the face of our having defaulted on our old ones. Moreover, we could not then expect them to take our post-war plans at face value, because they would have a right to doubt and would doubt whether we could find anybody who would trust us with the means of financing such plans. Doubting, they would not make their own plans to cooperate with their provincial government in a project in the completion of which they had no genuine faith.

[Mr. Matthews.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Which premier was that?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Premier Garson; and with those principles I heartily agree. I have every sympathy for what he says, and I believe that the confidence of our people all across Canada must be maintained if we are to make this country flourish in the post-war days, as we hope it may. I wish to extend my congratulations to the Minister of Finance upon the calibre of the bill he has sponsored, which I think will receive wide endorsation from one end of Canada to the other.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman, it is now ten minutes to eleven, and in order to facilitate the business of the house in accordance with the understanding announced by the house leader last evening, which I understand calls for the house to go into committee of supply, since apparently we are not going to get through this section, I am very happy to waive my opportunity to speak at this time.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many departments are going in to-night?

Mr. CRERAR: We are going to ask the house to let us get in five departments. There are nine or ten yet to go in, and we want to get in on Monday or Tuesday night. I gave notice of this on Saturday evening.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, but I was just rising to suggest that I do not think all the departments should go in to-night. We do not know what will happen in the next couple of weeks, if we are here; and there have been few opportunities to discuss any problems on going into supply, so that I think at least some of the departments should remain.

Mr. CRERAR: If these five are put in to-night, there will be five or six left, which will give plenty of opportunity for discussion.

Mr. COLDWELL: Perhaps we shall not need the opportunity, but we should like it kept open.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is in accordance with the undertaking the government gave previously, as I understand it. There are nine or ten departments left, and I think we are going into five to-night.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if the minister would take us into his confidence sufficiently to indicate the departments not yet in, and which departments it is intended to put in to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The departments not yet in are: the auditor general's office; the chief electoral officer; the civil service commission; the Department of Finance; the insurance department; the Department of Justice; the Department of Labour; the Department of Mines and Resources; the Department of National Revenue, other than war; the Department of National Revenue; the Department of National War Services, other than war; public archives; public printing and stationery; Royal Canadian Mounted Police; Secretary of State; soldier settlement board of Canada, and Department of Transport.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How many does the minister propose to bring in to-night?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Five.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which ones?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): National Defence, Finance, Justice, Labour, and Mines and Resources.

Mr. MacINNIS: Some of those are branches. They come in under separate departments. For instance, the civil service commission is under the Secretary of State, and soldiers' settlement is under another department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There are four or five main departments left.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which ones will be left, after the ones brought in to-night?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): National Revenue, National War Services, Secretary of State and Transport, with subsidiary branches.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Third and fourth reports of standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Weir.

Eighth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Donnelly.

WAR EXPENDITURES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton) moved:

That the first report of the special committee on war expenditures, presented to the house on Monday, July 19, be concurred in.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I realize that this motion requires the unanimous consent of the house, by reason of the fact that the necessary time has not elapsed. However, I wish to facilitate the passing of the motion and therefore I do not raise any objection on that score. I would call the attention of the hon. member who has moved the motion to its phraseology as recorded in Votes and Proceedings No. 114, which we have received this morning. There is in paragraph 3 a typographical error which should not pass the house: "to acquaint subcommittees." I presume this is meant to be "to appoint subcommittees."

Paragraph 4 of the report reads:

To employ such secretarial, reportorial, clerical and other assistance as it may deem necessary.

I take it this is similar to the wording of previous reports of the committee in former sessions. I suggest that the committee ought to consider, in a subsequent report before the house rises, whether the question of assistance, which was mentioned while the debate on the constitution of the war expenditures committee was in progress—I refer to legal assistance, assistance in the way of accountancy, and other expert assistance—should not come within the purview of what is described as "other assistance" in this particular paragraph. It was pointed out by members of the committee that one of the difficulties experienced by those who were attempting to investigate various accounts was that they were handicapped through lack of that type of expert assistance, which they felt was essential if they were to make a proper inquiry into the matters which came before them.

Paragraph 5 of the report reads:

In cases where considerations of national security preclude the publishing of certain recommendations and of the arguments upon which they are based. . . .

I take it that this is "evidence" rather than argument, but I leave it to those who drafted the motion to see whether or not they require that change to be made in order to carry out their wishes in that regard.

I take it also that paragraph 5 follows the report which has been made by a similar committee in the United Kingdom. I am hoping that the matter of national security will not be taken by the committee or by the house as meaning that we are to have, during the sittings of this committee, a maintenance of that secrecy to which such objection was taken during the debate. With these observations I am quite content that the motion pass.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

BY-ELECTION IN CARTIER—ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, grave irregularities in connection with the compiling of voters lists in the Cartier division of Montreal where a by-election is to be held on August 9, 1943, nomination day being August 2, 1943, and where hundreds of names of non-existent persons have been placed on the lists, some of which irregularities have been admitted publicly by one Lazarus Bavitch, returning officer for the electoral district of Cartier. If I am given leave, Mr. Speaker, to introduce this motion, I have the necessary proofs on my desk.

And leave having been granted:

Mr. COLDWELL: I would not have introduced this matter at this time in the closing days of the session did I not believe it is a matter of urgent public importance, and I do so to facilitate the conduct of the business of the house because otherwise it would have been necessary to move a motion on going into supply, and that might have delayed the business of the house indefinitely.

The preliminary voters lists were made available to the public only last Thursday. Hence the checking of the lists has been done on a relatively small number of polls, fifteen in all. The addresses of persons who, I shall contend in a moment are either non-existent, improperly on the list or their address not that given on the list, were picked at random and only a small part of each of the fifteen polls was therefore checked. There are 112 polls altogether in the division, and the findings which I shall present to the house in a few moments are illustrative rather than exhaustive. There is no reason to doubt and every reason to believe that the information which I have is merely representative and that the same story could be unfolded as to every one of the polls; all therefore should be investigated.

Altogether some 2,000 names have been checked since last Thursday, checked carefully by persons who are reliable and are in some instances supporting their checkings by affidavits which I have on the desk beside me. Out of some 2,000 names, 650—I repeat, 650—were found to be false or improperly on the list, a proportion of approximately one third.

I said I had some of the affidavits. Not all the checkers were available in the short time at the disposal of those who gave me this information to supply me with affidavits covering all these names, but I am reliably informed and therefore believe that the information I have just given is correct.

The following are among the more striking and in some respects perhaps the more ludicrous findings about which it is worth while to inform the house. For example, a baby seven weeks old listed as a bookkeeper; a little girl five years of age listed as a retired spinster, whatever that may be; a number of non-existent addresses which would make the voter reside over a railway or street intersection; seven voters listed at a United Cigar store; seven voters listed for the store which is now the Liberal candidate's committee room; eleven voters listed in a barber shop; six voters listed at a restaurant. The waiter at the restaurant laughingly told the person who made the inquiry that the enumerator took the names of the persons sitting at the counter.

There are also names of persons who are dead, persons who have moved away for more than a year, fictitious names, fictitious addresses, and the names of persons who are not citizens of Canada. The most common occurrence was the enumeration of an entire family without any regard to age. Indeed it seems as though the enumerators in the Cartier division enumerated everybody from the cradle to the grave, perhaps in anticipation of the government's social security programme. If a complete check were made of the 42,000 names on the lists we believe that at least 10,000 would prove to be false or improperly on the lists. From the information we have already it is obvious that hundreds, perhaps several thousands. of names are improperly left off the lists.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw to the attention of the house my opinion that the lists are entirely useless at best, and at worst—and in Montreal, as I think hon. gentlemen will agree from the evidence that has been presented to this house from time to time—it is always the worst because Montreal has been a telegraphers' paradise—

Mr. WHITMAN: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the hon. member withdraw that insinuation. I insist on it being withdrawn.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am quite willing to withdraw the statement I have made if it is proved to be incorrect. But may I refer the house to a statement—

Mr. WHITMAN: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the hon. member withdraw his statement unconditionally.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no point of order. He is making no attack upon the hon. member. He is making a general statement.

Mr. COLDWELL: I refer hon. members to Hansard of June 29, 1934, page 4469, where an hon. gentleman whom I regard as being one of the ablest men who ever sat in this house made this statement:

> I have had some experience in running elections in the city of Montreal, and as a matter of fact I do not employ voters in my own constituency; I employ voters who reside and vote in other constituencies, which is perfectly legitimate. As a matter of fact, if I am to conduct an election in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, first I must have an inquiry to ascertain that the alleged voter resides where he says he resides. Then I must have some description of him so that he can be identified, and usually in order to identify him by questioning I wish to know his telephone number; if he has an office I wish to know where his office is situated and his office telephone number. I cannot run an election otherwise. In one of my elections a thousand voters were impersonated before they got to the polls. You must have means for a complete identification, and your representatives at the polls must be thoroughly informed so that they may prevent impersonation. At election time I employ people who do not vote in my constituency to do that clerical and protective work.
> You must remember that if you are running an election in the city of Montreal you can go to an association in New York who will supply you with fifty or one hundred or two hundred or three hundred impersonators. These men will come to the city the day before the election, supplied with cards stating whom they are to impersonate; they will go from poll to poll impersonating voter after voter. In one election the only way we succeeded in preventing it was with the aid of a number of young men belonging to athletic clubs, some of them associated with McGill university, who were active supporters of mine. They saw an automobile carrying five or six men; it would stop at one poll and one man would get out and vote; it would go to the next poll and another man would get out and vote; and we then discovered that they were imported personators. We took the law into our own hands and disabled each one of those automobiles, and defied the police to take charge of us for breaking the law in that way. So we were able to smash the combination. But there must be some way whereby money may be legitimately spent in investigating and informing ourselves with regard to prospective voters, in order to secure such information as will enable us to identify each and preserve his right to vote. I can only avoid the present law by going to some other constituency and engaging men there to do that preventive work for me. . . .

In one case I think we secured thirty or forty detectives from another province and some twenty or thirty others elsewhere. Strange to say, before the election I learned that even they were being bribed. We brought some sixty of them into the main committee room, told them we knew they were being bribed and were working for the opposite party and asked those who admitted it to take two paces to the front. Two-thirds of those men took two paces to the front, admitting that they were working for the other party and not for us. Such a situation is difficult but some way must be found to remedy it. I have evidence that at least fifty or sixty blank warrants were issued for use in my constituency. They were signed by a judge to be filled out when necessary. One committee in the St. Lawrence ward of my constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, composed of respectable men, were arrested and put in gaol before the poll opened, through the use of blank warrants ostensibly signed by a judge in the city of Montreal. I have had police officers come to my main committee room where most representative women of the city were engaged on the telephones to persuade the voters to come to the polls. Those police officers had blank warrants which had been filled out on the street, with which they attempted to come in and arrest the most representative people in the city. We have stood at the door and said we would use strong measures if they attempted to carry these warrants into effect, because we knew they were false and fraudulent. That sort of thing is carried on, and it is not surprising to find that in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George the election expenses have run up as high as $120,000 or $125,000 in a single election. I know of one case where the candidate contesting the election spent $75,000, and there was a contribution of $25,000 to the election fund which had never been reported to him.

Mr. WHITMAN: The hon. member has referred to the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, but his statement was that the city of Montreal is a hot spot for telegraphing. I wish that statement withdrawn unequivocally, for in my division of Mount Royal I know for a fact there was no telegraphing.

Mr. SPEAKER: In Beauchesne, second edition, citation 294 reads:

[Mr. Coldwell.]

If a member should say nothing disrespectful to the house or the Chair, or personally approbrious to other members, or in violation of other rules of the house he may state whatever he thinks fit in debate, however offensive it may be to the feelings, or injurious to the character, of individuals; and he is protected by his privilege from any action for libel, as well as from any other question or molestation.

The hon. member has not made any particular reference that I could say was disrespectful to the house or to the Chair, or personally opprobrious to other hon. members; therefore there is no question of privilege.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am quite willing to say this, that I know there are a good many honest people in Montreal in all parties who deplore this very kind of thing.

Mr. DUPUIS: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, Mr. Speaker; I should like to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to ask the hon. member—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. DUPUIS: —if he is referring only to Montreal. In all fairness the hon. member should say that there is telegraphing in large centres all over Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am quite willing to answer that question.

Mr. DUPUIS: You seem to be afraid.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not a bit afraid. I know of no telegraphing in the part of Canada where I reside.

Mr. DUPUIS: Why single out Montreal?

Mr. COLDWELL: Because that is the only place where I have any evidence before me to support such a charge. On Tuesday, July 6, there appeared in the Montreal Star a letter which was signed "Fair Play" complaining about the padding of the voters' lists. I have the clipping here, and I should like to put it on record:

Sir,—I was greatly surprised the other night on reading the electoral list in my district to find, instead of two people in my house there are eleven listed. My neighbours next door have four people, and I saw fifteen names. Also there is a number added which does not even exist. Now, I ask you, does this mean all those people will vote under my address when there are really only two of us? We are not alone in this. Another person in this block is alone and yet five are shown by the list on the pole. I think we ought to have some protection and also I think the people who canvass for names ought not to be allowed to do so unless they can spell properly as directed.

Then the reply by the returning officer for the electoral district of Cartier, Lazarus Bavitch, appeared in the Montreal Star of July 13, as follows:

Sir,—In connection with the recent complaint in your column by a voter in a certain poll in the electoral district of Cartier, with respect to the alleged padding of the list of voters in this poll, I desire, in my capacity as returning officer for the above electoral district, to draw to your attention the fact that I have personally investigated the poll in question in order to determine the accuracy of the complaint.

Upon investigation it was discovered that the pair of enumerators who had made up the list of this poll had unduly added to the list of names. The result of this investigation was forwarded by me to the chief electoral officer at Ottawa, who instructed me to appoint two new enumerators, in order to get an accurate list of names made of this poll. This enumeration is in the process of being completed. The fees of the original enumerators, which amounted to approximately $35 for each, have, accordingly, been forfeited.

These cases were brought to his attention, and he admits that the padding occurred; and apparently the only punishment that has been meted out to the persons who did this improperly, and against the law, is that they are to forfeit the $35 to which they were otherwise entitled. There are certain polls not referred to by the returning officer which are among the worst. A few moments ago I mentioned the situation that has arisen in certain of the divisions of Montreal. I quoted the words of Hon. C. H. Cahan and the admissions that were made before the parliamentary committee which sat during 1930 to 1935. Anyone who knows anything about the proceedings of that committee will recall that several outstanding cases of impersonation were mentioned. One other that is authenticated and often mentioned in Montreal is that on one occasion the Anglican bishop of Montreal, Bishop Farthing, appeared at his poll early on election day to vote, and was blithely informed that they were out of ballots, that all the ballots had been used up already, and, as it transpired, improperly; and that Bishop Farthing himself already had been voted for, that someone had voted in his name.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): When was that?

Mr. COLDWELL: In 1935. The present lists are an invitation to dishonesty on election day, an invitation of which some election machines are not in the habit of refusing to take advantage.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the hon. member say who signed the affidavits?

Mr. COLDWELL: I have the affidavits here, and I shall come to one or two of them in a moment. Perhaps I might place them on record now. One of them, for example, states this:

I, the undersigned, Estelle Gahan of the city of Westmount in the district of Montreal, clerk, being duly sworn, do hereby depose and say:

1. I reside at 4378 Western avenue.

2. For some days I have been engaged in checking the preliminary lists prepared for the by-election pending in the riding of Montreal-Cartier.

3. I am credibly informed, have reason to believe, and am furnished with evidence leading to the conclusion, that there has been systematic padding of the said lists.

4. Details of cases of padding investigated by me are set forth in a sheet attached to this affidavit, to form part of it, and initialled by myself and the ministerial officer taking this affidavit from me.

And I have signed,

Estelle Gahan.

Sworn before me at Montreal on the 18th day of July, 1943, whereupon the affiant and myself have initialled the annexed sheet ne varietur.

R. L. Calder,
A commissioner of the Superior Court in and for the District of Montreal.

This is what the young lady says:

I have checked the major part of poll No. 94 and found the following to be true:

Out of 51 addresses visited I found:

196 names of people who did not live at the addresses indicated;

8 names listed at an address that does not exist;

17 names of people under age, including a baby of seven weeks, who is listed as a bookkeeper.

And it is duly initialled. Then, here is another affidavit:

I, the undersigned, Samuel Wachtvogel, of the city of Montreal in the District of Montreal, being duly sworn, do hereby depose and say:

1. I reside at 5688 Esplanade avenue.

2. For some days I have been checking the electoral list for poll 94 of the Montreal-Cartier Division, and I have found the following:

Seven voters were listed at 4500 Park avenue. Upon investigation 4500 turned out to be a United Cigar Store, with no residents.

Seven voters were listed at 4502 Park avenue. This is a store which was vacant at the time of the enumeration, and is now the Liberal Committee Room of Mr. Lazarus Phillips.

Eleven voters were listed at 4506 Park avenue, which is a barber shop, with no residents.

Six voters were listed at No. 4512 Park avenue which is, and has been a restaurant, with no residents.

At 4516 Park avenue there were nine persons listed who do not live at that address.

At 4520 two persons were listed who do not live at that address.

At 4522 six persons were listed none of whom live at that address.

So that in seven houses or stores there were forty-eight bogus voters listed.

And I have signed,

S. Wachtvogel.

Sworn to before me at Montreal, the 19th day of July, 1942.

R. L. Calder,
A commissioner of the Superior Court in and for the District of Montreal.

I will table these affidavits, with others which I have, but which I feel it unnecessary to read.

An hon. MEMBER: Read them all.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have made the statement, and I wish to repeat it, that allowing an election to be stolen and to be filched improperly is just as bad as setting aside elections altogether, that there is no difference between the robbing the people of the right to choose their own representatives freely, and the methods pursued by Adolf Hitler in Germany. The responsibility is on this House of Commons, and particularly on the government which is responsible for the conduct of affairs in this country, to take the appropriate action in these cases.

It may be said that revising officers are correcting the lists. As we know from experience, at this date that is a practical impossibility, when a situation as wholesale as this is revealed. Revising officers would quite properly require evidence before striking names off the list. It is patently impossible for all the electors themselves to check the lists and to appear before the revising officers for the necessary affidavit, and other evidence. Only a complete reenumeration of the constituency in question will meet the situation.

I would make the point quite strongly that unless the government does act it will have to take the responsibility for the irregularities in this forthcoming election. And now, knowing the facts, or at least some of the facts, it would be accessory to the crime both before and after the fact. It seems to me it is the duty of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—and I know the Prime Minister does not countenance this sort of thing for a moment—to see to it that we cleanse this blot upon the record of democracy in Canada.

What can the government do? I am going to make some suggestions. I suggest that since the present returning officer—and this surely is quite improper—is a nephew of the Liberal candidate, and since he has already shown his complete incompetence in connection with this work, another returning officer or an assistant returning officer should be appointed, the latter to be selected by one of the other candidates. I suggest that the candidate first nominated or associated with a recognized party in this House of Commons might choose the assistant to the returning officer and, if you will, there should be a complete and immediate reenumeration of the constituency. This need not cause any delay. The new enumeration could be brought before the revising officer and, after taking the necessary legal steps as to evidence and so on, the revising officer could use the evidence so gathered to establish the official list for the election of August 9. The enumeration should be carried on in accordance with the law, by two enumerators at each poll, each representing an opposing party. If we look up the Dominion Elections Act, we find that section 17 of the Dominion Elections Act provides for this. This means that one enumerator per poll would represent the Liberal party, and one would represent the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, or the other national party in this by-election.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the hon. member allow me to ask if there was not a representative of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation?

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. DUPUIS: As enumerator?

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. DUPUIS: What was he doing, then?

Mr. COLDWELL: We had no candidate there at the time of the last election.

Mr. DUPUIS: Was there no enumerator of the other party?

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. DUPUIS: Were there two enumerators?

Mr. COLDWELL: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. WHITMAN: There was a communist who ran in the last election in Cartier.

Mr. COLDWELL: I cannot say. I think there was an acclamation in a recent election in the Cartier division.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, when Mr. Bercovitch was elected.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Bercovitch was elected by acclamation at a by-election. A gentleman called Ainey ran against him in 1940.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am simply submitting this to the house, and I hope—

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member made a statement a moment ago—

Mr. COLDWELL: I have given enough evidence this morning to show the corruption and the impropriety of the whole thing. I think it is indefensible, and it should shock any hon. member in this house.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member said there were two enumerators.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said I was not sure.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member gave a statement in which he said they were dismissed.

Mr. COLDWELL: No; enumerators were dismissed, but whether there were two in one poll, I cannot say. They probably were; it could be read that way.

Mr. DUPUIS: He was lax in his duty, then.

Mr. COLDWELL: After what Mr. Cahan said in his evidence, as to the way in which his own detectives were bribed and corrupted, I think we should look very carefully into the choosing of an enumerator.

Mr. DUPUIS: The electoral law was changed since then.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I proceed, Mr. Speaker? The third point is that the government or the proper minister or officer should issue instructions requiring each voter to show his registration card at the poll. That might assist very materially.

I hope that the government will take steps which while they would be no guarantee of honesty would at least show that an attempt was being made to secure an honest election in the constituency of Cartier. Otherwise from what I have said this morning I think that the electors of that constituency will be overwhelmed by a corrupt and crooked election machine. I am not placing the responsibility upon any political party for that machine, but I am saying that it is the duty of this house at this time to see that the forthcoming election in Cartier is as honest as we can make it and that those who have been responsible for this corruption and the placing of names improperly upon the voters' lists shall be prosecuted to the utmost extent of the law. To simply say to people who have padded the lists, "We are not going to pay you for the enumeration," is entirely insufficient. We have to safeguard democracy in this country and there is no way of bringing our democratic institutions into greater disrepute than to have the knowledge go abroad that this house, having information regarding the condition which exists in a constituency, does not take the proper action.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I first of all say to the hon. member that I am obliged to him for having brought up this matter as being one of urgent public importance. It certainly is and my hon. friend is quite right when he says that it affects the privileges of the entire house. I so regard it myself and I am sure that every hon. member in the house equally so regards it. I am not in position to say to what extent his representations may or may not be correct, but he has certainly given enough in his statement to make it clear that there is a necessity of having the matter fully and carefully looked into.

He has made some references which I think are irrelevant. He referred to a statement made by Hon. Mr. Cahan when he was in this house in relation to one election which took place when he was a candidate. If my hon. friend had wished to be fair in that matter I do not think he would have singled out the city of Montreal as being the one centre of political iniquity. Had he really known the whole situation he might have gone to other constituencies where other people have also had experiences in general elections. I think myself at the moment of an election when I was a candidate in York North a few years ago and busloads of voters were brought up from Toronto to poll votes against me and did so although not one of them had even his name on the voters' lists.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say to the Prime Minister that the only reason I referred to the constituencies I did was that I had the information before me. Had I had other information, I would have given it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I heard the statement made by Mr. Cahan in this house and he and I frequently talked together about the best methods of meeting some of these wholly improper and wrong practices which are adopted by certain people in elections, but which certainly do not represent the wishes of members of this House of Commons. My hon. friend was good enough to say that he knew I would not approve of these methods. I think he might have said that with equal truth of every hon. member of this house. I believe that every member of parliament is interested in having honest elections, and I think every member of this House of Commons would be prepared to assist in seeing that elections are made as clean as it is possible to make them. My hon. friend says that if elections are to be stolen or filched, it is as bad as having no election at all. I would go further than that. I would say that it is worse than having no election at all because it is encouraging a form of wrongdoing that cannot be too quickly stamped out entirely, if representative institutions are to be respected in our country.

I did hear a day or two ago that some irregularity had occurred in connection with one of the enumerators or returning officers, but the particulars I do not recall at the moment. My colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), and I conferred about it at once, and the Secretary of State took steps immediately to have the chief electoral officer investigate the matter. This is the first intimation that I have had of anything of the kind to which my hon. friend has referred other than the one case I have just mentioned.

I wish to make it clear that the law under which elections are held, by-elections as well as general elections, is a law that was made by the parliament of Canada. I assume there is within the law itself the means of meeting a situation of this character. If there is not, then the House of Commons as a whole has been remiss in not seeing that the law was made sufficiently comprehensive to deal with anything of the kind. I shall be surprised if it is not, but I agree with my hon. friend when he says that there may be reasons why the government should insist where there are offences, where people are not complying to the full with the provisions of the law or taking steps which would defeat the purpose of legislation of this house, that everything possible is done to see that the situation is rectified and that wrongdoing is prevented as largely as possible.

I cannot say, speaking offhand at the moment, what is involved in the suggestions which my hon. friend has made as to the manner in which this situation can be most effectively dealt with, but I will say now that I shall take up the matter immediately with other members of the government and that, as far as it is possible for the government so to do, steps will be taken to see that the election in Cartier is made as fair and square as it can possibly be made. I cannot express too strongly, not only on my own behalf but on behalf of my colleagues, and, may I say, on behalf of every member of this House of Commons, that not one of us in this House of Commons shall view as being warranted any situation with respect to by-elections that is not creditable to the country. I shall go further, and say that I do not care who the man is, whether he calls himself Liberal, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, Social Credit or by any other designation, if he lends himself to practices that are wrong, he should be dealt with summarily without regard to anything except the offence of which he is guilty and circumstances relevant thereto. I shall be happy to assist in any way in my power toward seeing that, not only this election, but all elections, as far as possible, are conducted in a fair and honourable way.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): In view of the Prime Minister's remarks, perhaps I should say a few brief words in connection with this matter. Naturally, this is the first intimation that has come to me of irregularities of the kind alleged. I am sure that if they had come to the attention of the chief electoral officer he would have immediately communicated with me, and the fact that he has not done so—

Mrs. NIELSEN: May I correct the minister? I also received a telegram on July 14 about this matter, giving exactly the same information as that given by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and I immediately telephoned the chief electoral officer. Therefore he has had that information.

Mr. McLARTY: If the hon. member had allowed me to finish she would have heard exactly what I intended to say. I stated that this is the first indication as far as I am aware as to any facts of padding of the enumerators' lists. I was going to say that late on either Thursday or Friday night a wire was received, I believe from Fred Rose, who is a candidate in the election. I do not know for what party he is a candidate or on what platform he is running. It was too late to get in touch with the chief electoral officer that night, but the first thing in the morning I had a consultation with him, and, after discussing it with the Prime Minister we sent the assistant chief electoral officer to Montreal to investigate the accuracy of the allegations which were there made. So far his report has not been received, although verbally I was advised this morning that allegations contained in that telegram were not substantiated. But, for the benefit of the member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen), if my memory is correct, there were no facts in that telegram indicating that the enumerators' lists had been padded, and it was to that phase of the election, which was the most serious phase dealt with by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, that I was intending to refer when I was interrupted.

There is one thing which is a little difficult to understand and to give credence to. The Dominion Elections Act provides that there shall be not one but two enumerators; and under the act those enumerators are nominated by the successful candidates in the preceding election and the candidate getting the next largest number of votes. In other words, in order to enable to happen what is alleged to have happened—to do justice to the election act—there would either have to be some measure of conspiracy, or the enumerators would have to be under the impression that they were taking a census, not making an enumerators' list.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend who appointed the second enumerator, besides the winning party in the last election?

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Speaker, a note was forwarded to me a couple of minutes ago. In the last election Mr. Bercovitch, who has passed away, polled 18,000 votes. The only other candidate, Mr. Ainey, listed at that time as "National Labour," polled 2,000 votes. Now Mr. Ainey is on active service, and I am advised that the political representatives of Mr. Bercovitch's party and the political representatives of Mr. Ainey's party would appoint the enumerators.

Mr. COLDWELL: And who are they?

Mr. McLARTY: I have no idea, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Ainey is described as "National Labour". He may be, so far as I know, C.C.F.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, he is not. I think he is another Liberal.

Mr. McLARTY: I have no idea who he is. What is more, I have no idea what candidates are running in Cartier to-day.

Mr. COLDWELL: He was certainly not a candidate of the C.C.F. I do not know what he is—possibly another Liberal.

Mr. DUPUIS: He must be a C.I.O. candidate.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not know what he is. I assume the returning officer would act fairly in the appointment of the enumerators. If the evidence read by the leader of the C.C.F. is correct, certainly if the enumeration was fairly done, it was carelessly done. But in the absence of any more definite information it would be very difficult on the spur of the moment to give a decision on a purely ex parte statement. I can assure my hon. friends, however, had any such information been available to us prior to this time, an immediate investigation would have followed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I ask the minister, in the matter of these by-elections, what arrangements if any are made to take the soldiers' votes, that is those serving in the armed services whether in Canada or overseas?

Mr. McLARTY: Unfortunately in the case of by-elections, no arrangement can possibly be made.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McLARTY: I know my hon. friend will be fair enough—

Mr. SPEAKER: The question cannot be asked in this debate, which is confined to one subject, and that is the Cartier by-election.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, in support of his argument the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to conditions in St. Lawrence-St. George. I think hon. members would expect me, and I feel it my duty, to say something about those conditions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. May I point out to the hon. member that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) did make reference to the city of Montreal, which I think was irrelevant to the argument which he was using. I will allow the hon. member to reply to that, but the debate cannot be extended to include either the election act or election laws, or happenings in other constituencies. However, I shall allow the hon. member to reply because I rather think I should have called the hon. member for Roestown-Biggar to order when he introduced something other than the subject matter of this debate.

Mr. CLAXTON: I quite appreciate the difference, Mr. Speaker, and I will limit my very few remarks to the point made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He cited in support of his description of conditions in St. Lawrence-St. George the remarks of my predecessor, Hon. C. H. Cahan. These remarks were made in this house and before commiteees of this house, as I recall it, in 1934, and I have to remind hon. members that Mr. Cahan, for whom I had and have the utmost respect, used consistently to complain about the condition of affairs in St. Lawrence-

St. George, and equally consistently used to get elected there. He was elected in 1925, in 1926, and in 1930, and all that time he kept complaining steadily about conditions there. He said in his remarks quoted by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that he understood that some elections there had cost as much as $120,000 to $125,000, and the inference was always made that this money was spent in corrupting the electors. Well, I have to recall that in the last election Hon. Mr. Cahan was defeated by a not inconsiderable majority, and the expenses on both sides of the election on that occasion were lower than at any time in the history of the division, so far as expenses are known at all, and the expenses on the winning side were considerably lower than those of the defeated side. Now, when the election began, when I was nominated, I went to Mr. Cahan and expressed my respect for him. I said, "This will be as clean a fight as we can make any election fight," and he agreed with that course. So far as I know, both of us lived up to that agreement completely. I never heard from anyone, Liberal or Conservative, inside or outside the constituency of any corruption or alleged corrupt practices during the election of 1940; and I think it is stretching a long bow to support an argument with regard to the Cartier division by making references to something said about St. Lawrence-St. George in 1934 by the member for that time.

I only conclude by saying that I think the people of St. Lawrence-St. George would support what I say, and that is that no election could have been cleaner than the last one, and I believe the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who knows me pretty well, would agree that if I had anything to do with it that would be the case. I therefore submit Mr. Speaker, that the argument drawn over the boundary line from one division to another will not hold water for a minute.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have no desire to take any lengthy part in the debate which has been initiated by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). However, I should like the house to know that my view is that the launching of this move to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance has served a useful purpose at an appropriate time.
