demand when it comes to farm machinery. Since farmers cannot afford to buy much machinery, one would think the price would be lower; but it has not yet fallen. The government has not told the farm machinery to lower their prices. Of course, it is not just farmers who are suffering, because many people in the farm machinery industry were laid off during the past year. Even in my riding, which does not have much manufacturing, over 100 people have been or will be laid off by the end of the year. I refer to the farm machinery industry in Yorkton. Companies such as Massey-Ferguson, Co-op Implements, Versatile and International Harvester have been laying off people because of the drop in farm income and the fact that there is no additional tax relief for farmers.

● (1622)

If any other sector of the economy had suffered the drop in real income that farmers have in the last two years, tax relief would be provided. If corporation profits had decreased by 20 per cent last year and 11 per cent this year, I am sure there would be more tax relief to corporations than is available to farmers. No relief is provided in the bill before us.

The government has conducted many studies of this situation. In the 1960s, a one-man commission under Clarence L. Barber was appointed to study the farm machinery industry. An interim report was produced in 1969 and the final report in 1971. However, I understand the government has put this report on the shelf and is no longer considering its recommendations. Apparently it has no intention of implementing any more of the suggestions made in the report. Its report painted quite a dark picture which endorses the view of the Outlook Conference as expressed in the paragraph I read into the record a few moments ago.

I should like to quote from the Journal of Economics of May, 1972, which I think summarizes the findings of the report very well. A review of the report of the Royal Commission on Farm Machinery, at page 316, reads in part as follows:

> The picture of the industry that is drawn in the report is a classic picture of oligopoly: high concentration of output and sales, a history of mergers, entry obstructed by economies of scale in manufacturing and high investment in distribution, restraints on price competition among the leading firms and a gradual decline in their market share, significant price discrimination protected by monopolistic practices, emphasis on non-price competition, failure to exploit fully the economies of scale and to achieve maximum technical efficiency. All these features are discussed and, to some extent, analysed.

The report of the Barber commission gives many examples of an oligopoly in the industry, but the government has taken no action despite the recommendations. I suggest that in a sector where income has dropped so drastically in the last couple of years, the bill should make some effort to improve the position of the farmers.

A number of things other than favourable tax provisions could be done to help the agricultural industry in Canada. I should like to mention just one, tariffs. On average, the agricultural tariff in Canada is less than one-half of 1 per cent. This is one of the reasons we are not self-sufficient in food. When I was in the Niagara peninsula last May, I spoke to fruit and vegetable growers and found that we were no longer self-sufficient in many areas where we used to be, because of lack of tariffs to prevent the dumping of certain fruits and vegetables by other countries.

Producers in that area would like a seasonal tariff so there would be some protection for their crops when they reach the market. It is strange that in this country some industries—many located in southern Ontario—have huge tariff walls. For many manufacturing industries the tariff is set at around 20 per cent, but the average farm tariff is less than one-half of 1 per cent.

Our farmers are very productive, Mr. Speaker. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) complains about productivity, I do not think he is referring to the farmers.

An hon. Member: Maybe he is.

Mr. Nystrom: Maybe he is, indeed. Maybe he blames the farmers for not being self-sufficient in food. As the Science Council of Canada has warned, it is possible that by the year 2000 we will not be self-sufficient in food but will be a net importer, despite our vast acreage and all our technology. Even today, according to government statistics, if we disregard grains and oilseeds, we are not self-sufficient in food. This is due to lack of planning by the government. Many people claim that the food we import cannot be grown here, but that is not true. We could grow over 70 per cent of the foods we import. We are not self-sufficient in beef, but we could be if we had proper planning and protection for the farmer. If our farmers were guaranteed a stable income, they could produce food at low prices compared to many of the things this country produces.

Mr. Speaker, because other members wish to speak before five o'clock, I should like to end by saying to the government, again, that the next time a tax bill is brought before the House it should include measures to protect our food producers. I would remind the House that last year farmers suffered a drop in net income of 20 per cent, and may suffer a drop of 11 per cent this year—that is, 11 per cent on the 20 per cent—which is a sharp drop over two years. The experts say that next year it will drop by about 6.1 per cent.

The time has come for better planning in the food and agricultural sector of the economy. This could be achieved through progressive tax changes which would help small and middle-sized farmers stay on the land. They would produce more food, make this a better country for all and, hopefully, in an area in which the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) is so interested, make a greater contribution to help feed the world.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as we draw this debate to a conclusion this afternoon, I think it is wise to remember that the bulk of Bill C-11 came out of a budget delivered by the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), on March 31. At that time, unemployment in this country stood at 8.1 per cent; today it is 8.4 per cent. Inflation was 7.4 per cent at that time, and today's figure reveals it stands at 9.1 per cent. Then the minister of finance stated that he anticipated a real growth in our economy of 4 per cent this year. We are now told it is more likely to be 2 per cent.

Cash requirements on March 31 were estimated, Mr. Speaker, you will recall, at $6.4 billion. The present minister had to admit in his October 20 statement that the cash requirements are now $8.5 billion. That is the extent to which this extravagant government has lost control. On March 31, which was budget night, we were told the total budgetary deficit would likely be $7.2 billion. In fact, it was admitted on October 20 that the deficit will be $9.2 billion. Most of us believe that, in turn, was an understatement.

Perhaps the most disturbing aspect of all is not that we have this sad tale of statistics to relate, but this government even today fails to recognize the inadequacy of its economic program. Take, for example, the responses of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to questions today. The government expects a rather docile Canadian public to accept unemployment of 8.4 per cent, inflation—in the last three months—of 10.8 per cent, and the all other things we could talk about. Our caucus will not be supporting Bill C-11 at third reading; there is no doubt about that—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: —if that bill is passed—and I hope it is not—let there be no doubt that we have seen 100 per cent of the government's legislative answers to the problems we are living with in Canada. Let every member look at the order paper. You will see there is not one financial bill being offered by this government for legislative processing in this House, in spite of unemployment, inflation and lack of real growth in the economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: There is not one bill being offered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) after we conclude this debate. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues ask, where is the Minister of Finance? The truth is that the Minister of Finance is presumably some other place playing tiddleywinks. He does not seem to comprehend the magnitude of the problems facing this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) has said that he is working on the job employment credit bill. Let us analyse that. On October 20, the same Minister of Finance said in his statement of that date that he had legislation to bring into this House called employment credit, and he was setting aside $100 million to be spent creating jobs in this country. That evening we said, "Good, bring it in. That is the type of thing needed to reduce unemployment. Today, December 13, we are told by his parliamentary secretary that the Minister is working on the bill he referred to last October 20. What an utter disgrace we have here.

I want to be fair to this Minister of Finance. I said he has nothing on the order paper after Bill C-11 is passed, presumably this afternoon. We recall that he introduced a bill for first reading today. What does that bill do? It deals with the Bank Act. Let me read the explanatory note, bearing in mind the unemployment, the inflation and the lack of real growth that we have. What does our Minister of Finance ask us to consider next, Mr. Speaker? The explanatory note reads as follows:

The purpose of this act is to extend, from the 31st day of March, 1978, to the first day of April, 1979, the period during which banks to which the Bank Act or the Quebec Savings Banks Act applies may carry on the business of banking.

Mr. Speaker, what sadder testimony can we have of the inadequacy of this government with respect to our economic affairs? Only yesterday the Minister of Finance made this statement in Vancouver:

I believe that all of us—as consumers, workers, businessmen, or politicians—recognize that the economy cannot be expected to continue to deliver the increases in real incomes that we enjoyed in the relatively easy times of the 1960s and early 1970s.

First as a consumer, second as a businessman, third as a worker, and finally as a politician, I want to dissociate myself from that pessimistic attitude the Minister of Finance took in Vancouver. I dissociate the Conservative caucus from the suggestion that we cannot regain the real growth potential that should be ours in Canada. It is absolute balderdash. This House should tell the Minister of Finance in no uncertain terms that we do not go along with the pessimistic attitude he expressed in Vancouver.

I know there are those who believe parliament is becoming—the Prime Minister likes to express this view—increasingly irrelevant, that its institutions are inadequate to cope with today's problems and its committee system, in particular, is little more than a ritualistic exercise which has a marginal impact, say, on unemployment, inflation or the other economic woes to which I have referred. But I have said that I want to be fair to this Minister of Finance. Maybe we have underestimated him in certain respects. While there is some truth to what I have said concerning the inadequacies of this forum, and especially its committees, sometimes we are rather startled to find what happens in committee.

Cast your mind back to a week ago last Friday when the Minister of Finance made one of the few, short appearances he has consented to make before the Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. At that time, Mr. Speaker, we were pressing the minister to tell us more about how he was going to relieve the $11 billion end product, manufactured goods, trade deficit we are now experiencing. We asked how he was the going to relieve $11 billion deficit in order to achieve approximately 800,000 jobs that such a deficit means? Lo and behold, what did the Minister of Finance tell us? He told us it was a question of terminology; in fact, it was somehow just a question of definition. For example, wheat really was an end product; if you took wheat and included it in manufactured goods, our over-all picture would look a lot better.

It is important we explore briefly the impact of the Minister of Finance's startling observation that wheat, rather than being a resource commodity, is somehow a manufactured commodity and we are, accordingly, doing much better than we thought. If I might, to specifically quote the Minister of Finance, he said:

> How much further can one go in the exportation process? After all, we could scarcely be expected to bake bread for the Russians.

We can ship them wheat if we define it as a manufactured article and then our manufacturing imbalance will look much better because, after all, in the mind of the Minister of Finance wheat is manufactured. I admit that the depth of this idea absorbed us for a time at committee. In the first place, it means—as I said—that our trade imbalance in manufactured goods this year will not really top $11 billion. If we accept the terminology of the Minister of Finance, all we have to do is accept wheat as a finished product. With a simple change of definition, the minister managed to arrest our alarming mounting deficit in manufactured trade—a problem, frankly, that absolutely defeated former ministers of finance to resolve.

That is only the beginning of the impact of this revolutionary way of approaching trade. If the minister's definition of finished products should catch on in the world, then Brazil, Colombia, the Ivory Coast, Angola, Uganda, Ecuador, Costa Rica and Honduras could become important new exporters of finished products. The first five nations I mentioned are the leading exporters of coffee and, to paraphrase the minister, we can scarcely export them to brew it for us. The last three countries are the leading exporters of bananas, and you can imagine their surprise when they discover that they have been exporting manufactured, end products all these years. What more perfect commodity could there be than a banana? It even comes in its own packaging and, as my colleague said, manufactured by God. The banana fits all the criteria of the minister's new definition: it is finished to such degree that there is nothing left to do but export it.

If the minister's definition catches on, then Thailand and Pakistan are important new exporters of finished end products. These nations are the second and third largest exporters of rice, and we can scarcely expect them to make rice pudding for us. This should make the Thais and the Pakistanis very happy, as they have been labouring under the mistaken impression all these years that they were not exporters of manufactured or finished goods.

The new system, however, will not make everyone happy. If the minister is right, then Japan will become a major importer of finished goods, in that she imports about $1.1 billion worth of wheat each year. This is only part of the picture. Poor Japan also imports massive amounts of tea, rice, coffee and other finished products. I suppose it will be only a matter of time before Japan is knocking on the World Bank's door for a loan to help them cope with their staggering deficit in finished products.

What of our neighbours to the south? The minister told the committee that it is not only wheat or barley or the other grains that should be considered as finished goods, but newsprint as well. Imagine the Americans' surprise when they discover that they have squandered away their strong position in the trade of manufactured products by becoming the largest importers of newsprint. Maybe now it is a little more understandable why we have been so generous in giving them export assistance. With such a large debt accruing to us in finished products such as newsprint, the least we can do is build a few steel mills in Texas and New Jersey.

What an amazing breakthrough the minister has charted for the world! With one simple definition he has turned the world upside down. Yesterday's underdeveloped nations are now our major developed ones, and the developed country of yesterday is today's have-not country. We in Canada should be grateful to have such a genius to set the world straight.

Mr. Paproski: The Shawinigan kid.

Mr. Stevens: We should really be proud of this Shawinigan kid. Others may have their Adam Smiths, their Keyneses, Friedmans and Galbraiths; but perhaps the greatest of them all is our current Minister of Finance who continues to dazzle us with reasoning akin to the man who wanted to change the name of Toronto to Miami in order to bring a warmer climate to Canada. We owe a massive debt to this man who has demonstrated, once again, that this government can solve any problem simply by redefining it; that rather than accepting reality, rather than admitting mistakes and correcting policy, this government can simply rationalize the problem away.

We need not worry about our staggering deficit in manufactured items or the hundreds of thousands of lost Canadian jobs which that deficit implies. We need not concern ourselves with these things, the minister tells us, because he can simply redefine our trade statistics to make us look good. Calling wheat a finished product would not create any more jobs than before—but no matter, the minister could always redefine unemployment, too, and that problem would be no more.

In the meantime, of course, the minister is returning us, month by month, into a colonial state. We can export all the food and natural resources we want, and import all the manufactured items we want and the minister will set the books right by declaring wheat and newsprint as finished products. I recommend that the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) tell that to the jobless who are looking for work, especially in the manufacturing field.

It is too bad the minister was not around when the Fathers of Confederation tried to chart a course for Canada that would make it a manufacturing state. The minister could have saved them much worry by telling them that we were already a manufacturing country, that we have our own wheat and, "After all, you can't expect us to bake bread for the Russians." The minister could have told Macdonald that the entire concept of wanting Canada to manufacture goods for export was unnecessary, in that we were already a great exporter of finished products. Such an approach to foreign trade might have changed the entire history of this country.

Looking ahead, with an election coming up, we fancy that the Liberals will want to campaign on this revolutionary concept in trade, and we envisage some 280 Liberal candidates pointing out that the government's policies of the last ten years have put Canada up there with the big ones, with Angola and Costa Rica, with Uganda and the Ivory Coast. No more will people laugh at banana republics. Thanks to the minister's new concept, such countries will become major exporters of finished goods and Canada will be right there with them.

I mention these things because we have in Bill C-11 the epitome, in legislative form, of the government's complacent, stagnant attitude with respect to the economic needs of the country. During second reading and committee of the whole stage we on this side advanced various proposals which we felt would improve the bill. Unfortunately, amendments were forthcoming in only two or three instances.

Bill C-56 proposed the taxation of life insurance policies—the first time such a thing had been done not only in Canada but anywhere else in the world. I am pleased that largely as a result of pressure from this side of the House the government has since backed down and Bill C-11 has been amended further to make taxation of life insurance policies less offensive to those who demanded that their life insurance policies should not be taxed by this government or by any government.

I am pleased, too, that the government has acceded to our request to give the benefit of an income tax cut to all Canadians, especially to those with modest means. But I am disappointed that the increase is so small and that by the use of closure the minister was able to cut off debate concerning the adequacy of the $100 reduction proposed in the bill. If we had been allowed to debate that clause, we would have asked the Minister of Finance if $2 a week was all Canadians needed by way of a tax cut. But we were not given that opportunity.

Many reasons have been advanced to explain the introduction of closure with respect to Bill C-11, but when all attempts at rationalization have been forgotten, one reason will remain: the Minister of Finance is over his head when dealing with such legislation as this and the longer this subject is debated, the more his lack of depth is demonstrated on the floor of the House. That is why closure was introduced.

During the debate in committee of the whole we were able to bring out certain facts concerning the impact of the capital gains tax. We showed that to the extent the department was taxing capital gains without indexing for inflation, its actions were confiscatory. Hopefully, in a future budget the minister may see the need to put a stop to non-indexed taxation of capital gains. In short, nothing has contributed more to the inflation experience in land prices than the capital gains tax the government imposed a few years ago.

My time is limited, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to touch on some of the highlights of the debate and draw attention to certain areas in which we feel the bill is particularly deficient. I wanted to explain why we felt there was no alternative before us but to vote against Bill C-11. We had hoped the legislation could be improved during the committee stage. We had hoped to persuade the government to increase the employee expenses allowance to $400 rather than the $250 presently proposed. But members opposite used the sheer weight of their majority to deny this to Canadian workers.

We had hoped to get the minister to agree to amend the Income Tax Act so as to remove the social insurance number provision; we do not feel these numbers should play any part in legislation such as this. These social insurance numbers have no place in our income tax system. I am sorry the Minister of Finance did not accede to our request for their removal. I am sorry he cut off debate to prevent members on this side asking him questions as to why he is seeking a further $9 billion in borrowing authority under clause 116 of the measure we are being asked to vote on this afternoon. These are the things which in future weeks the minister will, no doubt, regret having done.

The fact is, there is nothing in Bill C-11 which will in the coming months relieve the unemployment situation, the inflation we are now experiencing, the lack of real growth in the economy, or the tremendous deficit the government is living with. In short, no person who has any sense of responsibility should be prepared to sit in this chamber and vote support for a government which has shown that it is totally inadequate to cope with all these economic problems. In voting against Bill C-11 we are, in effect, voting against the government's economic record, and I call upon all members of the House to do likewise.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the Motion (Mr. MacEachen, for the Minister of Finance) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there are only fifteen minutes left to discuss a private member's bill, and in my opinion it would be unfair to take only that short period of time to do so. With the agreement of the other parties' representatives, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree to call it six o'clock?

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENTS TO CERTAIN SECTIONS OF THE ACT

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: I am sure hon. members have had a chance to look at Bill C-8, certainly in terms of its general purpose and its immediate objectives of improving the industrial relations system and Canada's competitive position.

Many of the provisions of the bill should be seen against the background of what my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), said a few weeks ago in his introduction of some other economic measures to stimulate the economy. Hon. members will recall that at that time he outlined the seriousness of our economic situation. He mentioned the rate of inflation was decreasing, yet it still had a long way to go to enhance our economic performance and position.

In addition he indicated that our output for this year and some of the projections for next year are not as great as we had hoped or as we earlier expected. But despite the fact that we can take some satisfaction in knowing that 250,000 more jobs have been created this year, there are still more Canadians requiring jobs.

The number of Canadians who need jobs is rising faster than the additional job creation that has occurred.

The Minister of Finance also indicated that although we have a favourable balance of payments on the trade side—a surplus of $2 billion—this is more than offset by a deficit in our tourist trade, interest payments, dividends, and so on. With that realistic analysis of the economic situation it becomes more imperative than ever that we improve our labour management relations system in Canada. The fundamental rationale behind the bill is to foster a greater degree of co-operation between management, labour and government in order to tackle some of these problems.

One of the underlying hopes in the bill is that it will foster a greater trend toward participation in various types of consulting mechanisms between government, labour, and management. Before dealing at any great length with those hopes, and just talking about the bill in specific terms, it would be useful if members looked at it in terms of it being divided essentially into three parts.

Which headings embody the objectives of the bill? We are talking first about justice in the work place. Under that meritorious objective, we should put in context the amendments in the bill to Parts III and IV of the Canada Labour Code.

Parts III and IV largely deal with upgrading the labour standards and enhancing the standards, particularly of the unorganized worker, and further, upgrading the safety and occupational health standards of the unorganized worker.

We should realize right away that the immediate impact of these provisions will be on the 550,000 workers under federal jurisdiction. They are primarily in the following areas in the federal sector: railroads, airlines, banking, trucking, broadcasting, grainhandling, communications, and the ports. About half of those 550,000 are unorganized.

It is our hope that Parts III and IV will give at least to the unorganized workers some of the minimum standards which have been won by the organized workers and which are now embodied in their collective agreements. We are not alleging for one moment that they match the standards set out in collective agreements, but we provide here a minimum standard.

With that background, I would like to identify quickly what we propose in terms of Parts III and IV of the Labour Code.

The amendments seek primarily to provide workers with increased job protection. For example, the amendments will extend all benefits of the Code, except those related to hours of work, to managerial and professional employees, providing them for the first time with statutory rights with respect to such basic standards as vacations with pay and general holidays.

Dealing with pregnancy, this will not be acceptable as a cause for lay-off or dismissal. Under the present standard, employers may dismiss an employee with less than 12 months' service solely because of pregnancy. This will be corrected by this amendment.

Additional Part III amendments will provide paid leave to qualified employees when a member of their family dies. They will provide employees with basic job protection during periods of sickness. They will extend protection against unjust firing, with the right to appeal. They will require employers to pay all wages due to employees on a regular and timely basis. The bill also seeks to increase to nine the number of statutory holidays by the addition of Boxing Day.

Dealing with the highlights of the amendments to Part IV, and still dealing with the objective of justice in the work place, the proposals enhance the already comprehensive measures for protecting the safety and health of workers. Specifically, the amendments will first enable the establishment of employer-employee safety and health committees at the worker level which will identify and ensure the correction of work hazards.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): They will also provide employees with a voice in matters related to safe working conditions.

A further proposal would give workers the right to withdraw, without loss of pay, from work situations which they consider pose imminent personal danger. This would be a mechanism by which individual employees could exercise a responsibility, and a right, to remove themselves from work situations which, in their judgment, threatened injury to themselves.

There are provisions to ensure that they are protected against sanctions being unjustly applied to them in the exercise of that particular right.

Those are the proposals which deal with the main highlights in terms of justice in the work place.

The second main objective of the bill is to accomplish improvements in the structures of collective bargaining. This is to be done through amendments to Part V of the Code. These amendments deal mainly with improving the system and the procedures of our industrial relations system.

At this juncture I would stress that despite the stresses and strains to which it has been subjected, our collective bargaining process continues to be viable. It will continue to receive the full support of this government.

As it now stands, Part V does allow certain adversarial tensions to remain unchecked, to accumulate, and therefore sometimes to disrupt the system.

The proposals now before the House have the following objectives: to reinforce the collective bargaining system in order to reduce some of the tensions between labour and management; to improve the grievance arbitration system, as another means of reducing tensions; to reduce tensions arising out of the relationships between the individual employee-union member and his union by increasing the protection of the rights of the individual; to reduce the impact upon the public of the adversarial nature of the system by affording greater protection of the public interest; and to reduce unnecessary delays and procedures in the administration of the collective bargaining process.

More specifically the amendments would require unions to furnish members with financial statements; would give the Canada Labour Relations Board more discretion to order representation votes and related run-off votes; would require that unions fairly represent members of the bargaining unit; would ensure fair and objective referral procedures by union hiring halls; and would authorize the CLRB to establish the terms of a first agreement, on referral from the minister.

These amendments would also provide interim certification so that certifications are not held up where there are very serious contentious points requiring further deliberation by the board but which do not in essence affect the union's right to certification. The board could avoid delays by granting interim certification.

Those are the proposals which deal with improving the process and, I emphasize, the process of the collective bargaining system.

As far as improving the structures within which the system operates, the bill provides for only some of the proposals in the 14-point program. They are largely the proposals that you can legislate. Many of the other proposals to improve the structure really do not lend themselves to legislative treatment. They are dependent upon a consultative process that would involve labour, management, and government. Because they depend for their success on consensus, they do not lend themselves to legislative treatment. I might identify a few of these so that these amendments can be seen in the over-all context of what the government hopes to achieve.

First, in terms of structure, we are hoping to set up a collective bargaining information centre. It would be a centre under the aegis of labour, management, and government as equal partners. They would be responsible for the operations of the centre. We then hope the centre would bring out data of an economic nature dealing with collective agreements, industry by industry, in a form which would be of immediate use to the parties at the bargaining table. The data would not be suspect in terms of having a bias as is so much of the data upon which our system relies. We have many agencies getting out this material; labour suspects it of having a bias on the management side, and management, depending on the agency we are talking about, suspects it of having a labour bias.

Because the centre would be under the control and aegis of labour and management, we would hope such an arrangement would involve a precommitment to accept economic data emanating from this body and in that sense would set realistic parameters within which the collective bargaining could take place. We do not have such ground rules today. We think this will have some measurable impact on the structure of collective bargaining.

We are promoting, in terms of its impact on structures, a greater measure of industry-wide bargaining where it is practical. Part of that objective can be obtained through a legislative approach and, indeed, we are suggesting this in amendments to Part V. Hon. members will note that we talk in terms of allowing the Canada Labour Relations Board to promote coalition of broader-based bargaining in certain circumstances. We will ask the unions and, indeed, encourage them under given circumstances, to form a council of trade unions for collective bargaining purposes.

This proposal has considerable merit from several points of view. To have some impact on the structure of collective bargaining, we have promoted labour education. This does not lend itself to a legislative approach. We have already moved in this direction by way of a grant of $10 million to the Canadian Labour Congress on the basis of $2 million a year, to get under way with an educational program, one which I believe will have very tangible and beneficial results.

I would like to move on now to the third main area of the proposed over-all objectives of this legislation, the initiative to improve the work environment. I think it necessary to address this question so that members can see how the amendments to the Code fit in the over-all context of our desire to achieve perceptible improvements in the work environment. We are the first to admit that these amendments should have an impact on improving the work environment, but pertinent measures to enhance that particular objective do not necessarily lend themselves to a legislative approach. Again, to a large degree they require consultative mechanisms which involve management and labour taking over on an equal basis the operation of some of the institutes that will be required to achieve an improvement in the work environment and a greater degree of humanization in the work place.

Many hon. members may recall that about two years ago when we had the Canada Labour Relations Council set up here in Ottawa, labour and management participated on an equal footing with government. The council did considerable work in all these areas analyzing in the Canadian setting the experiments of corporations which had undertaken quality-of-work-life initiatives, various types of industrial democracy, and the impact of these experiments on productivity. These studies were undertaken by management, labour, and government together. I think there would have been a noticeable consensus arrived at had not labour felt it had to withdraw from such a body during the controversy over wage and price controls. In any event, we are desirous of setting up a quality of work life centre. We want labour to participate in the operational aspects of this centre, along with management and government. In that sense we do not see this as an offshoot of the bureaucracy but rather as a centre separate from the bureaucracy.

The centre would deal with experiments already taking place in Canada as well as in other countries in the areas of job satisfaction, humanization of the work place and various aspects of industrial democracy. Some of these words are "buzz words" that seem to be having an increasingly controversial impact when discussed in Canada. I will try to avoid getting preoccupied with the controversial nature of the labels and talk about the objectives the quality of work life centre would have. It would seek to guarantee a greater sense of equality in the determination of working conditions and job security, a greater sense of participation by labour with management in the determination of those working conditions and job security.

I would be the first to declare, if there are any comments with reference to this, that we do not see this as repugnant to the collective bargaining system.

In the North American context collective bargaining is the primary instrument in industrial democracy. It will continue to be our primary instrument to ensure that workers have a say in the determination of wages and working conditions. At the same time we note that some countries with a very strong and free labour movement have a better economic performance than ours and in some cases fewer strikes than we do. We note also that in such countries there has been a readiness to complement the collective bargaining system by another system which would ensure co-operation in terms of objectives to be achieved through a non-confrontation route.

As we all know, the collective bargaining system is primarily dependent upon an adversarial approach. We should like to see a complementary system as an overlay on the collective bargaining system. This would provide a means of developing at least a broad consensus in Canada between management and labour within which the collective bargaining system could operate with greater success and greater benefit to workers and management alike.

I might say that some of those countries whose economic performance has been better than our own and which do have a very strong and free labour movement have been prepared to look at worker-directors on boards, workers' councils at the plant level, and so on. The reaction so far in Canada has been somewhat negative on the part of both labour and management. So we, as a government, are saying, without prejudging the matter: let us have an institute which will look into the whole area and see whether some of those attributes cannot be applied in the Canadian context. They are the provisions which provide for the right to refuse work under conditions which a worker perceives to be dangerous to himself; and the proposals dealing with health and safety committees of workers and management at the plant level.

These provisions would fit nicely into the functions of an institute of occupational health and safety, which again would not be part of the bureaucracy but would be under the aegis of management, labour and government. This would provide the parties, on an ongoing basis, with the latest scientific findings respecting noxious substances which form part of the new technological processes being adopted in the work place to an ever increasing degree. A study of this might possibly involve the necessity of further regulations to protect the health and safety of the worker.

Another area of examination which we think would contribute to an over-all improvement in the work environment is a study of the concept of worker sabbaticals, or paid educational leave. This is part of the 14 points. We would like management and labour to come together with government to study the implications of that particular concept. When advanced in that way, of course, it does not lend itself at this stage to legislative treatment.

If the amendments proposed to the Canada Labour Code under the heading of "justice in the work place" and under the heading of "improvement in procedures and structures of the collective bargaining system" are passed, then we may go a long way to improve the lot of the workers of Canada and, at the same time, improve our industrial relations system.

We have come to the conclusion, as a result of conversations that we have had with many people on the management side and on the labour side, that governments in Canada today, both federal and provincial, the labour movement, and management are operating under more severe constraints than have been the case over the decades. These constraints have been imposed by economic situations throughout the world which do not provide governments with the manoeuvrability or the options which are commonly perceived by many people. Whatever the political complexion of government in Canada, the policies of governments do not differ to any significant degree because the constraints are so severe. I need only mention to my hon. friends in the New Democratic Party that NDP governments have found there was some merit in supporting wage and price controls for a period of time. So constraints are there.

The necessity to be competitive is very much on the mind of many labour leaders, certainly those in the secondary manufacturing field in Canada at the present time.

If that is true and there is an increasing realization of it, then it seems to me that exclusive reliance on confrontation, which is so much a part of our collective bargaining system, when it comes to resolving labour disputes and indeed become very passé. Many have come to the conclusion that we must develop another type of system which is complementary to that system.

In other words, attitudes in Canada are changing. I think people are looking with increasing skepticism on some of the old rhetoric. People like my hon. friend, the financial critic of the Conservative party, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), will agree that workers and labour leaders are not calling representatives of the business interests "robber barons" to quite the extent they used to. I also detect that some people on the business side are not quite so ready to go around identifying labour as totally irresponsible in every given situation. There is an increasing sense of community of interest on the part of all.

We do not deny, despite the realization that the old rhetoric has had its day and is archaic thinking, that there is still a great deal to be done in terms of changing fundamental attitudes in Canada. We need this before we can ever get the kind of complementary system that is necessary to soften the total reliance on the adversary approach which is so much part of our system.

By the House adopting these amendments, and to the degree that they enhance our capability of achieving some of the other objectives which I have identified and which do not lend themselves to legislative treatment, we hope to accomplish the change in attitude on the part of labour and management which is so necessary for improving our industrial relations system.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to reply to my hon. friend, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), it would not be amiss—it has certainly been noted by the House—to remark that after a quick flurry over the provisions of the amendments to the Canada Labour Code the minister spent a good deal of his speech commenting on his 14 points and his non-legislative proposals for a better industrial climate for this country. It was not too many months ago that we heard a good deal of this speech, and I think I said in good humour—I am sure it was taken in that fashion—that the minister has made the speech so often now that he really does not need any more speech writers.

I say with all sincerity that the minister is desirous of bringing about a better state of industrial relations in this country. Certainly he has made a great many speeches trying to persuade the Canadian public, especially the labour movement, that this is so. The difficulty is that he has been operating under very trying conditions, most of which have been created by the actions of his own cabinet colleagues.

I should like to come to some of the points which have to be considered when one looks at labour legislation and industrial relations. I suppose that when one tries to find the key to better relations between labour and management, labour and government, or labour, management, and government together, the first word to start with is "trust". This may not all be the fault of the Minister of Labour. His difficulty over the last several years has been largely that labour in this country no longer trusts the government of the day.

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Mr. Alexander: And the minister knows why.

Mr. Fraser: The minister knows why. But there is a limit as to how many times the Minister of Labour can make a speech of good intentions against a backdrop of evidence of bad intentions—and not just bad intentions, but thoroughly dishonest changes in government policy and in the word that the government gave to labour.

I ask all hon. members to remember that in 1974, when this party openly and honestly advocated controls, the government of the day, in a frantic attempt to regain power, denied that it would ever place controls on the working people and the public of this country.

● (2042)

Mr. Alexander: That is what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) said in Hamilton.

Mr. Fraser: That promise was accepted by labour in Canada right across this country, and because labour in this country believed that the government fighting for re-election meant what it said, in many cases they voted for candidates of that government in the honest belief that they could depend upon ministers of the government when they said there would be no controls.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): They won't be fooled again.

Mr. Fraser: I cannot guarantee that, because the government is pretty skilful at beguiling the various segments of the Canadian community into believing it, even if that belief, in terms of history, does not last very long.

In an item in a newspaper of November 21 there was an interesting comment in connection with the doublecross to which I am referring. This is an article discussing the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald). This is what the newspaper clipping says:

> Someone found some of 'Thumper's' old pamphlets that hadn't been distributed during the 1974 election campaign. They made for funny reading.
> '. . . The Tories propose freezing your wages. But even if your wage is frozen, the price of imports cannot be. For example, the prices of simple everyday things like imported oranges may continue to rise, but your wages won't if they're frozen. So you lose.
> 'The Tories' solution was tried in the United States. It produced shortages of foodstuffs and other supplies and even higher prices when the freeze ended. As a result, the U.S. abandoned it. Britain tried it. It produced confrontation and violence.
> 'The Tories can't be allowed to freeze your wages. It just won't work. You know it. We know it.'

That is what the election propaganda said. Anybody who says that a qualification was put on that commitment to labour has only to read the propaganda put out in the campaign by one of the former ministers of the cabinet.

Mr. Stevens: They sit over there laughing at us.

Mr. Fraser: The author of the article goes on to say what we know and what labour knows. He says:

Fifteen months later, Mr. Macdonald introduced wage and price controls.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: Look at how they laugh over there.

Mr. Fraser: When we talk about a better climate for industrial relations, it is all very well for the minister tonight to talk about it with the backdrop of inflation going down. That is a laugh, after today's figure of 9.1 per cent. It is all very well for the Minister of Labour, working under the cataclysmic chaos that his fellow cabinet members have created, to be tossed out into the maelstrom and told, "You are the Minister of Labour, go and placate these people. Tell them that things are getting better, tell them we'll get them jobs by improving industrial relations". The Minister of Labour has clearly the most difficult task of any member of cabinet when it comes to trying to persuade labour that they should listen to him, no matter how honestly he may be advancing propositions which he sincerely believes are in the interests of the Canadian general public and the labour force.

What happened that has created so much difficulty for the Minister of Labour? Labour walked out of the Canada Labour Relations Council which the minister established and to which he has referred tonight, and which we supported because it was a move in the right direction. What happened to the Economic Council of Canada? Its usefulness and credibility immediately diminished because again labour walked out of it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: Adding to an already unhealthy statistical strike record, labour, in a most unusual step in this country, decided to have what they call a national day of protest, but it was nothing more or less than a national strike. It was not a strike against management in the hundreds, in the thousands of work places of this country. It was a strike against the government and it was a way of saying, "We don't trust these guys, they doublecrossed us and we have got to show them".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: Nobody is advocating another such demonstration. It is the antithesis of our system and no members of the House can condone it. But when we talk about having a better climate, a better relationship between government and labour, or management and labour in the work places of this country, in the name of heaven let hon. members remember who has destroyed any hope of creating that climate, at least for a long time to come.

It also had another effect. It had the effect of the Canadian Labour Congress at its meeting in May of 1976 enunciating a manifesto. That manifesto called for a tripartite decision-making body of government, management and labour, and because it was decision-making, it was rejected by all political parties. Eventually it was also rejected by some of the affiliates of the Canadian Labour Congress. Months later, in an attempt to salvage the better aspects of the concept, the emphasis shifted to a consultative tripartite arrangement, which was much looser.

Attempts were made by labour and management to have an effective conversation with the government, but what was the government's response? Hon. members should remember that until a few weeks ago, just before the mini-budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was still trying to blackmail the CLC executive into giving a promise of restraint, when he knew, the cabinet knew, the Minister of Labour knew, and everybody with any brains in the country knew that the CLC could not give that commitment because they do not control their affiliates. Yet right until the mini-budget which declared the end of controls, the Prime Minister was trying to blackmail labour into giving a commitment that they could not give.

I do not have to give a lecture on the internal workings of the labour movement to hon. members and I should not have to give it to members of the government. I certainly should not have to give it to the Minister of Labour who knows perfectly well how much difficulty that created in the backrooms and in the organizations of the Canadian Labour Congress. Let me just assure hon. members that on this side we realize that, imperfect as the Canadian Labour Congress may be, it is the single most significant focal point for labour in this country, and if there are to be negotiations, if there is to be a treatment of reason, the CLC cannot be embarrassed and put in a position where it cannot deal with the government. But that is what happened as a result of the Prime Minister's blackmail.

What has happened is that there has been a breakdown of any trust between the labour movement and the government, although, curiously and interestingly enough, there has been more consultation between management and labour in the last year than probably at any time earlier in our history. What does that mean? It means that management recognized that there was no way out of this morass unless they ignored the blandishments of the government or the entreaties of the government and dealt with labour by themselves. That is exactly what has happened.

We remember the next doublecross. As hon. members will remember, the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines clearly indicated that if in the coming year of 1978 inflation did not decrease to 6 per cent or less, there would be provision for allowing wage increases above 6 per cent. That commitment to labour was broken. I say with sincerity that the Minister of Labour knows the effect that had on the climate of accord which he has been attempting to establish.

The minister referred a few minutes ago to the difficulties Canada is facing. It is a comfort to realize that the hon. Minister recognizes them. We would be more comfortable if we were convinced that other members of the government recognized them. There is no question that most of the observers of the political scene recognize them.

Mr. Bruce Hutchison wrote in an article dated December 12, 1977:

> The government can no longer count exclusively, or even primarily, on the issue of the nation's unity when bread and butter issues are over-shadowing it. Hence Mr. Trudeau's belated interest in finance . . .

A few weeks ago the Prime Minister delivered a lecture which might have got him through first year economics but not much farther.

> Hence Mr. Trudeau's belated interest in finance and Jean Chrétien's desperate efforts to control a ruinous inflation, a high unemployment rate and an inherited budgetary deficit that, in normal times, would be enough to sink any government . . .
> The losses are clear to everyone—a mountain of debt, both foreign and domestic, savings eroded, our dollar devalued, our reputation throughout the world gravely damaged.

It is against a background of broken promises and most serious economic difficulties that the minister has the unenviable task of trying to maintain a link between the government of the day and the labour movement. I will give him credit for trying. As everyone is aware, he is operating under difficult circumstances.

The public of Canada should be reminded that federal jurisdiction in labour matters is extremely limited. The minister referred to extra labour propositions. These propositions will have only a limited effect if they are established, because approximately only 10 per cent of the work force in Canada comes within federal jurisdiction. There are approximately ten million people in Canada's labour force and, of that approximately 10 per cent come under the jurisdiction of this House. The rest come under the jurisdictions of the ten provinces and are subject to various provincial labour codes. The workers within federal jurisdiction are subject to the Canada Labour Code. It is important to realize that they include federal servants who are subject to the Public Staff Relations Act.

The 1977 figures indicate that, of the total Canadian work force, 3,149,213 are unionized. The Canadian Labour Congress membership includes 99 unions. Of these, 14 unions have 50,000 members or more. I do not need to list all the unions, but it is important to remember that in the private sector and under federal jurisdiction, and as a consequence subject to the Canada Labour Code, there are approximately 550,000 workers. The most recent figures indicate that approximately 45 per cent of these workers are non-unionized. In addition, approximately 320,000 public servants come within federal jurisdiction and are subject to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. The unionized workers within federal jurisdiction, subject to the Canada Labour Code, are represented by approximately 55 unions, excluding directly chartered CLC and CNTU unions, 40 of which are affiliated with the CLC. The unionized federal public servants are represented by 13 unions, of which eight are affiliated with the CLC.

A few minutes ago the minister set out the general areas of federal jurisdiction. In summary, the federal jurisdiction involves 550,000 people who are private sector employees and 320,181 people who are public sector employees. If the Armed Forces, the RCMP and others are added to those figures, which is approximately another 100,000 people, the total is just under one million. In the private sector, just over one half are unionized and have the right to strike under the Canada Labour Code, and in the public sector approximately 90 per cent have the right to strike. In the public sector the remaining 10 per cent are senior executives, personnel administrators, the operational methods group, and certain designated essential service employees.

I have taken the time to refer to those statistics because far too often people in the private sector among the public, and within the labour movement, seem to believe that the federal government can effect the answers to a better industrial climate or can solve all the problems that accompany labour and management relations in Canada.

As the minister is aware, the significance of the federal position is the example it sets. As a consequence, any legislation which is passed becomes a signal to the provinces, the labour unions, the private sector from the management side, and the majority of organized and non-organized workers in the rest of the country. It is helpful to enunciate some of the principles which must be kept in mind when one considers legislation in this vital field, and when one is dealing with labour and with management in the hope of establishing better industrial relations.

The first is trust: labour must be able to believe in the government of the day. Without that, all the blandishments and enticements will not work. The second is confidence: both labour and management must believe the government accepts its responsibility to restrain its growth and encroachment on the economy. The degree the government has been increasing its encroachment on the economy has reduced the effectiveness of our private sector to plan, invest, build, and has taken money out of the pockets of the working people. It now ill behooves the government to ask the working people of Canada to bear the brunt of inflation. Of course that has been the complaint of labour, and almost every objective observer in the last two years has indicated that there is much justification in that complaint.

The third is the recognition of the necessity to maintain a free collective bargaining system. The Minister of Labour indicated that is the basis of his own approach, as well as many other things. No matter how helpful some complementary additions to the collective bargaining system may be, I do not believe the country is ready to accept any real, severe encroachment upon the free collective bargaining system. The country is not ready for that yet, and in fact may never be.

In considering legislation and in dealing in an extra legislative manner, as has been suggested by the minister, there is a fundamental point. The fundamental point which has to be remembered is that we have had a history of free collective bargaining, and both management and labour want to get back to it as soon as possible.

The fourth point is that in considering these matters there has to be a minimum of government interference in the terms of collective agreements. By that I am not saying that there has not been in the past—and there may well be in the future; there may be now—occasions when labour must submit to legislative moves in the interests of standards. The minister has spoken about some of these, but in dealing with both management and labour it is essential that it be remembered that both management and labour have chosen to work out most of these problems and arrive at collective agreements over the bargaining table.

The fifth point is that there should be a recognition that foreign structures and foreign philosophies of labour relations cannot be transferred to Canada easily. In fact in some cases they may not be able to be transferred at all.

There has been, especially in recent years—partly because of the very high incidence of strikes in this country, which has, fortunately, diminished very significantly during this past year—an almost frantic yearning to go outside Canada to find some panacea to all our woes, and import it here. The government has even paid some distinguished gentlemen to travel abroad—

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): From your riding, John.

Mr. Fraser: —and to come back with a very interesting, exact and accurate document setting out the method of handling labour relations in European countries. As the minister says, one of these gentlemen is from British Columbia, and there is no doubt that in this ongoing debate he has made a significant contribution. I had occasion to discuss Mr. Connaghan's report with German trade union people and with members of the German government a year ago, and they complimented Mr. Connaghan on the accuracy with which he portrayed the situation in Germany. However, it is important to recognize also that when one goes to Europe one is constantly warned—as I know the Minister of Labour is aware—that what may work in Germany works because the people there are Germans, and what may work in the Scandinavian countries works there because the people are Scandinavians, but those things may not necessarily work here.

Let me say something about so-called co-determination. It is the view of this party that if both management and labour wish to experiment with forms of co-determination at any level in the work place or in the upper echelons of management, they should be free to do so, but it is also the position of this party that it would be dangerous to force such co-determination by way of legislation. It is far better to achieve these things by voluntary consent in those areas of industry where conditions lend themselves to them than to try to impose them by government edict.

On this same point I noticed that the Minister of Labour did not mention tonight his multi-partite national forum. I am sure—and I am watching him smile—he did not think I was going to go through my entire speech tonight without mentioning it. I remind the minister and the members of the government that one of the difficulties in achieving this multi-partite national forum is that management is not very enthusiastic about it and labour is opposed to it. No matter how good the idea may be in theory, it cannot be brought about unless the parties consent freely to join in such a proposal.

The sixth point is that in developing labour legislation we must be sure to ensure a balance of power in the bargaining process, favouring neither management nor labour, and to the degree that any labour legislation tilts the balance one way or another it works against a climate of accord over the bargaining table.

The seventh point which must be kept in mind—and this is a serious matter which has been avoided by the government for some years—is that at last in this country there must be a realistic acceptance that there are some strikes in essential services, and those strikes which may not start off as essential service strikes but which are demonstrably against the public interest must be dealt with more competently than they are dealt with at the present time. The most recent example was the air traffic controllers' strike, but there have been others: the rail strike of a few years ago, the strike at the river ports on the St. Lawrence, and the grain strike at Halifax. The Minister of Labour has been through all those strikes, and we all tried, given the limitations of present legislation and present approaches, to do the best we could with them.

However, I have to say seriously that despite the fact that this matter was met years ago by the Woods Report, and despite the fact that over and over again the government has finally had to act—usually belatedly—no serious effort has been made by the government to deal with this problem. There is no question that the climate of distrust between the government and labour at the moment probably makes it almost impossible to discuss the matter, but if the government is not discussing it, I can assure the minister that the public is. We have advocated for a long time the establishment of a public interest disputes commission. There are certain aspects of this approach which need consideration, and I would be the first to say—and I say it to the minister and to other hon. members, keeping in mind my admonition of a few minutes ago—that these things should not be done without consultation with both labour and management. It is time we started to consider some approaches which are less damaging, not just to the public interest but also to the image of labour, because in the long run it does no good to have problems occurring over and over again which place labour in the unenviable position of having everybody point at it as being the source of all the problems of the country.

I think it is worth considering that a commission—or some other body which has available to it expertise and some of the data the minister spoke about—should monitor at a certain point certain negotiations, and that well before the legal strike date is arrived at, the commission should report to the cabinet on what the effects on the public would be. That report should be made public because it is essential in dealing in this very delicate area that the public fully understands not only the issues in the dispute but also the effect on the well-being of the country if the dispute cannot be settled.

That report should be made available to the public and to the government, well in advance of the strike date. At that point the cabinet could assess, on the basis of that report, what its responsibility ought to be, and could move in advance of the strike under legislation which could be established to postpone strikes for a certain period of time and to provide for a cooling off period and for a further period of negotiation, with as much help as possible from the commission, from a data centre or from the other bodies the minister has suggested, in order to resolve the dispute without the necessity of putting the country through the agony of a national shutdown. This approach may not always work, but surely it is worth trying. It is a thousand times better than the ad hoc system followed by the government in the years since I came to the House of Commons in 1972. Only subsequent to a cooling off period and further negotiations, if the government felt there was no alternative but to end a strike in a particular area, would legislation to do so be introduced in this House.

The circumstances that surrounded the air controllers' strike must not be repeated. In that case the legislation itself set the terms of the settlement and, as this party has said over and over again, that is completely wrong. This House is not the place to set the terms of settlement. It was doubly wrong in that case because it was the employer—this House—that passed the legislation setting the terms of settlement. If settlement is to be forced on both sides the matter must be taken out of this House and put before an independent arbitrator.

Another matter that must be faced because of growing concern in the country is democracy in the unions themselves. I say that, realizing that there is democracy in the vast majority of unions. But where there is seen to be a limitation of democracy and something less than a free and secret vote, the public's confidence in the union movement is diminished. We have instances such as happened only today when allegations were made in this House with respect to the illegal strike in the postal service. Illegal strikes within federal jurisdiction—within the public service—cannot be allowed to take place with impunity. I say that because the working people of this country have to realize, as I think most do, that their freedom and security can only be maintained under the rule of law. To the degree that some union leaders are prepared to take members out on illegal strikes, they will destroy the faith and confidence of the general public in the trade union movement.

Another point is that the law and the process of union organization—application for certification and creation of a first contract—must not be unfairly hindered. I say that because, looking back in history, we must recognize that unions were necessary and, I believe, are still necessary. I think it is also accurate to say that the existence of trade unions and of a union movement is accepted by the vast majority of Canadians as part of our industrial milieu.

Another aspect is that the Canada Labour Relations Board has to be made more efficient. Union after union and management after management complain of delays and I am sure the minister has heard these complaints. I urge him to consider steps to make that board more efficient in the sense of being able to move the disputes more quickly because, to the degree that they are held up, they aggravate the situation.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): That is what some of the amendments do.

Mr. Fraser: I recognize that, but I would also ask the minister to recognize, as I am sure he does, that much more must be done.

I also want to emphasize that labour legislation must concern itself with its effect on productivity. That does not mean just a one-way street. It is essential for management to have a productive work force, but it is also essential for management to remember that decent conditions and high morale lead to a much more efficient and productive work force.

My last point, Mr. Speaker, is to say that the answer to industrial relations is not—I repeat not—just to pass more laws. Canada has a vexingly legalistic system now. There are ten provincial codes and a federal code. Every month of the year high salaried people try to figure out how to bring them all in line. Passing another law is no solution. It must be remembered also that the system is, and in a free society always will be, an adversary system to a certain degree. There are differences of position and differences of interest, but when passing legislation the object of the exercise is to increase the level of understanding of each side for the other in the adversary process. In a free society both sides should be grown up enough to be able to handle freedom, and should have enough common sense to know when to dump rhetoric and face the facts. If management or labour wants the government to settle everything, believe me, government is all too ready to move in. It is easy to force a settlement, but it is often difficult for either side to live with it.

We believe there are no magic answers to industrial relations in Canada. What we are talking about are human relations, and anyone—labour leader, public spokesman or politician—who offers an instant answer or an omniscient remedy for the frailties of human nature is selling the public a pig in a poke.

I see my time is getting short, Mr. Speaker, but I beg your indulgence and the indulgence of the House to carry on.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Fraser: There are some aspects of this bill which any right-minded person living in this country and who has any concern for his fellow citizen, has to endorse. There is no doubt about that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: For that reason we are going to move this bill into committee after a short debate but, keeping in mind the principles I have enunciated, some things must be examined more carefully in committee.

This bill is not entirely accepted by either management or labour. For instance the effect of the higher legislated standards has to be carefully considered. The danger is, of course, that legislated standards intrude on the collective bargaining system, as both management and labour have remarked.

As I mentioned a few minutes ago, the Canada Labour Relations Board is faced with the accusation that it cannot handle its present workload, and to the extent that the bill increases work for members of the board it must be made certain that these amendments are appropriate and that the board can handle the extra work.

Some areas where work will be increased by the broadening of the board's discretionary powers are the following: altering terms of employment; imposition of first agreements; onus of proof; cease and desist orders; consent to prosecute; remedies for unfair practices; compliance with board orders; representation and run-off votes and others. That is not to say there are problems that cannot be surmounted; it is to say it is going to require careful consideration of the proposals which the minister has put forward.

It would be appropriate for a committee to ask the minister whether consideration has been given to the cost of these amendments and whether that cost will be reflected in price increases or operators' costs, especially in small business. When I mention small businesses there is an interesting comment made by Mr. John Bulloch, head of the Independent Business Association of Canada, in a speech which he delivered November 21 at Queen's University. He said this:

The small business sector is the most free enterprise oriented part of our entire economy and, as such, finds it difficult—if not impossible—to flourish in an atmosphere which rewards non-productivity. The magnitude of this problem is best appreciated in the light of one basic statistic: The small business sector is responsible for about half of the jobs provided by the entire private sector.

That has to be kept in mind, Mr. Speaker. It also has to be taken into account that labour is suspicious of legislation that moves into the unorganized area because it will then take away from labour its legitimate area of activity.

Mr. Speaker, labour is going to ask us to consider carefully the averaging provisions which it feels establish too much discretion, specifically that there is too much discretionary power in the hands of the minister in the amendments to section 29 which allows the permit to be issued and cancelled at the employers' request. They ask how can the minister determine the best interests of the employees? How does the minister meet the 80 per cent approval required by employees for averaging? They are worried about possible employer interference in determining employees' best interests.

Labour claims that the elaborate provisions for adjudicating unjust dismissal are, in its words, purely political. They say that even though the entire procedure is paid for out of the taxpayers' pocket—as is proposed in this bill—the real protection to the dismissed worker in the unorganized area is dubious.

In terms of these safety and health committees labour has also pointed out that it is concerned committees are established at the discretion of the minister, and not required on a universal basis. It has said furthermore it is the employer who causes the establishment of these committees, and nowhere are the rights and participation of the trade union defined or even mentioned.

There are reservations respecting this bill from management and labour. As a consequence, when this bill reaches committee it will be the duty of all hon. members to look at all the provisions carefully. It will be the duty of the hon. minister, his deputy and the hard working members of his department to explain clearly and carefully the effects of these amendments, and justify the reasons for them. Although they have been a long time coming, we welcome the amendments and we will support them at this stage. We expect to have a vigorous and hopefully constructive period of examination of the terms of the bill in committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in this bill the minister proposes a number of improvements in the situation of Canadian citizens who come under federal jurisdiction. We should keep in mind, of course, that only about 10 per cent of the labour force in Canada comes under the jurisdiction of the federal government, and that 90 per cent of the working people in this country fall under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. None of the improvements proposed here will immediately, or in the near future, improve the lot of Canadians who come under provincial jurisdiction.

We welcome the improvements which will benefit Canadians who come under federal jurisdiction—the removal of pregnancy as a cause for dismissal, the requirement that employers pay salaries on a regular basis, the extra day holiday—Boxing Day—the proposals to give workers some rights with respect to health and safety. However, I must say to the minister that I have a great deal of suspicion that most of these will remain simply as clauses on statute books, and very few of them will become effective. I will deal with that in greater detail a little later.

The minister will not be surprised at our support of these proposals; in fact they are long overdue. And he should not be surprised if his proposals have been met with less than 100 per cent enthusiasm by the spokesmen for organized labour in this country. They recognize the fact that these improvements are very minor as compared to the tremendous damage which has been done to the Canadian people by the fact that we have the greatest percentage of unemployed that this country has had since before World War II.

Some members of parliament, myself included, are old enough to remember the hungry, dirty thirties. We have now, Mr. Speaker, more unemployed, and as large a percentage of our labour force as there was unemployed—not in 1933—but during the period 1937 to 1939. The unemployment was only eliminated by the advent of World War II when we suddenly found that we could do all the things government said could not be done during that great depression. We found we had the money to put people to work building guns, tanks and planes, all of which were destroyed during the war, even though during the earlier years we could not put them to work building the things which needed so much to be built.

That situation is with us again. Last month on a seasonally adjusted basis we had 900,000 unemployed, 8.4 per cent of the labour force, and among our young people almost twice that percentage unemployed.

In Manitoba, which never has the highest percentage of people employed or the highest unemployed, last month it had 28,000 unemployed, an increase in the rate of unemployment from 4.7 per cent in October to 6.1 per cent in November.

Given this tremendous calamity, it is not surprising that organized labour, which to a large extent holds this government responsible for our high unemployment, is not enthused by these proposals. The labour movement is suspicious of this government. No matter how attractive government legislation or proposals may be, the labour movement is not prepared to listen to them. One cannot blame it.

Let us look briefly at what has happened in the last two years under a government which was elected to a large extent by telling the Canadian people that it was opposed to, and would not impose, wage and price controls. Despite that promise, a year later it brought them in under the so-called anti-inflation program.

We in the New Democratic Party opposed that program. We said it would not work. The government brought in that program in 1975 because it said inflation was rampant. There was double digit inflation. The inflationary rate on an annual basis was 10½ per cent. The government said it had to deal with that, and put limits on wage and price increases.

There was a temporary reduction in the increase in the cost of living. According to figures that came out yesterday, the cost of living in the past 12 months increased by 9.1 per cent. Given an increase between 3/10 and 7/10 of a percentage point each month, as we have had for the past 11 months, when we get the figures for December we will find that for the calendar year 1977 the increase in the cost of living has been about 9½ per cent, just 1 per cent less than when the government implemented its anti-inflation program.

We opposed the anti-inflation program because it would not be equitable. We pointed out that it would be easy to control wages and salaries, but difficult if not impossible to control increases for self-employed people and professionals. Time has shown that we were correct. In fact increases in income of professionals such as doctors, lawyers, dentists, engineers and architects have been substantially higher than those permitted to wage and salary workers.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

The last decision of the government, a complete repudiation of its arguments when it brought in its anti-inflation program, was to limit increases in wages and salaries in 1978 to 6 per cent. It is obvious to everyone but the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that the cost of living in 1978 will undoubtedly increase by somewhere between 8 and 10 per cent.

By bringing in legislation to limit wage and salary increases to 6 per cent, the government is decreeing that the majority of the Canadian people will have a real reduction in their living standard in 1978. When it brought in the anti-inflation program, it was ostensibly because wage and salary increases were running substantially higher than the increase in the cost of living. We have had a betrayal of the interests of the ordinary people of this country by the government. Therefore it is not surprising that the labour movement is lukewarm about this or any other proposal by the government.

I want to say something else about the economic situation before dealing with some of the basic principles of the bill.

As bad as the government's anti-inflation program has been in terms of creating more unemployment, its policy of restraint, supported by the Conservative party, is an even greater disaster for the country in terms of creating more employment.

There are only two fields in which people can find employment in this country. One is the private sector. That sector employs people only when it can produce and sell its products at a profit. When the economy is in recession, as is the economy of Canada and the economies of most of the industrialized world, the private sector does not hire more people. It lays them off. We have seen a host of layoffs of long term employees in recent weeks and months. I could spend my 40 minutes just listing those companies, beginning with International Nickel, Falconbridge, Noranda, and Northern Telecom.

The other field in which people find work is with the government or on projects initiated by the government such as housing, schools, hospitals and so on. At this time, when the private sector is laying off people, federal, provincial and municipal governments should be hiring more people. Instead of putting more people to work, the Liberal government and the official opposition join in a call for more restraint. More restraint will mean more unemployment. In the coming year the rate of unemployment will not be the present 8 per cent plus, but probably 9 per cent. In fact I will not be surprised if it is above 9 per cent in 1978. In fact given this situation, one can understand why labour is suspicious about this bill.

I wish the minister well in the appeals he has made and will continue to make with regard to the need for better co-operation between labour, management, and government with regard to more consultation, working on forms of industrial democracy, and so on. However, they are just words. I do not blame the minister for making those speeches. However, they are much like the sermons that many ministers preach on Sunday mornings, having little relevance to life as it is in Canada. The same is true with regard to the view that is frequently expressed that we should try to emulate the peace which exists between labour and management in countries such as Sweden and Germany. That peace is based on entirely different conditions than we have or have had in Canada. That peace is based on full employment.

It is relatively easy to get workers and their unions to be successful and co-operative and objective when they have jobs and when they have reason to believe those jobs will continue. It is another thing to persuade workers to be co-operative and reasonable when they do not know whether they will be working or not in a week's time or a month's time. We should not be surprised if, in such circumstances, they try to squeeze out every benefit they can right then.

Then again, it is recognized in a great many countries that unions are here to stay, that they are part of the way in which society operates. Unfortunately this is not always the case in Canada. Many employers, particularly employers in small business, and some in business which is not so small, do everything they can to discourage their employees from joining unions. I have no doubt that the banks, for example, are, and will be, less than enthusiastic about workers wishing to show an interest in joining trade unions. So it is not surprising that workers and trade unions are edgy about any proposals which come from outside—from management, the media, or even from governments which they believe are somewhat sympathetic to their objectives.

Having already indicated that we support and welcome this bill as far as it is likely to benefit the people who come under the jurisdiction of federal labour legislation, I want to turn to consider some of its provisions. I must say I have a good many reservations about a number of the proposals before us, not with regard to their intention so much as the ability of the department and the government, given their present staffing, to do the things which are outlined in the bill.

For example, this legislation will provide where possible a mechanism by which a non-union worker may complain about his dismissal; he will be able to complain to an inspector of the Department of Labour, and if the inspector cannot settle the point he may request that his complaint be referred to an adjudicator appointed by the minister, and that adjudicator would have the power to order reinstatement and compensation if he finds the employee has been wrongly dismissed. I might point out that workers in Canada have so far not had much success in enforcing a provision along these lines, not even the much milder provision presently in the federal Labour Code. All the experience in Canada and the United States shows that many employers who are opposed to the unionization of their workers will use any and all methods open to them to prevent their workers joining unions. There is no evidence, and I say this with regret rather than with condemnation, that the Department of Labour as presently constituted has the ability to police and enforce a provision of that kind.

The bill contains a clause which gives employees the right to refuse to work if they feel that working conditions constitute imminent danger to their health and safety. The procedure is that the employee reports such circumstances to his employer who then investigates the problem. If the matter cannot be resolved, a safety officer is called in to make an inspection. Should the employee remain unsatisfied there is provision for an appeal to the Labour Relations Board. Mr. Speaker, the spokesman for the official opposition has already drawn attention to the backlog of work which faces the Labour Relations Board. That is not the only difficulty.

In this period of mass unemployment any worker, particularly in an unorganized plant, who considers making the complaint has to bear in mind the possible effect on his continued employment. To rectify the circumstances about which he has complained might well involve the installation of a costly improvement; a worker is likely to be extremely hesitant about making a complaint because of the possibility of his dismissal.

Another point is this: who decides what the word "imminent" means? What one person may consider to be an imminent danger another might regard as being a necessary or inherent part of the work being done. We shall certainly want to discuss with the minister and his officials in committee precisely how this clause will operate.

Then there is provision for the establishment of health and safety committees in the work place. Such committees would be required in various work places at the discretion of the minister. We approach this provision with a good deal of skepticism. I do not worry too much about the approach taken by the present minister. On the whole I believe that were he to err he would do so on the right side. But we have seen other ministers of labour in whom we would be far less confident.

Employees are to compose 50 per cent of the individual committees whose task would be to identify potential health and safety hazards and to develop management programs related to health and safety. Mr. Speaker, we believe these committees should be set up in all work places employing more than ten people. We do not like the fact that the choice of the members of the committees is left to regulation by the minister. We believe that the employees' representatives, where there is a union, should be chosen by the union, and that when no union exists an election should be held among all the employees. I am doubtful whether the committees could really work in places where there is no union. I suspect employers would put pressure on individual members of the committee who would be inclined to keep in mind at all times the likelihood of their being fired if they made what the employer thought was trouble.

We believe that if and when these committees are set up they must be given training on a regular basis in health and safety aspects at their place of work, that is, if the committees are to function effectively. A committee must decide where and when to hold its meetings, rather than this being left to regulations published under the bill. Committees should also meet at regular intervals.

I want to deal with one more broad question, and this is where I believe the bill is not much more than window dressing. According to the minister, this bill will bring some order and reason into the whole question of occupational health and safety in those places where federal jurisdiction exists over industry. It is pretty obvious that the federal government up until now has been derelict in its duty to protect the health and safety of workers. Because of this neglect, the number of accidents in work places has been increasing at a steady and alarming rate. In 1968 there were 6.5 million accidents. In 1974 the number had almost doubled; there were 11.5 million accidents. These figures relate to all work places, which would include those under federal and provincial jurisdiction; I do not have a more detailed breakdown between those two jurisdictions.

As a result of the increase in the number of accidents there has, of course, been a corresponding increase in the cost of accidents to industry. In 1968 it was estimated that the cost of accidents to industry was $1.165 billion. By 1973 this had increased to $2.1 billion. When this cost is adjusted for increases in consumer prices, there has been a 30 per cent increase in cost over the five year period 1968 to 1973.

The number of days lost through accidents is greater than the number of days lost through strikes and lockouts. We read a great deal about the harm done to our country and to our economy by strikes, but we read and hear very little about the cost to the country of accidents. The number of days lost in 1974 as a result of strikes and lockouts was nine million; the number of days lost through accidents in 1974 was 11.5 million. So one can see that governments, both federal and provincial, have not really addressed themselves to this problem.

The intervention of governments in this area has, to say the least, been ad hoc. There are at least nine federal departments involved in the area, and among them they administer about 10 separate pieces of legislation, all of which are safety oriented and have little regard for health aspects. Even the safety record shows flaws. The Canada Labour Code, which is the major piece of legislation on this subject, covers employees working in federal industry, except those in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon, and those people who work in shipyards, on trains and planes. These people are covered by separate pieces of legislation, and this legislation will not be improved by the changes proposed in this bill.

We believe that the government should consolidate all occupational health and safety considerations into one department. We believe they should give a great deal more consideration to the health aspects of the work place. We believe they should adopt the philosophy that people in the work place have a right to the same protection as people in the community.

I want to close by pointing out what I consider to be the inability of the minister to communicate with his fellow ministers. The Minister of Labour preaches, I believe sincerely, the need to make great improvements in the way we monitor and control the health and welfare of those who work in business and in industry in this country, while just a few days ago his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), said that one of the big reasons for the lay-offs in Sudbury was that pollution controls instituted in that city by the provincial government of Ontario were so tough that industry simply could not afford to live with them. One has only to drive through or fly over Sudbury to get a picture of what the moon looks like, Mr. Speaker, so much of the environment in Sudbury has been destroyed by the fumes and pollutants which have been spewed into the air and into the water over an area covering 50 to 100 square miles. Compare the view of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with the very fine sentiments expressed by the Minister of Labour.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, to the extent that there are very specific improvements proposed in this bill, we greet them with approval. But we look on the rest as mostly verbiage, as a plank in the next election platform of the Liberal party, a measure which might be implemented, like other pledges in the past, 25 to 30 years from now. To that extent we are, to say the least, pretty critical of the whole package.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, looking at the hour, I wonder if I might call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure hon. members will not have any objection.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—REQUEST FOR MEETING BETWEEN GATT NEGOTIATORS AND CERTAIN INDUSTRIES

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, though my question was primarily related to agriculture, it was initially directed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) since the Minister of Finance introduced the legislation adjusting duties, particularly relating to imports arriving in Canada. Unfortunately, seven minutes does not give one anything like enough time to do more than raise questions, so I want to ask a series of questions this evening.

Has the minister compared the relative trade opportunities Canadian agriculture has when shipping to the U.S. versus the opportunities United States agriculture has when shipping to Canada? Has he examined the opportunities for Canadian agriculture to ship to the European Economic Community compared with their opportunities to ship to the Canadian market? Has he examined the opportunities of the most favoured nations to ship to us compared with our opportunity to ship to them? Has the minister ever taken these matters into consideration?

Has the minister assessed the impact of the formation of the EEC, particularly as it relates to apples and to Canadian trade in the European market, and to other commodities as well? Has he examined the relative position to date versus the relative position of 20 years ago? Has the minister examined the graphs to show the pattern of Canadian agricultural trade as it relates primarily to fruits and vegetables in the last twenty years? Does he know how much the imports, for instance, of apples have increased, and is he familiar with the decrease in the apple exports from Canada? If he does not have the answers to these questions, then he is in no way competent to pass legislation or, as Minister of Finance, to be a party to the decision as to what trading considerations shall be extended to other nations entering our market.

Does the minister fully understand the impact of the recommendations of the Tariff Board as they have broadened the NOP category to include a number of products not clearly defined, and does he know that as this NOP group is expanded at lower rates of duty, these imports will infringe upon markets for Canadian producers? If he does not, then Canada is not in very good hands when legislation is introduced or when our negotiators go abroad.

Does the minister know that the production of Canadian fruits and vegetables on a larger scale with a better degree of protection, might very well provide the consumers with better prices than they are presently getting from a starved Canadian horticultural industry, plus imports from other lands? Has the minister studied the impact upon our costs of the lowering of duty structures on such items as tomatoes and tomato products, because if he did, he would understand that the cost of tomato products coming into Canada today exceeds what Canadian agriculture would need to produce Canada's requirements in a normal year.

Does the minister know that if all of the recommendations of the Canadian Horticultural Council to the Tariff Board hearings would cost Canadian consumers 33 cents per capita a year, the increase in tax returns to the Canadian government would far exceed 33 cents per capita a year? Does he know that, according to the federal Bureau of Statistics' figures, it is estimated by the Canadian food processing industry that if their recommendations were accepted for the importation of processed products, it would cost Canadians 48 cents per capita a year? We are talking peanuts in respect of protection for the consumer when we are talking about 48 cents per capita a year, but we are talkimg about the expansion of a multi-million-dollar industry and the employment that would go with it.

Does the minister know that when the United States is preparing its case for negotiations, the industry is part of the preparation and a party to the negotiations and that they are guided by the industry? Is the minister prepared to allow comparable input and comparable work along with that group, or is he not? Has the minister checked what has been given away in the last twenty years as we have negotiated tariffs, and what we have received? Have we been Santa Claus or have we been Scrooge?

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) summed that up when he said that when agriculture goes to Geneva, it goes in a bikini, indicating it has very little more to give.

Will the minister insist that the Canadian negotiating team get the surtax which has been requested by both the processing industry and the fresh fruit and vegetable industry, with a triggering device that will be activated in time to preserve the Canadian agricultural industry, or will he allow it to continue on the basis of the dumping legislation which cannot be an effective mechanism for the protection of the industry? Does the minister know—I will cite the extreme of change in trade—that in the last ten years mushroom imports and mushroom products have increased by 1,600 per cent? Does he know that mushroom imports today now constitute 70 per cent of the Canadian market?

Since my time is about up, I want to ask the minister for an answer to my initial question: is he prepared, and is the government prepared to support him, in the formation of a house committee to allow the industry and members of the House to present to cabinet ministers and to negotiators, if possible before they go to Geneva, the facts and figures and the needs of the Canadian horticultural and food processing industries of Canada?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, having been born and raised in Essex county, which is the heartland of Ontario with respect to fruits and vegetables, and having known the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) for over 30 years, I do not think any country in the world would have a better spokesman regarding the agricultural industry and the GATT negotiations than we have in Canada.

The hon. member has asked about the possibility of a committee of the House to meet with industry representatives and our negotiators in Geneva. Since the negotiations began, the government has stressed the importance of a two-way flow of information between the government and interested parties in the private sector. The Canadian Trade and Tariffs Committee was established specifically for this purpose. There have also been numerous briefings and discussions between representatives of the private sector, senior government officials and members of the Canadian negotiating, team, and direct consultations with provincial governments, including a federal-provincial ministerial conference in October.

Some members of the opposition have been briefed on the negotiations and have called on the Canadian delegation in Geneva. The office of the co-ordinator for the multilateral trade negotiations has also been very active in publicizing the negotiations in recent months. This office was established to undertake liaison with provincial governments and private sector organizations on the evolution of government policy on the negotiations, and to consult with them on specific issues as they develop during the course of the negotiations.

I can safely say that there has been much more consultation during these trade talks than in any previous ones. At present, the government is considering ways to further the consultation process as it affects industry, the provinces, and hon. members on both the government and opposition sides of the House.

AGRICULTURE—VETERINARY COLLEGE FOR ATLANTIC REGION—INQUIRY AS TO COMMITMENT TO FINANCE—REFERENCE OF HOWELL REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure who will reply to the question I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) earlier regarding the need for a veterinary college in Atlantic Canada. My question results from the report tabled by Dean Howell, who was appointed by the Government of Canada to explore the necessity for a further veterinary college in Canada. There are three such colleges in Canada today. The conclusion of that report was that a fourth college should be established in Atlantic Canada. At the end of the report it was recommended that the college be established in Prince Edward Island.

There are many things I could say about the conclusion reached by this report, but my time is limited during adjournment debate. The fact of the matter is that there are obvious conflicting provincial interests as to where a veterinary college should be established in Atlantic Canada. I have asked the Minister of Agriculture if he would exercise his good office in an attempt to remove the question of where the college should be located from the cross currents of provincial jurisdiction and on to the federal table.

The move to establish another college was commenced long before 1970, but during that year the federal Department of Agriculture undertook a study in order to discover if there was a need, and the department found out there was. Frankly the criteria established by Dean Howell are in open conflict with some of his conclusions. Obviously I am biased concerning the location of the college. It could be and certainly should be in Nova Scotia.

Why should a dean from the Guelph Veterinary College, through his imagination and discussions with Atlantic Canadians, decide to establish a veterinary college in Prince Edward Island? It does not take a professor from Guelph to know that besides lobsters, Prince Edward Island produces potatoes. Prince Edward Island is a field and crop community. I am not knocking P.E.I. because I am a member from the Atlantic community, but the animals in Atlantic Canada are in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There are relatively few in P.E.I., and the criterion established by Dean Howell himself is the need to have a veterinary college established next to a degree-conferring university. At the moment the only university in Prince Edward Island, UPEI, is not a degree-conferring university. We need postgraduate facilities in some of the establishments that are already in Atlantic Canada, not in Prince Edward Island.

In the closing moments of this debate I cannot speak on the need for a veterinary college without going back in history. In the time I have left I hope hon. members will put up with a little nostalgia. This is December 13, 1977. It just so happens that a man called George Nowlan, my father, was elected to this House on December 13, 1948, 29 years ago. Perhaps that was before some hon. members were even born. It was certainly before most of my staff were born. I do not want to get too nostalgic, but it is interesting to look at the Journals of this House. I do not think they have been referred to before in adjournment debates, but as I say, my father was introduced to the House of Commons on January 26, 1949.

Perhaps it is because of the conviviality and informality of the adjournment debate that I trespass this far, but having the opportunity to speak in this Chamber on December 13, I feel I should do no less than to pay some respect to my heritage.

I want to refer to other hon. members who are great Canadians or were great Canadians. The day my father was introduced to this House, Lester Pearson, Albert Boucher, Stuart Garson, Leopold Demers, and a man called George Drew were also introduced. I know that does not solve the problem with regard to a veterinary college in Atlantic Canada, and I am the first to admit that.

Regardless of all the facts I could recite from the lengthy document I have in my hand, the fact of the matter is that we have a research station at Kentville, Nova Scotia, which is one of the most viable research stations under the Department of Agriculture. Any veterinary college should be established next to a research station or near animals. That would certainly be in Nova Scotia, in the Annapolis Valley. Many times I heard my father say that a complementary development next to the research station in Nova Scotia would be a veterinary college. Frankly, that is where the field animals are. Because of what my father said I took unto myself the licence to introduce a little personal nostalgia to this adjournment debate. That is fairly unusual, but any member who has been in this House for a while should be exposed to a little nostalgia from time to time.

The Department of Agriculture has lead the movement to canvass whether there should be a veterinary college. The commissioner appointed by the department says there should be one. I suggest that the minister use his good offices toward this end, but initially we should refer the Dean Howell report to the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that all interested parties can come before it.

If the minister thinks there are other avenues we should explore in order to avoid a provincial fight, I would be happy to go along with him as long as there is progress and as long as a veterinary college is established. We do not need provincial cross-currents and jealousies to stymie what Dean Howell himself says is very necessary.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the disagreement of the province of Nova Scotia with regard to the location suggested for a fourth veterinary college, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) has asked me repeatedly to hand over the Howell report to the Standing Committee on Agriculture which recommends that a fourth veterinary college be founded at Charlottetown in the Atlantic region.

In his capacity as dean of the Ontario Veterinary College, I am convinced of the impartiality and outstanding qualifications of Dr. Howell in the matter. The Standing Committee on Agriculture may, if it so wishes, look into the matter, get copies of the Howell report by addressing its request to the Atlantic Higher Education Board in Fredericton, New Brunswick. If the committee so decides, it can also review the annual report for 1975-76 of the Atlantic Provinces Higher Education Board, in which it makes its recommendations concerning the Howell report.

CANADA COUNCIL—PROPOSAL THAT COMMITTEE REVIEW MANDATE

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, since I last raised the question of the Canada Council grants and contributions, and the Council's abuse of its privilege to distribute tax dollars for the purpose of elevating the artistic standards of Canada, I have spoken to many reporters, heard from many Canadians, and discussed the matter in several different forums. The almost unanimous response of those who have seen the obscene documentation is outright outrage.

I should like to present this material to the House tonight but I would urge the television cameras not to zoom too close to it because I think it would be offensive to the record as well as to the Canadian people to see it. At this point, although I should like to expose the material to the people of Canada and shock them further, that is not my purpose tonight. The reason for the disgust and anger for the inadequacy of judgment and administrative capacity of the Council and the government goes much deeper than a mere scandalous wastage of hard-earned tax dollars.

This material, supported and masquerading in the name of art, is a demeaning degradation of human experience. It is in my view neither creative nor beautiful, it is not even grotesque or or ugly beautiful, it is neither uplifting nor fulfilling, it is not even passionate or erotic; it is simply vulgar degradation of the human experience—vulgar and demeaning at a level well below that of funky graffiti written on the back of washroom doors. This type of vulgarity deserves to be placed in a category of the hate literature of pop art and should not be censored but rather branded as unfit for human consumption, and discarded on the rubbish heap to rot in its own vulgarity.

This material is evil in the broadest sense of the word, and the government has an obligation to fight against this type of degradation rather than condoning, supporting, and encouraging the production and distribution of it. This material is not art. It is not right. It is wrong.

The minister, the government, and its vehicle the Canada Council, are weak and full of fear—fearful of not appearing avant garde, fearful of being labelled culturally illiterate. I say that the granting of thousands of dollars for this material proves they do not in fact have the capacity to judge the bottom line of tolerance of either the will of this parliament or the will of the Canadian people.

Not only is the Canada Council supporting literature which most in this House would term obscene, but the Auditor General has lashed out at that body for lack of adequate documentation. Right now it is entirely possible for someone to give the skimpiest budget details, obtain a grant, and spend the first installment in any manner he wishes.

What the Auditor General was more wary of was the unknown abuse of the existing system. In the small sample of grants he examined, requests for documentation of expenses were not complied with. The money could have been spent anywhere and anyhow for all the Canada Council knows.

When I asked in committee whether or not the Canada Council would comply with the Treasury Board regulations calling for tightening up I was informed that they would not do so. That kind of answer does not make the taxpayer—the person who has to put up all this $403 million the Canada Council has spent to date—feel very confident. He likes to know his money is being spent efficiently and effectively, the Canada Council should not be considered a special case for financial accountability on tax dollars.

I have requested that the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts examine the Canada Council's mandate and issue a report of their findings. The body has been with us for 20 years; a time which has been the stage for many changes, and it is time to look at it again.

A parliamentary committee should determine: (1) the nature of the mechanism that will assure accountability to parliament including concerns regarding political direction, financial documentation, and selection criteria; (2) the nature of ministerial responsibility for both financial documentation, grant and contribution selection criteria; (3) a selection process that will ensure that political bias and patronage are not simply replaced with artistic elitist bias and patronage; (4) a selection process that will reflect regional aspirations and realities of our country.

The current minister has directed the Canada Council to begin a program to promote national unity in contradiction of the minister's earlier view that neither the minister nor this parliament should direct Canada Council. While promoting Canada's unity is a worthwhile endeavour, this is an extension of the purpose of objectives of the Council and should on this basis alone be referred to the committee and further legislation, should political direction of the Canada Council be considered acceptable by this parliament. Personally, I view the potential for abuse with alarm because of the implication amply demonstrated within dictatorships, communist or otherwise, who have subverted the arts for political ends.

In September the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) transgressed his oft stated policy that the Canada Council was solely an arms' length organization when he gave $4 million to that body earmarked for national unity projects. The Secretary of State has started an inquiry into the arts; an inquiry outside parliament and the by-passing of parliament is an all too common action during the last few years and parliament demands that right back. Obviously the Secretary of State believes an examination of the Canada Council and its mandate is necessary. Let us turn the issue over to those who represent the people.

In view of the minister's direction to the Canada Council to begin a program to promote national unity in contradiction of the minister's view that neither the minister nor parliament should direct the Canada Council, and in view of the Auditor General's concern regarding financial documentation, I ask the minister to consider requesting that the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts complete a review of the mandate, and the implications of extending that mandate to include promotion of national unity as well as the accountability, financial procedures, and performance to date of the Canada Council.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) essentially raises two questions, the first one being parliament's intention when it established the Canada Council, and second the Canada Council's performance of the task set forth for it by parliament.

As the hon. member is aware, the Canada Council was established in 1957 to foster and promote the study and enjoyment of and production in the arts, humanities and social sciences. Parliamentarians at that time were most concerned that they should guarantee the independence of the Council to ensure its freedom from possible political interference. Indeed the hon. member tonight has high-lighted that particular concern which I suspect indicates that parliament, even today, is concerned and that those concerns remain valid.

The essentials, Mr. Speaker, and some of the history that should be brought forward are that the estimates and the supplementary estimates for the Canada Council must be reviewed by the appropriate Minister, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). The Secretary of State must bring the supplementary estimates before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts for approval annually. Indeed, parliament has the opportunity at that time to assess whether the estimates are valid and should go forward.

This brings me to the second question raised by the hon. member, that of the Canada Council's performance. Hon. members, both in committee and in the House, have questioned the Council's emphasis on "excellence", yet I am sure that all those interested in the Council are familiar with its explorations program, designed to seek out new forms of expression and public participation in the arts. In its quest for innovation and the imaginative, the council, through explorations, encourages any Canadian to submit ideas for funding, any Canadian with an imaginative idea and the ability to carry it out.

Unfortunately the member opposite does not afford me the courtesy of an opportunity to express myself as was given to him. I would like to go on at great length to discuss his personal views, but I would like to get to the question he raised and give him the answer he seeks. If he wishes to discuss back and forth and not have the answer given, I am willing to give up that time.

The Canada Council has never spurned the off-beat for fear of public criticism—for excellence wears many guises. The hon. member, in calling for a review of the Council's performance, has referred to "disgusting and pornographic" works by a Canadian poet supported by the Council. I agree that not all works created by contemporary artists—whether or not they are supported by the Canada Council—may find favour with the general public or its elected representatives. However, might I remind the hon. member, that many of those whose names rank among the great painters, poets, and novelists did not enjoy public acclaim in their own lifetimes? Indeed, many were obliged to pursue their art in the face of diversity. And while I am not arguing that the poets mentioned in the hon. member's question to my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), may necessarily prove to be held in great esteem by all posterity, I should like to argue that, unless all forms of expression are encouraged, we can expect of the future no more than a form of limited cultural development which will be in direct proportion to the restraint applied during the critical growth period.

Might I also suggest that the hon. member has selected for his own purposes examples which do not reflect the general activity of the Canada Council and the artists it supports. He is glossing over all those artistic achievements whose success can be attributed to the support received from the Canada Council which is, should, and must be, free from political intercession. I see my time has expired, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

TRADE

PROPOSAL TO HOLD TRADE FAIRS FOR BUYERS FROM UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As an important initiative to overcome our massive deficit of $11.5 billion a year in manufactured products will be to show these products to far more potential customers in the United States and in the world market. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That, as a preliminary to "Operation world markets", which should be held next spring, the government should, this winter, bring the important buyers from the principal markets in the United States, to see Canadian manufactured products in giant trade shows in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, and our heavy machinery in the factories where it is made across the country, as a means of making United States buyers, and later the principal buyers in the world market, more aware of what this country has to offer, and, as a result, greatly increase the sale of Canadian manufactured products—the ones that produce jobs.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of a motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

ALLEGED DISREGARD OF CONTROLS POLICY BY INSURANCE COMPANIES—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of today's report by Statistics Canada that property-casualty insurance companies have almost doubled their profits in the first nine months of 1977, from $261.3 million in the comparable period in 1976 to $412.5 million in 1977, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this disregard of the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines by the property-casualty insurance companies of Canada during the government's controls policy, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for investigation and report back to the House.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBILITY OF DECLARING OUTAOUAIS REGION DESIGNATED AREA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that last October the unemployment rate went up to 13.5 per cent in the Outaouais region against 11.4 per cent in Quebec as a whole and considering that the Société d'aménagement de l'Outaouais has established that the industrial growth in that region is below that of other regions such as northwest Quebec, Saguenay-Lac Saint-Jean and even Gaspesia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House urge the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to declare the Quebec part of the Ottawa region a designated area, as requested by representative bodies in that region.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED REFERENCES OF PRIVATE BILL TO COMMITTEE TO PERMIT DISCUSSION OF RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the reported negotiations between the Minister of Transport and the CNR-CP rail regarding the rail rights of abandoned rail lines and because there is an obvious conflict between the provincial governments and the federal government as to whom the rights of way of abandoned rail lines should revert to, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That the Minister of Transport request that the House leader bring forth private members Bill C-222 on railway line abandonment so that it may be amended if necessary, passed on second reading and sent to committee so that this subject may be discussed openly in committee with input from the provinces and the principals concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

FAILURE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE FUNDS FOR TRIDENT AIRCRAFT LIMITED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Trident Aircraft Limited has been forced to close its doors in spite of funding from the BC DC amounting to $1¼ million from private investors, in view of the fact that this support was put into place on the basis of an assurance of federal support of $5 million and in view of the fact that Industry, Trade and Commerce has ignored all letters, phone calls and telex advising them that BC has fulfilled its commitment and calling on the government to fulfil its obligation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

REQUEST MINISTER EXPLAIN FAILURE TO TAKE ACTION TO STOP DECLINE IN FARM INCOME—MOTION UNDER S.O.43

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that farm income has declined for the second consecutive year and in view of the fact that at the Outlook Conference just concluded, a further reduction in farm income is predicted for 1978 which would result in a decrease from 1975 to 1978 of over $1,243 million, in the face of an increase in farm input cost of over $1 billion from 1976 to the 1978 projection, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That in the complete absence of any legislation or other corrective measures, the Minister of Agriculture appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture to explain why on October 14, 1975 the government seemed to have recognized the problem, and I quote, "to ensure an adequate supply of food, farmers must be assured of a rate of return commensurate with the large investment of labour and capital essential to agriculture production" when in reality nothing has been done and the record clearly illustrates a continuation of an unfortunate and disastrous situation.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO SAFETY OF AIRLINE OPERATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has had in his hands for several weeks a report detailing the inadequate enforcement of air safety regulations in northwestern Ontario and has not yet reported to the House whether he will hold an inquiry on the matter, and in view of the allegations of political interference in enforcing safety standards, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to institute a full public inquiry, which would be free from political influence, into the matter of airline safety in northwestern Ontario.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF BILL PROVIDING FOR EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDITS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for the Minister of Finance relating to economic action. May I ask the minister where the bill is introducing employment tax credits.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): We are busy drafting it, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES TO PROTECT FARM INCOME

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Since they do not have anything to offer in that area, may I ask the minister what specific measures the government will introduce before Christmas to stop the billion dollar slide in net farm income in Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the economic policies of the government were set forth in the speech of October 20. We have established the goals for the Canadian economy. We expect that the performance next year will be better than this year. That was confirmed on Monday by American advisers who stated that next year they expect that only Japan will out-perform Canada.

Mr. Clark: The goal of net farm income was set two and a half years ago and this government has done nothing about it except let the income of Canadian farmers slide.

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF MEASURE TO REVERSE FLIGHT OF CAPITAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Since the government is making no effort in that area either, will the Minister of Finance tell the House of Commons what specific measures the government intends to introduce to reverse the flight of $735 million from Canada in the last year?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is always an outflow of capital from Canada to foreign countries and an inflow of foreign capital into Canada. There is nothing unusual in that. I was in New York last week and I was pleased to note that American investors have tremendous confidence in Canada.

[English]

MEASURES TO BE PLACED BEFORE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, even this minister knows that the flight of capital has been abnormally high which indicates that in this field, too, the government has no economic action to propose. May I ask the Minister of Finance what specific short term measures he intends to place before the federal-provincial meeting of ministers of finance in January?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I think I will have my propositions presented to the ministers of finance first.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

ALLEGATION OF POOR FORECASTING—POSSIBILITY OF ACTION AGAINST ADVISERS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my questions, too, are directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the very unsatisfactory forecasting which has been done by the present minister and previous ministers of finance, underestimating the degree of unemployment and inflation and over-estimating the rates of real growth, will the hon. gentleman tell the House whether he has carried out any shake-up among his advisers to ensure a better performance in future?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): The difficulty of making accurate forecasts is one which every nation in the world faces. Last year, for example, the OECD, the IMF and the World Bank predicted a growth rate of 5 per cent in the developed nations but the actual rate for 1977 will be about 2 per cent. In a very disturbed world such as we are living in today, there are problems connected with forecasting but I have confidence in those who are working very diligently today for the federal government in the Department of Finance and in the Bank of Canada and I do not intend to change them.

REDUCTION OF SUPPLY BOTTLENECKS AND PRICE RIGIDITIES—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): In the statement by the hon. gentleman's predecessor "Attack on Inflation" presented to the House on October 14, 1975, the following appeared:

> The federal government intends to focus with some urgency on identifying ways in which supply bottlenecks and price rigidities in its own area of responsibility can be reduced.

Bearing in mind that today is December 14, 1977, will the minister tell us what progress the government has made in this direction?

STOCKPILING NICKEL—DATE OF DECISION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that yesterday afternoon the Minister of Labour interviewed on television after a meeting with steel workers from the Sudbury basin said the government was considering a temporary stockpile as a short term solution to the crisis faced by workers in the Sudbury community, and since we shall be faced with these lay-offs at the end of December and the end of January with the bulk of them coming at the opening of the federal-provincial conference on economic strategy, can the right hon. gentleman inform us how soon we may expect a decision with respect to stockpiling of nickel on a short term basis so that the uncertainty in the community might be alleviated?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Perhaps I might answer the hon. member's question. What occurred yesterday was that the steel workers came forward with a proposal to save 600 jobs on a permanent basis if there could be stockpiling for one month. After questioning the steel workers with reference to this proposition the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and I said we would analyze it further and look into the proposal which is now being refined by the steel workers with a view to possibly placing it before our cabinet colleagues for consideration.

STOCKPILING NICKEL—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF FRENCH EXPERIENCE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Minister of Labour is now the ventriloquist, I will continue with a supplementary question to him. According to a report by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, France is engaged in two separate stockpiling schemes, one financed by the government to serve as a strategic raw materials reserve consisting mainly of nickel and copper, the other backed by a group of French banks to assist Société Métallurgique de Nickel through poor market conditions by purchasing some of its New Caledonia nickel production. I ask the minister whether he is prepared to have his officials investigate the French experience in this matter with a view to proposing this to the cabinet as a possible solution on a short-term basis for the nickel industry in the Sudbury basin?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: This is Punch and Judy.

An hon. Member: This is the other ventriloquist.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if members present wish to receive an answer, then perhaps—

Mr. Paproski: Come on, answer.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member raised the question of the French experience with stockpiling. As I understood his preamble to the question, it was to the effect that the French government was trying to shore up Société Métallurgique de Nickel, a French company which perhaps was in some difficulty. He did not indicate to me that the action of the French government was taken to support French workers in France; rather it was aimed at supporting a company which was operating off shore from France, in New Caledonia. That seems to me quite a different situation from the one we are discussing in this country.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nickel Belt on a final supplementary.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I asked the ventriloquist a question and I got the answer from the other half of the team. My supplementary question is again directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the report of his own department indicated that the purpose of stockpiling nickel was twofold—one, to protect the jobs and security of the economy of the nickel industry, and two, to stockpile strategic minerals—I ask the minister whether he is prepared, instead of standing up and being so insensitive to the people of the Sudbury basin—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: —to have his department investigate the French experience so as to get all the facts about the actions of the French government with respect to stockpiling and report same to the cabinet which will have to make a support decision?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the wild allegations and the stridency of the hon. member will help the situation one little bit. If he wants to play politics with the people of Sudbury, that is his business. We are interested in trying to help the people of Sudbury.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: We do not think that the wild allegations and exaggerations regarding the impact on the city of Sudbury will help the city of Sudbury. We are quite prepared to look at any constructive suggestions which come forward, including the possibility that there may be something in the French experience from which we can borrow to assist in this very difficult situation.

Mr. Rodriguez: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has addressed a question to the Minister of Labour and two questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Rodriguez: I had two supplementaries.

POSSIBILITY OF DECLARING OUTAOUAIS REGION DESIGNATED AREA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. As no new manufacturing industry of consequence, that is with more than 20 employees, has settled in the Quebec part of the Ottawa region since 1973 because that area is no longer designated by DREE, and as regional organizations such as the CRO, the SAO, the municipalities and the OPDQ are in favour of its designation, might I ask the minister whether he intends to make a statement in the near future to the effect that the Outaouais region in Quebec has been designated by DREE?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the hon. member that I have personally met the authorities of the Outaouais region with my colleagues in this House, the hon. members for Gatineau, Hull and Pontiac. We have met those people and discussed the matter with them. Those three hon. members have described the situation to me on several occasions and my department has also looked into the over-all situation in the Outaouais region. We have considered the possibility of intervening and are now considering it; I trust that within coming weeks, or possibly months, we will be in a position to announce a decision.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, as the minister seems to be in the process of studying the problem now, could he tell us what credits or specific assistance might be provided, and how they compare with the millions that could be invested in the area?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to indicate now how much money would be allotted by my department to the development of the Outaouais region, but I am quite pleased to see that the Outaouais region as well as the hon. member support the interventions of DREE and recognize that those interventions are very justifiable.

FINANCE

MEASURES TO REVERSE FLIGHT OF CAPITAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The outflow of Canadian investment capital has not been matched by an inflow of foreign capital. In fact, during the third quarter foreigners actually reduced the value of their holdings in Canada by $20 million. Will the minister be presenting any legislation, or what action will he be taking so that Canada will once again be an attractive country in which to invest money?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the hon. member is suggesting that we should control the flow of money which comes into or goes out of Canada. I am not advocating such a policy.

Mr. McKenzie: I hope the minister is not going to wait until the cupboard is bare. The United States government and the governments of individual states are openly soliciting and assisting Canadian businesses to move to the United States. What is the minister going to do to counter this irreversible trend?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think Canada will remain a very favourable place in which to invest. Many people want to invest in Canada. The hon. member does not seem to have great faith in Canada, but he should read what was written in the newspapers on Monday about the Canadian economic picture for next year as it was predicted by the Conference Board in New York which said that Canada would outperform the United States and every other country except Japan.

Mr. Stevens: What about the Conference Board of Canada?

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF REVIEWING DECISION ON ADVANCED BOOKING OF DOMESTIC CHARTERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In view of the almost universal condemnation by every level of the media, the Consumers Association of Canada and various sectors of the country, would the minister advise the House when the cabinet intends to review the almost incomprehensible recommendation of the air committee of the CTC with regard to ABC charters within Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a good deal of criticism has been directed at erroneous interpretations of what the CTC did, but I have been reviewing the decision, and I believe that at a fairly early date I will be placing before my colleagues recommendations with regard to this decision and with regard to charter policy. At this time I am happy to say to the House that I am quite sure that my recommendations will be in favour of greater flexibility.

Mr. Lambert: In order to assist the minister, perhaps he should reread the remarks I made at the time of the debate here with regard to the Air Canada reorganization bill, bearing in mind the requirements of Canadians who travel in Canada at a cost which is commensurate with what they should pay relative to or compared with what they are being asked to pay to travel abroad.

MOUNT HOPE—REASON FOR DELAY OF DECISION ON EXPANSION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Transport and it concerns domestic travel. Can he tell the House why it has taken the minister and his department so long to come to a decision with respect to the expansion of Mount Hope airport?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is because we have been so careful to have the fullest consultation with people in and around Hamilton, and members of parliament, as well as other levels of government. As yet we do not have a final answer from all of those sources of consultation; but I expect to have that answer very soon and then be in a position to announce what will be done for air facilities in Hamilton.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, may I remind the minister that this matter has been ongoing since 1972. Can he give us some assurance as to when he will arrive at a decision, and that he will make a statement in that regard before the Christmas holidays?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will not give the hon. member that assurance because I am not sure when we will receive a final response from the various levels of government. In reference to 1972, I did not hear the hon. member complain when we set up a consultative process in order to go to the community to hear its views in the past year and a half. I hope the hon. member agrees that has been a most worth-while exercise.

Mr. Alexander: Quit pussyfooting; quit foot-dragging.

Mr. Lang: The results have been excellent. It is a pattern we will follow in the future, because this government wants to be assured that it has the views of the people in hand before arriving at a decision.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Just like Pickering and Mirabel.

STATEMENTS BY AMBASSADOR ENDERS ON FREE TRADE—POSSIBILITY OF PROTEST

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the Prime Minister, whose attention span is very limited by his own admission. I do not want him to doze off. On November 29 in a public speech the Minister of Agriculture said that he was "sick and tired of the U.S. ambassador running around talking about free trade". Also the minister stated that the United States was the most protectionist country in the world.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Crosbie: Just take it easy. My question is this: was the minister speaking on behalf of the government and giving the position of the government when he made this public complaint about the United States ambassador? Has the government made any protest, verbally or in writing, of any description to the U.S. government in connection with the actions or statements of the U.S. ambassador, Mr. Thomas Enders, in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes; the answer to the second question is no.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is: is it the view of the Prime Minister and the government that the U.S. ambassador should not go across Canada talking about free trade? Is that the government's position? If so, why does the government not have the courage to follow it up with a protest? Apparently the Prime Minister has indicated that is the government's position.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the ambassador can talk like a gentleman representing his country in Canada, if he wishes. We have no objection to that. We objected to the former ambassador making points against the government through the media and privately. That Mr. Enders does it in this way is perfectly compatible with his function. Surely, the hon. member would agree that any minister of this government, and indeed any member of this Chamber, can answer the ambassador in public in the same way.

Mr. Clark: Saying that the government was sick and tired.

POLICY ON INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC BOYCOTTS—DATE WHEN RESULTS PUBLICIZED AND REPORT TABLED

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. On October 21, 1976 the government set forth a policy regarding international economic boycotts. Can the Prime Minister tell us when we will receive the results of this policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, on January 21, 1977 there was a directive on international economic boycotts issued by the deputy minister of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce which indicated that a public report would be made semi-annually. At the same time, will the Prime Minister inquire as to why this report was not made and when it will be tabled?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, yes.

FINANCE

SUGGESTION BANKS BE ENCOURAGED TO REDUCE LENDING RATES AND GIVE PREFERENCE TO SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The after tax profits of Canada's nine largest banks again increased substantially in the year ending October 31, 1977. With that in mind, is there any consideration of lowering lending rates to encourage investment and boost the economy, and more particularly, also to urge the Canadian chartered banks, as they anticipate a new Bank Act, to establish a preference or protected part of their lending resources for viable small and medium size Canadian businesses?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I take good note of the representations of the hon. member; I shall convey them to the governor of the Bank of Canada and take them into account in my discussions with the bankers.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY WHETHER LEGAL ADVICE RECEIVED PRIOR TO AUTHORIZING OPENING OF MAIL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. May I premise it in this way: everyone in the House believes we have to take proper steps in reference to the security of the nation. Has the Solicitor General had a discussion with the former solicitor general, the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, with regard to the instructions given for the activity known as "Cathedral", the opening of mail in reference to terrorists? What was the discussion? Were those instructions given to the officers in question prior to receiving legal advice from officers of the Crown?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, indeed I have had some conversations with my predecessor concerning some of the instructions to the security service. His instructions to the security service were very much the same as those given by various solicitors general in the past: the security service had to operate within the law. During the course of his tenure as solicitor general, a request was made for authorization to issue a warrant authorizing the security service to open mail in one specific case. The authorization was signed on the understanding that it was to be referred to the Department of Justice for opinions from law officers of the Crown to see whether section 43 of the Post Office Act did or did not override section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act. The answer my predecessor received from the law officers of the Crown was that section 43 of the Post Office Act in fact did override section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act, and that no warrant could be issued by the Solicitor General authorizing the opening of mail while it was in transit and within the hands of the Post Office.

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDING LAW TO PERMIT FORCE TO OPEN MAIL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I did not receive an answer to my question whether instructions were given regarding the Cathedral activity prior to receiving advice from legal officers of the Crown. My second question in reference to that is: is the Solicitor General considering amending the law, as it now stands, to give security officers of Canada the necessary authority so they may act within the law instead of outside of the law?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the hon. member's question, the standing instructions have always been that the security service, as any other police force, must carry out its mandate within the framework of the law. With regard to the second part of the question, of course we are always willing to consider amendments to the law, if they are necessary to assure the security of this country.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the Solicitor General will not answer my simple question.

Mr. Olivier: What is your question?

Mr. Woolliams: Well, I have put my question twice, and I will put it thrice.

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Olivier: We cannot hear you.

Mr. Woolliams: Did the former solicitor general receive the advice of officers of the Crown before giving those instructions which apparently were illegal?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear from my initial answer that the authorization was given in a specific case by the solicitor general, my immediate predecessor, on the condition that before execution the opinion of law officers of the Crown be obtained.

As a matter of fact, the answer to this question was tabled in the House last December at the time I tabled the annual report under the Official Secrets Act. It indicates quite clearly that an authorization was sought for the opening of mail, and that the authorization was not executed because there was an opinion given by law officers of the Crown that it was not within the power of the solicitor general to authorize any such openings. I will take the hon. member's suggestion, that there ought to be changes in this area, under advisement. I hope, if changes are presented, the hon. member will want to be the spokesman of his party in supporting those changes.

GRAIN

DATE OF PAYMENT UNDER STABILIZATION PLAN—REASON FOR DELAY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. As the minister is aware, net farm income fell by 20 per cent last year and it fell by 11 per cent this year. I would like to ask the minister when payment will be made to farmers from the Western Grain Stabilization Plan since all statistics are now in? Will that payment take place very shortly or is it the intention of the minister to wait until the election is called?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite wrong in saying that all statistics are in. Indeed, the year in question is 1977 and, to my knowledge, 1977 is still running, grain is still being sold and costs are still being incurred. The stabilization payment is based on figures after 1977 is complete and they can be calculated.

Mr. Nystrom: The minister knows the statistics are based on the crop year. If he had been at the Outlook Conference he would know the statistics are in and were given to us here on Monday and Tuesday. I would like to ask him why the delay.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, after spending seven years opposing the stabilization bill I would have thought the hon. member would at least know that it is written on the basis of the calendar year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BREAK-INS BY SECURITY SERVICE—PROTECTION OF THE CITIZEN

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Several days ago the right hon. Prime Minister said, after having stated that ministers could not be responsible for the activities of security forces, when asked where was the citizens' protection:

> We have the protection of the courts. If you want to break into somebody's house, you get a warrant. A court decides if you have reasonable and probable cause to do it. If you break in without a warrant, a citizen lays a charge and the police are found guilty. So this is control on the criminal side . . .

I want to ask the Solicitor General if he agrees with this novel theory of protection and, also, how does a citizen lay a charge and get the protection of the courts if he does not even know who did the break-in?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite clear what the question is. I think the hon. member wants to know what type of procedures have been set up and are being contemplated by the government. I would refer him—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: If the hon. member is interested in the answer, he should let me speak; if he is not, I will sit down.

Mr. Alexander: Dont be so touchy, Francis.

Mr. Fox: The government set up the Marin Commission of Inquiry which reported in 1976. The commission recommended to the government the establishment of an external review authority which will be empowered to receive complaints from citizens and to conduct an independent investigation of those complaints to see whether or not any wrongdoing has occurred.

That legislation is presently being drafted. Legislation implementing the Marin report is presently in the hands of the Department of Justice. Legislation is in the process of being drafted and would normally be introduced in the House early in the new year.

Mr. Fraser: The minister knows perfectly well that the question is this. If the right hon. Prime Minister's theory is correct that, if there is an illegal break-in, the citizen lays a charge, then how does a citizen lay a charge if the break-in is done illegally and secretly by security forces and the citizen does not know who made the break-in? How do the courts protect that citizen? This is the novel theory of the right hon. Prime Minister. There is no way whatsoever that the courts can protect the citizen—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fraser: —unless ministers are responsible—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fraser: —for the activities of the police which are secret and illegal—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Why don't you ask me the question?

Mr. Fraser: It's no use asking you any more.

Mr. Trudeau: You're too dumb to understand the answer.

Mr. Fraser: Too dumb? You must be the only one teaching that theory in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River.

INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES IN ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and it is with regard to an inquiry that is presently underway in the province of Ontario. On the basis of information supplied to the attorney general of that province by the Solicitor General of Canada, can the Solicitor General tell the House today what dialogue he has had with the Ontario authorities, and whether he has a report on the outcome of the inquiry which was to inquire into alleged illegal activities of the security service of our country and of officials of his department?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, all the information he brought to my attention was brought to the attention of the attorney general of the province of Ontario who, as I understand it, asked the Ontario police commission to launch an investigation into the matter. There has been complete co-operation between the commission and the RCMP but as yet there has been no report to me or to the attorney general of Ontario in connection with this matter. I assume that the investigation by the Ontario police commission is ongoing.

Mr. Oberle: I would like to ask the Solicitor General one supplementary question, that is whether he has had any discussion with his own officials and the officials of the security service of the RCMP in connection with these activities of the law enforcement agency in that province, particularly the practice of engaging agents provocateurs to do some of the dirty work which in other parts of the country has been done by the RCMP.

Mr. Fox: The answer to the question is no. So far as I am concerned, the matter is in the hands of the Ontario police commission. If the hon. member believes that agents provocateurs have been hired by the RCMP, which is not the case, I would encourage him to bring that evidence to my attention or to the attention of the McDonald Commission of inquiry which is the proper forum for investigating any such allegations.

POPLAR RIVER POWER PROJECT IN SASKATCHEWAN—ALLEGED FAILURE TO ALLAY FEARS OF UNITED STATES CONCERNING POLLUTION

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with the Poplar River power project in southern Saskatchewan near the boundary with the state of Montana. Press reports have quoted the premier of Saskatchewan as blaming the apprehension existing in Montana about pollution from that project upon the failure of the Department of External Affairs to properly pass along to the Americans the right information. I should like to ask the minister if there has been any problem in this connection to justify the allegation that his department has not in fact been communicating effectively with the United States with respect to the Poplar River project.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I saw the press reports in this regard and I made inquiries. In so far as I have been able to determine, I do not have the actual word of Premier Blakeney on this but the information I have is that the comments attributed to him were inaccurate, that he made no such claims and that he is satisfied with the position which the Canadian government and the department have taken.

HEALTH

ALLEGED DANGER TO INFANTS FROM CHEMICALS CARRIED BY NURSING MOTHERS—REQUEST FOR STUDY

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the extreme anxiety caused to nursing mothers in the announcement of the findings of research work carried out to test foods, which concerned in particular milk, which revealed that nursing mothers carried an amount of additives and chemicals which could be dangerous to the health of the infant at present or in the long term, and whereas it was found that cow's milk did not carry the same high level of additives and chemicals and did not present the same threat to the infant, I should like to ask the minister what steps have been taken to investigate the situation and correct it?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, upon my return to Ottawa last Tuesday I was immediately informed of the CTV program on the findings of research work carried out by a well known Canadian toxicologist on the dangers of nursing. I checked with my officials and we have taken the necessary precautions. We have appointed a panel of medical experts who will give us more information which will be published as soon as possible and forwarded to all Canadian mothers on an individual basis. The Health Protection Branch of my department has also advised all provinces that hospital milk banks can have all our technical assistance to analyse their samples.

[English]

Mr. Rynard: I should like to ask the mother—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rynard: It could happen. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if she has gone into the question of possible diets for those additives and chemicals. This could be done right away and would allay this fear that some nursing mothers have.

FISHERIES

SHORTAGE OF LOBSTERS FOR INSHORE FISHERMEN—CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES ON POSSIBLE ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. In view of the scarcity of lobsters along the south shore of Nova Scotia which the inshore fishermen contend is due to offshore lobster fishing, has the minister made a study of the hundreds of fishermen who have withdrawn their traps from the water and are now unemployed? Also, what steps does the minister intend to take to hold consultations with his United States counterpart since the new regulations for this fishery which is shared by Canada and the United States, would have to be carried out on an international basis?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will recollect that last year at this time we had exactly the same type of problem. It is probably due to ocean conditions or water temperatures that the lobster have not moved into the traditional grounds in all districts. The first week records show that in two districts out of four the catch is above that of last year and in the other two districts it is not as high. As to joint management with the United States, this is the subject of discussion and negotiation as is the future of Georges Bank. My officials are consulting with the lobster fishermen but we know that by the end of the season last year conditions turned out to be not as bad as many people tried to make us believe they would be.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT POLICY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not indicate how many people are presently unemployed as a result of this scarcity. I submit there are hundreds, if not thousands. In light of the fact that last year Canada imported more than $183 million worth of fishery products, when can we expect the announcement of a fisheries development policy that will minimize the quantity of fish imported and maximize the quantity we can produce and thereby assist in taking care of some of the horrendous unemployment in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have just been to the hon. member's district on the south shore of Nova Scotia and the fishermen there did not seem to share his pessimistic approach to the fishery. We import some fisheries products but we export 85 per cent of Canadian fish production. In a few years we will be the number one exporting nation in the world in fish products.

EFFORTS TO OBTAIN RELEASE OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY FROM PRISON IN SOVIET UNION—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding Anatoly Shcharansky. On Monday the minister indicated to the House that he was inviting the Soviet ambassador in to discuss the case. I wonder if he could inform the House of the result of that conversation and whether any action has been taken with respect to Mr. Shcharansky?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to recap briefly what I said to the House on Monday, I spoke with the ambassador from the Soviet Union in Ottawa and indicated to him that we would be prepared, on the basis of information from Mr. Shcharansky's relatives, to have them sponsor him and issue the necessary documentation for him to come to Canada. As is the normal custom, the ambassador merely took note of my representations and indicated he would pass them on to his government. I saw him again yesterday and I did not get a specific indication from him that this had been done but the conversation led me to believe it had been done. I have no way of knowing how soon they will respond to those representations, of course. As soon as they do I will be glad to advise hon. members and determine what further action, if any, it will be necessary to take.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of this case would the minister undertake to find out exactly what did happen and to gain more than a mere impression and inform the House as soon as possible because of the interest in the country?

Mr. Jamieson: Of course, Mr. Speaker, but I can tell the hon. member that in line with the normal procedure followed in this case I think it is fair to say that there is no doubt that the ambassador was obliged to transmit the representations I made to him to his government. Whether his government chooses to respond is something I cannot forecast but I must say he accepted my representations very fully and indicated he would pass them on so I expect we will receive an answer.

ENERGY

PROPOSED PURCHASE OF TANKERS BY ALBERTA LIQUID NATURAL GAS GROUP—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CANADIAN SHIPYARDS PATRONIZED

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerns the depressed state of the shipbuilding industry in Canada. There is a report that the consortium of Petro-Canada and the Alberta liquid natural gas group who are proposing to bring liquid natural gas out of the eastern Arctic into the eastern markets of Canada, will purchase two tankers from a foreign government at a value of about $400 million. In view of the fact that the government has a regulatory process which must be followed before this purchase can be made which involves the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Department of Transport and others, would the minister be prepared to give the House a guarantee that this major shipbuilding and ship purchasing project which may take place in the near future involving the Crown corporation, Petro-Canada, will take place in Canada where it belongs and not abroad?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member were to look over the record he would see that I answered a similar question recently and I gave such assurances. I might take the opportunity to tell him it is premature to speculate on any application by Petro-Canada for such a major proposal. Certainly, work is underway and a study is being conducted. I hope it will be possible to say more about this in the near future but at the moment it is still very much a schematic or conceptual approach as far as the corporation is concerned.

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question. I assume that is a "yes" answer—that we have received some kind of guarantee. The Minister of National Defence has indicated from time to time that in the $10 billion replacement project for naval vessels over the next 20 years, these vessels will be built in Canada where possible or feasible. I should like the minister to direct his attention to this and perhaps give the House a guarantee that this major shipbuilding program will be executed in Canada, period; not if, and, but or maybe. Can we have some kind of guarantee that the 5,000 shipyard workers who have been laid off will have a chance of getting back to work with a government policy that assures Canadian ships will be built in Canada?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has made a number of statements with respect to assistance for the shipbuilding industry. If there is some particular question that the hon. member wants to put to the Minister of National Defence I believe he should do so.

Since the former premier of Manitoba, Mr. Ed Schreyer, declined to take a federal position at that time and has now indicated his disinterest in completing his term as Leader of the Opposition in Manitoba, would the Prime Minister indicate whether Mr. Schreyer has again been offered an appointment to a federal position?

SHERBROOKE AIR SERVICES

Question No. 124—Mr. Herbert:

1. Was a request received from Bar Harbour Airlines to make a stop-over in Sherbrooke on its regular flights between Quebec and Boston and, if so, was it granted and, if not, for what reasons?

2. Was there an objection to the stop-over made by an airline and, if so, which airline?

3. Is any airline providing regular commercial service in and out of Sherbrooke?

4. Is the Airport suitable for commercial traffic and, if not, are changes contemplated?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): In so far as the Canadian Transport Commission is concerned: 1. Bar Harbour Airlines has applied to the C.T.C. for authority to make an intermediate stop at Sherbrooke on its regular flights between Quebec and Boston without local traffic rights between Sherbrooke and Quebec. A decision on the application has not yet been reached.

2. Interventions opposing the application were filed by Mober Aviation Inc. and (jointly) Quebecair, Air Fecteau Ltée, Air Gaspé Inc. and Les Ailes du Nord Ltée.

3. Mober Aviation Inc., of Drummondville, has recently been granted a licence to operate a Class 3 Specific Point Commercial Air Service between Sherbrooke, Quebec City, La Tuque and Roberval. By a recent decision, Mober Aviation Inc. has been granted authority to operate a proposed service between Sherbrooke and Boston but the licence has not yet been issued.

Transport Canada advises as follows: 4. The airport is suitable for commercial traffic. Assistance will be provided to the Municipality next summer by Transport Canada under its Financial Assistance Program, so that they may carry out major repairs to the runway, as well as improve the runway lighting.

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. (a) CBC does hire part-time employees from private employment agencies to meet unexpected short-terms work demands, to replace staff members who are sick or absent for a variety of reasons, or to fill in for employees who have left but have not yet been replaced on a permanent basis. (b) On occasion CBC uses the services of employment agencies when a competition within the Corporation has not yielded a suitable candidate or in order to have the widest possible choice both from inside and outside the CBC, from which to select a full-time employee. Records are not kept in such a way that the information about numbers of part-time or full-time employees in each location can be extracted readily and without an undue amount of time, work and cost.

2. Such employees are paid from the CBC's regular operating budgets.

3. It has not been customary to require the CBC to provide such details as the costs incurred in business transactions with private companies. The background to this custom is explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2,530, May 22, 1975.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would Your Honour be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 1, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42 and 43?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council has suggested that we call as a group motions 1, 7, 8, 9, if I understand him correctly.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to give some particulars. The notices of motions for the production of papers which will be answered today are in fact the notices of motions Nos. 1 and 7 to 43 inclusive. Now, there are five or six different types of answers for various groups of notices of motions, and it would take too long to answer each motion individually. That is why I would ask Your Honour to simply call as a group first motion No. 1 and the motions Nos. 7 to 43 inclusive; then, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lamontagne) will himself specify which notices of motions will be answered by a stock answer. That procedure will be a lot simpler for the progress of our proceedings.

[English]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as most of the notices of motion are under my name, I would much prefer the parliamentary secretary to deal with them one motion at a time, giving his answer as the case may be.

Mr. Speaker: If it is planned that the motions be presented in a manner outlined by the hon. parliamentary secretary today, and preparations are not in place to respond to them individually at this time, of course the only option open to the Chair would be to call them individually, which is the only authority I can exercise at this time unless there is consent to change that practice.

Perhaps there might be consultation in light of further examination of the documents to be tabled in response, if that is to be the case, or whatever responses are to be made, to see whether or not agreement can be reached for handling this matter in a different way; otherwise, to call them seriatim at some time in the future.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, your comment was to call them at some time in the future. We are on motions now; I do not see why we just do not go ahead and call the motions. I know it will take some time, but I do not think the government should be permitted not to call them. They have indicated they are ready to call them, and the member is entitled to have them called.

Mr. Speaker: I may have made a mistaken assumption that the two hon. parliamentary secretaries involved were prepared to proceed with them on one basis, but not on the other. It may be, now, that they are prepared to proceed with them individually, in which case I will call them one at a time.

COPIES OF DOCUMENTS RELATING TO DESIGNATION OF B.C. HYDRO AUTHORITY UNDER TREATY WITH UNITED STATES

Motion No. 1—Mr. Brisco:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all papers and documents, studies, reports and correspondence between the government and the Province of British Columbia and/or British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, relating to the duties and functions to be carried out by British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority in its capacity as the designated entity under the Columbia River Treaty and subsequent protocol endorsed by the Governments of Canada and the United States, specifically under Article XIV of the Treaty, including any and all exchanges of notes between the Governments of Canada and the United States exchanged under Article XIV and any other material, documents, papers studies and correspondence in the possession of the government concerning the possibility of designating another entity than British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority as the agent of Canada under the Treaty, or the appointment of a second Canadian entity under the Treaty to share responsibility with British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, or the empowering or charging of British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority with the responsibility of ensuring the greater stability of the Arrow Lakes and the suspension of all progress on the Kootenay River Diversion project.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Concerning Motion No. 1, the answer is as follows: The production of these documents would necessitate long and extensive research into our records, but the important facts, including the duties and functions to be carried out by the designated entity and the related documents, can be found in "The Columbia River Treaty and Protocol—A Presentation. February 1964". This document is available in the Parliamentary Library and at the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

There must have been no other protocol, because there were no exchanges of notes or other documents concerning the possibility of designating another entity to share responsibilities with the British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, the stability of the Arrow Lakes or the progress on the Kootenay River diversion project.

[English]

I therefore request that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

I wonder if it is an acceptable answer for the parliamentary secretary to say that a certain matter is not in the government's records. Surely, if the House requests it, the government can get it. The reason I am prompted to raise this point of order is that when a motion is called about a matter that is in the possession of the government, the government still refuses to table it. Is this an acceptable answer?

Mr. Speaker: In a preliminary way, it seems that this is not the time to challenge an answer. The proposer of the motion is given the option of accepting the answer or rejecting it by transferring the matter for debate. I do not know at the moment if we can alter that procedure because of the high volume of motions being dealt with at this time.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, partly following the point of order raised by my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre, I would like to give notice that we will be appealing to Your Honour for whatever remedy is open to us to allow us to get access to the documents that we have been denied by the parliamentary secretary today.

We were told there was nothing secret about this uranium international cartel. I suggest there has been an affront to this parliament today, because the bulk of the documentation that we requested is in the hands of the Moss committee of the Congress of the United States. We know it is in the possession of this government, yet they have systematically, with trumped-up excuses, denied this parliament access to information which is in the hands of the United States Congress.

If he is not satisfied because the papers have not been produced, he is entitled to a debate to be held in due time, pursuant to Standing Order 48, and after one hour and a half of debate, each question will be put. So, his argument does not hold.

But he did not make such a request; he spoke of taking another course of action. Parliament could have decided right now whether the documents are to be produced, or not, had the hon. member called for a vote.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has given me notice that as a result of the response he has received, after taking the opportunity to review what has been said he will be raising the matter again. I take that as notice.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENTS TO CERTAIN SECTIONS OF THE ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, December 13, consideration of the motion Mr. Munro (Hamilton East) that Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose last night the minister and other members had spoken on the bill. I would like to add my words. I understand that the minister is anxious to show something in the Canada Labour Code for his efforts in the labour field which really have not been all that productive since he was appointed to that portfolio. I think the minister has been singularly unsuccessful in labour relations, so that much of what he has tried to do has not come to fruition.

In general, these amendments to the labour code are innocuous and apply to those in the labour force who are covered by federal regulations, not a great many, but important in the grain handling field especially—which affects Manitoba and the west—banking, transportation, and a few other federal activities. In a general way, it can be said that most of the regulations and amendments are already part and parcel of the present labour regulations and probably do not deviate a great deal from what is being carried on at the present time.

In some of the provinces, these new amendments may be minimal, but in others they may be above the present practice. The importance of the amendments lies in the effect they will have on the general labour situation and on productivity. The provincial labour codes will have to conform to these amendments. To this extent, the proposed labour code changes are important because what we find here also extends into the provincial field, down into small business, even to the small corner grocery store, into professional offices, and so on. Though they are not governed directly by the Canada Labour Code, nevertheless, through provincial adherence to general practice, all firms, no matter how small, will tend to adhere to the regulations.

In a general way, I would say these amendments will decrease productivity and increase labour costs without giving rise to corresponding increased efficiency.

I would like to mention one thing which specifically affects my riding and the province of Manitoba. At the recent annual meeting of the Manitoba Wheat Pool held in Winnipeg, it was pointed out that these amendments to the labour code will cause serious problems for grain handling companies on the prairies because of the adoption of a 40-hour week with only eight hours' overtime permitted within any one week. This was highlighted by Mr. Harold Sneath, the outgoing president of the Manitoba Pool Elevators, who said it would cause serious problems in the grain industry at the local level.

What are the implications of this 40-hour week, with only eight hours allowed for overtime? At country elevators, managers have their own working period. Elevator managers at country points are busy for ten, 12, or 15 hours a day at times, and they take corresponding time off. It is not unusual to find that an elevator manager has taken a couple of days off to go hunting. This is because he worked overtime previously. If this legislation is imposed on the grain handlers, it can only mean increased costs to the farmers, and I question whether it is worth it.

This point should be considered very carefully: it is going to increase costs at the country elevator points. I would hope the government would see fit to introduce an amendment which would give some sort of relief. Certainly, being an elevator agent in this country seems to be one of the more desirable occupations. They do not have a large turnover, and most country elevator agents seem to enjoy their work. So I would think this is an important feature. Should we, in effect, create a situation where at the country elevators the cost to the farmer is to be increased?

We have lately heard from the Hall commission on the abandonment of rail lines in the west. In fact, the abandonment of rail lines and the abandonment of small elevators are one and the same. If this labour legislation comes in as presently constituted, it will effectively kill small elevator points in the country: farmers will haul to larger elevators handling more grain and using a larger staff because they can give the farmer better service during the busy season. This is the considered opinion not of myself alone but of Mr. Sneath, the outgoing president of the Manitoba Pool Elevators. The fact that negotiations have been going on between the management of the pool elevators and the union means that the management's position has been weakened with this legislation.

In another portion of the bill there is reference to dust control. I do not understand why country elevators should be under federal dust control regulations. I think it is another instance of too much federal interference in what is really a matter of provincial jurisdiction. At the lakehead, the Manitoba pool had to spend $1,100,000 on dust control equipment to satisfy the Ontario department of the environment with respect to dust emission. This is significant. Why should country elevators come under federal jurisdiction, under an Ottawa bureaucracy which is insensitive to their needs, where western Canadians have little or no say and where western Canadians are not prominent at all? How can you stop dust from circulating when a truck is dumping grain from an elevator? The operators and the farmers delivering grain simply get out of the way, but presumably the federal inspectors will be able to produce a long dissertation on how to get out of the way of dust produced by grain being dumped. It will certainly cause a lot of problems and cost a lot of money.

It is doubtful if all of these regulations and inspections will really be in our best interests. We have to decide whether all these regulations are needed. In country elevators, a great deal has been done in the past two years with regard to dust control. The elevator companies are to be commended for that.

As for holidays, Boxing Day is to be added to the list of eight general holidays. We are still debating whether to have heritage day in February. The number of holidays in Canada is such that our calendar is beginning to look like a Mexican calendar. That holidays are important in assessing labour productivity is of some significance, I suggest. For example, when discussing the textile bill which was passed under the ministership of Jean-Luc Pepin—who is now saving the unity of this country—the textile industry told the committee that one of the significant reasons for the inefficiency of Canadian textile workers was that their competitors in other countries did not have nearly as many holidays. I was surprised to learn that the industry was not referring to low income countries such as Taiwan and Malaysia, but to countries like the United States where the number of holidays was significantly less—as I recall, only two or three. The number of general holidays in Canada is approaching between 4 per cent and 5 per cent of our total working period. This is not insignificant.

Italy, for example, also has many holidays, be they official or religious ones. The government did attempt to compress them into the Christmas and New Year holidays—which workers tended to take off anyway, whether they worked or not—but encountered stiff resistance in this regard. I suggest that in Canada the number of holidays seriously affects our productivity.

The other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), in talking about productivity, said that the wave of pessimism had spread too far. He had some suggestions to make in this regard. We in this country are presently trying to decide how to handle labour, management and government relations with a view to reducing the number of strikes and increasing productivity, something we all support. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) has talked about tripartism. We in Canada have had a considerable overdose of distrust, hostility and recrimination. There are those who say that our adversary system in management-labour relations is unlikely to work very well unless there is a more effective means of putting the issues on the table at the national and regional levels. I think this idea has a lot to commend it.

Similarly, we need better data. Unless our unemployment figures and statistics relating to the cost of living are brought up to date, we are going to experience considerable difficulty. You will have labour and management arguing over what is the unemployment level, or the number of man-days lost through strikes, absenteeism and industrial accidents.

The minister believes that tripartism is of some importance as a means of permitting government to become more involved in labour-management bargaining. Presumably, the minister's idea is that when the economic pie is cut up, the discord which arises when negotiating some 10,000 collective agreements will be muted by an overlay of consensus and compromise. No government in any industrialized democracy has gone this far and shared its power with big business and labour. However, in Sweden and West Germany, government has drawn labour and management into the process of economic management, though remaining, as indeed it should and must, the senior partner in the firm.

At the broadest and most fundamental level, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there are two main objections to this kind of tripartism. I think it can be said that this question has been discussed with labour groups. First of all, it largely excludes from power many constituencies, such as consumers, small businessmen, housewives, students, the retired, the unemployed and the unorganized worker. Consider the fact that about 30 per cent of the some ten million workers in Canada are unionized. I suggest that is a significant consideration.

The question to ask is this: Can we reasonably assure ourselves that the benefits of a more harmonious relationship among big government, big business and big labour will exceed the additional cost of shutting out the rest of society? Tripartism is not a broadening of the base of power in society but, rather, an elitist reaction, as a result of which big government and big business would agree to accommodate big labour in reaching decisions which were not necessarily in the interests of society as a whole.

Although tripartism might lead to greater efficiency, in time it might lead to economic management which would be more centralist, more authoritarian and less democratic, since about seven million Canadian workers would be largely left out of consideration except for the democratic process of parliament. We all know, Mr. Speaker, how ineffective parliament is in a given situation when it comes to dealing with the problems of labour and management.

We will continue to have management and labour settling their differences without the services of the government as matchmaker. However, generally speaking, both management and labour have been critical of what the government does. They have said that there is too much government. They have said that there is too little government. They say that government is ineffective. They say there are too many controls, and then they say there are not enough controls.

This leaves multipartism to consider. Can we bring to the process the collective wisdom of a wide group of people—which, in effect, is what parliament is? I doubt that this will be very successful, though discussion of this issue has not really crystalized. Personally, I feel there is much to be said for the adversary system, the traditional system. In the last 25 years we have had relative labour peace, and as a result we have been unwilling to accept that labour-management differences have yet reached the crisis point. The minister will continue on as he has in the past. Problems between labour and management will sort themselves out without there being too much government interference, government being asked to intervene only when necessary.

Turning to the Canada Labour Code, I would like to point out that section 59(4) of the code currently prohibits the dismissal of pregnant employees only if they have compiled twelve consecutive months of continuous employment. That condition is now to be removed altogether, but I suggest the problem with regard to pregnancy is not solved that easily.

I suppose legislators feel that being pregnant should not be a job disqualification under any circumstances. However, with certain people pregnancy is almost incapacitating. As long as pregnant employees can do their usual work, no one complains; but in certain circumstances pregnant employees are often just "around" and are not in a physical condition to contribute their usual work output. In some instances, this amounts to wages without any work being performed. The matter of pregnancy should be studied further. Pregnancy cannot be treated as a non-event, and a pregnant person should not automatically receive the usual work benefits.

In the matter of bereavement, the definition of what constitutes a family can be very widely interpreted, and certainly could be construed and used by many employees in such a way as to get a few days off unless clearly defined. With regard to job protection, during periods of sickness most firms can reinstate their employees with few problems. But with respect to small firms—and I am thinking of perhaps small credit unions, because presumably they come under this legislation—it will not always be easy to reinstate employees in offices of two or three people. There does not seem to be any tribunal to which a small firm can apply to see if it has the ability to meet specified conditions and whether meeting them would be too onerous.

Section 5(7) provides protection against unjust firing. That is of some concern, particularly to small businesses. In fact, most dismissals from small businesses are due to personality conflicts between the boss and the employee. In most cases, no amount of ordering by ministerial authority will resolve the problem. This is a very important matter. Because of possible unpleasant effects and difficult situations, this section must be seriously considered.

With regard to section 5(8), it is not easy to ensure that an employee has his wages in hand on his regular pay day at all times. An employee may be required to be away on a particular pay day. There are many occasions when it will be costly to comply with this section. Nevertheless, in a general way I think all agree with the thrust of the amendment.

We are always dealing with labour, management and unemployment. We are always concerned about what unemployment statistics mean. In the United States, it has recently become the practice to express the cost of living index with three indices: the cost of living varies among retired people, working people and other groups. When we measure our cost of living index, we forget that it is not always exact and it is sometimes very inaccurate. We should bear this in mind when dealing with the cost of living. The cost of living index is directly related, primarily, to the middle income group and to what that group buys.

It has been suggested that the cost of living index does not truly reflect the situation of the well-to-do or of the poor, and that it does not reflect the situation of those who perhaps do not buy very many commodities because of retirement.

Are the unemployment statistics we are using correct? It has been pointed out that the highest rate of unemployment is among people who are under 25, and that among people 25 years of age and over the unemployment rate is only 4.8 per cent, half a percentage point higher than a year ago. This should be borne in mind when we examine the unemployment situation.

We must also remember the problems with regard to youth unemployment and that the benefits paid by way of unemployment insurance give youth a greater opportunity to experiment with finding the kind of work they want. They have a much greater opportunity than their parents ever had. I think it can be said that young people are leaving school without being qualified for employment in certain jobs. I think educators have some responsibility for this. It is not unusual to see young people coming out of educational institutions with the idea they are worth $15,000 or $16,000 a year—and they are, if they can find jobs. It is important that we consider unemployment statistics when we assess what we should do by way of job-creation. Unless productive jobs are created, an unnecessary amount of job-creation by the government will not lead to lasting employment in the long run.

I would like to say a few words about the withdrawal of the United States from the International Labour Organization. The withdrawal coincided with the election of Mr. Joe Morris to the top office of the CLC. Mr. Morris regretted—and I think rightly so—the decision of President Carter, along with the national labour organization of his country and business, apparently against the advice of the state department, to withdraw American support from the ILO. We should not, however, be too critical or the position taken by the United States. The ILO seems to have fallen under the domination of the Soviet Union and Third World countries which are inclined toward communism. These countries have used the ILO to put forward their views and as a political forum in which to berate western countries.

It is significant that in those countries there are not true labour movements with unions which are free to become established and to express views. I think this withdrawal will be significant, because the United States contributed about 25 per cent of the total contributed which was, I think, in the area of $25 million. This withdrawal has been likened by a few people to the German withdrawal from the League of Nations, and its subsequent downfall.

In closing, I would like to say that I hope in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration there will be a complete study of the implications of the amendments contained in this bill. On the surface, they do not seem to be too severe, but in the area of grain handling they will have a major effect. About 90 per cent of grain handling is involved with export movements. Considering our balance of payments situation, that export trade is important, and if this bill causes serious problems for grain handling at country elevators it will not have served its purpose in that sector.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I paid great attention to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) when he introduced this new legislation before the House yesterday. The only thing I could point out at the outset of my remarks is that the working conditions mentioned in the minister's speech have been existing long enough in Canada and that we should have passed such legislation a few years ago. I realize that Bill C-8 does contain positive improvements which should contribute to avoiding certain delays in employer-employee relations.

Several clauses of this legislation provide workers with the protection they are entitled to. I have found very interesting the clauses which allow a worker to refuse to perform some duties presenting immediate risks without having to suffer a salary loss. I had the opportunity to realize that too often unfortunately that employees were exposed to dangerous work without being adequately protected, especially on construction sites. It is one essential point in working conditions. So we must have clearly drafted, safety regulations and an experienced team responsible for supervising the ways work is assigned on a construction site.

Too often workers who had been looking for a job for a considerable time and are anxious to work suffer from conditions that should not be tolerated in this day and age, when the means are available to guarantee protection against safety hazards. This is fundamental, and union leaders and labour representatives should work in that direction and supervise construction sites.

I myself worked on hydroelectric dam projects, where I found that we were sometimes directed to unsafe work places. This is especially true at times where the unemployment rate is abnormally high. For fear of losing their jobs, workers take the chance of working in unsafe conditions. In that respect, I am 100 per cent in favour of the proposal put forward, and I hope there will be adequate implementation so that regulations are understood by workers and they can insist so that their boss, or company executive or the small foreman abide by the rules.

Earned days based on years of service is stimulating for workers. Another provision covers possible intervention to hasten the payment of wages due, and there is much to be done on that. Still recently, I had an opportunity to phone an employer in the Lebel-sur-Québillon area, to get him to give a work statement to an employee who had left the site because the job was finished. He had been waiting for a month and a half for unemployment insurance benefits because the employer had not sent the employment statement as he should have. There is a lot to be done in the monitoring of work conditions.

A number of other clauses in the legislation will certainly help reduce delays and unnecessary procedures that too often hinder the administration of the collective negotiation process. I am hopeful in that respect. Delays have been the cause of many strikes. By providing the board with a greater possibility of control over votes, either to establish a bargaining unit or for other usual formalities in the relationships between the union representatives and the workers themselves, we should contribute to avoid many difficulties arising from the decisions which were made after an insufficient analysis of the consequences.

Everybody knows that workers had to struggle to obtain freedom of association. They were right and they had their rights recognized. However, if this freedom which was acquired after so much sacrifice is violated by force, it is no good to the worker. The freedom of choice of the worker, as far as the union is concerned, should always be considered. This is a very important point. A true freedom of association implies the freedom to refuse to become a member of an association and even the freedom to dissociate. This is what freedom is all about, after all. Where is the freedom of association if you are either forced to join a determined union or you can no longer leave that union. We should ask ourselves what is freedom? This should apply to the union organization as to any other association, any other group in society. The freedom of choice also entails the freedom to refuse. It is a violation of individual freedom of choice to force a union upon the individual. We could also deal with closed workshops, the Rand formula, check-offs but we will come back to these points when we have an opportunity.

Today I will limit my remarks to a few points. I want to bring to your attention that I am quite aware of what is going on in the administrative mechanism of trade unions. I have worked in that field for ten years as president of a local. I am pleased to add that during those ten years of union work, of labour organization, I have negotiated a number of collective agreements with quite a few employers and large corporations in forest operations. For ten years we have succeeded in negotiating and obtaining improved conditions for workers who had to work in those areas and we never had to go on strike. Why? Because we were trying to negotiate instead of trying to go on strike. Nowadays it seems that things have gone to the point where strikes mark the start of negotiations. That is why we must put order in this field. We should have done so a long time ago. I am happy today to congratulate the minister for proposing a bill aimed at that goal. We will have to see to it that the implementation is brought along in the proper way.

One of the most important problems we are faced with today is the fact that people no longer care much about government authority. Is it because it is not worth respecting? Let us think about that. We know what happened. This House has to pass legislation to send the men back to work, after giving them the right to walk out. The government is going to send a conciliation officer to the work site. But it doesn't seem to work. These points deserve serious consideration and it is absolutely natural that the government should try first to get better conditions for Canadian workers and then to direct and monitor the way the labour legislation is followed. Anyhow, the role of the government in labour disputes does not seem to be all that wonderful from what we can see. The right to strike is emphasized to the point that we sometimes seem to forget that it is subordinate to the right to work. The situation is quite serious when we reach that point. We are facing an inversion of values. The almighty dollar has priority over all other values.

The interest of the collectivity comes after the interest of the individual or in some cases of the profession. Many people keep on repeating the words freedom, freedom and rights. But these noble principles are so often used without rhyme or reason today that they are becoming real myths without any meaning. They are so often referred to in some circles that they will ultimately destroy themselves. The repeated confrontations between labour and management are a potentially dangerous tactical exercise even if it seems to be cleverly set up. It is all too easy to be so blinded by personal or professional selfishness as to forget that we can only exercise and enjoy our own rights to the extent that we respect other people's rights. While we recognize that man has been created free, we also recognize that he is a social being. Aware of these individual deficiencies, man has always tried to compensate for them by associating with his fellowmen in various ways, which is only normal, associations in which everybody can benefit from the mutual distribution of wealth owned by individuals who know each other, who realize they have common problems, who act sensibly while following a natural tendency by getting together in order to stand a better chance of obtaining as a group what they cannot obtain individually.

I read an article entitled "The Crisis of Collective Bargaining" in the December 1974 isssue of the Labour Gazette. According to this article, for nearly one century, collective bargaining has survived numerous pressures from within and without. In spite of all the fears that it will soon disappear, it still remains the most often used method of conducting labour-management relations. After quoting many statistics, 1,440 to be exact, concerning agreements, the assistant director of the Labour Relations Centre at Queen's University said that 50 per cent of the settlements were reached through conciliation or mediation, 5 per cent through arbitration and 11 per cent after a strike. Only one third of the settlements were reached through direct negotiation between labour and management. These statistics clearly show that very few labour and management negotiators still know how to settle their differences at the negotiating table without the help or the intervention of a third party and without the decisive tools of a strike or a lockout.

Not so long ago, the services of a conciliator or a mediator were rarely needed. Nowadays, their intervention in collective bargaining has become commonplace. We must certainly not underestimate their contribution to maintaining peace in labour relations, but the fact that their services are increasingly called upon points to a weakness in the collective bargaining system. The renewal of collective agreements must not necessarily aim at wage increases, even if this is an interesting part of the negotiations. There is also the improvement of working conditions in the plant, in the office, on the road or on the worksite, the number of working hours, accident prevention through the implementation of safety rules, fair work distribution, proper and timely representations to government authorities using the strongest possible means of persuasion to obtain a well-balanced labour legislation which is not prompted by the fear of an impending election, but is in the interest of the next generation.

It is rather difficult to demand that governments launch all sorts of major building programs even though many projects could be implemented, especially senior citizens' residences and slum clearance.

All that is done while maintaining a financial system which does not reflect the real wealth. Our huge current production could be increased fourfold if there were real means for distributing goods. It is quite normal for people today, as it was before and as it will be in the future, to be looking for some means of escaping misery, which in our opinion is caused by an economic and financial system which is unbalanced and brings about a very unjust distribution of wealth.

To remedy the situation, we Social Crediters propose a reform of the financial system which would permit the practical application of the principle of distributive economy for abundant goods. For those who consider themselves to be scholars, this formula is too simple. They need sophisticated formulas, so complicated that they have to face unbelievable situations where workers willing to work find out they are on strike. Yet, every accomplishment in the world was done through work. Nobody can deny that. It would undoubtedly be interesting to hear the explanations given by strikemongers and those who seem unable to reach an agreement. Can the benefits arising or derived from a strike be described? Good workers, who often have a family to care for, are justified in demanding a little more happiness for themselves and their families, but this should be possible without strikes, where they might be playing into the enemy's hands who is using them to promote subversive interests.

[Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska).]

As we already wrote, unionism is still a democratic means of ensuring the portection of workers as long as it is directed by responsible leaders and that the means used are fair to both parties, when you must bring the management of the business or the various services to recognize their social responsibilities. We have the right to join forces to defend our interests as long as we do not violate the rights of others. This is very important. It is time to determine when the social and economic interests of the people must prevail over the right to strike. When everything is paralysed and air, land and sea transportation is at a standstill, I wonder if the right to strike is justified. This is when we need an appropriate and flexible legislation that would eliminate this situation and would prevent us from having to adopt other legislation to withdraw what has already been given. We operate in a very strange fashion.

I know it is difficult to solve all those problems in our confused financial system, but the situation is so serious that we could at least establish as soon as possible a real labour court made up of representatives of labour, management and government and after a study of the situation in every industry or service, set a salary scale adequate and proportionate to workers' needs and the capacity of the enterprise instead of waiting for conflicts before making decisions.

We might easily understand that workers are asking for working and salary conditions allowing them to have a decent standard of living but, however, it should be possible in Canada to establish living conditions acceptable to all well disposed workers. We have the feeling today that employee strikes have become the regular negotiation process as the possibility of a strike is raised in every collective bargaining. Yet, that principle is entirely wrong. A strike should be used only as a last resort when all other conciliation means have failed. When at the expense of human dignity management continues to exploit the wage earner or forces him to accept poor working conditions, fortunately that kind of employer has been largely reduced in our country, but when the situation exists, a strike can be justified. The employer has no right to determine on his own behalf the salary and working conditions of his employees, any more than the union has to impose its own views unilaterally. If the employer can, figures in hand, show that present and projected conditions forbid any rise in expenses beyond a given percentage if his business is to remain healthy, the union has no right to demand more and even if a strike were legal, it still would be immoral.

I have here two photocopies of press articles about Toussaint & Frères, an industry in the county of Kamouraska-L'Islet. The windows have been boarded up from the beginning of the labour dispute, and there is not much left in the Toussaint & Frères plant since the company has emptied its buildings. Faced with labour demands, the employers decided they could not carry on operating under those conditions and as they had the opportunity to transfer their machinery somewhere else, that is what they have done with the result that now some 50 workers are jobless, although some of them had been on the payroll for 18 years and others for ten, 12 or 15 years.

So all these people lost their jobs and problems arose. It happened in April. Some people have drawn unemployment insurance benefits only some three weeks ago. So I made many representations to get the Unemployment Insurance Commission to understand those things, namely that they were no longer working in that plant since the employer had shut down. They waited for all the machinery to be taken out, they had to see it done themselves, to make sure that there were witnesses, otherwise they were not ready to pay out the benefits even if some among these people had worked elsewhere on other sites and had accumulated contributions. Yet they were told: In the first place, the decision taken following the loss of your job in a collective dispute contributes to maintaining your status as non-eligible for these benefits.

The same thing is happening at Napoléon Transport Ltd., at Rivière-du-Loup. There was a lock-out there. The fact is that since last spring, following a communication with a senior Unemployment Insurance Commission officer, there may be one of these guys who is being paid unemployment insurance benefits but he did have to wait for two months. He cannot get anything. He cannot get welfare benefits because as he is told: You have stopped working because there was a labour dispute. This is true in his case, but he was not even unionized. He worked there some three weeks, and then became a victim of local developments. He worked three months elsewhere, for three different employers, yet the Unemployment Insurance Commission told him that he had lost his first job because of a labour conflict. That is the kind of nonsense which should not happen as often as it does now.

There are cases when a strike can be considered as reasonable and acceptable but it is seldom so. Often, if all avenues of negotiation were explored, a strike could be avoided. The time when the boss was almighty and kept his employees in check through fear, threat or blackmail is over. Today management is used to negotiating and even if it finds it sometimes a bit unpleasant, it recognizes that it cannot escape such obligations. However, when it sees the union making unreasonable demands, management immediately reacts by refusing to make any concessions at all. This kind of attitude is very frustrating for union officials and that is when they start being demagogical before their members by calling for union solidarity. You can imagine what happens. How do the workers react? Their blood boils, their pride is hurt and then they are ready for any act of violence. I must say with regret that this has happened in many places, particularly in the province of Quebec, because I know what happened there.

When the Minister of Labour tabled in the House this general law to amend the Labour Code, he stated that these amendments were an integral part of a large program launched by the Department of Labour to improve working conditions generally and strengthen the collective bargaining process and the industrial relations system. He also said that, besides reflecting general improvement in labour, collective agreements and provincial labour legislation, this major review of the Canadian Labour Code also corrected some problems resulting from its application. That bill could constitute a declaration of workers' rights even though it is far from being complete. This legislation affects about 550,000 private sector workers under federal jurisdiction.

For some activities such as railways, air transport, banks, trucking, broadcasting and television, grain handling, communications and harbours, I noted that some amendments to this legislation would oblige unions to provide financial statements to their members and guarantee fair and objective procedures for job offers in hiring halls. We should keep that in mind as well. In other words, the government should not unconsciously contribute to creating problems and then admit that it cannot solve them.

I have already given examples of things we should never have to do. I refer to legislation ordering striking workers back to work after the passage of legislation giving them the right to strike. Those are examples of obvious inconsistencies which should be avoided at all costs. I approve this bill on the whole because it includes much that is good. However, it should have been passed years ago, but since it has now been introduced it is never too late to act. Therefore, I support its contents on the whole because I see many improvements. Let us hope that amendments brought to the Canada Labour Code will contribute to a healthier climate and restore harmony in employer-employee relations.

[English]

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief comments regarding one aspect of this bill that was covered earlier by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), and that is the way the amendments will affect grain handling in western Canada. First of all, I should like to put on the record a letter I received from the manager of one of the elevators in my constituency which sums up very well the feelings of many managers of elevator companies on the prairies. This manager writes as follows:

> I have been notified that the Canada Labour is planning to enforce an eight-hour day, forty-hour week on us effective August 1, 1978.
> I work for Pioneer Grain Co. Ltd. In my personal feelings this is going to damage our free enterprise. We will not have the incentive program that we have now. During harvest it will be a hardship on farmers if we have to close at six o'clock. I am sure the farmers will not approve of (an) eight-hour day in harvest.
> Therefore, I'm against any action taken to control our working hours.

Two or three weeks ago I had occasion to attend the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board addressed the meeting. Following his address, he indicated he was prepared to answer any questions that might be put to him and one or two individuals expressed the concerns they and the wheat pool had regarding the legislation.

Grain handling on the prairies is different from the usual type of industry. If the elevator agents or managers are restricted to a 40-hour week with eight hours' overtime, the system will just not function properly. The sale of grain is subject to quotas and delivery depends on those quotas; it depends on the season of the year and on the weather. It is not uncommon to see a line up to ten, 12, 15 trucks at elevators during the course of a day, and there is no way the agent can shut down at six o'clock in the evening and leave trucks lined up.

I believe the elevator companies and their employees who manage the elevators are, generally speaking, happy with the legislation as it exists. I would ask the minister, if he has not already done so, to get in touch with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, who has obviously consulted members of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. Perhaps the hon. minister has received representations direct from the wheat pool. If so, I hope he will take them into consideration and will make the necessary changes to the act. It may be by way of an exception or amendment, but I trust he will take the necessary steps to accommodate the requests of the grain companies and their employees.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) indicated in a speech last night, we are in general support of the proposals in Bill C-8. We are prepared to give it approval at second reading so that it can go to the standing committee for detailed study. Because my colleague covered the waterfront last night, it is hardly necessary for me to do it again. But I thought I would like to take the floor for a few minutes, mainly to deal with two or three specific matters that are raised in the bill.

May I say, when I hear some of the opposition to this kind of legislation, I feel even more inclined to support what the minister is doing. There are those who seem to think that by giving labour additional holidays or additional vacation time, the cost of production increases and our productivity suffers. I wish those who pronounce those views could come up to date and realize that a labour force consisting of persons who are recognized as persons and whose rights are recognized is a much more productive labour force than one consisting of just so many hands not far removed from the days of slavery. The whole concept of the right of labour to have a say in its conditions of work has greatly improved productivity in modern decades, and anything we can do to push along that process is all to the good.

I am glad to see, in the bill, one or two new things such as bereavement leave, provision for sick leave, the portion of the bill that deals with unjust dismissal, and so on. We shall look with very keen interest at the proposals in the bill which try to ensure unorganized workers some of the rights and benefits that have been won by those who are organized.

I should like to ask my good friend, the minister: What happened to an item that was in last session's Bill C-32? The minister may remember that toward the end of last session he introduced Bill C-32 to amend the Canada Labour Code mainly with respect to general holidays. In that bill he included Heritage Day and Boxing Day. In this session we have Bill C-8, and Heritage Day seems to have been dropped. I realize that the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) announced earlier in this session, in response to a question of mine, that the government had decided not to proceed with Heritage Day during this session in any respect. The argument that he gave was that this was a time of restraint. I find it very difficult to discover much evidence of restraint around this place.

Mr. Paproski: He means after the next election.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The time for governments to bring in goodies is before an election, not after.

Mr. Paproski: These guys work it differently.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes. The whole argument that, because we are in a time of restraint, workers must not be given the benefit of an extra holiday, is seeing things completely in reverse. By that kind of logic one could argue that we should cancel all holidays and make everyone work six or seven days a week, 52 weeks a year. The minister would not argue that that would increase productivity. He knows that would decrease productivity and we would have a very unhappy labour force. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that argument for a holiday midway between Christmas and the New Year period and the Easter period is a good one, especially in this country. It is a long pull from Christmas to Easter, and if we are going to have many winters like the one we are having now, it is all the more reason to have such a holiday.

I remind the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) that a few years ago one of the railway management-labour disputes was finally settled by the adjudication of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall. He knows that in the settlement Mr. Justice Hall made of that dispute there was a provision for Heritage Day to be added to the holidays with pay which railway workers would get as soon as it was passed by parliament. Mr. Justice Hall and those who were involved in that adjudication seemed to think at that time, because a bill for Heritage Day was before parliament and making good progress, that it would probably be through in no time at all.

Well, already the railway workers have lost two or three of those Heritage Day holidays that they thought they got resulting from Mr. Justice Hall's settlement of that dispute. Railway workers still feel today they have been treated unfairly and treated with lack of faith in the fact that this day has not been established. In fact, there has been a postcard campaign about the matter which is under way right now, and those who signed these cards are aware of the fact that a bill for Heritage Day got second reading and committee of the whole passage a year or so ago. They are aware that during the last session the government had two bills before the House concerning Heritage Day. But now, when we get Bill C-8, it is not there at all. I hope the minister will listen to argument about the matter when we get this bill into committee. It is an amendment which can be easily made in committee. It will keep faith with the railway workers in terms of Mr. Hall's settlement of that last dispute.

Canadians generally would welcome the idea of a weekend holiday on the third Monday in February. Surely we can do that. In addition to the idea of a holiday, or whatever you call it, there is merit in the concept of the idea of calling it Heritage Day. There are groups and organizations in this country working very hard to help us appreciate and protect the heritage that we have. A day dedicated to that concept is a good one. I hope the minister will not feel that his cabinet colleagues have crowded him in so much that he cannot move on this, and I hope that when we get into committee on the bill Heritage Day can be put into the legislation.

I see the minister has put in the bill a new provision respecting vacations with pay. We have not had such vacations in the law very long, and up to the present time the holiday provided in the law is only two weeks. The minister now proposes that for an employee coming under federal labour jurisdiction who has been six years with the same employer, holiday pay or the period of vacation with pay is to be extended to three weeks. This is an improvement. It is in line with the bill I have been putting into the House year after year for a long time. However, why make such employees wait six years? When such an employee happens to leave one employer and goes to another, he will have to start all over again. Why cannot the idea of three weeks' holidays with pay start after a shorter period of time than six years? Even five or four years would be better; but I suggest it should start after three years with an employer.

The third point I want to raise with the minister has to do with the whole business of health and safety. I have been sitting here trying to think what year it was that the first legislation under the Canada Labour Code having to do with health and safety was brought in. It was when John Nicholson was minister of labour. Many members will not remember those days. It would be during the regime of Mr. Pearson as prime minister. I remember very clearly that bill to provide a safety code section of the Canada Labour Code being referred to the standing committee. We dealt with it at some length because we were concerned about it. I think it was in the month of December, probably 1965, 1966 or 1967. The minister made a strong appeal asking us to get the bill through so that the officials in the department could draft the regulations and the whole regime of health and safety could be put in place. Ten years have gone by. Some of it has been done, but ever so slowly. My contacts with officers of the Department of Labour who are involved in this question lead me to believe that they are keen on it. They want to push for health and safety in the work place, but somewhere there seems to be some force holding them back.

Every time the workers in the CPR Weston shops, which lie between my constituency and that of my friend from Winnipeg North, complain about fumes or other conditions in the shops that are contrary to health and safety, they have to go through a lot of rigmarole and red tape. In the end, very little is done. I certainly do not blame the officials and public servants in the department. They are keen on it. However, somebody is saying, "No. Go slowly on this." It is like the voices we hear sometimes in this debate about increasing the cost of production if we give people holidays or good rates of pay. Our view is that if you make working conditions healthy and safe, and you provide adequate holidays, rates of pay and all the rest, productivity will be a lot better. I welcome what the minister has proposed in the health and safety part of the Canada Labour Code, but I ask him for a little more speed in putting the new proposals into effect than has been the case since we first put health and safety in there ten or 11 years ago.

As I have already said, we welcome any bill that improves labour relations. We shall study this one very carefully. I hope that special attention will be paid to the three points I have made at this time.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to make a few remarks on the amendments to the Canada Labour Code, Bill C-8, and to congratulate the hard-working Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) for bringing in such progressive amendments to the Labour Code—a real milestone in the long line of improvements in labour legislation initiated by Liberal administrations. Of course, primarily affected by this legislation are workers under federal jurisdiction, but its principles will no doubt be an inspiration and example for other jurisdictions to emulate.

As a physician, I am particularly interested and happy that the bill proposes comprehensive measures for the safety and health of workers. I am sure that all in this House agree with the minister that Canadian workers have a fundamental right to an environment that neither damages their health nor imperils their safety. This principle is also an important element in the maintenance of improved employee-employer relations and, consequently, improved productivity and profitability.

I am particularly interested in the minister's announcement as far as a better work environment for Canadians is concerned, and establishing a Canadian centre for occupational health and safety. There is a great need today for such a national institution. Such a centre would promote the concept of a safe-work environment and the enhancement of the physical and mental health of working people throughout the country. It would facilitate consultation and co-operation among provincial, territorial and federal jurisdictions in the establishment and maintenance of high standards of occupational safety and hygiene appropriate to the Canadian situation and compatible with recognized international standards.

I have in mind, in particular, the need for research and enforcement of appropriate regulations for the workers in asbestos mines and asbestos-related industries, and also special and strict standards to protect the worker from deafness which occurs from the occupational hazard of noise which often occurs in factories. It is imperative that this centre co-operate with the various workmen's compensation boards of the provinces in this country, in order to have special committees established to deal more quickly with those workers who have been injured on the job, and especially those who after many years in mines and asbestos-related factories have suffered damage to their lungs, liver and other vital organs of their bodies.

Another health problem which is gaining a lot of attention these days in the occupational health field is that of deafness. It is one of the fastest rising illnesses in this country. It is high time for a centre such as the Canadian centre for occupational health and safety to take strong initiatives and bring about a lowering of the noise levels in our factories and urge the various provincial workmen's compensation boards to deal more quickly with cases of deafness.

In conclusion, this bill is a great step in providing a better work environment and, therefore, better worker-management relations in our country. I look forward to making further remarks when the bill is studied in committee.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of the industrial revolution, industry, government and business have been preoccupied with attempts to decide how the product of the industrial machine which we have built should be distributed. In this day and age we seem more concerned at every level—industry, labour and government—with the distribution of the benefits of the industrial machine than we are with oiling the machine and seeing that it keeps running. The risk of a breakdown in the industrial relations process has reached such proportions that some say it poses, at least in this country, a threat to the very survival of the economic system.

In the short time available to me I shall not, of course, be able to go back in history and draw from the experience of history in dealing with the measure we are discussing today. It is, however, my intention to place on record my views with regard to the current situation and to give an outline of the measures which Canadians workers and employers has a right to expect would be included in this bill after the promises made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) to approach the subject broadly and to make some fundamental changes to a system which has obviously run up on the rocks and is not functioning well at all.

First, let me put this whole subject of industrial relations into proper perspective in the Canadian context. When we speak about industrial relations, we are really speaking only about one-third of the Canadian work force; we are only speaking about one-third of industry which employs that work force. Those of us who represent constituencies in the House of Commons should pay more attention to the other two-thirds of the work force which has no access to unions, and to the two-thirds of the business community which employs those people and cannot afford the schemes of extravagance which have been generated by the industrial relations process. I have in mind small and medium-sized businesses for the most part.

An assessment reveals that the larger corporations, namely, those which maintain oligopolistic or monopolistic positions in society, are the ones which employ union workers. These are the corporations which manage to insulate themselves, if not completely isolate themselves, from the three market forces which the other two-thirds of the industrial community has to work with. Government, of course, is a perfect example. Public employees enjoy the greatest security, and their pensions are indexed, the reason being, of course, that government does not need to subject itself to the pressures of a free market system, but dips into the barrel every time a demand is made and settles that demand in a fashion which is least harmful to its political masters and to the harmonious operation of Crown agencies and the administration generally.

The bill has, it is true, recognized the need for adequate coverage of available unions across the country. One would have expected the Minister of Labour to address himself to this aspect. One would also expect him to have made an attempt in this bill to establish a labour code which would help those who are not presently organized either to become organized or to achieve an equitable share of that part of the gross national product which is labour's portion. On the other hand, we would have the right to expect the minister to address himself to the serious problems faced by the business community which is subjected to free market forces and which has a very difficult time dealing with workers when they demand concessions equal to or similar to those which the government grants its own employees.

One of the aspects of the bill which is particularly offensive to me is that discretion to impose a first-year settlement, in cases where certification has been achieved, should be left to the minister or his officials. To put this in proper context, one must consider the certification process, a process which is still not adequately protected in a democratic manner. As a matter of fact, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, in a statement to the minister expressing disappointment with his approach to this question, expresses the view that "certification of a union as a bargaining agent should only occur where there is evidence that there is majority support for a union through a government supervised secret ballot."

I was involved in a situation recently in which unions were certified to represent the work force of a certain industry although the majority of the employees were not in favour of certification. Should the two parties not be able to get together after certification has been made by the government, the minister takes it upon himself to impose a first-year settlement. I can only assume that his decision would be in accordance with the general guidelines and standards set by the public sector.

A great many employers express fears of the consequences such a procedure might bring. As a matter of fact, I am connected with a firm which finds itself exactly in that position. Certification has been made, but there is no contract because the workers do not want a contract. The union which has been certified will not tune or change its contract, a global contract signed in British Columbia. The upshot is this: the employees of that company have no access to a union simply because they are not prepared to sign a contract imposed on them by a union even though it has been properly certified. I serve notice on the minister that these workers will be equally upset if he comes along and tells them he intends to impose the initial contract.

Many of my colleagues criticize me for what appears to be an anti-labour stand taken from time to time in the House of Commons. I have said there is no democracy in the industrial relations process in this country. I have said that unions and employers often act irresponsibly. As a matter of fact, in defending a private member's bill in this House I have said on a couple of occasions that the freedoms and rights of the individual are being eroded in this country as a result of the certification process to which we adhere.

I should like to give hon. members an example of what I mean. Just recently I received a letter from one of my constituents, who is an employee of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, enclosing a copy of a letter he had received from the first vice-president of CUPW, André Beauchamp. My constituent says that he is relying on me to defend, in the House of Commons, his personal rights and freedoms which he feels are offended, indeed endangered. I should like to place part of this letter on the record. It is addressed to all local presidents across the country and quotes article 4.74 of the new national constitution which reads as follows:

4.74 a) The national director convenes the regional executive committee and the local presidents to his region once a year in order to: "Ensure that local officers comply with the national policies and orientation of the union in their attitude toward the employer at Union-management meetings, counsellings, etc., and avoid any suspicion of collusion with the employer by refusing to participate in recreational events, sports events, dances, distribution of prizes and trophies, collaboration to employer newspapers, etc., in order that the integrity and independence of union leaders be safeguarded in their dealings with employer representatives and that members themselves comply with this orientation.

The letter then goes on to define sports events in this way:

Sports events means softball tournaments, hockey tournaments, golf tournaments, curling bonspiels and any other events that will bring you into contact with members of management.

This policy should be enforced and explained to the members.

Management is trying to show two faces—

In the case of the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), that may not be too far out.

—one during working hours and another outside the workplace; we know from experiences that this does not work out for the benefit of our members.

In solidarity—

That is signed by André Beauchamp, first vice president. I ask, Mr. Speaker, is my constituent justified in feeling that his personal freedom is being infringed? I say yes. If he wants to work as a public servant in the Post Office, or anywhere else in the public service, he is compelled to join this union. In earning his livelihood as a public servant, he cannot fraternize with his employer. He cannot participate in softball tournaments. He cannot curl. He cannot do the things which I suppose people do behind the wicket boxes in a post office. There is dire need for fundamental change in our industrial relations process in this country as long as any one of the partners to this tripartite arrangement of government, labour and management adopts this kind of stance.

What are some of the problems we are facing? Last year we had the world record for lost man-years. What a dubious distinction! Our trading partners in the world are not at all amused by the kind of behaviour which our industries demonstrate every time they demand that a certain delivery contract be filled, or when our transportation system breaks down.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Those figures are not accurate.

Mr. Oberle: The minister says the figures are not accurate. I wish he would set the record straight. Perhaps Italy again managed to hold the prize for yet another year; but our figures indicate differently, that Canada does have the worst record in the world for lost man-years resulting from strikes, lockouts and shutdowns. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, there is gross exaggeration of the adversary system, and the letter I have just put on the record is a perfect example. There does not seem to be any forum in this country for business, labour and government to get together, as is the case in more advanced and more refined industrial countries with which we compete.

The problem is that there is no true industrial democracy in this country. The kind of industrial democracy that we have is the kind our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) espoused when he said to a press conference in London the other day that he favoured a one-party democracy as a viable option for this country. May I remind my colleagues that a one-party democracy is what exists in East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia and other Iron Curtain countries.

It is about time freedom of association, one of the cardinal principles of democracy, is restored in this country. Freedom of association means that a member of the work force should have the inalienable right to access to a union. It should also mean the right not to join a union if the individual so wishes. The fact is that only about one-third of this country's work force has the option of joining a union; two-thirds have no access to any union.

In order to make fundamental changes in our industrial relations in this country, the minister must address himself to legislating the conduct of unions so as to provide access to their membership for all workers in Canada, which is not the case now. With this bill, the minister seems to want to fill the vacuum by legislating holidays and health and safety regulations within a plant. He expects this to solve the problem. The fact is that it will not.

We must seriously examine some of the industrial relations models which other countries in the western world have adopted, such as those which provide that all persons have access to a union, that no one shall be compelled to join a union. Under the European social charter, unions do not have the right openly to support just one political party, compelling their membership in the union concerned to support that one party. Management should also have the right, as they do in more advanced industrial countries, to join with unions in reacting to legislation and to demands made by the other two partners, government and labour, in the economic process.

I am pro labour, Mr. Speaker, pro union. I believe that union power in this country must be solidified, as it is in other parts of the world. In the West German model there are 16 unions, and every worker in the country has access to one of them. In this country our unions are fragmented. They fight with each other. None is capable of evaluating the economic problems which this country faces, problems which at least to some extent are brought on by the lack of an intelligent industrial relations program. We should encourage unions to broaden their scope of union activity and to build into that activity certain social components, not just among its membership but along with management, in order that the tripartite and consultative approach necessary to bring about a more enlightened industrial society can be fostered and advanced.

Surprisingly enough, my colleagues in the industrial sphere have already brought in the meaningless things which are in this bill. Bereavement leave is one of those. I do not know an employee of any company with which I am associated, or with which my friends or partners are associated, who would not be allowed to take two or three days or a week off if a member of his immediate family were to die. I do not know anyone who is not given sick leave, an extra holiday or three weeks' vacation after six years' service. These are minimum standards which no industry in the private sector today would want to be without.

The problem is that there should not be conflicting jurisdiction between the federal and provincial governments. We have a federal labour code and provincial labour codes, and no one knows what the minimum standards are. The provinces have direct jurisdiction over health plans, workmen's compensation boards, and so forth, and it becomes rather confusing when the federal minister intervenes and sets one set of standards while the provinces have other standards. Clearly, in this field the federal government should decentralize and surrender its jurisdiction to the provinces.

I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who reminded the minister of his promise about Heritage Day. A promise is a promise. Even though this may not be a good time to legislate more holidays, it is time to improve productivity in our industries. However, a promise is a promise. This measure is long overdue, and in committee I intend to remind the minister of the promise he made to the rail unions at the time of the Hall commission settlement. I remind the minister that we have every right to expect this holiday to be included in the bill before us.

The unions do not like most of the measures in this bill. It sets inadequate standards. The minimum standards set are not acceptable to labour or business. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association indicated to me that it is not at all happy with this bill because it fails to address itself to the fundamental problems we are facing in our industrial relations process. Who likes this bill? I do not know, but it is certainly my intention to find out in the committee and to remind the minister of his responsibility to bring about some basic changes which must be brought in if our economic system is to survive.

[Mr. Oberle.]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like also to make a few remarks about this legislation whose objectives, I feel, have some merits. I suggest to the House that this legislation is of paramount importance for the future of our labour relations which long since should have been governed by more effective mechanisms. I think it will prove very important in the future, especially in the economic area, and that is why the provisions of this bill may contribute something useful, but one must not only think so, one must say so.

I have listened most attentively, of course, to the remarks which our official critic, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) has made. I have also been able to understand quickly the provisions, somewhat general in scope, of this bill. When this legislation deals with labour relations, I suggest again that it deals with much more. It deals with justly warranted leave in this day and age and, in the present context, with security of employment and, something which is also important, the health of workers. We will probably have to reach agreements with the provinces in that regard, in view of their responsibilities.

Mention has also been made of setting up of an information centre. That point is of particular interest to me because I feel, or at least hope, that such a centre would enable union workers to obtain all the economic data they need when the time comes to discuss with the employers. Provided with information that is comparable to that of the employer, I feel, on the one hand, a union could better understand the economic effects of its demands and, on the other hand, that the union also has the right to be made aware of the financial situation of a company. So, with regard to the setting up of an information centre, I dare hope it would be of tremendous help to both sides. It might even help draw both parties closer in the interest of the national economy.

If I understand the bill correctly, I gather an attempt is being made to bring to the same table, more than ever, the three parties concerned, namely the employer, the government and the union workers. God knows how often hon. members have made that observation in the House and urged the government to try, as much as possible, to bring all interested parties and sectors around the same table to discuss collective agreements, in a real dialogue to achieve more interesting results than they have in the past. There is no doubt, as my colleagues pointed out earlier, that we will support this bill on second reading. I should also like to point out that I come from a province, like so many of my colleagues, which has gone through difficult times because of the strikes we have had.

This legislation affects only 10 per cent of workers, but I quite understand that it can hardly cover the majority of workers since the act applies to employees under federal jurisdiction. However, I believe that if we could, indirectly, through this legislation, through these correctives, through these amendments give some sort of an example to the provinces, either indirectly or directly, we could make an important contribution to the collective agreements negotiated in each province. But is it possible at this level of government to invent enough new mechanisms to avoid a greater number of these strikes which are so costly and which have unfavourable effects either on prices or on productivity or on the climate which prevails in certain industries or groups of workers? We are well aware that people do need the public services which are in fact essential services. There have been many problems, not only in Quebec, but throughout the country, in the area of labour relations, and this has caused strikes.

Like many others, I believe that the time is past when the government could give the right to strike with one hand and withdraw it with the other because of the difficulty or the impossibility of coming to an understanding concerning collective agreements or collective bargaining. This legislation therefore aims at improving or facilitating labour relations. I believe it is our duty to wish that the government may meet its objectives, and even urge it to do so.

I am among those who have been always fascinated by—and I do not know if this would be possible—the development of a permanent bargaining mechanism which could perhaps bring to this process the clearsightedness and foresight wished for by all members of the House. Could such a mechanism be invented to enable the people concerned to avoid those strikes which, once again, have been so costly and so unfavourable to our economy? Of course, as the minister said, this legislation aims at improving the labour relations system and, hopefully, the competitive position of Canada on an economic level.

Several observations have been made since last September with regard to the economy, especially to the effect that productivity, labour disputes and the like have had the tendency of making us less competitive for the sale of our products abroad. I would not put the whole burden of responsibility on the shoulders of the workers alone. Of course, I think that we have the responsibility of trying to arrange and modify the existing mechanism of negotiations between labour and management. If we at the federal level could engineer a device which could increasingly prevent these strikes, which I insist have had a very negative effect on the economic development of Canada, I think indeed that if we could work out a sufficiently efficient mechanism, we could perhaps draw the attention of the provinces to what is happening here and prompt them into imitating this newly created mechanism so that they would also be able to prevent so many strikes from breaking out.

I mentioned a province which has known difficult times because of strikes. I could refer to my own riding where we have also experienced serious difficulties because of strikes which caused enormous problems to certain people. Given the circumstances, I repeat, even if this legislation concerns only some 10 per cent of Canadian workers, I do hope that these amendments will all bring the desired results, and will anyway make union spokesmen, representatives from our industry and our provincial heads of government, but particularly union leaders, reflect and perhaps analyse these new mechanisms which could serve them and particularly their members.

I think that this legislation aims particularly at protecting the interests of our unionized workers because the interests or the success of our industries are also directly related to the interests of the workers. These were some of the comments I wanted to make and I hope the minister responsible for this legislation gets the results he expects. Inasmuch as this legislation serves the interests of the workers and the economic development of Canada, I think that as far as our side of this House is concerned we will not hesitate a minute in supporting any good legislation of this kind.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues have indicated, we support most of this bill. The minister is to be congratulated for removing the pregnancy clause which allowed certain industries to dismiss members of their female force because of that condition. Also, some additional holidays have been provided. Why did the minister choose six years as being the time necessary to qualify for three weeks' holiday? He could have chosen three years or some other appropriate time span.

When the original one week and 1 per cent vacation pay program was developed, it was on the basis of 2 per cent for one year and 4 per cent after the second year. Many plans contained a provision, after six years, for a 6 per cent vacation pay program, and now the six years' requirement is being proposed in the bill before us. I think that proposal could have been more generous.

Some hon. members have been blaming the problem of strikes on labour. I suggest it is like dancing: it takes two to tango. It is not always the organized employees who cause a problem; quite often the employers are to blame. This has never been more evident than in the case of the postal employees. These employees have had no employer with whom to bargain or to present their grievances. They are unsure whether they are dealing with the Department of Public Works, Treasury Board, or the Postmaster General. As I understand it, they come under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, which is similar to the Canada Labour Relations Act.

It is very difficult to blame those employees, because they do not know who to negotiate with. That is a problem which must be looked at. I am sure those workers would like to come under the Canada Labour Relations Act. They are attempting to have the idea of a Crown corporation accepted by the country in order to come under that act. One of the reasons is their inadequate grievance procedure. Not only must a bona fide union negotiate, arrange working conditions and hours, but it must arrange an orderly method for handling grievances. Under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, grievances take months and months to be settled, and thus the act fails. This causes wildcat strikes and arrangements which are unsatisfactory to the public, to the employees and to the employers. Perhaps more than 10 per cent of the population should come under the Canada Labour Relations Act.

I was interested in the comments of the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). They reminded me of a man who worked all his life in a plant, fought the unions by working hard against certification, negotiations and strikes, then reached the point where he was on his death bed and requested his lawyer to draft his last will and testament. He asked for six union members to be pallbearers at his funeral. His lawyer said, "Why do you want them? You have been opposed to unions all your life." The man indicated that the lawyer was correct, but that every time the unions negotiated a contract, he reaped the benefits; every time the man had a problem, he went to the union and took advantage of it. He concluded by saying, "I do not see any reason why I should change that when I am dead".

The addition of the new clause relating to the dismissal of non-organized workers concerns the unions. While perhaps this is necessary because only a quarter of the workers in Canada are organized, it seems to me that assistance under the act should be provided to help organized labour in organizing the unorganized. This bill provides only minimum standards which are acceptable perhaps to the minority. In saying this, I suggest we are merely going through the motions rather than accomplishing anything, because in a small plant in which the federal government is involved and where there are unorganized workers, it is doubtful if they will be able to find a representative to act on their behalf in case of any dismissal, to ensure that the provisions of the Canada Labour Relations Act are observed. It might be better if the advantages of being organized were made clear to the workers because, despite what people say, an organized worker is a much more orderly and productive worker: and if management is reasonable in relation to the employees, it will find unions to be of advantage.

The minister made a major change in the bill by requiring the establishment of a safety and health committee. A few moments ago an hon. member mentioned the occurrence of strikes in his area and said he was opposed to them, as I am sure all hon. members are. However, it is interesting to look at the last year for which we have figures in that respect. We find that in 1974, nine million days were lost through strikes and lockouts, and in that year 11.5 million days were lost through accidents.

It seems to me the minister has recognized that one of the major problems causing loss of production by employees is not strikes and lockouts, but sickness. Much of the sickness has not only been the result of lack of safety precautions, but because workers have not been involved in observing that safety precautions are applied in their places of work. We are plagued in this country by a large number of agencies involved in safety. We have special safety measures for ships, others for aircraft, others for miners and loggers. Many categories of safety measures are applied differently from one area to another.

It seems to me very important that we look at some of these safety factors. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) mentioned some of them. One area of danger in my area which requires safety precautions to be taken, and which scares the hell out of me, is asbestosis, which is the most dangerous disease that can occur because it appears to act like a time-bomb. You can be exposed one day, and 20 years later the effects might become evident. It may be limited exposure, but still the results will appear in 20 years time, which may mean total incapacity, sometimes followed shortly by death.

We have little understanding of asbestosis. I think some members from the province of Quebec should take a special interest in that disease, because I believe the standards which are observed in Ontario are being only partly enforced in some of the towns in Quebec where asbestos is being mined and where the asbestos dust content is even higher than in some Ontario mines.

The premier of Quebec has been very concerned about this problem, to the extent of thinking about nationalization of the industry, partly because of the damage that has been done over a long period of exposure to many people in that province. Although the same danger exists with other chemicals, this is particularly true of asbestos. When I was a miner working underground in hard rock mines, I was exposed to silicosis. Silicosis does not affect everyone in the same way. Some miners were affected, and others were less so, even though they all were exposured to it to the same degree.

I remember working with a young chap who was on a stope very close to me for quite some time. He was in the mine about 11 months, and developed 100 per cent silicosis. We were given an X-ray examination every year and his X-ray showed 100 per cent silicosis. He was very badly incapacitated and could not continue working. We insisted that many other union workers in the mine in which I worked have a regular silicosis examination, and with one or two exceptions no one was found to be suffering from silicosis to any degree.

These are odd diseases and they are not too well understood. In many cases, silicosis can be seen on the X-ray, and it does not get any worse unless you are further exposed or unless there is a complication. But with chemicals such as vinyl chloride, PPB, asbestos and many other chemicals which cause industrial diseases, a time factor is involved. There is a certain period of incubation during which there is no indication of the disease developing, and then it occurs, in many cases with a fatal result in a short period of time.

The minister has indicated that he wishes these committees to be set up in areas where there are unions which, jointly with management, would organize committees; but he has not said how often these committees would meet, what they are to do and how the decisions that they make will be implemented. It will be very difficult to set up a bona fide safety and health organization in plants where there are unorganized workers.

I suppose that those members of the House who are opposed to unions will continue to put forward the argument that union leadership dictates to management. Let me point out that unions also protect the worker, and if someone is nominated at a union meeting to the health and safety committee of the plant, there will be protection, in the course of his duties, against any decision that may be made by that committee. In the case of the unorganized worker, I can see no way in which he can be protected. It is not spelled out how he will be nominated and whether all the employees or only 50 per cent will be required to nominate him. When the bill reaches the committee we will be asking the minister those questions.

I would have liked to see a number of other clauses in the bill. One of them should have dealt with the lack of training of unorganized workers elected to represent fellow workers on a safety committee. The minister should ensure that workers in plants where there is radon gas, radioactivity, or exposure to asbestos or coal dust, are trained properly so that they can operate efficiently. Even on a construction site, workers are sometimes exposed to asbestos dust in small fibre particles. I think the organized trade unionist will insist that his union gives him some training in order that he can function properly.

These matters can be discussed in committee, but I hope the minister is prepared to indicate the type of training that will be provided to enable these safety committees to operate properly. It is all right to say that nobody has to work in an area where there is imminent danger, but what is imminent danger? In a mine, the miner is about the only person who can really tell whether there is loose in that area which is dangerous, and if he has been working in the area for some time it is likely he will know whether the danger is imminent.

It would be difficult for the shift boss to come in and say, "I agree the danger is imminent and that you are in danger of loose falling on you." There will be some disagreement, so perhaps the committee should be charged with finding a more appropriate word than "imminent". Once it is established that there is a danger, the matter of degree will always be argued—whether it is imminent, or a large or small degree of danger. We will have to iron this one out. Because of the time lost through problems of industrial health and safety, I think we should make sure that these safety committees are established in such a way that they will offer the maximum amount of protection.

I am sure the minister will agree that changes to the bill are necessary because in many ways we are entering a totally new field. In my experience with the mining industry, the boss usually said it was his responsibility whether conditions were safe or not, and as a rule the only consideration was whether compensation would have to be paid for an accident of fatality. It was often cheaper to pay in the case of a fatality than in the case of an accident, so his understanding of what was imminently dangerous was influenced in a way that safety committees would not be.

I think the minister should indicate how often the committees should meet, and they should be required to report on a regular basis. They should also be allowed an opportunity to participate in research in relevant areas. If these suggestions are adopted, I am sure the minister will find there is co-operation from both management and employees as they come to understand the advantages of participating in an organized way.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief intervention in this debate. I appreciate that the minister has brought this legislation forward to improve the conditions of the unorganized worker, and we on this side are anxious to see the bill receive second reading and go to committee. I have had an opportunity to look at some of the provisions in the statute, and did so with the eye of a lawyer. The minister is a distinguished lawyer in his own right, of course. I must say that when I encountered such provisions in my law practice, I used to hold them up to a mirror to see if they made any more sense when read backwards.

After the minister introduced the bill yesterday, my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), referred to the credibility of the minister in matters pertaining to labour. At that time I was reminded of the story about the late John F. Kennedy. In the course of his political career, he had occasion to visit a number of steel mills and in one was stopped by a worker who asked, "When did you ever work a day in your life? What do you know about labour matters? When did you ever hold a real job?" Mr. Kennedy stumbled a bit and replied that he was sympathetic to the plight and to the aspirations of the working people of the United States. The worker is reported to have replied, "With respect to ever having a job in your life, you have not missed a thing."

Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the minister that this party is interested in supporting legislation that will improve the lot of the unorganized worker in Canada. He will have our support in any attempts to improve the legislation. One of the difficulties with this kind of legislation, considering the breadth and width of our country, is that it contains provisions which are intended to have blanket application. As a westerner, I want to point out again to the minister the particular importance of the grain industry to western Canada and to pronounce a caveat with respect to it.

My colleagues, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), have already brought to the attention of the minister the unique problems of the grain industry. Farming as a whole is a seasonal occupation where people are very active at certain times of the year and not so active at others. I think we must look carefully at the bill to ensure that in cases where seasonal considerations are necessary, such as the grain industry, there is a degree of flexibility available to elevator operators and people coming under federal jurisdiction. The farmers of western Canada should not be inconvenienced by the inaccessibility of elevators or other important and related industries.

In order to ensure co-operation between management and labour, we should make sure in committee that not only are applications for averaging orders made by employers, but that it is incumbent upon them to consult employees on the advisability of granting an order. The minister might entertain an amendment calling for something short of a formal vote but requiring that the employer consult the employees concerned. We often overlook the interest of the employees in legislation of this kind, when these are the very people we are trying to help.

I do not want to be specific at this time, but the minister may see, from the provisions contained in the amendments to the Canada Labour Code, that at the present time, as far as averaging orders are concerned, there is no reference to employees, no reference to consultation with employees but, rather, the only provision in this respect relates to an application by the employer. If the minister took the grain industry by way of example, he would find the elevator agents would, in fact, be very receptive and agreeable to such an application being made for an averaging order relating to hours of work which they are entitled to perform during heavy seasons. It would be part of an attempt by the government to consult with labour in order to allow them to be involved in the process. Perhaps provision could be made in the legislation to manifest the desire of the minister—I know we on this side have such a desire—to bring employees into the consultative process as opposed simply to being the odd man out and a third party in the whole procedure.

The point I have with respect to the grain industry, whether it relates to elevator agents, managers of elevators or just people involved generally in the grain industry, is twofold. First of all, consideration should be given to this particular segment of employees to ensure that they are able to work during heavy seasons. The period of time should be sufficiently long so that plans can be made. Then everyone involved in the industry will know that hours of work will be adjusted to a particular period of time during a certain designated season. Then there will be no misunderstanding about applications having to be made a few weeks before harvest, for example. On a yearly basis, everyone will know in advance, as far as seeding time and harvest time are concerned, that there will be a period of time when the elevators will be open and available.

I suggest this should extend, as well, to implement dealers and manufacturers. One of the problems we have in western Canada is the difficulty during a heavy season—the harvest season, for example—in getting the parts needed for repair purposes to keep the machinery operating. It seems to me the extent of this application is a matter, again, for the committee. Such a provision respecting the grain industry could well be extended to manufacturers of farm implements. They then have flexibility as far as supplying spare parts was concerned. It could also include truckers and others in the transportation industry which is related to the farm industry. It would allow them to work extra hours and to be sure parts were available at the place of the farming operation. In the long run, we could have a more efficient farming industry, which is so important to our economy.

I realize some of these matters are under provincial jurisdiction. However, I say to the hon. member—who is a very astute member and dresses very nattily—that the particular references I have made are to matters under federal jurisdiction; that is, interprovincial transportation and interprovincial businesses. I know the hon. member is rarely wrong, but I must say to him, rarely is he right.

I would ask the minister to take these suggestions into consideration during the committee hearing which we will have, and to make sure that the farming industry, the grains industry in western Canada will not be put in the same position that has all too often occurred through this government's policies, and our suggestions being given scant consideration. I assure the minister that if he attends the committee meetings and this government is not receptive to the representations which I and my colleagues from western Canada will make, we will be heard and we will not stand for any scant attention being given to the interests of western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I simply say there are many precedents—the minister will know this with respect to the concept of averaging—and many provincial legislatures have passed legislation because of the importance of particular industries within their jurisdictions. This is an important matter as far as western Canada is concerned. We are in support of the basic precepts set forth in this bill, but we want to make sure the application is fair to everyone across the country, especially western Canada. I know the minister will give consideration to the matters that have been raised. We look forward to his receiving our suggestions in the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty to inform all members that if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fair comments that have been made by many speakers in the official opposition, the NDP and the Social Credit party. I shall not endeavour to answer many of the points raised, because some speakers said they will raise them again in committee. I shall give further thought to the points raised as to how we intend to achieve the objectives of certain clauses of the bill, what the process will be, how we can speed up the system, how people will be appointed and the number on committees, the interests of people in the grain industry and how they can be protected with respect to averaging. All these things, it seems to me, we can deal with constructively in committee.

The encouraging aspect of the remarks of most of the spokesmen for the opposition parties is that they agree with the fundamental precepts of the bill. That being so, they are more concerned with working out acceptable arrangements in arriving at some of the objectives of the legislation, and in that respect we are prepared to be as flexible and as accommodating as possible. In that spirit of co-operation, Mr. Speaker, perhaps that is sufficient from me, other than to reiterate that we hope to have a constructive session in committee in order to deal with most of the points in a beneficial way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

PROPOSED PURCHASE OF FIRE TUG FOR ST. JOHN'S—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the tragic incident in St. John's Harbour in September when the Portuguese sidetrawler Vasco D'Orey caught fire in St. John's harbour causing loss of life and threatening a major disaster in the harbour at St. John's, since no fire tug is now provided for that port and in view of the agreement of the chairman of the St. John's port authority, the Liberal candidate in the St. John's West by-election, that the authority needs and is lobbying for a new multi-purpose tug which would include fire-fighting equipment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the government of Canada make funds available to the port authority of St. John's for the purchase of a new multi-purpose tug including fire-fighting equipment in order to be properly prepared to take action to save lives and to save the harbour of St. John's in the event of any other shipboard fires in that harbour.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion pursuant to the standing order only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO PROTECT ACRYLIC YARN AND SWEATER MANUFACTURERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to urge the House to take action on a matter of pressing urgency. Yarntex Holdings Limited, which operates plants in both Quebec and Ontario has reduced its work force by some 500 people in the past two years. Moreover, spokesmen for the Canadian sweater industry, which employs about 8,000 people, suggest that if the trend to closings in the acrylic yarn sector continues, the sweater industry would also find its future in jeopardy, and possible lay-offs there could become imminent.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has had in his possession since early November the report of the Textile and Clothing Board on acrylic yarns, and so far no action has been taken on this serious matter. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House call upon the government to take immediate steps to protect both the acrylic yarn industry, and also the sweater industry, and to make those steps known to this House without further delay.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of this House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST GOVERNMENT INTRODUCE MEASURE TO ENCOURAGE YOUNG FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that several dairy producers are now facing quota problems, which has prompted them to demand additional quotas; considering that the prices they must pay are often out of proportion with a fair production income, thus discouraging them further; and considering also that many young farmers could not only obtain an additional quota, but saw the one which they already had restricted by a harmful government policy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the federal government take immediately the necesary steps to introduce legislation aimed at helping rather than discouraging, as is the case at present, our young farmers who are eager to relieve their seniors.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF SUBJECT OF TANKER MOVEMENTS ON WEST COAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. I have the honour to propose the following motion. In light of the conflicting reports emanating from British Columbia following the decision to recess the west coast oil ports inquiry and in light of the uncertainties generated by the fact that the proposal by Kitimat Pipe Line Limited has not yet been withdrawn from the National Energy Board, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That the issues and concerns related to oil tanker movements on the west coast as might be affected by the Kitimat Pipe Line Limited, TransMountain Pipe-Line Limited, and other proposals be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and that upon receipt of the interim report of the west coast oil ports inquiry by the government, the report be referred to the same committee for due consideration and that the same committee shall report to the House within three months of the receipt of the interim report.

SUGGESTED DELAY OF WICKANNINISH PROJECT PENDING DISCUSSION BETWEEN FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On November 21 the honourable Grace McCarthy, B.C. deputy premier and travel industry minister, sent a telegram to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). The substance of the telegram was a request for a meeting between herself, the justice minister, the Senate government leader, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Milne). The meeting's topic would be keeping Wickanninish Inn as a place of accommodation. The justice minister, the senior B.C. cabinet has not yet responded—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a motion to put, perhaps he will propose it forthwith.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That this House call upon the Indian affairs and northern development minister to direct the architect to delay his work on the Wickanninish project pending the outcome of the meeting with B.C.'s deputy premier, which I am sure the justice minister would be happy to convene as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INCLUSION OF DEPARTMENT IN FUTURE STUDIES OF FUNDY TIDAL POWER PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Fundy tidal power development study is substantially complete and a pilot project is now under active consideration, whereas the Fundy development can generate tremendous economic activity in Atlantic Canada, whereas DREE, which is seriously impaired by underfunding, has thus far been excluded from these studies, and whereas neither the budget nor supplemental estimates contain any new and badly needed development impact for the Atlantic region, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) be included in all future Fundy studies and his department be directed to attend the upcoming meeting of energy ministers considering the long delayed maritime power corporation.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF PROPOSED LABOUR-INTENSIVE PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF OTHER MEASURES TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of Treasury Board. Is the minister prepared to take the House into his confidence with respect to details of the government's federal labour intensive program, which I understand from the minister's office he is releasing to the press later this day, and to tell the House at least what he proposes to tell the press? Perhaps at the same time he might also tell the House whether this is the same program which was announced in this House by the Prime Minister on October 19.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have taken the members of the House into my confidence to some degree by appearing before the miscellaneous estimates committee, at which time there were certain questions asked about it. Indeed, the Minister of Finance announced the program in principle, and in fact described the amount of money to be allocated to the program, in his speech on October 21. I do recognize that there have been other allusions to it. There will be an allocation of $150 million over the period from now to September 28. The program will be directed on a provincial distribution basis to those areas weighted for high and chronic unemployment. The provincial breakdown will be made available to members in letters going to them this afternoon. Fifteen departments of government will be involved in the program and the hiring which should create about 157,000 man-months of work. I use the term man-months as some jobs should last two or three months and others eight or nine months, so the average will be from five to five and one-half months' duration. If the hon. member wishes to put any other questions I shall be glad to answer.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given the fact that since the program was announced in the House by the Prime Minister on October 19, the number of unemployed has increased by 53,000 and we understand that only 20,000 jobs will be created or one job for every 50 unemployed Canadians, can we expect any other initiatives from the government before the first minister's conference takes place to deal with what is perceived as an emergency situation now that winter is approaching with critically high unemployment?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House share the hon. member's concern as expressed on many occasions about the high level of unemployment, particularly in certain regions of the country. The program I have described and which was announced by the Minister of Finance on October 20, augments the $458 million that this Parliament has approved for expenditure this year on direct job creation and many other programs that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has enunciated and articulated in this House. There are other measures which the Prime Minister and other ministers have described as being in the mill, some to culminate in the series of meetings going on with our counterparts in the provinces and other groups in the country, the details of which will probably come out about February.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I put a further supplementary question given this flip-flop approach to unemployment which is the only thing the government has to offer Canada at the present time, and in light of the fact that allocations under phase 2 of the Canada Works Program were largely influenced by political patronage in that Liberal constituencies received approximately $300,000 more than Conservative constituencies, given the fact, also, that the hon. member for Renfrew North announced a $2.5 million program of FLIP for his constituency last Monday, can the minister assure the House that this program will be allocated fairly and impartially and not on the basis of any partisan consideration?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Andras: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I can give the hon. member that assurance. In dealing with his preamble I find it strange that he was given the lead responsibility in this matter for his party since as I recall his constituency enjoys one of the highest allocations under the LIP program.

REQUEST FOR PROJECTS ALLOCATED TO QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Following my colleague's question, I would like to ask the minister, given the fact that $53 million seemed to be intended for the province of Quebec, if he would provide the House with some information, that is to which specific projects will those funds be allocated in the province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct about the amount allocated to the Province of Quebec. I might tell hon. members that the basis for the provincial distribution was the unemployment rate in each province multiplied by the labour force in the province which labour force was adjusted to equalize the participation rate across the country. Then there was a flat 3 per cent of the number of unemployed deducted. This has the effect of tilting it toward the high and chronic unemployment areas. As to the details of the $53 million in the Province of Quebec or, for that matter, any other province, I would refer hon. members to the information which will be forthcoming today and tomorrow and to the particular departments which will be administering the projects, of which there are 15.

● (1422)

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, could the minister assure the House that these projects which will be implemented in the province of Quebec have been previously discussed with certain ministers of the government of Quebec? Could he also give us the assurance that these projects comply with priorities already established by the province of Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, this is a federal initiative. The direct hiring will be under federal authority and the dispensation of wages will be made from federal funds although there will be the usual exchange of information with the provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, since the minister has scheduled a press conference to that effect, would he not consider that it would be useful and fair to us in the opposition it he were to make a statement at three o'clock this afternoon so that we could ask him relevant questions? We are quite pleased with these investments but still we would like to ask a few questions and I think it would be fair also to all members of the House.

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I weighed that consideration but I felt that this program having been announced on October 20, as the hon. member preceding the hon. member who has just spoken took great pains to establish, this is not the first announcement of it. Because of the questions I have been asked and the obvious interest shown, I have responded to questions here but some of the details are available and they will be in hon. members offices today. I have answered fully the questions asked here today, and I shall be pleased to answer further questions during the question period. There is no intention to withhold information. We want all interested members to know about the projects and, indeed, to advise us with regard to the projects in their areas when they are made known.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN BASIC DISABILITY PENSION—SUGGESTED RESUBMISSION TO CABINET

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It relates to the deep concern of veterans and veterans organizations, as well as a great many Canadians, over the announcement the minister made some weeks ago to the effect that the basic rate of the war disability pension would not now be restored to the composite rate standard which was set in 1973. My question to the minister is this: has he at any time since he made that announcement taken this matter again before cabinet? If he has, what was the result? If not, will he make such a submission at an early date?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): At the time I made the announcement I did say that I knew the veterans and the veterans organizations would be disappointed. But I also said, and I repeat it now, that the government will be again considering this matter when fiscal restraints can be eased.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope that the lack of restraint we see in so many quarters will encourage the minister to feel that the time has come to take this issue back to cabinet. When he does, may I ask him if he will also point out to cabinet the small amount of money which would be needed to pay prisoner-of-war compensation to the fewer than 200 World War I veterans who were prisoners of war and who are still with us? Will he also keep alive the question of amending the rules respecting widows' pensions so that those whose husbands were receiving pensions of below 48 per cent will get a pension as of right?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the items enumerated by the hon. member are always under study in my department and could be moved forward at any time.

FINANCE

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF EMPLOYMENT CREDITS MEASURE—NUMBER OF JOBS CREATED

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As he will recall, in his statement of October 20 he said:

I am announcing tonight employment credits for job creation.

Yesterday, in answer to a question put by the leader of my party, the minister stated "We are busy drafting it"—meaning the employement credit bill. Would the minister tell us what progress he has made in drafting the bill and whether we may receive it today?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the bill is not ready. As I indicated before, I was stuck in the House for almost six weeks on Bill C-11.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I am working on the bill and I hope everything will be ready very soon. I hope it will be in place in the early months of next year.

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary question to the minister arises out of a report yesterday in UPI which stated:

● (1427)

Finance Minister Jean Chrétien says he has $100 million he can't give away.

That is referring to the employment tax credit bill. Can the minister indicate to the House when the bill is forthcoming, how many jobs will be affected by the provisions in that bill, assuming it will receive prompt passage in this House?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I hope this program will create at least 50,000 new jobs next year.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, assuming the minister can introduce the bill forthwith and assuming there is early passage of that legislation, would he indicate when job creation will be felt, if the bill is passed before we recess? What is the earliest opportunity for people to receive work as a result of his new bill?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I realize the minister is anxious to answer that type of question, but I caution the House that we are beginning to get far afield. We are anticipating legislation, and in addition, we are beginning to put hypothetical questions. However, I will let it go.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the bill cannot be ready before next week. When we started Bill C-11, the hon. member said that second reading was to be three or four days, and it lasted three weeks. Thus, I cannot rely on him very much.

Mr. Stevens: That is not true.

Some hon. Members: That is not true.

RESEARCH

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAMS TO STIMULATE DEVELOPMENT OF MANUFACTURING SECTOR

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology. Given Canada's trade deficit for last year in excess of $10 billion in manufactured goods, heading for $11.5 billion this year; and in view of our reliance on technological advantage to enable Canadian products to compete in world markets, is the minister going to introduce any new programs or incentives to stimulate research and development in the manufacturing sector of the economy to promote greater efficiency, expand our export trade and put more Canadians to work?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, there are measures contained in the bill which my colleague, the Minister of Finance, is dealing with in the House now. These measures provide investment tax credits of five per cent and 10 per cent for research and development. In addition, we have our contracting out policy which we are extending to deal with this matter. I share the hon. member's concern. The level in the Canadian industrial sector is dismally low and should be significantly increased.

DELAY OF APPOINTMENTS TO MEDICAL, SCIENCE AND ENGINEERING COUNCILS

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, is the decision to delay for over half a year the appointment of the president of the Medical Research Council and the president and members of the Natural Science and Engineering Council considered an encouraging move? When are they to be appointed?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as far as the Natural Science and Engineering Council is concerned, we hope it will be in the very near future. As far as the Medical Research Council is concerned, I would prefer the Minister of National Health and Welfare to respond.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am in the process of reviewing some candidacies for the presidency of the Medical Research Council. I realize the urgency of such an appointment. No delay has ever been decided upon, as suggested.

REQUEST FOR LIST OF EXPENSES OF McDONALD COMMISSION AND OPPOSITION TO KEABLE COMMISSION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Could he disclose to the House the amounts of money which have been spent up till now for legal fees and other judicial costs in relation to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in his department's unsuccessful attempt to oppose the Keable Commission and the honest disclosure of all circumstances surrounding the action of the RCMP special group responsible for uncovering any so-called subversive activities?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): First of all I want to tell the hon. member that all documents in our possession and related to allegations of questionable or possibly illegal practices have already been referred to the commission established by the federal government precisely to investigate RCMP activities, practices and procedures. It is therefore extremely difficult to accept the premise of the hon. member's question that we are trying to hide something when every document in our possession and every allegation directed to us have already been referred to a commission of inquiry headed by a judge from the Supreme Court of the Province of Alberta. As for the amounts for legal services, I obviously do not have the figures here. Those are matters which are being considered before the courts, and the services of the lawyers involved are paid for by the Department of Justice according to a tariff set up by the Department of Justice when their services are needed.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Are we to understand from the reply the minister has just made that he will not go before the Supreme Court to appeal the decision rendered by Justice Hugessen in connection with the case which is now pending before the Keable Commission, and to what extent is the current administration not willing to go to demonstrate the relevancy of federalism, as well as its sole preoccupation with truth and justice by working in closer co-operation with the Keable Commission?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that by setting up an inquiry at the federal level, we have clearly demonstrated to the Canadian people our intention to go to the bottom of the sometimes far-out allegations which have been made, like those the hon. member himself made on TV, when he accused the RCMP of having murdered a former—

An hon. Member: A friend of his!

Mr. Fox: —resident of the province of Quebec, a certain Mr. Viger, when all available evidence bears witness to the fact that Mr. Viger fell off a tractor on his farm and died from heat exposure. If the hon. member wants to talk of justice, Mr. Speaker, he should be honest enough to substantiate his rumours before the inquiries which have been set up or refer them to the attorney general of the province of Quebec and indicate who his informants are. Should he fail to do so, we would have to come to the conclusion that his rumours are the result of a highly irresponsible mind.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I would not raise a question of privilege since the moment is not appropriate, but I—

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member at three o'clock on a question of privilege.

McDONALD COMMISSION—REASON FOR OPPOSITION TO APPLICATION OF LEADER OF OPPOSITION TO BE REPRESENTED

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the same minister. With regard to the application that was recently made by counsel on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition to the McDonald Commission, which was opposed by three counsellors, namely, counsel for the commission itself, counsel for the commissioner of the RCMP and counsel for the Solicitor General, did the counsel oppose that application on the instructions, be they direct or indirect, of the Solicitor General? In other words, did all three oppose these instructions, and if not, who opposed the application of the Leader of the Opposition and for what reasons?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): When the Leader of the Opposition decided to ask permission to have counsel sit in on commission hearings, the matter was brought to my attention by my counsel. My position is that the Government of Canada has full confidence in the commission of inquiry which was set up by the government of Canada to look into the matter concerning allegations against the RCMP. We have full faith that that commission will be able to get to the bottom of the matter. We believe that if it comes to the question of who should appear before that commission, it becomes quite clear at that point that all political parties would have as good a case as the Leader of the Opposition to be represented before that commission as well as innumerable groups throughout the country. It is our position that the commission has received a mandate from the government to go right to the heart of the matter. We have full faith in that commission, which apparently is not the case of the Leader of the Opposition.

McDONALD COMMISSION—SUBMISSION TO COUNSEL OF QUESTIONS NOT ANSWERED BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): I regret the Solicitor General refuses to answer whose counsel was instructed by him or by the government. He described the McDonald Commission as a place where sunshine is let in. It could be more accurately described right now as foggy hall. Numerous questions were put to the Solicitor General in the House and in the committee which he refused to answer on the basis that those questions would be more properly put before the McDonald Inquiry, and I do not think he will deny that. Has his counsel received the transcript of questions put both in the House and in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and will the Solicitor General make an undertaking to the House that those questions will be put at the appropriate time by his counsel at the McDonald Commission?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): It is quite apparent the hon. member does not understand the workings of the McDonald Commission. Perhaps if he left the House and sat in on some of the meetings of the commission he would understand that questions are being put to witnesses by the commission counsel. Perhaps he would also understand that the decision as to whether a political party should be represented before the commission was made by the commission itself.

So far as the specific questions which were put to me at the hearings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs are concerned, I would be delighted to forward a copy of the committee's proceedings to the counsel for the commission of inquiry.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR MAINTENANCE OF QUOTAS ON OCEANIC BEEF

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that quotas on low grade Australian and New Zealand beef will run out at the end of this year and the continuing low returns to the Canadian livestock industry, can the minister assure the House and the industry that the present levels of quotas on Oceanic beef will be maintained in 1978?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, negotiations have been going on regarding quotas on Oceanic beef with our other trading partners, the United States and Argentina, and an announcement will be made shortly concerning these quotas which should not be much different from what they were before. But I would remind the hon. member that when he speaks about depressed beef prices, he is not 100 per cent correct. They are on the increase and have been for some months. It appears that we are out of the bleak picture in which we found ourselves for a couple of years with regard to beef prices. My colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and I are working very closely on this with the other countries concerned.

BEEF—POSSIBILITY OF REQUEST FROM AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND FOR INCREASED ALLOTMENT

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. We have noticed recently that Canada's allotment to the U.S. was increased by some five million pounds. The announcement was made perhaps a week or ten days ago. Has the minister received a request from Australia and New Zealand that their allotment for some 120 million pounds for this year be extended upwards in view of the U.S. allocation to Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I think it would be only natural for them, if they have a surplus of beef, to want to sell more, but just because they made a request does not mean we will grant it because we have established a fairly good quota. If there is any modification in it, the change will be very small. I should remind the hon. member also, as I am sure he is aware, that the U.S. have not filled one third of their beef quota to Canada.

Mr. Hargrave: I want to assure the minister that I am well aware of that situation, but I want to ask him a supplementary question. Is it the intention of the government to increase those allocations for the balance of this year? I am not asking him whether or not he has received a request but whether it is his intention to increase the allocations to Australia and New Zealand above the 120 million pounds?

Mr. Whelan: No decision has been made at this time and it is our intention to protect the beef producers of Canada.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO ENFORCEMENT OF SAFETY REGULATIONS—ENFORCEMENT PROBLEMS OUTSIDE ONTARIO

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that investigators have found that air safety regulations in northwestern Ontario have frequently been disobeyed, thereby jeopardizing the travelling public, and that attempts to discipline the offending aviation firms have been overruled by somebody in Ottawa, thereby raising the spectre of political influence, I should like to ask the minister when he will institute an independent public inquiry into this problem which the minister knows is the only effective way to clear the way and regain public confidence.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): In fact, of course, the investigation which revealed the necessary facts upon which to act has already given us the information required. It is my intention to act upon that information. I have already done so in some respects and I expect to make a complete statement of the progress being made in the very near future.

Mr. Symes: The minister very carefully avoided the question of political influence and we need to get to the bottom of it. I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Can the minister assure the House that the lack of enforcement of air safety regulations has been confined only to northwestern Ontario and is not a national problem? I ask this with particular reference to representations made to the minister by the Canadian Airline Dispatchers Association.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the issue raised by the airline dispatchers is really quite a separate one, but I should say that the question of enforcement of regulations is one which extends beyond the Ontario region, and after our review of the requirement for more inspectors we proposed the addition of 12 inspectors, who will be located in various regions of the country, although an extensive number of them will be for the Ontario and western region which covers northern Ontario. I think this will go a long way toward improving enforcement of regulations, and we are making other changes to ensure that too.

HEALTH

SUGGESTED DELAY OF BAN ON SACCHARIN TO PERMIT COMPANIES TO REDUCE INVENTORY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the United States has set an 18-month moratorium on the saccharin ban, and in view of the fact that the saccharin ban imposed last March by the Canadian government has caused severe hardship to companies involved in the production of the sweetner, is the minister prepared to extend the regulations so that these companies might sell off their remaining stock in order to offset some of the very heavy costs they have incurred so far?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker. We have refused this request more than once. Our studies have confirmed the validity of scientific tests with regard to saccharin. Furthermore, we are not banning saccharin as is the case in the United States; we are simply putting it where it belongs, in drug stores.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED GRANTS TO PERMIT DEVELOPMENT OF NEW DIET PRODUCTS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that industries everywhere in Canada are facing at best difficult times, particularly in rural ridings such as mine, is the government prepared to offer incentives and grants so that these particular companies can research and develop new diet products and so that this industry may thrive and continue to provide jobs?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce does offer grants for new initiatives and new products. Companies can apply to either the Ontario or federal enterprise development board.

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF SUGAR POLICY

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the fact that representation has been made by myself on behalf of Alberta sugar beet growers to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture and the stabilization board regarding the closing of the sugar factory at Picture Butte, Alberta and in view of the fact that we produce only 10 per cent of the sugar we consume in Canada, would the minister assure the House today, prior to my meeting tomorrow in Vancouver with Canadian sugar producers, that he will bring in immediately a sugar policy to save this valuable industry?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have a sugar policy. Sugar beet growing in southern Alberta is assisted by the federal government, and it is my information that there will be no reduction in acreage because of the closing of that one plant.

Mr. Hurlburt: Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary question. In light of the fact that sugar beet growers in southern Alberta are not going to be pleased with the answer I just received and that this government refuses to act when it comes to a meat import law, which forces many cattlemen into bankruptcy, is this the plan the government has for the sugar producer?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, with regard to a meat import law I can assure the hon. member that that matter is in good hands, and there will be one for the year 1978.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: The hon. member has nothing to worry about in that regard.

AIRPORTS

VICTORIA—INSTALLATION OF RADAR

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It is related to the recently published expansion plans for Victoria International Airport, presumably on the ground that more traffic is expected. During the past 15 months there have been at least 14 air traffic incidents at that airport including four accidents in which eight people lost their lives, four of those fatalities having happened within the last 30 days. Those accidents and incidents could certainly have been avoided had radar been installed. Do the plans which are being made include installing radar at Victoria International Airport, or are there plans apart from those which are now being made involving the installation of radar there?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, our ordinary practice is to develop long-range plans for airports and to provide facilities step by step. That is the case with Victoria International Airport, as it is with any other. However, I think the hon. member was being somewhat misleading in suggesting that these specific incidents were related to the absence of radar.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I was not being misleading. I want to make it quite clear that when the fatal accidents did occur the aircraft involved were beyond the sight of the Vancouver control tower and within sight of the Victoria tower. Therefore, I wonder if the minister will now give me the report he promised almost a year ago about plans for installing radar at Victoria International Airport.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have given the hon. member everything I promised to give him. He does a disservice by suggesting that he knows the cause of aircraft incidents and the way in which they could be avoided without knowing the findings of thorough investigations of those incidents. The hon. member raises this matter in this House without giving me notice of the fact he is going to speak about specific instances so that I can add some light.

COMMUNICATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—MINISTER'S POSITION ON SEPARATE AGREEMENT WITH EACH PROVINCE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Communications. The minister of communications of the province of Quebec appears to be interested in discussing administrative arrangements on the question of cable jurisdiction and other communications matters, and I wonder if the minister is considering a full-fledged federal-provincial conference in the new year. There has not been one for several years, and there are many questions outstanding.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is not well informed about the frequency of meetings of communications ministers. A meeting was held March 29 and another one is scheduled for next March.

Regarding the negotiations proposed by Quebec communications minister O'Neill, I acknowledged his proposal and I am prepared to enter into negotiations with him on a bilateral basis, as it has already been done with other provinces such as Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am talking about ministerial meetings, not meetings among officials. Do I understand from the minister's answer that the minister is going to continue her Don Quixote policy of bilateral negotiations with each individual province and of not putting the whole matter of communications on one table to try to resolve the issues? Does the minister want to have separate agreements with the ten provinces?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: The memory of the hon. member is certainly failing him, because the meetings I am referring to took place at the ministerial level. As for these bilateral negotiations, I think the hon. member should understand that these are extremely complex issues, they arise in a context which varies from one province to another and must be dealt with on a bilateral basis. It would of course be desirable to reach similar agreements with all provinces. It is my objective but I am not sure I will reach it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BELLA BELLA, BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN REPAIRING DAMAGE

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is the Minister aware of the economic disaster and tragedy which struck the remote village of Bella Bella on the coast of British Columbia? For the minister's information, in case he has not heard, power was lost for a week, freezing temperatures burst pipelines and a flood took place. In addition Bella Bella has just lost its hotel. Can the minister assure me that efforts will be made by his department to assist the residents of Bella Bella as they seek to rebuild and replace the buildings and facilities they have lost?

● (1452)

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): What is obvious, Mr. Speaker, is that there is much more concern on this side of the House than there is on the other side respecting the disaster at Bella Bella. If they are not taking it seriously, we are.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if I might be able to hear the minister's answer.

Mr. Faulkner: We are involved, Mr. Speaker. We have two engineers working with Chief Reid. I understand things are under control. I will be in touch with Chief Reid later on in the day, and we will be communicating with the hon. member.

ENERGY

LOWER CHURCHILL FALLS POWER PROJECT—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. His colleague, the Minister of Employment, has repeated on a number of occasions the type of projects that would provide long-term employment, for example, the lower Gull Island site in Labrador. I wonder if the minister would indicate if he has had any further discussions with the province of Newfoundland? Have there been any new proposals, and has he indeed participated in discussions between that province and the province of Quebec with regard to future developments?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes I have talked to the minister of mines and energy for the province of Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, with respect to this particular project. I have asked him if he would put forward a proposal to me and to the federal government indicating what the priorities of the Newfoundland government are for the development of the Lower Churchill Falls site. Also how they relate to his government's priorities with respect to a settlement of the outstanding dispute with the province of Quebec. He has undertaken to do so, and I would expect to receive a letter from him some time next week. I believe it was promised to me before Christmas.

An hon. Member: Don't count on the Christmas mail.

Mr. Marshall: I realize the amount of money allocated in the FLIP program would not go very far towards full development. I wonder if the minister has any allocation of that funding? And is there funding going to such a project for the preparatory work which might help out in the future?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, should such funds be made available, I am sure that the Minister of Employment would want to make that announcement, and I will leave that to him.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TIBETANS—REASON FOR CHANGING PLACE OF BIRTH ON PASSPORT APPLICATIONS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. After Tibet was taken over by communist China, a small contingent of Tibetans came to Canada, and the majority of them settled in Belleville. They have become extremely good citizens. I would like to ask the minister why when these Tibetans now apply for their passports, does the External Affairs Department arbitrarily change their place of birth from Tibet to China?

Mr. Speaker: I really think that is a question which ought to be put on the order paper.

TRANSPORT

EFFECT OF CLOSING SEAWAY ON SOYBEAN MEAL PRODUCERS

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On December 2 officials of the minister's department issued an order closing the seaway. This would be about three weeks in advance of the order normally being issued. One of the results has been that some 14,000 tons of soybean meal will not reach the export market. I would like to ask the minister if he is aware of the situation, and if so is there anything possible that can be done?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the only order on December 2 was the closing of the further movement of ships upward into the seaway system which would, of course, have to return. We were aware of the fact that there were a great number of ships within the seaway and they would want to emerge. To this day, when ordinarily the seaway would officially close, there are some 87 vessels still caught and wanting to come through. It will take superhuman efforts by the seaway pilots and coast guard to get most of them out. It was the only course of wisdom to stop further vessels and thus adding to that number.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, this will certainly cause a very severe depression in prices. There is also a possibility that sales of soybeans from southern Ontario will cease for approximately a three-month period. I would like to ask the minister if he would make every attempt to see whether there are any vessels now in the system which might be utilized to move at least a portion of the 14,000 tons of soybean meal which is sitting in the port of Toronto to the export market?

Mr. Lang: I am sure that the people with the soybeans will be looking for those empty vessels in the seaway, if there are any, and they should be able to make such arrangements. I hope the hon. member does agree that it would not help the situation to allow a vessel to go in, be loaded and then to be frozen inside and not be able to get out again.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

TRIDENT AIRCRAFT—REASON FOR DELAY OF FEDERAL AID—POSSIBILITY OF TAKEOVER BY GRUMAN OR CANADAIR

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the fact that British Columbia Development Corporation advised the minister's office on September 15 that they had fulfilled their obligations with reference to Trident Aircraft, and in light of the fact that up until yesterday they had not had the courtesy of a reply to their phone calls and Telex's, has the minister decided whether or not he is going to live up to the department's obligations to provide $5 million to Trident Aircraft as arranged by the former minister of industry, trade and commerce?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): My department has been in touch with Trident Aircraft and we require them to suggest that they have 25 credit-worthy applicants for their airplane with 10 per cent down, and then we will give them greater assistance.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, it would appear on the surface that the minister has now changed the rules by which British Columbia Development Corporation and Trident are supposed to play the game. May I ask the minister if he is aware of any efforts by Gruman and Canadair to take over Trident Aircraft. If so, is the department involved?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, Gruman and Canadair are doing a market survey for the Trident aircraft to see whether there is a market for them.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON SECURITY MEASURES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the great interest and concern created by recent skyjackings and bombings of scheduled airliners, I want to ask a two-part question concerning airport security in Canada. First I would like to ask about differences in levels of security in different cities in Canada, for example one can undergo a detailed—

Mr. Speaker: In light of the time limitation could the hon. member ask his question.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, my question is what measures are being taken to monitor the inspections that are being carried out to be sure that Canadians are getting proper protection from this costly service? Secondly, would he also tell the House if any attempts are currently being made to determine if dangerous materials are being carried in passengers' baggage in aircraft holds?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the security system is being monitored, and every effort is being made to make sure it is as effective as possible. However, I would like to have a detailed report before commenting on measures in relation to items in the holds of aircraft.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Ritchie: As the Prime Minister has left the House, I will wait until tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo.

Mr. Beatty: My question is also for the Prime Minister.

ACRYLIC YARNS—DATE OF RELEASE OF REPORT OF TEXTILE BOARD

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister has had in his possession since early November the report of the Textile and Clothing Board on acrylic yarns, is the minister now prepared to release the report and act upon it; if not, can he tell the House when he will be in a position to do so?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The report is still being considered.

ALLEGATION OF FLQ CELL IV MONCTON UNIVERSITY—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION AND REPORT

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. What does the minister intend to do with regard to recent revelations of an alleged active FLQ cell now in the University of Moncton? Are the RCMP investigating this matter? If not, would the minister please take steps to have the RCMP move in on this serious matter immediately and report to this House on the entire situation?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): I will take note of the hon. member's representations of the matters that ought to be looked into and report as soon as possible.

TRADE

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC BOYCOTTS—REASON FOR DELAY OF REPORT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and is supplementary to a question put yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth. Nearly a year ago the deputy minister of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce issued a directive on international economic boycotts stating that a semi-annual report would be published. I would like to ask the minister if he has received that report and if so, when did he receive it and will he table it now?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): With regard to the economic boycotts and the report, it is still being considered.

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC BOYCOTTS—POSSIBILITY EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION HAS OWN GUIDELINES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we would like some explanation from the minister as to why a semi-annual report to be issued twice a year has not yet been issued, nearly a full year after it was first promised. Will the minister look into the possibility of whether the Canadian Export Development Corporation has developed its own set of guidelines having to do with international economic boycotts. If so, and I would like a confirmation if that is the case, will the minister undertake to make those guidelines public?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the EDC operates under the guidelines laid down under the legislation. I can say to the hon. Leader of the Opposition that there will be new legislation early in the new year with regard to the EDC and all of this can be discussed at that time.

Mr. Clark: Just so the minister is clear on precisely what I am referring to, I am referring to the question of guidelines relating to international economic boycotts. Is the minister saying that there are no new guidelines except those set out in legislation? If that is not the case, and there are new guidelines, will he undertake to make those guidelines public to the House of Commons at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. Horner: As I said, Mr. Speaker, there will be new legislation in the new year which will clearly define the obligations of EDC and strengthen its ability to guarantee loans and insurance to Canadian corporations.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MATTE—RCMP—REPLY OF SOLICITOR GENERAL RE DEATH OF MICHEL VIGER

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege. Since the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) when answering my question took that opportunity to insinuate falsehoods, I now take the liberty of making the necessary rectifications. The Solicitor General's insinuations concerning my recent statements regarding the serious presumptions I entertain about the circumstances surrounding the death of Michel Viger are of an hostile character and show a reaction of panic on his part. The reasons which force me to search for truth and justice are not based on the sensationalism of rumours which would be more or less groundless; they are rather the result of a profound indignation stemming from the following facts. First, the authorized criminal action of a special committee of the RCMP which, instead of preventing subversive activities, actually sought to provoke them. Some people tell me to prove it. All they have to do is simply refer to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts which was in session here on Parliament Hill in 1969 and they will know what I mean. Second, the explicit disclosure of some of these facts by the authorities themselves, which cannot be denied, with the intention of concealing more compromising circumstances. Third, the fact that a whole nation has been profoundly traumatized in 1970, following tragic events whose origin is foreign to the legitimate aspirations of Quebeckers and which were provoked by these famous special committees whose methods are more like those of the Gestapo. These are reasonable and sufficient grounds indeed. The minister thinks that he can allow himself to cast doubt on my good faith because, in his opinion, he alone and his government hold the key to that enigma by the fact they control this famous special committee which, as I just mentioned, looks like some modern version of the Gestapo.

I am not therefore expecting the minister or the government to simply confess the ignominious actions of these agents provocateurs of a few years ago, we saw how a president of the United States denied vigorously some facts which were actually quite true. I intend to safeguard my reputation. My only concern is to rid our institutions once and for all of hatred and terrorism, and for that purpose it is necessary to go to their roots, namely these agents provocateurs who worked systematically in order to bring about the October crisis of 1970, and for the edification of the minister himself, to know to what extent, when I am asking him what were the circumstances, his department is really aware of the circumstances surrounding the alleged accident in which Michel Viger died.

Before answering my questions, the minister should have the decency to investigate. He would discover things he may not be aware of but which can very well have happened. Because Michel Viger, whom I knew, told me himself in so many words he was a Royal Canadian Mounted Police agent, and on this I would like to conclude my question of privilege.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this government established last June a commission of inquiry in order precisely that we could have an independent body inquiring on certain allegations made in months past. The hon. member is straying enormously from the debate. He spoke the day before last and it has been reported in newspapers across Canada that he blamed the RCMP for Mr. Viger's death. The Montreal Gazette of December 14, 1977 for instance had this headline, and I quote:

MP accuses RCMP of murder.

Mr. Speaker, we have the same thing in the newspaper Ottawa Today, Today Staff:

[English]

RCMP accused in Viger death.

A Quebec MP said last night he suspects the RCMP was instrumental in the death of the man who shielded Pierre Laporte's murderers in his farmhouse outside Montreal.

René Matte, social credit MP for Champlain, said in a Radio-Canada interview last night that he suspected the RCMP in the death of Michel Viger—

[Translation]

It is not only in the English press. The hon. member was well understood in both the official languages of this country. The newspaper Le Droit carries the headline:

Matte claims Michel Viger was murdered by RCMP.

Mr. Speaker, it is, of course, also in the Journal de Montréal. What I said to the hon. member in the question period is either he has or does not have information about that death. If he does not, Mr. Speaker, and he made up that rumour, he deserves to be called, as I did in the question period, irresponsible.

An hon. Member: True.

Mr. Fox: If he has information in that respect, Mr. Speaker, he also deserves to be called irresponsible because his duty as a citizen and as a member of parliament, Mr. Speaker, is to make the information he has immediately known to the relevant authorities. If he has information on the causes of Mr. Viger's death, causes which were explained by Mr. Viger's father in interviews with reporters during the day as surely being accidental, well, his duty, Mr. Speaker, is to bring those facts to the attention of the attorney general of the province where the death occurred, a government with which he has excellent relationships for that matter, the attorney general of the Province of Quebec. If he has not done so, Mr. Speaker, he is also irresponsible.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Champlain raised the question of privilege concerning his disagreement with the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) about questions and answers during the question period. In any case, it is certainly a matter of debate but not a question of privilege. Finally, the hon. member did not move any motion. Consequently, as far as the Chair is concerned, nothing can be done in the circumstances.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to the usual business question. I must preface it with an expression of regret that the President of the Treasury Board did not, as I requested, stay to make a statement on the very important program he is announcing. I presume he had an appointment in the Press Building which was unavoidable even for parliament.

I wish to ask the deputy government House leader to confirm what he intends to call for today and tomorrow. There have been certain discussions with respect to the business for Monday and Tuesday, when it is contemplated there will be a debate on external affairs. I think this will be a very important debate and one which will capture the attention of the country. Is the hon. member in a position to inform us when the motion will be put down, and in what terms it is likely to be? Would he also consider setting down the motion for the adjournment in accordance with the discussions which have taken place, so that we might dispose of it and carry on with the important debate to which I have referred?

Mr. Cafik: The first priority, and the business which will be called today, is Bill C-5, the report stage and third reading of the Canada Elections Act. We would like that bill disposed of in all its stages before introducing anything else. If Bill C-5 is disposed of before tomorrow evening, we would call Bill C-7, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act. After that, it is planned that Monday and Tuesday will be set aside for a special debate on external affairs. In addition, we would hope some accommodation might be reached on the question of the freedom of information reference to the committee. That matter is under discussion at the moment.

As far as the tabling of the motion relating to the external affairs debate is concerned, that will not be done until we have disposed of Bill C-5, but we would like it to be done as quickly as possible. In terms of the motion for the adjournment, we would also like to dispose of Bill C-8 prior to its introduction. If those two items are taken care of, we would be able to do those things tomorrow.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is a very full reply and I should like to think we can expect an equally full reply in relation to a question which was raised by my hon. friend from York-Simcoe who suggested that the government, if it wished, could introduce the important employment tax credit legislation which was talked about long before Bill C-11. We would undertake to deal with that bill quickly because it is such an important measure.

As well, I think it would be appropriate for the deputy government House leader to tell us now what the government intends to bring forward by way of legislation when we come back in January, particularly in terms of measures to deal with the economy of the country. I hope we shall not be coming back to deal with such things as a petroleum statistics bill. I realize that the hon. member may not have that kind of information available to him today, but would he consult his colleagues to determine whether before we leave an announcement could be made by the government House leader, the Deputy Prime Minister, telling us what measures the government plans to introduce to deal quickly with economic matters in terms of legislation?

Mr. Cafik: In connection with the expeditious passage of tax credit legislation prior to the adjournment, I must tell the hon. member that I am not in a position at the present time to know what stage that matter has reached; but I can assure him I will bring this question to the attention of my cabinet colleagues, together with the disposition which the hon. gentleman has expressed.

Second, in relation to tabling, prior to the adjournment, a list of legislation to be dealt with following the Christmas recess, I might say that this matter has been discussed on a number of occasions in the context of the announcement of business for a whole session. Such a practice has not been followed in the last 1½ or two years because the original reason for tabling a list of all legislation in advance was so we might be able to negotiate an arrangement whereby time would be allocated and the various bills, and so on, dealt with in an expeditious way. It did not serve that purpose, and for this reason the practice has not been followed recently. Nevertheless, I will draw the matter to the attention of the House leader, and I am sure it can be discussed when the House leaders meet.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Is it possible that the real reason why we do not get a list of legislation is that the government does not know what it is doing?

Some hon. Members: Oh!

An hon. Member: Cheap shot.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, that last question was one which I had in mind as a supplementary, but now I do not need to ask it.

Mr. MacFarlane: Humbug.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I get back to the minister's statement that he does not wish to table either the motion having to do with external affairs or the motion for the adjournment until Bill C-5 has been concluded? I would point out that if these two matters are to be debated on Monday, notice will have to be filed in any case before the House rises tomorrow. I wonder whether he might not let us on the opposition side have copies of the intended motions, so that we can know what to plan in terms of the debate on Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Cafik: I simply indicated that if there was a disposition agreeable to all members whereby an order of the House, or something to that effect, could be made under which we would dispose of Bill C-5 by a given time between now and Friday, we would be able to table these motions immediately. That might be a convenient way of achieving the objective hon. members are seeking, as well as the objective the government has in mind, namely, to dispose of Bill C-5 prior to Friday evening.

An hon. Member: Keep that up and you will be here until the new year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am afraid the minister has missed my point. I am simply suggesting it would be helpful to all members if we could know, before the motions are tabled, particularly with regard to the debate on external affairs, what the terms of the motion are to be. I am simply asking that he supply the representatives of the parties with copies even before that motion is tabled.

Mr. Cafik: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think that is a very reasonable request. I think the request I have made is very reasonable, too. I will take into account what the hon. member has said, and when the motion is drafted I will try to make copies available to members of the opposition parties.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, this question is very important. Such situations occur each year just before the Christmas holidays. This is nothing new; it happens every year.

Bill C-5 is very important and it interests all members of this House as well as the public because, normally, in a democracy the whole population must know the elections act since it must apply it.

We agree that Bill C-5 must be passed as soon as possible and as intelligently as possible.

However, from what the minister has just said, it appears that there might be—we are not absolutely sure about this—a debate on external affairs. We do not know what the motion will be and whether there will really be a debate. Why not tell us? And if there is a debate, why not tell us exactly what particular subject will be debated? I very much fear, Mr. Speaker, that when the motion on Bill C-5 is passed next week, if we do not know exactly the nature of the debates which will take place in the House, it is possible that a certain number of members will be absent, and we know that the weather can have a very great influence on such matters.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, it would be normal to ask the minister to specify the nature of this debate so that we can prepare ourselves intelligently and have interesting and useful sittings.

[English]

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I think a false impression is being created, and if it has been created on my part, I apologize. If Bill C-5 is not disposed of by Tuesday, I presume there will be no debate at all on external affairs. This is why I have indicated that the motion will be tabled when Bill C-5 is disposed of. Presuming that, in private discussions with hon. members, I am led to believe that Bill C-5 will be disposed of this week, I have also indicated to all hon. members that the external affairs debate, if held—as presumably it will be—will be a broad-ranging debate which will allow hon. members a full opportunity to participate and to speak on all matters relating to external affairs. I have not seen the motion, but I am under the impression that that is its nature. I think all hon. members will be well guided to bear those factors in mind in making preparations to participate in a debate which may be held on Monday and Tuesday, depending on the disposition of Bill C-5.

Mr. Foster: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would the acting House leader tell us whether the government is going to table the bill on the Alcan pipeline? It seems to me this is a matter of great concern not only for the Yukon but, in economic terms, for the whole country. Can the bill be tabled before the Christmas recess, so that hon. members will have a chance to review it before they recess?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to table a number of bills for first reading prior to the adjournment. I must admit that I do not have the papers in front of me, so cannot say whether this bill will be one of them; but if it is not, I will take the representation to my colleagues to see what can be done.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO PROHIBIT PORNOGRAPHIC DISPLAYS

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-411, to amend the Criminal Code (pornographic displays).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, it is true that this bill deals with the subject of pornography, but I regard it as an environmental pollution control bill. It will not affect the availability of pornography in society; that is not its purpose. Its purpose is to prevent those running establishments which emphasize sex and pornography as one aspect of their literature from displaying such material so that it is visible to the public passing by on the street.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed

Costs: Were to be predominantly labour-intensive, although a minor share of equipment or capital cost could be included provided this could be related to job-creating activities. Approximately 75 per cent of the federal share of the contributions was to be made for the FY 1971-72 ending March 31, 1972 and 25 per cent in the two months of April and May and ending May 31, 1972.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CERTAIN SECTIONS OF THE ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-5, an Act to amend the Canada Elections Act, as reported by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections (with amendments).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As the hon. members know, there are on the order paper 18 motions at the report stage of Bill C-5, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act. The Chair feels that 12 of these 18 motions do not meet the requirements of the Standing Order of the House or of our precedents, according to which amendments cannot go beyond the scope of a clause or of the bill itself, nor seek to amend the main legislation. Moreover, since some of these amendments are not accompanied by royal recommendations, they infringe upon the royal prerogative.

[English]

It is my intention at this time to outline to the House my views concerning each and every one of the 18 motions. As I have just said, motion No. 12 does not seem to me to meet procedural requirements and precedents in order to be accepted by the Chair. I feel that motions Nos. 1 and 6 go beyond the scope of the clause they seek to amend, and therefore are not in order. I refer hon. members to page 521 of May's in support of the application of this rule.

Motions Nos. 3, 7 and 12, standing in the name of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick), seem to be defective from the procedural standpoint in that they introduce into the bill a new proposition. In this regard I refer the hon. member to citation 203 of Beauchesne's.

Motions Nos. 5, 8 and 15 go beyond the scope of the bill itself and amend the parent act, and thus would not be acceptable.

Motion No. 9, also in the name of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton, infringes upon the financial initiative of the Crown and would require a royal recommendation.

Motion No. 13, standing in the name of the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), seems to be irrelevant to the clause it seeks to amend as it attempts to amend the parent act.

Motions Nos. 16 and 17 are the same. However, they go beyond the bill and are not relevant to the subject matter of the bill as adopted by the House at second reading stage. They also seek to amend the main act.

We are, therefore, left at this time with motions Nos. 2, 4 and 14 which are considered to be in order, along with motions Nos. 10, 11 and 18. The Chair would suggest that the motions in the name of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) bearing the numbers 2, 4 and 14 be grouped together for debate, and that a vote on motion No. 2, if required, would also dispose of motions Nos. 4 and 14. As for motions Nos. 10, 11 and 18, they should be debated and voted on separately.

I invite hon. members at this time to comment on this first impression of the Chair, which I think is based upon precedents and Standing Orders which can hardly be contradicted.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, in so far as motions Nos. 6, 13, 15 and 16 are concerned, I believe there will be consensus in the House of Commons to give unanimous consent to deal with those motions which are put down in the name of the government. Therefore, I request that they be called in the usual manner, and when they are called I will seek unanimous consent to proceed with them at that time.

• (1532)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would like to hear arguments from other members who are concerned about the point I have raised. I will recognize the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) and come back to the request of the minister.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, what you have said may be quite valid. Your Honour went through quite a list. As a matter of fact, we might be out of here by four o'clock at the rate we are going with your assistance. I believe all the matters which for one reason or another you thought to be beyond the ability of this chamber to discuss were discussed in committee.

I must admit that I am a little confused, as Your Honour proceeded quite rapidly. Your Honour had notes. If you had called motion No. 1 and made the objection, we might have been disposed to give unanimous consent, in spite of your objection, to allow the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) to present her motion. I do not think it would take long to debate it, and we might be able to go through the motions in that order.

I think Your Honour dealt with 14 out of 18 amendments, some of which we want and some of which are controversial. I wish I had a copy of Hansard to find out what was said about the amendments I put forward. I think if the motions were taken one at a time and it was suggested that motion No. 1 went beyond the scope of the bill, it would be easier. I thought the hon. member for Trinity had found a way of bringing it within the scope of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is correct in saying that the Chair had some notes which were read, but that is an indication that the Chair took the trouble and the time to look through the motions and to verify the references. I should like to refer the hon. member to Standing Order 75(10), which reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker shall have power to select or combine amendments or clauses to be proposed at the report stage and may, if he thinks fit, call upon any member who has given notice of an amendment to give such explanation of the subject of the amendment as may enable Mr. Speaker to form a judgment upon it.

My remarks were not made to preclude the hon. member from expressing his point of view but, rather, to save time. I think some of the objections I have voiced are quite evident. The hon. member and others concerned will find it difficult to convince the Chair otherwise, unless it can be done by unanimous consent. That is why I did not want to put the request of the minister concerning motions Nos. 6, 13 and 16 to the House immediately, in order not to take away the right of hon. members who might have done the same type of work, or had dialogue with colleagues, to seek unanimous consent for their own motions. I am ready to proceed in a way that will satisfy everybody, and I would welcome some assistance from hon. members.

We could perhaps proceed by elimination. If nothing procedurally wrong is brought to my attention, we could proceed immediately with the motions that are acceptable to the Chair. We could seek unanimous consent for the motions that have been proposed on which there has been discussion. We have been told by the minister that unanimous consent may dispose of the question of their acceptability and in due time bring them up for debate.

In the meantime, the hon. member, through the Chair, could examine whatever possibility there is concerning the motion he has put, and the Chair would give a chance to other concerned members to do the same. In due time we can make sure that this legislation has been heard in all its implications and hon. members will feel they have not been prevented from doing their share in improving or amending the legislation.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, if I understood you correctly, the objection to my motion No. 1 is that it seeks to add to section 13 of the act, and as Bill C-5 amends a subsection of section 13 my motion goes beyond the scope of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wish to correct the hon. member. I said the hon. member's amendment goes beyond the clause to which it is attached. It does not go beyond the bill, but beyond the clause.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, since the clause in Bill C-5 that I am attempting to amend opens up section 13 of the act, I suggest my amendment might be considered if there were unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there are no other comments I would seek unanimous consent to the proposition of the acting House leader on motions Nos. 6, 13 and 16. Is there consent? Precedents allow this to be done. It does not mean that the Chair feels it is a good habit to develop this method of proceeding, but if there is unanimous consent, the House is master of its own rules and these three amendments—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are four—Nos. 6, 13, 15 and 16.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry; I omitted No. 15.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I suspect there may be some feeling that the government is attempting to go beyond the scope of our rules on these four amendments. The amendments were brought forward at the request of members of the standing committee, not on the initiative of the Crown. I think that should be known. We are simply trying to respond to the representations made by members, on both sides, of that committee who requested me to take this action. I agreed. I do not want hon. members to feel that the government has some self-serving objective in bringing forward these amendments at this time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we are not questioning the motivation of the government, but we find ourselves in a strange position this afternoon, much the same as we found ourselves in on another occasion with respect to $1 items. I say, with respect, that the Chair had been given notice of the difficulties and had time to consider this very controversial and difficult matter of procedure. Now we find ourselves, without notice from the Chair, dealing with important procedural matters. The minister said there have been discussions. I think I am speaking for all members when I say it is regrettable that we now find ourselves faced with these difficulties, without any notice.

I hope this is not going to be the practice. It does not lead to swift consideration of the business of the House. I have not had notification of any difficulty from the procedural point of view. It is obvious from the consternation of the deputy House leader for the government that he has not received any indication of difficulty. I cannot speak for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); perhaps he has. We are dealing with an important piece of legislation with respect to which there are procedural objections. Quite frankly, I regret that very much.

● (1542)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I regret to say it, but the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is making a mountain out of a molehill. There is no trouble. Your Honour has done the right thing by studying the proposed motions with regard to their procedural acceptability. Your Honour has given the opinion that there are indications of unanimous consent to proceed, and Your Honour has indicated that if that is the case, you will agree. Thus, why do we not get unanimous consent and put motions Nos. 6, 13, 15 and 16 on the list of motions to be dealt with?

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Not having been advised of the procedure the leader of the government suggested to the House, Mr. Speaker, I was very much surprised. However, following consultations with my colleagues, and because we have closely watched the progress of Bill C-5 which is currently under review and which has reached the report stage, we understand that the intention is to study motions Nos. 6, 13, 15, and 16 together. Moreover, the government leader has consulted me, as he must have no doubt consulted the other leaders to come to a consensus which would be acceptable to all members.

I understand that this may be a somewhat improvised procedure, but because the House has had the opportunity to consider seriously all these amendments, I feel that we should accept this intelligent way to proceed and that we should get on with it. But I should like to emphasize once again that this is a very important piece of legislation and that Canadians should abide by the election act when they are called upon to vote. Its provisions must be as clear as possible, because it is always the same people who never study the legislation which they are responsible for enforcing on election day. That is why I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that come election day, voters have the power and, if we want to make sure that they use this power, the people who are responsible for enforcing the legislation must be informed of it as much as possible. As members of parliament, we must see to it that the legislation is not complicated, but that it is clear and easy to understand.

[English]

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be difficult. I understand the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The deputy House leader for the government has indicated that he would like unanimous consent for a number of motions which stand in his name. I, for one, would be prepared to support that request. I am not sure whether the deputy House leader for the government is listening.

Mr. Cafik: I am listening.

Mr. Dick: Thank you very much. Perhaps we could deal with a couple of clauses which have been approved, in order to indicate some quid pro quo. With unanimous consent, we can proceed. I believe the entire debate will be finished by tomorrow afternoon, anyway. If we arrive at an agreement now, and then an hon. member opposite rises and says "no" to my motion because of an irregularity, I will not be very happy.

If we establish agreement for all 18 motions at this time, then we will proceed through the list. There will not be much discussion, except on a few points; therefore, it will not take long. At this time I would prefer that Your Honour did not ask for unanimous consent, because my feelings at this moment may be different from my feelings later, after discussion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I intervene at this time without precluding other members from speaking. Perhaps the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) has forgotten that he has a motion which is not acceptable. Because it infringes upon the financial initiative of the Crown, the Chair has no authority to seek unanimous consent. The Chair could seek unanimous consent only to permit the government to get from the Governor General the royal recommendation. Therefore, I cannot accept the request of the hon. member to ask for unanimous consent with regard to the 18 motions.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I agree that the motions requiring a royal recommendation should be struck because they have been duplicated by the minister: he has adopted my wording and is able to receive royal recommendation; I am not. The same situation exists as far as the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins) is concerned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This proves the hon. member is aware of what is happening in the motions and there is no element of surprise. I have to apply the rules. My concern is not to seek an early Christmas adjournment but to look at the report stage of the bill on which there are motions of hon. members in order to determine whether they meet the requirements of the Standing Orders. We have not proceeded in any different way from other occasions. Actually, the Chair has demonstrated much co-operation.

[Translation]

In answer to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) who wants the act to be clear, I suggest that the act may be clear, but when the Chair must rule on the acceptability of an amendment, it must do so according to the rules, the precedents and the practice of the House. The Chair is not allowed to pass or amend legislation but it must apply the rules and ensure that the Constitution of Canada is complied with and serves hon. members as well as it can.

I offered my full cooperation. Finally I suggested that the easiest way to proceed was to seek unanimous consent for the motions introduced by the Acting President of Privy Council (Mr. Cafik). There is apparently some hesitation on the part of one member of the opposition to give unanimous consent to these four motions at the present time. So, I return to my first suggestion which would be to proceed immediately to the study of the motions which are considered to be acceptable and unobjectionable, and group motions Nos. 2, 4 and 14 for the purpose of the debate, so that they may be disposed of with one vote. Later, we could consider and discuss separately motions Nos. 10, 11 and 18. In the meantime, the hon. members who are interested could meet and determine on which acceptable motions there is unanimity; then the Chair would be at the entire disposal of the House to formally seek its unanimous consent, and we could proceed with our study at the report stage.

[English]

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I have just one point. I do not think this is the time to commence negotiations, because the problem is clear: certain of these motions are procedurally out of order. It is my intention, and I rose to indicate it earlier, to seek unanimous consent on behalf of the government and on behalf of members of the committee. If the House does not want to deal with these motions, then let members withdraw unanimous consent and the bill will go forward without the motions. But I implore hon. members to realize what they are doing, because some of these motions are extremely important in terms of providing voting rights, for instance, to civilians voting with the armed forces overseas. If members want to deny that right, let them deny it; but I will put the question.

● (1552)

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to hear the interpretation to understand fully the House leader's remarks. Since there is no interpretation right now, it is very difficult to understand what the minister is saying.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the minister has the tendency to speak too fast. He might want to correct that.

Mr. Cafik: I can speak more slowly, Mr. Speaker. The fact of the matter is that I have indicated that I propose, in order to live up to my commitment to members of the committee, to move these motions on their behalf, with the consent of the government; and if the House decides it does not wish to provide that unanimous consent, they will accept that responsibility—but I will have fulfilled my commitment.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, the spirit we enjoyed in the committee was one of understanding and co-operation. As the deputy House leader said, the committee agreed that the matter would be proceeded with in that manner, and that was the understanding of all the parties. The minister made a commitment which he wishes to carry out. I think we should go along with it.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to keep this discussion going much longer, but I am in a somewhat unique situation on motion No. 17 which stands in the name of the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins). That motion would allow the right to vote to teachers who are presently working under contract with the Department of National Defence but are still in the employ of their school boards. I had a private member's bill on exactly that issue in the previous session, and I have in this session.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Epp: I am simply saying that it would be my wish that we come to some agreement and we put the motion before the House, because it is my intention not to disfranchise those who can vote.

Mr. Benjamin: The minister is prefectly right. Amendments for which we ask unanimous consent are amendments put forward at the request of members of all parties. Some of them are for the convenience of the Chief Electoral Officer. I wish the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) had kept his seat instead of trying to impress the House with his knowledge of the rules. If you will pardon my expression, Mr. Speaker, he is fouling up the agreement at which all parties arrived. As far as I am aware, there is unanimous consent, if only everyone would shut up and sit down.

Mr. Hopkins: I am not surprised we have stopped at motion No. 17 because there has been considerable discussion about a royal recommendation. However, when the deputy House leader appeared before the committee, he undertook to obtain a royal recommendation for this motion, and he came back with it, for which I thank him. At the same time, I wish to state—as has been indicated by certain members on the other side of the House—that there was good rapport among members of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have spoken to representatives of all parties on the other side of the House and understand they agree to motions Nos. 16 and 17, for which I thank them. I simply suggest that we should go ahead and obtain unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest a way in which we could proceed. First, I propose that you make a ruling with respect to motion No. 1 which you indicated you do not favour. The case has been stated by the hon. member in whose name it stands, and I suggest Your Honour should make a ruling on it. Then I suggest we proceed to debate motions Nos. 2, 4 and 14 which you have grouped for discussion.

The other suggestion I make is that we agree to give unanimous consent on motions Nos. 6, 13, 15 and 16, but that we leave open the right to argue procedurally any of the other motions, such as motions in the name of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick), particularly those which Your Honour says go beyond the scope of the bill, rather than those which involve expenditure. In all fairness to the hon. member, he should have the right to argue the procedural admissibility of his motions.

[Mr. Scott.]

I think no one wants to foul up the understanding which was reached on motions Nos. 6, 13, 15 and 16. If there is any doubt about it, we can carry on debate on motions Nos. 2, 4 and 14 and deal with the others later. We are prepared to debate the ones Your Honour approves. We are prepared to deal with motions Nos. 6, 13, 15 and 16 on the basis of unanimous consent. But some of the others which Your Honour thinks are out of order are motions concerning which members would like to argue procedural admissibility, and I believe Your Honour will give them that assurance.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with what has been suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I seem to be the fly in the ointment. Since all the other alternatives have been discussed, perhaps it might be best to go on to motions Nos. 2, 4 and 14 and then proceed to motions Nos. 10, 11 and 18. The reason I want to state that clearly, if I may, at this time, is that you have ruled against my motions Nos. 3, 5 and 7, ones about which I happen to feel very strongly. The reason I put them down in this way is that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, in a report made to the House on April 29, unanimously agreed to have them debated and the government left them out of the bill. I would like to be able to speak on them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will have a chance to put forward his argument if he can convince the Chair that the motion is acceptable procedurally. Whatever report the committee has made, and whatever the House may want to do, must be within the confines of our rules. This is what my ruling will be about. When I gave an indication of my opinion regarding these motions, I did not wish to stop any member from putting forward argument on his motion, which is the usual practice of the House and is one which I intend to follow.

It is up to hon. members to argue their case before the Speaker makes a ruling. That is something upon which I cannot disagree, so I accept the suggestion of the hon. member. I hope that when he argues his case, he will argue it on the procedural aspect of the motion and not on the reason for his presentation of the motion.

● (1602)

In order to find a way for this House to move more quickly, perhaps I can put to the House the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that we call motion No. 1 and invite comments from the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) as to the acceptability of her motion. Then I will make a decision on that motion, and after that we will proceed with motions Nos. 2, 4 and 14. Then, because they have been grouped for debate, a vote on Motion No. 2 would dispose of all three of them. Then we could come back to motion No. 3. If there are some arguments to be made, I would listen to them and make my decision; then we could proceed.

However, so that we can plan the work of the House, I wonder if there is unanimous consent to go forward in due time with motions Nos. 6, 13, 15 and 16 proposed by the minister.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, call them one at a time, please, and start with motion No. 1 as suggested.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is a matter requiring unanimous consent. The question could be put later.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, do I not have unanimous consent to put those motions? If that is the decision, that is the end of the motions. I have sought consent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's words are being slightly twisted. He did not say no unanimous consent, ever; he said no unanimous consent, now. He suggested that we call them one at a time. My hope is that when we reach motions Nos. 6, 13, 15 and 16, there might at that point be unanimous consent. The hon. member is nodding his head. I think I have stated it correctly.

Mr. Dick: Absolutely correctly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Trinity has put down a motion and the Chair has indicated that motion No. 1 goes beyond the scope of the clause it is intended to amend. Unless the hon. member can argue the point successfully, the Chair will not change its mind. I invite the hon. member to comment.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I will make my argument very brief. Since clause 9 of Bill C-5 seeks to amend section 13 of the Canada Elections Act, my argument is that since section 13 has been opened up, it should be possible to make the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, if I may speak on the same point of order, the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) discussed this point in committee and at that time she was having some difficulty as to how she might word her motion. When I saw it, I thought, as Your Honour has pointed out, that it might be in violation of the rules. I think the hon. member feels strongly on this point, I know there will be a very brief discussion on the point she wants to raise. If we are going to give unanimous consent later on some things, I think it behooves us to give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Trinity, because this matter is very important to her. I would certainly be willing to give my consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not the prerogative of the Chair to deem that there is unanimous consent. I refer the hon. member for Trinity to page 521 of May's where it says:

> An amendment which is out of order on any of the following grounds cannot be proposed from the chair:
> (1) An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the subject matter or beyond the scope of the bill, or if it is irrelevant to the subject matter or beyond the scope of the clause under consideration.

I remind the hon. member that section 13 in its entirety is not before this House. Only that portion of section 13 of the act which is being amended by this bill is before the House at this time, and in no way will the foregoing citation permit me to put the hon. member's motion to the House.

The argument made by the hon. member defeats her own point. She tried to convince the Chair that she wants to amend a part of the act which is not before the House in Bill C-5 which we are studying. I cannot accept the hon. member's amendment.

Following the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick), I will now ask whether there is unanimous consent to put the next motion to the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Dick: The minister said "No."

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Since the Chair has declared motion No. 1 out of order on account of some irregularities. I remember two years ago a case in the House of Commons concerning the report stage of Bill C-52 amending the Pension Act. At that time, the Chair, despite many misgivings, had seriously considered all views and ruled that the amendment presented under a motion numbered so and so was not in order and that it was not possible to put it to the House.

The Speaker had then ruled the amendment out of order and we could not go further. Now on the basis of such precedent, I think that the situation today is absolutely similar to that of two years ago and I support the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thank the hon. member for his comments and I will now call motions Nos. 2, 4 and 14.

[English]

These three motions are to be debated together, and a vote on motion No. 2 will dispose of all three motions. These three motions are in the name of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette).

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (for Mr. Collenette) moved:

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-5, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be amended in clause 10 by striking out line 19 at page 14 and substituting the following therefor:

"agent of a registered party".

Canada Elections Act

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (for Mr. Collenette) moved:

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-5, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be amended in clause 10 by striking out lines 32 and 33 at page 14 and substituting the following therefor:

"party, and where the registered agent of a party".

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (for Mr. Collenette) moved:

Motion No. 14.

That Bill C-5, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be amended in clause 41 by striking out lines 41 and 42 at page 44 and substituting the following therefor:

"and not otherwise, and where the official agent".

● (1612)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have very briefly explained my understanding of the reason for these three motions. The reprinting of the report of the committee to the House of Commons did not take into account the precise wording that was agreed to by the committee. It is really a correction of typographical errors in order to conform with the report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Carried.

[English]

Accordingly, as previously suggested by the Chair, the adoption of motion No. 2 disposes of motions Nos. 4 and 14.

An hon. Member: Which way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare motions Nos. 2, 4 and 14 carried.

Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 14 (Mr. Cafik for Mr. Collenette) agreed to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They are disposed of here all the time, but it does not mean "favourably."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now consider motion No. 10 in the name of the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen).

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (for Mr. MacEachen) moved:

Motion No. 10.

That Bill C-5, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be amended in clause 35 by striking out lines 34 and 35 at page 39 and substituting the following therefor:

"(9) When a recount of votes is made by a judge pursuant to subsection (7) or where the results of any other recount are such that the number of votes separating the candidate who obtained the highest number of votes and any other candidate is no more than twenty-four."

[Mr. Cafik.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Might I bring to the attention of the hon. member that this motion has a royal recommendation attached to it.

Mr. Cafik: I just draw briefly to the attention of the House that this particular amendment is the result of a proposition put forward by a member of the opposition. It effectively means that when there is a required recount under the law, where the gap between the winner and the next runner-up is within 25 the present law provides that the Crown, through the electoral office, will pay legal costs up to $250 a day. This amendment corrects that. If it is within 25 votes either prior to or after the recount, it will still be covered in the same way. The government agreed to accept that amendment. It will not happen very often, if ever, in the circumstances I have described.

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) wishes to ask a question.

Mr. Béchard: If this is a literal translation, could the minister tell us why in English it reads:

. . . no more than twenty-four",

And in French:

. . . moins de vingt-cinq".

[English]

It is the same thing, but not the same words.

Mr. Cafik: This matter was brought to my attention not only by the Chair but by legal counsel. It was looked into and a number of options were considered. In the final analysis, it was decided the manner in which it is expressed in the motion was the most accurate way we could devise. There is no difference whatsoever in terms of its effect. As the hon. member has pointed out, it happens to be expressed differently in the two official languages.

An hon. Member: Good for you.

Mr. Scott: I have to agree with that. As a matter of fact, I was the one, on behalf of my colleagues in committee, who spoke to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) in this respect. An error can be made. For any election to be decided by a majority of 25 votes is not much, and why should the candidate be put to this expense through no fault of his own? We felt that $250 a day was not enough for the price of legal advice at this time. We support the government on this amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The minister is seeking the floor on a point of clarification, which is permissible.

Mr. Cafik: I am sorry, because I do not like to intervene, but I would draw to the attention of the member who spoke prior to myself that motion No. 11 deals with the second aspect, that is, the amount of remuneration for legal fees in the case of a recount. Motion No. 10 deals strictly with the item to which I referred in my comments.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify that point. From the minister's remarks, it appears there was an implied discussion of motion No. 11. Certainly, the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott) mentioned that. It is, perhaps, unfortunate that the minister and the following speaker mentioned the number "25". That is where the confusion arises. If you state that number and less, it is definite. I understand that the only person who would have qualified for this reimbursement was the former hon. member, Jean-Luc Pepin, in the constituency which he represented in 1972. This amendment would allow that if a person was defeated by 25 or 50 votes, a recount was requested, and after the recount it was discovered there had been an error in the addition—they had won, or lost, by 24 votes or less—then he or she would be covered for the expenditures by the Chief Electoral Officer.

I agree with the minister that it will not happen very often. But it has happened. I believe this is a very worth-while amendment, and I am glad to see that the royal recommendation was brought in by the minister for it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I fully agree on the suggested amendment for reasons identical to those given by the previous speaker. I think that more and more in Canada, as the number of political parties tends to rise, we should protect traditional parties, the old parties, as possible difficulties concerning recounts will be more and more frequent. So I think we should help those who have governed this country for many years by recognizing at least this aspect that would give them the satisfaction of a recount that would not be an unduly heavy financial burden for a candidate or a party.

Mr. Speaker, even if my remarks might seem facetious, I said it very seriously as it is the only solution considering the frequency of problems and the difficulties we are facing presently at the constitutional level throughout Canada. I do not wish to include the province of Quebec more than other provinces, because in every province there are people who think differently and see Canada in a different way but nevertheless, we should at the time of general elections designate representatives of the people and then the votes might be closer. This is why the government leader included this aspect in an amendment to the elections act to ensure better protection for some candidates following an election that could be a financial burden for them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 10 (Mr. MacEachen) agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now consider motion No. 11.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (for Mr. MacEachen) moved:

Motion No. 11.

That Bill C-5, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be amended in clause 35 by striking out lines 19 and 20 at page 40 and substituting the following therefor:

"relates, the lesser of such amount and five hundred dollars for each day or".

He said: Mr. Speaker, in this amendment we have changed the limits in the Election Expenses Act from $250 to $500. This means that in the case of a recount, a person within the category in question will be entitled to receive compensation for payment of legal fees to a maximum of $500. It would be the amount of the bill up to that maximum figure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 11 (Mr. Cafik, for Mr. MacEachen) agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to motion No. 18.

[Translation]

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (for Mr. MacEachen) Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council moved:

Motion No. 18.

That Bill C-5, An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be amended in Clause 71 by adding immediately after line 21 at page 82 the following new subclause:

"(3) Section 27 of the said rules is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(16) The Chief Electoral Officer may make regulations modifying this section for the purpose of making it applicable to Canadian forces electors described in subsection 21(3), and when such regulations are published in the Canada Gazette, this section shall, for such purpose only, be read and construed as modified by such regulations." "

[English]

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to motion No. 18. I tried to get Your Honour's eye before you actually put the motion. Motion No. 18 is of no consequence whatsoever in the law unless motion No. 16 carries. Motion No. 18 is consequential on motion No. 16 which, as we have discovered, requires unanimous consent in order to be put. I think it is counterproductive at this stage, as motion No. 18 has no meaning whatsoever unless motion No. 16 is carried.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question having been put, is there consent that it be withdrawn and considered together with motion No. 16?

Motion No. 18 withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This brings us to the consideration of motion No. 3 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). The Chair has indicated that the motion is defective from a procedural standpoint in that it introduces a new proposition into the bill. On this point, I wish to refer the hon. member to citation 203(3) which reads as follows:

An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

The hon. member's motion attempts to modify the clause by giving a purpose or direction to the money, which is not provided by the clause under consideration or by the intent of the bill. I am ready to listen to the argument of the hon. member.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if I cannot rely on this motion being acceptable, at some stage I may ask the minister to act in the friendly and co-operative way in which the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections has historically acted; that is, with consent and from a non-partisan point of view. I hope he will consent to there being discussion of this matter.

I am willing to have motions No. 3, 5 and 7 lumped together and dealt with at one time. They deal with slightly different aspects of the same thing. Your Honour has ruled motions Nos. 3 and 7 out of order as they introduce a new proposition to the bill. Your Honour stated that motion No. 5 goes beyond the scope of the bill and amends the parent act. They are all within clauses of the bill which are opened up. Your Honour read a citation to the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) which refers to clauses. It does not refer to subclauses. There is a distinction, as we often refer to clauses and subclauses.

These motions were put down in my name because the government did not see fit to bring them in. There was all-party consideration in the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I emphasize—all-party consideration. The Liberal party, the New Democratic Party and the Progressive Conservative party were there at that time, April 29, 1976.

I asked a number of questions in the House. The then government House leader said he wanted to amend the legislation in the way I had brought in the amendments. He said there was a private member's bill before the House that he wanted brought forward and discussed. That bill went forward to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. At page 26 of issue No. 44 for Tuesday, April 13, the Chairman said:

The next is Mr. MacGuigan's bill, restricting expenditures obtained under the Canada Elections Act to the acitivity of that party in the federal field.

There was a brief discussion. Then he said: "Those in favour of the subject matter of Mr. MacGuigan's bill? Those opposed?" The subject matter of the bill was agreed to. In the next publication, which contains the report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to the House, the following appears on page 7 of issue No. 45, dated April 29:

Your committee recommends that the government consider the advisability of introducing amendments to restrict expenditures obtained under the Canada Elections Act to the activities of the party in its federal capacity as referred to in Bill C-362.

So the committee did make a recommendation: it made an all-party, unanimous recommendation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is really debating the motion. I had hoped to receive argument from him as to its acceptability. However, he has at least given me an opportunity to examine the three motions to which he referred, Nos. 3, 5 and 7. I might be ready to reconsider my decision on motion No. 3, but I do not see any way in which I could do so with respect to motions Nos. 5 and 7.

Mr. Dick: I am sorry; I did not want to get into debate. I wanted to show that a recommendtion had been made and that it may have been overlooked in the bill which was put forward. That is why I put these motions down. I certainly made an attempt to bring them within the scope of our rules. Perhaps I will settle for No. 3 at this time.

Motion No. 3 would introduce certain additional words at line 32 on page 14. The clause is already there; we are definitely into a subclause in this case. The clause states:

(a) all money provided by an individual other than the candidate or by a corporation, trade union, unincorporated organization or association, whether as a loan, advance, deposit, contribution, gift or otherwise, shall be paid on his or its own behalf out of moneys to which he or it is beneficially entitled to a registered agent of the party—

My amendment would provide that such money—it is the same money we are talking about—shall be for the use of the party in its federal capacity only. I do not think this introduces a new topic, though as a matter of fact there is some doubt as to whether this topic is already covered in the bill. I would point out that this is an elections act for electing members to the federal House; we are registering federal parties at the office of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada, and I am merely talking about using the funds for the benefit of the party at that level, though I may have spelled it out in more precise detail.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am glad the hon. member has addressed himself to motion No. 3. I allowed him to pursue his comments because I have been examining his request to reconsider my first opinion as to the acceptability of that motion. The hon. member is right in the sense that his amendment is directly related to the clause. It does, of course, bring in a new concept—and that was my preoccupation—the concept of limiting certain funds to federal activities, which was not in the bill. But I have come to the conclusion that since this a borderline case, I am ready to accept the motion and it can be put to the House.

Mr. Dick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I therefore move, seconded by hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That Bill C-5, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be amended in clause 10 by striking out line 32 at page 14 and substituting the following therefor:

"party and such money so provided shall be for the use of the political party in its federal capacity only; and where money is received by a"

Mr. Speaker, I may not be successful in convincing the House of the necessity for the course I am proposing, but I can assure Your Honour that I shall not attempt to argue motions Nos. 5 and 7. Frankly, I was hoping that they would all be accepted and taken together. I had intended to make one speech on them all, anyhow. As the mover of this motion, I am limited to 40 minutes. I shall try to be as precise as I can, but I wish to cover some of the history relating to this measure.

The intent of the Election Expenses Act of 1973 was that money was to be raised with the benefit of a federal tax deduction and used for federal activity of a registered party. There has been some debate on this matter pro and con. In 1974, there was a by-election in Carleton East, in the province of Ontario—right here at the edge of Ottawa—wherein Mr. Benoit ran for the Progressive Conservative party and Evelyn Gigantes ran for the New Democratic Party. The representative of the Liberals was the successful candidate but he lost nine months later in the general election.

In that election, one of the political parties—to be precise, the New Democratic Party—raised every cent of its provincial campaign funds by using the federal tax deduction. They said, "Toll it through the federal party. We will give you a reduction in your federal tax payable." They immediately moved the $100 down to the provincial party and ran the by-election. Now there was a loophole and some of us felt it was wrong. I only say there was some concern. In October of 1974, I point out, there was a further development. I quote a letter dated October 28, 1974:

Liberal Party in Ontario

15 Duncan Street, Toronto, Ontario

We Liberals now have a new opportunity and a new responsibility. Our responsibility is to broaden our base of financial support in order to lessen the potential influence of large institutions in the political process.

The Election Expenses Act, Bill C-203, stimulates financial involvement by encouraging volunteer support and small donations. To accomplish this the new act provides for tax credits. A tax credit is a direct reduction of federal income tax payable. The system must work. It is therefore necessary to obtain your support through your contribution.

In the past a donor who made a direct contribution to the party or a donation to the Liberal Union (later the Red Carnation Fund) did so with no tax benefit. You now have the opportunity of supporting the LPO up to a maximum of $1,150 and be able to claim a direct credit against your personal income tax (not against taxable income but against the tax payable) to a limit of $500 as indicated by the chart below.

Then a chart follows. Continuing:

The funds are used to pay staff of the party, provide party offices and other services that the party needs to function between elections.

A substantial share of your contribution will be deducted from your 1974 income tax if your cheque is received before the year end, payable to the Liberal party in Ontario, 15 Duncan Street, Toronto, Ontario. The Liberal party is in urgent need of your support. Your cheque is vital if we are to continue functioning as an effective party organization.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that this is not directed to the national Liberal party, which has its office, I think, at 305 Bank Street.

Mr. Maine: It is 102 Bank Street.

Mr. Dick: My apologies. This is sent to the Toronto office and is signed by Jeffrey L. D. King, president of the provincial Liberal party of Ontario. He was elected at the annual meeting in Toronto when the provincial Liberal leader was named guest speaker, at a function where their federal counterparts, including the federal Liberal leader, did not come to greet them. That was a provincial affair at the time, and this was signed by a man who to all intents and purposes was provincial Liberal president at the headquarters in Toronto. In other words, the Liberal party began to use the same mechanism in 1974. I felt that this was wrong, so on November 6, 1974, I posed this question to the then House leader, as reported at page 1111 of Hansard:

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I intended that my question be directed to the President of the Privy Council. Thank you very kindly. I had no intention of demoting the minister.

I had made an error previously.

In view of the fact it has been some ten days since it was drawn to the attention of this House—

I believe through newspaper articles.

—that there has been a flagrant abuse of the Election Expenses Act, I believe an immoral exploitation of a loophole, such that provincial political party associations are going to reap benefits which were not intended, does the President of Privy Council have any intention of introducing amendments to close up this loophole and stop the exploitation of the Federal Election Expenses Act by the NDP or other political parties?

The then president of the privy council, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), replied:

Mr. Speaker, I have been reviewing the operations of the Election Expenses Act and I think it will be necessary to bring revisions before the House. The hon. member may be aware that one member on the Liberal side, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, already has a private bill on the order paper for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker then recognized me for one short supplementary, and I asked:

Mr. Speaker, is the introduction of this bill being delayed as a government bill because of the fact that on October 28, 1974, on Liberal party of Ontario stationery over the signature of the president Jeffrey King, individuals were being asked to donate to the provincial party in the same manner—

The hon. member for Eglinton replied:

The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. I do hope, however, that hon. members on the othr side of the House will co-operate in dealing with measures to clear the order paper so I can deal with this matter.

He expressed the intentions of the Liberal party in saying that he wanted to deal with this matter, and then referred to the fact that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) had a private member's bill on the order paper outlawing the practice of handing money which is tax deductible down to the provincial level. Then a funny thing happened, Mr. Speaker. In 1976, the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, following discussion which I will go into in more detail later, made a unanimous, all-party recommendation to the government. This is to be found in issue No. 45 of the committee proceedings for April 29. I think it bears repeating that we have here all-party support. The recommendation is as follows:

Your committee recommends that the government consider the advisability of introducing amendments to restrict the expenditures obtained under the Canada Elections Act to the activity of the party in its federal capacity as referred to in Bill C-362.

Bill C-362 was the private member's bill of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville in that session referred to by the then president of the privy council. In other words, there was an all-party recommendation to the government of the day that this loophole be closed. I took a look at the contents of Bill C-5 and I had to do some stickhandling, I guess. I wanted to have the matter dealt with, so on November 22, as reported at page 1117 of Hansard, I raised the matter again. You will note that this is three years and 16 days after I first brought the matter up and when the Liberal government of the day said it intended to correct this loophole. I put the following question to the President of Privy Council:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the President of Privy Council. On December 6—

That is an error; it should be November 6.

—1974, page 1111 of Hansard, I directed a question to the then president of the privy council, the hon. member for Eglinton, with regard to the Election Expenses Act. I pointed out that provincial party affiliates of federal parties were reaping the benefits through a loophole in that act and money taken off of federal tax payable was being taken down to provincial levels to fight provincial election campaigns. At that time the then president of the privy council said that they were very interested in closing that loophole and that private members' bill in the name of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville would, he hoped, be debated very soon. The same recommendation was made in the report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections on April 29 of last year. Why was that loophole not included in Bill C-5 presently before the committee? Why is there no provision included to cut off that loophole?

The President of Privy Council replied:

To be frank with the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, at the moment I am not aware of the reason that particular amendment has not been proposed. Presumably any loophole that may exist in the law can be in practice closed by the operation of the national political parties and the candidates for whom collections are made. I suggest to the hon. member that this is a matter which might be considered in the committee because the bill is now before that committee.

That was the committee I referred to. The fact is that it was dealt with by the committee in the previous session and that committee made an all-party recommendation that this loophole be closed. The minister continued:

It might be a matter for consideration.

How thoughtful of him!

Certainly, I will give it some thought and consider whether it would be necessary and desirable to move an amendment to bring this objective about if it does constitute a real problem.

Then I followed up with this supplementary question:

Mr. Speaker, there was a private members' bill to cover this loophole and it was requested by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in their report of April 29 of last year that the government provide for this. The bill presently before the committee is silent on this. We cannot introduce an amendment of a provision which has not even been opened up in the government legislation before us. Will the President of Privy Council take the necessary steps as quickly as possible to refer that subject matter or an amendment to Bill C-5 so that it can be considered at the same time?

● (1652)

Mr. Speaker, I was in error because, of course, I have found a way to bring in the amendment. The President of Privy Council responded as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I will consider the representations made by the hon. member and whether at this stage it would be desirable to bring in an amendment, either by consent or otherwise in the committee, or have it done in another way. I still believe it is a loophole that can be closed by the national parties operating as they see fit in the management of collected funds.

Mr. Speaker, you know, I know, every member of this House knows, and anyone who is not locked up in a hospital because of mental instability knows that no party will stop using loopholes until there is an order that all parties stop. Each is afraid that the others will have the advantage. I have looked into the matter and I know that although for almost a year this party refused to use this mechanism to help fund provincial parties, they are going to use it now, as does the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party.

An hon. Member: They do not need that in Ontario.

Mr. Dick: My hon. friend says that Ontario and Alberta, the provinces with the most progressive governments in the country, have closed the loophole at the provincial level and refused to allow federal parties to pass money to their provincial counterparts. The other eight provinces do not have such legislation. The legislation before us provides for the laundering of money not only to provincial but to municipal elections, and not only to municipal elections either, because just this year the New Democratic Party advertised for people to send contributions under the federal Election Expenses Act to support the socialist party of Spain. Imagine using our tax dollars at the federal level to support a foreign party of whatever political stripe! A certain political party has inquired whether it can use federal tax dollars to support its counterparts in Chile and Argentina. Mr. Speaker, this government has an $8 or $9 billion deficit, so we should not be financing other political parties in the world.

This loophole is so wide it can easily be abused, but the practice cannot be stopped as the law stands. That is why I offer these amendments. The abuses must be stopped if this government and members of this House have any conscience. The original intent of the act was to make it easier to collect money for federal political parties and for the support of candidates at the federal level at the cost of the federal treasury. The first proposal was a tax allowance of $75, which is a loss of $75 to the treasury. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that with our deficit we need all the money we can get. Why should we support a continued loss to the treasury of about a $3 million per year so that provincial parties can ride on our coattails?

If parties want to assist provincial activity, let them take the money from their own treasuries, as Ontario and Alberta have done, by introducing similar legislation. The people who want to engage in that activity at whatever level should pay for it.

When I brought this matter up in the last round of committee meetings, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Cafik) said that in 1973 the then president of the privy council said he did not mind if we were involved in provincial activity. In a moment I shall show how selective he was in choosing that quotation because the former president of the privy council stated the exact opposite.

As I have already said, there is no doubt that the three major political parties are using this provision to fund provincial organizations. This is unfair. The Liberal party in Quebec can use the federal Liberal structure to fund itself, for instance, but the Union Nationale party cannot use it as it has no federal counterpart and is not registered nationally. Neither can the Parti Québécois. The Social Credit party can use it, because it is both national and provincial.

It is well known that federal tax moneys were used in the last municipal election in the city of Winnipeg. A New Democratic Party candidate ran for mayor and was funded by federal tax dollars. But the use of this system, laundering the money at the federal level and directing it in this way, he was able to run his campaign. That is how wide open this is, Mr. Speaker. We can fund municipal elections in the same way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder if I could ask the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions to tidy up one small housekeeping matter.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

STANDING COMMITTEE AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL TO U.S.A.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State)(Multiculturalism) moved:

That members of the Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be granted leave to travel outside Canada, namely, to Washington, D.C., U.S.A., for a period of up to four days while the House is adjourned, for the purpose of studying problems relating to the management of national economies in the 1970s, and that the necessary staff accompany the members on the inquiry.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, Your Honour will recall that during the question period matters were raised by the hon. member for St. John's East with respect to the announcement of the details of the FLIP program. The President of the Treasury Board indicated that he would not make a statement on motions with respect to it, but that he would be making a statement later in the day.

Part of his rationale for following the course that is apparent under the rules was that members of the House would receive in their offices the statement that he was to make at his press conference.

I have raised this matter before. It has come to my attention that members of parliament will receive the statement tomorrow. As has been argued before, in other cases, there ought to be a statement on motions regarding government announcements.

● (1702)

The minister is in contempt of this House because he did not make a very short statement in this chamber on a program which is significant enough to cause him to scutter across Wellington Street for a press conference. There are rules for short replies and reasonably short question periods in circumstances such as this. I have raised this point because I feel very strongly about it. The government is holding the House in contempt by doing this, especially when members will not receive written notice until tomorrow, and the press conference took place today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Before the parliamentary secretary speaks on this point of order, I should like to remind the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that perhaps he has a matter of grievance, but the Chair cannot recognize it as a point of order or a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McGRATH—STATEMENTS MADE BY MINISTERS OUTSIDE HOUSE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the point of order of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is not proper, but I have a proper question of privilege. If I am wrong, I will apologize to the House and to the minister. In reply to a question today, the minister indicated that I would have the details of his statement delivered to my office. When I returned to my office, knowing the minister was meeting with the press at three o'clock, I called his office in order to find out at what time we could expect receipt of his statement. I was informed that we would not receive it until tomorrow. Inadvertently or otherwise, it seems to me the minister has seriously misled the House on this important matter. As long as ministers treat the House contemptuously, then they are responsible for delaying the proceedings of the House. Every time that occurs we will raise it as a question of privilege or a point or order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to Standing Order 16 which says that the proceedings on private members' business shall not be suspended except as provided for in Standing Orders 15(5), 26(12) and 44 or when otherwise specified by any special order of this House. So I suggest that these points of order and these so-called questions of privilege which are now being made go against the right of members to present their bills or their motions at private members' business time. I say that we have been dealing with points of order or so-called questions of privilege which are strictly political and that we should now proceed immediately with private members' business.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The question of privilege raised by the hon. member for St. John's East will be taken as notice and brought to the attention of Mr. Speaker. If that is agreeable to the hon. member, we will proceed now to private members' business.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan)—External Affairs—Imprisonment in Soviet Union of Anatoly Sharansky—Efforts to obtain release; the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes)—Export Development Corporation—Reason for financial support for Canadian Superior Oil to drill in Dominican Republic; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Manpower—Lay-offs at Labrador linerboard mill—Government action to alleviate.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed with private members' business, in the sequence shown on the order paper of today namely notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO EDC FINANCING OF SUGAR COMPLEX IN REPUBLIC OF IVORY COAST

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Shall order No. 2, in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) stand?

An hon. Member: Stand.

[Mr. Pinard.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand at the request of the government.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings, documents and agreements relating to the financing by the Export Development Corporation of a cane sugar complex in the Republic of the Ivory Coast to be built by Redpath Sugars Ltd.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion follows a reply to a question which I had on the order paper in October, 1976. It was answered just prior to Christmas, 1976. Originally, the motion was put on the order paper in February, 1977. It died in the last session and was repeated by me in this session. I should like to explain why the question was posed in the first place.

The annual Canadian consumption of sugar is approximately 100 pounds per person. Of this amount, something more than half is used by food manufacturers. World sugar production presently exceeds 80 million metric tons per annum, of which Canada consumes over two billion pounds of sugar per year and is dependent upon imported raw sugar for approximately 90 per cent of its needs.

With regard to imported sugar, approximately 800 million pounds per annum come from Australia, 600 million pounds per annum from South Africa, and 400 million pounds from Mauritius. I obtained this information from an answer tabled by the then minister of industry, trade and commerce.

The 1971 report of the Tariff Board relative to the investigation ordered by the then minister of finance respecting sugar reads in part as follows:

The price of refined cane sugar in Canada appears to be based primarily upon considerations not as closely related as is desirable to such factors as production costs and competitive pricing. It is based on formulae related to the London daily price for "free market" sugar adjusted by a variety of factors; this situation has the further characteristic that one company is the price leader and the others assume that the refiner's margin of the price leader is constant in the short run.

Resulting from the clamour over the price of sugar when there were sharp rises, a document entitled "Food Prices Review Board—Sugar Prices and Policies," dated July, 1974, was prepared. At page 6 it reads as follows:

There has been a strong trend by a number of countries to establish their own sugar industries, both growing and processing. As new developments in the technology of sugar-processing continue . . . it is expected that more countries will process raw sugar, either from beets or sugar cane.

The document continues, at page 32:

The Food Prices Review Board considered that the Canadian sugar policy . . . should be based upon a broader multilateral approach . . . In a world market where future supplies are likely to be much tighter, it would appear to be ironic for Canada to continue policies which put nearby sugar-exporting countries, such as Cuba and Brazil, at a disadvantage in selling supplies in the Canadian market . . .

In the face of expanding world demands and uncertain world supplies, Canada's sugar policies must not be confined by traditional attitudes or arrangements.

In 1974, the same year as the report—in fact, following it by two or three months—the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs stated that the government would be introducing a new policy. The minister was contemplating the idea of a federal board to buy raw sugar and resell it to refineries. Just after that, president Neil Shaw of Redpath, Canada's largest sugar refinery, criticized politicians for meddling in the affairs of the Canadian sugar industry. I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that we are talking of the Redpath company, a subsidiary of the Tate and Lyle multinational giant. In a book published in August, 1975, also by the Food Prices Review Board, concerning the Canadian refining industry, one can read the following statement on page 16.

—most of the Canadian refiners negotiate contracts allowing them to purchase their raw sugar on a "deferred pricing" basis. Under such contracts the price of the raw sugar would—

—in many cases, not——be determined . . . until the raw sugar was actually used in their refineries.

In the same document it is said:

—refiners can derive their refining margin from the list prices issued by Redpath.

Redpath is the company we are considering. It goes on to say:

—the refining margin received by the other refiners would not be determined directly by their own refining cost and profit expectations but instead by those of Redpath . . . This situation is quite typical of an . . . industry . . . in which there are few sellers.

In January of 1977, in a letter signed by the former minister of industry, trade and commerce, I read the following statement:

The general policy of the government is to leave the buying and selling of products in the hands of private companies with government involvement limited to border measures such as the tariff and matters affecting competition. This is the case with regard to sugar.

Also, in another letter from the then minister of industry, trade and commerce dated November 21, 1977, we find the following statement concerning proposals for the Foreign Investment Review Act:

These proposals were approved for the acquisition of control of Merry Packaging Limited and Holway Paper Box Manufacturing Limited by Redpath Industries Limited and its wholly-owned subsidiary, CBC Packaging Limited respectively.

I would explain my anxiety by referring to a couple of fairly well known cases that are being pursued in the courts. In 1974, testifying at the anti-combines trial of Redpath, St. Lawrence Sugar Limited and Atlantic Sugar Refineries Company Limited, an expert Crown witness testified that Redpath Industries Limited paid several million dollars more than necessary to a tax-exempt Bermuda company in which it was a shareholder. He said that the figures indicated that Albion contracted with various suppliers at discount prices for the raw sugar and charged it to Redpath at the price fixed daily in London. I understand that the case of tax evasion by the use of a Bermuda subsidiary is scheduled to come to trial in January, 1978. In connection with the appeal from the combines acquittal involving the same firm and other firms but involving primarily Redpath, a hearing was held in October of this year and a verdict is pending.

That is the situation which led me, in October of 1976, to ask what were the terms and conditions under which the Export Development Corporation financed an industrial cane sugar complex for the Republic of the Ivory Coast. The reason I asked the question was the somewhat conflicting reports. For example, one report stated that the Export Development Corporation kicked in $88.3 million in the form of a ten-year loan, while Canadian banks supplied $21.6 million; Antony Gibbs and Sons Limited of the U.K. participated with $16.7 million, and the rest came from a $45 million Eurocurrency loan. The same report states that the Export Development Corporation gave a boost to Redpath Sugars Limited by helping finance a $172 million cane sugar complex in the Republic of the Ivory Coast. But another report in another newspaper states that a further $10 million is expected to come from the Canadian International Development Agency in the form of a concessionary financing loan.

Thus intrigued by the variety of figures that were in different reports, I asked for details. The details as supplied in the answers are as follows. On August 11, 1976, the Export Development Corporation and four Canadian banks made an agreement to lend $50 million to the Société pour le développement des plantations de canne à sucre, l'industrialisation et la commercialisation du sucre, to finance a sale by Redpath Industries Limited and Redpath Sugars Limited, Montreal, of goods and services for the development of a sugar cane estate and the construction of a raw sugar factory. Repayment is to be by 20 semi-annual instalments beginning six months after completion. EDC also provided a guarantee for loans by banks up to $5 million.

We are discussing taxpayers' assistance, federal assistance, to a subsidiary of a giant multinational corporation which, according to a chart which I have with me, has at least 66 subsidiaries in just about every country of interest. I see countries such as England, Zambia, Canada, Bermuda, U.S.A., Jamaica, Mexico, Norway, Nigeria, Northern Ireland, Belgium, Rhodesia, British Honduras, Guyana, Trinidad, India, Holland, France, the Congo, Mauritius, Switzerland, Indonesia, Mozambique, and South Africa. This is the kind of company that needs federal assistance. I do not really know how much it needs, but according to the answer it is $50 million. But there is no indication as to what forms of assistance are being given by other agencies, apart from the note I read in the newspaper about the $10 million from CIDA.

I also feel that the conditions I asked about in my question have not really been provided. Who will have priority, the banks or the Export Development Corporation? In a case such as this, what risks are we taking? That was not mentioned, and that is the reason I ask in my motion that the documents upon which this decision was made be provided. That is why I ask for all the correspondence, all notes and minutes of meetings which will indicate to the public why it has been considered necessary to invest something in the order of $65 million, according to the figures I have, to assist Redpath, part of one of the largest multinational chains in the world. Surely the Canadian taxpayer is entitled to this information.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to second the motion moved by my dear colleague, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). There are a couple of things I would like to clarify for him as a result of my research. As I understand it, the motion before us requests an order for copies of all correspondence, all notes, the minutes of meetings and all documents and agreements relating to the financing by the Export Development Corporation of a cane sugar complex in the Republic of the Ivory Coast to be built by Redpath Sugars Limited.

As I understand it, the project in question is an integrated sugar complex. It is wholly-owned by the government of the Ivory Coast, a government which has committed itself to expanding and diversifying its agricultural base. In an effort to expand its agricultural base, it created Sodesucre, a government-owned corporation, to assume the responsibility for the production of Ivory Coast sugar. The country has traditionally imported sugar and hopes to develop its own natural resources to supply the domestic market and to provide the country with foreign exchange earnings from export sales. In all our dealings with underdeveloped countries, we try to ensure that they have the opportunity to become self-sufficient. In addition, we hope that they develop agro-industrial bases so that they can exchange their goods and products with other countries of the world.

How was this company established? Sodesucre called for tenders in the international market for the development of this sugar complex. In response to this call, Redpath Sugar submitted a successful bid. The bid was won in the face of very stiff international competition from firms which were supported by their national equivalents of the Export Development Corporation. The successful bid of the Canadian firm will result in the placing of substantial equipment orders in Canada and in the creation of jobs for Canadians employed by suppliers and subsuppliers.

The sugar complex is a commercial project being built because the government of the Ivory Coast has decided that its economy needs, and can benefit from, such a complex. The Export Development Corporation supports commercially viable transactions which involve exports beneficial to Canada, so it is quid pro quo.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Are you a free trader?

Mr. Parent: I believe that if free trade benefits Canada, I would be a free trader. I believe we have to consider the over-all benefits which would accrue to our own country as well as the countries with which we are dealing.

To get back to what I was saying, by definition such a transaction involves a willing buyer and a willing seller. In other words, it must be mutually advantageous and mutually beneficial, as I was saying to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—or is it Ottawa-Carleton?

[Mr. Herbert.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): "Grenville-Carleton".

Mr. Parent: Renfrew county?

Mr. Paproski: That must have been quite a party you had.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): "Granulated Renfrew".

Mr. Parent: If I can get on with this very serious topic without these remarks from my left and my right—

Mr. Symes: Get after those corporate welfare bums.

Mr. Parent: I do not have to go after them; I can go after you fellows.

Furthermore, it should be a financially sound proposition. I hear someone coming.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They have come for you.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1742)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-11, An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds.—Chapter No. 1.

Bill C-15, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1977-78.—Chapter No. 2.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: May I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5:43 p.m. the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-5 as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think I have time left until just a fraction before 8.30 in which to conclude.

An hon. Member: No!

Mr. Dick: I have finished the preliminary half of my remarks and I should like, in the second half, to document what I have had to say. It may be my only opportunity. This matter, the subject of my remarks before five o'clock, first arose when in October, 1973, members of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, engaged in consideration of the Election Expenses Act, were concerned as to whether or not provincial organizations other than registered federal parties would be able to benefit from the generosity of the Minister of National Revenue in allowing a tax deduction in respect of certain donations to political parties. I would refer in the first instance to page 14 of issue No. 15 of the reports of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections dated October 30, 1973. The witness on that occasion was Mr. David H. Wishart, chairman of the study group on election expenses set up by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. As recorded at page 14 the former member for Skeena, Mr. Howard, sais this:

● (2012)

Is it your view, with respect to the income tax deductibility feature of the bill, that a person could make a contribution to a subsidiary section of a registered party, such as a provincial section or the like, and would then be able to get a receipt for that for income tax purposes? That particular provision is on page 35, the proposed subsection is 126.1 (1).

Mr. Wishart replied:

We did not read it that way, Mr. Howard. What you have in mind is if, say, someone contributed to the New Democratic Party of British Columbia, would he be able to get a tax receipt for that? I can only read the words in the text about an election of members to serve in the House of Commons.

So obviously that witness believed that we were talking of expenses for electing federal members to the House of Commons. Then immediately following, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said:

Could I put a supplementary in there? Does it not also refer to a contribution to a registered party? Supposing you leave out the election altogether, and consider Mr. Howard's question from the point of view of a contribution to a registered party. Is there any limitation on how it would be interpreted if you gave a contribution to the registered party with the direction that it be transferred to the provincial branch?

MR. WISHART: I am sorry, Mr. Brewin, I just do not know the answer to that question.

That is an indication that the New Democratic Party was well versed in this matter, that it had done its homework and had its lawyers there to assure themselves that they would be able to use this scheme.

The next time that the matter was raised in committee was on Thursday, December 13, 1973. In issue No. 17 of the committee's proceedings, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) put a question in a somewhat convoluted way but it is the answer that is important. The answer given by the person named in the report, who I presume is the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), is as follows, as recorded at page 7:

If the person who received the funds is a registered agent of the party, so nominated and listed by the chief agent, he could issue tax credits as I understand it. The only question in my mind concerns your mention of a provincial secretary.

Then I would ask hon. members to note these words:

I would enter a caution because the bill is couched in terms of the election of members to the House of Commons and presumably we are dealing with funds for elections to the House of Commons and registered parties seeking to elect people to the House of Commons.

In other words, the President of Privy Council is saying: "Watch out, this is an Election Expenses Act dealing with the election of members of federal parties to the House of Commons". He is staying well away from any provincial affiliation. Then a little later on on the same page Mr. McKinnon, I presume the hon. member for Victoria, says this:

Mr. Minister, in a province such as British Columbia where we have a Social Credit party, it would be to their advantage then, would it not, to contribute the funds to the federal Social Credit party and have them transfer them back to the provincial Social Credit party and thereby come under this tax allowance which would not be the case if they contributed directly to the provincial party? Federally speaking, they are of no consequence in B.C. but it would be a big advantage to them if they follow the way you have explained. They will be able to collect money really for provincial purposes and be exempt from federal tax.

The President of Privy Council replied:

What you are really asking me is whether funds collected for which tax credits are issued can be used for provincial elections? Is that what you are asking?

MR. MCKINNON: In your explanation to Mr. Benjamin you indicated they could transfer these moneys between federal and provincial parties.

MR. MACEACHEN: That is not what I said.

Then after some obiter dicta he continues:

Now it is then up to the registered party to determine how it supports its political activities and we do not determine that in the law.

That is in conflict with what he had said on page 7, namely:

I would enter a caution because the bill is couched in terms of the election of members to the House of Commons and presumably we are dealing with funds for elections to the House of Commons—

And so on. There appears to be some contradiction there. The minister is trying to get the best of both worlds. Then on the next page of the report, again the hon. member for Victoria:

I do not wish to take too much time of the committee, but surely you are asking for laundering of money are you not, in that, the normal contribution of provincial parties will soon be challenged through federal parties so that they can take advantage of the tax concession and then back to the provincial party?

I suggest that the use of the word "laundering" by the hon. member, a word usually used in a derogatory sense, is an indication that he was not pleased about it; and the first words of the President of Privy Council show that he thought the bill was couched in terms which meant election of the House of Commons.

I go now to page 38 of issue No. 25 of the report of the privileges and elections committee for Tuesday, December 11, 1973. Mr. O'Connor, a former member of the House, had this to say:

I believe it is the next section that restricts the tax provisions and allowances for donations strictly to registered parties and candidates in a federal election. Has any thought been given to the discriminatory effect of such a provision on provincial parties, and candidates in provincial elections, particularly in the year 1974, when there will almost surely be three provincial elections in the maritimes, combined with the good possibility of a federal election, all within perhaps three, four or five months of each other? The effect of such a considerable tax credit or tax allowance will be to encourage people to make donations to the federal party or the federal candidate, as opposed to his provincial counterpart and party—much to their detriment. Had any thought been given to extending this principle to other than federal parties?

So the understanding of a Progressive Conservative member of that committee was that this bill was restricted to the financing of federal parties at the federal level. The President of Privy Council replied:

We have thought about the effect on provincial situations. I did not feel that it would be proper to get into the financing of political parties at the provincial level.

In those words he implies that the bill is restricted to the federal party level and was not connected with provincial parties. As recorded at page 39 of the same issue, Mr. O'Connor said this:

I think that there could be substantial discriminatory effects of this section against provincial parties and candidates. I think it may encourage a practice which I am sure we do not want, which might be undesirable, that of people making donations to a federal candidate or federal party in anticipation of he in turn providing the receipt for tax purposes and then handing the money over to his provincial party or a provincial candidate friend in his area. I am sure we do not want to encourage that type of thing.

Again there is an indication that this bill has to do with elections at the federal level. A little further on Mr. McKinnon, presumably the hon. member for Victoria, said this:

I would like to speak to the subject as I recall and refresh our Minister's mind about his answer to a similar query about a month ago . . . did he not think we were asking for laundering of money, that is that donors would give the money to the federal candidate or the federal party and they in turn would pass it on to the provincial candidate or provincial party, having given the tax receipt, the secret of it all, to the donor? And your answer at that time was that you would not wish to interfere in the interior workings of a party, and certainly you implied that you had no objection to such a practice. The reason I have intervened now is to ask a further question on this—how would you feel about it in municipal politics?

● (2022)

Again he referred to the time when I indicated that the President of the Privy Council had put his foot on the other side so that he was straddling the fence.

[Mr. Dick.]

At the bottom of the page comes the reply:

MR. MACEACHEN: I think I will repeat exactly what I said earlier, that if the registered party feels that contributing or helping a provincial organization is to serve its purposes, then we will not prohibit that in the law, and I do not think we should.

We have had no representations from the provinces in any way. They have made changes in their electoral law and brought benefits to themselves in various cases, and we just have not heard anything from them on this.

We have thought about the effect on provincial situations. I did not feel that it would be proper to get into the financing of political parties at the provincial level.

That is a contradiction, if ever I heard one.

As recorded on pages 40 and 41, Mr. Howard, the former member for Skeena, went into a long discussion about it being all right, or appearing to be all right, and that he did not think the Minister of National Revenue would look behind the receipt. The President of Privy Council replied at page 41:

If they feel that a provincial section is worthy of support, they can do that and under the law it will be disclosed.

That is not how it is working today, Mr. Speaker. Later at page 41 Mr. Howard said:

I can phone my federal sector and say: 'Here, I am going to give you $100. I want a receipt, but that is earmarked for the provincial section of the party in B.C.' He can transmit that to the provincial section: I get my tax deduction, but the money goes to the provincial section.

That brought the following response:

MR. MACEACHEN: If that arrangement is acceptable to the registered party and it agrees that it wants to spend its money that way, that is not prevented.

At the bottom of the page Mr. Howard asked:

Mr. Chairman, if, by implication, it is permissible, why do we not do it directly and talk in terms of contributions to provincial parties?

Even when Mr. Howard had the situation clarified the President of the Privy Council did a flip-flop. Mr. Howard was bothered and said so. In effect he asked why we would not be honest about it instead of hiding behind this kind of scuttle-butt.

In issue No. 42 for Thursday, April 1, 1976, at page 19 the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) introduced his bill saying how much he disliked the way they were tolling through provincial funds. I do not have time to read it all. At page 21 appears the following:

MR. BEATTY: I would like to voice my support, Mr. Chairman, for the thrust of the legislation proposed by Mr. MacGuigan. One of the concerns that I have had for some time is the possibility that funds which were raised for one purpose were being channeled through to a totally different purpose.

At the bottom of page 22 I said that I agreed with the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. At page 23 a witness, Mr. Hamel, said:

I have had a number of questions asked of me, I will not name the party, but one party asked me whether they could finance one of their similar parties in Chile or Argentina or one of the foreign countries.

Then he added:

At the moment there is no restriction.

I put the question:

There is no restriction as well, I understand, for people using the Election Expenses Act presently to help fund leadership campaigns.

Mr. Hamel replied:

No.

A few moments later the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville said:

I think that would be contrary to the spirit of the act, at least, but this legislation does not go that far. It might, however, be the model for further legislation . . .

Next we come to issue No. 44, for Tuesday, April 13, 1976. I have already indicated, this bill was reported unopposed by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections with agreement by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. At page 7 of issue No. 45 for April 29, there appears the following:

Your committee recommends that the government consider the advisability of introducing amendments to restrict the expenditures obtained under the Canada Elections Act to the activity of the Party in its federal capacity as referred to in Bill C-362.

In conclusion, I should indicate that this matter is dealt with in issue No. 2 at pages 18 and 19 for Tuesday, November 22, and in issue No. 3 at pages 8 and 9 on Wednesday, November 23.

If we do not close this loophole the next step will be up to the public of Canada which can call us to account in the years ahead. The people might say, "Look what those crooked politicians did. We thought they were being honest and cleaning up the election financing but all they did was sweep it under the rug."

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, in connection with motion No. 3 we have heard a great deal about the evils of the Elections Expenses Act which allows funds raised at the federal level through a tax credit to be used for other than federal purposes. We have had political parties in this country for 100 years, Mr. Speaker, and I think they have behaved responsibly at the federal level. I do not think accusations or innuendoes about the activities of any political party in this country are warranted.

Political parties would have to answer to the public for taking funds raised at the federal level and using them at another level. There is no disposition in this bill to do that. I would point out, however, that discharge of this motion might lead to administrative nightmares in the application of the law. It is extremely difficult to accomplish what is proposed in this amendment. For that reason, and on the principle that laws that cannot be enforced are bad laws, many members may feel the motion should not pass.

Political parties in Canada, particularly the smaller ones, that operate on both the federal and provincial levels, often have joint offices in the provinces to look after both federal and provincial concerns. In some cases the division of manpower and resources is easily earmarked—the federal funding for federal purposes and provincial funding for provincial purposes. If this motion were adopted there would be the problem of determining how much of each person was working for whom and how that could be justified under the law.

In light of the fact that our political parties are responsible to their members and the people of this country, it is recognized that they must act in a responsible manner unless they want to answer at the polls.

For these reasons the government is not prepared to support the motion.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond briefly to the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). At the outset I want to say to my friend that political parties are not just machines in some kind of corporate mechanism. Political parties consist of people.

● (2032)

Mr. Dick: That is right, in my party as well.

Mr. Benjamin: I am glad the hon. member said that, because it helps to rebut the arguments put forward by him as the sponsor of this motion.

Political parties are gatherings of people to bring about social and economic changes, as well as to promote ideas at the provincial, municipal and federal levels. The hon. member does not seem to be aware of the financing of his own party, let alone of the New Democratic or Liberal parties. I am slightly embarrassed to tell him of a banquet which was celebrated in honour of the eightieth birthday of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). That celebration was attended by approximately 2,500 people. As a matter of courtesy, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and myself paid $50 each to the Progressive Conservative party in order to attend that banquet. In fact the former minister of finance, Mr. John Turner, attended as well. Several weeks later I received a receipt in the amount of $36 for tax purposes.

Mr. Dick: Did you use it?

Mr. Benjamin: Yes. I wanted to get back from the Conservative party some of the money I spent, even if it was at the expense of the Liberal government. I am sure the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton would claim somehow that it was for federal party purposes. It was a legitimate operation, as far as I was concerned. The Conservatives were honouring one of their members, the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I think the sponsor of this motion should look more closely at how his party is financed and who is entitled to receipts for tax purposes. He mentioned only what the New Democratic and Liberal parties did, and forgot to mention the Progressive Conservative party.

A friend of mind, who is a Progressive Conservative, raises money for that party in the city of Regina. The people who give him money receive receipts for tax credits, which is not wrong. My party has published its financial reports every year since 1933. It is financed in the following manner: the great, overwhelming majority of its funds are raised by the provincial constituencies of our party. For example, the last year that I was provincial secretary for our party in Saskatchewan, we sent $47,000 to the federal party in Ottawa as our share of the contribution toward national party operations, as did British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario and Nova Scotia. In fact, approximately three-quarters of the funds of the New Democratic Party are raised by the provincial sectors.

When the next federal election is called, every provincial sector is assigned a quota of funds which they may raise for the federal party. Under this legislation, those contributors are entitled to receipts for the purposes of tax credits. I suspect that is the case in the Progressive Conservative party as well.

The hon. member refers to this as a loophole or something which is sinister, but this is the first time it is out in the open for everyone to see. That can hardly be called sinister, and certainly it is not a loophole. It is an incentive and encouragement for more Canadians to take an active part in the political affairs of their country by supporting the party or the candidate they choose. Surely that is healthy in a democratic society.

Also the hon. member referred to deductions for the purpose of federal tax credits which are given to provincial constituencies, as well as municipal ones. Again he inferred that this was something sinister and unheard of. Tax credits or deductions for income tax purposes are allowed by the federal government for thousands of corporations and, more particularly, for charitable organizations that are licensed only to operate municipally or provincially. If a person makes a contribution to a provincial charity, he is allowed to deduct it from his income tax. If we follow what the hon. member is indicating in his motion to its logical conclusion, then only contributions to federal charities could be used for income tax purposes. I am sure the provincial Red Cross groups and other organizations would not be in agreement with that type of legislation.

The minister referred to this as being an administrative nightmare. If this motion were to pass, I suspect the commissioner of election expenses, who works out of the office of the Chief Electoral Officer, would require at least 100 people on his staff. Their duties would involve the inspection of books, bank accounts, receipts, and the operations of 281 federal constituencies, five or six federally registered parties, and over 700 provincial constituencies. The receipts, bank accounts, deposits and the issuing of funds would have to be examined. Also there are three to six parties in every province. Their books, accounts, receipts and payouts would have to be examined. I doubt very much if the Chief Electoral Officer or his election expenses commissioner would have the authority to look into the operations of all sectors of every political party. This would have to be done in every province of Canada, which is ridiculous. I was hoping the hon. member would give up after the first five minutes of his speech.

In closing, I suggest a more positive way of improving the present legislation, the tax credit provisions. It seems to me there would be nothing wrong with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), when he brings down his budget in the spring, announcing a minor change in the provision for tax credits for political contributions. It would require a slight change in the income tax form.

My suggestion is: in the province of Saskatchewan, as an example, the provincial income tax rate is 38 per cent of the federal tax payable. A person could deduct a tax credit with respect to a political contribution from his total federal tax first. Then he would have 38 per cent of the remaining federal tax payable which would be his provincial tax payable. That would automatically reduce the actual amount of his provincial tax payable. In other words, both the provincial and federal jurisdictions would make allowances for tax credits in regard to political contributions.

I hope the Minister of Finance will consult with his counterparts in the ten provinces. In order to include this in the budget which will be forthcoming in the spring, all that is required is one paragraph. This would make the hon. member who has moved this motion feel better. It would divide the tax credit among the provinces and the federal government. I see nothing wrong with that. In any event, even without it, the federal tax credit for contributions to political parties is one of the most progressive and advanced steps made in Canadian politics in many years since we got universal suffrage.

All our political parties on the federal level also operate on the provincial level, and in some parts in Canada on the municipal level, and it is the same money. They work together as an instrument for social and economic change. The benefits that the nation allows by way of tax credit for political contributions is a positive incentive and an encouragement for more Canadians to take a more active part in politics, particularly in the financing of politics and, more essentially, the financing of political parties in which they choose to believe and the candidates whom they choose to support. I hope the House will give this motion very short shrift.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion defeated on division.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. Dick) negatived.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to motion No. 5 on the acceptability of which Mr. Speaker has some doubts. I am ready to receive arguments from the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) or other hon. members as to the acceptability or otherwise of motions Nos. 5 and 7. I have warned the hon. member that he might have difficulty in convincing the Chair that these two motions do not bring in a completely new proposal. Although I accept the fact that they relate to the point of order he raised on motion No. 2, when one reads these two motions and the clauses which they seek to amend, one has a distinct impression that they bring in a new proposal. If the hon. member has anything to add to what I have said, I welcome his remarks.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take a great deal of time on this. I want to point out that if motion No. 6 purports to open up certain subsections, whereas the bill which was reported to the House purported to open up subsection 13.3(1), I felt that although subsection 13.3(1) states that we might be able to delve into that section, we might not have to deal with certain subsections. If I am wrong, the same arguments that you, Mr. Speaker, might be using to rule out my motion No. 5 you will use to rule out motion No. 6 because it purports to open up more than one subsection.

What I intended to do in this motion, which is connected with my motion No. 3, was to put the onus on the auditor appointed by a registered party to set out in his report to the chief agent of the party whether or not all the receipts and expenses of the party for a fiscal period were in connection with the political party in its federal capacity and, if not, what amounts were spent for provincial, municipal, or out of Canada political activities.

The party to my left has been saying that they have been disclosing this information since 1933. I thought that everybody would welcome this open disclosure which they all seem to want. Without such an amendment, this information will be buried under the carpet where the public cannot see it. I will say no more. If you allow this motion, Mr. Speaker, and we go on to the next one, I will say that what I said on the last motion will apply to the next one. If you see fit to do so, Mr. Speaker, perhaps it can be disposed of on division. Otherwise, you might have the same difficulty perhaps with motion No. 6.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not want to prejudge the decision, but the hon. member would have to convince the House to give consent to the motion. I take it from the minister that there might be consent to motion No. 6. But so far as motions Nos. 5 and 7 are concerned, which would open up a subsection on the appointment of an auditor and give direction to him, I believe that this would bring in a new perspective which was not foreseen in the bill and for that reason I cannot accept it, unless there is unanimous consent to motions Nos. 5 and 7.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I have not yet spoken on motion No. 7. All I can say is that if there is a willingness to give unanimous consent to it, I will undertake not to make a speech but to let the matter go on division. Perhaps that might encourage the minister and we will have the interparty compatibility that this committee has usually had.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there consent to motions Nos. 5 and 7?

Some hon. Members: No.

Motions Nos. 5 and 7 ruled out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready to proceed to motion No. 6? There is a request from the minister to seek unanimous consent to motions Nos. 6, 13, 15 and 16. Perhaps this is a good time for me to ask whether or not there is consent to these four motions. I know the hon. member has the right to request that the Chair put the question on each motion, but I put the question on all four, for all it is worth.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you put each motion individually as we approach them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we proceed with motion No. 6 in the name of the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) although the Chair has voiced a reservation on it?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (2052)

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (for the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council) moved:

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-5, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be amended in Clause 11 by

"11. Subsections 13.3(1) and (2) of the said Act are"

(b) striking out lines 25 to 29 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

"13.3(1) Every registered party shall, within thirty days after becoming a registered party, appoint an auditor, unless the party has previously appointed an auditor who continues to hold office as such.

(2) Where an auditor of a registered party ceases for any reason to hold office as such, ceases to be qualified as an auditor or becomes ineligible as provided in subsection (3), the party shall, within thirty days, appoint another auditor."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. This particular amendment was part of a larger amendment introduced at the committee stage, and this element of it was felt to be out of order at that time. I indicated in the committee that I would bring forward an amendment and seek unanimous consent to restore that disposition in the House.

Effectively this amendment would amend clause 11 in order to clarify the requirement of Bill C-5 that registered parties have and keep auditors.

Motion No. 6 (Mr. MacEachen) agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Motion No. 7 has been disposed of as not meeting the requirements of our procedures. The House will now consider motion No. 8, appearing in the name of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). The Chair has already indicated that this motion also goes beyond the scope of the bill and seeks to amend the act. However, I am prepared to hear arguments from the hon. member.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I thought in dealing with motion No. 5 that I indicated that perhaps I might be able to persuade

Your Honour or the House, later in dealing with motion No. 7. At that time I said I was only speaking about motion No. 5. If I may have a brief moment, I would like to try to persuade the house that motion No. 7 should be allowed to stand. Motion No. 7 would add a couple of paragraphs to clause 12. At page 15 of the bill section 13.4 of the act is opened up.

Clause 12 begins with the following:

Section 13.4 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

Then subsections (4) and (5) are added, and all I am attempting to do is add subsections (6), (7) and (8).

My proposed subsection (6) says the following:

A return referred to in this section—

That section is opened up on page 15, line 30 of the bill, for it refers to section 13.4. All I am asking is that a return referred to in that section be accompanied by an affidavit of the chief agent attesting that all of the expenditures referred to in paragraphs 2(c) and (d) were made in respect of the activities of the party in its federal capacity. Subsection (2) is referred to in subsection (5) which is on page 16 of the bill. That reference can be found at line 18 of page 16, and subsection (2) is also referred to at line 37 of page 15. The subsection to which I am referring is already referred to.

The proposed subsection (7) in my motion No. 7 reads as follows:

Where an offence against this Act that is an offence by virtue of subsection (6) is committed by the chief agent of a registered party, the registered party is guilty of an offence against this Act and is liable upon summary conviction to a fine not exceeding double the amount that was expended on behalf of provincial, municipal or out of Canada political activity.

With regard to my proposed subsection (8), I know that in the last two years all the federal parties have got themselves into what I think is a mess. I do not think it was intended, but my proposed subsection (8) says that:

Section 7 shall come into force January 1, 1981.

This would give the parties three years to rearrange their affairs and get out of the mess.

The subsections to which I have referred are added to section 13.4. In Motion No. 5 there was a more difficult point which I had to get around because in that case we were dealing with subsection 13.3(1). That was called a subsection. In this case section 13.4 is to be amended, so a whole section has been opened up and not a subsection. I believe if Your Honour reads the quote which Your Honour read earlier when dealing with the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), Your Honour would find that this talks about section and not subsection. Therefore, I think there is a considerable difference. In that case the motion opened up and specified a subsection. This motion deals with a section.

If Your Honour sees fit I intend to apply the speech I made on motion No. 5 to Motion No. 7, and I will sit down and let the matter go on division.

[Mr. Dick.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member really has made his speech on this amendment. I do not know how he can apply his remarks to the work of returning officers.

Mr. Dick: We are on motion No. 7.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We are on motion No. 8. Motion No. 7 was ruled out of order.

Mr. Dick: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I was not allowed to speak on motion No. 7. I spoke on motion No. 5.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Motions Nos. 5 and 7 are ruled out of order.

Mr. Dick: But there is a distinction because one refers to subsections.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In his most recent remarks the hon. member did refer to motion No. 7, but I thought his main argument referred to motion No. 8. However, I must tell him that as far as motion No. 7 is concerned we almost have a double decision. It has been ruled out of order.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, on motion No. 8 I can say that the Chair is absolutely right that it has to be ruled out of order. I thought there might have been some predisposition on the part of the minister that we would move into a new era of politics, as has been done in the major provinces of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia where the officials at the polls represent two different political interests. This clause is copied directly from one of the provincial acts and I know it would cause the Chief Electoral Officer and all his representatives in the ridings more trouble than any other section, but all I am doing is seeking unanimous consent. I would need to have it in this case. There is no doubt that it is absolutely out of order unless there is unanimous consent. I wonder if the minister would consider giving his consent on this matter.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the members of my party would be willing to give their unanimous consent if Your Honour were disposed to ask the House for it. We would agree to allowing the motion to be debated and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) has made a request for unanimous consent with regard to Motion No.—

An hon. Member: Number 7.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No, motion No. 7 is out of order. We are dealing with motion No. 8. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Dick: The minister says no and again does not want to co-operate.

Motion No. 8 (Mr. Dick) ruled out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There not being unanimous consent the House will proceed at this time to motion No. 9 (Mr. Dick), but by the remarks of the hon. member earlier this afternoon he has agreed that on motion No. 9 a Crown recommendation would be involved.

Mr. Dick: Withdraw.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is not questioning the decision of the Chair, so the motion cannot be considered. It is withdrawn by the hon. member.

Motion No. 9 (Mr. Dick) withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House having dealt with motions Nos. 10 and 11 the House will now proceed to the consideration of motion No. 12 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). Again I refer the hon. member to my initial reaction to his motion this afternoon.

The motion seems to me to be defective from a procedural standpoint. It introduces a new proposition to the bill, and taking into account many references, past precedents and, in particular, a reference to Beauchesne citation 203(3), it cannot be accepted. However, I am ready to listen to the hon. member's comments.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, this matter is referred to at page 41 of the bill inclause 39(61)(1) and then later 39(61)(4). Now, as in the case of my motion No. 3 where after reconsideration it was found acceptable because it was qualifying what was in existence and we are amending that section already. This situation is identical. We are explaining how the poll clerks and the district returning officers are to be paid. To my mind it would have been better to have included what would have been section 29 which was a proposal I had under motion No. 8. This was out of order because the minister would not co-operate or have a fair debate on it.

In this specific instance I am asking that the subsection as amended continue, but after it says "allowances attributable to polling stations that are payable to deputy returning officers" to continue with "... deputy returning officers who shall be appointed by the candidate at the election who represents the political interest of the government of the day"—which would be the Liberals in this case—and then the words "and poll clerks". All I do is qualify the clerk by saying "who are appointed by the party whose candidate had the highest or second highest number of votes in the preceding election and who are of a political interest other than the political interest represented by the government of the day". Then to continue on with the bill. This is not as tidy as amending section 29, but it is perfectly in order because it describes and section 29 has to be read in conjunction with section 29(4). For interpretation of statutes you have to read sections with sections and you have to read the whole act together for clarity. This is not a new idea, the poll clerks are there, the DROs are there and they are going to be paid. I am suggesting that they assist in the qualifications in the appointment. It is a modern concept which has been adopted in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia. It would be a beneficial amendment with the result that the Canadian public would feel there was a more just and fair system.

I stand by your ruling whatever it may be and I hope you understand the qualifications which I have here are of the same nature as motion No. 3, and they are really not introducing anything different in substance. If you do not rule in my favour, I might be able to seek unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do see the objective of fairness the hon. member is trying to reach and if I do use his own words, a concept. And I will just add a new concept that he is trying to bring. While we have a clause that is to set a tariff for those electoral officers, setting effective dates and obtaining the authority for the issuing of warrants to pay these people, the hon. member is taking advantage of a clause that only adds a new concept in which he believes. With that I do not agree. Procedurally this cannot be acceptable. It could be acceptable with unanimous consent of the House and I am seeking unanimous consent at the request of the hon. member.

Mr. Dick: I accept your ruling and ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to proceed with the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Motion No. 12 (Mr. Dick) ruled out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to consideration of motion No. 13. The hon. minister knows motion No. 13 does not on its own meet the requirement of our rules or standing orders.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, in order to fulfil our commitments as a government to members of the committee who studied this bill, I seek unanimous consent to put motion No. 13.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I do make the request, I would bring to the attention of the House that motion No. 13 is accompanied by a recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General to meet that requirement. Is there unanimous consent to give consideration to this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the House that I would not be as obstreperous as the minister and would consent to give some indication that there is co-operation from some sides of the House.

Mr. Cafik: In dealing with motion No. 13 I would like to indicate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. minister is ready to comment on the motion, I have to put it to the House. There being unanimous consent, Mr. Cafik (for Mr. Mac-

Eachen), seconded by Miss Bégin, moves that Bill C-5 be amended as follows:

Motion No. 13.

That Bill C-5, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be amended in Clause 40 by adding immediately after line 21 at page 44 the following new subclause:

"(3) The Chief Electoral Officer shall, as soon as is reasonably practicable after receipt by him of all returns in respect of election expenses required by section 63 of the Canada Elections Act to be transmitted to him in relation to the first general election to which section 61.1 of that Act applies, make a report to the Speaker of the House of Commons relating to the election expenses of candidates, and that report shall stand referred to the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Privileges and Elections for consideration of the appropriateness of the limitation of election expenses of candidates provided in section 61.1 of the Canada Elections Act."

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, before commenting specifically on the bill I note that every time unanimous consent is sought and I have withheld, it has been drawn to the attention of the House. That does not embarrass me in the very least. The fact of the matter is in terms of co-operation I think all hon. members who would be honest with themselves would agree that in passing this bill through the committee no one could have been more co-operative than I. I have taken many steps in order to deal with this bill in a way that suits the disposition of the committee. This particular amendment in motion No. 13 is a further reflection of that disposition.

The motion provides that the Chief Electoral Officer, when making a report on election expenses of candidates at the first general election to which the amended Canada Election Act applies, that the Election Expenses Act contain such a provision to do the same thing in respect of candidates as it does in respect to parties. It is an amendment to make the provisions symmetrical and obtain a report from the Chief Electoral Officer as to the adequacy of the provisions of electoral levels for both parties and candidates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Motion No. 13 (Mr. MacEachen), agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House is now scheduled to consider motion No. 15, on which there is hesitation by the Chair because this motion also goes beyond the scope of the bill as it attempts to amend the parent act. The hon. minister admits that this is so, but also requests the consent of the House to proceed with the motion.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, this matter was not dealt with fully in committee. It was discussed on one occasion by one member who did not come back to the committee. I have gone through all the proceedings. It was not indicated in any of the minutes that the minister was requested to come back with this motion or anything of this nature. Since what this motion effectively tries to do is undo something which is before the courts at the present time, I think we should wait until we have the court decision. For that reason, I withhold unanimous consent.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, this amendment posed by the minister for which he seeks unanimous consent is part of a further commitment he made to political parties on the ad hoc committee. The representatives from the member's own party on that committee were party to the request to the minister for this amendment. The impression in committee was that we could take it for granted there would be unanimous consent for the motion to be presented for debate.

I wish the hon. member who is threatening to withhold unanimous consent would reconsider and consult with the representatives of his own party on this matter. An all-party committee discussed this matter with the officials of the minister and the Chief Electoral Officer. This amendment is the result of this discussion. Surely we should at least have an opportunity to discuss this in the House. I plead with the hon. member to provide unanimous consent for us to deal with it.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I would say that the government is not married to this amendment. It is being brought forward only because of our co-operative disposition in trying to achieve objectives that we felt were in the minds of the members opposite. If there is not a disposition to give unanimous consent, the government will not be particularly aggrieved. We are simply trying to accommodate the will of the opposition in light of the fact that this bill affects every member of parliament. We are not trying to deal with it in a partisan way.

I would make one further point. As to the impact of this amendment on any matters that are before the court, they are totally irrelevant. It has no impact on that question whatsoever. Quite evidently, the government is not married to this proposition. It is prepared to support it if members opposite would like it to be supported in order that we may accommodate the disposition of such matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I believe I am the only member of the House who is actually a member of this ad hoc all-party committee which meets under the chairmanship of the Chief Electoral Officer. We have had a number of discussions on the Roche case, as it has been called. These are the amendments which we came up with and proposed to the government.

While the minister may be correct in saying that the government is not married to these amendments, I can assure hon. members that the political party organizations which exist in Canada are married to these amendments. We regard them as absolutely vital if we are to fight the next election campaign under the election expenses law.

The result of what happened in the Roche case makes it perfectly clear that the meaning of the concepts envisaged in the Election Expenses Act absolutely fall to the ground if anybody can come in and do the kind of thing that was done in that case. Therefore, it would put all organized political parties which have indicated a willingness to abide by the Election Expenses Act into an almost impossible position. That is why we came up with these two additional clauses. That is why I believe the government accepted the recommendation.

I might say that the government had a different kind of proposal, but when it saw what we came up with it backed off its own and went ahead with the one that the all-party ad hoc committee proposed. I would ask hon. members to give unanimous consent to allow this to go forward.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I have sat on the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections since 1973. In preparation for the debate on this bill, I read through each one of the minutes. I find in issue No. 1 for Tuesday, November 8, and Wednesday, November 16, 1977, that the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) queried Mr. J. O. Gorman on pages 18, 19, 20 and 21 about this topic. On pages 18 and 19 of issue No. 2 of the committee I asked something about this.

It is also referred to in issue No. 3 at pages 17 and 18 where the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) discussed this with Mr. Hamel, putting two different types of examples. The Chief Electoral Officer indicated one would be caught by the act as it existed and one would be legal as the act existed. I remember in 1973 we asked that there be a defence allowed in that act. Since the Crown has appealed the decision, I do not think we can say it is not working. It may very well be working. The Crown is sufficiently satisfied that there was a wrong decision at the lower court and that they had a strong enough case to make an appeal.

Mr. Reid: Not the Crown, the Commissioner for Election Expenses.

Mr. Dick: All right, the Commissioner for Election Expenses. I thought that was an agency of the Crown. On that ground, and because of the lack of co-operation I have had from the minister, I feel this is a minor thing and I will withhold my consent on this occasion.

Mr. Benjamin: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may say a word on this same point of order. I hope I can suggest something that might bring peace. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) is not prepared to give the necessary consent to proceed with this motion. However, it has come out of the debate that has taken place that there have been discussions among the representatives of all the parties, including his own, of which he was not aware. I wonder whether there is some way we can stand this matter so that there can be discussions overnight and we can deal with it tomorrow.

Let me right away say this, and I invite the attention to this of the deputy government House leader. I realize that one of the concerns about not getting this bill through the report stage tonight and having to finish the report stage tomorrow is that some members might not be willing to proceed with third reading tomorrow. I want to give the undertaking on behalf of this party that if this report stage is stood over until tomorrow so that we can conclude it then, we will agree to proceed with third reading tomorrow.

We may get no further tomorrow than we can get tonight, but I make my appeal to the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton, not that he change his mind tonight because he has made it pretty firm where he stands, but that he be a party to discussions overnight to see whether there might be consent.

I listened with interest to the point made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), not only about the agreement of all the parties, but that all parties have a stake in it. I would go further and say that the country has a stake in any effort to see to it that a bill that is supposed to put a ceiling on election expenditures actually does it. If we do not cover this, the sky becomes the limit.

I do not blame you, Sir, for getting to the point in your chair, that indicates you want me not to get into the substance. I shall get back to the procedure.

I make an appeal to the House to let this motion stand. We could then go on to motion No. 16 and continue the report stage of this bill tomorrow on the understanding, as far as we are concerned, that third reading will also be proceeded with tomorrow.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I want to make it clear that it is agreeable to us that third reading should be completed immediately following the report stage consideration. I say this so that the deputy government House leader, when considering the suggestion made to him by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), might understand the position we are prepared to take. I hope the hon. gentleman will consider standing the motion on the basis of that undertaking.

Mr. Cafik: If my understanding of what has been said is accurate we would be quite prepared to agree to standing this motion. However, I should like to make sure that my understanding is accurate: there would be an agreement of the House, now, which would allow us to proceed to third reading of this bill tomorrow and to complete third reading tomorrow. If that is the case I am quite prepared to allow motion No. 15 to stand in order to allow the party opposite to consider its position with regard to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The way to evil being paved with half measures perhaps we should make it an order of the House that, notwithstanding deferral of consideration of motion 15 and the completion of the report stage, tomorrow the House would proceed to the adoption of the bill without further delay, completing all its stages.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is the proposition I was making and you are perfectly right in including in that House order that proceedings on the bill should be concluded tomorrow—that Bill C-5 be passed through all stages before the private members' hour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There seems to be agreement. Unless somebody expresses a contrary view, it is so ordered. Motion 15 is accordingly allowed to stand.

Motion No. 15 (Mr. MacEachen) stood.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the consideration of motion No. 16 in the name of the Deputy Prime Minister, and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). This is a motion to which the Royal recommendation is attached. The Chair had reservations as to the procedural acceptability of this motion since it went beyond the scope of the bill and was not relative to the subject matter of the measure as debated on second reading. Nevertheless, since there have been indications that the House might be prepared to give consent I will allow the minister to proceed.

Mr. Cafik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This amendment was considered to be put out of order at committee stage. The government agreed at that time that it was out of order, but in the belief that we are complying with the wish of the committee by proceeding in this way I am seeking unanimous consent for the motion to be put.

Mr. Dick: The essence of this motion was originally conceived by a subcommittee consisting of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins), and myself. A recommendation along those lines was made in April, 1976. I thought it was a very worth-while proposition even though the government failed to put forward its legislation properly on the first occasion. I would certainly like to see this motion adopted and will give my consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will put the motion to the House but in doing so I might mention that since motion No. 18 is consequential upon motion No. 16 a negative decision on motion No. 16 would dispose of both motions.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State for (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, in the name of the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) I move:

Motion No. 16.

That Bill C-5, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be amended by adding immediately after line 37 at page 81 the following new Clause:

"70.1 Section 21 of the said Rules is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(3) Every civilian who is

(a) employed outside Canada by the Canadian Forces as a teacher in a Canadian Forces school or as administrative support staff for such school, and is a Canadian Forces elector qualified and entitled to vote under these Rules."

(b) qualified under the Act as an elector,

A number of representations have been received in connection with this question. Teachers working for National Defence headquarters on bases abroad are not at present allowed to vote, whereas members of the Armed Forces are. Representations have been made on this point by the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East as well as by other hon. members. I myself met with representatives of the Teachers' Federation while this bill was going through committee and indicated that the government was completely in agreement with proposals to correct this anomaly. Hence we have brought forward this amendment not only on behalf of the government but at the request of members on both sides of the House in order that administrators and teachers attached to DND bases abroad may have the right to vote in Canadian elections.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins).

Mr. Epp: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak on motion No. 16 and I am uncertain as to the speaking order. In view of the fact that a government member has just spoken, should he not be followed by an opposition member?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have no objection. I did recognize the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East though, and it would be for him to decide whether to yield to the hon. member or not. It is the prerogative of the Chair to recognize a member when he stands. The hon. member did send a note to the Chair so I had no hesitation about recognizing him—I know he is affected by motion No. 17 which he is proposing.

Mr. Hopkins: In keeping with the good rapport in the committee and having spent 12½ years in the teaching profession, from which members will understand that this is a serious interest of mine, as it is of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and others on the opposition side, even though my motion No. 17 has been ruled out of order I will gladly yield to the hon. member for Provencher on condition I may follow him.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins) for his co-operation this evening. I find it rather odd that I can speak at this hour to my private member's bill, this not being the hour designated for private members' business. I am pleased that the government has accepted the essence of my private member's bill, which was introduced in the last session and given the number C-426. I have resubmitted the bill but it has not been called in this session, and now obviously will not need to be called. It does not have a number as it has not received first reading. As I say, I am gratified that the government and members of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections have finally seen fit to end in Bill C-5 an injustice which has been going on for too long. I agree with the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East that this is an injustice which should have been taken care of a long time ago.

In view of the publicity given to Bill C-426 and the involvement of the Canadian Teachers' Federation, their provincial organizations as well as the Canadian School Trustees' Association, I think certain facts should be placed on the record.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Do I have an undertaking that I will be assured an opportunity to speak following the hon. member for Provencher?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member is directing that question to me. I do not believe it is in my power to give such an assurance; I believe that is the Speaker's role.

The present situation is one in which members of the Armed Forces and their spouses can vote in their home ridings. This has not been the case with teachers, and the argument has been that they were not under contract with the Department of National Defence and thus did not qualify as public service electors. Consequently they did not have the right to vote.

I was made aware of that fact through past involvement as a teacher. Friends of mine teaching abroad, especially in Europe, found they could not vote, so they contacted me and asked me whether I would bring forward a private member's bill which would right this anomaly. This was done and, as I have already said, this proposal was encompassed within Bill C-426, introduced in the last session on June 21, 1977.

Although the teachers we are speaking of worked for the Department of National Defence, under contract with that department, the argument has always been that they were on leave from their school boards and, as a result, when their term of service was completed they would return to the service of their school boards. Therefore they were really in a state of limbo; they simply did not have the right to vote.

We are speaking about a fairly large group of people. I do not have statistics for the present school year, but we are looking at between 400 and 450 electors; I think that is a fairly accurate estimate. We received the support of the Canadian Teachers' Federation and their provincial organizations, as I have said, as well as the Canadian School Trustees' Association.

When one looks at what has transpired one sees the government has in fact been playing footsie with this amendment. It could have amended the Canada Elections Act well before the Election Expenses Act. In a bulletin issued by the Canadian Teachers' Federation dated January 11, 1977, it is stated that they had the understanding that this topic was to be debated in the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections on April 13, 1976. I quote from this bulletin:

For some reason they—

That is, the discussions.

—were sidetracked from any earnest consideration of the problem. The CTF president and the Minister of National Defence have both made subsequent representations to the President of Privy Council.

I should like to quote an extract from a letter from General Quinn, then commander of Canadian forces in Europe, dated December 3, 1976, regarding a bulletin dealing with the topic of federal voting rights. He had this to say in part:

—MND has advised the CTF that he would recommend that the MND support a CTF request to the President of Privy Council to again seek an appropriate amendment to the Canada Elections Act to ensure the franchisement of Canadian teachers serving in our overseas schools.

That was followed up by a letter from the then president of the Canadian Teachers' Federation to the Minister of National Defence asking him to use his good offices to bring in an amendment which would permit teachers under contract with DND to vote. A similar letter was also directed to the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). We have had to wait until today to see what I regard as a legitimate, just, and fair request placed before the House of Commons.

The most interesting correspondence is that sent by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), in his capacity as the then parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence, to the President of Privy Council, dated November 26, 1976. In that letter he had this to say:

It is therefore the request of my minister that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for resolution during this session of parliament. Such action would remove a serious cause of discontent amongst overseas teachers. I am sure you can understand that these individuals find it extremely difficult to comprehend why they cannot vote, when the people with whom they work day by day have the franchise.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi recognizes his own words, so that is an achievement in itself. What should be remembered is that these teachers are assessed income tax. They have had to pay their unemployment insurance premiums and make Canada Pension Plan contributions. To all intents and purposes they were Canadians serving on Canadian Armed Forces bases in the service of their country.

While some might think that this is a rather small victory tonight, I hope the amendment will carry with the unanimous consent of the House and will be an indication of our support for these teachers who are serving their country. I feel that this is an important step in the democratic process. The right to vote is their inalienable right, one that is being recognized at long last.

For myself, I am very pleased that while the government has not seen fit to pass Bill C-426, in essence this is what is happening this evening. I am therefore glad the government has approved that bill.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, as I said previously, as an ex-teacher I wish to thank members on both sides of the House for their continued lobbying and for the good rapport which exists in the adoption of this motion.

● (2142)

I was an elementary schoolteacher for seven years, a principal for four years, a high school teacher for five and one half years, and a vice-principal for one and a half years. In the five and one half years spent at Canadian Forces Base, Petawawa, I came to know many people in the Canadian Armed Forces. After my arrival in Ottawa I became involved in NATO and familiar with the conditions under which people work and live abroad.

What we are dealing with tonight is not an item of partisan politics but rather an item of the basic right of a Canadian to vote in a Canadian election. There are 309 teaching personnel overseas with the Department of National Defence at the present time. Of these, 296 are teachers and people involved in directing staff, and 13 are business administrators, audio-visual technicians, library technicians or administrative assistants. Of the 309 teachers and administrative personnel, 145 are single and 164 are married. There are 26 teaching teams or couples, which leaves a total of 138 spouses. I should like the minister to confirm that the 138 spouses of teachers and their sons or daughters 18 years of age or over will be included as Department of National Defence electors.

People attached to the educational staff of the Department of National Defence who are working abroad should vote in the constituency in which they lived before they left Canada. If this were not the case they would have an advantage that public service electors living abroad do not enjoy at the present time. It must be realized that many of these teachers are still in the employ of their school boards in Canada. Regardless of where they lived in Canada, if they are now attached to DND schools outside Canada, they are deemed to be DND employees and along with their spouses and children should be considered as DND electors.

Sometimes I think we get so involved in partisan debates in this House that we fail to see the real value of the issue at stake. I think it is to the credit of the members on both sides of the House that they have taken up the case of the 447 teachers and spouses living abroad. This does not include sons or daughters 18 years of age or older. We should actually be considering between 475 to 500 electors abroad who are Canadian citizens but who do not have a vote in Canadian elections. This is a great injustice. We sometimes hear the argument that many of these things are difficult to enforce, but there should be no trouble in this case.

Less than a month ago I visited the Canadian Armed Forces in Europe. I was told by military personnel there that there is absolutely no problem in adding these people to the voters list under the term "deemed to be DND electors." In its usual efficient way the Department of National Defence has a record of these employees, their spouses and children, so it is just a matter of adding them to the list of DND electors when they return to Canada.

We discussed earlier the subcommittee which I chaired last year as a member of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I was not satisfied with the decision arrived at regarding the teachers at that time, and followed the matter up with members of the House. I had a motion ready to place before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections but was told there was a possibility it might be out of order because a certain amount of money would be involved in adding names to the DND electors' list and that it would therefore require the royal recommendation.

I put motion No. 17 on the order paper thinking it would be ruled out of order because of the need for the Royal recommendation, but was pleased that the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) saw fit to set down a government motion using my terminology. As a result, we have before us tonight a government motion with the royal recommendation. It has been supported by all parties, which is a demonstration of the democracy of this chamber.

Many efforts have been made in this area in the past, but the result of the debate is what counts in the end. In concluding, I should like to thank all hon. members who took part in the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. Am I to understand that, because of the similarity, the hon. member wishes to withdraw motion No. 17 from the order paper?

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation about withdrawing motion No. 17 if government motion No. 16 is adopted. As I have said, we become so involved in partisan politics that it is nice to see something achieved through unity. I am sure we all support the deputy House leader in this motion, and I hope we will have all-party agreement to adopt it this evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, we support this amendment and, with members of other parties, have been involved in discussion of it. We in the New Democratic Party are happy with this amendment as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. I understand from time to time people other than teachers and school administrators are hired under contract by the Department of National Defence and other departments to work overseas. This amendment should have included those people.

• (2152)

In late 1973, the Canadian National Railways, a Crown corporation, had a contract with the government of Iraq. A fair number of CN engineers and technicians were in Iraq in order to advise its government concerning the construction of a railroad. Those employees resided in that country for a year and lost their ability to cast a ballot during the 1974 election. I see no reason why every Canadian embassy and consulate could not be classed as an advance poll in order that the thousands of Canadians employed by Crown corporations, government departments and private corporations who have assignments overseas can cast a ballot, as is the situation in regard to members of the armed forces.

I hope members of the House will realize that the act should be amended in order to include the people to whom I have referred. I hope this is recommended to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections and eventually results in an amendment.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, in the report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections dated April 29, 1976, there is a word of thanks to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and a number of other hon. members whose worth-while bills were adopted.

There was a great deal of co-operation by all parties in that committee. A subcommittee was chaired by the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins). Even though that hon. member and myself represent people who are resident on the Ontario side of the Ottawa Valley and our constituents are side by side, we do not always agree. All members were happy to serve on this committee and came to the unanimous conclusions which are contained in the report.

At committee stage the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) suggested the possibility of extending this provision to cover more people than just the teachers and administrators of the Department of National Defence. During those discussions we referred to MacMillan-Bloedel out in British Columbia which has salesmen in Australia and Malaysia, as well as other enterprises that have agents overseas for periods of one and two years. In fact at any one particular time there are approximately 250,000 to 300,000 Canadians overseas. It was decided that it would be just too expensive to include all those people.

The people who are overseas on government business and on diplomatic and trade missions can be included because the government is aware of their Canadian residences. We decided to deal with DND people as a block because they are required to put their home residences on a form before leaving the country.

People who travel on leave from university or on sabbatical, or people touring or working with another company overseas, would have to register with the various Canadian embassies abroad. This process was felt to be too expensive. In fact Canada does not have embassies in every country. I am aware some countries utilize this process, but it was regarded as being too expensive. For this reason the subcommittee accepted what the hon. member for Provencher had included in his private member's bill. The standing committee was very harmonious, and we reached an agreement in 1976.

As there is a military base in my riding and a number of my constituents are required to go overseas as administrative civilian support personnel, I am happy to see this adopted.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I have no personal desire to intervene in this debate, but a substantive question was posed by the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins). I seek the unanimous consent of the House to answer that question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This being a motion to amend, the hon. minister does not have the right to reply. Therefore he requires the unanimous consent of the House in order to do so. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East asked a question concerning this amendment. He wanted to know if the spouses and children of those covered under the act, namely, teachers and administrators, were convered as well. In light of the fact that this motion deems them to be employees of the Department of National Defence, they are covered in the same way as spouses and children of members of the Armed Forces in the same circumstances. Therefore the answer is that they are in fact covered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is now on motion No. 16, in the name of the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 16 (Mr. MacEachen) agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As was agreed previously, motion No. 16 affirmatively disposes of motion No. 18.

Motion No. 18 (Mr. MacEachen) agreed to.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to withdraw motion No. 17 and to thank hon. members for their co-operation on motion No. 16.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please, Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins) to withdraw motion No. 17?

Motion No. 17 (Mr. Hopkins) withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The consideration of the report stage of Bill C-5 is now completed, except for motion No. 15 which has been stood by agreement. Under an order of the House, this bill will go through all stages and be adopted tomorrow before private members' hour. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the business of the House. There was some discussion early in the day with respect to motions. Could the deputy House leader inform us whether he put down a motion with respect to external affairs to be debated on Monday or whether he intends to do that on Monday, and also, can he tell us about the adjournment which he and I discussed earlier?

Mr. Cafik: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In light of the agreement of the House and the House order with respect to the final disposition of Bill C-5, I think that is a reasonable request and I assure the House that I will do everything possible to have both those motions brought in tomorrow, if they are prepared. I will do whatever I can this evening and early tomorrow morning to make such arrangements, if that can be done.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—IMPRISONMENT IN SOVIET UNION OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY—EFFORTS TO OBTAIN RELEASE

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, communism and capitalism are two different theories of production and distribution of goods. Capitalism has produced enormous advances in economic standards that have occurred throughout the industrial revolution. It is an efficient system which also encourages human enterprise, freedom, and mobility. But for many around the world the communist model has been the attractive one. Embodied perhaps in its noblest form in the constitution of the Soviet Union, it purports to protect the freedom of the individual, freedom of religion, of association of movement; it grants economic and social rights far beyond even the official guarantees of the citizen in Canada. It is a document of great vision which, since the 1920's, attracted many even in Canada who saw it as an enormous advance over tsarist feudalism and repression.

The story of how the Russian revolution was perverted is one of the great tragedies of human history, a tragedy whose end might even be the destruction of modern civilization. Yet so great is the hypocrisy of the modern tsars who rule from the Kremlin that they continue to hold forth their model constitution and to enter into accords like the Helsinki Agreement, binding themselves to respect the basic human rights of their citizens, with no intention of doing anything more than they happen to consider convenient.

Anatoly Shcharansky is a young Soviet Jew who wants to go to Israel. He is a Soviet citizen who stood up to ask for his constitutional rights to go to his historic homeland to join his Israeli wife who came to this parliament in Ottawa last month to ask for our help. Last Saturday some members met with 30 Shcharansky relatives, most of whom live in my constituency, who all asked our help for their relative. It was Anatoly Shcharansky who also undertook to monitor in the Soviet Union his country's compliance with the Helsinki Agreement. He did in the Soviet Union what I am doing in Canada as a member of the Helsinki Review Committee of this parliament. These are his only apparent crimes.

On March 16 of this year he was arrested, and that was the last anyone outside prison has seen of him. No contact has been permitted, no charges have been laid, no defence has been allowed. In Canada a person can be held prisoner in jail for seven days without being charged. In the Soviet Union nine months are permitted, and these nine months end today, December 15, for Anatoly Shcharansky.

Every week his mother, who is now 70 years old, visited the prison in Moscow for contact or news of her son. What part of the establishment of communism is it to deny an old woman any news of her son? Because he is Jewish, because he wants to go to Israel or wants his civil rights?

On Monday Canada officially offered landed immigrant status to Anatoly Shcharansky.

Today the answer came in the form of a Reuter's press release from Moscow announcing that the nine-month investigation will be continued for another six months. So much for human rights; so much for the constitution; so much for the Helsinki Agreement. The Canadian government cannot accept this treatment of Shcharansky. Human rights are international; we are one family. Mr. Shcharansky's relatives in Canada have asked their government to raise the Shcharansky case and to make a specific recommendtion on his behalf to tie his case to the Helsinki Agreement, and I am asking, for those relatives, that the government do so.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I commend my hon. colleague for his concern for the fate of Mr. Anatoly Shcharansky. He is in good company because no less than 60 hon. members have sent letters or made representations to the minister in this regard. As the hon. member indicated a few minutes ago, many of our colleagues met with Mrs. Shcharansky ten or 15 days ago.

The minister informed the House on December 12, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), that he had called the Soviet ambassador and made representations to him about the Shcharansky case. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) drew the ambassador's attention to the broad concern being expressed about the case in Canada, and said that in the interests of detente and of relations between our two countries Canada would be prepared to accept Mr. Shcharansky, should the Soviets decide to allow him to leave the Soviet Union.

The government has met with Mr. Shcharansky's relatives in Canada who are willing to sponsor his admission to this country, and we would, of course, expedite his entry into Canada.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—REASON FOR FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR CANADIAN SUPERIOR OIL TO DRILL IN DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, this evening I want to pursue a question I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) on December 8 relating to an export development loan or insurance guarantee of some $25 million to Superior Oil of Canada Limited as insurance for its exploration activities in the Dominican Republic.

My concern is that we are using public money in a fashion which will not benefit Canadians, contrary to what the minister claims. The minister argues that this insurance of $25 million is necessary to encourage Superior Oil to drill for oil in a central American country and that, without this insurance guarantee, Superior Oil and other companies would not undertake this exploration.

The government has a stated policy of self-reliance in energy, and if we are to take the government seriously it should be expanding efforts to explore for oil here in Canada rather than helping companies to do so outside our boundaries. The minister argues that because of this contract we might have a guaranteed supply of oil in the future, if Superior finds it in the Dominican Republic.

First, let us find out who Superior Oil is. Superior Oil Canada is owned by Superior Oil of the United States. It is a subsidiary of an American oil corporation. Superior Oil of the United States is owned by MacIntyre Mines, which owns Falconbridge in the Sudbury area. As we all know, Falconbridge recently announced that it is laying off employees because of the so-called slack in the nickel market throughout the world. It is interesting that, like Inco, Falconbridge is undertaking development of nickel mines in Third World countries, particularly Guatemala and other central American countries, and that the use of oil is a very important process in the development of the nickel industry. I wonder if there is not some consideration beyond merely supplying Canada with oil in this deal which has been worked out. However, what worries me most is the assumption by the minister that somehow we are going to have a guarantee of oil in the future.

If it is necessary to give a $25 million insurance policy to Superior Oil, I think there is some doubt as to a guaranteed supply of oil from the Dominican Republic. The insurance policy provides that if Superior Oil is interrupted because the Dominican Republic either nationalizes the oil wells or holds back on export permits, then Superior can claim the loss in terms of drawing on this insurance policy. The minister says on the one hand that we will have a guaranteed supply of oil. If it is so guaranteed, why is it necessary to give Superior this insurance policy against interruption of supply? It seems to me there is a contradiction here and that conceivably, in the future, because of the political instability in the Dominican Republic, we could end up with no oil coming from the Dominican Republic. Therefore the Canadian taxpayer has lost out on the supply of oil as well as the insurance in the amount of $25 million issued to Superior Oil through the Export Development Corporation.

This seems to me to be a very questionable venture at a time when we have a policy of self-sufficiency in oil. We should be directing our energy and dollars to stimulating exploration here in Canada. Also, because of the activity of multinational corporations, particularly in the nickel mining industry and the relationship that Falconbridge has to Superior Oil, I do not think that deals of this kind should be worked out, considering the callous disregard for the workers of the Sudbury area by companies such as Falconbridge and others.

I would like the parliamentary secretary to explain to me why the minister keeps on saying this is going to be a guaranteed supply of oil for Canadians. The very existence of this insurance policy and terms indicate to me there is some doubt that the oil is guaranteed.

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Canadian Superior Oil Limited, located in Calgary, Alberta, can rightly be considered as one of the major companies dealing with exploration and development of oil and natural gas in Canada. In 1976, the company achieved an ambitious exploration and development program, particularly in the province of Alberta. Their operations have set a record in 1976. They took part in the drilling and the opening of 210 wells, including 96 at the prospection stage, and 114 at the development stage. Those wells were distributed as follows: 202 in Alberta, four in British Columbia, three in the Northwest Territories and one in Saskatchewan. Canadian Superior Oil Ltd. has also taken part in the drilling of 52 wells in various foreign countries.

They intend to follow this dynamic exploration program in Canada as well as throughout the world whenever the economic and geographic situation is favourable. The company has shown a rapid growth during the past years. Therefore, its operating capital has increased from $44 million in 1972 to $147 million in 1976. It paid $32 million in taxes in 1976 as compared to $5 million in 1973. Projections for 1977 are much greater still.

Since its inception 30 years ago, Canadian Superior Oil Ltd. has accomplished tremendous technical progress in the exploration for and development of hydrocarbons. In order to take full advantage of the talents of its 440 Canadian employees, the company expanded its operations to the international scene some years ago. To remain competitive in an area that is so competitive, the company must seize every promising opportunity that comes along, both in Canada and abroad. The international nature of its operations exposes it to foreign techniques for hydrocarbons exploration, thereby enabling it to develop some technical expertise for its Canadian exploration programs. This is most significant in this day and age, in view of the increasing difficulty of oil detection and extraction in Canada. The use of the most sophisticated techniques available has become an essential feature, if we are to simply obtain oil and gas self-sufficiency in Canada at some point.

The production sharing agreement signed by Canadian Superior Oil Ltd. with the Dominican Republic is another opportunity for Canada to sell geophysical and drilling services, and if the well proves commercially productive, it will offer opportunity for selling Canadian equipment.

Adjournment Debate

MANPOWER—LAY-OFFS AT LABRADOR LINERBOARD MILL—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ALLEVIATE EFFECTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the many members who are here tonight are aware of the number of times I have raised this serious problem which has arisen in my district as a result of the closure of the Labrador linerboard mill. I raise it again tonight because the situation is worsening. It is worsening because I cannot seem to get anyone on the government side to realize that there are other industries which were dependent to a great extent on the mill and that they should be protected. They should be monitored before they fall by the wayside.

Not only are the service industries suffering, but there is now a serious effect on the retail stores and other small businesses in that thriving community. It is vitally important that, rather than accept the shock that came about as a result of the closure of the mill—and the government accepts it laying down waiting for the problem to resolve itself—increased efforts should be directed toward these small businesses which are now feeling the effects of a depressed economy.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) indicated the type of assistance that has been given by way of mobility grants and retraining programs. While it is appreciated, it does not solve the problem which exists. In a way it tends to contradict the objectives we should be trying to reach.

Mobility funds are fine, but the workers in Stephenville and the surrounding area want to stay at home. Many have built expensive homes and have established roots. They now have to pull up stakes. In many cases families will be broken up. Homes built at inflated prices will now have to be sold at a loss. Many are mortgaged and have high monthly payments which these people cannot afford.

The retraining assistance is also appreciated, but for what are these people being retrained? They are being retrained for jobs that do not exist. My district has the highest rate of unemployment in all of Canada.

Another feature of the efforts of Manpower which the minister mentioned is the financial assistance available under the emergency response feature of the Canada Works Program. However, he indicated it is premature to apply for assistance because the employees are receiving severance pay. The minister is wrong on two counts.

First, the majority of the workers did not receive severance pay, or only received a small percentage of it. Second, the minister is wrong in expressing the attitude of leaving the matter until it becomes an emergency instead of having a contingency plan in place now. What is required is what I suggested almost a year ago, a year before the mill closed. There was every opportunity to make plans, but my warnings went unheeded. It has been obvious for the past two years that the mill was ready to close and was being kept in operation only by the continuing attempt of the provincial government to save, at great cost, the jobs involved.

The government had at its disposal every means to save the situation. The extensive area surrounding the mill, which is situated in the Harmon complex, was the location of a massive strategic air base left to the province by the United States together with many millions of dollars worth of facilities of every type suitable for the establishment of appropriate agencies of government. There was, as I suggested last year, plenty of opportunity to decentralize those agencies.

Let me mention some which I had in mind. They included the establishment of a marine training centre, the establishment of a segment of the air search and rescue operation, the establishment of a segment of the coast guard college and of a segment of the fisheries college. What a blow it was when, after a meeting on the spot in which government representatives had expressed their concern about the situation, the government failed to take any action to move a single agency to the area. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the meeting to which I have referred took place only one week before the announcement of the government's great decentralization program.

Time does not permit me to describe the advantages of such moves as I have suggested, moves which could have been made at little cost to the treasury. I can only appeal to the minister, through his parliamentary secretary and through his colleagues, to look at this whole question again with a determination to give sympathetic consideration to the needs of the small industries which still exist in the area and which are doing their best against every sort of handicap. Special consideration should be given to such industries when determining the help which can be extended through the various programs the government talks about in connection with small business.

I appeal to the parliamentary secretary to try to understand the consequences of the destruction of an industry in circumstances which I tried to bring to his attention in a reasonable way, not in the way some have approached him following the closing down of other industries. I trust the government will do everything it can to help a community in which the unemployment rate is so high and the state of the economy is so depressed.

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as all hon. members know, department officials went to work as soon as the announcement of that lay-off reached them in April 1977. Indeed, in late April and early May the officers of our Manpower Consultative Service met on various occasions with management and union delegates as well as the representatives of the provincial Department of Manpower and Industrial Relations. Those meetings enabled the parties involved to reach on behalf of the affected workers a first agreement to promote manpower studies on May 9, 1977, to which a final agreement was added in September 1977. Under the guidelines of the Manpower Consultative Service, management and the union continued to work as if through a manpower rehabilitation committee which the commission assists financially by paying half of the research, planning and consultation costs. The committee uses all the means available to it to help the workers affected. Indeed, it uses a whole series of public or private programs and calls on the expertise of technical advisors.

The commission allocated $25,000 under its Manpower Consultative Service to deal with the linerboard mill problem. Besides our Manpower Consultative Service the hon. member for Humber-St.-George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) undoubtedly knows that, since last April at which time the provincial government informed it that the linerboard mill was going to close down, the commission has been actively trying to help through its services and programs the affected workers and has not stopped doing so. First, a Canada Manpower Centre was opened in the linerboard mill to help workers register and make the benefit of our programs and services more readily available to them. On November 25, 1977, 402 of the 588 salaried workers involved are still registered for our programs and services; 208 were directed toward jobs; 38 were found jobs; 118 received financial assistance under the manpower mobility incentive program; 59 were recommended for courses under our training program; and finally, the employment applications of the 95 other workers are posted in all Canada Manpower Centres where job opportunities suitable to their qualifications might be found.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we shall continue our concerted efforts in favour of the other workers who have been affected by these lay-offs. There is hope that someone else may purchase or operate the linerboard mill very shortly. If this hope does not become a reality or if the new owner cannot hire enough of the former employees, we shall help them more through the emergency response feature which has been provided for similar cases. I want to say once more to all hon. members that all the resources of my department have been put at the disposal of the workers of the Labrador linerboard mill who needed them and all other groups of wage earners who are affected by lay-offs or the closing down of plants in Canada, and that they will remain at their disposal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

PROPOSED INCREASED WRITE-OFF OF EXPENSES FOR PROMOTION OF EXPORT SALES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As it is essential that this country overcome its $11.5 billion a year trade deficit in manufactured goods and as this can only be done if we greatly increase our sales efforts abroad and let far more people in the world market know what this country has to offer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott):

That the government allow producers to write off 200 per cent of all expenses connected with making sales trips abroad, displaying their products at foreign trade fairs and any other expenses incurred in sales promotion in the export market and any other expenses incurred in sales promotion in the export market in excess of those made in the base year—the year before the plan goes into operation.

Such a program would greatly increase our sales effort in the export market—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is permitted to put his motion forward but not to argue it. The motion can be presented to the House at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. Member: No!

SUGGESTION SYNCRUDE NOT INTERFERE WITH UNION ORGANIZATIONAL ACTIVITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Workers being interviewed for jobs at Syncrude, which is partly owned by the federal government, are being told the plant will operate without unions. Since this appears to contravene the Alberta Labour Code and federal government labour policy, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House advise the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to instruct Syncrude officials that they are not to interfere with normal union organisation within the plant.

Mr. Speaker: The motion having been raised under the provisions of Standing Order 43, can only be put to the House with unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF GREEN PAPER ON FREEDOM OF ACCESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43. It deals with matters of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the need to obtain recommendations concerning legislation affecting government secrecy and clarifying issues of security and ministerial responsibility. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the Green Paper on legislation on public access to government documents be referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can only be put to the House with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTION GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME BE ESTABLISHED AT POVERTY LINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of extremely urgent and pressing necessity.

In March 1977, the Senate indicated that a single person with a $3,981 income was on the poverty line. Since old age security pensioners of single status are receiving only $261.06 a month or $3,132.72 year, which is $848.28 a year below the poverty line, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

Social Security

That the House urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to increase the old age security pension, the guaranteed income supplement and the spouse's allowance, so that they may reach at least the poverty line.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

STATUS OF WOMEN

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FEMALE EMPLOYEES BY BRITISH AMERICAN BANK NOTE COMPANY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a motion under Standing Order 43. I would direct it particularly to the attention of the Minister of Justice who is responsible for the administration of the Bill on Human Rights and to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations who is also responsible for the status of women. I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House deplores the discrimination against women being practised by the British American Bank Note Company in its refusal to pay wages to its female employees equal to those it pays to its male employees, and this House calls on the Minister of Justice and the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women to make it known that if this practice is not corrected the federal government will have to cease doing business with the said company, it being the view of this House that our laws respecting discrimination against women must be upheld.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the inflation rate is constantly going up, to the great prejudice of low wage earners and the needy; considering as well that low wage earners, the unemployed and welfare recipients have no protection against rising inflation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

[Mr. Laprise.]

That this House urge the government and the Minister of National Health and Welfare to bring forth the annual guaranteed income program and that this income be indexed to the cost of living.

SUGGESTED LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR MANDATORY REPORTING OF CORPORATIONS AGREEING TO BOYCOTTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of the same order. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) on October 21, 1976 stated in this House that:

Canadian firms may decide nonetheless to agree to certain boycott clauses and forego Canadian government support for the projects concerned. All Canadian firms, however, whether they accept boycott clauses or not will be required to report all instances of their complying with boycott provisions. Information obtained from such reports will be made available to the public.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has stated outside the House that he has no plans to make such a list public and would not indicate how many companies the department has found signing contracts with boycott clauses, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That legislation be introduced prior to the Christmas adjournment which requires mandatory reporting of Canadian corporations which agree with Arab boycott clauses.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF GREEN PAPER ON FREEDOM OF ACCESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Basford: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River moved a motion without discussion with the House leader. There has not been that discussion and if it were moved again it would be agreed to by this side.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would, of course, require the unanimous consent of the House to ask for unanimous consent a second time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Then if it is agreed, the motion that the hon. member for Peace River put earlier was:

That the green paper on legislation on public access to government documents be referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments.

I understand that the motion was moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). The House has heard the terms of the motion and it can be presented at this time pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, there has been some discussion which indicates that there might be agreement reached, at this time of Christmas and all that goes with Christmas, to arrange time for debate. I think the understanding is that it will be a short debate. The time, the method, the number of speakers and so on will be discussed. We have no willingness on this side to have a long debate, but I think there should be some discussion about the debate between all the House leaders. So would Your Honour simply let the motion stand? There will be the usual discussions, out of which will flow some tremendous arrangement.

Mr. Speaker: Then I think for neatness we had better deal with it on the basis that, pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion has now been presented in the regular way. It is moved by the hon. member for Peace River, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. The motion is now in the possession of the House and I think debate on the motion ought to be adjourned at this time. Equally, it could carry now without debate.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to pass this motion right away. If the opposition wants to talk out the motion or to find some way of not putting this matter before the committee, that is for them, but we are anxious to have it referred to committee. Why does not the House agree to pass the motion right now without debate?

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

● (1117)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister is not aware of the discussions that have taken place between the deputy House leader (Mr. Cafik) and myself with respect to this debate. They have proceeded most cordially. I would like to inform the Prime Minister through you, sir, that there will be one speaker from each side in the debate at a time to be arranged. Because third reading of Bill C-5 may be reached today on consent, perhaps we might be able to do it later this day. I know that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the deputy House leader agree that the whole purpose is to ensure that this matter reach the committee as quickly as possible. I deemed it wise to inform the Prime Minister of this arrangement in the event he has not had a chance to consult his colleagues.

An hon. Member: Perhaps he is too dumb to understand it.

Mr. Speaker: We are now well into the question period. In the circumstances we ought to consider that it has been moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), seconded by Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton), that this debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt that motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The question period will terminate at approximately three minutes past twelve.

REPORTING OF COMPANIES COMPLYING WITH BOYCOTTS—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF CONFLICTING STATEMENTS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. My question is to the Prime Minister. On the 21st of October, 1976, the Secretary of State for External Affairs took the time of the House on motions to state the government's position on economic boycotts and I quote:

All Canadian firms, however, whether they accept boycott clauses or not, will be required to report all instances of their complying with boycott provisions. Information obtained from such reports will be made available to the public.

Yesterday, outside of the House, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that it is not the plan of his department to make public information concerning Canadian firms complying with boycott provisions. Sir, we have a situation here where two ministers of the Crown have made directly contradictory statements. I would like to ask the Prime Minister which minister speaks for the government on this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Leader of the Opposition were to look at the full statement and the debate which followed, he would understand that there is no inconsistency. In fact, there is still a problem to be resolved with regard to publication. The difficulty, and it also has been expressed by some members opposite, was whether the names of companies which had been invited to participate in the boycott and had declined to do so should be published, since they had done nothing that was either improper or regarded as being illegal or reprehensible. Therefore, there is discussion presently going on between myself and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other colleagues to resolve the issue in the manner I have outlined.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, there is clearly a problem to be resolved. The problem is within the Government of Canada because they cannot agree on their policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REPORTING OF COMPANIES COMPLYING WITH BOYCOTTS—REASON FOR DELAY IN PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The Secretary of State for External Affairs, who seems to be answering the question because the Prime Minister does not want to, will recall the Deputy Minister for Industry, Trade and Commerce in January of this year promised that there would be a report published twice yearly relating to the firms that are affected by this policy position. That undertaking was given in January. It is now December and there is still no report. Is it still the policy of the government to make that kind of a report on a semi-annual basis? And, if so, where is the report?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as to the preparation or the current status of that particular report. I know that a good deal of work has been done on it. Incidentally, I do not believe it necessarily needs to be a matter of argument. I return to the fundamental point. There is a question of how this can be dealt with in a manner fair to those who are dealing with countries which have boycott clauses, but which have not themselves done anything that is improper or in any way regarded by this House or by Canada as being an offensive type of action.

I suspect if the hon. members wish to have a reasonable discussion on how this matter can be dealt with, and at the same time indicate our abhorrence of the kinds of boycotts which all of us on this side and members opposite have always referred, then there is no good reason that we should not talk about it in a reasonable way. When the report is completed, I appreciate it should be dealt with, and we should carry through on our commitment. The matter is not a matter of saying how many have complied or otherwise with the boycott, or how many have been asked to comply. Strictly, it is a matter of finding out which companies have no reason to be reprimanded publicly and perhaps misunderstood publicly.

Hon. members opposite have claimed that we should not be doing anything which will make it difficult for companies to expand their export operations and the like or, in fact, to hurt their business within the country.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Jamieson: Hon. members may laugh at this, but I tell you—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REPORTING OF COMPANIES COMPLYING WITH BOYCOTTS—STATEMENT BY TRADE MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, obviously the minister has as much trouble speaking for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as he does staying on both sides of this question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I should like to ask the Prime Minister, since this is a policy question, whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was speaking on behalf of the government and stating government policy, when he said yesterday that in relation to the publication of lists of companies found signing contracts with boycott clauses "that kind of thing, when we're trying to promote world trade, is something we don't want to get into". Was the minister speaking for the government when he made that statement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that was the first question the hon. Leader of the Opposition asked. He asked who was speaking for the government, and I told him it was the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Clark: We have just had such a repudiation of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that he is ashamed to show his face in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Members opposite seem to feel if they shout enough they will draw the hon. minister back. We will see if he has the courage to return after being repudiated by the Prime Minister on the floor of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REPORTING OF COMPANIES COMPLYING WITH BOYCOTTS—AVAILABILITY OF REPORT AND DATE OF PUBLICATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the position of the government on this question of principle remains very, very unclear, would he tell the House whether the policy announced by the minister has been carried out and whether firms have been required to report? Are those reports in the hands of the government? If they are, will the information be made public immediately as the minister undertook in his statement of October 21, 1976?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has compiled a list and there has been a reporting procedure. There was no attempt on anybody's part to disguise this, and it came out in the debate at the time that making the information public is not the difficulty. The difficulty is whether individual firms will be identified as complying with the boycott or merely asked to comply with the boycott.

The hon. member has referred to a difference of opinion on this side of the House. Many members on his side have told me also that they understand this quandary and, in fact, spoke for companies that were concerned that they might be identified when they had committed no offence.

To return to my basic point, if the House is satisfied with declaring without identification that X number of companies have complied, or those that have been asked to comply, I do not believe that creates a serious problem. The problem is whether companies are identified, when there is no particular reason for them to be identified publicly in that way, because they have committed no particular offence.

REPORTING OF COMPANIES COMPLYING WITH BOYCOTTS—ALLEGATION ONLY TWO NAMED

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If the minister has worked as closely as he claims with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, can he confirm that there are only two names of companies on the list. Can he confirm that?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm that in specific terms, because I have not seen any list in recent days or recent weeks. I know there are a minimum number of companies which have been involved in this particular exercise in any way.

REASON FOR DELAY IN REPORTING COMPANIES COMPLYING WITH BOYCOTTS—POSSIBILITY EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION EXCLUDED

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): We understand this report has been on the desk of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce since September, but we cannot understand why, if it has been in his possession for so long, it has not been released. Does it contain information supplied by the Export Development Corporation or is this Crown corporation excluded from the government guidelines?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. The Export Development Corporation, as the statement which was made in the House some 14 months ago clearly states, is obliged to follow the guidelines as they relate to the boycott and the anti-boycott provision.

Oral Questions

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLEGATION NAVIGATION ORDERS DISOBEYED—GOVERNMENT POSITION—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Will the minister confirm that the existing air navigation orders issued by his department to ensure the safety of the public travelling by air have been disobeyed on numerous occasions in the past by regional and national airlines, thereby jeopardizing public safety?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is asking whether a whole body of regulations has on occasion been breached, the answer clearly is yes. Indeed, charges have been laid and occasional action taken to suspend certificates. I am not quite sure from the general question what the hon. member has in mind. Perhaps he could be more specific.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I asked in my question to the minister about air navigation orders. In my supplementary question to the minister I should like to ask him, in view of the revelations of the Carswell-Slaughter investigation of breaches of air safety regulations in northwestern Ontario, an example of irregularities by the national airline which was brought to the minister's attention by the National Dispatchers' Association, as well MOT investigation into the 1976 crash of an Air West airplane in British Columbia which concluded that the carrier did not meet safety standards and that Transport Canada's monitoring of the carrier's operations was inadequate, whether the minister will now admit that the situation is serious enough to warrant a full public inquiry into air safety regulations and their application across Canada?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. The fact of the matter is that the investigation had revealed certain deficiencies which should have been corrected and steps have been taken to correct them. Obviously, there will be breaches of regulations, including air navigation orders by some individual operators. I would not want to join the hon. member in making it sound as though air carriers flagrantly abused the regulations, and I would even want to emphasize that it is completely untrue and unfair to carriers to suggest that they are frequently engaged in activities which are unsafe. The fact of the matter is that our standards in our air navigation orders are very high. That is the standard we want observed, but a breach of the air navigation orders in those circumstances may not always involve a high risk but only a failure to attain our very high standards. We still attempt to observe them and we are amending our air navigation orders where required to do so. We are appointing additional inspectors and we are following other recommendations which were made by our investigators who did a very thorough job.

ALLEGED FAILURE TO ENFORCE SAFETY REGULATION—REASON FOR DELAY IN ADOPTING RECOMMENDED IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): I have evidence of serious breaches in the regulations on a nationwide basis, not just related to northwestern Ontario.

I should like to ask the minister if he can explain why, after complaints were lodged with his department as early as in 1972 by the Canadian Airline Dispatchers' Association and the review of procedures was begun, the new regulations entitled "Acceptable Means of Compliance with Operational Control Requirements" completed in 1976 have not yet been implemented? Is the minister bowing to pressure from the airlines?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Not at all, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, while dispatchers may have registered complaints about some regulations in 1972, it was only seven or eight days ago that I visited with them and had a long meeting to discuss the problem. I assured them I would take a personal interest in the question which had not been brought to my attention before. If the hon. member has additional evidence of difficulties I hope he will bring them to my attention rather than simply making broad allegations. Having heard from the dispatchers, I am looking into the matter and will take appropriate steps if there is any problem which needs to be solved.

POSSIBILITY OF AIDING SOUTH SHORE REGION OF QUEBEC—POSSIBILITY OF REPRESENTATIONS BY LOCAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

A few months ago Quebec and Ottawa signed an agreement. Commenting on it, the minister stated that the south shore region might benefit from it, for instance by way of access roads to forest areas and the like. Can the minister tell the House whether he has received any requests from organizations of this region concerning the program which had been outlined by him as regards forest areas?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember personally such requests from the region mentioned by the hon. member. It is possible that representations were made in the last few weeks to our offices in Quebec city. However, possibly some groups in that region did communicate with the Quebec Office de planification du développement or with the Quebec department of lands and forests on this subject. Then, I shall inquire and communicate again with the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. Could the minister tell the House if there are other projects, besides those mentioned earlier, which have been proposed by south shore area organizations to launch new industries or expand the ones already existing?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, in the course of our recent negotiations there have been discussions and proposals concerning assistance to some infrastructures to accommodate industries in this part of the lower St. Lawrence area. Decisions are to be made very soon at both government levels and some proposals which were made to us might be accepted.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED REFLECTION ON UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR ENDERS—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question concerning the ambassador of the United States, Mr. Enders, whose professional stature is reflected in the fact that having been appointed ambassador to Canada under a Republican administration he was retained by the Carter Democratic administration. On Wednesday the Prime Minister said that the Minister of Agriculture was speaking for the government when he complained about certain viewpoints expressed by the ambassador in speeches in Canada. This statement by the Prime Minister, if allowed to stand, will unfortunately diminish—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Roche: Did the Prime Minister intend to diminish the usefulness of Mr. Enders? I would ask the Prime Minister to clarify this most important matter.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Gladly, Mr. Speaker. I think I made it quite clear by my answer to the supplementary question that I consider Mr. Enders is free to state publicly in Canada the views that represent those of his government just as I would want our ambassadors abroad to express their views. I think Mr. Enders has been doing it consistently, and there has never been any complaint officially or any note sent to Washington from this government. I added that a minister is perfectly free to disagree, just as any other member of this House would be free to disagree with Mr. Enders. I had not and I still have not read the speech of the Minister of Agriculture. He may have used language which is colourful and which he frequently uses in this House. I am standing by the position that the Minister of Agriculture is free to criticize and disagree with Mr. Enders, but that Mr. Enders was perfectly entitled to speak for his government and to continue to do so.

Mr. Roche: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it from that answer that the Prime Minister wishes to remove the cloud that has been cast over Mr. Enders. May I ask if it is the policy of the government that ministers of the Crown can publicly complain about the expressed viewpoint of ambassadors without reducing their credibility and hence calling into question the effectiveness of their representation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would be surprised if the opposition agreed with the right of anybody to disagree with an ambassador who is speaking for his country. The interests of Canada are not necessarily those of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: There is certainly no intention to cast a cloud over Mr. Enders' capabilities or his ability to speak for his government. I made it clear in my answer that I considered he was a gentleman and was doing his duty just as I would want our ambassadors to do their duty. Too many ambassadors try to be popular in the country to which they are delegated. I do not think that is their job; they are there to represent the countries from which they come, not the countries to which they go. I respect Mr. Enders for taking the positions he does if they are those of his government. I just do not think we should be shy or embarrassed about disagreeing with him.

Mr. Roche: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With respect to the desired popularity on the part of ambassadors in Canada, would the Prime Minister outline for the House the guidelines that ambassadors should follow with respect to their conduct?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the Prime Minister wishes to do that or if the House wishes to have the information it will have to be obtained in some other way.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FLIP PROGRAM—WEEKLY RATE OF PAY—COST OF ADMINISTERING PROGRAM

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the President of the Treasury Board with reference to the announcement made yesterday about the creation of 157,000 man-months of work at a cost of $150 million. Is the minister in a position to advise—and I am sure much study has gone into this proposal—what the weekly rate of pay will be for the individuals who are to be employed? Will it be in the vicinity of what was paid under LIP or Canada Works?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Boa !): Mr. Speaker, the intention is to pay the going rate in the particular locality for the type of job being done. Generally speaking, this will be maintenance, labour or clerical work and the wages will reflect the going rate in the area. Some of the projects may require experienced or skilled personnel, so it will vary. I could not give an average rate except to say it will be the going rate in the area for the particular skill or trade required.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that 157,000 man-months of work divided into $150 million is $955 per month or $11,500 per year, which comes to slightly under $6 an hour, can the minister give an idea of how much money will be used for administrative purposes? Will it be 40 per cent of $150 million or something in that vicinity?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to evade the question as I think it is pertinent, but the 15 departments and the several programs or projects within them are so varied and diverse that I cannot give the House or the hon. member a simple formula such as the percentage of the gross amount that will be devoted to administration and material. Those are the factors plus capital costs and the hon. member has arrived at an hourly rate by simple division. He has also indicated that he recognizes there will be other deductions—some administrative costs, capital costs, material costs, and some will be for straight labour, but some projects will require some material investment for the project to go forward.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REASON PUBLICITY OF FEDERAL DEPARTMENT NOT BROADCAST

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montreal-Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State responsible for the CBC. As he left his seat a few moments ago, I will direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The Secretary of State for the CBC having resumed his seat, I will now put my question to him.

On November 29, I directed a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion concerning the publicity of his department broadcast only on some private networks in Montreal. Could the Secretary of State tell us whether he has considered the matter. If so, has he spoken to the CBC and can he tell the House the results of the inquiry concerning that publicity only be given on private networks?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have raised the matter with the CBC and they are reconsidering the criteria involved.

TRANSPORT

INCREASED TOLLS ON ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—SUGGESTION INCREASE BE MADE IN STAGES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the proposed increases in the tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway which I understand are to be implemented shortly after the first of the year. Having regard to the widespread opposition to the increases, in some cases increases of over 100 per cent, and given the fact that the increases will have a disruptive effect upon Canadian industry and will in all likelihood divert some of the traffic from the seaway, I wonder if the government is giving any reconsideration to implementing these rather alarming increases and, if not, is the government at least considering the possibility of staging the increases rather than having the impact brought to bear in one fell swoop?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as usual, we have been taking careful note of the views of those who are affected. While we recognize the smallness of the impact compared with the total cost of transportation, the increase in value of goods and the fact that there have been no increases for almost 20 years, we are aware of the concerns some people have voiced about the impact and perhaps even the psychological impact, and we have been taking that into account in our discussions with the United States. A decision is now very close, but I cannot say whether it will be announced in a matter of hours or days.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, am I to take it then that talks have been going on with the United States counterparts, that initiatives have been taken by the U.S. counterparts and that the suggestion in fact came from the U.S. government as far as the staging process is concerned?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think it would only be fair to say that, yes, discussions have been taking place. I have had discussions with Secretary Adams of the United States. Similar representations have been made to both of us, and I think our reactions to those representations have been quite similar as well. However, beyond that I will not go.

RESOURCES

NICKEL—POSSIBILITY FEDERAL REPRESENTATIVES WILL APPEAR BEFORE ONTARIO COMMITTEE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Charlie McCarthy of the cabinet. In view of the fact that the Ontario provincial government has set up a special legislature committee to look into the nickel industry in Ontario vis-à-vis the recent actions of INCO and Falconbridge in laying off some 4,000 workers in the Sudbury basin, in view of the fact that the federal government has a vital stake in the nickel industry in Canada because of its resource taxation policies and since the federal government has already taken some responsibility in this area with the special internal report by the Department of the Environment regarding highgrading of nickel in the Sudbury basin, can the minister tell the House if his department intends to appear before the special committee to discuss its views and approaches to the nickel industry and, if not, why not?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to find out whether we have received any request from the select committee.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I did not ask the minister if he received a request. I asked whether he has taken any initiatives to ensure that his department appears before that committee to present the views of this government regarding a very vital resource which affects not only Canadians from coast to coast but specifically the workers in the Sudbury basin. I wish the minister would not assume such an insensitive and callous attitude.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have already explained to the House and to the hon. member on previous occasions that I took a number of initiatives some weeks ago with respect to the minister responsible in the Ontario government; not the select committee, the minister responsible. I should be meeting with him very shortly, and I hope it will be possible for the two governments to come together with a plan of action which will help solve some of the problems about which the hon. member is so concerned and about which we on this side of the House are very concerned.

NICKEL—SUGGESTION INDUSTRY OFFICIALS APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE TO EXPLAIN OPERATIONS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in effect the minister says he has not made a request to the provincial legislature committee and will not be appearing before it. Since the vitality of the nickel industry is of absolute importance to Canada as a whole and since the management of that industry is now being called into question, will the minister tell this House if he is prepared to call before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works the management of Canada's nickel industry so that they can be questioned about their management of our vital resources?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is confusing the jurisdictions of the federal government and the provincial government with respect to select committees. He is also trying to create the impression—and I think purposely—that a minister can require a committee to call witnesses before it. The hon. member must know that the committee will decide what persons it will call before it.

THE ROYAL FAMILY

PRINCE CHARLES—REASON FOR FAILURE TO CONVEY INVITATION OF UNIVERSITY OF WESTERN ONTARIO

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister is aware, the University of Western Ontario has been forced to withdraw an invitation to Prince Charles to come to London to receive the prestigious centennial degree from the University of Western Ontario because the university has been unable, after a year of effort, to secure the co-operation of the federal government. Can the Prime Minister tell the House why it is that he has yet to reply to the letter of February 24 from Premier Davis in which Premier Davis stated that there was an invitation and offered to pay for the trip, or the letter of November 23 in which Premier Davis requested prompt consideration and reply from the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check. I certainly authorized a reply to be sent in my name, and I think it has been received by now. I will verify that, but the letter points out to Premier Davis that the Royal Family was in Ontario this year and that Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Phillip will be going to Alberta, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland next year.

Mr. Stevens: That is better for you in an election year.

Mr. Trudeau: The latter two provinces have not had a visit from the Queen in many years. In addition to the visit of Her Majesty to Ontario this year, Prince Andrew stayed in Ontario for a school term, and we felt that this was the schedule for the time being.

Mr. Clark: Is there a quota?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to get some understanding from the Prime Minister as to what his policy is. Do I understand the Prime Minister correctly that he has some objection and that this is the reason the reply was not received? Does the Prime Minister have some objection to the offer by the government of Ontario to have Prince Charles visit Ontario cities, including Hamilton and London, for three to four days at the expense entirely of the provincial government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of expense; it is a question of the Royal Family itself. They are invited constantly, not only by many provincial governments and many institutions—

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Trudeau: An hon. member from somewhere in Vancouver asks what is wrong with that.

Mr. Fraser: This is one time when I did not say anything, Pierre.

An hon. Member: Even when you do speak you don't say anything.

Mr. Trudeau: I did not hear the hon. member say anything, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: I never heard you answer anything either.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Merry Christmas.

Mr. Trudeau: Did that loud voice come from Calgary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: Santa Claus.

Mr. Clark: Just because you can't find Ontario does not mean Prince Charles can't.

Mr. Hees: Be a big boy and answer the question, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: Whenever the House wants to hear the answer, I will give it.

ENERGY

URANIUM CARTEL—REASON FOR REFUSAL TO PRODUCE DOCUMENTS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it relates to the production of documents relating to the uranium cartel which has been denied by the government at each request by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. In view of the fact that the minister has maintained all along that the cartel was legitimate, required and necessary, would he clarify for the House why he has refused many of these documents on the basis that the documents might be detrimental to the future conduct of Canada's foreign relations?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is the reason.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, this government puts us into a preposterous position. We were going to debate freedom of information. How can the minister justify or rationalize the fact that the government—for the purpose of covering up any discussion and investigation of the cartel—refuses documentation which people can obtain in the United States under the American freedom of information act or indeed through the various houses in the United States? How can the minister rationalize refusing to give the people of Canada these documents through their elected representatives?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking for information about which it has been made very clear to him and the House that in the government's judgment it would not be in the public interest to release, information dealing with arrangements entered into with foreign governments. The hon. member must know that this is a basis that has been used by the government in the past and accepted by the opposition.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the minister ought to know that is not a basis upon which the House has been refused documentation before, the basis that it is detrimental to foreign relations. I would ask him to justify that position in the House. On what basis is a matter merely being confidential and therefore one on which he refuses to give this information to the House, which is another reason he gave in response to the hon. member?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question.

AIR TRANSPORT

INSPECTION OF AIRFRAMES—POSSIBILITY OF IMPLEMENTING JURY RECOMMENDATION

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the death of a spray plane pilot last year. The jury recommended that the Ministry of Transport do more thorough inspections of airframes of airplanes over 15 years of age. Can the minister tell the House his reaction to that recommendation and what action he is prepared to take on it.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing the recommendation to my attention. I will be asking my officials for a report upon it to determine the feasibility of implementing the suggested additional inspection.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF MEASURES TO AID HIGH TECHNOLOGY INDUSTRIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Since Canada's manufacturing industry today is in serious trouble with some 100,000 fewer people working in manufacturing today than there were three years ago, I ask the minister if he is aware of any new policies to help high technology industries which is machinery, electrical products and the chemical industry. Does the government have a target, for example, for cutting our deficit on trade in fully manufactured goods, a target that would square our balance of payments on current account and hopefully add a few more people on our employment rolls?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in order to help the manufacturing sector of the Canadian economy, there are tax proposals included in Bill C-11 which should enable them to invest more and expand some of their operations where this can be done successfully. There are other policies in other departments to help those industries. We are doing our best to ensure a viable manufacturing base in Canada.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FEMALE EMPLOYEES BY BRITISH AMERICAN BANK NOTE COMPANY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister as it involves at least two or three departments or ministers. It concerns the very serious aspect of discrimination of employment affecting the 25 employees of the British American Bank Note Company in Ottawa who have been on strike for many weeks. In light of the very real imbalance in the pay structure, the very real discrimination between the employment of women and men in that company, since the Government of Canada is the prime customer of this company and in light of the human rights legislation passed by this House in June which is clearly directed against that kind of discrimination, will the Prime Minister indicate whether the government is contemplating any action such as discontinuing its present contract?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the details of this particular labour dispute. I can assure the hon. member as a matter of principle we do not encourage third parties to involve themselves in disputes by exercising any kind of economic boycott, if that is what the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am sorry the Prime Minister is not aware of the situation because the president of the company has justified this discrimination on the basis of it being historic. If there has ever been an obvious case of discrimination between men and women, it has to be this case. When he looks at it, I hope he will look at section 19 of the human rights bill which allows the governor in council to make recommendations respecting the terms and conditions to be included in or applicable to any contract, licence or grant made by Her Majesty in right of Canada. It very clearly gives the government the right and responsibility of making regulations affecting discrimination in employment. Has the Prime Minister been consulted by the Minister of Justice or is consideration being given to including in regulations to be brought down under the human rights bill some clear-cut responsibility in this matter with regard to a major company with whom the Government of Canada is almost the total contractor?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the bill provided for a certain process after which the government would take action. The hon. member is suggesting that we intervene in a labour dispute as a third party and that we use economic leverage to settle this dispute in a particular way. I suggest that is a completely incorrect way of proceeding.

ROSEAU RIVER DIVERSION—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The United States has offered to pay approximately $4 million for mitigating works to offset the effects in Manitoba of the state of Minnesota's Roseau River diversion project. Has the Canadian government determined whether there will be advantage to Canada for this project. If no substantial advantage can in fact be determined for Canada, can I have the assurance of the government that they will forward a note during the negotiations with the Americans that we wish that the project not go forward?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot answer the hon. member in detail on that question at the moment without running the risk of saying something that will be inaccurate. I would like to take time to go into it. I recently discussed it briefly with some officials. If I understood the hon. member correctly, I think the answer is yes, we will continue to ensure there is no damage done as far as Canada is concerned. As to the rest of the question, if the hon. member will agree, I will get him a more detailed response.

POST OFFICE

REDUCTION OF RURAL SERVICE IN MANITOBA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Postmaster General. As Canadians are tired of the continual increases in postal rates and at the same time the cutbacks in postal service, can the Postmaster General tell the House if there is to be a cutback in rural route service in Manitoba and also Saturday morning wicket service in this province?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the post office has to be very sensitive to conditions in the market place and the demands that are made on its service. In areas where the demands have fallen in terms of the services that have been offered, we have taken decisions to cut back those services. Indeed, in the province of Manitoba, there has been a cutback on Saturday rural mail delivery in certain areas as a result of a decline in demand for that service. It was only done after surveys had been conducted and there was an indication that the service was no longer required. In terms of Saturday morning wicket service, the same criteria apply. Indeed, we have cut back the services where the demand was not made known in certain areas. Decisions are based on local demand and local criteria.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Last month in this House the Postmaster General assured the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex there would be no cutback on Saturday rural route service in Ontario. Due to the fact there have been demands to continue the same type of service in Manitoba, rural routes and Saturday morning wicket service, is the minister saying there is one type of service for Ontario and another type for Manitoba?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I did indicate to the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex that in the area in which he resided there would be no cutback in service. I stand by that statement. As I indicated, there may be different conditions in different areas. It is done on criteria that are established after local investigation.

FISHERIES

REASON FOR REFUSING TO SUPPLY MR. MENEELY WITH SALMON EGGS AND WILLINGNESS TO SUPPLY UNION CARBIDE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. It concerns the potential for aquaculture in British Columbia. Mr. Al Meneely, a Canadian owner and operator of a salmon aquaculture farm, was driven out of business because the Department of Fisheries refused to supply him with salmon eggs. First of all, would the minister advise the House why it was that Mr. Meneely was refused a sufficient supply of salmon eggs so that he could continue his business?

● (1202)

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, had the hon. member checked his facts he might not have needed to ask his question. This matter was raised in an article in the Reader's Digest and reproduced in one of the weekend inserts—either Weekend or The Canadian. We tried to put the facts on record. I wrote a lengthy letter to the editor but I have no knowledge as to whether the editor honoured my request to publish the facts. These allegations seem to have a very long life and re-establishing the truth is very difficult. I would be happy if I could find a way to put my answer on the record of the House. It is rather lengthy but I certainly believe the hon. member would not want to be a party to misinformation. I know him to be a much more honourable man than that.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, there is one fact which the minister can confirm—that a company called Union Carbide has received approval from the Foreign Investment Review Agency to carry on the business of aquaculture in the Province of British Columbia. This is a multinational company which is now taking up the role Mr. Meneely formerly played in the aquaculture business. Can the minister also confirm to the House that this same company has exported salmon eggs from British Columbia to some of its subsidiaries abroad?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check into recent developments. It is some months since I have seen the dossier, but I cannot think of one dossier in the whole department on which I have spent more time checking and rechecking than the one to which the hon. member has made reference. I am satisfied that the articles which have been published were full of misinformation. However, some of the information the hon. member has referred to may be accurate and, of course, I will check into it.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGATION DAMAGED MAIL ARRIVED IN CALGARY—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Postmaster General? I know I speak for the minister and for all members of the House when I say we are all dreaming of a white Christmas, but it appears westerners will have a wet one. Is the Postmaster General aware that several tons of mail from Toronto arrived in Calgary soaking wet and badly damaged? Is the hon. gentleman prepared to investigate this situation and prepared to tell us what is to be done?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, that matter was brought to my attention yesterday. I have had an investigation conducted in this connection and I am pleased to advise the hon. member that the report is completely inaccurate. There were one or two bags of mail which had been somewhat affected by rain but none of the mail was damaged. It is being processed in the normal way and will be delivered, only slightly affected, to the addressees.

TRANSPORT

OGDEN POINT PIER, VICTORIA—REASON FOR DELAY OF AGREEMENT WITH WESCAN TO PERMIT OPERATION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): My question is for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman knows there was a disastrous fire at the Ogden Point Pier in Victoria on August 8. On August 18 there was a meeting at which his senior officials said we should be able to get a lease or agreement signed between the government and Wescan in order that it might continue operations. With 93 people out of work four months after that meeting, we still do not know when the agreement will be signed. There have been leaks from the minister's department to the effect that it will be signed any day. Could the hon. gentleman report to the House on this question?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, after the destruction of the wharf there was a change in the ownership of the land from the CNR, adding certain legal complications which had to be cleared up before progress could be made with respect to a lease. We have made an offer recently to the operator who is interested in constructing a new wharf. I have not personally seen the terms and conditions of the agreement and cannot therefore say whether we shall soon be in a position to sign. I do understand, however, that he has told the press we have an agreement, from which I assume the operator is accepting the terms. If that is the case, I expect it will now be only a question of completing the paperwork.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

LAY-OFF OF EXPRESS EMPLOYEES—ALLEGED FAILURE OF COMPANY TO PROMOTE BUSINESS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport. Has the hon. gentleman taken any initiatives to investigate the appropriateness of the CN laying off approximately 360 employees on a nationwide basis from its express division and whether the reason given by CN—lack of business—has been due to its own lack of initiative in promoting business?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been fully informed of this situation by CN. The layoffs reflect a decline in business of a seasonal nature. They are for a specific period of time and those laid off know when they will be back at work. This can be said of almost every case. Canadian National has acted in a very fine fashion in the way it has handled this situation both in discussion with the union and the workers involved. It might indeed be said to be an example to other companies which do not always follow such a course.

Mr. MacKay: Without disputing the minister's premise, I would like to point out to him that there has been a steady erosion of jobs with the CN right across the country. At the same time there has been a diminution of the level of service, which discourages Canadians who might wish to use that service. There is thus an unproductive cycle established. Is the minister looking into the situation to ascertain why business appears to be seasonal and why there is not a greater utilization by Canadians of CN services in the hope that we might be able to stop this constant erosion of jobs without any corresponding increase in business?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, Christmas is seasonal and a drop-off in business seems to accompany that particular season. It happens every year. The hon. member should know that Canadian National is in fact handling more goods and covering more ton miles with a smaller number of employees. This, surely, reflects efficient management and success in finding ways of avoiding an unnecessary salary load—an unnecessary burden of cost upon the economy. The efficiency of management in handling more ton miles with a smaller supply of labour and capital is the kind of improvement in productivity which we want to see generally in the economy.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STEVENS—STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE RESPECTING BILL C-11

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given you notice. It arises from what was said in the House yesterday by the Minister of Finance in response to a question put to him by myself with respect to the introduction of an important tax credit bill which has been proposed.

The minister stated, as reported at page 1893 of Hansard:

When we started Bill C-11 the hon. member said that second reading was to be three or four days and it lasted three weeks. Thus, I cannot rely on him very much.

I interjected that this statement was not true.

Mr. Abbott: It is true. You are unreliable.

Mr. Stevens: I maintain that the minister, in making that statement, imputed bad faith on my part. He was suggesting I had entered into some kind of understanding or agreement with him with respect to the early passage of Bill C-11 through second reading. I deny that, without qualification. There is no truth in the minister's statement. There was no conversation between him and myself with respect to the time we might take on second reading debate of Bill C-11.

Not only do I deny the truth of what the minister said, but I would draw to your attention a second untruth which I believe Your Honour can check for yourself by reading Hansard. The minister stated that Bill C-11 took three weeks at second reading stage. That is not true. Second reading began on November 7 and ended on November 24. If it had taken three weeks, the terminal date would have been November 28. So on the face of it the minister's statement is untrue. Further, I recall that not only did we spend a relatively short period debating Bill C-11 on second reading, but between the dates mentioned we had at least two supply days, and there were several questions of privilege raised—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now expressing disagreement with the minister with regard to the duration of a debate on second reading. His question of privilege basically relates to a statement by the minister that there had been some consultation between him and the hon. gentleman about the second reading debate lasting three or four days.

I have to tell the hon. member that, aside from the fact that essentially we are dealing here with a disagreement, the remark complained of was made during the course of the question period yesterday. Our practice normally requires that any member wishing to raise such a matter by way of a question of privilege must do so at the earliest opportunity. The hon. member was here yesterday and the occasion for raising the matter as a question of privilege, had he wished to do so, was yesterday at the conclusion of the question period—not 24 hours later.

Therefore, I am in double difficulty about going any further with the disagreement which the hon. member has, which again I say is essentially a disagreement, in any case, and not a question of privilege.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, if I may speak to the points you have made, I did not raise the question yesterday because—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid the hon. member is procedurally out of order in going on with the matter today when he had an opportunity to do so yesterday.

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was trying to explain to Your Honour why I did not raise it yesterday. The fact of the matter was that I heard what the minister said, but I was not sure whether I had heard him correctly. I watched the 11.30 TV performance last night, and it confirmed what he had said. I did not get Hansard this morning until 10.25. I telephoned Your Honour's office before ten o'clock and stated that I felt the minister had made a statement that was completely untrue; that if, in truth, it was recorded that way in Hansard, I hoped to be able to raise a question of privilege at the appropriate time. That I am attempting to do. If Your Honour would give me the opportunity, I want to refer to certain statements of Your Honour and precedents cited with respect to this type of matter on previous occasions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. First of all, I allowed the hon. member to develop his question of privilege and to indicate his abject disagreement with and denial of what the minister had said yesterday. That seems to me to give the hon. member for York-Simcoe some latitude in raising what was essentially, and remains, a disagreement with a remark made by the minister.

Mr. Stevens: Which is untrue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has put his interpretation forward. He has put a denial on the record. Essentially it is a disagreement; but in any case there is another difficulty, which I have outlined, and I do not think the hon. member should go any further.

Mr. Stevens: He should retract.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During today's question period the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton I think may have inadvertently misled the House when he indicated that an agreement had been reached in relation to the motion put forward by the member for Peace River, and that the Prime Minister had not been aware of that agreement. The fact of the matter is that no agreement had been finalized. I had approached House leaders on the other side to determine whether there was a disposition to limit debate or to have no debate at all on a motion to refer the matter, but no conclusion was reached. I felt it would be a bit misleading if the impression were created that the Prime Minister ought to have been informed of an agreement which had not been reached. I would have felt obliged to inform him of one that had, but certainly under no obligation to inform him of one that had not.

Mr. Speaker: These are the difficulties we face continually if we attempt to negotiate something on the floor of the House. These ongoing discussions leave some loose ends, and these leave different impressions on both sides of the House. Again it is an indication that we ought to firm up such arrangements before attempting to report them to the House or to deal with them on the basis of consent. I understand, however, that on orders of the day there may be some accord resulting from developments in the meantime, and we can deal with that at that time.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege arises from the statement that you have just made. I feel that you have put me in an unbelievably untenable position. I was attempting—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I want to remind the hon. member, I hope for the last time, that whether or not the hon. member seeks to agree or disagree with rulings by the Chair, rulings by the Chair on procedural matters are final. I have made a disposition in respect to the procedural correctness of the hon. member's position. As the hon. member said in his remarks today, he complained yesterday from his seat, at the time the remark was made, that the remark was not true. The hon. member was in his seat, he was aware of the remark, and he said that it was not true.

I do not often lean on the requirement that a matter of this sort be raised on the first occasion. I have often extended leniency in that regard. However, if the rule is to be respected at all, certainly in a situation where the hon. member recognizes a remark to the extent of denying it from his seat in the House, as he did yesterday, he must surely recognize that, if there is any validity at all to the regulation, I have to enforce it in these circumstances. I do not take particular pleasure in that. That is the primary concern.

In any case, on balance there is a direct disagreement in this matter. The hon. member has put his accusation and his denial of what the minister said yesterday on the record and has said it is untrue. He has done so under the guise of a question of privilege. It is not a question of privilege, but in any case, even if it were, the only time it could have been properly raised in the procedural sense was yesterday.

INFORMATION

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF GREEN PAPER ON FREEDOM OF ACCESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, earlier in our proceedings today the House gave unanimous consent to put a motion proposed by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). As a result of that, I have had discussions with members opposite and believe there would be agreement to proceed with the motion at this time, under a couple of conditions, namely, that no more than one speaker be allowed per party and, secondly, that no member shall speak for longer than 15 minutes.

The next point I should like to put forward—and perhaps I can attend to this in a moment—is that the motion requires some amendment, to which I hope there will be unanimous consent. In light of the fact that it is a joint committee which is referred to, there is a technical flaw in the motion. Therefore, I would like to propose an adjustment to it after we have decided whether we can proceed in that manner.

Mr. Baldwin: That is perfectly all right with me, Mr. Speaker. Any time the government can improve on a motion I make, I am always glad to accommodate them.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms and conditions of the motion. It is proposed that the matter be proceeded with at this time on the basis that there be no more than one speaker from each party and that each speech will last no longer than 15 minutes. In addition, an amendment will be permitted to give recognition to the fact that it is not a standing, but a joint committee and some adjustment may have to be made with reference to the other place. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered. The question, therefore, is the following. Moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the green paper on legislation on public access to government documents be referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members on both sides of the House for their accommodation, and I also offer thanks for the alacrity with which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has accepted the invitation to have a debate. I am only sorry that the Prime Minister is not here to debate the matter, because he has learned a lot about security and ministerial responsibility over the last few weeks. He has had a very "Liberal" education with respect to this matter, and I had hoped that he would be here for this debate. However, I see my hon. friend, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) is here, and I have reason to believe that in general he believes in good legislation, at least to the extent that cabinet solidarity permits him.

The period of gestation for any reform is always fairly lengthy, though with this government it is extremely lengthy. Hopefully, because of the number of conditions which have been placed on this reform, we are getting close to the stage of reaching committee and we may be able to do something constructive on this very important issue concerning circumstances in this country and other countries in the civilized and democratic world.

I believe it was John Stuart Mill who mentioned the necessity of there being a free marketplace of ideas in order for there to be good government. A free marketplace of ideas does not exist where you have government secrecy. Government secrecy has been the way of life of many governments in democratic countries. I hope we are now coming to a stage where that will be concluded. Government secrecy is a palpable defect. It is widespread. It has run so deep that it has become a malignant disease and what I would call a political distemper which constitutes a major impediment to the free marketplace of ideas. It spawns corruption, incompetence and indecision. We have seen a lot of that, Mr. Speaker, over the last two or three years.

It is a major factor in the cynicism and loss of confidence which has spread over this land. Any member of this parliament who is honest will agree with me when I say, travel any place in Canada and you discover a feeling of outrage, frustration, anger and disbelief among the people which has constituted an impediment in the capacity of governments today to deal with the problems which afflict us. Most of those problems are man-made and can be cured by man. It takes a relationship between the government and the governors which is non-existent not only in the federal system of which I have some knowledge but in other systems of government in this country.

Mr. Speaker, people may forgive politicians and governments for erring, but they will no longer forgive them for lying, for deception, for procrastination linked to deception which have become the trademarks of Ottawa. Open government by a workable freedom of information law will have very definite advantages for this parliament and for the public of Canada. Canadians are entitled to know what the government is doing to or for them, what it is costing them, and who will receive the benefits of the proposals which are made. This parliament will then be a better place. We will have a more efficient question period, with crisper, shorter questions, if members of parliament on both sides of the House are armed with the knowledge permitting them to contribute to any debate in a meaningful, effective way.

The right of freedom of speech is often talked about. Mr. Speaker, what good, what use and what value is freedom of speech without the knowledge upon which we can base that speech? I am convinced the quality of debate in this House will be vastly improved when and if that time comes. The word is "when" because this has become a major issue. I do not believe the public will tolerate refusal by this or any other government, be it federal or provincial, to delay the enactment of a workable freedom of information law. When it comes, Mr. Speaker, it will be a better parliament because of the quality of the speeches we will be making and the questions we will be asking.

There have been challenges to the kind of law which most of us want and when I say "most of us", I give credit to a great many people on the government side. If I were free, under our rules, to introduce a freedom of information law myself, and should it be put to the question without any whips being present, 75 per cent of the members of this House would support it, and at least that percentage in the other place. We would then have a bill in short order.

The government is indicating that they have approached this problem with undue caution, with Scots caution, delaying caution. They talk about ministerial responsibility. Mr. Speaker, ministerial responsibility in Canada has become a farce, a myth. It no longer exists. The average minister does not know one per cent of the work being done in his department. He is, in effect, the spokesman, the advocate for his department and its officials. He reads the departmental brief in cabinet, in cabinet committees, to this House and to the public.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

By the very nature of the kind and quality of our government, the massive intervention the government has made in the lives of people, it is impossible for any minister to know what is going on. Even when he is given information by senior civil servants on how his particular department is run, he comes into this House and what is the situation? We had a typical example during the last few months, specifically in the past few weeks, regarding security. By interpretations which have been placed by the Chair based on precedents of this House—and I do not challenge them—we have been prohibited from questioning ministers who have considerable knowledge, or should have, of the workings of the Department of the Solicitor General. These people are eminent parliamentarians—I will use that expression as it is Christmas time. However, under the Government Reorganization Act, the Prime Minister is able to move a minister to another department when things become awkward, and he falls outside the scope and scrutiny of this House. That is the situation which exists. How can you have ministerial responsibility in a situation of that kind?

The situation is of ministers sent to a royal commission under terms of reference established by the Prime Minister, by personnel appointed by the Prime Minister who will report to the Prime Minister. This royal commission may hold many of its deliberations in secret. How can that be held to be, in any sense of the imagination, ministerial responsibility? Anyone who suggests ministerial responsibility constitutes a barrier to a freedom of information act should have been in this House for the last two months. They would then know it does not constitute any meaningful alibi.

We talk about ministers having the right, the final word, and not the judges. Every day of the year, magistrates in the federal and provincial courts examine issues dealing with federal and provincial legislation which involve making a judicial interpretation of certain aspects of government behaviour initiated by ministers. We have many examples. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) has shown no unwillingness to seek judicial guidance on certain decisions he has arrived at in the course of the debate on security. Four times he has seen fit to go to a judge, and each time he has been rejected. For a government which states that it is not prepared to entrust to judges the right to scrutinize the decisions of ministers, the Solicitor General shows a remarkable alacrity to accept another attitude.

We have the case of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) who went to a judge with respect to an issue. We have the case where the AIB program was referred by this government to the Supreme Court of Canada. During the days of the year when courts are sitting, they have occasion to decide and deal with issues in which the government is involved. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that is not a reason. The real reason is—and we all know it; members on the other side know it; cabinet knows it—fear of exposure, fear of embarrassment. Those are very understandable fears for a government which has been in power for any length of time.

● (1232)

The reasons advanced by this government are precisely the same as those advanced by President Nixon, through his counsel, to the Supreme Court of the United States. Also, these reasons were advanced on behalf of the Harold Wilson cabinet in the United Kingdom when the court was considering the Crossman diary litigation which exposed the workings of the United Kingdom cabinet for what they were. It is the fear of embarrassment and the fear of being caught—not viciously or in terms of corruption, but it is human nature not to want to be proved wrong. I am sure ministers of the government make as many mistakes as myself, and perhaps more. There is no reason why their mistakes should not be exposed and subjected to scrutiny by this parliament, on behalf of Canadians. This does not constitute any barrier to the passage of legislation.

Today, the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), acting through a whim of secrecy, evaded a reasonable question posed by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn). My colleague was asking for information about the uranium cartel. Members of this House, and Canadians generally, are entitled to that information. The period is long past when that information would be of any consequence. It is a terrible thing for members of the public to witness the manner in which the minister evaded a proper question put by a member of my party.

In conclusion, we are not seeking something which will put this country or the government down the drain. Any government can live with it. We want a declaration indicating that all documents in the possession of the government are available for examination by the public and by parliament, subject to certain precise exceptions. There is little disagreement between the government and members of my party as to what the exceptions will be: they can be thrashed out.

As soon as possible, we would like to see indexing of documents to enable members to identify them. It is a humiliating and demeaning experience for members of the opposition to be required to rely on leaks from public servants in order to perform their duties. We are entitled to something better than that. We must have a proper appeal process to an independent tribunal. The decisions of that tribunal must be binding on the government and the other party concerned. I would like to see rules making that procedure simple and inexpensive, so there is no delay. People should be allowed to obtain a document on the payment of a reasonable fee. I do not think it should be free: the fee would pay for the cost of the service.

If the government believes there is no public support for this suggestion, it is wrong. We have gathered support from 45 or 46 organizations which have a total membership of approximately three million people. These organizations are of some substance and are influential. I will not get freedom of information by leading an attack on the barricade; but if the government delays implementing a proper, workable, freedom of information law prior to the next election, it will have a penalty to pay and its name in the history books of this country will be lower than it is at the present time.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to congratulate the members of parliament who participated in this most excellent study. I did not have an opportunity to participate, but the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) did on behalf of the New Democratic Party. This is a substantial move toward finally having a meaningful bill presented in this House.

I endorse what was said by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). He indicated that it was incumbent upon this government to do something once the study comes out of committee. The reason for that, and the reason we are now hearing a few cooing noises from the government side concerning this subject, is that the government now realizes the political impact of this particular subject. Canadians are tired of seeing a government which represents a bureaucracy rather than its constituents. That is the key question in terms of freedom of information. The lockup between the government and the bureaucracy should never be so close that the difference cannot be recognized.

The House has witnessed a substantial amount of evidence concerning the Royal Canadian Mounted Policy inquiry, as well as many other matters, where ministers have failed to distinguish between the interests of their own bureaucracy and the interests of the public. Often there is a distinct conflict between those two areas.

I congratulate the hon. member for Peace River for doing an excellent job by bringing this matter forward once again. In an untiring way he has led the fight to bring forward a decent piece of freedom of information legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: We should not forget the contributions of other members in the House. I am thinking particularly of Barry Mather who sat in this chamber as a member of the New Democratic Party for many years. From 1965 to 1970, yearly he introduced a private members' freedom of information bill. Also, I would not want to discount the efforts of the hon. member for Greenwood or those of the venerable and honourable member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who has been an untiring advocate of freedom of information in this House.

From time to time we receive interesting answers on the subject of freedom of information. When one requests the opening up of bureaucracy to provide more information to the public, quite often a minister of the government will say, "All you are doing is increasing the cost of government, the volume of work, the number of employees, the number of computers, as well as duplicating work".

Approximately a year ago I went to Washington to look at their freedom of information law to see whether there was any validity in the answers which I was receiving from the bureaucracy and the ministers. Possibly the environmental protection agency was hit hardest by the United States freedom of information legislation, and their people totally support that legislation. The result in the United States is that a person simply writes a letter requesting information. There is a time limit for the agency to reply to that letter. The request does not have to be fulfilled if the information provided is not specific enough. The person is required to pay a nominal charge for duplication, and the information is forwarded.

Our government has forgotten that these documents are not the property of the government, nor members of parliament; they are the property of the public who pay the taxes, and they are entitled to that information. The sooner that fundamental principle is realized, the sooner Canada will have a freedom of information law.

I was delighted with the recommendation suggesting the establishment of a panel of judges to review the question. It will wash the dirty linen of the RCMP. If one looks at the wiretap legislation, he will see the same principle is involved. When the government decided on the wiretap legislation, they decided we would allow judges to issue warrants on wiretaps except in matters of national security. We do not have confidence in the bench for that; we will let the Solicitor General do it. Again, that is a fundamental weakness.

I say, trust the courts, trust the judges. With the capacity they have and the tenure they have, they are the best we can have in the country to protect the civil rights and freedoms of Canadians. On many occasions this government has felt it could not invest the courts with that kind of trust. I hope that the all-party report will also spur the government forward in those areas—sometimes, of necessity, in camera—in providing the courts with the decision-making process in those areas.

We will probably see a bill. I am afraid I am cynical enough to believe it has something to do with the timing of the next election, but I urge the minister seriously to consider these recommendations, particularly in terms of narrowing the definition of information which may not be released, and particularly with regard to allowing a panel of judges to make the final decision. There is no way that a minister can act objectively on a request for information which may be embarrassing to his personal performance. The old cliche that justice must not only be done but must be seen to be done never applied more than it does on the question of freedom of information.

I do not want to be long-winded. I just want to say how delighted our party is that this report has come forward, and how delighted we are that members of parliament such as the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) are associated with it and have placed their names on it. We also have our Social Credit friends associated with the report. I hope that the efforts which have been made by many members of the House will now come to fruition.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to give my support to the motion, which has been expected for some time and should lead to a statute ensuring greater freedom of information. Such freedom of information has been requested by everyone, not only by members in this House. Because when members ask for information or the production of certain documents, when they insert questions on the order paper, very often it is because of queries from their constituents.

And when, as very often happens, we are told we cannot have the information because it is confidential, we wonder whether we are not dealing with some kind of in camera government. A democratic country such as we have in Canada is entitled to something better. Sometimes we are told that questions on the Order paper cannot be answered because this would be too costly, too expensive in terms of both time and money.

Mr. Speaker, if a question is too expensive in terms of time, in terms of research to find answers, it may be that there are deficiencies on the part of the bureaucracy, that bureaucrats do not take the trouble to keep note or maintain files of their actions and expenditures. If such files were kept up to date, it would be easy to give us the required information without too much time or money.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore feel that members of parliament and the general public need to be better informed if this Parliament is going to perform its function in a democratic country.

In my view, the bill that has been called for by the opposition and a variety of organizations working in that area should bring more freedom of information without putting the government in hot water, which too often is what they fear.

Mr. Speaker, in very limited areas only should the government withhold information, but as I said, in a democratic government information must be readily available, to meet the Canadian people's information needs.

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I want to say, first of all, that I welcome this initiative on the part of the honourable and learned gentleman. It helps me meet the commitment which I made to the House and to him, that as quickly as possible we would have the government's green paper on access to public documents forwarded to the joint committee. As hon. members know, we have had on the order paper a government motion to that effect. I welcome his motion, just as I welcome the activity of the joint committee in studying this extremely important issue. I welcome, as well, the initiative of my friend, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), and the members of the committee of which he is chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: I think that their contribution is extremely useful to the discussion of this important question, and I know that the joint committee will be looking at their recommendations. I want to add that it is my hope that other organizations, such as the Canadian Bar Association and others, will come forward to the committee with constructive suggestions on how we can improve the position which has been outlined in the green paper on access to public documents.

I want to say, also, that it is not a question of whether there is great public support for these changes which I think all members of the House wish to make. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) assures me that there is great public support for these measures. I would say to him that even if there were not, these changes should take place because they are essential to the functioning of a healthy democratic society.

At the outset of his remarks, the hon. member for Peace River asked me to specify, within the balance of the possibilities of collective responsibility, my commitment to the principle of open government. I am pleased to do that and to draw his attention and that of members of the House to the first two paragraphs of the introduction to the green paper on legislation on public access to government documents. Having written them myself, they represent my sincere view and also the commitment of the government to follow the precept of open government.

It has always seemed to me a paradox that in the parliamentary system—with its emphasis, at least in the past, upon confidentiality within the public service, and secrecy of decision-making in the cabinet and secrecy of party decision-making in various caucuses of the various parties—that in a country which espouses open government, so much of the decision-making process should take place behind closed doors and away from public view.

The commitment, which has been eloquently expressed by the hon. member for Peace River, is one which members on the government side share and, indeed, one which is shared by members of all parties.

I can say parenthetically—I do not think the hon. member will mind—that his view that one of the results of the legislation would be to improve the quality of the question period is something that I would devoutly support. Anything that would improve the quality of the question period or that would assist in the improvement of the kind of questions put by members of the opposition is a step devoutly to be wished for.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the minister not agree that the quality and shortness of the answer period could also be vastly improved?

Mr. Roberts: I have often been much more impressed with the quality of my answers than I have with the quality of the questions.

An hon. Member: You are the only one.

Mr. Roberts: I thank the hon. member for admitting that in my case, at least, it is true.

● (1252)

The hon. member cited John Stuart Mill, a Liberal for whom I have a particular affection. I think the hon. member and I would both agree—if I can return a quotation of Mill's to supplement his own—that, "Whoever knew truth to be put to flight in a fair encounter?" It is my commitment—and I think it is evident in the paper that it is also the commitment of the government—to ensure that as much information as possible is available to the public and to hon. members, so that a full understanding of the context of decision-making is available and so that the public can properly judge the efficiency and the correctness of decisions which are taken.

In the few moments that are left to me, I want to emphasize the purpose of the government's presentation of the green paper on legislation on public access to government documents. I am sure hon. members of the House appreciate, but members of the public may sometimes not, that the green paper is not a description or a setting forth of policy positions to which the government is committed in a hard and fast way. It is, rather, a study document. It is a document prepared for the purposes of examination and discussion, and that is the process we have followed in presenting the green paper.

Some have interpreted the green paper to be—and they are mistaken in their interpretation—a disguised hard and fast policy position, and they feel that the various options which are described in the green paper are not really options but are a kind of stalking horse for some policy which has already been decided and which will be unveiled in a hard and fast way at a certain time. I want to emphasize that that is not the case.

The government is presenting this study paper because it genuinely thinks it is important to move in this area. We think there are problems involved, and we very much wish to have the counsel of the joint committee on the recommendations made in the paper. We are not committed to either the specific exemptions which we have described nor to any specific review process. We are committed to the idea of implementing open government in this country and expanding access to public documents. We accept that material prepared at taxpayers' expense should be available for the public to see unless there are extremely good reasons why it should not be so available.

I want to draw the attention of the House to pages 10 and 11 of the green paper which outline in a tentative way a possible description of what exemptions there should be to the basic principle of providing access, which we accept. I do not argue that the description of these exemptions is perfect in the document we have presented. There are many difficult problems to wrestle with. Some have suggested that we should, for instance, simply apply the standards or the language used in the American freedom of information act, but because we have a different system of government, the effect of applying the words used in that act might be unforeseen. There might be undesirable effects which hon. members of the opposition—not me—would be the first to resist. We have presented the American wording and we have also presented the wording which was used in Australia in relation to some of the exemptions, to try to get the committee to focus on this question and to assist us in coming up with better wording if better wording can be found.

I want also to refer to pages 16 and 17 of the green paper which outline the review process and present five options or five different approaches. There may be others. If there are others, I hope the committee will present to us other ways of reviewing how the exemptions might be applied in practice. Here, too, we see that there are problems. The fact that the green paper discusses those problems should not be taken as an indication that the government has settled upon one final approach as to how a review process should be undertaken. That is not the case. We are open and willing to consider the recommendations which will be made to us by the committee.

There are problems with judicial review. There are problems with many of the options described. Judicial review can often be a costly process. Perhaps it need not be so. Perhaps there are ways of achieving the objective which I believe hon. members on both sides wish to achieve without the process of judicial review. That is one of the matters I hope the committee will look into very seriously.

Questions of ministerial responsibility are important. As the hon. member for Peace River has indicated, over the past few weeks the House has been considerably exercised as to what the responsibilities of ministers are and how they should be enforced. I doubt that members of this House would wish to see us implement a policy which would tend to undermine the accountability of ministers to the House. However, again we throw those questions, which can be complicated questions, to the committee for discussion and we are eager to have the counsel of the committee and its advice on those questions.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt)—who, unfortunately, is not now in the House—referred to the question of cost and the experience in the United States. I would like to point out to hon. members that on pages 26 and 27 of the green paper the whole question of cost is discussed. Apart from the whole process of judicial review, the estimated present cost in the United States of administering their freedom of information act is, in round figures, approximately $150 million a year. I would not for a moment suggest that because the process is costly, it should not be embarked upon; but I think hon. members will want to know what the cost will be for whichever of the various approaches to the question may be taken.

As hon. members will have noticed, I am not in very fine voice today. I do not wish to go on at great length. I hope the committee will wish to have me come and speak to it: I am anxious to do that. I believe that for technical reasons it is important for me to move an amendment. I, therefore, move:

That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a semicolon and by adding the following words:

"and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof".

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) says he is always anxious to consider improvements to his motions. I hope he agrees that this change is an improvement.

I believe it is incumbent upon me also to ask for unanimous consent to withdraw my motion No. 8 which had as its purpose to do what the hon. member's motion does. The hon. member's motion seeks to refer the green paper to the joint committee. That is a commitment we have made. We wish to follow upon that, and that is the purpose of our original motion which has now been obviated by the hon. member's motion.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I am always glad to act as a catalyst to precipitate government action, but I knew this action would have come anyway. I am glad to agree to the changes which have been proposed. Before sitting down, I would like to say to the minister that I am not asking that this be incorporated in the motion, but would he and the government be good enough to consider the need to equip this committee with special counsel? I am not suggesting that it be in any large degree. We have counsel now, but they are fully occupied with statutory instruments, which come forward in very large quantities. I think it would be useful to have special counsel who would be related to this aspect of our duties.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly sympathetic to this request. I would have to take it into consideration and, of course, there might be implications here, as far as the House leaders are concerned, about which I would have to inform them. I cannot make the commitment the hon. member is asking for, but I shall certainly be an energetic vehicle of transmission of his request to the appropriate minister.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the minister's request for unanimous consent to withdraw motion No. 8 standing in the name of the government, we concur.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So do we.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the government to withdraw motion No. 8 from the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Roberts) agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock later this day.

At 1.02 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

The House resumed, from Thursday, December 15, consideration of Bill C-5, to amend the Canada Elections Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please hon. members are aware that motion No. 15 standing in the name of the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) was stood yesterday by unanimous consent. It is the last motion to be considered. The House has been informed that the motion did not meet the requirements of our Standing Orders, as it went beyond the scope of the clause and beyond the scope of the bill in amending the act and was not acceptable under our rules. It has been suggested by the minister, and requested by many members, that the motion be considered by unanimous consent. Unless hon. members are prepared to give unanimous consent for consideration of the motion at this time, report stage of the bill will have been completed. Is there unanimous consent to allow motion No. 15 to be considered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, this completes report stage of Bill C-5.

Mr. Benjamin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear a "No" to unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There was a "No", and I know where it came from.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, did he say it, or merely shake his head?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member who said "No" said it loud and clear.

• (1412)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe there is agreement to proceed immediately with third reading.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (for the President of Privy Council) moved that Bill C-5, to amend the Canada Elections Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cafik (for the President of Privy Council) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I must say a few words on third reading of this bill which otherwise I would not have done—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I did not see the minister stand. I do not know if he wants to speak. The fact that he moved the motion will make him lose his right to speak unless he receives consent at the end of the debate or at any other time. That is the only way he would be able to intervene. He will either have to speak at this time or seek consent to speak later in the debate.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay this debate. I certainly do not want to interfere with the right of any member to intervene at this moment. I would simply say, in summation on third reading, that we as a government have adopted a very flexible stance in relation to this bill, in a genuine attempt to try to accommodate the disposition of all members. Perhaps this is the reason we had some difficulties at report stage in trying to achieve that objective. However, I followed that flexible course in both committee stage and at report stage. We feel we have achieved a very broad basis of consensus on the elements contained in the amendments to this bill which reflect the disposition of members of parliament, the ad hoc committee, and largely, if not totally, the Chief Electoral Officer.

I would underscore one point which I think is more significant than any of the others. Allowance has been made in this bill, through the amendments at report stage, to accommodate the voting rights of those who are teachers and administrators attached to DND bases overseas. This is a very important step forward. A number of representations have been made by individual members and by the Teachers' Federation. We, as a government, are very pleased to associate ourselves with the achievement of that objective. It is an achievement and objective that can be shared by members on both sides of the House. We consider it a very important step forward.

The second point I would make is with regard to motion No. 15. Although it has not received unanimous consent, I would simply indicate, with regard to that motion dealing with the difficulties being experienced through a particular by-election, the problem being referred to generally as the Roach case, that the government never did strike a particular disposition. We attempted to respond to our perception of the disposition of members of the House of Commons in bringing forward an amendment that we felt would be acceptable. The fact that it did not receive unanimous consent does not in any particular way aggrieve the government in that regard. We were simply trying to serve what we perceived to be the interests of members of parliament.

I do not think it is necessary for me to recount all the amendments related to this bill: they are well known. I spoke of the original amendments and the nature of them at second reading. I addressed myself in very brief form to each of the amendments at report stage. In connection with the committee, the record stands for itself as to the disposition we have taken in that regard.

We think it is a positive step to come forward with these amendments. We hope they will substantially improve the application of the Canada Elections Act. I want to express, on behalf of the government, appreciation to the committee members and to the House of Commons for a tremendous degree of co-operative effort in order to help achieve a bill which affects each of us individually, all of us collectively, and all Canadians in general.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to rise on third reading of this bill, but in light of what has occurred I feel I must. I agree with the remarks the minister made a few moments ago. There has been a degree of co-operation and flexibility shown, not only by the minister and the government but by members of the committee and, in most instances, by members of all parties on the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. It was a repetition of what has gone on in that committee since I became a member of parliament in June, 1968. I have been a member of that committee since the twenty-eighth parliament in 1968.

We spent almost two years dealing with the entire Canada Elections Act. Most of us on the committee also sat on a special committee on election expenses. We worked on that project for about a year and a half and then submitted a report to parliament on election expenses. We sat again when the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections dealt further with the Canada Elections Act and amendments thereto.

During those nine years and some months, outside of some good-natured teasing it is one committee where there has been a minimum of partisan politics and a maximum of co-operation, accommodation, compromise and mutual agreement. On one occasion, the major provisions of the Canada Elections Act changes were dealt with by committee of the whole. At that time, the same kind of non-partisan co-operation was evident. I recite all this because that is one committee where there must be a maximum of co-operation and a minimum of partisan political activity. That committee must deal with election law and election expenses. On occasion there are references to that committee dealing with members' rights and privileges. Therefore, there must be a minimum of partisan politics and a maximum of co-operation and flexibility in order that we may, as often as possible, arrive at unanimity in our decisions and reports to parliament.

In many instances, the amendments to Bill C-5 to amend the Canada Elections Act were agreed to in committee, with only the very rare occasion where there was a vote or division. Amendments by government members and members of opposition parties were accepted. It is very rare in parliamentary committees that the government and the responsible minister are as co-operative and flexible as they were on this occasion.

• (1422)

Whatever one might think of the deputy government House leader, he is a nice fellow personally, but he is also a very tough politician, and partisan in terms of his political beliefs. But even he set an example by way of co-operation and flexibility by doing his utmost to meet the wishes expressed in favour of changes in Bill C-5. He returned to his cabinet colleagues and in most instances got approval for changes to be made, which meant that he, as the minister piloting the bill through the House, had to bring forward amendments and royal recommendations at the report stage. I believe that in every case this was done at the request of members of this committee and of opposition parties. That is a good example of co-operation, a good example of all parties working together to get the best possible election provisions.

An hon. Member: Not in every case.

Mr. Benjamin: Perhaps not in every case, but certainly in most cases. I mention this because I feel badly that we could not have decided all the motions which had been accepted by the Chair or with which there had been unanimous consent to deal. Every member has the right to withhold unanimous consent, but I submit that if this right is not used with care and good judgment, it is being abused. On this occasion I feel the right has been abused; I feel it has not been used with care and good judgment. I say this in spite of my liking for the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick).

Motion No. 15, with which we could not proceed because unanimous consent was not given, embodies an amendment without which a loophole remains in the law allowing the spirit of the elections act to be subverted. In the committee, the hon. member talked a great deal about closing such loopholes. I sincerely believed that he would be the first among all the members of the committee to be concerned about ensuring that it would not be easy to evade or subvert the intent and spirit of the elections act. I heard him on frequent occasions express his fears about brown-bagging and the diversion of funds to areas in which they should not be used. Our failure to deal with motion 15 could mean that his fears would be realized. I cannot fathom the reason he would not want this motion dealt with.

I believe it was understood that on this issue, as well as on several others, we would give unanimous consent as necessary when we reached the report stage, on the basis that these were measures which needed to be taken. They concerned matters which have been fully discussed in the committee on privileges and elections. On May 15 they were discussed by an ad hoc committee comprised of senior representatives of all the parties meeting with the Chief Electoral Officer, and that committee reached the conclusion that amendments must be made to the bill with respect to third party advertising.

It seemed to me that the degree of co-operation and agreement expressed then was being fulfilled by the government and by the minister through the presentation of motion 15. We liked the motion as far as it went, though had we been given an opportunity to discuss it, I would have gone further by moving an amendment to strengthen it. But even had my amendment failed, the motion would still have meant the strengthening of the legislation.

The argument put forward by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton yesterday in justification of his desire not to deal with this motion was that the matter was presently before the courts. I am not a lawyer, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. member is, and he should know a lot more about such matters than I do. But the precedent for passing or amending legislation in this parliament and in other legislatures while matters are before the courts has been established on a thousand occasions. I need only remind hon. members that when we were enacting amendments to the Criminal Code in 1969 and 1970, hundreds of cases involving the Code were before the courts directly relating to dozens of the sections we were amending. If the hon. member's argument were to stand, it would mean that parliament should not, and would not, deal with legislation at any time as long as the subject was somehow or other before the courts.

The hon. member's argument is so palpably absurd that I am surprised he would even put it forward. Parliament could not function if we were to follow his logic to a conclusion. Motion No. 15 and the amendment I would have moved would have been a valid exercise for the House to deal with. The hon. member's statement about the subject being before the courts is totally irrelevant. The hon. gentleman does not have the support of his own caucus with respect to the matter, and the House should be aware of it. His own party organization wanted this matter dealt with. In leaving this loophole open, we have provided a possibility that the intent and spirit of this law may be evaded.

I believe there is a deficiency in the law with respect to third party advertising. I say at the outset that in no way do I wish to infringe upon the freedom of speech or upon the right of every citizen to express his views before, during or after election campaigns. But the public has long demanded election laws and provisions to control election expenses so as to require that money spent by political parties is indeed spent on behalf of parties and candidates for office. It includes provision for disclosure of contributions in excess of $100. The law provides for controls on such expenditures, and that there shall be reimbursement for some portion of this expenditure by the national treasury. It also provides, but inadequately so, that if there is advertising carried on by those other than a political party, its official agent or candidate, which is of a political nature, it shall be construed as political advertising and the cost thereof must be shown.

The Roach case, as it is called, which is before the courts is an example of how the election law was weak in this area. It showed how a citizen, with the most honest and best intentions, may have broken the law. But the law is unclear. In my opinion, the Canada Elections Act is not clear enough, and frankly I do not think it is strict enough.

I should have liked to see an addition to the law to include not only the motion with which the minister would have required unanimous consent to deal, but an amendment to the last part of the motion. So that the last paragraph would have read as follows:

—he did not mention or display the name of, or specifically identify,—

Then I would have inserted the following words:

—or did not explicitly or implicitly offer support for, or opposition to, any candidate or registered party.

I feel that the motion suggested by the minister, on the advice and at the request of the ad hoc committee composed of all political parties, with my amendment would have done what I believe we all want to see done. If even then it was still deficient, we would have had to wait until the courts decided, should the court be presented with a case to decide.

I said earlier that there is implicitly, in this kind of provision in our electoral law, that fine line between what would be evasion of the law and the freedom every citizen has, namely, the right to freedom of speech. It is perfectly proper and fitting for any individual, organization or association in our nation, during election time as well as any other time, if they so wish, to buy a radio spot, television ad or ad in a newspaper to expound their views on an issue of the day, and to call upon fellow citizens to support that view. That is a valid and worth-while exercise, whether or not any of us agree with that particular point of view.

However, where an individual, organization or association purchases a half-page or full-page advertisement in a newspaper, for example, in the midst of an election campaign expounding a certain view in support of any one of a dozen or so issues, whether capital punishment, marijuana, abortion, negotiations having to do with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, issues which are now or which will become current, and that individual, association or organization, not a political party or candidate or the agent of a party or candidate, specifically, explicitly or implicitly identifies a candidate or a party, or offers support for, or opposition to, a party or a candidate, then the advertisement becomes a political advertisement, the cost thereof should be assessed and the matter dealt with in accordance with the other provisions of our election law.

I am saddened that the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) took the position that he did. If he wishes to oppose this kind of motion, he could well have done so. He is very capable on his feet and he could very well have done so in a debate on the motion or in a vote on the motion. I hope we are going to continue to have the degree of co-operation and non-partisanship that has been almost historic in the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections; but I say to my hon. friend that what he did today severely jeopardizes for the future what has gone on among members of parliament for many years.

Whether or not one likes a particular item which is proposed or is under discussion, this has always taken second place to the committee accomplishing the maximum amount of work, particularly in the area of election law and control of election expenses. This is something that is basic and fundamental to the welfare and good order, not only of our parties and candidates who run in elections but of the whole nation. I hope the hon. gentleman will decide that he can no longer be a member of that committee, that he no longer wants to sit on it. I want to tell the hon. member that there were many occasions when I did not want to be so co-operative; I wanted to raise hell and I had to bite my tongue and force myself not to. But that is a secondary consideration. We did not always get the kind of law and amendments that we wanted, but at least we had something that was common to members of all parties in the committee, and has been for the 9½ years I have been on the committee.

I am pleased with the improvements which have been made in the law by the rest of the amendments. I think they will generally prove to be of value and will make it easier for candidates and parties to abide by the law. A great deal of work will be required on the part of parties, candidates and workers to educate themselves and to inform the public of the provisions in this new law. I do not doubt for a moment that during the course of and following the next general election it will come to light that many mistakes have been made. Since the law is new, we will all be working under it for the first time. But I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of the mistakes will be honest ones.

There will have been no deliberate intent to evade or avoid the provisions of our law. No doubt there will be a few cases which the commissioner of election expenses will have to deal with. I would not be surprised to see a small number of official agents or candidates, or even elected members, paying some very severe penalties all the way from jail terms to losing the seat to which they have just been elected. That may well happen in a few instances. There will be some mistakes made, but they will not be deliberate mistakes. We will need that experience to learn how well the law operates.

The amendment we have passed to provide for review is particularly pleasing. Once all the returns are in and expenses are filed, the Chief Electoral Officer refers the reports to parliament. The privileges and elections committee can meet subsequent to the next general election and assess the experience, the results, how successful the limitations on expenses are, and if the reimbursement provisions meet the requirement. There are a host of other things we can review and make recommendations to parliament for any changes that may be necessary in a future parliament for preparation of a subsequent election. That is a valuable provision, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to see it in many other pieces of legislation. After a certain period of time has passed, there is a provision for review by a committee of this chamber.

I express my disappointment at not being able to deal with an important and fundamental point regarding third party advertising. I am pleased with the success we have had—some of it not as much as I and other members would have liked—in dealing with the remaining amendments in this bill. I hope that by passing this bill today they will have provided the Chief Electoral Officer with sufficient time to get ready for a general election. I hope that we have made it easier for him and his officials to carry out the implementation and the overseeing of this law.

I wish to express the commendation I made to the minister and the members of the committee for their co-operation, and particularly to express appreciation and gratitude to the Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. Jean-Marc Hamel, and his staff for the many hours they spent during the day and at night meeting with members of our committee, with members of the ad hoc committee, and meeting in the office of the chairman of the committee, assisting us, providing information and answering questions. If it had not been for their co-operation, we would not be at the stage we are now.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the amendments we have made will prove beneficial to all Canadians.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, to begin with, we should mention the people in the ad hoc committee who contributed so much. Actually, they were the master craftsmen of this bill. They were instrumental in whatever improvements have been made to the bill. I am not saying it is a poor bill. We all received much co-operation. But to those unsung heroes who probably do not have the opportunity to express their views in such a forum as this, I particularly want to mention Mr. Hamel and his staff. Also, Mr. Laschinger who represented our party at the ad hoc committee. There are many others, whose names I do not know, who were very much in evidence representing other parties of the House of Commons.

I would like to congratulate the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette), for his work in handling the committee. He did exceptionally well. It was a committee where there was much harmony and co-operation. I would also like to mention the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) who took a very active and co-operative part in the proceedings. One of the amendments we brought in was indexing. At this time, when everyone is talking restraint, our party in particular felt it very necessary that we ask for an amendment to the indexing clause. After researching the last ten by-elections, on a party average only 89 per cent of the limit which would have been allowed under the act was spent. Taking these things into consideration, and coupled with the economy of the country, we could not go along with the indexing of pensions at this time. Probably in the future, after the next election, this could be reviewed. We are not saying the door has to remain closed forever. Taking everything into consideration, we reached the conclusion that we must oppose indexing at this time.

Mr. Speaker, concerning the anonymous donations, there were several recommendations presented to the committee. We felt at this time that was just a way of buying the election, so during the committee proceedings, from the beginning we objected to the brown-bagging, as it is called, and asked for all donations to be accounted for. That was another restraint that was needed. We want to be responsible and know where our money is coming from, and to keep election expenses clear and above board.

I was disappointed a little while ago, after we had started debate on third reading, to hear so many members kill time on an issue which means very little now in terms of changing the legislation. We expect this bill will be passed, and I think too much time has been taken this afternoon criticizing this bill.

I hope the amendments that have been made will do much to strengthen our political system. I was also a little disappointed in motion No. 8, in that the government refused the amendment respecting cases where the returning officer and the poll clerk were of opposite political faith. The province of Ontario has seen fit to extend this provision to the opposition parties. In this modern day of politics, Mr. Speaker, it is only fair that the two parties, one party representing the government and the other party polling the highest votes, should have a choice in naming either of the two people involved in the polls on election day. I thought the spirit of co-operation that we enjoyed in the committee probably would have prevailed here. That was one motion that we tried in a small way in committee, but we were stonewalled. I was hopeful that when we returned to the House some consideration would have been given to this motion, which I believe is very timely and probably long overdue.

I hope the changes that have been made to the Canada Elections Act will improve our democratic system, and that some of the changes which have been set aside will see the light of day in the not too distant future.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on third reading of Bill C-5. I wanted to take a few moments to speak about this bill as a member who has had the very special privilege of seeing his private member's bill incorporated in it.

Voting is the absolute fundamental or bottom line of the democratic process, followed by who is allowed to vote, and the ease of access to vote. It is not simply to give a certain percentage of the population a vote; it should include all people within the system who are properly and democratically citizens of communities. After that, when universal suffrage is operative, all the people within the system should have equal access to the right to vote and it should be easy for them to exercise it.

In the last election during 1974, a particular situation arose in my riding. A lady who suffered a handicap registered her particular concern that she, and others like her, would be humiliated and would have some difficulty exercising their right to their franchise. As a result of that, at the beginning of the first session of the thirtieth parliament, I submitted Bill C-292, which would assist the handicapped by providing the minimum difficulty possible to them in order to exercise their vote.

I am pleased, as are other members who have private members' bills included, that the particulars of the bill were moved on to committee. In turn, the committee and the Chief Electoral Officer did everything possible to accommodate us. The end result is that in my bill, clauses 29, 50, 51, 52 and 53 accommodate a particular problem. It is not a universal answer to the problem; it is a beginning. In urban areas, where someone has a handicap, is wheelchair-bound or suffers from some other type of infirmity, rather than facing the possibility of being carried into a polling booth or humiliated in some other way, they will have access to an advance poll. That level access will be advertised in notices of advance polls and, in turn, without too much difficulty people can transfer their votes to that advance poll.

In the future we will have to consider all people who want to play a full role in a true democracy, despite their particular situations or backgrounds. There should be better facilities for them in the future. Through the accommodation of the Chief Electoral Officer and the committee itself, my particular private member's bill has gone forward incorporated in Bill C-5. At least it is a beginning. Even if people are handicapped, they are every bit as good, as bright or as much a participant as anyone. Because these people have suffered handicaps and have survived as good Canadians, we should lean over backwards within our democratic process to prove to them that we want the particular understanding and sensitivity of their vote exercised. Therefore, I am proud that this has come forward and will be a part of this new act. I hope the Chief Electoral Officer and members of this House will consider the possibility of extending it on a much wider basis.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I feel I have some right to speak on this bill because I was one of the original members of the committee some four years ago which brought the original election expenses bill to the House.

I listened with interest to last night's debate, as I did to the debate on second reading and to the interventions which were made this afternoon by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). I admit that the New Democratic Party has contributed substantially toward many things in Canadian public life, but certainly I cannot go as far in this adulation as the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) did, as reported at page 438 of Hansard dated October 31, 1977, when he said:

> I think it was no accident that this electoral reform was carried out when the New Democratic Party held the balance of power in the twenty-ninth parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: I am glad to her that applause by hon. members of the NDP, because it makes it easier for me to comment. What actually happened was that the NDP talked almost interminably in an effort to keep this bill from being passed in 1973 and 1974. It caused me, as reported at page 8911 of Hansard dated December 19, 1973, to mention that I thought I should identify myself as a Progressive Conservative, because the preceding seven speakers were all from the New Democratic Party. That is how they displayed their great rush to get that bill through, and now they would like to have credit for it.

I should like to remind the House that we are seven years short of George Orwell's date for the rewriting of history, as was attempted by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie the other day. On the day of voting, there were eight votes and the final vote on third reading of the election expenses bill, and members of the New Democratic Party supplied some of the dissenting votes. In fact, three of the ten dissenting votes were from the New Democratic Party. Often we judge people's promises by their performance.

In this respect, I should like to point out that the performance of parties differs quite considerably when it comes to adhering to the former elections act. The authority in Canada for election expenses and accounting is Professor Paltiel of Carleton University. I have found no reference work which is more dependable or highly regarded than his. At page 113 of Professor Paltiel's book entitled "Political Party Financing in Canada", there is a table of eight previous elections. The table is headed "Percentage of Candidates not Submitting Expenditure Declarations in Eight Canadian Federal Elections". Presumably this has something to do with what the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie said, as reported at page 438 of Hansard dated October 31, 1977:

It has always been a very long-standing and firm commitment on the part of our party that election reform was desperately needed in Canada to restore confidence in the democratic and electoral process.

While I agree they contribute a lot, I could do with less sanctimony from that party. Returning to the table at page 113 of the professor's book, it indicates for the last eight elections the percentage of candidates who did not submit expenditure declarations as required by the elections act. If one looks at the table, he will see that the NDP led the three major parties in every one of those eight elections in not completing their election expenses returns.

Now I should like to deal with the reforms that will occur because of this bill. I am glad the government finally bowed to the pressure imposed by the Progressive Conservative party, the New Democratic Party, the Social Credit party, as well as government backbenchers who were concerned about anonymous donations. The entire Election Expenses Act, with all of its forms and attachments, would fall down if anonymous donations were allowed. If the $100 anonymous donation provision had remained, nothing would have prevented an unscrupulous party or politician from pretending, for example, they had received 300 $100 donations. Surely people would say that is deceitful. There is no indication that we should expect anything else.

I am looking at Election Expenses Form 64 and I object to it remaining in the same shape in which it was before, in which the same questions are asked. In Form 64, which has been in use heaven knows in how many elections, there is a column in which the name and occupation of every person, including the candidate, and of every club and society from whom any money, securities or the equivalent of money received, should be set out. This form happens to be for the Victoria NDP candidate in the last election and only has three lines filled. You would have to be naive to believe that every person who contributed to even such a small party as the NDP in Victoria could be listed in these three lines. I do not think the NDP are the only ones to do this.

Mr. Woolliams: I think so.

Mr. McKinnon: No, they are not; here is the Liberal party doing much the same thing. On the second page we find the name of one stalwart individual who has contributed $6,500. It is not very likely. I think it is much more likely that many other people contributed to that individual in the name of that one person—he was the bag man. I think we are not blameless in this regard either.

I would have liked to have seen some method of preventing this in the future because, if we are going to allow this information to be put in the light of the noonday sun, we should have everything out and let everyone see who is contributing how much and to which candidate. I hope the new bill will do this.

I must say I was rather alarmed when I questioned the Chief Electoral Officer in committee on how he was going to find out, if someone had contributed $100 or if the Election Form 64 showed they had received dozens of $100 donations adding up to one large sum, whether or not it was a true return. He told me it was quite easy, he would go to the taxation department. I am not sure that in the present climate in this country we want anyone to go to the taxation department to prove whether one has done this or that, the secrecy of tax returns being what it is supposed to be.

There is a very good amendment according to which the Chief Electoral Officer will assume the financial burden for publishing summaries of election expenses. In the election before the last one there were several independent candidates running in my constituency. I thought they added a lot to the electoral process. They were mostly young people. They had something to say, and they said it. They had very limited budgets and it was a terrible shock to them when it was all over to find that they had to pay bills in excess of $100 for the required advertising to publish details about their own defeat. I am pleased that summaries now will be published by the CEO.

I do not think there can be a dissenting voice in the House or anywhere else about the right being given to teachers employed overseas to vote. Having been a teacher myself, as some hon. members may know, I could never understand why teachers were not given the same rights as others. After all, embassy employees have that right as well as servicemen abroad.

I should like to mention also my support for the Chief Electoral Officer who, I think, has done a very good job in assisting and advising the committee. I should like to mention three or four other people such as the executive directors of the political parties who know a great deal about fund raising and perhaps not so much about how the funds are spent, but they were of great assistance during the deliberations of the committee. I would like to agree with the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre who pointed out that there was a certain amount of good-natured raillery in the committee but the end result was politicians meeting in committee and hammering out compromises which, I believe, have vastly improved the bill. I take pleasure in supporting it.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as we have been listening to this debate I am sure that all of us have been thinking how fortunate we are to live in a democracy where there is open access to the political process. Equally so I think the care and attention which members on all sides of the House have given to the details of this bill are evidence of how important it is, and how members prize access to the political process. The very careful attention, as a number of members have said, and the non-partisan quality of the attention given in committee are another indication of the importance of amendments to the Canada Elections Act.

The amendments that have been made in recent years have all been aimed at broadening the basis of participation. An amendment was made some time ago to allow new citizens earlier access to the political process. I want to address myself very briefly to the question of new parties.

There are two national parties now represented in the House which began as regional parties. Changing times require different responses. Political parties express the way in which people want to work for social betterment and social change. Different times require different solutions, and a statute which is aimed at some degree of permanence obviously must provide ease of access for new parties which may be needed in future times.

In this connection the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) yesterday described, very accurately I think, the tax credit as being the most progressive measure introduced since universal suffrage. But measures that are intended for the common good may be misused by a minority, and I think there is a potential for abuse through a loophole which exists in the present bill and which it was not possible to close now but which I hope the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections will address when it next considers amendments to the Canada Elections Act.

At present there are 15 fringe groups which have signified their intention to run candidates in the next election. If they meet the requirements for auditors, and so on, and if they nominate 50 candidates, they will maintain their rights until the following election, whenever that may be. Thus, regardless of their share of the popular vote, regardless of whether the public has indicated support for their policies or their ideas, as things stand, any fringe group which has 50 candidates nominated and which has met the other requirements will be able to retain its right to give tax receipts. I suggest that this is perhaps not the intention of the act and therefore should be reviewed.

If I may make my point with figures, let me point out that of those 15 fringe groups which are now ready to organize candidates in the next election, two ran a substantial number of candidates in the last election; one party obtained nationally 16,260 votes, or .17 of the total votes cast, and the other party obtained 12,100 votes nationally, or .13 of the total votes cast. To put it another way, neither of these parties which claim to be national parties received as many votes as the one independent member who sits in the House.

While I think it is extremely important that access be kept open for new parties, I also suggest that in future, after having allowed a party access during one election, if at the end of that election the voters by their ballots give a message that a particular party is not accepted, as indicated by its share of the popular vote, consideration be given to de-registering that party.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I do no intend to take up too much time in this third reading debate, but having sat on the committee in past months when we were preparing suggested amendments, and then having sat again as we studied the amendments brought forward by the government, I have a few things to say.

I am always a little concerned when all-party co-operation reaches the point where one finds a prairie radical praising the extent of that co-operation. Something has gone rather sadly wrong when that happens, and while I do not ordinarily consider myself an iconoclast, I become a little suspicious when I hear a hymm of praise being sung to cosy arrangements by which everything is worked out through a thoroughly mutual agreement. I am happy to say that there was an instant or two in the processing of these amendments when committee votes were held even if that meant that objections were overridden by a majority of people opposed to the objectors. However, at least that happened.

The essential system in Canada errs basically as long as we have a situation—and this is my personal opinion, not the party doctrine—where tax funds go to help finance candidates, and I hope that the review promised after the first real test of the Canada Elections Act will take a good look at that aspect.

When everybody concerned is involved with the central authority and is partially funded by it, we have a breeding ground for cynicism, particularly amongst the young and the disaffected. I was not in parliament when that major change in principle was accepted, so I do not feel personally responsible for it.

I am concerned—and I am glad the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) raised this—about the weaknesses of the Canada Elections Act in terms of the frivolous party and the frivolous candidate. I know one can become very sanctimonious about democracy and easy access through this act for everybody, but one of the things about modern electioneering and modern technology is that both have vastly increased the rewards to people who are either neurotic or slightly deranged—and I hesitate to use those words—who manage to get over the easy hurdles to become candidates and who may have a sufficient number of like-minded friends to be registered as a national party. To me this is done with ridiculous ease. There are televised all-candidate forums, halls are rented, and other opportunities are provided.

There is an enormous amount of free publicity for anyone who manages to become a candidate in an election. There is a great capacity for mischief. We are so deeply into the process of funding mischief publicly at election time that I think we must examine this aspect very seriously.

Through the Canada Elections Act I suspect that we will have succeeded in producing ballots which will be of enormous length. The candidate field will become increasingly crowded by people who will have no particularly good reason for being there except a love of attention and lust for the free publicity which comes with the electoral process.

We have spent a lot of time on the issue of easy access to polling stations. Nobody would deny that there are benefits, whether they are for teachers overseas, the military, or the handicapped. All that is entirely and utterly praiseworthy, but we have still failed to adopt a permanent voters' list and a full scale absentee ballot. Until we do that I do not think we can be very proud of our easy access.

We have extended slightly the provision for advance polls. That takes care of the holiday week end trap into which we have fallen in recent elections. I am very concerned, however, about the clause which slipped through, over objection, regarding the extended eight days of voting in the returning officer's office. I am gravely concerned about control. I know how busy those offices are during the days prior to an election, and the last thing a returning officer wants is to have people showing up over a period of eight days asking to vote. I am not talking about advance poll dates.

Does this mean that the 15, 16, 20 or whatever number of registered political parties there might be will have scrutineers sitting around the returning officers' offices? If that is the case, they will be all over the place, and I suspect that the efficiency of the offices will be greatly hindered and that in the end, particularly in close elections—and I speak as one who has suffered through one of those—it is going to be dismaying to find, when everybody thinks the ballots are counted, the returning officer showing up with one more barrel collected in those eight days, dumping it out, and possibly altering the result of a close election. I will be interested in seeing how that little clause works in actual practice.

I know that when we speak of a permanent voters' list the question of the terrible expense is always raised, but I have yet to see a really good analysis of what that expense would be compared with the expense of our present enumeration system.

One of the things that amazes me in our increasingly urban society is the way the Canada Elections Act still reflects in several instances the old myth that country life is pure, serene, and innocent, and that city life is corrupt and defiled. I suspect it works both ways. In town two people do the enumerating, but in the country there is only one. On the other hand, I suspect it is easier now to miss an entire high rise apartment block than a single farm house in a rural area.

There are many anomalies. A missed rural voter can be sworn, but not an urban one. I find this kind of discrepancy between urban and rural amazing, particularly when our urban population is so enormous in proportion. When we pass Canada Elections Act amendments I am surprised that there is not rioting in the streets of our larger urban centres. However, people do not seem to be quite aware of how much this myth, which has outlived its day, persists in this act. I still suspect, though, that the reason we never seriously face up to the question of a permanent voters' list is our delight as politicians in the enormous source of small patronage which is handed out very directly and individually at election time.

I hope within the next decade or two we can adopt a permanent voters' list that would permit a full-scale absentee ballot. It would be much better than scrapping the list after every election. That strikes me as a pretty amateurish move when through technology the election, campaigning, disclosure, use of the Income Tax Act and many other things have become very sophisticated. In this one area, however, we remain singularly primitive.

I am happy for the change that provides that the cost of a recount can be borne publicly if the margin is low enough. I know from personal experience how easy it is, when margins are small, to find a variety of ways in which minor factors can mean winning or losing an election. I fought one close election where an entire community was disenfranchised without recourse. I admit the circumstances were unusual, but they lost their vote until the next election four years later.

It seems that 1972 is the last year for which we have the report of individual expenses of those candidates who declared them. I could not locate one for 1974 and I think I know why. In the majority of cases in 1972 the winning candidate was the one who spent the most money. Where he spent about twice the amount spent by the other candidates, the majority was higher.

I was pleased to see that the move to index election spending has been halted. There are parties in this House who have some way to go to meet the limits which, to my mind, are ridiculously high. The escalation of election expenses has been fantastic. When I came here in 1965 I declared $2,160 in election expenses and was the second "cheapest" member elected that year in terms of expenses. In 1968 my campaign cost $6,000; by 1972 it was up to $12,000, and in 1974 it was $17,000. That kind of escalation of expenses is unnecessary, but even at that the $17,000 spent in 1974 was well below the limit set in the act.

I think many elections should pass before the limits are raised. In our deliberations here we have greatly contributed to the cost of elections. I would rather some of that money went to the development of a permanent voters' list and an absentee ballot rather than toward an over-kill in election campaign expenses.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I will be quite brief but there is one point I should like to make with reference to the Canada Elections Act. Changes to the act since the last federal election impose a number of restrictions on what a candidate may do, most particularly on the amount of money that may be spent on a campaign. That is good. There are restrictions in the act and it calls for penalties if they are breached. But if a candidate's official agent makes a mistake in collecting or spending money, the candidate who unintentionally disobeys the act may have to pay a fine or even go to jail. I do not know whether mens rea applies.

Sometime ago under the Protection of Privacy Act a section was bootlegged that went into the Official Secrets Act. Under this section it is very possible that a Solicitor General—of any party—may be able to get a warrant without authorization from a judge and by making the usual application under the Criminal Code could issue a warrant to have a candidate's campaign headquarters, his personal telephone or the telephones of his friends wiretapped.

I must give credit for this conclusion to someone else. Mr. Ron Atkey and I were on a panel addressing young people in the Quebec convention, on privacy. I dealt with the problems of the Code and he dealt with this, and I was so impressed that I felt I should bring it to the attention of the House this afternoon. Section 6 of the Protection of Privacy Act reads in part as follows:

> The Solicitor General of Canada may issue a warrant authorizing the interception or seizure of any communication if he is satisfied by evidence on oath that such interception or seizure is necessary for the prevention or detection of subversive activity directed against Canada or detrimental to the security of Canada or is necessary for the purpose of gathering foreign intelligence information essential to the security of Canada.

It defines the terms "subversive activity" as follows:

> activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change—

God knows we need a government change—do we ever need a new government. It continues:

> —within Canada or elsewhere—

It then deals with various methods—force or violence—but I leave that out. It is the following "or" that counts when it continues:

> —or any criminal means;

Let me read it again, Mr. Speaker:

> activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by force or violence or any criminal means;

When I go into an election campaign, Mr. Speaker, I not only work my heart out but I pray that we will get a new government some day—especially since 1968. I do everything in my power to bring about change in this country. I speak outside Alberta; I go to Ontario, to British Columbia, I do everything I can, but I have not been fortunate enough to get a change of government, but if I do it by criminal means—

An hon. Member: The good Lord is not listening to your prayers.

Mr. Woolliams: Sometimes the good Lord loves those who work hard but do not accomplish their objectives. All of us on this side of the House try to change the government. While we are about that, our official agent may make a mistake under the Canada Elections Act. If mine did, somebody could go to the Solicitor General of the day and say that quiet, well-mannered, soft-spoken young fellow from Calgary North has violated the Canada Elections Act and is guilty of criminal activity. The Solicitor General could then authorize a wiretap on my campaign headquarters, on my home telephone, and on the telephones of my political friends, of whom I have many. Our majorities on this side verify that we all have. I am sure the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), who put his foot in his mouth today—and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has now disowned him—will find out that his majorities were not won through his own efforts. I give that credit to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) because at one time Alberta was not Conservative. In 1953 Alberta had two Conservative members and Saskatchewan had one member. You could generally hold your meetings in a clothes closet in the prairie provinces up until the time of the right hon. member. Then fellows like myself came along. We defeated the Social Credit party federally and we came into the House.

● (1532)

There is a point I want to drive home with a sledge hammer because this was bootlegged in under this act. I am always guilty of trying to overthrow the government. I try to do that every day. However, I do not do it by any criminal means. I do not have any worker tearing down Liberal signs or wrongfully collecting money. I will bet at the time of the next election there will not be one candidate elected who has not broken this act.

All this rhetoric is very well, but I have talked to a lot of good lawyers about this act. I went to one. A lawyer never tries to act for himself because he ends up with a fool for his client. These lawyers inform me that no one could obey this stupid act.

I am always guilty of trying to overthrow the government. I might have some worker getting into some criminal act under the Canada Elections Act and I will end up with wiretaps. I do not want that after what we have seen in this House this past month or so. We saw that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) could not make any statement under the rules because they had left their nice little jobs. They keep sweeping everything under the table to cover up these things. I do not have enough faith to believe that this could not happen in this nation. I tried to get recognized during the question period today in order to ask the minister about that. I may do that later.

It is not the Elections Act that has to be changed, but the definition of subversive activity. I have never heard of anything so nonsensical. It refers to "activities directed toward accomplishing government change within the act by any criminal means". If that does not mean what Ron Atkey claims it means, I do not understand English. As a senior member of parliament, I warn this House that we had better make that change.

I do not want the telephone in my campaign headquarters tapped. There have been times when I have said some things about my dear old Liberal friends that may have been a bit unfair. When I listen to their speeches, they have one song for Quebec, one song for Ontario, and a chorus for British Columbia. They could not say the same thing in the same place in the same way, twice.

As an example of that, I can refer to wage and price controls. During the last campaign, they said that would take out the heart of every Canadian. They said it would ruin the labour movement and management and would control farm prices at the gate. Before the Prime Minister got back to Sussex Street, with or without his campaign manager, he implemented what all his candidates criticized. There they sit, hushed with that degree of integrity which only their party can muster. I do not take kindly to that.

Mr. Harquail: What a joker.

Mr. Woolliams: I want to deal with the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) over television. He is always talking, always yelling from his seat. I have asked him over the years he has been here to please make a contribution to his constituency, to get up and say something, even if it is good-bye. His yelling makes the Canadian people angry because he has no manners.

I believe I have made my point, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the kind attention that has been given to me this afternoon.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that I do not think it is in order for a member when speaking on a particular matter before the House to spill over in the way the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) just attempted to do in a most improper manner. I wanted to point that out so the record will demonstrate that he was completely out of order.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) knows more than the Speaker as to when order should be restored.

Mr. Harquail: Who are you? Where did you come from?

Mr. Dick: We in this country have been indeed fortunate over the past number of years to have as our Chief Electoral Officer a man of the calibre, integrity, ability, and non-partisan fairness of Jean-Marc Hamel.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: I joined the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in January, 1973. I have had the opportunity of seeing this man being the witness at our meetings. He has always tried to be fair, tried to live up to the reputation of being non-partisan and giving fair quarter to each and every person. I have never seen a witness do a better job before any committee I have attended. I give him full marks for running a good show. I do not think anyone else could do it on the budget that he has. In this committee there has been a sense of non-partisanship, a sense of fairness, and a sense of people wanting to work together to improve the electoral system within Canada.

If we look at the minutes of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for April 29, 1976, we see the names of six or seven private members whom we formally thank in the report back to the House for their contributions of private members' bills which came to the attention of that committee.

The committee adopted the content of those bills from all parties on all sides of the House. It considered them in a non-partisan manner. Some were too expensive to be implemented, some were considered to be appropriate and we recommended that the government introduce them. The government brought them forward in Bill C-5 and they will shortly be part of the law of this country. That shows the importance that individual members can have in trying to perfect our electoral process.

It has been suggested that Bill C-5 to amend the Canada Elections Act would be a very complicated piece of legislation. You will need a Philadelphia lawyer at your elbow every time you want to collect ten cents for this or spend ten cents for that. A chartered accountant will be required in your office most of the time. No doubt the complexity of the Canada Elections Act has been increased since the 1974 election. I hope that all members of the House will agree that some time in the future, perhaps after the next election, the Canada Elections Act will be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. This would allow them to go over the act much as they did in 1968 and 1970 to streamline it, to find out the flaws, to identify the well-meant ideas in the legislation which just cannot be carried through in practice.

I hope, too, we could renumber the clauses because I am getting tired of looking at decimal places. We talk about section 70, section 70.1, section 70.2, subsection 3, subparagraph (a) (i) and so on. It becomes very complicated because of the amendments which have been introduced. It is nobody's fault, but it would be good from the point of view both of hon. members and of electoral procedure if the bill were streamlined.

I did wish to speak briefly on a matter which unfortunately was brought up on the report stage—motions Nos. 8 and 12. These dealt with the deputy returning officer being appointed by the candidate who represented the political interests of the government of the day. I was very disappointed that the proposals in this regard were not accepted. On the other side it would have meant that the poll clerk would have been appointed by the candidate other than the candidate of the political interest who had come first or second other than the opposing interest to the government's interest, which would have meant a Progressive Conservative poll clerk in some situations or an NDP or Social Credit poll clerk; possibly it could be a communist or a Marxist-Leninist. They have the right, they have the freedom, and I think it would have appeared fair to have embodied such a provision within the election law. This is the way things are run in the province of Ontario following a change in the early seventies. It is run this way in the province of Quebec, except that in Quebec it is provided that the government of the day appoints the deputy returning officers and the party which forms the official opposition appoints the clerk. Having it the other way spreads it out among all the parties. Both, in essence, are the same.

Representatives of two parties are within reach of the polls, and to my mind this indicates a sense of balance, a sense of fairness, especially when one considers that we appoint members from two parties to be enumerators in urban ridings. One never finds members from the same party enumerating a single poll, and since the practice has been adopted in that case it seems to me it could follow through to the DRO and the poll clerk. I believe such a measure would avoid a great deal of confusion. After talking to those who work as returning officers or who are employed in the office of the Chief Electoral Officer, I understand this is the biggest single problem they face on election day consequent upon the confusion between the provincial acts and the federal act. I believe the change I have in mind would bring equity to all, and I hope some day the government might see fit to bring in this progressive piece of legislation.

There are other matters upon which I should like to comment. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), one of my colleagues on the committee, made various statements in the House yesterday and again today. First, he told us how he had gone to a political fund-raising dinner. He did not think I knew how fund-raising was done in our party or in his party or in the Liberal party. I certainly know how it is done in my party and in my constituency, and I have a reasonable idea of how it is done in the other parties. But since I am not a member I cannot vouch for every detail. He may know better what goes on in the other parties than I do.

He told us how he went to a banquet along with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in honour of the eightieth birthday of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). He said he was embarrassed that he had gone there, and that I did not know how the fund raising was done, and so on. I see, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre is back in the Chamber after having a smoke. All I wanted to say was this: I know he might have been embarrassed, but it was political good sense that the member for Regina-Lake Centre, in the middle of Saskatchewan, should go to a celebration in honour of the premier politician of that province because, if he did not go, he probably would not get elected the next time.

Mr. Benjamin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not mind the hon. member referring to my remarks, but I want him to be accurate. I said I was embarrassed by receiving a receipt for tax credit purposes from the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Dick: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have the floor. Sometimes the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre does not even read what he himself has said. If he would read Hansard at page 1921 he will find that his words were:

> I am slightly embarrased to tell him of a banquet which was celebrated in honour of the eightieth birthday of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. That celebration was attended by approximately 2,500 people. As a matter of courtesy, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself paid $50 each to the Progressive Conservative party to attend that banquet.

He said he was embarrassed because he went. I do not see anything about tax there at all.

Some hon. Members: Read on!

Mr. Dick: I intend to go on through the speech. Everyone is entitled to his turn. He went on to say I had forgotten to mention that the Progressive Conservative party was using the tolling-through system by using the federal tax credit. I want to assure him that I certainly did not intend this. In fact, as reported at page 1914 yesterday, the hon. member will see that I did refer to the fact that my own party was involved as well, although we had refrained in the first year. I also said in the committee that my party was involved in this as much as any other party. The fact is, the parties themselves have a stake in it, and that is the reason they do not want to get out of it. I am not saying it is right. I know what the parties want, but I feel very strongly it is wrong.

The hon. member went on to talk about the loopholes. He did not go on to talk about the financing by Canadian tax dollars of municipal elections, the Spanish Socialist party or the potential funding of parties in Chile and in Argentina, but these are matters which have been discussed, and since I put them on record yesterday I do not propose to do so today.

What did concern me somewhat today was that the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre was perhaps a little unfair. To begin with, on a point of order, he asked the Speaker, "Who said no?" He said: "I didn't hear anybody." And although he professed not to have heard anybody, he then singled one member out when he got up later. I do not know whether it is proper to single out a person on the basis of how he votes, whether consent is given or not. I would remind hon. members that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre drew attention to the absence of a quorum in December of 1974 in a surprise move which caught everybody off guard and had the effect of preventing the debate from proceeding. No strenuous objection to that was voiced in the House, although I know there were comments in the press and there were probably some comments behind the curtains. I might also say that the former member for Skeena, Mr. Frank Howard, had a reputation for denying consent.

Mr. Peters: But he always knew why he did it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Because the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) has mentioned my name I think I should make one slight correction. I would be quite happy if I could take the credit for calling the quorum on that particular occasion, but the credit should go to my hon. friend from Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Mr. Dick: My apologies. I made an error. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) is well known for his knowledge of the rules, and he has on many occasions denied unanimous consent. At least, to stand corrected, he has called a quorum. I do not feel that I should be embarrassed since the New Democratic Party has done this sort of thing on numerous occasions. I can also point to the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) who has done this on many occasions, especially when he was on this side of the House. The government does it every day with motions under Standing Order 43. Yet I am now asked to quit a committee because I did it on one occasion. I do not think that that is a fair reflection.

I have worked on the committee and supported many amendments which the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre has proposed. I supported many amendments to the Election Expenses Act which John Harney, a former New Democrat from Toronto, put, as well as amendments put by the former member for Skeena, Frank Howard. The hon. member singles me out, not knowing this has happened, and I am supposed to feel embarrassed, but I can hardly do so when his own party has such a good record of obstruction.

The hon. member talks of diverting funds, and says we are worried about brown bags. I argued very vociferously in Committee on the disallowance of anonymous donations. He said that if motion No. 15 does not go ahead there would be room for the little brown bag to be used for siphoning off purposes. I suggest the hon. member has not read that particular section in the legislation which specifically states, in subclause (4), that such a person cannot in any way be affiliated to a political party which is running a candidate. Otherwise a person would have to commit perjury in our courts and he would be tried for that crime as well. Is the hon. member suggesting that political parties will tell people to take an extra $1,000 and force them to commit perjury? This situation is already covered in the act, so I think he is completely off base there and does not really know what he is talking about.

There is no doubt that the party back room boys might have liked the motion as well, and perhaps it was discussed by some of them in an ad hoc committee in a back room somewhere.

Mr. Benjamin: Are you accusing hon. members of going into the back room?

Mr. Dick: I am not accusing anybody. Whether or not it was done in an ad hoc committee, it certainly was never done in the Standing Committe on Privileges and Elections. I have before me issue No. 1 of the committee proceedings, on page 18 of which the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) discussed the matter thoroughly with Mr. Hamel. The chairman became involved, and so did a Mr. Gorman. They discussed the matter, but it was dropped. No motion was moved. There was no further discussion at that stage.

At pages 18 and 19 of issue No. 2 I asked Mr. Hamel a few things about the Roach case. Again no motion was moved. There was no suggestion that the bill in front of the committee at that time should be amended. There is no suggestion in that regard anywhere on the record.

Mr. Benjamin: You know where it came from.

Mr. Dick: I came up again briefly on Wednesday, November 23, at pages 17 and 18 of issue No. 3, in a way that indicated that the existing section was perfectly adequate. But other than those three isolated instances, Mr. Speaker, there is no discussion of the matter in committee. As I say, no motion was made to amend the bill in committee.

If a motion had been made in committee and had been lost, then I would certainly have supported what the committee said and would have endorsed it on the floor of the House. I approached three members of the House, and the first time that I saw that amendment was when it was set down on Tuesday. I showed it to a person in my own party who has been following the matter very closely. I showed it to a member of the Liberal party, whom I will not identify—he can identify himself—and he was shocked and surprised and did not know that it was going to come up. I expressed the view that the government was trying to bootleg something in.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, that amendment would deny freedom of speech to a number of people. It would mean that you cannot name a candidate or a political party. If I am the Conservative candidate in an election for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton and I take a different position from that taken by a member of, say, the Pro-Life League, then if a newspaper cannot report that there is a denial of a right. After all, if you cannot stand the heat in the kitchen it is time to get out. If a person makes a statement, Mr. Speaker, a newspaper should be able to use his name and point to his party. The fact is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) is seeking the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would not want to mislead the House. Would he permit a question to clarify that latter statement?

Mr. Dick: Perhaps at the end of my remarks there will be time for a question. The fact is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, before the time expires for government business at four o'clock I think it is important to draw the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is a House order to dispose of all aspects of this bill prior to entering into private members' hour. I draw that to the attention of the Chair so that we do not miss that point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Precisely. Since it is four o'clock and a House order was issued yesterday that the question be put at this time, the question is as follows: The Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik), for Mr. MacEachen, has moved that Bill C-5, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be now read the third time and do pass. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

Order No. 2, the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay); shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand by unanimous consent.

Order No. 4, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis); shall the item stand?

He said: I am inspired by this packed House and attentive audience on a Friday afternoon before Christmas to deal with a subject which is of importance to me.

It is well known that the rules of our Chamber allow each member only one notice of motion per session. I have used my one per session thirteen different times in my years here to deal with this particular subject which I believe is of the utmost importance.

I said it the first time I spoke on a similar motion that the relationship of our country to the Commonwealth Caribbean could be the most important touchstone of our whole external outreach program, as we used to call it in those days. If we cannot be successful in our dealings with the sister states of the commonwealth to the south of us, we may find ourselves incapable of launching vast programs across the world.

I have enlarged my motion of former years and I have no specific reference in this year's motion to such places as the Turks and Caicos Islands. While I have not altered my view that the Canadian people, parliament, and the government should always welcome any desire of the people of the smaller islands to the south who might wish to unite with us, the subject was well discussed in previous debates. I still say, however, that the reason advanced by a government spokesman a few years ago was, in my opinion, most outrageous in that he said we could not assist the Turks and Caicos Islands because to help them might cause other islands to feel that they had been neglected. That is a very narrow view of world leadership and community relations in this hemisphere.

There has been a long story, Sir, of the special relationship between our country and the lands mentioned in this particular motion. We took a long time to get out of our own colonial status, and it was a good many years before we had any real expression in the field of foreign policy. History records that the first area to which we gave attention in a diplomatic way and in terms of economic relationship after the United States and the United Kingdom—an interest in which we could not escape no matter how we tried—was the Commonwealth Caribbean. In a recent book on "Canada and the Third World"—modesty forbids that I mention the author of the section on Canada and the Caribbean—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Please do!

Mr. Macquarrie: It indicates since the days of John A. Macdonald there was a special concern. Sir John A. Macdonald appointed Sir Francis Hincks—as his special adviser on Caribbean affairs. In 1912, 1920 and 1925 there were meetings at the very highest level of the leaders of the government from that region and from Canada. I had the privilege of being in attendance at the 1966 meeting. I was not born in the time of the first two. I was much too young to be admitted to the third one, but I did make it for the last one and it was a great occasion.

The motion, Sir, embraces some concepts that I did not talk about on previous occasions, and you have read them to the House. It deals more with economic situations than it did in previous years. I believe that reflects the concern that I have and that my colleagues have over the depressing economic ills that our country is now facing. I come from a part of the land where we have been disadvantaged so long that we have grown accustomed to it. But I can assure you we have not grown to like it, we do not intend to like it, and do not intend to tolerate it forever.

I have sought to put into this private member's motion some suggestions whereby the part of Canada from which I come, because of its propinquity to the Commonwealth Caribbean might take steps under government leadership to enhance our position in the eastern extremities of the Dominion of Canada. There once was a time when we were much privileged to be located on the Atlantic Ocean, when the Atlantic Ocean was one of the great corridors of commerce. Now we find that we are on the tag end of the transportation system. We pay more freight rates than anyone else. We wait longer to have our goods and services moved, and we have greater inconvenience than other parts of the land.

I think there is still an opportunity to make our maritime location an advantage. That is why I talk, Sir, of the importance of assisting in the shipbuilding industry. One of the tragedies that has occurred in this Dominion in my time, I haven't been through the whole thing, I am not quite a Father of Confederation but they say I look like one—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: Thank you. I can remember when our merchant fleet was the fourth largest in the whole world. And now it matters not where I go, I always go to the wharves,—my father was a sailor and I love harbours—I always go down to the seaports and I never see a Canadian flag on any ship around—it is a disgrace that we should have lost our great tradition as the sailors, mariners, navigators of the world. I believe there is yet room for the construction of ships, for training in the most modern circumstances, with the best of refrigeration and exchange of goods and services between ourselves, the eastern seaboard of the United States and especially with the Commonwealth Caribbean. I am emphasizing that in my motion.

As a maritimer, I am emotional about this because we have long had ties of affection and good will with these people. Perhaps we reflect that in that we have learned long ago the virtues of rum, and we know there is only one area of the world that really produces good rum, and that is the Caribbean area.

Although I am a great nationalist and I am all in favour of the Chamber of Commerce of the Atlantic region in supporting maritime products, but because I love my stomach and my health, I won't go quite so far as to support maritime rum, and I have to deviate from that. We sold fish and we brought back rum, and nutritionally they got the best end of the bargain, I suppose. But in the gustatory sense I think we got the better end of the bargain!

There are opportunities, not vast opportunities, there is no way that we can expect tremendous expansion of trade but I am confident, and I have looked at the figures just an hour ago, that there are opportunities for improvement. I would like to see a committee of both Houses look at this matter very carefully. If I should happen to be sitting on the other side as one of the members of the joint committee, I will be quite delighted because I think the Senate study of the Commonwealth Caribbean was a very fine, definitive work and I consult it every time I make a speech or write an article about this particular area. They did a good job and they went into it thoroughly and came out with some very splendid recommendations.

I would like to see us return to leadership. I would like to see us do what the Hon. Leon Balcer did when he was minister of transport which was to encourage, assist and subsidize our shipbuilding facilities; and we have them in the area. I was shocked a couple of years ago to discover that representatives of the government of Cuba were coming to Canada and placing contracts with Canadian shipbuilding companies for ships to ply the eastern trade. Canadian shipyards, with Canadian inspiration and subsidization, should have been providing those.

A happy occurrence took place in recent years when the Cubans sent a ship into Charlottetown. That ship returned to Cuba with a cargo of the finest cattle and hogs that Prince Edward Island farmers can produce. No islander can make a speech without talking about potatoes or rum. Our best potatoes are being sent down to the Caribbean, especially Puerto Rico this year. That will do wonders for their agricultural community.

We have a great opportunity, but we should give it more priority. There comes a time in the life of a nation when things are taken for granted, such as these very small communities in the Commonwealth Caribbean. These communities are able to function with the best traditions of the parliamentary heritage which is ours as well. I have seen tiny legislatures in the Caribbean which follow meticulously our rules and procedures. Although it is not for me to reflect upon any incumbent government, the people of the Caribbean are capable of changing governments from time to time. I believe that is healthy, in any case.

An hon. Member: They do it more often than we do.

Mr. Macquarrie: Yes. Since I have been moved from the far right of my party over to the far left, although I realize this right-left terminology is meaningless in Canadian political parlance, I am delighted to be here among my NDP friends.

I was never upset when I heard people referring to the election of socialist governments and how they should be watched. I do not think Mr. Manley is a communist. I had the pleasure of having breakfast with him at Blair House, when my leader invited me to do so. Also I have met Mr. Burnam and most of the other Caribbean leaders. Possibly in their efforts to stimulate the economies of their countries, they are implementing socialist measures as Sir John A. Macdonald did during the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was a great step toward nationalization. Our party has contributed toward socializing the sectors of the economy which required socialization because of certain common goals.

I think Caribbean politicians are well intentioned, and I wish them well in their endeavours. Canada benefits if that part of the world is prosperous. We benefit if their political institutions are viable. There has been notable progress. As the time when their federation was breaking up, I felt many communities would not be able to make a go of it; but I am happily surprised that so many of the small communities with apparent disadvantages have been so successful. Canada should be a party to the furthering of their success in order to strengthen the ties between us that are historical, emotional, sound, rational, and geographic.

Since we are in the spirit of Christmas, I should like to say to those who take part in this debate, regardless of whether they speak for or against, are invited to join me in a pre-Christmas drink of the fruit of the cane. If they have a lesser taste in beverage, they can partake of something less delightful than rum. And although by tradition we do not formally notice their presence, I hope the diplomats from the Commonwealth Caribbean who are in the gallery, will also join us in order to discuss this matter more informally at the conclusion of this debate which, I am sure, will result in unanimous support for my motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Caribbean Community

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). His generosity has been extended well beyond the usual bounds, as evidenced by his invitation at the end of his speech.

Not only is he a member of parliament who has shown a great deal of interest in the Caribbean by visiting there but, as he indicated, on 13 occasions in 13 sessions of parliament he put this motion before parliament. That offered us an excellent opportunity to talk about the Caribbean, and especially the relationship which exists between Canada and the Caribbean. Certainly I support his interests in that regard.

As the influence of Great Britain has become less and less, more and more colonies of the Caribbean have become independent countries. This provides Canada with a natural opportunity to play a meaningful role there. The relationship which exists between Canada and the Caribbean is a mature and positive one, with no overtones of colonialism.

The hon. member for Hillsborough made a special contribution to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association by acting as a chairman of the Canada-Caribbean committee for several years. This committee provides a vehicle for meetings and exchanges between Caribbean members of parliament and legislators with Canadian members of parliament and senators.

I am sure his motion covers many of the important items to which any special committee of the Senate and House of Commons would want to address itself. With the kind of weather we have been experiencing in Canada during the last couple of weeks, because of the onset of winter, we are all very conscious of the special opportunities afforded to Canadians for vacation and recreation in the Caribbean during the winter months.

Our long association with the Caribbean dates back to colonial times when we exchanged commodities such as fish and wood products for such items as molasses and rum. The early commercial records of the Barbados mention that from 1771 to 1773 fish, lumber, shingles, staves, hoops, peas and beans were being imported from Canada. By 1860 Canadian vessels were sailing regularly to the British West Indies with fish, some potatoes and lumber; returning with sugar, salt, molasses and rum. There has been a continuing communication between our countries, a fact commented upon at the Canada-West Indies Conference of 1912 by the then minister of industry, trade and commerce for Canada, the Honourable George E. Foster. At that time he said the following:

> For a number of years Canada and the West Indies have been communicating with each other, and have been endeavouring in various ways and at different times to stimulate the volume of trade and to improve the means of intercommunication.

At that time Mr. Foster also mentioned that for 15 years Canada had given preferences to goods coming from the West Indies. This 1912 conference saw the signing of a Canada-British West Indies Treaty. A second trade conference was held in 1920, and a Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement resulted.

Caribbean Community

A further development occurred in 1925 with the signing of another Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement, a significant feature of which was a fairly broad exchange of preferences between the signatories. This agreement regulated trade between the two parties until 1966 when, in recognition of the changes which had occurred over the years, heads of governments of the Commonwealth Caribbean countries and Canada met in Ottawa July 6-8, 1966, to discuss their relationship. Subjects of mutual interest were examined, including trade, aid, transportation, and communications. A protocol to the 1925 Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement was signed providing for review of the agreement following the Kennedy Round. The protocol dealt principally with specific commodities including rum, bananas, flour and codfish. It also provided for new consultative procedures on measures to encourage economic development and establish a Standing Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs.

● (1622)

A follow up meeting took place in St. Lucia the next year, and in 1970 there was a special Canadian mission to the Commonwealth Caribbean. By November, 1975, Canada and the Caribbean were again responding to changing conditions by re-examining their relationship. The discussions initiated at that time are continuing and are aimed at the conclusion of a new and updated agreement covering economic and trade matters.

Throughout the evolution of relations between the two areas Canada has remained an important supplier to the Caribbean. In general, we are the fourth or fifth most important trading partner of the various countries there, supplying to each about 5 per cent of its total imports and usually taking about 5 per cent of the exports of each. Indeed, Canada has achieved a relatively higher degree of penetration in this market than in most others.

From what I have just related, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the maturity of our relations is such that means for maintaining and enhancing them are already well established. Further verification of this is indicated by the diversity of formal and informal contacts between the two areas. Part (e) of the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough, touches on this subject and I would like to take the opportunity now to relate some examples of these contacts with particular reference to the last few years.

In 1975 our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) visited Trinidad and Tobago, Barbados and Guyana en route to the Commonwealth heads of government meeting. There have been three meetings since November, 1975, between Canadian and Caribbean officials to consider the formulation of a new agreement on trade and economic affairs. As I have mentioned, discussions are continuing.

Prime Minister Manley of Jamaica visited Canada in October, 1976. At that time a package comprising a line of credit, a short-term loan and CIDA aid for a total of $100 million was arranged. Utilizing Canadian consultants, CIDA has made an extensive survey of the possibilities in Jamaica and Barbados for joint ventures between Canadian and local firms.

This past October, Prime Minister Forbes Burnham of Guyana led a delegation of Guyanese officials to Ottawa for talks with our Prime Minister and Canadian officials. I am very pleased that at that time we had an opportunity to speak to the Senate foreign relations committee and our Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence and to respond to questions. I think this kind of opportunity for exchange is an important one, and one which seems to be expanding. It gives our parliamentarians who serve on that committee, and also to others who are interested, an opportunity to communicate directly in a semi-formal way with the heads of governments of the various countries in the Caribbean.

Also, this autumn, a group of Jamaican businessmen visited Canada to promote closer trade ties. Recently, a small delegation of Antiguan officials visited Ottawa for discussions with various federal departments. Apart from federally sponsored trade fairs and missions, there have been a number of provincially organized business missions to the Caribbean area.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the special relationship on a person to person basis which has developed between the CPA of the two regions. As you know, there are seven CPA regions in the world. One of them comprises all of the parliaments and legislatures in Canada, and another is the Caribbean region. We have an ongoing relationship, and I really want to compliment Mr. Speaker Jerome because I think he has given much momentum in increasing those contacts between the two regions of the association. Several representatives from the Caribbean attend international conferences such as the CPA conference which we held here in Ottawa in September of this year. That conference occurs in Canada only every ten years or so. Besides that, we have an ongoing special relationship between the two regions of the CPA because they are invited to our regional council meeting in May. It is essentially a meeting of Speakers of all legislatures. Special Speakers from the Caribbean are invited at that time to participate in those discussions, and they have an opportunity to visit various parts of Canada.

At our regional conference, which is held in one of the provincial capitals each summer, several delegates are invited from the Caribbean, and of course each November for the last five years we have had a seminar on parliamentary procedure at which there was very active participation. I believe three countries were represented, and three delegates this year attended that conference as well as two members from Canada who attended the regional conference. There is an ongoing exchange, and Mr. Speaker Jerome has been very active, together with myself, in promoting that. It falls in line with our general approach to enhance the relationship between these two regions of the world.

I would now like to turn my attention, Mr. Speaker, to the specific suggestions for improving Canada-Caribbean relations which my hon. colleague has made in his motion. I certainly appreciate his concern for this topic and the contribution a motion such as his makes to examination and hence clarification of issues relevant to Canada's national issue. However, I have difficulty with some of the hon. member's recommendations.

With reference to item (a) of the motion, I wish to advise the House that a long history exists of subsidization of steamship operators who contracted to furnish regular service between Canada and the West Indies. Direct subsidy payments by the Canadian government were, however, discontinued with the establishment of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamship Limited in 1928, an operation that continued, albeit incurring a substantial deficit, until its cessation in 1957. Since then, commercial shipping companies have provided services without recourse to subsidy.

The Canada-Caribbean service has presented shipowners with the dilemma of unbalanced outward and inward cargo movements. Saguenay Shipping Limited, a subsidiary of Alcan, by loading return cargoes of bauxite and alumina from the Caribbean region, has established a viable commercial basis for a Canada-Caribbean service and is thus an exception.

I would now like to turn to the part of the hon. member's proposal that falls most directly within the responsibilities of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. This is item (c) which reads:

that the proposed committee would consider such tariff changes as might facilitate the exchange of commodities between the two areas.

In order to explain some of the problems inherent in the proposal I would like to outline briefly recent developments in our trade relations with the Commonwealth Caribbean. Coming as he does from a region of Canada with longstanding trade ties with the Commonwealth Caribbean, I am sure the hon. member will be aware that our trade relations were primarily governed for many years by the provisions of the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement of 1925, to which I have already referred. Under this trade agreement Canada exchanged tariff preferences with the Commonwealth West Indies.

In the early seventies some of the countries of the Commonwealth Caribbean established the Caribbean Common Market as the successor to the Caribbean Free Trade Association. The Common Market provided for free trade between its members and for a common tariff applicable to imports from outside the region. The existing Commonwealth preferences which Canada enjoyed under the provisions of the 1925 agreement were subsumed into the new CARICOM common tariff.

However, the member countries of CARICOM, along with a number of African, Asian and Pacific countries, the ACP, which had traditional ties with the member countries of the European Economic Community, entered into negotiations with the European community with a view to signing an economic agreement. This agreement, which became known as the Lomé convention, provided, among other things, that the ACP countries would grant the EEC countries tariff treatment no less favourable than that granted to any other developed country, including, of course, Canada.

In order to meet their obligations under the convention the countries of CARICOM introduced a single column tariff effective January 1, 1976, which applied to imports from all sources with, of course, the exception of intra CARICOM trade. Another factor to bear in mind is that the United States scheme of tariff preferences for less developed countries places a somewhat similar onus on beneficiary countries, as does the Lomé convention. Thus, in order to obtain tariff preferences in the large United States market, Caribbean countries would be expected to phase out preferences granted to developed countries.

As the central element of the 1925 Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement is no longer valid, CARICOM and Canadian officials are negotiating a new agreement on economic and trade matters to provide a formal framework for the new relationship. The Bahamas, which is not a member of CARICOM, and Bermuda, which is not in the Caribbean but which was a signatory to the 1925 agreement, have both introduced one column tariffs. Canada continues to grant unilaterally the preferences in the Canadian tariff to the Commonwealth Caribbean and to Bermuda. In addition, these countries are also beneficiaries of Canada's system of generalized preferences for developing countries.

It follows from the withdrawal of our preferential tariff access to the Caribbean market that the only tariff adjustment possible which might benefit us is the reduction of certain of CARICOM's most favoured nation tariffs. These could, of course, apply equally to all outside suppliers to CARICOM. Canada will be raising this possibility within certain CARICOM member countries during the Tokyo Round of GATT tariff and trade negotiations now under way in Geneva.

Perhaps the greatest impediment to the sale of Canadian products in CARICOM markets is the extensive system of import controls now in effect in the region. Some of the countries of CARICOM, but especially Jamaica and Guyana, are suffering from severe balance of payments difficulties, exacerbated by rising petroleum costs, and have imposed stringent import control regimes. While we understand and sympathize with the difficult economic situation these countries find themselves in, we would expect to see the controls progressively dismantled as their economic situations ameliorate.

Trinidad and Tobago, alone among CARICOM members, is in a strong international financial position because of oil supplies there. We heard an excellent presentation by the High Commissioner in the committee of which the hon. member for Hillsborough is chairman, outlining the very favourable position of Trinidad and Tobago because of the oil resources in that country. However, Trinidad and Tobago has imposed a number of controls for development purposes. Random examples of Canadian exports which have been affected are apples, banned by Jamaica and Barbados; red kidney beans and onions, controlled by Jamaica; and synthetic fibre bags, banned by Trinidad and Tobago. Import controls and provision for consultation on such matters will be one of our considerations during negotiations for the agreement which is under discussion now.

I hope these brief comments outline some of the considerations we should have in mind if the hon. member's motion is passed and is discussed by the joint committee proposed by the hon. member. I certainly want to indicate my support for his proposal.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I too want to commend the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) on motion No. 16 which is before the House today. I urge all hon. members to support the motion so that we can study it in a very serious way in a committee.

I think the economies of the Caribbean and Canada are complementary and that we should be exploring the possibility of a common market relationship between countries in the Caribbean and Canada. Any common market arrangement which might evolve would be useful to both, and perhaps a few years down the road that commonwealth arrangement, if it could be established, might evolve into a more political association between the two, and perhaps even the unity of Canada with some parts of the Caribbean.

It would be my objective, if indeed we could get a committee established, to try to strengthen the relationships between the two now, with the objective being a common market relationship between Canada and as many countries in the Caribbean as possible and with the ultimate goal being political unity or political association in the future. This would offer a number of advantages to both. Canada is a great and beautiful country, as we all know. It has many things, but there are a few things we do not have, and that is primarily because of our climate. We do not have a tropical climate, and therefore we do not have tropical foods and fruits and the weather that goes along with those things in the winter time for vacations and the like. All Canada really misses is a tropical climate. The United States, the Soviet Union to some degree, and I suppose China have that. An association with the Caribbean would give us what we do not have.

The second point which should be made, and made as often as possible when we are talking about this, is that if Canada as a whole could benefit from a close association with the Caribbean, that would be so particularly in the Atlantic provinces. It is not very far between the four Atlantic provinces and the Caribbean. There is a high unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces, and many of the things we need from the Caribbean could come into Canada through the Atlantic provinces, putting people who are unemployed there to work.

The Atlantic provinces have the highest unemployment rate in our country. A close association with the Caribbean would perhaps create jobs in the transportation industry, the shipbuilding industry, and in our harbours. More jobs would be created in packaging some of the food which would be coming in from the Caribbean. Many of the things we might ship to the Caribbean would go through the ports of Atlantic Canada, and again there would be warehouses, packaging and transporting of goods to the ports in the Atlantic provinces. These things would create employment, which would immensely help Atlantic Canada and Canada generally.

There is a common link between Halifax and some of the well known ports in the Caribbean. It would be very sensible to plan the world, our country, and the Caribbean states, keeping things that are mutually advantageous in mind.

The other point I want to make is that the time has come when we have to diversify our trade as much as possible. All of us are very fond of the Americans and of the United States, but at the same time I think we are putting too many eggs in the American basket. It would be to the benefit of all of us if we were to transfer a few of those eggs to other parts of the world, and the most obvious part is the Caribbean. Instead of bringing in oranges from Florida and California, they could come in from the Caribbean countries, which would be better for us as well as for them.

Many Caribbean countries lack the things we have in this country, such as technological skills, and we could help them train their people in this way. With our technical know-how we could assist them to build the factories that they need. They also need many of the raw resources that we have in abundance. If there were a close relationship they could benefit from all this. Indeed, if they wanted to, they could even share our winter weather. As the hon. member for Hillsborough and I go down there to swim and enjoy their beaches, so could their people come up here to ski. There are a lot of things in the two regions that are complementary, and I think it makes sense to have the closest possible relationship.

I should like to point out, too, that it is not just the English-speaking islands in the Caribbean that are complementary to English-speaking Canada. In many of the islands where French is spoken such as Haiti, Guadeloupe and Martinique, an exchange could be arranged with the province of Quebec or the other French-speaking parts of Canada.

Someone mentioned the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) who, a few years ago, spoke of the possibility of the Turks and Caicos Islands becoming part of Canada. If he were here today I am sure he would still advocate that.

I hope the day will come when we have political union with some of the Caribbean countries. This motion should not be talked out today but should be given some serious study. In time we may reach a common market relationship and achieve a measure of political association. Several other hon. members have advanced convincing arguments, and I hope the motion will be adopted.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a few moments because I know that other hon. members wish to participate in the debate.

In 1975 I had the privilege of accompanying the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the heads of government meeting in Jamaica. Previous to that I went on a pre-tour to Guyana, Barbados, Trinidad and Tobago. I should like to express my very deep feeling and respect for the many things that we have in common with the open and genuine people in that part of the world.

These days we hear a great deal, both critical and positive, about the role that Canada, as a developed nation, should play in the Third World. I believe we are moving in the direction of saying that if we are to have such a role we should work with those countries with which we have had long ties and have developed a close relationship. I cannot think of any part of the world with which we have a closer relationship than the Caribbean. Those countries have, in common with us, a democratic system and a British heritage.

In the pre-trip that took place before the heads of government meeting, I particularly remember the time spent in Guyana. Speaking as a backbencher in private members' hour I admit that I saw things I would like to change in their democratic process, and things that I would challenge. The fact remains, however, that despite their difficult background and great economic pressure, they have a system that they are trying hard to make work within the modern world.

In Barbados I found a people with a literacy rate of 95 per cent or 98 per cent. In their last election a great friend of Canada, Mr. Barrow, lost to a new government, proving that democracy does reign. In that country Canadians of humble means live side by side with, and equal to the original people of that country.

In Trinidad and Tobago there is a difficult and complex situation. The people are striving for a full and free democracy and have achieved the fundamentals of the democratic process.

I sometimes read in the press that the Jamaican system is not democratic and of Prime Minister Manley being too close to Premier Castro. That is an absurdity. When the premier of Nova Scotia visited Cuba someone said to me that Mr. Regan was down there trying to make a better deal with the Cubans and wondered what would be said if René Lévesque had gone to Cuba. I have no particular liking for René Lévesque, but I am trying to say that the success of our country depends on looking at our friends with some understanding of their backgrounds.

I should like to commend the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) for bringing this motion forward. With such a sensitive, positive motion he is obviously sitting on the wrong side of the House. he should be over here with us.

I hope members of the government will read today's debate and pay heed to what has been said.

I see a fellow member from Toronto over there who many Canadians may feel is a trifle insensitive to the needs of the maritime areas of Canada. I suffer from that accusation from time to time. I must say, though, that he is a good economist and has shown some sensitivity for liberalism at various levels in Canada. Sitting with him are members from Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island who understand the heart and goodness and practicality of this world in which we must survive together. As a developed nation we must show the developing nations that we understand them and want to be a leader. As practical businessmen we want to create jobs and help our own people as well.

Three out of four of the members opposite are from the maritimes and, of course, recognize the importance of the fishery to both countries. We have fantastic resources in our fisheries although of course we want to rebuild depleted stocks. We must realize the strength we have in controlling our 200-mile limit. Our sales of fish to Jamaica, Trinidad, the Windward and Leaward Islands have shown an interesting trend over the last decade. They have faced problems on account of currency values and balance of payments, as well as the crash in the price of sugar.

Our nation depends on trade, and we must recognize the Third World. There is a real job to be done there. When I consider Trinidad and Tobago, as well as Jamaica and even the Dominican Republic, I realize there is the opportunity for trade with our fisheries, which would provide jobs for our maritime region where there is massive unemployment and would provide the Caribbean countries with the funds to buy the things they need.

I will be brief today, Mr. Speaker. Having had the advantage of being an active member of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and having met those fine, aggressive, and bright people who represent the Caribbean islands, I respect their traditions of democracy. I have in my constituency many people from that area. They want to help build my community and be good Canadians. As I say, I had the privilege of participating with the Prime Minister at the Commonwealth heads of government meeting. I therefore believe that we have a real role to play.

The hon. member's motion is not one which says we will give anything away during hard economic times. It states that if we care about our heritage, if we care about our brethren, if we are good businessmen, if we have products to sell, and if we want those nations to develop, they must have their fair share in the world. Canada should do what he suggests, and I hope we will.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that the last thing my distinguished colleague, the author of the motion, needs in order to speak eloquently about the Caribbean is a packed House. He does not need a packed House to be inspired every time he speaks about the Caribbean. He always does that with great affection. My colleague, the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming), has developed the same sentiment for the Caribbean. I had hoped he would be a little more brief so that I could have expressed some of the views I prepared on the subject.

I believe that members on both sides of this House hold great affection for the people of the Caribbean.

[Translation]

And I wish to congratulate my colleague and friend, the mover of this motion, for having enabled us to discuss in the House the possibilities of maintaining and developing better communications with the Commonwealth Caribbean. It seems to me particularly appropriate to show some concern for that part of the world which enjoys such a pleasant tropical climate while a premature winter has given us before Christmas some record low temperatures and several snow storms. While snow storms are welcomed by many among us who ski as I do, it remains that many Canadians can hardly wait for that season to go and enjoy the beauty of the south.

Of course, this subject is especially topical at this season since thousands of our fellow citizens are getting ready, as I said earlier, to fly to one of those islands in the Caribbean sea for the holiday season, which contributes to bringing us closer to those countries. Since recent developments in air transport have placed this area within a few hours of us and since the democratization of tourism has placed it within our means, the more than one hundred years old relations between our country and the Commonwealth Caribbean have become more intensified than ever.

This is why we must congratulate the mover of the motion under consideration this afternoon since it enables us once more to examine our relations with this area for which members on both sides of the House certainly feel much sympathy, great attachment and a unanimous concern to do everything possible to improve our present relations and to make current exchanges even more effective and meaningful. We must however ensure that the proposed methods are the most proper to meet this objective, and that they do not simply add to existing ones and contribute to slowing down present mechanisms, and, finally, hinder rather than help our efforts to meet our objectives. To bring more light into this matter, it would be appropriate to outline briefly the present state of relations between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean, the better to assess the suggestions made in the motion and determine if they are truly justified.

The ties between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean are nearly as ancient as the history of our country since they go back to the beginning of the 18th century. Even then, settlers in the Maritime provinces had developed trade exchanges based on cod and wood from Canada and sugar, rum, molasses and spices from the West Indies. This type of exchange has survived under various forms to the present time and has become more diversified and more intensive, and now the Canadian people themselves are closely involved in these relations because of the many immigrants from these islands who came to Canada and the thousands of Canadian tourists who spend their holidays in the Caribbean.

We, in Canada, tend to consider this area as a group of countries with similar characteristics. Yet, nothing is less true to reality because if that group of countries have much in common they are nevertheless characterized by a great diversity, be it geographic, demographic, economic, social, or because of the very nature of the problems each country must face. This explains in part the difficulties those countries had reconciliating their differences with their common regional interests. In spite of everything, those countries as a whole make up an area united by various cultural and social similarities. Those are realities we must take into account when dealing with them.

The resources of those countries can also vary a lot from one island to another, contributing to great variations between their respective economies and making their objectives and priorities difficult to reconcile. Thus bauxite plays an essential role in Jamaica and Guyana, where as oil and asphalt form the base of Trinidad's economic life, and other islands have to rely on sugar cane. It is true that from an agricultural point of view each of those states has arable farm lands provided they can be properly irrigated. But one thing all those countries share in common is the sun which gives them a pleasant tropical climate during our severe winters, and very inviting beaches. Of course, this allowed them to develop a particularly thriving tourist industry which provides them with jobs and generates valuable currencies for their expansion. However the benefit they can derive from tourism should not be exaggerated because the development of this industry is tied to a great extent to foreign investments which must be refunded and to the import of products which must be paid for in currency.

The political diversity which characterizes all these countries should also be noted, some of them having become independent while others—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Private members' hour has now expired. The House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. Monday pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 2(1).

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for unanimous consent of the House of Commons to introduce a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. At least 50,000 Canadians are going to be without jobs this winter unless this government introduces the employment tax credit legislation which was promised two months ago by the Minister of Finance. Since there is no possible excuse for further delay, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone):

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to introduce legislation by tomorrow, December 20, implementing the employment tax credit promised on October 20, on the understanding that such legislation will be dealt with in all stages before this House rises for Christmas.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented at this time pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REGRET AT IRRESPONSIBLE STATEMENTS CONCERNING MEANS TEST FOR SOME PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Mr. Allan Lambert, the chairman of the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability—the same Mr. Lambert who a while ago recommended $60,000 salaries for deputy ministers and now wants to cut back the public service—said in a radio interview this morning that the reference made by his commission to putting a means test on social programs was a matter beyond the terms of reference of that commission, which raises the question: Why did the commission make such a statement? I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House deplores irresponsible statements that call for means tests on, or the cutting back of, the social programs which have been put into effect by the Parliament of Canada, it being the view of this House that the time has come to increase the basic rate of the old age pension, making it available at age 60; and that action should be taken immediately to increase the basic amount of the war disability pension as a matter of good faith toward Canada's war veterans.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to the Standing Order can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF ANNUAL REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I too have a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and I know it will receive sympathetic consideration. Various matters of concern to veterans having reference to the basic rate of pension, widows' pensions, prisoner of war compensation and other matters reflect the urgent need that these matters be dealt with immediately. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras):

That the Veterans Canada Annual Report 1976-77 be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, it was agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The motion of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe can be presented to the House pursuant to Standing Order 43 for consideration at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTED MEASURES TO ASSIST PLANT CONSTRUCTION FOR PROCESSING RAW MATERIALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As we ship out of this country a far too large proportion of our primary products, to be processed to their final stages of production in other countries, which thereby gain the many advantages of employment, profits and taxes which accrue from this further processing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack):

That the government require those who export our raw materials to process a far higher proportion of them in this country, and make available generous tax incentives, in addition to the DREE grants, which have proved to be inadequate, in order to induce the building of the additional factories which will be needed.

Such a policy will retain in Canada many of the jobs we are today making available to workers in other countries, and make it possible to offer far more permanent jobs to our people, instead of the temporary, make-work kind, which is all the government seems able to offer our unemployed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTED DELAY OF PASSAGE PENDING ASSURANCE OF BANKS NO FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO CHILE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding an urgent and pressing matter. Canadian chartered banks are becoming deeply involved in making financial assistance available to the military dictatorship in Chile, particularly the Royal Bank, the Bank of Montreal, the Toronto-Dominion Bank and the Bank of Nova Scotia. In view of the concern being expressed by all church groups, reflected in the statement by Archbishop Edward Scott, primate of the Anglican Church of Canada, that these loans represent aid to an "oppressive and inhuman" regime in Chile and give banks a considerable interest "in the staying power of the regime", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That this House of Commons not pass Bill C-16, which extends the current Bank Act until April 1, 1979, unless assurances are given by Canadian chartered banks that they will stop providing financial assistance to the military dictatorship in Chile.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION OF DUTY ON WIDE FLANGE STEEL BEAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the disruption imposed on the B.C. steel fabricating industry, supporting a work force of 2,000 or more people, with the imposition of a 30 per cent duty last September on wide flange steel beams pending the anti-dumping tribunal decision on the appeal of Algoma Steel, and particularly in view of the regional antagonism already in place concerning protective measures for eastern Canadian industries at the expense of the outback regions of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

● (1412)

That the government take immediate measures to return this duty to 10 per cent in order to protect this $30 million B.C. industry that provides more than 2000 man-years of work for British Columbians.

PROPOSAL TO RETURN ABANDONED RAILWAY RIGHTS-OF-WAY TO PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. To avert a feud between the federal Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and his counterparts in the four western provinces as to ownership of abandoned rail rights-of-way, and in view of the fact that the Hall Commission recommended provincial ownership of such rights-of-way, and that the provinces are in a much better position to manage those rights for the benefit of affected residents, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the Minister of Transport notify western provincial governments that he is prepared to immediately negotiate with them and with the railroads to ensure that ownership of abandoned rail line rights-of-way be under provincial jurisdiction.

EFFORTS TO OBTAIN PERMISSION FOR MR. SHUMUK TO EMIGRATE FROM SOVIET UNION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise an issue of urgent and pressing necessity. As it is over a month since the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), promised that he would personally review the application of Mr. Danglo Shumuk to immigrate to Canada, and as continued incarceration in the Soviet Union can only further contribute to Mr. Shumuk's ill health, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu):

That this House call on the Secretary of State for External Affairs to use all means at his disposal to persuade the Soviet Union to permit Mr. Shumuk to emigrate to Canada where he has relatives willing to care for him.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR REACTION TO GREEN PAPER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the strong desire the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) has expressed for public input and reaction to the green paper; and in view of the fact that the deadline which has been set for such input is two weeks before the annual meeting of the sports federation of Canada, which will be the first time the various sport governing bodies will have had an opportunity to meet and react collectively to the green paper, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek):

That this House requests that the minister extend the deadline for reaction to the green paper from January 14 to the end of February 1978.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED LACK OF FINANCIAL CONTROL—MEASURES TO REGAIN CONTROL

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board, I would like to direct my questions to the Prime Minister. The Lambert Commission in its parliamentary report tabled Friday stated that the lack of any effective financial management control over government spending is as much due to the sheer size of government as it is to the tremendous growth in government spending over the last few years. The report indicates that a pause or freeze probably would not be sufficient. Given the fact that the Prime Minister turned down a proposal by the President of the Treasury Board to eliminate five departments, does the government have any other plans or proposals to reduce the scope of government activity such as transferring some of these to the provinces, municipalities or private sector?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I, of course, cannot agree with the premise of the question about any proposal by the President of the Treasury Board. It can only be that the hon. member is misinformed. Insofar as constructive suggestions are concerned, I would point out to him that just a year ago today there was the established programs financing proposal which we made to the provinces and which they accepted, transferring tax points and resources to the provinces to the tune of more than $2 billion, if my memory is correct.

REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF CROWN CORPORATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): That transfer of $2 billion still resulted in a 10.3 per cent increase in government spending. The Lambert Commission also pointed out that there are now some 54 wholly owned crown corporations and over 300 other corporate bodies of which the government is either total or partial owner. In fact, the Treasury Board figure used was 367 when that report was published. Last Tuesday it was 386 and it is still growing. The government does not even know how many crown corporations it has. The Lambert report observed that such crown corporations merely serve to remove or complicate ministerial responsibility and parliamentary scrutiny over government spending. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether he or the government have any plans to reduce the numbers of Crown corporations? After all, if the government does not know how many it has, it cannot be of great harm to government policy to divest itself of a number of these Crown corporations and put them back in the private sector, especially those operating in commercial areas.

● (1417)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a very general proposal the hon. member seems to put forward. When the government does anything to reduce the spending of Crown corporations, or to reduce their financial exposure, we are unable to get much co-operation from hon. members opposite.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Give it a try.

Mr. Trudeau: The House leader asks me to give it a try. Before the House now there is a bill on the Canadian National Railways, which will have the effect of saving the government $100 million. I would ask the opposition to co-operate and pass it in all stages tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGED OVERLAPPING OF DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSIBILITIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RECTIFY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister in regard to the same report, page 5 thereof. The report indicates overlapping and a lack of clarity in the roles assigned to the respective central agencies. I am thinking of the Treasury Board and the Privy Council office confronting departments with confusing lines of accountability. We do not need the final report from the Lambert Commission in order to address ourselves to this particular problem. What plans does the Prime Minister have in order to reduce this overlapping and clarify the issues so that department heads will know what they are doing, what they are accountable for, and parliament will have even further control?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should remember that when the Lambert Commission was set up, it was not only an issue of this government, it was against the opposition and critics of the other side. We were attempting to get from Mr. Lambert and his colleagues a recommendation on a better functioning government. I recall the Tories, in particular, were objecting to this initiative. Now that Mr. Lambert is coming in with these preliminary reports, which begin to clarify the matter, already we have taken initiatives. I have written to Mr. Lambert in this respect in order for officials to sit down and commence discussions, in advance of its final report, on possible lines of direction for further progress.

PROPOSED IMPROVEMENT IN FORM OF ESTIMATES AND PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the Prime Minister, we do not need the formal report of the Lambert Commission in order to eliminate the overlapping and to reduce the lack of clarity. I think the Prime Minister could move in that area right now.

With respect to the form of estimates, including the budget and the public accounts which are always placed before parliamentary committees, in the opinion of the Auditor General the form is not satisfactory and, therefore, the necessary investigations which are required cannot be put forward because of the confusion. Is it my understanding that the Prime Minister will bring about a new form of estimates, budgets and Public Accounts in order for parliament to have a higher degree of control regarding the public purse?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not making a very complete proposal. As I understand it, he is commending the government for having set up the Lambert Commission to look into this problem; but certainly it is premature for the hon. member to draw conclusions on behalf of the commission before the commission itself draws those conclusions.

LAMBERT COMMISSION—DATE OF FINAL REPORT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I was not talking about the commission. I was talking about the thoughts of the Auditor General who indicated that the estimates, public accounts and budgets are not in proper form whereby parliament really has control over government spending.

My last question is in regard to the final report of the Lambert Commission. Unquestionably we will need this report before the government will be able to bring in its mini-omnibus bill on Crown corporations. Has there been any indication given to the government, or to the President of the Treasury Board in particular, as to when we can expect the final report of the Lambert Commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire.

McDONALD COMMISSION—STATEMENT BY COUNSEL ON PURPOSE OF INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice in the absence of the Solicitor General, who is no doubt preparing his appeal papers again. The McDonald commission's counsel, Mr. Howard, is quoted as saying:

One of the purposes of the royal commission is to hopefully restore any confidence that may have been lost in the RCMP.

Given the fact that the commission has decided now that no representatives of political parties may be present and no representatives of civil liberties groups may be present, and given the fact that there is public interest in getting the truth as a result of this inquiry, does the Minister of Justice agree with the sentiments expressed by counsel for that inquiry that the purpose of that inquiry is to restore confidence in the RCMP, and if he does not agree that that is the purpose of the commission, will he make representations to see that the commission's counsel is removed so that one representing the public interest can be appointed?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): The purpose of the inquiry is set out in the order in council establishing it and one of the terms in the order in council is that it is necessary to have confidence through the inquiry in the security forces.

KEABLE INQUIRY—REASON FOR APPEAL OF DECISION OF QUEBEC COURT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): With regard to the most recent decision, which again has struck down the government's case as to the constitutional question concerning the Keable inquiry, that in fact that inquiry is properly constituted and within the constitution, can the minister advise us whether under the provisions of the Federal Court Act, section 41(2) this government does not feel it has sufficient protection with regard to the Keable inquiry, and is that the reason there will be an appeal from this most recent decision?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): All that was decided the other day was that there would not be a suspension order until the merits of the case have been argued early in January. As to the second point, obviously we have argued that section 41(2) is not sufficient; it relates solely to national security, and what is being argued in court is a federal-provincial constitutional issue.

ALLEGED INABILITY OF McDONALD COMMISSION TO PROVIDE ANSWERS TO SOME QUESTIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): At the initiation of the McDonald inquiry, the matter of operation Cathedral came up, and introduced in evidence at that commission was a telex with a portion blanked out. Also at that commission no questions were asked with regard to where the telex came from, who inspired it, etc. In view of the fact that we have been told in the committee of the House that the appropriate place to ask questions is at the McDonald inquiry, and in view of the fact that there is now some evidence that that inquiry will not provide answers, will the Minister of Justice undertake to provide those kinds of answers which probably we will not be getting from the McDonald Commission?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): The terms of reference of the McDonald inquiry are perfectly clear, to inquire into the practices and procedures of the security service in carrying out its mandate. The McDonald inquiry has full powers to ask all questions, either in camera or in public, that it chooses. It has set out to perform that task and it is not up to me to tell this independent inquiry how to conduct its affairs.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR ALLEGED CHECKING OF McDONALD COMMISSION MEMBERS AND COUNSEL

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I have a brief supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. Was it on his advice or was he consulted about the process of having commissioners and counsel of the McDonald Commission checked and presumably approved by the RCMP?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBILITY OF NEW DEVELOPMENTS CONCERNING PAYMENT OF BENEFITS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. On November 28, I asked him a question dealing with the problem of lost time or waiting period for the unemployed in northwest Quebec because their return cards were rejected by the Montreal computer. The minister answered that all requests were made within a 24-hour period. As a result of an inquiry, it has been shown that those cards are not checked nor put in the computer within 24 hours. I would therefore like to know whether there have been some developments in this connection?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I answered the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada who asked me that question on Tuesday last. The answer is correct. The mistakes were made by the claimants, not by the department or the commission.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Given the fact that, after verifications have been carried out we know that mistakes have actually been made by the representatives of the Unemployment Insurance Commission themselves and that the computer cards are not processed within 24 hours, as the minister has indicated, since a mini-SRI computer has already been removed in northwest Quebec, would the minister accept to reinstal mini computers of this type in remote areas such as in northwest Quebec?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his representation. I will have to look again into this question.

GRANTING OF TELEPHONE SWITCHING CONTRACT TO FRENCH FIRM—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He is in receipt of a letter from AEI Telecommunications of Winnipeg with regard to AEI's complaint that CIDA is going to give a telephone switching contract to a French firm when AEI can handle the same work in Canada. It is a $6 million contract. Has the minister had an opportunity to investigate this complaint?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I will look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

DEVELOPMENT PROPOSALS—GOVERNMENT REACTION—POSSIBILITY OF MEMBERS ATTENDING MEETING WITH MINISTERS FROM ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the minister's news release that he will be meeting tomorrow with the fisheries ministers of Atlantic Canada I would like to ask the minister if he has now read the proposal for the development of the fisheries in our area as put forward by the governments of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, if he is now prepared to take a more positive attitude toward that proposal and if he will also extend an invitation to members of parliament as well as the press to be present at tomorrow's meeting.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes, I have read the proposal. Incidentally, it is not from just the governments of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia; it purports to speak for two other provinces, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The plan which is documented in the proposal has not been made public. I do not feel free to discuss it until it is made public at the meeting tomorrow.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH FRANCE AND UNITED STATES ON OWNERSHIP OF RESOURCES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the fisheries resources on Georges Bank and in the St. Pierre-Miquelon area to Atlantic Canada would the minister indicate whether any progress has been made in discussions as to who will own these resources and whether he would consider putting these items on the agenda with the six other items which he has indicated will be discussed?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in both cases negotiations are under way between the government of Canada and the two countries involved, France and the United States. I do not think that further public discussion, except the discussions which are being held with provincial representatives and with representatives of fishermen and processors, would be useful at this time. However, if during the in-camera session of this meeting with the provincial ministers this subject comes up, I am sure we would be quite willing to give them the latest information we have.

MEETING WITH MINISTERS FROM ATLANTIC REGION—POSSIBILITY OF PROPOSALS CONCERNING EXPLOITATION OF 200-MILE LIMIT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I understand that this is to be the first of the sectoral meetings in connection with the first ministers' conference aimed at maximizing employment potential in the various sectors. Is the minister prepared to tell the House what proposals he intends to lay before the provincial ministers when he meets with them to maximize the exploitation of our resources within the 200-mile limit and thereby increase whatever employment potential there is in the short term?

● (1432)

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this meeting was called outside the context of the sectoral meetings. Because all the information about the stocks of fish over the next five to seven years is now available, I felt it was important, while this information was available, that we have a full discussion and briefing on this item. This would be one of the main items on the agenda. The opportunity for development would be subject to discussion and further work by our officials and possibly another meeting of the ministers of fisheries in the New Year. The main reason for this meeting is not the sectorial approach, although it might be included.

INCREASED TOLLS ON ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—SUGGESTION ADDITIONAL REVENUE BE USED TO IMPROVE SERVICE

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport may I put a question to the parliamentary secretary. I am pleased that the minister saw fit to at least spread the increase in the seaway tolls over three years although I am sorry there is any increase at all. Can the minister give the House some assurance that a good portion of this additional revenue will be used to improve service on the seaway, particularly for research into making the seaway a 12-month operation?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think a good part of the answer is to be found in the release issued by the minister on this subject last Friday, and I think this decision to stagger the increases in the rates of the Seaway Authority is a good one. It has been made thanks to the representations of the hon. member for Welland, the hon. member who has just asked the question as well and several other hon. members in the House. As to making the seaway a 12-month operation, I think we have discussed this rather at length recently when the president of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority appeared before the committee on transport and communications.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LIMITATION ON GROWTH OF GOVERNMENT—ALLEGED USE OF CONTRACT HIRING TO CIRCUMVENT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister concerning the progress report of the Lambert Commission. This report states that we are long past the point of no return in the size of the government and indicates that the enormous rate of growth of government is not sustainable. Since the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines recommended a one per cent growth in the civil service, why has the government found it necessary to hire private employment agencies to fill civil service jobs and why is contract hiring being used to circumvent the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must point out to the hon. member that for two years now the growth in the public service has been less than one per cent. The hiring of outside consultants is a practice with a very long history in this country. It is done now, as it was previously, in order to bring certain expertise to bear which does not exist within government service.

Mr. Clarke: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the position of the Prime Minister that the hiring of contract civil servants is not in addition to the replacement of people who are needed on a full-time basis?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that. I am saying that the hiring of people on a contract basis does not enlarge the civil service which has tenure and which is going to be around for a long time. They are hired on a contract for a limited time to do a specific job. This is more economical than taking somebody into the civil service with full guarantees of permanence, pension rights, and tenure which do not extend to those on contract. The government uses the contract precisely in order not to bind itself for a long time to people who might be needed to do a job for only a short time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGED PROPOSAL OF UNITED STATES TO ELIMINATE NORAD AIR DEFENCE COMMAND

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister. A weekend news item indicates that the Prime Minister is to visit NORAD headquarters next week. The right hon. gentleman indicated he has requested a briefing on the United States air force proposal to eliminate air defence command which proposal was described by a Canadian general stationed at NORAD as "under-handed, devious and full of half-truths?"

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any such proposal and I do not think any has been made yet. I know that the United States reported to us in the PJBD meeting that they are going to study this problem but no proposal has been made to us yet.

NORAD MEETING—POSSIBILITY OF DISCUSSING UNITED STATES PLANS FOR FIGHTER REPLACEMENT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As Canada is making a choice in the next few months of a $2.3 billion new fighter aircraft, will the Prime Minister seize this opportunity to find out from the United States officials what their plans are for their fighter replacement in NORAD? Will he also inform the House if he is to be accompanied to this important defence meeting by the Minister of National Defence and if not, why not?

An hon. Member: Who is going to carry the skis?

An hon. Member: Barney can't ski.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while I am at NORAD I will be counting on the Minister of National Defence to defend the country for those few days. He has been to NORAD before and has been involved in several meetings of NORAD and NATO. I will be going there to benefit from the groundwork he has laid.

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID LAY-OFFS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As we now have the November figures for various plants in Canada with respect to lay-offs of 50 people or more showing that the trend to lay-offs in the manufacturing industry is continuing with 2,752 further lay-offs reported in November, would the minister indicate whether he has had an opportunity to review this latest list and if so, does he have any comment on how this dreadful trend in our manufacturing industry might be arrested?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there are many ways in which the trend could be arrested such as passing Bill C-11 long before it was passed in this House so that the Minister of Finance could bring in the job-creation legislation which the Leader of the Opposition asked for today.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister must at least be familiar enough with finance to know that all the taxation measures in Bill C-11 were effective as of March 31 this year. My further question touches on the specifics of certain of the lay-offs which are reported as being due to technological changes. For example, Harding Carpets in Guelph laid off 74 employees. Could the minister indicate if he has checked this type of problem to see how we can arrest such lay-offs?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member missed the point completely in my previous answer. The Minister of Finance could not work in his department and concentrate on new measures at the same time as attending the House to answer questions put by the hon. member on Bill C-11. With regard to my knowledge of financing, I have never yet been out $4.5 million in any effort I financed. With regard to what the department is doing in paying attention to manufacturing jobs the EDB and the enterprise development program are concentrating on the maintenance and securing of permanent jobs in the manufacturing sector.

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF TAX CREDIT BILL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Speaking about the need to relieve the unemployment situation in this country, would the Prime Minister indicate if he has taken up the suggestion of my leader and may we expect the employment tax credit bill to be introduced today or tomorrow? If it is, the Official Opposition will certainly ensure that it gets speedy passage within the day if it is in the context that has been represented.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, how can the Leader of the Opposition or the hon. member undertake to pass in all stages a bill they have not even seen?

Mr. Stevens: If it is as represented.

Mr. Trudeau: They have taken 21 days and the House needed closure in order to pass a tax bill which was cutting taxes.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. The Prime Minister apparently missed the question asked by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. The question was simply this: Given the fact that the Minister of Finance has had at least two months to prepare a very simple bill, will the Prime Minister give an undertaking to introduce that bill today or tomorrow so that it can be passed as quickly as possible and those Canadians who would fill the 50,000 jobs created by the bill would not have to wait another two months simply because this government cannot bring simple legislation to the House?

● (1442)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is a rare delight to hear the opposition imply that the government's legislative projects are so good that it is prepared to vote for them before even seeing them. With this kind of co-operation, if it is sincere, I can assure you we shall be making tremendous progress when the House resumes after Christmas. If the opposition really wants to show good faith, I might point out that there is presently before the House—it will be given first reading today—a bill which would cut $100 million from government expenses. Its passage would mean we could use this $100 million to create jobs. If the opposition wishes to show that it is serious, and passes this bill in all its stages today, then we will proceed—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It will be interesting to see what the Prime Minister would use that $100 million for—perhaps a trip to Vail, perhaps something else.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Clark: What we are talking about now is not something trumped up for today's order paper. We are talking about a bill which was promised two months ago, a simple bill to which a companion piece has already been introduced in the Ontario Legislature; it is one which could be introduced by any competent government. The minister has told us it would provide jobs for 50,000 Canadians—that might not mean much to the Prime Minister, but it means a great deal to those Canadians who are out of work. We want a simple answer—whether or not the right hon. gentleman will ensure that this bill will be introduced today or tomorrow so that if it corresponds to the undertakings given by the Minister of Finance we can pass it in order to provide those 50,000 jobs for Canadians rather than have them wait until after the Prime Minister's holiday.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is the third repetition of the question put by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Now it has been repeated a second time by the hon. gentleman.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC CONCERNING TRANSFER OF DEPARTMENTS TO SHERBROOKE

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In October the Canadian government announced that many federal departments would be moved to various provinces as a continuation of its decentralization program started more than five years ago. Could the Prime Minister tell the House where the discussions with the government of Quebec on the implementation of some decentralization projects at the provincial level stand at this time, and more specifically, the mapping branch in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which was to be moved to Sherbrooke? Are negotiations leading to an early agreement and if so, when can we expect the work to begin?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is too soon to say that an agreement is on the verge of being concluded between both governments. The proposal of the federal government is firm and I think we can notice that the Quebec government is relenting. I believe that Premier Lévesque said publicly that he was prepared to bring some amendments to the Official Languages Act. Mr. Speaker, it seems that in addition to the disturbing "civil liberties" and "freedom of choice" aspects of the legislation, the PQ government is beginning to recognize the economic drawbacks of this law and that it would be prepared to introduce some flexibility into it. But I cannot speak of imminent agreements for the time being.

CHARTERED BANKS LENDING MONEY TO CHILE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is directed to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. A number of Canadians, including members of church groups, are concerned about at least four of our chartered banks investing money in Chile. Their position was summed up by the Archbishop of the Anglican Church of Canada when he said: "Loans aid the oppressive and inhuman regime in Chile and give the banks an interest in its staying power." Has the government met with the chartered banks asking them to cease lending money to Chile and, if it has not, does it intend to do so?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not know of any meeting which has taken place on that subject. I will inquire.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ALLEGATION CONCERNING LOANS TO CHILE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. At the United Nations several weeks ago Canada condemned Chile's record on human rights. At the same time, a Bank of Montreal official was quoted as saying: "The Export Development Corporation has no qualms about guaranteeing anything in Chile in terms of loans made by banks to that country." Would the minister clear up this inconsistency and bring the government's commercial policy into line with its moral statements?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): There are two different considerations here. It is not, really, for us to judge the moral commitments of a country. The other thing concerns creditworthiness; if we are to lend money we have to judge a country's creditworthiness.

SUGGESTED TABLING OF FORECASTS AND PERFORMANCE DATA WHEN ESTIMATES BEING CONSIDERED

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister concerning the Lambert Commission Report and, in particular, the suggestion made on page 23 that multi-year program forecasts or cost-benefit studies or performance data used by the Treasury Board be made public for the use of the committee at the time estimates are being considered. When the main estimates are tabled in February, would the Deputy Prime Minister consider tabling that kind of data also so that the committees studying the estimates would have this information before them particularly in view of the decrease in the number of votes over the years.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will consider that suggestion and it would please me greatly if it were possible to comply with the hon. member's request.

SUGGESTED DEBATE PRIOR TO FINAL REPORT OF LAMBERT COMMISSION AND REFERENCE OF REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for that forthcoming answer. The Lambert Commission Report tabled last week was just a progress report; the commission is going on to make a final report. Before that report is brought down would the hon. gentleman consider setting aside a limited period for a special debate so that the commission might have the views of members of parliament to hand as it examines the strengthening of parliamentary controls over estimates? In the meantime, would the government consider referring the progress report to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, and undertake, as well, to refer the final report to that committee so that it could look at the recommendations with respect to parliamentary control in the light of our standing orders which, as I think the government House leader would agree, are quite inadequate at the moment for the task to be done.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): As to the suggestion that we might allow a limited amount of time to debate the subject, I can say that in principle I am in agreement with respect to the desirability of arranging for debates which might arise unrelated to legislation. It is on this basis that I justified the value of the debate today and tomorrow on external affairs. I believe a more extended use of that principle would have to be based on the practice of repricocity, so I shall probably be asking the opposition to accommodate me on certain other points if these special debates are to be arranged.

In connection with these special references to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, I think it would be a good idea to hold discussions with the chairman of the committee and other hon. members to see whether they would regard the study as a profitable activity for the committee. It is certainly worth considering.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF THIRD PHASE—USE OF SLIPPAGE FUNDS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the serious level of unemployment which persists in the Atlantic region despite the short-term jobs created under the Canada Works program, may I ask when an announcement will be made with respect to "slippage funds"—money which has not been used up by other programs—and when we may expect an announcement with regard to the third phase of the Canada Works program due to begin in the spring of next year?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): We shall be commencing to use the slippage funds very soon. As to the hon. member's question about the third phase of the Canada Works program we are contemplating a slight change; we are considering using some of that money for the creation of more permanent jobs. I want to examine that in some detail with the department before announcing when we will embark upon phase three of Canada Works as such.

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Canada Works program is spread over a five year period, so that people can know what their continuing objectives should be, would the minister announce the remainder of the program for the next four years? Information is coming to members of parliament on a daily basis, and people would thus be able to take advantage of a phased objective for their communities under the Canada Works program.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, it is precisely for that reason that we are looking to projects which create more permanent type jobs, such as the Gull Island project or the spruce budworm harvesting project in Nova Scotia. It is projects of that nature which might make more effective use of Canada Works moneys. On that basis we would cut down on money used to create temporary jobs, but I do not think anyone would really object to that. We are trying to make that kind of use of the money and to get the information to members of parliament.

RELEASE OF PCB AS RESULT OF TRANSFORMER FIRE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE HEALTH OF PEOPLE NOT AFFECTED

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Environment). It has been reported that a group of federal civil servants working for Revenue Canada in Toronto were not told, until six days after their building was covered with soot from a fire in a nearby hydro transformer, that this soot contained high concentrations of a dangerous chemical, PCB. Therefore, what has the minister's department done to ensure that this building is safe to work in and also to have the employees medically examined to see whether their health has been threatened in any way?

Finally, in this general connection will his department now proceed to remove immediately the dangerously high concentration of PCBs released into Prince Rupert harbour some time ago and not wait until the matter of jurisdiction over, and responsibility for, this spill is finally resolved?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, my department has been working with the Ontario government who have been in charge of the PCB spill in Toronto. I can get him a more precise report on the questions he has asked.

With regard to Prince Rupert, action has been taken there and the spill is in the process of being totally cleaned up. To my knowledge there has not been any environmental damage from this particular spill.

ABANDONED RAILWAY RIGHTS-OF-WAY—REASON FOR BYPASSING PROVINCES AND GIVING LAND TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I direct my question to the Prime Minister. Does the government have a rationale for bypassing the very strong desires of the prairie provinces to obtain authority over the dispersal of lands from abandoned railway rights-of-way?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the government has always a rationale behind its policies. With regard to the recommendations in the Hall report, the Minister of Transport has never denied any consultation with his provincial counterparts.

[English]

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Could I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport whether the minister has any obligation which is statutory to bypass the provinces and to give this land to the municipalities; and while he is on his feet would he also say whether or not he would table the agreement between the federal government and the railway companies regarding the dispersal of land from abandoned railways on the prairies?

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF FLEXIBLE ADJUSTMENTS FAVOURED BY PRIME MINISTER—POSSIBILITY OF SWISS CANTONAL ARRANGEMENT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In an interview published in last week's Newsweek the Prime Minister, speaking of the constitution, appears to reject a unitary state or a loose federation of quasi-independent states but favours flexible adjustments in our present constitution. What are these more flexible adjustments to the constitution which the Prime Minister has in mind, since he rejects a quasi-independent state in confederation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for a short indication of that I would refer the hon. member to the Speech from the Throne, where three or four major changes in the constitution were proposed which would still leave a constitution with a federal structure and which we think would improve considerably the present state of affairs.

Mr. Ritchie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Further on in the interview the Prime Minister seemed to favour a Swiss type cantonal arrangement. Is the Prime Minister convinced that the Swiss arrangement would be suitable for Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member refers to the article—or to the transcript, I am not sure what appears in the article—I remember being asked by the interviewer if the Swiss approach was not closer to what we were looking for than, I believe he said, the German, the Brazilian or maybe the Russian approach to federalism, and I indicated that I thought it was.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF SOCIOECONOMIC IMPACT STUDY PRIOR TO PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Environment) and is a follow-up to a question I asked earlier of the minister responsible for federal-provincial relations. It is with regard to federal responsibility for pipeline construction in the province of British Columbia. The responsibilities to which I refer are those in the area of Indian affairs and the Alaska highway. Since the minister is responsible for discussing these matters with the province of British Columbia, and having had some meetings with that province, could he report whether there will be a study on the socioeconomic impact in that particular area before the bill is presented to the House and further action commences?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this question should more appropriately be addressed to the Deputy Prime Minister, who has had these kinds of discussions on behalf of the Government of Canada. So far as the socioeconomic aspects which relate to Indians are concerned, in the hon. member's area these are being handled by the Indian affairs department. My responsibilities are related to the environmental aspects.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I am not having very much success in determining who is responsible. Could I direct my supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister. Have there been any meetings with the province of British Columbia and, if so, how many? Has the minister taken part in these discussions, and who in the government is responsible for safeguarding particularly areas of federal responsibility, such as the upgrading of the Alaska highway and the socioeconomic impact on the native people and other residents in that critical area? Some 540 miles of the pipeline will pass through the province of British Columbia, an area of direct federal responsibility.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that I had a meeting in Victoria on Thursday last with representatives of the government of British Columbia in which a variety of pipeline related matters were discussed, including the socioeconomic impact of the pipeline in northern British Columbia and how the costs which may be associated with the pipeline could be met, whether from the pipeline or from other sources. The conclusion of the meeting was a realization that we needed to refine our information on certain matters prior to further negotiations or discussions which may take place at the ministerial level.

With respect to the pipeline generally and who is responsible, obviously the construction of the pipeline will interface with, or the pipeline itself will impact upon, a large number of government departments and agencies. It is for that reason that the government has decided to create a single agency which will be responsible for all aspects of the pipeline. We hope to have the legislation setting up the agency before parliament shortly after the Christmas break.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF MEANS TEST FOR CERTAIN PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. My question is based on the concern being felt by a great many Canadians resulting from the comments of the Lambert Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability to the effect that there should be some means testing or cutting back of old age security and family allowances. In order to give the assurance that the people of Canada would like to have, can the minister make it clear that the present government is not considering any such cutbacks, certainly not at the present time?

● (1502)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I just heard the radio report related to what the hon. member has asked me, namely Mr. Lambert's remarks on the universality of payments of a social nature and eventual cutbacks. As far as I am concerned, he was not talking within his terms of reference. I can assure the House that this government believes in universality of such payments as family allowance and old age pension.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EXPANSION PLANS FOR CFB ESQUIMALT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence who recently made a statement in Victoria concerning expansion plans for CFB Esquimalt, leaving his officials in Ottawa completely in the dark. For the benefit of the House and of his officials, can the minister explain what he had in mind when making that announcement?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the expansion plan is part of the base development plan of which I am advised by my officials. I do not have the details at my fingertips, but I will be happy to go into further detail on that. I know that one item is a new hospital there and another is sports facilities which are required. I would be very happy to disclose the basis of that plan to the hon. member at any time convenient to him.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister and the officials have gotten together because when I asked the question in committee, they were completely in the dark and knew nothing about it. Where are the funds for this expansion to be found? Are they in existing estimates or in estimates yet to be presented to us?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the base development plans are planned over a long period of years. Some of the funds are actually allocated. Some are in the system for approval within the department and by Treasury Board. Others might have to be deferred. One certainly has to work within the budget of the departments and the long range plan. Esquimalt is certainly one of our important bases and we want to make certain it is maintained at the level that is required.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with the business of the House which applies directly to the Secretary of State. Some time ago the Secretary of State indicated that he would be having a meeting with the main Francophone groups outside of Quebec on December 20, which is tomorrow. Since then he has written to all members indicating that this meeting will take place tomorrow at ten o'clock.

Over the weekend an item in the newspapers indicated that a major announcement on government policy having to do with minority groups, covering a five-year span and an expenditure of $75 million, would be made tomorrow morning at this meeting. I would have thought that if it is to be a major thrust of government policy that is announced tomorrow morning, the Secretary of State would today have made a statement on motions in the House. Perhaps he would indicate whether this is to be a major policy of the government and when he will be making an appropriate statement to inform members of this House.

Mr. Roberts: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I would like to involve myself in a semantic question of what is major and what is minor. I was conscious, of course, of the debate on foreign policy which members on all sides of the House, particularly those on the other side, are anxious to conduct over the next two days. I was not overly anxious to encroach upon that debate.

The statement that I will be making tomorrow, which is one to which I have invited all members of the House, is really an elaboration of the speech which I gave in the House during the debate on the Speech from the Throne. It seemed to me, taking into account all those circumstances and considering the needs of the House in order that members may debate foreign policy, and so on, that this would be the appropriate way in which to make the announcement.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the question period I directed certain questions to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment concerning his press release of December 16 which indicated that the economic prospects for Canada's Atlantic fisheries would be the main point of discussion at a federal-provincial meeting in Ottawa tomorrow, and that the meeting would be open to the press. I asked the minister if the meeting would also be open to members of parliament. I presume the minister did not hear that part of my question. In view of the importance of this conference, I believe it should be open to the elected representatives of the people and I wonder if the minister would now clarify his position on this important matter.

Mr. Speaker: This is really the second non-point of order having to do with business outside the House. It does not relate to any disorder or matter that would prevent or inhibit the House from carrying on with its business. If the minister were to make that indication now—and that probably ought to have been the case with respect to the last point of order—it would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the parts of the meeting which will be open still have to be determined by agreement with the other participants. I have suggested that some parts, especially where we will be giving a briefing on an assessment of the stock conditions and the prospects for the coming years, should be made available and part of the information package. I have no difficulty with observers being present. I suppose the number would have to be limited by the size of the room. Other than that, I have no great difficulty.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises from the statement made last Thursday by the Minister of Finance. At that time he said:

When we started Bill C-11, the hon. member said that second reading was to be three or four days, and it lasted three weeks. Thus, I cannot rely on him very much.

When I attempted to raise that as a question of privilege on Friday, Your Honour, quite rightly, pointed out that as a matter of privilege I should have raised it on Thursday, the day it occurred. I hope that at the first opportunity the Minister of Finance will set the record straight, as I know he does not want such a misrepresentation to remain in Hansard.

The matter has been slightly complicated. When I made the statement again on Friday, the Minister of State (Small Business) interjected, "It is true", referring to what the Minister of Finance had said. I would call upon the Minister of State (Small Business) to correct the record today, because surely he would not wish such an untruth to remain in Hansard.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I did notice the remark I made. If I said that the hon. member was unreliable because of some discussion he had with the Minister of Finance, I would be completely out of order in saying so. If I said he was unreliable because of his general conduct in this House or in committee, I would probably also be in error because I have not seen him at all times—only from personal experience. So I withdraw the remark.

CANADA'S RELATIONSHIPS WITH OTHER NATIONS

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That this House takes note of the present state and future prospects of Canada's relationships with the other nations of the world.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I know that other members share my satisfaction that it has been possible, in view of the heavy schedule of the House nevertheless, to arrange to schedule this debate. It is something which I have been in agreement with for some time, as have House leaders opposite. I welcome this chance to have a wide-ranging and constructive discussion on many aspects of international affairs.

I realize what I am doing at the moment will be done very informally, but I know I have the agreement of hon. members opposite in suggesting, while we would not necessarily pass a motion to this effect, that the House be asked to convey to our distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), the foreign affairs critic for the Progressive Conservative party, the best wishes of this House and our hopes that he will have a speedy recovery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: In a single speech or in one debate it is not possible to cover all aspects of international affairs. I have decided this afternoon to confine most of my remarks to those issues in the international realm which impact most directly upon the people of Canada, and also those which have caused the greatest amount of concern in recent months. Meeting both of those criteria, very obviously, is the question of the world economy and the new economic order, as it has come to be called, throughout the international scene.

Some weeks ago I gave the House a rather comprehensive report on the various activities taking place in such organizations as the International Monetary Fund, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, and a number of similar agencies. Therefore, it is not my intention today to deal with these in any great detail. However, by way of recapitulation I should like to refer briefly to three subjects which I am sure will be touched upon by other speakers from both sides as this important debate proceeds.

First, I refer to the summit conference of last May, in London, and the events which have flowed from it. Among those are the north-south dialogue, or the search for the new economic order, as well as the multilateral tariff negotiations. All of these—and particularly the focus which was brought to them by the summit—illustrated once again the interdependence of the world and the growing necessity for us to consult with one another, not only in the developed world but also with the Third World. This is necessary if we are to find solutions for what are generally described as basic structural changes in the world economic system.

There is now general agreement, given the precarious nature of the economic structure at the present time, that resolution of a satisfactory nature will not be found unless we recognize that old solutions imposed on new circumstances will be inadequate. Therefore, the search is on in a wide range of fora in order to determine how we must approach these new developments.

In the case of the summit, there was general agreement that we must resist what are obviously the growing forces of protectionism. Canada, more than any other developed country, recognizes that there is a fine line which we must follow between ensuring that existing industries and existing sources of employment are reasonably protected, while at the same time doing those things necessary to ease the general pattern of world trade to make access to foreign markets better for us so that we can, from a comparatively small domestic base, expand in a manner which will be necessary if we are to meet the increasing demands upon the economy and if we are going to be able to support the general standards to which our people are entitled.

Before returning to the multilateral tariff negotiations, I should like to refer to a very serious concern of those who met at the summit, including the government and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). That is the tremendous problem of world unemployment, particularly in the developed world. It is a phenomenon which has not shown up previously or, at least, to the same extent as at present. It is one of the permanent structural changes to which I referred a few moments ago which will require new initiatives and new techniques.

No one contends that there are any easy answers. However, during this past week the OECD held a high-level meeting in Paris. It was attended by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), among others. It was attempting to see what kind of international action or impact might be brought to bear on something which, happily, in this country has not so far created serious unrest of a dangerous kind but which in some countries, including some with long democratic traditions in Europe, is of real concern in the sense that it is posing a threat to the very democratic foundations of those societies.

Of course, we will have to deal with these matters in the domestic context also and undertake whatever measures we can devise jointly, or as a government, in order to do what is possible within the framework of our own responsibilities and capabilities. But in this, as in so many other matters these days, it is becoming increasingly apparent that we will have to rely more and more on international instruments; and, of course, one of those is the multilateral tariff negotiations.

Let me say very briefly—because undoubtedly there will be from other speakers, if not in this debate then in subsequent weeks, a full explanation and an ongoing discussion and debate on this question—that what might be described as crucial talks, in terms of the multilateral tariff negotiations, are coming at what is admitted on all sides to be a most inopportune time and certainly one vastly different from what was in existence in 1973 when the Tokyo Round was launched. Since that time we have had the incredible and dramatic changes brought about by the OPEC decisions and what has come to be called the energy crisis, and we have had a whole series of other international events which have sharply dampened the enthusiasm of many developed countries for the kind of across the board tariff-cutting mechanisms which appeared in 1973 to be highly advantageous to all.

Yet, as I said a moment ago, those who met at the summit in London, and also those who participated, including myself, at the OECD meeting in Paris subsequent to the London summit, concluded without reservation that there was no alternative but to press ahead with what will, we hope, over time be a comprehensive improvement in the over-all tariff structure.

I should mention, also, at this point that of course most of the emphasis quite naturally tends to fall upon tariff reductions or changes. But for Canada, as for many other countries, an equally important if not more important aspect of the MTN is the whole question of non-tariff barriers. This, too, is being addressed in what I think hon. members will find is a comprehensive and far-sighted way. No one has any illusions that this process will be either easy or quick. It will take a very long time, and indeed it is quite possible that we may not proceed with a single action but may provide for periodic assessment along the way. In other words, no one in Canada, either from the optimistic or the pessimistic side, should expect or anticipate that there will be some dramatic, overnight change in the present scheme of things. Obviously, this question has to be approached with great caution and great care.

In addition to that, of course, we in this country must also examine what we can do domestically in those cases where transitional or other forms of adjustment assistance are required to ease any potential burdens that may emerge when the final listings are made and the exercise is over. But I repeat that I believe we are embarked, as a country, on the wise course.

After all, it has become something of a cliché in Canada to say that we must export in order to survive. It follows almost automatically that a climate receptive to export or, for that matter, a climate receptive to imports from around the world, is highly advantageous for Canada, particularly in view of the quite dramatic changes that have been taking place in the last 10 years to 20 years which have seen very large organizations of countries coming together. I refer to organizations of countries such as the European Economic Community, the ASSEAN group, and many others. This means that Canada, with 23 million people and a comparatively small manufacturing and production base, must look outward and must avoid at all costs an international community which is inward-looking, if we are going to have those export opportunities.

There is a great deal more that could be said and will need to be said, and a great deal more consultation will have to take place with provincial governments, with various industrial sectors and, indeed, with the Canadian community at large, before final and definitive decisions are taken with regard to MTN. But I thought it important, in the context of this debate, to emphasize to hon. members that Canada is taking a very strong role and considers it important for the country that we have as one of the central pieces of our foreign policy this total involvement to the maximum extent possible in various international organizations which, in the last analysis, will have a tremendous, if not decisive, effect upon how quickly we emerge from the current depressing and unfortunate circumstances in which not only we, but all the industrialized countries, find ourselves.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, it is parenthetically interesting to note that, while one can never be sure until these events are concluded, there is considerable encouragement in the news coming from Venezuela, where the OPEC countries are presently meeting, which seems to suggest that we are likely to see a freeze on oil prices at least for the next year or so.

I might add that we in Canada have been active, along with other western governments, in making representations to the OPEC countries in an effort to persuade them that that kind of posture is the one which best serves the world community at the present time and which also, of course, in the long run serves their interests. This whole issue of the world economic situation bears very heavily on Canada's relations with its major friends and trading partners in the international community. I am referring to such countries as the United States of America, the countries of the European Economic Community, and Japan, as well as others.

I would like to take a moment now to deal, once again very briefly, with our current state of relations with various countries which I have mentioned. Turning first to the United States, I am happy to be able to tell the House that in my judgment—and it is one, I believe, that is widely shared—Canada-U.S. relations are in better condition today than they have been for a very long time in the past. I am by no means assuming, accepting or suggesting that the government deserves all the credit for this situation, but I am happy that we have been able, during these past 12 months in particular, to undertake certain projects and discussions with the United States which have helped to create a set of circumstances which I am happy to report are most encouraging and helpful at present.

The Prime Minister has twice visited President Carter since his inauguration, and my own relationship with Secretary of State Vance is most friendly and co-operative. We have had many meetings in the last eight or nine months, not only on matters affecting Canada-U.S. relations directly, but also we have been able to co-operate most effectively in concerting our efforts in terms of a number of international initiatives. Also, many of my colleagues who have direct relations with departments and agencies in the U.S. have been able to have close relations and make co-operative arrangements.

I am also pleased to note that members of the House of Commons and of the other place have substantially increased their negotiating position and their discussion arrangements with their colleagues in the U.S. Congress. Here I pay tribute to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), who has been one of the leaders as a senior member of the House, and indeed members opposite have participated with him in this most worth-while undertaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I should say that, quite frankly, we in this country frequently tend to ignore, or at least to forget, the fact that there is a duality in the American system, and that while you can have good relations in so far as the executive branch is concerned in Washington, it is of equal importance that the parliamentary and the congressional parts of our systems also have frequent and, indeed, almost day to day contact. We have set up in the past year—thanks, again, to the hon. member for Eglinton and others—an arrangement whereby that is going to be possible to a greater degree than ever before.

● (1532)

I do not want to take the time of the House to detail the literally hundreds of issues which have arisen and which have been resolved quietly and, indeed, in most cases without publicity over the past year. We are all aware that in a relationship as intricate as that between Canada and the United States there are tensions which develop daily and irritants which arise daily which must be disposed of. Happily, the vast majority of them are without any serious consequences. However, I would like to mention just three areas in support of my claim that relations with the United States are in very good order at the present time.

There is, for example, the fact that we were able to conclude the northern pipeline treaty, which I think by any assessment or measurement indicates a high level of co-operation between the two countries. I am also happy to say to the House that despite early forecasts of failure, negotiations with regard to the maritime boundaries—probably one of the more complex issues to arise between us in the last 25 or 30 years—are now moving along very satisfactorily. Certain matters have now been established in principle with regard to joint management of fish stocks and the like, and the two negotiators felt sufficiently satisfied with the progress they were making to request from their governments an additional month, until January 31, 1978, in which they are reasonably confident they can conclude the negotiations satisfactorily.

Of course, as I said a moment ago with regard to the OPEC meetings, one can never be certain on these matters until the ink is dry on the agreements. Nevertheless we have come a very long way since January of this year when there was very little to assure us that there could be this kind of agreement without, at the very least, a third party intervention.

The other point with regard to the United States which demonstrates the way in which we have been able to work together is the announcement made over the weekend by my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), with regard to the agreement arrived at on phasing in the St. Lawrence Seaway toll increases. Once again, here was a case where each country accommodated the other in a manner which I believe met the objectives of both, and it was not necessary in this case either to fall back upon the legal mechanisms and provisions in the treaty for renegotiation and the like.

Therefore, while we will always have certain difficulties and tensions with the United States, I think it is important for us to state at this time that the United States continues to be not only our best customer, by a very wide margin, but also our closest friend and, in the long run, the country with which we find we can co-operate—for a whole range of logical reasons—most successfully and most beneficially in terms not only of economic matters, to which I referred a few moments ago, but also of advancing efforts toward a more permanent peace in the world. On the vast majority of occasions we find ourselves, in this respect, with no difference of view from the United States as to goals, even though on occasion our techniques may differ somewhat from theirs.

In this overview of our relationship with various countries in the world, I would like to turn now to the European Economic Community and in the process to say a word about the nuclear negotiations which have been going on for a very long time now, but which, I am happy to report, appear to be at least within reach of being settled satisfactorily for all sides.

Before I deal with the nuclear question, however, let me just say a word about our relationship with the Community in general. It is just about a year ago today that I, along with my Community colleague in the Canada-Community Committee, inaugurated the first meeting in relation to the so-called contractual link, the familiar name which has been applied to the special relationship between us.

In the past year this committee has proved to have had considerable value, if for no other reason than it has given us a forum or an opportunity in which to discuss various problems which arise between us, not the least of which in recent weeks, incidentally, has been the matter of the quotas which we found necessary to impose and the decisions which we had to take with regard to such things as textiles and footwear. Prior to the establishment of the committee, these matters had no home, as it were, in terms of a negotiating base. Therefore, if for no other reason, the committee is a worth-while instrument.

There have also been some slight improvements in terms of the economic relationship between Canada and the Community, but I think it is reasonable to expect that any substantial increase in trade must await the resurgence or the reactivation of the economies of the western European countries. As things stand at the moment, there is a tremendous amount of slack in the economies of these highly industrialized countries. I am thinking of steel, as just one example for Germany and for the United Kingdom, but there are many more. Therefore, as long as that condition continues to exist, it is not very likely—nor, indeed, is it possible—for them in many instances to increase substantially their imports from Canada.

Nevertheless, I believe—this appears to have been borne out by businessmen, who visited the Community recently, and by others—that a good relationship exists, that there is a commitment on both sides to work more closely together, and that over time, if the business community in Canada seizes the opportunities, there is no doubt in my mind that we can, in fact, increase significantly the amount of exports to the Community.

However, one must always bear in mind, in these matters—as I said a few moments ago in relation to the MTN—that if we are going to get additional exports from Canada into the Community, we must also be prepared to look at the areas of trade in which they are interested and which we may be able to employ in order to help with this two-way traffic.

Again I do not wish, to take the time of the House with a detailed elaboration of all the matters which relate to the contractual link and to the whole range of new opportunities and new potentials which exists for us. However, I do want to say that as I travel about Europe—and, incidentally, other parts of the world as well—it is obvious to me, as I am sure it is to hon. members in all parts of the House who have had a similar experience, that we in this country must—this applies to the private sector in particular—find new techniques and a more aggressive approach in terms of selling in unfamiliar territory.

For a very long time the majority of business was conducted between Canada and the United States. There were exceptions, but it is clear that the Canadian business community—I repeat, with some exceptions—needs to revamp its thinking, to employ new techniques and to get to know what the real opportunities are in various places. These opportunities exist not only in the Community but in many parts of Africa, in Latin America and in southeast Asia as well.

Having said these few words about the general relationship with the Community, let me turn to the nuclear question which has involved, for me at least, the most difficult set of negotiations which have taken place during the present year. It had been my intention, as I informed the House a few days ago, to wait until the agreement had been either approved or rejected by the Council of Ministers before indicating to the House what the situation is. However, I also gave a commitment to the House that I would disclose the details of the agreement at the appropriate time. Since we will be adjourning tomorrow, I suspect, and therefore are likely to be in recess by the time the Community's decision is known, I feel I ought to advise hon. members to the maximum extent possible just exactly what is involved in the agreement and emphasize the current state of play.

First, let me say that the agreement has been accepted by the government of Canada. It has been accepted because it meets all the requirements of the 1974 policy. I am not going to try this afternoon—I am sure hon. members will appreciate this—to go into all the technical points, but they will be available to anybody who wishes to see them and I am sure they can be tabled at the appropriate time. However, there are two or three highlights which I think will give hon. members a clear view of what has been arrived at.

I say that it has been agreed to by the government of Canada. It is not yet approved by the Council of Ministers in Europe and we have no assurance that it will be. I can tell hon. members that there are countries within the Community which are taking strong exception to some of the requirements and it is not inconceivable that they may decide not to accept them.

Basically, to repeat the first point I made, the agreement will meet all the requirements of the 1974 policy. The second point that it is important to understand is that all Canadian material going into the Community will be under full IAEA and Euratom safeguards as they relate to all supplies within the Community, wherever located. In short, the basic foundation of Canadian policy that Canadian nuclear supplies will not be used for anything other than non-explosive nuclear purposes has been fully met.

The third point that I think hon. members will be pleased to hear is that no nuclear supplies from Canada will be used in French reactors unless and until the French government accepts IAEA and Euratom safeguards. In this connection, I am pleased to tell the House that we have been able to obtain agreement from the government of France that they will accept such safeguards covering Canadian material. Furthermore, we have insisted, and France has agreed, that any plutonium derived from Canadian-sourced material also will only be used in terms of the civilian nuclear program. The fundamental point about which I have been asked many questions in this House is that the French government has accepted IAEA and Euratom safeguards and has agreed to proceed to apply these. Unless and until it does, and unless these are in place, no Canadian material will be used in any French reactor.

The next point that I should like to touch on is the question of the transfer of sensitive nuclear technology, another question on which several questions have been raised in the House during the past few months. Once again, there will be no transfer of sensitive nuclear technology from one country to another within the European Community unless the receiving country has a bilateral agreement with Canada that such transfer is permitted. Not only, therefore, do we have the IAEA kind of safeguards, but in addition it will not be possible—and we will use France as an example—to acquire any Canadian technology unless and until a country has negotiated a bilateral agreement with Canada.

The next point, which is very familiar to members and which I think is known, proved to be the most difficult of all the negotiations, with the possible exception of some of the bilateral questions with France. I refer to the question of reprocessing. I think it is necessary for me to attempt, on this highly complex subject, to give the House a layman's assessment or explanation of what exactly is in play in connection with this very important issue.

Basically, there are two points of view in the world community on the issue of reprocessing. One, articulated most recently by President Carter of the United States, is that reprocessing is not a necessary part of any civilian nuclear development program. It ought to be emphasized that the President and the government of the United States have not excluded the possibility of all reprocessing for all time. What has been said by the President, with which we concur, is that because reprocessing tends to lead to proliferation in the amount of plutonium, and since it is inevitably linked to the fast breeder reactor, therefore we need to know a good deal more about it before we plunge headlong into the development and creation of these fast breeder reactors, and it is also necessary to take a hard look at how reprocessing is going to be done, the nature of controls, and such questions.

There is a second school of thought, and equally legitimate, I am told, by the scientific community—although there are differences of view amongst different people, and this is not a subject lacking in emotion. One may take the view of the President of France, the Chancellor of Germany and all the leaders of the European Economic Community, or what I might describe as the energy-short industrialized countries of the world, many of which have virtually no other sources of available energy at the present time; at least, that is their contention and their view and it is not my position to argue with them, although I see the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) sort of doubting the truth of that comment.

I have looked sufficiently hard at such countries as Germany, and have learned to my satisfaction that they would be hard pressed at the present time to totally abandon any civilian nuclear energy program. This is a matter of opinion. I repeat, they feel strongly that in terms of reprocessing it is an essential and necessary element of their civilian program. Their argument is defensive, at least on the surface, to the layman. I will come back to why the layman's judgment in these matters must sometimes be questioned. The point is that reprocessing provides up to 60 times the utilization of the same amount of uranium as does the straightforward, conventional use of uranium through enrichment and nothing else.

Countries which have seen their economies badly battered in the last four years as a result of the OPEC action and the general price rise in fossil fuels are, in effect, saying that they want to utilize to the maximum extent whatever fuels are available and that they cannot simply turn their backs on a process which will give 60 times as much utilization as non-reprocessed material.

Those, highly oversimplified, are the two main arguments. It is a mistake to say they are mutually exclusive. This mistake is frequently repeated by a great many people. Europeans, on the one hand, are not going headlong into reprocessing and fast breeder reactors. Indeed, even in the most optimistic scenario we will probably be pretty close to the year 2000 or beyond before there can be any significant change from what we have at the present time. I repeat, to this point they are not committed to any argument. At the same time, it is a misrepresentation to say that the United States is completely opposed to reprocessing or to fast breeder reactors.

I might point out that within recent months the United States has done a number of things, all of which impacted to some degree on Canadian policy and were part of the whole question of negotiations. First of all, the United States did continue with a high level of research on certain aspects of the matter we have been discussing. The United States resumed shipment of enriched uranium to Europe. The United States provided uranium for India, and the United States made an arrangement with Japan so that its pilot reprocessing plant could proceed.

All these things have happened since the original declarations about reprocessing were made, and all came to a head at the London summit when the energy problem was discussed in all its aspects. As a result of that very thorough discussion and assessment, a decision was made to find out not just what one group or another thinks, not merely to accept the layman's sometimes emotional response, but to have a thorough and complete scientific and other types of assessment of the so-called full fuel cycle.

This decision, taken in May, changed something else. It was concluded initially there, and subsequently by Chancellor Schmidt and our Prime Minister during the Chancellor's visit to Canada, that it ought not to be an assessment confined to the so-called suppliers' club, or nuclear club. As a result, INFCECP—was expanded and invitations extended to other countries, including some in the eastern bloc, for example, the Soviet Union, and to others such as in Latin America, so that it is much more broadly based. It was, therefore, judged that it would be more credible in terms of its results than if it had simply been the small club of nuclear suppliers arriving at a conclusion among themselves.

These are the elements, together with these two options, which come into play in our discussions with the Community as to all the circumstances in which we would be prepared to resume shipments. I emphasize that the embargo, now a year old, is beginning to exact very serious penalties and impose heavy strains on our friends in the EEC who are also our allies, part of the western alliance and members of NATO. We can scarcely regard them as being, in such a context, suspect.

Furthermore, bearing in mind what I said about our wish to maintain good relations with Europe, an obstinate and unreasoning resistance on our part to the resumption of shipments would clearly be taken as an unfavourable act; indeed, it has already been so interpreted in some quarters. Yet at the same time we were not prepared to negotiate a situation in which the Canadian safeguards were ignored, either in terms of the other elements to which I referred earlier and where there have been significant improvements over the 1959 agreement, nor for nuclear supplies without any restraint in terms of reprocessing.

The dilemma, therefore, boiled down to whether or not, given the existence of the study and Canada's participation in it, given the significantly different points of view, there was a way in which we could properly ensure that the ongoing needs of the present reactors in the Community and the identifiable needs for a little while to come could be met. The resolution flowed basically from the agreement and from the principles agreed upon by the Prime Minister and Chancellor Schmidt in July of last year, that we would undertake to resume supplies of uranium to the Community under all the conditions I mentioned earlier for the period of the INFCECP study or for two years.

Miss MacDonald: Without a veto?

Mr. Jamieson: I will get to that question very soon. It is estimated there will be the time of the study, plus one year, in which to negotiate a subsequent agreement. In essence, that is the situation. We would be willing, in the case of Europe, to do what I have said. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands asks, "Without a veto?" The answer, if she wishes to interpret the word "veto" in the negative sense, is yes. The word "veto" is a regrettable one to be used, in any event. It has been assumed that we would say no, whereas, of course, what was meant, particularly in the case of the EEC and friendly or allied countries, was that we would have the right to say either yes or no.

Mr. Clark: Oh!

Mr. Jamieson: There is a great deal of difference. If hon. members are suggesting that we ought automatically to say no, they are taking the position that no reprocessing ought to be done in any circumstances. I emphasize that in the view of the government, such a judgment cannot be made now. So we are suspending that judgment for the period of the study, or for two years, whichever is the shorter. We shall then be in a position to negotiate, I hope, a longer term agreement which will not only involve Canada and the EEC, but Canada and the whole world community. In the meantime, however, it is not just a question of carte blanche. In the first place, the reality of the situation is that very little of the nuclear supplies either presently shipped or likely to be supplied in two to three years will be reprocessed.

Mr. Clark: Is that a guarantee?

Mr. Jamieson: One cannot be completely certain. I think the scientific people would tell us, on the basis of the technical competence which exists today, it is likely that only a very minimal amount could be done in two to three years. So in real terms there is no great change. What we have done is obtain an agreement with the Community that no reprocessing will be carried on without prior consultation with Canada.

There will, of course, be some who will make a great deal out of the fact that consultation is not the same as consent. My answer is that we are dealing with friends and allies; we are not dealing with people we would normally suspect. If hon. members opposite wish to take that point of view, they should tell Britain, West Germany and all those other countries that somehow or other we do not trust them. What we have said is: All right; if you agree that before any Canadian material is reprocessed there will be worth-while consultation with us, we shall resume shipments under certain circumstances and conditions.

There was, of course, another element here which we had to take into account, namely, that there was already a good deal of material in Europe, material which had been shipped many years ago but which was still being used in one form or another and which could not, in normal circumstances, be made subject to any retroactive agreement whether a veto was in operation or not. This being the case, what we managed to do in the case of the Europeans—and I am by no means sure it will be acceptable—was to get an undertaking from the Community that none of the previous material, none of the material shipped prior to 1974, would be reprocessed unless we were consulted in a worth-while way.

Remember, any new material to be shipped is not likely to be reprocessed until well into the 1980s, and perhaps later than that. Therefore, by getting retroactivity through invoking clauses which existed in the 1959 agreement requiring consultation, we now have a position whereby all the material in Europe will be subject to consultation. Furthermore, we have undertaken with the Community not to act merely in a customer-supplier relationship, but in addition to the INFCECP study we shall conduct our own examination of the way in which this system of consultation works in connection with reprocessing. So by the end of the study, when the time comes for us to seek long-term arrangements with the world community, we shall have experience upon which to rely.

I emphasize once again that all the elements of this package I have described conform to the 1974 policy statement. The alternative facing those who would have wished a continuance of the embargo is to place one of the major groupings of countries in the western world in a position of serious deficit in a period when they have willingly entered into an agreement to study the implications of reprocessing in the fast breeder reactor program. We have simply said we shall do nothing until a study has been completed.

The second element is that we cannot go on indefinitely mining uranium and keeping it in stockpiles. There is an economic side to it. It was not in any sense a dominant issue, but I have no doubt that if we had, in an unreasonable way, refused to resume shipments to the Community there would have been criticism on the other side that, because of what is essentially a narrow question of disagreement, we had in fact caused problems for our friends and difficulties at home.

The next question which arises is: What will happen in the case of Japan? At the present time, as I think I have mentioned in the House, I have signed an interim agreement with the United States on one of the major problems which existed in the case of Japan, namely, that of double-labelling. I am not going to take the time of the House to deal with this intricate subject, except to say that I believe the Japanese had, and do have, a reasonable point. If they are going to be subject to American controls when the enrichment is done in the United States on the same material, it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for them to adhere to a set of separate and distinct Canadian controls. So we do have a basis now for resolving that particular issue.

I have indicated that in the case of Japan we would be prepared to offer to them the same kind of arrangement, although the circumstances may be somewhat different in that case from that which we have sought at least to negotiate with the Community. I emphasize once again that this has been an extremely difficult and complex negotiation, but I am prepared to defend what we have decided upon, if it is approved by the Community, as being the best possible arrangement under the circumstances, and the widest one given all of the elements which are in play.

I do not know how much time hon. members wish to give me, but I should like, if I may, to turn at this stage to something else of importance.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak very briefly about our relations with France. Of course, I do not need to remind you that relations between Canada and France are based on historical, linguistic and cultural affinities as well as on the development of an economic and political cooperation that I consider very important.

However, those naturally harmonious relations are going through a difficult period, particularly since Mr. Lévesque visited France last November. It is partially caused by the domestic situation in Canada and the ambiguity shown since then by the French government concerning the internal situation in Canada. After the visit of the Quebec premier in France we asked the French government for more details on its policy concerning relations between Canada and France and the proposal for France-Quebec annual meetings at the prime minister level. Since then we have received written assurance from the French government that its policy concerning Canada remains unchanged and that it will not interfere in the Canadian political debates and will respect the Canadian constitutional framework. We took note of this assurance and I for one consider that the issue about the Lévesque visit in France is closed. However we shall continue to remind the French administration of the necessity to consult us before signing agreements with provincial governments, just as we shall continue our discussions on the issue of prime ministers' annual meetings.

We are also concerned by other aspects of our relations with France. For instance, their intention to prohibit the importation into France of young seal skins. I met my French counterpart, Mr. de Guiringaud, in Brussels, specifically to discuss this issue two weeks ago. In the meantime, we have sent to the French administration a memorandum to demonstrate that this species is not in danger and that it is scientifically proven that the slaughter means used are the least traumatic for the animal and that allowances have been made within GATT for those products. I hope that the French government will recognize the validity of our argument and will change its intention of banning young seal skin imports into France.

The issues of the delimitation of the territorial limits between Canada and France near Saint-Pierre-et-Miquelon and our fishing relations continue to present some difficulties. The fact that early this year France and Canada proclaimed a 200-mile economic and fishing zone gives an even greater sense of urgency to the question of an agreement on the delimitation of our marine boundaries, and in that regard the recent 1976 English-French award with respect to the English Channel had the effect of reinforcing Canada's legal position. The government of Newfoundland maintains that there cannot be negotiations with France before the question of federal-provincial jurisdiction has been dealt with. That is why we want the province to participate in the negotiation process and a firmer stand by the federal government should normally help reach that objective. The interim fishing agreement reached on December 30, 1976, will expire at the end of this month. On December 9 last we agreed ad referendum to extend to 1978 all the 1977 arrangements, except for the size of the quotas that were negotiated earlier in Ottawa.

Finally, I would like to point out that last week Canada denounced the 1933 France-Canada trade agreement effective March 15, 1978. We made that decision reluctantly and only after trying unsuccessfully for over a year to reach a compromise with France. That agreement no longer had its raison d'être. For example, the Canadian champagne industry was being penalized unfairly vis-à-vis foreign industries, and we were forced to take this step to protect that industry.

[English]

With the indulgence of the House, Mr. Speaker, since I understand that this is the first time in 17 years that we have had a two-day debate on external affairs, I should like to touch on one or two other matters. One of them has to do with Canada's attitude toward South Africa. As the Prime Minister indicated in the House some two weeks ago on December 5, Canada, along with a great many other countries, has been re-examining the attitude it ought to take beyond what has already been done by the world community in response to those actions which in recent times have been undertaken in South Africa to which we in Canada take the strongest possible objection, and with which we—and I am sure this extends well beyond the Government of Canada— are in major disagreement.

It is true, of course, that in other countries of the world there are clear violations of and disregard for human rights. There, too, Canada is expressing its concern, as are all members of this House.

South Africa, however, stands alone. It is the only country which as a basic part of its government structure—whether it is constitutional in the legal sense is beside the point—has a declared and unequivocal policy. It stands apart as a country which makes decisions affecting human beings on the basis of race and colour. Therefore, over time it is not surprising that the attitude of the vast majority of the countries of the world has become harder, particularly during these past months when we have seen an increase in the amount of repression, rioting and especially in the disturbances which followed the still unexplained death of a respectable and respected black leader of South Africa, Steve Biko.

Along with others, Canada has been asking what further steps we ought to take in order to display and to demonstrate our disapproval of the present regime and our disapproval of apartheid. We strongly believe that what must come in South Africa is the destruction of that kind of system, the introduction of the principle of one man, one vote and of the normal democratic process which all of us in this part of the world take for granted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I am, therefore, announcing today that Canada is phasing out all its government-sponsored, commercial-support activities in South Africa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: For example, we will as quickly as possible withdraw our commercial counsellors from Johannesburg and close the office of the consulate general in that city. We will also withdraw our commercial officers from Cape Town. We will, of course, maintain our offices in Pretoria for normal business, because we do not feel that the breaking off of diplomatic relations at this time is advisable. We still wish to have an opportunity to do what we can in order to impress upon the government of South Africa the necessity for change. We also want to have an opportunity to talk to respected leaders who are opposed to apartheid in South Africa.

In addition to this phasing out of our commercial activities, we will also withdraw all Export Development Corporation government account support from any transactions relating to South Africa. This involves, for example, export credit insurance and loan insurance, as well as foreign investment type of insurance. This is a step which is not as complete as what may very well come in time. We are examining the implications and the possibilities for other such actions. After consultation with the Canadian companies concerned, we will be publishing a code of conduct and ethics for Canadian companies operating in South Africa, designed to govern their employment and similar practices. This will be done as quickly as possible.

The fourth measure is related to South Africa's former membership in the Commonwealth and which we now propose to change. From a date to be announced, we will require non-immigrant visas from all residents of South Africa coming to Canada. We have asked the appropriate officials to examine the impact and the capacity that is open to us to renounce the British preferential tariff. It is still in effect even though the Commonwealth membership of South Africa has long since ceased to exist.

In addition to all of these measures, we are very much concerned about two other aspects of South Africa and South African operations, namely, the activities of Canadian companies in Namibia. Once again, we have asked the officials of the Department of Finance and others, as quickly as possible, to look into all the implications of possible tax concessions and, to the like which these companies may be obtaining and which are being provided by what is essentially an illegal regime in Namibia, by our standards and by our demonstrated conduct at the United Nations.

We are also establishing possible codes of conduct for further investment by Canadians in Namibia. It may be asked—I am sure it will be—why these measures are not introduced immediately. There are two reasons: first, we want to be very sure that we do not penalize Canadian companies which may have been active in that country for legitimate and perfectly acceptable purposes. Nevertheless, there is unquestionably an incongruity in a situation which permits an illegal regime, by world definition, to be participating with Canadian companies in the manner I have outlined.

There is a second reason why we are withholding, for the time being, any further action. We continue to hope that a means will be found of ensuring that there is a peaceful and satisfactory solution for Namibia, one that will bring about equality—one man, one vote. We hope this can be done through negotiations and the process in which Canada is participating, which relates to the five western members of the Security Council talking with the government of South Africa and the other parties concerned.

In the process of making this statement and of expressing my hope for a peaceful outcome in Namibia, it is also Canada's hope and wish that the black leadership there, as elsewhere in South Africa, will show its own high level of responsibility. We hope it will do everything reasonable and possible to bring about transition by peaceful means, rather than plunge another region on that tragic continent into the kind of bloodshed we have seen repeated over and over again in recent years.

There is one final point. We will keep the whole South African situation under review. We are moving now to make sure that our own embargo against sales of arms to South Africa is on all fours with the recent declaration of the Security Council which placed an international embargo on arms shipments. This is the first time in the history of the United Nations that such an embargo has been imposed on a member state. I believe this is a step in the direction which it is inevitable and appropriate for us to take. I re-emphasize that we will keep the whole South African situation under review.

I could take time to discuss in considerable detail such questions as Rhodesia. I will simply say, in the interest of saving time, that we are very closely in touch and in tune with the efforts now under way, particularly those of the Anglo-American initiative to once again bring about a peaceful transition in Zimbabwe, or Rhodesia, whichever you wish to call it. We are looking with great interest at the most recent steps taken by Prime Minister Ian Smith. We can only hope that he has made fully legitimate commitments and that he is, indeed, prepared to take all the steps necessary to ensure a peaceful transition there. The situation is extremely complex. There are two major factors: Mr. Nkomo's forces located outside of Rhodesia, and the issue as to how they are to be dealt with in any negotiation. That continues to be a serious issue.

● (1622)

In so far as Canada is concerned, we have made no commitments as of this moment with regard to Canadian participation in any possible settlement arrangements for Rhodesia. We have said, provided the circumstances are right—and if, indeed, the provision of a peacekeeping force with a Canadian component in it would serve to bring about this peaceful transition—that we would then be prepared to look at it most sympathetically. Indeed, we would not be the party that would stand in the way of bringing about that resolution. So far no request has been made, no specific proposal has come forward. The same is true in the case of Namibia.

There will be many other speakers who will touch on the subject of human rights. I had planned to make a rather lengthy explanation of the Canadian position at Belgrade and elsewhere, but I hope hon. members will not criticize me for not doing so because of the time I have used already. Those members of parliament who have been observers with the delegation feel a high level of statisfaction with the position Canada took at Belgrade. We have not been reticent in denouncing what we regard as basic and direct violations of human rights. We are hoping there will be a successful conclusion to that conference which will lead to other discussions and a general opening up of the entire question of access.

There are four points which I can state quickly. We feel very strongly, in the west, that citizens of a country, whether it be in eastern Europe, Latin America or Africa, should have the right to speak out against their governments or their establishments without the fear of reprisal. That is a very simple and straightforward principle to which most parties subscribe. Also, there should be the maximum amount of movement of people; for example, for family reunification and family visits. There is no reason why this should not be permitted on a worldwide basis with a minimum of intervention by the state.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: The same is true with respect to the exchange of printed information. We hope our stand, along with the stand of others, will bring about that kind of exchange.

In order to translate the policy declarations, there ought to be exchanges in the educational, scientific and cultural fields without any inhibition or restraint. I am sure many members will speak out on human rights. Among them will be those who are as concerned as I am about the fate of Anatoly Shcharansky. With regard to that particular case, we have indicated to the Soviet Union—as well as in relation to others who may be under some form of detention as a result of their attempts to monitor the carrying out of the Helsinki Act—that we consider any action taken against these people at this time could pose a serious threat to a successful outcome at Belgrade. Also, it could threaten and undermine the whole thrust toward detente.

I am sure hon. members would not want me to end without expressing a few words of great satisfaction at current developments in the Middle East. I cannot imagine anything that could bring to all of us more joy than the dramatic breakthrough of the past few weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: When I was in the Middle East approximately a month ago, it was clear that there was a significant change of attitude. It had not shaped up at that time. I questioned very much, even for the few days before the decision was made, that either of the leaders genuinely felt they would be meeting in person so quickly. Yet there is no question that the yearning for peace was evident. I do not think "yearning" is too strong a word. Many have asked what we in other countries can do or ought to do at the present time. I have only one piece of advice: we should do the minimum possible to impede the principals in their very strong commitment at the present time; we must give them all the encouragement we can.

Already the hope is realized that the courage of President Sadat will be met by the generosity of Mr. Begin. This is starting to come together. No one should delude himself that there are not any significant, deep-seated, almost Biblically historical animosities and tensions which must be cast aside. Never in our recent history have the signs and the portents been so great for peace.

This is why, among other things in relation to the United Nations, I have expressed criticism about what has been happening at the United Nations in these past weeks with regard to various resolutions which serve no useful purpose in terms of what is being done at the present time, but which will have a detrimental effect by dragging into this very delicately balanced situation extraneous issues and unnecessary complications. Before another year is out, and before this kind of a review takes place, I think it would be good and wise to have once a week—

Mr. McGrath: Do we have to wait another 17 years?

Mr. Jamieson: No, we will not have to wait another 17 years. In any event, I hope next year we will be able to view with considerable satisfaction that at long last, going back perhaps 2,000 years or more, we have seen one of the great historic events of our time occur in one of the troubled parts of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: In conclusion, I remind hon. members of something which occurred to me in an indirect way the other day. There are two things which sum up the situation as the end of 1977 approaches and we look at this battered planet. As Charles Dickens once said, "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times". In many respects, that fits our circumstances today. On the one hand there is much hope and the prospects are good and bright, yet on the other hand there is much meanness, anger and bitterness. The challenge for us all is to bring these to the point where, as Dickens said, the best of times surmount the worst of times.

As the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) will appreciate, at Beaumont Hamel, the great Newfoundland cemetery, it occurred to me a short time ago, despite everything that has occurred in the period since the Second World War, this is now the thirty-third Christmas we have managed to get by without having a major global conflict. We have had all manner of tragic bush wars, and some, like Viet Nam and Korea, that were massively bigger. At least we have learned enough to move tentatively along this course toward a more lasting and permanent peace. I suppose it can be said that we should be grateful for small blessings, namely, 33 years in which we have not been dumped into a nuclear holocaust. We can all hope that in the thirty-fourth year and beyond we will be able to say the same thing against an even more permanent foundation of true peace in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can be permitted, on behalf of all hon. members of the House, to say to the hon. minister that it is the practice of all of us to consider a speech both in terms of its content and its delivery. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that we recognize we have just heard a very well delivered statement.

● (1632)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I would like, also, on behalf of my colleagues and, most particularly, on behalf of my colleague and seatmate, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), to express our appreciation to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) for his very generous and deserved words in respect of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe whom we hope to have back in his place in the House as soon as the session resumes in the New Year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I should say that we have a certain sympathy for the minister because he has been presiding over the Department of External Affairs during a time of uncertainty as to just who is in charge of precisely what parts of the department. The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) was in active competition for some time with respect to responsibility for matters relating to the north-south conference. Now he seems to have been moved out of that, but he continues to show up as the negotiator for Canada at international pipeline negotiations and other matters which might more normally fall within the terms of reference and responsibility of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Then of course, we have the peripatetic Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) who we gather has responsibility for relations with Francophone countries—we gather on this side of the House, largely to keep him out of Canada. We can certainly approve of that part of the motive, although we are beginning to worry, particularly as we read more current press reports, about precisely what impact his presence outside Canada is having on our relations with other countries.

Nonetheless, we do sympathize with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. His state of mind after becoming minister of that department must have been like the feeling one would have if one had been invited to a grand dinner and was only served the soup. The minister might claim that that has been good for him. I regret to say that it is not good for the country to have a situation of uncertainty over who is responsible for our foreign policy. It is certainly not good for the morale of those Canadians who work within the Department of External Affairs not to know which minister is their minister and, perhaps more important, not to know what their responsibilities are in relation to the responsibilities of the emissaries that might be sent out from time to time from the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

So without dwelling on this subject any longer, and without making any personal comments to the minister, let me say that from the point of view of members on this side of the House, we will be pleased when he or his successor as secretary of state for external affairs has the opportunity to exercise jurisdiction over all the department and not have pieces of it crumble away to be dealt with, with various degrees of competence, by other ministers or, worse, by people who are not members of the government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There are one or two matters to which I want to make quick reference in response to some of the words of the minister. I will not let pass without comment the generally optimistic, one would almost say sanguine view, that the minister took with regard to the nature of international economic development. It is fine to be optimistic—perhaps it is a condition of this time of the year—but I think all of us recognize that other countries, certainly the U.S.A., evidence much more concern over the direction of the impact upon their own future of some of the developments that we now see in international circles.

Without getting into the matter under the title of this debate, I think it is important for us to make very clear that we on this side of the House are not at all sanguine about the degree of planning or even the degree of analysis, relative to our international economic situation, which has been undertaken by the Government of Canada. We think there is a tendency to talk about problems and avoid the very real and dangerous implications for Canada that are developing now as other countries develop their technology, their productivity, their capacity to compete far more effectively than we have in this country.

I think, also, it would be well for me to make reference, in passing—since the minister raised it—to negotiations relative to the maritime boundaries. We are pleased to hear that they are proceeding well, although I think the minister will agree that his comments are subject to interpretation that those negotiations are now proceeding so well that the negotiators have had to ask for another month in which to complete them. I want to make the point, one that members of this party have made before, that it is very likely true that those negotiations would have proceeded much more effectively had there been much more representation on the Canadian negotiating side from members of the Canadian fishing industry who are themselves knowledgeable about fisheries boundaries and about their importance to the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, judging from the remarks of the public and the media, it seems we are now witnessing in Canada a tapering of interest in external affairs. I believe this is due for a large part to our concern over our serious domestic problems which are related to both the unity of this country and the economic situation in general.

Canada's international dimension has never been more important for our future than it is today. We have played throughout the year a role both important and respected as a medium-sized power in world affairs.

[English]

More recently we have had our attention drawn to a number of what can only be called failures in Canadian international policy. Because I think it is an important part of the debate in this House, I want to deal for a moment with some of the failures and some of their causes. Many of our international failures have the same root causes as the failure of this government at home. The first cause is that this government has lost respect by stating high principles and then abandoning them in practice. I intend to come back to a long list of examples, including a new example given to us today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The other cause is the attempt of this government to try to change reality to fit its own theories. That is what went wrong with its management of both the language policy and the economic policy in Canada. It is also what went wrong in the attempt by this government to fundamentally change our defence relations with NATO and our economic relations with the United States. As the House will recall, the Prime Minister for some time had a theory that we could move away from NATO, and for the first six years of his government we did, with very harmful consequences to the morale of our armed forces and to our reputation among our allies. That negative attitude toward NATO has now been suspended, but suspended partly because of the general tactic of this government of changing its positions as elections draw near, and partly because our European allies, quite properly, made it clear that if Canada would not accept obligations in NATO we could not expect co-operation on economic matters.

The second theory of this government which failed was the idea that we could substantially shift our trading relations away from our major partner, the United States. That was manifest in the so-called "third option", the contractual link with the European Economic Community. I was interested to hear today the minister's latest definition of the virtues and values to Canada of the contractual link. It appears that the contractual link now means there is a place where Canada can sit down with other nations and talk. That has happened after a year. The minister says, from across the floor, that it is important. I agree it is important, but it probably would have been less expensive simply to rent a room somewhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Even the minister said that the economic consequences of this so-called contractual link and the economic consequences for which the link was formed, are, to use his own word, "slight"—they have had a slight impact. I think that, unhappily, is a generous assessment of the impact of the contractual link on Canada. That was one manifestation of the government's view that they can move away from the United States. The other, much less defensible, was a series of minor affronts to the United States of America. That is a topic to which I intend to return later in the debate because it is a practice that the Prime Minister, sadly, returned to very recently in this House.

● (1642)

Time does not permit a full assessment of the cost to Canada of changing our traditional and necessary policies to suit the theories of the government, but the net effect has been to diminish our reputation and to cause others in the world to think of us as a capricious country, a kind of dilettante among nations, rich enough that we can ignore reality to pursue some kind of whim. That uneasy reputation for Canada was deepened by the practice of this government so often, abroad as at home, of saying one thing and doing the opposite. In terms of foreign policy, we had two instances of that last week and we probably have seen a third instance of it today.

I want to deal a little later, and some of my colleagues will deal a little later, with the references the minister made regarding a pending agreement with countries in Europe concerning nuclear questions. I very much want to see the document which the minister says is available. I am sure that in the interests of this debate being an informed debate, even though the agreement has not been signed and agreed to by the European partners—but because he has described it as a statement of government policy—the minister would agree that it would be very helpful for us to have it tabled today so that we could study its details and know therefrom precisely what the government of Canada is proposing to do.

Mr. Jamieson: I think I can give you the highlights.

Mr. Clark: The minister says he thinks he can give us the highlights. That would be helpful. We would want highlights which would cover any deal which might cause problems. If the minister would undertake to give us those today, it would be very helpful for my colleagues who want to take part in the debate tomorrow.

In passing, I would like to make one or two comments about this matter. Having listened to the minister, it seems to me that we now have one standard which will apply to nations in Europe and a different standard which will apply to other countries in the world.

Mr. Jamieson: No.

Mr. Clark: The minister says that is not the case. We will want to examine the precise nature of the agreement. I suppose what concerns me and the House most particularly about this kind of thing is that a year ago the government of Canada was prepared to enter into an embargo when it did not hurt, and it was ready to defend principle when it was easy to defend principle. However, now that that principle is tested, the government caves in on the first evidence of its being tested. That is a very worrying kind of concern for all of us.

However, let me go back to some of the other instances in which we have seen too much of this government stating one position in principle and then abandoning it in practice. One instance clearly concerns Canada's relations with the United States. There were several years of calculated indifference to American interests. On one celebrated occasion when the Prime Minister was touring the Soviet Union, he went so far as to suggest that in his view the United States posed a military threat to Canada. After that, and after an unnecessarily provocative visit to Cuba by the Prime Minister at a critical moment when Cuban forces were involved in Angola, the government of Canada used the occasion of the American bicentennial celebrations to advertise a new harmony between our countries. That advertisement was carried on by some of the statements of the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon. However, in the wake of all that last week, gratuitously and deliberately the Prime Minister ended all that talk of harmony with the kind of offhand insult he regularly directs toward some of his fellow countrymen.

What was the reason for that? The reason was that Ambassador Tom Enders of the United States was making speeches about freer trade which incurred the displeasure of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). The fact is that the statements by Ambassador Enders have been much closer to the actual position of the government than the picturesque outpourings of the Minister of Agriculture. Indeed, the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs today on the question of freer trade was much closer to the position stated by Ambassador Enders than the position of his colleague in the cabinet. If the Minister of Agriculture wants to be sick and tired of anyone, perhaps he should be sick and tired of his colleagues in the cabinet.

The point here is that this is not a minor debate in parliament. This is a matter which has very important implications for our relations with a country which all of us acknowledge to be the most important ally Canada has. It would have been far more responsible, if the Prime Minister cared about maintaining good relations between Canada and the United States, for him to discipline his own minister, rather than to undermine the credibility and the effectiveness of the ambassador of the United States. As the Ottawa Journal wrote the following on Saturday and I think deserves to be put on the record of the House of Commons:

> The issue is whether Mr. Whelan was "speaking on behalf of the government" of Canada when he said he was "sick and tired" of Mr. Enders. Mr. Trudeau's earlier "yes" stands unexplained and unrepudiated.

The editorial continues:

> It is impossible to believe that Mr. Trudeau did not know what he was doing both in giving assent to Mr. Whelan's views and in trying to play an insulting intellectual game in the Commons . . . What he was doing was not in Canada's interest.

The views expressed in that editorial are those with which most of us can agree. Unfortunately, that practice by the Prime Minister is not at all new: it is entirely consistent with the attitude of this government to talk about good relations with the United States and then to act in ways which undermine, unnecessarily, those good relations.

The second instance of the government saying one thing in principle and doing the opposite in practice concerns the arrangements known as the Arab boycott. Fourteen months ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs—new at his job—announced a policy to require Canadian firms to report, and I quote the terms of his own speech, "all instances of their complying with boycott provisions." That was the promise. Now the practice is to limit that requirement to compliance with explicit boycott provisions; in other words, to quote an example which has been attributed in the newspapers to the minister: It is quite all right with the government of Canada for Canadian firms to boycott ships that stop in Israel, so long as the boycott is not an explicit provision of contract.

That is to have no policy at all, which is bad enough. What is worse is the hypocrisy—I would have to call it, looking at its record, congenital hypocrisy—of this government which pretends to oppose all boycotts when in fact it acquiesces in most of them. Again, in January, the government promised to publish the list of Canadian firms which agreed to boycott provisions every six months. That was January. This is December. No report has been published, and another promise by this government has been broken.

Today it appears that the government is backing away from nuclear safeguards. We will have to look at the details, but on the basis of what the minister said it appears that prior to today this country required an advance veto on the reprocessing of spent fuel by consumer countries. However, now, concerning European Community countries, we have abandoned the advance veto and require consultation only. This means that if Canadian rules are broken, our only remedy is to cut off future supplies—and that may well be too late. It will be action taken after the damage is done, because today the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated his intention to give away our power to act before the damage is done.

The irony of this dilettante record in foreign affairs is that it was accomplished by a government which claimed some special competence in international matters. Perhaps that was part of the problem, because part of what went wrong in foreign policy, as in so many other fields, is that the political operatives in the Prime Minister's office were granted a power which was well beyond their competence, and that caused chaos and confusion in the conduct of international affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the worst thing about what the government has done in foreign affairs is that it has destroyed the work of Lester P. Pearson. Our party is committed to regain for Canada the respect of the international economic community, which respect must come from clearly stated convictions and competent leadership. Essentially, foreign policy is the means by which we try to maintain our independence and our liberties. Even though it must reflect our domestic concerns and aim at maintaining our security, it must also reflect the character, values and ideals of our country. As a medium-strength power, we are not called upon to recreate the world in our image. However, Canadian policy can aim at attaining an international context in which we can pursue our own interests and promote our own ideals.

When we look at the world today, we note that there is no lack of serious problems. Some concern specific areas, like the Middle East and South Africa; others concern the whole world. A brief list could include the arms race, nuclear proliferation, food and energy shortages, the widening gap between developed and developing countries, the evolution of China and China-U.S.S.R. relations, and various economic problems, among which are world inflation, unemployment and an unbalanced international monetary situation.

● (1652)

We cannot, as a country, address all these problems on our own, but they can be met through Canada acting in alliance with other nations with which we share common approaches. That should occur not only in the types of arrangement the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated today, but also through NATO, through the Commonwealth, through the Francophone community.

I think we have to accept—certainly it is the position of this party—that NATO must continue to be seen as a filler of Canadian foreign and defence policy. Our national security is dependent upon there being no war between the super-powers. The key area where the stability of the super-powers needs to be maintained is Europe. We have a role to play here, a role out of self-interest in our own security but a role, also, as a country which subscribes to certain values that are in conflict in the world. We must be prepared to play our part in defending and maintaining those values.

Moreover, as this House knows, Canadian participation in the alliance provides the basic diplomatic infrastructure for more general consultation and economic co-operation between member states. Naturally, sir, we are similarly committed to the principle of continental defence for North America.

In this party, we have always advocated a very active role for Canada in the Commonwealth, a role particularly relating to matters of aid and development, but also in the unique consultative mechanism which the Commonwealth provides based upon the common heritage of its members. Similarly, we think it very important for a country like Canada to continue to pursue efforts to develop links with countries of the Francophone community. That is, perhaps, the most dramatic way in which Canada can give evidence, internationally, of the richness and diversity of our Canadian heritage. There are important opportunities in both the political and commercial areas for Canada to pursue policies related to strengthening our ties with the Francophone world.

I want to speak briefly today about Canada's role within the United Nations. We think our role in that international body must be based upon active participation in the areas where we are competent, such as in matters of food production, the sea, telecommunications, economic development co-operation and international peacekeeping. In order to be more effective, Canada must give more priority to co-ordinating the activities of federal government departments, provinces and non-governmental organizations affected by international decisions.

Certain reforms to the United Nations are essential. I think all of us accept and honour that institution in terms of what it sets out to accomplish. We are blind to reality in the world, however, if we fail to realize it is going to be necessary for us, as a respected nation in the body, to speak of the need for reform in some of the functions of the United Nations. There is growing public skepticism—particularly in the western democracies—about the ability of the United Nations to deal with conflicts which arise daily or to enforce decisions that have been taken.

The minister made a very strong speech, at the General Assembly this fall, highly critical of many aspects of the United Nations. It is fine to make that kind of speech, but he is the minister responsible for the foreign policy of this government and it would be much more helpful if Canada took positive initiatives within the United Nations to help reform the organization.

I should like to suggest to the minister and the government that the following initiatives should be included. There should be strict rules for the giving of United Nations' aid so as to remove it as much as possible from the political arena. In order to maintain the credibility and strength of the organization, we think there has to be a restructuring of the finances of the organization.

We think Canada could take the initiative toward the phasing out of the Committee on Colonization unless that committee is prepared seriously to examine decolonization by various countries which have not undergone sufficient scrutiny in the past, including countries in southern Africa and behind the Iron Curtain.

This party believes it is of fundamental importance to restore respect for the United Nations, particularly in the western democracies. We must make dramatic moves, and we must be among the leaders to move to reverse the growing cynicism toward that world body and to strengthen commitment to the purposes inscribed in the charter.

As concerns international development, I believe that for the rest of this century, our greatest challenge will be to establish new relations among wealthy countries and developing nations. Experience has already amply shown that traditional resource transfer methods have not succeeded in creating a true development momentum. Low productivity is at the heart of this problem. In the interests of wealthy and poor countries alike, we must boost productivity throughout the world, and the best way to meet this objective is to stabilize the price of goods, lower tariff barriers, increase capital flow to developing countries and improve technological transfers.

[English]

The Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke of some of these problems. I think it important for us to bear in mind that, despite the interest that Canada, both at the government level and among individuals, has indicated in international development in recent years, our performance has been sluggish. Our aid has declined from .56 per cent to .46 per cent of the gross national product in the past year, rather than moving toward the .7 per cent of GNP as requested by the United Nations. Committed Canadian leadership could help significantly to develop better negotiating attitudes in international forums searching for new arrangements in the field of trade, commodities and credit which would lead to an improved sharing of the world's wealth.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are about to rise. I wonder if I might have the consent of the House to continue?

Mr. Jamieson: Carry on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Because so many members want to speak in this debate, and because there have been certain discussions, I wonder if Your Honour would ascertain whether the House would be willing to suspend private members' hour and allow the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to carry on.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, it is true there have been some informal discussions in respect of this matter. It would be quite agreeable to this side to suspend private members' hour for this evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I feel I should ask if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to suspend private members' hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps, before I give the floor to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), I might give notice to the House of the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA'S RELATIONSHIP WITH OTHER NATIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Jamieson:

That this House takes note of the present state and future prospects of Canada's relationships with the other nations of the world.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I express appreciation for the indulgence of the House in allowing speeches to be a little longer than usual.

I was speaking about some of the areas in which Canada's committed attitude toward international development could lead to very real improvements. I think we have to recognize that international co-operation in the world today is no longer a matter of wishful thinking; it has become a prerequisite for peace and stability. Economic growth, in this context, must have as its goal the provision of minimum standards for all peoples in the world. We are not merely advocating the redistribution of a static world income. The higher incomes that are sought by some of the poorer countries through commodity arrangements and better access to the markets of rich countries would signal the potential of significant growth in world economic activity, with the poor nations sharing much more equitably in the increment of that growth. That, in our view, is the basis of a realistic policy for Canada to pursue with a new, integrated international development strategy.

My colleagues and I think there are several important changes which have to be made regarding the operation of the principal instrument of Canadian international trade activity—CIDA. CIDA now has responsibility for over $1 billion a year, and the agency is simply not receiving the kind of administrative or cabinet leadership it requires. For a start—one which we hope will be made immediately—we think there should be an independent management study of CIDA's operation. I wish to emphasize that it should be an independent study.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We also think the government should give the most serious possible consideration to the likelihood that CIDA would be very much improved by having a minister with special responsibilities to supervise CIDA, one who would co-ordinate aid, trade and monetary policies, report to parliament and increase public participation. It is noted with some irony in this House that we have a Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo), but we do not have a minister of state responsible for an agency which is spending in excess of $1 billion a year—and spending it in a way which has caused controversy among Canadians, including those well informed about, and sympathetic to, the needs of international development.

We think, also, there should be modifications to Canadian tax law and other steps taken to encourage Canadian companies to participate in international trade and to form consortia to help develop the economies of third world countries. At the same time, we think those ventures would bring substantial benefit to Canadian industry.

There are several other matters to which I wish to direct attention. Like all hon. members, we on this side welcomed President Sadat's courageous peace mission to Israel and we are following with cautious optimism the discussions under way in Cairo between Egypt and the representatives of Israel. Events appear to be moving rapidly, and it seems that Prime Minister Begin was pleased with the reception accorded him in Washington over the weekend. Now, as he heads for Cairo and his own meetings with President Sadat, I am sure that all members of this House wish him well in these critical negotiations which appear to be proceeding with real hope for a reasonable peace settlement which takes into account all the critical factors in a complex but fundamentally important area of the Middle East.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As the minister did, I want to turn to the question of South Africa. As all hon. members know, this party has consistently opposed apartheid as a profound violation of human rights. In the interests of equality of opportunity within South Africa and peace and security on the African continent, we believe the South African government should move toward the establishment of equal rights and political liberty for all persons, regardless of colour.

There is a great deal to be done in South Africa and through southern Africa generally to institute reforms through peaceful means. Most people living in that part of the world desire evolution, not revolution, in their drive toward freedom and equality. We think it essential that solutions to existing problems be found within South Africa. Nonetheless, the free world must continue to communicate its concern for justice and security in that troubled part of the globe.

In that context, I am pleased to see, and certainly support in principle, some of the steps which the Secretary of State for External Affairs outlined today. Again, we shall have to make the closest possible study of the implication of the measures referred to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He indicated he was taking steps to phase out some—I think I am correct in thinking he said "some"—of the government-sponsored commercial activities in South Africa. He said "all of them," but then he made an exception in relation to government offices in Pretoria.

Mr. Jamieson: That is our regular embassy.

Mr. Clark: That relates to non-commercial activity. I am pleased to have that clarification from the minister. It will be important for us to know precisely what the implications of that action are, and I am sure the minister will want to furnish us with the details of those activities. It will also be interesting to us to learn what are the implications of any changes with relation to Commonwealth preference to which he alluded in his speech. As we study these implications, one of those matters to which we will want to pay close attention is to ensure that their negative impact will not fall more particularly upon residents of that country who are black. We think that would be a most counterproductive approach to Canadian policy, as we are sure the minister will agree, and it is something we would want to consider with great care.

With respect to the undertaking concerning Namibia, the extent of the undertaking—unless I am wrong—is to investigate the impact of Canadian activities there. We in my party think that kind of investigation is long past due and we encourage the government to carry on the investigation. Again, we would wish to get the details of any action which the government may undertake in that regard. I believe the minister spoke of establishing a possible code of conduct for Canadian companies which might be involved there. He said there would be extensive negotiation with the companies concerned so there would be some certainty that the code would be a realistic one.

With that reservation and the others I have made, particularly concerning the impact of what has been undertaken here today—specifically with regard to its impact on blacks in that part of the world—we generally support and welcome the initiative which was announced today by the Secretary of State.

Another matter I wish to raise concerns respect internationally for human rights. The fact is, there is widespread disregard, even contempt, for human rights in many parts of the world today. Amnesty International was awarded the 1977 Nobel Peace Prize. It is reported as follows:

Government-sanctioned torture is still practiced in a horrifying number of states, in spite of the newly adopted United Nations declaration against all forms of tortures.

This degradation of the human spirit is totally unacceptable to most Canadians. Through the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker)—whose work, by the way, was one of the major factors in generating the first full government-sponsored debate on foreign policy in this House in 17 years—this party and this parliament demonstrated our determination to protect human rights in Canada. I refer to the passage of the Canadian Bill of Rights. We fully support the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights and covenants on social, political and economic rights.

Where religious and ethnic communities are denied civil or political rights, or are refused social, economic or cultural justice, we firmly support their demand for justice, and naturally endorse the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Pact. We also support and endorse the defence by Canada of the relevant guarantees of the 1977 Belgrade review conference. I make the point to the minister, and I am sure he will agree, that it is not enough to defend rights at a conference. Canadian foreign policy must give more priority to the protection and the advancement of human rights internationally. The Canadian government, in its relations with foreign governments, should raise on every possible occasion the question of the reunification of families and the persecution of non-violent dissidents.

The Canadian government should work constantly to ensure that racial and religious groups are fully guaranteed their basic rights, including freedom of emigration and equality of political expression. Finally, there should be no moving away whatever from the Canadian policy of admitting victims of foreign oppression to this country as refugees. We believe that forcing people to live in refugee camps on a continuing basis is absolutely contrary to fundamental human rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Now I would speak briefly on the question of arms controls. The spectre of nuclear war is unquestionably the most terrifying potential threat to the world. At least six nations now possess atomic nuclear capability. Two dozen or more are now on the threshold of producing, as a by-product of their energy programs, the starting point for several thousand atomic bombs if they so wish. That is the situation as it presently exists.

● (1712)

Bad as the present situation is, it is bound to become worse as nuclear capacity spreads. The possibility of accidents, misinterpretation of orders, theft of nuclear weapons, nuclear terrorism and blackmail, would be greatly multiplied in a proliferated nuclear world. Moreover, a significant element of unpredictability is introduced into the system of mutual deterrence by the inclusion of many more nuclear powers, each with different geopolitical ambitions and with different military and technological capabilities.

The UN special session on disarmament, in the spring of 1978, provides one more opportunity to make some progress in this fundamentally important area. We in this parliament would be interested in knowing what precise proposals Canada might submit or support at that session. Indeed, I think I can speak for my colleagues here when I say there would be a disposition among the members of this party to be involved in the advance preparation of those proposals. We think the government of Canada has a profound obligation to the people of this country to do everything possible to play a useful role in the arms issue, an issue which affects every individual on this planet.

The minister pointed out—we have all remarked on it—that this is the first time in some 17 years that the House of Commons has set aside two days to debate foreign policy. There have been other debates on particular issues, very often at the instigation of this party in opposition; for it is acknowledged by all of us that this debate today on foreign policy is a very valuable interlude in the affairs of parliament. But the point has to be made, and made very clearly, that international issues should be a much more regular part of Canadian consideration. That would be good for the substance of policy and for decisions to be made of policy, because individual Canadians, as has been shown on many occasions, are much more forthright on issues like discrimination and nuclear limitation than this government and its advisers have proven to be. So not only would it be good for the substance of policy, but it would broaden the frequency of consideration by parliament. I suggest it would also be good for the country.

There was a time, looking back not many years, certainly not as many as 20, when foreign policy in Canada was a major outlet for the idealism of a whole generation of Canadians. People living in different corners of the country who were separated by other matters nonetheless came together as Canadians to deal with matters of international policy and the role that Canada should play in the world. International relations and foreign policy can be a positive, uniting influence among Canadians.

Before that can happen, Mr. Speaker, foreign policy in Canada has to move out into the open. That, unfortunately, is not happening now. It is not simply a matter of debate in this House being limited. There are other signs of too much secrecy relating to development of foreign policy. In his latest report, the Auditor General exposed questionable payments of $508,000 last year made by the Department of External Affairs to landlords in host countries. When my colleague the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) tried to seek the names of those countries, the government refused to name them. The government also refuses to release CIDA's country reports which would enable parliamentarians to judge just how effectively the $1.1 billion of taxpayers' money is being spent. This government's obsession with secrecy has been carried so far that even the Treasury Board study on the effects of CIDA aid, which is tied to the Canadian economy, is withheld from public inspection.

That has to change, Mr. Speaker. One way to change it would be to introduce and to act upon the legislation proposed by my colleague from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) to open more broadly access to information in this country. But another way—in our view the two should go together—would be to establish a broadly mandated House of Commons committee on foreign affairs. We should extend the mandate which exists now to ensure that there is an opposition vice-chairman for that committee and that the committee has the necessary research and staff support. We think a committee of that kind would have to have a regular mandate to review the annual report of the minister. It should be empowered to hold meetings across the country and to allow the widest possible participation by Canadians who are worried about their world and their country but who today are denied adequate opportunity to express their concerns or to make an impact upon that policy.

The members of this House know that all Canadians have a very vital stake in peace among nations and in the degree of progress which we find internationally. We in this party want to return this country to a position where our role in international affairs can be a great source of pride for Canadians and also a great source of creativity, something which once again challenges the Canadian imagination. We believe if that happens it, in turn, can contribute to greater unity as a nation.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) for the interesting, clear and cogent manner in which they have commenced this debate. I am well aware, as I imagine almost all members are, that international affairs do not command the absorbing interest that some other matters do, be it in parliament, in the media or perhaps among the public of Canada. Nevertheless, as has been said, it is a subject of deep concern to the survival of the human race, to the future of our children, grandchildren, and perhaps to ourselves. We must be able to solve international problems and to secure lasting peace. It is, therefore, very fitting that we should devote some of our time to this subject.

There are a number of subjects on which I should like to concentrate. The first of these is disarmament. In her excellent work entitled "The Game of Disarmament", the distinguished Swedish expert, Alva Myrdal, wrote:

> Meanwhile we have to do everything in our power to campgaign for public enlightenment. The present competitive escalation is a flagrant miscalculation and it is endangering the security of all of us. Security can only be found by reversing the trend, by beginning and continuing to diminish vast stocks of arms, both nuclear and conventional, that the nations of the world have.
> Such a strategy means, in the first instance, facing the arms race as the major international, moral dilemma of our time.

As she points out, Mr. Speaker, it has been created solely by mankind, but it is at least within our power to solve it. As Mrs. Myrdal says, the world is hovering at the edge of an abyss, driven there by man's own unreason. She refers to the arms race as "global folly". There are few people who know more about it than she, since she has represented her country at innumerable disarmament conferences, international, European and bilateral.

All countries are now buying greater and greater insecurity at higher and higher cost. In her book, Mrs. Myrdal refers to the $300 billion being spent annually on the arms race. Some put this figure even higher, at $400 billion. The amount spent is of the same order of magnitude as the total income of the poorer countries which comprise more than half of mankind.

The Stockholm International Peace Institute, known as SIPRI, represents another type of comparison. Thus, for example, world military expenditure is greater than either world expenditure on education or health: it is 15 times larger than official aid provided to the underdeveloped countries. It is equivalent to the gross national product of all the countries in Africa, the Middle East and South Asia.

Immense scientific skill and research are devoted to building up the power of nations so that, to use the jargon, they may be able to overkill each other many times over. I point out to the House that arms strength is achieved at the sacrifice of social welfare. This applies not only to nuclear weapons but to the so-called conventional weapons which have become more and more sophisticated and more and more numerous through the world, including the poorer sections of the world sometimes known as the Third World. I shall return later to the most recent turn in the armaments race. I think it is a sinister turn. That is, the proposal to produce neutron bombs.

Every government tends to justify participation in the arms race as being necessary to guard its security. But that is an illusion. What makes the arms race a global folly is that all countries are now buying greater and greater insecurity, at higher cost. In fact, the evidence indicates the stepping up of armaments leads to a decrease in safety against attacks. As defence expenditures mount, it becomes harder to obtain financing for civilian purposes such as health, education, housing and other kinds of social needs. Public expenditures for such things would, if well planned, raise the productivity of labour and provide a future remedial course to individuals in society.

There is not only a question of danger and the security of human beings. There is the question of the waste of human resources, the danger that militarization of countries will undermine the morality of people who think in terms of "real politik" entirely outside the realm of moral precepts carried on in terms of power which they use to justify the use of violence and threats of violence together with large-scale spying, bribing and lying in high places. This, surely, must have a debilitating outcome on our social order and respect for ethical rule.

To deal with the super-powers first, Mr. Speaker, an article by an eminent scholar, Jerome B. Wiesner, who is very expert in this whole field, is mentioned at page 28 of Mrs. Myrdal's book. She writes:

> Ever since shortly after World War II, the military power of the United States has been steadily increasing. Throughout the same period the national security of the U.S. has been rapidly and inexorably diminishing... From the Soviet point of view the picture is similar but much worse. The military power of the U.S.S.R. has been steadily increasing since it became an atomic power in 1949. Soviet national security, however, has been steadily decreasing.

There are those who like to make out that the quantitative growth of armaments, conventional and nuclear, has been the prerogative entirely of the U.S.S.R. Our cold war warriors are not slow to remind us of this and to suggest that it is necessary for us to build up the kill-power of the United States and her allies to meet this threat. What these people never tell us is the extent to which the U.S. has already been building up qualitative superiority in weapons of destruction and is continuing to do so.

It is sometimes said that possession or superiority of arms is a necessary deterrent, but it goes far beyond any power necessary for deterrence. However, once those super-powers have the capacity to destroy each other, a further attempt to secure superiority is the building up of an overcapacity. The overkill capacity of each of the super-powers is far beyond enough.

Jules Moch, who for a long time was a leading French spokesman for disarmament, made a striking calculation in his book "Destin de la Paie 1969." He said that, taking into consideration how many tons of explosives are needed to kill the average number of people in each square kilometre, stocks of nuclear weapons already then available were sufficient to annihilate the total world population 690 times over. Today, if the U.S.S.R. decided to risk retaliation, they could launch an attack on the United States with intercontinental missiles and bombers. This time, the number of American casualties would be extremely high—100 million casualties are estimated. The situation in the U.S.S.R. is even worse. The question that has to be asked is: What is enough?

We must reduce the forces of the super-powers and their allies. But this is only the first step. What is really needed is the total abandonment of nuclear weapons. It is true that the main responsibility rests upon the super-powers, but all powers have a measure of responsibility: all powers are participating in the arms race, including even the Third World nations.

What is necessary to be done? Some achievements have, in fact, already been made—more particularly, the partial test ban and the non-proliferation agreement. The test ban must become a total test ban. I listened to the minister's account of the safeguards we are going to attach to the export of uranium. I hope he was not being overly optimistic. The non-proliferation agreement must be strengthened. We must pursue our efforts to attract people in governments to recognize their true interests. We must make it clear that the production of arms is not, in fact, the avenue for increased production and employment. This is not the case.

[Mr. Brewin.]

It would, indeed, be perfectly possible for people living in a sensible world to work together to provide alternate useful forms of employment. We must aim at a strategy of limitation and reduction of specific arms. It is useless to talk about general and complete disarmament at this time. If a few hundred bombs are all that is needed for a deterrent, how did it happen that we needed to produce more than this number? The number of nuclear weapons must be drastically reduced. It is not, however, only in the area of nuclear weapons that disarmament is required: there are more and more sophisticated conventional weapons being produced.

A report by the United Nations groups of experts on the social consequences of disarmament in 1972 stated that controls over proliferation have to be improved, strengthened and applied to nuclear facilities in all countries. We have signed treaties—the last one I am aware of is the Geneva protocol of 1925—to prevent the use of cruel methods of warfare. This is something that goes far back in human history. However, we did not carry it out. As I am going to point out, war has become more and more brutal.

In the interests of humanity, chemical weapons and napalm should be banned, along with the bombing of open cities. Biological means of warfare have been outlawed, but the same rules of war have not been applied to chemical means of warfare. They should be. The problems concerning inspection, which made it difficult to secure disarmament before, are no longer insuperable problems because of the far greater means of detection now available to the countries of the world. There is a tremendous need for a great deal more openness in this field.

Some advance has been made under the Helsinki Agreement, whereby military manoeuvres by different powers are attended by the representatives of other powers. It is not to be suggested that this step is a very long one or a very potent one, but it is something to create more confidence and remove fear. It is something which needs to be advanced, expanded, and changed. No doubt there are many other steps which have to be taken, and no doubt the working out of these steps is not a simple or straightforward matter. It is something that has to be done if the fears of mutual destruction are to be removed.

Members of this House are well aware that a special assembly of the United Nations has been called for May or June, 1978. The nations of the world will gather to deal with this question of disarmament. The chances are that the conference will be much improved by the fact that France and the United States are participating in it. They intend to participate fully, so it is to be hoped it will be more effective. I am not sure whether the Chinese will attend. It is possible that country will attend, but every other country in the world will be taking part.

I should like to suggest to the minister and the government that we should not take our participation in this conference lightly. We should talk with like-minded countries, such as Sweden and the Netherlands, in regard to the steps which should be taken. We should be planning to consult and inform Canadians in order for there to be public participation in the process. For a number of recent international conferences, the Government of Canada has provided for the presence of both parliamentary observers and non-governmental agencies. This is an important aspect in ensuring the conference is taken seriously by Canadians. I commend the hon. Leader of the Opposition for what he said on this matter. It is not just a matter for a few bureaucrats in the Department of External Affairs or any other department. It is something in which conscience, concern and interest in what is being looked at should be understood. The fact that some members of the House attend as observers may not be an ideal setup, but it is a useful one. They cannot go to these conferences without learning a geat deal. The non-governmental agencies should be encouraged to attend, because they are the ones who are idealistic.

An hon. member during the debate today indicated that the younger generation used to have a great idealistic interest in international affairs. It is safe to assure the House that the situation today is the same. Every effort should be made to brief and instruct those who will be attending in various capacities. There is no point in going to the conferences if they are not provided with the necessary information. Often they have an interest, but it cannot be satisfied. Also I hope senior members of the government will be involved in this conference.

Now I should like to turn to a specific aspect of disarmament in which it is necessary for Canada to make up its mind and speak out clearly. I am referring to the proposed production of a neutron bomb. The implication of this new weapon is frightening indeed. President Carter has indicated his intention to consult his allies. I do not know whether that has been done yet, but as recently as August 1 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is quoted as saying in an interview in the Toronto Daily Star that he has neither analysed the neutron bomb nor discussed it with President Carter.

A short while ago the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) told the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), in reply to a question concerning the neutron bomb that, "As to the neutron bomb I would think that the hon. member knows as much about it as I do." This is an extraordinary thing. This demonstrates the irresponsibility of the Canadian government and almost indicates a degree of incredible indifference to a subject which is in the minds of people across the world, particularly in Europe. We are involved in Europe. We are part of NATO. There are Canadian troops in the very areas where neutron bombs might be used. It is time for the government to make up its mind on where it stands.

The neutron bomb can kill people with radiation, without too much damage to property. Neutron bombs are small, tactical weapons which carry a spray of lethal radiation that is more effective than tactical nuclear weapons. Radiation deaths come quickly if people are near the bomb. If they are within two kilometers, they do not die immediately. They linger around for a week and die slowly with convulsions, vomiting and diarrhoea. The result is that they die in great pain.

Some people think the neutron bomb is a good idea. Senator Stennis of Mississippi said that the idea of having this weapon is the best news in years, although Senator Heinz of Pennsylvania said that it is a weapon which is even more repugnant than usual. The opponents of the neutron bomb argue that it is particularly inhuman. It may save property, but it does not save lives. It is a form of chemical and bilogical warfare which historically has outraged civilization throughout history.

The obvious thing is that if it can be produced by the United States, it can also be produced by the U.S.S.R. The United States Atomic Energy Commission tested the bomb as long ago as 1963. For some reason or another, no production was proceeded with. It is being talked about now, and President Carter will make up his mind after consultation with his allies. An analysis of the weapons program by the United States arms control and disarmament agency found that the production of the weapon would have a deleterious effect on negotiations with the Soviet Union and other countries. The foreign minister of Sweden has indicated that it is an exceedingly cruel weapon.

Professor Linus Pauling, a former Nobel prize winner from the United States, has indicated that he believes the manufacture of the neutron bomb and its deployment are a temptation for military leaders to use it. The employment of such nuclear weapons will almost certainly lead to a world war in which the terrible hydrogen bombs stockpiled in nuclear arsenals will be brought into use.

Professor Eric Burhop of Britain, president of the World Federation of Scientific Workers, has said that the decision to develop the neutron bomb represents a further step in the escalation of the arms race and will make agreement on measures on disarmament more difficult. It is, however, the weapon par excellence to take over the industries of another country because it kills people in other countries and leaves the factories standing.

Lord Chalfont of Britain, who is a military writer, and although a member of the Labour cabinet is now a stronger supporter of the Conservative party in Great Britain, is certainly not an anti-militarist, has said that the effect of the use of the neutron bomb would be to blur the distinction between nuclear and conventional weapons, and that once the threshold is crossed there will be no certainty of control.

Professor Feld of the U.S.A. has said that by contributing to the illusion that nuclear weapons are usable, by eroding the barrier against any first use of a nuclear weapon, and by increasing reliance on them and lowering the threshold of their introduction into possible conflict, the deployment of neutron bombs could greatly increase the chances of a nuclear war.

The Economist, which is hardly thought of as a radical sort of paper, says the bomb will kill those within its range and result in a creeping, cruel death for many others. The American writer, Mr. Norman Cousins, introduces another aspect. According to him, the use of the bomb will cause genetic damage to survivors, which means that human beings yet unborn will pay a fearsome price. These unborn children through genetic degeneration may inherit all sorts of defects.

The neutron bomb poses a moral issue: do we have the right to condemn future generations, and have we the right to use the neutron to declare war against humanity? Military experts differ on this question, and I am not particularly surprised that that should be the case, but I have always imagined that on a matter as vital as this we must think things out for ourselves and not leave them exclusively to the judgment of military people.

There are one or two other subjects that I want to touch on very lightly. I join the others who have spoken in this debate in rejoicing that a serious negotiation is going on and that there appear to be real prospects of a breakthrough. In particular we wish the leaders of Egypt and Israel well in the historic task they have undertaken. We think Canada should make it clear that if Canadian assistance is needed as a buffer, or if our peacekeeping force is needed in establishing stability in that area, we would be ready to participate. Just as continuing hostility in the Middle East would be an incalculable evil, a negotiated peace would be an incalculable gain, not only for the nations involved but for the world as a whole.

I heard what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said on the subject of South Africa. It seemed, although we did not have time to examine what he said in detail, that he has moved a long way toward the point of view we have taken for a long time, namely, that it is hypocritical for us constantly to condemn apartheid or inhumanity, to talk about sanctions, and then to do absolutely nothing about restraining commercial activities between Canada and South Africa. If, as it sounded, the minister has moved to that view, then I think he should be commended. I imagine it was about ten years ago that we started talking about this first, and it shows that if you keep on talking about something worth-while, you finally get some results.

I should like to end with one other reference, one which has already been made, that is, the necessity to participate fully in the development of the new economic order and to take necessary steps to assist nations in the Third World to expand their trade. We appreciate the fact that efforts along these lines have been made in the North-South conference, largely and substantially aided and helped by the former secretary of state for external affairs, but many of the proposals made were found not to be acceptable to some of the countries concerned. However, this new economic order which is tied in with the question of disarmament is one of vital concern to human beings all over the world, and we have, by reason of our high degree of skills and the productive nature of our economy, the opportunity to help. I think it is not much good to say that we cannot do it because we are in trouble ourselves. We have nothing like the trouble, the malnutrition and abject poverty that affect many nations throughout the world. I believe that if we assist in building a more prosperous world through the expansion of a new economic order, we shall help to solve our own problems.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, in this subject matter which is so vast I have chosen to deal with a very narrow and specific area and to outline and highlight some of the action being taken so far as development in the Third World is concerned.

In a move toward assisting development in Third World countries through science and technology, the United Nations has decided to hold a world conference on science and technology for development, UNCSTED, in 1979.

A United Nations conference concerning this general subject area was previously held in 1963, (UNCSAT I). Subsequently, in December, 1970, the UN General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to evaluate the implication of science and technology for development, and specifically to assess the results achieved within the UN system since the first conference. The Secretary-General underlined the need to expand co-operation in the field of science and technology. One result of his reply was the proposal to hold UNCSTED in 1979.

This decision in turn reflects the conviction by developing countries that science and technology, in its broadest sense, represents a key factor in their national development strategies. Policy issues, rather than technical questions in science and technology, are to be the topic of discussion at the conference. That is to say, concrete examples of solutions to numerous socioeconomic problems through science and technology will be examined.

The main objectives of UNCSTED are: first of all, to adopt concrete decisions on ways and means of applying science and technology in establishing a new international economic order, as a strategy aimed at economic and social development within a time frame; second, to strengthen the technological capacity of developing countries so as to enable them to apply science and technology to their own development.

The third objective is to adopt effective means for the utilization of scientific and technological potentials in the solution of problems of development of national, regional, and global significance, especially for the benefit of developing countries. The fourth objective is to provide instruments of co-operation to developing countries in the utilization of science and technology for solving socioeconomic problems which cannot be solved by individual action, in accordance with national priorities.

The conference agenda as recommended by the United Nations Economic and Social Council consists of four major parts. The first is science and technology for development, consisting of technology transfer, the integration of science and technology in socioeconomic development, and new science and technology for overcoming obstacles to development.

The second is institutional arrangements and new forms of international co-operation in the application of science and technology, consisting of the building up and expansion of institutional systems for science and technology in developing countries. It also consists of research and development in industrialized countries, the exchange of science and technology information and experiences, the strengthening of international co-operation in the field of science and technology, and the promotion of co-operation among developing countries.

The third is utilization of the existing United Nations system and other international agencies, and the fourth is science and technology for the future.

Thus far, topics to be discussed will include food, including production, transportation, storage and distribution; energy, with the emphasis on renewable resources; natural resources, including finding, exploitation and development of mineral and fibre resources; industrialization, with emphasis on manufacturing industry; and finally, tropical diseases, primarily from a medical standpoint.

The value of UNCSTED will depend to a great extent upon the preparatory work which is now under way. Thus far the bulk of the conceptual preparation for UNCSTED has been done by the UN advisory committee on science and technology for development, a body of non-governmental experts. Responsibility for the over-all policy direction has been given to the UN committee on science and technology for development, a body of national government representatives. At its first meeting, which was held in January of 1977, guidelines for the conference were set, and Mr. J. F. daCosta of Brazil was appointed secretary-general.

Canada has taken an active part in preparing for the conference. In order to provide direction and co-ordination of the many national activities, the federal government has established two major interdepartmental committees. Over-all policy direction is provided by a policy committee chaired by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. The day-to-day co-ordination is provided by a steering committee chaired by a senior official of the same department. Major support of these committees comes from the Ministry of State for Science and Technology and the Canadian International Development Agency.

One activity now under way is the production of a national paper for presentation at the conference in 1979. Presently under the chairmanship of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology, the paper describes the present science and technology component of Canada's aid programs.

It also focuses on areas of Canadian expertise of potential value to developing countries and illustrates, with selected examples, where and how Canada has applied science and technology to development.

Although UNCSTED will be primarily an inter-governmental conference, contributions of non-governmental sectors will be of vital importance. Contacts are being made with universities, business, labour, the Royal Society of Canada and with SCITEC.

Presently the University of Guelph is involved in eight international projects, and I would like to outline them very quickly. The first is a triticale project in which research is now being done on this new hybrid cereal at the International Centre for Maize-Wheat Research in Mexico. It will be useful in areas of short-growing crop seasons and drought, prevalent in areas such as Iran and Iraq where food scarcity is a major concern. The University of Guelph is presently taking an active part in this particular crop research, working specifically on the winter type of triticale. Our Canadian climate provides an excellent environment for such research.

The second is a tripanosomiasis project. This fatal disease carried by the tse-tse fly is the major factor which limits cattle production in Africa. As protein deficiency is a major problem to the people of this area, finding a cure for this disease will greatly improve the nutritional standards of the area. The University of Guelph is presently involved in this four-year project, training people from Kenya at the university.

The third is the cassava project. Cassava is the major food crop in most tropical regions of Africa and Asia. With the main centre of IDRC in Colombia, South America, the International Centre for Tropical Agriculture, the University of Guelph has now completed its five-year joint involvement in the project. Involving a dozen departments at the University of Guelph, researchers examined worldwide distribution as well as marketing of cassava. The University of Guelph was instrumental in providing unique equipment and expertise.

The fourth and fifth are apiculture projects. Beekeeping projects are now taking place in both Kenya and Sri Lanka. These projects, financed by CIDA, are now in their second successful phase. This establishes not only local enterprises in the areas but also serves to increase food production. Professor Gordon Townsend of the University of Guelph is a world expert in this area.

The sixth is the Ghana project. This five-year project, twinned with the University of Ghana, involves faculty members from Guelph doing research and teaching on site in Ghana. Students from Ghana in turn study at the University of Guelph so that they may return and staff their own areas.

The seventh is the University of Malaysia project which involves establishing a veterinary college at the University of Malaysia. This is a four-year project financed by CIDA.

The eighth project is the Jamaica project. In the Caribbean research and training is being done in the pork and pig industry.

The University of Guelph is now finalizing a project with the University of Campinas, Brazil. This project, financed by CIDA, will involve training of faculty in the food science departments. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

• (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Maine: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying when I spoke prior to six o'clock, the University of Guelph has been involved with CIDA in several projects illustrating how our country is helping to transfer science and technology for development to the developing world.

In conclusion I should like to wrap up my comments by saying that the University of Guelph is also involved in a host of short-term projects in conjunction with CIDA. Specifically, numerous staff members have been asked to be advisers in several projects in Zambia and the Middle East.

I trust that the appropriate use of science and technology in contributing to the solution of problems in developing countries and in complying with their needs, has now been made evident. In conjunction with people from developing countries, we have aimed at training their people in order that they may return to their own countries and staff their own areas in the near future. In other words, we are helping them to help themselves. Although they were encouraged to do as much work as was possible in their own developing countries, often the highly technical equipment and expertise involved made it necessary that the research be carried out in Canada.

Projects such as those undertaken by the University of Guelph represent what can be done by our non-governmental sector. That is why it is essential that, at UNCSTED, Canada be represented by non-governmental organization delegates as well as governmental delegates. Through the involvement of the Department of External Affairs and MOSST and specific departments such as agriculture and fisheries with the scientific community both directly and through SCITEC, the Royal Society of Canada, and possibly the Science Council of Canada, arrangements can be made for NGO contributions in the 1979 conference. It would be a tragedy—no, a travesty of justice—to see other than the fullest of co-operation between these two communities in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, our debate takes place at a time when peace initiatives in the Middle East are occurring at a furious pace. The moves by President Sadat and Premier Begin have been called daredevil diplomacy. Now we learn that these daredevils are going to hold their second face to face meeting on Christmas Day. Can there be any greater Christmas present to the whole world than the continued movement forward to peace by these two courageous leaders? If it takes daredevil diplomacy to bring peace to an area that has so long been the reflection of the tragic vision of mankind, let us have more daredevil diplomacy.

To the Arab and Israeli diplomats who are listening to this debate I say it is not my intention to tell you how to solve the vexatious problems of the Middle East; I only want to tell you they must be solved for the good of the world. Take back to your governments the wish, the insistence, the demand of the Canadian people that this fresh momentum for peace not be lost. The courage of Sadat and Begin has inspired the world. Our hopes have been raised that there is a way to extend justice to Jew and Arab alike. Do not allow the promise of this moment to be lost.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we must speak of Canada's responsibility in foreign policy. This debate will be useless if we offer only rhetoric to one another, if we advance impossible proposals, if we use it as a smokescreen to cover the deep divisions at home. Somehow, through this debate, we must strike a note of realism concerning Canada's place in a world that is undergoing great change. We must balance the strength and potential of Canada with the fact that we are divided in so many ways internally. We must balance our good reputation and image abroad with the fact that we are not a major power.

Yet considering all the realities of Canadian existence, there is no doubt in my mind that Canada can do much more than it is now doing to extend peace, stability and justice in the world. In fact this very exertion outwards into a world that is fractured would be of considerable help in revitalizing the Canadian spirit. The government's down-playing of foreign affairs—there was not a word on this subject in the throne speech—appears to be a confession that it cannot advance in the external arena until the internal picture is improved.

I am convinced that reaffirming a constructive role for Canada in the world community can be of considerable help in finding a renewed sense of purpose and direction for Canada. In fact the continued development of our own country demands that we pay greater attention to the role Canada should play in a changing world. This is not a simplistic notion, rather it is a reflection of the profoundness of human nature.

Human beings need goals to find happiness; and nations need goals to discover their unity. Outside the Parliament Buildings, there is a monument that says it well: "If I lose myself, I save myself." What this means, in modern terms, is that a renewed effort on our part to make Canada an international source of human rights and economic growth would be a means to create new bonds among Canadians. The internal strengthening of Canada through greater involvement in the newly-discovered realities of an interdependent world is a challenge of historic proportions to this country.

Can we respond to this challenge? Mr. Speaker, we have no choice but to respond. We do not live alone on this planet. Look at the picture of the earth sent back from space by the astronauts. That picture reveals graphically how the interests of one part of the globe are connected with the interests of all. If foreign policy has always been the pursuit of national aims and interests in the international environment, foreign policy must now strive to secure those interests by promoting the well-being of peoples and nations throughout the world. What is needed, therefore, is a reconstituted foreign policy for the 1980s that can reconcile the traditional needs of independence with the new demands of interdependence.

A policy of enlightened internationalism is a necessity. And that takes political leadership. The government has shown a disinterest in providing leadership to the Canadian people. It is time for members of this House to assert our determination to participate in the construction of a new foreign policy for the next decade. We are the ones who go across this country measuring public opinion and also helping to shape it. In 1977 I spoke in 27 Canadian communities on Canada's international role and I have found that in every community there is a creative minority of concerned Canadians who want a stronger foreign policy and more leadership from the government in this area.

The Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence ought to be an ideal instrument in the forming and dissemination of policy. But it is not utilized because of the silly rule that committees can only study what the government allows them to study. Thus this whole fall session has been wasted because the government would not provide a reference to the committee to study aid, or disarmament, or peacekeeping or indeed any of the many items that are opened up in the minister's annual report. All members know that consideration of estimates is not a time for exploring new possibilities. The subcommittee on international development which produced reports on a common fund for commodities and debt management during the past two sessions performed valuable work. Why should that work be suspended? If the government is serious about the motion before us asking us to take note of "future prospects of Canada's relationships with the other nations of the world," then at the very least it would refer the minister's annual report to the committee and let us get down to the serious work of contributing to a foreign policy for the 1980's.

Mr. Speaker, a reconstituted foreign policy should not make the mistake of the past decade—going off in all directions at once, especially when some directions contradict others. It should rest on firm foundations, rather than on a set of stop-and-go experiments. That has been the major flaw in Canada's foreign policy in the 1970s. In this decade the government, discovering interdependence, thought the best response was to plunge into new arenas to the diminishment of traditional relationships; to spend aid money in a plethora of developing countries without stopping to measure whether the aid was effective; to make great speeches at conferences outside Canada without ever explaining to the Canadian people why an enlarged foreign policy is necessary and what the government's plan is. As for Canada's votes in the United Nations, they have been such a strange mixture of yes, no and abstentions, with the emphasis on the abstentions, that they defy analysis.

Also, how are we to analyze the so-called third option policy? What positive gain has it produced? The necessary counterweights to our dependence on the U.S.—the Pacific Rim, the EEC, Latin America—have not materialized. The contractual link has yet to amount to anything beyond mere statements of good will. Moreover, the search for a closer relationship with Europe was undermined thanks to the decision to reduce unilaterally our participation in NATO. The fact that this reduction was made before the conclusion of the foreign policy review made nonsense of the claim that foreign policy would determine defence policy.

Beside the fact that the government's foreign policy has been a failure in that it has accomplished none of the things it set out to do, it is no longer clear how or where our foreign policy is made. The most important agreement of the decade in Canada—U.S. relations, the Alcan Pipeline agreement, was negotiated not by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but by the government House leader. Our relations with francophone countries, which until recently have been handled adequately by External Affairs, are now being entrusted to another cabinet minister, the Minister for Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). The reasons for this have never been satisfactorily explained.

In a reconstituted foreign policy for the next decade, I favor a clear statement at the outset reaffirming a spirit of co-operation in Canada-U.S. relations, for the simple reason that our security and trade are inextricably bound up with the United States. And in the past decade a traditionally positive relationship has been strained, often needlessly. Canadians have been left to wonder if somehow Canada was getting delusions of grandeur that we could survive on this continent without the closest attachment to the U.S. A reaffirmation of Canada-U.S. relations at this moment would act as a stabilizing rudder as we steer into new waters.

Second, our traditional ties with the Commonwealth and NATO need to be reinforced. These great and time-tested associations provide a framework for Canada's interests abroad. Yet the government has given the appearance that we could treat old friends in a cavalier manner.

Only when Canadians are reassured that our attachments to the U.S., Europe and the Commonwealth will remain the anchors of a reconstituted policy, will such a new policy be understood and accepted. There must be movement forward into the complex fields of human rights, detente, the development and security of Africa, international development and disarmament. But these steps must be on firm foundations. We should be careful that we do not draw the analogy of Canada's being a bridge too far. For a bridge requires strong footings. Today those footings are not strong because the government has almost totally neglected to explain to the Canadian people whatever it is it is trying to do. No wonder Canadians are bewildered and think that Canada is wandering in a jungle at midnight without a compass.

If any final proof is needed about the confusion of purpose in Canada's foreign policy, Mr. Speaker, let us consider the sorry spectacle of CIDA officials now justifying Canada's aid budget on grounds that it is good for the Canadian economy. Is the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce so bereft of ideas to promote the sale of Canadian goods abroad that the government must insist that CIDA become a sales agency? The mismanagement of the economy must be even worse than we imagined if CIDA, an agency that was started to express the humanitarian concern of Canadians for the poor of the world, is now to be used to prop up industry, trade and commerce.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, more than half of Canada's aid budget is spent on Canadian goods and services; this is called tied aid. There is nothing inherently wrong with tied aid, provided that it promotes development. However, given such factors as the high technological content of much tied aid, there is increasing evidence, which I have seen with my own eyes, that it can promote underdevelopment instead. The myth has grown up that tied aid is important to the Canadian economy. How can this possibly be true when tied aid represents only .23 per cent of our gross national product? If the government has evidence to the contrary, let it publish the evidence and stop operating CIDA in such secrecy that a "confidential" label is even put on its country reports.

To have the government now justifying CIDA on business grounds will, in fact, prevent CIDA from implementing the government's own strategy on international development that calls for increased emphasis on rural development of the poorest people.

There is a paradox in this which I will explain in this way. There is little direct commercial return to Canada in the development of health, education and marketing services in the villages where the greatest number of the poor live, and little benefit directly to people in developing countries through our emphasis on bilateral tied aid.

True aid is an investment in the long range development of people. If CIDA persists in explaining itself on grounds of immediate commercial return to Canada—when that return is insignificant anyway—it will seriously jeopardize that substantial body of public opinion that supports CIDA on the grounds that it is actually helping the poorest people.

Note well what I am about to say, Mr. Speaker. It is not the quantity of money that Canada spends through CIDA that is important in helping people, it is the quality. I would accept a cut in CIDA's over-all budget if I could spend the remainder on community development, especially the kind promoted by non-governmental organizations. Such a policy would, on the basis of my experience travelling in the Third World, help more of the poorest people in the poorest countries achieve self-reliance.

My leader today called for an independent review of the whole CIDA operation. I support that review because a fresh, objective examination of CIDA must now be made if the government is to retain the support of Canadians who want CIDA to help make self-reliant, dignified human beings out of the world's poverty stricken millions.

There are benefits to Canada through international development, properly carried out, and we should not hesitate to point them out. Vast new markets will open up through helping to develop a level of self-reliance in the people. Their purchasing power is now so low that they are not considered major markets despite their population size. Their incomes would increase, as the Secretary General of the Commonwealth, Shridath Ramphal, has noted, "from the dismantling of trade barriers and other obstacles and from a sustained expansion of their export income from primary commodities." These increased incomes would inevitably be spent on imports from the industrialized countries.

Developing a level of self-reliance in the one billion poorest people in the world is a long-range investment, and that is the essence of a policy that now ought to be advanced. On the question of measuring aid effectiveness we should thank the new North-South Institute that has analysed the deficiencies in Canada's present role. I quote their conclusion:

> In summary, while Canadians in general, and Canadian policy-makers in particular, like to view Canada as being in (or close to) the vanguard of the industrial countries, this self-image is more flattering than accurate. Canada, on occasion, has taken positions that have put this country among the leaders of the north. However, as far as proceeding with in depth and innovative analyses or offering proposals that could facilitate substantive agreement between the north and south, Canada has neither called upon enough of its resources nor come close to realizing its potential.

In outlining an improved Canadian policy on international development in the 1980s, I would establish these priorities. First of all, more emphasis on fostering self-reliance in the Third World through the satisfaction of basic human needs—sufficient food, shelter, health facilities and education and a job opportunity for all. Those are the basics we are talking about, Mr. Speaker. Second, increased attention to water management and soil conservation. Third, intensified and continuous and two-way technical co-operation with developing countries. Fourth, emphasis on stabilizing the prices of commodities and manufactured goods; and improving access for Third World countries to industrialized countries' markets. Fifth, intensified efforts to help developing countries become more self-sufficient in food production and increased participation in world food programs. Sixth, domestic industrial strategies to enable Canada to produce more high technology goods needed on world markets.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in a reconstituted foreign policy can there be any subjects more necessary to highlight than stronger Canadian efforts to improve the conditions for human rights and arms control? We are holding this debate almost on the eve of Christmas. We want to celebrate the birth of Christ who came to us in the name of peace. But peace is not merely an ideal. Peace is a practical and immediate necessity arising out of the present situation where men have acquired such immense power that they are now in a position to conquer the stars or to annihilate themselves completely along with the globe on which they live. Peace is not just the absence of war; it is that set of equitable human and national relationships that promote the conditions for human dignity sought by every individual. What we are facing today is a world that is endangered by gross violations of human rights and widespread terrorism, a widening gap between the developed and developing nations, and an arms race that is out of control. That is neither a safe nor an equitable world in which to live.

No, we cannot do everything. But we can raise our voice and increase our work in the world community to root out the causes of disorder and injustices. I believe the Canadian people want their leaders to move in this direction. And we have the duty to provide such leadership through a new, coherent, comprehensive, and convincing foreign policy.

● (2032)

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this is a general debate on Canada's foreign policy, but what I am going to discuss, the Arab boycott and the federal government's response to it, are as much matters of Canada's domestic policy as they are of its foreign policy.

The boycott touches on our foreign policy because it is a form of warfare by Arab states against Israel. It is as much a part of their effort to destroy Israel as their military warfare since 1948. However, Canada is not at war with Israel or with the Arab states.

Canada's official policy has been to support the existence of Israel as a free and independent state within secure and recognized borders. Therefore, when Arab countries say if Canadian firms want to trade with us they cannot trade with Israel or with other firms which trade with Israel or which are owned by or employ people who are sympathetic to it, they are trying to get Canadian companies to do something which clashes directly with Canada's official policy as a government, as a country.

When Arab countries say to Canadian firms. "If you want to trade with us you cannot have Jewish employees or owners or directors and you cannot trade with Canadian firms with shareholders or employers who are Jewish or who are sympathetic to Israel," then this conflicts directly with our federal government policy on human rights and the approach to human rights of most Canadians. It clashes with our domestic policy. It is understandable, therefore, why the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in this House in May, 1975:

> This type of practice is alien to everything the government stands for and indeed to what in general Canadian ethics stand for.

These sentiments were not translated into any kind of concrete policy on the Arab and similar international boycotts until almost a year and a half later on October 21, 1976, when the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) presented to the House a statement of policy on such boycotts. This statement said the government opposes boycotts which attempt to have Canadians in their commercial dealings discriminate against other Canadians on the basis of origin or belief, or which attempt to have them refuse to buy or sell to countries like Israel with which Canada maintains friendly relations. However, in the statement the only measures the government said it would take to implement this policy were withholding its supporting services from dealings where Arab boycott compliance was involved and having all firms report to it for later publication any compliance by them with the boycott whether or not they sought government assistance.

This policy was not translated into any kind of action until the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce issued guidelines for its implementation three months later on January 21, 1977. These guidelines, however, drew back from the commitment of the policy statement. They said reports would be drawn up only with regard to firms that approached the department for assistance.

No explanation has ever been offered to this House or to the public as to why the guidelines issued by the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did not go as far as the government's formal policy statement which said all firms, whether they sought government assistance or not, would have to report to the government all requests they received to comply with international boycotts of a kind contrary to the government's policy statement. The guidelines also said a public report of information gathered under them will be made "semi-annually".

This meant the first report should have been made last July. This did not happen, and until questions were asked about it in the House last week there was no indication by the government when such a report would be issued to the public, if ever, and what had been holding it up until that point.

Although the wording of the policy statement and the guidelines at close reading are somewhat ambiguous on this, the press and the public generally interpreted them to mean that the reports, when made, would at the very least name those firms, about which the government was aware, that had agreed to comply with the boycott. In fact this understanding was encouraged by spokesmen for the government. For example, on February 17 of this year, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), then the parliamentary secretary to the President of Privy Council, speaking in an adjournment debate in reply to a speech made by myself, had this to say:

> The reporting requirement under which the department would publicize the names of companies or individuals from whom services and support have been withdrawn or withheld for contravening the government's policy on boycotts is a responsible and practical way of reinforcing the government's policy in this area.

I want the House to note the words of the then parliamentary secretary which state clearly that the reporting requirement meant the department would be publicizing the names of companies or individuals from whom services and support had been withdrawn or withheld for contravening the government's guidelines on international boycotts.

As we know, answers given by parliamentary secretaries in adjournment debates are prepared for them by the relevant government departments as the official position of the government, and are presented by the parliamentary secretaries as such. It is understandable, therefore, that there was consternation, if not surprise, to say the least, when the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), as reported by the Globe and Mail in its December 17 issue, after telling the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) during the question period on the preceding day that the list of companies in question was "still being considered" said later, to reporters outside the House, on the same day, and I quote from the press report:

—he had no plans to make the list public and would not even indicate how many companies the department had found signing contracts with boycott clauses.

'You'd be open for all kinds of libel,' Mr. Horner said, because the publicity might hurt the companies' sales.

'That kind of thing when we're trying to promote world trade is something we don't want to get into.'

Here appears to be an even further narrowing-down of the seemingly meaningful policy announced by his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on October 21, 1976. One could wonder how naming the companies the government found to be complying with the boycott could ever involve "all kinds of libel". How can it be libel when the government is simply telling the truth, that certain companies are engaging in conduct that the Prime Minister of Canada said is contrary to everything the government stands for, everything Canadian ethics stand for, and what the present Secretary of State for External Affairs later called repugnant and unacceptable?

Most Canadians want, as I do, to see Canadian trade with Arab countries and all countries greatly expanded. However, I do not think they want to see this done, nor do I, on terms which are contrary to basic Canadian ethics and concepts of human rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: It should be troubling indeed to note the inference of the reported remarks, assuming they are accurately reported, of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, that discrimination against some Canadians on the grounds of their origin, religion, beliefs, associations or that efforts that harm a friendly country are prices he is willing to pay to expand Canada's trade. If that inference is correct, and I hope it is not, it clashes with the policy of the government of which he is now a member and, more important, with the views of Canadians generally.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs took a somewhat different approach in the House the next day, last Friday. He said in effect that the list in question had not been released because the government had not yet decided how to release information it had received, particularly whether it should release the names of companies which had received requests to comply with the boycott but which had rejected those requests. He implied that there were other unresolved questions of the same order as well. This was when he was speaking to reporters later outside the House. He said that the government had not decided, according to press reports, whether to release the names of companies that had simply agreed not to ship goods on a vessel which stopped in Israel, but did not include a boycott clause in their sales contract.

One could have somewhat more sympathy for the government's position on this, if the policy statement had not yet been issued, or if it had been issued and the government was simply waiting for the guidelines to put it into effect. Almost a year and a half went by from the time the Prime Minister said that the boycott was contrary to everything the government stood for to the time the policy statement was issued. Was there not enough time during this period to make the necessary decisions? During this period we asked when the policy would appear, we were told that cabinet was continuing to study the matter.

Are we to take it, then, that the cabinet spent a year and a half studying this matter and allowed a statement of policy on boycotts to be made, promising a mechanism for public reports, without first deciding on answers to these basic questions as to what information was to be put in these reports? Are we to take it, if this was not done by the time the policy statement was finally made on October 21, 1976, that there was not time for answers to these questions to be developed within the three months between the making of the policy statement and the later issuing of the guidelines in January 1977?

Are we to take it that there was not time to get answers to these questions in close to a year since the guidelines had been issued, even allowing almost an extra six months from the time the first report was due? Certainly, even with the many other matters that validly required the government's attention, I think there was time to reach a decision as to what information should be made public concerning what the government had learned with regard to boycott compliance by Canadian firms. I think the Canadian public should urge the government to get on with this matter and make decisions. Then if the public is not satisfied with those decisions, the government should be able to explain and justify them. Answers to those questions regarding the releasing of information troubling the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the cabinet, could be worked out in a few hours if it were decided that it had to be done.

I will offer some suggestions on how to proceed, in my usual effort to be helpful and constructive. If the government has learned of firms that simply received boycott requests, but did not agree with them, why should not their names simply be held back and tables would be published showing the number of firms receiving such requests, the nature of the requests, and the industrial sector in which the firms, receiving these requests are found. When it comes to companies that agree to ship goods on vessels not stopping at Israeli ports, the previous minister of industry, trade and commerce, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), seemed to state the government's position on this in a speech in Ottawa last April. At that time he said:

It would contravene our policy to undertake that the goods will not be carried on a blacklisted vessel or insured by a blacklisted insurance company, because that could limit the Canadian seller's freedom with other Canadian companies.

An argument could be made as a result of what the Minister of Finance said at the time when he was the minister of industry, trade and commerce that the names of such firms, along with the information on exactly what was agreed to, should be disclosed. But if a firm had agreed to nothing more, an argument could be made and possibly accepted, it could be put forward as a working hypothesis, that here too only statistical tables be published.

However is there any valid argument that the government should not publish the names of firms which agreed to boycott clauses in the sales agreements they entered into or that the names of firms that agreed to boycott clauses in the letters of credit under which they were to receive payment, should not be published? I am referring to boycott clauses, not to trade with Israel, with firms trading with Isreal, or in which firms agreed to discriminate against other Canadians. Surely not, if the words of the Prime Minister in May, 1975, and the words of the government's own policy statement a year and a half later, can be taken at face value. If the government needed more detailed guidance, surely it could take a look at the regulations on reporting which were made under the new comprehensive United States legislation forbidding all United States companies, whether they sought aid from their government or not, from complying with international boycotts like the Arab boycott.

In spite of earlier predictions, there is no evidence that this new American law is hurting United States trade with the Arab countries, or that it is embarrassing any American companies. Therefore I think the government is now in a position to make the necessary decisions on what to put into reports to be issued under its guidelines without further delay. The government should issue these reports as it has promised.

But let us bear in mind that these reports will tell very little about the impact of the boycott on Canada and Canadians. Even if the government publishes the names of every company coming to its attention that accepted the provisions of the boycott rules in any way, the Canadian people will not be given anything close to a true picture of the boycott implications for Canada. It is clear the government has not carried out its promise contained in the October 21 policy statement. I am referring to the promise to have all firms, whether or not they require government assistance, report their compliance with the boycott. Any report issued under the government's guidelines of January, 1977, cannot give a complete picture of the boycott's implications.

Among the essential tasks of our national government are the protection of our country's sovereignty and the providing of the equal protection of our laws to all residing within our borders. Unless the federal government brings forward all the necessary measures to make fully operative its October 21 policy on the Arab boycott and other international boycotts, it will not be carrying out these responsibilities in the way expected by Canadians generally. What do the guidelines issued by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce actually say? Those guidelines indicated that the government would withhold services only after transactions involving boycott compliance were actually entered into and signed. Also it would expect the reporting of boycott compliance by companies only where they approached it for assistance. These measures, in my view and in the views of many other Canadians of every origin, are largely without the kind of impact that is required.

Much government assistance comes in the form of trade promotion activities, circulation of information, the making of contacts and so on, that take place before a transaction is entered into. Companies not requiring assistance from the government could continue as before in their dealings. Many, if not most, would not require such assistance. If they were subsidiaries of foreign firms, they could rely on the banking connections and the resources of their parent companies. If they are larger Canadian companies, they can rely on their own resources and banking connections. They would not be required to make any report of boycott compliance to the government. In fact such firms would not be likely to approach the government for help in the first place.

Ministers of external affairs continue to state their abhorrence and that of the government for the boycott. They continue to confirm that their views, and the views of the government, are that Israel has a right to exist within secure and defined borders.

Words are important. Generally Canadians have welcomed certain of Canada's recent votes at the United Nations, although they continue to be concerned about other votes in the form of abstentions in the United Nations and in certain of its specialized agencies. In situations like this, I would argue that action to implement words of support counts as much, if not more, than the words themselves.

● (2052)

All Canadians welcome the initiative to bring peace to the Middle East of President Sadat of Egypt and Prime Minister Begin of Israel, and all Canadians, I am sure, pray for the success of these initiatives. But a number of Arab states are refusing to take part in these efforts to bring peace to the Middle East. Perhaps part of the reason is that they still hope to bring about the destruction of Israel, if not through military warfare then through economic warfare in the nature of the current Arab boycott. I would argue that a firm stand by Canada against the boycott, a stand based on legislation of general application, is one way that Canada can contribute to the bringing of a peace, fair to all sides, to the Middle East.

To the extent that the rejectionist Arab states realize they cannot destroy Israel either through military or economic warfare, the more likely they are to agree to come to the bargaining table for face to face peace talks with the Israelis, talks of the kind that are presently going on between the Israelis and the Egyptians.

If the government wants to take a step, even though it might appear to be a small one, being that of only one country in the world community, that would help achieve peace in the Middle East, and if the government continues to be serious about what it said in the policy statement of October 21, 1976, then surely it must implement the two measures announced in it in the fullest possible way rather than in the most limited and narrow way. This, I regret to say, in my view is about all that it has done until now. But more important, it must act on recommendations like those of the Citizens' commission report issued early this year. This report demonstrated in particular the impact of the Arab boycott in Canada.

I would argue that the government must put into effect legislation against the boycott applying to all businesses, whether or not they need government support. If it does not do so, as I have pointed out, it is undermining its own policy on international boycotts. It is allowing foreign governments to extend their discriminatory law into Canada. This foreign law, after all, encourages one group of Canadians to discriminate for possible economic gain against another group of Canadians because of their origins and beliefs. This obviously clashes with Canadian standards of morality and human rights. Therefore, a Canadian federal law of general application is required so that no Canadian business would have to make its own decision as to the extent to which it should balance possible profit against ethics. Instead, all companies here would be on the same basis and none would have to fear losing business to a Canadian competitor if they follow the standards of conduct which the government, in its own policy statement, says are desirable and necessary.

Anyway, the evidence is clear that when a company does have the courage to refuse to comply with the boycott, either on its own or because of requirements of its own country's laws, generally the Arabs back down. If the goods or services are of a quality and price they are seeking, they will find a way of completing the transaction. Even if this were not the case and even if there were some marginal risk of economic loss, as I have said, I think most Canadians would want to see the government take a stand in a way that is in accord with the principles and ethics which provide the basis for our country's existence. The United States is finding it possible to do this in spite of much greater economic links with Arab countries than Canada.

General legislation for boycott compliance was adopted by the U.S. Congress earlier this year, and in spite of what those opposing it forecast, there has not been any breakdown as a result; there has not been any loss of U.S. trade with Arab countries as a result. Therefore, the question must be asked; how can Canada do any less if our government takes seriously the words of its own policy as announced last fall?

There are many similarities between the United States and Canada when it comes to social and economic systems. Canada and the United States are also major competitors in world markets. Surely the government can be asked: what is there about Canada that makes it less necessary and possible for it to have general anti-boycott legislation than it is for the United States? The United States already has trade and investment links with Arab countries far beyond anything we have now or contemplate for the future.

Like Canada, the United States is interested in expanding its trade with Arab countries. It is far more dependent on oil imported from them than Canada. As I have said, our two countries have similar systems of economic and social organization. The compulsory requirement in its law which the U.S. has had for some time, but which we do not have, which makes it necessary for firms there to report boycott requests and compliance with them showed a very high degree of such compliance. Therefore, when one bears in mind the high degree of ownership of Canadian business by firms based in the United States, the conduct of Canadian companies, if not requiring government support for trade abroad, is not likely to be very much different.

Also, one can ask whether the standards and ethics of the United States, when it comes to affording its citizens the equal protection of the law against threats to their rights, like those created by the boycott, are higher in the United States than in Canada. I hope this cannot be shown to be the case.

The U.S. legislation is based squarely on the jurisdiction of the U.S. federal government under its constitution over international trade and trade between its constituent states. Our own constitution gives our federal government authority over international and interprovincial trade. There is, therefore, in my view, an equivalent basis under our own constitution for anti-boycott legislation along the same lines as that adopted by the U.S. Congress.

This new American law incorporates the concepts which President Carter said such legislation should have in order for him to give it his support as President of the U.S. In a statement before the law was passed he said that to have his support this law would have to contain, as it did:

> Legislative language which would impose the following restrictions: Prohibit all forms of religious or ethnic discrimination arising out of a foreign boycott—prohibit firms from refusing to do business with a country as a condition of doing business in another country—prohibit firms from acting as enforcers of a foreign boycott—prohibit firms from responding to requests for boycott-related information—prohibit the use of so-called negative certificates of origin within a year of enactment.

Such general legislation against the boycott was recently introduced, in fact just last week, by the Ontario government into the legislature of that province. This legislation indicates commendable intentions and it deserves wide community support. I am certainly not saying that about the government of Ontario in general. In other areas it certainly deserves to be replaced by the party led by Stuart Smith, but surely in this area it deserves wide community support.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: The Ontario government, with its free enterprise, pro-business orientation, surely is as interested in encouraging Canadian trade abroad as is our federal government. Surely it would not be presenting legislation to the Ontario legislature that harms prospects of trade with Arab countries by residents of Ontario, whether companies or individuals.

To conclude, let me say that I think Canadians generally would join me in calling on the government for full and meaningful action to put its policy statement into effect in a way that fully protects Canadian civil rights and Canadian sovereignty. In order to maintain our national unity surely our national government must demonstrate that it can provide, and in fact is providing, security in economic and human terms to all its citizens, whether they are English-speaking or French-speaking, and of every origin. Therefore, we and all Canadians as part of this effort must make sure the government takes meaningful action on issues such as the necessisty of preventing threats to that security like the Arab boycott. Such action must be an important segment of a total priority effort by the federal government to preserve Canada as one, strong, united country serving the best interests of all its people, a country living in security, freedom, and prosperity in a peaceful world community in which Canada plays a full and useful part.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, reference has been made by previous speakers in this debate, notably by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), that this is the first time in 17 years that this House has had an opportunity to have a debate of this length on Canadian external relations. That is a surprising and disturbing fact. In fact I would categorize it as unbelievable, if it were not true, and certainly extraordinary and incredible.

In those 17 years how many matters have been stored up, seeking expression in this House? We have already had, aside from the tours d'horizon of the first two speakers, comments on nuclear proliferation, international aid, international research and development, and the Arab boycott. I myself have a great series of topics upon which I would like to comment, but I promise to be selective.

Seventeen years means that we go back to 1960, a significant date. It is also significant that it took pressure from this side of the House to get this debate going at all. I only hope that it will not take another 17 years before we have another debate on this subject. If I personally, or my party, have anything to do with it, we will not have to wait that long. In my view we should have debates of this length and breadth at least annually, and perhaps even more often.

In addition to the matter of the extended gaps between debates, but perhaps as a function of those gaps, I find it unfortunate that this government should decide to make surprise announcements in a debate of this kind, as it did this afternoon. I refer to the announcement on the subject of South Africa. While the government was at it, I wonder why it did not feel moved to make an announcement about the denial of human rights in Uganda, another part of Africa, where the tyrannical regime of Idi Amin surpasses by an immeasurable degree any goings-on in South Africa. At least profitable employment is being offered to Africans in South Africa, whereas in Uganda there is a tribal tyranny over all other tribes, buttressed by supporters, I am lead to believe, from outside the country. What is our aid package for Uganda? It is not easy to find out, but we should know what our aid package for Uganda is as a matter of course.

In any event, as to unilateral declarations of policy in the foreign field on whatever subject, surely these are matters about which inter-party consultations ought to take place. This is no matter for partisan politics, at least by my standards, but rather one to which a bipartisan or multipartisan approach ought to be adopted.

The government has learned nothing in the years in which it has been in office about the need to be more open in its handling of foreign affairs. I am confident that when the Conservatives are returned to power there will be a disposition to take other parties into their confidence in the development of foreign policy measures. I do not say all matters, but at least in the matter of foreign policy, which is an area in which openness can and ought to be practiced.

We are asked to respond to the exhortations contained in the motion now before us, and I will read it now:

> That this House takes note of the present state and future prospects of Canada's relationships with the other nations of the world.

How can we take note of the present state of our relations with the other nations of the world if we do not know what they are? In this general area of secretiveness I think one of the most outrageous examples of the way in which this parliament and the Canadian people have been treated can be found in the current negotiations with the United States on our maritime boundaries.

This country has no idea of what exactly is being negotiated, although we were assured as recently as this afternoon that, with an extension of another month the two, negotiators will come up with satisfactory results. What kinds of results covering what kinds of problems will they come up with? We should know. It has all been left to government appointees; competent ones, no doubt. One in particular I can speak very highly of; the other I do not know. However, some people have been denied an input, as my leader said earlier today, and those people are the most vitally interested parties, namely, the fishermen themselves.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): They are involved.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Just about one year ago Canada took a momentous step by declaring Canadian jurisdiction for fisheries management out to 200 nautical miles. What has been accomplished in the intervening year?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): A lot.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): We have adopted, for fisheries purposes, something more than one million extra square miles of sea, equal to about one third of our territorial surface area, yet we have done little to show that we are serious about taking care of our new acquisition or to provide in meaningful terms evidence of our assertion of this extended jurisdiction.

A great number of problem areas has been opened up. A few arrests have been made on both coasts. Negotiations have been going on with our neighbours, but no extra surface patrol craft have been ordered. We only recently concluded arrangements for air patrol craft. We do not really know how much further ahead we are today than we were this time last year or whether in fact we have derived any benefit from the action taken last January.

I would like to put forward this evening some ideas about what I think we should have been doing and what we should now be doing to ensure that we derive maximum benefit from the action taken January 1 of this year of extending out to 200 nautical miles Canada's jurisdiction over fisheries resources. Canada's action a year ago, possibly because it was taken without too much forethought and planning, has had wide and profound international repercussions with which we have still to come to terms. I suggest that one of the most demanding tasks is working out satisfactory arrangements in a number of areas with our nearest neighbour, the United States, with which, incidentally, we have four complex boundary problems emanating directly from that 200-mile jurisdiction declaration.

I know discussions have been going on with Marcel Cadieux, our former ambassador to the United States, who is heading the Canadian team. We are assured that these discussions are going to lead to satisfactory results and that we will hear about them at the end of January. What are they intended to accomplish and how nearly are they accomplishing the ends? What goals are they setting out to accomplish? We have no knowledge of what matters are being considered in these negotiations, or how broad the discussions are. Do the discussions concern only boundary extensions? What effect are the proceedings going to have on other bilateral concerns?

Uncertainty and the muteness of the government on this matter prompt me to set forth a range of matters on which we should be negotiating, but about which we have learned nothing. The very fact that there is silence about the scope of negotiations, in itself, I suggest, is rather disquieting. On top of this uncertainty there is a positive certainty that oil shipments are coming down our west coast, and a search is being made for a port at which these shipments can be discharged. That is a certainty. In these circumstances it seems to me that a much more long-sighted approach ought to have been adopted and pressed with more energy.

For this purpose I should like to set out what I think ought to be included in any agreement with our United States neighbour, either as an umbrella agreement involving a great variety of matters connected with Alaska oil shipments and related issues, or a series of agreements each related to this wide spectrum of concern. I would suggest that at least the following matters deserve attention in any such agreement or agreements.

First of all, there is the fisheries jurisdiction; then compulsory traffic control including safeguards for fishermen and sportsmen; shipbuilding standards; crewing standards; clean-up facilities; clean-up cost settlement procedures, and finally, patrol. To be effective I suggest all of these should be included in any negotiations now taking place.

The main purpose underlying the extension of our jurisdiction to 200 miles was to gain management control over our fisheries. What we have established, in other words, is a fisheries management zone 200 nautical miles wide off our three coasts. If we had no neighbours nearer than 200 miles such an action would cause no great problem. But we do. Moreover, they have extended their jurisdiction, for fisheries purposes also, to the same width—although they waited two months after the Canadian action to take theirs. By March 1, 1977, however, the two zones were in place.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Where we first run into trouble in this double, unilateral action, is the interface between these two zones. Unfortunately there are four such interfaces, each with distinctive problems—one on the Pacific between British Columbia and the state of Washington, where the two extensions push out into the Pacific; the second, also on the Pacific, but this time between British Columbia and Alaska, again where the two extensions bulge out Pacificwards; the third in the Arctic, between Alaska and the Yukon; and the fourth on the Atlantic, between New Brunswick and the state of Maine.

As I have said, the problems posed by the extension of these four boundaries are separate and distinct. A single approach, in terms of agreement of a particular method of extending the boundary, does not seem to be possible—a median line approach may be feasible at one interface, a sectoral approach may be required on another, while an ocean-floor fault—or chasm—may be the best method of dealing with a third. On one, at least, there is already some uncertainty or difference of opinion, as to the meaning of the existing internationally agreed line established through arbitration. On one side it is viewed as a shore line and hence amenable to the creation of a band of a territorial sea; to the Canadian side that line is considered as an unmistakable boundary defining the limits beyond which the other's territory and territorial jurisdiction do not and cannot extend.

I wonder if, in the absence of agreements on these four important interface areas, there has been a chance to look at a bilateral agreement in which the sectoral approach might be applied, that is, applying the pie slice principle, carving out an area whose apex would begin at the internationally recognized seaward point with the two sides of the isosceles triangle or extending seaward for 200 miles, and that within that sector there be a joint jurisdiction exercised over fisheries, both management and take, as well as over pollution control measures.

As I see this approach, it could lead to an agreement under which each country would have an equal voice on the sectoral commissions that might have to be set up, and would give us four pie slices separating our respective 200-mile zones in those four areas where our zones would otherwise meet. In such circumstances the boundary, in its normal internationally accepted sense, between our two areas would subsequently have to be decided without regard to fish and pollution, but be concerned exclusively with other matters. For example, navigation, resource ownership, customs and immigration control, and military or naval matters might be amongst those things that would have to be separated by a single line. To do so, of course, would require explicit agreement spelled out in a bilateral convention—an umbrella agreement, in short, agreeing on the sectoral approach to deal with fisheries and pollution plus accompanying agreements and subagreements defining the boundary for other purposes.

I have already suggested one reason for taking this sectoral approach to the resolution of our differences, namely, the difficulty we are probably having in deciding on a single boundary line to serve all purposes. Another is related to the matters of common concern within that sectoral area—in particular because fish are no respecters of internationally accepted boundaries. Fishermen in pursuit of their livelihood follow fish migrations, or movements of schools. They might wish to do so across an international frontier and thereby risk getting into trouble with the neighbouring state. If, however, there were a common zone separating two distinctly national zones, and if, in that common zone, fishing practices—quotas, net sizes and so on—were agreed upon in advance, pursuit by the nationals of the two coastal countries into that common or shared zone would not render the fishermen concerned liable to prosecution, at least not until they passed out of it on the other side into the national jurisdiction of the neighbouring state.

That is one area of bilateral concern on which Canada and the United States should seek agreement, and possibly embed that agreement in a bilateral convention.

Since, however, the carriage of potential pollutants over these waters is of concern, because of the danger involved, to the fisheries involved, it is obviously desirable for the two neighbouring countries to reach some sort of agreement on how that commerce is to be carried out—in what kind of ships, with what kind of crews, and following what routes. Shipping standards, crewing standards and traffic control management must obviously be regulated along mutually agreeable lines. Double bottoms and twin screws for tankers might well be part of any such agreement, plus agreed seamanship qualifications for skippers and mates, not to mention mandatory traffic reporting procedures for all commercial vessels travelling into, out of, or through the area.

Another element in any such comprehensive agreement would be the storage of clean-up equipment and, quite as important, the establishment of procedures for dealing with the costs of clean-ups and claims arising from spills. This latter might have to envisage the creation of a fund into which vessel users would be required to pay and from which settlement of claims could be made. Whether a special court would have to be established for the settlement of claims is a matter that would obviously have to be examined most carefully. Whose law would prevail if the spill occurred in the "shared" zone? Would it necessarily be different from that prevailing in either of the national zones?

Finally, who would have responsibility for enforcement of the law set out in the bilateral agreement as it would apply to third nations? In this connection, it will be necessary to lay down specific principles governing patrol and surveillance responsibilities as well as authority to board, arrest, exclude or expel from the jointly administered area for infractions or suspected infractions. This is perhaps a new area of bilateral activity in the international arena but it is one into which we may well have to venture if we want to make the most of our 200-mile zone and at the same time achieve the elimination of a great number of friction points between our two countries. I believe we stand the best chance of maximizing the exploitation of our living respurces only if we proceed in such a fashion, and I have gone to some lengths to set forth my reasoning for holding this belief.

I should like to deal with a number of other topics, but there are a number of other speakers who wish to take the floor. Before I sit down I do wish to underline the comment made just this evening about a drop in morale in the Department of External Affairs over the last several years, and more recently because of the split jurisdiction of the department. Now, there are four or five different ministers—the hon. gentleman over there may shake his head if he likes, but no one in the department knows who is responsible or who has the over-all responsibility—in other words, who is going to muck things up next. That is the problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The department needs one minister, that is all; a minister in whom they would have confidence, a minister they can respect. Such a relationship is not possible when there are four ministers—one who speaks about new methods of selling uranium, another who decides on questions concerning francophonie, a third who talks about north-south relations, and a fourth—

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am not sure what he is in charge of. All this has had a substantial adverse effect on morale in the department, and hon. members over there ought not to tell us otherwise. I know, and I am sorry to have to say it. This was a fine department—

An hon. Member: And then you left.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And then I left.

Oh, yes. I forgot Ivan Head. I would call it not only quatrocephalia but quinquecephalia.

Some hon. Members: What?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): We need only one head for this department and another debate on this whole subject. Then, perhaps, we can get on with the business.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak here in the House of Commons on the question of human rights. I have in the last two and a half months addressed meetings from coast to coast, and on almost every one of those occasions I have spoken on the subject of human rights which so deeply affects Canadians, especially those of eastern European background.

It might come as somewhat of a surprise that a minister for multiculturalism should be dealing with a question of this kind in the House of Commons. However, as I view my portfolio it is not only vertical, in the sense that it deals with the legitimate aspirations and concerns of the ethno-cultural people of Canada but it is also horizontal, in the sense that a great many of the things done by the federal government, provincial legislatures, and even municipal governments have an impact, positively or adversely on those concerns. The issue to which I intend to refer tonight affects literally millions of Canadians who come from eastern Europe or who are of Jewish origin, and who are particularly affected by what is happening in the Soviet orbit in terms of restrictions upon the exercise of human rights and the way human rights are abused and denied in that part of the world. I think it is important, too, to point out that Canadians of all backgrounds share this concern about encroachments on human rights because we in Canada, having taken our own human rights for granted for so long, do not look very kindly upon the violation of human rights in other parts of the world.

Not only have I spoken to groups across the country, I have listened to them as well and I have heard their cries of anguish and their expressions of frustration when they direct their attention to this subject. Some of them act on occasion as though the Government of Canada had complete control over what happens in foreign states. Obviously, they know this is not the case but in their concern for relatives and loved ones in their former home lands they grow impatient with their government and what is happening around the world. Their concern was very well illustrated the other night, on December 8, when I had the pleasure of speaking to the Canadian Ukrainian Professional and Businessmen's Association of Montreal.

A large number of Ukrainian people were present, but because I was in attendance they took the opportunity to invite some 40 representatives of 15 ethno-cultural groups in the city of Montreal. At the conclusion of that meeting, a large part of which was taken up by questions and answers related to human rights, they passed unanimously, or certainly with a great body of support, a resolution of which I received a copy in the form of a telegram. I should like to read that resolution in order to show the depth of feeling on the subject.

> We the undersigned, being the representatives of various Canadian ethnic communities of Montreal, mindful of the difficult state of human rights in various countries of the world today and especially in Eastern Europe, hereby petition the Canadian federal Minister of Multiculturalism to state openly before the Canadian parliament the following resolution:
> "Be it Resolved that the matter of human rights and the freedom of cultural expression shall be actively supported both within Canada and at all international conferences as a matter of Canadian government policy. More specifically and insofar as such rights and freedoms are consistent with our philosophy of the Canadian way of life and in accordance with the above, be it resolved that the Canadian government publicly denounce the official repressions of ethnic cultures and the intolerant treatment of dissidents in Soviet and eastern European countries today and that such a statement be forthwith publicly expressed by Canadian representatives at Belgrade to all nations presently there in international conference in review of the Helsinki Agreement.
> Furthermore, be it resolved that consistent with the above the Canadian government take all necessary steps to successfully resolve all outstanding requests for family reunification and for immigration into Canada by persons desiring to make this country their new homeland."

[Mr. Cafik.]

That telegram, better perhaps than my own words, illustrates the great concern which Canadians from that part of the world feel about the way in which people are being treated in their former homelands. There are people who want to leave their homelands for family reunification purposes, and whose only crime is to stand up and act like free men in their own societies.

Literally thousands of dissidents in eastern Europe who have dared monitor the act which was signed in Helsinki are being persecuted in one way or another, and for a number of reasons, all of which boil down to a violation of their personal liberties and freedoms. These human rights violations, I suppose, exist in many countries of the world, but certainly they exist in overabundance in that part of the world. Now that the Final Act of Helsinki has been signed and we are presently in Belgrade reviewing the provisions of that Final Act, I think we have a new basis from which to speak out on this particular question.

Before making specific points with respect to what we ought to be doing, I should like to review briefly some of the provisions of the Final Act which was signed in Helsinki. It is important to go through some of the history, some of the hard, basic positions adopted in that Final Act, since I believe many Canadians were frustrated when Canada originally signed the Final Act. They were frustrated because they felt that this government and other western governments which signed the Final Act at Helsinki had solidified the existing boundaries of states within the Soviet orbit. That is not really the fact, Mr. Speaker.

The fact is that in that Agreement on Security and Co-operation in Europe there is provision to recognize existing boundaries in the sense that no one would use physical force to change the boundaries. That is quite different from giving some moral sanction to those particular boundaries which, in reading the accord, I do not find directly or even implicitly.

So far as the three Basket clauses of the Helsinki accord are concerned, let me deal first with Basket I. This section deals with ten fundamental principles. Nine of these deal with state to state relations. The seventh of the ten deals with a state's conduct toward its own citizens, namely, the question of human rights. The seventh principle states that participating states will respect human rights and fundamental freedoms: through conscience, religion or belief. It will encourage the exercise of political, social cultural and other rights; recognize the universal significance of human rights and fundamental freedoms as essential for peace and friendly relations among states. States will act in conformity with the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and will also fulfil their obligations as nations to the International Covenants on Human Rights, dealing with economic, social and cultural rights, and civil and political rights.

Basket II deals with trade, industry, science and technology. It deals with the need to improve trade relations on the European continent. An important area deals with scientific and technical exchanges involving the improvement of opportunities for the exchange and dissemination of information and international visits, including increased tourism on both and individual and group basis.

Basket III, which has more interest in relation to human rights for many in the west, is a provision which is the touchstone of the Final Act. The inclusion of humanitarian principles involving the freer movement of people, ideas, and information was a prerequisite of Canada and the western nations at the Helsinki talks. Basket III is essentially about international movement—the movement of individuals, information and ideas. Canada's main contribution in this particular area related to family reunification, which is a principle held so strongly by all Canadians.

Item one dealt with family reunification and emigration. Here states agreed to simplify the procedures and conditions for those requesting to leave in order to be reunified with families, and particularly with spouses, living in other states.

Item two dealt with regular family meetings. Here the agreement provides that states agree to attempt to ease the free movement among peoples, especially those who wish to meet with members of their families, and by promoting tourism and exchanges.

Item three was designed to increase circulation of printed, filmed and broadcast information and to improve the working conditions of journalists stationed abroad by freer travel and greater access to sources of information.

Item four dealt with cultural and educational exchanges in order to expand personal and institutional contacts by artists, scientists and scholars, and for access to information and materials.

I have run through those three Baskets in a very brief way in order to establish the background for the comments I will be making later on as to what in fact is happening in the Soviet Union and eastern European countries, so that we can relate those events to the sacred international agreement signed in Helsinki by those very countries. The major issues that I am concerned about are human rights, not only in eastern Europe but in all countries of the world.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) has in the past spoken in the House of Commons on the human rights climate in Uganda. There is no question that this is a serious concern and attracts a good deal of the attention not only of members of parliament but of all Canadians. The military coup against the democratically elected government of Chile and the subsequent arrest of individuals associated with, and sympathetic to, that government was another violation of human rights.

South Africa has been spoken of in this debate today. It is quite obvious that its official policy of apartheid is again a violation of basic fundamental human rights.

However, Mr. Speaker, these countries I have just named are not signatories to the Final Act signed in Helsinki. This does not make their violations of human rights any the less significant or any the less important, or indeed any the less deserving of our attention as members of parliament or as Canadians. However, there is a distinction. The fact that they did not sign those accords, while the countries I am going to talk about in more specific terms did, makes a considerable difference. Therefore, monitoring all their abuses and publicly denouncing them, as a government, may constitute an interference with the internal operations of a foreign state.

However, in the case of the Soviet Union and other eastern European nations, they have agreed, by signing the Helsinki Accord, not only to monitor but to be monitored in regard to compliance within their own country of the Helsinki Final Act. Therein lies a very significant difference, because then for this country to speak out in relation to violations of human rights is not to interfere with the internal domestic affairs of a foreign state but, rather, to hold them accountable, as they would hold us accountable under this international agreement.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I think it is inappropriate for Canada or any other signatory to the Final Act, to be reluctant to speak out in Belgrade, here in parliament, or elsewhere in the world, in relation to perceived violations of that agreement. The Soviet Union's denial to its own citizens of the right to choose the country of their residence, is, if true, a violation of the Final Act, international agreements, and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Soviet Union's apparent lack of co-operation and its refusal to allow families to be reunited appears to be an abuse of basic human rights and of its commitment to the various accords and covenants which it signed, not only in Helsinki but in other parts of the world.

The Soviet Union continues to be restrictive concerning visits of relatives between our two countries. I am sure all members of parliament received communications about the difficulty of travelling back and forth between these countries, something which really is guaranteed under these agreements. The majority of those wishing to leave the U.S.S.R. on private visits to relatives in Canada do not appear to be getting out of that part of the world. Canadian tourists complain that travel within the Soviet Union is restrictive. They are not allowed to visit relatives in villages or the resting places of their forefathers at cemeteries.

Basic human rights and fundamental freedoms have been recognized as having universal significance and are the subject of international concern by the United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Convention against Discrimination in Education, and The Final Act at Helsinki.

The Final Act recognizes the international significance of human rights and the responsibility which all signatories have toward defending these rights and freedoms. By signing the Final Act the Soviet Union recognized that compliance with the human rights obligations is fundamental to security and co-operation in Europe.

With regard to the Belgrade conference, Canada has taken a serious view of what is happening there and of our obligation to speak up in Belgrade in recognition of our obligations as signatories to the Helsinki agreement.

From the opening Canadian statement by Mr. Klaus Goldschlag on October 6, 1977, I will take a few random quotations in order to illustrate the strong and positive position that the Government of Canada has taken in these meetings. I might point out that these are individual quotes and are not to be read in sequence. I quote:

> We cannot proceed on the assumption that relations between states can remain unaffected where respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms is seen to be deficient . . . We cannot agree that such a discussion (on human rights) constitutes an intervention in the internal affairs of participating states. We are here to measure progress . . . The dispositions of the Final Act in the matter of human contacts are of special concern to Canadians. We are a country of settlement . . . (and) have continuing family links in Europe. The Canadian government has pursued a policy that attaches priorities to the reunification of families . . . It is our hope that one of the results of our meetings will be a more generous and humane interpretation of the family reunification clauses of the Final Act, not as an exception but as a matter of general policy and practice . . .
> If that were achievable here at Belgrade, it would help more than anything else to lend credibility to our efforts in the eyes of Canadians . . .
> Indeed the factor of credibility could be crucial to public support for detente in Canada—

It is quite clear that we have taken a strong position in relation to the Belgrade conference, and we shall continue to do that.

I want to move specifically to cases of problems that have been expressed by many Canadians of violations of human rights around the world. I would first like to talk about what is happening in the Soviet Union and in other parts of eastern Europe as a result of the Helsinki Accords. When the accords were originally signed, I understood the Soviet Union widely distributed copies of them. They felt it would substantiate and support their position at home. When it became widely distributed within the Soviet Union and in eastern Europe, groups of people sprang up to observe the implementation of these accords.

One, the Moscow group, was established on May 12, 1976. Its aim was to promote the observance of the humanitarian provisions of the Final Act by means of informing all heads of state which signed, and the public, about cases violating the articles in Baskets I and III. Prominent members of the Moscow group were arrested, including Yurii Orlov and Alexander Ginzburg. In fact on February 15, 1977, the House of Commons passed a unanimous resolution protesting those particular arrests. Later, Mr. Anatoly Shcharansky was arrested. I understand he was part of that monitoring group in Moscow. He has been held in prison without charge for nine months as of December 15, 1977. I understand the Soviet Union has acted to hold him a further six months without laying a charge.

The Shcharansky case is a very high profile one in which I became involved. On December 10, 1977, I had a meeting in Toronto with relatives of Anatoly Shcharansky who are citizens here in Canada. There are over 30 of them.

Following negotiations with the Department of External Affairs and others here in Ottawa, I went to Toronto to meet with them to see if they would support a proposition whereby we would allow immediate landed immigrant status to Anatoly Shcharansky in order to relieve the Soviet Union of the difficulty they had in this case. His relatives here in Canada supported that proposition so much so that they were willing to provide joint support for any application of landed immigrant status. No official response has yet been received from the Soviet Union. It is time that the government gave consideration to further action in this connection so that the Shcharansky family and all Canadians will know that we in Canada do not take violations of human rights lightly.

Anatoly Shcharansky is but one very important dissident. There was a group set up in Ukraine on November 9, 1976, to achieve the same objective, namely, monitoring the application of the Helsinki Agreement. Prominent members of the Ukrainian group who were arrested included Mykola Rudenko, Oleksii Tykhyi, Myroslav Marinovych and Mykola Matusevych.

A public group was formed in Lithuania on November 25, 1976. Groups have been established in Georgia, in Armenia and, I am sure, in other parts of eastern Europe to monitor the application of the Final Act. These people have been prepared to risk their lives, certainly their freedom, in order to defend the right of citizens in those countries to exercise their basic freedoms.

We have seen from the recounting of the Helsinki Accords that we not only have signed an agreement along with Soviet Union and other countries which allows us to be monitored for any violations of human rights in our homeland, but the right to monitor through the Belgrade conference and through other means the implementation of that agreement. If we have that right as a nation under this agreement, how can we do anything other than support those in countries who are doing that which we have the right to do under international agreements? It is only logical not to interfere in the domestic affairs of another state. In fact, however, we are fulfilling the obligations imposed upon us by being signators of that agreement, by speaking out and by drawing attention to these matters at Belgrade, in this parliament, in Canada, and throughout the world. We are drawing attention to violations that have occurred and that continue to occur within that part of the world.

We have a deep and solemn obligation to speak out on this matter. Canada should not interfere with the domestic affairs of another nation. Those domestic affairs should be respected, but our respect for the domestic integrity of a nation does not mean we have to violate our decent and basic respect for the human rights of citizens in any country of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, largely I want to direct my remarks to the coming United Nations special session on disarmament. I hope the House appreciates this is one of the most important meetings that the United Nations has held since the Second World War.

Before doing so, I wanted to comment briefly on some of the remarks made in this debate today. I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche). I do not think many people in this Chamber could disagree with his very noble sentiments concerning how to move forward to a more peaceful world. I was surprised with one comment he made concerning Canadian-United States relations. He indicated that these relations had been handled adversely by the government and were at an abrasive state. When one looks at that question, one has to look at specific issues between Canada and the United States.

Is the hon. member suggesting that Canada's stance on the negotiation of boundaries should be more co-operative? Is he saying, for example, that on the Garrison diversion project we should have backed off in order to salvage Canadian-United States relations? Should we give up on the interception of salmon in the Fraser River by United States fishermen in order to maintain good relations? It takes two to maintain those relations. Canada has not been aggressive enough in dealing with the United States over cross-border issues, but we have not blown the question of Canada-United States relations.

We are two sovereign nations, and the evidence indicates that we must act in an independent manner. That is particularly the case with regard to the United States, because of the great unequal positions of power there are between the two countries.

I endorse what the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) said concerning the Arab boycott. He has expressed the views of the New Democratic Party on that particular subject. He should not get carried away with the question of refugees. There are three million Palestinian refugees in the world as well. I do not suppose he was suggesting that Canada should open its doors to them. Perhaps he was.

There is a real problem in the Middle East. Hopefully progress is being made in regard to that very abrasive conflict at this point in time.

We must stop being selective about human rights. My party supports the release of Anatoly Shcharansky. We would like to see more done in a public way for dissidents such as Daniel Schumacher in the Soviet Union. Also we would like to see an aggressive attitude on the part of this government in support of the victims of totalitarian regimes in Brazil, Chile, and the various other totalitarian states around the world. We cannot constantly deal with one question, the question of the victims of the Soviet Union. We have to look at oppression wherever it exists. Canada cannot be selective on the question of human rights. I am hopeful more and more names will come forward publicly from all over the world.

Mr. Prud'homme: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I should like to refer to the United Nations special session on disarmament, particularly in regard to Canada's stance at that important conference. The United States has developed the capacity to destroy the Soviet Union some 36 times over with the amount of nuclear weaponry it now has in its hands. On the other side of that equation, the Soviet Union can destroy population centres in North America some 12 times over with the amount of nuclear capacity that country holds. That has contributed to peace in the world since the Second World War. Any objective observer will come to the conclusion that the absolute insanity and madness of a nuclear exchange has resulted in no nuclear exchange among the major powers. It is called "mutual assured destruction".

Canada should examine very carefully how it can go about not increasing the insanity of overkill and how something positive can be done to persuade other nations in the world, as well as ourselves, to move toward a position of reducing present massive expenditure on world armaments.

As a world power, Canada has a relatively modest defence budget. In fact not many people are concerned about this area of peace, the amount of our national budget which is directed toward matters of defence. My party does not object to reasonable expenditures for improving and upgrading some of the equipment, but we have serious objection to the kinds of equipment and the kinds of roles we are playing. We are concerned with the real question as to how much of our money is spent on surveillance aircraft for the 200-mile zone, and as to whether the F-16 is a useful expenditure for this country. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDING ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—ALLEGED ILLEGAL OPERATIONS OF BANK OF MONTREAL IN VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR REPORT OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on December 5 I raised a question regarding a constituent of mine, Mr. Larry McHale, as I have done on several other occasions in this House. It is a case that I have followed with some interest and with some deepening concern to make certain that Mr. McHale receives justice.

Approximately two years ago Mr. McHale asked that an investigation be conducted into the activities of the Bank of Montreal and its handling of his account vis-à-vis an organization known as Argon Developments, together with a Mr. Percy. It strikes me that Mr. McHale is not the kind of person who is bent on any kind of wrongdoing.

I do not want to frustrate the normal course of justice in any way, but I want to help bring about justice as speedily as possible. In order to do that, I believe Mr. McHale deserves to be heard as quickly as possible.

Obviously I do not know all the details of the McHale case and I do not even know whether in his dealing, corporate and otherwise, he has been guilty of any kind of civil crime, and I do not pretend to know. But I do know that on the evening of December 7 five members of the commercial crime section in Vancouver spent two hours in the McHale residence and buildings on his yard looking for evidence, apparently explosives, which would implicate him in a conspiracy to do criminal mischief against one of the corporations in Vancouver. They found nothing, but they arrested Mr. McHale. Two days later another officer came with a police dog and conducted a second search. Again they found nothing.

On December 10 I attended a bail hearing in Vancouver to see if bail could be established for Mr. McHale to allow him his freedom. I was struck by the incredibly sloppy work done by the Crown prosecutor at those hearings. His information was not accurate and he made allegations which were completely unsubstantiated and easily disproven. I was also struck by the prosecutor's attempt to link Mr. McHale in a tangential way to a Mr. Jim McCann who allegedly has been indiscreet in his talk and in his actions.

The prosecutor's actions and the arrest warrant based on the word of an informant lead me further to wonder about procedures against Mr. McHale. The informant who gave the information for the warrant is a man who has a criminal record as long as my arm. He has had several charges of breaking and entering and armed robbery, and now is charged in Burnaby with trafficking, and in Vancouver with possession of narcotics. Apparently on the basis of information from this kind of an informant, McHale is now being held without bail, almost totally incommunicado. His wife has not seen him since that day, except in the court room, and three days ago there was a third search of his property, and again nothing was found.

Over the past 15 months I have talked with Mr. McHale a number of times and have never found him to be oriented toward violence but always looking for a solution by means of the court. While he has mentioned some bizarre incidents of harassment in the past, he almost chuckled at them because he knew I would not believe them. Yet, just today I read again the Canadian Bill of Rights which includes:

> The right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law.

Last night I received a phone call from Mr. McHale's wife, who was alone in the house with their three children. She told me that a brick had smashed through the window. I presume this is one of the bizarre incidents of the kind he had mentioned to me before.

I am coming to some very unwelcome conclusions regarding Mr. McHale's case. It seems to me that one of the unfortunate circumstances is that, while Mr. McHale is in prison without bail, he cannot even pursue the process of justice in his own case. It seems to me that justice is being frustrated there. Here is a man who feels he has been wronged by a major bank and be has been very vigorous in trying to have his grievance aired and judged. I am now beginning to wonder if he has been singled out for cruel and unusual punishment, both to discourage him and to make him an example to others. Therefore I urge that Larry McHale be given the speedy trial he has requested.

● (2207)

Canada has prided itself on being in the vanguard of civil rights, and I assume that this House and the judicial system in this country would want to see Larry McHale have a speedy trial and to see his case heard as quickly as possible.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I might first respond to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) by explaining that the RCMP have indeed investigated the matter and that the resulting information has been relayed to the proper and appropriate authorities at the attorney general's office of British Columbia.

I also want to say that I very sincerely recognize the desire of the hon. member to pursue that principle of any open and free society that justice not only be done but that it be seen to be done. A more recent development of that adage might be that justice be done and seem to be done with reasonable speed.

I recognize the problem the hon. member raises, but I want to explain on behalf of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) and his department that once a matter involving a criminal charge has come into contact with a provincial system of administration of justice it would be totally improper if any person on behalf of, or involved with, the Department of the Solicitor General were to intervene. In that connection I am pleased to say that I have had an opportunity to get some better understanding of the situation from the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock and that I appreciate all the more the concerns he has raised.

I am very strictly limited as to the type of involvement I might have, but within that stricture I am pleased to say to the hon. member that if there is any assistance I can give within the limitations I have just described in terms of the administration of justice, I will certainly be pleased to do so. In the meantime the proper answer has been given; that the matter is within the administration of justice, which is a provincial matter. I ask the hon. member's appreciation of the fact that administration of justice is not a federal matter but completely provincial.

MANPOWER—BILINGUAL POSITIONS—REASON SOME EMPLOYEES DO NOT RECEIVE BONUS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, on December 8 I addressed a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) asking about his awareness of a difficult situation which exists in the offices of his department in the Montreal region. I addressed my question to the minister based on a circular which was distributed in September by the Treasury Board, and I would like to read a few sentences from it as follows:

> The concept of units working primarily in French will be retained but the decision as to where such units will be organized will rest with individual departments . . . The language requirements of positions will be based on the specific and actual work related need for one or both official languages.
> Managers will determine the language proficiency required in bilingual positions for each skill (reading, writing, listening and speaking) . . .

At the same time the Public Service Commission issued a communique, and again I will read two sentences from it as follows:

> Modifications to the official languages policies and programs of the federal public service will result in increased responsibilities for departments and agencies.
> In the area of staffing, departments and agencies will now be responsible for determining the level of linguistic proficiency required of incumbents of bilingual positions within their jurisdiction.

In the constituency of Vaudreuil we are experiencing considerable difficulties in three departments. Under the Department of Veterans Affairs at the Ste. Anne de Bellevue Veterans Hospital many of the patients are unilingual English and many of the patients are also unilingual French. It is, of course, necessary for the staff to speak both languages. We thus encounter considerable difficulty in that there are apparently certain percentages which are given for the various levels of persons who are to be designated as bilingual and therefore eligible to receive the bonus of $800. It is inevitable in such circumstances that there are people who must use both official languages but who will not receive the bonus paid to their fellow employees. This may create a difficult morale problem at this particular hospital.

Also in the constituency, which is about 50 per cent French-speaking and 50 per cent English-speaking, we are obviously going to run into difficulties in the Post Office where once again service must be provided in both official languages. In the province of Quebec the language of work is French so once again, because of percentage restrictions not all the personnel that must service the public will be designated, and therefore not all the personnel will receive the bilingual bonus. Again, this causes discontent.

My question was addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration because of the situation peculiar to the west islands of Montreal where almost the entire population is English-speaking. Because the offices of this department are in part of the greater Montreal area, however, the language of work is French—and quite rightly so—but obviously necessarily the personnel dealing with the public must be able to speak the English language.

The case that I brought to the attention of the minister, asking whether he was aware of it, was typical of that obtaining in many of the offices. Six counsellors worked together, each counsellor being given responsibility for certain trades. The work of the counsellors does not overlap. Thus, depending on the trade of the person seeking employment, that person would be serviced by one of the six counsellors. Since 85 per cent or more of the clients in the office are English-speaking, it is therefore essential that all six counsellors speak the English language. Because of percentage restrictions, however, only five can be designated bilingual. The five receive the $800 bilingual bonus, and the sixth, who is extremely competent and fluently bilingual, does not receive the bonus. This obviously creates inequity and morale problems.

In the same office an individual has been transferred from Toronto. This individual works with English-language clients and is unilingual English. Although the individual is taking the French course and trying hard to speak the French language, certainly at the present time by any stretch of the imagination that individual could not be considered bilingual. Again, the language of work of this office is French so there is no possibility that this person can be designated unilingual, which would have to be unilingual French. This person must therefore fill a bilingual position and becomes eligible for the $800 bonus. Again, one can see the difficulty that has been created.

While understanding what the Treasury Board and its hard-working president has been trying to accomplish, it seems to me that he has effectively passed the administration of the program over to the departments and to the employees of those departments.

I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration about his knowledge of the situation. In his reply he tended to refer me back to the Treasury Board. I should like to hear tonight whether the document issued by Treasury Board in September which gives responsibility for administration to the departments, is actually in effect. I should like to know whether the employees are responsible and whether in these circumstances they are willing to investigate these particular examples of difficulty that are causing morale problems in my constituency.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the hon. member that the revised policy on official languages states that the bonus shall be payable to all eligible employees for whom the Treasury Board is the employer, as well as to governor in council appointees, when such employees occupy positions which have been identified as bilingual and the individual employee has been indentified by the Public Service Commission as meeting the established language proficiency requirements for the position.

The government is fully aware that there are cases in which public servants occupy bilingual positions but rarely use both official languages, as well as cases in which people occupying unilingual positions are using both official languages from time to time.

It would seem, notwithstanding the circumstances which the hon. member has described as being very strange, that if in fact there is an instance of one out of six persons in the area which he describes finding himself aggrieved by not having a bilingual position, upon the re-identification process taking place in the department in the hon. member's riding such an employee could then seek redesignation of his position as bilingual. This would be possible if he were able to show that the position required a bilingual person, and if he could also demonstrate that he was bilingual. Complaints of the same nature arising, say, in the Department of Veterans Affairs or in the Post Office could be handled in the same manner.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—REASON PUBLICITY OF FEDERAL DEPARTMENT NOT BROADCAST

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montreal-Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, on November 29 last, I asked a question of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion about the advertising campaign made on private networks in Montreal but not on the CBC. The minister did confirm that such was the case despite the fact that he had asked the CBC to broadcast the paid advertising campaign. On December 16 last, I directed the same question to the Secretary of State responsible for the CBC (Mr. Roberts) asking him specific things: whether he was aware of the matter, if so whether he could advise the House about the result of his dealings with the CBC on advertising not broadcast on that network but on private networks. The Secretary of State answered as follows: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have raised the matter with the CBC and they are reconsidering the criteria involved.

Since then, Mr. Speaker, I took the liberty of doing some research, and I find that the CBC's drive to exclude paid advertisement from DREE was extended not only to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but also to the Post Office and the Department of Employment and Immigration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I went beyond those three departments and the one referred to in my two questions. I took the liberty of doing some further research, and I found two other departments where that unpaid advertisement had been broadcast by private networks, one case being an ad by the Department of Urban Affairs in Montreal concerning a project in our area that will certainly cost close to $1 billion.

The Department of Urban Affairs announced that another phase was being brought up to $63 million, to provide for water purification plants or network for greater Montreal. This was broadcast by private stations. Since then, Mr. Speaker, another minister, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport was in Montreal to attend an event that was non-political in my view, namely the Grey Cup Game. This got more than one hour's coverage time on private TV networks, but nothing on the government's network.

What concerns me deeply, Mr. Speaker, is that private networks are profit-making organizations. The Crown corporation is costing us over $500 million each year, and they are selective in their advertising. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could be somewhat more precise than the minister, and answer those questions that are relevant in the current context. Canadians and certainly I myself would like to have some explanation that would shed some light on the situation, because this goes much beyond the first question I put forward in the very specific case of one department. As I just suggested, this extends to six departments and, if I can follow up on my research, I am certain I will stumble on a good number of other cases.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I take cognizance of the two questions put by the hon. member, and I would like to state that DREE's original message was rejected because the advertising copy went beyond the scope of straight information material and did more than present the department's expansion program for the Montreal area. However, Radio-Canada lately amended their policy concerning the acceptability of advertizing material and DREE's message was then considered as a simple documentary on the effects of the DREE expansion program in the province of Quebec.

All DREE texts have now been approved. The corporation has established standards for the programs stating views and the controversial texts which forbid it to sell broadcasting time for any advertising which professes opinions or leads to controversy. The only announcers which are acceptable are those who have definite goods or services to offer and the content of the advertising message must normally deal only with those goods and services offered. Any advertising originating from departments or federal organizations must present fact or information; it must not present questionable issues, nor engage in political proselytism, nor contain politically oriented comments or opinions.

Before this last revision of the commercial policy of the corporation, the clause which required that the message only contain facts or information was interpreted in the narrow sense as applying to the effective mechanisms of a particular program of action and not to the incidental benefits that might result from it.

The frame of this policy has now been enlarged to take into account the various types of government messages submitted to the CBC. There are for instance those messages broadcast to announce program or particular services, there are those texts containing persuasive material, there are reports showing attitudes and there are announcements of a more general character.

This broadening of the policy allows the presentation of programs, services and functions in a broader frame. However, the CBC notes that government advertising must still be free from any controversial opinions or any statement which would give support to a given economic, social or political view. Furthermore, messages originating from the government must not openly proclaim the achievements of the various departments of the government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

CFB OTTAWA NORTH—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ALLEGED MISAPPROPRIATION OF FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a matter of pressing necessity further to a situation I raised in the House on December 8 with respect to misappropriation of public funds at Canadian Forces Base, Ottawa North, Rockcliffe and as a result of additional information I have received in the last several days, including the fact that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has now been called in to investigate. I therefore ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of National Defence make a detailed statement outlining the situation, specifically, that he explain the removal from the base last weekend of thousands of dollars of allegedly improperly purchased musical and electronic equipment, that he state details of an attempt by one of the officers involved to pay back to the government a large portion of stolen funds and, finally, that the minister guarantee that all charges which may be laid will be dealt with by civil rather than military courts.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

PROPOSAL TO RESTORE BASIC DISABILITY PENSION TO COMPOSITE LEVEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgency, a matter of deep concern. It relates to the announcement made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs to the effect that a 7.2 per cent increase in the rate of the war disability pension will come into effect in January. This increase, already provided by law, does not restore the basic rate to the composite level established in 1973, a level which the minister agreed was one which should be maintained. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That this House calls on the government to authorize the Minister of Veterans Affairs immediately on the reassembling of the House of Commons on January 23, 1978, to introduce legislation to restore the basic rate of the war disability pension to the average take-home pay of the five categories of federal public servants designated in 1973, it being the view of this House that anything less represesents a failure to keep faith with the veterans of this country.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent before it can be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION SPOUSES' ALLOWANCE BE RETAINED FOLLOWING DEATH OF MARRIAGE PARTNER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the spirit of goodwill and generosity which normally exists at this time of year, and given the Scrooge-like approach of the former minister of national health and welfare was best exemplified by the letters that went out annually to some 2,500 Canadians who, upon the death of their spouse and in their bereavement, were suddenly deprived of the benefits of the spouses' allowance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House request that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in the spirit of Christmas and as a New Year's resolution, take a minimal first step to redressing the hardship of some 100,000 single, divorced and widowed Canadians between the ages of 60 and 65, most of whom are women, by undertaking to end the practice of curtailing the spouses' allowance upon the death of the partner in marriage, thus assuring that at least those who are presently in receipt of the spouses' allowance will not have to face, on the death of their partner, the added tragedy of economic deprivation.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSAL TO OBTAIN ASSISTANCE FOR MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) confirmed yesterday, our present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) cannot do two things at once. The minister said: "The Minister of Finance cannot work in his department and concentrate on new measures at the same time as attending the House". As former ministers of finance have been able to do just that, even the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) guided 13 bills through the House in a few months last session, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House recommend that a trio be formed of Mr. Edgar Benson, Mr. John Turner and Mr. Donald Macdonald, being three former ministers of finance under the present Prime Minister, to assist poor Jean who appears to have floundered so badly with the passage of but one Bill C-11.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REQUEST THAT PROVINCES BE CONSULTED PRIOR TO CHANGE IN POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion which arises out of the continued uncertainty with respect to the future of DREE policies. This requires the assurance of the House that in fact no changes will be made to that program without an adequate prior process of consultation with the provinces. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House direct the appropriate ministers not to proceed with the development of new application policies for DREE programs until the fullest consultative procedures have been adhered to with the provinces aimed at identification of procedures which would have the effect of reducing the alarming high levels of slippage and having the result of assisting in the realization of permanent, rather than temporary employment, in such areas as those of our primary sectors.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSAL FOR DISPOSAL OF NUCLEAR WASTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the recent proposal by Falconbridge Nickel Mines to the Department of the Environment to fill up some of their closed mines in the Sudbury basin with Canada's nuclear wastes; and in view of the fact that this mining company, and even some government documents, have suggested that it would not be unhealthy to have a radioactive waste heap in their backyard, and that it might be good, at least economically, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That this House instruct the government to investigate the possibility of using the swimming pool at 24 Sussex Drive as a nuclear holding tank, and that it also investigates the possibility of sinking shafts for radioactive disposal at the homes of the executive and directors of Falconbridge Nickel both here and in the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY ON COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH COUNTRIES WITH WHOSE PRACTICES CANADA DISAGREES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister concerning government policy relating to commercial dealings with other countries. As the Prime Minister would know, yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced a new commercial policy toward South Africa which would include the withdrawal of all Export Development Corporation's support. That was done "in response to those actions which at recent times have been undertaken in South Africa to which we in Canada take the strongest possible exception". Approximately 90 minutes earlier than that, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the House yesterday indicated that the government would do nothing about Export Development Corporation activities in Chile because "it is not really for us to judge the moral commitments of a country". Those positions are utterly opposite. They were stated on the same day by two different ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: That is not unusual with this government.

Mr. Clark: I regret to have to do this for the second time in a week, but I should like to ask the Prime Minister which minister was stating the policy of the government? Which of these two, who took absolutely opposite positions, was stating the policy of the government concerning commercial relations with countries with whose practices we disagree?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Leader of the Opposition refers to the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he will understand why in the case of South Africa we are having a particularly restrictive approach to trade with that country. This approach does not apply to other countries, with whose ideology we disagree.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, in light of the statement made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who said that no moral commitment at all would bear on the commercial policy of Canada—

Mr. Horner: I did not say that.

Mr. Paproski: Yes, you did.

Mr. Clark: —perhaps the Prime Minister would remind the House of Commons precisely what distinction he and his government claims exists between the position taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the position taken by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

• (1417)

Mr. Trudeau: I agree with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that he has been badly quoted by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: But it is in Hansard.

Mr. Trudeau: The position expressed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is that it is not the business of EDC to make political judgments of the kind that the Tory party is obviously unable to make or to make a moral judgment. Under the EDC Act passed by this Parliament the role of EDC is to make judgments on credit worthiness. Overall, political judgments are made by the House and by Cabinet. I see the hon. member for Halifax enjoying this particular one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I invite the hon. member for Halifax and the Leader of the Opposition to indicate to us their preference and I will do my best to respect their preference. Do they want us to cut off—

An hon. Member: Just answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: —cut off trade with Chile, or do they want us to resume trade with South Africa?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Tell us what your policy is.

Mr. Clark: I concede to the Prime Minister that the quotation of the words of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce might have been a bad one, but it was an accurate quotation of his words, exactly as the Prime Minister of Canada just now did not do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I would assume that the distinction on which the Prime Minister and his government seek to rely is a distinction referred to in some desperation by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he said that in South Africa's case discrimination is built into the structure of the country and the minister said, I think, that South Africa stands alone in that regard. If that is the basis of distinction for the Government of Canada for the policy decisions opposite being stated by two ministers of the Cabinet yesterday, is the Prime Minister really saying that the Government of Canada is prepared, in terms of its commercial policy, to say that murder and torture—because murder and torture are alleged by Amnesty International and other bodies to have taken place in Chile—are all right but codified discrimination is not all right? Are these the criteria that guide the Export Development Corporation?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, these are not the criteria.

An hon. Member: Horner, you blew it!

An hon. Member: And how!

Mr. Trudeau: There are many countries in the world with which Canada and Canadians engage in trade. We disagree with the ideology of many of them, many of them have non-democratic systems, indeed probably many of them practice murder, terror and torture.

An hon. Member: And you approve.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think even the Tory opposition is suggesting that we should cut off trade with all the countries with which we disagree. We deal with South Africa in a different and specific way for a reason that even the Tories should be able to understand if they remembered that it was under their leader, the Right Honourable George Diefenbaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Get it straight, it's John.

An hon. Member: You've got a heck of a memory.

An hon. Member: You need that ski holiday.

An hon. Member: George lives in Kitchener, it is John who is here.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert has two forenames, one is John and one is George.

An hon. Member: You are coming along.

An hon. Member: That is pretty good. You are getting smart.

Mr. Trudeau: The opposition has many leaders. They have various names, and I do not think that is relevant to the argument I am making.

● (1422)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Hees: Do the splits, Pierre.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are making a fool of yourself, sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the Prime Minister might be permitted to conclude his answer briefly.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it was under the Conservative government of Mr. John George Diefenbaker—and as he said, under his initiative—that South Africa was excluded from the Commonwealth. This must mean that in the minds of some Tories in this House South Africa is in a special position, and I wish the present Leader of the Opposition would learn that distinction from the master.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister referred to the right hon. member for Prince Albert as having two names. This government has two policies on the same subject, one stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and an opposite one stated by the deflowered Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What the official opposition is suggesting is that there should be some criteria set by the Government of Canada which guides the activities of the Export Development Corporation, and what this House wants and needs to know—now that there has been this confusion of two policies stated by two ministers—is what precisely are the criteria which are set by the Government of Canada to guide the activities of the Export Development Corporation. Perhaps those criteria could be tabled in the House or stated by the Prime Minister. There are two policies. The Prime Minister has refused today to say in which one he believes. What are the criteria? If the Prime Minister cannot state them here, will he publish them in a way which will ensure at least that his two ministers say the same thing on this one matter?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that was the subject of my first answer when I indicated that the EDC operates under policies established by law passed by this House and under direction from the government. One of those directions is not to make political or moral judgments but to make judgments on the credit worthiness of the countries whose exports are financed. That is exactly the position taken by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

On the question of South Africa, even if the government did not issue specific policy guidelines, as indeed we did in the case of the Arab boycott, the role of the EDC would not be to make political or moral judgments. It is because the EDC was given specific directives under the law by the government that it is making this distinction in the case of South Africa and, indeed, in the case of the Arab boycott, and the reason we are doing it for South Africa relates to the particular abhorrence we on this side have for policies based on race and colour characteristics which are part of the policy and philosophy of the government of South Africa. I repeat that this was understood as long ago as 17 years by the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert when he took the initiative of excluding South Africa from the Commonwealth.

Mr. Clark: Is the Prime Minister telling us that to this government murder and torture are less abhorrent than the codification of discrimination? What we want to know is what are the criteria which guide the policy decisions of the government and which caused one decision to be taken in relation to the EDC in South Africa and not in other countries. Is it really and truly the position of this government that it finds murder and torture to be somehow more acceptable than the codification of discrimination?

● (1427)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That in its precise language is an exact repetition of an earlier question.

REASON FOR LOAN TO CUBA IN VIEW OF FACT CUBAN TROOPS ARE IN ANGOLA

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and concerns the general area of economic sanctions and boycotts. Bearing in mind the economic and commercial sanctions against South Africa which were announced yesterday, could the Prime Minister explain the double standard when the Canadian Government feels it is quite moral and ethical to offer a $100 million loan to Cuba through EDC to finance a stainless steel mill when that country has troops in Angola and several other South African countries and supplies arms to guerrilla forces in Africa?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will give me a bit of time to answer this question because it is in three parts. The first is that Canada believes in freedom of trade. It believes in its businessmen—

Mr. Stevens: Except in South Africa.

Mr. Trudeau: Not except in South Africa. Mr. Speaker, we are making no legislation to prevent Canadian businessmen trading in South Africa if they so desire. There is absolutely no restriction on the issuance of passports for them if they want to go and trade or play tennis or practice sports. It is the policy of this government that Canadians are free to move wherever they want, whenever they want. We do say that the federal government will not encourage or subsidize such movements in the case of South Africa. We went even further in the case of Rhodesia. Businessmen can move there if they want to, but we will not in any way permit or authorize the trade of goods with that country because under the United Nations Security Council resolution there is an embargo on trade with South Africa.

In the case of South Africa, Canada had an embargo on the sale of arms long before the Security Council adopted this resolution. We were away ahead of the United States and the Security Council on this matter but now this is also the policy of the Security Council that there should be no trade in arms with South Africa. There is therefore a certain limit on trade in arms with South Africa. The United Nations did not go that far in the case of Chile, in the case of Cuba, in the case of China, in the case of the Soviet Union, in the case of Czechoslovakia, in the case of Rumania or in the case of a devil of a lot of other countries who do not have democracy and who do not have ideologies in which we believe but in which case not only businessmen are free to trade and move there but in each case our government services, trade commissions and so on, are prepared to assist them in passage of this trade. We believe that as a general rule, trade between nations is a good thing. It is not only good economically but it is also good in terms of human relations between the peoples of these countries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker and I want to thank hon. members opposite for their applause. Given the fact that the stainless steel mill for Cuba designed by SMC in Montreal is a copy of an existing stainless steel mill in Canada and noting that there is considerable overcapacity in the world supply of stainless steel and that industry sources estimate Cuba could only use about 10 per cent of the production internally, is this the best use that the Government of Canada can find for $100 million? Could we not use it domestically to help our secondary industry? Could we not use it in Sudbury or some such place?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have been very close to argumentation ever since the question period began and I think the last question falls in that category.

INDUSTRY

NICKEL—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO PREVENT LAY-OFFS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Conference Board of Canada predicts that unemployment in 1978 will rise to 8.4 per cent. The board's prediction for 1977 was very low. They predicted it would be 8.1 per cent and it is 8.4 per cent. They were not taking into consideration in 1978 the massive layoffs in the mining industry. In view of the predictions of very high unemployment, will the Prime Minister advise the House if he will bring in on the first sitting day in 1978 a plan to prevent the layoffs of any of the nickel industry work force as part of an overall commitment to reducing unemployment in Canada.

● (1432)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not possible, not only in economic theory but under the law, for the government to prevent nickel from laying off employees if it wants to lay off employees. The hon. member should know that the government has no legal recourse at its disposition to do that. Therefore, the suggestion by the hon. member is not only not legal and impossible, but it would not be constitutionally possible if the House wanted to adopt a law to that effect.

NICKEL—SUGGESTED STOCKPILING TO AVOID LAY-OFFS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a very practical suggestion for the Prime Minister. In addition to the French and soon to be announced American examples of stockpiling minerals, nickel in the French example and soon to be announced copper stockpiling in the United States, I draw the Prime Minister's attention to the rationale behind his government's uranium stockpiling program, and I quote very briefly from the 1973 report—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, will he put it forthwith.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the stockpiling which took place in the uranium industry in order to save the community of Elliot Lake, is the Prime Minister now prepared to recommend to cabinet a stockpiling program for nickel in order to save the economic integrity of the Sudbury basin and all other nickel producing communities across this country? That is the best Christmas present he could give to the nickel base industry.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in his preamble the hon. member seemed to indicate that a lot of countries are beginning to do what Canada has been doing for the past 12 months. INCO has been stockpiling for, I believe, 12 to 14 months. They have stockpiles at hand for a value of some seven months' sales. Therefore, the hon. member is really only catching on to what has been done by INCO and presumably what is being done by other countries as well.

NICKEL—PROPOSED TARIFF ON IMPORTS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my final supplementary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last week I asked the minister about the possibility of an import tariff on imported raw nickel into Canada when we have, according to the Prime Minister, a seven months' supply of nickel stockpiled. At that time the minister told me he would look into the question. That was over a week ago. Has he now looked into the possibility of an import tariff on raw nickel and, if so, what decision has he reached?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the import tariff on raw material would only increase the cost of manufacture in Canada and the opposition wants to certainly increase manufacturing in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: That is a stupid answer.

An hon. Member: It was a stupid question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER CANADA WILL CONTRIBUTE TO CONSTRUCTION OF RAILWAY IN VENEZUELA

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Since the Quebec city area is deprived of information because a newspaper has been on strike for a long time, we are restricted to information given on radio and television. In view of broadcast information concerning the participation of Canada in railway construction in Venezuela and considering the benefits which Canada would obtain, could the minister tell the House whether Canada will contribute financially to the construction of that railway and if so to what extent?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the role of External Affairs in this has been to coordinate the effort in terms of the foreign relations impact, but the actual negotiations have been carried out by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am glad that the government was able to put this package together. I suspect that my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, could provide more of the details than I am in possession of at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary.

Considering the minister's answer, could I also ask him to advise his colleague and make the information public as soon as possible, because it is advisable that Canadians be aware not only of the financial participation of Canada in that country but also of the benefits which it could derive?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to inform the hon. member and the House that through EDC and the government accepting a liability clause, Canavan, the Venezuelan railroad, did go ahead. A contract will be signed with Bombardier for $40 million for the construction of railway locomotives. Sydney Steel Corporation in Nova Scotia will receive a $40 million contract for rail and Hawker Siddeley of Nova Scotia will receive a $45 million contract for the building of railway cars.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST PRIME MINISTER STATE REASON FOR INVESTOR CONFIDENCE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who at a press conference yesterday stated:

> If you have confidence in the future, you invest in the future. You put your money in it and you build something and then you say the future is going to be good.

Would the Prime Minister indicate to the House why he feels investors should have such confidence today when if they had bet on the Prime Minister in April 1968 when he took power and invested $1,000 in composite Toronto stock exchange securities, the buying power today would have fallen to $628, a 37 per cent plunge since the Prime Minister took power.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member is forgetting to take into account the capital gains that were made during that time.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT BILL—POSSIBILITY OF BUDGET IN JANUARY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister must realize that what I am talking about is loss of capital, not capital gains. In the absence of the Minister of Finance, the first Acting Minister of Finance and the second Acting Minister of Finance, I will put my supplementary to the Prime Minister. On December 7, the Minister of Finance stated:

> I will be able to come to the House with a statement seven days after Bill C-11 is passed.

That was with respect to the employment tax credit bill. This is now the seventh day since Bill C-11 was passed. Will the Prime Minister indicate who will be making the statement to the House with regard to the employment tax credit bill?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It will be the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: Will the Prime Minister indicate when the Minister of Finance will be making the statement? Also, will he indicate whether we can expect a budget upon our return in January?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the answer is soon and the answer to the second question is no.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF ALLEGED SAVINGS THROUGH PASSAGE OF BILL C-17

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister challenged the opposition to co-operate and pass the CNR revision bill in all stages, stating that it would result in a saving of $100 million to the government. Can the Prime Minister explain to the House and the country how the elimination of an $808 million debt by the government of Canada and the loss of interest revenue to the government on that amount of money will result in an immediate saving of $100 million, which I believe the Prime Minister suggested would be used for job creation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the House leader and the other parties want to call the bill immediately, we will give the answer to that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Answer his question.

Mr. Trudeau: I can tell him now but it means making a speech. I do not think that would be permitted under the rules. However, if second reading is called today and if there is an undertaking to go to all stages by the end of this sitting day, we will gladly give an answer to the question that has been asked.

● (1442)

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That is a very weak explanation, and I must say that the paper transaction has more the appearance of an act of desperation than a sound decision. Given the fact that the cancellation of the $808 million debt will result in the loss of interest revenue to the extent of $65 million to $70 million on an annual basis, and given the fact that it has been said in some quarters that the actual saving to the government will be something in the order of $25 million to $30 million annually rather than the $100 million which the Prime Minister floated yesterday, I ask the Prime Minister whether this is part of the deviousness in which this government is engaged in fooling the people of Canada? Are we to expect the parliament buildings to be offered for sale as the next step on the part of this government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are very happy that the hon. member is beginning the debate. I just challenge him and his party to call the bill—

Mr. Mazankowski: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member wants us to answer the question.

Mr. Clark: You misled the House, admit it.

Mr. Trudeau: If hon. members want the answer, let them call the bill for second reading. We will give them the answers and we will vote on the bill tonight, but they are afraid to do that.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES PRIOR TO CHANGE IN POLICY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who, to one million unemployed Canadians, is the "Grinch who stole Christmas". My question is prompted by the reply given my colleague the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe yesterday when the minister said, as reported at page 1988 of Hansard, that "we are contemplating a slight change; we are considering using some of that money for the creation of more permanent jobs". That is a commendable objective. Given the projections by the Conference Board and others that the ratio of job vacancies to unemployed persons in the Atlantic provinces will grow by a ratio of one to 40, and given the fact that we already have a serious unemployment situation, does the minister intend, before making this fundamental change in the only make-work program that we have, to meet with the provinces before putting that change in place; and in view of the fact that the change should be in place by January, will that meeting take place soon?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my memory of the story of the Grinch who stole Christmas was to the effect that eventually Christmas was given back by the Grinch; so I would expect, with the programs I have had, that I would not be considered the Grinch but the one who went looking for Christmas.

In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, I have already discussed this matter at some length on a one to one basis with my provincial colleagues. There seems to be the general feeling that we should be looking to more permanent job creation of the kind I indicated yesterday, such as the Gull Island project, the spruce budworm harvest and things of that nature. It seems to me that this is the kind of initiative that we could be taking. I would not see that as a significant change; it is part of job creation, but with a slightly different, and I think better, emphasis.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, a change in the government is the only way to restore Christmas to the unemployed of this country. Obviously, the policies required are not coming from this government. As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, given the fact that this is the only job creation program which we have, and given the fact that we support the minister's desire for more permanent job creation, is the minister prepared at least, in the Atlantic provinces where unemployment is so critical, to sit down and discuss with the provinces, and indeed the municipalities, job ventures so that maximum use can be made of money under Canada Works to create the largest number of jobs which are permanent?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, first of all the hon. member is wrong in his facts; this is not the only job creation program of this government, or even of my department. Certainly, there are job creation programs which are initiated by the provinces. So far as sitting down with the municipalities and having discussions with them is concerned, we get the reading very plump and plain from the provinces that they do not wish us to operate in this area since it is their jurisdiction.

As for coming forward with projects, there has never been any shyness on the part of the provinces to suggest the manner and the ways in which this money could be more appropriately and effectively used for permanent job creation, and we are prepared to listen to this type of representation.

AGRICULTURE

SOYBEAN MEAL—POSSIBILITY OF GETTING SHIPMENT OUT OF TORONTO BEFORE FREEZE-UP

Mr. Walter Smith (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I will direct it to the Minister of Agriculture. I am informed that there are about 14 tons of soyabean protein meal in the harbour in Toronto, and I should like to know whether the minister can advise the House if that shipment has a chance of getting out of the harbour before the freeze-up of the seaway?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the day the question was asked the boat was loaded, and I understand that today it is going through Montreal harbour. It was loaded at the time the question was asked. I believe you could say that it was a "loaded question".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HEALTH

LIQUID PROTEIN—MEASURES TO CONTROL SALE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare but in her absence I will direct it to the acting minister in charge of sports and physical fitness. It concerns the controversial liquid protein diet that has been linked with some 39 deaths in the United States and is being widely promoted to overweight Canadians as a safe substitute for normal food. Although this diet is believed to be risky even under strict medical supervision, it is readily available over the counter to people who embark upon a crash diet. Therefore, is it the intention of the government to restrict sale of this product to prescription holders? If not, has the government in mind any other way or means of controlling this liquid protein diet?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the government does not intend to make this a prescription drug because the products in themselves are not harmful. However, by mid-January we will have a new regulation under which it will be required to use a label which indicates that the product is not to be used for weight control alone or for weight reduction, and is not to be used as the sole source of nutrition. Any food, even meat, eaten exclusively would be detrimental to a person's health, but this is not detrimental in itself.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

LIQUID PROTEIN—ALLEGED MISLEADING ADVERTISING—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I have with me a typical advertisement for this product which appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix and says that "the Progo diet is one of the most effective, superior and safest weight loss systems ever devised". I should like to ask the minister, since the FDA in the United States is now investigating this type of diet because of the 39 deaths which have been linked to it, whether he would take the advertisement and investigate to see whether or not it is indeed misleading advertising?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I would be pleased to do so, Mr. Speaker.

INCREASE IN COST OF INSULIN—ACTION TO PROTECT DIABETICS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I should have liked to direct a question to the minister of health also, and since she is not here I presume the acting minister will answer for her. In view of the fact that there has been an alarming increase in the cost of insulin in this country, thereby creating hardship to diabetics, would the minister explain why this what appears to be unjustifiable increase has occurred and what action the government is taking to ensure that the interests of diabetics in Canada are protected?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to convey the hon. member's question to my colleague.

BILINGUALISM

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO REGAIN TRUST OF FRANCOPHONE MINORITIES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State and concerns the announcement made earlier today outside the House regarding official language minorities. Given that we have seen the implementation of the bilingualism policy, a noble idea endorsed by all parties in this House, bungled by the government to the point where it has caused needless dissension in all parts of the country, and given that the minister announced today new measures for official language minorities, the implementation of which is already causing concern among the very groups that it is designed to assist, so that we are in danger once again of repeating the misunderstandings of earlier programs—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Miss MacDonald: —would the minister say how he plans to regain the trust and confidence of the organizations representing Francophone communities outside Quebec, the organizations which boycotted the earlier meeting today, so that they can play a meaningful role and participate in these programs?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a peculiar and particular view of the effectiveness of the official languages program, a view, for instance, not shared by the former official languages commissioner, Mr. Spicer, who declared clearly that he felt at least 80 per cent of our effort under this program had been successful.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, to answer the second part of the hon. member's question, I must say that I personally met representatives of the Federation of Francophones outside Quebec Saturday last and that we have spent three hours discussing the program which I have announced today. I have also discussed that matter with hon. members on many occasions and I hope—I should say I believe—that we will obtain cooperation from representatives of provincial associations and from the Federation of Francophones outside Quebec. With our efforts I strongly hope we will succeed.

● (1452)

[English]

Miss MacDonald: The report of the minister with regard to that meeting is quite different from that given by the president of the Fédération des Francophones de Québec. In his announcement earlier outside the House, the Secretary of State said: "The principles governing our approach are not different but the ways and means of implementing them remain to be settled." It is obvious the hon. gentleman did not agree to any commitment with the Francophone community at the meeting last Saturday. Since the ways and means are still to be settled, what initiatives does the minister intend to take to meet the wishes of this group?

[Translation]

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I must say that I have an advantage over the hon. member because I was present at that meeting last Saturday while she was not. I can assure her that there was a very constructive discussion indeed and for that reason—even though we are going to receive positive criticism I hope—I expect to have very successful relationships with that association.

Mr. Speaker, I am deeply sorry that the hon. member who had been invited could not attend this very important meeting this morning.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES PRIOR TO CHANGE IN POLICY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. It relates to a matter which was raised by the hon. member for St. John's East with the minister responsible for employment and it has to do with the creation of permanent jobs in the Atlantic region as well as with the problem of "slippage", to which I shall refer in a few moments. Bearing in mind the concern expressed at the recent meeting of the Council of Maritime Premiers about the future of the DREE program, can the Prime Minister give the House and the country his assurance that there will be no revolutionary changes with respect to that program until there has been consultation with the Atlantic premiers and the premiers of other provinces affected with the object of permitting them to contribute their ideas on the subject?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question of regional development was raised with each one of the premiers I have seen in the past few weeks and we undertook to meet this particular problem head on when the federal conference of first ministers meets. I understand the premiers of the eastern provinces are preparing themselves to deal with this subject. We on this side have been getting ready on an extensive basis to indicate the benefits of DREE and the reasons for which it should be continued.

Mr. Forrestall: Our concern, as representatives of regions where there is serious and chronic unemployment, is that the DREE program and the program put forward by the Minister of Employment and Immigration have in some cases resulted in 60 per cent or even 80 per cent slippage in terms of the funds which go into those regions for the development of infrastructure and the creation of jobs. The money does not stay in our region. The question is, whether in its planning, either for the federal-provincial conference in February or with respect to the future of DREE, the government has given serious consideration to programs which might assure a more permanent location for the dollars and cents and for the level of support so that our people may benefit from permanent employment rather than transitory jobs.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member realizes, I am sure, that under the DREE arrangements, primary responsibility for the economic development of a particular area in a province is a provincial matter. This is why much of the operation, all of it, I would say, is subject to federal-provincial agreement related to the objectives of particular regions. For this reason, the choice the hon. member suggests is really that of the provinces. As to the matter of what he calls slippages, or what one might call leakages, it is a factor which is present in all economies. Even in Canada, monetary and fiscal policies result in some leakage because Canada is such a large trading nation and it will always be the case that a dollar spent in one part of the country will not benefit that one part of Canada alone but will also have an effect in other regions.

SMALL BUSINESS

POSSIBILITY OF PROGRAMS TO PROVIDE INCENTIVES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State responsible for small business. It is now over three months since the minister assumed his new role and inherited a ten-point program from his predecessor which he attempted to pass out as government policy on small business. In view of the fact that in reality this program merely expresses the need for further studies in this regard, though studies have been going on, now, for a number of years while inflation and unemployment continue to increase by leaps and bounds perhaps affecting small business more than any other sector, I should like to ask the minister what specific incentive-oriented programs related directly to small business he has in mind, if any, and when he proposes to introduce them—or does he intend to merely sit on the ten-point program?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for asking this question. As he may be aware, a good deal of concern has been expressed about the operation of the Small Business Loans Act. The government has undertaken to make this program more attractive to small businessmen. I was able to announce this morning, after meeting yesterday with officers of the Canadian Bankers Association, that we shall be increasing the interest rate on small business loans under the act to one point above prime which, together with the amendments to the legislation of last June and the warm support of the banks, make the benefits far more easily available to small businessmen. This is a major point in our ten-point program. We are taking a number of further steps and I hope to announce positive measures in the near future.

GRAIN

WHEAT—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF MINIMUM PRICE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the whole subject of the two-price system for wheat and the expected increase in the minimum price payable under that system. The minister has indicated that a decision will be made on this important matter before Christmas. Has a decision yet been made and, if so, at what level has the minimum price of wheat been set?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No final decision has yet been made. There will be further discussions later this week.

Mr. Murta: Will the minister give the House an assurance that an announcement will be made before Christmas with respect to the minimum price. Will that price be significantly higher than at present?

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member knows I cannot give such an assurance about price at this time. As to the other question, it all depends on how fast our work proceeds in this House and how much time is available to discuss the other topics before us.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Leblanc: Mr. Speaker, this bill permits the operation of off-track betting establishments to enable the provinces to advance funds for athletic, recreative, cultural and other purposes. Furthermore this would provide the province of Quebec with a supplementary source of income for the Olympic deficit, and the other provinces with revenues other than taxes.

CONSOLIDATED COMPUTER INC.

Question No. 29—Mr. Dick:

1. On what date was Consolidated Computer Incorporated (CCI) incorporated?

2. Is CCI under a federal or a provincial charter?

3. Did the government make any loan to CCI and, if so, on what date did it first make a loan?

4. Was the first government commitment a loan guarantee and, if so, who loaned the money at the time?

5. Has CCI defaulted on payment of such loans?

6. Is the government's financial commitment to CCI presently in the same form as the original financial commitment and, if not, what steps has it gone through from the original commitment to the present commitment?

7. Does the government expect to recover its financial commitment to CCI and, if so, in what manner?

8. Has the government ever made a financial commitment of a similar nature, in excess of one million dollars, to any other computer, data processing or electronic manufacturing company and, if so, what is the name of each such company and what percentage of the equity was owned by Canadians?

9. Is Central Dynamics Ltd. a federally or provincially incorporated company?

Order Paper Questions

10. Who are the executive officers and the directors of Central Dynamics Ltd.?

11. What percentage of the shares of Central Dynamics Ltd. are beneficially owned by Canadians?

12. Is Central Dynamics Ltd. involved in purchasing equity in CCI and, if so (a) what are the financial arrangements (b) what are the principals involved in the financial arrangements?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: 1 and 2. Consolidated Computer Inc. was incorporated under the laws of the Province of Ontario on June 21, 1968.

3. The Federal Government made direct and insured loans to CCI under the General Adjustment Assistance Program (GAAP). The first loan insurance was extended on July 24, 1970, while the first direct loan was made on December 28, 1973.

4. The first government commitment to CCI was in the form of a loan insurance under GAAP. The lender was the Ford Motor Credit Corporation.

5. CCI defaulted on such loans in 1972, and the company went through a major financial reorganization shortly thereafter. Since that reorganization, CCI has not defaulted although on occasion GAAP has provided assistance to CCI without which assistance the company could have been technically in default.

6. The Government of Canada's present financial commitment to CCI is not in the same form as the original commitment described in answers 3 and 4 above. As a result of the 1972 reorganization of CCI, the Government of Canada, through GAAP, and the Ontario government, through its agency the Ontario Development Corporation (ODC) acquired a controlling equity interest in CCI and certain debt instruments. Thereafter, GAAP and ODC, on a joint effort basis, provided other assistance to CCI in the form of direct or insured/guaranteed loans until December 1976. A second major financial reorganization took place in December 1976 which resulted in the conversion of the total indebtedness of the Government of Canada and ODC sold to Fujitsu Limited (Fujitsu), a Japanese company, 3,300,000 common shares of CCI in consideration for the undertaking and commitment by Fujitsu to provide CCI with technical, manufacturing, financial and marketing assistance and manufacturing and distribution rights and a reduction in royalties payable to Fujitsu. As a result of the December 1976 reorganization, the present shareholding of CCI is as follows: Government of Canada 53, per cent; ODC, 16 per cent; Fujitsu, 23 per cent; The Public, 8 per cent. In addition, GAAP provides insurance with respect to lease financing of the products manufactured by CCI, and provides assistance to CCI under the industrial assistance programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

7. The government expects to recover its commitment in CCI by the sale of equity it owns in CCI. As a result of the reorganization, CCI's credibility has been significantly improved in the marketplace. This is being reflected by a better acceptance of its products and by an improvement in the company's financial performance.

8. The government has only made such loan insurance commitments under the General Adjustment Assistance Program (GAAP) to three other Canadian-owned computer, data processing and electronic companies. The amount of loan insurance to these companies totals approximately $5.5 million. The government does not publish the names of firms receiving such loans from private financial institutions, since this is considered to be commercially confidential information.

9. Central Dynamics Ltd.—Centre Dynamique Ltée was federally-incorporated on March 21, 1958.

10. Executive Officers and Directors: (i) Officers—Sources: Annual Report—Year ending March 31, 1976: Russel C. Scrim—Chairman of the Board of Directors; Earle W. Wallick—President and Chief Executive Officer; Leslie K. Sellmeyer—Executive Vice-President; Kenneth P. Davies—Vice-President, Product Planning; Robert Mee—Vice-President, Engineering; Laurent Nadeau—Vice-President and Secretary Treasurer; Louis Harvey—Vice-President. (ii) Directors—Source: Annual Summary as at March 31, 1977: Russel C. Scrim—Mount-Royal, Quebec; Earle W. Wallick—Beaconsfield, Quebec; Laurent Nadeau—Dollard-des-Ormeaux, Quebec; Arden C. Boland—Town of Mount-Royal, Quebec; William A. Grant—Montreal, Quebec; Gerald D. Sutton—Montreal West, Quebec; Alex G. Lester—Montreal, Quebec; Jean M. Paris—Outremont, Quebec; Jean D. Vincent—Pointe-Claire, Quebec.

11. The 1975 CALURA return of Central Dynamics Ltd. indicates that 2,775,262 of the 2,821,280 common shares issued, were held in Canada.

12. Central Dynamics Ltd. explored the possibility of purchasing equity in CCI but withdrew. The names of the principal shareholders and the details of the financial arrangements are given in (6) above and appeared also in Vote L37B of the Supplementary Estimates (b), 1976-77.

CHEESE

Question No. 37—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is it a fact that there are approximately twenty-seven kinds of cheese produced around the world and that twenty-one of these can or are being made in Canada?

2. What is the total amount (in pounds) of cheese imported in each of the past four years by types of cheese manufactured in Canada and specifically, has the import quota been raised and, if so, on what dates?

3. What import duties are applied to foreign cheese similar to types made in Canada and is any consideration being given to raising them or to lowering the import quotas in order to assist the Canadian producers?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Agriculture and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: 1. There are more than 400 different varieties of natural cheese manufactured in the world at present and these can be grouped into basically 18 types or kinds of cheese. These are grouped based on their distinct characteristics, meaning that the details of setting the milk, cutting, stirring, heating and salting are varied to produce characteristics that are peculiar to each type. At present, Canada produces 15 of these basic types.

2. Canada manufactures 66 varieties of cheese and imports over 200 varieties. Statistics Canada do not break down imports or domestic production for each variety. An analysis was undertaken on Canadian market disappearance (including imports/domestic production) in 1975. Top six varieties were:

Variety	Market	Production	Imports
Cheddar	176,600,000	176,000,000	600,000
Mozzarella	41,100,000	40,000,000	1,100,000
Brick	12,100,000	12,100,000	—
Colby	6,500,000	6,500,000	100,000
Gouda	5,100,000	800,000	4,200,000
Parmesan	4,400,000	3,100,000	1,300,000

The reason that the Colby and Gouda amounts do not add up in total is that the department rounded the figures off to the nearest 100,000 and that accounts for the discrepancies. A global import quota of 50 million pounds of all types of cheese was established on June 6, 1975. There has been no increase in the quota size since that time.

3. The general duty rate is three and a half cents per pound with the exception of the British Preferential—three cents and New Zealand—one cent (Special Agreement). Duty rates are being reviewed as part of the MTN preparation and will be a topic for discussion during the GATT round of negotiations. The global cheese quota is reviewed annually, however, no decision has been taken yet as to its size or structure for the 1978-79 Dairy Year.

2. Not applicable.

Question No. 395—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to the Roosevelt Campobello International Park Commission and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Roosevelt Campobello International Park Commission did not have anyone under contract in 1975. In 1976, the Commission had one firm install fire alarm systems in three of the cottages. The total amount paid to them was $8,800, and the individuals in the firm were not retired public servants.

For each year since 1970 to date, by province, did the Industrial Development Bank or the Federal Business Development Bank grant loans and, if so (a) how many (b) what was the average amount involved (c) what was the percentage of loss?

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES IN CONSTITUENCY OF NEW WESTMINSTER

Question No. 463—Mr. Leggatt:

In each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of New Westminster by Department of External Affairs and those agencies that report to it?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Statistics are not available as departmental expenditure records are not maintained by region or municipality. However, as the Department does not maintain an office in the constituency of New Westminster it is estimated that expenditures are negligible.

CANADA'S INDUSTRIAL OPERATING CAPACITY

Question No. 535—Mr. Howie:

Approximately what percentage of Canada's industrial operating capacity was utilized in the first quarter of (a) 1974 (b) 1976 (c) 1977?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada produces capacity utilization rates for the Canadian Manufacturing sector. The capacity rates for this sector are as follows: (a) 1974, first quarter, 93.24; (b) 1976, first quarter, 84.09; (c) 1977, first quarter, 84.09.

INCOME TAX ARREARS OF NATIONAL AND MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Question No. 677—Mr. Laprise:

1. As of March 31, 1977, were income tax arrears still owing by national and multinational corporations and, if so (a) in each case, what was the amount (b) at what rate of interest, if any?

2. For each year 1973-1977 to date, what was the (a) number (b) amount of outstanding arrears?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): 1. (a) As of March 31, 1977, there were 28,654 corporation accounts outstanding for a total of $289,908,577. Information is not available to categorize these accounts by "National" and "Multinational". (b) The rate of interest on arrears is 6 per cent per annum.

2. Year	(a) Number of Accounts	(b) Amounts
*1975 and Prior	4,881	$ 94,930,563
1976	12,546	$ 89,594,752
1977	11,227	$104,383,261

CANADA'S RELATIONSHIPS WITH OTHER NATIONS

The House resumed from Monday, December 19, 1977, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jamieson that this House takes note of the present state and future prospects of Canada's relationships with other nations of the world.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated last evening, most of my remarks on this interesting debate will be directed toward the coming United Nations conference on disarmament. Before commencing to deal with that particular subject, I want to respond to the proposal made by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) yesterday in regard to South Africa. As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) indicated, we welcome that particular initiative. Actually, we consider it to be approximately ten years late.

We should like to look at the pig in the poke because we are not sure what it means. Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs will flesh out this proposal. The Secretary of State has suggested that Canada will develop a code of ethics for Canadian companies which deal with South Africa. That is all very well, but unless we know what are the sanctions to be applied to those who violate the code, to a large extent that statement is meaningless.

In regard to the response of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), I have concern about the statement he made as reported at page 2007 of Hansard dated December 19, 1977, which reads as follows:

As we study these implications—

Perhaps this statement is an indication of the Conservative policy. I hope it is not. When the Leader of the Opposition referred to "implications", he was referring to implications on the proposal of South Africa. Perhaps other participants in this debate may correct what appears to be a rather naive statement. It continues:

As we study these implications, one of those matters to which we will want to pay close attention is to ensure that their negative impact will not fall more particularly upon residents of that country who are black. We think that would be a most counterproductive approach to Canadian policy, as we are sure the minister will agree—

If any member of this House believes that we should not exercise sanctions against a country with a largely black population, on the ground that it will hurt the black population, he does not understand what the black populations of those countries want. If members consulted with the leaders of the black communities in South Africa, I am sure they would discover that these sanctions have not gone far enough. While there may be some short-term economic loss to blacks, those people welcome initiatives on the part of western industrial countries in order to move their country forward to a civilized and democratic system.

This House has heard a long debate regarding the question of which countries should be singled out for these particular sanctions. It is not a simple question, nor is it a simple issue. Moral decisions have to be taken. I suggest to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) that when South Africa is isolated as a special case, Chile also should be isolated as a special and separate case. As far as Chile is concerned, western industrial countries assisted in the subversion of the democratic elected government of that country. Surely, that places Chile in a special category. The moral arguments the government is making in regard to South Africa should apply to Chile, even though it is a different case. These judgments are made subjectively.

Mr. Breau: What about Cuba?

Mr. Leggatt: My hon. friend asks me about Cuba. If aid in the world is to be examined, we must examine who is receiving the aid and how much of it is being directed to people who need it. If you use that as your moral judgment, you will continue to have good relations with Cuba because Cuba is one country that has taken aid. No matter how much we may disagree with their regime, you will find that the aid which has gone to Cuba has in fact gone to people who need it. That should be the criterion all around the world. When we aid countries in Africa and Asia, we should make sure that aid is going to the poor and starving who need it, certainly not to monuments growing up to a totalitarian dictator, as has happened so often with aid. That is not what is happening in Cuba.

• (1512)

Mr. Breau: What about human rights?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about a speech?

Mr. Leggatt: If the hon. member would like to rise to his feet and make a speech, he can do so. However, I do not mind responding on the question of human rights. As I said yesterday, we should stop being selective about human rights. We must remember that there are other countries beside the Soviet Union which mistreat their citizens. If there are people being tortured in Cuba, we should be on the floor of the House calling out their names, just as we do in any other regime around the world. So the idea that we keep throwing the names of countries back and forth at each other, on the assumption that somehow this party is only interested in human rights in certain countries, or that party is only interested in human rights in certain other countries, is simply a non sequitur; it is simply irrelevant.

I should like to get back, however, to what has really happened to this country over the past ten years, particularly the image of this country in international affairs. I have had the opportunity to attend every Law of the Sea Conference since they began, and it is the general consensus around the world that this country's reputation as a peacemaker has suffered very seriously since the days when Lester Pearson was conducting the foreign affairs of this country.

There are a number of reasons for this, but one of the major ones has been our slavish acceptance of any policy in this world promoted by the United States state department. So long as this country continues to take a satellite position in world affairs, its reputation will continue to suffer. I should like to remind hon. members of some of the things this country has done in the past which has won it the reputation of being an aggressive peacemaker. They are: the Canadian refusal to support the U.S. boycott of Cuba; Canada's strong disapproval of the Anglo-French-Israel invasion of Egypt of 1956; the Prime Minister's visits to China and Russia; and the disapproval by this country of the massive bombing of Vietnam. These are all foreign policy matters in which Canada stood up and was independent on the side of peace, and it was because of those policies that we gained a reputation as peacemakers.

But our reputation today is no more that of a peacemaker. We have not engaged, in the international sphere, with the kind of aggressiveness, originality and initiative that our diplomats and our governments once had. Surely, at this time, we should have entered into these kinds of initiatives. Another initiative was taken by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who I see here today, who established that kind of independence in foreign policy with the initiative he took at the Commonwealth conference to exclude South Africa from the Commonwealth.

Here, again, was a foreign policy initiative where Canada stood up and said something independently and differently. If there is anything this country needs, it is to have independence. It needs a sense of nationhood. It can have that sense of nationhood through such a foreign policy. But what has been the record for the last ten years? The record has been a slavish, following whatever policies happen to be adopted at the time in the United States.

So long as we see our role as merely that of a satellite or supporter of the United States, we are not doing ourselves credit and we are not contributing to our own relationships with the United States. Nor are we contributing to peace in the world, because the United States is entitled to have us as an objective friend and to have from us the kind of advice which may be different from the advice they have been receiving their own bureaucrats. That has not been the case. In the United Nations we have simply been slavishly following the United States example in one motion after another.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

In the province of British Columbia there is very real concern about the establishment of the Trident nuclear submarine base in Bangor, Washington, which is some 60 miles south of the city of Victoria. It is not an easy issue, but when I wrote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the response may as well have come from the U.S. government—there would have been hardly any difference.

Let me just quote the response, to give a little background. There has been real concern among some scientists that this particular weapon was being developed as a first-strike weapon because of the technical facility that was available to target the nuclear warheads right on the sites of the silos of Soviet missile sites, thereby at least providing some temptation for a first-strike capacity. That issue was never addressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is the present government House leader. He said this in response to my letter:

> The Trident submarine programme is being undertaken by the U.S.A. in the development of its strategic deterrent. Because the programme does not form part of the Canada-U.S. arrangements for the joint defence of North America and the proposed base at Bangor will be built on U.S. territory, there is no requirement for the U.S.A. to consult Canada with regard to this matter and we have not made any representations to the U.S. authorities on the subject.

Here is a matter which intimately affects the safety and future of people all over the world. Surely we could at least expect enough interest on the part of this government to determine at least what kind of weapon it wants on our doorstep and what effect that weapon will have on the mutually assured destruction theory which many people tell us has kept the peace. There is merely a slavish adoption of the U.S. foreign policy. Why is the UN disarmament conference so vital, not merely to this country but to the whole world?

In 1973, the world spent $240 billion on armaments. It went up from $160 million ten years previously. If we were to take 10 per cent of the saving on the world armament bill, here are some of the things we could do: we could eliminate all illiteracy in the world by the turn of the century, simply by spending $1.5 billion of that money. We could feed the hungry of the world at the rate of $4 billion a year, and there would be no more hungry children in the world.

We could provide a family planning program of some $2 billion a year which would once and for all begin to tackle the major problem in this world, which is overpopulation. We could provide a worldwide medical care scheme at the rate of $4 billion a year. We could treble our foreign aid at $3.5 billion, and we could provide a permanently funded peacekeeping force at $1.5 billion a year. That is by simply reducing the expenditure of the world, on armaments, by 10 per cent. It is growing at a faster rate than 10 per cent. By simply reducing it to 10 per cent, we would at last tackle some of the global problems.

How do we go about moving this question forward? How do we, as a country, go to the United Nations disarmament conference and do something in terms of stating that we have a commitment to the principle of disarmament? There is not much point in going there talking out of both sides of our mouths, selling arms around the world and then suggesting that we cut back. There is not much point in saying we believe that action is needed to reduce the proliferation of nuclear weapons while selling the dangerous CANDU reactor around the world to every unstable regime that is willing to buy one with a set of safety standards which is becoming a laughing-stock in terms of scientific research into the risks inherent in the CANDU reactor.

In my view, what we have to do is take some unilateral action. It takes courage to act alone in these matters, but we are in a rather unique position. We can make unilateral decisions which will not adversely affect us and which may move the world forward in terms of disarmament. There is ample precedent for this. There is a treaty which controls the use of bacteriological warfare. That treaty came about because of the actions of former President Nixon of the United States, who acted unilaterally in saying that the United States would end its continuing moves toward bacteriological warfare. When he acted unilaterally, the Soviet Union joined the United States, and there is a treaty. Canada also acted unilaterally in forgiving some $254 million of debts of the poorest countries of the world. That act of generosity spurred Sweden forward, and Sweden did exactly the same thing. That did not come about as a result of a continuing dialogue which took forever. There has to be a break in the log-jam.

I suggest that in three areas we can move this country forward in a very significant way and make a significant contribution to the world UN conference. Right now, Canada ranks sixth in the world in terms of sales of weaponry to other countries. Those sales amount to about $355 million a year. Over a ten-year period we sold about $78 million worth of hardware to Peru, $49 million to Brazil, and $45 million to Iran. My hon. friend was wondering about Cuba. We sold none to Cuba. We sold $25 million worth of weaponry to Malaysia and $1 million to Chile. Of course, that was subsequent to the change of regime in Chile. We are making a pretty hefty profit in arms sales around the world. Surely in order to move to a position of less hypocrisy on this subject at the UN conference we should make a unilateral declaration that we will suspend for one year, while the conference is on, our sales of arms abroad and invite other like-minded countries to join us.

The second, and perhaps the most important unilateral act we could take, would be to abandon our nuclear role in the world. I know that our nuclear role is very peripheral. We have some storage of nuclear weapons at two or three bases in Canada, but my information is that the abandonment of our nuclear role would not in any way affect the capacity of the United States in terms of the defence of the North American continent. To abandon that peripheral role would be an important step forward. More importantly, abandoning our sales of the CANDU nuclear reactor abroad is absolutely vital.

In the world there are two kinds of proliferation, horizontal proliferation between major countries, and vertical proliferation of atomic weaponry—the more dangerous. As surely as we are sitting in this House, terrorist groups will get hold of a nuclear weapon. The Japanese Red Army received $6 million from the government of Japan not too long ago in a hijacking. As a world community, surely we must ask ourselves how we are to stop the inevitable from happening. We cannot stop it by wringing our hands. First, we have to study the way we are securing our airports. It is still most unsatisfactory. More importantly, we have to take a careful look at the way we are proliferating peaceful nuclear technology around the world and making more and more of the byproducts of the CANDU reactor available to terrorist groups.

The day a terrorist gets a nuclear bomb and blackmails a major city or country will be the day of Canada's shame, because that is the day Canada will have contributed to that act. The very real risk of war and the risk to the human race now is the risk of terrorism and the risk of terrorists obtaining a nuclear weapon.

We have abandoned the role of peacemaker because we have made compromises. We have gone ahead and sold nuclear materials regardless of the cost because of pride in our technology and the bureaucracy, the business and the labouring people who work in that industry. Altogether, it is a kind of self-fulfilling prophecy. The ball is rolling. The momentum is there, and this government has never been strong enough to stop it. What we need is a government which has the guts to stand up to its bureaucracy and say, "No more sales of nuclear weaponry and nuclear technology abroad". The day we do that we will make a significant contribution to peace and to this particular conference.

Last, but not least, we have abandoned the question of peace research. War and peace are both subject to scientific study. The amount we spend in terms of contributions to war is massive. In terms of peace research, I suggest we give nothing. We should commit 10 per cent of our military budget to peace research and to approved peace study groups. Sweden has done this for many years. We no longer have that reputation. I want to mention one group, the Canadian Peace Research Institute, which has been struggling on a very small budget and with no help whatsoever from this government for a very long time. Surely we should be moving forward in terms of world peace.

I want to conclude on an optimistic note. Most disarmament conferences work only under pressure. I do not believe the United Nations itself would have been formed without the memory of the agony of the Second World War. So we have to ask ourselves what pressure is now on the delegates who will attend the conference. There is pressure because of nuclear weaponry and because of the very real risk that it will get into the hands of either a terrorist group or a small and unstable country.

Canada has done almost nothing—in fact, less than nothing—to prevent that weaponry from going to unstable parts of the world. I believe we could make a positive contribution if we were to, in a unilateral way, move the conference forward; but if we simply go with the same hypocritical attitude we have had for the past ten years, Canada will not only not be listened to but will not have any impact on the conference.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have followed this debate with a great deal of interest. I have read everything that was said yesterday in my absence, and I have listened to the speech of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) who always commands attention when he speaks in the House.

I welcome the opportunity to discuss international affairs. This has been a closed shop since the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office. The day I asked the Deputy Prime Minister whether consideration would be given to setting aside a couple of days for discussion of external affairs, I knew in advance what his answer would be. He is one who through the years has dedicated himself to parliament. I often think he must feel lost sitting among those who today are in the same cabinet and who seem to regard parliament as an institution of little or no consequence, realizing in advance, as they do, that whatever stand they take, a supine majority will ensure passage of legislation regardless of whether it is for the benefit of Canada.

Over the years, under the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent and under my government, whenever there was a request for a debate on external affairs it was granted. The present minister, too, shares the appreciation of the assistance which parliament can give to a government when members speak freely concerning matters with which they are conversant and of which they have knowledge.

There were times in the past when I represented Canada at various conferences both before and after I became prime minister. Since 1963, for some reason I have never had the opportunity of going to any conference even in a minor capacity. I can only conclude the reason is that I do not have those qualifications which other members of the House have.

On this occasion I will discuss a number of matters which I believe deserve to be considered. I am not surprised—I have become inured to it—that whenever I am about to speak, or am on any list to speak, the Prime Minister always finds that some other call takes him from the chamber. Were he here, I would be able to make some personal references because he chose to forget my Christian name today. I can understand any relationship to anything Christian he might find discomforting having regard to the degree to which he has so often in the past been able to secure his inspiration from non-religious sources. I regret, too, with the minister and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) the fact that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) is not here to speak. This House has, for him, that feeling of respect which comes to those who, regardless of whether one agrees with his political views or not, is recognized as one who is prepared to speak as he feels.

I must say that I am very much interested in what has been decided in connection with South Africa, to which I intend to make reference later. One thing that strikes me about this government, however, is the abiding affection that is shown to Castro and to Cuba. Whatever offence is committed in that country is covered up, concealed, approved or at least connived. These are things that are difficult to understand. Canada does not want to be "Castronated".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Canada does not support any nation or national leader whose objective is civil war and launching it in other parts of the world.

Mr. Jamieson: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says, "Hear, hear." I hope he will say "Hear, hear", when opportunities come to determine that Castro and his works are taboo in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Castro has gone all over Africa launching civil wars. Castro has American republics deeply concerned over what he has been doing to undermine their governments in favour of communist governments or far left institutions. In Great Britain, in the United States, in France and in West Germany I have spoken to the leaders of those countries. They cannot understand the close and abiding relationship that prevails between the Prime Minister of Canada and Castro. An international brigand—that is what he is—who has his forces destroy freedom in African countries, is endeavouring to undermine democratic governments in Central and South America. Yet he is Canada's pet. It is beyond my understanding.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat and underline that Castro is engaged in exporting revolution to Africa and inciting revolution in the Americas. People cannot understand why the government of Canada kowtows to Castro. The Prime Minister went to Cuba on an official visit. He said, "Castro, you wonderful fellow," while at the same time Castro had 10,000 or 12,000 troops in Africa undermining legitimate governments and spreading revolution. Today, if you speak to leading Americans both in and out of the administration, the first thing they will say is, "Why is Canada so close to Castro? Do you not know what he is doing?"

I will say no more about Castro except this: the fact that Canada's Prime Minister has placed Canada's arms around Castro is causing a deep sense of suspicion against Canada and its objectives all over the western world. I pass on to another example, France. France owes much to Canada. Its survival in two world wars is in very considerable measure due to the sacrifice of other countries and the soldiers of other countries. The treatment given to the government of Canada by the present administration of France is as unjustified as it is reprehensible. The French government encourages separation of Quebec from Canada.

Why has that been Canada's attitude? Why does Canada permit, without strong disapprobation and public disapprobation, the fact that the government of France and the administration in that country does everything they can in a subterranean and sometimes very open way to bring about the separation of Quebec from the Dominion of Canada.

What treatment has Canada received? Does this government fall in line with the present administration of France? The Hon. Gérard Pelletier was appointed Canadian ambassador to France. Normally, within a matter of a few days, an ambassador presents his letters of accreditation. What happened to him? He was in Paris for days and days. He wandered around the city of Paris and sometimes went out in the country. Since the minister made an observation a moment ago that I could not hear, I ask him whether he approves of the treatment given by France. Three weeks went by, almost four, and finally the government of France, the administration, accepted Pelletier with his letters of accreditation.

What happened to the Prime Minister of Canada? He went to Paris following the celebrations in London. He was invited to lunch with the President of France. That is a normal thing. How long did he have to wait? He was invited for lunch on a certain day. The President of France found he could not accommodate him that day and the date was postponed. That was an insult to Canada. I do not agree with the Prime Minister very often, but I found it difficult to understand the humility with which he was prepared to accept that insult, and yet the degree to which his sensibilities are aroused in the House of Commons if anyone in the opposition says anything even remotely critical of him.

Then Premier Lévesque arrived and was met with pomp and circumstance. While Canada's practice for years has been that no foreign decoration be received by Canadians without the consent of the Canadian government, the President of France took Lévesque in his arms and announced that he had been awarded the prestigious senior decoration, the Legion of Honour No. 1. He did not get the consent of the Canadian government.

What did the Canadian government do? Instead of taking objection the Prime Minister tried to laugh it off. From now on the rules respecting awards to Canadians by foreign governments will not require the consent of the Canadian government. Canadian after Canadian has had honours turned down from foreign countries. Surely France has not forgotten the tens of thousands of Canadians who gave their lives in two world wars.

What happened in this case was an insult to Canada, regardless to whom it occurs, and I will always take strong objection to it. The Prime Minister, in effect, said there was nothing Canada could do. Lévesque did not wait for any consent: he started to wear it even before he got it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: We pass on from there. These are just indications of the degree to which this nation internationally is falling behind. I think of the announcement yesterday concerning South Africa. There was a tremendously courageous announcement! I was condemned because I took a stand at the Prime Ministers' Conference of 1960 and 1961 when an application was made by South Africa to rejoin the Commonwealth. The Prime Minister said today that I pushed South Africa out. He knew that statement was not true when he made it. South Africa withdrew. It said it was through with the Commonwealth.

In 1960 I brought before the Prime Ministers' conference the proposition that if any country within the Commonwealth became a republic, but if later it decided that it wanted to be a member of the Commonwealth, to rejoin was not automatic. Such country should at least follow reasonably carefully those common dictates that activate men and women who believe in freedom. The debate, went on. I shall always remember it. I said to the Prime Minister of South Africa that all we ask is that South Africa shall not disfranchise 12 million or 13 million blacks. Under Botha and Smuts it was otherwise. The black and coloured had members. Those members were abolished. I said that I do not ask that you give man and man equality, but I ask you to restore the constituencies in the parliament of your country that prevailed for blacks or coloureds during the days of Field Marshal Jan Christian Smuts and General Botha. On and on went the argument.

In the passing years, the criticism of the stand I took has disappeared. Had I not taken that stand, the only white prime minister to take the stand at the Commonwealth, and had there been a vote, that would have been the end of the Commonwealth itself.

● (1552)

I was then criticized in this chamber. And holy of holies, the Liberal party was shocked into speech. They condemned me and said it was terrible. I always dislike missing observations which pass between outstanding and distinguished members of the government, and I am sorry that I missed that which passed just now between the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson)—because it must have been good.

Mr. McGrath: The Deputy Prime Minister was writing speeches then.

Mr. Yewchuk: He wrote the speeches condemning you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know he wrote one or two. I always enjoyed those which he wrote because they followed a common pattern. The identification was there without attribution.

Then the criticism of that day ceased in light of the recognition that had we had a vote in the Commonwealth at that time, that would have ended the institution. An announcement is now made in a rather surreptitious way. The government has a habit of doing this. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs enunciated the government's policy toward South Africa. The minister normally does not assume the garland of self-imposed piety. I was not here yesterday, but having read what he said I thought he was a little apologetic. What of Canada's attitude? The western world has stood back and let Angola fall. Castro marched, or marched through others. Angola had the world's second largest diamond mines, diamonds which are so necessary today to modern production. We are now going to cut off South Africa, or at least go so far as we can. It has the world's largest production of diamonds, manganese and chromium.

This brings me to the situation today in Rhodesia. Rhodesia produces 14 per cent, I think, of the world's supply of chromium. If Rhodesia falls, the U.S.S.R. or its sycophants will control 93 per cent of the world's chromium. Are we going to cut off trade with South Africa? No, Mr. Speaker. Today the Prime Minister did a mental somersault and said we are not going to do that. What we will be doing, Mr. Speaker, in effect, is driving South Africa, by isolation, more and more into the Russian orbit. The course that the government announced yesterday in such evanescent terms is to me a major policy blunder. Russia needs industrial diamonds. Russia now has access to Angola's wealth in this regard, but it is not sufficient. She will now find herself in the position of getting the necessary diamonds which she does not have now.

Why are we slapping South Africa in the face? In 1960 and 1961 the government was condemning me. Satan was spiritual compared to the description given of me for what I had done by taking a stand on behalf of freedom. Their memories have not failed them, Mr. Speaker. They remember the awful picture painted of the right hon. member for Prince Albert destroying the Commonwealth.

What is the situation today? All of the major supertankers, in their tripping from the Middle East, South Africa or North America, must use Capetown or Simontown for watering purposes. These are the two largest naval bases which can serve these major tankers. The United States navy uses the Simontown base for its submarine flotillas which patrol the bases there. These shipping routes are critically important. If they fall under the aegis, directly or indirectly, of the U.S.S.R., this is extremely dangerous to the survival of freedom not only there but throughout the world.

I make the appeal to the government to reconsider this question. I have not heard any hallelujah choruses from other parts of the world among our great allies. The course which was taken so cavalierly yesterday is one which is fraught with terrifying danger to the future of freedom everywhere in the world. I know the government will laugh it off. It will end up by saying that it has not done such a thing, that what it has done is for the benefit of South Africa or for some other country.

An hon. Member: For Castro.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Castro does not come into this, but you would think he had been the government's adviser.

I turn now to another matter. What has the government done on behalf of the millions and millions of people who love freedom as you and I, Mr. Speaker, love it? I speak of the Ukrainian people, the Baltic peoples and other peoples of smaller population than those two? Has it ever protested the treatment being handed out to the Ukrainians and to others in the United Nations? Never a word has been spoken since 1960. Why is that? Is that the way to establish world leadership—to be afraid to speak out?

Mr. Paproski: Just before elections.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Somebody suggests the government will speak out just before elections. Well, the government has an awful lot of speaking to do if it thinks it is going to survive. Canada has not spoken out since September, 1960, when on behalf of the nation, with Khrushchev present, I protested strongly against denial of freedom in the Ukraine. And do not tell me that protests are ineffective. The Kremlin does react to international criticism. I call as my witness in that behalf Cardinal Slipyj, who for many years, I think 17, was a prisoner often in solitary confinement in labour camps in Siberia. He was in Canada three years ago and was asked about the protest that was made by the former prime minister of Canada, John Diefenbaker. He said, "I have been in solitary confinement for more than 19 months, and others who loved freedom as I do are in the same position." Suddenly, one day in late September, 1960, we found that an amelioration took place. The U.S.S.R. does react to criticism. It did in that case.

● (1602)

What about the United Nations today? It seems quarantined against adopting protests and resolutions concerning the denial of fundamental freedoms and the tyranny being practised at this very moment toward freedom-loving citizens under the control of the U.S.S.R. No action can be taken in that forum. I call as my first witness at this point the Ukrainian Committee, a body which has made a tremendous contribution to freedom over the years. In 1970, 1971 and 1972 they got in touch with the Secretary-General of the United Nations concerning the terrible injustices being done to Ukrainians—and this applies to 50 million others who are behind the Iron Curtain. The protest was not even submitted to the assembly. But the Kremlin does feel criticism. It does react. I hope that the heart of this government will be moved even now to protest against the awfulness of the tyranny being perpetrated against these people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or does freedom know double standards? Is the standard of this government the standard of Canada? Not at all. I go across this country and one of the major criticisms I hear is this: the government is frozen in its own image of self-importance and refuses to do anything internationally unless forced to do so. Mr. Speaker, I fear for the continuance of the United Nations. I do not see how it can stand up having regard to some of the things it has done or failed to do in the last year or so. I believe I am the only member of this House who was in San Francisco in 1945. I sat two seats behind that great tribune Field-Marshal Smuts, the only person there who had been a member of the original League of Nations. He said, "I wonder if this organization will go the way of the League of Nations." I see the United Nations today becoming dominated by small individual states who are united by only one thing—a common desire to achieve their own objectives. I fear that unless one of the great nations like Canada speaks out, the United Nations is on the road to suicide.

What of the millions who are in the camps? I saw the statement made the other day by the Prime Minister. He said he was disturbed by the fate of these millions. What about the thousands of freedom-loving dissidents who, like Valentyn Moroz, are imprisoned over there and held without evidence whatever? What about the tens of thousands who have been in prison camps and mental hospitals? Although unidentified, they belong to the immortals in freedom's lexicon.

Mr. Speaker, I am told my time is almost up and therefore I want to pass on to just one other observation. I want to deal with the general situation as I find it. Here we are, meeting in this chamber in complete quietness and calm. How few today have spoken out against the overwhelming power in military terms and the growing threat presented by the Soviet ballistic-missile navy? This is an hour of peril. Admiral Douglas Boyle stated recently that there are 32 missiles at sea in Soviet submarines in the Atlantic within range of Chicago, 24 within range of the whole of North America, and 32 in the Pacific within range of American missile sites in the west. According to the Admiral, the Soviets will have 30 of their Delta-class submarines in commission before the U.S. Navy equivalent Trident-class boat is launched. Mr. Speaker, we are living in a period of calm similar to that which characterized Europe during the period from 1934 to 1939. Only Churchill then spoke out. He was regarded as a pariah. He was a voice in the wilderness. I heard him speak on two occasions: the House emptied. He said the war was coming, but nobody paid attention.

On March 24 of this year General Alexander Haig said the Russian offensive build-up was "unimaginably" greater than had been expected. Major-General George J. Keegan of U.S. Air Force Intelligence said that for 25 years the U.S. Secret Service underrated what was happening. Yet here we are, doing nothing, living in a fool's paradise. Everywhere, all over the world, the U.S.S.R. is marching—not with its own troops but with those of other nations. The only warning from one of the great powers has come from the Chinese. They warn that the Russians plan the military take-over of western Europe and go on to say it could be completed within 21 days without serious damage to western industry. South Africa and the Middle East would then be taken over in a matter of days.

Some may ask me: Why has Russia not struck? Mr. Speaker, I have read every work which had been published on this subject in the last ten years. Most conclude with that question. I think the answer is this: the Kremlin is afraid of its own dissidents. The United States cannot understand Canada's attitude. Indeed, to a very great extent today the United States does not trust the government of Canada.

Mr. Jamieson: Ridiculous!

An hon. Member: Why should they?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I heard someone say "Ridiculous". Oh, it is all right to laugh it off.

Mr. Dupras: Is that what you want?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The interruptor at the back there is fully qualified by his lack of intelligence. I make that statement advisedly. Why has Canada carried on as it has with Castro? Did the United States approve? It was and is deeply concerned.

• (1612)

Mr. Duclos: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member is qualified by his ignorance to keep quiet.

Mr. Duclos: What do you mean by that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Duclos: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) has no knowledge of the subject at all, yet he said "No". One member can do that in this House.

Mr. Duclos: The hon. member should not have insulted the minister.

Mr. Clark: It is a shame the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) is such a child and cannot accept some criticism in this House. He should be sent back to the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No, that cannot be done.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, although I follow the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the debate, needless to say I will not follow him in his style nor in his convictions in certain matters. I listened with great interest to the right hon. member. It was one of his more entertaining speeches. Occasionally I wondered whether the right hon. member was dealing with the issues from the point of view of self-justification or whether he was dealing with the issues as they appear in the world today.

Particularly I was struck by his references to South Africa. The right hon. member spent a good deal of his time talking about the moral stature which Canada ought to have in the world. Also, he indicated that Canada ought to be interested in the grievances of Ukrainians and the Balkans. He felt Canada should stand up for the rights of people throughout the world. I agree entirely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: But when the right hon. member referred to South Africa, his standards changed. I hope he will look carefully at the words he used in the debate today. He seemed to indicate that Canada should not participate with other countries in disciplining the government of South Africa which is engaged in an abhorrent policy.

An hon. Member: Just like Uganda.

Mr. Sharp: I do not intend to follow this line. I am grateful to the right hon. member for suggesting a debate on foreign affairs. However, I am surprised he did not deal with some of the more fundamental issues facing the world, rather than personally attacking the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). This debate provides me with an opportunity to congratulate my successors in the office of the secretary of state for external affairs, the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) and his predecessor, the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). If the Deputy Prime Minister was not such a superb House leader, probably he would still be the secretary of state for external affairs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: How does that make you feel, Don?

Mr. McGrath: As a Newfoundlander, I resent that.

Mr. Sharp: The Deputy Prime Minister was disappointed when the Prime Minister asked him to revert to his old job as House leader. But I realize I speak for everyone in the House when I say that those who take an interest in foreign affairs are full of admiration for the manner in which the Deputy Prime Minister brought his great talents to bear in the field of Canada's external relations. The best evidence of his judgment and skill in this field was how he handled the co-chairmanship of the north-south dialogue. It was agreed, had it not been for his patience and negotiating skills, that the conference probably would have been a total failure. Second was his selection, as Canadian negotiator of the northern pipeline agreement with the United States, which is one of the most important agreements in our generation.

The hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs has talents of a different kind. Those talents stand him in good stead. I am happy this man is the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He has taken over his responsibility with skill and imagination. On many occasions I have listened to him answering questions posed by members opposite, and I have admiration for the way he commands his department and is knowledgeable of this intricate field. I am sure all hon. members wish him well. He has a balance of common sense which derives from his origin and his background. He has a sense of idealism which will stand him in good stead in the turmoil of this rapidly changing world.

When I was the secretary of state for external affairs, I proceeded on the premise that a foreign policy should, as far as possible, be non-partisan. I believed then, as I do now, that Canada can achieve its external objectives most effectively if there is a broad measure of agreement among all parties. This does not mean that the opposition should agree at all times as to how the government proceeds to achieve its objectives. There is plenty of room for criticism, even if there is broad agreement on objectives.

I have listened to the various speakers who have participated in this debate, as well as reading their speeches. I should like to make some remarks to illustrate how much agreement exists on the basic element of Canada's foreign policy. No one has questioned Canada's membership in NATO, nor the presence of Canadian troops in Europe. Speakers for the official opposition have urged that we should support NATO more. No one has questioned Canada's responsibility to provide development assistance. The criticism is that Canada is not doing enough.

Party spokesmen vied with one another in their commitment to the defence of human rights throughout the world. Doubts were expressed about the implementation of the third option in our relations with the United States, as well as the contractual link in relation with the European community. But no spokesman has disagreed with the purpose of these policies or principles. The Commonwealth, which our Prime Minister has done so much to sustain, is still considered to be a useful instrument for the promotion of international understanding. All parties voiced approval of the additional measures announced by the minister to show Canada's disapproval of apartheid in South Africa, with the exception of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, who apparently does not speak on behalf of his party in this case.

All members joined the minister in welcoming the recent dramatic moves for peace in the Middle East. Whatever differences there may be about the details of nuclear safeguards which Canada is attempting to apply, there is no difference among the parties on the essentiality of preventing the geographical proliferation of nuclear weapons. On that we are all agreed. If I may say so, this is not surprising. Canadian foreign policy is not an ideological matter, it is not the product of the imagination of particular foreign ministers who happened to be in office at the time the foreign policy of Canada is derived from certain basic and unalterable facts. The first of them is our geographical position in the world. I can remember on one occasion being in the Canadian embassy in the Soviet Union when the then foreign minister, Lester Pearson, was making a speech. He was thanking our Russian hosts for their hospitality. We had made our first visit to the Soviet Union at the beginning of the fall, and he was addressing three of the big five who were then in office.

He said that Canada is not a big country, that we have a lot of geography, we do not have many people and we do not have a long history, but we occupy a strategic position in the world, located as we are between the United States in the south and the Soviet Union in the north, and therefore are subject to pressures from both sides, to which Mr. Kaganovitch—who was then one of the Russian leaders—rose and said that so far as the Soviet Union is concerned, it is friendly pressure. Mr. Pearson then replied—and I am sure the right hon. gentleman would agree with him in that respect—that the strongest pressure he knew was friendly pressure.

So it is our geographical position in the world that has a profound effect upon Canadian foreign policy. The second is our history, and particularly our peaceful evolution to independence. Not many countries can say they have not had major wars or revolutions in their territories, but we can say that and it has a strong influence on our foreign policy. Our dependence for domestic prosperity on trade, which arises from our resources and our position in the world, is another fact which influences Canadian foreign policy. Another is the origins of the people who make up this country, drawn from all over the world, and our full commitment to democracy and freedom.

These facts have led all governments, the government under the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the government of Mr. Louis St. Laurent, the government of Mackenzie King, the government of Mr. Pearson and the present government, to very similar conclusions. I was very interested to find, when I was listening to the right hon. gentleman, that he never dealt with any of these fundamental issues. He dealt, in a very entertaining and striking way, with what were really the superficial aspects of Canadian foreign policy and I think he missed a great opportunity, but of course that is his business.

May I now turn for a few minutes to a particular application of the principle of a non-partisan approach to foreign policy which I think is important, that is, the relation to the activities of members of parliament when they go abroad on interparliamentary visits. As hon. members are aware, there are now innumerable interparliamentary gatherings, and I understand from Mr. Speaker that there are others waiting to be formed. For the first time in my experience in the House of Commons, I had the honour of co-chairing the Canadian side of one of these interparliamentary bodies, namely, the Canadian European Parliamentary Association. This has given me a new insight into some of the problems and opportunities associated with these institutions, even though as secretary of state for external affairs I had some knowledge because I was consulted about them from time to time.

Their most beneficial aspect is the opportunity to exchange views on problems of common concern, and this exchange can be superficial or it can be in depth, depending entirely on the personnel on both sides of these discussions and their willingness and ability to participate. My first observation arising from this recent experience is that although there has been in recent years a considerable improvement in the preparedness of Canadian parliamentarians to participate at these interparliamentary meetings, we can do much better. We still do not take these contacts seriously enough, to the detriment of Canada's position in the world and Canada's relations with other countries.

One reason for this is that Canadian parliamentarians, unless they have ministerial experience, parliamentary secretaries or active members of committees concerned with external affairs, do not become very expert in the subjects on which they are talking to parliamentarians from other countries, except of course in domestic matters on which they may be truly experts. I know that briefings by officials are helpful, but there is not the continuity sometimes that is desirable in these contacts.

The school for members of parliament in external relations should be the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, but I regret to say that recently it has not been fulfilling that role, a role which I think would be very useful. When I was secretary of state for external affairs I found it very useful to refer matters of importance in foreign policy to that committee, but more recently, for reasons that I do not quite understand, there has been considerable devolution in the activities of that committee.

I have in front of me a list of inquiries that were undertaken by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, beginning in 1968. There was one inquiry in 1968, one in 1969, and six in 1970, there were four in 1971, one in 1972, four in 1973, two in 1974, and in each of the last three years only one. I am excluding the consideration of the estimates. What I am talking about are full-scale inquiries arising out of the estimates, or out of a reference of a piece of legislation. It seems to me that it would be very desirable that this committee be reactivated and given more work, because I cannot believe that there are no problems that could be referred to the committee.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask the hon. member a question? Would he not agree that combining national defence and foreign affairs with some of the problems that have existed in national defence since the so-called unification has tended to put external affairs questions somewhat on the back burner?

Mr. Sharp: I do not know that I agree altogether with that. I would have thought there are some questions that could have been discussed in that committee, such as some that were discussed in this debate, where there might have been a better opportunity for an exchange of views, for bringing in people to bring testimony, and so forth, purely on questions of external affairs and not only on national defence. In making these comments, you will see that I am following the tradition of being non-partisan. I do not mind raising questions of this kind which I think are important to the functioning of this institution.

Another reason for the relevant ineffectiveness is that the Canadian side of interparliamentary associations, or at least the elected members from this side, do not report to anybody, either to the House or to a standing committee. Recently I had the experience of being co-chairman of the Canada European Parliamentary Association which underlined the curious position of the Canadian side. With the approval of Mr. Speaker, a subcommittee was formed to examine more closely relations between Canada and the EEC with respect to nuclear energy.

At the conclusion of our subcommittee discussions which took place first in Brussels and then in Ottawa, the European side insisted upon the preparation of a communique or a report which they wished to make to their parent body, the European parliament, so we agreed to the preparation of a report—but I had nowhere to send it. I gave it to Mr. Speaker, who was the only authority I could find who could receive this report. I sent copies for information purposes to the committee, which is now defunct but one will understand the problems which arose. This was an important report which should have been referred to a standing committee for discussion. At least it ought to have appeared in print. As it is now, it resides in Mr. Speaker's hands and in the hands of the members of the committee for their information, but I have no machinery for its transmission.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I point out that when I was co-chairman of the Canada-U.S. delegation some years ago, along with my successor as Speaker we were able to convince the then Mr. Speaker Lamoureux to table the report so that it would appear as an appendix to Hansard. This was done as a result of my insistence, so the precedent is there. I wish the hon. member well in his efforts to get those printed as appendices. The hon. member should just try it and see how far he gets.

Mr. Sharp: I thank the hon. gentleman. That does not solve all the problems, however, because in this particular case it was a subcommittee; it was not the committee as a whole. There might have been greater ease in getting the House to agree to publish the report of the committee, but this was the report of a subcommittee and this multiplied the problems. However, I thank the hon. gentleman. I think his heart is in the same place as mine, he wants to see these procedures improved.

When Canadian parliamentarians meet their counterparts from other countries, they are not participating in negotiations. That is the function of the governments of Canada and the other countries concerned, but by such activities Canadian parliamentarians are engaged in promoting understanding, and this requires them, on the one hand, to be as fully aware as possible of the policies of the Canadian government. On the other hand, they must be able to report their activities and conclusions to the body from which they were selected. After all, these meetings have a purpose other than educating individual members of parliament. I therefore suggest that at an appropriate time we ought to look at our standing rules.

At one time the idea that there should be a report to the House was put forward. I am not quite sure whether I would think that desirable, because I think it would be resisted very strongly by those who have the responsibility for organizing the work of the House. However, I see no reason why the report should not be referred automatically to a standing committee and provide the basis for further discussion if that is desired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: At least the reports would then have a place to appear.

I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is listening when I say I think our friends in the other place have better facilities and do a somewhat better job than we do in this field. These reports are usually printed in Hansard for the other place. The standing committee on foreign affairs of the other place prepares excellent reports on Canadian-European relations and Canadian-American relations. We have not yet been able to match those reports in thoroughness or in quality, and I as a member of the House of Commons somewhat resent the fact that I have to admit to the co-chairman of my committee that he is in a better position to handle these matters than I am as the co-chairman from the House of Commons.

In concluding these very general remarks, I would like to make some suggestions. I suggest that Canadian external policy should continue to be non-partisan in character, or at least as non-partisan as it can be; that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be encouraged to become more active by suitable references moved by the ministry; that care be taken in the representation of the House in interparliamentary groups and in the briefing and preparation for meetings; and that reports from parliamentary meetings be referred automatically to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence or to any other standing committee which may be appropriate.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I listened with great interest to the excellent speech of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp). I am reminded of a question I asked the government House leader yesterday with respect to possible activity in the coming period of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I understand that some discussions were to take place. I know this was on the mind of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. Have those discussions taken place?

Mr. Sharp: No, not yet.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on external affairs. Although not an expert in the subject, since my early childhood I have always been interested in what may happen throughout the world, and this passion has not diminished since I have been elected. When we travel throughout the world and see how people and citizens of the various countries welcome Canadian delegates, I can tell that it is heartening to be a Canadian, with the consideration we receive everywhere in the world.

The very quick advent of communications had the effect of reducing the size of the earth and of bringing closer, at least theoretically, the peoples and the nations. Today we cannot ignore the problems faced by some nations and individuals several thousands of miles away from our home. Not only should we become aware of these problems but it is also our duty to react and give if necessary, while respecting the sovereignty of each country, the help and the support, and in this regard the action of the Canadian Armed Forces in the peace force of the United Nations is exemplary. On the other hand, we cannot help regretting that such a measure is always followed by a conflict, that it comes always too late in reality. Prevention is better than cure. I think a peace policy should always be oriented in a preventive direction. It is obvious that intervention after the facts is not bad in itself if it is the only solution. I am sure that with a little foresight and courage we could prevent some conflicts.

It is not a secret for anybody that for over 30 years the world has been divided into two, a Russian camp, and an American camp. Nearly all other countries are following behind either of these superpowers and, unfortunately, Canada is no exception. The so-called non-aligned countries are trying more or less successfully to maintain some sort of neutrality, but silence is sometimes more eloquent than a flow of words.

As far as Third World countries are concerned, it is clear that we are witnessing the emergence of a new political force in the world. Its current lack of unity and cohesion, however, prevents it from playing its legitimate part on the world scene, but this is only temporary and is likely to change entirely the rules of the game. As I was saying, for all practical purposes the world is divided into two camps. China, in spite of its recent opening to the outside world, is an unknown quantity which remains quite mysterious. There are no conflicts in which its two adversaries are not fighting one another through third parties. Up to a point, this is a good thing, for a direct confrontation between them would certainly mean the end of civilization on earth. On the other hand, it is revolting to see the great powers manipulating and encouraging countries and people in conflict in order to consolidate their zone of influence. It is the duty of Canada impartially to denounce such practices by great powers.

One of the areas where Canada could play the part of a watchdog is that of armament sales. It is mainly by this means that the great powers keep alive the disputes of the small countries. A recent article of the Monde diplomatique dealing with the delivery of weapons to foreign countries was very revealing on this point. In 1976, the United States sales of armaments abroad came to $9.5 billion. This is 25 per cent of the national income of Canada for the same year. But what is even more alarming is that nearly $8 billion of these $9.5 billion were sales to developing countries. Perhaps the United States did not force these countries to buy arms, but then they did not dissuade them either. In any case, had the United States not responded to their requests, these underdeveloped countries would have turned towards the U.S.S.R which would have been eager to satisfy them.

We must admit that these countries very often have dictatorial or repressive regimes and that they play the game called by the great powers which take advantage of their servility. Meanwhile, the people of these countries still live in poverty and are deprived of genuine freedom. That is what Canada must denounce, not to achieve a comfortable place for itself but to bring about respect for individual liberties. During this year of "the political prisoner", the subject of individual liberties has been talked about very often. But talking about it is just not enough; we must take steps to ensure that every individual in every country has an equal opportunity to live these liberties and above all, to understand them. It is well known that the Helsinki Conference has been used by the U.S.S.R. as a smokescreen of good will so it would be put to better use within the Russian frontiers. This year, the surveillance group established in May 1976 in Moscow with a mandate to seek respect for human rights has been destroyed in the repression. In Czechoslovakia, for instance, the signatories and supporters of "Charter 77" who only asked for the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act provisions were subject to harsh repression. This repression took the forms of arrests, questioning, layoffs and even legal proceedings. Most western countries have categorically although very politely condemned such actions which are simply undermining a little more the bases of an already very precarious freedom. Surely enough, in such cases governments are bound to adopt a very diplomatic approach because we maintain important trading relations with them. Besides, the sovereignty of countries over domestic problems is unquestionable. However, there are cases where we must rise and protest as strongly as possible because this principle is a basic right and as such we are collectively responsible for it.

But the serious situation in eastern countries should not lull us into forgetting human rights in other countries which are under American control. In countries like Chile and Argentina, the freedoms of expression and thought are hardly better respected than in the U.S.S.R. Let us not forget that it is thanks to the help at the U.S. that a democratically elected government was defeated in Chile. Let us not forget either that the police forces of these countries which are known for their very liberal use of torture and unexplained disappearances have been trained in the United States.

As far as South Africa and Rhodesia are concerned, the situation speaks for itself. Under the cover of advanced countries, these two nations maintain some of the most repressive regimes in the world. If our foreign policy were to be fair, we should condemn every threat to individual freedom, no matter in what country such repression takes place. Our credibility towards all the people under the yoke of oppression is at stake.

Mr. Speaker, the particular situation of Canada as opposed to the countries of the Third World is a matter of opinion. On one hand, Canada is among industrialized countries because of its geographical situation, its standard of living and its culture. On the other hand, however, being an exporter of raw materials, it also finds itself on the other side of the fence, among underdeveloped countries.

Just like the Third World countries, Canada is under the economic domination of the United States in the sense that it exports its raw materials towards that country which returns them as finished products. As in the case of the underdeveloped countries, large American multinationals exploit our natural resources and make huge profits out of them, and as one speaks of economic dependency, one implies a political counterpart, so that we are finding ourselves pretty well in the same situation as these small countries. So it seems to me that a particular link should unite Canada to these countries since to some extent we experience the same problems. As I was just saying, the Third World will undoubtedly soon become a major international political force.

The day when underdeveloped countries will decide to ask a fair price for their materials which developed nations need so badly, we will witness a drastic reversal of the situation. We must open our eyes and our minds to examine thoroughly these issues so as to realize that we must take right here in Canada all available means to promote a better understanding between governments and nations of the world, so that one day we do not find ourselves at a disadvantage.

● (1652)

We do not want to have situations we could not accept and not take steps to try not to impose such situations on other countries as well. This movement I just mentioned is already shaping up, and all it lacks to go is unity, a coherence that it does not have now; they are still divided, but they will manage to create that unity overnight. They have created a very powerful economic and political force in the world and let us hope that we will not be the target of the oppression movements against the peoples that they now consider as not helping them but working against them.

We can certainly not rely on the great capitalistic powers to consolidate that movement. They have too much to lose. On the other hand, a country like Canada in the privileged situation it occupies can provide that leadership. To do that, it must clearly take sides with the small people, those who are tired of external domination and want to take their destiny in their own hands without any interference from the great powers.

Miss Bégin: There are always some of those.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): What we must aim for—and I will answer the minister—is a fair and equitable redistribution of wealth at both international and national levels. This does not mean we must declare war against the capitalist countries but quite simply that they—and Canada, to a lesser extent—will have to pay the fair price for what they take. Situations change in the world. So let us be careful and enlightened and realize that that situation could change at any moment. In any case, even if Canada does not take part in that movement, it will happen sooner or later. Canada's participation can only make it happen faster. The balance will be reset one day or the other, and Canada should take part in that movement instead of being caught off-guard. Mr. Speaker, I will say that Canadians can be rather proud of Canada's external policy. In general, whatever the government, Canada's external policy has been one of conciliation and generosity toward underdeveloped countries—

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): The Liberals have been here for a few years!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I would not want the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Loiselle) to believe that that is the financial contribution of the Liberal Party, for that is the contribution of the whole nation. So, it does not matter if that was under the Liberal or the Progressive Conservative government. That might have been the same also under a good Social Credit government, for the nation does not belong to any party and the parties must serve the nation. That is how I see politics.

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): That is what we are in power for!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): The hon. member for Chambly says: That is what we are in power for. Do you want to show that you are in power? You have the majority, as I have said time and time again, you have the majority of the seats, but the real power is outside the House. It is in the hands of national and international high finance. You are nothing but servants of financiers.

Mr. Speaker, since Canada is not a great power, it is listened to with less cynicism than the other developed countries. All of that is to its benefit and it should take advantage of the situation to promote a more equitable order around the world. Canada can and must play a middle-man role in the various conflicts. It must also entertain a favourable attitude toward disadvantaged countries. When as a delegate of this Parliament I had the opportunity of travelling officially to Cyprus for instance and visiting parts of that island including Nicosia and other towns, I noticed that among the UN Forces present there, it is toward the Canadians that the population felt most respect. It was also in the occupied sector patrolled by Canadians where things were more peaceful and where the fewest incidents ever occurred.

So in my opinion Canada is meeting its obligations in this role. It also plays a crucial role in trying to preserve peace in these areas. Yet Canada is capable of doing more. It can set a good example by participating in all conferences in order to bring about a better understanding in the world about the riches which God gave the earth and which are at the disposal of all nations. It is the duty of every government to see to it that their population benefits from economic and social policies which will provide for a better distribution throughout the world so as to better satisfy human needs, thereby fostering a spirit of conciliation among nations. So much the better, Mr. Speaker, if this can be achieved. One must not forget that before any armed conflict, before any war is declared, there are economic wars being waged. There is a continuing economic war for the conquest of markets and it is now going on since every industrialized country wants to export its surpluses outside so as to ensure a steady production and provide employment for its residents. You just have to read the newspaper reports, especially those from Europe. We are confronted by a situation that has been experienced before the 1939-45 war and those who write the history of their people remind us about these issues that these armed conflicts have always been provoked and preceded by an economic war for the conquest of markets.

I am convinced that this debate has been carried out quite objectively, despite the few incidents that took place and the odd rivalries between the various ministers who have to preside over the destiny of our country in the field of foreign affairs yet, over all, this has been a time for reflection.

BROADCASTING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre) moved that Bill C-217, to amend the Broadcasting Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as this will be one of the last pieces of major legislation to be debated in the House in 1977, I hope that it receives approval from the government and is allowed to go to committee. Canada's educators, the universities and schools, have been fighting this for some eight years. We hope some headway will be made today.

I speak on behalf of six million students in Canada in schools and universities and 250,000 teachers and school trustees who have been pressing for some action on this bill for the past five years. We hope the government has its heart in the right place today, seeing it is Christmas. This will be an opportunity to wish Canada's six million students a very merry Christmas and 250,000 teachers and school trustees a happy New Year by passing this bill and sending it to committee.

In retrospect, perhaps the wording of the bill should have been different. The bill provides that only school boards, as opposed to any publicly-supported educational institution, be given access to CBC productions. The bill also provides that any material deemed to have educational content be made available free rather than at a nominal or specified charge. In spite of these two oversights, however, the rationale behind the bill is clear. If there are any technical or legal aspects to be dealt with, they could be attended to in committee.

The current situation with regard to the accessibility of CBC broadcast materials is incredible. Network materials, often so splendidly produced and so useful for educational purposes, lie buried in vaults. Canadian educators should be able to take CBC educational materials obtained through the library service of the CBC or its commercial outlet, Visual Education Centre Inc., or obtained directly off the air from radio or television at the time of the broadcast, or taped off-air from radio and television for use at some other time, either free of charge or at minimal cost. These materials would be used in schools and universities only on a strictly non-profit basis.

In October, 1975, the then secretary of state announced that CBC programs would be available for post-broadcast use. This is only a partial solution to the problems with which my bill deals. There is very limited value to post-broadcast films.

The present Broadcasting Act is outmoded and inapplicable to today's technological and educational process. Teachers are inhibited by the present Broadcasting Act from fully realizing the potential of the technology available to them and to their students. Public school systems constitute a distinct and identifiable group within which access to materials can be planned and accounted for. Teachers and students should have access to as wide a range of materials as possible in order to ensure the highest quality of education. Copying and duplicating should be allowed for, subject to suitable safeguards to protect the legitimate interests of the creator and publisher.

In the case of broadcast programs of an educational nature, there should be recognition of the need to record these for playback within a limited period. In this situation, the tape recording may be used to meet timetabling contingencies without royalty payment. Transmission of copyright material through closed circuit television systems should be subject to reasonable royalties and fees in terms of the specific target audience. School boards and teachers have experienced distress in recent months because of current inadequacies in legislation and agreement at the federal level. Threats of legal suit have been made. While I am aware of the complexity of what is involved, meaningful action at the federal level is needed.

As for control, teachers' associations and school boards have stated that they would control the use of productions considered educational, and that the school board would determine what productions are educational. They would do so upon the recommendation of their teaching staff. The school boards would be prepared to report to the CBC productions used for educational purposes. Basically, all they are asking for is in the interests of the six million children and young people in the schools of this country. We must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that they are the future. They are the future MPs, MLAs, the future creators of intellectual property, the future CBC staff and officers, the future teachers and trustees. They are important people.

I received a letter from the Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists, based in Toronto, forwarding to me for information regarding education. ACTRA states that it is in close association with teacher and professor groups nationally, and in several provinces is active in developing working agreements that govern the production of materials to be used in education. It is greatly concerned that careful attention be paid, in the development of public policy in this field, to the needs of the creators of these materials.

Suggestions have been made in the past few years that certain kinds of "educational" materials—one example is programs made for the CBC—should be more widely available for use in schools, colleges and universities, and also for wider educational purposes, including broadcasting. "Education" used in this fashion has no practical meaning, beyond "wide use". They enthusiastically support this wide use, and indeed are doing everything they can to ensure that Canadian materials of all kinds are available for use by our educators and others.

At the same time, they do not believe the public will be best served if these materials are made available without certain controls—controls that protect a creator's moral rights in his work and that ensure he will be paid fairly for the use of that work. It is particularly important that the revised Copyright Act does not make any provisions that exclude materials used for education from copyright control, or that any action is taken to force the CBC or any other agency either to give away its materials or to allow their use without making fair payment to the creators of those programs.

I have also been in communication with the Canadian School Trustees' Association regarding some of the points dealt with by the bill and the desirability of passing such a bill to committee. May I put on the record some of the recommendations they make. They have this to say:

> The Council for Educational Technology in England has written to CSTA and said, "As for broadcasts intended for schools and for adult and further education, these may be recorded off air and retained for three years." If it can be done in England—why not in Canada?

I hope the parliamentary secretary will have good news this evening in this regard. If they have worked out the problems in England in regard to obtaining educational films, and I do not see why we in Canada cannot find a solution. They continue:

> Both the BBC and the Independent Television Companies Association Limited (the equivalent to CTV in Canada) have forms of agreements with educational authorities (the equivalents to school boards in Canada) to permit off-air televising.
> The CBC has been studying British systems, around about the time that you had another bill of similar nature before the House, but they apparently were ahead of the arrangements in Britain which came about in 1975—or they knew of them and wanted no part of them.
>
> The Canadian Teachers' Federation and the Canadian School Trustees' Association supported your bill, and they represent some 250,000 people in Canada, around 6,000 of whom are elected men and women in the same manner as MPs. Their views must have some impact on MPs if they are representing their constituencies effectively.
> Further, the Canadian Parent-Teacher, Home and School Federation also supported your efforts and they represent even greater numbers of constituents across Canada.

That is an indication of just how many people we are speaking about this afternoon.

As for authors, composers, actors, etc.—why do they hesitate, if they do? They need circulation of their materials, especially Canadian authors, composers, actors, etc.—your bill will help them, not cheat them of some money. Besides, the CBC and CTV are good pay right now—Canadian creators are not being cheated.

Trustees, teachers, home and school have repeatedly urged more Canadian content in curriculum and educational materials. Your bill will encourage such desired activity because of the additional exposure to students in the classrooms and to teachers who will want to use the materials.

Writers, composers, musicians, etc. receive copyright protection through the efforts of the Canadian taxpayers. Is it unreasonable to ask them to find some accommodation for students in classrooms to benefit from their works by off-air recording for classroom use?

The Canadian School Trustees' Association tells me that their membership has agreed to a form of licensing and an annual reasonable fee to provide for taping off-air and other copyright considerations. The moneys earned, if matched by the Canada Council, would provide considerable funds for Canadian authors, musicians, etc.

Finally, your constituents want such privileges for schools as being able to tape off-air, such as they can in Britain and have told you so in the past by letter, personal contact, and telegram. It will not be costly to do so; all that is necessary is to respond to a very reasonable request of our constituents—one which, for a change, will not cost an arm and a leg.

This is the letter I have received from Mr. C. H. Witney, an executive director of CSDA. I also have a copy of a letter from Mr. R. S. Ingram, the secretary-treasurer of School District No. 63 (Saanich), British Columbia. He draws attention to the cost of the video equipment they installed in the schools. He states:

Twenty thousand dollars have been spent to date on the receiver-monitor equipment in our district. This equipment cannot be used to its full potential because of the exorbitant cost of acquiring video tape.

A number of schools across Canada have invested in this video closed circuit TV equipment and it has proved to be of very little use or of no use at all. The letter goes on to point out that suitable video tapes are not available from the CBC due to video educational centre involvement in connection with single performance use of such tapes. The cost, the writer says, is prohibitive because of union agreements calling for $73 for one artist, single use, and a PEMC agreement with script writers. The cost would be $547 for a half-hour script or $1,094 for a half-hour script with copyright. These fees are, of course, exorbitant. They are much too high for the school boards to afford. I am sure this aspect could be discussed in committee. I have with me, also, a letter from Mr. N. J. Parker-Jervis, of the Department of English at the University of Alberta. He says:

I have much to do with the audio-visual centre run by the English department here and I, too, am much concerned with the questions you raise. For years, it seems to me, I have been lobbying, particularly with the CBC and the BBC, to persuade them to tackle the problem of copyright and residuals. I have not met with much success. The network materials often so splendidly produced and so useful for educational purposes lie buried in vaults.

Let us hope we have some success today. Let us bring this material out of the vaults. I have also received letters on the subject from the Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teachers Federation, an influential organization which takes an interest in the subject and whose office is in Toronto. I have received further correspondence from Mr. Victor Dotten, past-president of the federation. I first introduced this bill in the last parliament. After a lot of letter-writing, representations to ministers and so forth, the government agreed to send the subject matter to a committee if I would withdraw the measure. I did withdraw my bill and the subject was referred to a committee. On Tuesday, May 7, 1974, I attended a committee meeting with six other Conservatives. The only person present from the government side was the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart). A couple of CBC officials were there, along with a representative of the School Trustees' Association and representatives of the Canadian Teachers' Federation who had come from British Columbia, the maritimes and central Canada.

Mr. Speaker, that meeting had to be called off because of the absence of all-party representation. No Liberals showed up. It was one of the most contemptuous things I have seen since I arrived in Ottawa. The first meeting was held at 3.30 in the afternoon. The hon. member for Cochrane said we would call the meeting once again for eight o'clock that evening. I attended once again at eight o'clock, along with the school trustees and six of my Conservative colleagues. We walked into an empty room. Even the chairman was not there. That is a contemptuous way to treat people, but it is characteristic of the manner in which the government has dealt with the situation for the last eight years. I believe the people on whose behalf I am speaking are making a legitimate request and deserve decisive answers. I hope the parliamentary secretary will not stand up today and read some reply which a civil servant has prepared to this important question. I trust we shall hear some pleasant words from the spokesman for the government on this issue.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I shall not comment on the hon. member's statement about the government taking a contemptuous attitude, because I am not really sure this was the case. However, I have a certain amount of sympathy with this bill because it is an attempt to help schools and boards of education, and as a former chairman of the Welland board of education I can understand the reason the bill has been introduced. In some ways, its objectives are praiseworthy, but as it stands it will be next to impossible to implement because of certain technical difficulties. Its introduction may help to smooth out the way to some financial assistance to educational bodies, but the difficulties to which I have referred remain. The Broadcasting Act provides, as the hon. member is aware, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation establish a service which is varied and sometimes all encompassing. I draw particular attention to the fact that the corporation—and I quote—is established for the purpose of providing the national broadcasting service contemplated under section 3 of the act. Under section 3(g) the national broadcasting service is defined as "a balanced service of information, enlightenment and entertainment for people of different ages, interests and tastes covering the whole range of programming in fair proportions."

I introduce the above to highlight the extent of the CBC's mandate and the practical limitations that budgets impose on objectives. In this respect, there are ever increasing demands being made on the CBC and its services with what often appears to be a total disregard with the latter's capability to respond effectively to the task at hand.

With these thoughts in mind, I would like to proceed to the examination of the legislation placed before the House and outline some of the ambiguities and conflicts inherent in the wording of Bill C-217. These are given here only when they affect the understanding of the intent. Referring to section 39(1)(c) of Bill C-217, I note that the first proposed amendment would presumably require the CBC to at least give specific emphasis to some mechanism through which school boards throughout Canada could be given an opportunity to express their opinions as to the educational nature and value of the programs produced by or for the CBC. Assuming such a mechanism could be developed to the satisfaction of everyone concerned, this proposal still raises serious implications. First, to be effective, school boards would have to make their wishes known in advance of production or acquisition by the CBC. Negotiating for additional rights to a program that has been very well received by viewers can be difficult and costly. In some cases, whether or not a program has been acclaimed, clearances can take as long as a year following broadcast. It is always difficult and often impossible to judge the educational value of a program on the basis of a synopsis. Accordingly, school boards or their representatives would need a great deal of information about CBC production plans which typically are spread over a year or more before the broadcast date, and would want to see previews in some cases. As can justifiably be imagined, any such relationship would impose an impossible and unacceptable burden on production staffs. It would result in the widespread dissemination of highly confidential production information and would impose severe constraints in competing with other networks, particularly in current affairs and news.

● (1722)

Broadcasting programming is dynamic. It would be impossible to predict in advance of a program year what titles school boards might wish to deem educational. Clearing programs for post-broadcast use are expensive. More importantly, any arrangements through which school boards could be empowered to select CBC programs for post-broadcast use would make it possible for organizations chartered under provincial legislation to make relatively open-ended demands against the corporation's operating budgets approved in parliament.

The hon. member no doubt will attest to the constitutional problems and difficulties at issue in this approach. They are given further emphasis by the apparent intention of Bill C-217 to by-pass the provinces and territories completely. The position of provincial governments and discussion on a cost-sharing formula involving the provinces are essential elements which require further consideration.

The implications of the arrangements entertained under the bill are compounded when one considers that a large majority of programs produced, or acquired by the CBC, are available for broadcast use only and cannot be used for other purposes. In some cases the talent collective agreements under which the programs are produced do not provide for classroom use. In other cases, the non-broadcast rights may already have been licensed elsewhere. Writers, who nearly always retain copyright ownership in Canada, may not wish or be able to grant the right to use in the classroom of a program produced from their creative works.

In the case of feature films, only the broadcast rights are made available, with producers and distributors retaining post-broadcast rights. The only instance where the CBC could have post-broadcast rights would be in the case of a Canadian film with CBC production money. In drama, management contracts do a specific program but the author retains the copyright. The copyright laws in Canada specify that unless otherwise assigned, the copyright is vested with the creator.

If Bill C-217 were adopted, inevitably programmers would be under pressure to make choices that emphasize those programs for which classroom clearance is possible. The hon. member will agree, subject only to the unqualified mandate to provide the national broadcasting service defined in the act, that by far the most serious consequence for the CBC of the adoption of C-217 would be that the CBC would no longer be seen to be independent and autonomous in program matters.

The CBC is a federal agency responsible to parliament, the source of most of its funds. It has certain obligations imposed on it by the Broadcasting Act and elsewhere. An amendment of the kind proposed by Bill C-217 would give local school boards, which are under provincial jurisdiction and administration for the most part, the right to make unpredictable demands on the CBC's financial and other resources, and to alter in a major way the balanced service required of the CBC under section 3 of the act.

Serious consideration should be given to the hazards of accepting the principle of provincial influence in broadcast programming matters, even though at this time the justification appears to be popular in some parts of Canada. The bill raises more problems and questions than it solves. It fails to answer whether such a proposal has much appeal for the provinces.

Other members will speak on this important matter, but before closing may I congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) for his original idea, although I feel it cannot be agreed to at this time for the reasons I have mentioned. However, perhaps there is some room for the idea after further federal-provincial discussions and agreements have taken place.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, approximately four or five years ago I was the original seconder of the bill of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). As a matter of fact, we were seat mates, as well as being ex-school board trustees.

I am disappointed in the contribution made by the hon. member of Welland (Mr. Railton). He seems to have found a difficulty for every solution. I doubt very much if he will be voted man of the year by the Welland school board after the 15-minute dissertation we have heard with respect to the duties of the CBC. According to the hon. member, the autonomy of the CBC will be destroyed if school children are allowed to see its programs before they are aired publicly. I never heard more rubbish in a shorter time than I heard today from the hon. member for Welland.

The CBC's autonomy is evident to everyone. The corporation produces excellent programs in an attempt to assist in the teaching of social studies. That has been the strength of this bill, and the strength of the movement toward making CBC programs available for use in the classroom.

The school boards that have gone into video tape equipment are faced with difficulties. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre referred to school board No. 63 which invested in VTR facilities. I was chairman of the Victoria school board when it invested in VTR under the assumption that the CBC was a public corporation working for the good of the Canadian public and would welcome a wider audience for its programs. I assume the corporation would welcome wider audiences for those excellent documentaries and for its excellent coverage of current affairs. The CBC was determined that no one would see its programs unless a stiff price was paid, particularly school children, which was a shocking thing to occur.

In British Columbia, the Kamloops school board set up video tape recorders in almost every school. It was able to tape every decent program produced by the CBC. The facilities were used quite freely. The effect was good. Then suddenly the school board was threatened with a lawsuit if it continued to tape off-air CBC programs for use in its schools.

This subject was raised in the House in 1974 by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. We were amazed at the quick response we received from all educators. We were promised, by the minister responsible, that he was working toward a solution. We were offered compromises, which we accepted, but they were never delivered. Nothing seemed to happen, except it was prevented from becoming the public shame it was.

● (1732)

A taxpayer pays for these programs to be produced by the CBC and I do not see why the taxpayer, who also pays taxes to the school district, cannot get a program by just paying once for it—why can he not pay the tax once and then his kids can watch the program? Once should be enough. There is the problem of residuals for creators of creative work. I do not know how much creative work goes into a newscast. Sometimes when I look around the House of Commons I realize there is much more creativity here than people realize, particularly in answers to questions, although there is a certain amount of creativity in questions also. I am sure that the problem of remuneration for the artists for truly artistic work could be solved.

On this side we would like this to go to committee. We want these problems to be solved and we want to come up with better solutions than we have now, which is not to leave some of these things which could be so useful to the education world forever in the vaults until they disintegrate perhaps a thousand years from now. It is ridiculous to think that there is something here that might be useful to schools and to our young people, but that we cannot solve the problem.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief in my participation on Bill C-217. As someone who has been a member of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts since my first election to this place in 1972, and also having the honour at present of being chairman of that committee, I am quite interested in the contents of this bill, but I also see a great many problems. As someone who has earned his living in the past, before becoming a member of parliament, in the field of radio and television, and specifically recalling my obligations as a member of some unions to carry out functions on television and, I think more specifically, of the Canadian Association of Radio and Television Actors, of which even newsmen had to be members, although the news people hate to admit they are actors or performers but that is part of the business, obviously I can find many aspects in this bill to commend to the consideration of the House.

But once you go past the good intentions there are some real difficulties which I do not think can be overlooked. To say that the CBC happens to be a Crown corporation, subsidized to a great degree by the Canadian public through federal taxes, is not to say that further down the line there will not be complications in the material that is put together to be presented. Simply to say that this material, after it has been introduced, belongs to the Canadian public and therefore should be distributed freely to school children, as this bill suggests, and that it is evil to deny them access to this material for which we as federal taxpayers have paid, I suggest, is a simplistic argument.

The hon. member who spoke before me went over some of the problems involved, but I do not think he did so with much thoroughness. Should a performer who chooses to perform for a production that is being used by the CBC waive his or her rights to residuals for repeats when the same performer, acting for any other type of media or production house or film centre in Canada, has the right to those residuals? Is it fair to say that the CBC, when it has responsibility not only to spend our money to produce programming and make it available to the Canadian public but, as some of us know in some frustration they have not done well, can come back and say they have done well and have recovered money where they can, in the interest of carrying on a viable operation, and yet try to meet their responsibility under the Broadcasting Act? I say that the cost is real within a complex society where other competitive organizations, be they other television networks or other producers of theatre, drama, or public affairs, operate under the separate rules in the business world. I suggest we cannot do that easily, as good as the idea may be.

The fact is that cost comes down to a line somewhere, and the waiving of it either puts back on the CBC an additional burden, which will be born by federal taxpayers indirectly, or it means that parliament or the Government of Canada would pick up the additional cost of the responsibility for a settlement of residuals rather than the CBC.

The CBC, with a budgeting range of half a billion dollars, is under great criticism, and I suggest we cannot easily add to its cost load and argue that we will be tough with it. In turn, when we have a massive deficit, which we now have, and we hear from the other side the arguments they put forward about restraining government spending, when we hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) ask, as he did in the question period yesterday or today, what the government is going to do to get the burden off its back as suggested by the Lambert Commission, in transferring points to the provinces whose jurisdictional responsibility is involved, I cannot see how the opposition can do what my predecessor often used to call sucking and blowing at the same time. They play a fine harmonica, but the cost of the tune must be covered by someone. In this case the cost would either directly fall on the taxpayer through the CBC or would have to be directly paid by the taxpayer through the government assuming the burden. I cannot see how we can do that responsibly when education is primarily the responsibility of the provinces, especially primary and secondary education.

It is a commendable proposal that the material should be made available where contracts and agreements are such that there are no additional dues owing to the people involved in the production. That is fine, but where cost factors are involved, as they are in most cases, and where the CBC has the responsibility to recover costs when it has spent money on productions, I do not think it should be the responsibility of the federal taxpayer, simply because we are not answerable for that area of jurisdiction and it distorts the whole process of our political system.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to be long but I feel I have something to contribute to this debate. I know there are problems. The arguments brought forward by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) about school children and school trustees interfering in the programming of the CBC left me flabbergasted. I have not heard arguments of such vacuity put forward by the hon. member in this Chamber before, and I am quite surprised. As I see it, school teachers would be aware of the program that would be available and would apply for it, and not try to guide the CBC into a particular form of program.

I know there are problems, and we have just heard about them. The suggestion is that the matter go to the committee where these problems could be worked out. ACTRA has indicated its readiness to face these problems.

I can recall having tried when I was abroad to get a particular ballet program from the CBC. Ballet programs are most useful to use in countries where there is a language problem because ballet is a universal language; it speaks for itself. It is not a matter of having a play where you must have the translation dubbed. A ballet can be used by an embassy abroad. I tried to get one, but the CBC put up a fight and refused, presumably on the grounds which are being advanced now that there are residuals available to the performers.

There are two solutions which I can suggest. First, I believe a school board has already agreed what a nominal fee might be. The other one is that the performers in the original performance might be given a higher fee on the understanding that some of these programs might be used in schools.

● (1742)

I just do not see what the government is trying to do by preventing good programs—I do not want to see bad programs in schools; there have been enough of them—which teachers could learn about and use for current affairs programs, as the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) said. Some of the historic programs we have seen on the CBC deserve to be given a much wider distribution. They could be used as a basis for discussion in social sciences classes. I just do not see why the government is trying to prevent this matter from going to committee. I would like to call for the question now so that this matter can go to committee.

Mr. McKenzie: It worked out in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It worked out in the United Kingdom, and if it can work out there where unions are strong I do not see why we cannot work it out here in Canada.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Daudlin: Hon. members opposite want to have their time to say something, but when someone else gets up to avail himself of the same opportunity they suggest he should be stilled and not allowed to rise. Those same members suggest that when time allocation is imposed they are being muzzled. I find this absolutely incredible.

Everything which has been said indicates that the hon. member has a good idea. I think all hon. members have indicated that the kernel of what he is saying is a good idea. No one denies that, but what has not been indicated is the direction that the CBC is already taking.

Mr. McKenzie: This matter was raised previously.

Mr. Daudlin: I think this matter was initially raised in July of 1975. Since that time the CBC has made available, according to some notes I have, some 200 hours of French and English programs for circulation. New releases are being made at the rate of about 90 to 100 hours per year. A radio further use project is being developed this year with the same kinds of objectives as for TV.

The CBC's further use project is quickly gaining acceptance across Canada, and at its present rate of growth it will soon be the largest collection of Canadian programs available for use in schools. This is to say nothing with respect to the programming available through the National Film Board.

In view of the various considerations which Bill C-217 raises such as jurisdictional constraints, copyright obligations and control and responsibility of the corporation for programming, the further use program of the corporation becomes an even more logical approach to distributing CBC programs for post-broadcasting use. Already school boards and service clubs are greatly benefiting from this program free of charge. Nothwithstanding that, the letters the hon. member brings forward make no mention of this particular program, which is already in use by those same school board. However, he claims the letters support this bill.

The corporation has accepted, I submit, the responsibility of meeting the heavy demands from the public for its programs. Constrained as it is with respect to copyright and talent agreements, the corporation is nevertheless making an increasing amount of programs available for post-broadcast distribution.

That the corporation is developing a post-broadcast use program for radio attests to the seriousness and importance attributed by the CBC to the wider distribution of its programs to the public. In this respect I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) to reconsider his proposal. It seems to me that there is already a response being made by this government and by the CBC. In fact the CBC has taken it upon itself to develop this post-broadcast system.

Mr. McKenzie: I would not have had to introduce the bill if what you say is true.

Mr. Daudlin: The hon. member says he would not have had to introduce the bill if what I say is true, but he fails to take into account the fact that there have been more than 200 hours of production available to school boards and the like since the hon. member brought forward his bill in 1975.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): One hundred hours?

Mr. Daudlin: I said 200 hours. The hon. member should be listening. Two hundred hours is a fantastic amount of time. If the hon. member was being fair, where was that in his speech?

If the hon. member was being fair, he would not have said to us that the government and the CBC are denying the children of this country the opportunity to see CBC programming. In fact there is a library full of it, and it is being relied upon rather heavily.

Mr. McKenzie: Say that to the school boards.

Mr. Daudlin: I do not have to. The record speaks for itself. The school boards are already using it, and they are using it to a greater and greater extent. While I am speaking of that, one needs only to look at the kind of advertising that is taking place with respect to the new technology of which the hon. member speaks and what in fact is being developed.

With the new kinds of videotape cassettes and the new technology that is being used we are now getting to the point where virtually every individual in the country will have the opportunity to tape off air, and it is obviously going to be something in addition to the post-broadcast policy that the CBC is following. Individuals such as hon. members opposite and myself will have the opportunity to tape off air, and I wonder whether that will create problems. There have been arguments about the availability of that kind of off-air taping. It seems to me that we would be in a position to invite our closest friends to watch programs we tape on cassette machines.

Notwithstanding that, the hon. member does not seem to recognize that the CBC is moving forward and is not going to deal with the issue in the way the hon. member proposes.

To follow up on some of the comments made by my distinguished colleague, with whom the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) took such issue, I point out that the language of sub-paragraph (k) needs clarification since, among other things, there is a difference between the French and English texts. For example, the English version refers to "any broadcasting productions which are the property of the corporation" while the French text refers to "toutes production radiodiffusées appartenant à la Société." It is not specified whether this amendment applies to all broadcasting productions including radio or just to films as it is stated in sub-paragraph (c). The expression "any broadcasting productions which are the property of the corporation" is so broad as to include any kind of radio or television broadcast, including news.

Mr. McKenzie: You are not married to the language.

Mr. Daudlin: Without wanting to cast any disrespect on the hon. member, if so little has gone into the preparation of the bill as to afford this kind of ambiguity and difficulty, I would have difficulty supporting a reference of this bill to a committee. It seems to me that perhaps we should go back to the drawing board.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Why do you introduce so many amendments to your bills?

Mr. McKenzie: Move an amendment.

Mr. Daudlin: The hon. member suggests I introduce an amendment. Perhaps that should be done, but I say that this measure should be sent back to the drawing board. It is certainly not something I would agree to referring to a committee. One has to have a kernel of something to work with in order to send it to a committee.

In addition to what I have indicated, the hon. member will no doubt agree that, if it is assumed that the amendment is intended to cover all productions by or for the CBC, there appears to be irreconcilable differences between this proposed amendment and that in sub-paragraph (c).

If we accept for the moment that these drafting problems can be overcome, the CBC must then make the assumption that in order for these amendments to have any meaning in practice the corporation will have to be aware of all the opinions of the thousands of school boards across Canada even before a particular program is produced or acquired for broadcast.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Daudlin: Hon. members opposite are having a lot of fun shouting "Question". There are several other comments I would like to make. It will only prolong the debate if they use more time by shouting "Question".

There is also the consideration that there are at least two parties to every contract. The program rights market is not regulated by price lists and is highly competitive. As soon as it became known that the CBC was required to obtain educational rights in addition to broadcast rights, the hon. member can no doubt see that the corporation would have little or no bargaining position left. The cost of this service would become prohibitive—

Mr. Paproski: The men with the white gloves are coming to take you away.

Mr. Daudlin: If they have white gloves, I will be very comfortable.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA'S RELATIONSHIPS WITH OTHER NATIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Jamieson that this House takes note of the present state and future prospects of Canada's relationships with other nations of the world.

Mr. Dupras: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on a point of order.

Mr. Dupras: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is general agreement among hon. members that speeches be limited to 15 minutes each for the remainder of the debate till ten o'clock.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the proposal by the parliamentary secretary. Is it agreed that the time of each member be limited to 15 minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is so ordered.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, 15 minutes is not much to formulate a foreign policy, but it is enough to express in a few words my views on some matters of concern to this House and the country as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to take part in this debate, as it is the first time in 17 years that we have had the opportunity in this House to look fully into the implications of a foreign policy which has considerably evolved in the last few years, and to readjust our aims if needed so that our country may be more implicated at the international level.

Mr. Speaker, the interest of Canadians in external affairs has considerably increased during the last ten years, and if one considers the participation of Canada in several major international activities, and I think particularly of Canada's decision to participate once more in the Security Council and its subsequent election to the UN Security Council, the participation of the Deputy Prime Minister as co-chairman of the fourth conference of the United Nations on trade and development, the invitation extended to the Canadian government to hold the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements in Vancouver, Canada's decision to go ahead and face the facts and thus recognize China, one of the first western nations to do so. Mr. Speaker, the ever increasing involvements of the Canadian government show the Canadian people's determination to become increasingly aware of what goes on in other countries.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege and the honour to serve my country in the last three months as Canada's representative at the thirty-second session of the UN General Assembly, more specifically on the fifth commission, the administrative and budgetary commission. And I was in a position to become familiar with the internal operations of the United Nations, its various mechanisms and the reasons why that institution has been criticized and also why it is so necessary. This is the subject with which I should like to deal briefly this evening in the House.

Mr. Speaker, we must recognize that the UN has considerably evolved during the last 32 years. It must be kept in mind that it was created after the second world war during a difficult period following a very painful conflict, and it was created by a number of sovereign states, 57 at the time, which had interests themselves throughout the world.

Later, in subsequent years, with the fall of colonialism or at least of official colonialism, an increasing number of new nations which had gained their independence at the end of the fifties or at the beginning of the sixties joined the United Nations, and that trend is keeping up since the organization is now composed of 147 member states.

Mr. Speaker, an organization had been devised for 57 member states, with appropriate mechanisms and structures, and it is now made up of 147 member states. So, it is easy to understand why the rules of the game have changed. What was at the beginning a conflict, a potential conflict between socialist and capitalist countries, later became a conflict between colonial and decolonized countries, between developing and industrialized countries, and it is now more or less a conflict between rich and poor countries. And it is normal, Mr. Speaker, that this new majority at the United Nations, this new majority composed of poor countries, of those countries which obtained their independence and are now developing, it is normal, Mr. Speaker, that those countries stick together and often show some impatience and resentment towards richer countries which they accuse, often rightly, of being indifferent to them.

Mr. Speaker, if one is to analyse objectively what has happened to the UN in recent years, it is essential to have good understanding of the new rules of the game. Beyond the problems related to the working of the UN, with which, unfortunately, I will not have time to deal this evening, we have had more than an idea of those difficulties, confrontations and frictions in the working of the UN which again merely reflect the difficulties that exist between rich and poor countries, because it must be kept in mind that the United Nations are not a world government but rather a forum for discussion, a meeting place.

Therefore, we have witnessed a whole series of stances that were more or less acceptable, let us admit it, more or less applicable and often a little unrealistic, but, Mr. Speaker, they didn't really have the effect that had been expected. If one understands well this esprit de corps among those poor countries, one understands better, Mr. Speaker, that some resolutions which may seem unacceptable to our country were carried with a majority. Mr. Speaker, there is a new majority in the United Nations, we have to accept that fact if the organization is to carry on, and I, for one, Mr. Speaker, believe that the UN is a worth-while organization which must go on with its work.

Mr. Prud'homme: I agree.

Mr. Pinard: It is certainly worth improving.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Drummond, says that it is worth improving. Any organization, and the first that comes to my mind is this very House, is worth improving. I, for one, trust that he will put all his energy into it.

Mr. Prud'homme: And good luck!

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I have presented the facts in that light, it is because again this year Canada has not followed up its wish which was expressed in other forums, not to get involved in conflicts which only concerns us indirectly. Mr. Speaker, Canada is a country which is highly respected internationally in several respects. As I said earlier, this is due to the fact that our involvement in various areas, a direct involvement demonstrated by an obvious interest in various conferences.

Generally speaking, Canada has such a good image abroad that it is a sad thing that a certain emotivity should sometimes lead us to take positions that are misinterpreted by the global community and somewhat tarnish some of our efforts in other areas. This at least is the impression I got during my stay in New York.

Canada has been a leader in the area of development, and a few months ago, as all members are aware, we erased the external debt of the least developed countries. That initiative was greeted in an extraordinary way by the countries involved and by the group of underdeveloped countries as a whole. In such instances, people come forward to tell us how, marvellous it is Canada could take such a leading position. It is unfortunate that in other areas, and I think of the Middle East in particular because this is making headlines, we should take more contentious positions.

I urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), when the time comes for this country to take a contentious position, to seriously weigh the pros and cons of both sides of the issue. In the UN we are fortunate in having a third way, open to us. I know that in Canada abstention is sometimes crucified by those who would like us to take more outstanding, extreme positions. But it is a fact at least in the United Nations forum, abstention has become an accepted way of voting that changes the name of the game. This is used on occasion by every country where, for a reason or another, neither extreme reflects that country's real position in respect of the issue at hand.

Mr. Speaker, I must admit that before going to New York, I myself was reluctant to chose abstention. Since that time I have seen the organization at work, and I have come to the realization that in some cases it is better to abstain than create enemies without reason. In the present case, and I think once more of the Middle East, there has been a tremendous opening, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself suggested, when Mr. Sadat on the one hand and Mr. Begin on the other made the necessary steps for a first and now a second meeting.

Why should we Canadians have a finger in the pie instead of letting both parties settle their conflicts, for they will have to live together peacefully? Once again I urge the Canadian government to change its emotional approach and not to play partisan politics as it has been the case many times in the past when time came to appreciate the situation.

As I do not want to be long, Mr. Speaker, and my time is running short, I will take a few minutes to deal with the francophone Africa issue. A few days ago in Abidjan the Agency for Cultural and Technical Co-operation concluded its meetings. Unfortunately, institutional conflicts between France and the Quebec and Canadian delegations prevented the Agency for Cultural and Technical Co-operation from making a head start toward fulfilling the aims which were at the base of its creation, that is multilateral co-operation between Francophone countries.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that those poor countries in Africa or elsewhere have to wait for any kind of help from rich and industrialized country, and in this case they had a tool they could have used to help those countries fulfill their aspirations and develop themselves. I regret that once again conflicts—and I repeat, institutional conflicts—stood in the way of progress. I cannot help blaming the French government, however mildly, for its somewhat unflexible position towards multilateral co-operation. All of us know that after the colonization, France created special relations with those countries bilateral relations, and I suppose it does no want other Francophone countries such as Canada to share that co-operation with Francophone nations. For our part, we are wrong sometimes, we are concentrating too much on domestic issues and we do not like to see a full-fledged Quebec delegation attending those international meetings.

Mr. Speaker, let us forget our little domestic problems until the next conference, let us have bilateral relations with France in order to settle those issues so that once and for all co-operation between Francophone countries might work, that we might have, and I put them between quotes because they are banned words, a "Francophone Commonwealth".

● (2022)

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be participating in this debate, not the first foreign affairs debate in 17 years. It is quite wrong to suggest that; there have been a larger number prompted by the opposition over that period of time.

I want to congratulate the minister for the high tone he took in leading off the debate. I say to him now, as I said to him in the committee not long ago, that we are proud of him as an eloquent and articulate spokesman for our country abroad. On occasion we do not agree with him, but we admire the way he expresses himself. His speech the other day was a credit to him, to his country, and to the department. I was very proud of the whole tone of the debate. Almost without exception, no one descended into party politics at any time. Our leader, who has proven himself knowledgeable on national issues, demonstrated a dimension of statesmanship the other day, showing he has a grasp of international issues which bodes well for the potential prime minister of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I was particularly pleased at his reference to the late L. B. Pearson. There never was a finer or nobler Canadian. I admired what my leader had to say about the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), a leading expert in the study of aid and development who proved himself, as he always does, a most competent, perceptive, and sensitive statesman.

The Middle East has been a major concern of mine for many years, Mr. Speaker, but the subject will not form a major portion of my truncated speech. Like all people of good will who believe that love is better than hate and peace better than war, I rejoiced at the recent meeting in that ancient and beautiful city which our old hymn describes as "Jerusalem the Golden". I predict that President Sadat will become the winner of the Nobel Peace Prize and I hope nobody will think me anti-American if I say that it is an even greater designation than being named Time magazine's "Man of the Year." But we must not allow our yearnings or our responses to the theatre and the drama of the Jerusalem meeting to blind our perception of some sombre truths. Psalm 85 in the Presbyterians' beloved Old Testament contains a pregnant message "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other."

No matter how amiable are the relations or the accords between Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat, there will be no lasting or worthy peace in the Middle East which forgets the suffering or ignores the rights of the chief victims of the Middle East situation, the Palestinians. It was not a good omen when the Israeli delegate to the Cairo conference the other day refused to participate in the presence of an empty chair which had been designated for the PLO, and called for the hauling down of the PLO flag outside the building. Whether we like it or not, the PLO is the most widely supported Palestinian organization at this time.

Until the Palestinians have a state of their own they will not be able to go through the process of formally selecting a government. And not all members of the PLO are terrorists, as we are so often told they are by the biased media. President Sadat aired the case for the Palestinians well in the Knesset.

Let us hope it will not be lost in any bilateral discussions which take place.

The return of Sinai to Egypt and a separate peace between that country and Israel will not solve nor settle the Middle East crisis. There is a danger in rushing some of these things too fast. The American word "momentum" has been used in connection with the operation: it is being said we must maintain the momentum. We should be less interested in momentum, I believe, Sir, than we should be interested in peace.

Other states must be involved. I refer to Syria, whose commitment to the suffering Palestinians has been both powerful and painful, and to Jordan, whose moderation and wisdom are and always were a hopeful and helpful element. I congratulate His Majesty the King on the celebration of his twenty-fifth anniversary of his reign, as we did the Queen of our own country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: Saudi Arabia is a thoroughly dependable ally for peace and good will. There is long suffering Lebanon and, most of all, the Palestinians. These people must be in the equation if a successful formula is to be worked out. As for our role in connection with a recent UN resolution, I made clear my view on that at the committee meeting and I shall not repeat it tonight. The hon. gentleman who spoke before me talked about the use of abstention. On that resolution, 32-20, instead of voting with El Salvador, the United States and Israel against everybody else, it would have been wise to have abstained. I regret profoundly that we did not do so.

When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) was in my party I hardly ever agreed with him. Quite often at national meetings the party supported his view rather than mine, which leads me to believe that at times parties, like individuals, deserve what they get. In the instance of the boycott I am more inclined to be with him in his realism than with certain other people. The main issue is surely not the Arab boycott in its primary, secondary and tertiary elements. The main thing is to settle the reason for the boycott, namely, the insistent state of war. That is why there is a boycott. It is because these states are technically still at war. Can you imagine Winston Churchill saying "In war we can use only certain kinds of boycott"? He would use them all, of course. The settlement of the issue is of the essence.

I think we could do more in the Middle East if we were more objective. I heard Professor Peyton Lyon on radio this morning saying we had lost our capacity there because we are regarded as being too pro-Israel. I should like to see the day when we could regain true objectivity. It is conceivable that the nations may not want to go to Geneva for renewal of the conference. They certainly would not wish to go to Washington because a meeting there would be held under the wing of a great power. I would like to see Canada in a position to invite all the participants to come to Ottawa. We are peacekeepers. We are proud of this role. We had a great tradition in the days of Mr. Pearson when there was a crucial, troubled time in the Middle East and Canada was in the forefront. Perhaps an objective Canada, unbiased, might be the scene of a renewed conference of Middle East states.

I was interested in what the minister had to say about South Africa. I am being careful not to be hostile, but I am a little troubled. I think it is sometimes dangerous to be too brittle in one's attitude toward these matters. I wonder if I were allowed a question a day by Mr. Speaker and if every day I brought up to the minister cases of a country in which human rights were being grossly violated, and asked if we were going to sever trade relations with it, how many days it would take and how much international trade we would have left. This is a very serious situation. If the minister wishes to read Amnesty International he will find there are a great many countries involved. But more serious than that and something which troubles me is that perhaps outside criticism makes it more difficult for the moderates within South Africa.

There are men of good will inside South Africa. There are moderates there, and the ganging up of the outside world has the inevitable result of making the extremists more popular in that country. That is a great danger with this sort of thing. We want to give room to the moderate men, to people of good will. There have been some forward steps taken in South Africa but no one ever mentions them. Their system, of course, is iniquitous, but do you bring improvements to the people one wants to help most by ringing them round with a circle of hostile criticism?

I am always a little ill at ease when I hear these criticisms of the majority at the United Nations. I am old enough to remember when majorities in the United Nations General Assembly were good things because they were nearly always controlled by the United States and they were nearly always from Latin America. So it was a great thing to be in the majority. I remember all the work which was done to bring that majority into play to create the State of Israel. But now majorities are considered bad. It is unwise for Canadians to get into that act as to whether a little state is as important as a big one. Does Canada say that being a small province is less valuable than being a big one? There are troubles when one gets into that seeming condescension of criticizing countries which are both small and non-white.

It is strange that there are certain occasions when the majority is damned, but when it comes to Africa we justify our actions by indicating that we are with the majority. An inconsistency such as that troubles me. If I had more time I would wax eloquently and logically as to where that will lead us.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) is getting pretty senior around here, as I am. He spoke about the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, of which I have long been a senior member. If I were in the United States Senate I would be referred to as a ranking member of that committee, and I would have a staff of 100 people. My long-ranking membership here seems to be of no good, except that I am usually told, "You have said that before, Macquarrie".

I agree with what the hon. member said about the usefulness of Senate committees. Whether he is preaching for a call, or I am, I can only say that I have always felt that way about Senate committees. Their work in regard to the Commonwealth Caribbean was absolutely definitive, and they deserve great credit for it. The hon. member was somewhat unfair to our standing committees and to the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) when he suggested that they were not doing enough. Many months were spent on a very serious study concerning aid and development. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona was very accurate when he commented on that. The hon. member was correct when he indicated that there is no proper term of reference; but that is not the fault of the committee, it is the fault of the government.

I am too young to be in my anecdotage, but when the Hon. Paul Martin was secretary of state for external affairs I was the spokesman for foreign policy on this side of the House. We agreed that the ministers' reports would be sent to committee. By doing that, we had an opportunity to examine any issue on the entire global surface of international relations. That should be done now. We need a broader term of reference.

I liked what the hon. member said about the non-partisan approach, but we should not bind ourselves to total non-partisanship. As St. Paul would say, there are times we in the opposition can "shew unto you a more excellent way," and therefore we have the right to disagree. When Canadians travel abroad, they do not kick around the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), nor the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson).

This has been a very excellent debate. If I had not had the guillotine put on me, I was intending to give an excellent lecture on Canada-United States relations. I hope to publish a paper on that soon, and I will send a copy to everyone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intended to deal with a number of subjects, but since I am limited to 15 minutes I will avoid that temptation. I should like to talk about the situation in the Middle East. I talk about that subject not only because it is one of the most important up front subjects in international affairs today, but because I am a Jew and a Zionist.

For the past 35 years that the State of Israel has been in existence, it has been pleasing to note how strongly Canadians support it and its right to existence. That state is supported by Canadians for a number of important reasons. It is recognized that Israel is the historic homeland of Jewish people because they have a special historic claim on it, and also because Jews have been present there for thousands of years. An hon. member opposite suggested that it was a Palestinian state from which the Palestinians had been ejected, which is not true. It was as much a Jewish state as it was a Palestinian state at any time during the recent past. Strong colonies of Jews lived in Israel during the period when it was a trustee territory and during the period when it was a colony. Thus, it is not a Palestinian state.

Canadians support Israel as well because they remember the holocaust and the near destruction of the Jewish people during the Second World War. No one can view that situation without seeing some sense of justice in the result achieved by the Jews in being able to re-establish the Jewish homeland in some small corner of the world. Canadians recognize and appreciate that Israel is a solid democracy, at a time when democratic states are few in number, particularly in the Near East. Israel is a democracy. It shares many institutions with Canada. It has our admiration and respect for that reason.

Israel is watched with interest and respect because of the social experiments which take place there. Even Canada, with its longer history and its vastly different situation economically, socially, and politically, has learned things from the small state of Israel and its willingness to experiment.

Finally the courage of the state of Israel, surrounded as it has been since its formation by hostile neighbours, and the courageous manner in which Israel has conducted itself and protected itself, are respected and admired by Canadians.

The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) indicated that the Arab boycott would end when there was peace in the Middle East. There will be peace in the Middle East when Israel's right to survive is accepted by her neighbours. Israel's enemies would like to argue that peace is being held up because of occupied territory. I remind the House that Israel was facing hostilities and enemies when there was no occupied territory. How can it be argued that it is the occupied territory which is standing in the way of peace? Before there was occupied territory, there was war against the state of Israel. The Palestinian question is raised as a reason why there will not be peace in the Middle East. Before there were any Palestinian refugees, there was war against the state of Israel. Thus it is not the Palestinians and their legitimate aspirations to be settled and cease to be refugees—that is not a fundamental cause of the problem.

Also it is argued that there should be a Palestinian state, and if a Palestinian state were established on the occupied west bank then there would be peace in the Middle East. This has been put forward as an impediment to peace. The west bank belongs to the Arab side. It belonged to them before 1967. If the Palestinians wanted a homeland on the west bank, it could have been established before Israel occupied the territory, before the last two wars were necessary.

None of these alleged problems is the reason for the hostility. The survival of the state of Israel is the issue. The Palestine Liberation Organization claims to represent Palestinians, and if it were willing to acknowledge the right of the state of Israel to survival then there would be peace in the Middle East. As well as the hon. member for Hillsborough, I yearn for peace; but also I should like to make it clear that there could be peace in the Middle East and there could be negotiations with the Palestinians if only the PLO and Israel's other neighbours were prepared to recognize Israel's right to exist. It is because of that, I think, that the Canadian people stand so strongly at the side of Israel and, I am pleased to say, the Government of Canada does so as well. Israel is not referred to by her neighbours as the state of Israel but rather as the Zionist entity. There is an unwillingness after 30 odd years to grant to the state of Israel its designation. But things are changing rapidly.

● (2042)

The Middle East stands today at a crucial crossroad hovering between movement toward peace and movement toward war. The major countries involved in determining the future of the region—Egypt, Jordan and Israel—are showing important signs of moderation and a willingness to negotiate. Other Arab countries—Syria, Iraq, Libya, Algeria, South Yemen—are consolidating an extremist, destructive, negative stance that calls for the destruction of Israel and the continuation of conflict and warfare. At the recent Tripoli conference these latter states, together with the Palestine Liberation Organization, all signed a communique attacking Egypt for its peace initiatives and refusing to do anything that would help bring about peace in the region. On the contrary, those states and the PLO called for the destruction of the "Zionist entity", and, in the words of U.S. President Carter, have thus provided a totally negative response to all the recent positive developments.

The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, a major behind-the-scenes power broker, has kept its views quietly to itself; however, it is generally believed that King Khaled and his advisers support the Egyptian initiative and seek its success. I wish only that the hon. member for Hillsborough would do the same.

Israel has always sought peace with its Arab neighbours, and its prime ministers have always been willing and eager to go anywhere in the world to discuss peace. Every Israeli prime minister has publicly declared his willingness to go to any Arab capital to discuss peace. Thus it did not surprise anyone when Prime Minister Begin made the same offer made by President Sadat only six months earlier. The Egyptian leader stunned the world with his announcement because it represented a major shift in the stance of the major Arab country—a shift from an emphasis on war to one on peace.

At the present time Egypt and Israel are negotiating directly, in a face-to-face manner, at the Cairo conference. In and of itself this represents a vindication, even an initial triumph, of the position taken by the Canadian government under successive secretaries of state for external affairs—and that position was embodied in the texts of UN Security Council resolution 338 of 1973, which incorporated UN Security Council resolution 242 of 1967—a resolution in whose development Canada played a major role. That position to which I refer is the call for direct negotiations between the parties as the only viable and potentially successful form of such talks. The Canadian government has repeatedly said that the breakthroughs that are required would only develop via such a framework, and it may in some way be due to our reiteration of this position that the Egyptian government has come around and accepted this perspective—one, I might add, that Israel has always shared with our government.

In the present context a major destructive element is played by the United Nations. I do not agree with the hon. member of Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) that the right thing to do is to go along with the majority, whatever that majority might want. I would rather agree with the hon. member for Hillsborough that the policy of following the majority for its own sake can only lead to difficulty when the majority takes a swing in a different direction at some subsequent time.

The right thing to do in foreign policy, and in particular in our voting at the United Nations, is to try to take positions on resolutions which correspond with the fundamental moral stance of the Canadian people. I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) that our foreign policy in this country is bi-partisan. It generally happens that the Canadian people know their mind on major foreign issues. I think, in connection with the issue of the Middle East, that it would be indefensible for this government to come forward with a policy of abstaining or of voting with the majority for its own sake. No one expects or would want the government to do that.

I am very pleased that of late our delegation has taken important and strong stances on a number of UN votes, stances of which all Canadians should be proud. In an era when courage of convictions seems to come very cheap and where company in UN votes is often sought at too high a price, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) took a strong and clear position in voting together with Israel, El Salvador, and the United States against a blatantly biased resolution on the situation in the Middle East. This was a resolution which would undermine resolution 242 which has been responsible, I would argue, for laying a foundation upon which Egypt and Israel could meet.

That resolution completely prejudged the outcome of the Middle East negotiations and called for complete Israeli withdrawal from all occupied territory as well as for PLO participation in the peace process. It condemned the continuation of the occupation by Israel, ignoring the basic reason for that continued occupation, the reason I referred to at the outset, the Arab refusal to discuss peace. This is all to the good. Now would certainly have been the wrong time to introduce gratuitous, biased resolutions that would have Israel surrender everything and receive nothing in return. The minister was correct in being irritated by these senseless resolutions, and so will all concerned and aware Canadians. Similarly, in recent votes on even more vicious resolutions on the Palestine question, resolutions that called for the destruction of Israel, Canada stood firm and opposed their passage.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I am all the more happy to take part in this debate that we seldom have the opportunity in this House to discuss our foreign policy. At the same time, I regret that the House generally devotes so little time to the discussion of matters concerning foreign affairs. In doing so Mr. Speaker, we unfortunately give support to the suggestion that among the many government activities, foreign affairs is somehow a marginal area to which attention is called simply in case of parliamentary missions abroad. For many people foreign policy can only be of continuing interest for a few star gazers who cannot see real problems which confront a politician.

Mr. Speaker, is view of this unfortunately widespread attitude in political circles, it is no wonder that Canadians in general see very little importance in the foreign policy of their country. I believe that the House should set an example and bear witness to the vital nature of our international relations by once a year setting aside at least two or three days to debate the foreign policy of the government.

Mr. Speaker, that a government should establish realtions with as many countries as possible or participate in the activities of various international institutions, is certainly not a luxury. On the contrary, it is the government's duty to contribute to the establishment of harmonious relations between all countries of the world and, hence, to safeguard world peace, without which everything is meaningless because, Mr. Speaker, what good would it be to eradicate unemployment in this country, to stabilize prices, to ensure material security for all Canadians or to make the country more united if we were to wake up tomorrow in a world faced with a nuclear holocaust? We should not kid ourselves, if a major world war should break out, it would be extremely difficult not to use the ultimate weapon.

Mr. Speaker, there is a great number of questions relating to international relations that have direct impact upon Canadians' day-to-day lives, but none can evidently match disarmament in importance. Since the end of World War II, the destructive capacity of nuclear weapons has steadily increased, both in quantity and quality. Moreover, the risk of proliferation of these weapons is greater than ever. We also see a disturbing proliferation and an ever greater degree of sophistication of conventional weapons. In short, although eight international multilateral agreements have been concluded since 1960 and although a dozen other bilateral agreements between Soviet Union and the United States have also been signed, the arms race is nevertheless gaining momentum. The world military expenditure, established in 1960 at $100 billion annually, have escalated to $400 billion a year, a situation all the more revolting and absurd that there are so many developing countries taking part in this foolish race, at the expense of the well-being of their own people.

Furthermore when we consider that the two superpowers actually have the military capability to kill over 100 billion human beings and that 40 per cent of all research and development expenditures in the world are used for military purposes, one question comes to mind: is man the reasonable animal described by ancient philosophers? Mr. Speaker, it is rather discouraging to see that the pace at which the various ongoing negotiations are progressing is such that it cannot match the pace of the frightening progress made by military technology.

According to experts, the world is about to konw a real explosion, a real revolution I should say as far as new nuclear and conventional weapons are concerned and this, in a context where nuclear proliferation and terrorism are also becoming more and more threatening. Mr. Speaker, having said this, the nations of the world should put a good deal of hope in the special session of the general assembly of the United Nations on disarmament which is to be held next spring. As sponsor of the resolution asking for this special session, Canada will have to bring an original and positive contribution.

Having renounced a long time ago all desire to belong to the nuclear club, although it had the capability, our country enjoys in this area a sort of moral authority which permits it to demonstrate a leadership which unfortunately escaped it some 15 years ago, except of course in the area of nuclear arm non-proliferation, for it is a well known fact, Mr. Speaker, that Canada was one of the first countries to decide last year to export its nuclear technology only to countries which agreed to submit their whole nuclear programs to international controls.

Mr. Speaker, as it is important for Canadian parliamentarians to contribute to the drafting of the policy which the Canadian delegation will support during this special session of the General Assembly of the United Nations, I suggested recently the setting up of a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, a subcommittee which would hear expert opinions on the disarmament issue and report to the House on the position Canada should adopt before the United Nations on this occasion. Therefore I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will realize the importance of such an initiative and that the House will authorize without any further delay the establishment of this subcommittee which already has the approval of many of my colleagues from both sides of the House, including the Chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence—

Mr. Prud'homme: I support this idea wholeheartedly.

Mr. Duclos: who is telling us that he supports this idea wholeheartedly.

Mr. Speaker, among the other issues that might directly affect the life and welfare of Canadians, one is certainly the Middle East issue. Talking about this, we must remember how concerned all Canadians were at the time of the last conflict between Israel and the Arabs in the fall of 1973. In this respect, it is to be hoped that in the future our country will never again be in such an embarrassing position and that its neutrality in this conflict will be so obvious that, should the conflict flare up again, which of course I and all others hope would not happen, we will not have to be afraid of finding ourselves cut off from our oil supplies.

It is always touchy, Mr. Speaker, to deal with a matter so fraught with emotions and involving a country with which many Canadians have special ties and of which they can rightfully be proud. Moreover, special care and caution must be exercised in dealing with this matter since for the first time peace does not seem to be out of reach any more in the Middle East.

Israel being the only truly democratic state in the Middle East, it is only natural that Canadians in general feel quite sympathetic toward it. However, it is also quite natural that occasionally Canada has to show amicable disagreement over certain policies of that state. Indeed, it is fundamental that the Canadian policy on the situation in the Middle East be first dictated by the interests of Canada and by a desire to help establish peace in the world. I am happy to note that over the years the Canadian policy is more and more characterized by objectiveness and neutrality, but unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, it still happens that positions endorsed by the United Nations general assembly seem to spring from considerations that have very little to do with the contents of the resolutions we have to decide upon.

There is now a lingering hope of peace in the Middle East, but we must not entertain any illusions, as has been indicated by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). While it is important that the fundamental right of the state of Israel to exist within safe borders be recognized, it is also important to give satisfaction to the legitimate interests of Palestinians and to obtain their full involvement in any negotiations concerning their future as a community. Any hope of a final and definitive solution of the Middle East issue will be an illusion unless it is decided to establish a homeland or some territorial framework enabling Palestinians to assert themselves politically.

I think it is up to the Palestinians themselves to decide whether their homeland should have complete political autonomy or whether it should be part of a larger political entity of a federal or confederal nature. Mr. Speaker, I was extremely pleased to learn about the Government of Canada's new policy toward South Africa and its policy of apartheid. I want to congratulate the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs who has been responsible for those major changes in our foreign policy. I always believe that it was not enough to denounce racism, but that it was also necessary to express in a tangible way our disgust at any policy denying human dignity, even though certain sacrifices had to be made. The steps announced yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs are a very appropriate extension of the policy statements which up to now Canada, with a few exceptions, had found satisfactory and I am sure the government will have the support of a majority of Canadians in the implementation of those measures.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal briefly with a matter about which I feel very strongly, the human rights issue. Canada, in due time, did condemn countries like Chile which are guilty of human rights violations, more particularly at the UN General Assembly. I am surprised, however, that international financial institutions which had somehow starved President Allende's leftist regime, should show new generosity since the coming to power of the military junta of the bloodthirsty dictator Pinochet and that Canada's representatives within those international institutions should support such a position. For example, I would mention that the World Bank withheld any economic assistance to Chile in the years 1971, 1972 and 1973, but that country received $13, $20 and $33 million from the World Bank in 1974, 1975 and 1976. The Inter-American Development Bank provided Chile with $158 million worth of economic assistance in the years 1974 and 1975 when that assistance had only reached $7 million in 1972 and 1973. I do not agree that we should not make moral judgments and that economic decisions should only be made based on the credit worthiness of the countries involved. I hope in that respect that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will soon be able to have a surprise for this House as beautiful as the magnificent Christmas present he offered us yesterday in the form of our policy toward South Africa.

[English]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of good things about being on the backbenches—I will start with the first one—especially if you have been on the backbenches for quite a while because you get a feeling of déjà vu—of having been through this thing before.

I recall in 1965 when Walter Gordon, a great and good man, was minister of finance. He spoke to some of us privately about what he was going to do with Time and Reader's Digest. He said they were not going to get away with things. But somehow or other he was not able to persuade his cabinet colleagues of the wisdom of that policy and when he introduced legislation regarding magazines, Time and Reader's Digest were exempted. Since he could not take care of that kind of situation I would not have minded if he had left it at that, but he was not satisfied to do so. He dragged out poor Lord Thomson and made him the butt of everything that was evil in the publishing industry.

I feel tonight as I did then. I never thought I would rise to come to the defence of Lord Thomson, nor did I think I would ever rise to come to the defence of South Africa. The same kind of hypocrisy, the same kind of cheap morality, and the same kind of double standard, however, have been foisted on this House not only by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) but by spokesmen of this side of the House.

When we look around the world and see the kind of evil that is manifest in country after country, to single out South Africa as the object of our new found morality is too much. It is just too much. It shows how much a tool this country has become of those forces in the United Nations. Foreign policy is not made on Sussex Street any more; foreign policy is made in New York on behalf of the United Nations, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, like Walter Gordon, a great and good man privately, now becomes a kind of mouthpiece.

There was a time when I would have been proud, as an early supporter of the United Nations and of the League of Nations before it, to have found myself in harmony with the United Nations and its resolutions, but not any more. I cannot feel that way when I see the kind of double standards that exist in the United Nations. Things used to be simple for us reformers.

Things were black or white. It was simple even to the extent that the white was always bad and the black was always good. It is no longer that simple; it is no longer clear that being poor makes you always right and being rich makes you always wrong when it comes to nations.

I do not see that the former colonies, the ones that have achieved independence since World War II, are exercising any more superior morality than the regimes they succeeded.

When I think of some of the things that have been done in Uganda—and there has hardly been an action on the part of this government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Saltsman: Have we withdrawn our commissioners from Uganda? Do we cut them off?

Mr. Jamieson: No.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Come on! You have never been there.

Mr. Saltsman: When I think of the atrocities that have been recorded in Chile, and consider the cheap shot we have taken at South Africa—it is a cheap shot. After all, what harm is it going to do South Africa? What harm is it going to do Canada? That is cheap morality. It is not going to cost very much. As just one indication, our exports to South Africa total under $100 million, of which less than 10 per cent was financed by the Export Development Corporation. Imports from South Africa were about $140 million last year. That trade pattern is not going to change very much because South Africa is not dependent on our export financing. We are not going to lose much business as a result of this great burst of moral fervour.

Let us look at what is happening in Chile. The Bank of Nova Scotia is participating in loans amounting to $360 million to the Chilean government. The loans are meant to finance a Chilean government-owned steel complex, an iron ore mining and industrialization program, foreign debt payments, and various other things. But there is not a word against Chile. Because it is a respected member of the United Nations there has been no condemnation.

Mr. Jamieson: Last week.

Mr. Saltsman: Withdraw our ambassador then. Do to Chile what is being done to South Africa. I have nothing against morality if the minister wants to be moral, but this is typical. I want to know the rationale for the sudden burst of this nice nellyism of ours. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) at least is consistent. He does business with everybody and says that as far as morality is concerned we will just close our eyes and not worry about it. That, at least, is consistent. I may not agree with it but I can understand it.

When the Prime Minister rose during question period today and tried to explain to the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) how he makes the distinction regarding South Africa so that South Africa is singled out, the Prime Minister in his own words said, "I know murder, mayhem and all the rest is going on in other countries, but we do it to South Africa because South Africa has technically, legally, constitutionally, apartheid in its system." He is like Professor Higgins when he talked about the French—they really don't care what they do, just how they pronounce it. The fact that people are being murdered in Chile does not count because it is not in their constitution to murder people in prison. In South Africa it counts. That is really what I find so offensive. If we are going to tackle this let us do it with an even hand. There is an argument to be made for morality. I do not underestimate morality but why do things in this particular way? We can only be suspicious of this easy, cheap way of getting off by showing the moral superiority of the government.

The minister knows, and examples have been brought to his attention, of Canadian companies that are being blacklisted and blackmailed in the Middle East. Yet there has not been a word of public condemnation of this kind of action. I can understand them not wanting to publish it. I am reluctant even to raise the question because the people involved are so frightened. They have reason to be frightened. They can be made or broken by this kind of black-list, yet the government on whom they depend and rely does not have the courage to stand on their behalf and take some action.

If I use strong language like cowardice, it is because I do not know what other language to use to describe what is going on. I listened to this debate meander all over the place with everybody saying nice things. It is an advantage of a backbencher that you do not have to be nice and you do not have to say nice things. In fact, things are neither nice nor clear. The government can always say it is only a backbencher sounding off.

I suspect that some of the sentiments I am echoing probably more closely reflect the way people in this country feel that the noble sentiments of the minister, certainly the decision that he is going to make an example of South Africa. One can only come to the conclusion that the example is purely political in scope.

Mr. Jamieson: Shame! Small! Cheap!

Mr. Saltsman: The minister can say that if he wishes. I can understand that he feels very strongly about it.

Mr. Jamieson: Shocking!

Mr. Saltsman: I will not take exception as I have said some strong things as well.

Mr. Jamieson: You certainly have.

Mr. Saltsman: As the minister knows, I am not normally in this kind of mood. However, I do not feel proud of the kind of program and the kind of foreign affairs policy that has been presented to this House in the last couple of days. I do not see the kind of distinction that the minister and his department make on this issue.

There are others who wish to speak who feel as strongly as I feel about this issue. However, I did want to raise it tonight, even though the language is considerably in excess of the language I usually use. I want to say that the government is wrong, it is in an indefensible position and is not being morally courageous and morally correct in what it is doing.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the minister on his delivery yesterday. Through an hour and a half of that golden voice I was almost led to believe that he was part of the heavenly chorus of this season of the year and we had truly peace on earth. However, under the glittering tinsel of the golden voice was a pretty shabby tree that had been tinselled up for the occasion. There was no smell of frankincense or myrrh about it, but the reek of a double standard.

I was driven to look at the New York speech of the minister. I was particularly struck by the opening there where he had the pleasure of welcoming two new members to the assembly, the Republic of Djibouti and the Socialist Republic of Vietnam. My mind went back about two and a half years ago when something called the Republic of South Vietnam was set up and recognized by this government with indecent haste. It disappeared as one of the most ephemeral governments ever to exist on the face of the earth, now incorporated into the Socialist Republic; no vote of the people, no majority rule, no one man one vote there. No mention of the boat people who find it necessary to risk their lives in open boats to reach Australia or some other sanctuary and are doing that at the cost of enormous suffering.

I am sure he got through that welcome without for a moment losing his smile, and his crash course in diplomacy has provided him with that.

As we prepared for this debate, I noticed that the Ottawa Citizen came out with a major article entitled "Canada's Shiny Image Tarnished at U.N." written by Azhar Ali Khan. As usual it lists the standard litany of left wing causes that we apparently backed in past years and ones that would bring the praise of the entire world for doing so. I have not time to list them all tonight, but they are there.

It also takes after the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). Here is one place I do not agree with them. I would like to praise the minister at this time for at least bringing a breath of fresh air into the United Nations General Assembly.

In spite of that, the author of the article says it was a scathing attack and an unexpected tirade. He even said it was reminiscent of former U.S. ambassador Patrick Moynihan. That did make me smile a little. Certainly compared to the polished harpoons of Moynihan with their explosive charges, it was bit of squid jigging that went on in the United Nations that afternoon.

The important thing is that, even as mild and meek as the minister's reprimands were at the United Nations, they landed on him. He was landed on with enormous weight as though he had done irreparable damage to the cause of Canada by pointing out that those carefully drafted resolutions on Israel and South Africa were a waste of time, repetitive, and bringing the assembly into disrepute.

The hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) picked up this enormous urge of the press and of some people that we should always be popular at the United Nations. I am glad the minister found the courage to vote and to join a handful of countries; Canada, the United States, Israel and El Salvador. It was about time that we ceased the pattern of abstention on outrageous resolutions before the United Nations. The problem with the continual abstention is that it adds to the fiction that there is a moral world community. We have heard that expression. The minister uses it himself. It is as if there was a commonality of interest displayed at the United Nations with which we can safely go along almost all of the time when no such thing exists.

There is no peace in this world and a great danger. When Moynihan said we were assailed, meaning the United States, but it would apply to us, because we were democracies and because we were right it is true. That is the enemy totalitarian forces on either side, be they communist or be they fascist on the other side, and they exist in this world. The kind of democracy we have in this country is open to attack at all times.

I wonder if we are as vigilantly on guard against extraterritoriality when the threat is from Arab states as we were when it was from Americans and we wanted to trade with Cuba. That, of course, is one of the left wing issues that is held up as a marvellous high point in Canadian external affairs. Of course nothing is said after the passage of time about what has grown out of that and the position of Cuba in the world today.

I was struck by lines in the minister's speech to the effect that this is the thirty-third Christmas without a global conflict. Again one was almost lulled into the thought that peace had arrived. However, there are wars going on in this world. They are dirty and miserable wars. There is one in Ethiopia versus Somalia, and versus Eritrea and goodness knows who all else. It brings back haunting memories to one such as myself who is old enough to remember that earlier war in Ethiopia that the world tried to ignore when Mussolini's Italy invaded it. Now that country is in agony again. Who is there to complain now? Who can name the dead? Who can number them, either in Addis Abbaba or elsewhere? The conscience of the world is less bothered. I know that this country is less concerned about Ethiopia now than it was in 1935 at its most isolationist stage.

There is a war going on in Morocco and Mauritania. Who will name the dead there? Who will number them? We probably would not have heard about it at all had the French apparently not strayed into that the other day. It suddenly became newsworthy once it was not confined only to African countries.

There is another war going on in Angola. There we have some names and we can bring them to the attention of this House. Let me quote Betty Bridgman, repatriated missionary from Angola. She said this:

● (2122)

On June 1 we rose to find Cuban and government soldiers had invaded the hospital and a neighboring village. They rounded up all the mem of every age and marched half of them away. Then they lined them up and shot and killed 16, leaving their bodies for their families to find the next day. One of those killed was Frederico Kacuku, one of our senior nurses, a gentle and peaceloving man, who had spent his life relieving the suffering of others. Another was Eduardo Morim, the carpenter who made artificial limbs for the amputees at the hospital. One old man was nearly 80, and he was killed along with his son who left a family of small children.

I know that Steve Biko is mourned, and rightly so because of his youth and ability and because of the loss of a person who might have made a difference in South Africa. But who will mourn Jonas Zavimbi when and if he is hunted down in Angola and destroyed? He was a leader who grew out of the work of this country in that land but was abandoned by the western world when Cuba moved in. I still wonder what it is about that state that permits it to supply mercenaries for the rest of the world without criticism on the world scene.

I wonder how the minister could have got through that section of his speech on South Africa yesterday knowing that our handling of native affairs in this land has been almost an unmitigated disaster from beginning to end. It seems to me that one of the qualifications for any Secretary of State for External Affairs in this country is that he first serve a year in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as minister. If he had to wrestle week in and week out with the problems of that department, I do not believe he would be able to speak as sanctimoniously as the minister did yesterday.

I was very much concerned to hear the minister promise peacekeeping forces. He said that if he thought conditions and the time were ripe he would send them to Rhodesia, and that the same was true with Namibia. This reminds me of a warning from the Times of London, whose reporter filed his story from Johannesburg. Speaking of South West Africa he has this to say:

Strategists believe that the Ovambo homeland which faces the border could be overrun in 48 hours if the South African army pulled out.

I do not believe that this nation knows what is being promised on our behalf, as we seem willing and prepared to move into situations about which we know little, where the danger is enormous and where the results could divide this nation. It seems to me it was a former prime minister, Mr. Meighen, who made the mistake of saying "Ready, aye ready" many years ago when intervening in a dispute a long way from here. It is startling to find a minister of this government, this late in the day, saying virtually the same thing, that he is ready to become involved in a situation which can bring no good to this country nor to South West Africa. No encouragement should be given the United Nations to continue its rather insane adventure in that part of the world.

Trade measures were mentioned. It is just unbelievable that the trade representatives in Johannesburg and Pretoria are to be withdrawn when there has been a large mission from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce sent to Indonesia, including a representative of the Export Development Bank, particularly in view of the Amnesty International report. Amnesty International has had tough things to say about South Africa. It has drawn the attention of the world to that country for many years. However, speaking of Indonesia, Amnesty has this to say:

The unchanging pattern of political imprisonment in Indonesia presents the gravest challenge to the concept of international responsibility for human rights.

They put it beyond South Africa.

In no other country of the world are so many political prisoners held without trial for so many years as in the Republic of Indonesia.

That is but one excerpt from a lengthy report. Our representatives have just spent five days in that country discussing Canada's participation in a billion dollar project, a coal mining operation, I am sure the announcement will come early in the new year—yet we have the nerve—to withdraw our representatives from South Africa. Again one wonders where is the logic in the approach we are taking.

Then again today during the question period there was the warning of continued co-operation with and loans to Cuba. Why should we finance that government so long as it is maintaining its forces in Angola? The same reporter in the United Church Observer says that her impression is that there is now more oppression than ever there was under the Portuguese in their day. I cannot believe that we can still be engaged in financing Cuba in any operation there.

There is a terrible selectivity to the approach of this government to external affairs. I find it remarkable that there is no mention in this report of the return of parliamentary democracy under a constitutional monarchy to Spain. There is a miracle of the modern world—that that nation could go from the dictatorship of Francisco Franco to a parliamentary democracy modelled much like ours without any intervening civil war. Surely our government could have taken note of that at the first opportunity, because it serves as a reminder to us that the system we have is not all that bad. I suspect one of the reasons it is not mentioned, and one of the reasons why an earlier motion of mine was turned back by that side of the House, is that it indicates the usefulness and importance of the constitutional monarchy in a country which has deep and important divisions.

Although I find some things to praise in the minister's speech I hope the minister will take a more realistic attitude in the United Nations, in spite of the evils of apartheid. We are trading with nations we treat as partners. We are welcome there and we welcome them and trade with them. We know that their prisons are crowded with political prisoners, this happens all over the world. But why should we single out just one or two nations? The problem with the United Nations is that their resolutions now single out only two nations, Israel and South Africa, and the fiction is created, aided and abetted by this government, that somehow the world community as a moral force is united in its condemnation of those two nations. I do not believe that we should put ourselves in the position of continuing to contribute to that sort of nonsense. Until such time as we have solved the problems in this country—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity of debating, along with other members of the House, Canada's stand on various international relations and to hear so many members speak on these matters with such enthusiasm and interest. It is regrettable that we cannot have such debates more frequently, as we do not have the forum that we have here in the House of Commons in the Standing Committee on National Defence and External Affairs. However, I hope things will improve in the future.

This debate on Canada's international relations is very timely. It comes not one day too soon as we follow with amazement the swift pace of the historic negotiations between Israel and Egypt in this last month of 1977 as well as the progress of another history-making meeting which is now taking place in Belgrade which is reviewing the implementation of the commitments contained in the Helsinki Final Act and the conclusion of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

In saying this I do not discount the importance of the war between Ethiopia and Somalia, as well as other wars and upheavals in many parts of Africa which are heating up each passing day. We must not forget the people who have lost their lives in these wars and upheavals and we must not fail to speak out, as these tragedies are tremendous ones. Canada, as a member of NATO and the Commonwealth, has a particular interest and concern in these grave developments.

Economics dominated the international scene last year. The economic situation has important implications for Canada whose growth depends a great deal on international trade and co-operation. It is to the credit of the federal government that we are making great efforts to work for an orderly and equitable evolution of the international economic system, for example, by participating in the Conference of International Economic Co-operation and expanding its development assistance program. The possibility of an interdependent world order based on peaceful relations and justice depends upon collective action in a world which inexorably is becoming smaller, more populated and increasingly industrialized.

We must, however, face hard facts and come to terms with the real world. The explosion of east-west trade and money-lending by western banks has generated not only opportunities for profit, but also problems of debtor-creditor relations. Debt servicing difficulties encountered by east European and other borrowers is only one aspect of these problems. Prudent foresight is necessary if we are to avoid an international market and banking breakdown. I hope Canada and its partners will work co-operatively to help resolve this problem without delay. This trade and lending explosion developed in the atmosphere of détente.

For this reason, as well as for others, we must also review the development of this détente especially as it has affected compliance or non-compliance with the commitments undertaken in the Helsinki Final Act. This is what the Belgrade review meeting of the Helsinki Final Act is all about. The major and most popular subject of this meeting is the need to respect human rights. The world-wide trend to assert individual and collective aspirations has produced human rights movements which must not be ignored. This trend carries significant implications for east-west relations, and in particular for NATO-Warsaw Pact relations and relations within the Commonwealth.

Having observed the Canadian delegation working at the Belgrade meeting, I can report to this House that Canada's stand on human rights in particular is being clearly and courageously expounded and upheld. Our team is on the offensive and is bringing to task those signatory countries that have violated their commitments and are suppressing human rights principles enshrined in the Helsinki Final Act and in other human rights covenants and declarations as well as in many modern constitutions, including those of the Soviet Union and the east European countries.

Furthermore, the Helsinki Final Act recognizes the collective rights of peoples to self-determination and equal status in the international community as well as freedom of religious belief and practice. Western advocacy of respect for human rights must be intensified and apply equally to all countries, not just on a selective basis; it must arise from our genuine appreciation of the intrinsic value of each human being and from our conviction that respect for human rights is the best guarantee for peace.

The pursuit of justice in international relations transcends every other obligation. Unfortunately, the Charter of the United Nations has been breached many times. We sadly recall the invasion of our sister Commonwealth country, Cyprus. Last month, both the UN Security Council and the General Assembly spoke in favour of an early and just solution of the Cyprus question. Because the members of the United Nations are obligated by these resolutions, I urge Canada, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), to pursue their implementation vigorously. The people of Cyprus stand on the side of legality and justice. They demand not just sympathy, not just judicial endorsement of their rights, but action.

As in the case of Cyprus and that of many other unfortunate countries where human rights are being violated, we, most fortunate among the countries of the world, are challenged for the sake of justice and peace. In facing this challenge we support the efforts of Canada's representatives under the leadership of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the hope that a rule of justice will bring in true and lasting peace.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday this debate got under way with a very remarkable speech by the minister, who offered us the hope that this debate could be conducted on a level which would enhance Canada's standing in international affairs. Unfortunately some of the speakers who followed sort of spoiled the possibilities that this debate presented in that regard.

Before I turn to the main theme of my remarks I should like to draw the attention of the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) to the fact that the minister did more than mention Spain in his speech. He went to Spain last month on an official visit to that country—the first visit of a Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs to Spain. In my judgment that is more significant than mentioning a country in a speech. I should like, also, to express the regret felt by some of my hon. friends that they did not have an opportunity to take part in this debate.

[Translation]

I particularly wish to mention my colleague from Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), the chairman of the committee on external affairs and national defence, who asked me to add his name to the list of speakers. He would have liked also to make his contribution and state some arguments which are worth listening to. I also regret that some of my colleagues who were well prepared and ready to take part in this debate were unfortunately unable to make their contribution for lack of time.

[English]

I should like to begin by expressing Canada's regard for a most important group of nations, the Commonwealth countries. Canada remains strongly attached to the Commonwealth and confirms the positive role it can play in world affairs. It continues to evolve as a valuable association of equal, sovereign states which have voluntarily agreed to consult and co-operate in a uniquely flexible and pragmatic manner. Combining 36 countries of different races, languages, cultures and states of economic development from all parts of the world, it reflects accurately the world's current major problems and provides a forum in which consultation, co-operation, and consensus have been developed to a high degree. The Commonwealth has played an important role in a wide variety of political, economic, and social problems of international concern, including that of disparity between rich and poor nations.

The Commonwealth heads of government, meeting in London last June, directed their discussion to major world and Commonwealth trends. A major topic was the situation in southern Africa. They reaffirmed their full support for the struggle in Zimbabwe and Namibia and for the demands of the oppressed in South Africa. They recognized the need to increase the reasons available to broaden Commonwealth programs of humanitarian and technical assistance in that area.

● (2142)

Another major topic was the world economic situation in the light of the results of the North-South Conference and the London Economic Summit. Discussion included the final report of the Commonwealth Group of Experts, which has made a significant contribution to international efforts to evolve a new economic order with particular emphasis on the problems of developing countries. Heads of government indicated that the Commonwealth has a useful role to play in achieving a global consensus in economic affairs, and considered how it could assist in specific problems such as commodities, energy, food production, trade and finance.

Other topics discussed included the Middle East, Cyprus, the Law of the Sea, human rights, and a review of the large number of functional areas in which Commonwealth co-operation is carried on through the Commonwealth Secretariat and related institutions.

Believing as it does in the ideals and the consensus approach of the Commonwealth, Canada plays an active role in its major ongoing economic and social programs. These are largely co-ordinated through the Commonwealth Secretariat in London and designed particularly to assist developing countries. The Commonwealth Secretary-General said that the Commonwealth has one fourth of the world's people, but it has nearly one half of the world's poor. This adds to Canada's responsibilities.

In pursuing its Commonwealth role, Canada also reinforces its commitment to the broader world community and the ideals of the United Nations. It is also of interest and gratification to Canada that the Commonwealth now includes two other members that also participate in La Francophonie, namely, the governments of Mauritius and the Seychelles.

I should like to turn to the question of disarmament. The hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) asked what initiatives Canada will be taking at the United Nations special session on disarmament. Also they asked what arrangements were being made for participation by members of parliament and other interested Canadians at the session. The definitive Canadian position for the special session remains to be developed in the next few months, and it is the subject of intensive study. However, even at this preparatory stage Canada has already submitted a number of action-oriented proposals relating to the special session. These have included the establishment, under the auspices of the United Nations Secretary General, of an international register of arms transfers to which all member states of the United Nations should submit full information; a conference between both recipients and suppliers to restrain such transfers on a regional basis; regional arms control conferences to deal with local arms races through agreed measures of restraint; and the holding of a follow-up special session at an unspecified interval to review progress in the specific targets to be set by this special session.

It is not expected that the delegation to the special session will be chosen until a month or so before the session begins. In the meantime contacts and consultations are under way with Canadian experts, non-governmental organizations and private individuals concerned about disarmament questions.

The hon. member for Greenwood expressed some apprehension as to the development and the production of the neutron bomb. Perhaps I should indicate that Canada has spoken out in regard to the neutron bomb. The government was asked what position Canada was taking in NATO on the neutron bomb. While Canada has no plans to acquire such weapons, we have been participating in discussions at NATO headquarters in Brussels regarding the possible acquisition by certain NATO countries of enhanced radiation reduced-blast nuclear weapons. These discussions are continuing. The military usefulness of the weapon is not in question but, like our allies, Canada is also conscious that its possible acquisition raises very complex questions which must be examined with utmost care. Any decision regarding these weapons will not be taken lightly.

I believe the hon. Leader of the Opposition, as well as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), raised questions concerning the maritime boundaries negotiations. In their remarks they stated that the Canadian public has not been made aware of the scope of the maritime boundaries negotiations, and that Canadian fishermen, as the most vitally interested constituency, have been denied input with respect to the bilateral negotiations.

The Department of External Affairs, in a press release on October 21, 1977, published the entire text of the Joint Report by Chief Negotiators on Canada/United States Maritime Boundaries and Related Resource Issues, signed by Ambassadors Marcel Cadieux of Canada and Lloyd N. Cutler of the United States, together with annexes on the principles for a joint fisheries commission to be established by a convention between Canada and the United States, and the proposed principles for offshore hydrocarbon shared-access zones.

A subsequent departmental release of November 28 announced the extension of the negotiators' mandates to January 31, 1978, noting that the extra period would permit careful review of the elements involved in the negotiations, for example, management and sharing of fish stocks off both coasts, hydrocarbon sharing arrangements in maritime boundary areas and delimitation of maritime boundaries. The release went on to say that additional time is also required to ensure consultation with and participation by industry, state, provincial, congressional and other interests of the two countries.

From the start the Canadian negotiating team has made every effort to ensure that the fishing industry has been fully and regularly consulted at every stage of the negotiations. Most recently at an east coast fisheries meeting in Boston, from November 28 to December 2, and at a west coast meeting in Vancouver from December 6 to 8, Ambassador Cadieux and his officials held lengthy and extensive consultations with representatives of a wide variety of industry interests. I have a list of 32 interested industries that have been invited to attend those negotiations.

Mr. Speaker, I might give some more information about the involvement of the Canadian government as regards French-speaking countries. I wish to add to what the minister said on another aspect of our foreign policy, the French-speaking countries and the fifth general assembly of its main institution, the Agency for Cultural and Technical Co-operation which has just taken place in Abidjan, Ivory Coast.

The French-speaking countries are an essential element of our international relations because, Mr. Speaker, they are the natural outside extension of French Canada's vitality and culture. It is also a very useful area of international co-operation. That is why the Canadian government has played a paramount part in the establishment and development of the agency and of ministerial conferences in the areas of education, youth and sports. This is why as well we have facilitated the development of the agency and its programs of training and cultural, educational and technical exchanges, as well as their extension to the scientific field and economic co-operation, two very important areas for the young developing French-speaking countries

From the very beginning, Quebec, New Brunswick, Ontario and Manitoba have contributed to the work of the agency through federal government participation. It was with our help that as early as 1971 Quebec obtained the status of a participating government, and was able to participate very actively in the works of the agency, in co-operation with the federal government. We had given our support to the granting of such status, precisely for governments of federal countries like ours and we consider that such arrangements give evidence of the capabilities of the federal system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I feel that speaking at this time in the debate before we adjourn for the Christmas recess in my chosen profession it would be more appropriate it I were to announce the benediction rather than offer any remarks with respect to the issue that is before us in terms of the motion.

I doubt whether in my time as a member of parliament I have ever debated a motion which offered as much possibility to literally cover the world horizon as has this particular motion. In the course of the two day debate we have covered enough different opinions and enough of the areas of international conflict and contact to realize that, as the minister himself said in his closing remarks, in the words of Dickens I think, "It was the best of times and it was the worst of times." In some ways that is partially a description of this debate.

We have heard some encouraging words and some discouraging words. In fact I think in almost every speech that was delivered in the House in the past two days we have received both encouragement and discouragement. That was evident in the tempo and mood of the debate in the opening day, in first, the comments of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), who is not here, inadvertently, I suspect, in his answer to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) with respect to the Export Development Corporation. It was evident also in the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) who, interestingly enough, stepped from the portfolio of industry, trade and commerce into external affairs.

Encapsuled in their remarks, and as picked up by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) today, we have the essential conflict that is at the root of so much of the difficulties we face as a country and as the world. It is the conflict of the question of crass politics or economic interests as against the higher levels of mankind with respect to questions of morality and altruism. None of us can claim to be disinterested in either aspect of that debate. Certainly when the Secretary of State for External Affairs introduced the new initiatives that were to be taken with respect to South Africa which he described as the most clear cut case of specific institutionalized discrimination, many members on all sides could agree. In the context of what has happened at the United Nations since its establishment in 1945 there has come to be a unanimity of opinion with respect to the total abhorrence for institutionalized racial discrimination.

However, what is not so clear, and what came out in the course of questioning earlier today and in some comments over the past two days, is that increasingly we are called upon to make moral decisions with respect to economic and political activity. This should not be surprising to anybody in the House if we look at the major conferences at which the United Nations has focused its attention over the past five to ten years on questions of environment, population, food and habitation, and the last two special sessions on developing a new international economic order. It is fair to say that in each of these instances we were dealing with technological problems, historical problems, and problems related to our own ability to cope with developments in the world community. But I think in the final analysis, when we look at any one of these problems, we realize that whether we would make progress with respect to them really depended on political will.

Recently in speaking to another group I was tempted to suggest that in all the ages of mankind which we have been experiencing in the past few centuries, from the age of steam and the age of steel to the nuclear age, perhaps future historians will look at the period of the late 1960s and 1970s and describe these times not so much as the age of technology or computerization, or as the nuclear age, but rather as the age of morality.

Certainly if we look at the most powerful country in the world led by the new Carter administration, the leading edge of their activity in the international field has to do with accepting some form of moral responsibility. In a way this is what the minister touched upon in his speech, and to the degree that it is a moral responsibility, which we take without hypocrisy and in a genuine attempt to let the world know, and specifically let the authorities in South Africa know, that the system of apartheid is no longer acceptable in the world community, we support him in that initiative. To the degree, however, that it may not, or in some way may touch upon more difficulties for those who are presently suffering from discrimination and from the kind of deliberate or accidental economic and social disparity which exists in these countries, we will need to be more convinced that our approach will be consistent and, in the final analysis, just.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

I, as one individual, welcome the opportunity to debate the matters that have been brought before us today. If I had more time in this debate I would have wanted to talk about the importance of the upcoming UN session on disarmament. Quite frankly I had hoped that the minister, in his quite long address yesterday, might have touched in more detail on what our position was going to be with respect to that assembly. In the time I spent at the United Nations this fall it was not easy to discover whether or not we would either be joining other initiatives with like minded countries or whether we would be taking some initiatives ourselves with regard to this important special assembly next May and June.

I had hoped we could have paid more attention to what is now a new perception on the world food question. Since the World Food Conference met three years ago there have been a number of major changes regarding our understanding on how we are going to solve world food needs, and when we talk about human rights there is no more important and basic human right than the right to a daily nutritious diet.

These are matters that cannot be dealt with in the context of a two-day debate, but I hope the final remarks of the Leader of the Opposition urging a consistent and continuing reference to the major committee which has served this House, namely, the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, will be taken seriously by the minister and by other members of the cabinet.

If Canada is to play an increasingly responsible and constructive role in the world community it will not be seen to be just a matter of debate once every 17 years of a general nature as we have had in the last two days, but the government will accept, with the support of all members in the House, a continuous and perhaps a deepened responsibility in the realm of that committee. A number of members of the committee—the former chairman has just spoken—in the experience they have given to that committee have shown that it can play a responsible role for this parliament and for the Canadian people. If that suggestion alone is acted upon, this debate will have achieved a good deal in terms of Canada's responsible performance in the world community.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as the last point of order in 1977 there are two matters which I would like to raise. First I wish to extend to you and your colleagues in the chair, to the clerks at the table as well as members of the staff of this House of Commons who serve us so well, every good wish for Christmas and for the new year on behalf of all members of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): My second point, Mr. Speaker, is much more mundane. I should like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council

(Mr. Pinard) what legislation we will be dealing with when this House resumes its sittings in January.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the Leader of the Official Opposition to extend our best wishes to the Speaker, to all his assistants, to the whole staff as well as to all my colleagues on both sides of the House. When we meet again, on January 23 of next year, we should proceed to the consideration of Bill C-16, an Act to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, and of Bill C-18 amending the Anti-inflation Act. For the time being, that is the order of business when we return to the House in 1978.

● (2202)

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we thank the parliamentary secretary for indicating the business that we will be starting off with in 1978, but may I join with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the parliamentary secretary in the very warm Christmas greetings which have been extended to you, Sir, to your family, to the Table Officers and to all those who serve us in this House. Perhaps I might be permitted on this occasion to put in a special word for the members of the protective service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Recognition of why I was doing that came a bit slowly, but at least it came. We do join in these greetings, and we all extend them, all of us to each other, and may 1978 be a better year for the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I too would like to join in the good wishes which have been expressed to you, Sir, and to all who support you and who serve us in this Chamber and to say how very much we have appreciated the manner in which you have conducted the business of the House this past year, in very trying times.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I would also like to extend to hon. members opposite, to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), to my colleagues in the government, and to hon. members on this side my best wishes, and particularly to express how fortunate I think we were to have had the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) wind up this debate. I think he gave it just the right tone, and it was entirely appropriate that it should have been so in these last days and hours before the Christmas season.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Allow me to respond and to echo those sentiments by saying to all of the staff who serve the members of the House of Commons and the House as the institution that it is my pleasure to extend on behalf of all the members of this House all our best wishes and to extend to all members and to our usual guests at this time of year, since we are approaching an adjournment, an invitation to join one another in Room 16 before we depart for other events during the Christmas break, and to wish one another a Merry Christmas. I hope all will be able to join us and receive good wishes personally.

The motion which stands in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), of course, remains a government order.

An order made December 19 by the House provides that at the time of adjournment later this day the House will stand adjourned until Monday, January 23, 1978, at two o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2 (1).

However, prior to coming to that point it has been agreed that we will proceed, pursuant to Standing Order 40, with two questions on the adjournment motion, one in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) and the other in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), and that after these questions, under the usual terms and conditions that apply, the House will stand adjourned until Monday, January 23, 1978 at two o'clock. In the meantime all hon. members and others who are usually invitees—our staff and others—are welcome to join us in Room 16 for a short Christmas greeting before everybody departs for the holiday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—POSSIBILITY OF PROGRAM TO CONSERVE NON-RENEWABLE ENERGY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on November 14 last, I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) whether the government intended to implement a program urging Canadians to use renewable energy resources such as solar energy, wind energy, geothermal energy and a host of other sources of renewable energy.

Up until recently, people in Canada and elsewhere were taking for granted that the available amounts of energy, those most readily available in the form of wood fossils, coal, were inexhaustible. After the advent of offshore oil, energy was so cheap that we could disregard insulating our oil-heated homes, build big cars without worrying about fuel consumption, manufacture cheap electricity in power hungry oil-fired thermal generators. Oil then became the wealth running the world. Because of the escalation of black gold prices of limited supplies, of the economic impact on several countries, we now have to reconsider our position particularly with regard to our oil reserves which we all know now are not inexhaustible. Based on the best predictions, oil production will not be able to meet demand by the year 2,000, and shortages could start between 1985 and 1995.

As far as energy conservation is concerned, we have no alternative. On the other hand, to obtain new sources of energy, we must choose among the possible options those which suit our needs better without going deep into debt or destroying our environment. So, in addition to conservation, we will have to seek a solution through research and development of our renewable energy resources.

In answer to my question as to whether the government intended to implement a national incentive program for conservation, research and development, the minister stated the federal government had decided to significantly increase its expenditures in that area. The government now has a $128.2 million budget for energy research and development. Indeed, the increase proposed for 1978-79 is $15 million. I am also informed that the increase will be from $7.7 million to $15.7 million for research and development of renewable energy sources, which is not bad, and there will also be a $5 million increase to $16.7 million for research and development in energy conservation.

Therefore, it is encouraging to note that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources puts an emphasis on renewable energy sources by doubling next year's estimates, and that he stresses energy conservation measures. The announcement made this week by the minister that his department will propose a $21.9 million funding for the federal labour-intensive program to create jobs and help Canadians save is also a forward step.

Access to information, Mr. Speaker, means perhaps helping Canadians to better insulate their homes and better estimate the performance of their oil or gas heating facilities. It is also perhaps helping Canadians in information and energy conservation oriented projects undertaken at the local level. All of that will contribute to a better utilization of our energy resources. These programs will certainly be useful if we want to explain the urgent nature of the situation and make people understand the kind of challenge that has to be met. Perhaps we might also have to switch some day to incentive programs such as subsidies, grants, tax relief if we want to encourage Canadians to invest and perhaps change their traditional use of what is commonly referred to as energy forms such as oil, coal and gas.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources informing me that he intends to create in my riding a community centre for energy conservation. This community centre will employ some seven people and its objective will be essentially to inform the public, to give assistance to volunteer agencies, schools, industries, municipalities and citizens' committees to plan and implement energy conservation programs. I can only command the minister for the emphasis he puts on the use of renewable energy resources. I hope that some day we might be able to engage in national programs that the Canadian people may be required to implement, and I leave it to the parliamentary secretary to tell us whether we have or may expect such a national incentive program for the conservation of these renewable energies.

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier).]

Mr. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), I must confirm at the outset that one of the main objectives of the national energy policy regarding self-sufficiency is to find possible energy sources which would replace those now being used. The use of solar energy to heat water in private homes and in industries as well as to heat buildings could considerably improve our national energy budget in the long run.

Building insulation is a well established technique used in a modern market and well suited to classic consumer incentives. However, solar heating is only at the exploratory stage. It will soon become economical but it is not yet suited to the above-mentioned classic incentives.

Some other issues must be resolved before the development of an incentive program. It includes the formulation of technical standards for solar heating systems, consumer protection, judicial rights concerning solar rays, zoning and other problems under provincial jurisdiction. The renewable energy resources branch recently created within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources actively studies those matters in co-operation with other government organizations, at federal and provincial level.

In the solar energy field, the federal government directs its efforts towards research, development and demonstration of the technical feasibility of solar heating in Canada. Spendings in that area have rapidly increased from $100,000 in 1975-76 to more than $4 million for this fiscal year. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced during the debate on the Speech from the Throne that the quasi totality of the supplementary amount of $15 million that must be spent for research and development in the energy field will be directed towards renewable resources and energy conservation. The technical developments of solar heating in Canada take advantage of those research and development efforts. The production and distribution of solar heating equipment will require federal government support as the industry will expand and develop. If such traditional consumer incentives as the Canadian Home Insulation Program are not adequate now, they could become so later on following the research that has been undertaken. So we are very optimistic as concerns the future development of solar heating and other resources of that kind.

INDUSTRY—NICKEL—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO PREVENT LAY-OFFS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a most disheartening sight to see members get ready to leave here in order to have a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. As the members exchanged greetings, I thought of the 5,000 to 6,000 unemployed or about to be unemployed workers in the Sudbury basin who will not be able to contemplate dumplings and sugar plums over this Christmas season. With that in mind, I was prompted to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today what specific measures the government has and is prepared to announce in the New Year with regard to the nickel industry in order to avoid the lay-offs that will occur there at the end of January or the beginning of February.

Already the workers are receiving notices. It is now extending to the salaried workers. Workers with 21 years' experience at INCO have received their notice—48 years old with 21 years' service with the company. Workers today started receiving notices informing them that they are now being downgraded in terms of the jobs they are doing. If you are a machinist, you are now a labourer. Of course it involves a pay cut. All of this is taking place in the Sudbury basin. It has created a very unsound economic picture there.

I felt it was my responsibility to place these questions before the Prime Minister today. I asked what steps he is contemplating to put before the House when it returns in January with regard to the unemployment situation in the nickel industry. The Prime Minister stated it would take some time before they could get around to that. He says it takes time to plan a strategy. This is not new. We have been living with a hinterland economy for a long time.

A majority Liberal government has been in power for the greater part of the last 50 years. We have lived in Ontario with a provincial Conservative government for the last 40 years. Therefore they cannot hide behind any excuse that they have been unable to plan. But they have failed to plan and thus have developed one industry communities such as we have in the Sudbury basin.

I asked the Prime Minister to consider the pattern that has been set by the French and the United States in stockpiling nickel. That was not an idle suggestion of mine; I have suggested it for a long time. I used the example of the government's approach to uranium when in the 1950's and 1960's the industry was faced with the disaster of the community of Elliot Lake being on the verge of collapse.

Let me quote from the 1973 report "An Energy Policy for Canada". This report gives the concise rationale for stockpiling uranium. I quote:

> Following the completion of the second uranium stockpiling program in 1970, the federal government announced that, in view of the continuing poor short-term marketing situation it would consider further assistance for established uranium mining communities. Subsequently, the federal government entered into an agreement with Denison to jointly stockpile—

What the government did was to stockpile uranium for seven years. The rationale for this was that it was not just a strategic mineral. The fact is that the government was concerned about the economy of that community. We are now suggesting to the government that the same rationale should be used to stockpile nickel today.

Who caused the lay-offs at INCO? Surely it was not the workers. Who was it that made the decision 30 months ago to continue to stockpile nickel? Who was it made the decision to continue demanding overtime for production workers? Surely it is not the workers who participate in such decision making. No, Mr. Speaker, it was INCO and Falconbridge, in full knowledge of the situation. They have always kept that information close to their breast and have never shared it with the government, as we know from the record, or with the workers. It was the company which made a unilateral decision to continue to stockpile nickel.

The Prime Minister said that the companies are carrying a seven month supply. According to INCO's 1976 annual report, the company's nickel inventories at year end were equivalent to a five to six months' supply as compared with a normal level of two to three months' supply. We know that a the end of 1976 the company was carrying six months' stockpile. We are now told they are carrying a seven months' supply. In other words, over the period of one year they have maintained their stockpile. It is rather interesting that from the end of 1976 to the end of 1977 they have maintained a seven months' stockpile when they normally carry two or three months' supply.

The question has to be asked: if the company is prepared to carry that kind of stockpile, surely it is well aware that the turnaround of the nickel market is just around the corner? All of the experts in the nickel industry have told us so. We have been through the copper downturn and copper is now taking off. The American government is about to announce the stockpiling of copper. Therefore we have told the government that it has a responsibility to the workers in the Sudbury basin. It cannot leave the workers to the vicissitudes of the unilateral decision by the company to plan its production level; the government is culpably responsible for the conditions of the nickel mining industry in the Sudbury basin. Only they can lift the sword of Damocles from the heads of the workers in the Sudbury basin—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

• (2222)

Mr. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question on the possible stockpiling of nickel, may I say that the parallel with the uranium stockpiling program is fairly distant. In the case of uranium we were faced with the reality of total mine closures and the economic collapse of the community of Elliot Lake, whereas in the present nickel surplus situation we are facing grave problems of cutbacks in production and employment but not total closures.

Let me repeat what the hon. member already knows. There is a world surplus of nickel production capacity in relation to demand. For going on to three years now, world nickel production has exceeded demand and, as a result, producers around the world have been accumulating inventories which are now at a level far in excess of what has been considered normal. Besides being an onerous burden for the companies, these large inventories have also had an effect in the market place. No easy solution is foreseen for the world-wide problem of oversupply and declining prices. Producers in other countries are facing the same problem as Canadian producers and many of them have announced cutbacks in production similar to those taking place in Canada.

The financing of additional excess nickel inventories directly or indirectly by the federal government would extend the period of excess nickel supply and would involve large financial commitment. It could also be an open invitation for similar programs for other metals which are now in over-supply, and these are many. However, serious as these disadvantages are, the government continues to study urgently all potential solutions and does not rule out any possibility of a workable scheme including those which may involve stockpiling elements.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) mentioned this afternoon the stockpiling program in France. Mr. Speaker, France is an importing country, and when it does stockpile it is to protect herself against a fluctuation in price. When a Canadian company stockpiles it is because it is confronted with a very soft world market and, as I mentioned earlier, stockpiling is a very expensive process. There is a world of difference between the two reasons for stockpiling.

Mr. Speaker, considering that this is the last intervention in the House of Commons in the year 1977, with your permission I should like to extend good wishes to Your Honour and all members of the House in a language which I do not think has been used so far in this connection, though I have heard hon. members on both sides extend their seasonal wishes in English. I should like to say it in French.

I wish everyone a Merry Christmas and I even wish for the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) that the year 1978 will be a very happy one for all men of goodwill, and we certainly need that.

NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO DIVERSION OF CIVIL SERVANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which involves political interference by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). Given the fact that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment has diverted a $10 million federal government project, and 400 permanent jobs originally designated for the city of Moncton, to his home town of Shediac, which smacks of political interference and patronage of the most offensive kind, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That this House directs the government to investigate and review the impact on and the cost to citizens of Shediac, Moncton and the province of New Brunswick by the decision based on political considerations to divert 400 positions in the superannuation unit of the Department of Supply and Services, and a $10 million federal government project originally destined for the city of Moncton where services are now in place, to Shediac where such services will have to be provided at great and unnecessary expense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LEGISLATION TO RESTORE BASIC RATE OF WAR DISABILITY PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It deals with a matter of great urgency, especially to the veterans of this country. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House calls on the government to authorize the Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce forthwith the necessary legislation to restore the basic rate of the war disability pension to the average take-home pay of the five categories of federal public servants designated in 1973, it being the view of this House that not to do so would represent a failure to keep faith with the veterans of this country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PEACE TALKS BETWEEN EGYPT AND ISRAEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That this House expresses to Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, and Israeli Premier Menachem Begin, our concern at the suspension of Middle East peace talks, calls upon both leaders to recover the momentum toward peace which so inspired the whole world through the courageous actions of both leaders, and offers the good offices of the Canadian government in whatever way it could be of assistance in re-establishing the negotiations that must lead to a peace based on mutual respect.

REQUEST SPOUSES OF DECEASED WHO ARE LESS THAN 65 RECEIVE OLD AGE PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion concerning an urgent and very important matter.

As the law, as it now stands, stipulates that any person of 60 to 65 years of age who is married or living with another person of at least 65 and of the opposite sex is entitled to the spouse's allowance; as, under the act, when the older spouse passes away the right of the surviving spouse to the spouse's allowance ceases immediately; as this provision of the act leads to serious problems for those who are victims of it, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That this House urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to introduce without delay a bill to amend the Old Age Security Act so that anyone of 60 to 65 years of age who has, at some time or other, received the spouse's allowance, may continue to receive it even after the death of the older spouse.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ALLEGED GOVERNMENT INSENSITIVITY TOWARD UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the "minister of unemployment" has shown a consistent lack of sensitivity to the problems of the unemployed over the past few weeks by telling them that they are spoiled rotten, that they are doing very nicely indeed, that they should not feel disgraced, and there is nothing that the government can do to help them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House direct the Minister of National Health and Welfare to enter into discussions with provincial welfare ministers to measure the full social impact of long-term unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ANTI-DUMPING ACT

REQUEST THAT SECTION 7 BE INVOKED RESPECTING WIDE FLANGE STEEL BEAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that Algoma Steel has never been a traditional supplier of wide flange steel beams to the British Columbia construction industry, and in light of the fact that the Anti-dumping Tribunal's decision to uphold the appeal of Algoma Steel on wide flange steel beams has eliminated the traditional sources of supply to the west coast industry, thus causing severe disruption to the industry and the immediate loss of some 400 steel workers' jobs in B.C., with a further 1,100 B.C. jobs threatened over the next 12 months, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That the government of Canada invoke section 7 of the Anti-dumping Act exempting wide flange steel beams 25 inches and less from the act.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT TAKE ACTION TO RECOGNIZE RIGHTS OF MINORITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on a very urgent and important matter concerning the linguistic rights of all Canadians.

Hon. members will recall that on December 15 last, Ontario Premier Bill Davis wrote a letter to Mrs. Gisèle Richer, President of the Ontario French-Canadian Association, to inform her that for the time being the government of Ontario has no intention of taking any step which would make French an official language in the province of Ontario.

Dismayed and shocked by such a negative and unacceptable policy statement from the premier of Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert):

That the House express its regret about the statement of the premier of Ontario and invite him to support any initiative which would recognize to English and French minorities the right to live and to develop in their mother tongue, and this in all Canadian provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the continuing absence of the Minister of Finance, who seems to shun this House, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. This is the first day of parliament in 1978, a year which looks like it will become known as the year the country closes down.

• (1417)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: There are 700 people laid off by Christie Brown in Toronto, 275 miners laid off in Marmora, Ontario and 700 employees laid off by MacMillan Bloedel at its plywood mill in Vancouver. In light of this very dismal beginning to 1978, will the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, tell the House of Commons what steps the government proposes to introduce and to take immediately to reverse and stop the pattern of lay-offs and to find jobs for the growing army of Canadian unemployed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government believes, and the statistics support it, that the economy has been stimulated in the proper fashion by this government.

An hon. Member: With 8.5 per cent unemployment, you could not believe that.

Mr. Trudeau: If hon. members refer to official statistics, they will see that in the third quarter of the past year the gross national product was growing at a rate of 5.3 per cent on an annual basis, that the merchandise surplus for the current year will be about $2.5 billion, and that housing starts in December were at an all-time high of almost 300,000.

An hon. Member: The land is strong!

Mr. Trudeau: There are many indications that the economic posture of the government is the proper one. The signs which are already apparent indicate that in the short run the economy is on the right course. At times in the history of a nation there are lay-offs and new jobs are created. Last year 250,000 to 300,000 new jobs were created. The stimulative posture of the government is in the order of $8.5 billion. It would be astonishing if the opposition were calling for a larger deficit than that. We believe that the mood of this parliament, and perhaps even of the Leader of the Opposition, should be one of looking forward with confidence to Canada's future, rather than dreading it.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we look forward with confidence to the future of this country because this is a year in which this government, if it has the courage, will call an election and allow Canadians to choose a new government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister chooses his statistics.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Hon. members opposite try to shout me down, but in its December report the OECD revealed, among other things, that Canada has the worst unemployment record of all the industrialized nations of the world. This independent, international index went on to point out that the measures announced by this government last fall will not provide sufficient stimulus and that our rate of unemployment will grow even worse with this do-nothing government.

The agenda of parliament has no new economic legislation. Is that the plan? Or can the Prime Minister tell us what immediate steps the government intends to introduce, instead of doing nothing and telling the 700 people out of work in Toronto that everything is all right? What is the government going to do to alleviate the slump in the Canadian economy?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are not saying that everything is all right. In view of unemployment of this magnitude, we will announce steps which will indicate the government's very real concern. Although we are not saying everything is all right, we are, also, not saying the country will close down, which is the statement of the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In terms of new measures, there is a tax credit plan which will be put before parliament within a day or two. We expect very early action by the opposition on that plan, rather than its usual stalling when the government comes forward with plans to stimulate the economy.

• (1422)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, this government has stalled for six months on bringing in that employment tax credit plan. If they were a responsible government at all that cared about the people of this country, they would have started this session of parliament by putting the legislation before this House of Commons, instead of the legislation being as absent as the Minister of Finance.

I ask the Prime Minister whether it is fair to conclude from his statements that his government has rejected completely the idea of following the OECD's advice and the advice of most other economists to bring forward major stimulative measures through tax cuts to try to bring back stimulation and growth to the Canadian economy this year.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition challenges us to start this session with this particular tax measure. I can tell him that the ways and means motion will be on the order paper today, and I challenge his party to support this plan.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might go back and repeat my question to the Prime Minister for the fourth time. Will the Prime Minister of Canada tell the House whether this do-nothing government, this government that is prepared to ignore the plight of a growing number of Canadian unemployed, has rejected the advice of most economists that this economy needs stimulus, and has rejected the idea of a major tax cut as one way to provide that stimulus?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as usual, the hon. Leader of the Opposition is falling behind the government's actions. If he were not reading only what some economists are saying, he would see that the government has already stimulated the economy to the tune of some $2 billion, and that there will be further stimulus after today's ways and means motion. The hon. Leader of the Opposition seems to forget that his party voted a tax measure presented by the Minister of Finance a couple of months ago which will have the effect of putting into the hands of consumers and Canadians $100 or $200 this month and next month.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REDUCTION OF TARIFFS TO STIMULATE ECONOMY—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. As the December report of the OECD on member countries paints a particularly gloomy picture for Canada, pointing out that there likely will be unemployment even in excess of the 8½ per cent mark toward the end of this year, and as part of that unemployment is undoubtedly due to former tariff reductions which in the absence of an industrial strategy have resulted in certain plant close-downs and lay-offs in this country, would the Prime Minister elaborate on the statement the Vice-President of the United States, Mr. Mondale, made last week to the effect that Canada will announce within a few days its willingness to join in pushing for an ambitious reduction of tariffs averaging 40 per cent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other ministers have indicated quite clearly that Canada is a willing and active participant in the multinational, multilateral trade negotiations which are taking place in Geneva. I think that even the opposition would agree that Canada, as a trading nation, should be interested in the reduction of tariffs.

However, if the hon. member refers to statements made by the government in recent days, he will see that Canada's concern will be to make sure that those reductions in tariffs will only be given in exchange for equivalent advantages for Canada and would be phased in over a period of time during which, hopefully, even the opposition would want to see Canadian industry adapt and become as effective and efficient as possible. As to this government's aims in the multinational trade negotiations, we on this side do not think there is a great future for a trading nation like Canada if we barricade ourselves behind tariff walls as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary question to the Prime Minister follows on his statement. With the OECD indicating that unemployment in Canada will be at the highest level of the 12 industrialized nations which they reviewed, would the Prime Minister indicate if his government has conducted any study to determine to what extent our unemployment is being triggered by unwise tariff reductions of the past? If so, would he indicate the findings of that study? Also, could he indicate to the House what steps he will take to ensure that Canadian labour will not be brutalized further by unwise tariff reductions?

● (1427)

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member should refer to announcements made by the Minister of Finance and by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in very recent months which indicate that jobs, for instance, of workers in the textile industry and in the shoe industry have been protected by certain tariff measures. The same is true in the farming industry. There are all kinds of areas where the Canadian government has taken measures to protect those jobs.

Along with this protective action, Mr. Speaker, we are working with industry, management and the unions to ensure that the future is not one of constant protection. As the hon. member realizes, this results in higher costs for the Canadian consumer, for shoes, for textiles, for food or whatever it is. Because of this, Mr. Speaker, it is important that, while we take these protective measures, we also take steps to ensure that these industries become more modern and more cost efficient so that they can compete in world markets and therefore will not need the artificial protection of trade barriers, which seems to be the policy of the hon. member.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN CONTENT OF STEEL PIPE, ETC., MANUFACTURED FOR NORTHERN PIPELINE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Last September he promised Canadians that almost 100 per cent of the pipe required to build the Canadian portion of the Alcan pipeline would be produced by Canadian workers in Canada. I should like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he is aware that the studies of the United States government completed before the agreement was signed last September assumed that 30 per cent of the durable goods for the Canadian section of the line, mainly steel pipe, would be supplied from American sources.

Related to that, is the minister aware that a major American bank is now trying to raise capital for the project on this basis, with advertisements in papers such as the Wall Street Journal—which I showed the minister—which appeared recently. The article claimed that thousands of jobs for the Canadian portion of the line will be given to United States citizens? If so, I would like the minister to explain to the House the major contradiction which now exists between the American government's statements on jobs in this area and statements which the minister himself made last September.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any contradiction between the attitude of the American government and the statements I have been making, which were repeated as recently as several days ago in the presence of the Vice-President of the United States. We have undertaken an agreement with the American government that each country will maximize its industrial benefits. I think I can convince the hon. member, when we come to the discussion of the legislation, that it will be possible for Canadian producers of steel, for example, to participate competitively and to obtain a very substantial proportion of that business.

As the hon. member knows, the applicant company has estimated a Canadian content of 90 per cent. When it comes to steel pipe, of course, the major Canadian producer has stated its ability not only to compete in Canada for business in Canada, but also to compete in the United States against American competition for supplies in that country.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, would the minister now answer the question apart from stating generalizations? Last September 9, to be precise, the minister at a press conference in this city promised Canadians 98 per cent of the steel would be produced here in Canada. The American government, according to advertisements that are now appearing in American business publications, are saying that 30 per cent of it will be produced in the United States. Even the minister with his Liberal past cannot have it both ways that much. Who is telling the truth? Did the minister receive guarantees from the Americans, in the agreement last fall, that we are going to get 98 per cent, or was he misleading the people of Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there was no misleading of the people of Canada. What is clearly set out in the agreement, and what I believe will be carried out in reality, is that Canadian companies, through their own competitive ability, will be able to obtain a very large proportion of this business.

An hon. Member: Seventy per cent.

Mr. MacEachen: I have no way of commenting upon the advertising in the Wall Street Journal. I do not regard it as an authoritative source for Liberal philosophy. Maybe it is for the NDP.

● (1432)

Mr. Broadbent: The reality, of course, is there is no authoritative source for Liberal philosophy. It is such a bundle of contradictions that there couldn't be one source. I will direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister. A study was prepared by another minister's department, DREE, before the agreement was signed last September. It indicated that unless written guarantees were put into the agreement, Canadians would lose some $600 million of benefits.

Having had that study carried out by one of his departments, can the Prime Minister tell the House why the Canadian government did not insist that guarantees be put into the agreement? Related to that, will he, at long last, now guarantee that Canada will get the right to produce 98 per cent of the steel which the Deputy Prime Minister promised last September, and will that be in the legislation when it is introduced in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party is not only placing his faith in the Wall Street Journal, but he is obviously taking as gospel truth the statements and ambitions of American entrepreneurs. It is not our philosophy. We believe that Canadian entrepreneurs can compete. We believe they could perhaps even compete in the American portion of the line. We are hopeful that the Canadian people, the workers and the entrepreneurs, will show greater confidence in their ability to produce than the leader of the New Democratic Party, who seems to have more confidence in the Americans.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST SPOUSES OF DECEASED WHO ARE LESS THAN 65 RECEIVE OLD AGE PENSION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Since a person between the ages of 60 and 65 who is living with a companion of the opposite sex who is at least 65 years of age receives the spouse's allowance, which is cancelled automatically the moment the older spouse passes away, will the minister undertake to amend the legislation to make it possible for anyone between ages 60 and 65 who gets the spouse's allowance to continue receiving it even after the older spouse has passed away?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned on a number of occasions the problems which have recently arisen from the practical application of a legislation which would greatly help many Canadian couples which have to manage suddenly with a single pension. I hope the hon. member will raise his voice to convince the businessmen who influence the government so that tax credits will be earmarked for the aged instead of other projects. It is a well known fact that public funds are scarce these days.

I have started to discuss with my officials everywhere in Canada the practical problems of people who are living on nothing but a pension, and we are reviewing the situation.

● (1437)

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I thank the minister for her good answer and for her invitation to communicate with businessmen. However, in view of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is a woman and that Canadian women have frequently complained that male lawmakers do not fully understand them and that their rights are encroached upon, will the minister take advantage of her position to introduce a law which would aim precisely at ensuring that the rights of women aged between 60 and 65 are respected, because the victims of the present law are mainly found in this age group, and at the same time, to add a guaranteed income for single persons aged between 60 and 65, whether they are male or female?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the hon. member, I must tell him that this has nothing to do with discrimination based on sex. It is a problem of redistribution of income, of which we are all very much aware, and we are striving to find the most innovative solutions possible to this problem. If the hon. member has any doubts about the commitment of this government and of the female ministers who participate in it on an equal basis with their male counterparts, or about their awareness of the problems of women, I have to add that I have recently been told how mothers were happy to benefit from full indexation of their family allowances from January on.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

SUGGESTION THE QUEEN DIVESTED OF CERTAIN POWERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister on this the opening day of parliament. I would again point out to him that parliament consists of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. During his absence an announcement was made by an unidentified person, unknown in his office, that the Queen had been divested of certain of her powers, the detail of which I shall not refer to now, which amounted to an evisceration of her rights.

I want to ask simply one question. Was that done by action of the cabinet? If so, upon what date was the decision made that the Queen's powers should be so reduced that the Governor General virtually becomes the president of this country? Was it done by order in council, or how was it done?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member asks the date and asks how it was done. It was done in 1947 by publication of letters patent giving the Governor General in Canada all the powers exercised by the Queen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Bégin.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister at the time, Mr. St. Laurent, respected the Crown—something the Prime Minister has not done. Throughout he has done everything to destroy the monarchy in our country. It was not done in 1947. I ask whether anything was done by his government, by order in council or action of the cabinet, that brought this about or brought it to a head. Surely that is a simple enough question. Or was it done by himself in his general efforts to emasculate the monarchy?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the statement of the right hon. member and perhaps his unwillingness to understand the facts, it was in 1947 that the letters patent were issued transferring from the Queen in England authority to the Governor General in Canada to exercise in Canada, for Canada, all the powers hitherto exercised by the Queen. No order in council was necessary pursuant to that issuance of letters patent.

NEW BRUNSWICK—EXPENSE RELATED TO DIVERSION OF CIVIL SERVANTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Has Treasury Board undertaken to underwrite the additional expense to be imposed on the taxpayers of the town of Shediac, in the province of New Brunswick, by locating the 400 persons' superannuation unit of Supply and Services in Shediac, the constituency of the Minister of Fisheries, where municipal, provincial and school services must be provided, instead of in the city of Moncton where the capacity already exists?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the details of any additional expenditures required. I will certainly look into the matter and comment on it.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF McDONALD INQUIRY—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the publicized and considered opinion of many organizations, including the Quebec League for Human Rights, that counsel at the McDonald inquiry have not been tough enough in their questioning of witnesses and their criticisms, does the Solicitor General intend to amend at the McDonald commission's terms of reference by order in council or otherwise to require it to recognize the requests for standing before the commission from those parties which have expressed such an interest?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lawrence: The Canadian Labour Congress has indicated that it will seek standing, and the right to cross-examine witnesses, when the commission considers the activities of the security service as they relate to organized labour in this country. Will the Solicitor General be instructing, or has he already instructed, his counsel to oppose this application?

Mr. Fox: No, Mr. Speaker, no instructions in this regard have been given to my counsel. The decision as to who actually has the right to appear before the commission and which counsel have the right to cross-examine witnesses who are heard before the McDonald commission of inquiry is completely in the hands of the commission. It is master of its procedures and of indicating the way it wishes its proceedings to be handled.

● (1442)

Mr. Lawrence: Do I understand the Solicitor General is telling us that his own counsel, who has appeared before the inquiry and has opposed the application in the past, did this on his own initiative without instruction from the government?

Mr. Fox: Surely, that is not what I said. I tried as far as possible to answer the specific question the hon. member put to me. The hon. member asked me what instructions I gave to my counsel. Questions have been put to me in the House concerning representations that have been heard in the past as to the right to cross-examine witnesses. If the hon. member cares to look at the record for the month of December, he will see what answers I gave. I indicated that I had not issued any instructions with respect to the CLC obtaining the right to cross-examine witnesses. I expressed the view that the commission itself was the master of its own actions. As far as I am concerned, the commission is there to act in the public interest, and it is quite capable of handling the job of cross-examining witnesses appropriately.

HAMILTON AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT REACTION TO REPORTS ON UPGRADING

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the hon. gentleman had an opportunity to review the reports of the ad hoc committee concerning the upgrading of Hamilton airport? Has he reviewed these reports personally, as well as the report of the technical committee, and is he now prepared to make an announcement with respect to what might happen at Hamilton airport?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I have now had an opportunity to review the documents. It is, of course, a long time since I received and reviewed the report of the community committee which did such a great job in analysing the situation in the Hamilton area. I received the report of the technical committee only last week. I anticipate I shall be able to make an announcement shortly in connection with this matter, perhaps within a week.

NEW BRUNSWICK—DIVERSION OF CIVIL SERVANTS—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. It involves political interference by the Minister of Fisheries which in my view smacks of pork-barrelling and patronage. I refer to the 400 guaranteed jobs which were to be provided in Moncton and which are now being diverted to Shediac, which apparently is in the minister's riding. In July, 1976, these jobs were directed, without equivocation, to the city of Moncton, yet as of October, 1977, they were directed to the "Moncton area". Hon. members will notice the difference, because it brings in the Minister of Fisheries.

Would the President of Treasury Board, in the goodness of his heart, refer this whole matter to the appropriate standing committee in order that a complete investigation might be made of this questionable action by the Minister of Fisheries?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): I am sure my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, made this recommendation after due consideration of all the factors there—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: —and the necessity to bolster the economy of that area. I would not be inclined to take the action the hon. gentleman suggests.

Mr. Alexander: Are we to understand, then, that pork-barrelling and patronage is the way of life of this government? I put this question to the hon. gentleman with regard to federal government relocation programs for the purpose of creating regional work. Will he cease using as criteria for such relocation partisan political considerations which primarily involve patronage? I ask this question bearing in mind that of the 24 relocations known to me, 11 are going to constituencies of ministers, nine to those of lesser Liberals, and four to those of opposition members. Will the minister cease and desist from this rotten practice?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister may wish to answer the question, but it does contain an argumentative element.

Oral Questions

POST OFFICE

SERVICE PROVIDED BY LETTER CARRIERS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I would direct a question to the Postmaster General. The Prime Minister recently suggested that we might one day have to do without some of our luxuries and start walking to get our mail. Is the Prime Minister also suggesting that the 20,000 members of the Letter Carriers Union will also be taking a walk—to the local Manpower office, that is? Will the Postmaster General inform the House whether the Prime Minister was talking through his hat, or whether his remarks are an indication of present or future policy within the Post Office?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): I would recommend that the hon. gentleman consider the Prime Minister's remarks in their full context. I would also ask him to read the comments I made shortly after the Prime Minister had spoken. I indicated there was no intention of doing anything which would have a negative impact on the letter carriers or, indeed, on home delivery. The hon. gentleman is well aware of my personal views as to the essential nature of letter carrier service, and it is my intention to do the best I can to enhance home delivery and the excellence of the service presently provided.

● (1447)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the Prime Minister's statement since indeed—

[English]

Mr. Darling: I am well aware of what the Postmaster General is trying to do. However, with all due respect to him the Prime Minister takes precedence over the Postmaster General, which is why a lot of us are worried. It is now more than a month since the Post Office hired temporary workers to help with the Christmas mail, yet some of those 8,000 people have not yet received their cheques. Will the Postmaster General inform the House whether or not the delay is being looked into, and whether the balance of cheques will be sent out immediately, hopefully by special delivery rather than by ordinary mail?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has brought that problem to my attention. I can assure him that indeed all the people who were hired for the Christmas period have already been paid or will be paid shortly. If there are any specific cases he would want to point out to me, I would be glad to hear them and give them all due attention.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

EFFECT OF TELEPHONE WORKERS' DISPUTE ON ECONOMY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): My question is directed to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Labour. The telephone dispute in British Columbia has gone on for 9½ weeks. Some 10,000 workers have been idle, and there has been considerable damage to the economy of the province. The commissioner, Dr. Noel Hall, recommended a settlement of this dispute back in May, but it was rejected by the telephone company.

● (1452)

Will the House of Commons see legislation implementing the settlement of that dispute in the event the report, which I believe is either in the minister's hands now or is expected tomorrow, does not settle the dispute by the end of the week, so we can put an end to the tremendous economic disruption that has occurred in the province of British Columbia?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of this question. As the hon. member probably knows, the Minister of Labour is in Quebec city today taking part in an important federal-provincial conference. I will take note of the question and report the information to the hon. member in the House tomorrow.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, there has been strong suspicion for some time that decisions in regard to this dispute are in fact being made by General Tel and Tel in New York, the parent company of the B.C. Telephone Company, and not by the local management in the province of British Columbia. Has the minister made any inquiries to determine who, in fact, is making the on-the-scene decisions in respect of the company with regard to this dispute? If he has not, does he intend to do so in order that we can see who is running the B.C. Telephone Company—local management or New York city?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is making pure speculations. I will check the file and report tomorrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST GOVERNMENT INSTITUTE PROGRAMS TO CREATE JOBS FOR YOUNG PERSONS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In November last, I believe, I had the opportunity to introduce a motion urging the government to institute special programs for the thousands of young unemployed in Canada. The government refused that motion and I note that on January 9 last, the minister remembered that great idea which I submitted to the House when he created an advisory committee for the establishment of employment programs for young Canadians. Since the first meetings were held a week or two ago, could the minister tell us what kind of programs his department will introduce and how much money will be earmarked for those programs?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is obviously misreading the purpose of the National Youth Advisory Group. That is an advisory body which advises the minister on the programs we have in place, as well as on other recommendations and suggestions that have been made as a result of meetings, for example, of the OECD, and representations that come to us from across the country.

In the interim, we have several programs in place for the young. I am happy to say that the Chambers of Commerce and Boards of Trade across the country have seen to it that our pilot project on job experience and training will probably be expanded twelvefold over the winter months. We have the Young Canada Works program, through which we have been able to place a number of students. We also have young people working at our Canada Manpower centres and universities across the country. Myriad programs are in place.

Just recently I signed a co-operative education program with the province of British Columbia. Many things are, in fact, in train. The advisory committee is there to evaluate the projects we have and where emphasis might be placed in so far as job creation for youth is concerned.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Of course I am sad to see that the minister is not considering a special program and under the circumstances, considering the existing programs which have proved to be clearly unsatisfactory to reduce the percentage of unemployed, especially among young Canadians, I would like to ask whether the minister continues to brush aside the idea of establishing a strategy or setting a special program to find employment for our young Canadians greatly concerned about the future of their country?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, here, again, the hon. member holds out the false hope that one particular program can do the job he suggests needs to be done, namely, lowering the unemployment rate among youth. I am suggesting there are various programs in place in various regions of the country which I think will have a positive impact. We have received commendations from the OECD on the programs we have in place, some of which they wish to emulate in other countries. I think it is wrong to denigrate the programs we have in place by suggesting that one massive expenditure of some nature, which is pretty hard to determine from the opposition, might do the job.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, we have an alarming increase in the rate of youth unemployment in Canada, apparently standing at 15.2 per cent for those in the 15 to 24 age bracket, which will be considerably aggravated by the new crop of graduates in about two months' time. In other words, the problem has grown beyond the scope of the government's existing programs. Apart from setting up an advisory committee, which is an admission that the government does not have any answers, I would ask the minister whether he took advantage of his meetings with the provincial ministers of manpower on January 17 to discuss this very alarming problem of lack of job opportunities for our young people.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Very definitely, Mr. Speaker. We commented on the apprenticeship program, the adult occupational training programs and how they might be given more effect so that young people will get their training and apprenticeship at an earlier age. The setting up of this special advisory group is only one more weapon in the arsenal to deal with this specific problem. We have dealt, not only on a bilateral but on a multilateral basis, with the ministers of education, of labour and of manpower for the provinces, and also internationally at OECD, searching out every avenue that is available to us to cope with this problem which is not unique in Canada. Certainly, the unemployment rate among youth is too high in Canada, and we have to bring to bear all the weapons we can to deal with the situation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

FUNCTIONS OF OMBUDSMAN—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice which deals with the function of the office of ombudsman he has suggested setting up. The functions he sets out will deal with maladministration, incompetence and inefficiency of the various departments of the government, but will not deal with illegality. Why will they not deal with illegality, and who will determine whether there is inefficiency or illegality?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should have thought it obvious that the police and the courts are the proper agencies to deal with illegality. Obviously, if in the course of an investigation or an inquiry by the ombudsman he were to come across facts which indicated there was criminality or illegality involved, I would expect him to exercise his duty and refer the matter to the police.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact there has been maladministration, incompetency and gross inefficiency on the part of this government, before the minister issued this statement did he consider and ascertain the cost to the Canadian taxpayer of setting up such an empire?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, such an empire is not set up and there is no intention of setting up such an empire. Obviously, this will be a matter of discussion in cabinet as we approve the legislation, which has not yet been approved. It will be a subject for discussion in the parliamentary committee and ultimately for negotiation between the ombudsman and members of the treasury board.

PUBLIC SERVICE

COMMITTEE OF REVIEW—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council which relates to the special committee on the review of personnel management and the merit principle in the public service. Will this committee hold public hearings? If so, when? Also, will MPs and others be given the opportunity to express their views?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will have to verify the impression I have that it is not the intention to hold public hearings. I will make sure whether that is the correct situation.

STATUS OF WOMEN

HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT RATE AMONG WOMEN IN ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for the status of women. It relates to the latest unemployment statistics, which show that the rate of unemployment among women in the province of Ontario is twice that of the rate in respect of men. Given this high rate of unemployment among women, and the fact that the minister's colleague, the Minister of Finance, indicated in a speech last week in the city of Toronto that he considered the participation rate of women in the work force as a major contributor to ongoing high unemployment, I should like to ask the minister what steps he is taking to counter this discriminatory attitude on the part of his colleague, and to see that it does not extend to or influence the operations of Canada Manpower centres with regard to the placing of women in the work force.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all like to indicate to the hon. lady that there is nothing discriminatory in the statement made at the time by the Minister of Finance. These facts are well recognized by all labour economists throughout the labour market in Canada. We have been creating jobs in Canada at a higher rate than any other industrialized nation in the world. We have also had difficulty in respect of unemployment because of the large number of young people coming into the labour market, and also as a result of the very rapid increase in the participation of women in the work force. I rejoice, as does this government, in the fact that women are joining the work force in greater numbers, but obviously one should not ignore this phenomenon in terms of its impact on unemployment.

● (1502)

At the present time, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has taken many steps over the last two years, in co-operation with his colleagues in cabinet, to make sure women are given a fair deal in the representations they are making at Manpower centres when they are looking for jobs. The government itself has taken steps inside its own operations to ensure a fair deal for women. There is still a long way to go in all respects and the government is committed to improving the situation.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I accept the fact that the minister has indicated he and his colleagues have a long way to go in this respect. Has he considered the words of the Minister of Finance to the effect that next year unemployment will depend to a considerable extent on the participation rate especially among women? If he does not consider that discriminatory, will he have a little chat with his colleagues to see, at this time of economic distress for many Canadians, that the attempts of women to gain an equal role in the economic and social life of this country are not undermined by this government?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, not only the government, but society as a whole, has a long way to go. That is what I said. We have a long way to go to ensure equal opportunity to women in our society. This government is committed to that role; it has been committed to it for years. We have taken steps in the last few years to put Canada ahead of most other democratic countries, in terms of steps we have taken to raise the opportunities for women in our work force.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, since this is the first day after the Christmas recess, and since the government indicated to us before we left the two pieces of legislation we will be dealing with—and I presume the order stands—could the government indicate to us when we will be dealing with the employment tax credit legislation and the pipeline legislation? Perhaps the hon. government House leader might take this opportunity to set out for us his priorities for the remainder of the legislative session, and the order of bills as they will be called.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware that we are proceeding with the extension of the Bank Act today, followed by the amendments to the Anti-Inflation Board Act. Then I hope we can deal quickly with the employment tax credit legislation, which will be introduced today in the form of a ways and means motion. Certainly these are among the items which will be called immediately this week. I hope to bring in the pipeline legislation at an early date. That will be given priority as well. In addition to these four items of legislation, I will wait until Thursday to project any further.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the pipeline legislation, I believe there was a request made in this House of the government House leader to consider the establishment of a special committee of this House, rather than a standing committee, to deal with the pipeline legislation when it leaves this House after second reading, if and when it is introduced. I wonder if the government House leader has come to any conclusion with respect to this request. If he has not, will he do so and inform us as soon as possible as to his intention to consider the establishment of a special committee of the House to deal with the pipeline legislation?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the question as to whether we ought to establish a special committee to deal with this piece of legislation is still under consideration. No decision not to proceed in that direction has been taken. It is still an open question. It will have to be resolved when we move to second reading of the bill in order that the committee to which the bill be sent can be indicated in the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the government House leader makes his statement on Thursday with respect to House business, will he give the House a list of the legislative measures which the government intends to introduce at this session that have not yet appeared on the order paper?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will consider that. Also I should like hon. members of the opposition to consider the possibility of some general agreement on the time that should be taken on each of these items which I have mentioned already and those I will indicate later.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in regard to the same point of order and with reference to the pipeline bill, can the government House leader tell us, when that bill is introduced, whether it will contain a legislative reference to the guarantee that approximately 98 per cent of the steel used in the pipeline will be produced in Canada? That was the promise made on September 9.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on the question of the so-called promise, I have talked often about the proportion of industrial benefits to accrue to Canada. It is my recollection that I have not yet mentioned any figure, except the figure which was put forward in the application by the pipeline company, namely, its view that 90 per cent of all materials and services can be acquired in Canada. Certainly that is an objective we will strive to maintain.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, in regard to the same point of order, in view of the importance of the pipeline legislation and the fact that the ratification legislation passed through Congress several months ago, is there any particular reason for the delay in bringing forth the legislation in this House?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there is really no delay in bringing forward the legislation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Hon. members opposite have not given the government very much encouragement to bring forward additional items of legislation in view of the fact that we spent approximately 20 legislative days on one item of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF MOTION TO AMEND INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Otto E. Lang (for the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), I should like to table a ways and means motion to amend the Income Tax Act. Order Paper Questions

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-414, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Prince Edward-Hastings).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the riding proposed as Prince Edward is almost three quarters in Hastings county. At the request of a significant number of leading citizens from both counties, I ask that the name be changed to reflect both historic counties and the close and friendly relationship which has existed over the years between them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the Chair would have to make some sort of procedural reservation on the face of it, in view of the fact that already there is a constituency called Prince Edward-Hastings. It is very unlikely that we could have two constituencies with the same name. In any case, I presume the hon. member has leave to introduce the bill, subject to some sort of discussion of an amendment, and also subject to the reservation of the Chair on procedural grounds.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as I have to answer more than 100 questions today, I ask leave of the House to table the list of the numbers corresponding to those questions.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: According to the ordinary practice of the House, the list which has been provided to the Chair is provided to representatives of each party, as I am sure was done. It is a rather lengthy list of questions which have been answered. The parliamentary secretary has suggested that this list be printed in Hansard as if it had been read and that the questions be deemed to have been answered in the usual way. Is that agreed?

Mr. Paproski: It is agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

Lang during the time she has been a member of the staff of the honourable Member for Saskatoon-Humboldt while he has been a member of the Cabinet?

DAIRY FARMERS—MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Question No. 100—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Minister of Agriculture in September 1977 refer to dairy farmers as "greedy" and, if so (a) was he stating government policy (b) where (c) on what date (d) for what reason?

2. Is the Minister aware as to whether or not most dairy farmers work seven days a week, in excess of eight hours per day and did they advise the Minister that their only desire was to make a decent living?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. No—The Minister of Agriculture has not said that all dairy farmers are "greedy". He has said on a number of occasions that a minority of fluid milk producers are greedy for not wanting to share the burden of surplus and over-production with industrial milk producers. The expansion of some fluid milk operations at the expense of industrial milk producers does not display a Christian attitude. In his discussions with dairy farmers at their meetings, government policy as well as the minister's personal views have been explained very carefully to those present.

2. Yes—As a practising farmer, the minister is well aware of the hours of work required for all farmers, not just dairy farmers and that their motivation is the same as other people. Farmers are very capable of making their views known to the minister and their exchange of views with the minister keeps him up-to-date at all times.

2. Yes. $1,412,746,082 at March 31, 1977. (Reference, Public Accounts 1977, Volume I, 10.8, A-14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20).

FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES

Question No. 114—Mr. Herbert:

Has the agreement been concluded between the government and the Quebec provincial government concerning the date of mailing of family allowance cheques and, if so, what are the details?

FUNDS FOR CRIME PREVENTION

Question No. 165—Mr. Friesen:

1. Will there be an infusion of funds into crime prevention for better trained, deployed and equipped policemen and, if so (a) in what amounts (b) for what purposes?

2. Were funds or man-years made available to the RCMP as a result of the introduction of the peace and security legislation and, if so, what were they?

3. Have additional RCMP positions been allotted to do the administrative work on the new gun law proposals and, if so, how many?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): 1. Funds have been made available under the Peace and Security program to strengthen existing capabilities in crime prevention. In collaboration with provincial and municipal authorities and an advisory board, which includes representatives from the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police and the RCMP, emphasis is being placed on providing police with practical, innovative, community-oriented preventive programs which address local needs. Although many of these programs, such as Operation Identification, Neighbourhood Watch and Block Parents depend upon active voluntary community support, some, such as team policing, involve changes in the deployment of a city's force and may involve additional training as well as equipment. While funds were not specifically provided for better trained police officers, there is some concern to ensure that policing in general, and police recruit and in-service training in particular, come to reflect a more even balance between law enforcement and preventive policing. To this end, it is felt that some orientation in family crisis intervention and similar programs should, where appropriate, be made available to police forces and training establishments. (a) $1,108,000 for 1976/77. (b) For developing, disseminating and implementing model prescriptive policing packages.

2. No specific resources were made available to the RCMP as a result of the introduction of the Peace and Security legislation but while man-year growth in the government as a whole was kept below 1 per cent during 1976-77, the RCMP increased by 4.4 per cent. Of the net increase in man-years authorized for departments and agencies whose man-years are subject to Treasury Board control, 14.7 per cent were allotted to the RCMP. Financial resources granted to the RCMP were also allowed to exceed the average increase for all government departments and agencies, for the same year. These increases were in recognition of the priority the government attached to innovative measures in crime control (Peace and Security).

3. No man-years have as yet been allotted to the RCMP by Treasury Board. It is anticipated however, that seven man-years will be provided for the fiscal year 1977/78.

NFB—POLICY ON USE OF AUDIO-VISUAL TAPES, FILMS AND SCRIPTS IN ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOLS

Question No. 471—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. What is the policy of the National Film Board with respect to the use of audio/visual tapes, films and scripts in elementary and secondary schools?

2. (a) What services or programmes are available through the National Film Board to elementary and secondary school teachers (b) by province, what was the cost for such services in each of the past five years?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Film Board as follows: 1. It is the policy of the National Film Board to promote and assist in the development of audio-visual services to Canadian schools and teachers and to support their operations and growth with its own productions and resources, rather than to substitute for the education system in providing such services. The production and resources of the National Film Board reach elementary and secondary schools in Canada in many ways: (1) All productions distributed by the National Film Board are made available in 16mm format on a free loan basis to elementary and secondary schools, usually through the established audio-visual service of the school or the schools system. The same productions are also available for purchase from the National Film Board offices across the country. Such purchases can often be made at varying discounted rates on quantity orders and/or within a film library development programme. (2) Where such capabilities exist, departments of education or provincial telecommunication authorities can purchase from the National Film Board the rights to broadcast within the educational television system or closed-circuit school TV system, to transfer from film to tape and to reproduce quantity of tapes of all productions cleared for such distribution. In addition, the National Film Board now sells all such productions on tape format. (3) Other audio-visual products, such as 8mm films, filmstrips, slides presentation, transparencies, multi-media kits, are available for purchase by schools from three (3) distributors in the country. (4) It is not the policy of the National Film Board to provide scripts of its productions although in a few instances such scripts have been made available free of charge for film studies.

2. There is no service provided by the National Film Board specifically designed for teachers in the elementary and secondary schools. This is considered to be the responsibility of the departments and boards of education. However, like any other Canadian, the elementary and secondary school teachers have access to the free loan service from the National Film Board 27 film libraries across the country. The following table shows what percentage of all transactions recorded in all film libraries were for elementary and secondary schools during the period of 1972-73 to 1976-77 and the estimated cost of providing that service per province. The services of the National Film Board staff members in its local and regional offices are also made available on request and within the limits of resources and capabilities in time and place to share with teachers or audio-visual specialists their experience in the fields of film library organization and management, film information and programming, films and media studies and also concerning the use of audio-visual aids in the learning process. There are no reliable data to account for the cost of such personnel services per province in each of the past five years. In addition to above-mentioned service, the National Film Board, during the fiscal year 1976-77, in collaboration with the a/v Committee of the Council of Ministers of Education, developed its "Education Support Programme" designed to bring about a closer and more concerted collaboration with educational authorities in Canada concerning audio-visual aids and their effective use by teachers and students in the learning process. This programme was funded in the amount of $300,000 to cover all levels of education in all of Canada.

CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT OF TEACHERS OVERSEAS

Question No. 473—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. (a) What is the procedure followed in the hiring by the government of Canadian teachers to teach at Canadian Armed Forces bases overseas (b) how many are employed (c) what is the salary scale (d) what is the amount of foreign service allowance awarded (e) what provisions are made for (i) travel expenses (ii) medical insurance coverage?

2. Under what provisions are members of the Canadian Armed Forces given the vote while serving overseas and do these provisions apply to teachers at the bases?

3. Under what provisions are members of the Forces exempted from paying tax on foreign service allowance awarded and do the provisions apply to teachers at the bases?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Defence, the Chief Electoral Office and Revenue Canada as follows:

1. (a) Teachers for overseas DND dependants schools are obtained from their employing school boards in Canada under a two-year loan-of-service agreement. Interested applicants apply to their employing board for such an assignment. The board reviews all applications received and forwards suitable nominations to the Department of National Defence. The National Defence Headquarters Teachers Selection Committee makes the final selection. (b) 296 (including direction, administrative and teaching staffs). (c) The employing board continues to pay the salary authorized under their salary agreement whilst the teacher is assigned overseas. The department reimburses the board for monthly salary payments made. (d) Foreign service allowance for teachers is calculated in the same manner as for members of the Canadian Forces and the amount may fluctuate according to the cost of living or post indices established by Statistics Canada. Other factors that have an influence are salary entitlements, length of service overseas and whether the teacher is accompanied by dependants. The minimum and maximum allowances now vary between approximately $300 to $700 per month. (e) (i) Teachers are entitled to travelling allowances as though proceeding on duty as a member of the Canadian Forces. (ii) Teachers are covered for adequate hospital-medical insurance under provincial health insurance plans, where extended outside Canada, or under the Canadian Teachers Association in Europe (CTAE) Group Plan, a health care plan sponsored by the Canadian Premier Life Insurance Company.

2. The provisions of the recently amended Special Voting Rules (Schedule II to the Canada Elections Act) include provisions for the taking of the votes, at a general election, of Canadian Forces electors, including teachers and administrative support staff at Canadian Forces schools outside Canada, and their eligible dependants residing with them.

3. Members of the Canadian Forces (as well as employees of all Canadian departments) are deemed residents of Canada pursuant to paragraph 250(1)(b) of the Income Tax Act. Any foreign service allowance received by such members is specifically exempted from tax under subparagraph 6(1)(b)(iii) of the Act. School teachers are subject to tax under subsection 115(2) of the act and there is no similar provision exempting teachers from paying tax on foreign service allowance. However, in order to rectify this anomalous situation a remission order, titled "Department of National Defence Overseas School Staff Income Tax Remission Order 1976", permits a teacher to elect to be taxed as though he was a member of the Canadian Forces. Therefore, if a teacher makes the election there will be a remission of federal income tax which was paid on the foreign service allowance. It is expected that most provinces will also approve a remission of provincial taxes in respect of foreign service allowances although this matter has not yet been finalized.

TORUTEIN

Question No. 493—Mr. Nystrom:

Is Torutein, manufactured by Amoco Foods Company in the United States, a torula yeast grown on pure alcohol and do advertisements for the product claim that it replaces milk solids, improves meat flavour and binds fats and water, replaces dried egg yolks, imparts a smooth mouthfeel and enhances sour cream flavour and, if so (a) what tests have been done by the Health Protection Branch, Food and Drug Administration or the Company to indicate that this product is safe for human consumption (b) what tests have been done to indicate that Torutein, which is used to replace milk solids and egg yolks, provides the same nourishment (c) under what regulations is the product being sold in Canada and are there any regulations which would limit its use in food products?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Torutein, manufactured by Amoco Foods, is a Torula yeast (Candida utilis) which is grown on food grade ethyl alcohol, using a continuous aseptic fermentation process. The yeast is grown as a pure culture under controlled conditions designed to give uniform products. The yeast is continuously harvested, concentrated by centrifugation, pasteurized, spray dried, and bagged using sanitary processes as normally found in the dry milk industry. The advertisements for Torutein do claim that its use improves meat flavour; binds fats and water; imparts a smooth mouthfeel; enhances sour cream flavour in dressings, sauces and dips; and partially replaces non-fat dry milk and eggs, for functional and organoleptic purposes, in certain unstandardized baking formulas. (a) Amoco Foods Company had done chemical, microbiological, nutritional and toxicological studies on Torutein, and the results of these studies indicate that the product per se is safe for human consumption. (b) Data provided by the manufacturer indicate that the nutritional quality of Torutein differs from that of dried egg yolk and milk solids. It is higher in protein although of a lower nutritional quality and contains higher levels of B vitamins except vitamin B12 and folic acid. Its total mineral content is comparable to that of milk solids but it contains negligible amounts of calcium and more magnesium and iron. (c) Torula yeast has been used as a Food ingredient for a considerable period of time. Although there are no regulations controlling the sale of the product per se, its sale as a food or food ingredient is subject to the general provisions of the Food and Drugs Act relating to safety and lack of deception. Torutein may be used as an ingredient in unstandardized foods. While there are no legal limitations on its level of use in these foods, its upper use level is self-limiting at around 3 per cent due to undesirable colour, texture and yeasty taste. Most staple foods are subject to standards of composition in the Food and Drug Regulations which specify the ingredients which may be used in those foods. The Health Protection Branch policy has been to consider Torutein used in condimental proportions to be "seasoning", and therefore its use has been permitted in those standardized foods for which provision is made for "seasoning". The addition of Torutein in condimental proportions to standardized foods should not replace any nutritive ingredient. If Torutein were used in higher than condimental proportions as a replacement for nutritious ingredients, a different set of circumstances would exist. It is the policy of the Department of National Health and Welfare to ensure that substitution of ingredients does not decrease the nutritional quality of the diet. For example, regulations were recently promulgated requiring that any protein sources added to meat and poultry products to extend the protein or used to simulate meat or poultry products contain protein and vitamins and mineral nutrients in amounts equivalent to those found in meat. Torutein used in more than condimental proportions in meat or poultry products would be subject to these regulations. The development of such regulations is an ongoing process in response to the development of new foods.

CANADA CENTRE FOR REMOTE SENSING

Question No. 549—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is there a division within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources known as the Canada Centre for Remote Sensing and, if so, what work does the division carry out and does it produce map images of various areas from satellite transmissions?

2. Were copies of such maps available from the Department at a price of $4.00 each during last year and did it take approximately ten days for an order to be filled?

3. Was the sale of such items turned over to a private company known as ISIS of Prince Albert, Saskatchewan and, if so (a) for what reason (b) was the price raised to $10.00 and, if so, for what reason (c) are orders placed with ISIS in Prince Albert still filled by the Department and postmarked from Ottawa, despite the fact that such items bear a Prince Albert address and, if so, for what reason?

4. Are cheques in payment of such items made to the private company and, if so, for what reason is this being done if the government is still involved in any way and what return does the government receive under the present fee of $10.00 as compared to the previous fee of $4.00?

Mr. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. Yes. The Canada Centre for Remote Sensing acquires and disseminates remotely sensed data of Canada, taken from aircraft and earth observation satellites, to a large number of private and government users throughout Canada. This is a largely subsidized operation with a gradually increasing rate of cost recovery. The branch also conducts research into computerized image analysis and into new sensor applications. Yes, CCRS does produce map images of various areas from satellite transmissions.

2. Yes, copies of colour map images were available from the department last year at a subsidized price of $4. It took approximately eight weeks for a first colour order of a particular image to be filled after receipt of the satellite transmission. Repeat orders were filled in approximately ten days.

3. Yes. (a) This decision was in keeping with the government's "Make or Buy" policy whereby some 'in-house' activities are being transferred to private industry in order o assist private industry and to reduce the number of government employees. It was also in keeping with the government's policy of decentralizing government activities outside of Ottawa. (b) Yes, the price was raised to $10 this year to cover overhead and marketing costs of ISIS and to provide for a contribution to the NASA station charges, newly instituted in 1977. This $10 price is similar to that charged by U.S. distributors. (c) Yes, a few orders placed with ISIS in Prince Albert are still filled by the department and postmarked from Ottawa. The transfer to ISIS is still in a transition phase. Under the terms of the EMR contract with ISIS, ISIS was given six months to fully take over the ordering and distribution function for the LANDSAT products. In the meantime, orders are filled by EMR staff and the name and address of ISIS appears on the order.

4. Yes, cheques in payment are made to the private company. The government in this case is the manufacturer and the private company is the marketing and distributing agent. ISIS' selling prices for a series of colour products range from $10 to $30. On total sales of $10,323 from May to October, 1977, the government received $7,505.

12. Does the Planning Branch presently concern itself with the review of existing policies and programmes or the analysis of proposed policies or programmes?

13. Does the Efficiency Evaluation Branch presently concern itself with the review of existing policies and programmes or the analysis of proposed policies or programmes?

14. Are any of the planning and evaluation studies undertaken by the Efficiency Evaluation Branch used in the budgeting process?

15. Are any of the planning and evaluation studies undertaken by the Planning Branch used in the budgeting process?

16. Are any of the planning and evaluation studies undertaken by the Efficiency Evaluation Branch done in cooperation with the Auditor General?

17. Are any of the planning and evaluation studies undertaken by the Planning Branch done in cooperation with the Auditor General?

18. What will be the relationship between the proposed Comptroller General and the Planning Branch?

19. What will be the relationship between the proposed Comptroller General and the Efficiency Evaluation Branch?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. The mandate of the planning branch of the Treasury Board Secretariat was derived from section 5(1) (c) and 5(1) (d) of the Financial Administration Act.

2. The initial terms of reference of the planning branch were to initiate and undertake studies of the effectiveness of selected government programmes and the efficiency of selected administrative units and, as techniques and methods of evaluation are developed, to transmit them to departments.

3. The planning branch was not restricted to studying proposed or existing policies and programmes. It could both review existing policies and programmes and analyse proposed policies and programmes.

4. Twenty-five man-years were budgeted each year since the 1970-71 estimates for the study of economy and efficiency by the performance measurement policy division.

5. Forty-eight man-years were budgeted each year for the effectiveness evaluation division to ensure that programmes are effective and that the desired results and benefits of the programmes are being achieved.

6. The information requested refers to internal departmental projects of a confidential nature and cannot be released.

7. The information requested refers to internal departmental projects of a confidential nature and cannot be released.

8. The planning branch did not undertake studies which led to the decision to disband Information Canada, the Company of Young Canadians or the Local Initiatives Programme.

9. Yes, the mandate of the planning branch has recently been changed.

10. The organization division and the task force on decentralization shifted from the planning branch to the programme branch to rationalize the resource reallocation process.

11. The organizational status of the performance measurement policy division has not been changed. It is a division within a new branch called the efficiency evaluation branch. In addition to being responsible for the board's performance measurement policy work, the new branch is responsible for policies governing procedures for evaluation of programmes by departments.

12. The planning branch currently concerns itself with both the review of existing policies and programmes and the analysis of proposed policies and programmes.

13. The role of the efficiency evaluation branch is to develop and ensure the application of policies, procedures and practices to evaluate and report upon the efficiency and effectiveness of government programmes. The branch is therefore concerned with ensuring that there are appropriate policies and procedures concerning performance measurement and programme evaluation. The branch does not review or analyze existing and proposed policies and programmes.

14. As noted in the response to question 13, the efficiency evaluation branch does not conduct planning and evaluation studies of programmes. However, the two policies for which it is responsible, performance measurement and program evaluation procedures, do relate to the budgeting process. One of the requirements of the performance measurement policy is that measures of the performance of programs be supplied by departments, where feasible, in support of their annual resource allocation requests. The policy governing evaluation of programmes by departments provides for the Treasury Board to participate in such evaluations, where this would be of use in arriving at resource allocation decisions. There is a constant liaison between the efficiency evaluation branch and the programme branch in this work.

15. Yes, the programme branch use planning branch studies in the budgeting process.

16. A close liaison has been established between the Study of Procedures in Cost Effectiveness (SPICE) team of the Officer of the Auditor General and the efficiency evaluation branch. This liaison is to assist SPICE in carrying out its study. A joint review of the "procedures" used for measuring the performance of the income security programme of the Department of National Health and Welfare was carried out by SPICE and efficiency evaluation branch staffs. There are also frequent exchanges of information of techniques for carrying out these reviews of procedures.

17. No, there are no planning and evaluation studies undertaken by the planning branch in cooperation with the Auditor General.

18. As with the rest of the Treasury Board secretariat, all planning branch material will be available to the Comptroller General.

19. The President of Treasury Board plans to transfer the efficiency evaluation branch to the Comptroller General following passage of the legislation establishing the Comptroller General.

BANK ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND OPERATION TO APRIL 1, 1979

Hon. Otto E. Lang (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that in March of this year the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), introduced a bill to amend sections 6 of the Bank Act and Quebec Savings Banks Act to permit the banks incorporated under those acts to continue to carry on business until March 31, 1978, nine months beyond the date specified. The short bill before us today will further extend the banks' powers to do business until March 31, 1979.

The reasons given in March for the delay in the decennial revision were the following. First, the extent of consultations encouraged by the white paper. Second, the extent and complexity of the task of converting the principles of white paper into legislation and particularly, where appropriate, making the Bank Act consistent with the principles and provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act and, third, the extent of the pressure of other priorities on the small group of legislative drafters in the Department of Justice.

The consultative process based on the white paper has largely ended but the other two reasons have continued to be a source of delay. However, I am now able to report that the preparation of the legislation is nearing completion and the bill will soon be ready for introduction. This bill will result in an extensively remodelled Bank Act, important amendments to the Quebec Savings Bank Act, amendments to the Bank of Canada Act and the Bills of Exchange Act, and will establish the statutory framework for the creation of the Canadian payments association. It is my minister's intention to introduce this legislation as soon as possible in this session.

The package of legislation I have just described will, of necessity, be long and complex, reflecting, with some changes, the proposals of the white paper on banking legislation. To ensure that parliament will be able to debate the issues unimpeded by a time constraint, and to resolve any uncertainty about the life of the existing act, we are proposing that parliament should proceed immediately with the bill to extend further the powers of the banks to do business.

The bill is quite straightforward, extending the banking powers to March 31, 1979, and reintroducing the wording of sections 6 of both acts as it was prior to the amendment earlier this year. That wording provides flexibility and acts as a safeguard in the event that parliament is not sitting at the end of March, 1979, and has not by then passed the general revision legislation or a further extension bill.

As indicated, we will bring forth the comprehensive banking legislation as soon as possible, and we look forward to full and useful committee consideration and debate.

We assure hon. members that the objectives remain those set out in the government's white paper, that is, to provide for a fair and responsive evolution of Canada's payments system, recognizing the growing importance of near-banks in the financial transactions of the nation; to provide more reasonable rules for the entry of new institutions into banking, or the conversion of existing institutions into banks; to deal with the question of foreign-owned banking institutions in Canada; to deal in detail with the business and corporate powers of the banks.

In all of these areas the goal is to encourage more competition in Canadian banking, while keeping control of our banking and financial system in Canadian hands.

We are confident that these goals are supported by all sides in this House. The extension bill will guarantee us the opportunity to give the new, comprehensive legislation which is to follow the full debate and scrutiny it deserves.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to show any disrespect for the parliamentary secretary, he is a pleasant enough chap, but I think that we on this side of the House feel that the government is now showing its traditional incompetence and laissez faire attitude in dealing with this legislation. We are now in the opening day of the resumed session, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien)—who privately had indicated to me his great desire to get through this bill and told me he hoped he would be able to table for first reading the government's proposals to amend the Bank Act by the Christmas adjournment or, if not, shortly thereafter—chooses—and the choice is his because he makes his out of city appointments as he sees fit—not to be here today. All I can say is that the debate is going to be longer than shorter because I do not think we should handle parliament that way.

With all due respect to the parliamentary secretary, I know he was handed a high smelling basket on this occasion and it is not his fault, but, frankly, I had hoped, when I discussed this first with the Minister of Finance, that he would agree to one speech from each representative of the parties, if need be, and that we should then go into committee of the whole House to amend the motion. I still hope we can amend the motion so that this one paragraph bill does not go to committee and through all the weighty business of the legislative process that flows from that, and that we can dispose of the bill in a matter of an hour and a half in the House. That is what should be done with a bill of this kind, but the circumstances have changed, and my caucus colleagues have convinced me that we should act otherwise.

The revisions of the Bank Act, such as they are today, do not have the same high profile that the 1976-77 revisions had. At that time there was a statutory ceiling on interest rates, there were user charges and minimum balances, and there was the question of foreign ownership. In other words, the Bank Act was strictly out of kilter with business conditions. At that time people were feeling pretty excited about the Bank Act. At the present time there is not that high profile in the general community with regard to banks. Despite this lower profile in the mind of the public there is a very great and urgent need in the business community—and there has been for a long time—for a more up-to-date system of financial institutions. The structure has to be changed.

I remember back in 1972 or 1973 telling the former minister of finance, Mr. Turner, that he should set up a royal commission on banking and financial requirements in Canada, bearing in mind the great increase in the importance of banks. This had been a question in the sixties. The 1966-67 revision was a second go around following the Porter commission report. The government had come up with an atrocious bill. The Porter commission was based on statistics of the late 1950s and early 1960's and on operations based on the 1954 revision.

There has been a fantastic change in business operations and requirements for financing in Canada. It is almost as though we have moved an age in light years. However, the government did not see fit to set up an inquiry and, frankly our Bank Act is totally out of date with our requirements, to the detriment of economic activity in this country. I do not care whether it is for a small operator or a large multinational corporation; our Bank Act is totally out of date. Chartered banks are into all kinds of activities, but they would like to be into many more in a different form.

What I find more disconcerting than anything else are the activities which are beyond the control of the Minister of Finance and the review of the Inspector General of Banks. Let us consider the operations of the so-called satchel, or suitcase, bankers. They represent foreign business interests. They are able to drop into hotel rooms for a week or two weeks in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver or anywhere else, and carry on their operations. They are able to sign up substantial sums of Canadian savings, finance, make bridge loans, provide intermediate financing or engage in supplementary lines of credit. They can do a number of things. They are not every-day banking operations which cash cheques, open savings accounts, sell travellers cheques and provide traditional over-the-counter banking services. These services are provided by chartered banks, but we also see them provided at credit unions and caisses populaires. There are national and provincial trust companies which also carry on the business of banking, and that to me is the key.

Under the British North America Act the Government of Canada is assigned exclusive jurisdiction over money and banking. I suggest that this is one item in the constitution which is distinguished by its breach 24 hours a day. There are credit unions, caisses populaires and trust companies which carry on the business of banking without any supervision whatever and with total disregard for the monetary policies set down by the Minister of Finance in the discharge of his legal responsibilities. He has no control over them. Our economy is going along on a lopsided pace because of that. If there are rules and guidelines for those who engage in the business of banking, I think they should be complied with.

I said ten or 15 years ago that there is no jurisdiction residing in a provincial government over the conduct of the business of banking, or what is called the quasi business of banking, simply because institutions conducting these operations are incorporated under some form of provincial legislation. One might as well say that because provincial governments have the conduct of the policies and operations of provincial trust companies because they are incorporated under charters issued under the corporation laws of the provinces, in the same way those provincial governments could say to companies carrying on the business of flying by charter or by schedule that "we will lay down the rules with regard to the air operations of your company, the conditions for issuing licences for aircraft and licences for your personnel, et cetera" simply because those companies are incorporated under provincial corporation laws. To me you cannot have it both ways.

I know that one of the problems with the delay in this legislation has to do with the first of the proposals contained in the white paper dealing with a Canadian payments system whereby provincial governments and credit unions are not agreeing to pay the freight to belong to a Canadian payments system. They want all the benefits without assuming any of the obligations. If they want to engage in the business of banking, they should assume the obligations, but the procedure adopted by the government of the day through the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), who was then minister of finance, and under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act of the 1960's, was to seek the consent or approval of the provinces to set up such a system. The door was opened wide and, of course, there is very much co-operation and so forth.

When the shoe is on the other foot and the government moves into an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, it often takes little time for some of the provinces to say, "Keep your cotton picking hands off and stay out." I wish they would sometimes observe that in reverse.

The Bank Act expired on June 30, 1977. It was extended by Bill C-39 passed by this House last April, which is to expire on March 31 next. A rather complicated formula was included in the bill. I would have preferred an extension to July 1, bearing in mind what appeared to be some reluctance on the part of the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) to do anything about the white paper as far as the standing committee was concerned, but the compromise was made for March 31, 1978. The effective date now, therefore, is March 31, 1979, and if parliament is not sitting at that time a formula date is to be decided by this House and the other place.

At the conclusion of this debate I will ask the parliamentary secretary to level with this House. I know that one of the considerations is the report of the commission on corporate concentration. When the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) was minister of finance he was always being asked when that was coming forward. Why talk about issuing a white paper when, if the report on corporate concentration is to be worth the paper it is written on, it will make some observations about directorates of the major financial institutions of this country? I do not prejudge that report one way or the other. It may have some very worth-while recommendations to make, but since the administration of our chartered banks and trust companies is of such material import it does not seem to have been worth publishing the white paper of August, 1976. Is it to be thrown in the waste basket because subsequent recommendations are more valid? I have never been able to follow this government's thinking, Mr. Speaker.

This procrastination goes all the way back to the former minister of finance, Mr. Turner. It may have been that his hands were tied by the fact that this government was in a minority position between 1972 and 1974 and was unwilling even to crack a smile for fear it might be thought to be prejudiced. After 1974, when there was a growing unease between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the then minister of finance which culminated in a banging door—"Comme on dit en claquant les portes" resignation by the minister and the appointment of the hon. member for Rosedale as minister of finance, we were into the swim of wage and price controls.

During all of this time the other place was able to consider the contents of the white paper and received representations from interested parties which were of limited value. I am going to suggest that when and if the bill incorporating the amendments to the new Bank Act come in, hon. members of the other place will have to go through the whole process again because conditions will have changed.

Knowing some of the background, it seems to me that the white paper was not referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs because of the unwillingness of the then minister of finance and the government House leader to have a lengthy debate. The opposition was asked to agree to a quick referral of the white paper and then, if the government brought in the bill, to agree that the second reading would be pro forma and the contents of the bill superimposed on the white paper. I never heard of such a mish-mash in my life, Mr. Speaker, and I would have no part of it.

This points out the total inadequacy and the lunatic system of committees that we have in this House whereby legislation and estimates are referred to standing committees. At times the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs may have half a dozen bills lined up, as well as the estimates for many departments and agencies. It is by far the busiest committee on average.

It is my view that, in the consideration of estimates, parliament's job is the examination and provision of supply as soon as the blue book on estimates comes down. This year that may occur next week or in the early part of February, but the guillotine falls on May 31. No legislation should go through any committee under this system. A change has been offered to the House but people are frightened of change. There is no way a white paper or Bank Act should be prevented from being referred to a committee on banking—a committee which would die after it accomplished its work. As things stand, the government will not get second reading of the bill and consideration by the committee before May 31.

Let us examine the sequence, Mr. Speaker. There will be a debate on Second reading and at that time members on both sides of the House will be heard in extenso because banking is so important. It is twelve years since banking was discussed in depth in this House so we can expect an extended debate. Then there will be public hearings.

It takes a matter of six weeks at least between the reception of a report and the commencement of public hearings. Notices have to be published across the country inviting representations and, depending upon the public reaction, it may be that the hearings will take longer than anticipated. The committee then makes a report which may have some extensive changes. The government has to take time to consider those recommendations and either at committee stage, or the report stage, bring in a whole series of amendments which will occasion debate; and on it goes.

It is a long process, but the act is one of the most important ones we have on the statute books. Mr. Speaker, I cannot foresee that even in an off election year that there should be a shortened process. Certainly it would be shorter if one had special legislative committees rather than just standing committees to consider estimates and legislation each vying for the necessary time. Some day there will be a revolution in some of the thinking around here with regard to our committee structure, and we will have a vehicle that will be far more effective. I am looking at the government chief whip. He knows whereof

I speak; he has seen the framework and I think he understood my purpose, but he was scared by it. He thought he had too many committees to get too many people for. He is wasting away to a shadow, literally in trying to man the committees as they now stand. We are very glad to see the congenial whip back functioning in full bore in his duties now.

Why should there be changes in the Bank Act? First of all incorporation. In the last couple of years we have had that unedifying process of trying to incorporate the Continental Bank via a private member's bill. If there ever was a more disgraceful procedure, costly, uncertain, undignified, unworthy of this House, it was the performance with regard to the Continental Bank. There are certainly proper guidelines laid down by administrative requirements with the control by the governor in council of issuing the permit to commence business after the Inspector General of Banks is satisfied that all the minimum requirements are met. There is absolutely no reason why banks should not be incorporated in the corporate affairs branch.

Then we come to the Canadian payments system. Frankly the credit unions and the trust companies in their desire to participate in the payments system strike me as people wanting to ride a bus and not wanting to pay. They want a free ride. There is no way in my book that that should happen.

And, as I mentioned earlier there are the activities of the foreign banks in Canada. I am not going to say that foreign banks are bad per se. They themselves must think it is a joke right now in the way they can operate without any supervision whatsoever; except if they establish an incorporated subsidiary and carry on from a well posted place. There are foreign controlled banks; there are foreign banks. There is a distinction.

One of the strengths of the Canadian chartered banks system is the extent to which the major Canadian banks are able to operate abroad and, to the extent that they have done so, the strength they possess in certain markets, New York for example. Now, as sure as big apples come from little apples, if the Canadian government in a moment of irresponsibility decided to clamp down and subject foreign banks to impossible conditions, the quick result would be that foreign jurisdictions, the government of the United States, or the legislature of the state involved, or any European country, or any other country in which Canadian banks operate, would retaliate, and not necessarily on a tit-for-tat basis.

There is no way that there can be a sort of punitive control imposed on foreign banks. We invite the competition, but you know right now it isn't competition. Everything is loaded against Canadian banks dealing with some foreign competitors who have no standards to meet, no expenses to meet and who can come in and offer a major line of credit at a quarter per cent or half a per cent less.

I heard of one case today where a large Canadian corporation was offered a line of credit of $60 million. They owed about maybe $200 million, that is potentially in the line of credit extended to them. They were offered a line of credit of $60 million at something less than prime. Why all it took was a flying visit from a representative to call in on the board of directors a few phones calls, and maybe a lunch or two. Of course they can shave off maybe a quarter per cent, or even three eighths of a per cent. But, on $60 million, that means a lot. Fortunately the Canadian bank told its customer that if they wanted to take that line of credit that they could call up the competitor and, ask them to take on the other loan too. Nothing, of course, was heard about the whole blessed operation. But that is the sort of competition, totally unfair and irresponsible and beyond the supervision of the Inspector General of Banks.

I would like to see well defined definitions and guidelines for the conduct of merchant banking in Canada. Goodness knows how many merchant bankers there are from the United States, from Britain, France, and Germany who participate in Canada. Why shouldn't Canadians representing Canadian financial interests participate in the direction and in the administration of Canadian business that they could finance? They cannot do it now; it is impossible.

We want a modern, up-to-date financial system, not one that copes only with the conditions that apply today but with conditions ten years in the future and lays the framework for the next 25 years. That is what we need, not something that looks back at the model "T". You do not build a modern car by looking at a 1945 model. Unfortunately, that is what is being done with the Bank Act. We have to do a lot of rethinking with regard to this.

There is going to be a report by the commission on corporate concentration. I will be very interested in that document. It may show some ways of doing away with difficulties in the structures of banks at present. There are not enough directors representing ordinary shareholders.

I wish to mention a few other matters with regard to banks. I would like to see a reduction in the value and quantity of the qualifying shares of directors. It should not be necessary that you be a director of Power Corporation, Massey Ferguson, Sun Life or any other major company in order of qualify for a bank directorship. They should sort of democratize.

Qualifying shares of some banks today cost as high as $50,000 or $60,000. If the bank wants you as a director and you have empty pockets, they will lend you the $50,000 or $60,000 to buy the qualifying shares. That is wrong. Such a director will be beholden to the administration of the bank. There is a very great danger that that individual will be beholden to the administration and really be a tame director. That is not necessary and should not be there.

There are many other changes we would like to see. I will not go into them in detail. They call for getting on with the changes to the Bank Act. The parliamentary secretary said "at some time in the future", "as soon as possible". That leaves us in a very unsatisfactory position. It is not because parliamentary business is being upset or that it is going to come on in an election year. I am almost prepared to bet some of our good currency that, depending upon the date of the election, it could be that we will be back before this House asking for a further extension. I do not see any activity on the bill prior to June. If the election is not in June but in October or November, then along comes the introduction of the Bank Act and first reading. Second reading will take some time.

I have already shown what the waltz steps are with regard to the public hearings. Therefore, March 31, 1979, will be long past history before the bill is passed and time is given to the banks to get into position. There will have to be a further extension. As one says, that is a hell of a way to run the store.

This goes right back to the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Turner. He missed the boat in 1973 by either failing to persuade the administration or not coming to the decision to have a royal commission, on the style of the Porter commission, laying out in clear terms the requirements of the Canadian financial system for the next generation, seeing what dramatic change there has been in the past 20 years. If that had been done, we would not be talking about this bill today. We would have a new Bank Act in position.

As a final point, the Inspector General of Banks should not play such a passive role. His is a role of merely receiving reports and seeing that certain things qualify under the guidelines and regulations. It is not an initiative on his part to examine as far as I would like. We had the operations of one of the banks that was carrying on here for a while. The public was saved from any disaster by reason of the fact that the other banks arranged that one of them would purchase the business. That is not good enough. The Inspector General of Banks must have more investigative powers than that.

I foresee a much wider role for the Inspector General in that an awful lot more institutions would have to qualify under the Bank Act. If they are carrying on the business of banking, they will have to pay their dues. There is no such thing as a free ride. If people want to carry on the business of banking, let them or their organization comply with the regulations that are designed, not necessarily to protect the competition but to protect the public. It is on that basis that I and my colleagues are very critical of the government with regard to the timing and casual approach to it. Therefore it is conceivable that later this day we will express our displeasure in another way.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the government's decision to postpone again revision of the Bank Act is a sure sign to the Canadian people of the inefficient way the country is being administered by this cabinet and this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

The government has experienced for the past five years, not to mention the past ten years this Prime Minister has been in power, a tremendous growth in the civil service. Here, in the national capital region, there has been a dramatic increase in highly paid civil servants in the Prime Minister's office, the Finance Department, and in the Bank of Canada.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Despite the fact that the Bank Act was supposed to be revised in 1977, the government is now requesting another delay. It will be 1979 before we get around to the so-called decennial revision that was supposed to be done in 1977.

Inflation and unemployment in this country, coupled with the flip-flop by the Prime Minister on wage and price controls, long ago convinced many Canadians that, despite the problem of national unity, this government does not know where it is going with the economy.

The uncertainty and the drift which are apparent at the present time, and which have been building for some time in the business sector of the economy, are being added to by such things as the inability of the government to revise the Bank Act on schedule.

● (1602)

The Bryce Commission on Corporate Ownership is, I understand, almost completely ignoring the extent of financial concentration which finds expression in the chartered banks. As parliamentarians we should be concerned about the expression used by Allan Fotheringham in the January 23 issue of Macleans to the effect that Canada "is controlled not by politicians but by a system of interlocking directorships, with the banks as the lynch-pin." This statement seems scarcely exaggerated in the light of recent economic events. We have seen, for instance, Inco shifting certain of its operations to Guatemala and Indonesia at the cost of thousands of Canadian jobs; we have learned of other multi-national corporations deciding to move parts of their operations to countries abroad with a corresponding loss of employment here. Unfortunately, such actions are not discouraged by a government which, far from protesting, supports the corporations lavishly by offering them all kinds of fiscal loopholes and tax breaks, including tax deferrals.

The present over-concentrated and semi-monopolistic banking system is a further factor in encouraging corporate policies of a kind which have been criticized so severely in this House in recent months.

Like so many other big businesses in this country, the banks did not relish the basic premise of the Carter commission that "a buck is a buck from whatever source it comes," though they do not hesitate to act on this premise when dealing with the large non-financial corporations.

Dr. John Porter in his book "The Vertical Mosaic" written, I think it was, in 1966, showed how 907 men in Canada shared 81 per cent of the directorships of the dominant corporations as well as 58 per cent of the bank directorships and a similar proportion of the directorships of the life insurance companies. Mr. Fotheringham, in the article to which I have referred, points out that today the extent of this concentration has become even more pronounced: no more than 300 men centred on the boards of the banks, hold more than 3,000 directorships of corporations with total assets of $700 billion. I may say I am not sure as to the correctness of that latter figure. My information is that nine of the 12 chartered banks in Canada had total assets amounting to $247.4 billion in 1977, up by 21 per cent from the year earlier, with each of the five leading banks increasing its assets—$17.9 billion in the case of the Toronto-Dominion and $23.1 billion in the case of the Bank of Nova Scotia. However, it seems to me Mr. Fotheringham is perfectly accurate in his other statistics.

I suggest the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) should inform himself on what the Norwegian government has done recently to democratize the banking system in that country because its measures serve as a good example, one which we might well follow instead of allowing the economy to be increasingly controlled by the banks and by the large corporations.

At a time when the whole world is seriously concerned about the operations of the OPEC oil cartel and with the possibility of the existence of a uranium cartel—indeed the Prime Minister has suggested that such a cartel might be used effectively in the nickel industry—it is not surprising that the decennial revision of the Bank Act is being continually postponed by a government which does not wish to interfere too greatly with the cozy cartel of Canadian bankers who, in co-operation with the Bank of Canada, have a monopoly on producing money.

The Prime Minister has referred to the bankers publicly as "the worst bitchers of all in the Canadian economy" and has expressed himself as being ashamed of the profits the banks have been making—some $232 million in 1977. Such being the case one might expect that the right hon. gentleman would want to do something about these "bitchers" with the big profits. But such is not the case. What we, as representatives of the people, get, is a request from him and from the government to postpone revision of the Bank Act further.

Let us briefly review bank profits for the year ended October 31, 1977. First, the figures for total revenue. The Royal Bank showed a percentage increase of 12.3, the Bank of Commerce an increase of 11 per cent, the Bank of Montreal an increase of 11.1 per cent, the Bank of Nova Scotia an increase of 13.3 per cent, and the Toronto-Dominion Bank an increase of 10.8 per cent. This, Mr. Speaker, is at a time when the non-financial corporate sector is on its proverbial you-know-what and when the government is spending $1.5 billion trying to get the rest of the private sector moving.

Let us turn, now, to after-tax profits. Between 1976 and 1977 the Royal Bank saw an increase from $157.4 million to $168.8 million. Profits of the Bank of Commerce rose from $145 million to $150 million—I am rounding these figures out, now. In respect of the Bank of Montreal, they went from $95 million to $122 million; for the Bank of Nova Scotia they went from $116 million to $131 million, and for the Toronto-Dominion Bank they went from $92 million to $100 million. That represents the increase in net earnings of these shares for these large corporations.

One of the reasons the government is not anxious to revise the system and get greater control is the fact that the net earnings per share of the Royal Bank went from $4.30 to $4.61 between 1976 and 1977; in relation to the Bank of Commerce they went from $4.19 to $4.32; for the Bank of Montreal they increased from $2.71 to $3.18; for the Bank of Nova Scotia they went from $2.83 to $3.19, and for the Toronto-Dominion Bank they increased from $2.43 to $2.63. That represents pretty darn good profit in light of the remainder of the economy, and shows again the coddling that has gone on and the special protection of power that has been given to these five large banks, along with the central bank, to control the money supply in a semi-monopolistic if not entirely monopolistic system.

Of course we were not surprised to hear from the representatives of these large corporations, that is, the Canadian Bankers' Association, that the white paper produced by the government followed closely the recommendations of that association. Nor were we surprised to see the stock market shares of the five chartered banks with the largest assets rise to the biggest gain in over two years.

There are really only 12 banks in Canada, and among these, the five I mentioned, since they control 90 per cent of all banking assets, are in effect, if not in a theoretical monopoly position, in a semi-monopolistic position, and in respect of many functions are in a monopolistic position because of their role in the open market operations of the Central Bank of Canada in increasing or decreasing the money supply of this nation.

These banks have historically managed to keep unions at arm's length, even though they control 60 per cent of all consumer lending in this country, by being allowed by the government here in Ottawa to have these so-called banker's hours.

These large banks have ostensibly favoured women for their staff positions such as tellers, etc., where they constitute some 70 per cent of the labour force in the banking industry, but they make sure that only 2 per cent of them ever get management positions. However, the chairman and chief executive officer of the Royal Bank of Canada, Mr. Earle MacLaughlin, had the gall to say they could not find competent women in Canada in the field of economy to sit on the boards of directors. Apparently there are too many Senators looking for the jobs. This is so even though up until 1970 there was only one male head of a Canadian bank who had ever been to a university. In spite of this he suggests that women are not competent to sit on the boards of directors and get a little share of the patronage that is being dished out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hogan: Of course these banks do not need to worry about such controls being placed on them because the Senate banking committee is dominated by Liberal appointed Senate members, many of whom are often in the same interlocking directorship system the banks' boards have used to dominate so much of the country and the policies of our federal government.

This cosy little arrangement with the Senate banking committee and the domination of the five big banks under the protection of the federal government verify to a large extent Marx's insight concerning nineteenth century capitalism when he said that the government is but the management committee of the bourgeoisie. This still has a lot of relevance when you read "banks and multinational corporations" instead of "bourgeoisie." I would suggest to you in all seriousness that this insight by Marx is of great relevance to us in the middle of the 19th century—in 1978 here in Canada.

In the Globe and Mail of December 23, 1977, datelined Victoria, British Columbia, the British Columbia consumer and corporate affairs minister Mr. Rafe Mair accused the chartered banks, especially the big five, in some cases of using threats, deceit, outright blackmail and other inconceivable practices in connection with consumer lending. He suggested that the laws which have been violated include the Personal Information Act, the Conditional Sales Act and the Debt Collection Act, among others.

An hon. Member: Good NDP legislation.

Mr. Hogan: All progressive legislation in this country comes from the NDP.

Mr. Roland Frasee, president of the Royal Bank of Canada and also president of the Bankers' Association, said in a letter to Mr. Mair, as quoted in the Globe and Mail, "that provincial legislation, even of general application, is inapplicable to banks".

Mr. Mair argues that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)(Mrs. Campagnolo) will find out what the people think about unemployment in her own riding, which I understand is now reaching some 35 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Tell me how many women are heading the church and I will be quiet.

Mr. Hogan: As I was saying, Mr. Mair argued that consumer credit falls in the area of general civil, commercial or property rights areas of concern, and that under the British North America Act this falls to the province. However, the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Department of the federal government has had nothing to do as far as we can find out in writing the proposed revisions to the Bank Act. As I implied earlier, that was left to the efficiency experts of the Department of Finance and of the Bank of Canada who, in spite of their numbers and expertise, ask for 12 years to do a job that was supposed to be done in ten.

The toadyism of the civil servants in these two departments to the five large chartered banks was seen in the proposal in the white paper to bring the so-called near banks, that is, the trust companies, credit unions and caisses populaires, under some form of federal control which would involve these institutions being required to have some form of reserve requirements with the Bank of Canada.

[Mr. Hogan.]

The credit union movement has opposed the white paper for this reason and the provincial governments have generally supported them. The caisses populaires in Quebec have opposed the reserve requirements for similar reasons and have been supported by the province of Quebec, which has raised something along the lines of the B.C. suggestion, namely, that there is a problem here involving federal intrusion in a provincial field.

The leader of our party pointed out in a recent address to the small businessmen of the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses that we in the New Democratic Party think that bank loans are too difficult to arrange for small businesses. The Small Businesses Loans Act, which was designed to alleviate part of this problem, has become almost totally ineffective, particularly as we in the Atlantic region have seen. The act guarantees a loan made by a bank or other lending institution to a small business as long as the lender is willing to take a rate of interest lower than market rates. Can you imagine the large banks doing that? However, the upper limit is $75,000, which is not much except for the smallest of operations. Moreover, potential lenders are not required to lend any money under the act. They are not required to do so, and this is absolutely shocking. The decision as to whether the money should be loaned out under the provisions of this act, either at market rates, or at all, is entirely up to the lender.

It is not surprising that not much money is lent out under this act, since it can be lent out at higher market rates through the financial sector and especially the banking system. In that connection the Federal Business Development Bank, a federal agency, similarly has been of little help to small business, something which can be documented easily in the Atlantic region. Most small business spokesmen believe it has not been any more congenial to businessmen attempting to start a new business than have the traditional private sector lenders. I wonder why.

In conclusion, the prime reason given in the white paper, or the prime motive behind the change in the act was to increase competition. That was the same reason given in 1967 for taking the ceiling off the 6 per cent that existed. Real competition has not increased since that time. Mr. Fotheringham has indicated that we have had an increase in concentration. We are aware of that. Every now and then there is a price war among banks, which is immediately called off because they are monopolistic in nature. Already that has been suggested by the study of the Economic Council of Canada. Banks have too much market power in the financial sector.

I should like to refer to a provincial brief and indicate that we agree with the provinces of Canada wherein it is stated:

> We have serious reservations about some of the federal proposals and their possible effect on competition. In particular, the range of bank services is to be expanded substantially while the near banks will face new restrictions. The Canadian Banks, according to the Economic Council of Canada, already possess an inordinate degree of market power.

I believe I have clearly indicated that in my speech today.

It continues:

In addition much of the competition that the banks presently face is from the smaller regional institutions as well as a broad range of specialized financial intermediaries.

These financial intermediaries have been peripheral to the main function of banks.

The brief continues:

Therefore, the white paper's proposals to promote competition could actually reduce the alternatives available in the near banks without affecting the degree of concentration in the banking sector.

The failure of the government last year and again this year to come through with a revision of the Bank Act is due primarily to the increase in public service employees, the expertise in the Bank of Canada, the increase which has occurred in the Department of Finance, and the growth of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which was to have some control over all corporations! That was explained when it was set up, and now we are aware of the fact that it was not involved in the compiling of the white paper. This is not as clear and obvious to the public as the unemployment figures and the cost of living increases, but it indicates the inefficiency of this cabinet and previous cabinets.

Of course the Prime Minister changes his cabinet ministers around so much that they do not get to know their jobs. That is part of the problem. Some cabinet ministers will admit that privately. Obviously the Prime Minister had good intentions about bilingualism and the unity of this country, but he knows absolutely nothing about governing a cabinet that will bring good management to the Canadian economy for the benefit of all. Now he claims he wants to stimulate the private sector, but the revisions to the Bank Act are evidence of gross mismanagement by this government in the last four to five years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks to make with respect to the particular bill before the House today. I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is present now in this Chamber. It will be interesting to hear his remarks in defence of this legislation. Of course, his parliamentary secretary made a few brief remarks when introducing the legislation.

This is not one of the happier moments for the government. For the second time in the life of this parliament it is asking for an extension of the Bank Act. This particular bill sums up the complete lack of economic good sense and management which puts the government in the ridiculous situation of asking for an extension of legislation which is now well beyond ten years out of date. Already this has been stated by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan).

Important changes have taken place in the economic life of this country. The government has recognized particular pressures which were mentioned in its white paper of a year and a half ago. But the government has failed to have any effective discussion or examination of that white paper by a committee of this House.

As was referred to earlier this afternoon, I recall some of the negotiations that were ongoing with respect to a good and searching examination of the government's proposals in regard to the Bank Act. A number of members had certain regional concerns and certain expectations concerning specific amendments which might be proposed. We were extremely hopeful that a number of the issues raised in the Bank Act would be addressed by the appropriate standing committee in an examination of the white paper. That did not occur because the then minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), indicated that it would be more appropriate to wait for the bill itself since the government was anxious to move expeditiously on with this legislation.

The government wanted an opportunity to examine the specific contents of the bill in the appropriate standing committee and perhaps to hear from important and key witnesses across the country. In the last year and a half we have been faced with the situation of having neither. We have received the government's statement or its white paper. Members of the other place have had some chance to examine that document and hear witnesses; but it is obvious that by the time we arrive at a point where the actual contents or the measures proposed can be examined in the other place, it will be so hopelessly out of date that the exercise will have to be renewed again.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member aware that the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs offered to refer this white paper to the committee for study? Also, is he aware that there was unanimity, except for one Conservative member who objected? That member wanted to have a long debate in the House before the white paper was put before the committee. I think the hon. member is not aware of the facts. The Liberal party, the New Democratic Party and the Social Credit party were agreeable to that procedure, but it was vetoed by a Conservative member.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has a very selective memory. I do not recall any decision being made by a member of my party to have extended debate. Certainly there was no position taken either publicly or privately. These are purported facts which the minister is attempting to smuggle in by way of a question.

Mr. Chrétien: It is a fact.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It is a fact in the mind of the Minister of Finance, but I do not know whether it is a fact in the mind of anyone else.

Mr. Chrétien: A fact is a fact.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to inject any partisan note, but I was the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. This question was raised in the House of Commons, and I rose on that occasion. Later in private discussions with the hon. House leader of the Conservative party, it was finally agreed that a mistake in communications had occurred. He indicated that there was no agreement on the part of the Conservative party to take that stance. The fact is that their representative on the committee would not make an agreement to deal with the matter without debate at the referral stage. That is a very simple fact which is well documented, both in the committee and the House of Commons.

● (1632)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It is interesting to see how defensive both these ministers are. Certainly the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) is a persuasive fellow, as we have been reading recently in the local papers. But I do not think either of these defences hold a whole bunch of water because the government, in my view, was never blocked at any time either in the move for its white paper to go to standing committee or in the presentation of draft legislation which could have been examined by the committee. Both the interventions by both hon. members are simply smokescreens to try to protect what is left of their reputation, which is certainly very little at this point in time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): We are faced with this government realizing the kind of major economic problems that we have in this country, and, having nothing better to say after having produced a white paper on banking roughly a year and a half ago, saying at this juncture that what we need now is at least another year's delay, if not more, before we can present any form of amendment to the ten year revision of the Bank Act. If this is the best defence of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Multiculturalism with respect to the situation of their government in terms of dealing with this important legislation, then clearly they have very little to say indeed.

The reason I am speaking in this debate is not that I am an expert on banking, as most hon. members would know, but that I believe that this legislation is central to the wellbeing and economic management activities of this country. The very principle that we have revisions on a regular basis—which is not too often because we do not get them any more often than once every ten years—is an important principle but perhaps one which is not of serious concern to this government. Apparently its members are either being distracted or they are in such poor shape in terms of dealing with these central questions that they have not reached any final decision with respect to the measures that are being advanced in the white paper. Apparently the problems having to do with the growth of near banking activities, or the implications of increased banking activity from foreign sources, or the whole practice of banking in various economic situations across the country, are not of such pressing concern either to the Minister of Finance or to his colleagues that they are prepared at this time to present amendments to the House for discussion. I find it a rather incredible position and in fact I am not at all surprised that the Minister of Finance, for reasons best known to himself, could not be here to speak this afternoon in introducing this bill. I felt somewhat sorry for his poor parliamentary secretary—

Mr. Chrétien: My excellent associate.

[Mr. Cafik.]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): He might be excellent but he was left with the most difficult and embarrassing job of presenting, in as few words as he could muster, the defence for this particular exercise. If anything, on the opening day of the second part of this session this symbolizes a complete abdication of responsibility. I cannot think of anything that indicates that more clearly than the legislation that is before us this afternoon.

Here we are with some of the most serious economic problems that this country has faced for many years, as a recent commentator has said, since the depression, and the government has finally recognized the matter is serious. Certainly the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has learned this lesson as he criss-crossed the country last fall because, while he might not have gone out to meet the ten premiers in the ten provincial capitals with the purpose of discussing economic matters, he came back with that clear message, so much so that when he stood up in December to make an announcement of what he discovered in his fact finding mission, he said he discovered the economic situation in this country was so serious that the first thing that had to be done was to hold a number of preliminary meetings in different sectors to try to solve some of the underlying economic problems that have faced this country for a considerable period of time, roughly paralleling the length of time during which the present government has been in office, and that the major step in this examination will be the holding of a federal-provincial conference on economic questions next month.

With that kind of learning experience for the Prime Minister, and presumably for other ministers including the Mnister of Finance, I find that the government is in a most incredible kind of situation where it is forced on the first day of the resumed session to ask for a further delay in the revision to the Bank Act, without even having the ability, or indeed the good grace, to say, "Look, we are this close to realizing some major decisions with respect to the amendments and very shortly we will be able to table some form of draft legislation and we expect to be able to tell members of the House and the Canadian public what we would like to have happen with respect to the revision of the Bank Act, and we will forward these to the appropriate committee".

It seems to me that it is a clearcut case of mismanagement and of an inability to come to grips with some of the essential questions that face the country at present. While for many of the general public the revision of the Bank Act may seem a rather abstract or erudite exercise, certainly those who are concerned with the efficient and fair working of the Canadian economy believe the question of its updating or clarification, or of helping the banks of this country to work more effectively, is not an inconsiderable and unimportant task. As a matter of fact I believe that the government at one point did think that it was important, otherwise it would not have put forward the white paper in August of 1976.

I am particularly concerned for one or two basic reasons, and one is obviously related to the situation in the Atlantic provinces because of the present functioning of the major chartered banks and the impact of that functioning on regions of economic and social disparity. I had raised this before in the House and I will not pursue it at length this afternoon, but if you examine the situation with respect to banking activities in the Atlantic provinces you will realize that, with roughly 9.5 per cent of the Canadian population, it is not unreasonable to expect that the banks in terms of their lending activity would parallel their basic responsibility in that area in roughly the same percentage fashion.

When I examine the most recent statistics that I have available I find the percentage of Canadian loans to the Atlantic region in 1975 under the Small Businesses Loans Act is as follows: the Bank of Montreal made loans totalling roughly 8 per cent, the Bank of Nova Scotia, 13.8 per cent, the Royal Bank, 7.8 per cent, the Toronto-Dominion Bank, 0.5 per cent, the Canadian Imperial Bank, 8.3 per cent, and all the other chartered banks, roughly 8.9 per cent. I think it is obvious that the performance level of the chartered banks—with the exception of the Bank of Nova Scotia which, even though the major portion of its banking decisions are made in Ontario, maintains a semblance of a head office in Nova Scotia and has a traditional sense of obligation to the Atlantic region—is not satisfactory.

The other aspect that has concerned me, and I had hoped we would have some discussion of it long before this, was the whole situation with respect to the disclosures of major loans, particularly foreign loans, by Canadian banks. This is a question that is being raised increasingly and repeatedly, first of all by a number of non-governmental organizations, including the major churches of this country and others concerned with the question of economic development and human rights, and it is now also being raised by the government itself. Certainly in the policy that was revealed in December by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) concerning South Africa there was a very clear indication that it might have some basic relationship to Canadian corporate activity in the Republic of South Africa.

The problem for all Canadians at present is that it is not possible to know what banks engage in economic activities in South Africa and the extent to which that activity may in effect be supporting the present regime. I find it interesting that in the United States one bank in particular has given some leadership in this situation, and I am referring here to the Bank of America Corporation. If the Minister of Finance has not seen it, he might want to look at the recent speech by the president, Mr. A. W. Clausen, in which he indicated they were seriously addressing the possibility of voluntary disclosure. Indeed, last year he announced the implementation of a decision to appoint five members of his executive group to a task force charged with developing a model disclosure code for the Bank of America and its affiliates and subsidiaries. He said that he gave them a time frame, some ground rules, and a complete set of things to look for.

I believe that these two matters alone—the question of disclosure with respect to the foreign activity of banks, and concern about the regional performance of banking activity in this country—plus the matters already mentioned this afternoon warrant the earliest possible consideration.

The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond referred to the attitude of banks concerning women directors. While the hon. member correctly stated the matter in terms of changing a very discriminatory anomaly in Canadian banking practice, hon. members might be interested in recalling that I have a specific bill on this question presently on the order paper which could easily have been incorporated into Bank Act amendments, had such been presented here this afternoon.

I am not going to address the House any further this afternoon. I think I have made my point very clearly. I think it is unacceptable and shocking that the government, at this late date and with so many pressing matters calling for a revision of the Bank Act, should merely ask for a further delay instead of accepting the responsibility which is clearly that of the government, at least until an election.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak just briefly about the request of the government for a further extension of the Bank Act. Previous speakers have highlighted the disgraceful performance of the government in this delay. It appears that anything having to do with financial or economic problems is delayed and stalled. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is very proud to say that when he was president of the treasury board he was called "Mr. No". In his present portfolio I believe we could call him "Mr. Stall" or "Mr. Delay". I think "Mr. Stall Stall" would be an excellent name for the minister we have today.

I want to speak briefly on behalf of credit unions and caisses populaires which are very concerned about this delay. During this delay more and more foreign banks are setting up shop in Canada and carrying on the business of banking, in all but name, entirely free of government regulation and control. This is unfair competition.

I have received much correspondence from co-operative credit unions in Manitoba. There are 4,000 credit unions across the country with a membership of 7.5 million. We are talking about many people, and they are very concerned about this delay.

I would like to quote from a brief I received from the Co-operative Credit Society of Manitoba Limited as follows:

> Especially of concern to our members is the matter of proposed credit union inclusion in reserving with the Bank of Canada. We feel, and feel quite strongly, that proposals in the white paper in this regard are based upon the long-since antiquated idea that the chartered banks are the only financial institutions of significance in Canada. Also we feel that based upon this outmoded idea, the proposal regarding reserves with the Bank of Canada by all other financial institutions, which is based upon traditional chartered bank operations, is unrealistic.
> This will make competition, the stronghold of any democracy, increasingly difficult for literally every other financial institution in the nation. Certainly it would be particularly harmful to the smaller members within our credit union system.

So again, we feel obliged to draw your attention to the inequity of those specific proposals of the white paper which would impose these reserve requirements on the part of all members of the Canadian payments system. We hold these to be totally inconsistent with the principles of free enterprise. Another more equitable alternative can surely be found. But as indicated in earlier submissions the credit union system is not seeking legislation especially beneficial to its members alone at the expense of other institutions of a financial nature. We want only that which is fair to all.

So we can expect complete co-operation from credit unions. They have certainly been very patient; they have been waiting since 1976 for the Bank Act to be brought forward and for changes which would affect them. They presented an excellent brief to members of parliament back in October, 1976, and I would just like to quote one or two of their major concerns. One of them comes under the heading of "Membership and Structures" and reads as follows:

Credit unions offering "chequing" services wish to have access to the Canadian Payments Association—

Here is another delay. They are waiting for access to this association.

—through the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society Limited. We recognize and accept that, as members of the association, credit unions will be required to bear a portion of their physical operating costs. Their contribution to these costs should be calculated on the basis of volume of items processed.

We believe that participating members should have equitable representation in the management of the association. The management structure that is established should ensure that no single category of financial institution can exercise effective control.

That strikes me as a reasonable request. It is unfortunate that this issue is just going to be left in abeyance for another year. Another credit union and Caisse Populaire concern comes under the heading "Assurance for other clearing system participants" and reads as follows:

In support of its proposals for reserve requirements, the white paper states that these requirements provide "some assurance to participants in the clearing system that cheques which they have cleared, and which are drawn on other member institutions, will be paid". We would like to point out that the same assurance can also be supplied, on a day-to-day basis, by maintaining an adequate settlement account and making appropriate arrangements for Bank of Canada credit. In this respect, we are prepared to lodge Government of Canada securities with the Bank of Canada (to support loans from, or purchase-and-resale agreements with, the Bank of Canada) in an amount that will adequately cover reasonable fluctuations in day-to-day clearings.

For longer-run considerations of financial stability, there is a variety of safeguards that is more than adequate to provide other clearing-system participants with the assurance they require. These safeguards include:

—Provincial liquidity requirements, regulation, and inspection

—Federal liquidity requirements, regulation, and inspection under the Co-operative Credit Associations Act

—Provincial stabilization funds

—Voluntary interprovincial liquidity assurance programs

—Access to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation by the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society Limited and the provincial centrals certified under the Co-operative Credit Associations Act

—Access to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation by provincial stabilization funds

It also might be pointed out that credit union "cheques" are currently honoured with confidence by other institutions in the financial system.

I have been a member of a credit union for many years, and I have always felt very safe in my dealings with it. In many cases credit unions provide better service at less cost than many of our other banking institutions, so we should be co-operating with credit unions in every way we can. Unfortunately, the credit unions will just have to wait. We hope the government will reconsider and bring the Bank Act in at an earlier date. In the meantime, however, seven and one-half million members of credit unions will have to wait for "Mr. Stall" and his bank act.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I shall try not to cover too much of the same ground as I think most members have contributed quite eloquently to the major point, which is that the attempt to delay the institution of changes to the Bank Act is typical of the government's approach to governing the country. In fact what we see is that there is no sense of industrial strategy and no real concern about changing the economy of Canada. If the government were serious about creating employment in Canada and about changing the way we go about our economic business, the place to start would be with the financial institutions of Canada. There is no will on the government side to do so, however.

I noted recently that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) indicated that he does not intend to run in the next federal election. I must say I regret that as I think he has made significant contributions to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I think members of all parties would wish to congratulate him on some 16 years of service to the people of Canada and the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I am sure one of the great frustrations he experienced was not in his present portfolio, but rather in a previous one when he attempted to bring in a Competition Act that had some teeth and some meaning. I think he would agree with this. In fact we have not had the will in Canada to bring forward legislation to change our economic structure in any way. Even the tampering—and I think it was positive tampering—that he attempted in his previous portfolio could have had some very positive effect on economic conditions today. That is why I say that in Canada we have failed to propose an industrial strategy for the country. We have been going from day-to-day with band-aids trying to stop sores that are no longer just oozing blood but are pouring blood. The economic body of this country is dying because of neglect.

One just has to look at the present structure of banking in Canada. We have six major banks. The United States has 15,000 banks, separate chartered institutions actively lending money with some sense of competition—not enough competition but with some sense of competition. There is no competition whatsoever in banking in Canada. About 300 people sit on all the boards of the major banks and they hold some 3,000 directorships in the major corporations of Canada. They have arranged, for example, that in major shopping centres an exclusion clause will apply so that only a particular bank can do business in that area.

Just ask any small businessman about getting a loan. In any small town in the United States, if you want to open a business the first people to visit you will be representatives of the banks in that town asking if you need help. The process is reversed in this country. We put great stone fronts on the banks and people are scared to go in and see the manager. In spite of the "red car convertible loans" and such things, Canadian banking today is still conservative. It contributes nothing to the growth of the economy and, in fact, is compounding our very serious unemployment problem.

It does this government no credit that it has failed to introduce banking legislation to break the monopoly and either to expand the number of banks in competition for loans or get rid of the whole lot in a public way. We cannot have both; we must have one or the other. At the moment we are getting the absolute worst of both worlds in Canada.

British Columbia has special problems. I will go back a few years to the time of the NDP government there. It brought forward some very sensible legislation surrounding the whole question of debt recovery. That legislation remains on the books without amendment by the present administration. It took them a long time but they seem to have realized the wisdom of most of the legislation that they said was so bad during the last provincial election.

One piece of legislation dealt with a vital and importnat issue—it is the "seize or sue" legislation which provides that you do not get two kicks at a debtor. For instance, if you want to seize his car, you can do so, sell it, and thus satisfy the debt. But you are not allowed to seize the car and then sue for the deficiency. That adds insult to injury. The interest rate on the original debt is high enough to cover the risk of loss. The legislation also provided that the goods could not be seized if only one-third of the debt remained; in that case, you had to go after the debt itself.

That is pretty sensible legislation and the present administration in British Columbia has accepted it. Surprisingly, the banks of British Columbia do not accept it and have consistently refused to comply with the law. The courts of British Columbia have told the banks that they are wrong and that the province has jurisdiction in this area. In effect, it has told them that if they are going to lend money on a car or take a chattel mortgage, they must comply with the law of the province.

Here is the catch, Mr. Speaker—the forms to be signed by the borrower have not been changed and the banks insist that there is no law requiring a change. In the forms there is a provision that says that if the borrower does not pay, the bank can seize the car and also sue for the deficiency. In spite of the provincial law, therefore, when you go to see the manager he can simply show you the form and have you sign a note for what you still owe. The banks are thus unjustly enriched, but worse, they are arrogant about not complying with the law of the province to protect debtors. They worry about their corporate image and about being seen as nice guys, but I think it is time they were stripped of that image. I think credit should be given to the minister of consumer and corporate affairs in British Columbia for doing a good job in that area.

There is a solution to this particular conundrum, Mr. Speaker. This government could include in banking legislation a provision that bank forms must be approved by the registrar in consultation with the provincial authority. As with most things, however, the government continues to show neglect.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

I am informed there is a disposition to proceed with motion No. 9 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis). Is there unanimous consent to stand motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Income Tax Act

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO EXEMPT INTEREST ON MUNICIPAL BONDS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to exempt the interest of municipal bonds from income tax.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is appearing in my name for the second time, and the reason for unanimous consent to proceed with it this afternoon is that I did allow it to stand a couple of times in favour of other members who had more pressing matters.

It is unfortunate that private members' hour does not really allow for debate because many of the comments made last time this was introduced, on May 24, 1977, could have been better answered then rather than now. However, as you know, time does not permit. As a consequence I am now bringing this motion forward and I intend to press the motion again and again if necessary until I have some form of support for it.

I am going to deal with the comments that were made when the matter was brought up last year and I intend to add some new arguments. When the matter was brought up last time, the New Democratic Party made an intervention in the afternoon and they actually made mention of three points. First of all they suggested my motion would benefit only the rich. I know that the New Democratic Party have a thing about people being wealthy; however, I think this is nonsense. I started out in municipal life as a councillor for Sidney over 21 years ago and in those days we sold our municipal debentures over the counter to farmers in the area, and they certainly were not wealthy. The New Democratic Party also pointed out that the motion would distort the tax system. The tax system, Mr. Speaker, is so badly distorted as we have seen by the bill this afternoon, the bills in this session so far, and the bills we expect to have, that my suggestion could only serve to clarify it rather than destroy it. Lastly the NDP suggested this would create a tax haven, as in the United States, because the debentures would qualify for deductions. Of course, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I am trying to do, provide a tax haven. In the suggestions which I will make later, I will be able to deal with it in more detail.

The Liberal party intervened also last May 24 and they brought up a number of points which I thought were very interesting. Their first point was that the government had no business changing laws to finance municipal governments. The Department of Urban Affairs was set up to do that exactly, to intervene and meddle in urban affairs. In fact, the municipalities are creatures of the provinces. We know that, their activities are governed by the provinces. But there is nothing to say that when the federal government is given an opportunity at no cost to itself to reduce the tax burden on municipalities and their people, that it should not do just that.

The Liberal party mentioned at that time that it was up to the provincial governments to give city governments more taxing powers. This is the very reason that I wish we could have debated the matter at that point. Frankly my dander was up at that point, and my anger at the nonsensical way in which the arguments were presented would have made for a good debate. It is absolute, utter nonsense to think that the municipal governments could have more taxing powers of their own. They are taking from the people in the municipalities now the maximum amount of money through the realty taxes and there is no way more money could be expected from the taxpayers in that particular way. The provincial governments are powerless to change that situation given the restraints they have to face.

The Liberal members suggested at that time that the proposal which I made would have an unfair impact because high income municipalities and individuals would benefit more than low income municipalities. If that is not identical to the socialist doctrine put forward by the NDP I do not know what is. We expect that socialist doctrine from our friends to the left, but coming from across the way, it seems to me, shows the true nature of the Liberal party rather than a concerted effort to deal with the proposal put before them.

I was delighted to see that the Social Credit party at that point in time supported my motion. It is interesting to know that there are in the House of Commons at least two parties that have a free enterprise format in their policy. It is the only other party in the House obviously that is not a socialist party.

Mr. Speaker, having said that, I want to deal briefly with the fact that the voice of the municipalities in the province of Ontario, The Municipal World magazine, gave some space to my suggestion and they supported it. In doing so they asked for comments from the Minister of Urban Affairs, which I thought was a very good idea. The Minister of Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) did not then participate, as obviously he is not going to this afternoon because he is not in the chamber. However, the Minister of Urban Affairs did put forward some gobbledygook which was written in a bureaucratic type of language which I am confident the minister himself did not write. His argument, written up in the magazine, was that it would not necessarily offer benefits to the cities. Of course, it would offer benefits to the cities. That is the whole purpose of my motion.

The mail which I received from the various cities in Ontario, and at least one from outside Ontario, indicated that the aldermen in those cities thought that it would benefit them. The minister mentioned that because municipalities rely on foreign borrowing the effectiveness of the measure would be limited. Once again, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the point I am trying to make. Because municipalities rely on foreign borrowing, this measure is needed. It is necessary. It would reduce the foreign borrowing of the municipalities and allow them to borrow in Canada with all the benefits going to Canadians.

Once you get through the few pages of double talk in the reply by the minister his final point was that it was unlikely it would enhance the Canadian balance of payments, position "in the short run". Of course it wouldn't enhance the balance of payments position in the short run. That is exactly the point I have been trying to make. In the short run there would be very little difference. But surely to goodness this government can look for once beyond the short run. It could look beyond tomorrow. It could look a few years ahead and make some provision for municipalities and their problems as they continue to grow, so that ten years from now they will be in much better position. The debentures sold with ten, 15 or 20 year coupons will have to be honoured. Those that are being sold today will have to be honoured in ten, 15 or 20 years. It would take that long before this measure could really benefit the municipalities.

I am not going to take the full 20 minutes allotted to me. I want to deal with some points that I may not have fully covered the last time. It may add to my argument.

First, and most important, this is a means of assistance to the municipalities which will not require another costly self-perpetuating bureaucracy. The policy of this party has been clearly enunciated by our leader and others. We do not want to increase the bureaucracy. We have suggested that the controls be removed in a way which would reduce rather than increase the size of the civil service. The proposal I have put forward does not in any way add to the bureaucracy.

Second, unlike the comments by my friends to the left and their colleagues opposite, the small investor would receive a twofold benefit. First, his municipal taxes would be lowered. That was the main thrust of what I said when I presented the motion for the first time last year. The municipal taxes of all taxpayers in the cities, towns, villages and townships in Canada would be lowered. Second, in addition to the benefit of reduced taxes in the municipality, the income would not be subject to income tax. As I said, he would receive a twofold benefit.

More important, the municipalities would be able to finance their public debt from their own citizens. As I indicated a while ago, I started out in political life 21 years ago in Sidney. There we sold our debentures over the counter. If the municipal debentures are sufficiently attractive, there is no reason why they cannot be sold in that way.

I have a tremendous amount of faith in Canadian investors. I know that right now they have very little confidence in the economy of this country. Large amounts of money have been invested in the United States and other countries. I am quite happy to have this referred to as a tax haven. I am confident that given this relief from income tax on municipal debentures, the money will remain in Canada. They could be financed within the communities where the debentures are to be sold.

That would have a corollary benefit, that of adding to the relationship between the citizens and City Hall. They would get to know what is going on in their community much better than they do now. They would feel they are participating. It would make them better citizens and would lead to a better relationship.

I have a very strong feeling it would result in a diminishing of demand for funds in the foreign market. Last time I made the point that some $875 million went out of Canada in payments. Those dollars had to be borrowed in the first place. The resultant diminution of borrowing on foreign markets might well bring down the interest rate even one quarter or one half point. Corporations that borrow abroad, as they necessarily do would be able to borrow at a lower interst rate. The decrease in inflationary pressure would benefit all sources rather than hinder them.

One of the main purposes of the proposed changes in the Income Tax Act would be to enable shareholders and small private companies to receive built up surpluses on a tax free or low tax basis. It would allow them to bring built up tax surpluses into circulation, helping to offset the depressed conditions in which we now find ourselves. This is one more way those tax surpluses could be put into circulation in Canada, making it attractive for people in the cities to invest in their own communities.

As I said before, a good deal of money goes outside Canada into tax havens. A competent professional service is required to enable them to do that. That cost is wasted. Making legal a tax haven for Canadians here at home without the attendant high professional costs would meet the needs of all Canadians and lower interest costs attendant on proposed capital expenditures.

I have gone on longer than I intended. I want to bring out again the two major points of my original proposal. Reliance on foreign markets would be reduced and we would attract investors from Canada. My research indicates that the additional debt surplus would increase. In fact it has increased in recent years.

I was hopeful that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) would take part in the debate this afternoon. He is a highly respected former municipal politician. He is well aware of the truth of what I am saying. He knows this measure would benefit the municipalities. Now that he has a good deal of clout in the Finance Department, I had hoped he might rise in his place and support this motion. However, we will have to wait and see what happens. I am not particularly hopeful. In the past the government has not been very receptive to suggestions that are sensible and which will help the ordinary individual.

I will leave it at this point, with the caution that if this motion is talked out this afternoon I will bring it back again and again until I get it through.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, this motion to permit a tax free treatment of income earned on municipal bonds is one of the oldest chestnuts in the field of taxation. It is not because it has any merit. I do not think it has any merit, for two reasons.

First, because they do it in the United States, the assumption is made that anything that is done in the United States must be better than anything that is done in Canada. Therefore, the idea keeps getting put forward for that reason. Second, it is put forward, and the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) knows this as well as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley), because the need of municipalities for funds is extreme. Their responsibilities far exceed the revenue base they have been given by the provincial governments which set them up. I argue that the need alone is no justification for making an amendment; as the hon. member himself indicated in his conclusion, it would be quite a tax rip-off. It would be a tax haven which he proceeded to justify. I do not think it can be justified. I will come to that in a moment.

Before I get to the substance, I want to reply to the two cheap shots the hon. member lowered himself to take during his remarks. In carefully listening to him, I noted only two cheap shots. The first crack was that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) was absent from the House right now. He suggested that indicated a lack of concern for municipalities. If the minister were to be in this House every time the subject of cities is raised, he would have no time for the administration of his department or for meetings with the many delegations across the country that want to meet with him. I hope the hon. member for Hastings was joking when he suggested the Minister of State for Urban Affairs ought to be here to listen to this old chestnut being kicked around again. I would much prefer to have the minister spend this hour doing the administrative side of his job, there being such a heavy demand upon his time.

● (1722)

The second cheap shot the hon. member for Hastings took was that directed toward the Liberal party.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Kaplan: He said that because we opposed a measure which so obviously favoured the rich, we were therefore socialists. The hon. member was drawing a far-fetched conclusion; there is a great deal of difference between being a socialist and simply wanting a fair tax system, which is the kind of system this party favours. It is simply a question of resisting the introduction into the system of benefits which would do far more for the rich than they would do for municipalities. That is the substantial point and it is one which the hon. member should recognize.

In the United States, where this rip-off has existed for many years, the savings to the rich in the form of income tax concessions have far exceeded the benefit of the lower interest rate which the municipalities are able to achieve by being in a position to offer tax-free bonds to those who buy them. A study recently carried out in the United States for President Carter showed that the loss in taxes to the federal treasury through this income tax privilege was far greater than the saving to the municipalities through lower interest payments. In other words, the municipalities and the whole system in the United States would be better served if municipal bonds were taxable, and if the federal government took the portion of tax which it collected on the interest accruing from municipal bonds and paid it over to the municipalities there would be far more money paid to the municipalities than is now the case through a measure which, in the end, is a tax haven, as the hon. member himself concedes. The fact that it is done in the United States is not, in my opinion, sufficient to recommend the proposal—

An hon. Member: You have always been anti-American!

Mr. Kaplan: This is the first time anyone who knows me has made such a charge against me. In fact, I am very pro-American and very close to the Americans. Nevertheless, I do not think we should copy their mistakes.

I suggest that in addition to it being a rip-off which benefits the rich more than it benefits the municipalities, the proposal of the hon. member for Hastings has the additional disadvantage of operating against free enterprise. I am sure the hon. member's constituents will be sorry to hear he is advocating tax proposals whose adoption would be damaging to free enterprise.

The hon. member, as we know, has been a municipal councillor and he is in a position to understand the need for easier access to capital. I suggest he has a responsibility to look beyond the needs of the municipalities, to stand back and consider the effect of the proposal he is making upon the economy as a whole. After all, his proposal is a far-reaching one and would involve hundreds of millions in lost revenue to the federal treasury, so he ought not to think of it as being simply an easy way by which the municipalities would get extra money. The changes suggested are such as to affect the balance between municipally conducted enterprises and those which operate in the free market.

I should like to quote, if I may, from the report of the Carter Commission on Taxation in which the commissioners rejected out of hand any proposal such as we are considering here. As recorded at page 125 of the fourth volume, the commissioners made this observation:

> Where government undertakes activities which compete with those of private business, the exemption of government instrumentalities from tax to which their privately-owned competitors are subject provides the former with an advantage to which the latter may quite reasonably object. There are many examples of government-owned corporations which compete with privately-owned companies—

Municipalities presently contract out a great many of the activities for which the funds are provided by municipal taxpayers, for example, snow-shovelling, gardening, the cleaning of public buildings and, almost certainly, the construction of buildings which municipalities require. It is evident to me that if the tax benefit proposed were to be available to the municipalities, the balance would change and it would be cheaper for the taxpayers of a municipality through their councils to set up their own contracting companies, buy their own trucks and so on, and take on these jobs themselves because they could secure access to money at lower rates than the private sector.

It is true the municipal taxpayers would benefit—but only as municipal taxpayers. The country as a whole would be poorer because, as I have indicated, the benefit contemplated is one which would cost more than it would save. We would find municipalities putting up buildings and renting them to business, as is the case in the United States today; businessmen there putting up a building have to pay taxes at normal rates, but municipalities can do it themselves a lot cheaper. If you go to the United States looking for a place to open a business, the first thing you find out is that municipalities are prepared to use this tax loophole for the benefit of individual companies. This is not the case in Canada because we have a fairer tax system.

I submit that in the broader perspective there is no advantage to the country in the type of proposal the hon. member recommends. Not only would it be of undue benefit to the rich but it would operate against the interest of free enterprise. I understand that a great many members on this side wish to speak on this proposal and I therefore am not willing to take up more time. But I believe I have demonstrated that we are certainly not socialists and that this is not a measure such as would warrant the attendance of a minister for an hour this afternoon.

● (1732)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to get back to the business of the House of Commons on its first day of the new session, although I am rather saddened by the fact that we are once again debating the somewhat ill-conceived and premature motion of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis). My colleague, the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), has given an adequate position against the motion as outlined by the hon. member for Hastings. I should like to deal with some other ramifications of the motion should it ever be implemented by the government of Canada.

The exemption from income tax of the interest on municipal bonds has been proposed by the hon. member as a means of assisting local governments. The United States provides such an exemption, as my colleague has outlined. It provides this exemption from taxation of interest earned on both state and local bonds. With the exemption, investors would be willing to buy local bonds with rates lower than the rates on corporate or other government bonds. In this way the new tax advantages would be translated into reduced financing costs for the municipalities. The cost of the measure to the government is the forgone income tax revenue on local bond interest, and the benefit to the municipalities is the decreased interest rates.

I find this a very interesting proposal coming from a member of the Conservative party at this time of economic restraint. It appears from positions that have been made public by members of the Conservative party in the last few months that they are going to ride the big, over-spending government hobby-horse into the next election. However, along comes the hon. member for Hastings who proposes that the federal government should then forgo tax revenues in order to implement the kind of motion he has before us.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We would just like to have what you spill.

Mr. Collenette: While the measure would undoubtedly have some success in achieving this result, there are significant defects which make the proposal undesirable for adoption in Canada. It is interesting to note that the interest exemption for state and local bonds in the United States has been widely criticized both within and outside the government. In fact, there have been numerous attempts by the administration to withdraw this exemption and replace it with a direct subsidy or some other form of financial aid which does not have the serious inequities and costly inefficiencies of the current interest exemption.

I know my colleague, the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon), wishes to deal with a number of aspects of the motion. I should like to talk about the problems inherent in the proposal in respect of distribution of benefits by region. This proposed interest exemption is likely to have the opposite effect on local financing from the one it is intended to have, because this measure will benefit larger metropolitan centres more than smaller rural communities.

In making that statement I am fully cognizant of the problems faced by large municipalities since I am a member of parliament from metropolitan Toronto, and that metropolitan area has severe financial problems, whether they be in providing welfare, other social services and community services, or, in particular, transportation. I want to talk about transportation a little later on.

I am taking this position because I feel the hon. member has not really grasped the significance of implementing the motion or the impact this will have on large metropolitan areas to the detriment of smaller municipalities. I know by the constituency he represents that there are many, many small areas which I am sure would not want him to be misled into thinking this would benefit them when in fact it would benefit the large metropolitan areas.

Furthermore, it will help municipalities in the higher income provinces much more than the towns in lower income provinces. Surely this is a perverse effect, and such an outcome is not in the best interest of Canadian municipalities at large.

Municipalities and other local governments come under provincial jurisdiction. The role of the provincial and local levels of government varies greatly from province to province. Because of these regional differences there are substantial variations in the financial arrangements between these two levels of government. For example, there are wide variations in the provision and funding of health care. Provincial governments bear the major responsibility for health services, although municipalities may be delegated a considerable degree of authority. All ten provinces have exclusive responsibility for provincial health insurance, although financing is through premiums in Quebec, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, and through general revenues in the remaining six provinces. For other health services, municipalities play varying roles. For example, in Newfoundland the municipalities make no financial contribution to hospitals or public health services. In other provinces, for example New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba, there are municipal hospitals with municipalities paying at least part of the capital cost of construction.

Differences exist among provinces as to the proportion of local funding for such services as education and also with regard to structure of local revenues. In Prince Edward Island, for example, the operational costs of education are competely financed by provincial grants to local school boards. Funds borrowed by school boards for the construction of schools are also guaranteed by the government in that province. By contrast, in Ontario local property taxes raise nearly half the total expenditures on education, with the balance financed by grants from the Ontario government.

On the revenue side, for example, the proportion of the funds raised through property taxation, debenture issues and other fees and taxes varies across the provinces. Such variations are reflected very clearly in the outstanding per capita municipal debt by province. I will not go into that, however, because I would be prolonging the debate.

When I spoke on this matter, I guess it was last year when the hon. member first brought it forward, I mentioned I felt it was premature because in the province of Ontario a government commission had been created and had reported. That was the Blair Commission headed by a former mayor of one of the municipalities which make up my constituency of York East in Toronto. That commission made certain recommendations to restructure municipal finances which are being studied by the Ontario government. The provincial treasurer says it bears further study, but he cannot accept some of the ramifications which would occur from an implementation of the Report of the Blair Commission. So the kind of proposal the hon. member is making really does not take into account work that is already being done in the province of Ontario in respect of municipal financing.

Therefore, I would like to make the point that we have to look at this proposal in the context of over-all fiscal and constitutional reform. Last election we as a Liberal party made a number of promises in respect of aid to transportation. One of the arguments against that aid was that it was not within federal jurisdiction to interfere in assistance to municipalities, and perhaps it should be done in other ways, such as by making more revenues available to the provinces which in turn would make more revenues available to the municipalities. Perhaps that is, indeed, the solution. Perhaps we will have to say, as we have in respect of health care: Here are additional tax points; the provinces must raise the money and accept responsibility for giving money to the municipalities.

There is another side to that point, one I have been mentioning in speeches in my constituency at public gatherings, and it is that I believe the country is becoming too decentralized; that we are giving up too much fiscal and taxation power to the provinces. What is going to happen is that the rich provinces like Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia, in any further decentralized country, are going to become stronger; the poorer provinces, especially those in eastern Canada, are the ones which will suffer the most through decentralization or a diminution of powers. In any event, that follows from the arguments I have been making. I believe the motion proposed by the hon. member must be seen in the context of over-all constitutional and fiscal reforms. We should not be dealing with it on a piecemeal basis, and for this reason I cannot support the motion.

One other aspect of the motion that bothers me is that it would encourage municipalities even more to raise funds without real recourse to a consideration of the problems that increased municipal expenditures might incur. Over the last few years everyone has been attacking the Government of Canada for not having tight reins on its purse, but provincial governments, municipal governments and provincial utilities have been some of the greatest masters of taxpayers' money.

During the last few years, provincial governments, municipal governments and provincial utilities such as Ontario and Quebec Hydro have gone outside the country in an attempt to raise money. Those utilities raised money in New York. In fact the premier of Ontario has been to Zurich, Geneva and other places in an attempt to raise money for provincial expenditures. The foreign borrowing which has been done by individual municipalities, utilities and provinces has distorted Canada's financial picture as well as the value of the dollar. Over the last few years the Canadian dollar was valued too high. Now we are experiencing a general correction in the value of the Canadian dollar. One of the principal causes for its overevaluation was the enormous provincial, municipal and utilities overseas borrowings.

I have been informed that the government of Canada does not owe a nickel outside of this country, that all of its public debt is raised through pension funds, through Canada savings bonds, and it is floated within the country. Therefore, the government knows what money is likely to be raised on the Canadian market. It does not go abroad to borrow money as the municipalities and provinces do.

Perhaps the hon. member should propose a constitutional amendment or an act of this House whereby the borrowings of municipalities, provincial governments and utilities should be subject to some over-all national financial plan or program.

Mr. Ellis: Another socialistic move.

Mr. Collenette: Hon. members opposite suggest always that there is socialism in pronouncements which are made by anyone who is trying to be progressive. Perhaps that is one of the main problems which the Conservative party has faced over the years. The Conservative party has blinkers; it cannot see over the horizon. Many years ago they adopted the term "Progressive", but in recent years the party has been far from that. If they get on their campaign horses and travel across the country repeating the same lines to Canadians in the next election, as was the case with their partner in Manitoba, I think they are in for a rude shock. Perhaps the voters of Manitoba have just grievances against the New Democratic party, but they should have gone to the Liberal party which was offering a progressive, free enterprise, non-socialistic alternative. That province is recognizing that it will have a tremendous price to pay for the hard line, narrow-minded view of the Tory party there.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is little to distinguish you from Schreyer.

Mr. Collenette: Hon. members opposite continue to hurl insults. It distresses me that we have reached this level of debate, hurling partisan remarks across the floor at each other. I hate to be a part of that, but I feel compelled to respond. The hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon), as a former mayor of a distinguished municipality in the province of Ontario, is eager to take part in this debate.

In conclusion, the motion is premature and ill-conceived. It will only further encourage wild spending by municipalities and wild spending by the provinces without recourse to revenues and without recourse to the true financial picture in the country. I find it very, very odd that one of the members of the Conservative party is talking with restraint on the one hand, and then is talking about a motion with severe financial ramifications for the country on the other hand.

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) on bringing to the attention of Canadians the fallacies of this bill, as well as the conduct of some members in this House when a position is being presented for or against a certain subject. It is amazing that a member of parliament would stand up in these hallowed halls and request the government through a private member's motion to create tax havens. Many Canadians are fighting tax havens, and now at this particular time in our economy he would like to have them put out as protectionism against another group in our society. Tax havens are for people who can afford them. Ordinary people do not have the advantage of a chartered accountant or a big business. Some people do not have the opportunity or the income to find tax havens. The hon. member has forgotten about those people, which is very sad.

As a consequence of lower interest rates, local governments would be encouraged to increase their long term debts. We have heard what happened in the province of Ontario and what the provincial government has done to the municipalities. For eight or ten years the provincial government encouraged people to spend, indicating that it would cover the spending for 80 per cent. Over the last ten or 15 years, this Conservative government has forced municipalities to spend in order to receive tax grants. Now the day of reckoning has arrived. The Conservative government did not have the foresight five or six years down the road to see what was happening. Now it is telling the municipal councils and school boards to cut down. After they have fished out the carrot, they have pulled it in. The provincial government is telling the municipalities that it made a mistake in its long-term financing but will not take any blame for it and it tells the municipalities to tighten up.

In the Strathroy and Middlesex area, the provincial government is giving a 4.8 per cent increase in funds to the education system. Perhaps that is fine and it is within the guidelines, but where was the provincial government when those 4,000-pupil schools were being built and millions of dollars in architectural fees were being paid out? Now the poor taxpayer has to pay for that. He is always the goat, especially in Ontario with its Conservative provincial government.

As was indicated by my colleague, this is a distortion in the financial decision-making process of local governments. The proposed interest exemption creates another serious bias in the capital market for privately issued bonds. If local governments increase their long term debt, either there must be an increase in over-all public-plus-private debt or else there must be a decrease in private debt. It is likely that municipalities will bid away at least some funds from the private sector, even if there is an increase in over-all debt as well. I wonder if this is what we want.

At the present time the backbone of this country is the small businessman. That has been the case for many years. As we have seen, small businesses have done very well in this country over the last 15 or 20 years. Why is that? It is because they are realistic enough to look down the road four or five years. Also, this government has helped and encouraged small businessmen in Canada to invest in the future.

I will not go too far on this, but I brought this to the attention of small businessmen in the Stratford-Middlesex-London-Lambton area. No government is perfect and every government can be criticized. My only criticism of this government with regard to small business is, as I have said on many occasions, that small businessmen are not getting a square deal out of banks. I think there are problems here and, as was mentioned by my friend, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), some time ago, banks do not look at small business as a potential for growing and developing, the potential for a bank to make more money out of business, which is the name of the game—free enterprise. At a time when the federal government is placing great importance on the economic contribution of the private sector, a move in the opposite direction is obviously undesirable, as I just mentioned.

Moreover, it is likely that the smaller corporations would be hurt most by this measure, and we do not want that with the economy in a questionable state at present and with the government doing as much as it can to revitalize Canadian industry and business. The people we want to take care of first are the small businessmen who need extra capital advance. That extra one or two men in a small plant are the backbone of our country.

Some people will say that big business is the only way to go, as my friend, the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis), has said. He wants to get into big business and to give opportunities to people who have tax havens and advantages. I disagree with that. I am critical of this government so far as banking for small business is concerned.

The income tax exemption would be of no use to tax-exempt institutions, such as pension funds, and unattractive to investors with low marginal tax rates, such as pensioners with low incomes. Where will the money come from for the people who should be given this opportunity? This government has proven time and time again that when they consider the interests of the people, they consider people in all segments of society, not only special tax-exempt classes. The proposed exemption thus also creates a distortion in the type of investor to which municipal bonds are attractive.

The proposed exemption creates a bias in the decision-making process of investors. The tax-exempt status of municipal bonds would be most attractive to investors, both corporate and individual, with the highest marginal tax rates, and not attractive at all to tax-exempt or low tax investors. That, after all, is what this country was built on. This government looks at all the people, not only at certain people to whom it gives special benefits. I do not believe that we should set apart different classes, something which we on this side have not done in the past.

Now I should like to say a few words about subsidies to high income taxpayers. Investors with high marginal tax rates would be willing to buy tax-exempt local bonds as compared to regular bonds so long as their after tax position was no worse with the tax-exempt bonds. If all the tax-exempt securities were purchased by individual taxpayers with the highest combined federal and provincial rates in excess of 60 per cent, then in theory the interest rate required to attract these purchasers would only need to be slightly less than 40 per cent of rates on other comparable bonds.

In this circumstance, the full benefit of the subsidy would be reaped by municipal governments in the form of reduced financing costs. This would occur because the investors would be in about the same after tax position whether they purchased regular, taxable bonds or tax-exempt bonds. The benefit to investors in the form of the tax exemption would be only enough to offset the tax that would have been due on a taxable bond. For the various levels of government, the reduced interest payments by municipal governments would be equal to the revenue lost by the federal and provincial governments. This is the mechanism of tax-free municipal bonds, in theory.

What we are saying on this to the people is: "Yes, this is a great idea, you won't have any problems. It is beautiful for you, the individual, but in the long run the federal and municipal governments will pick up the tab". If we are going to give something to someone, let us give to him and leave it with him, not take it back with the other hand.

In practice, however, municipalities are unlikely to experience a reduction in interest rates of anywhere near the 40 per cent implied by the top marginal tax rates. Approximately half of municipal debentures are currently held by pension funds, foreign investors, other municipalities and other provinces, none of which is taxable. If the interest rates on municipal debentures were to fall significantly, these institutions would no longer find it desirable to hold the debt. As they left the market it would be impossible to sell all the debt to individual taxpayers in the highest marginal tax bracket, and certainly they would not accept it. They would say: "It is good now, but what about the future? You will take it all back from me anyway, so that does not make sense". If you give something to people, make sure they have it in their pockets; do not take it away with the other hand. As a result, significant portions would need to be sold to lower income individuals with lower tax rates and to corporations with combined federal and provincial rates of 46 per cent to 51 per cent. Who in God's name in a low tax bracket can afford to put out money for this? They do not do so anyway so they cannot have any benefit from it. The ones who should be receiving the break are not getting it; and the ones who should not be receiving it are receiving it. So the rich get richer and the poor get poorer.

I can tell you that that is not the Liberal philosophy. This government's philosophy is that we should share. We have done this in the past and we will do it again.

Mr. Alexander: Just like the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). He shares.

Mr. Condon: Did I hear something? No, I did not. As I was saying, as a result, significant portions would need to be sold to lower income individuals with lower tax rates and to corporations with combined federal and provincial rates of 46 per cent to 51 per cent. Both to attract purchasers from these groups and to prevent all the non-taxable investors from discontinuing their investments in municipals, the interest rates could not fall by nearly the full amount which would maximize the benefit to municipalities.

As was mentioned here previously by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), there was an accusation that we were being anti-American. As he said, we are living side by side with the Americans, and I do not think the feeling on this side is anti-American. We are trying to work together, but we do not have to adopt all their ideas. Many American citizens are now coming to Canada for advice. One example is Senator Edward Kennedy who came here to investigate our health system. I hope that both Canada and the United States can learn from each other. I do not think we are anti-anything. I think we are pro-Canadian.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

BANK ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND OPERATION TO APRIL 1, 1979

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): At five o'clock the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) had the floor, and he has 31 minutes left.

[English]

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your warning hon. members as to how much time I have, but I must say that one is tempted to try to use that time, and I do not think that should be the response of a responsible member of parliament.

At five o'clock I was dealing with the capacity of banks to support small business in Canada. The record of banking institutions supporting and encouraging the growth of small business in Canada is one of the poorest in the western world. We pointed out this afternoon that there are 15,000 separately chartered banks in the United States. In Canada there are 12; probably only six of them are effective in terms of size. A non-aggressive and non-imaginative banking system like ours, which does not go out and seek to help entrepreneurs get small Canadian businesses underway, makes a major contribution to the economic malaise in which we now find ourselves.

I can give an example of this. A small entrepreneur who wants to set up a small hamburger stand will get short shrift from any of the major banks in Canada unless he has a fantastic amount of collateral or guarantees or unless he puts his house, his car and everything he has on the line. However, if instead of going the independent route he decides to associate himself with the McDonald's hamburger chain, the money will start flowing out of the conventional lending institutions of Canada, particularly banks, like you wouldn't believe. The result is that people like McDonald's—and I do not particularly have anything against them as they probably make a very good hamburger—

An hon. Member: "They do it all for you".

Mr. Leggatt: I will tell you who they do not do it for—the small competitive Canadian businessman who does not have the same opportunity to do that kind of massive advertising and use their techniques of merchandising. Their product is market tested in the most successful market in the world, the United States, before it is offered in this country. We had better understand that the small businessman in Canada must have the same kind of help from our financial institutions as they get. He is not getting it at the present time. Anyone who has McDonald's backing can go to any bank in Canada and find that the response is "Away you go if you are associated with the clowns".

They had a wonderful promotion technique in the lower mainland of British Columbia. They invited all the politicians to take a day at a McDonald's hamburger stand and sell hamburgers, with all the profits to go to a worth-while charity. It was worth-while too, as I believe it was for crippled children or some such organization. I told them I would not go. I said that if they wanted to contribute to charity they should go right ahead without sucking in all the political people in the community to promote their hamburgers. I said I would sell hamburgers if the profits were to go to the small businessmen that McDonald's have driven to the wall in my community.

We have to look carefully at the way the lending institutions in Canada are driving small independent businesses to the wall. This all comes back to the way we organize and control the financial institutions in Canada. Unless we start to do something for the entrepreneurs of Canada we will not be able to buy a Canadian hamburger. It will be breakfast at "Denny's" and supper at "McDonald's." There will be franchises from one end of the country to the other and I do not want to see that. I want Canadian independence and I want a uniqueness in our services. All we are getting at the moment is that market tested formula from southern California and New York state. It is impossible for Canadian entrepreneurs to compete without the kind of training, the kind of leadership and the kind of financial assistance from our institutions that they have been crying for and have not been receiving from this government and particularly from the banks of Canada.

We all like to stand in this House and say we are in favour of small business, but little has been done to help small business. Some very specific areas could be tackled. The government could have taken these steps instead of trying to delay changes to the Bank Act for another year, had it had the courage to grasp the nettle. One of the problems with this government is that perhaps the minister would have been kicked out for doing that, as the former minister was; then we would have to start again from square one with a new minister.

I have always heard about the banking lobby, Mr. Speaker. As a member of parliament I have been lobbied from mining, from forestry and from fishing interests, but I have never had a banking lobby in my office. I could not figure out why until I realized that there are so many people in the place next door who hold directorships in banks that there is no point in their coming to an ordinary member of parliament. The conflict of interest in the place next door as it relates to the appointment of members of the Senate to directorships on the boards of the major banks of Canada. And the question of whether that has influenced the legislation presented to this House, should be looked at very carefully.

We had a tough year in 1977. Labour was held down. They attempted to hold wage increases at six per cent, and they are not too much higher than that with inflation at 9.5 per cent. But what happened to the banks in that terrible year? The dear old Royal Bank, the largest, managed to increase its revenue from $2.44 billion to $2.74 billion, a 12.3 per cent increase in profit in one year. That is well ahead of any wage settlement I saw and well ahead of the majority of profit-taking in other sectors of the Canadian economy.

Banks in this country are given very special privileges. The revenues of the Bank of Nova Scotia increased from $1.5 billion to $1.7 billion last year, or 13.3 per cent. And so it goes with all the banks. They look more out of the economy last year than they deserved. What is the government doing about it? It is delaying changes to the Bank Act.

If there is one thing we should be doing in this House it is to change the way we regulate banking in Canada. Unless we can make the banking system competitive we should think about having a public banking system. It must be one or the other. We cannot continue with what we have now, which is the worst of both worlds in terms of funding and financing the business of this country and creating employment. It is the small businessman who provides most of the employment. His is a labour-intensive business; he needs help. He is not into the area of massive technology and of attempting to eliminate his workers because of the capitalization in his industry. If we are ever to have increased employment it will be in the servicing sector and the small business sector. This is the area we should be encouraging if we are to reduce unemployment.

We get no answers whatsoever from this government when we ask about bringing forward banking legislation which would regulate competition and would require banks to offer small loans and increase the amount of those small loans. Even under the Small Businesses Loans Act you are limited to $75,000. Anyone who has had experience with small business knows that you cannot do much with $75,000, yet loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act are still limited to $75,000—if you can get money under it. In most cases the money is simply not available. There is no legislative requirement on a bank to lend money under its low interest provisions. That is where we should have begun in terms of legislation to help small business and in terms of regulating and controlling banks in order to provide for loans of higher amounts at low interest for small business. I want to see the situation where when a businessman comes to a town there are four banks competing to finance him. The way it is now, you almost have to break down the bank manager's door to get in to say hello! And then he is so fat and sassy that he could not care less, because he is making money by lending to conventional large borrowers or playing games with the American franchise houses all across Canada. The banks of this country had better get interested or they will find changes that will be untenable to them from an operational point of view. They have not performed the service of creating employment in this country, and their record of massive profits in the last two years and little help to small business is a prime example of their neglect in this area.

This government should move toward providing special training for entrepreneurs. I should like to see this done in a private way. We face heavy competition from American entrepreneurs partly because of their larger markets, partly because of the larger variety available to them, and partly because of the greater number of people available to market test products. We have the problem of isolated pockets of population. There is the lower mainland and the Toronto-Montreal complex, but generally it is very difficult to market test a product in Canada compared to the United States, which has such huge market testing areas as New York city with ten million people. We have not given enough consideration to the question of solving this problem but one way would be through a special training program for Canadian entrepreneurs. This program could be offered through the universities or technical schools. We cannot create more employment without giving our small entrepreneurs some help.

• (2022)

West Germany, Japan and many other countries in the western world have set up trading companies. Their purpose is to make contact with overseas businessmen, arrange contracts and then to allow local small business to fill those contracts.

Our own Export Development Corporation, which should be active in this area, unfortunately continues to favour major colossal business over small business. The result is again that the larger businesses, which tend to be foreign owned and foreign controlled, receive by far the most help from the EDC.

In terms of government spending, what we need to do is to allocate a guaranteed portion of that spending to small business so we can allow those entrepreneurs to grow and get into competition with those at the larger business level. This has been done successfully in the United States. They have decentralized their purchasing into areas of need, but again they have decreed that those products should be produced by small business.

We must consider removing the sales tax which is extremely regressive, not only from the point of view of the purchaser but also from the point of view of the small businessman. He cannot continue having to tack this on to his product and expect to have success. Because he is the last genuinely competitive part of our economy, we are handicapping him more and more.

I do not believe for a moment that the various sectors of this economy are in any way competitive with each other. I believe, as most people do, that prices are administered, but they are not at that lower level. Ask the small clothier what kind of competition there is between him and The Bay, Woodward's or Eaton's. They can buy their products at massive discount prices. The small entrepreneur is stuck with buying them at a higher price and he has to give superlative service in order to compete with mass merchandising techniques.

We need, of course, low and middle income tax cuts. We need the employment tax credit that has come up and been suggested in this House many times. But what we need most of all, and this is really where I began these remarks, is an industrial strategy. An essential and vital part of that strategy is change in the financial institutions of Canada to make them competitive, change to make them effective and to put money where it is socially desirable. In Canada today, if you are not talking about creating public employment, the small, independently owned Canadian business is where loans should go. That is not happening. We have not had an industrial strategy. The failure of this government to process banking changes now rather than the old delay, delay, delay gives the Canadian people, certainly my constitutuents, no reason whatsoever to have any confidence that this government understands anything about improving the economy and solving the massive unemployment that we face.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, this government has always prided itself on bringing forward progressive legislation. This is the supreme example of their progressive legislation—progressing the bill forward one year because they do not have the legislation ready.

I remember just a few weeks ago when we were debating the income tax bill the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) sat here and harangued the opposition time and again because we were slowing down debate, because we were slowing down legislation when there was so much the government wanted to do. We were impeding all that progress which they had in mind. That was in the middle of December.

One would think with that kind of comment coming from the Minister of Finance that they had a series of bills ready to go and that as soon as we were past that income tax bill there would be another measure ready to work on. Here is a bill that is overdue a year or more. It is not only overdue in terms of the government calendar—because the white paper came out approximately twelve months ago—but it is overdue as well in terms of the needs of the country. Yet the government is sitting on its hands. I suppose the reason might be that some of the members of the banking committee of the other place, which the member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) has talked about, have been running scared of the attitudes toward this legislation and they want it stopped for as long as possible. At any rate, they are not ready to progress as they ought to be. I can imagine that a week or two from now we are going to hear howls from the various ministers saying that we are slowing down legislation.

I know the banks in Canada have enjoyed a reputation for being strong financial institutions. I think they have prided themselves on the fact that during the great depression in the 1930s there was not one bank in Canada that went belly-up. That provides security for the money lenders in Canada. I remember also that while the banks remained very secure during the 1930s, the farmers did not, and the small businessmen did not. There were all kinds of foreclosures all across Saskatchewan where we were living at that time. There were people just walking away from their farms, leaving them and allowing the banks to inherit them. An uncle of mine who had a good farm in central Saskatchewan with excellent farm buildings and a fairly new house sold his whole farming operation for $1 in 1939 and let someone else take over the mortgage. The banks did fairly well in the 1930s and did not feel too much pain.

Whilst we do need that kind of security and stability in our country, we also need some competition in the money market. I took my university undergraduate and graduate training in the United States, and spending seven years in the United States allowed me to look a little bit at the way the lending institutions operate in that country. In the 1930s we in Canada looked with pride at our record compared to the number of bank failures in the United States. You could drive down some of the streets in Chicago and see some of the old bank buildings that were used as banks previously and then folded in 1933 because Mr. Roosevelt closed them. Their security was not very good. In the 1930s they corrected that; they provided insurance for their depositors. What we need is a system similar to the kind they have in the United States.

I spoke to an attorney in Washington, D.C. this afternoon. He specializes in banking and he told me that in the United States there are 14,000 banks; 6,000 national banks, which would be similar to our banks here in Canada, and 8,000 state banks. The national banks have approximately 60 per cent of the assets in the United States, and the state banks have the other 40 per cent, in addition to the savings and loans associations that are scattered all across the United States. If you go to any bank in any city in any state, you find there is some competition.

One of my constituents is building a small chain of retail outlets. They are not very grandiose. They serve the public very well. He is an aggressive salesman. He is trying to establish a new business. He is providing entrepreneurial leadership to some people who want to invest. He is providing employment that was not there before.

When this constituent wants to open a new store, even though he has a record of success he has to go to the bank and prove to that banker that he does not need the money before he has enough security to open another branch. He has to prove that he does not need the money before he can get it.

He decided to open another branch in the city of Bellingham. As soon as he walked across the border, he had two or three banks begging him for the business. I say to myself, what is going on? Here is a fellow, unknown in the state of Washington, who the banks want to serve. They are competing for the opportunity to serve him. However, in British Columbia they look the other way. They thumb their nose at him.

Something is wrong with our system when our Canadian institutions do not want to help Canadian entrepreneurs, when the same Canadian entrepreneurs can go to the United States and get money at just about any lending institution they walk into. Not only that, they can get the money at about 50 per cent less cost than here in Canada. In Canada they must pay 12 per cent or 13 per cent for their line of credit while there they can pick it up at 8 per cent. No wonder business is leaving Canada and going to the United States.

If one of this government's sins has been control of the money supply by printing too much of it, the other one has been allowing the institutions to be so tight-fisted in their policies that they have controlled the money supply in that way. They have not allowed an equal distribution across the country of opportunity in entrepreneurial business.

Looking again at the system in the United States, you can go into a city bank or a state bank and you know that that private institution is indigenous to that particular area. You can rest assured that the president, chairman and directors of the board of that bank are from that community. They all live there and have their roots there. They want business to succeed in that community. They approach the businessman from an entirely different perspective from the banker here in Canada.

A lot of local bank managers would love to do something for the local businessman, but their hands are tied. The local bank manager has a limit of $50,000 he can lend the businessman. If the required loan is more than that, he must get approval from the district office. If the amount is too large, it goes from the district office to the head office. Where is the head office located? It happens to be in Toronto. They really care about White Rock, Langley or Cloverdale, don't they? Where are they? They could not care less about the prosperity of that particular community they are supposed to be serving.

A bank manager lives in a community. He has his roots there. He would love to do something for a businessman but he cannot because his head office stops him. In addition, often the manager is rotated from one place to another. By the time he barely gets his roots into one community, he is transferred to another branch in another community. He may never get his roots down the way he would like.

This government, with great temerity, is recognizing that the economic base is shifting from what has traditionally been central Canada and is moving westward. The other day the mayor of Winnipeg said that the financial base was moving to Winnipeg. That is the geographic centre of Canada. Certainly the economic base is gravitating toward Alberta and British Columbia. Maybe it is time we had some revisions to the Bank Act that allowed regional interests to express themselves in the financial community.

About ten years ago the then premier of British Columbia, W. A. C. Bennett, came forward with a budget and made a speech in the legislature of British Columbia. He proposed a Bank of British Columbia. I still remember the guffaws and shouts of horror across Canada that the premier of British Columbia would have the temerity to suggest that we ought to have a Bank of British Columbia. It was as though that was some kind of financial heresy. What is wrong with having a Bank of British Columbia that is uniquely British Columbian, that sees as its responsibility the growth of British Columbia, that is sensitive to the needs of that community, that draws on the resources of the people in that community and draws all its personnel from the community to man that bank? What is wrong with that?

It still strikes me with some kind of surprise the chagrin he had to face from the financial community across Canada for even suggesting there ought to be a local bank in British Columbia. By the time that idea got combed through the financial brains of central Canada, it was thoroughly diluted. However, that is the direction we will have to go.

We must come to grips with the need for regional expression of the financial needs of the people in a banking organization, and the investment of the funds of that banking organization to meet the needs of that community. We can no longer afford the days when a farmer, who is a small businessman, walks into a bank and borrows money for the intervening months until his crop comes in, leaving that bank thinking that the bank manager has done him a favour, while he pays 13 per cent interest on the note. The bank is operating a service for these people.

If we want to stimulate our economy and stimulate small business in our country, we must look upon the small businessman as a friend, not as a potential liability. With 60 per cent of the work force in this country employed in small business, we have to realize that these people are the backbone of our country and that they have to be served.

This government's idea of progressive legislation is to postpone for one year legislation we ought to be dealing with today. That is its idea of progressiveness. I say shame for being so slow in keeping its legislative program going that we cannot even deal with issues that ought to be dealt with today to make sure that we have a healthy and thriving economy. It is time we got this legislation moving, so that the people across Canada who are most affected by this restrictive legislation can get the service they deserve and we can get the people of this country working in the way they want to be working.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this measure to extend the Bank Act; the request for extended time in which to consider the revision of the Bank Act is an indication of the government's lack of ability and its failure to deal successfully with the economic situation. We are obviously facing an unsettling and uncertain period economically, and while not all the problems are domestic in origin, a great many of them have certainly been caused by the ineptitude of hon. gentlemen opposite and by the failure of the administration to deal with the financial woes of the country.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is rarely in the House these days. He goes about the country like an optimistic choirboy telling people how the country is going to grow. But how can it grow when our principal trading partners, the United States, Western Europe and Japan, are all reporting a low level of activity and show little possibility of doing better in the coming year? Surely the minister's statements must be taken with a considerable measure of salt. The outlook for the United States continues to be far from cheerful, only a low level of economic activity being predicted.

Revision of the Bank Act is long overdue. Parliament has to deal with the problems presented by the so-called near-banks, and a situation in which Canadian banks feel they are handicapped when competing with foreign-based banks because of the way in which the regulations presently operate. Then there are a number of internal banking issues; for example, what should be done about the rapid increase in the financial muscle of the credit unions. The success of the unions is to be applauded, but it makes sense that the regulations and restrictions affecting financial institutions should be of a reasonable nature and applied with reasonable fairness to all.

While the government delays legislation to revise the Bank Act, Canadian banks are going ahead with participation in leasing and factoring, which means managing companies for a fee. The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and the Banque Provinciale du Canada have established wholly-owned leasing subsidiaries, and the Royal Bank of Canada has close to 100 per cent interest in an established leasing company. In banking circles it was felt the revised act would allow the banks to become direct participants in leasing and factoring. It would seem Ottawa has already given tacit approval to the banks to engage in these activities.

This is not a good situation. It might well be an advantage to the economy that banks should become involved in leasing and factoring, but as the law presently stands they may not engage in such activities though they may invest in a portion of the equity of such companies. If the government intends to allow leasing and factoring on the part of the banks, the whole question should be discussed in this chamber as soon as possible. If the banks have received some sort of assurance from the government that their activities in connection with leasing and factoring will be legitimized within a few years, we should know about it. A tacit understanding that legislation will eventually be changed to suit the needs of the banks seems to be both unwise and undemocratic. If parliament is to exercise any influence upon what is to happen, it is time the legislation was brought forward.

That the government has already acquiesced in the situation appears to be substantiated by the fact that the Inspector-General, Mr. William Kennett, has already given permission for several banks to assume 100 per cent ownership of leasing and factoring establishment. If the new Bank Act does not permit leasing or factoring there will certainly be major financial changes forthcoming. All the banks are watching to see whether complete ownership of a leasing company allows better penetration of the market. In fact, there does not really seem to be much difference between leasing and factoring; this aspect of the situation will not be clarified for some time to come.

No discussion of the Bank Act would be complete without some general reference to the financial institutions of our country. The recent controversy as to whether Sun Life should move its head office out of Montreal has directed public attention upon our financial institutions. The Sun Life affair, against the background of other unsettling events in this country and abroad, has brought into question the strength and reliability of many of our financial institutions. We should not lose sight of the fact that Sun Life is the seventh largest corporation in Canada.

The question which has attracted such attention is whether or not a corporation has the right to move its offices and its place of work in accordance with the best interests of its shareholders—the mutual policyholders, in the case of Sun Life. Western Canadians certainly applaud a move of the head offices of many of our institutions out of Montreal because ever since the days of the Northwest Fur Trading Company the west has been at a disadvantage; so many financial and industrial corporations were based in Montreal.

One need only look at the performance of CNR and Air Canada to realize how poorly institutions with head offices in Montreal serve western Canada even though they may be serving eastern Canada adequately. But when it comes to private corporations the government should at least refrain from coercing them to remain in an environment where they cannot do the best for their shareholders. It is often said that corporations should be aware of what is in the national interest. In the case of Sun Life specifically, the projected move should not be made, on the ground that it would not be good for national unity. But this begs the question. Sun Life is a mutual company and its policyholders are also the shareholders. A policyholder in western Canada should surely have the right to make his voice heard if he feels the company would operate better in some other part of the country than at its present headquarters; and the directors surely have the right to move the company in accordance with the desire of its policyholders.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that head offices are not moved easily. Knowing the directors of Sun Life, one realizes they would probably be most reluctant, personally to leave a city in which the company has been domiciled for a century or more. Incidentally, the suggestion has been made that Readers' Digest, which the government tried hard to move out of the country, may also move out of the Montreal area.

The language issue is a practical one. Statistics show that some 80 per cent of the financial operations of Montreal-based companies are carried on with English-speaking Canada or the United States. To conduct such a large portion of business in the other official language would undoubtedly put Sun Life at a serious disadvantage. For instance, it would make little sense to have a Sun Life policy written in Manitoba brought to Montreal and translated into French so that company employees could deal with it and then attempt to recommunicate with the Manitoba policyholder in their official language.

The attempt by the government to lean on Sun Life lends no strength, in the long run, to the movement for unity. It amounts to an attempt to force the company to do business under a set of conditions which it may find innappropriate; it might not be able to cope with such an environment and in the long run the policyholders are the losers. Should the savings of policyholders throughout the rest of Canada be poorly handled because of a government decree?

Some have suggested that Sun Life should be nationalized. I would remind hon. members that a mutual company, widely owned by many individuals, is very close to a co-operative. I cannot help thinking that many policyholders in the company will become uneasy about their savings as, indeed many Canadian investors are now starting to worry.

Bank Act

● (2052)

The failure of the government to deal with the Bank Act shows the low priority the government puts on our financial stability. It is suggested that the Sun Life confrontation with the Parti Québécois in Quebec city has probably halted any early accessibility to markets there. Financial experts predict that Quebec may face additional problems in raising money in the European dollar markets. The New York market has already put premium prices on bonds from that province, and many traditional investors are staying clear of Quebec bonds.

The problem not only reflects on Montreal, it also reflects on the whole of this country, and it is certainly time this government faced up to these problems.One of the ways in which the government could help is to bring forward the amendments to the Bank Act so there can be a thorough discussion of the problems facing this country, and particularly its financial institutions.

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, let me inform the minister from Outremont that I am going to speak about women.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Something you don't know anything about, Mr. Lalonde.

Mrs. Pigott: It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, how that brings the other side to life. When I first came to parliament one of the first question I asked was when the Bank Act was to be reviewed. With my experience in the business community one area to which I felt I could perhaps bring some fresh light in parliament was in the area of the banking system of this country.

There are three areas in which I should like to see changes. The first is in the attitude, that has been very eloquently spoken about tonight, toward the small and owner-managed businesses in this country, where there needs to be a fresh and new approach. If 90 per cent of our small businesses employ less than 50 per cent of those employed, just think of what could happen if there was a fresh and enthusiastic response from the banking community toward those companies.

I should like also to speak of two other aspects of this situation, the first being the banking community's discrimination against women. The other, which disturbs me as well, is the fact that the banks in this country operate in very tall office blocks or glass houses far from the real world. For example, even our Department of Finance has to live in a rarified atmosphere 30 storeys up. We have this incredible glass house across the way. There is also that almost obscene situation in Toronto where all our banking establishments are bent on seeing which can build the tallest glass house.

What this country needs is a new attitude in the banking community. It does not need to go up. What the banking community needs to do is to spread out across this country and realize there are changes required and a vitality to be stimulated. The preoccupation of the banking community to build banking towers is just a disgrace.

This Bank Act review could do a great deal toward bringing a new economic era to this country if we had the time to talk about it. What sectors and what regions need to be provided for and promoted? Just think of what effects the provision of capital could have on the socioeconomic life of Canadians. How is money to be handled in the future by the banks as business transactions and as savings? There should be a fresh approach toward savings in this country and how our banks should operate in a post-industrialized society. We could have had such a fresh and good time in this parliament had we been able to examine these things.

One lesson I learned, and about which I tell school children when I speak to them about parliament, is the lesson I learned while sitting in that back bench last year. In that small corner in which I sat there were people from the mountains of British Columbia, from the tobacco farms of Ontario, from the ranching country of Saskatchewan; and next to me sat my two NDP colleagues, one from Vancouver and the other from Nickel Belt. What I learned sitting in that corner—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You must have learned a lot.

Mrs. Pigott: Yes, I did learn a lot and I am very grateful. What I did learn was that in this House of Commons we speak for and understand all the constituencies in this country. Instead of the Bank Act being talked about in those ivory towers 30 storeys up, it should be brought here where people who know what is going on in this country might have some input.

Let me speak especially about the banking world and what is happening in that regard to women. We might have had meaningful discussions about discrimination in the financial community toward women. There is a great need to re-examine this whole area. In the past ten years many important changes have taken place in Canada, and this may have been one of the great social revolutions so far as women are concerned.

There are significantly more women seeking credit today, and this reflects the fact that more and more women are employed outside the home. We have taken initial steps to protect women against discrimination in the credit field, but the guidelines are voluntary and the credit situation is still unfair. Women's rights to equal access to credit have been denied through misconceptions regarding women's creditworthiness.

In the past when banks were rapidly expanding their share of the personal credit market some personal loans officers were, to use the banks' terms, a little over-cautious in granting credit. That is an understatement. Until 1968 the National Housing Act specified that when a financial institution was calculating how large a mortgage a family could handle it could only include 50 per cent of the wife's income in the total family income. These regulations were changed to remove the implication that the husband was the chief breadwinner, making it possible for the financial institutions to include any or all of the spouse's income in calculating a loan.

In 1971 additional changes stipulated that an applicant for an NHA mortgage could not be discriminated against on the basis of sex or marital status. It is fine to introduce guidelines and regulations, but we cannot ignore the fact that a vastly improved credit situation is still hiding great inequalities. Married women with incomes of their own are still being asked to provide information about their husbands' income on credit applications. It is still true that a newly separated, divorced or widowed woman does not enjoy equal opportunity for credit. In many cases such a woman will find that she has no credit identity separate from her husband's.

The two great bastions of discrimination against women are still senior sections of the federal government and the financial community. The minister from Outremont says he has been doing a great deal about this, but the 1976 statistics show that 70 per cent of all women in the federal service make less than $10,000 a year, while only 20 per cent of men earn less than $10,000 per year. Only 1 per cent of senior management jobs are held by women. I shudder to think what the statistics are in respect of the financial community, but those are the government's own statistics.

If women are to play a more important role in the business community, breakthroughs must come in two key areas, opportunities and access to capital. The same banks which are making strides in promoting women to positions of authority are refusing other women business loans. In my experience a woman president of a company was told that, had she been a man, her loan would have been twice as great. Many bank managers still adopt a negative attitude toward women borrowers. When asked for a business loan, the bank manager said: "Why does a nice little girl like you want to go into business?" That is another story which indicates that a bit of change is needed in the financial community.

An MBA student graduated from university last summer. He was employed in a local bank. He was told to make certain he opened a bank account in a neighbouring bank, because the bank did not want other women working in the bank to know what he was receiving. He has since left that bank.

The requirement that a husband sign a contract made by his wife for credit or a loan, and the issuance of credit cards only to a husband, are two practices which women find unsatisfactory and humiliating. Such policies presume that a married woman will have no income of her own. With the number of women now in the working force, this is no longer a valid assumption.

What share have women in high level decision-making in our corporations? Almost none. Women hold less than 1 per cent of the top corporate positions. The shortage of women is most marked in the fields of finance, mining and utilities. In the early 1970s the chartered banks had one woman director and no female corporate officer. In finance, trust, loans and insurance companies there were four women directors out of 697 and one female corporate officer out of 73. I think that is a great shame. Our women are qualified and well educated but they are not being afforded an opportunity to serve this nation. One would think that the federal government, after the great year of the women, would have seen to it that there were changes in our Crown corporations.

Recently I picked up the annual report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and to my utter horror discovered there was not one woman director in that institution. I hope I have rectified the situation by submitting within 24 hours a list of capable women able to sit on the board of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet).

An hon. Member: But were they Liberals?

Mrs. Pigott: I was very careful to make certain that half the list contained names of women who were Liberal.

I notice the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde) is not listening to what I am saying. The odds against a non-Canadian getting on a Canadian board of directors are six to one. The odds against a woman getting on a Canadian board of directors are 104 to one, in spite of the fact that 35 per cent of company shares usually are owned by women. It was Stephen Leacock who said: "When I go into a bank I get rattled." It might well not have been Leacock who said that but most Canadian women who seek credit in our banks. Of course, it was a wise woman who said it is a terribly difficult task being a woman, since it consists of dealing principally with men.

I am sorry we did not have an opportunity to bring before committee the many, many briefs from women who believe they should participate in the financial concerns of this country.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I was interested when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) saw fit to interject some remarks in this debate this afternoon, although he was not here when the bill was introduced. When the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) was speaking, the minister started belabouring him about certain facts. This was refreshing because we have not seen the minister for some time. One of the last times the minister appeared in Hansard was on December 7, 1977, when he was asked the following question by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark):

> Will the minister tell the House when he will be in a position to bring to parliament a specific proposal to embody that employment tax credit, when will it be before the House, and will we have it this month, as the Prime Minister promised?

As reported at page 1634 of Hansard, the minister replied as follows:

> I will be able to come to the House with a statement seven days after Bill C-11 is passed.

Bill C-11 was passed on December 13, 1977. Seven days later would have been December 20, 1977. We have not heard his statement as yet. I will be patient. After all, we have waited 11 years in order to have another look at the Bank Act.

I suppose we can wait another day or so for the statement which the Minister of Finance promised in December.

This act was last in front of the House 11 years ago when it was revised. The revision provided that it be reviewed in ten years. One would think the government would consider ten years' notice to be sufficient, but it was unable to get ready a bill in that time. The government required another year, and today it has indicated that it needs yet another year. It is simply a measure of the incompetence of the minister and his staff when they cannot prepare a bill to review the Bank Act after approximately 11 years' notice.

I should like to spend a moment talking about the peculiarity of our banking system. I support the reference of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) to the Bank of British Columbia, and the help it has been to the business community having a bank with local interest. I was involved with a problem in my constituency when the Ogden Point pier burned down last August. We set up a committee of public servants, politicians and interested citizens in order to figure out a manner in which to reconstruct the docks, and particularly the warehouse on the docks, so that the business of loading and unloading pulp and paper could resume.

One innovation in the last ten years has been the quasi-bank supported by the federal government. I am referring to the Federal Business Development Bank and the Export Development Bank. These are not banks covered by the Bank Act, but they pass themselves off as banks in any event. The subject of our discussions at that time was how we could finance the reconstruction of the warehouse and the docks in Victoria. The cost was to be approximately $1.5 million. The federal government was unable to promise any help whatsoever, but a representative of the British Columbia Development Bank, when he was asked if he would back a loan to enable construction to go ahead, said he would.

I should like to refer to what has been happening in Canadair with respect to the LearStar aircraft program by referring to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal, dated February 16, 1977. In part it reads as follows:

On December 2 of last year—

That would be December 2, 1976.

—Hugh Poulin, Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce Minister Jean Chrétien, stated that Canadair estimates it will have to borrow up to $128 million in 1979 for the LearStar program.

Of this amount, he said, $128 million is to be provided by a consortium of two Canadian banks, and Ottawa will guarantee $50 million of the loan while Quebec will guarantee a further $20 million, the balance to be secured by a pledge of Canadair's assets.

The balance would be something in the neighbourhood of $58 million. The assets of Canadair are owned 100 per cent by the government. They were bought for $30 million. Another $8 million was dedicated when Canadair and the federal government got caught in the wrong in a suit laid against them by Northrop aircraft for the mishandling of its contract with them. The government saw fit to divert this $8 million to Canadair and claimed to be increasing its equity in a firm which was already owned 100 per cent by the government.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

Surely the federal government is the only government in the world which owns 122 per cent of a firm. However, they will pledge these Canadair assets to cover the money that the banks are not going to cover.

This was the story of the Canadian banks: Two Canadian banks were supposed to form a consortium to provide that money. It was a rather familiar tale with this company because, hon. members will recall, there was supposed to be a Canadian consortium to find money for the LRPA contract. Now we find quite a different story in the January 6, 1978 issue of the Globe and Mail which stated:

● (2112)

The federal government has approved a proposal by Canadair Limited in Montreal, which is wholly owned by the government to raise $70 million (U.S.) in five year promissory notes in international capital markets for use in financing the development and production of the CL600 Challenger executive jet in Canada.

The international financing is to be arranged by Merrill Lynch International and Co., an affiliate of Royal Securities Ltd., of Toronto . . .

At the same time, industry, trade and commerce minister Jack Horner has agreed to several undertakings related to the $70 million financing by Merill Lynch, including an agreement that if cost overruns occur in connection with the Challenger program, he will seek parliamentary authority for whatever additional funds are needed to permit Canadair to meet such unforeseen expenditures.

I suspect those unforeseen expenditures will arise as certainly as the sun will rise tomorrow. The Globe and Mail article goes on:

The government also agreed, as long as any of the $70 million in promissory notes is still outstanding, not to sell or transfer its ownership in Canadair or change its shares in such a way that the government's voting rights associated with its Canadair shares are reduced to less than 66.6 per cent or that the government no longer elects all of the members of Canadair's board of directors.

Let me point out two things. To date the directors on the Canadair board elected by the government are all senior civil servants, the majority of whom come from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Ottawa owns 100 per cent of the common and preferred shares in Canadair and they have guaranteed not to sell them. That is very strange when you consider the original reasons for their purchase of Canadair, which was to put Canadair together with the de Havilland company in Toronto to form a viable aerospace industry which would be attractive for some private company to buy. Now there is no longer any talk of putting together a viable package and selling the industry. They are saying now that they promise not to sell and that they remain committed to cover any overrun cost which might occur in the production and sale of LearStar jets.

I find that the banks of Canada are put in this position on a fairly regular basis by this government, which is the sole organization left in this country that can raise and control large amounts of capital. It is no wonder that banks are confused, and with the management this government provides, it is no wonder that banks are very hesitant to commit their own funds, particularly Canadian banks which know this government better than American banks do, although American banks have locked them into a pretty tough contract in order to provide another $70 million for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to get his favourite plane flying.

I have nothing further to add, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry that the government is too incompetent to bring in this bank bill of which they have had 11 years' notice. I trust the next government will be more competent. I want to point out that I think the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is in a very poor position to predict what will happen at the end of five years to these promissory notes which they are selling in the United States, backed by the government. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce says he wishes to be remembered as a great friend of business, but he has about as much chance of being remembered as a friend of business as Benedict Arnold had of being remembered as the conqueror of Ticonderoga.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill because I think it is important. It indicates one of the weaknesses of this government in relation to the Bank Act, a weakness that has existed for a number of years. When the Bank Act was originally passed, we were to have a revision of the act every ten years. This has been delayed over a period of years now until one of these days we will miss the ten year period and a decade will have gone by with no revision. Although the government is now asking in this bill for the revision to be held over and for parliament to free the government of the responsibility to make changes that are required by law, we are actually talking about changes that should have taken place in 1970, and this is 1978. So we have had considerable slippage in following the provisions of the act for some time. I think one of the reasons for this is that the government is too busy worrying about a number of other problems.

It was interesting to note that the financial institutions are very influential, not only here but in other countries. I was particularly interested in some of the remarks that were made about the changes contemplated by Sun Life in its proposed move from Montreal because of certain conditions for which this government has been responsible for the last two or three years. Perhaps that is why the white paper with which we were presented has never been proceeded with.

It is interesting to note that there are a number of banks in this country which, as hon. members have said, are protected in such a way that they are guaranteed their savings, so that for many years no bank has gone bankrupt in this country. This is in contrast with the hundreds of thousands of banks operating in the United States which collapsed during the depression years. One of the reasons that Canadian banks are not in difficulty is the interrelationship between the Government of Canada and its banking institutions which allows the government to decide what the savings should be, what the margins of the banks should be and what banks may be developed. That control seems to me to have worked very well in protecting the banks but it has not always worked so well in protecting the public.

Much of our trouble in this country stems from the fact that while Canadians have much money in savings, in most instances they are reluctant to put that money into the development of our country, and particularly into the social capital of our nation. When a municipality wants to raise money, it calls on the suitcase bankers to lend much of it. Suitcase bankers are not necessarily bad bankers. As was pointed out recently by one of my colleagues, very seldom is there a foreclosure or a mistake made by a U.S. suitcase banker who comes to this country, makes large loans and returns home, without having run any establishment in this country. We have been very particular in our relations with them. When a different government is formed, it does not matter in what province, a trip is always made to New York—although it does not always happen as fast as has been the case in the past year—to find out whether or not Wall Street will back the debentures or the requirements of the province. The state of the nation has had something to do with their ability to maintain or establish credit ratings which are so important to these suitcase bankers.

It behooves us to study banking in this country. Hon. members are aware that a finance company once came before parliament asking for permission to establish a bank under rules and regulations totally different from those in the present Bank Act. That request was made because the Bank Act was being held up, and it has been held up for approximately three years. Parliament had to consider that application and some changes in the Bank Act which were asked for by that finance company. The government promised that finance company that Bank Act legislation would pass two years ago. The government also promised it would pass last year. Through the efforts of some members of the other place, some of us were convinced that because the Bank Act legislation was going to meet the requirements of the co-operative movement, finance companies, trust companies and others who had gone part way into the banking structure, the requested legislation should be passed, and we now have another bank operating under conditions which are different from those under which other chartered banks operate. This new bank is allowed to exist pursuant to legislation which is anticipated but which has not been passed and may not be passed for a number of years. That bank now operates and has advantages which in my opinion are not available to other banks.

Small community development projects today are at the mercy of ordinary banks. We set up the Federal Business Development Bank, the old industrial development bank. It is supposed to be a bank of last resort, but people find that instead of making the concessions they have to make to the FBDB they might as well make them to ordinary banks.

There are some changes which should be made. We should be discussing the role of trust companies and co-operatives through their credit union and caisse populaire structure. We should be talking about the role of these institutions and whether it should be mandatory, as I presume is the case in the province of Quebec today, that regional consideration be given, and whether the same rules should necessarily apply in natural resource development areas as in the housing industry and in certain small businesses. Perhaps different rules should apply for exploration in the Arctic. There may be a strong argument that we need to revise the Bank Act to take into consideration the diverse needs of communities.

It has always seemed odd—and this point has been dealt with many times by my colleagues in the Social Credit party—that Canada is not a leader in the field of lending institutions. We are certainly not, however, in the unenviable position of the United States where banks are asked to lend large sums of money to the international community, particularly developing countries. Ten years ago it was felt that if money was lent to those countries, those countries would develop their own resources and eventually become markets. In fact, that has not happened, and thus the International Monetary Fund finds itself in a very serious position. Although money was lent, the IMF has been unable to collect much of what is owing by the third world. Therefore the banking industry, particularly in the United States, is in great difficulty.

I am sure some Canadian banks are also suffering as a result of this, but they have not made loans of that kind to municipalities in Canada which desperately need capital to develop such things as educational systems or to provide sewers and water and other services. These are long-term projects, and they would be secure investments as long as the country remains secure.

Banks could have handled the financing of these kinds of projects. Interest rates could have been much lower; volumes would have been large. The first thing the newly elected premier of the province of Quebec did was go to Wall Street to see what terms he could obtain for borrowing for long-term development. That was also done by the premier of Saskatchewan. This would not be surprising if banking institutions in Canada were weak, but we have more savings per capita than any other country in the world. I was very amused to learn not long ago that we have $282 billion in insurance savings. If we have that amount lying around, we should not really need to go to another country to borrow money. Our banking structure should be such that through the Bank of Canada we could direct banks toward the type of lending in which they should be involved.

In revising the Bank Act we should consider two other matters which are closely connected. One of these has caused the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to announce his retirement at the end of this parliament; that is, our competition legislation. That legislation is obviously a financial instrument, and it should be overhauled in such a way that a much more people-oriented direction could be taken so that not only companies but the public as well could be protected. Companies are certainly already well protected. If a company is bothered by competition, it can buy out that competition. The public must also be protected by our competition legislation, and money must be made available so that there can be competition.

My colleague spoke about the free enterprise system. He referred to the little corner hot dog stand and McDonald's sitting side by side. We say that this is a country of unlimited free enterprise where the little person can compete with

[Mr. Peters.]

McDonald's. However, that is not the case at the bank, and if it is not the case at the bank, there really is no competition at all. There is no competition at the wholesalers, and if a small operation cannot get started with a loan bearing rates and conditions comparable to that enjoyed by McDonald's, that is not competition either.

A great deal of abuse has taken place with regard to bankruptcy, and this abuse has been suffered not so much by banks and financial institutions as by the public. Is there a constituency held by any hon. member in this House which has not experienced the bankruptcy of dozens of little companies? Secured creditors get their money when bankruptcies occur. Workers and suppliers of services and goods do not get any money. The only ones who get any money are financial institutions, and they do pretty well. Surely we must take these factors into consideration when dealing with the Bank Act. If we do not there will be a great deal of distrust resulting from the disparity that exists between large and small borrowers. Although the banks are quite happy to have small borrowers deposit their money, they are not so happy when they apply for loans.

The banking institutions have now entered the field of short term credit. I think there are few people who have not been offered some type of short term credit that will eventually end up in an Econocard or some such thing issued by a bank. I suggest there will be no such thing as money changing hands. The bank will get a note of your credits and deposits and will deal with withdrawals and other services by computer.

Few people who use banks today are unaware of the changes that have taken place in the banking community. I recently spoke to two bank managers from a community other than my own. It was interesting to hear them speak of a new problem: apparently the banks are being unionized. One mentioned that an employee had been made chief accountant, which was a new title. He did not get any more money, just the title. Mr. Speaker, what they are trying to do is put as many people as they can into management by giving them a title so that they will not be able to join a union. People in the banking world have no particular faith in their institutions and are well aware of how poorly many people are being treated.

I think it is high time we reviewed the Bank Act. Legislation should not be introduced the day before an election—which will probably take place in 1979—so that we will just get around at the last moment to putting in a ten-year change as a concession in order to get some thing done. Changing the Bank Act should involve all constituents of the banking community—trust companies, loan companies, the co-operative movement, caisses populaires and credit unions. Perhaps we should look at this question before we expand the activities of banks. I have always found banks to be identical, whether the Banque Canadienne Nationale or the Royal Bank.

If you approach several banks with a proposition you will likely get the same answer from them all; one will not take a chance any more than the other. If you approach a credit union it will probably consider your character, your past record, whether you get along with your spouse and some other questions that indicate whether you are likely to remain in the community. Then they will probably make you a loan. There is no competition in banking. We must consider whether we have too many banks already or whether we should promote all the near banks to the status of regular banks. We created a bank for the IAC and allowed special considerations to their directors which were not available to any other bank.

We should approach the other place to do a serious study with whatever independence they retain. The chairman of the banking committee in the other place, Senator Hayden, probably holds many directorships in banking institutions. My hon. friend says not. The last time I looked he had five or six directorships and is connected with many other financial institutions. That may not be a bad thing, of course, because it may give him an insight into the institutions that the rest of us do not have. I would find it a very difficult problem, however, if he were to exercise the jurisdiction he gets from his directorships when making decisions in the other place. He made them in the case of IAC and I suggest he may make them for other banking institutions. This is a problem we should look at before the provinces decide to set up their own banks or before cities like Toronto decide to set up banks to serve their own needs. This would only further fragment the banking community and its ability to raise large sums of money for the development of some of the important interests of the nation.

The government should stop worrying about Quebec and get on with running the country. I think it is a cop-out to put this Bank Act off for another year. If there is no election then they will put it off for a further year. There are very serious problems in the banking institutions of this country. They have the ability to extend credit where it sometimes should not be extended, and they have the ability to withhold credit in the areas of housing and community development where it should not be withheld.

I think it is a very serious matter to put off the decennial review of the Bank Act. Instead of reviewing it in 1970, we are postponing it until 1978. We may well lose ten years through this remission we are granting now.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to miss this opportunity during consideration of Bill C-16 to express once more my views about the Canadian monetary system which, in my opinion, ought to be modified. It should be amended so as to meet the needs of the population instead of being the master of the economic and financial situation in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I think we have often stated our position on that matter, that monetization of the nation's credit should be done through an institution exclusively owned by the state. I would not want someone to believe that I hold a grudge against bankers.

● (2142)

Certainly not; I respect them as human beings and I want them to do their job in our country, but I would like the legislation under which they operate to be amended. The last time the Bank Act was revised, the Canadian parliament gave them more power. The interest ceiling was removed. They were given access to mortgage loans. While many industries are having great difficulty in surviving and saving their business because of competition from foreign products or on the international market, our banking institutions are making a lot of money because the legislation gives them special protection.

They never made as much profit as during the last few years when we have been plagued by serious inflation and high unemployment, which, far from decreasing, is going up according to the statistics, and it grieves us to repeat this. I would much prefer to be able to say this evening that the employment situation is improving in my constituency, that there are fewer unemployed, that more industries are being developed and can offer employment to the young people who graduate from our colleges, our CEGEPs, our universities and trade schools. I would much prefer to be able to say this, but because of somewhat peculiar circumstances, 1978 may be even worse than 1977. At the end of the year, if we look at the statements of chartered banks, we shall see once again that their profits have increased and that they have made more money while the other economic sectors are having an extremely difficult time.

Mr. Speaker, are we to believe that the government and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) are not aware of this? Is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) not aware of this? They are aware of this situation, but they are the lackeys of the financial powers, and the Prime Minister himself stated in 1977 that bankers were the worst complainers in Canada. It is because he is aware of the situation that he said this. He said that under his administration, the banks had made more profits than any other economic sector in Canada and that he was ashamed of this situation. Our right hon. Prime Minister said this. This was published in a magazine. All Canadians can read about that and I am sure that when the Prime Minister made that statement he knew what he was saying because he was acquainted with the facts.

Mr. Speaker, surely it does not rest with a single man to give up that authority or that constraint. It rests with Parliament and parliamentarians to help the government and the Minister of Finance to present legislation aimed at removing some powers from chartered banks and at amending section 72 of the Bank Act. I had hoped that during this session the government would introduce legislation to review entirely the Bank Act, but I realize that such is not the government intention. Bill C-16 is quite short since it is only two pages long.

In fact, there is only one clause, but a very important one, which further extends for months the supremacy of chartered banks on the minting of the nation's credit. I was discussing that matter with a former bank manager just before I came to the House and we were deploring the fact that such a section should give so much power to those financial institutions and that the Bank of Canada which is the bank of Canadians should have so little power compared with chartered banks.

We agreed that money is an instrument of exchange and measure of assets and that such an instrument should be totally under the authority of the government through the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, when it is suggested that Canada's money supply is created by the Bank of Canada, people are not being told the truth because of Canada's money supply which stands at about $100 billion the government of Canada through the Bank of Canada only created about 10 per cent of that. So who created the other 90 per cent of that money supply? Where does that money come from? Where does that money supply come from, if not through the creation of bank deposits made by chartered banks to their clients? And when their clients pay back the loans that were made to them through the creation of deposits, money is being destroyed. That is not the way it should be, Mr. Speaker. In this country that it not the way it should be if we really want to use our monetary system for the benefit of the people as a whole, the benefit of government and, as the hon. member who spoke before me suggested, provincial, municipal and school governments so those governments will be able to achieve objectives within their jurisdictions, provide people with services at decent costs, not being forced to pay back $5 for every $1.

That is the case now in this country, and I urge hon. members to consider the situation very seriously; I think I have spoken about this in the House then I quoted a very particular case when the federal government through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation made a loan—it made several but I am quoting a very particular case—to the Quebec Housing Corporation to build 30 housing units. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation after obtaining the necessary money from the government, money that it obtained from chartered banks, lent $537,863 to the province of Quebec. Mr. Bourassa, an economist premier, was not economical; he was a professional economist and, good boy that he was, he signed an agreement with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation promising to reimburse $57,000 yearly, for 50 years, that is $5 for each $1 borrowed.

Now, far be it from me to want to shock anyone in this House but, in the province of Quebec we are living under another government, another premier. Are things any different? Again, Mr. Speaker, big finance is running the show, dictating its will to the new government of Quebec, deciding what it must and must not do. In other words, the financiers control the credit of the nation, they order the governments around, what we call democratic governments. That is financial dictatorship in parliamentary democracy and the nation is its laughingstock. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation whatsoever to say that I shall vote against Bill C-16 because I did not really expect that we could deal in depth and completely with the Bank Act, to really improve it and assign the monetary system its real role while allowing chartered banks to serve the private sector and serve it well.

I am not criticizing the accounting system of the banks because it is excellent. They have remarkable officers and they know how to take advantage of a law which serves them well. I would like this act to be amended in such a way that we can be proud to say that in Canada we have an exemplary monetary system, a monetary system which serves the private sector well but which does not dominate the public sector that should be ruled by the representatives of the people.

If we are elected for something, let us prove it, reject Bill C-16 and require the government to get on as soon as possible with the study of legislation with a view to revising the Bank Act and at that time we will debate in an objective manner and bring forward the necessary amendments to this bill so that the Bank of Canada may truly become the bank of Canadians and that it may lend to the chartered banks the necessary credits in proportion to their needs to further the development of our country. This would bring order to our financial system; two separate sectors: the public sector would be financed by the institution of all Canadians and the private sector would be financed by private financial institutions. If we do not come to such a solution, I am convinced that within five, ten or 20 years Canada's debt which has doubled within the past eight years, the gross national debt which amounted to $43 billion in 1968 and which has risen to $86 billion in 1976 will not diminish in the coming years but rather increase. The servicing of the debt will also increase.

The government will either have to again borrow billions of dollars or increase its levies on Canadian taxpayers in order to pay the interest to those who control the minting of the credit in our country. At that time, we will realize that we are facing a tremendous national debt. According to accounting experts we are now indebting ourselves to the tune of $16,000 a minute. In the present budget, it is costing us more than $15 million a day just in interest on the Canadian public debt, and that excludes municipal or provincial debts.

Is that a good system? Let us keep it if it is any good. But then let us stop complaining and I am convinced that if we keep it, our private enterprise system, our capitalist system which should be the best in the world because it should be more likely to represent the aspirations of free men is going to crumble very quickly, because we have asked too much of it. If we refuse to bring about reforms, to correct our system which is increasingly degenerating, one of these days we will wake up to the realization that it is impossible to make this private enterprise system survive and we will then enter an era of dictatorship that nobody wanted in the first place but that we will be compelled to suffer because we will not have had the courage to take up to our responsibilities while it was still time.

This is why very briefly I wish to state again very clearly my position. I still think, like our party, that we should revamp our monetary system and make changes to it. Yet only parliament has authority on that matter and cabinet members, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) under the direction of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have the authority, according to our procedure, to present such a legislation. We can talk about it and make representations but the final decision will be made by the members of cabinet. Then, if cabinet members bring the legislation that will correct the situation I shall be the first to say that owing to them, to the cabinet, to those men who had the guts to confront big finance, to put some order in, if we have good results, I shall recognize that owing to them we have at last a monetary system serving the Canadian people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

(Printed pursuant to order made Monday, December 5, 1977)

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO
TORONTO WEEKLY COURT

IN THE MATTER OF an application for Judicial Review, pursuant to The Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971, S.O. 1971, Chap. 48;
AND IN THE MATTER OF the Atomic Energy Control Act, R.S.C. 1970, Chap. A-19;
AND IN THE MATTER OF Regulations Respecting the Security of Uranium Information, S.O.R. 76-644; BETWEEN:
JOE CLARK, SINCLAIR STEVENS, BILL KEMPLING, WALTER BAKER, JIM GILLIES and RON HUNTINGTON

Applicants

—and—
ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA

Respondent

EVANS, C.J.H.C.:—

This application is brought by Joe Clark and five other members of the federal Progressive Conservative party pursuant to s. 6(2) of the Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971, S.O. 1971, c. 48, for judicial review of the Uranium Information Security Regulations, SOR/76-644, promulgated pursuant to s. 9 of the Atomic Energy Control Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. A-19. Counsel for the applicants and the respondent submitted that this was a matter of some urgency and, consequently, I agreed to hear them on the merits and granted leave to proceed.

In the Notice of Motion, the applicants seek the following order:

1. A declaration that the Uranium Information Security Regulations (hereinafter referred to as "The Regulations") do not prohibit the applicants from releasing any note, documents or material or communicating the contents thereof to their solicitors and counsel for the purpose of seeking legal advice and facilitating the conduct of any legal proceedings.

2. A declaration that The Regulations do not prohibit the solicitors and counsel for the applicants to release or disclose any such documents in furtherance of the conduct or prosecution of any legal proceedings.

3. A declaration that The Regulations do not prohibit the applicants or any member of the House of Commons from releasing or disclosing any such documents in the course and in furtherance of Parliamentary debate.

4. A declaration that if the said Regulations do prohibit the release or disclosure referred to in paragraphs 1, 2 or 3 above, the said Regulations are ultra vires the Governor General in Council and therefore of no force and effect because:

i) The Regulations contravene The Canadian Bill of Rights, 8-9 Eliz. II, Chap. 44 as amended, in that they abrogate, abridge or infringe freedom of speech and the applicants' right to security of person and enjoyment of property and their right not to be deprived thereof, except by due process of law;

ii) The Regulations deprive the applicants of their right to counsel.

iii) The Regulations abrogate, abridge and infringe the privileges, immunities and power of the applicants and other members of the Official Opposition as members of the House of Commons.

5. A declaration that The Regulations are invalid because they are not authorized by the Atomic Energy Control Act, R.S.C. 1970, Chap. A-19.

6. A declaration that The Regulations are invalid because they were not validly promulgated pursuant to the Atomic Energy Control Act.

7. A declaration that The Regulations are invalid or are not yet in force by reason of the non-compliance with s. 3 of the Canadian Bill of Rights, 8-9 Eliz. II, Chap. 44, as amended.

At the hearing, counsel for the applicants stated that he did not propose to make submissions respecting grounds 6 or 7 and the application for a declaration based on grounds 6 or 7 is therefore denied.

At the outset a motion was brought on behalf of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association for leave to intervene amicus curiae. Despite the submissions of counsel for the Association, I denied the application on the grounds that the issues raised were fully covered in the facta filed by counsel and that submissions by the intervenor relative to the same issues would serve no useful purpose. Moreover, I did not consider it either necessary or proper to widen the issues which the parties proposed to present to the Court. Counsel for the intervenor conceded that there is no right of intervention and that the grant of such indulgence is within the discretion of the Court. Under the circumstances, I was not satisfied that this was an appropriate case for the intervention amicus curiae and exercised my discretion accordingly. Before proceeding to deal with the issues presented by the parties, however, I feel compelled to deal with the question of interventions amici curiae.

In the Supreme Court of Canada, provision is made in the Rules for interventions. Rule 60 states that:

> (1) Any person interested in an appeal between other parties may, by leave of the Court or a Judge, intervene therein upon such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges as the Court or Judge may determine.
> (2) The costs of such intervention shall be paid by such party or parties as the Supreme Court shall order.

The intervention is by leave and is within the discretion of the Court. In Dr. Henry Morgentaler v. Her Majesty the Queen and A.G. Canada, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616, the Court granted leave to six associations and heard submissions from each. The Court apparently was of the view that the submissions of each intervenor would serve a useful role in determining the controversial issues presented to the Court. (See also The Nova Scotia Board of Censors and A.G. Nova Scotia v. McNeil, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 265.)

In England, intervention amicus curiae is granted primarily to government agents such as the Attorney-General or the Official Solicitor (see, for example, Morelle v. Wakeling, [1955] 2 Q.B. 379; for a discussion, see Alan Levy, "The Amicus Curiae", Chitty's Law Journal, March, 1972, pp. 94-95). J. M. L. Evans, Official Solicitor of the Supreme Court of England, in a Communication dated November 26, 1969, had this to say about the role of amicus curiae:

> It is . . . a comparatively rare procedure and is usually invoked where it is considered by the Court that an important point of law is involved which the Court wishes fully argued and which is unlikely to be dealt with by the parties before it. I think it is practically unknown in my experience for any such procedure to be initiated by a bystander as indicated in these old works. (Levy, p. 95) (Emphasis added)

Where both sides are represented by able counsel and the issues are squarely put to the Court, interventions amicus curiae are not appropriate.

In Re Drummond Wren, [1945] 4 D.L.R. 674, Mackay, J. permitted intervention by the Canadian Jewish Congress. In that case, the applicant, who was the owner, sought to set aside a restrictive covenant which provided that the land was "not to be sold to Jews, or to persons of objectionable nationality". There was no respondent.

In Rex rel rose v. Marshall (1962), 48 M.P.R. 64 (Nfld. Dist.Ct.), Kent, D.C.J., dealt with the issue of whether certain publications were obscene. The distributors did not contest the seizure of the publications and did not make submissions at the show cause hearing. However, one of the publications was "Playboy" and counsel for Hugh M. Heffner, the publisher, sought to intervene as amicus curiae in order to argue that "Playboy" was not obscene. At pp. 66-67, Kent, D.C.J., stated:

> At this time I did not see that Mr. Barry, appearing simply for and on behalf of Playboy and under that name on the record, had a right to be heard. However, in the particular circumstances of this case and the fact that I felt the hearing of all persons who might in any capacity properly be permitted to be heard before the Court, would be of assistance to the Court, particularly where there was no voice before the Court on behalf of the publications seized, I therefore told Mr. Barry that I would not permit him to be heard as representing a party to the action nor place him on the record as representing a party to the summons, but as a matter of indulgence I would hear him simply as "amicus Curiae". (Emphasis added)

The distributors did not make any submission on the issue of obscenity and the trial judge considered that counsel for Playboy could assist the Court in determining that legal issue.

In Re Chateau-Gai Wines Ltd. and Attorney-General of Canada (1970), 14 D.L.R. (3d) 411, Jackett, P. dealt with an application in the Exchequer Court involving the Canada-France Trade Agreement Act, 1933. At pp. 412-3, Jackett, P. States that:

> Before turning to a recital of such events, however, I should mention that, while the registrant, being a sovereign power, is not a party to this application, the Court did cause the proceedings to be brought to the attention of the Deputy Attorney-General of Canada with the suggestion that, as a matter of courtesy, they might be brought to the attention of the Government of the French Republic and that, while such action was taken more than two years before the commencement of the hearing of this application, neither the Government of the French Republic nor the Attorney-General of Canada had, prior thereto, intervened in the matter. However, counsel instructed by the Attorney-General of Canada did appear during the first part of the hearing as amici curiae and were very helpful to the Court on the issues upon which they undertook to assist the Court. Subsequently, after an adjournment, the Attorney-General of Canada was granted leave to appear as a party, and, as such a party, has opposed the application. (Emphasis added)

Given the circumstances in that case, the Attorney-General had a clear interest in seeking to uphold the provisions of the Agreement.

Subject to statutory or court-made rules, it is my view that interventions amici curiae should be restricted to those cases in which the Court is clearly in need of assistance because there is a failure to present the issues (as, for example, where one side of the argument has not been presented to the Court). Where the intervention would only serve to widen this lis between the parties or introduce a new cause of action, the intervention should not be allowed.

While it may have been preferable to have dealt with the application for intervention following the argument of counsel for the applicants, I concluded, in the present case, that the experience and competence of counsel for the applicants guaranteed a complete canvas of the legal issues involved and that intervention was therefore not appropriate.

Although the issue of jurisdiction was not raised in either Statement, I put it to counsel that it may well be that the matter should have been brought in the Federal Court pursuant to s. 17 or s. 18 of the Federal Court Act, 1970-71-72 (Can), c. 1 (now R.S.C. 1970, c. 10 (2d Supp.) Counsel then made submissions on the question of jurisdiction and I reserved decision. However, I proceeded to hear counsel on the merits in order to facilitate the hearing of this matter and with the hope of preventing a multiplicity of proceedings.

Given the nature of this application, there are a number of considerations relating to jurisdiction. In the first place, the applicants challenge the validity of the Regulations. This challenge involves a consideration of the nature and extent of the powers of the Board under s. 9 of the Atomic Energy Control Act. Therefore, I must consider the effect of s. 18 of the Federal Court Act. Moreover, the applicants seek review of the approval of the Governor in Council. This involves a consideration of s. 17 of the Act. Finally, the applicants seek an interpretation of the application of the Regulations. This also involves a consideration of the ambit of s. 17.

Section 17(1) of the Federal Court Act provides:

> The Trial Division has original jurisdiction in all cases where relief is claimed against the Crown and, except where otherwise provided, the Trial Division has exclusive original jurisdiction in all such cases. (Emphasis added)

Section 2(m) reads:

> 'relief' includes every species of relief whether by way of damages, payment of money, injunction, declaration, restitution . . . or otherwise. (Emphasis added)

"Crown" is defined in s. 2 and meaning "Her Majesty in right of Canada". Counsel for the applicants strenuously argued that the application for a declaration was not "relief . . . claimed against the Crown". This argument has two aspects. The first is that Parliament, the Cabinet and the Atomic Energy Control Board do not come within the meaning of the word "Crown". The second aspect is that s. 17(1) is designed solely for tort and contract actions and similar proceedings.

The issue of jurisdiction is discussed by Donnelly, J., in Denison Mines Ltd. v. A.G. Canada, [1973] 1 O.R. 797, in which he dealt with an application for a declaration that the Atomic Energy Control Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 11 (now R.S.C. 1970, c. A-19) was ultra vires the Parliament of Canada. The issue of the Federal Court Act was raised and Donnelly, J., concluded at p. 802:

> "It asks for a declaration that the Atomic Energy Control Act is ultra vires the Parliament of Canada. This is a matter directly affecting the Crown and its right to control atomic energy. Whether such an action could be heard in this Court before the passing of the Federal Court Act need not be decided as s. 17(1) of that Act gives the Trial Division of the Federal Court exclusive jurisdiction in all cases where relief is claimed against the Crown including relief by way of declaration." (Emphasis added)

Donnelly, J., goes on to state at p. 804:

> "Section 17(1) of the Federal Court Act when read with s. 2(m) is adequate to clothe the Trial Division of the Federal Court with exclusive jurisdiction where a declaration is sought in a matter that affects the Crown as is done here and to exclude this Court from entertaining this case." (Emphasis added)

When s. 17 and the definitions of "relief" and "Crown" in s. 2 and read together, they appear to oust the jurisdiction of this Court where an applicant directly challenges the validity of a federal statute by means of an application for a declaration. The approach taken in Denison Mines would also appear to be relevant to any attack on federal regulations and to any application for a declaration interpreting such regulations.

The decision in Denison Mines is criticized by Dale Gibson, Faculty of Law, University of Manitoba, in a note entitled "Constitutional Law—Power of Provincial Courts to Determine Constitutionality of Federal Legislation" in 54 C.B.R. 372-380. At p. 373, he states that:

> Apart altogether from the constitutional implications, which will be discussed later, this decision is mistaken for several reasons. Section 17(1) applies only to cases where relief is claimed against the Crown, and the only claim involved in the Denison case was against the Attorney General of Canada. The mere fact that the outcome of the litigation might affect the Crown does not mean that relief is claimed against the Crown. Even if the court were right on that point it is difficult to see how Crown rights were involved in the case. The legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada were certainly involved, but it is one of the most fundamental principles of constitutional law that Parliament and the Crown are distinct legal entities. The former is a legislative body and the latter is an executive body. Reference to the Crown in section 17(1) of the Federal Court Act cannot reasonably be construed to mean Parliament; section 2(f) of the Act removes any possible doubt about that by defining Crown to mean Her Majesty in right of Canada. Finally, even if there were an ambiguity which permitted more than one meaning to be assigned to the term Crown, the ambiguity should have been resolved in favour of jurisdiction by the High Court, since, in the words of Maxwell (Interpretation of Statutes (12th ed, 1969), p. 153):
> A strong leaning exists against construing a statute so as to oust or restrict the jurisdiction of the superior court . . . a statute should not be construed as taking away the jurisdiction of the courts in the absence of clear and unambiguous language to that effect.

The main thrust of Professor Gibson's criticism is that he apparently feels that the term "Crown" does not include Parliament. Implicitly, Professor Gibson is restricting s. 17 to civil actions against the Crown involving tort or contract liability. (This is supported by his reference, infra, to McNeil v. Nova Scotia Board of Censors (1975), 53 D.L.R. (3d) 259 (N.S.C.A.), involving the provincial Proceedings Against the Crown Act, R.S.N.S. 1967, c. 239, discussed infra).

Despite his conclusion on Denison Mines, Professor Gibson admits, at pp. 373-4:

> The Denison approach received some support from the British Columbia Supreme Court in Canex Placer Ltd. v. Attorney-General of British Columbia (1975), 56 D.L.R. (3d) 592 (B.C.S.C.); (rev'd on other grounds (1976), 58 D.L.R. (3d) 241 (B.C.C.A.).) That case also involved a claim for a declaration that certain legislation was unconstitutional. Since the statute concerned was provincial, the meaning of the Federal Court Act did not arise. However, the case did deal with the question of whether an action to determine the constitutionality of legislation is a proceeding against the Crown. Verchere, J. held that such an action cannot be brought against the Attorney-General of the province because it is a proceeding against the Crown, and provincial legislation requires that the Queen in the right of the province should be the designated defendant in such proceedings.

Therefore, an action to determine the validity of a statute would be a "proceeding against the Crown". This is entirely consistent with Denison Mines.

Professor Gibson also cites McNeil v. Nova Scotia Board of Censors, supra, in which the Court held that a "proceeding against the Crown" did not include an application for a declaration that an Act was ultra vires. It should be pointed out, however, that the Proceedings Against the Crown Act, R.S.N.S. 1967, c. 239, is basically designated to deal with tort or contract "proceedings" against the Crown. Section 1(f) of the Act states that:

> "proceedings against the Crown" includes a claim by way of set-off or counterclaim raised in proceedings by the Crown, and interpleader proceedings to which the Crown is a party;

Section 3 states that:

> 3. Subject to this Act, a person who has a claim against the Crown may enforce it as of right by proceedings against the Crown in accordance with this Act in all cases in which:
>
> (a) the land, goods or money of the subject are the possession of the Crown; or
>
> (b) the claim arises out of a contract entered into by or on behalf of the Crown; or
> (c) the claim is based upon liability of the Crown in tort to which it is subject by this Act. R.S., c. 225, s. 3.

Thus, "proceedings against the Crown" may not be comparable to "relief . . . against the Crown". There is nothing in the Federal Court Act to indicate whether s. 17 is limited to tort or contract proceedings. The definition of "relief" in s. 2(m) would appear to go beyond such proceedings and includes "every species of relief". Unfortunately, Professor Gibson does not take cognizance of these distinctions.

The effect of the decision of Donnelly, J. in Denison Mines on the current application is not entirely clear. In this case, I am concerned with an application for review of the approval by the Cabinet of Regulations 76-644 and the power of the Board under s. 9. I am not convinced that s. 17 of the Federal Court Act was designed to cover this situation. The application before me does not involve an attack on the validity of a statute and Denison Mines is not entirely relevant. As a result, I am reluctant to relinquish any jurisdiction existing in this court. I must assume that the jurisdiction of this court continues in the absence of the clearest words to the contrary.

Given the fact that we are concerned with the powers of a federal Board, it is also necessary to consider s. 18 of the Federal Court Act. Section 18 reads:

> The Trial Division has exclusive original jurisdiction:
>
> (a) to issue an injunction, writ of certiorari, writ of prohibition, writ of mandamus or writ of quo warranto, or grant declaratory relief, against any federal board, commission or other tribunal; and
> (b) to hear and determine any application or other proceeding for relief in the nature of relief contemplated by paragraph (a), including any proceeding brought against the Attorney-General of Canada, to obtain relief against a federal board, commission or other tribunal (Emphasis added)

The extent of s. 18 is considered in Hamilton v. Hamilton Harbour Commissioners (1972), 27 D.L.R. (3d) 385 (Ont. C.A.). In that case, the Court held that the Supreme Court of Ontario did not have jurisdiction to grant a declaration against the federal Harbour Commission. The Court affirmed that s. 18 ousts the jurisdiction over federal boards. At p. 386, Gale, C.J.O. states that:

> It appears to us that the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners clearly come within the plain language of s. 2(g). They are a federal board, commission or other tribunal because they are a body . . . 'exercising or purporting to exercise jurisdiction or powers conferred by or under an Act of the Parliament of Canada'. That is so by reason of the provisions of the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners' Act, 1912 (Can.), c. 98, passed in 1912 by the Parliament of Canada, and subsequently amended from time to time. That being so, the above provisions of s. 18 apply, and it is our view that this Court no longer has any jurisdiction in a matter wherein declaratory relief is sought against such 'federal board, commission or other tribunal'.

The Hamilton Harbour Commission Act, S.C. 1951, c. 17 confers two basic powers on the Commissioners:

> a) the power to regulate and control the use of the harbour;
> b) the power to deal with certain real property.

The Harbour Commissions Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. H-1, imposes on a commission the duty and power to regulate and control the use and development of all property within the limits of the commission's harbour jurisdiction (section 9) and authorizes a commission to purchase and lease or sell property in the harbour (section 10). It is clear that the operation of a commission as a land owner raises the question of provincial jurisdiction. Consequently, s. 18 may not be designed to cover such activities. The decision in Hamilton Harbour Commissioners, therefore, may be limited to commission activities relating to the regulation and control of harbour activities. Again, the practical effect is that the extent of the decision in Hamilton Harbour Commissioners is not entirely clear.

Another factor which must be considered in assessing the applicability of s. 18 is that s. 9 of the Atomic Energy Control Act confers the power on the Board subject to the "approval of the Governor in Council". In this respect, the applicants are seeking relief against the Board and the Governor in Council. The decision of one depends on the other and the decisions are not mutually exclusive. The complementary nature of the decision-making process takes the situation out of the ambit of s. 18 of the Federal Court Act.

Counsel for the applicants spent considerable time evaluating the right of the applicants to challenge the Act and the Regulations and to seek a declaration of rights. I am of the view that Thorson v. A.G. Can., [1975] 1 S.C.R. 138 and Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, supra, is sufficient authority for the proposition that every citizen has the right to challenge the validity of a Statute or a Regulation. The fact that the applicants go beyond this and ask alternatively for an interpretation of the application of the Regulations does not alter their basic right.

There is one aspect of this application which does concern me. In their alternative submissions, they seek a declaration that a Member of Parliament cannot be prevented from using the information in Parliament. Moreover, they seek a declaration that the Regulations do not abridge the solicitor-client privilege. In this respect, they are seeking "absolution before sinning". In my view, they should advance these two arguments as a defence if they are charged. Practically speaking, they may not be charged, in which case this part of the application is simply an academic exercise.

In Dyson v. Attorney-General, [1911] 1 K.B. 410, Cozens-Hardy, M.R., at p. 417, had this to say about applications for a declaration:

> The Court is not bound to make a mere declaratory judgment, and in the exercise of its discretion will have regard to all the circumstances of the case. I can, however, conceive many cases in which a declaratory judgment may be highly convenient, and I am disposed to think, if all other objections are removed, this is a case to which r. 5 might with advantage be applied. But I desire to guard myself against the supposition that I hold that a person who expects to be made defendant, and who prefers to be plaintiff, can, as a matter of right, attain his object by commencing an action to obtain a declaration that his opponent has no good cause of action against him. The Court may well say 'Wait until you are attacked and then raise your defence', and may dismiss the action with costs.

The same approach could be taken in this case. Counsel for the applicants argued that the applicants could not obtain meaningful legal advice due to the refusal of counsel to receive information which might contravene the Regulations. If the applicants are willing to release the information but counsel refuse to receive it, it is counsel not the applicants who are seeking the exoneration of the Court in order to justify their receipt of the information. Once again, I am concerned that these proceedings are inappropriate.

Despite these concerns, I intend to deal with the merits of the application in the hope that it will finalize this matter although I enter the caveat that such applications should be considered most carefully. The role of the Court is not to grant "absolution before sinning" nor to deal with academic issues.

In dealing with the validity of the Regulations, the preamble of the Atomic Energy Control Act must be considered:

> WHEREAS it is essential in the national interest to make provisions for the control and supervision of the development, application and use of atomic energy, and to enable Canada to participate effectively in measures of international control of atomic energy which may hereafter be agreed upon; Therefore, His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

Only Parliament is entitled to judge what steps must be taken in the "national interest". The Courts are reluctant to interfere with actions deemed to be taken in the "national interest".

Section 9 of the Act grants a wide power to the Board to make Regulations. Counsel for the applicants and respondent argued that the power to pass Regulations 76-644 must be found in s. 9 (d)(e) or (g). Those provisions read:

> The Board may with the approval of the Governor in Council make regulations
> . . .
>
> (d) regulating the production, import, export transportation, refining, possession, ownership, use or sale of prescribed substances and any other things that in the opinion of the Board may be used for the production, use or application of atomic energy;
>
> (e) for the purpose of keeping secret information respecting the production, use and application of, and research and investigations with respect to, atomic energy, as in the opinion of the Board, the public interest may require;
> (g) generally as the Board may deem necessary for carrying out any of the provisions or purposes of this Act.

At first blush, the power to make regulations is fairly extensive.

Regulations SOR/76-644, entitled Uranium Information Security Regulations are dated September 23, 1976. The preamble reads.

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, pursuant to section 9 of the Atomic Energy Control Act, is pleased hereby to approve the annexed Regulations respecting the security of uranium information made by the Atomic Energy Control Board.

Section 2 of the Regulations states:

Security of Information

2. No person who has in his possession or under his control any note, document or other written or printed material in any way related to conversations, discussions or meetings that took place between January 1, 1972 and December 31, 1975 involving that person or any other person or any government, crown corporation, agency or other organization in respect of the production, import, export, transportation, refining, possession, ownership, use or sale of uranium or its derivatives or compounds, shall

(a) release any such note, document or material, or disclose or communicate the contents thereof to any person, government, crown corporation, agency or other organization unless

(i) he is required to do so by or under a law of Canada, or

(ii) he does so with the consent of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources; or

(b) fail to guard against or take reasonable care to prevent the unauthorized release of any such note, document or material or the disclosure or communication of the contents thereof.

Prima facie, this would cover Members of Parliament and would appear to abridge the solicitor-client relationship.

Mr. Lederman argued that s. 9(d) was not sufficiently broad to cover the nature and extent of s. 2 of Regulations 76-644. I agree with that submission. He also argued that s. 9(e) was not broad enough since it dealt with information "respecting the production, use and application of and research and investigations with respect to, atomic energy" whereas s. 2 of Regulations 76-644 deals with the "production, import, export, transportation, refining, possession, ownership, use or sale of uranium or its derivatives or compounds". I do not find it necessary to decide that issue since I consider that s. 9(g) provides sufficient authority for the promulgation of the Regulations. While Mr. Lederman argued that s. 9(g) is procedural or administrative only, I cannot accept that argument. Section 9(g) grants considerable power to the Board to make regulations as it "may deem necessary for carrying out any of the provisions or purposes of this Act". The purposes set out in the preamble of the Act, include control of domestic atomic energy and the participation in international control. In my view, s. 9(g) must have some substantive basis in order to enable the Board to carry out the purposes and provisions of the Act.

This conclusion is supported by the decision of Robins, J. in Duquesne Light Company et al v. Westinghouse Electric Corporation, unreported, dated June 29, 1977. In that case, Westinghouse Electric Corporation brought two applications before Robins, J. The first was to enforce letters rogatory issued by the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia and the second was to enforce letters rogatory issued by the Court of Common Pleas for Allegheny County, Pennsylvania. In dealing with the applications, Regulations 76-644 were raised. It was argued that an Order enforcing the letters rogatory would compel certain Canadian companies to release information respecting atomic energy contrary to Reg. 76-644. Consequently, Robins, J., felt bound to deal with the issue of the validity of the Regulations. Since the determination of the validity of the Regulations is an issue peripheral to the main application, he was correct in assuming jurisdiction to determine the issue.

Robins, J., exhaustively analyzes the validity of Reg. 76-644. At pp. 17-18 of the judgment, he deals with the background of the Regulations:

> On September 21, 1976, the Government of Canada approved a regulation under the Atomic Energy Control Act to prevent the removal from Canada of information relating to uranium marketing activities during the period 1972-75. This action the Minister has said was taken 'in the light of the sweeping demand for such information by U.S. subpoenas, which, while served on officers of United States companies, call for the presentation of information in the possession of subsidiary or affiliate companies "wherever located".' The regulations, cited as the Uranium Information Security Regulations, SOR/76-644 (P.C. 1976-2368, September 21, 1976) prohibit the release or production of any document or material relating to these activities and prevent the giving of any oral evidence which would result in the disclosure or communication of the contents of such documents . . . . Their validity is attacked by Westinghouse in these proceedings. In his press release of September 22, 1976, the Minister concluded:
> Given this background, it is not surprising that the Canadian material called for by the U.S. subpoenas contains information in respect of activities approved and supported by the Canadian government. Clearly this must be regarded as an issue of sovereignty. The government has therefore moved to prevent the removal of such documents from Canada.

No evidence has been presented in this application which would indicate that the true purpose of the Regulations is anything other than that set out by the Minister. Counsel for the applicants continually referred to the Regulations as a "cover-up" and argued that since the Regulations were passed in September, 1976, and covered the period of January to December, 1975, there was every indication that the Regulations were a "cover-up" for the alleged illegal cartel. The Government has given the reason for the Regulations and I am bound to accept that in the absence of persuasive evidence to the contrary. Whether it was necessary to cast such a wide net in order to achieve the stated purpose is a matter for Parliament.

Before embarking on an evaluation of the validity of the Regulations, Robins, J., sets out the terms of reference to be applied. At p. 41, he states that:

> The question in substance is whether the Security Regulations fall within the scope of the regulation-making power conferred by the Act on the Atomic Energy Control Board. In determining this question the meaning of the Regulations when read in the light of their object and the facts surrounding their making should be ascertained as well as the words conferring the power in the whole context of the authorizing statute. The intent of the statute transcends and governs the intent of the Regulations: Driedger, The Construction of Statutes, at p. 199 et. seq.

Mr. Lederman also quoted from Driedger for the proposition that s. 9(g) was procedural. However, I am convinced that the approach taken by Robins, J., is the correct one and that it is necessary to look to the intent of the Statute in determining the extent of the regulation-making power.

In considering the extent of s. 9, Robins, J., deals specifically with s. 9(e) and s. 9(g). At p. 42, he states that:

> . . . Even if this is so, it is not imperative that the authority for these Regulations be found in s. 9(e) of the Act. The Regulations do not, of course, indicate under which subsection of s. 9 they were made. Sufficient authority may, in my opinion, be found in the general power under s. 9(g) given by Parliament to the Board with the approval of the Governor in Council to make regulations generally as it 'may deem necessary for carrying out any of the provisions or purposes of this Act.'

Robins, J., then goes on to evaluate the scope and purpose of the Act in order to substantiate his conclusion on s. 9(g). At pp. 42-3, he states that:

> One of the reasons for the Act according to its preamble is that it is essential in the national interest to control and supervise the development, application and use of atomic energy. The real subject of the legislation is, as McLennan J. expressed it in Pronto Uranium Mines Ltd. v. The Ontario Labour Relations Board et al., [1956] O.R. 862 at p. 869, 'the control of the production and application of atomic energy and that control is exercised from the stage of discovery of ores up to its ultimate use for whatever purpose . . . ' In this context regulations 'necessary for carrying out any of the provisions or purposes of this Act' include, in my view, measures respecting intermediate steps such as the import, export, transportation, refining, possession, ownership or sale of atomic energy or substances capable of releasing atomic energy or any information in respect thereto. (Emphasis added)

This approach is consistent with the principle enunciated by Driedger.

Robins, J., then goes on to discuss the discretion granted to the Board. At pp. 43-4, he concludes that:

> To effect the control of the production and application of atomic energy Parliament enacted basically a skeletal statute to be supplemented by the conferral on the Board with the approval of the Governor in Council of broad general powers to make regulations establishing not only details of this legislation but its principles. Whether the regulations are 'necessary for carrying out any of the provisions or purposes of this Act' is a matter to be determined by a subjective test of necessity. The regulation-making authority is the sole judge of necessity and the court will not question its decision unless bad faith is established. See R. v. Comptroller General of Patents, Ex Parte Bayer Products Ltd., [1941] 2 K.B. 306 per Scott L.J. at pp. 311-312:
> > '. . . the effect of the words 'as appear to him to be necessary or expedient' is to give to His Majesty in Council a complete discretion to decide what regulations are necessary for the purposes named in the sub-section. That being so, it is not open to His Majesty's courts to investigate the question whether or not the making of any particular regulation was in fact necessary or expedient for the specified purposes. The principle on which delegated legislation must rest under our constitution is that legislative discretion which is left in plain language by Parliament is to be final and not subject to control by the courts.'
> See also Re Chemical Reference, [1943] S.C.R. 1. In my view the Security Regulations are within the purposes of the Act and as such their expediency or necessity cannot be challenged. (Emphasis added)

It is not proper for the Court to re-think the concerns of the Board in deciding whether such Regulations were necessary. Since the "expediency or necessity" are a "subjective" determination, the Court should not substitute its own opinion on the issue.

In the absence of probative evidence of bad faith, the Court is not justified in impugning the motives of the Board. As Robins, J., states at p. 44:

> Bad faith going to impugn the Regulations is not apparent in this case either on the face of the Regulations or anywhere else.

As previously stated, there is no evidence before me which would justify a finding of bad faith. The Regulations are valid on their face.

Finally, Robins, J., concludes that:

> In short, the Security Regulations can be construed, in my opinion as being in harmony with the purposes of the statute. No conflict exists between the Statute and the Regulations; the Regulations are within the scope of the powers conferred upon the Board and accordingly are intra vires the Atomic Energy Control Act.

Although I am not bound by the decision of Robins, J., it is of considerable persuasive effect and I am in complete agreement with his conclusion.

As a result, I find that Regulations 76-644 are intra vires the Atomic Energy Control Board and the Governor in Council.

There is one aspect of the Regulations which causes some concern. Section 2(a) prohibits the release of information concerning uranium but provides for two exceptions. The second exception reads:

> 2(a)(ii)
> ... he does so with the consent of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources...

Counsel for the applicants argues that this offends the maxim delegatus non potest delegare. After considering s. 9 of the Act and s. 2 of the Regulations, I have come to the conclusion that s. 2(a)(ii) is ultra vires the Atomic Energy Control Board. I agree with Mr. Sopinka's submission that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is effectively doing the regulating. Counsel for the respondent argued that this was comparable to a case of agency rather than delegation. However, there are no guidelines provided for the Minister and there is no indication that the Board maintains a principal — agency type of arrangement with the Minister. The real effect of the exemption is to vest the regulation-making power of the Board in the Minister. The Minister could give exemptions to everyone and could effectively nullify the application of the Regulations.

In Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 3d ed., S.A. de Smith considers the principles to be considered in applying the maxim delegatus non potest delegare, at pp. 268-9:

> a) Where an authority vested with discretionary powers affecting private rights empowers one of its committees or subcommittees, members or officers to exercise those powers independently without any supervisory control by the authority itself, the exercise of the powers is likely to be held invalid ... (Madoc Township v. Quinlan (1972), 21 D.L.R. (3d) 136; R. v. Sandler).
> b) The degree of control ... maintained by the delegating authority over the acts of the delegate or sub-delegate may be a material factor in determining the validity of the delegation. In general the control preserved ... must be close enough for the decision to be identifiable as that of the delegating authority ... (Osgood v. Nelson (1872), L.R. 5 H.L. 636; Devlin v. Barnett, [1958] N.Z.L.R. 828 ... Hall v. Manchester Corporation (1915), 84 L.J. Ch. 734, 741 ... Cohen v. West Ham Corporation, [1933] Ch. 814, 826-827 ... R. v. Board of Assessment, etc. (1965), 49 D.L.R. (2d) 156
> c) It is improper for an authority to delegate wide discretionary powers to another authority over which it is incapable of exercising direct control, unless it is expressly empowered so to delegate ... (Kyle v. Barbor (1888), 58 L.T. 229) ... A Canadian provincial marketing board, exercising delegated authority, could not sub-delegate part of its regulatory powers to an interprovincial authority ... (Prince Edward Island Potato Marketing Board v. Willis (H.B.) Inc., [1952] 2 S.C.R. 391).

On the basis of these principles, I have concluded that s. 2(a)ii) is ultra vires.

Counsel for the respondent referred me to the case of Reference re Chemicals Regulations, [1943] S.C.R. 1. In that case, the Governor-General in Council was empowered to make such regulations as he might by reason of the existence of the war deem necessary or advisable for the defence of Canada. The Court held that this power was wide enough to permit sub-delegation to the Controller of Chemicals.

The point of distinction in the Chemicals Reference case is that the Court was dealing with a war-time situation. In this respect, the Court was willing to apply a much more flexible approach to the powers of the Executive. This is apparent in the words of Duff, C.J., at p. 11:

> The duty of the Governor General in Council to safeguard the supreme interests of the state, as contemplated by section 3, may, it seems plain, necessitate for its adequate performance the appointment of subordinate officers endowed with such delegated authority. I find it impossible to suppose that the authors of that enactment did not envisage the likelihood of the Executive finding itself obliged, in discharging its responsibility in relation to the matters enumerated in sub-paragraphs (a) to (f), to make use of such agencies.

From a practical viewpoint, the Court concluded that the Executive could not possibly handle the myriad of tasks delegated to it by the legislation. Therefore, the Court interpreted the regulation-making power as implicitly including a power to sub-delegate part of the regulation-making power to a subordinate body. Duff, C.J., goes on to state at p. 12:

> The enactment is, of course, of the highest political nature. It is the attribution to the Executive Government of powers legislative in their character, described in terms implying nothing less than a plenary discretion, for securing the safety of the country in time of war. Subject only to the fundamental conditions explained above ... when Regulations have been passed by the Governor General in Council in professed fulfillment of his statutory duty, I cannot agree that it is competent to any court to canvass the considerations which have, or may have, led him to deem such Regulations necessary or advisable for the transcendent objects set forth.

Duff, C.J., then concludes that the wording "necessary or advisable" is wide enough to permit the sub-delegation to the Controller (p. 12).

The approach of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Chemicals Reference case is dictated by the exigencies of the war-time situation. That is not so in the present case. In the first place, it is not an over-burdened Executive delegating to a subordinate. It is a federal Board delegating to a member of the Cabinet. There is nothing in the Atomic Energy Control Act which justifies the conclusion that the Board is entitled to delegate the powers granted to it by the Act. Finally, the Board is established to carry out the "policing" of the atomic energy field. One can assume that the Board is comprised of people who are experts in the field and are experienced in administrative practice. Consequently, the Board and not a Minister is best suited to handle the powers given to it by Parliament.

This conclusion appears to be consistent with the decision in A.G. Can. v. Brent, [1956] S.C.R. 318. In that case, the Court dealt with a delegation to Special Inquiry Officers under the Immigration Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 325. Section 61 provided:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations for carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of this Act . . .

Section 20(4) of Order in Council, P.C. 859, [1953] S.O.R. 536, stated:

> Subject to the provisions of the Act and to these regulations the admission to Canada of any person is prohibited where in the opinion of a Special Inquiry Officer such person should not be admitted by reason of . . .

The Section then goes on to list three reasons. In delivering the opinion of the Court, Kerwin, C.J.C., states, at p. 321:

> I agree with Mr. Justice Aylesworth, speaking on behalf of the Court of Appeal, that Parliament had in contemplation the enactment of such Regulations relevant to the named subject-matters, or some of them, as in His Excellency in Council's own opinion were advisable and not a wide divergence of rules and opinions, ever-changing according to the individual notions of Immigration Officers and Special Inquiry Officers. There is no power in the Governor General-in-Council to delegate his authority to such officers.

The use of such words as "deem necessary" in s. 9(g) of the Atomic Energy Control Act and "deem necessary or advisable" in s. 3 of the War Measures Act, 1914, does not distinguish the application before me and the Chemicals Reference case from the Brent case. Section 61 of the Immigration Act was sufficiently wide that the conclusion of the Court is particularly relevant to the application before me. The decision in the Chemicals Reference case can be distinguished because of the circumstances then existing.

Notwithstanding my conclusion on the applicability of the Chemicals Reference case to the issue of sub-delegation, the approach of the Supreme Court of Canada in both the Chemicals Reference case and in Brent supports my conclusion that s. 9(g) grants substantive and not merely procedural powers. Indeed, the Chemicals Reference case is cited by Robins, J., in Duquesne at p. 44, to support his conclusion that the Regulations are intra vires the Board.

As a result, I have concluded that s. 2(a)(ii) of Regulations 76-644 is ultra vires the Atomic Energy Control Board. However, this does not invalidate the entire Regulation. The appropriate approach is simply to strike s. 2(a)(ii) out of the Regulations. Therefore, apart from s. 2(a)(ii), the Regulations are intra vires the Atomic Energy Control Board.

In dealing with the issue of Parliamentary privileges, counsel for the respondent submitted that the Courts have no jurisdiction to determine the nature and extent of such privileges. He argued that Parliament is the source and the sole judge of the privileges of its members. This would create an interesting obstacle for the applicants in the present case. I would point out, however, that I am asked to interpret Regulations 76-644. In doing so, I am asked to determine whether Regulations 76-644 override or abridge existing Parliamentary privileges. In this respect, I do not consider that I am infringing on the jurisdiction of Parliament.

Historically, there has always been some question whether the Courts have jurisdiction to determine the nature and extent of Parliamentary privilege. As the supreme law-giving body, it would seem only natural that Parliament should be the source of authoritative guidelines on the subject. On the other hand, there is something inherently inimical about Members of Parliament determining the nature and extent of their own rights and privileges. The Courts have seized on this to consistently review the nature and extent of Parliamentary privilege.

In Thorpe's case, 1452, Chief Justice Fortescue wrote an opinion favouring the supremacy of Parliament in determining the nature and extent of Parliamentary privilege:

> That they ought not to answer to that question, for it hath not been used aforetyme, that the justices should in anywise determine the privilege of this High Court of Parliament; for it is so high and so mighty in its nature, that it may make law, and that this is law it may make no law; and the determination and knowledge of that privilege belongeth to the Lords of Parliament, and not to the justices. (5 Rot. Parl. 240; I Hatsell, pp. 28-34)

This approach has largely been overlooked in other cases.

In May, Parliamentary Practice, 19th ed., the author sets out the arguments on both sides at pp. 200-201:

> The House of Commons claims that its admitted right to adjudicate on breaches of privilege implies in theory the right to determine the existence and extent of the privileges themselves. It has never expressly abandoned its claim to treat as a breach of privilege the institution of proceedings for the purpose of bringing its privileges into discussion or decision before any court or tribunal elsewhere then in Parliament. In other words, it claims to be the absolute and exclusive judge of its own privileges, and that its judgments are not examinable by any other court or subject to appeal.
> On the other hand, the courts regard the privileges of Parliament as part of the law of the land, of which they are bound to take judicial notice. They consider it their duty to decide any question of privilege arising directly or indirectly in a case which falls within their jurisdiction, and to decide it according to their own interpretation of the law.

This passage is cited by the House of Lords in Re Parliamentary Privilege Act, 1770, [1958] A.C. 331 at pp. 353-4. Unfortunately, the Court does not draw any conclusions and merely reflects that "the old dualism remains unresolved" (p.

354). May, on the other hand, comes to the following conclusion, at p. 202:

> Since the House of Commons has not for a hundred years refused to submit its privileges to the decision of the courts, it may be said to have given practical recognition to the jurisdiction of the courts over the existence and extent of its privileges. On the other hand, the courts have always, at any rate in the last resort, refused to interfere in the application by the House of any of its recognized privileges.
> It is a remarkable fact that the modern solution of the problem was anticipated by Clarendon at the beginning of the struggle between the House of Parliament and the courts. 'We are', he represents the Commons as saying, 'and have always been confessed the only judges of our own privileges: and therefore whatsoever we declare to be our privilege is such: otherwise whoever determines that it is not so makes himself the judge of that whereof the cognizance only belongs to us'. And he solves the 'sophistical riddle' by showing that the proposition is only true if 'rightly understood'. 'I say the proposition rightly understood: they are the only judges of their privileges, that is, upon the breach of those privileges which the law had declared to be their own, and what punishment is to be inflicted upon such breach. But there can be no privilege of which the law doth not take notice, and which is not pleadable by, and at law'.' (History of the Rebellion, Book iv, quoted by McIlwain, High Court of Parliament, pp. 240-1)

Consequently, the Courts apparently have an implicit jurisdiction to deal with questions of Parliamentary privilege.

Notwithstanding the submission of counsel for the respondent, I have no hesitation in proceeding to evaluate the effect of Regulations 76-644 on the privileges of Members of Parliament. Roman Corp. Ltd. v. Hudson's Bay Oil & Gas Co. Ltd., [1971] 2 O.R. 418 (Houlden, J); [1972] 1 O.R. 444 (C.A.); [1973] S.C.R. 820, (discussed, infra), is sufficient authority for the proposition that the Courts of law in Canada have jurisdiction to adjudicate on matters involving the privileges of Members of Parliament.

The privileges of a Member of Parliament are set out in the Senate and House of Commons Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. S-8. Section 4 reads:

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES OF MEMBERS AND OFFICERS

> 4. The Senate and the House of Commons respectively, and the members thereof respectively, hold, enjoy and exercise,
>
> (a) such and the like privileges, immunities and powers as, at the time of the passing of the British North America Act, 1867, were held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom, and by the members thereof, so far as the same are consistent with and not repugnant to that Act; and
> (b) such privileges, immunities and powers as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, not exceeding those at the time of the passing of such Act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom and by the members thereof respectively. R.S., c. 249 s. 4

The privileges which currently exist in England developed gradually over many centuries.

The history of Parliamentary privilege in England follows an interesting course. The imprisonment of Strode in 1512 for words spoken in Parliament resulted in what is known as Strode's Act, 4 Hen. 8, c. 8 which not only declared that the proceedings of Stannary Court which had imprisoned and fined Strode were void but also that all future proceedings against a member of Parliament "for any bill, speaking or declaring of any matter concerning the Parliament", would be void and ineffective. The nature and extent of this terminology has been disputed for many centuries. The demand for freedom of speech was succinctly stated in a petition of Sir Thomas More (Speaker in 1523) that "if any man in the Commons House should speak more largely than of duty he ought to do . . . all such offences should be pardoned" (Hall's Chronicle (ed. 1890), p. 653). This petition, however, is not recorded in the Parliament Roll. In 1554, the three claims of freedom from arrest, freedom of speech, and of access, were first made together (C.J. (1547-1628), 37). By the end of the sixteenth century the practice seems to have become regular.

The Commons Protestation of December 18, 1621 was prepared by the English House of Commons and was made known to James I (I Hatsell's Parliamentary Precedents, p. 79). The prostestation reads:

> And that in the handling and proceedings of those businesses every Member of the House hath, and or right ought to have Freedom of Speech to propound, treat, reason and bring to conclusion the same:
> . . . And that every Member of the said House hath like Freedom from all Impeachment, Imprisonment or Molestation (other than by censure of the House itself) of or concerning any Bill, speaking, reasoning or declaring of any matter or matters touching the Parliament or Parliament business.

This protestation was not in accordance with the king's conception of the liberties of the Commons and Hatsell, supra, reports that the king sent for the Journal Book and "in council with his own hand rent it out", and by a memorial of December 30, 1621, he declared it to be annulled, void and of no effect.

The recognition by law of the privilege of freedom of speech received final statutory confirmation after the Revolution of 1688. By the 9th Article of the Bill of Rights it was declared: "That the freedom of speech, and debates or proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament" (I William and Mary, sess.

2, c. 2). The aforesaid language makes it clear that a Member is not amenable to the ordinary courts for anything said in debate however criminal its nature. The term "proceedings in Parliament" connotes more than speeches and debates. A general idea of what the term covers may be gathered from looking at the cases and at the principle followed by the British House of Commons.

In Ex Parte Wason (1869), L.R. 4 Q.B. 573, Mr. Wason laid an information relating to a promise by Earl Russell to present a petition to the House of Lords. The information charged that Earl Russell, Lord Chelmsford and the Lord Chief Baron conspired to make statements in the House of Lords in respect of the petition designed to defeat its object. This conspiracy was alleged to have taken place outside the precincts of the House. The court held that the criminal conspiracy was so related to what would ultimately be a proceeding in the House that the act itself was a proceeding in the House.

In R. v. Bunting (1884-5), 7 O.R. 524, the Ontario Queen's Bench held that a conspiracy to change a Government by bribing members of the provincial legislature was not in any way connected with a proceeding in Parliament and therefore the Court had jurisdiction to try the offence. The Court distinguished Ex parte Wason, supra, on the ground that in Wason the whole transaction of defeating the petition could not be complete without a proceeding in the House. In Bunting, however, the offence of bribing, for whatsoever purpose, was said to be complete without any reference to what might or might not happen in the House. O'Connor, C.J., in his dissent, stated the law in general terms:

> . . . I desire it to be understood, however, that I do not hold that a member of Parliament is not amenable to the ordinary courts for anything he may say or do in Parliament. I merely say he is not so amenable for anything he may say or do within the scope of his duties in the course of parliamentary business, for in such matters he is privileged and protected by lex et consuetudo parliamenti. (p. 563)

According to Erskine May in his book Parliamentary Practice:

> What is done or said by an individual Member becomes entitled to protection when it forms part of a proceeding of the House in its technical sense, i.e., the formal transaction of business with the Speaker in the Chair or in a properly constituted committee. But it does not follow that everything that is said or done within the Chamber during the transaction of business forms part of proceedings in Parliament. Particular words or acts may be entirely unrelated to any business which is in course of transaction, or is in a more general sense before the House as having been ordered to come before it in due course. This is a test which may be useful in deciding how far crimes committed during a sitting may be entitled to privilege. (p. 89)

May observes that the privilege which formerly protected Members against action by the Crown now serves largely as protection against prosecution by individuals or corporate bodies:

> Subject to the rules of order in debate . . . a Member may state whatever he thinks fit in debate, however offensive it may be to the feelings, or injurious to the character, of individuals; and he is protected by his privilege from any action for libel, as well as from any other question or molestation. (p. 78)

P.S. Pachauri in his book The Law of Parliamentary Privileges in the U.K. and in India (1971) after discussing R. v. Bunting, supra, and Ex parte Wason states:

> The sum total of the various judicial dicta on the subject is that there must be some reasonable nexus between the acts or words and the business of the House so as to make them part of the proceedings of the House and the place where the words are spoken or acts are done are immaterial. (p. 86)

The principle followed by the British House of Commons in determining what is a proceeding in Parliament has been discussed on several occasions. A general idea of what the term covers is given in the Report of the Select Committee on the Official Secrets Act, H.C. 101, p. V. (1938-39).

> It covers both the asking of a question and the giving written notice of such question, and includes everything said or done by a Member in the exercise of his functions as a member in a committee of either House, as well as everything said or done in either House in the transaction of Parliamentary business.

The Committee concluded that disclosures by members in the course of debate or proceedings in Parliament could not be made the subject of proceedings under the Official Secrets Act and a disclosure made by a member to a Minister or to another member directly relating to some act to be done or some proceeding to be had in the House, even though it did not take place in the House, might be held to form part of the business of the House and should be similarly protected. But the Committee also observed that a casual conversation in the House could not be said to be a proceeding in Parliament and disclosure in the course of such conversation could not be protected as it was not in the course of a proceeding in Parliament. On the same ground the Committee also held that a member who discloses such information in a speech in his constituency or anywhere else beyond the precincts of the House would also not be protected by the Parliamentary privilege. (Supra, paras. 9, 10 and 15). The House agreed with the conclusions of this Committee on Nov. 21, 1939 (H.C. Debates, Vol. 353, c. 1083). (For a discussion, see Pachauri, The Law of Parliamentary Privileges in U.K. and India, pp. 87-89.)

The Report of the Committee and the ruling of the House of Commons has obvious implications for the present case. The Official Secrets Act can be compared to Regulations 76-644 in that both require strict confidentiality of specific information.

In this respect, the Members of Parliament would be free to use the information in Parliament but could not release it to constituents.

Counsel for the respondent concedes that the information can be used in Parliament but argues that the information cannot be released outside of Parliament in any manner.

Counsel for the applicants argued that the Members are entitled to release the information to the press. They argued that the right to release the information to the press would have no practical value unless the press were covered by a similar privilege. Finally, counsel submitted that the Members have the right to release the information to their constituents. I cannot accede to these latter two arguments. The privilege of the Member is finite and cannot be stretched indefinitely to cover any person along a chain of communication initiated by the Member. The privilege stops at the press. Once the press have received the information, the onus falls on them to decide whether to publish. They cannot claim immunity from prosecution on the basis of the parliamentary privilege which protects the Member releasing the information. Whether they have a valid defence under the Regulations is another matter. Finally, the Member does not have the right to release the information to any one he chooses outside of Parliament. The concept of "proceedings in Parliament" cannot be extended beyond all logical limits. I am not satisfied that the privilege enables the Member to release the information to his constituents. The concept of "proceedings in Parliament" has not been extended to cover the informing function of a Member. This is consistent with the ruling of the House of Commons in the Official Secrets Act, supra.

In coming to the conclusions set out above I have relied on the authorities discussed above and on the recent decision in Roman Corp. Ltd. et al v. Hudson's Bay Oil & Gas Co. Ltd. et al. The reasons delivered by Houlden, J., in the High Court and Aylesworth, J.A., in the Court of Appeal are of particular relevance to the current matter.

At p. 425 of his reasons, Mr. Justice Houlden quoted from Vol. 28 of Halsbury's Laws of England, 3d ed., at pp. 457-8:

> An exact and complete definition of proceedings in Parliament has never been given by the courts of law or by either House. In its narrow sense the expression is used in both Houses to denote the formal transaction of business in the House or in committees. It covers both the asking of a question and the giving written notice of such question, and includes everything said or done by a member in the exercise of his functions as a member in a committee of either House, as well as everything said or done in either House in the transaction of parliamentary business.
> In its wider sense proceedings in Parliament has been used to include matters connected with, or ancillary to, the formal transaction of business. A select committee of the Commons, citing and approving a Canadian dictum, stated in its report that it would be unreasonable to conclude that no act is within the scope of a member's duties in the course of parliamentary business unless it is done in the House or a committee thereof and while the House or committee is sitting.

Houlden, J., then considers the Commons Protestation of 1621 and the Bill of Rights, 1689, at p. 425:

> . . . the wording of the Commons Protestation of 1621, with its very similar wording to art. 9 of the Bill of Rights, 1689, furnishes a good indication of what was meant by the words Proceedings in Parliament as used in the Bill of Rights, 1869, and these words were not limited to matters in Parliament but, as the Protestation states, included speaking, reasoning or declaring of any matter or matters touching the Parliament or Parliament business.

Following the statements in the House, the Prime Minister and a Member of the Cabinet sent a telegram to the plaintiff and made a statement to the press. Houlden, J., held that the privilege of a Member extended to statements in a press release where such statements had been previously made in the House.

On appeal, Aylesworth, J.A., in delivering the judgment of the Court, agreed that the telegram dispatched to the appellant Roman by the respondent Trudeau and the press release issued by the respondent Greene were mere extensions of the statements made by the respondents in the House and therefore they were protected by the same absolute privilege as the communications made in the House itself. Aylesworth, J.A., states at p. 450:

> That is to say, that these actions were, in essence, 'proceedings in Parliament' within the extended meaning of that hallowed phrase as judicially interpreted and applied.

Aylesworth, J.A. went on to say at p. 451:

> . . . I venture also to express the view that the modern judicial concept of the meaning and application of the phrase 'proceedings in Parliament' is broader than had been the case in some instances in the past. If this be so, certainly there would appear to be ample justification for it in the development of the complexities of modern government and in the development and employment in government business of the greatly extended means of communication.
> The object of the privilege is, of course, not to further the selfish interests of the Member of Parliament but to protect him from harassment in and out of the House in his legitimate activities in carrying on the business of the House; consideration of the interest of the public in this regard overbears the usual solicitude in our law for the private individual. Viewed in this manner, and that approach, I think, is historically correct, it becomes abundantly clear to me that all of the actions of the respondents complained about, and specifically the sending of the telegram and the issuing of the press release, were no more and no less than the legitimate and lawful discharge by the respondents of their duties in the course of parliamentary proceedings as Ministers of the Crown and Members of the House.

Aylesworth, J.A., follows Viscount Radcliffe in A.-G. Ceylon v. de Livera, [1963] A.C. 103. Aylesworth, J.A., concluded that both Trudeau and Greene were discharging their "essential functions" in making the statement to the media and in sending the telegram.

In A.-G. Ceylon v. de Livera, Viscount Radcliffe states, at p. 120:

> . . . , in what circumstances and in what situations is a member of the House exercising his real or essential function as a member? For, given the proper anxiety of the House to confine its own or its members' privileges to the minimum infringement of the liberties of others, it is important to see that those privileges do not cover activities that are not squarely within a member's true function.

And further at p. 121:

> The most, perhaps, that can be said is that, despite reluctance to treat a member's privilege as going beyond anything that is essential, it is generally recognised that it is impossible to regard his only proper functions as a member as being confined to what he does on the floor of the House itself.

Consequently, it is necessary to determine whether the act complained of is a "real or "essential" function of the Member.

In delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in Roman Corp., Martland, J. quotes at length from the judgments of Houlden, J., and Aylesworth, J.A., and adds at p. 828:

> Without dissenting from the views expressed in the Courts below as to the privilege attached to statements made in Parliament, I would prefer to deal with this appeal on the broader issue, on which those Courts have also expressed an opinion.

Following the authorities set out above, I have come to the conclusion that a Member of Parliament may utilize information proscribed by Reg. 76-644 in Parliament and may release that information to the media. However, I hold that the privilege of the Member cannot be extended to protect the media if they choose to release the information to the public. Nor do I consider that the "real" and "essential" functions of a Member include a duty or right to release information to constituents. The cases indicate that the privilege is finite and I would not be justified in extending the privilege to cover information released to constituents.

The applicability of the Regulations to the solicitor-client relationship raises an issue of more general concern. The solicitor-and-client privilege is one that is well recognized and protected by law. A tremendous wealth of judicial pronouncements has evolved over the years dealing with the nature and extent of the privilege. The issue in this case is whether Regulations 76-644 override or abridge that privilege. My reading of the authorities, does not convince me that the Regulations can prevent the applicants from disclosing the information to their solicitors for the purpose of obtaining legal advice.

Counsel for the applicants seeks to extend the privilege beyond the solicitor-client consultation. They argue that if the privilege is to have any meaning at all, it must be extended to enable the solicitors to initiate legal proceedings on behalf of their clients. Counsel for the respondent, on the other hand, seeks to restrict the privilege to cases of bona fide consultation. He argues that if the real purpose of the consultation is to circumvent the Regulations and not to obtain advice on the applicant's legal position then the privilege cannot be extended. This argument is analogous to the principle that the privilege does not extend where the consultation involves the commission of a crime. In my opinion, however, it is impossible to predict in advance whether the consultation will be bona fide. Consequently, it must first be determined whether the solicitor-client privilege remains intact notwithstanding the Regulations. If that is so, then the principles relating to the nature and extent of the privilege come into play.

The interplay between statute law and the solicitor-client privilege is considered by Chief Justice Jackett in Re Director of Investigation and Research and Shell Canada Ltd. (1975), 55 D.L.R. (3d) 713 (Fed. C.A.). By virtue of s. 10(1) of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23, the Director of Investigation and Research was empowered to:

> . . . enter any premises on which the Director believes there may be evidence relevant to the matters being inquired into and may examine anything on the premises and may copy or take away for further examination or copying any book, paper, record or other document that in the opinion of the Director . . . may afford such evidence.

The issue before the Federal Court of Appeal was whether that Section abridged the solicitor-client privilege. The Court held that it did not.

In delivering the reasons of the Court, Jackett, C.J., makes a number of observations concerning solicitor-client privilege. At p. 722, he states that:

> What has to be decided in this case is whether Parliament, by conferring on the Director fact finding powers in the widest possible terms, intended to undermine the solicitor-and-client relationship of confidentiality that made necessary the solicitor-and-client privilege in connection with the giving of evidence in the Courts. In my view, that question must be answered in the negative.
> There must always be cases where the Courts, faced with unqualified language used by Parliament to accomplish some important public objective must decide whether it was intended by Parliament, by such language, to make a fundamental change in some law or institution to which no reference is explicitly made (Compare George Wimpey & Co. Ltd.. v. B.O.A.C., [1955] A.C. 169 per Lord Reid at p. 191, and R. v. Jeu Jang How (1919), 32 C.C.C. 103, 50 D.L.R. 41, 59 S.C.R. 195, per Duff, J., at pp. 105-6 C.C.C., p. 43 D.L.R., p. 179 S.C.R.) In my view, this is such a case.

He then goes on to discuss the nature of the privilege:

> In my view, however, this privilege is a mere manifestation of a fundamental principle upon which our judicial system is based, which principle would be breached just as clearly, and with equal injury to our judicial system, by the compulsory form of pre-prosecution discovery envisaged by the Combines Investigation Act as it would be by evidence in Court or by judicial discovery.

In this respect, then, the solicitor-client privilege is prima facie paramount to such legislation. This reasoning is particularly persuasive in the present case.

Chief Justice Jackett also considers the problem of bona fide consultations. At p. 723, he states that:

> It must not be forgotten that all that is being discussed in this case are bona fide communications between solicitor and client. Any conspiracy between a solicitor and some other person to commit a crime and any use of a solicitor-and-client relationship to cloak relevant evidence or facts from discovery falls completely outside the principle of confidentiality protected by the law.

The same principle can be applied in the present case. However, bona fides can not be determined in advance and can only be challenged in the light of subsequent events.

In the present case, it is impossible to predict whether the consultations would be bona fide. The mere possibility that they would not does not detract from the prima facie right to the privilege. If subsequent evidence arises demonstrating that the consultations were not bona fide then the privilege is lost. Again, I would point out that the problem in dealing with "absolution before sinning" is that we have no way of knowing what the motive of the applicants actually is or whether any "sin" will be committed. Consequently, I can only offer an academic evaluation of the principles of solicitor-client privilege and can express no opinion on the bona fides in this particular situation.

The decision in Re Director of Investigation and Research and Shell Canada Ltd. is cited with approval by Osler, J., in Re Presswood et al and International Chemalloy Corp. (1975), 11 O.R. (2d) 164. In that case, s. 186(3) of the Business Corporations Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 53, provided that company accounts and records were to be produced for examination by an inspector. The company claimed privilege for certain documents. Osler, J., cites the reasons of Jackett, C.J., in Re Director and Shell, at p. 166, and concluded that the company was entitled to maintain the privilege and left to the master the determination whether privilege extended to particular documents.

In the absence of precise and unequivocal language, I am satisfied that Regulations 76-644 do not override or abridge the solicitor-and-client privilege.

The nature and extent of the privilege is somewhat more troublesome. I agree with counsel for the applicants that the Members can initiate legal proceedings. I do not agree, however, that the information can be released to the public simply because legal proceedings are undertaken. The Court might consider that it was bound to maintain the integrity of the Regulations by sealing all pleadings and material and maintaining such confidentiality during the course of the proceedings. Indeed, there may be an onus on the party initiating the proceedings to apply for an order directing that confidentiality be maintained throughout the proceedings before placing the proscribed information in the hands of the appropriate court officials. Proceedings in camera, while rare, are not unknown in our Courts. In this way, the integrity of the Regulations is maintained while the applicants are free to seek a judicial interpretation whether the Government was involved in an illegal cartel and whether such cartel vitiates the validity of the Regulations.

I am supported in this conclusion by the fact that s. 2(a) does not refer to Court proceedings. The section refers to "any person, government, crown corporation, agency or other organization". The administration of justice cannot be slotted into any of these. In my view the Regulations would have to contain the clearest words to negate the right of a citizen to seek redress in the Courts.

The Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23, is in a somewhat different position. Section 2(a) of Regulations 76-644 would clearly cover the Director. Consequently, the applicants would be prohibited from releasing the information to the Director. Since the Atomic Energy Control Act is passed in the "national interest" and the Regulations are deemed to be necessary or advisable by the Board, the inevitable conclusion is that the Regulations must take precedence over the remedies in s. 7 and s. 8 of the Combines Investigation Act. The question remains whether the remedies in s. 7 and s. 8 are totally inapplicable in view of the Regulations.

Section 7(1) states that:

> 7.(1) Any six persons resident in Canada who are not less than eighteen years of age and who are of the opinion that
> (a) a person has contravened or failed to comply with an order made pursuant to section 29, 29.1 or 30,
>
> (b) grounds exist for the making of an order by the Commission under Part IV.I, or
> (c) an offence under Part V or section 46.1 has been or is about to be committed, > may apply to the Director for an inquiry into such matter. (1974-75, c. 76, s. 3(1)).

Section 7(2) sets out the material which must be filed in support of such an application:

> (2) The application shall be accompanied by a statement in the form of a solemn or statutory declaration showing
> (a) the names and addresses of the applicants, and at their election the name and address of any one of their number, or of any attorney, solicitor or counsel, whom they may, for the purpose of receiving any communication to be made pursuant to this Act, have authorized to represent them:

(b) the nature of

(i) the alleged contravention or failure to comply,

(ii) the grounds alleged to exist for the making of an order, or

(iii) the alleged offence and the names of the persons believed to be concerned therein and privy thereto; and

(c) a concise statement of the evidence supporting their opinion. (1974-75, c. 76, s. 3(2)).

Obviously, s. 7(2)(c) creates a problem for the applicants.

In my opinion, the applicants herein are entitled to make such an application and can include as much public information as possible. Section 7(2)(c) does not say that the applicants must prove the offence. It simply states that the applicants must provide evidence to support "their opinion" that the offence was committed. The Director then seeks out the evidence necessary for a prosecution or other action. I recognize that the investigation may be fruitless. The Director may run up against the confidentiality problem created by Regulations 76-744 or by a claim of "Crown Privilege" wherever he goes for information. That possibility is not in issue in this application.

In the result, I have concluded that Regulations 76-644 do not override or abridge the solicitor-client privilege. The situation, however, is governed by the same principles which apply to any other privileged occasion and a consultation or conspiracy concerning the proposed commission of a crime would not be privileged. The privilege does not allow the applicants or the solicitor to release any proscribed information to any other "person, government, crown corporation, agency or other organization". Moreover, the Regulations do not prohibit the institution of court proceedings provided that such proceedings maintain the confidentiality of the information.

Finally, the privilege or the ability to initiate proceedings does not enable the applicants to release proscribed information to the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act, although the applicants are entitled to trigger an investigation under s. 7 and s. 8 without releasing such proscribed information.

Counsel for the applicants also sought to impugn the validity of the Regulations by arguing that they were contrary to s. 1(a) and s. 1(d) of the Canadian Bill of Rights, 8-9 Eliz. II, c. 44. Despite the forceful submissions of counsel, I am not satisfied that the Regulations can be set aside on that basis.

Section 1(a) reads:

1. It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,

(a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;

Counsel for the applicants argued that Regulations 76-644 deprive Canadian citizens of very basic rights without "due process of law".

The concept of "due process of law" is considered by the Supreme Court of Canada in Curr v. The Queen, [1972] S.C.R. 889, in which the Court considered the validity of s. 223(1) of the Criminal Code dealing with breath samples. It is quite true that the approach taken by the then Chief Justice and Ritchie, J., avoids the issue of the Canadian Bill of Rights altogether, but Laskin, J. deals with the issue at great length. I cannot conclude that what Laskin, J., says is merely obiter since it forms a substantial basis for his reasons.

At p. 892, Laskin, J., starts off with the admonition that:

The Canadian Bill of Rights, 1960 (Can.). c. 44 is invoked in this case to sterilize certain provisions of the Criminal Code, viz., ss. 223 and 224A(3), as enacted by s. 16 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1968-69 (Can.), c. 38. That it may have a sterilizing effect upon federal legislation was decided by this Court in Regina v. Drybones, [1970] S.C.R. 282. Whether that must be the result here in no way depends upon what was decided in Regina v. Drybones.

Consequently, it is necessary to deal with each case according to its peculiar circumstances and with particular consideration for the legislation involved.

In dealing with the phrase "due process of law" Laskin, J., states, at p. 897:

The phrase "due process of law" has its context in the words of s. 1(a) that precede it. In the present case, the connection stressed was with the right of the individual to . . . security of the person. It is obvious that to read due process of law as meaning simply that there must be some legal authority to qualify or impair security of the person would be to see it as declaratory only. On this view, it should not matter whether the legal authority is found in enacted law or in unenacted or decisional law. Counsel for the applicant does not, of course, stop here. He contended for a qualitative test of legislation to meet the standard of due process of law and urged that the Court find that s. 223 fell below it. This was, however, a bare submission, not reinforced by any proposed yardstick.

What it amounted to was an invitation to this Court to monitor the substantive content of legislation by reference to s. 1(a). The invitation is to take the phrase 'except by due process of law' beyond its antecedents in English legal history, and to view it in terms that have had sanction in the United States in the consideration there of those parts of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the American Constitution that forbid the federal and state authorities respectively to deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law.

He then concludes, at pp. 899-900:

In so far as s. 223 may be regarded, in the light of s. 223(2), as having specific substantive effect in itself, I am > likewise of the opinion that s. 1(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights does not make it inoperative. Assuming that 'except by due process of law' provides a means of controlling substantive federal legislation—a point that did not directly arise in Regina v. Drybones—compelling reasons ought to be advanced to justify the Court in this case to employ a statutory (as contrasted with a constitutional) jurisdiction to deny operative effect to a substantive measure duly enacted by a Parliament constitutionally competent to do so, and exercising its powers in accordance with the tenets of responsible government, which underlie the discharge of legislative authority under the British North America Act. Those reasons must relate to objective and manageable standards by which a Court should be guided if scope is to be found in s. 1(a) due process to silence otherwise competent federal legislation. Neither reasons nor underlying standards were offered here. For myself, I am not prepared in this case to surmise what they might be. (Emphasis added)

At pp. 902-3, Laskin, J., reiterates and concludes:

> The very large words of s. 1(a), tempered by a phrase ('except by due process of law') whose original English meaning has been overlaid by American constitutional imperatives, signal extreme caution to me when asked to apply them in negation of substantive legislation validly enacted by a Parliament in which the major role is played by elected representatives of the people. Certainly, in the present case, a holding that the enactment of s. 233 has infringed the appellant's right to the security of his person without due process of law must be grounded on more than a substitution of a personal judgment for that of Parliament. There is nothing in the record, by way of evidence or admissible extrinsic material, upon which such a holding could be supported. I am, moreover, of the opinion that it is within the scope of judicial notice to recognize that Parliament has acted in a matter that is of great social concern, that is the human and economic cost of highway accidents arising from drunk driving, in enacting s. 223 and related provisions of the Criminal Code. Even where this Court is asked to pass on the constitutional validity of legislation, it knows that it must resist making the wisdom of impugned legislation the test of its constitutionality. A fortiori is this so where it is measuring legislation by a statutory standard, the result of which may make federal enactments inoperative. (Emphasis added)

This approach is particularly relevant to the current case. If we accept the finding in Pronto that the legislation involves the "national interest" and the finding in Duquesne that we cannot question the decision of the Board on the subjective necessity of the Regulations, we are left with the position that we should not impugn the legislation or the Regulations on the basis of s. 1(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. On considering the principles enunciated in Curr, Pronto and Duquesne, I have concluded that the Bill of Rights does not invalidate the Atomic Energy Control Act or Regulations 76-644.

Moreover, the Regulations are approved by the Governor General-in-Council and we must assume that due consideration has been given to the effect which the Regulations will have. It is not my function to assess the wisdom of the Regulations or whether their scope was excessive. The Regulations have been properly promulgated under the Act and have been passed by "due process of law".

I am also of the opinion that the same approach should be taken to s. 1(d) of the Bill of Rights ("freedom of speech"). It is trite law to say that freedom of speech is not absolute but is freedom governed by law. As Laskin, J., points out in Curr, we must consider the effect of the particular legislation in determining the effect of the Bill of Rights. The Preamble of the Atomic Energy Control Act states that it is passed in the "national interest" and I am not prepared to dispute Parliament's decision in that respect. The Members of Parliament are fully cognizant of the effect that the Act might have and of the considerable power granted to the Board under s. 9. The Board has decided that freedom of speech must be abridged in the national interest. I realize that there is an inherent repugnance in allowing an administrative tribunal to take such drastic steps but I recognize that the Regulations also have the approval of the Governor General-in-Council.

Having considered all these factors, I am of the view that Parliament is the best judge of the measures which should be taken in the public interest. By applying the principles enunciated by Laskin, J., in Curr, I find that the Act and Regulations 76-644 are valid notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Since I have already held that the privileges of the Members continue notwithstanding the Regulations, I need not consider the effect of s. 1(d) on such privileges in relation to Regulations 76-644. Moreover, since I have also concluded that the solicitor-client privilege exists notwithstanding Regulations 76-644, I need not consider the extent of s. 2(c) (right to counsel).

While this matter was reserved, Counsel advised me that the Regulations have been amended. On October 13, 1977, the Cabinet approved Regulations SOR/77-758 which replace SOR/76-644:

Short Title

1. These Regulations may be cited as the Uranium Information Security Regulations.

Interpretation

2. In these Regulations, "foreign tribunal" includes any court or grand jury and any person authorized or permitted under foreign law to take or receive evidence whether on behalf of a court or grand jury or otherwise.

Security of Information

3. No person who has in his possession or under his control any note, document or other written or printed material in any way related to conversations, discussions or meetings that took place between January 1, 1972 and December 31, 1975 involving that person or any other person in relation to the exporting from Canada or marketing for use outside Canada of uranium or its derivatives or compounds shall

(a) release any such note, document or material or disclose or communicate the contents thereof to any person, foreign government or branch or agency thereof or to any foreign tribunal unless

(i) he is required to do so by or under a law of Canada, or

(ii) he does so with the consent of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources; or

(b) fail to guard against or take reasonable care to prevent the unauthorized release of any such note, document or material or the disclosure or communication of the contents thereof.

Application

4. Section 3 does not apply to a person unless he has such possession or control by reason of the direct or indirect acquisition by him of the note, document or material because of his being or having been

(a) engaged in the mining, exporting, refining or selling of uranium or its derivatives or compounds;

(b) appointed to a public office or by a Minister pursuant to subsection 37(1) of the Public Service Employment Act or employed in the public service; or

(c) a director, an officer, employee or agent of

(i) a person engaged as described in paragraph (a),

(ii) a company incorporated in Canada that is or was a parent, subsidiary or affiliate of or related to another company incorporated in Canada so engaged or to a foreign corporation so engaged; or

(iii) the Atomic Energy Control Board, Eldorado Nuclear Limited or Uranium Canada, Limited.

It can be seen that Section 4 of the new Regulations has a profound effect on this application. Subsequent to the amendment counsel attended upon me and agreed that I should deliver judgment without regard to the amendment, I have done so.

As a result, an order will go granting a declaration as follows:

1. That the Uranium Information Security Regulations do not prohibit the applicants from releasing any note, documents or material or communicating the contents thereof to their solicitors and counsel for the purpose of seeking legal advice.

2. That the Regulations do not prohibit the applicants or any member of the House of Commons from releasing or disclosing any such documents in the course of Parliamentary debate or to the press.

3. That Subsection 2(a)(ii) of the Regulations is ultra vires the Atomic Energy Control Board and the Governor in Council under S. 9 of the Atomic Energy Control Act.

Apart from this, the application is dismissed. This is not a case for an award of costs. I am grateful to counsel for their assistance in this matter.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF GOVERNMENT JETSTAR FLIGHT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On December 24 last, the office of the Minister of Labour called for the government JetStar to come to Hamilton at about 4 p.m. to take the minister to Sault Ste. Marie. Because of weather conditions they could not land in Sault Ste. Marie and had to land in Toronto. In view of the fact that the exercise took more than six hours, and in view of the fact that the flight crew was denied inflight meal service because of the government's austerity program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That the Minister of Transport table in the House the manifest for that flight and a copy of the request for the aircraft, and the statement of government business which necessitated that flight to Sault Ste. Marie on Christmas eve.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BID BY FOREIGN COMPANY TO TAKE OVER NEWFOUNDLAND FISH PROCESSING COMPANY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning an application before the Foreign Investment Review Agency involving a bid by Nordzee, a West Germany subsidiary of Unilever, to take over the Newfoundland fish processing company, Ocean Harvesters. Because FIRA refuses to consider the views of fishermen and the communities directly involved, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That this House directs the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Fisheries to intervene with FIRA on behalf of the Newfoundland fishermen to inform that agency of the serious threat to the inshore fishery and the livelihood of the communities involved should this unnecessary foreign takeover bid be allowed.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LIFE IMPRISONMENT FOR KIDNAPPING, ABDUCTION AND HOSTAGE-TAKING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart), a motion which reads as follows:

That section 24.7 of the Criminal Code relating to kidnapping and abduction and hostage-taking be amended so that where other kinds of violence are involved, such as we see today in the tragic affair in Manitoba, a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment be imposed instead of the discretionary power given a judge to impose sentence "liable to life imprisonment".

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTION LAW BE AMENDED TO GIVE JUSTICE TO SENIOR CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Since when passing Bill C-52 parliament has recognized the vested right to unemployment insurance before January 1, 1976 of individuals 65 years of age; since before passage of that bill several senior citizens, realizing that the Unemployment Insurance Commission was ignoring the principle of the vested right, applied for pensions from the Canada Pension

Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan; since due to that fact, thousands of aged persons are penalized because the Unemployment Insurance Commission refuses to pay benefits to which they are entitled under the pretext that they have received pensions from the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House enjoin the federal government to appeal to the Unemployment Insurance Commission so that the latter reconsider its decision as a result of the glaring injustice now experienced by some 18,000 pensioners and at the same time to introduce legislation which would correct in the shortest possible time the injustice of the Unemployment Insurance Commission toward those senior citizens.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL

PURCHASE OF PAPER-SHREDDING MACHINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the extravagant efforts of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) to separate himself, his predecessors and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) from the RCMP and to shift responsibility for alleged wrongdoing from the government, and in view of reports that the Solicitor General recently purchased three paper shredding machines and is considering ordering others, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House directs the Solicitor General to divest himself of any and all paper-shredders now in use in his department and orders the Solicitor General, or preferably his executive assistant, to assure the House that this is absolutely the last instance in which he will allow the purchase and use of paper-shredders for his files.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

IMPLEMENTING OF HALL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATION TO CLEAR EXPORT BOTTLENECKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Net farm income from grain is down, and over 20 million bushels of west coast grain exports have been shipped behind schedule. This annual winter foul-up has once again cost us millions of bushels in exports, the farmers millions of dollars in demurrage costs, and it has jeopardized future trade with our important Asian customers. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board be instructed to implement the recommendations of the Hall commission forthwith with a view to straightening out west coast export grain bottlenecks.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this point only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

RELOCATION OF REGIONAL BOUNDARIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of very pressing and urgent necessity. In view of the fact that Unemployment Insurance Commission regional maps with respect to minimum attachment qualifications are terribly outdated, and in view of the fact that my riding of Brant, for example, is listed as having only 7.1 per cent unemployment when in fact the rate is about 15 per cent—a human and economic tragedy in itself—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That the Unemployment Insurance Commission scrap its outdated 16 regional boundaries and immediately introduce realistic attachment qualifications that accurately reflect current unemployment in any specific location in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

SOUTHERN ONTARIO—REFERENCE OF SUBJECT OF RAIL SERVICE TO COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order

43 on a matter of urgent public necessity. In view of the fact that Canadian National Railways is further curtailing essential rail services in southern Ontario, as now evidenced by the closing of the Caledonia station and the dismantling of train order signals at that station as of December 30, 1977, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That the whole matter of deteriorating rail service in southern Ontario be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for the hearing of evidence in this matter and reporting back to the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be made at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LANDING OF SOVIET SATELLITE ON CANADIAN SOIL

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister and it refers to reports of a Soviet satellite which apparently descended in the Great Slave Lake area today. We understand that the Prime Minister was advised of this matter by an early morning telephone call from the President of the United States.

This seems to raise a very important question touching Canadian sovereignty. Canada is supposed to be an equal partner in the NORAD arrangement which would be surveying the movement of this kind of vehicle into Canadian orbit. Since Canada is an equal partner in NORAD, why was the Prime Minister of Canada not advised by Canadian officials about this penetration of Canadian territory; and if he was not advised by Canadian officials, does that indicate that the only way Canada becomes informed of possible threats to itself is by telephone calls from American officials?

● (1417)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret to inform the Leader of the Opposition that his facts, as sometimes happens, are completely wrong. As to the equal partnership, when I visited the NORAD centre at Colorado Springs in December, the officials there, both the commander-in-chief and the deputy who is a Canadian, were extremely forthcoming in their giving of information to Canada about their surveillance in space of such objects.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): How about answering the question?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I understand there was an allegation that there was no equal partnership. I am explaining that there was an equal partnership. In so far as being informed about this particular instance of an orbit out of control, of course I was advised several days ago by Canadian officials that there was knowledge that there was a satellite out of control, that it was tumbling through space, that we were jointly, with the Americans, at NORAD monitoring its path, and if it became apparent that it might land in Canada, we would know and would let the Americans know and we would be in a position to take whatever preventive action was necessary.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada were advised several days ago, I presume they would have taken some action to prepare Canadian experts who might have been interested in this descent into Canadian territory. Could the Prime Minister tell the House precisely what arrangements and preparations were made by Canadian officials? Could he tell the House what Canadian experts are now on site in the Northwest Territories looking at this matter, or are all the investigations in this matter being left to the Americans?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the supplementary question is just as badly informed as the first question. As soon as it became apparent that the satellite might land in Canada, the federal government took several preventive measures, including contacting people at the highest level in the provinces concerned with civil defence. But, once again, there was not at the outset, an identification of the area where the landing might take place. One hour before the landing, I understand it was still possible it might have landed in the southern hemisphere rather than the northern hemisphere.

Obviously, we did not want to alert every square inch of territory in Canada where something might land. We took whatever preventive actions were necessary in order to let us act quickly as soon as the landing site had been precisely defined. When that was established, our officials knew right away. The President of the United States telephoned me around seven o'clock this morning and said they had it on their radar and it was about to land, and he indicated where he thought the landing would be. Of course, we were having the same approximate—

An hon. Member: Why? Did Canadians take any action?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman over there has a supplementary question, you might want to recognize him later. The real reason the President of the United States telephoned me was to offer to the Canadian forces, should they need it, airborne detecting devices for any possible radioactivity. That was a fair offer, and I undertook to see if it would be needed. I understand that the Minister of National Defence carried on from there, and that our own experts are involved in the detection process.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has replied with his usual evasive generalities.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Hon. members on the other side can continue to try to shout me down. The question was put, and the Prime Minister did not answer it except to say that Canadians are involved, which is a very general statement. The question was whether there are Canadians en route to the site or are on site—that question was not answered—or whether we are leaving this matter to the United States. The matter I now want to turn to is this. We seem to have a very curious system here in relation to NORAD.

• (1422)

We seem to have a system that requires the President of the United States to call the Prime Minister of Canada when there is some decision made as to where an object is going to fall.

Will the Prime Minister not only give us a general assurance, now, that the system is more secure than that, but will he check and make a direct report to this House to assure the House of Commons—it is very difficult, sir, to speak over the shouting from the other side of the House. I know they are developing a deliberate tactic of trying to shout down the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I can stand through this Liberal catcalling for some time, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask for an undertaking from the Prime Minister that there is a system more efficient and less demanding upon Presidents and Prime Ministers when an event of this kind occurs. I ask, in addition, that there be a direct means whereby the Canadian chief of government or the minister of national defence is advised, by Canadians, of a potential infringement of Canadian sovereignty and soil, rather than relying upon the President of the United States to awaken the Prime Minister with this kind of information.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I find the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition somewhat puzzling. His first assumption was that it was not an equal partnership and that we were only informed for the first time at seven o'clock this morning by the President of what was about to happen—

An hon. Member: You did not deny it.

Mr. Trudeau: This is presumably the way in which he chooses to conceive relations between the two governments in NORAD. My first answer was to put clearly to him that I had been informed several days ago by Canadian officials. Indeed, members of the Department of National Defence have been on standby for a week for just such an eventuality.

An hon. Member: Skiing in Aspen with you?

Mr. Trudeau: It could not be more clear, Mr. Speaker, that Canada was informed as soon as the landing became probable. The objection now seems to be that the President of the United States chose to phone me around seven o'clock this morning. I can understand why the Leader of the Opposition does not understand that kind of thing. It seems to me that this is the kind of courtesy which probably escapes members of the Tory party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: But, Mr. Speaker, I find it strange that we would fault the President of the United States for choosing to phone me to offer co-operation in such an important matter, when the thesis of the Leader of the Opposition is that it should be a co-operative approach.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister continues to try to evade a very simple question. The question is: Why did Canadians in this partnership not advise the Prime Minister of the final descent on to Canadian soil of a Soviet satellite? Why do we rely on the Americans in this matter? Let me ask one other question. The Prime Minister might be able to answer my question if his backbenchers ceased shouting at us from across the way.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: Sir, can the Prime Minister inform the House of Commons as to the method of disposal of the debris from the satellite? Is it the intention of the government of Canada to turn that debris over to the U.S.S.R.?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, these matters are dealt with in an international treaty which states that the country which is the launcher and owner of the satellite is responsible for the damage caused.

• (1427)

We will have to establish what damage there was, if any, and what operations have to be embarked upon in order to make any possible unsafeness safe. Then we will be able to ask the Soviets—

Mr. Clark: That is not the question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister is having trouble with the question.

Mr. Trudeau: I am not having trouble.

Mr. Clark: The question related to the debris.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is entirely possible that the satellite burned itself out in its re-entry and there is no debris. That is entirely possible. I think it is reasonable to answer the question by saying that we will first establish if there is debris. Second—

Mr. Clark: I suggest you ask Jimmy Carter.

Mr. Trudeau: —what possible damage might have been caused by the debris, and third, what possible action is needed in order to remove this adverse effect. Then it would be reasonable to address ourselves to the Soviets and say there is debris; second, there is damage, and third, "What are you going to do about it?"

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN CONTENT OF PIPE TO BE MANUFACTURED FOR NORTHERN PIPELINE—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring the Prime Minister back to earth. The Deputy Prime Minister said in Ottawa on September 9 that 100,000 man-years of employment would be created—that is a phrase right out of his press release—not "might be" or "could be", but would be created in Canada as a direct result of the construction of the Alcan pipeline. When we asked an officer of the pipeline company what this figure was based on, we were told it was based on the assumption that Canada would produce 98 per cent of the pipe for the Canadian section of the pipeline.

My question to the Prime Minister is as follows. Considering that the Deputy Prime Minister yesterday, both in the House and, if I understood it correctly, outside the House, withdrew the government's promise to produce 98 per cent of the pipe in Canada, and therefore withdrew entirely the very specific commitment to produce the 100,000 man-years of employment which he categorically promised on September 9, does this turnaround by the Deputy Prime Minister reflect government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party persists in seeing a contradiction between the reality of what we said—

Mr. Broadbent: There is a contradiction.

Mr. Trudeau: This is based on an assumption by the leader of the New Democratic Party that if there is a good piece of news for Canada, such as the construction of a pipeline which will involve spending some $3 billion or $4 billion on construction work in Canada, he must make sure that the down side of that good news happens, so that everyone will be convinced that the good news is not happening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it should be a cause of satisfaction to every Canadian that this very important pipeline will be built and that the Foothills part of it will be built in Canada, by Canadian companies, and that it will be calling for Canadian content for that building. I can understand the leader of the New Democratic Party wanting to get some guarantee that Canadian businessmen and Canadian workers—

Mr. Broadbent: You gave the guarantee. You gave the promise.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we negotiated an agreement with the United States according to which both countries, for the part of the pipeline built in their territory, would assure the maximum content for their country. We did not ask that the Americans guarantee that we would not be able to bid on their part of the pipeline, that if Canadian technology and Canadian materials were more competitive they would keep us out of their territory, because we have confidence in the future of the Canadian entrepreneur and the Canadian worker. That is our position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1432)

Mr. Trudeau: Surely, in a joint operation like this, we have to be consistent. If we get a guarantee from the Americans that they will not bid on our section, then we have to give an equal guarantee. We did not want to give that guarantee, because we have confidence that we can compete with any other producer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister took two minutes not to deal with the question at all. What is at stake here is the integrity of the government regarding a categorical promise made by the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada in Ottawa on September 9. The Deputy Prime Minister said that we were going to get 100,000 man-years of employment. He broke it down into three subsections. I will not repeat the figures that he gave. He did not say that we might get them, we could get them, or it would be dependent upon the situation: he said that Canada would get 100,000 man-years of jobs. Is that the situation, or is it not? Yesterday, in the House, the Deputy Prime Minister seemed to withdraw entirely that commitment made by the government on September 9.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would say the same: we will get that many jobs, and probably we will get more if we can compete in the United States section.

Mr. Clark: Always conditional.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, any doubt about the betrayal has now been cleared up. We now know we do not have a commitment to get jobs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Would the Prime Minister agree that practically the only benefit Canada was going to receive as a result of the Alcan pipeline was the jobs? If he would agree with that, would he also assure the House with regard to stories going around suggesting that Canadians have yielded to American pressure to change the kind of pipe required to build the pipeline? That will exclude many Canadians from the kind of jobs the government promised. The Prime Minister committed the government in order to get public support for this major project.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we did not need public support. We had the support of the New Democratic Party, the Progressive Conservative party and the Social Credit party.

Mr. Broadbent: On the condition there would be jobs.

Mr. Trudeau: This pipeline was envisaged as the right pipeline for Canada, at the right time, in the right way. The NDP voted for it.

Mr. Broadbent: We have not had a vote yet.

Mr. Trudeau: That discussion took place in the House of Commons early last August, when the New Democratic Party indicated that this was the proper course to take, and the government took it. Within a short time, the government successfully negotiated a contract with the United States government which indicated that each side would seek the maximum amount of content for the section constructed in its own country. This was a decision taken by the governments. The Canadian government does not intend to own the steel mill. It does not intend to take the steelworkers unto its bosom. We are now turning to the private sector and asking if it can produce effectively, compete and build a pipeline in Canada. The private sector is indicating that it can. We have faith in the entrepreneur and the worker. Therefore, we have faith that the agreement we signed with the Americans is one which will result in great benefit to Canadians. The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party does not seem to have that faith in the future. We do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

POSSIBILITY OF TERRORIST ACTIVITIES BEFORE 1971

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Although the Solicitor General had formally stated that the RCMP had done nothing illegal other than those acts concerning events which took place in 1972 and 1973, last January 9 he disclosed another act by that police force as incredible as having made a public announcement in 1971 in the name of the FLQ. Would the Prime Minister tell us if he can give the House absolute assurance that no illegal or irregular act has been done by the RCMP before 1971 in relation to the terrorist activities that have been committed in Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I could give the House an absolute assurance of that, there would have been no need for instituting a commission of inquiry. We have established such a commission so that indeed it could inquire on this police force and find out whether or not other illegal acts have been committed by the force and finally make its findings public, at which time the hon. member will be satisfied.

Mr. Matte: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Since the Prime Minister seems to show some good will, would he tell the House if he will change his mind about the federal government cooperating with the Keable inquiry on the operations of the RCMP related to terrorist activities in Quebec?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we did cooperate, we have made several depositions and we have handed back a whole series of documents to the Keable Commission. We have stated before the courts that this commission of inquiry should look into problems related to the administration of justice within the province of Quebec and not turn it into an inquiry on a federal institution. Just as the hon. member certainly does not believe that the federal government would be entitled to establish a federal commission of inquiry on, say the school system within the province of Quebec, so do we not think that a provincial commission of inquiry, either from Quebec, Ontario or Alberta, should lead an investigation on a federal institution as such.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF SOVIET SATELLITE LANDING ON CANADIAN SOIL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this is a very happy day. It reminds me of March and April of 1957, when one after the other, opposition speakers were howled down as the hon. Leader of the Opposition was today and two months later the government went out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have witnessed a disgraceful performance today on the part of the government.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence and ask him what time this morning he became aware of the fact that this satellite had, in fact, exploded over Canadian soil.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have been aware of the satellite being out of orbit for the best part of a week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: At what time today?

Mr. Danson: My officials have known this was possible since December. I knew around seven o'clock or 7.15 this morning when my officials called to let me know that it had re-entered the atmosphere on Canadian soil.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, is the minister in agreement with the description of this satellite as it was given a few moments ago by Associated Press in the United States, as a military spy satellite?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does he accept that? Why was the announcement of what had taken place made in the United States, and not in Canada? When I was prime minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind being howled down. I would again remind government members that what happened in 1957 is going to happen again this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister why the announcement was made in Washington and not Ottawa, where it should have been made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, first, I remember what happened to our relationships with the United States and other countries during that period of time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: It is not what I would describe as a spy satellite. It is a surveillance satellite, a radar-type satellite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1442)

Mr. Danson: If my friends over there want to laugh and howl down this side, they can do it all they want. But if they are interested in the truth, I will give it to them. Everybody has surveillance satellites to check on their fleets, on search and rescue, on the position of ships, and on pollution. That is part of the peaceful use of satellites. We co-operate with all nations of the world, and in our co-operation we maintain the peaceful use of satellites with our allies in NATO and in NORAD. There is complete communication going on at all times. It is not a matter of making announcements or not making announcements.

In the words of the press in Canada, it was ten minutes. This is not a great deal of time, but things happen very quickly with satellites, as my friends over there might begin to learn after a while. The announcement to the press here was made prior to the announcement made to the press in the United States. That was done in full understanding with the United States, I must say. Action is taking place because we have continuous co-operation. It is not a matter of who asked who, what. We are working together as a partnership and as a team, and it is working very well.

We are accepting the assistance offered by the United States government with four aircraft which are either on their way or in Edmonton now, or on their way to the site. We have our own full team of 23 anti-nuclear, anti-fallout people in Yellowknife ready, on the job, to render whatever assistance they can on the remote chance that particles from the satellite have penetrated the atmosphere. In most cases they burn up and dissipate in the atmosphere. There may be some indication that some have landed. Our troops are ready; they are on the job. We have nuclear alert teams on the job—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is all very well to talk about co-operation. We also have co-operation with Cuba.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will repeat my question to the minister. Why was this announcement not made from Ottawa, where it should have been made?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: I repeat that the announcement, if you can call it an announcement, the information which the press was given in Ottawa, was given here before it was given in Washington. I held a press conference as soon as possible, as soon as we could bring the press together. They were in my office this morning, where I gave them as much full and frank information as I could, and I shall continue to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: You knew about it a week ago.

U.S.S.R. DEVELOPMENT OF NUCLEAR PLANTS VIS-À-VIS WESTERN WORLD

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question, also, is for the Minister of National Defence. Reports about the satellite which descended in the Great Slave Lake area indicate that it was nuclear-powered while in flight. Can the minister inform us if this is to be taken as an indication that the Soviet Union is ahead of the western world in the development of small nuclear plants?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKinnon: Can the minister inform us if the power plant in use in Cosmos 986 is equivalent to, or ahead of, the Slowpoke which is being developed by Canadian scientists,? Also, could he tell us—the Prime Minister dodged this question, and when he dodges questions usually there is a reason—whether, as the minister says, on the remote chance that debris is found, and the international agreement covering it requires that Canada return such debris to the U.S.S.R., it is our intention to do so?

Mr. Danson: I cannot at this time give a relative assessment of the nuclear power plants on different satellites. I must say that if there is debris on the ground, we would want to contain it or preserve it and seal off the area. We will look after the safety of Canadians first and then we will determine what is required under the international régime. The most important point to which we have to address ourselves is the safety of Canadians and our sovereignty.

ENERGY

REPORTED INCREASED NATURAL GAS SUPPLIES—EFFECT ON CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN PIPELINE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister based on recent news reports with respect to additional gas supplies and accelerated or additional gas exports from Alberta to the United States. Can the Prime Minister inform us how long the government has been aware of this situation, which may merit slowing down the pace of construction of the northern pipeline, or may necessitate the prebuilding of the southern portion of the pipeline in order to facilitate additional gas exports to the United States? Did the Prime Minister discuss this issue with Vice-President Mondale when they met last week? If so, with what result? Was any agreement reached?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer the question, I would say yes, there was discussion with the vice-president on this question and there was agreement on the part of both governments that it might be very useful to prebuild a section of this pipeline using some of the gas bubble at present for that purpose, provided—it is a very important proviso—there is a swap arrangement giving Canadians a call on Alaskan, American gas at a later date. The other proviso is that the regulatory authorities of the province of Alberta and of the federal government fully endorse such a swap.

Mr. Nielsen: Can the President of Privy Council inform the House whether the prebuilding of the southern section was discussed during the September negotiations regarding the pipeline agreement, and whether the delay in bringing the pipeline legislation before the House is because it had been submitted to the government of Alberta for their observations and suggestions? Is this one of the reasons for the delay in the legislation coming before us?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: I have a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the President of Privy Council tell us why Canadians were denied knowledge of the possibility of prebuilding this pipeline, since no mention of the subject was made in the government's news releases, despite the fact that the U.S. President's decision and report to Congress concerning the same topic makes repeated mention of the possibility of prebuilding? When he answers that question, could he assure us that all the appropriate governments and agencies, including the native organizations, will be consulted before a final decision is made on this specific question?

[Mr. Danson.]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think it was made quite clear to Canadians, and indeed to the House of Commons before we debated the issue, by the National Energy Board in its report, "Reasons for Decision" with respect to a national northern pipeline, namely, that the swapping option, the prebuilding option and the predelivery option were all options which could be considered against a background of a northern pipeline program.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROPOSED LAY-OFFS AT CERTAIN MINES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that last Friday the minister met with provincial mines ministers in Toronto, and in view of the fact that in exactly three weeks from today 3,000 Canadian miners and smelter workers will be laid off in Thompson and in the Sudbury basin, can the minister tell the House what specific steps he proposed, if any, or what specific proposals he and the mines ministers discussed to avoid this catastrophic lay-off in the Sudbury basin and in Thompson, Manitoba?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is well aware of the fact that the conference of mines ministers was called to look at medium-term prospects for the mining industry and how it would be possible for mines ministers to restore confidence in the mining industry. The hon. member has pointed to one of the very significant but disturbing aspects of the mining industry today, a decision which might be followed in other mines across the country during the course of this year. Development of the mining industry will require a long lead time. The ministers looked at a number of questions which in their separate jurisdictions they may be able to address for the purpose of reporting to their first ministers for the February 1 ministers' meeting.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the statement made by the minister, that in effect they discussed potential mine lay-offs, can the minister identify, for the information of the House, the people of Canada and of the workers involved, what those potential mine lay-off areas are?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows there have been weakening markets in copper and, to some extent, zinc. I am pleased to say that so far as lead molybdenum, potash and uranium in particular are concerned, there are very strong markets at present. However, because of the world situation at the present time, some metal markets are undergoing a period of weakness. Zinc and copper are two of those. These are matters which we have been examining.

● (1452)

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in view of the statements by the minister and his aides prior to Christmas regarding the fact that stockpiling had not been completely eliminated from the government's arsenal to deal with lay-offs in the mining industry, and in view of the fact that a recent report from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources indicates optimism for the future of the nickel industry, can the minister tell the House if he has made to the cabinet a recommendation of short-term stockpiling of nickel? If he has, what is the decision? If he has not made such a recommendation, why not?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, this question has been asked in this House in the past, and the answer has been that stockpiling would not solve the problems of the nickel industry of this country at the present time. I can tell the hon. member that there was no support, that I detected, from mines ministers for a stockpiling program for metals, minerals or mines that were in difficulty.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Windsor West.

ENERGY

PRICE OF ALASKA GAS COMPARED WITH CANADIAN GAS EXPORTED TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. If and when Canada buys Alaska gas as part of a swap arrangement, will it be at prices equivalent to those Canada will get for natural gas it will have sold previously to the United States, or will the arrangement mean that Canada will be paying higher prices for Alaska gas than those it received for equivalent quantities of Canadian natural gas exported to the United States?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think I have reassured hon. members in the past that with respect to the pricing under swapping arrangements, Canadian interests will be preserved. I think the best way to preserve Canadian interests would be to ensure that any transfer of energy takes place on the basis of real values, not nominal values.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY WHETHER SHIP TO REPLACE LOST CN VESSEL WILL BE BUILT IN CANADA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Inasmuch as officials of the Ministry of Transport are now in Europe looking for a vessel to replace the Canadian National ship lost off the coast of Labrador and Newfoundland last year, can the minister indicate whether that accurately reflects the position he announced two weeks ago with respect to aid for the shipbuilding industry? If so, can he relate the two positions?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in this regard the Department of Transport is examining shipping costs and the cost of replacing a ship which served the east coast. The figures are comparable. We must compare what it would cost to purchase, with what it would cost to build.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, can the minister indicate what action his department has taken to determine the capacity of Canadian yards to construct a vessel within price ranges which are not significantly different? In other words, has he canvassed Canadian yards? Has he asked Halifax shipbuilders, for example, whose yards are about ready to shut down, whether they have the capacity?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we are assured by the Halifax shipyards and a number of others that they have the capacity. That is why we announced a 20 per cent subsidy on all ships built between now and the end of October, 1978. We certainly encourage shipbuilding to be done in Canadian yards and that they take advantage of that subsidy.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

DEATH OF RCMP OFFICER IN MANITOBA—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID SITUATION RECURRING

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the acting Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice. Is the Solicitor General in communication with the commissioner of the RCMP regarding the tragic affair in Manitoba, and has he any comforting information to give to the House?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General is in communication with the commissioner regarding the situation in Manitoba, which at the moment appears to be stable. I am sure the hon. member and this House join me in expressing sympathy to the family of Constable Onofrey who died in the course of his duty of protecting society as a police officer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: The special emergency unit of the RCMP is in control of the situation. I do not think I can report very much more at this point.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Since the legislation of this government abolishing capital punishment has obviously resulted in an increase in capital murder—

An hon. Member: That is not true; the rate has gone down.

Mr. Alkenbrack: —particularly the murder of police officers, will the minister immediately bring in legislation amending the Criminal Code to reinstate capital punishment, which is the ultimate, permanent and effective deterrent to capital crime?

An hon. Member: Boo!

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated the answer to that question, which is no. I have made recommendations to my colleagues, and they have been accepted, that in the next round of Criminal Code amendments upon which I am working the penalty for abduction be increased.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INSTRUCTIONS TO AIRCREWS AS TO DISPOSAL OF DEBRIS FROM SOVIET SATELLITE

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that the Canadian government has accepted the suggestion of the American government to let American planes fly in Canadian air space, has the minister given specific instructions to aircrews and to those in charge of the aircrews that when and if debris is found, it is solely under Canadian sovereignty and only Canadians will examine it?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, those instructions are not necessary. That is understood. The aircraft which are coming from the United States are being staged out of Edmonton at our regional control centre which is under the control of our air command. It is likely that the surveillance pods which will be used will be on our Hercules aircraft. That is not certain at this moment, but they will be under Canadian control. The high surveillance aircraft will be operating out of the same centre. Control is the responsibility of our own command and our sovereignty is, of course, fully recognized.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Am I to understand that if debris is found, under no circumstances will representatives of a foreign power be allowed to examine it? Is that instruction very clear? The minister said it is understood. Is it absolutely understood and made very clear in the instructions?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, they are operating under our control. We are not dealing with a belligerent power; we are dealing with people who are working with us. I cannot give the assurance that they will not be allowed to look or touch. If they can be of assistance to us in this role, of course, that assistance will be accepted. However, no specific instructions have been given by me. If it would make the hon. member feel any better, I would be pleased to give them. But that is not the object of the operation; the object of the operation is to reduce the amount of damage that can be done to Canadians, to our environment and to our wildlife.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO CLEAN UP OIL SPILLS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State (Environment). In the months of October and November of 1974 I posed a series of questions to the former minister of the environment and asked for the tabling of contingency plans in the event of a major oil spill on the west coast. The former minister assured me, as recorded in Hansard of November 6, 1974, that plans in the Vancouver area were very adequate and, in fact, computerized. Now I find that a consultant to the GVRD says that no government agency is capable of a major oil clean-up. Can the minister explain the disparity in those two accounts?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, it would take a little more time than I am allowed in the question period to explain that matter. Perhaps the consultant means that no single agency is capable of handling any major oil spill. We work with the United States, the Department of National Defence and a number of other groups in dealing with major oil spills and with the supply of materials. I assure the hon. member that we can deal effectively and quickly with oil spills on the west coast, and on the east coast as well.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, the consultant also said that these plans are merely policy guidelines and are not active plans. Can the minister explain that?

Mr. Marchand: I have not read this particular consultant's report. I will look at it. We have plans.

An hon. Member: Have you read them?

● (1502)

Mr. Marchand: On occasions when we have had to put them to the test, such as the Stevenson oil spill and others, we have shown that we can deal effectively with oil spills; perhaps not as adequately or perfectly as we would like, but we have a pretty good capability.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF RIDING OF SAINT-HENRI

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Saint-Henri) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-415, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Saint-Henri-Westmount).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to have the name of the Saint-Henri riding changed to that of Saint-Henri-Westmount. The reasons for adding the name of Saint-Henri- to that of Westmount date back to the seventeenth century. The Saint-Henri area was already in existence and is an integral part of the history of Montreal.

Moreover, we must pay particular attention to the industrious population of the Saint-Henri, some 23,000 strong, which is delighted to join the new Westmount riding.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Motion agreed to.

7. Does any government agency or department have immediate plans for purchasing further AR-15's and, if so, which agencies and departments and in what quantities?

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Justice, National Defence and the Ministry of the Solicitor General as follows: 1. Yes. This decision was taken by the government because it is of the view that the AR-15 has no legitimate sporting use and is closely modelled along military lines. It was felt that weapons of this kind should not be readily available to anyone, and that control should be exercised over those who possess them.

2. The Department of Justice is informed that the AR-15 is the commercial predecessor of the Colt M-16 and M-16A1 rifles, both of which are fully automatic weapons developed from the AR-15 design and manufactured for the use of U.S. troops during the Vietnam war.

3. Yes. It is pointed out, however, that the name of supplying firm is Colt Industries, not Colt Firearms. (a) To meet an objective in standardization. (b) Requirements were for a semi-automatic rifle capable of withstanding rigorous handling, rather simple to operate and service, lightweight, convertible to calibre .22 inches for training with a resulting economy for ammunition, and medium range. (c) At the time of purchase the Colt AR-15 was not on the list of restricted weapons.

4. Not within the context of the requirements as laid out in 3 (b).

5. The technical and ballistic characteristics of the Colt AR-15 are as follows: Calibre—.223 (Remington); Barrel—20 inches; Weight—7¼ pounds; Length—38⅜ inches overall; Stock—reinforced polycarbonate with buttstock stowage compartment; Sights—front: post, rear: adjustable for wind and elevation; Magazine—5-round detachable record pad; Muzzle velocity—3,250 feet per second; Muzzle energy—1,280 feet per pound; Flash suppressor, sling and swivels.

6. (a) See Part 6 (b). (b) National Defence—2; Canadian Penitentiary Service—822.

7. The Canadian Penitentiary Service will be purchasing additional quantities of this rifle as new major institutions come into operation; this will occur in 1978 and subsequent years. National Defence—No.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-23, to amend the Income Tax Act and establish the employment tax credit program.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND RANGE OF PERSONS TO WHOM ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES APPLY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-18 is now before the House for second reading. Some of the amendments in this bill are for housekeeping purposes and have been required for some time. Others are needed to ensure that the decontrol process will be orderly.

Controls were never intended to be permanent since this government does not believe in excessive intervention in the market place. Last October I announced that a phased process of decontrol would begin on April 14 of this year. We believe that this date will ensure that wage and price controls will be in place for the right length of time. Most groups and firms will remain subject to the guidelines until the last quarter of 1978.

The recent high rates of increase in inflation have resulted mainly from food prices and the depreciation of the exchange rate. I am confident that almost all of the impact of these developments is now behind us and that inflation will trend downward during 1978. Wage increases have been coming in at more reasonable levels and the AIB's price prenotification program is indicating only moderate changes.

Part of our progress is being made by a shift in attitudes. There is now a widespread recognition that we cannot expect the economy to deliver the large increases in real income which we enjoyed in the easy times of the 1960s and early 1970s. There is a better understanding of our goals and priorities and, in particular, of the difficulties involved in maintaining a competitive international trading position.

[Translation]

Our prospects are improving with regard to salary costs. The number of work days lost as a result of strikes decreased considerably last year. Union leaders have indicated that wage claims will be reasonable after April 14. All understand that unrealistic demand will only tend to reduce job creation or lead to the disappearance of existing ones. Public authorities, at every level, are showing more discipline than a few years ago.

Various new steps are being taken, as we near the phasing-out of controls. Our wage policy will guarantee that the state, as an employer, will not provoke in the private sector such wage increases as might be likely to stir a flare up in wages and prices. The federal-provincial conference of the finance ministers, to be held this week will give me a chance to broach this subject with my provincial counterparts, as well as with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) in the hope that a similar policy might be implemented throughout the public sector.

I plan to announce in the near future the details of the setting up of a control body whose main mission will be to see to it that all groups remain aware of the ravages of inflation, and draw attention to such inflationary elements as may exist.

[English]

Let me now turn to the specific clauses of this bill. Two of the amendments relate to the decontrol process. The first of these was introduced last summer. It would deem compensation plans to be amended in line with a recommendation of the AIB or an order of the administrator. Without this amendment, groups would probably be entitled to the negotiated level of wages as soon as controls cease to apply.

The other deals with administration in the transition period and prevents the use of what are known as AIB clauses. As the act now stands, no action can be taken against those firms or groups who have not reported early enough to allow a binding order to be issued by the administrator prior to December 31, 1978. This situation is clearly unsatisfactory and inequitable. This amendment would ensure that reports would be filed for the period covered by controls and allow the AIB, the administrator and the Anti-Inflation Appeal Tribunal to remain in operation as long as necessary to enforce compliance in respect of the controls period.

With respect to the "AIB clauses", the amendment will prevent the use of clauses which call for a higher entitlement to compensation as soon as the group is no longer covered by controls. It is designed to build in further restraint against a possible wage bulge.

All but one of the remaining amendments were introduced in Bill C-59 last summer. To review an order in council, which brought various groups that bargain in association under mandatory controls, would be backdated to December 16, 1975. A time limit would be imposed for parties referring a matter to the administrator following a notification from the AIB. The authority of the administrator to issue orders dealing with past or current contraventions of the guidelines would be clarified. Cabinet would be given adequate time to deal with petitions from parties affected by an order of the administrator. The remaining amendment, introduced for the first time, would clarify the definition of compensation plans.

[Translation]

Hon. members in this House will surely see the importance of this bill. It is therefore imperative that we proceed with its study without delay if we want the controls to be lifted in an orderly fashion. Let us not forget that we have little time left before phasing out of the controls begins.

[English]

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I was intrigued by the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who blames food prices and exchange rates for the continuing inflation which Canada is experiencing just now. Blaming food prices is almost the same as saying that the controls program does not work at all. Food prices at the farm gate were not supposed to be controlled. At the other end of the food chain, prices were supposed to be controlled except of course it was not price controls at all that we had, it was profit control. Therefore, any increase in costs could be passed right through to the consumer, and naturally we are not going to have any control over food prices. Long before this anti-inflation program was introduced in the first place the government knew that food prices were a villain and should be controlled.

As far as blaming exchange rates is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the government is responsible in large measure, if not totally, for the situation of exchange rates and the Canadian dollar. After all the government has allowed the productivity of this country to drop at such a rate, compared to other producing countries, that the world markets have finally realized the value of our dollar, and they have placed a proper value on it. That is the reason for the decline in exchange rates.

As for the minister's further remark that the economy cannot deliver the large increases to workers that it used to, we can look to the policies of the present administration and determine that they have in no way encouraged the economy to deliver anything close to what the economy is capable of delivering. For anyone wanting to improve the Canadian economy the government has provided only disincentives.

The minister also remarked that Bill C-18 is mainly a housekeeping bill. We might say that it is about time that the government started doing some housekeeping.

I would like to remind the House of some of the bungling that this government has done during the past few years, particularly in the case of the anti-inflation legislation which has been before the House, but not limited to that. For example, in 1975 we had Bill C-73, the original anti-inflation bill. Then, it was barely five months later the government found that it had to have amendments to the original program. Therefore, in May, 1976, we had Bill C-89, which amended Bill C-73. Then, a little over a year later, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-59 was introduced in July, 1977. Unfortunately the government did not think that Bill C-59 had sufficient priority and it died on the order paper at the end of the session. Now it is six months later and we have another set of Anti-Inflation Act amendments.

I have mentioned bungling, Mr. Speaker, and you may wonder if these are the only examples I have. On the legislative side I would like to refer to the Income Tax Act amendments. We dealt with those not so long ago and the minister and the government members were complaining that the opposition was stonewalling or delaying passage of the legislation. The delay came on the other side of the House, Mr. Speaker. The evidence is clear that Bill C-11 was first debated on November 7, 1977, and only five weeks elapsed between the start of the debate and the passage of the bill. Compare that with the 31 weeks which elapsed between the March 31 budget and the start of debate on the bill. The government left debate of that bill for so long that once again it found it imperative to introduce closure, and the people of Canada were denied a proper debate on another important tax bill. It is known widely that budget bills have effect from the date of the budget and there was absolutely no need for a closure motion to be used in that particular instance.

If that were not enough evidence, I would like to remind the House that even though ten years ago the government knew Bank Act legislation would be needed, we had an introduction yesterday of second reading of the Bank Act amending bill, in spite of the fact that the debate on an initial extension bill passed last year. The debate on that bill continued for a shorter period of time than the bells rang last evening to call a vote on this bill for which they obviously were not ready. What has happened to the proper legislation? That is the kind of bungling that we can do without.

It seems to me the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is appealing to Canadians on the basis that he is not going to run the next election campaign on his record. He cannot, of course, because he doesn't have a good one, so he is going to run the next election based on the future. He thinks Canadians are going to forgive him for his bungling; that is his premise. I say yes, Mr. Speaker, Canadians could easily forgive the government for bungling, but I doubt very much that Canadians are going to forgive the government for its dishonesty.

I would like to skim over a few examples which I suggest are examples of dishonesty on the part of this government. Just last week in the Vancouver newspapers there was an announcement made of the fact that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford)—I am glad he has returned to hear about it—gave the city of Vancouver $200,000 as the first installment of a $400,000 urban demonstration fund grant for the Gastown Fishermen's Wharf. Of course, the people of Vancouver welcomed that kind of participation by the government. But, it is totally dishonest to say that the Minister of Justice gave the city of Vancouver $200,000 as if it were something that he dug out of the Liberal coffers or his own pockets.

The people of Vancouver know where that money came from. It came out of the pockets of the residents of British Columbia. For this government to say that it has given money to the city of Vancouver is dishonest. The article goes on to say that the money came from a $6 million fund originally set aside for use during the United Nations Habitat Conference, but which was not used. Well, what do we take from that? That is an admission that either the government did some very bad budgeting and overprovided $6 million for the Habitat conference, or it had not sufficiently promoted the conference to make it a success and the money was not spent.

● (1522)

Mr. Basford: Don't you know about it?

Mr. Clarke: Of course. I was there. I was a delegate. I am aware that the minister's office generated a half million dollar loss as a result of unused hotel rooms. Who will be blamed for that? Was that dishonest or just fumbling? It is hard to distinguish.

The $6 million was probably appropriated for a specific purpose. We will find this out in a couple of years when it is looked at by the Auditor General and the Public Accounts committee. It seems to me there is a prima facie case of appropriating funds for one purpose and using it for another. The Auditor General and the Public Accounts committee have been very explicit that funds appropriated for one purpose are not to be used for another. We will have to wait for the answer to that one.

The Minister of Justice will not be here then. As for myself, I plan to be here for a good long time because the people of Canada need watchdogs like myself with a government like this in power.

The $200,000 gift is not the only item about which the government has been dishonest. Earlier the Minister of Justice went to Victoria and made a magnanimous gift of $150 million to the premier of British Columbia. It was all over the front pages.

Mr. Basford: British Columbia never had such good representation.

Mr. Clarke: Of course British Columbia needs that money. They welcomed getting it—back. However, the minister makes it sound as though he were bringing that money from eastern Canada to British Columbia by the truckload in order to make them a gift.

The people of British Columbia know where that money came from. They do not appreciate having it made to appear as though it is a gift from the great gods across the floor. I commend the Minister of Justice for his decision to quit this place early. It saves the voters the trouble of doing it for him.

There may be some discussion about the examples of dishonesty I have given. I have another piece of paper here which directly involves the Minister of Justice. It is a four page handbill entitled "The Redevelopment of Granville Island and False Creek in Vancouver".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have been following the interesting remarks of the hon. member. However, I have difficulty relating those remarks to Bill C-18 which is before us, the amendments proposed to the Anti-Inflation Act and the guidelines.

Mr. Clarke: I apologize to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House if I have strayed slightly from the tenor of the debate. I was merely making a preliminary lead-in to the thrust of my remarks which will deal with inflation. That is what the bill is about. It is clear that these government expenditures are inflationary. The problem is that those that I picked out are also dishonest. If I have stressed the dishonest feature of them over the inflationary feature, I apologize. I assure Your Honour I will tie that in with the debate on this bill.

As I was saying, I have a folder on the redevelopment of Granville Island and False Creek. It is not necessary to go into the history of this island at this time. Let it be said that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation acquired title to this land in Vancouver at a time when it was being used as an industrial estate. The great gods opposite decided that industrial estates should not be located close to the city where people can get to work easily. They feel they should be moved to the suburbs, which makes it more difficult for people. They decided this should be a people place, not an industrial estate.

Mr. Basford: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: In addition, they had to find a job for the past president of the Liberal party of British Columbia. For the past four or five years he has been the chairman, manager or director of the agency in charge of the redevelopment of Granville Island.

In order to buy up leases and clean the place up, $25 million was allocated. A park was put here and there as well as restaurants, and now they are going to put in some stores. What is wrong with that? It is a people place at the end of a two-lane dead-end road. How many people can get down such a road? What if there were an emergency? There would be a real traffic problem.

That is a dishonest use of the taxpayer's money, money which was obtained from people in British Columbia and is now back there. The people of British Columbia were not asked whether they wanted this.

After four years and the spending of $6 million, a public meeting was finally held last December 8 to outline the plans. The results were predictable. Vancouver merchants within a mile or two of that place asked what the government was doing with their tax dollars buy building a government-owned and subsidized shopping centre to compete with them. The people of Vancouver do not want to go to this people place with the inconvenience built into it. The merchants who pay the taxes are seeing their money being used in order that the government may compete with them. With a financial policy like that, I do not know where we are headed.

Something else in our society that is inflationary is the Unemployment Insurance Commission. That may sound strange. However, that commission will spend approximately $4.4 billion this year, which is about 10 per cent of the federal budget for the whole year. It may be called an insurance fund, but the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has no interest or desire in seeing that it operates as an insurance fund. He is only interested in paying the unemployed people provided to him by the Minister of Finance. It is like a con game—"You give me the bodies and I will pay them."

However, there happens to be the matter of a shortfall in the unemployment insurance fund. The government says it is not too great. It is nearly $2 billion. The Minister of Employment and Immigration does not consider that a deficit. In answers to questions in this House, that minister said on two occasions that this is a commitment, not a deficit. Of course it is a commitment. No one would argue with that. The government instituted the unemployment insurance program. Therefore it is committed to pay those who qualify for the benefits. But it is also a deficit. It is no wonder the Minister of Finance does not know how to balance the budget when the Minister of Employment and Immigration denies it is a deficit and the Minister of Justice thinks it is proper to take money out of someone's pocket, give it back to him, and ask for thanks.

All through this inflationary period the government has been asking Canadians to tighten their belts. But there is no evidence at all that the government has been tightening its belt in turn, and the result has been further inflationary pressure.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has made a big thing about his make-work programs. No doubt the people who are unemployed enjoy very much getting grants under the Canada Works Program and similar programs. Nevertheless, in my view the government should recognize that, if there is a need, adequate measures should be taken to meet it, and it is clear that the need for jobs has in no way been met by any of the minister's make-work programs. The money goes out, it is spent, and it is gone; the people are back on the unemployment rolls. All that has happened is the creation of yet another bureaucracy to administer these programs—programs which meet about 10 per cent of the demand. If there is a need, let us meet it. The government ought not to give the impression that they are good fellows handing out money so as to find work for the unemployed, and so on, when at the end there is no left-over benefit.

It is a little like the situation with regard to old age security and guaranteed income supplements. The amount presently paid out to a single person is about $3,000 a year. I have not seen the latest figures but in round numbers let us say the poverty level has been placed at $6,000 a year. How can the government suggest it is really meeting the need when $6,000 is the poverty level and it pays out $3,000?

I am sorry the Minister of Justice has left the chamber because I had another item I wanted to show him. This, too, is from the Vancouver Sun—an article written last week headed "Where your money goes". The headline reads: "Basford will get $112,000 at age 75". The article goes on to say that the minister, who, as we know, is retiring, will be getting a certain pension, and explains that with built-in escalation that pension could reach $112,000 by the time he is 75.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and the other members of the House, that the minister will need that $112,000 if he should happen to live to the age of 75. He will need it because when, at the age of 75, he goes to buy his new automobile he will need not $5,000 but $60,000 in 2007, or whatever the year is 29 years from now. That price is based upon inflation continuing at its present rate in Canada—it is presently 9 per cent though there are indications it will probably end up being 9.5 per cent. If we were fortunate enough to be able to contain inflation at the rate of 7 per cent the minister would only have to pay $35,000 for his car. The point is, though, that he will need the amount of pension the papers say he is going to get.

Here are a few more examples of what things will cost: a 60-cent loaf of bread at today's price will cost the minister $7.35 when he reaches 75 taking current rates of inflation into account. If he needs to call in a plumber to fix his kitchen sink, instead of a $25 charge for a house call he will be paying $233 to get the plumber to come over for an hour.

While we are talking about inflationary pressures caused by government spending I should like members opposite to consider the case of the elderly couple getting full old age security benefits and guaranteed income supplement. I am sure hon. members to my left will be interested in these figures, particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because he is familiar with the problems of these pensioners who are now getting $498 a month. I am sure he will be delighted to hear that when the Minister of Justice is 75 in 29 years from now, old age pensioners such as I have described will be getting $4,640 a month.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: That is $55,000 a year, which is about half of what the minister will be getting at that time. I submit the minister is not being unreasonable in signing up for his pension in these circumstances. Indeed, I am not at all sure that just being twice as well off as a couple living on old age security benefits will provide an adequate standard of living for him. If nothing is done about reducing present rates of inflation, this is exactly what we shall be seeing.

The figures I have given are not excessive. They are based on present rates of inflation and the indications are that the trend is worsening—that inflation in Canada is actually on the rise. Unfortunately, the government, and, I am sad to say, many parliamentarians do not address themselves to the real problem. It is not the amount of the minister's pension or prices in themselves. The problem is inflation—inflation and the economy. As I said earlier, the government has done nothing to see that the economy is put back on the rails so that it can produce the jobs it is capable of producing.

I saw another item in the paper which interested me and I should like to refer to it because it directs attention to the sorry state in which the Canadian government and people find themselves. The item refers to a comment made by one man to another as they waited in line to collect unemployment insurance cheques. One of them said, "It frightens me sometimes to realize that this administration, with its fiscal irresponsibility, is my sole means of support!" What a double problem it is for Canadians who probably want to work but cannot because of the policies of the government.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Or lack of them.

Mr. Clarke: We can understand it when the Prime Minister tells us he is sorry things have not been good, that he does not propose to run on his record—because it is bad—but that he will run on the hopes he has for the future. We are delighted to give the Prime Minister the chance to show us the programs contemplated by himself and his party. But here is an item from the Globe and Mail of December 14—I cut it out because it contains such a ludicrous statement to hear from the Prime Minister. He said "The government has no emergency plans to counter rising inflation and unemployment". He concedes that the rates of inflation and unemployment are rising, but he tells us that the government has no plans to change the situation. What a sad state of affairs! The economy is on a course which might well end in collapse and the government is bereft of ideas for dealing with the situation.

One might have thought that during the Christmas break members on the front benches opposite would have had a chance to restore themselves. We realize they were getting tired toward the end of the first half of that session, and the Christmas break, we thought, might have given them an opportunity to come up with some solutions to the country's economic problems. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was here in the House yesterday, the opening day of this resumed session, and I heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) ask the Prime Minister what plans the government had to reverse the economic trend. Here is what the Prime Minister had to say as reported in Hansard for yesterday:

The government believes, and the statistics support it, that the economy has been stimulated in the proper fashion by this government.

If the Prime Minister believes this—and he says he does, so we cannot doubt him—he illustrates a complete lack of knowledge of what economics is all about, because many more things could be done by the government to cut down government outlays and restore a little respect to Canadians by enabling them to find jobs.

● (1542)

The root cause of inflation in any country is government spending and over-spending which results in government deficits. Government deficits must be covered somehow. The government can cover deficits easily. All it has to do is print more money. That does not mean turning on the presses and turning out dollar bills, but it means spreading around the credit and selling a few more bonds to the Bank of Canada. The Bank of Canada does not really want the bonds; neither do investors. The government must get rid of its bonds in order to cover the deficit.

Every home owner in Canada is aware of the fact that he must balance his budget. He can borrow from the bank and a few lending institutions for a while, but he cannot continuously borrow year after year as the government does. The government suggests that, because it is the government, it cannot go bankrupt. I wish that were true. The current inflationary trends, which are not being attacked by the government, are leading Canada into the same type of collapse that any business or family would encounter if their affairs were conducted in the same way as the government conducts its affairs.

As the House is aware, I am a chartered accountant. Accounting principles can be applied to household budgets as well as to national budgets. If one continues to carry out policies which are economically bad, then he must reap the penalties later on.

Canada requires increased production. That would allow for the expansion of the economy in a normal manner. The government recognizes that there is inflation. It quotes figures based on percentage growth year over year, as well as on a much lower rate of real growth. If the government wanted to be more honest when using the term "real growth", it would tell us that this is the rate of growth after inflation is deducted—inflation it is unable or unwilling to cover.

There have been various arguments concerning the causes of inflation. Some people believe that wages cause inflation. Wages may add to the problem of inflation somewhat, but the labour people in Canada are seeking to regain what was lost through the inflation the government has allowed to occur. Because the labour unions are attempting to keep up does not mean that workers are gouging the people of this country.

The government has decided that the minimum wage in Canada will increase. It wants the lowest paid workers to receive the higher minimum amount. Of course these workers have needs, but the floor the government puts under wages has to work its way through the system. That results in higher prices for the consumer. Certainly that adds to inflation, but the point is that it was commenced by the government and not labour.

If a worker is earning $1 over the minimum wage and the minimum wage is increased by 50 cents, then he has to receive a proportionately larger amount. An increase of 25 cents in the minimum wage probably will result in an increase of 60 cents or more at the higher wage levels.

People have indicated that the government cannot control the inflation it imports. That statement is not completely true. Some of the goods Canada imports result in a greater cost to the consumer, but if Canada were more productive, then its dollar would be at a higher level than at present. If that were the case, Canadians might receive $1.08 U.S. on the Canadian dollar, which was the situation two or three years ago, instead of 90 cents today. The devalued Canadian dollar translates into a higher price of approximately 15 per cent on everything imported into Canada, which is a result of government policies. That could and should be avoided.

During the time that my party proposed a freeze some years ago, some people indicated that it would not control imported inflation. Those who said that forgot that the proposed freeze was to be implemented for a temporary period of 90 days. Any importer can control the price of his goods for that period. His orders are usually placed well in advance, and if there had been any problem, it could have been absorbed in his business.

I should like to direct a few remarks toward what can be done in order to resolve inflation. The government must have asked itself what can be done about inflation. Obviously it came up with the answer of controls, some year and a half after indicating how bad controls would be. That might be referred to as bungling or being dishonest. I would not want to say which right now. After a two-year period of application, the controls are not working. I refer to the government's "Year Two" report prepared by the Anti-Inflation Board. Under the section entitled "Fiscal Restraint", the report reads as follows:

The annual increase in federal, provincial and municipal government spending is back to 1972 levels or even lower.

As a comparison, during the first six months of 1977 the annual increase in federal expenditures was 13.7 per cent. At the same time as telling Canadians to tighten their belts and not spend so much money, the government was increasing its expenditures to the extent of 13.7 per cent. Also it might be interesting to note that the increase in municipal spending was 7.4 per cent, and for provincial spending it was 12.1 per cent for the first six months of 1977. Once again the federal government led the way in creating inflationary expenditures, while telling taxpayers to spend less.

Under the section entitled "Wages and Profits Restraint", the report indicates that at the end of Year Two of the program the consumer price index was 8.8 per cent, which was 2.8 per cent over the goal of 6 per cent. There are more current figures available since this was printed which indicate that 9.5 per cent seems to be the rate of increase for the consumer price index rather than 8.8 per cent.

The government indicates that it can overcome the effects of inflation by indexing, and now everything is indexed. Pensions, tax exemptions and so on are being indexed, which may relieve some of the hurt but does not solve the problem. Once again we find that the government is not attacking the root problem but simply applies indexing.

I already mentioned increases in minimum wages and I will not go through that again, but the end result of all these gimmicks that the government uses, such as indexing and so on, is that nobody is better off. In fact, I remember in 1974 when we were campaigning on the basis of controls, of a freeze with a selective control period following, working people would say to me, "Yes, we should have some kind of controls because my wife has had to go out to work for the first time in our marriage", or something like that. I said, "You mean that prices are increasing faster than your wages". Of course that was the problem. Costs were increasing at a faster rate than wages, and that is still true, so people are falling behind.

Now the government says, "We will put pensions up". In the case of the minister, his pension is capped at 7 per cent, so that if the government cannot force inflation below 7 per cent, he will fall behind for sure. Old age pensioners will be indexed at the rate of increase in the CPI, so they should be keeping their relative position. But I have spoken to many of them and they tell me they are not keeping their relative position; they are falling behind also.

There are many things that pensioners have to buy that are not included in the CPI which establishes the rate of increase in old age pensions. I say that it all comes back to the fact that Canada is not competitive in world markets because we have not been creating an attractive climate for industry to want to stay in Canada. That has resulted in lower export sales, resulting in trade deficits which ultimately result in the lower value of the Canadian dollar.

Why is the climate unattractive for business? I should like to refer to an article in the CA Magazine issue of November, 1977 which tells us that companies in Canada are going bankrupt at the rate of about 100 a week. The figures they gave were as of August 18. They say there were 2,602 business failures across Canada in 1977. That is bad enough, but it is also a 29 per cent increase from the previous year. The rate of losses is also higher than ever before, with unpaid debts left by the 1977 bankruptcies totalling $409 million more in the first seven and a half months than was lost in all of 1974.

We can see the inhospitable climate created by the government for business when we look at the stock market columns, which people have traditionally followed when investing their money. The problem in stock markets now is that the result of deterioration of money values has caused serious changes in the trends in stock markets. For instance, an article in the Globe and Mail last week indicates that the Toronto Stock Exchange index of 300 stocks has gone up only 10 per cent in 20 months. That would be a bad indicator for the investment community itself, but furthermore these prices are measured in dollars which have lost one-third of their value during the last decade. They say that the Canadian dollar is well on the way to losing half its 1971 buying power by 1980. How can we expect business to conduct itself in the traditional ways and to provide traditional investment shelters and so on when the government makes it so difficult for them?

Farther on the article continues:

> The circumstances have inspired the Bank Credit Analyst to revive its thesis of the past ten years, that inflation of debt along with inflation of money and prices will eventually have to be liquidated by collapse into depression. Accordingly, this service, with roots in Canada, advises extreme caution in investment policy, with an eye to defence against disaster.

That writer is not the only one who has spotted the serious problem, and the flight of investment capital and expertise from Canada is surely an example of the lack of confidence felt by many of Canada's strongest and best entrepreneurs and developers, and I do not mean only land development but also development of a healthy business climate.

What we need is a return of confidence in the Government of Canada, and of course there is good reason for not having any in the group over there. Also what we need is a caring for Canada. There are many Canadians who care very much for their country and who are hanging on here at their own peril through the economic crisis into which this government is leading us. The action of a company such as Sun Life in proposing to move from Montreal to Toronto is simply another illustration of this feeling among Canadian businessmen that if the government makes it inhospitable for them to work or live in a certain area, then—at least so far in Canada—we still have the freedom to make a move to some other hospitable climate.

I think it is a very sad thing for Canada, as it is for Quebec, that a move such as Sun Life is proposing has had to be considered, but it certainly was not the fault of the Sun Life people or of the sun Life policyholders who will make the decision ultimately as to where the company can best operate. It was the fault of the government of that province which made it so difficult for a company like Sun Life to operate. It is not only company problems that are involved, it is people problems. Sun Life is run by employees, and employees do not want to live in a place where the government has taken away so much of their liberty.

I want to refer again to the CA Magazine, the monthly publication of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in Canada, which held its annual conference in 1977 in Bermuda. You might think that strange. It does not have anything to do with inflation but rather with the fact that Bermuda was chosen as the site of a meeting because it is part of the Canadian Institute. All other provinces have been the site of conferences of the Institute of Chartered Accountants, but that was the first time the conference was held in Bermuda.

The guest speaker at that conference was the new premier, the Hon. J. David Gibbons, who is also minister of finance of Bermuda. I thought his summary of his legislative intentions was very interesting, and I would like to read the following short paragraph. He said:

In Bermuda, we take the view that it is the government's function to make legislation that provides the right climate for the private sector, consistent with the needs of society—it should protect both the individual and the environment.

I ask the House to compare that simple statement with the attitude and performance of the government opposite. It has certainly not provided the right climate for the private sector and it has tried to interfere to overcome the resulting shortcomings of the private sector to no avail. The government has not protected the individual, who is falling further and further behind as a result of its policies and, as we hear almost daily in the House, it certainly is not protecting the environment.

● (1602)

These are some things Bermuda does, and I quote the words of the premier:

The right balance between freedom and control—that's how we in Bermuda see our system of government and the country's approach to economic affairs. Essentially, the Bermuda Formula boils down to a system of free enterprise, supported by the right combination of flexible controls and a minimum of legislation.

When the premier says flexible controls, he does not mean the type of controls the government opposite imposed. There are certain other things which have to be controlled in order to preserve the mood and the nature of Bermuda. For instance, ownership of cars is rigidly controlled. When there are only a few miles of two-lane road, cars cannot be allowed to block it up. Workers in Bermuda are protected, and development and construction are carefully supervised. I am sure Canadian industry thinks it has had enough of that.

I will not go through the whole list, but one or two at the end might interest some Canadians. In Bermuda there are no advertising billboards and no car rentals. However, nowhere in the Bermuda Formula, as it is called, is there anything like the government intervention in business or in the economy we know here. Bermuda has a very simple and straightforward tax system, namely, and I quote the premier's remarks again:

There's no income tax in Bermuda, nor a profits tax, nor a capital gains tax. The bulk of our revenue comes from customs duties . . .

This suggestion has been made by me previously in this House, and some have said that it would be a retrogressive step. However, I note that the same exemptions I suggested are allowed by the government of Bermuda. Those cover basic foods like meat, fresh fruit and vegetables. It is possible to exempt the essentials of life from duties of all kinds and still achieve a certain balance. I do not think I should dwell any longer on Bermuda or other countries. We have enough problems here.

We on this side of the House are often asked what we would propose in order to solve the problems which the government seems to be unable to solve. I would like to mention a few proposals which come to my mind. I am not in any way attempting to write our program for the next election or to commit my leader or my colleagues, but some of these ideas have been talked about, and I like them.

Tax cuts would stimulate the economy. The government might say it has cut taxes, but its own advisers have said that those cuts were not enough and were not made soon enough.

As all Canadians are going to find out when they fill out their income tax forms in April, the provinces are going to take away the $2 billion tax reduction the Minister of Finance allowed, because in negotiations between the federal and provincial governments the formula was changed. I recommend that Canadians not spend the money the minister has given us because the provinces will take a good portion of it.

In British Columbia the tax rate for 1976 was 31.5 per cent. The rate for 1977 is 46 per cent, an increase of nearly 50 per cent. I do not think we can anticipate any great stimulation as a result of the gift from the Minister of Finance.

Is a massive tax cut inflationary? I have to say no. I hope I have illustrated that the speed at which the economy turns around is not what creates inflation; it is the speed at which the government spends, and overspends, taxpayers' dollars. If a massive tax cut is not inflationary, why do we not allow it? The government says that if it did, it could not balance the budget. It says that if it cuts taxes to the extent needed to get the economy going again, there will not be enough revenue to balance the budget, and there will be greater deficits. There is a response to that, and to illustrate I will cite the example of what happened in the United States. In the mid-1950s there was what was then a massive tax reduction of some $11 billion. At the end of that particular year when revenues were totalled, it was found that the whole $11 billion was recovered in increased revenues. There was no budget deficit created as a result of giving that money back to the people. If that seems like a strange equation, let me put it in a slightly different way.

At the moment 800,000 people in Canada are unemployed. Each of them is drawing an average of $6,000 out of the treasury. These people make no contribution to the federal treasury because their incomes are too small. They are taking out all the time. If we can get things going again and if the private sector is given the opportunity to provide jobs, which it can do, those unemployed Canadians will have the opportunity to become workers and taxpayers instead of remaining a drain on the economy.

I suppose we cannot eliminate unemployment altogether, but let us suppose we could cut unemployment insurance payments by $3 billion by putting people to work. The payments amount to over $4 billion, so that would be a cut of about 75 per cent. I am sure the private sector is capable of putting those people to work if there is demand. If we are talking about a tax cut of about $3 billion, we can see that there is the possibility of having things in balance again. I know this is an oversimplification, but in a debate such as this it is only possible to leave the details for another time. After all, we are talking about policy. Instead of saying that what we have done is the best we can do, we should be doing more.

I have already talked about the inflationary aspects of government spending. The government should consider cutting its expenditures. We on this side are always asked what we would cut and are accused of criticizing the government when it does, but if we could get inflation under control, the added expenditures as a result of indexing would not be necessary.

What a boon that would be! I said earlier that the problem is not indexing. The problem is inflation, and if we can get that problem licked, the problem of indexing would also be solved. The Prime Minister said he would wrestle inflation to the ground. He therefore must think that there is some hope of getting inflation under control.

I previously mentioned the unemployment insurance deficit of about $2 billion. I think it is unfair that taxpayers who are not entitled to unemployment insurance benefits should be called upon to pick up a portion of the deficit. That deficit is an inflationary expenditure which the Unemployment Insurance Commission makes every year. Many self-employed people, retired people, young people and others who are not entitled to unemployment insurance benefits have to pay their share of the deficit.

Another matter the government might examine is the cost of operating the House of Commons. It costs $80 million a year to operate this House. That is not a big price for democracy, but it works out to about $9,000 per hour. I suppose one could say we wasted $18,000 last night with our bell ringing effort.

It is the intention of the government to increase the representation in the House of Commons every ten years until the turn of the century. Many of my colleagues ask why we need a larger House of Commons. At the moment each of us represents 85,000 or 90,000 people. Other countries have much larger constituencies. In the United States, for instance, each member of Congress represents about 400,000 constituents.

Another major area that the government should get under control is Crown corporations. Is it really necessary for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to show a loss of something like $400 million or for the Post Office to lose about $600 million? I do not know of any other business which manages to spend $2 for every $1 of revenue. The government has not given sufficient consideration to these areas.

We must ask ourselves why the government has such a lackadaisical, don't care attitude toward inflation. One reason that springs to mind is that the government itself is the chief beneficiary of inflation, so why should it do anything to control it? It borrows money in year I and pays it back in year 20 with dollars only worth half what they were in year 1. It pays interest on bonds and borrowings at about 8 per cent, which is lower than the rate of inflation, so the taxpayer is already going in the hole. Then it adds that on to his other income and charges him tax on it as well. Things are very bad for the individual but they are good for the government, so it is easy to see why the government wants to continue having inflation. It has the tools at hand, it has the controls it needs to do something about inflation, but it will not because it does not see that as a popular measure.

Last week the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs visited Washington to talk to economists there. The theme with liberal economists there was just the same—and I use the small "l" liberal advisedly. They said they had reduced inflation to 6 per cent and, although they knew that is still too high and will have disastrous results in the long run, they were advising the government not to do anything about it for a few years.

In a recent speech President Carter of the United States said that he hoped to balance the budget by 1981. Nothing that the economists could propose was seen as a politically acceptable solution to inflation. They know how to solve the problem all right, but the government will not allow them to do it. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a new government in this country would show that something could be done and something would be done.

I am afraid I have gone on for a long time, Mr. Speaker, but it is important to bring some of these points up in the debate, and I hope it will be a rousing debate that follows.

To get back to Washington for a moment, after a depressing week listening to all these liberal economists saying that they did not know what to do, or were not willing to do anything about inflation, the one bright spot was provided by the former secretary of the treasury of the United States, William Simon. It is worth noting that Mr. Simon was a long-time personal and political friend of a former minister of finance in Canada, Mr. John Turner. Mr. Simon told us that he frequently came to Canada to comfort his friend who was having a very difficult time trying to talk this government out of imposing controls. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind that the former minister of finance knew that controls would not solve our problems and that he refused to implement them. It is particularly interesting to note that not three weeks after Mr. Turner's resignation the Prime Minister announced the program of controls.

I hope I have made it clear, Mr. Speaker, that the responsibility in this matter lies with the government. As I have illustrated, using the example of the Minister of Justice, the government is not using its own money when it hands out largesse. The government is a trustee of the money it takes from the people of Canada and has a duty to spend it more wisely than has been evidenced in the last ten years or more.

Inflation must be reduced. After 2½ years of controls, however, it is increasing, as the government's own figures show. Hon. members opposite seem to think there is something strange in what I am saying, but the strange thing is that nothing has been done on that side to solve this problem which is hurting all of us and bringing the country to the brink of financial collapse.

In ten years this administration has done nothing to solve the problems of inflation and unemployment, nor the over-all economic problems in the country. It is absolutely vital that some positive action be taken if we are not to face economic collapse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, what we are witnessing with this bill is another marvellous reversal in the series by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Canadians will recall that in 1974 he took off his jacket, loosened his shirt collar, slid down his tie, and campaigned in his great, vigorous, honest way against wage and price controls. What a "calamitous disaster", to use an old phrase from a different prime minister, would be inflicted upon Canada if we were to have such a system of controls. That is what he said in 1974.

In 1975 the government indicated that things were in a terrible state. Inflation was 9.5 per cent, and it said we needed a system of wage and price controls. Unemployment was 7.2 per cent. The Prime Minister said the two were connected. He said that when you have inflation running at that rate, and when it is due to price pressure generated by excessive wage increases—and, of course, we do not accept that argument—then you have unemployment. That is when he brought in wage and price controls. The bill now before us is supposed to terminate those controls over a period of time.

We now have another reversal. The controls program that has been with us since the fall of 1975 is to be dropped at precisely the time conditions are worse than when those controls were introduced—at precisely the time the statistical data for inflation and unemployment are worse than they were in the fall of 1975. This appears to be insane if you believe in the program at all.

Mr. Collenette: Are you arguing for more controls?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I heard a voice of wisdom from the back bench over there and I would be glad if the hon. member would give me a question.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, it is very good of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) to give up his time. Are he and his party arguing this afternoon that the controls program should remain? After making speeches in this House and going up and down the country speaking against the program, are they now changing their point of view and arguing for more controls?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, given the quality of that question, the hon. member will be in cabinet in two weeks. It is a gem. He asks if we are now arguing for this system of controls. Of course not. We opposed them in 1975, 1976 and 1977, and we opposed these kinds of controls in the election campaign of 1974. At least we were consistent.

• (1622)

The monumental capacity for hypocrisy of the Liberal party to attack the controls in 1974 was for cynical political reasons. It is worse now, and at a time when it is worse in terms of unemployment and inflation they lift the controls. If you believe in a program—that is the point I was trying to make—particularly for Liberal members of this House, if they believe in the set of controls that we now have, why in God's name take them off now? The rate of inflation, Mr. Speaker, for the last three months has been 11.2 per cent.

An hon. Member: Shame!

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Broadbent: That is the statistical trend. The figure we got recently was 9.5 per cent year over year. What is important in economics is not a one month figure but a three month trend, and the three month trend is 11.2 per cent. I say to the Liberals, and I say particularly to the female member of the cabinet who is opposite and who is supporting the system of controls—she comes from the province of British Columbia which has concerns about inflation—how can anyone support a policy that was justified at a time when inflation was 10.9 per cent, and now say let's take it off when inflation is running at 11.2 per cent? Only the intellectual culpability of a Liberal can accept that. It just boggles the mind.

The argument made in 1975 was that unemployment which was 7.2 per cent then, was in part generated by the kind of inflation we were experiencing. Unemployment now, as everyone knows except the government, is 8.5 per cent, so it is up too. If they really believe inflation is causing unemployment, and they really believe their controls program matters a damn in terms of efficacy, they should leave it in effect and not take it off.

But of course, Mr. Speaker, every Canadian knows that with the kind of controls program we had, it had no effect on inflation at all, except there has been an impact on one part of the Canadian community. That, of course, is the impact on the wage and salary earner. The program has been reasonably effective in holding down incomes of working Canadians. It has not affected prices. Let me just give you some examples. I gave you the running rate of inflation at 11.2 per cent which means we are back at double digit inflation in Canada. What about some concrete examples? The reality is that where the government could have been effective in controlling prices, they haven't done anything. Not a thing. I will give you some prices that, if the government had been interested, could have produced a real effect on the cost of living in terms of their impact on Canadians.

Consider food prices first of all. I will concede the argument that food prices, which have been a major source of price increases in Canada, have not been subject to any realistic wage controls by a national government when those foods are imported from abroad. I will concede that. One of the reasons for opposing this particular set of controls was that you could not control imported prices. If I remember correctly, the Prime Minister said back in the campaign of 1974 that you could not control import prices. We agree with that. There are other sectors, Mr. Speaker. And I want to stress, in all seriousness that if the government had been concerned about inflation, if it is concerned about inflation now, it could move and it could do something.

With respect to house prices they are up 9 per cent year over year. My party has said "move decisively on mortgages" because if you control mortgage prices you can hold mortgages down. It does not just affect the would-be home owner, it affects the men and women who rent their accommodation, because they pay the cost of mortgages indirectly through their rent levels.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Aren't those controls?

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, indeed, we favour some kinds of controls.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Let's put it on the record.

Mr. Broadbent: I say to the hon. member that it is this set of controls we oppose. The Liberals nod sagely. Let me say—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has the floor for the purpose of making a speech, and I suggest we listen to him.

Mr. Broadbent: Let me state it as clearly and as succinctly, and I must emphasize, as simply as possible so the Liberals will understand it, that the New Democratic Party does indeed believe in some kinds of control program in certain sectors. In any advanced economy anywhere in the world controls have been in effect. If they knew what they were doing, a selection could be made of certain sectors of the economy and then it makes sense to interfere with the market place. What we have objected to is this abysmal set of controls which the Liberals have inflicted on the people of Canada with the only result being that of holding wages and salaries down while letting prices go up. That is what we oppose.

House prices, as I indicated, are up year over year by some 9 per cent. On a $50,000 house, which is not out of line unfortunately for a typical family buying in most urban parts of Canada, that means year over year an increase of around $4,500 in price. We have calculated that because of this government's attitude on mortgages, not moving in and holding them down, with the cumulative impact over the life of the typical mortgage with that kind of a price increase would be $12,000. A family would have to pay this amount in additional cost just as a result of the year over year increase in the price of a house. So mortgages are one sector, I repeat, not just for the home owner but for the renters, where the government could have moved in with the Bank Act and forced the banks to bring down mortgages, making changes in the regulations to ensure that the banks put up money at a low level in mortgages.

Another area of cost that affects most families in Canada is that of the energy prices. What has the Government of Canada done about that? It has allowed the oil industry, the multinationals, to charge Canadians world prices for our own oil resources. What has this meant? For example it meant that they put up by $1 a barrel the price of oil last July, with another $1 a barrel on January 1, this year. Its accumulated impact on ordinary Canadian families, we have calculated in terms of cost. The increase in cost to drive cars and heat homes has been $150 a year. That cost could have been controlled and held down. Instead of permitting oil companies to cash in on decisions that were made a few years ago in the Middle East by the oil producing cartel, instead of permitting that cartel to have its hands stretched across our border and charge Canadians these prices, we could have held down oil prices and reduced the cost of living for Canadians.

Another practical matter and an area within federal jurisdiction, and where the government could have moved in on, is that of car prices. Most Canadians buy cars. Most families have them. We have an agreement with the United States that is supposed to ensure price parity between the two countries. Instead we get constant escalation of Canadian prices that are out of line with the goal of price parity. The government should have told the automotive companies that there could be no price increase this year until the prices are in line with the United States for the same products. Instead, the major manufacturers just announced they will increase their prices by 3 per cent. This will mean a $150 price increase for a typical car. Most Canadians buy their cars on time over a three-year period, paying 12 per cent or 18 per cent interest. This will increase the interest charges they will have to pay.

• (1632)

If the government were committed to selective action, there are a number of areas like that where it could have some real impact on prices. I refer to energy, housing, car prices, and there are others. I do not want to belabour the point this afternoon.

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Broadbent: A Liberal member says "good". There is always a capacity for massive indigestion whenever one feeds a Liberal the truth.

I will not string out the list of particular categories of price areas that affect a typical family that could have been acted upon on a selective basis by a government committed to dealing with inflation. However, we did not have that. We had this bogus controls program which, as I said, simply ensured the restriction and inhibition of wage and salary increases for ordinary Canadians.

I will not take quite as much time as the second speaker on this bill. I would like to indicate in my comments the general direction that the New Democratic Party believes is required in dealing with an economy such as ours at this time. Although I will be brief this afternoon, this is an illustration in short form of a general policy that has been developed and enunciated in the past.

First, we believe the Government of Canada ought to recognize at long last what has been accepted by governments as different as those of Japan, France, Sweden and West Germany. Two of those countries have social democratic governments, two do not. What they all have in common is a commitment to national economic planning. Entailed in that is a sophisticated approach to developing certain industrial sectors to ensure employment. It is no accident that all of those countries I have just mentioned have unemployment rates that are not even half the unemployment level in Canada. I am saying this in the context of dealing with inflation as well.

Those countries take sophisticated counter-cyclical policies over a period of time, not to remove entirely but to try to level out the cyclical nature of market economies so that the impact of inflation is minimized. That requires a commitment to national economic planning. It requires a commitment by our national government to recognize that in terms of world competition, in times of economic forces on the global scale, our national government should play a leading role in managing the economy. That we have not had.

Second, and in relation to that, there is the very important connection between production and inflation. It is not a simple direct connection, but there is some connection. When you have a million people who are unemployed and a manufacturing sector operating at only 82 per cent capacity, your economy is not producing the goods and services which, if it were producing, would have an effect on driving down prices.

There is a connection between unemployment levels and inflation. If you had a sensibly planned economy, one that ensured investment was going into the right sectors, and you had something approaching full employment, that would have an impact on driving down prices in certain key sectors. Again, we do not have that. Instead, we have a million unemployed, the worst level since the great depression.

Third, and I gave some examples of this earlier, in our country we need a system of direct controls in certain sectors in terms of prices, either because the prices are subject to oligopolistic action by a few firms in the economy and require direct government intervention to protect the consumer, or because we believe in society the particular price of a certain commodity for its own sake ought to be controlled and held down. In the latter case, I think of something like mortgages.

If you believe that housing is a social right, as my party does, through community or government action you have to take the kind of steps we took years ago with medicare and hospitalization to make that effectively a social right. That means dealing with the banks in a tough minded way to bring down, for example, the price of mortgages. The point I make is that you need effective price control in a certain specific number of sectors. We have not had that with this government.

As a concrete measure to improve circumstances for Canadian consumers, we have recommended, on behalf of my party as recently as last week in Toronto, a reduction in the sales tax, which is regressive. It hits the poor person, whether a pensioner, an elderly person living in Cape Breton, or his or her equivalent living in British Columbia. Sales tax hits the pensioner and the millionaire. It is very regressive.

In terms of dealing with the impact of rising costs and in terms of job creation, we have recommended a reduction in sales tax. Related to that, there should be serious negotiation between the federal government and the provinces so that the federal government can compensate the provinces in some way for the lost revenue they would experience in a reduction in the sales tax.

I want to stress that reducing the sales tax is a most equitable kind of proposal because it would bring proportionately greater benefits to low income people. That is something under the present circumstances which the government should act upon, perhaps even as an interim measure.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Finally, I want to propose on behalf of my party that we have to recognize the divergent needs and interests of the Canadian economy. We have to recognize that Canadians are prepared, and indeed want to work hard. They will be co-operative in terms of wage and salary demands if the government will set an example. By that I mean a real example in terms of bringing forward a coherent government policy, something which in other countries has been called a social compact. I cannot stress too much the relevance of that.

In Sweden, West Germany, and more recently in Great Britain, the governments of those countries know they can get wage and salary co-operation from ordinary men and women. If in certain sectors jobs are threatened and wage and salary increases are out of line, ordinary Canadians can perceive that well in advance. However, you cannot expect ordinary Canadians to co-operate with regard to wage and salary demands if you maintain simultaneously an unfair tax system that ensures great disparities in Canada. The same is true if you maintain simultaneously a housing program which ensures that the bottom 20 per cent of Canadians is inadequately housed or if you do not do anything about energy prices.

The point I am making is that in a mixed economy the kind of controls we have had are not the sensible kind. They are unfair and unworkable. We are seeing the results of that. They need to have a comprehensive approach. I do not care about the label. In Great Britain they call it the social compact approach. They have been doing it in other countries for some time without the label. What is important is the idea. The idea behind it is a sense of fairness to everyone.

What is so fundamentally wrong with the present set of controls? The present set of controls holds down wage and salary increases while permitting prices to go up. We cannot tolerate that kind of system any longer.

Let me illustrate by one final example the abysmal consequences of the kind of unfair thinking which lies behind this sort of controls program. The government is in the process of phasing out the controls program entirely. The major change it introduces, not in this bill but by regulation, is that it is going to permit wage and salary increases to go up in the coming year by some 6 per cent. What does this mean in terms of its impact on ordinary Canadians? It means this: if inflation is running at 11.2 per cent, as it is, and if wage and salary increases are to be restricted to 6 per cent, Canadians from coast to coast will suffer a net loss in real income. Let me give an example.

Let us assume the rate of inflation is 10 per cent. A man or woman earning $15,000 and getting the 6 per cent increase would suffer a decline in real income in 1978 amounting to $12 a week. But there is no guarantee a 6 per cent increase will be forthcoming, and in its absence the decline in real income in 1978 would be $30 a week. That will be the result of the government's program. Wage and salary earners are being left without any defence.

The government is saying to men and women, bank clerks, department store salesmen, unorganized workers in Atlantic Canada, "All you can get is 6 per cent, but inflation will continue unchecked." It is this kind of control program which the New Democratic Party will not tolerate. It is time it was brought to an abrupt end. It is time we put in its place a program which showed a commitment to national economic leadership, a program which would set out goals for employment and realistic targets in terms of reducing the rate at which prices rise.

In the months ahead, in a year in which we all expect an election, I, along with other members of my party, will be producing detailed proposals which we believe will not only bring a greater degree of efficiency to the Canadian economy but a much greater degree of justice, also.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to make my contribution to the debate on Bill C-18. The Anti-Inflation Board is one of the main contributors to our economic problems, including the record number of the unemployed; it is one of the main reasons for the flight of business and investment capital from Canada to the United States, and one of the reasons Canada is no longer an attractive place in which to invest money.

It is no use trying to delude ourselves. Investment capital and business growth are the two most important things a country needs if it is to prosper, and until we can change the political climate the mass exodus of capital and business will continue. Not only has the AIB caused serious problems throughout its existence, but we are running into new problems as an attempt is made to remove existing controls. I refer to one report out of Quebec city where labour ministers are meeting to discuss this aspect of the matter. It states:

> No consensus on the federal government's proposed monitoring agency to replace wage and price controls emerged Monday in the first day of a federal-provincial conference of labour ministers.
> Four of the ten provincial ministers available for interviews were unanimous in saying they did not see any evidence at the meeting of the consensus federal Labour Minister John Munro had sought.

So it is clear there are difficult times ahead because the provincial labour ministers are not satisfied with the government's program.

I referred earlier to the number of businesses and the volume of investment capital leaving Canada out of discontent with the poor political climate created by the present administration in Ottawa, a situation aggravated by the policies of the Lévesque government in Quebec. We have Lévesque driving business out of Quebec on one hand, and the Liberal government in Ottawa driving business out of Canada on the other. That is a great combination, a great prospect for the reunification of this country.

It is estimated there are now 140 Canadian manufacturing or distribution firms with outlets in the State of New York. In 1976, 44 companies either moved to New York or expanded existing facilities there. Of these 25 came from Ontario and 18 from Quebec, bringing with them $28.6 million in investment and creating 1,330 new jobs in the United States.

Northeastern states, with the support of the U.S. government, are taking full advantage of the uncertainty felt by Canadian businessmen and investors who no longer have faith in the prospects available to them in Canada under the policies of the present government, and are openly assisting them in the move to the U.S. American towns and cities along the Canadian border are blitzing Ontario, Quebec, and British Columbia with promotional campaigns aimed at luring Canadians across the line.

The mass exodus of business and capital is greatly aggravating Canadian unemployment. I have raised this issue many times with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), but they have no plan whatever designed to keep investors in this country. At the present time more than 400,000 students are graduating yearly from schools and universities in Canada and only 225,000 new jobs are being created. Unemployment is already costing Canadians more than $8 billion a year, and in the absence of any suitable programs on the part of the government the figure is likely to increase still further. In circumstances such as these the government has sought to rely on short term mini-works projects which have proved ineffective.

We in this party have for some time been calling for tax reductions. A small tax deduction will, it is true, be provided for this month, but it is by no means the total answer, and I hope the new tax incentive bill which the Minister of Finance has introduced will make venture capital more easily available to small and medium-sized businesses so that secondary industries, in particular, will be able to expand. At the present time there is no encouragement for Canadian investors to put money into secondary industries in this country. I hope the minister has this point well covered in the bill he has just introduced.

I should like at this point to offer the House further evidence of the lack of confidence in this country felt by investors. Olympia and York Developments Limited of Toronto laid out $350 million a few weeks ago to buy nine skyscrapers in New York city, becoming overnight the largest Canadian investors in American real estate. In 1976 Canadians invested $5.9 billion in U.S. companies, an increase of $500 million over the previous year. In fact Canadians are the largest investors in the United States today, accounting for 10 per cent of all foreign direct investment activity in that country. All this is very discouraging.

Just about every magazine one picks up contains an article on this very serious situation. One such article appeared in Forbes which was entitled: "Foreign Investment In The U.S.—It Grows . . . But Slowly". It is growing slowly and steadily with Canadian investment dollars. Last year $2.5 billion in real estate investment money went to the United States.

• (1652)

Canadian investors now own 30 per cent of the major high rise apartments in the city of Seattle, Washington. Also 17 major complexes in the United States are being developed with Canadian money. Investors have no faith in Canada or its government, and thus they are getting out. The net outflow of capital has been growing in recent years. In 1976, even though foreign economies were plagued by stagnation, Canadians invested $555 million abroad. For the first time in at least 25 years, 1976 was the first year in which foreigners actually reduced the value of their holdings in Canada by $395 million, because Canada is no longer an attractive place to invest money. Figures for the first quarter of 1977 show that the net outflow is continuing: $35 million in the first quarter, at an annual rate of $140 million.

Some Canadian investment counsellors are concerned about this irreversible trend. One such firm is Peter Henry Jerch & Associates of Winnipeg, Manitoba. That firm points out that this mass exodus of investment capital and business leaving Canada has been going on for the last few years. Mr. P. H. Jerch in a document prepared by his firm points out the following:

> Countries or for that matter provinces which have nationalistic, leftist or extremely strong bureaucratic tendencies make striving and successful entrepreneurs feel uncomfortable.

Certainly they feel uncomfortable in Canada. Mr. Jerch gave examples of 64 Canadian businesses which are planning to move to the United States or to expand there. He gives statistical information on the job loss caused by this investment money leaving Canada. Because of these Canadian firms planning to expand into the United States, there will be a loss of up to 17,000 jobs in Canada. Also he gives a perfect example of the political climate caused by socialistic governments similar to the one Manitoba previously had.

The effects of the New Democratic Party being in power for eight years were devastating to Manitoba. As an example, Mr. Jerch pointed out where $40 million of investment money was driven out of that province by the Schreyer government. Investors do not trust socialist governments. They will not make long term investments in provinces or countries where there are socialist governments. Also Mr. Jerch pointed out that this mass exodus of money from Manitoba resulted in the loss of 4,000 jobs. This trend has been slowed down somewhat by the change of government in Manitoba.

Another example which could be used is the province of Saskatchewan with Premier Blakeney nationalizing the potash industry. That put the fear of death into the minds of business investors across the United States. Also there is the Barrett government which caused serious economic problems in the province of British Columbia. An NDP government does not attract investment or business, for which there is no substitute.

I should like to comment on wage behaviour before, during, and after controls. Before controls 77 per cent of employees under AIB jurisdiction were achieving wage settlements above what the wage guidelines would have been if controls were in force. During the first year of controls, 41 per cent of employees attempted to achieve wage increases above the wage guideline. During the second year of controls only 30 per cent of employees attempted to achieve settlements above the wage guideline. Because the third year guideline was altered to a flat 6 per cent on October 20, the relationship between wage gains attempted and allowed is not clear. Even those wage settlements found to be excessive by AIB attempted to overshoot the wage guidelines by a smaller margin. Before controls, average wage settlements were 15.6 per cent, where 10.9 per cent was justified under the hypothetical guidelines—a 4.7 percentage point in the first year of controls and to 0.2 in the second.

While it is clear that the AIB had some considerable effect on wage settlements, it is not clear that the AIB was the sole or even the principal determinant of wage settlements. The over-all state of the economy had a very significant influence on wage demands, as many unions and workers realized that high wage gains could lead to a loss of jobs due to a corporation's growing inability to compete on domestic and world markets.

The behaviour of Canadian average industrial wages compared to those in the United States is instructive in this respect. Without controls the United States has reduced inflation sharply. Its correction took place at a high cost in unemployment, but United States unemployment rates have been below Canadian rates for ten months, and they have experienced lower inflation since early 1975.

I should like to refer to the percentage increase in manufacturing hourly earnings as between the United States and Canada. In 1976 the increase for Canada was 13.6 per cent, whereas the increase for the United States was 7.7 per cent. In 1977 the increase for Canada was 10.5 per cent, whereas the increase for the United States was 8.6 per cent. If economic conditions have the bearing on wage rates that is suggested, then pressures for large wage adjustments following decontrol will be limited by workers' fears of losing their jobs.

Should economic restraint fail to limit wage gains, it is the Conservative party policy that for the six-month to 12-month period following decontrol, unions negotiating with the top 200 corporations will be required to submit wage settlements to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs 30 days before a contract can take effect. If found to be excessive, and where publicity and suasion fail, the then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs may refer the increase to cabinet. As a last resort measure, cabinet could roll back the wage.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington)—Transport—Date when harbour patrol boat will be provided for Vancouver; the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—The Canadian Economy—Reason for continuing high level of inflation—Date when level will reach four per cent; the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier)—Administration of Justice—Request for amendment to permit use of French in Ontario courts.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, and notices of motions.

I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that the notations "allowed to stand at the request of the government" which appeared on the order paper at the time we adjourned for Christmas have been removed from the various orders under public bills as listed on today's order paper. This was an administrative decision taken by me. It arose out of my ruling of December 5, 1977, and the decision I made in the House on December 12, 1977, which had the effect of removing similar notations under notices of motions. Actually all that did was to eliminate any notation that had been made under a motion or a notice of motion for a private member's public bill, so that my ruling of December 5 will not be retroactive and the only note that would appear from now on with regard to notices of motions for public bills would be those that would result from the proceedings in the private members' hour following my decision of December 5.

● (1702)

There seems to be a disposition to proceed with Bill C-215 appearing in the name of the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner). If there is unanimous consent, orders Nos. 2, 4, 8, 9, 10 and 13 will be stood. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ISSUANCE OF CHEQUES

Mr. J. Larry Condon (for Mr. Turner (London East)) moved that Bill C-215, to amend the Criminal Code (NSF cheques) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-215 where a cheque has been returned "NSF", is to delay the raising of a presumption of false pretences until 15 days after notification by the bank, and to allow the person who made the cheque to avoid criminal liability by paying off the debt within the period of grace.

First of all, I should like to bring to the attention of the House the fact that this bill was put forward by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner), but because the rules of the House do not permit occupants of the chair to speak on their bills, I shall do so for the hon. member. When the time comes to discuss changes in the rules of the House, this is one change which I believe should be considered because our rules take away a very important function from members. I believe that all members should be allowed to speak on any bill they put forward.

As I said, the purpose of this bill is to try to improve the law so as to protect better, first, small businessmen; second, landlords; and third, people who suffer most from NSF cheques. In the past the recipients of NSF cheques have had no other recourse but to go to the small claims court or to go through the process of the criminal law to receive the money which they have lost.

There are a good many reasons for which people write bad cheques. In some cases it is an honest error on the part of the drawer of the cheque, as he is called by banks, and in most cases he will redeem the worthless cheque promptly after being notified that his cheque was dishonoured. In such cases payment, or even an arrangement to pay, is sufficient evidence to indicate that the cheque drawer did not commit fraud as would otherwise appear.

As has become evident in the last nine or ten years, those who have suffered most from NSF cheques have been small businessmen who, on seeing a person with the intention of paying a bill, took the word of the man as indicated on a piece of paper which designates to the person receiving it that money will be available when the cheque is put through the normal banking processes. One of the problems is that some people who make out such cheques have no intention of honouring them. Certainly the law has not been sufficiently strong to protect the recipients of such cheques, and this has caused many problems.

Let us take a look at the Ontario Landlords and Tenants Act. For example, a person who intends to rent an apartment pays the rent in advance by cheque. Three or four months later when the landlord tells him the cheque has bounced, the person says that he intended to honour the cheque but that since now it is October or November, the landlord cannot kick him out anyway. This puts the landlord in a very difficult position because he forfeits four or five months at a time of year when it is difficult to rent the apartment. It puts him in the position of having to house the tenant for free. In such circumstances the landlord cannot enforce the law under which he owns that property and for which he expects money.

Another problem we find is when a person purchases some goods. In the past the government has made an attempt to assist small businessmen and to give them an opportunity to develop their businesses, but the latter have been restricted by the law under which it is possible for people to pay for their purchases by cheque. The small businessman depends on the local person to walk in, pay cash for the goods and thus make money move around so that the businessman can buy more goods and increase his assets. It is not only businessmen who have suffered over the years. People who do not understand the law have also been the victims.

I should like to read into the record a letter written to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), a copy of which was sent to the hon. member for London East. It is a very sad story of a person who was given poor advice and who then suffered a calamity. It reads as follows:

I'm writing to you begging for help. I should explain what has happened to me and my family. I am 37 years old and have been working since I was 16 with my present employer, not for very much money but it has been steady work, saving everything that I could for me, my wife and two children. Recently I was misled by a real estate salesman to invest in second mortgages. I took all of our savings and did so. The total amount was $20,000. After five months the postdated cheques went NSF—

● (1712)

I assume this refers to the person making payments on the second mortgage.

—all of them on four properties, so the first mortgage holder foreclosed on the properties, and that left me helpless because I had no money to carry them on. Since this has happened I have not been able to sleep for a month. I'm on the verge of losing my job because my nerves have been so bad that my hands can't stop shaking since this has happened. I would appreciate if you can help me before I go out of my mind. I don't know anybody else that I can turn to. That is why I'm going to the top. Forgive me for the poor English as I came to Canada when I was twelve and had not gone to school in Italy and had only four years of school here in Canada. I hope you can help us, as I have not felt so low in life before.

Thank you. Hope to hear from you—

This is a typical example of what is happening. This gentleman has a family; he has worked very hard, saved $20,000, and finally felt he could be self-sufficient. He put his money into second mortgages so that he could raise his family and give his children the education he never had. This happened because of poor advice and because of the law we have now which does not protect people with little education. It is not just businessmen and landlords who suffer; the little fellow suffers as well.

How do you answer a letter like that? Some of my colleagues who are in the legal profession might say this gentleman could have purchased the properties, got more money and taken over the mortgage. That would be very simple for some people who are educated, but this gentleman lost all his money and possibly will lose his job because of his nervous problems and his worry. His money has been stolen, and he has no recourse. This is just one of the reasons why this bill in the name of the hon. member for London East should be passed.

I admit that I am not a lawyer, but I think we have a moral as well as a legal obligation to protect people like this gentleman. We talk about taking care of people of all kinds, but I think we have forgotten the people who count the most, the hard workers who lose their money because of this quirk in the law. They lose their money because of a lack of knowledge and because they do not do things which perhaps others with a knowledge of the law would do.

[Mr. Condon.]

Our criminal law provides no satisfaction for the merchant, the landlord, or for ladies and gentlemen like the gentleman to whom I referred. The law does not provide for repayment, nor does it deter others from committing this kind of crime. Offenders walk down the street laughing. They say, "If I can get away with it, why not?" French law treats this as an offence. The severity of punishment depends on the amount of money involved. The fraud is considered serious if the NSF cheque is between $200 and $700. The penalty is from one to five years. Some in this country may think that is harsh, but I wonder if one to five years is too harsh in the case I have cited involving $20,000. The victim in this case, as well as his family, suffered frustration.

For the sake of the consumer in the market place and every merchant with whom he deals, I strongly suggest that there is a need for a simple and effective law which would identify and eliminate cheque counterfeiters and bring about prosecution by the Crown without requiring the merchant, the landlord, or the little fellow to weigh the cost and the benefit of trying to collect payments on account of bad cheques. In my view the proposed bill would provide such a law, and I heartily support it.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to speak in support of Bill C-215, sponsored by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner). This bill would do something concrete to combat the ever-increasing number of NSF cheques, the elasticity of which is also increasing and stretching from one end of Canada to the other.

At present the Criminal Code of Canada states that if a person obtains any merchandise by means of a cheque dishonoured for insufficient funds, a false pretence will be assumed unless the court is satisfied by evidence that such cheque would be honoured if it were presented for payment within a reasonable time after it was issued. There is no doubt in my mind that the issuing of a cheque without funds in a bank account to back it up is nothing but the perpetration of fraud by the cheque issuer. This should no longer be tolerated. It is a well known and established fact that 90 per cent of the people who knowingly write cheques against bank accounts with insufficient funds have no intention of ever paying.

Too many people do not realize that the ability to pay by cheque is not only a shopping convenience but a customer privilege as well. It is certainly not a divine right.

Too few cheque writers understand that until such time as a cheque clears the bank it is merely a promise to pay and represents the granting of credit. Occasionally an accounting error on the part of a cheque writer may cause an overdrawing of his finances. Honest mistakes are promptly rectified, and honest mistakes occur in the vast majority of cases.

Writing an NSF cheque in Canada is not in itself a criminal offence unless it can be proved it was intended in the first place to be NSF. Proving this can be very difficult.

Bill C-215 would provide a mechanism by which to put some teeth into the law and to prevent the misuse of cheques. Cheques should be a satisfactory way of making payments.

The only alternative would be to stop accepting cheques altogether. I think all of us would hate to see that happen because of the hardship that would result. The provisions of Bill C-215 would give the writer of an NSF cheque 30 days to satisfy the debt after notification by the business concerned. If the cheque is not covered in the bank by that time, the purchase involved would be presumed to have been obtained by false pretences, and court procedures would be the next course of action.

This bill would go a long way toward deterring individuals who have habitually passed bad cheques. This bill would help all businessmen who have frequently been stung by fraudulent and unscrupulous individuals. I urge hon. members to support this bill so that it can become law as quickly as possible.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) should be commended for bringing this matter forward in the form of Bill C-215, and the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon) should be congratulated for setting out the problem in a very precise and persuasive way.

● (1722)

There are certain dangers in Bill C-215 which I should like to discuss, Mr. Speaker. Before doing so, I should say that I think this bill may be of sufficient importance to have the subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs where expert witnesses could be called. Businessmen, bankers, and law enforcement officers, for instance, could focus on the problem and make recommendations.

The bill gives a 15-day grace period after the bank has notified the person who issued the cheque that there are not sufficient moneys in the account to cover it. If the amount set forth in the cheque is not paid, then the presumption of false pretences applies and if it cannot be proven that the person who issued the cheque did so without any intention to deceive the payee, there would be the possibility of imprisonment.

When I heard the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton, who introduced the bill on behalf of its sponsor, say that in the case where someone was duped out of $20,000 on a mortgage he recommended imprisonment for one to five years, I thought that illustrated the importance of this discussion.

It would be trite to say that we live in a credit society rather than a cash society, Mr. Speaker. Our parents would never buy anything unless they had the cash to pay for it, but we are a different generation. I notice that my children lean to credit buying. In a credit society with the tremendous advertising pressures that there are, many people buy things they cannot pay for and sometimes issue cheques hoping that by the time they are presented to the bank they will have had a chance to deposit the money to meet them. In many cases this does not happen.

I think businessmen and bankers have a responsibility to tone down advertising aimed at young people today. We hear of things like "the red convertible loan." Young people borrow money, buy the red convertible, and then find they cannot pay for it. There is constant radio and television pressure on young people to buy, without impressing upon them their responsibility to pay. I think there is an onus on businessmen and bankers to ensure that young people are not pressured into over-buying.

This bill puts the onus on bankers to notify anyone who issues an NSF cheque that, if it is not covered within 15 days of the notification, there will be a presumption of false pretences. Again, it is trite to say that most businesses include in the cost price of an article the cost to them of loss through theft and loss suffered as a result of bad cheques. Of course 95 per cent of people in the community pay for those two cost factors.

As it stands, Bill C-15 would impose a tremendous workload on the courts with charges of false pretences as a result of NSF cheques. The present trend is to unclog the courts and not bring to them matters which are of a personal nature—squabbles between neighbours and so on. There is an attempt to refer such matters to places other than the courts so that they can devote their time to cases where violence has been committed against the person rather than assault on the pocketbook.

I could have said shed tears over the example given by the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton about the uneducated immigrant who invested his life savings of $20,000 in a mortgage and then, when the mortgagor did not pay, lost his money. It would have been interesting if the hon. member had read the reply given to that person by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Sometimes greed brings about loss, Mr. Speaker. This uneducated immigrant put his whole life savings of $20,000 into a second mortgage without any appreciation of what happens upon default, and without any appreciation of his responsibility for taking up the payments on the first mortgage and so on. It seems to me there is a moral obligation upon the lawyers who write these mortgages, upon real estate agents, and upon the community in general, to tell people who want to invest in mortgages, especially second mortgages, that they must be very careful not to invest their whole life savings, as they face possible loss.

When it comes to housing there should be a moral obligation on all of us to provide decent housing for Canadians at reasonable cost. We should take the profit out of housing. There is no reason why that immigrant should put his $20,000 into a second mortgage at a very high interest rate to be paid by the owner of the house. He should have directed his money into Canada Savings Bonds, or even into a bank, for lesser interest and greater security. In the final analysis, greed overcame caution.

Legal history shows that a hundred years ago we still had debtors' prisons. People who could not pay their debts were put in prison and then, of course, they could not pay their debts at all. We wisely got rid of debtors' prisons and gave people an opportunity to pay. Thank goodness we did get rid of them because they imposed an impossible burden on the debtor.

Imagine the result if the recommendation of the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton were accepted and a sentence of one to five years' imprisonment was imposed upon anyone who failed to pay debt. The Canadian people would ultimately pay the $15,000 to $18,000 per year it costs to keep that person in prison, not taking into account the moneys that would have to be paid to maintain any dependants. That does not seem to be a very good solution.

● (1732)

The solution, and it is a difficult one, is to impose upon people the responsibility to live within their means. That is not an easy task to perform and this is why, for people who experience difficulty, you have to have budget counselling which sets forth a proper budget which enables them to live within their means.

I would hope that we could refer the subject matter of this bill to the committee on justice and legal affairs and go into depth with regard to what should be done with persons who pass on NSF cheques. Certainly it hurts many people, small businessmen, landlords and so forth. It creates quite a clog on the banking system, on the criminal law system and on the law enforcement system. So I give the member for London East credit for bringing forth this matter at this time, but I respectfully suggest, Mr. Speaker, that his solution is not a good one. It does not take care of the total problem. I think we have to have the experts give us their recommendations based on their experience with regard to what should happen to a person who passes on an NSF cheque. Should that person be imprisoned? At this time I would say no. Should that person be forced to take budget counselling and eventually repay the amount of the cheque?

I think that if we were put to the ultimate test, the New Democratic Party would have to vote against the bill as it is presently constituted. But I would hope that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Young) will get to his feet and in his own persuasive and eloquent way say: "Well, the New Democratic Party has brought forth the idea that this subject matter should be referred to the committee, that we should have advice from experts and should get a report." Based on that report it may be that there should be changes to the Criminal Code affecting this situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to discuss Bill C-215 introduced by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner). I would like to congratulate the hon. member for having introduced this bill dealing with NSF cheques. I would only mention an idea I had while listening to the hon. member who explained the bill, the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon).

The hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton said that people who are responsible for or who write NSF cheques should be imprisoned, that we should have a bill providing that we can imprison such a person as soon as we are certain that he is acting in bad faith by passing NSF cheques. I for one, Mr. Speaker, would like to know which one should be imprisoned. Is it the one who writes such cheques because he is caught in the system or is it the system which drives him to do that by encouraging him to buy too much? Here is what happens. I have been in business for some 20-odd years and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Condon: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to clarify one point that seems to have been brought up twice. The assumption was that if somebody passed a bad cheque he would be put in jail. I was pointing out that in France, if a bad cheque is written and the person writing the bad cheque is guilty of an offence, the term is from one to five years in jail. I must have been misunderstood if it is suggested that I would throw a person in jail for this offence. It was the law of France I was referring to.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: I thank the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton for his explanation but I must say that they have a different system in France. The system in France does not relate to consumption as much as ours does here in Canada. In France they do not send credit cards right and left to heads of family, whether they are solvent or not, and then allow sons and daughters and wives to go and buy at Eaton's, Simpsons and so on with the head of family having $450, $500, $600 of bills to pay. In France they have a different system. But to explain Bill C-215 one must start with our system and not take the example of France where they have a different system.

I think small businessmen in Canada are certainly threatened by NSF cheques from their clients. I agree with what the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton suggested earlier, but they are the ones who suffer the most but, on the other hand, you also remember that the small businessman often has a certain margin of credit. He too belongs to the group of people writing NSF cheques because the bank, without warning him or warning him at the last minute, cuts off his margin of credit. He has post-dated cheques for a month, two months, three months, up to 12 months to pay for a house, a car, this and that but the bank tells him: You have a client who has been refused a cheque in your name so we can no longer maintain your margin of credit.

Take an example of $5,000 or $10,000. His margin of credit is cut by 50 per cent. He too becomes a victim of the system in which we are stuck. And I say that the main culprit is the bank which did create its own problems, first by issuing credit cards to nearly everyone, second by overlapping every which way the credit of its clients or those of other branches, third by lending money it never did receive. I think banks lend money on the stroke of the pen, then revalorized that money by giving it a certain value which is purely fictitious in my mind because a chartered bank only has to deposit a fractional reserve of 16 per cent with the Bank of Canada, and as soon as it has a 16 per cent reserve with the Bank of Canada, it can then lend a client 100 per cent.

Although it is allowed to lend 100 per cent with a profit of 84 per cent on the original amount, it is not in fact a profit of 84 per cent on the amount itself but an interest profit on the 84 per cent which it never had in its coffers in the first place. But nevertheless, to revalorize the money before its customers, it says: Sir, your line of credit has been cut down to so much. So the small businessman who is so unhappy, as the hon. member put it earlier, is more or less stuck because of the action of the bank.

But I would like to return to the point made earlier by the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton that the bill should provide for the imprisonment of recedivists. If such a person comes back with NSF cheques drawn against the same bank he should be sentenced to jail. But what about cheques issued last year to a Canadian milk producer? That cheque was for $3,000 or $3,500 because that milk producer had exceeded his quota and he had $214 or $241 left on his cheque. That person has some obligations with his bank and his creditors. Cheques were returned NSF because there were no funds although he had produced.

I would like to point out to the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton that we should ... I agree with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) in saying that this Bill C-215 should certainly be allowed to go through the various stages but that one should start by finding out where the evil lies, not in the mind of the hon. member, but in the initial thinking of those who care for the well-being of our economy. As to NSF cheques I think they are seldom passed in bad faith and only a few crooks make money by writing cheques without sufficient funds.

They just switch banks, those few crooks, but they only represent a small minority. If tomorrow we were to jail all those people who are of good faith, I am referring to the poor, because the cheques of the rich fellow never bounce, we would not have enough space in our jails. Furthermore, we would thereby punish those who are not responsible at all for the existing system. Mr. Speaker, when talking about Bill C-215, I think we should also mention deceitful advertising aimed at consumers.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Newspapers are filled with such advertising!

Mr. Beaudoin: Throughout the evening, every five, ten or 15 minutes we see advertisements being broadcast on television. Buy this today, pay tomorrow. Why so? To allow those who are filthy rich to take advantage of the poor and spoil them. This bill or a related bill should deal with that and condemn these companies which are dishonest and connive with those who lend money at rates of 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15 and up to 27 per cent and act in such a manner that the decent fellow, the little working man becomes insolvent and is driven to writing NSF cheques.

Once again, in ending my remarks, I would express the hope that Bill C-215 not be talked out but that it be referred to the Standing Committee for Justice and Legal Affairs and I hope that we will then start explaining these bills in a positive manner, in a broad sense, without any intention to punish the little fellow because it is the system which has failed, not him! We should start addressing ourselves to the system itself and give the individual a fighting chance because he has become insolvent on account of the very fundamental dishonesty of the system itself.

[English]

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about Bill C-215. I will be brief as there are other members who also want to speak before we adjourn for the dinner hour.

I congratulate the sponsor of the bill. The matter of NSF cheques and what happens to them should be straightened out. If a person in Canada writes an NSF cheque while thinking that he has enough money in the bank to cover it, that is not false pretences.

The situation which we now have does not satisfy anybody. If by accident you write an NSF cheque, thinking you have enough money in the bank, you can still be taken to court where you must prove that you thought you had the money. Although you actually thought you had the money, you could be found guilty of an offence. There is also the situation of someone practising fraud who gets away with that. This is not satisfactory from anyone's point of view.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) has asked that this bill go to committee where it can be studied in order to find a satisfactory way of handling instances such as this. Such a situation has happened with me and, I am sure, many other members of this House. I have written a cheque without having enough money in the bank. When that happens you wind up with an extra charge of $2.50—and I hope someone says something about that—or you have the embarrassing situation where your cheque is returned and it looks as though you are trying to pull a fast one.

I wish to deal with another point raised by the hon. member for Broadview. What is a merchant in Canada to do? I have had the experience of running a cash register in a busy store during the Christmas season. I have okayed hundreds, if not thousands, of cheques. You are reduced to sitting there, looking the person over and hoping you are making the right decision. When okaying cheques, you calculate that a certain percentage will be bad cheques. In my experience, I cannot remember once trying to get the money for a bad cheque. If the person does it on purpose, there is nothing you can do. If it is by accident, normally they will pay the money without too much of a follow-up.

The present situation is most unsatisfactory. The only ones who benefit are the banks with their excessive charge of $2.50. If someone writes an NSF cheque for $2.50 and the bank charges an extra $2.50 as a result, that person ends up paying 100 per cent interest. Even a loan shark would feel pretty happy about that sort of situation. Therefore, this is something which must be changed.

The bill puts forward the interesting proposition of allowing 15 days' grace. However, I think there are many more aspects to this whole question of cheques that are being utilized increasingly in our society. Under the credit card system, there is an interest charge of 18 per cent. Cheques have become a form of credit card system for many people. If a cheque is small, the interest becomes exceedingly excessive.

I do not know the exact amount of my telephone bill because it has changed so often recently. In any event, it is a relatively small amount. Many people pay their telephone bills as well as their hydro bills and other relatively modest amounts through the bank. Once again they are jabbed by the banking system for an excessive amount of money.

There are one or two other members who want to speak on this subject. I want again to congratulate the sponsor of the bill for bringing forward this subject, which is of interest to very many Canadians, in order that we may have a few minutes to discuss it.

● (1752)

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to spend a few moments putting forward some personal observations on Bill C-215. I am prompted to do so if for no other reason than that it stands in the name of the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner); in my view, therefore, it is a matter which is deserving of serious consideration. I compliment the hon. member on bringing this legislation forward and I compliment also the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon) for explaining so well the purposes of the bill.

I agree with what the bill seeks to achieve. I am not sure, however, that I agree with the means by which the sponsor and the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton wish to attain those objectives. Let me first of all draw attention to a matter which is, for me, one of serious principle, though I do not say so as a lawyer. Is the Criminal Code a vehicle to be used for the enforcement of a commercial contract? In other words, should we superimpose the Criminal Code upon day to day business activities? There are great arguments on both sides. I understand the frustration of small businessmen in the London area. My own riding is very close to that area and I appreciate the frustration businessmen feel in trying to get litigation through the courts, having regard to the inadequate facilities at their disposal. I understand that a similar situation exists in Ottawa to the extent that the regional bar association has made strong representations to various levels of government.

Nevertheless, are we to use the Criminal Code in an attempt to mitigate this understandable frustration and financial loss suffered by small businessmen? I am sure the financial loss suffered by these people in the London area has been very significant indeed. Knowing the nature of the court list in that area I can well understand that a businessman would not be much inclined to say to the law enforcement agencies: "I want this case prosecuted." Because of the frustration they feel with the civil court procedure, small businessmen in the area, as well, I am sure, in many other areas across Canada, are saying possibly: "At least we may be able to expedite our cases by resorting to the use of the Criminal Code."

This brings me back to the principle I stated: Should the Criminal Code be used to enforce commercial transactions? I do not know which side of the fence I am on. Looking at the legislation I can see certain difficulties immediately. Suppose I am a tenant and I receive a cheque from a friend or a business associate at the time my rent is due and I endorse that cheque to my landlord and it is returned stamped "NSF." Now, who is the payee? According to the cheque, I am. I, in turn, endorsed it to pay my rent. Under the bill before us, as I read it, I am in a situation in which, should the payor pay the amount of the dishonoured cheque to the payee, no further action is taken against him. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have no claim to that money. The claim has passed to my landlord to whom I have endorsed it. If he becomes the payee in law, that is fine, but I am not sure he does.

Another situation occurs to me. Again, as a tenant, I write a cheque to the landlord and the landlord endorses it over to another, and the recipient endorses it again, as happens in many commercial transactions; the cheque may pass through three or four hands before being finally presented to the bank upon which it is drawn.

I come, now, to the very good point made by the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton with respect to the morality of certain aspects of the measure and his concern about protecting the little fellow, the uneducated person, the person who lacks an adequate command of either of our official languages. Is it in the moral interest of such a person, or of any other Canadian, to say: "You can write cheques even though you do not have funds to meet them, as long as within a 15-day period following notification of the fact that you do not have sufficient funds to meet them, you make arrangements to do so." Is that good morally? I do not stand in judgment. I do not know.

What I am willing to say is that I support the position taken by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). I think this would be a very good subject for consideration by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, of which I happen to be a member. I am not so sure it should be discussed in this precise form but, in the absence of any other form, let us consider it in the form of Bill C-215. I should very much like to discuss further this matter of principle, the contemplated use of the Criminal Code to enforce commercial contracts.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I join with others who have spoken this afternoon in commending the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) and the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon) for bringing this bill forward. It has given us all a chance to take a run at the subject matter.

I might say that I have prepared what I thought was a pretty good speech on the subject. I had hoped to deal at some length with the legal technicalities involved because I believe there has been some misinterpretation of what this bill would really have done. I am indebted to hon. members who have already spoken, particularly to the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis), and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), because I believe they have drawn attention to some of the troublesome points. I, too, have doubts about certain aspects of the measure.

It is possible that we could refer the subject matter to committee. My reluctance in recommending such a course arises only because of the fact that other considerations to be placed before the justice and legal affairs committee this session are likely to take up a great deal of time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The time allotted to consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND RANGE OF PERSONS TO WHOM ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES APPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me return to the consideration of Bill C-18 which calls for amendments to the Anti-Inflation Act. I mentioned earlier the effects that long-term controls have had on the Canadian economy and the contribution they have made to high unemployment in this country. It was for this reason that we in the Conservative party proposed short-term controls; that is, to bring uncontrolled government spending under control. This is one of the main causes of inflation and the other economic problems we are facing in Canada today.

Earlier this afternoon I referred to a document prepared by Peter Henry Jerch and Associates, a Winnipeg investment group which has carried out detailed studies to determine why businesses and investment money have been leaving Canada in large numbers. Let me refer to this document again. It states:

> Countries or for that matter provinces which have nationalistic, leftist or extremely strong bureaucratic tendencies make striving and successful entrepreneurs feel uncomfortable. They are of course also the one element of business that a region can least afford to lose.

This is the basis of one of our main problems in Canada today. The document goes on to state:

> Britain is a good example of a country with bureaucratic tendencies. Italy has been on the brink of ruin for some time and had to formally restrict the outflow of funds: those who were not able to take their money out are however not going to invest it internally either. Germany, Denmark, France, Holland, Sweden and Austria, among others, are countries where those striving and willing to invest have been burned too often in the past. Every time an unfavourable trend develops, rather than burying their head in the sand, their thoughts and aspirations wander to more hospitable climates. For the past two or three years certainly, the trend of investing in or buying businesses, from almost anywhere, has been to do so in the United States. That country is viewed by most successful businessmen as the most hospitable place.

It really does not matter whether the Republicans or the Democrats are in, they welcome business and know there is no substitute for business or investors. There is no point trying to kid anyone that there is a substitute for business. Businesses hire people, they build plants, factories and provide employment. The United States is certainly benefiting from the poor political climate we have in this country, and this is an additional effect of the Anti-Inflation Act.

While it is gratifying to know that these controls are to be removed in April, Mr. Jerch gives further reasons in this document for the mass exodus of investment money and business from Canada. Continuing with the quotation:

Why this not-so-sudden flood for more hospitable climates? The big and rich U.S. market has, for all practical purposes, always been there. The devalued C$ should help in exports pricing and the relatively higher cost of acquisitions there—yet it has barely had any effect on the numbers of Canadian firms looking south. Is it the generally higher Canadian wage rates? Not likely, says Mr. Jerch. Not any one single factor is actually responsible. Rather, it is a combination of factors and feelings.

The best climate for orderly and normal business growth is economic and social stability—which is not to be confused with status quo.

That is something in this country which should not be confused with the status quo. While activist politics are present in most democracies, Canada seems to have had more than its fair share. Clearly that is evidenced by the problems which have been created in Ottawa by the premier of the province of Quebec.

● (2012)

Earlier I referred to the need for venture capital. I hope that will be encouraged in April when the AIB controls are removed. Mr. Jerch and his associates have compiled a document entitled: "Nothing ventured: nothing gained". I should like to point out that this is just one firm which has compiled statistics. If statistics were prepared by every investment counsellor in each Canadian city, I am sure the compiled figures would be devastating. This particular document was an investigation of the effects of risk capital on 40 Canadian companies, our economy and taxes. It reads as follows:

The growth and continued health of our economy is indeed based on an innovative secondary industry. Most innovation is people-based and most innovation starts small—in a smaller business. Like a seed that needs water and a good climatic condition, an innovation needs money, management and a conducive economic and social climate. Meaningful jobs and in effect the spirit of the population at large are derived from this innovation which instils a real purpose, satisfaction with oneself and old-fashioned pride in occupation and personal accomplishment.

I will not read the entire document, but I should like to refer to another section which deals with AIB controls and how they have affected a number of businesses in Canada. It reads as follows:

Peter Henry Jerch & Associates, being a firm specializing in corporate finance and acquisitions, has a significant roster of clients needing capital and is aware of many other situations where the injection of equity venture capital can produce very beneficial results to them and to the economy at large. In fact, the need is so broad that nearly half of all companies that apply for credit to banks should have additional venture capital to make them more successful and more viable.

As I mentioned this afternoon, I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will arrive at some legislation to deal with venture capital and to encourage Canadian investors to invest in our secondary industries, as well as our small and medium-sized businesses. The document continues:

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Peter Henry Jerch & Associates maintains that if such venture captial investments could be offset in full against other income, and besides the tremendous impact on the short and long term economy, there would be no negative effect on government tax revenues. To test this assertion, Peter Henry Jerch & Associates conducted a detailed survey of 40 smaller Canadian-owned companies located in Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia. The survey delved into nearly every aspect of a company and included a review of financial statements and books, a review of management ability to carry out a proposed strategy, and a study of product viability and historical projected market acceptance. Detailed summary tables were drawn up based on the results of this in-depth review.

The Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce would be well advised to contact Mr. Jerch and his associates, as well as other Canadian investment companies, in order to arrive at some ideas regarding venture capital, because it is evident the government is bankrupt of any idea along these lines.

I should like to refer to a recent article which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune. It reads as follows:

Canada doesn't need a grandiose national industrial strategy. What it needs desperately is more risk taking investment in small secondary industries.

That's the forthright and well-argued opinion of Peter Jerch of Winnipeg, head of his own firm of corporate financing and acquisition consultants, Peter Henry Jerch and Associates.

He's not advocating the tearing down of any of the existing systems of business development encouragement, even though he strongly suspects they haven't achieved the aims given to government programs such as DREE. What's required is a tax incentive which will wean Canadians away from their habit of being cautious savers and convert them into adventurous investors—on a massive scale.

I hope this will come about when the AIB rules and regulations are removed in April, and that the Minister of Finance will expand on his tax incentive bill, which has certain benefits but will not be the total answer. Also I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) is paying attention this evening, rather than just looking around this chamber. Some action in regard to arriving at legislation to deal with venture capital is needed.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, today we are engaged in an exercise in futility. We are being asked to support a bill which will continue in a phased out manner the anti-inflation program that the government put into effect in October 1975. The anti-inflation program is a complete failure, with the exception of the effect it has had on increases in wages and salaries. The cost of living for 1977 went up by 9½ per cent, which is 1 per cent less than the rate of inflation in October, 1975 when the government brought forward and implemented its anti-inflation program.

The New Democratic Party opposed the anti-inflation program in 1975 because we felt unemployment would increase and that no program could hold down the cost of living for more than a short period of time. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said during the 1974 election, the causes of the rising cost of living were almost completely of an external nature. They were due to increases in oil and natural gas prices imposed by the oil producing countries, as well as increases in the cost of food which could not be controlled in Canada. We predicted that controls would not be applied equitably, that people who earned their living through wages and salary could have their income controlled, but that people who were self-employed or business people would be able to circumvent the controls program.

It would be worth while to review what the government was promising when it brought in its anti-inflation program. I should like to refer to the policy statement tabled in the House of Commons on October 14, 1975, by the then minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), which reads as follows:

Canada is in the grip of serious inflation.

If this inflation continues or gets worse there is a grave danger that economic recovery will be stifled, unemployment increased and the nation subjected to mounting stresses and strains.

This statement is entitled "Attack on Inflation". We are aware of what has happened to unemployment. In October 1975 when the program was brought in, the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment was 7.2 per cent and the number of unemployed people was 725,000 on a seasonally adjusted basis. More than two years later, in December of 1977, the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment was 8.5 per cent and the number of unemployed people was 911,000 on a seasonally adjusted basis. In other words, there were almost 200,000 more unemployed people in December 1977 than there were in October 1975 when the program was put into effect.

● (2022)

Then the minister went on to say in his statement:

Inflation threatens to price our goods out of world markets and to lessen the capacity of our businessmen to expand their operations.

Many of our export industries have been in trouble. Many have not had large profits, and many of them, like International Nickel, have had to lay people off. At no time has that been caused by the fact that they were required to pay too high wages. If Canadian corporations have not been able to export as much as they had exported two or three years ago, it is because the western world in particular has been in a slump, and our products, our minerals and our lumber, have not been selling. Or if they have been selling, they have been selling at substantially lower prices than they did two or three years ago. A good example of that is the price of wheat which is down by about 40 per cent. The minister then said:

Lowering the rate of inflation and reducing the level of unemployment must go hand in hand.

I think it is pretty obvious that the rate of inflation is almost what it was in October of 1975 and that unemployment is substantially higher. We have witnessed a peculiar phenomenon in the first year. For various reasons the cost of living did not increase as fast as it had the previous year. To a large extent that was because the cost of food did not go up. So when the Anti-Inflation Board made their first year's report in 1976, they took credit for the reduced rate of inflation and they said, to quote from their first report:

The various elements of the anti-inflation program work together in this manner: Monetary and fiscal policies are designed to achieve a sustained economic recovery consistent with price increase targets of 8 per cent in the first program year, 6 per cent in the second year, and 4 per cent in the third.

Then they said:

Prices should increase by less than the increase in compensation, so that workers can gain, on average, at least a two per cent increase in real income.

Predictions of the Anti-Inflation Board and of the then minister of finance have proven to be completely erroneous because the rate of inflation in fact has increased to 9.5 per cent for the calendar year and in the last three months of 1977 to about 11.5 per cent, a rate of inflation even higher than that prevailing when the program was brought in.

We said in 1975 that this program could not work for any length of time, that we could not keep prices down because Canada could not live by itself, that Canada is part of the world economy. We are a tremendous importer of all sorts of goods and if these go up, as they have and as they will continue to do, we will have to pay increased costs. That is exactly what happened. The cost of food is going up. It has gone up by 17.7 per cent in the last year, which is not surprising when you think of the fact that we import fresh fruit and vegetables, we buy our coffee and tea and all other products, over the price of which we have no control. So the cost of living has gone up despite the arguments of the government.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is still arguing that in 1978 the cost of living will go up by only 6 per cent. That is a ridiculous claim to make, and it will prove to be wrong by a very large margin because we have not been able to master those factors which have led to the increase in the cost of living. The government is committed to regular increases in the price of oil and natural gas. We had an increase of $1 a barrel on January 1, which we will begin to feel in March, and there will be another increase of $1 a barrel in oil and a comparable increase in the price of natural gas in July. The price of food is continuing to go up; there is no indication that it will go down, and this despite the fact that the minister keeps on saying ad nauseam that the cost of living will not be great. The fact that the minister is repeating that will not have much effect on the cost of living.

The Anti-Inflation Board, which took such credit for the reduction in the rate of increase of the cost of living in 1976, is now trying, through the judicious use of selective figures, to indicate that we are doing not badly at all. In a booklet which they issued some months ago entitled, "Kick the Inflation Habit" they tried to argue that we were doing quite well. They tried to show that inflation has been coming down for the last 12 months, despite the fact that the annual rate of increase in the consumer price index was 8.5 per cent at the time they issued the booklet, as compared to 6.5 per cent the year before. How did they try to rationalize this? They said:

Food, energy and import price movements have obscured somewhat the success that has been attained in reducing the rate of inflation.

In other words, when they could not prove that the total cost of living was going up faster than they expected, they tried to exclude the price of food and energy from the calculations which they made.

It is obvious that the government's policies have not worked. The minister has made it clear, and this legislation provides, that wages and salaries will not be permitted to increase by more than 6 per cent in the coming year, despite the fact that we now have an annual inflation rate of almost 10 per cent. What that means, of course, is that every member of a family who works and is paid in wages or salary will have less funds to meet the actual cost of living because they will be restricted to a 6 per cent increase in their income while the cost of living is going up by almost double that. We said at the beginning when the program was implemented it would be easy for the government to control, at whatever level they wanted, incomes received by people who are paid in wages or salaries, but that it would be almost impossible to control the incomes of self-employed people. In its first year's report the Anti-Inflation Board describes what happened. Figures are given showing how much the incomes of professional people increased. I want to compare those increases, which were permitted by the Anti-Inflation Board, with the increases received by people who are paid wages or salaries. Dentists increased their income in the first year by 19.6 per cent. Their income went from $34,100 to $40,800. Engineers increased their income by 20.2 per cent. Their incomes went from $38,200 to $45,900. Lawyers saw their incomes increase by 14.6 per cent, from $34,900 to $40,000. Those income increases ranged from $5,000 to $7,000 at a time when the government had said that the maximum increase which would be permitted to any person in one year was $2,400. We see that, as we predicted, the government's program has worked in a very unfair way. Wage and salary earners have had their incomes controlled. Their increases this year are limited to 6 per cent, while the self-employed go merrily along.

● (2032)

We predicted that profits would go up, and indeed they have. The Montreal Gazette of November 30, 1977 reported that assets and after tax profits of the nine largest Canadian chartered banks rose more quickly in the year ending October 31, 1977 than in the previous year. The Gazette reported that the nine banks' balance of revenue, which measures the after tax profit before the deduction of sums to cover anticipated losses on loans still outstanding, rose by 10.4 per cent over-all.

On almost the same day the Globe and Mail reported that corporate profits for the first three quarters of 1977 had risen by 16.7 per cent. It was reported that after tax corporate profits grew at a quicker rate in the third quarter than in the two previous quarters, according to a preliminary third quarter survey of profits of publicly owned Canadian corporations. The year over year increase recorded in the latest quarter, 16.7 per cent, was the largest in any quarter since the third quarter of 1974. It is not just profits that have increased; there has been an even larger increase in the assets of Canadian corporations.

Eric Kierans, whom some members of this House will remember, quoted some interesting figures in a speech he made several months ago to the Committee for an Independent Canada. I would like to quote a couple of sentences from that speech because they are interesting. Indeed, I would say they are amazing. He said:

[Mr. Orlikow.]

In 1968, (corporate assets) amounted to $190 billion. Six years later they'd more than doubled, to $427 billion, an average annual compounded growth rate of 17 per cent.

He then said:

Then look at some individual examples like the Royal Bank . . . In 1970, the Royal's assets were $11.4 billion. In 1976, they were $28.8 billion. With CPR the story is the same. Assets, in 1970, of $2.3 billion. Assets, in 1976, of $6.8 billion.

It is not surprising, therefore, that people are dissatisfied with the anti-inflation program. As I have indicated, in the coming year ordinary citizens in Canada will be subjected to a substantial and very noticeable decrease in their actual standard of living. In most cases organized union workers will probably be able to get the increase which is allowed under this legislation, 6 per cent, but there are more people not organized than organized, and these people are faced with the fact that there are more people looking for jobs today than there have been since the depression years. People who work in unorganized industries will in all likelihood not be able to get the 6 per cent increase which is permitted by this legislation.

We will see a further continuation of the drift we have had for the last two and a half years. There will be more unemployment. As I said, in December there were 911,000 people unemployed. That was on a seasonally adjusted basis. That does not include the tens of thousands of people who are unemployed who are not counted because many of them have given up attempting to find jobs. If you live in Newfoundland where the rate of unemployment is over 15 per cent, there is not much use looking for work. There is not much point looking for work if you live in eastern Quebec or in the interlake area of Manitoba.

There will be more unemployment and more suffering on the part of the bulk of the people of Canada. I began my remarks by saying that we are engaged in an exercise in futility. The anti-inflation program has not worked. It has not kept the cost of living down. It has increased unemployment because, along with the anti-inflation program, the government is involved in a major program of restraint. The government has cut back on programs and has put a freeze on hiring. It has called on provincial and municipal governments to do the same.

The federal government has passed legislation which will reduce the transfer payments it has made in other years to the provinces to help pay the cost of hospitalization, medicare, social security programs and post-secondary education. All those programs were begun and encouraged by the federal government. They are now very expensive, and in the next few years they will not receive the same percentage of their cost that they have received in other years. The provincial governments are being urged to cut back on programs which have already begun. They are being pressured to give up any idea of new programs. Just at the time when the private sector of the economy is not able or willing to find jobs for all the people who want to work, and when the government should be increasing its participation to take up the slack, we find the government cutting back and urging the provinces to cut back and to show restraint. This means that we will have more unemployment and inflation.

I think that this legislation and this debate are really pointless. Instead of bringing this legislation forward the minister should have brought forward a new budget. The Minister should no longer heed the advice coming from officials in the Department of Finance because in the last three or four years they have been consistently wrong. Instead, he should listen to the advice given by the Economic Council of Canada and the Conference Board of Canada which he has rejected out of hand as being impractical. They have suggested that what is needed is a substantial cut in income tax, particularly for people in low and middle income brackets. The minister has been heard to comment that one of the reasons we are in trouble is because people are saving too much money. The figures prove that savings have increased substantially but these savings are not by people in low and middle income brackets. They are not in a position to save money; they must spend everything they earn just to get by.

● (2042)

The Economic Council of Canada, which is composed of people appointed by this government—it has no labour representation and, if anything, is business oriented—recommended a substantial cut in income tax and a cut in or removal of sales tax. No other form of taxation is felt more cruelly by people on low income than sales tax. Any reduction should be monitored so that it filtered down to the consumer. This would do a great deal to cushion the increased cost of living we have witnessed over which, in many cases, we have little or no control. That is one thing the government should do to fight the increase in the cost of living and the increase in the rate of inflation.

The government should also deal with unemployment. It is not good enough for the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen)—or, as he is commonly known, the "minister of unemployment"—to say that government can do little or nothing about unemployment. We will not and we cannot accept that kind of statement. We saw enough of that kind of argument in the depression years. We thought those days would never return but they are back. To a large extent, the minister and the government are responsible for the current unemployment.

We have argued and will continue to argue that it is the government's responsibility to adopt programs that will put people back to work. This is not impossible. We need to get on with building homes for the tens of thousands of people in this country who still live in dilapidated and unsanitary homes. This is completely inexcusable. We also need to develop programs to deal with pollution.

As I have said before, Mr. Speaker, we live in a country which spent $1.5 billion to hold the Olympic games in a city which still dumps raw sewage into the St. Lawrence River. That kind of thing should not be allowed to continue.

The government ought to forget about its anti-inflation program, although it earned some undeserved credit in the first year of operations, for which it can be grateful. It ought to get on with the job of putting people back to work and helping those on low incomes who have been adversely affected by the sharp increase in the cost of living this past year. This increase will continue throughout 1978 unless the government takes action.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to say that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was probably right when he said in Toronto recently that the Liberal administration was not very good. Of course, he tried to cover that up by saying that the alternative was worse. The minister and this government have been running the economy of this country for a long time, however. After railing against the evils of wage and price controls in the 1974 election campaign, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government then did an about-face and introduced them. The results have not been very good.

Bill C-18, instead of paving the way for the removal of controls, provides for the extension of them and even widens the net by including profit and wage guidelines retroactive to December, 1975, as well as guidelines for the transportation industry. Profit and wage guidelines are also to be extended to the construction industry. The bill contains one or two amendments that might be useful in a decontrol program, but although the government has announced that controls will end on April 14, in practice 70 per cent of renewable wage agreements and 81 per cent of renewable profit performances will remain under control during 1978. As well, the way has been paved for a continuation of these controls if the government so desires.

The Minister of Finance has said that he hopes for an inflation rate of 6 per cent this year. Mr. Speaker, he must be the most optimistic person in Canada when you consider that inflation is already running at 9.2 per cent and the government still proposes to remove controls.

In the United States, which has an enormous influence on our economy, indications are that inflation will increase substantially. In his State of the Union speech, the President of the United States triggered another fall in the United States dollar, and, of course, our dollar fell along with it. We tend to look at the state of the U.S. dollar and forget that the whole North American economy is affected by it. In President Carter's first year in office in the United States, the government there has added to inflation by an increase in the minimum wage, which always increases wages at all levels not just at the bottom of the scale. We are adept at this as our minimum wages are substantially above those in the United States. Just recently, the province of Manitoba illustrated the danger of excessive increases in the minimum wage when they refused a further increase in the statutory escalation of the minimum wage in that province. In the United States government workers received a salary boost of 7 per cent. They are doing the same thing that we are doing in this country.

The orderly marketing agreements which the United States government has indulged in are just a fancy label for the limiting of imports. In Canada we are doing this with televisions, electronic goods, shoes and clothing which decreases the flow of low-priced imports and allows higher pricing of domestic goods. This may be good for our domestic industry but it also increases the price of goods our people must buy.

In the United States there are today higher taxes on business for purposes of social security, jobless pay or what we call UIC, and an increase in pension insurance premiums. Of course, the United States has a larger federal budget and a larger deficit, with so-called tax cuts to offset tax increases. This is certainly a classic combination to cause inflation. As in Canada, all things done in the United States are done with the public good in mind, and to satisfy constituents that government feels its cause is just and reasonable. The result, whether in the United States or Canada, is to push up business costs, which in turn are passed on.

We also have the pervasive indexing of wages and pensions which is particularly important in the Canadian economy because so much of our expensive public service employment is locked in to the automatic indexing of wages.

● (2052)

The President of the United States does not intend to use forceful action in controlling inflation; he intends to have moral suasion by government, by business and by labour. In the short run, at least, this is not going to work any better in the United States than it would in Canada or in any other country. Perhaps, in the long run, it may well help to halt and contain the forces of inflation but it will not be of immediate value. So with the expected rise of inflation in the United States, how can anyone, least of all the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), expect our inflation rate will moderate from over 9 per cent at present to his own estimated 6 per cent? Certainly other trading partners are in the same situation. How can the minister expect to have an inflation rate of 6 per cent when our trading partners and the people we do business with are expecting increases in their rates, and where will our exports go?

In so many fields, Canada's performance is lacklustre, and this is evidence of our financial malaise. For instance, the rapid and continuous increase in Canada's external debt is such that we must give serious thought to the country's ability to cover the interest charges. A review of what has happened in our foreign debt is interesting. It has climbed from $26 billion at the end of 1968 to $46 billion at the end of 1976, and it is estimated to reach $58 billion at the end of 1978. Certainly the increment in the foreign debt is increasing by leaps and bounds. The interest and dividend components of the current deficit have increased from $900 million in 1968 to an estimated $3.6 billion this year.

It seems that as a result of the higher deficits in the interest and dividend items Canada is moving increasingly in the direction of a balance of payments problem, due to our inability to earn sufficient foreign exchange to pay the interest and dividends on outstanding foreign debt. In other words, large future borrowings will be necessary just to cover the service payments of past borrowing. Even with the merchandise trade surplus in 1977, the current account deficit is predicted to increase sharply from last year to over $6 billion for this year. In 1970 we had a surplus in our commodity trade of $3 billion, whereas in 1977 it was certainly less than $3 billion.

Much of this can be ascribed to the failure to sell to the United States the crude oil that we were selling in other years. It brings into question the disastrous situation whereby the federal government has been involved in a tax dispute with the provinces which has dampened exploration in the petroleum industry. It is significant to note that there seem to be ample gas supplies once again, largely on the initiative of the governments of Alberta and British Columbia, when changes were made in the tax structure so that drilling resumed. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are short-sighted in our assessment of restricting energy trade, particularly on a continental basis.

Our troubles are even greater in the manufacturing sector. The deficit in manufactured goods has climbed in eight years from $3 billion to $10 billion. This massive deficit has been due to the deterioration of the competitive position of Canadian manufacturing. A prime factor here has been the rapid increase in unit labour costs. There has been some restraint in the rise in wages in the manufacturing industry, but most important is the reduction in the rate of increase of labour costs due to a cyclical improvement in the output of the workers.

The lower value of the Canadian dollar and some reduced pressure on labour costs may bring about an improvement in the trade deficit, but this will be accomplished mainly through displacing imports rather than increasing exports. The lack of buoyancy in world trade will certainly diminish significant improvement in Canada's exports of manufactured goods. Unless industries have had some profits they will not be able to expand or to increase their efficiency so as to take advantage either of the home market or the export market. The operation of the tax system has meant that taxes were levied on fictional profits so that for many firms it was difficult to maintain an adequate level of capital investment or even to maintain the present level.

There are a good many reasons to believe that the home market for manufacturers will not be as buoyant as in years gone by. Travelling has introduced many Canadians to new levels of consumer wants and needs. Many Canadian manufactured goods are now realized to be of average or mediocre quality, not the worst but far from the best in the world. I notice western Canadians especially are looking south of the border for many of their goods, and many are not so keen on the traditional stylings of a textile industry based in eastern Canada. The western farm machinery industry is looking increasingly across the border for its machines as well as to sell agricultural and other products made by local industry.

No doubt the government would like to take great credit for the wage and price controls moderating inflationary pressure. But it is doubtful that controls have had any significant success considering the fact that conditions would have moderated the rate of inflation in any case. I think that the government's experience will cause all governments to weigh carefully whether or not controls should be reintroduced, at least in a period of peacetime. Obviously they distort the market. They make more difficult business transactions and decisions as to whether to expand and plan for the long term. Business tends to sit and wait, not knowing what the government is going to do next, and it is in no position to make any commitment for expansion.

But the cardinal failing, it seems to me, is that in a country where nearly 50 per cent of our GNP is channeled through governments, there has been no real control on government expenditures and no real control on increases in the public service wage remuneration level or on the various charges that Crown corporations can levy on corporate citizens, such as hydro and so on. Furthermore, Crown corporations, not usually considered in the public sector, did not, in the main, observe restrictions that were so evident in the private sector. The private sector has now become a relatively small part of our economy compared to what it was some years ago. Certainly it means that the advantages of any slowdown in wage increases in the private sector do not have nearly as great an impact on the total economy as was the case many years ago.

I would like to say a word about the cost to firms observing AIB rules and filling in AIB reports. I can quote a small professional operation which had a gross income of slightly over $20,000, in a profession whose fees were negotiated by an association and the provincial government. This situation put him in a so-called safe haven. But in order to prepare the AIB form the charge to this professional by his accountants was some $600 a year or about 3 per cent of his gross earnings. I suspect that this is fairly true for business at large. The cost of complying with the AIB, doing the paper work and submitting the required reports amount to somewhere between 3 per cent to 5 per cent of the cost of doing business in many instances. Not an insignificant amount, particularly when you add such costs as bilingualism, which many people feel adds another 5 per cent and which we recognize is a financial problem for Canadian business.

With the slack in manufacturing and in all sections of the country in the private sector, wage increases should not be increased excessively in the coming year. In any case, wage levels in the private sector seem to be substantially lower than in the public sector, so there is a steady move of competent and skilled workers and managers out of the private sector into the public service or public institutions. This certainly can be seen in small communities. From personal experience I can state that some of our most productive industries, such as agriculture, are not able to offer the salaries, amenities and pensions that government services can offer. In this field workers are scarce, and they will become scarcer because the agricultural industry is unable to compete with the public service. This seems to me to be one of the most important things we have to deal with in the economy. Furthermore, the rates of pay, hours, pensions and amenities make the excellence demanded so much easier to come by in the public service. Yet even in the face of supposedly high unemployment, there are many jobs, such as field workers and so on, that are not being filled because there are no applicants. Many are necessary for the functioning of our economy. We could do without many of the service workers, but not without jobs that produce our goods.

The minister did not bring forward a plan of the decontrol period. He did not bring forward the idea of a watchdog commission to watch over wages and prices, although he did talk about it vaguely. He may feel it would become another bureaucracy with another layer of people to watch over private business.

Bill C-18 is only marking time. It extends the AIB coverage for another eight months. As I have stated, every indication is that 70 per cent of wage agreements will continue past April 14 to the end of the year. Profit performances in the nature of 80 per cent will continue to be controlled.

This bill makes one or two amendments that are necessary in preparation for the removal of controls. However, it fails to bring forward any suggestions with regard to the post-control period. There is the possibility of economic chaos when controls are lifted. In particular, there is the question of how to deal with the public sector in order to find a reasonable method of assessing wage increases. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says he has a plan which he will put forward to the provinces at the forthcoming federal-provincial conference. However, there is nothing in this legislation to indicate what the government has in mind about this important facet as we approach decontrols, hopefully by the end of the year. I refer to the period when we will function without controls.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about this legislation which I think brings an extension of these controls which have been embarrassing so many Canadians for too long.

I remember very well, Mr. Speaker, when these controls were introduced in 1975, we on this side were already blaming the government for having waited much too long to do so. It was already too late to reach the proposed objective which was to curb inflation, a danger that had been hanging over our heads for several months and about which the Progressive Conservative party had warned this government on several occasions.

So we have lived through this period of controls and I suggest that now we have the right to examine its results. I believe, on the one hand, that this point has been recognized throughout the country and, on the other, that we have also come to realize that those two years were sad years for Canada. And we cannot help admit with all those who have a little sense of objectivity that the results are deplorable. We have partly succeeded in curbing salary increases but not prices. And that is where it hurt Canadians and did them wrong because they had to live through an increase in the cost of living as a result of a badly prepared, badly drafted and especially badly implemented piece of legislation. As I pointed out earlier, it was already too late to correct the malaise that was felt in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I remember quite well that two years before October 1975, the then leader of our party toured the country to warn Canadians against the dangers they were faced with because of inflation. But the government did not want to listen to the wise advice of our leader. The government, thinking that they knew everything, did not want to listen. However, they were well aware that politically, this could affect their popularity.

I will come back to what happened in 1974 later because some things are not so easy to forget. In 1975, nearly everyone was penalized by this board, all the sectors of our society, from the farmers to the labourers, and even the businessmen were penalized. People became more and more concerned and investments started to slow down. This is the result: we know the problems which we have had in the last two years and which are growing worse.

You may wonder why, Mr. Speaker. It is because we got off on the wrong foot. Yet, it was clear at the time that the cooperation and the support of provinces were needed and even essential, because I believe that at the time, in view of the decision made, provincial areas of jurisdictions were already being ignored. The government did not obtain the cooperation of unions, which was essential, nor that of business. Without the support and the cooperation essential for the effectiveness of this approach, the task was already doomed to failure; it was already impossible. This put the board in a difficult position since it had more often than not to oppose either the unions, the businessmen or the provinces, and this caused continuous confrontation, with the deplorable results that I mentioned earlier and that we must recognize.

Of course, we have been recommending this decontrol period for some time because, in view of the failure to meet these objectives, something should have been done a long time ago and the various sectors of the Canadian economy have been waiting for a long time for the government to take a position and they want to know exactly what the government is going to do.

Mr. Speaker, if the provinces, labour unions, the business community and economic sectors did not show much interest for the imposition of those measures, it is because already, in October 1975, people were showing that loss of confidence in this government. One has only to check the figures, and I will spare you all those statistical data for others before me have quoted them, but one has only to compare with our American neighbours who, without this tool, have fared a lot better than us.

I am not saying that they did not have any problems with the increasing cost of living or inflation, but they have come through without any controls, through persuasion, a better will and, probably, because of the much greater public confidence they had in their government than Canadians did in theirs. In my opinion, in a situation such as the one we are in now it is important to have confidence. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is calling for this confidence on the part of the opposition parties, and he hopes to gain the confidence of Canadians about the anti-inflation measures he has announced a few months ago and those he will be announcing in the coming days. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to trust the government when we see its economic record and the results of its policies. It is hard and I will even say it is impossible to support the government when it tells us about all kinds of expectations, knowing full well that all our economic forecasts have proven awfully false for too long and particularly so during these past ten years. So, right from the beginning, the objective set by the government was unreachable and the government knew it. But, Mr. Speaker, they had to win the 1974 election. So, two years before the enforcement of these controls, in 1975, the Progressive Conservative party had already warned the government about the dangers of these controls and the misery in which they would throw all Canadians. And the member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) knows quite well what he was advocating in 1974 like so many others. They crisscrossed the country and we saw what I would call the scandal of the century: all the Liberal members of the House and all those who were running for the Liberals stubbornly refused to believe in price controls, in a 90-day wage and price freeze.

This 90-day period, which was omitted when the controls were applied, would have given us and any government the time required to seek and obtain the support and the co-operation that are essential to the effectiveness of these measures. It has been swept aside. But what is most repugnant is that the government had promised it would never apply such controls and it tricked the business world, the unions, the workers, the provinces and this side of the House. The government was scaring Canadians with the proposal we were putting forward. It had been studied and we had the feeling it was already urgent.

We were asking the government to take action, and that was well before 1974. It did not respond, at least not before having categorically promised all Canadians that the government elected in 1974 would never apply controls. I said some time ago that this government had deliberately and openly lied to every component of the Canadian society, and I was asked to take back what I was saying because I could not prove it. I see the hon. member who must indeed feel embarrassed, he who in October 1975 was compelled to obediently submit to the decisions taken by this Prime Minister, to stay quiet and hope his constituents would forget he had ever stood up for this position.

Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced of that. I repeat everywhere that this government lied openly to the Canadian people in 1974, and that is why it deserves to lose the confidence of the people from day to day as it does.

Mr. Portelance: That is not true!

Mr. La Salle: An old proverb says that he who has lied will lie, Mr. Speaker. Today, the minister introduces before us a bill which in a way extends controls. There is talk of decontrol, of a supervising committee: how will it be done, with whose co-operation, under what agreements? We are given no details. How are we to believe so readily a government that has given the Canadians proof of its dishonesty with regard to the promises it made at the time. So, we are asked to approve some kind of extension, with a committee whose task would be to supervise the decontrol period and make sure nothing upsets our economy again; it is hard to "upset" the present situation; though there is pressing need to improve the situation we are now experiencing.

It has already been said that the suggested decontrol formula could lead to interference with the provinces. Tonight, over the news, after a day spent in Quebec city where representatives of the provinces and the federal government spoke of work and the decontrol period, considerable concern was expressed, Mr. Speaker. We are concerned by the approach to be used by this review committee. We really wonder to what extent this government is giving itself an instrument allowing it to intrude in provincial jurisdiction and make decisions that already belong to the provinces. And if the information we got tonight is right, it was obvious that all provinces, and not only the province of Quebec, were very much concerned by the way this surveillance would be implemented. I understand the Quebec labour minister who expressed his concern and I take this opportunity to encourage government members to do their best to facilitate the necessary agreements and to respect provincial jurisdiction, and this applies not only to the province of Quebec but to every province.

If the government demonstrated its incompetence on that respect the legislation we have lived with since October, 1975, I repeat that it is difficult to believe in the efficiency of those measures. We wonder if this government will not try to obtain such an instrument, not within a year but in the next few months. I insist on the absolute necessity to get support from provinces, unions and management during that decontrol period. We must admit that without a commitment to get the co-operation from every sector of the economy to deal with a situation created by this government, we are in a dangerous economic deadlock.

Yesterday, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) blamed our leader for being pessimistic as we recognized that this government, with its accumulation of deficits, was on the verge of bankruptcy. And we must be careful according to our friends opposite because when we talk about the government's bankruptcy we are frightening investors and foreign countries. Those people hear the same information and read the same newspapers as we do and it is impossible to make them believe that everything is going fine, thank you.

Mr. Lachance: Only Rockefeller!

Mr. La Salle: Rockefeller is also concerned. He made a courtesy visit to Canada yesterday but he must also have read the newspapers and I think that Canadians are more worried and this is important, Mr. Speaker. Canadians are more worried and this is why I think it is essential in the coming months to take the necessary steps to gain the support of union, provinces, employers and every sector of the economy. The government has shown a lack of leadership and is indeed caught in a trap and cannot free itself. It is not embarrassing to acknowledge the need for sensible advice from economic experts and the government should urgently appeal to those economic sectors which can provide some assistance in the public interest.

When I consider the special conditions in my province, I must point to this government that it must endeavour to obtain the co-operation of my province and avoid confrontations with the Quebec government, because it has chosen a special option which I and others do not approve. But I think we must respect provincial institutions and it is more urgent than ever to co-operate especially as far as this bill is concerned. And that cooperation is also essential in the case of the other provinces and that respect by this government for provincial jurisdictions is equally essential.

So I repeat that it is difficult to have faith in the legislation now before us in view of what we have had in the last two years. I hope we will be able to correct the present situation but we will be more successful if we can have faith in those sectors of the economy which could be well disposed at a certain moment if the government shows enough initiative to correct the situation. So I think it will be possible to get that cooperation which would allow us to restore an economic climate both in Canada and in my province, something which is necessary and urgent. We are concerned with that monumental failure and the repeated economic failures of this government but we are seriously wondering whether the best solution for the people of Canada might not be indeed a change of government. We hope that Canadians will have that opportunity to choose before long and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we will be reminding this government of the kind of administration we had for the past ten years. And we will see whether Canadians have suffered enough or whether they can tolerate any longer this kind of administration. In the circumstances I hope this government will not pass this opportunity or call that I am making about the urgency of having the support of the important sectors of the economy represented by the provinces and the unions to make this a successful legislation. Should it meet the interests of Canadians I would be quite happy to make my modest contribution.

Mr. Lachance: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) on a point of order.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) would accept a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is up to the hon. member to accept the question. His time has not expired, so the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont could put his question.

Mr. Lachance: I want to ensure collaboration with provincial authorities and rightly so. Does the hon. member not feel that the blanket agreement signed not later than today in respect of a $77 million fund, of which $45 million will be provided by the federal government for the servicing of industrial parks and also for fishery parks, is a good example of cooperation with the Quebec provincial government?

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a sizeable grant announced by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, I believe it was yesterday or the day before, for projects in the province of Quebec. This is very good news indeed. I would remind the hon. member just the same that it would have been better in my view if such agreements had been signed five years ago.

Quebeckers are asking themselves, why did this government wait until it was on the brink of bankruptcy, it brought the nation so near to a gigantic bankruptcy, into so dangerous an economic quagmire, before it started announcing day after day a series of grants that should have been announced four or five years ago, as we were then pressing for such measures. Of course I accept this grant announced today by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard). Of course I welcome it. My only regret is the government did so because it was forced to.

Mr. Lachance: This has been achieved, it is an extension.

Mr. Lapointe: We have granted $300 million over the last five years.

[English]

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, and I think in the opinion of members of my party, this is a very important debate on the Anti-Inflation Act, its regulations and the board. For the first time we have seen the government actually planning the economy in advance. But unfortunately its planning was wrong. I do not want to be one of those who says "I told you so", but members of this New Democratic Party suggested it was wrong two and a half years ago.

What the government planned deliberately has not only increased unemployment in this country and, consequently, increased the misery of many of our citizens, but it has not solved the basic problems it was supposed to solve, namely, the problems of inflation. This government has all kinds of precedents to follow. The United States, for example, tried controls in the late 1960s or early 1970s, but wage and price controls failed in that country. This government did not learn a lesson from that failure. We heard the words of President Carter on television the other night during his State of the Nation address to the United States Congress. He said he does not believe in price and wage controls because they do not work.

This government across from me now is committed to controls until at least April 14, and it intends to continue some kind of control mechanism well on into the year and perhaps beyond into 1979. This is its intention in spite of the lesson we should have learned from the United States.

I do not profess to be an economist, but it seems to me that when you have a totally unplanned economy and you are on the upswing is the time to attempt to dampen things through fiscal and monetary mechanisms. When the economy is on the downswing, as it has been in this country for the past two and a half years, that is the time when you loosen those monetary and fiscal measures. This Liberal government has done things the other way around.

According to the government everything was wide open during the early 1970s. Its advice was to make the fastest buck possible; get things now because in two, three or four years' time it will not be possible. We are now experiencing a restrictive economy with tight money, yet the government insists on continuing controls.

What does this mean in human terms? Let us get away for the moment from what is said by the great thinkers, the great legislators, that great Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the bureaucrats. Let us consider this at the grassroots. I do not wish to be too parochial by speaking just about my own constituency of Brant because this controls program has adversely affected most of the country, but let us look briefly at what these controls have accomplished in that area of Canada which is supposedly wealthy, with traditionally low unemployment, a high cash flow and a lot of economic activity.

As a result of the inverse or negative planning of the Liberal government, we have in the city of Brant an unemployment rate of 12 per cent. If you combine that area with the county and the Six Nations Indian reserve you will find an unemployment rate of about 15 per cent. Is this really what the government intended to do to the riding of Brant, or to any other constituency in this country? I can only draw the conclusion that this was intentional, that the Prime Minister was so preoccupied two and a half years ago with inflation that he was suggesting that we must suffer the consequences of controls and live with unemployment. He could then say to the young people of this country that if they could not get jobs they should go some place else; they should go to a foreign country.

The fundamental fact is that in western European nations, where governments plan in a positive way—and I do not refer just to those with social democratic governments—the rate of inflation and the rate of unemployment are both lower without controls. Yet the Prime Minister insists on holding on to the outmoded and outdated concept that the only way the economy can work is through controls.

I recall a very great opportunity I experienced back in the autumn of 1975 when I marched in Brantford with local labour people. At that time we realized that controls would not work and that they would be unequally applied. We knew some people would escape all the controls and others would escape part of the controls as far as income was concerned. We knew those on fixed incomes, such as disability, war and old age pensions, would be hurt. Also we knew those on wages and salaries would be hurt. It is very, very easy to control wages and salaries. At that time we were aware of the fact that those who worked on a fee for service basis or investors would find loopholes around the Anti-Inflation Board legislation. Let me make it clear that I am not condemning them as individuals. Indeed, 20 per cent of them found their way around the program and have not as yet sent in their information to the AIB with respect to income, which have to be adjudicated.

We were aware that it would be very difficult to control prices, but the most inequitable aspect of the program, which came into effect in December of 1975, was in relation to those parts of the economy that were excluded. I am referring to gasoline prices, home heating fuel prices, hydro, other public utilities, land speculation costs, home interest mortgage rates and the various borrowing interest rates across the country. All of these were excluded from the AIB program, yet today most of these areas, in terms of cost to the consumer, have skyrocketed well above the AIB guidelines for prices. At the same time wages have been held back.

For example, in December 1975 when the AIB program came into existence, the Canadian inflation rate was 9.5 per cent. Today the inflation rate is 9.5 per cent. What is the rate of increase in salaries today? Those who have to bargain for their incomes or salaries are being held to 6 per cent this year. At this very moment in time we have a differential of 3½ per cent between the amount of money people may receive in terms of an increase in salary and what in fact they are paying with respect to increased costs, according to the consumer price index. Obviously something is amiss.

The other day in Toronto the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) implied that things would not change. In a critical economic period such as we are experiencing now, the flow of money to those who need it the most must be increased. Whether these people are pensioners, low or middle income earners, they spend money on necessities such as food, gasoline and clothing. Although these are basic items which they require money for, the government is not prepared to reduce taxes, thus providing these people with a tax break of any significance. When more money is put into the economy at a time when the economy is down and money is tight, more money is spent. When this money is given to those at the bottom end of the income scale, it is spent. When it is spent, it creates demand. When demand is created, demand for productivity is created as well. When a greater demand for productivity is created, there is a greater demand for those who produce the products, which is one fundamental way to get people back to work.

It is a disgrace that Canada has over 800,000 persons listed as unemployed and probably another 300,000 persons who are either underemployed or have given up looking for work. Therefore we are talking in terms of 1.1 million unemployed people in this country, perhaps even more. One must look at the cost to those who are working because of the ineptitude and stupidity of the government. One must look at the payout of unemployment insurance, and when that runs out, the cost of welfare. I cannot understand this attitude in light of the experience to the south of us in the United States, where a much more rapid rate of recovery occurred. President Carter and his economic advisers are advocating and putting into practice the very things members of the New Democratic Party suggested last fall. Why is it that the government would not listen? I do not expect the Prime Minister to say that I am correct and he is wrong. But I am expecting some new action from the government side, something creative which will provide us with some hope. It will take a long, long time for the government to weaken. I am awaiting something innovative. If the government cannot think of something innovative, why does it not accept traditional economic practices, as the Americans are doing, in order to get more money flowing in the economy? I know we do not have a Lord Keynes or Kenneth Galbraith coming along every day, so perhaps we have to rely on the philosophical concepts of the economics of the thirties and early forties. But at least that is better than standing pat at a time when our economy is on the rocks.

I realize some people have not been hurt, such as myself and many others, but some jobs have been affected by the spin-off from unemployment. I am not referring just to statistics and numbers, but to people who are dependent upon their sons and daughters for a portion of their income, livelihood and so on. Approximately 2½ million Canadians are suffering directly as a result of the government's ineptitude and inability to come to grips with the economic realities of the present day.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is on the campaign trail these days. I guess someone up there does not like him, because when he was supposed to come to Brantford it snowed so badly he could not get in. A lot of work went into organizing the Liberal meeting at Brantford and I feel sorry for those who went to all the trouble. He was only 20 miles away and the highways were open. He could have been there, but he decided not to go.

An hon. Member: The highways were snowed in. I know, I was there.

Mr. Blackburn: We were all snowed in. Highway 2 was open all that morning and during the afternoon, but the Prime Minister decided not to risk it in his big limousine. He left his Liberal buddies in Brantford with about 600 doughnuts and I do not know how many gallons of coffee. I actually feel sorry for the local Liberal people who organized the meeting. Even I received an invitation, as a matter of fact. I do not know who slipped up there. It would take a long time to concert me to the Liberal party, a couple of lifetimes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Nobody would want to do that.

Mr. Blackburn: I can understand why the Prime Minister dwells almost entirely on the national unity issue at this time. He does not want to be reminded of the fact that he has been in office as Prime Minister for ten years, that when he came into office as Prime Minister promising to bring us together as a country, he said: "I understand Quebec, I am Francophone"—although I think he is half Scottish by origin. I can understand why he wants to evade the economic issues which will plague him during the next campaign. We can understand why he wants to go ahead on the national unity issue if we remember that when he was elected ten years ago there was not one separatist sitting in the Quebec National Assembly. Today there are approximately 70 or 71 and they are in power.

I am not blaming the Prime Minister entirely for what happened in Quebec, but as a Francophone Prime Minister of the country surely he must have known what was going on in Quebec in the 1960s and 1970s. So why did he choose to ignore the natural linguistic and cultural aspirations of that province and instead try to superimpose upon English speaking Canada some quasi-linguistic program that would somehow solve our problems by converting Canada into a bilingual nation? If we were the size of Switzerland, I would understand it.

Now he wants to get away from the AIB and all the problems and troubles that the AIB has caused Canadians. He wants to ignore inflation and the ravages that unemployment creates within a family, a neighbourhood or a community, and somehow sell the idea of national unity, about which we have all thought very seriously over the years. What is new about it? It is very interesting, when you compare the economy with national unity—and incidentally this ties in with this bill—to note that the government had flattened out in the late summer and early autumn of 1976 so far as their popularity across the country was concerned. They did not know where to go, they had no ideas and no philosophy left, if they ever had any in the beginning. Then all of a sudden, in the middle of November 1976, René Lévesque was elected premier of Quebec and the separatists gave our Prime Minister an issue.

We are not looking for issues in this country today, we are looking for policies which will benefit all Canadians, whether French speaking or English speaking. This is what will cement this country. But if unemployment continues to increase in Quebec, if job opportunities falter and fail for the young in Quebec, the young people in Quebec will say: "Look, we have our language and we have our cultural traditions. What is the point of staying in confederation?"

You do not hold a country together with rhetoric. In all sincerity and honesty I am somewhat dismayed that the Prime Minister is now quoting from the Bible and asking people to love one another. You do not need to quote from the Bible; you have to work, you have to act. You have to bring in economic policies that will help Canadians recapture their sense of self-confidence and dignity as people in this country. What we need are not words and pronouncements from on high, not somebody who changes his hairdo every season or every two or three years. We need action. We need somebody who can bring in something which will assist those who need assistance.

Late last summer or early fall my party asked the government to create jobs, public works programs or grant tax credits or benefits to low and middle income earners, to put more money into circulation, and so on. The government has ignored this. But not president Carter. Not the United States, whose recovery is coming about much more rapidly than ours. In fact, I doubt whether we will have a real recovery in this country for at least a year and a half under present Liberal fiscal and monetary policies.

To twist this kind of economic problem into an emotional national unity issue in the hope that people who are hurting will forget their hurt feelings and come together in an election campaign to hold the country together is a fallacious and spurious approach to basic issues. I predict that unless we address ourselves to the economic issues of this country, an election based on the national unity issue will divide this country more than it is divided today. This is not so just with regard to Quebec; this applies to the prairies, to British Columbia and to Atlantic Canada. I do not know to whom the Prime Minister is listening these days but I do not think he is listening to the grassroots, to the people in the prairies or in British Columbia, to the ordinary people who go to work every day, who still have jobs, who come home at night to family meetings, who watch television, have debts and have to meet the budget every week. I think he is listening to some of the so-called "expert advisers" in the Liberal party here in Ottawa and to the bureaucrats.

We have to change our direction, Mr. Speaker. We cannot afford to continue in the same direction we are going now. Some of the writers in the popular press today are saying that not only have controls failed but they have made matters worse. How much longer we can continue with this kind of phoney economics is hard to say. The most recent poll reflects the growing concern on the part of average Canadians about the economy. Once again the Liberals have slipped two points. Obviously the national unity issue is not getting across to the majority of Canadians as the Prime Minister would like. Canadians today are still preoccupied with pocket book, bread and butter issues. I do not think the average Canadian expects anyone to wave a magic wand and make all our troubles go away overnight. I do not think the average Canadian wants a great deal in material terms. But I am sure the average Canadian is very concerned that we are not only not holding our own in terms of real income but also that we are falling back. Tremendous demands are being made upon Canadians to buy at a time when they simply do not have money. Wealthy Canadians do not spend a large proportion of their income anyway. They save it, invest it or bank it. The interesting thing is that even those who are in the middle income bracket are trying to do the same thing because they are afraid of what is going to happen tomorrow, next week or next year.

In my opinion, the Canadian people have lost confidence in this government. They have not lost confidence in themselves. But what is the Prime Minister saying wherever he goes? He says; "Be proud that you are Canadian; be proud of yourselves; work harder." These are pious, stupid platitudes which he spews forth at political meetings that are very well orchestrated to make sure that 99.9 per cent of the people in the audience are Liberal supporters. Therefore, the account in the media looks great. One might get the impression that everybody in Hamilton is a Liberal. Let me say that the majority of Hamiltonians do not vote Liberal. However, no matter where the Prime Minister goes, that is the impression he wants to create.

It seems that we have adopted the Hollywood approach to politics, where everything is orchestrated and pre-arranged to the point where there is very little sense to it at all. We must come clean with the people of this country. We must be fair and honest with them. The Prime Minister is not doing that. When he does appear to be honest with the people of this country, and when he does appear to come clean with them, it is on the national unity issue and not on the economic issues which plague us.

When we advocated an expansionary approach to the economy last autumn, the government said that that would just send inflation up the ladder again. What nonsense! When there is plant operating capacity of about 80 per cent, an injection of cash will not reach inflation proportions for at least two years. Why not take the initiative now? I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), who is not here tonight, no doubt because of other commitments, and the Prime Minister, who cannot be here tonight because of other commitments, to take a bold step forward instead of dilly-dallying back and forth and waiting for George to do it.

"George" happens to be the President of the United States. Our government is hoping that the benefits of the risks taken by the United States and the benefits of American guts will spin off into Canada. Then the Prime Minister will say that the credit is his, Americans are willing to gamble. They are not afraid of inflation. They want to put people back to work, and that is what the New Democratic Party of Canada wants to do today. We do not want those who are working to have to pay more taxes and higher unemployment insurance rates in order to keep people away from work. That is what the Liberal government has allowed to happen for the past two and one-half years. We just cannot afford any more unemployment, yet unemployment is going to get worse this winter and on to the spring.

I hope the Prime Minister has the courage to call a snap election. I would be delighted to go to the people of Brant in April, because I know that the makeup of this chamber would be radically changed. The Prime Minister says he will follow the polls. I must say that that really reflects a lack of courage. When the government brought in a bill to abolish capital punishment—and I was with the government on that issue—it ignored the wishes of anywhere from 70 per cent to 80 per cent of Canadians.

The Prime Minister says: "No, I am going to wait until the polls are favourable to me and the Liberal party before I call an election." I challenge the government opposite to call this election as soon as possible so that we can clean the cobwebs out and bring some vitality back to government. I do not want to be personal, but quite frankly when I look at the treasury benches day in and day out and note the difference between what happens when the Prime Minister is in his seat and what happens when he is away, I know that we are dealing with a one-man government.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Blackburn: Canadians do not want one-man governments, so I challenge the Prime Minister to call an election. We will fight the government on economic issues, and I welcome hon. members opposite to sit on my side of the House for the next ten years.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—DATE WHEN HARBOUR PATROL BOAT WILL BE PROVIDED FOR VANCOUVER

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, on December 7, 1977, as recorded at page 1639 of Hansard, I asked the following question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang):

> ... when will the minister take the initiative to provide a Canada-built harbour (patrol) vessel for the port of Vancouver, the largest and busiest harbour on the west coast of the North American continent?

● (2202)

The National Harbours Board in 1977 asked four Vancouver shipyards, all in need of work, to submit a design of and specifications for their concept of a good harbour patrol boat. The four companies, on their own time and at their own expense, went through the design and specifications bidding process with four separate designs. The tenders were opened on September 6, 1977. The high bid was $226,600 and the low bid was $191,400. The bids were close; the prices were right and were competitive.

The low bidder subsequently asked when he would be allowed to go ahead. He was told by the National Harbours Board and the Department of Transport that there was not enough money available to cover the bid. The four bidders were asked to quote again and reduce the horsepower of the vessels they had designed. What a stupid request, Mr. Speaker, for an organization in the government that is dealing with marine equipment all the time. As it happens, due to the escalation in value of the United States dollar and inflation attrition, it would not make any difference if the horsepower of the vessel was reduced.

We are now told by the Department of Transport and the National Harbours Board that they will go through the same futile exercise with the plastic boat industry. I caution them not to get involved and waste their money since there seems to be no commitment on the part of the National Harbours Board to fulfil this very necessary equipment requirement for the port of Vancouver. What a waste of time and entrepreneurial working capital, particularly as one tallies the accumulated waste that is the taxpayers' legacy from this government.

An example of waste and apparent patronage occurred in 1974 when the National Harbours Board purchased a U.S.-built vessel in New Orleans, the Supply Venture. Apparently, someone in Halifax purchased this boat in New Orleans for $25,000, brought it to Halifax, then transferred the ownership to a company called Halifax Fishing Ventures Ltd. I have not been able to find that this company was ever registered, but it sold the vessel to the Department of Transport for $75,000 on a seaworthiness certificate. The vessel was shipped to Vancouver as deck cargo where in 1975 it was appraised at $10,000. It is nothing but a pile of junk. The engines have been removed but it has not been possible to get them to turn over. The boat lies in shame under a Vancouver bridge. This is an example of the patronage and waste of money involved in providing a needed boat for the port of Vancouver. The $40,000 has obviously gone to somebody but not to the entrepreneurs who put forward legitimate bids for the equipment. It is a national shame to see patronage and waste like this when hardworking entrepreneurs and skilled labour are idle and cannot even be given a simple, direct order for a badly needed patrol vessel for the port of Vancouver.

I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that I have been waiting for answers to my order paper questions on this subject since November 28, 1977.

All that is offered is more stonewalling, more secrecy, more cover-up and abuse within the mandate of trust given to this government by the people of Canada. I take this opportunity to ask again when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) will take the initiative and provide a Canadian built harbour partrol vessel for the port of Vancouver, the largest, busiest and most profitable harbour on the west coast of the continent of North America.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): I agree with the hon. member on the importance of the port of Vancouver.

[English]

An hon. Member: We know, we live there!

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: If the hon. member would only listen, he might learn something. I agree with the hon. member on the importance of the port of Vancouver, a port which, as everyone knows, is open twelve months a year, which is of great importance for the economy of the Pacific coast and the whole of Canada.

This port has known a very extensive development over the past ten years, because of the increasing tonnage which is using its facilities. Statistical reports indicate that over 40 million tons of goods have been handled in the port of Vancouver in 1976, which is more than any other Canadian port.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, in view of this fast increase of the tonnage handled in the port of Vancouver, it is understandable that—

• (2207)

[English]

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Lapointe: Wait until the end and you will hear the answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is quite understandable that a port of such importance wants to be provided with the necessary facilities to maintain its activities. At present, of the two patrolling vessels operating in the port of Vancouver, one has been in service for 17 years and the other for 33 years. Plans have been made to phase out the latter and replace it with a more recent boat which could better meet the more complex needs of the current facilities and the increased trade.

[English]

The Department of Supply and Services was therefore asked to obtain tenders for the supply of a suitable patrol vessel for the port of Vancouver and four tenders were received in response to the request. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that tenders have now been reviewed and that the contract will be awarded within the next few days.

An hon. Member: To whom?

Mr. Lapointe: I do not know, sir. It will be awarded within the next few days.

Along with the hon. member from the province of British Columbia we all look forward to the day in the not too distant future when the efficiency of the port of Vancouver will be increased by the addition of a new harbour patrol vessel.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—REASON FOR CONTINUING HIGH LEVEL OF INFLATION—DATE WHEN LEVEL WILL REACH FOUR PER CENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the matter which brings me into the adjournment debate tonight is an exchange I had with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on November 29, 1977, an exchange which was recorded in Hansard at pages 1349 and 1350. Very simply, I asked the minister why inflation in Canada over the three prior months had been running at an annualized rate of more than 8 per cent while our neighbour to the south, the United States, was cruising along with an inflation rate of only half that of ours. I further asked the minister why the government had silently abandoned its one time projected goal of 4 per cent inflation for this year, putting it off instead until some time after 1980.

None of the questions were meant to be taken lightly. With nearly a million Canadians out of work, with inflation again gathering momentum, and with the federal fiscal deficit topping $9 billion, these are serious questions of concern to all thinking Canadians. Yet the man most responsible for the government's fiscal and financial policies, the finance minister, merely ducked the questions by implying that he had never set such goals for the country, and that anyway they did not matter all that much.

This approach is all too typical of this government. When it finds that it cannot meet even its own standards of performance it simply puts those standards off, or maintains that goals are, after all, not important. When this administration brought in the wage and price control package it did so with much fanfare and ballyhoo about getting inflation down to 4 per cent this year. Let's remember that. It was the level of inflation we were told this government would achieve. Now, with inflation running about twice that level—in fact last month it was up to 9.5 per cent in a year over year basis—the government, rather than taking a hard look at its policy and programs, has decided instead to move the target back a couple of years.

We have even more current examples of where this minister is openly deceptive with the Canadian public. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, on October 20 the minister indicated that if we accepted his program inflation would be below 6 per cent in 1978. Before the finance committee of this House, the minister subsequently confirmed that by 6 per cent he meant that the average rate of inflation for the totality of the year 1978 would be 6 per cent. Those are his words.

On January 16 he crept into Toronto and spoke to the Canadian Club. He told them that the rate of increase in the consumer price index would be down to 6 per cent by year end, in short by December of this year as opposed to his earlier prediction. This type of deception by the Minister of Finance is totally unacceptable. It is time we called it what it is. It is open misrepresentation to the Canadian public.

The government seems to be in the position where they are willing to go to virtually any length to avoid living up to responsibility for the state of our economy. They will rationalize. They will make excuses. They will even attempt to rewrite history. They will do anything but face their own glaring mismanagement.

We saw this in committee recently when the Minister of Finance—naturally, it is very hard to get him before a standing committee of this House because he does not like to be cross-questioned when he is out of his depth and virtually does not know what he is doing—tried to account for a staggering $11 billion deficit in manufacturing trade. That is the amount this incompetent government has allowed to run up in this country. The minister came back with the startling observation that it is a matter of definition. He said that if we call it manufacturing, there is an $11 billion trade deficit. However, if you include certain other things, such as wheat, for example, which the good Lord presumably manufactures, he said the deficit would be something less than $11 billion.

What absolute hypocrisy to be suggesting that it is simply a question of definition. The government blame everyone they can think of. They blame the Arabs for our problems. They blame the United States government if it suits their purposes. They blame labour and management. They blame everybody but the obvious, themselves.

What is even worse, the government tries to minimize the seriousness of the situation. With a current account trade deficit of over $4 billion, with unemployment at the highest level in 40 years, and incidentally higher than in any industrialized country in the world, with inflation hovering at dangerous levels, the minister has the gall to tell the Financial Times, as he did last November, "and in ten years' time the people will say oh, gee, 1977—it was great."

The Minister of Finance has sent his parliamentary secretary here tonight because he does not like to face members of this House. I hope the parliamentary secretary will try to set the minister's record straight.

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the reason my minister cannot be here tonight is because he is speaking to the Canadian people in a very positive fashion. As the hon. member knows, the parliamentary secretary usually represents the minister at the late show.

To get a balanced view of our performance relative to that of the United States, it is necessary to look at more than one single indicator, as the member opposite has done. When a more comprehensive view is taken, it is not at all obvious that we are seriously underperforming relative to the United States.

While recent price increases in Canada have been somewhat greater in recent months than south of the border, there are other areas of economic activity where we have done better, in some cases much better, than have our American neighbours. For example, relative to 1974, business fixed capital formation here has increased by almost 50 per cent while the increase in the United States fell short of 30 per cent. Our merchandise exports are up 40 per cent over the same period while those of the U.S. increased by less than 30 per cent.

It is true that the rate of inflation, as measured by the consumer price index has recently been rising faster in Canada than in the United States. In December, the CPI in Canada was 9.5 per cent higher than one year earlier while the increase in the U.S. was 6.8 per cent.

The difference in these rates can be narrowed substantially when food and non-food prices are considered separately. Using the same year-on-year calculations, non-food prices in Canada were up 7.4 per cent while those in the U.S. were up almost as much at 6.3 per cent.

One of the main reasons why our food prices have moved up more than in the United States has been the recent depreciation of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar. This means that the Canadian dollar price of goods whose price is set in the international marketplace has increased by the full amount of the dollar depreciation. While all imports are subject to this effect to one degree or another, it is particularly evident with respect to food prices. There are two reasons for this. First, many food products are simply not produced in Canada due to climatic conditions and they have to be imported. Second, due to the perishable nature of foodstuffs, the impact of the lower dollar shows up right away; there are no appreciable inventories to stretch out and soften the impact.

While these price impacts are regrettable, they are unavoidable in an economy as open as Canada's. For example, the recent downward movement in the U.S. currency is not nearly so onerous in its price implications for the U.S. economy simply because imports form, relative to Canada, almost an insignificant portion of U.S. final demand and intermediate products.

As I have already mentioned, the non-food component of the Canadian CPI, while rising somewhat faster than the comparable U.S. series, has not been too far out of line. Part of the divergence that does exist in these non-food prices can also be traced to the lower Canadian dollar. In addition to making prices of consumer goods higher, production costs, which of course eventually wind up in final prices, have also been adversely affected to some degree since imported materials prices may now be higher as a consequence of the lower dollar. It is also the case that because energy prices started out at a lower level in Canada than in the United States, the rates of increase here must now be greater as we adjust to the world level. This is reflected in the CPI where Canadian energy prices in December were up 11.4 per cent while the November figures for the U.S. show a percentage increase of 8.1 per cent.

The greater upward pressure on our prices relative to the U.S. over the recent past must also surely be a lagged consequence of our very inflationary wage rate increases over the past few years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret I have to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but his time has expired.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO PERMIT USE OF FRENCH IN ONTARIO COURTS

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on December 13 last, I asked the Minister of Justice whether he would use his good offices to encourage the province of Ontario to recognize the use of French in all provincial courts.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that the Ontario Judicature Act formally forbids the use of any language other than English in Ontario courts of justice.

The amendments to be made to the acts both federal and provincial would allow the use of French in the provincial courts.

As information is the best tool in clearing up misunderstandings, and in the hope of stirring interest in the English majority of my own province, I shall therefore use Shakespeare's language to add to what I have to say.

[Mr. Lumley.]

[English]

It is not generally known by Ontarians that their own French-speaking population has no legal right to use French in everyday dealings, such as the drafting of legal contracts, insurance policies and other important transactions, including even personal wills which must be translated into English before being officially registered. I sincerely believe that when English-speaking Canadians understand the situation which exists in some Canadian provinces where there are substantial French-speaking minorities they will wish to raise these Canadians, often their own neighbours, friends or even relatives, to the legal status of fully-fledged citizens of a state where the majority is respectful and generous in recognizing and accepting language equality whether in the legal, health, educational or social domains.

In the short time allowed me tonight I should like to call attention to a particular problem which affects French-speaking Canadians living in Ontario. Bearing in mind that French in the Ontario courts is tolerated only in a discretionary way without any legal guarantee and that section 127 of the Ontario Judicature Act formally forbids the use of any language other than English in Ontario courts, last December I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) what pressures he intended to bring to bear on his Ontario counterpart to make sure that section 127 of the act might be amended so as to allow the use of French in all Ontario courts. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the Speech from the Throne it was stated that after consultation with the provinces the government of Canada would amend the Criminal Code so as to guarantee the right of accused persons to be tried in the official language of their choice. This commitment follows the positive actions taken by the present Attorney General of Ontario, the Hon. Roy McMurtry, whereby ministerial direction and within his discretion he allowed French to be used in certain designated judicial districts, beginning with two experimental projects, Sudbury and Ottawa, and enlarging this privilege to include several other judicial areas in Ontario. This was an encouraging and far-reaching measure which pleased many residents of Ontario.

For the first time Franco-Ontarians have been given the privilege of defending themselves before the courts in their mother tongue. I say it is a privilege, Mr. Speaker, because a privilege can be withdrawn. What we want is a right. That is what we need, and we want it enshrined in legislation.

To reach this goal of providing the right to Francophones to be heard in their own language in Ontario courts certain amendments are required to the Criminal Code. The Attorney General of Ontario has asked for these changes to the Criminal Code, and I understand also that the federal Minister of Justice is presently studying amendments with a view to making provision for accused persons to have the right of choosing the official language in which their case will be heard by the courts. This implies the use of judges and juries which can understand the language of the accused, and provision of the necessary administrative court services in the language understood by the accused.

In addition to the required amendments to the Criminal Code, amendments to the Official Languages Act would be required, making it the duty of federal courts to provide simultaneous translation of the proceedings, including the evidence given, from one official language to the other, and this everywhere in Canada.

Additional amendments would be required to allow an accused who was arraigned before a court of criminal jurisdiction and who speaks an official language other than that in which the proceedings of the courts are conducted the right to request a change of venue, making it possible for his case to be heard in a judicial district in Canada where his language is used.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I have tabled before this House Bill C-210, an act to correct certain anomalies and inconsistencies in the Revised Statutes of Canada pertaining to the protection of Canadian language rights. I hope to be able to debate this bill in the near future.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Minister of Justice of Canada for a progress report on his negotiations with the province of Ontario to make it possible to amend the judicature act of Ontario, the Criminal Code and the Official Languages Act. The province of Ontario has demonstrated its willingness to recognize that the use of the French language in Ontario is of fundamental importance in the administration of justice in this province. I am aware also that the federal government through its Department of Justice is co-operating with the province of Ontario in bringing forward the required amendments to make this possible. In times when we speak of justice, equality, tolerance and understanding, it is a measure of Canadian unity when provinces and the federal government can work together for the benefit of the citizens of this country.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): It gives me great pleasure to be able to respond this evening to this very interesting and important question and argument posed by my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). I would take note at the same time, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a single member of the opposition present here in the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order, order!

Mr. Young: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, one has just come in; the one who is always here.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) does not intend to bring specific pressure to bear on the attorney general of Ontario in view of the fact that the federal parliament has no particular authority of jurisdiction over provincial judicature acts. However, I point out that Department of Justice officials have met with almost all of the provinces in an effort to obtain provincial co-operation for the implementation of amendments to allow for choice of language in a trial. I might add that the consultations with Ontario were especially productive. Ontario is well geared in the way of court staff and judges to implement bilingual trials.

Hon. members will appreciate, I am sure, that the administrative ramifications of these measures are significant. The support staff will have to be as bilingual as the judge and jurors and the court reporters. For some provinces these people will have to be trained as they are starting virtually afresh.

In respect of the introduction of amendments to the Criminal Code, there are finishing touches required for the consultations and the drafting of the bill itself. The Minister of Justice expects to be able to introduce these amendments very soon, although no specific date can be given at this particular time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT DECLARE OPPOSITION TO CUBA'S USE OF ARMED FORCES IN OTHER COUNTRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, to move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That this House views with fear and alarm the course followed by President Castro and the Republic of Cuba, recently intensified, of using the armed forces of that country to operate in Africa and elsewhere to bring about the downfall of administrations that are not communist.

Furthermore, despite the fact that such conduct by Cuba is a continuing threat to peace, the high degree of public admiration and friendship shown to President Castro by the present government of Canada in the last three years is being interpreted in Africa and South America as approval by Canada.

Therefore, in the hope that it will contribute to removing any misunderstanding of Canada's position, this House declares that it is unalterably opposed to and condemns what is being done by Cuba in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FAILURE OF U.S.S.R. TO WARN CANADA OF IMPENDING CRASH OF SATELLITE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In order that all members of the House of Commons can add support to the Canadian government's note of protest to the U.S.S.R. concerning that government's inexcusable failure to warn Canadian officials of the impending crash of a potentially dangerous satellite, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That this House express its serious displeasure with the government of the U.S.S.R. for failing to warn Canada of the dangers posed to the Canadian people by the satellite which crashed on our territory.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recent legislation of the government regarding the abolition of capital punishment has obviously resulted in an increase in capital murder, particularly the murder of police officers. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard):

That this parliament immediately amend the Criminal Code and reinstate capital punishment as the ultimate, permanent and effective deterrent to capital crime.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO INCREASE PROFITS OF MILK PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to Standing Order 43, to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the financial difficulties industrial milk producers are faced with as a result of the government's inconsistent dairy policies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House urge immediately the Minister of Agriculture to take the necessary steps so that dairy producers may obtain the quotas or, either through subsidies or otherwise, the incomes they need to maintain a decent standard of living.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—NEGOTIATION OF SETTLEMENT OF LAND CLAIMS BEFORE CONSTRUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the urgency Yukon native people place on the settlement of their land claims and their desire to have these claims settled as soon as possible, before the construction of a northern pipeline, and in view of the Dean Lysyk inquiry recommendation that a second stage inquiry be conducted, since this has not taken place, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

● (1412)

That this House is of the opinion that the government should begin negotiations immediately with a view to settling the land claims of the Yukon native Indians in principle prior to the commencement of construction of the proposed northern pipeline.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented at this time, pursuant to the Standing Order, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REFERENCE OF OECD REPORT TO COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. As the December, 1977, Economic Outlook published by OECD has painted a particularly pessimistic picture for Canada in the coming year, including a rising unemployment level, soggy real growth, and contains the observation that "the Canadian economy seems likely to continue to face difficult problems" notwithstanding the budgetary measures announced in October, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That there be an immediate reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the OECD report so that we may receive further explanation with respect to that body's pessimistic view of Canada, and an explanation from the Minister of Finance of his growth projection for the GNP when virtually all other economic commentators see problems and feel that the Minister of Finance is being irresponsible in his projection of growth.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of pressing necessity.

Given the national crisis through which Canada is going at this moment, and this is especially true in Quebec, and given the possible danger inherent in the departure from Montreal of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That this House urge the Sun Life board of directors and shareholders to reconsider their decision and to remain in Montreal in the best interests of everyone.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

TRANSPORT CANADA

REQUEST THAT CALENDARS BE PRINTED IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Department of Transport has identified November 7 as the date of the next election, and that according to the 1978 Department of Transport calendar, printed in the United States, not only will November 7 be the election day but it will be a statutory holiday as well, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to require Transport Canada to have its calendars printed in Canada and that they only designate Canadian holidays and anniversaries.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION WHY CHARGES NOT LAID FOR DESTRUCTION OF SPAWNING BEDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the massive damage to the Weaver Creek spawning channel by logging and recreational activity in the mountains behind Weaver Creek, resulting in the loss of virtually the entire chum and sockeye run from the spawning beds—an estimated loss of some 700,000 salmon—and the serious effect this will have on the west coast salmon fishery, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That appropriate charges be laid under the new fisheries legislation, Bill C-38, and that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment be requested to rise in this House on motions to explain why charges have not been laid to date.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In light of the major crisis of unemployment that faces Canada and the fact that the only new economic legislation that this government has brought in is the employment tax credit program, which is three months later than it needed to be, can the minister tell the House whether the administrative arrangements are in place or are being put in place for the employment tax credit, and can he give the House a guarantee that the program will be in effect by February 15?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I spoke with my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who will be responsible for the administration of this program. The program will be in place by March 1. I hope it will be passed very quickly. I should like to say that on Monday the Leader of the Opposition told the House that I was very often away. I am not very often away—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Order.

• (1417)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that we would have more economic legislation brought more quickly before this House if the minister were paying attention to his responsibilities as Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have just indicated that the hon. minister really cannot go back and explain his absence, and I do not think the hon. Leader of the Opposition should be permitted to make a comment on it.

Mr. Clark: We are now told that the unemployed who might look to this employment tax credit legislation for some help will have to wait until March 1 before the only item on the government's agenda is ready to take effect. I ask the Minister of Finance whether or not he is prepared to go to work in his department, to give attention to that department, to bring in a budget before March, and to stop dragging his feet as he has done on the employment tax credit legislation.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it took the opposition five weeks to pass a bill which was proposed to the House in the spring. In addition to that, I was fighting against separation yesterday, not like the Leader of the Opposition who is going to Quebec City on Friday to try to make a cosy deal with the separatists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps it is appropriate that I take about two minutes now, which I will add on to the end of the question period, to remind the House of some of the difficulties we are getting into which relate to my relaxation of the requirements of the question period. In the first two days of our return here I thought it was not appropriate, after the recess, to be too stringent. However, as I permit longer questions with more extensive preambles, I find longer answers with more political input, and from both sides of the House that encourages a lot of barracking which probably would not take place if I were to take a harder line.

I felt things had started out today on a much more positive note, with a very brief question which was going to receive a very quick answer. However, we have begun to wander off the track a little. There is a natural temptation, in the atmosphere that exists in this fourth year of this parliament, to try to interject a few outside aspects in questions and answers. All of us realize that it is in our own best interests in the operation of this parliament if we again, through my guidance, return to a stricter line of short and precise questions, followed by short and precise answers.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister, in seeking the leadership of the Liberal party in Quebec, failed to answer my short and precise question. I asked whether the Minister of Finance is prepared to come to work in Ottawa and give his department the priority attention it and the unemployed in Canada require, so that we can have a budget brought in before the end of February.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I was in Ottawa on Monday. I left at eleven o'clock and returned at three o'clock. I worked in my department all day outside of that time. I do not have to be given any lessons by the Leader of the Opposition as to how to work for my country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Within a month after we returned in the fall, I had an economic statement and I changed the economic policies of the government somewhat. When I feel we need another budget, I will propose one. At this time, I think the best thing to do is to try to pass the legislation we have before the House. Of course, there is no miracle solution to this problem of the growth in unemployment. We are extremely preoccupied with it. Tomorrow I will meet with the ministers of finance. Next month the Prime Minister and the premiers of the provinces, with the ministers of finance, will have a meeting on all these matters. I am devoting all my time to that. However, I am not neglecting the other problems in Quebec. I believe I have to remain in Canada and fight for it. I will not make any cosy deal with Lévesque.

● (1422)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, will this part-time minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —give us a commitment to bring in a budget before the end of February? Will he tell the House of Commons, now, whether he and his government have rejected completely the idea of accepting the advice of the OECD and most other economists to add more stimulus to the Canadian economy through tax cuts or some other means, so that we will not have even more Canadians out of work as a result of the policies of this government to date?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, last week we had a meeting with the business people of this country, who stated that the economic policy of the government is the right one. The Conference Board said the same thing. Some people who are not known to be our friends, such as the president of the Royal Bank and the president of the Toronto Bank, agree with our policy. The only banker who does not agree with our economic policy is the former president of the Western Bank.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Clark.]

REQUEST FOR REASSESSMENT OF GOVERNMENT'S EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Following the release by Statistics Canada earlier this month of the unemployment figure, showing 8.5 per cent—an all-time high rate of unemployment for the country—the minister is reported as having said, and I quote, "the system is probably working as well as it can, given the plight of the western world economy". While he was saying that, the OECD were issuing a report saying that Canada had the worst record of unemployment of any industrialized country in the western world.

I ask the minister, who I suspect is a little shaken up, having to bear this terrible burden of unemployment under this government, on behalf of the one million unemployed Canadians in this country, many of whom are facing hardship, whether he is prepared to reassess the government's employment programs in light of the failure of these programs to have any significant impact upon the terrible unemployment situation in the country.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be precise. I suggest to the hon. member that he read more carefully the OECD report, which indicated that Canada ranked number three among the countries that faced better prospects for recovery. We were after Japan and the United States as the third country that would, in fact, recover. I have indicated to ministers at provincial conferences that I am quite prepared to look at the Canada Works program to see if we can build in the economic growth component and work toward a more permanent type of job creation. We have had a twelvefold expansion in our job experience training program. That has been successful. The work sharing program now comprises some 12 different projects, where people are working who would not be working if we had listened to the opposition parties and had taken it out of the recent legislation. Therefore, we are doing our bit.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS ON INCREASED COST OF WELFARE BENEFITS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my final supplementary to the Minister of Finance. The one million Canadians who are unemployed will draw little consolation from what we have just heard, given the fact that Italy's record is better than ours on this question. On the basis of information from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, during the month of December over 2,000 people per working day were coming off unemployment insurance and having to go through the humiliation of applying for welfare, thereby placing a terrible burden on the provinces as well as on the people concerned. Is the minister prepared to enter into discussions with the provinces to measure the additional economic burden that this unemployment situation is placing on the provinces which have to pick up these welfare payments, especially the poorer provinces which can least afford it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first thing tomorrow morning I will be joining my colleagues the provincial finance ministers for a two-day meeting. Among the items under consideration will be the short term economic conditions. I intend to discuss this problem with them as I did last October and if solutions can be found and suggested quickly, we will do so. However, the situation is difficult and I must report to the House that last fall before making my statement in the House, I had obtained the agreement of all finance ministers. We will try once again tomorrow to develop a consensus to try to tackle all economic problems which are confronting us.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN PIPELINE—HOLDING OF INQUIRY INTO OPERATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I would remind the Minister of Finance that in the fall of 1929 Mr. Herbert Hoover also had the support of all the bankers in the United States. My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. No, Mr. Speaker, I will change my mind and address it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Considering that the hon. gentleman's predecessor said on April 19, "If the Alaska Highway application should receive approval, the government will establish a further inquiry to assist in developing terms and conditions for the construction and operation of the line", and considering that representatives of the Council of Yukon Indians have charged that the government has completely failed to implement this commitment to hold a follow-up public inquiry, can the minister clarify the situation, and will he take immediate steps to implement the commitment to which I have referred?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, I will not, Mr. Speaker. No decision has been taken on a further inquiry. In consultation with the Council of Yukon Indians and others I have raised the question of whether a further inquiry is really needed. The Lysyk inquiry went to some lengths in defining what would be contained in the terms and conditions, and I have made the point, both publicly and in private meetings, that in my view we really need to define the terms and conditions and make them available to the agency that will eventually flow from legislation and have them available for public discussion. In other words what I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is what we need now are precise proposals, rather than further inquiries. I say this while repeating that no decision has been taken; I am just telling the House what my thinking is now.

Mr. Broadbent: I take it that the minister's refusal to guarantee—

Mr. Faulkner: No decision has been made.

Mr. Broadbent: Saying there has been no decision implies a reversal of the previous decision. The previous decision was that there would be an inquiry. The position now taken is contrary to the commitment which was made.

INDUSTRY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—SALE OF CONSTRUCTION EQUIPMENT TO UNITED STATES AND NOT CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I should like to address a question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Is the hon. gentleman aware that the U.S. Alyeska Pipeline Disposal Company has for sale pipeline construction equipment worth between $1 billion and $1.5 billion which could service the entire Canadian section of the Alcan pipeline, and that this equipment is scheduled to go on sale not in Canada but in the United States? In this regard I ask the minister what specific guarantees have been provided to ensure that Canadian companies and Canadian workers will be used in the construction of the Canadian portion of the pipeline?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I appreciate the hon. member providing this interesting information. Undoubtedly, he has gleaned it from the Wall Street Journal, which I have not had an opportunity to peruse recently. However, I will follow the hon. member as he leads me through the pages of the Wall Street Journal from day to day.

As to the second part of the question, which relates to the over-all opportunity for Canadian participation both in employment and in the provision of goods and services for the construction of the line, I repeat what has already been stated by the Prime Minister, that Canadian business and Canadian producers will have a full opportunity to participate—effectively, we believe—in the construction of this line. The estimated number of jobs to which the hon. member referred yesterday or the day before is still valid. It is our view that 100,000 man-years can be expected in Canada during the construction of this line. There is no withdrawal from the estimate put forward last September when the terms of the agreement were made public.

● (1432)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, whatever one might say about the reliability of the Wall Street Journal, by standards of comparison of reliability it is 100 per cent better than the minister. I have a final supplementary for the minister since he did not answer my second question after attempting to do so for two minutes.

Are there any specific guarantees respecting the construction aspect of the job? I am not referring to steel, because we realize the government sold out the steel producers in Canada some time ago. Is the government making any guarantees that Canadian jobs and firms will be used on the construction? I put that question in the context of this very expensive construction equipment which is necessary and which is going on sale in the United States and not in Canada, and in light of the fact that a number of Canadians already have been denied the right to purchase that equipment.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has suggested that the Canadian steel industry has been sold out. I prefer to listen to the president of Stelco as a spokesman for the steel industry, rather than the hon. member. Mr. Gordon has stated that he is fully confident he will be able to compete successfully for this business in Canada. It amounts to a very substantial amount of business for Canadian companies and workers. Also, he believes they will be able to compete effectively in the United States against American competition. Thus, there is no question of selling out. I believe the hon. member is selling out any sense of honesty when he continues to repeat what is nothing but unsubstantiated rumour.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT PLAY GREATER ROLE IN ECONOMIC MATTERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

On January 14 last, the Prime Minister granted an interview to the newspaper La Tribune of Sherbrooke. I noted that the comments of the Prime Minister were rather vague on one issue. He said among other things that his government would be willing to grant some powers to the provinces but in return, it would ask and I quote: But in return, the federal government would demand an increased role in the management of the economy.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister what he meant by an increased role in the management of the economy in that context?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was speaking during a debate on the constitution where I specified that the throne speech in October referred to proposals which would be made during this session. Those proposals would not deal with the sharing of powers as such, but if the provinces wanted to discuss the sharing of powers — and between 1968 and 1971 we made several suggestions concerning the transfer of powers to the provinces — we might also suggest that some powers would be better exercised by the federal government than by the provinces which have done quite poorly.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary. Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House whether the provinces have asked to discuss with the federal government the matter of this sharing of powers?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, but I would remind the hon. member that during the two years prior to October 1975, when the federal government announced price and wage controls, the provincial premiers, meeting among themselves, had begged the federal government to do something about inflation, explaining that the provinces had no powers in the field of inflation, that they may have had some powers but that even if all the provinces exercised them individually they could not achieve the results expected. They asked us to do something, which we did in October 1975 after consulting the premiers on the very same day. That, then, is an example of the transfer of temporary powers made at the request and with the support of the provinces.

FINANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER DISCUSSED HIGH LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT WITH OECD OFFICIALS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Undoubtedly, the minister has reviewed table 8 which is contained in the OECD's Economic Outlook. Unfortunately, it shows that Canada has the highest level of unemployment of any of the 12 industrialized nations which it reviewed—higher than the average by almost 3 percentage points. Has the minister discussed with his staff or representatives of OECD why Canada should have had during 1977 the highest unemployment level of any of the industrialized nations?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the Department of Finance, the economic policy of the government is under constant review. We are, of course, very much concerned by the rate of unemployment in Canada and know that one of the problems is the fact that the rate of entry into the labour force is the highest in the world; last year, Canada was, of all the countries in the world, the one where the largest number of new jobs were created. Unfortunately, the rate of new entries is such that, though we managed to get 290,000 new jobs from the Canadian economy last year, the rate of unemployment did not go down. Yet, the growth of employment in Canada is the highest in the world.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Referring to the same Economic Outlook report, it is anticipated that in the current year, 1978, unemployment will exceed 8.5 per cent, and there is some danger that it could go even higher. Also, it is anticipated that job creation in Canada will start to decline. Has the minister discussed with his staff what can be done effectively to reverse this OECD prediction, bearing in mind that Canada has bountiful resources which are second to none compared with the other industrialized nations which OECD reviewed?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we do not agree with the OECD prediction. Most of the forecasters in the Canadian private and public sectors are predicting a growth of approximately 5 per cent for next year.

Mr. Clark: You are the only one.

Mr. Chrétien: No, sir.

Mr. Clark: Name one.

Mr. Chrétien: The Conference Board of Canada, and the Conference Board of the United States. The other day, in Toronto, the question was put to Mr. Rockefeller and he said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Well, I did not know him. I did not ask the question. He is not a pal of mine.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I met him after his statement. He said that their private study concluded there would be more growth next year in Canada than in the United States.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed also to the Minister of Finance. I should like to point out that the bankers he has been talking to are not among the unemployed of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: As an estimated $1.2 billion is being paid out currently in various tax credits by this government and incentives to promote employment, and according to the government's own estimate there is another $1 billion going out for various make-work projects, government training projects, etc., will the Minister of Finance indicate whether his department or any department has undertaken the monitoring of those various programs to determine if we are actually getting the results we should from over $2 billion worth of incentives to try to correct the unemployment situation in this country?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the hon. member is at least recognizing now that we have put into the Canadian economy $2 billion of incentives. Of course we are monitoring this on a daily basis. A study is being conducted by the Department of Finance and the Department of Employment and Immigration. We are following that position very closely. If something has to be changed, we will be happy to do it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE THAT SOVIET SATELLITE CONTAINED NUCLEAR PACKAGE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. When the Prime Minister visited the NORAD headquarters at Colorado Springs in late December, was he advised that the Russian Cosmos satellite carried a nuclear package, that it was in difficulty and likely to crash?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I finished my visit at NORAD in Colorado Springs, I gave a press conference indicating that I had been briefed not only on the problem of air defence, which is the subject of NORAD—air defence essentially against bombers—but that the officials at NORAD had gone further and had gone into a great deal of briefing concerning space and problems of space. At the time I indicated that Canada was fortunate, indeed, to be able to share a lot of the information regarding space because it was in NORAD, but which under NORAD—

• (1442)

An hon. Member: Now answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: I am answering the question. If the hon. gentleman could follow the reasoning, he would see that I am answering the question, but it calls for a little bit of attention. In indicating that they had briefed me on space, I would only go as far as saying that they did tell me they were monitoring all the man-made garbage up there and they knew exactly what it was doing. They knew that some of it had already fallen and some would fall again. They went into some detail which I do not think is appropriate for me to go into.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE THAT SOVIET SATELLITE CONTAINED NUCLEAR PACKAGE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it seems rather clear that the briefing the Prime Minister received was the garbage. I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Considering that the Prime Minister claims the briefing he got at Colorado Springs, as referred to in Hansard yesterday, would indicate they were extremely forthcoming in talking to him about space garbage, when did the Minister of National Defence know there was a nuclear package aboard the Cosmos satellite, and when did he know it was going to crash?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I knew at the end of last week that there was a nuclear package aboard, and I knew that it was disoriented in orbit and was likely to come down somewhere on earth, possibly in Canada and possibly in the South Atlantic, last Friday. I knew specifically when it did re-enter, on Tuesday morning, I believe it was.

Mr. McKinnon: What the Minister of National Defence has just said, Mr. Speaker, confirms that the Prime Minister was not given a full briefing at NORAD when he made his visit in late December. I would now like to ask the Minister of National Defence, who told us yesterday the operation was Canadian-controlled, whether he will inform us if the United States U-2 which is checking for radiation at high altitudes has reported to us on its findings so far, and whether the American technicians manning American radiation detection pods in the low-level search have reported anything to us on their findings so far.

Mr. Danson: Let me answer the first allegation, Mr. Speaker. I was going to use a word that is unparliamentary. Briefings at NORAD are very thorough and very intense. My hon. friend has had briefings there. I do not know if they allowed him a full briefing; they may have had doubts, considering the questions he is raising, for the sake of western security—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: Certainly, there are those that are out of orbit, those that are not, and those that are disoriented. They are under observation. We cannot take precise readings that far in advance. Having regard to the second question the hon. gentleman asked—which is a legitimate question—there are Canadian crews on board the Hercules surveillance pods. They are reporting and working jointly as a team, and we do not make a clear distinction as to who is Canadian and who is American. When they are working together there, everybody is informed. The commander of the search, of RCC in Edmonton, is fully informed and fully aware. We have continuing co-operation with our American allies through NORAD and through the space program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Prud'homme: Following the ruling by Quebec Superior Court Chief Justice Deschênes that all clauses of Bill 101 related to legislation and justice language are invalid, would the Prime Minister offer his own comments to this House?

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ANTI-CORROSION CODE FOR AUTOMOBILES—TIME AVAILABLE TO COMPANIES TO DECIDE ON ADOPTION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As the new Canadian anti-corrosion code for automobiles can only be effective if it is obeyed by all Canadian automobile manufacturers, and in view of the fact that so far only one of these companies has agreed to comply with the code, I ask the minister how long the companies are to be given to make the decision to come aboard before the government decides it will pass legislation to back up the code?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Of the so-called Big Three, Mr. Speaker, one of the companies has said very clearly it will follow the code. Another has said its 1978 vehicles actually go beyond the code, although it did not say it would follow the code exactly as written. We have not heard from one of the major three. Several of the importer companies have indicated they will go along with the code. While no time limit was set down, we are awaiting the results of competition and consumer pressures to see whether others will come along. If legislation is necessary—and we have said we will proceed with legislation if that is the case—it will be carried out in full consultation with the provinces.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the government obviously intends to rely on voluntary compliance with the code, and this government in particular has had very sad experiences in trying to get people to obey guidelines on a voluntary basis. I ask the minister why the government does not now introduce legislation to back up the code, and thereby guarantee to Canadian automobile owners the kind of protection they have so long been denied.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, we believe in doing things in co-operation with industry and the private sector. This code was developed in close co-operation with the domestic manufacturers and importers. I must say that it received the strong support of all provincial governments as well as the Consumers' Association of Canada and the Automotive Protection Association.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

KITIMAT PIPELINE CO.—REQUEST THAT DECISION ON APPLICATION BE DEFERRED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources relating to the decision by the Kitimat Pipeline Company to reactivate its application for the construction of a pipeline from Kitimat, British Columbia, to Edmonton, requesting that the capacity of the pipeline be doubled to one million barrels per day. The west coast oil ports inquiry hearings headed by Dr. Andrew Thompson were postponed. Are they now to be resumed? If so, when will they be resumed? Also, will the minister assure the House that no decision will be made by the National Energy Board, or approval given by the government, until such time as the phase two hearings have been completed by Dr. Thompson?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when the inquiry was interrupted it was noted that the proceedings might have to be brought forward again at a time when a live Kitimat application came forward. This matter will now be considered with Dr. Thompson and a decision on how to proceed will then be made as soon as possible. As to the other part of the hon. member's question, I think perhaps the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should respond.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to hear the response of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but I would like the Minister of Transport to answer this question. In view of the fact that when the inquiry started, the government quite properly decided that public interest groups should have the opportunity to present their views and funded some of those groups, will this funding be carried on during the additional inquiry by Dr. Thompson and his group, and for what period of time?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the question of funding public interest groups, and other questions relating to cost and the time of the inquiry, are among those things we will want to discuss with Dr. Thompson to ensure that all proper steps are taken in connection with any possible pipeline.

IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC SELECTION CRITERIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It has reference to the tentative agreement between the government of Canada and the province of Quebec which would enable Quebec to establish its own points system for the selection of immigrants to that province. In view of the fact that the selection criteria would not be the same as for immigrants to other Canadian provinces, will immigrants qualifying under Quebec selection criteria have the right to interprovincial mobility? If so, has the government received the concurrence of the other provinces to accept immigrants who have qualified under Quebec's criteria?

• (1452)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have an agreement in principle with the province of Quebec, at least at the ministerial level. It remains for the Quebec minister to obtain the concurrence of his cabinet colleagues. The details of the program which I have seen so far were mutually beneficial, so that not only Quebec but all the provinces will be able to accept responsibility under the BNA Act for co-determination and the participation they should have in the immigration field.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, the minister chooses not to answer my question but to bypass it. In view of the far-reaching implications that this agreement has in principle, and in view of the assurances which the minister gave to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration that the committee would have an opportunity to study the regulations flowing out of the new Immigration Act, would the minister now fulfil his obligation and refer both the immigration regulations and the tentative agreement on immigrant selection to the standing committee for study and report back to the House?

Mr. Alexander: That is a good idea.

Mr. Cullen: Under the agreement there will be full mobility in the country: that is absolutely essential. Also, the agreement will be subject to the immigration laws. I have done more than a second mile, I think, by sending out to members of the committee the regulations as they are drafted, and I have asked for their comments. I have done that, also, in so far as provincial cabinet ministers who have this responsibility are concerned, so that they will note the message. I have also sent my provincial colleagues, in draft form, the kind of immigration agreement that I would like to see us enter into with Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia or Quebec. However, full mobility will be there.

ENERGY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—PREBUILDING OF SOUTHERN SECTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. As I noted yesterday, the U.S. President's decision and report to Congress on the Alaska natural gas transportation system states repeatedly that there is a possibility of prebuilding the southern section of the line. I find it difficult to believe that the President of the United States would rely solely on the musings of the NEB for the statement. Therefore, I ask the President of the Privy Council for clarification. Was the prebuilding of the southern portion of the pipeline discussed at all in the September negotiations?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have no recollection whatsoever that the matter was even discussed. Certainly, no provision was made in the agreement or in the negotiations leading up to the agreement regarding the prebuilding of the pipeline. In the legislation which is under preparation at present, which I hope to introduce reasonably soon to the House, there is no provision for the prebuilding of the pipeline. So it is a matter which has to be dealt with on different grounds from the general plan under which we are presently operating and the assumptions contained in the negotiations.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—ECONOMIC IMPACT OF PREBUILDING SOUTHERN SECTION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and ask whether he can explain the comments that he made outside the House yesterday which were reported on the CTV eleven o'clock news, namely, that the prebuilding of the southern portion of the pipeline could jeopardize the timing of the northern construction and delay completion of the pipeline until 1984-85, at a cost of perhaps $1 billion and thousands of jobs for Canadians. Does this mean that the government is not yet convinced of the benefits of preconstruction and is dragging its feet? Also, why is the government considering further delays in the building of the pipeline, when a short while ago they rejected a similar request by the Council of Yukon Indians?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that report is quite erroneous.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—PROJECTED DATE OF COMPLETION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I direct a further supplementary to the President of the Privy Council who may wish to answer this question instead of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is there a possibility that the date for the completion of the pipeline that is mentioned in the pipeline agreement might be changed, and does that mean that Canada will be in a position to renegotiate the other conditions of the agreement? Does it mean that the government may be able to recoup some of the possible benefits they gifted away when they negotiated the agreement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Without accepting the allegations contained in the last part of the question, may I point out that a timetable is provided in the agreement for the construction and operation of the pipeline, and there have been no discussions of any kind leading to a change in the provisions of that agreement. So I must say that I am at a loss to understand why there should be any doubt whatsoever as to the intention of the government to proceed with the legislation as quickly as possible and to proceed with the construction and operation of the pipeline according to plan.

INVENTORY OF NATURAL GAS—EFFECT ON ENERGY POLICY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It refers to the reliability of the reports that have recently come from his officials with respect to the inventory of natural gas located in western Canada, which would indicate that both domestic and export commitments can be met until the year 1990. I ask the minister whether these reports and forecasts were based on located supplies, or do they include such areas as the Beaufort Sea? Also, can the department provide any assurance as to the reliability of the forecasts, or will such assurance be sought before these forecasts are used to formulate further energy policies, relating them to the construction of a pipeline in the north?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, all forecasts involve a series of probabilities. We have tried to make that quite clear in the various reports we have put before the Canadian people and before the House. As to the suggestion to which I believe the hon. member is referring, that there might be more gas in the gas bubble than was first expected, it is quite possible that there might be. That is the opinion of one or two persons in my department. My department's view in respect of the inventory situation of natural gas is substantially the same as the findings of the National Energy Board in its Reasons for the Decision regarding the northern pipeline.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PENSIONS STUDY

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions relating to pension studies. I should like to direct the first one to the President of the Treasury Board. In April of 1977 he announced the establishment of a study to be undertaken by Tomenson-Alexander Associates. Has that study now been completed, and when will it be tabled in the House?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the study has been completed and it is now being translated and printed. I expect to be able to make it public in the not too distant future.

[Translation]

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My second question, Mr. Speaker, will be for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

To the best of my memory, an extensive study on pensions under all aspects, both public and private, was initiated in September 1976 within the government and in the public sector; it related more particularly to the Department of Finance and the Department of National Health and Welfare. My question is: When will this study be tabled in the House and referred to the appropriate committee? I also would like the minister to tell us whether she intends to introduce a bill based on this report and if so what will be the scope of such a bill?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, just before Christmas I had a preliminary meeting concerning the preparation of the report. I have not yet received the report and so it is too early to answer the other questions. However, I will inform the House as soon as I get the report.

INELIGIBILITY OF CANADIAN WORKERS TO RECEIVE UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for St. John's East pointed out that every day, because of the economic situation in Canada, about 2,000 Canadians become ineligible for unemployment insurance benefits and that in many cases they are forced to ask for welfare. Can the minister then tell the House if she has discussed this matter with the provinces and what immediate action we can anticipate from her to alleviate this serious situation?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the administration of welfare programs is under provincial jurisdiction. All Canadian deputy ministers of social services, including the deputy minister from my department, will get together as early as tomorrow in a federal-provincial meeting during which this subject matter will be dealt with.

Mr. Grafftey: I want to ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Considering that situation which is affecting many poor families in Canada, can the minister explain to the House why she has recently contacted the provinces by letter informing the provincial welfare ministers that the federal government intends to cut assistance in this regard in the area of welfare specifically?

Miss Bégin: I regret that the hon. member's information is out of tune with the facts, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to correct immediately the wrong impression he is giving to this House.

About December 14 last I wrote to my provincial counterparts to propose an early meeting at their convenience regarding the whole financing of social services, which in eight out of ten provinces would lead to an increase in real expenses and which would result in all provinces having an identical average per capita outlay within ten years.

As was explained in a press release issued at that time, unfortunately the country's economic constraints have forced me to delay for a year the granting of a supplementary amount of $132 million which is offered to the provinces and which will eventually be indexed, on agreement, after a year.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PERSONS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In light of the steady increase in youth unemployment from 9.7 per cent in December of 1973 to 10.6 per cent in December of 1974, to 13 per cent in 1976 and to over 15 per cent today, and in view of the fact that it will continue to increase for the foreseeable future and that the existing youth employment programs apparently are not turning the tide, what specific programs will the minister's department implement during this session to combat this critical situation?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have catalogued for the hon. member and for this House several of the programs we have in place to deal with youth unemployment in so far as my own department is concerned. The employment tax credit program announced yesterday by my colleague will have a beneficial effect. Jobs will be created by the construction of the pipeline. All these things will have their impact in turning this situation around, as the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Dick: In view of the fact that the minister has indicated no new programs in his department to combat the youth unemployment situation, is it the view of his department that this particular situation is under control, or does his department feel that the advice given in Toronto in April of last year by the Prime Minister to unemployed graduates, that they leave this country and go elsewhere for employment, is the appropriate advice for this year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT BASIC RATE OF WAR DISABILITY PENSION BE RECONSIDERED

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the increasing concern on the part of veterans across Canada over the refusal of the government to restore the basic rate of the war disability pension to the average take-home pay of the five categories of public servants designated in 1973, has the minister resubmitted this matter to the cabinet, asking for a reversal of the negative decision which he announced a couple of months ago?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not resubmitted this question, but I would like to remind the House that on January 1 there was an increase of 7.2 per cent, in disability pensions across this country. As I stated previously, when the government sees things in a different light, I will bring this matter back to it.

Mr. McGrath: You will have a long wait.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the 7.2 per cent cost of living increase granted by legislation this month does not restore the basic rate to the level agreed upon in 1973, will the minister reconsider the position he is taking today? While he is pursuing that, will he also consider pressing for action on behalf of widows where the veteran's pension was less than 48 per cent, resulting in no pension for such widows, and also on behalf of the fewer than 200 veterans of World War I who were prisoners of war in that war but who do not receive the compensation provided by parliament?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the answer to all those questions is yes. We have under consideration the widows referred to. I also expect to bring to the House some news about veterans of the First World War. This will be brought to the attention of the House at a later date.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—CP AIR EXECUTIVE SERVICE BOOKING ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given Your Honour the appropriate notice under Standing Order 17(2).

A couple of days ago most members of this House received a letter from CP Air dated January 13. Actually, it reached me only a couple of days ago and it was only yesterday afternoon that I was able to get the background information that leads me to believe that a question of privilege is involved.

As I say, this letter was written on the letterhead of a private corporation, CP Air, and was addressed to members of parliament. The letter expresses the desire of that company to provide us with service, and so on. It solicits our patronage. Obviously, there is nothing wrong with that, but in the letter we are told that there are two telephone numbers we can dial to get this special service. The significance of these two telephone numbers is that they are not ordinary private company seven-digit numbers; they are five-digit numbers. In other words, they are part of the government telephone service.

There is no comparable number for Air Canada. In the course of my inquiries I was told that a number had been established for Air Canada, but when I called that number the answer was "Central Travel Service" which, of course, is an agency of the government. When I called one of the two numbers listed in this letter the answer was a very pleasant "CP Air Executive Service".

Mr. Gillies: What is the number?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you will be wondering when I am going to get to the point of this being a matter of parliamentary privilege. My information is that this letter was sent to a limited number of persons. It was sent to most if not all members of parliament, although I have not yet ascertained whether any French-speaking members of the House received a letter in French. The letter was also sent to members of the other place. Apart from the members of these two Houses it was sent only to deputy ministers and possibly assistant deputy ministers; however, so far as I can ascertain, only to deputy ministers.

In other words, we, the 260-odd members of this House, are the majority of those to whom this letter was addressed. My point is that this puts us as members of this House in an awkward situation, if we accept this arrangement, whereby we are party to a scheme or arrangement which involves a government service being used, or abused, by a private company.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Nonsense.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend says "nonsense". I do not know that any of the hotels of Ottawa, the restaurants or the taxi cab companies which would like to have our business, have been given the privilege of special government numbers, yet CP Air seems to have been given, or to have obtained this privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if I might be permitted to allow the hon. member to conclude his argument.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My checking has produced the information that either the Department of Supply and Services or the Department of Communications was responsible for assigning a special number as part of Central Travel Service arrangements. I am told it was clearly understood that this was to provide a service for members and was not to be used as an advertising gimmick by a private company.

● (1512)

As I say, if the hotels of this city and other private businesses are not hooked into the government telephone service, why should CP Air have this special arrangement? I suggest that this puts us, as members of this House—because it is mainly to us it is addressed—in an awkward position.

I know we are accustomed to the CPR getting everything in this country for the past hundred years, but surely they should have to be approached the same as Air Canada is, through an ordinary, private, seven-digit number. Mr. Speaker, this matter should be looked into. If the letter had been given general distribution to the entire public service, Your Honour might say it has not got anything to do with the House of Commons, but in view of the limited number of people who received this letter it is primarily a House of Commons matter and, as I say, puts us in an awkward position.

I would be prepared to move the appropriate motion for the matter to be referred to a committee for investigation, and perhaps to have the numbers cancelled and CP Air put on the same basis as any other airline or company. In the meantime I would ask Your Honour to consider whether it is not a question of privilege for members of parliament to be put in this awkward position and to be made guinea pigs for CP Air.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As a result of notification by the hon. member of his concern with this problem and, of course, the formal notice given pursuant to Standing Order 17(2), I have had an opportunity to make only a very cursory investigation into the circumstances and to verify that the exchange involved is not one in any way under the control or administration of parliament. I felt that was my first responsibility.

The exchange involved, which gives access through a five-digit number, is in fact a government exchange but not one that is under our control or is involved in the administration of the House of Commons. I have, therefore, the greatest difficulty drawing a connection between the grievance the hon. member has raised and a question of parliamentary privilege.

The matter does concern an inquiry or grievance of some sort, however, and I think prudence has indicated in the past that if there is to be a response by either of the two ministers named as having the responsibility or authority in connection with issuing these privileges—that is to say, the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), or the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer)—we ought to await their response. At that time I can give a definitive decision as to whether there is any connection with parliamentary privilege. As I have indicated, I have great doubts about it in connection with a question of parliamentary privilege. I think I ought to wait to see whether an immediate response is forthcoming from either of the ministers before taking a final decision.

Order Paper Questions

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—CHAMBER TEMPERATURE

Mr. Paproski: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know that the candlelight power in the House has been reduced by about 51 candlelights but there seems to be a problem with heat in the chamber. Perhaps Your Honour or the House officials could check to see what is happening. Some of the glare of the television lights has been eliminated but the heat in the chamber is still high. Maybe it is because of some of the members—I do not know—but I feel something should be done. This has happened since Monday of this week, and I hope Your Honour will check into it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will be very glad to monitor that. We are monitoring things on a daily basis and had hoped that the adjustments made during the recess would contribute to more comfortable temperatures. There is more difficulty with controlling the light level than the heat level—at least in theory. We ought to be able to do something about the temperature.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND RANGE OF PERSONS TO WHOM ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES APPLY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, January 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a few brief comments on Bill C-18 which proposes changes to the Anti-Inflation Act. It would have been reasonable for even the most objective observer and follower of the progress of the anti-inflation program to expect that if any bill were to be placed before this House it should be one that would put this monster to bed—this cruel joke, this albatross which has been hung around our necks and the necks of the industrial and commercial interests in this nation. This monster has caused chaos in the economy and will continue to do so for some time. It will also disrupt the industrial relations process and a variety of other areas.

The bill attempts to correct some serious discrepancies that have occurred in the program. There were deficiencies inherent in the bill when it was introduced. Today the government is trying to legitimize its bastard child which was conceived—ill-conceived—some time ago.

This is not the first time the bill needed to be changed and the loopholes plugged, Mr. Speaker. Even before it became law the government had to make certain concessions to sectors of our society that were not happy with it. Organized labour and the unions were not happy with the legislation because of the effect on historic relationships and contracts. They demanded and received certain concessions to accommodate their sometimes legitimate and sometimes selfish aspirations. Some other groups called for changes before the legislation was passed, such as corporations dealing in export trade. Other sectors of the economy that could not reasonably be controlled such as agriculture and banking voiced their objections as well. Everything was to be straightened out and regulated, and there were to be changes in procedure in connection with the Bank Act.

• (1522)

Now, Mr. Speaker, to the Liberals the anti-inflation war has been a rather good election tool. As we are getting closer to the next election, it comes as no surprise to me that this situation should be brought before us again. Now one can say that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is quite right in saying the government has been consistent. At least during elections it has been consistent. In 1974 when we had proposed a program of major price controls, the Liberals were against it—it was a cruel joke; it would cripple the economy, it had not worked anywhere else in the world, it was a retrograde step in regulating some of the imbalances we had experienced at that time in the economy. One can reasonably say, Mr. Speaker, that the government could have reasoned, because we had laid out our program reasonably and succinctly, that the government won the election as a result of it.

Here it is 1978 and the minister is travelling throughout the country stating that the government is going to take this burden away from the shoulders of the citizens and is going to get rid of this program. The program was never designed to cure inflation but rather to break the inflationary psychology and to regulate some of the imbalances. One can say that the Liberals did not like the program in 1974. They do not like it now and they are starting to phase it out on April 14 of this year. What went on in between, that is something that the Minister of Finance and the government hope Canadians will forget. What happened in between should have no bearing on the stories the Liberals will be telling in the next election campaign with respect to regulating the economy through wage and price controls.

The problem that legislators have ignored and have forgotten is to consider that when the program was first conceived, even then and for the last ten or 15 years, significant changes have gone on, and our whole society is undergoing significant changes in its social structure. The anti-inflation program has contributed to these changes and, so to speak, has accelerated the changes. I am talking about the changes which will see the shift of the social structure, that segment of our society which once occupied the middle class,—the small entrepreneurs, small- and medium-sized businessmen,—which is now being replaced by the professional manager, the public servant and by the bureaucrat. The corporate manager now decides the direction in which our economy moves. And that most important sector of our economy, namely, the small business sector, and indeed those people who work for the small and medium business sector, are relegated to a minor position in our future social structure.

For a moment I would like to speak about this important sector in our economy, and particularly the two thirds of Canada's work force which does not have access to union power, which is not organized. Let me put it in context with this new corporate manager, with this economist and social engineer who only know the flow chart and know how to deal with the economy in percentages and with charts that have been designed in universities.

Let us look at how this program has affected and how it has widened the gap between organized and unorganized labour; how it has widened the gap between the small businessman and that sector of our economy which is organized in a monopoly or an oligopoly situation. Because the increases were all based on percentages the effect was that organized labour, or the bureaucrat or the professional manager earning $18,000 a year, with an 8 per cent increase was allowed an increase of $1,400, whereas the worker who works in a service industry or small business who may still be making $8,000 had to put up with $640, and that is not even a drastic example. The fact is that all of these people have to buy their bread, their necessities of life, in the same store, and the economists had completely overlooked that controls, based purely on the percentage increase, had a much different impact on one sector of the economy than it did on another.

[Mr. Oberle.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, the reason the government had to amend the law so frequently is that it was so ill-conceived in the first place. Just for the record, and it will be repeated many times in the next few months particularly as we go into the election, I would like to look back to 1974 and make a comparison with the system that was proposed by the Progressive Conservative party in the election campaign. For one thing we have never professed that an anti-inflation program or mandatory controls would be a cure for inflation. What we had set out to do was to break the inflationary psychology and to allow ourselves a period of adjustment, during which some of the imbalances and the great gaps in the system, to which I have made reference, could be corrected. As my hon. colleagues will recall in order to do that we needed a 90-day period, during which everyone would be equal.

I for one had no problem selling that kind of a scheme to reasonable Canadians. There were imbalances in the system as there are now. But if we could assure our constituents for 90 days that the price of a loaf of bread and of a quart of milk would not increase, their contribution to that kind of an approach would be that for 90 days they could not ask for an increase in salary or benefits that they were receiving from their employers. If every reasonable Canadian, in light of the difficulties we experienced then and which we are still experiencing now, managed to live with that approach, then there would have been a period of adjustment for 18 months. Having used the 90 days to arrange the holy trinity of the economy, big government, big business and big labour to work out an agreement over an 18 month period, the necessary adjustments could be made allowing two-thirds of the work force who were left hopelessly behind to catch up to some extent with that section of the labour force that had made the excessive gains. And the same of course would be the case in the business sector, allowing the small businessman to pass through some of the costs which he had to face as a result of commodity exchanges, some of them from other sources.

The partners in the holy trinity wanted no part of that, at least not the corporations; nor did the unions. As you will recall, the unions threatened us outright that there would be a national strike if the Conservatives were elected, and that kind of a program brought in. Of course the Liberals played into their hands saying that they were right, there was no need for those kinds of controls; no need for any controls. The question was not one of regulating the economy with fiscal monetary tools, but the question was one of leadership; and the question was decided. We have yet to figure out where this great Messiah is leading us because on this issue he and the government have failed miserably.

It is difficult to speak on the anti-inflation program without looking at some of the root causes of inflation, particularly in light of the fact that inflation is the most serious situation facing this country today in economic terms. Promises that 6 per cent and 4 per cent inflation would be achieved as a result of the program have just not been fulfilled.

The simplest way to explain the root cause of inflation is an increase in the money supply over which the government has control, particularly if it is in excess of the real growth of the economy. That, in simple terms, is the cause of inflation.

If we showed a real increase in the gross national product of 5 per cent and if the government increased the money supply by 5 per cent, it would be managing the economy in the context in which it should be managed. Anything in excess of that is inflation because there is nothing to back it up. My colleagues all know that the average increase in the money supply over the past five or six years has been in the area of 15 per cent or 17 per cent.

The government has increased its spending during the time of the anti-inflation program at a rate precisely double that of the inflation rate. That gives a clear indication that the government, for some reason or other, deliberately inflated our economy. It increased the money supply to the point where it could no longer manage the economy with traditional tools and methods that we have learned to use.

Why would a government take deliberate steps like that? There are fundamental reasons for it. In our situation we have very serious problems in fulfilling our social contracts. Commitments the government has made to the provinces, to public servants in the form of pensions, transfer payments to individual Canadians in the form of unemployment insurance payments and so on, are already too high. The government finds it very difficult to fulfil its social contracts. The only way the government knows how to get out of that kind of dilemma is to increase the money supply, paying the recipients of these social programs with watered-down currency.

This is not just a domestic activity or domestic con game. The exchange of commodities on a global basis has had the effect whereby some countries have diluted their currencies, hoping that the sellers of essential commodities would not discover the fact before a deal was made. That is what brought on the energy crisis.

The best way to explain inflation is to point to the fact that heavily industrialized western nations were ripping off the Arab countries. The Arabs discovered that whereas they used to ship 2,000 barrels of oil in order to be able to purchase a Cat or some other form of equipment, they now had to ship ten times that amount to the industrialized countries in order to make the same kind of purchase. They got together, looked at the situation and worked out ways of getting out of that situation, which they did. They increased the oil price, through a cartel, in line with industrial commodities that were being traded on world markets.

The oil crisis did not affect the Canadian economy in the same way that it affected our trading partners with which the government likes to compare our economy. We were not affected in the same way as Japan, West Germany, the United States and some of the other industrial giants in the world economy.

It can well be said that the global oil crisis had no effect on our economy. Because of the position we were in in 1974 or in the years that the oil crisis was raging throughout the world, we were exporting more oil than we were importing. As a result, we were not suffering these negative effects and in fact were putting money in the bank during that time.

This international con game is still continuing. Countries are still watering down their currencies in the hope of gaining a better position in the trading community. As a result, people are being cheated out of commitments the government has made and cannot fulfil.

The reason controls do not work is best illustrated by comparisons that we have made as far back as 1972, when a socialist government was elected in British Columbia. The first thing it set out to do was to move against free enterprise. Because there was such a critical shortage of living accommodation in the city of Vancouver, the government decreed in 1973 that there should be a rent control of 6 per cent. Statistics indicated that Toronto had precisely the same problem, roughly 98.8 per cent occupancy with high rents.

After one year of rent control in the province of British Columbia, rents had gone up 3 per cent more than in the city of Toronto. People began scratching their heads, wondering what had gone wrong. The fact was that every person who had anything to rent increased the rent by 6 per cent, whether it was necessary or not. They knew that if they did not do it that year, they could not do it the next. The ceiling automatically became the floor. Some exceptions were made. In some cases the problem was so acute that additional housing units had to be brought on stream and special deals were made with contractors.

The same was true with the Anti-Inflation Board. The ceiling of 8 per cent became the floor. The ceiling of 12 per cent became the floor. Everyone ran off in different directions trying to pass through costs here and there, trying to discover an historic relationship, anything that would lend itself to a logical argument which could be advanced to the Anti-Inflation Board. That is the reason the Anti-Inflation Act has not worked.

● (1542)

The only way out of this dilemma is through leadership by example. If the government wishes to maintain any credibility at all it must take drastic measures not only to curb the increase in its spending but to bring about a decrease in expenditure. We in this party claim that there are, indeed, ways of decreasing government expenditure and we are prepared to propose programs which would cut billions of dollars from the budget. It is not sufficient for the government to curb the rate of increase in its size. The size of the administration must be reduced. It must assume responsibility for reassessing some of the programs it has established. It must refrain from hiring consultants to the tune of a billion dollars a year to help find a way through the jungle which the administration itself has created.

The cliches of the Minister of Finance will no longer convince anyone. Too many promises have been broken. Too many commitments have been abandoned. The government will, no doubt, go into the next election campaign telling the people that it has removed controls, secured the co-operation of the big unions and of the business sector, and promising a lower rate of inflation—6 per cent at the end of this year and 4 per cent, eventually, in line with the real growth of the economy. But attempts along these lines will meet with no success.

The government has failed to arrange for the co-operation of a tripartite tribunal as is so necessary at this point in time. It is true on occasions there have been conferences in back rooms between representatives of the government and their friends among the business giants. But that is not enough. A totally integrated Canadian corporation today is a company which has a consultant sitting on one of the regulatory boards and agencies which the government has created. Similarly, a well integrated company needs to have some of its directors sitting on the boards of banks as well.

The government calls in its friends and talks about labour, which is supposed to be responsible for the horrendous crisis through which we are passing, and then it calls in some labour leaders to take part in discussions, although I must say they did not play the game as well as the business sector did. Nevertheless, they call in labour as well, and sit together in a back room and talk about the business sector being responsible for the dilemma in which we find ourselves. The fact is, in the whole period during which the anti-inflation program has been in force there has been no attempt to bring the parties together in one room to discuss, for example, the formulation of an industrial and social strategy. No attempt has been made to work out what share each should have of the pie—to divide it fairly, giving government sufficient money to operate, giving industry enough money to meet the horrendous cost of upgrading its technology and modernizing its plant, and giving labour, too, its fair share in the real growth of the economy.

The minister may travel across the country telling Canadians that next year real growth will amount to 5.5 per cent. The fact is, though, that all the evidence, all the traditional sources of information, indicate it will be less than that, possibly 3 per cent. I do not wish to be a prophet of gloom but there is no indication, either, that we are likely to receive anything less than a 9 per cent inflation rate at the end of this year.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) has told us, of course, that according to some indicators, Canada, next to Japan and the United States, has the best potential for showing a measure of economic recovery. Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe we always have the best potential to be number one in economic terms in the industrial community, but we have not yet learned to seize the opportunity presented to us by the richness of our resources and the skills of our workers. We have not yet been prepared to make the commitment required to muster these resources by giving the necessary incentives to industry and to the workers to dig us out of this predicament, which has brought with it a measure of shame to our country because we have slipped from number three position in the world to number ten, next to such countries as Luxembourg.

The measure we are discussing today is a housekeeping bill which attempts to plug loopholes so far left open. It is an attempt to ensure that when controls are lifted the unions will not demand that their members be placed in the position they might have expected had controls not been imposed. The government is trying to stick a finger into a leaking dam. The bill is a nothing bill unless ministers are prepared to tell us plainly what plans they propose to adopt as the country enters the post-controls period. We fear that, in the absence of any attempt to arrange a tripartite agreement, the country is in for some rough months, if not rough years. Canadians are beginning to realize it will take a very fundamental change, namely, a change of government, before we can expect a turn around.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the Minister of Finance is at this time but I would like to point out that being the sponsor of this bill he finds himself in a rather unpleasant situation since he was just recently appointed Minister of Finance and must consequently accept to steer this bill of amendments through the House although the faults therein were inherited from his predecessor.

The press release of December 19 when this bill was introduced said that the government intended to bring in amendments to the Anti-Inflation Act to secure a more orderly withdrawal of wage and price controls as announced by the hon. Jean Chrétien. There was mention of amendments which had been introduced last summer under Bill C-59 but which were abandoned before the last session of parliament was prorogated. We are now told that these amendments introduced under Bill C-16 provide for the first time that there will be some orderly transition between the control period and the lifting of certain controls on April 14.

But a thorough examination of Bill C-16 does not indicate any mention of the date of April 14. This would be done by order in council.

I wonder whether electoral reasons did not determine the date of April 14 since the control legislation will no longer be in effect on December 31. December 31 is too far in the future for the election requirements and demands of the government before the end of the year. It is anticipated that it will be for the month of June or the fall—there is uncertainty as to whether there will be an election, so they say that there is going to be a transition period starting on April 14, but what kind of transition? This is not indicated at all in the bill. The withdrawal of this mandatory program is intended for a public which is not too well informed. We are grandfathers to all those people and in our benevolent attention for the well-being of the Canadian public we are going to start withdrawing those controls. There is nothing in this legislation for that, except that the legislation will continue to be in effect until December 31 next.

So I quite simply say that this bill is being brought before us for purely cosmetic reasons. I say so very simply, publicly and formally. If it were not against parliamentary rules, I would actually say hypocritical, but that is a bit too strong. So I simply say cosmetic.

We now find ourselves in the last period for presenting reports and it is already foreseen that the mandate of the Anti-Inflation Board will extend beyond December 31 for everything that concerns its regular administration. I would have thought that this was included in the act passed in 1975, but one has to go back to the debates of 1975 to realize that the opposition of the day had indeed clearly informed the public and criticized the bill as presented—I think it was then Bill C-89—and we have never witnessed such a jumble, a package of measures, devised God knows where for the purpose of being presented to us in a hurry. I still recall vividly the first meetings on the anti-inflation bill which took place in the railways committee room and the eagerness of government members. If a member of the opposition dared criticize or challenge the measure, he was guilty of obstruction. The measure was deemed necessary! Indeed it was imperative in October and November 1975 but these very same members, under the guidance of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), were all heard during the 1974 electoral campaign condemning any form of control over incomes and prices.

Well, there was a difference of course. In the Bible we read about the conversion of St. Paul on the road to Damascus, but in this case, between I don't know where and Ottawa, during the year 1974-75, the conversion of Saint-Pierre took place. I call him "Saint-Pierre" just for the sake of comparison because I strongly doubt that he or myself ever wish him to be canonized! Isn't it quite singular for instance to see how his apostles, the government members, all came into the fold. Their conversion to controls was instantaneous and those of us who can still feel some measure of indulgence toward them noted that there were some shortcomings in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, if a member of the opposition, if my colleague from York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), if the member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and others, ever dared criticize the bill, we were strongly lashed at not only by the government but by a biased press which was poorly informed on the subject. At that time, how should I say, the pass word—

• (1552)

[English]

It was the in thing to be in favour of controls, that sudden conversion, and to be with it. It was the spirit of Canada's galloping Prime Minister, no matter what road, what lane, or what lost trail he might either gallop, trot, walk, or merely meander on.

True enough, there were certain spirits who were against this. We in the official opposition divorced ourselves entirely from the motivations of the New Democratic Party opposing controls. I had seen their flip-flops during 1974. Their leader at that time spent three weeks during the election campaign trying to destroy the program here in Ontario, and that is the only place where he was at all effective.

• (1602)

The program of wage and price controls had been advocated by the Conservative party since early 1973. I do not for one moment subscribe to the view that it was wrong to disclose this particular type of program in detail to the public of Canada. Everyone knows that in editorials and in all sorts of places opposition parties are being asked to outline their programs weekly, much like supermarkets such as Steinberg's, Dominion, Loblaws and A&P in eastern Canada, and Woodward's or Safeways in western Canada. The people want to know weekly what is the price for cabbage, pork chops and orange juice, as well as for other things in the supermarkets. They apparently also want to know the weekly stand of political parties on any particular point. All I am suggesting is that this sort of reaction to a disclosed program is totally belied by the performance of the Canadian public in 1974. At that time the public had a most essentially detailed program that would affect the economy. It had been laid out and was not something brought in at the last moment. It was outlined here on the floor of this House.

In the budget debate of 1973 I first disclosed that we had such a program, and my colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley fleshed it out as we agreed would be done during the time we had for the debate. That program was laid out. There was no surprise in it and it did not vary, except perhaps in the minds of some of the so-called pundits and political critics.

The NDP assaulted the program. They were totally against it. The then leader offered a price review board as an alternative. What on earth was he using to try to delude the public? He was using another variation of wage and price controls. Such a price review board would place emphasis on prices and presumably profits, but an integral part of price is the cost of rent, of financing and of labour. When I refer to the cost of labour I do not mean only labour on piece work, but also managerial salaries. These costs are all part and parcel of the cost of production. The prices review board would have looked at all suggestions for increases in prices to the public.

This was just a flip-flop, and the net result was that the electorate in Ontario and British Columbia gave the NDP the back of its hand. The leader of the party lost his seat, I would suggest, because of his total lack of sincerity in attacking the program of wage and price controls as it applied in 1974. As a matter of fact, this government did the greatest possible disservice to the public of Canada, and we are the inheritors of the resulting problems in 1978, by its dilly-dallying and deliterious actions, and even by its wrong actions in 1972.

The 1972 budget of John Turner was a totally uncalled for expansionary budget, particularly when you can remember that the Prime Minister had boasted in 1969 that inflation had been licked and wrestled to the ground. He did so even though figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics or any other probe indicated a straight line. The Prime Minister was deluding the Canadian public that he knew what he was talking about.

I give him a certain credit for intelligence. I do not think he misunderstood the situation but was simply misleading the Canadian public through those years.

The Prime Minister was unavoidably driven into a corner after 1974 when we were experiencing at least nominal double-digit inflation. This is similar to the unemployment situation in that unemployment figures do not represent a true picture. There is always an underestimation in these matters. It is nonsense to talk about inflation at a rate of 8 per cent, 9 per cent or 9.5 per cent because this is just under the double-digit figure. If you ask people what they will sell their houses, property or farms for, whether they are ordinary working folk or those in the higher income brackets, you will find they want a return of 11.5 per cent or 12 per cent. That is what the public indicates as the degree of inflation.

It is ridiculous to ask the people of Canada to save and invest their funds. The Lord knows that we have had exhortations from "A" to "Z", and from midnight to midnight, 24 hours of the day, to save and to invest, providing we can stay ahead of the tax man. Why should people save to invest when they only get a return of 8 per cent or 9 per cent on Canada Savings Bonds at a time when inflation is 9.5 per cent or 10 per cent? They are not standing still, they are beginning to go backwards. How can we encourage people to save their money? Do not tell me this applies only to those people with incomes of over $25,000 or $30,000.

● (1612)

Every member of the House has had phone calls from old age pensioners who are on modest incomes, but not necessarily limited to what is paid under the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement. Some have perhaps saved a little on the side, maybe they are retired farmers and are getting something from the mortgage on their farms. They have had savings of one sort or another. They might be getting the Canada pension on top of old age pension, and in some provinces they live in residences for senior citizens which are highly subsidized by the provincial government out of the taxes from the general taxpayer, and to that extent they have an addition to the old age security provided by society. But even if they want to buy $200 or $300 worth of Canada Savings Bonds per year, and that is a very modest objective, how can you tell them that they are going to do anything worth while if, on the coupon rate of the Canada Savings Bonds, they will fall behind because inflation has gone up to 9.5 per cent or 10 per cent? There is no profit in trying to delude the public to that extent, and I think it is an act of deliberate dishonesty on the part of the government to engage in such tactics and to adopt such a laissez-faire attitude with regard to the economy as a whole.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. To my mind there has been a very precise ruling by Mr. Speaker relating to the use of unparliamentary language. The hon. gentleman has used terms with regard to this government that, in my view, are completely unparliamentary, and I ask him very seriously to withdraw those remarks.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has used them in regard to the government as a whole, not in regard to any individual.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wondered whether that was going to be the protest of the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais). From time to time he has been gently exposed to the rules of the House. May I suggest that he take a course in depth on the procedures of the House? I did not say the Postmaster General deliberately misled the House. My statement was that the government misled the public, and that has been perfectly acceptable since Anno Domini, in the same way that it is open to a backbencher on the government side to say that the opposition has misled the public. Of course, God forbid that they should say that because they have no occasion to do so. Be that as it may, I will take on the Postmaster General on a point of order at any time of day or night, and he better get up early in the morning.

When we see this government being honest with the public in so far as inflation is concerned, that will be the second coming of Christ. It has been dishonest with regard to inflation for almost a decade. I can go back to 1968 and 1969, long before the entry to the House of the majority of government backbenchers sitting here today, and I distinctly remember speeches made by the Prime Minister before he became Prime Minister, and subsequent to that time, as well as of the then ministers of the Crown, with regard to inflation. According to them we were doomsayers at the time, but at that time our dollar was worth about 50 per cent more than it is now. We have seen the savings of the Canadian public eroded to the point where they are now.

Some hon. members opposite were with me in Washington last week as members of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. We heard there a very good exposé of the U.S. economy. Our hosts, and I thank them publicly here, were most co-operative and went out of their way to be frank and to make themselves available at a most inopportune time for them on the eve of the president's message to Congress on the state of the nation and on the eve of the presentation of the U.S. budget. They were quite candid in their replies.

There are hon. members opposite who heard me make statements suggesting that unfortunately I thought the U.S. administration suffered from some of the problems that have faced our Canadian administration with regard to inflation, that they simply refused to bite the bullet and take the necessary steps. The same situation prevailed in this country until 1974 when wage and price controls were imposed. They should have been imposed long before that time and in a different form. The Prime Minister was upset. There was no way that he would consider a freeze and he made the comment "zap, you're frozen". That was his slogan in 1974, and it was said to the workers of Ontario. I am only sorry they did not have cotton wool in their ears at the time so they could have avoided hearing it. It was the worst thing he could possibly have said.

Members of the finance committee have heard from members of the administration, not only privately but publicly, and from the former chairman of the AIB, who was one of the first ones to say it, that it was unfortunate that the government had not chosen an immediate freeze instead of this creeping sort of program which has been in force and which, frankly, sabotaged the whole principle. A good deal could have been done, but this program as it has worked out has been on the down-slide for many months, and the sooner the government gets rid of it the better because it is causing us to have a surplus of Canadian investment in the U.S. as against investment here in Canada.

Consider the major realty companies in this country. They are investing hundreds of millions of Canadian dollars in the United States and they have been doing so for the last two years. Why? Because we have the most aggressive tax system in so far as business and returns to Canadians are concerned. We have ten times too many regulations, starting with the federal government and going on to the provinces and the municipalities. I will put the blame on the backs of the provinces and the municipalities with regard to realty developments in this country. It is a known fact, it is notorious, and it is to our utter shame.

● (1622)

If there are going to be realty developments, whether of a residential, commercial or industrial nature, it will take developers up to five years to fight their way through an almost impenetrable jungle of a mish-mash of assinine regulations in many instances. During all that time, of course, developers will pay taxes and interest. However, in the United States it takes two years at a minimum. It may take three years, but still that is a big difference. Our major Canadian industrial and commercial developers soon know what the answer is and where the money is going to be made. That is the proof of the pudding. Let us not worry; tax is going to be paid. The Income Tax Act will affect those profits. There will be no exploitation of the public or anything like that.

It is high time this program came to an end. The commodity index on the basis of prices last month was 9.5. Within two months it will be over ten. When we include increases in the prices of petroleum products between now and mid-summer, it will be over ten. The figure will be a double-digit figure.

Wage and price controls are as effective as a sword fight with icicles in the mid-summer sun. The only thing good I see in this bill I pointed out at the beginning. Mr. Tansley, the present administrator, was in the committee dealing with supplementary estimates in November of 1976. I said the following, as recorded at page 6:22 of the minutes:

> One point that I did want to raise particularly, Mr. Tansley, is the legal effect of your orders or the decisions or the recommendations of the AIB. They do not modify any contract, do they? They are merely a rollback of rates of compensation for whatever may be the term of the contract or the agreement and that if—I put it to you—say in June in 1977, it were decided to lift the whole program of price controls, all those contracts would spring up like so many mushrooms before dawn at the contract rates and that we have a time bomb sitting in in so far as prices as well as compensation rates in all these contracts which we are now seeing.
> And I think you would confirm you are seeing more and more two- and three-year contracts and the strategy is simply, now you negotiate for a contract well down the road at rates—you may roll them back—but as we approach the terminal date of this program, or shall we say the political attractiveness of lifting the program, there is going to be a very serious adjustment because you have not the power to modify the contract.
> MR. TANSLEY: It is my personal view that your concern is well placed but I do not know that I am in a position to say much more than that.

In parenthesis I might say that I confirmed this in subsequent meetings with the then minister. With regard to clause 5 of the present bill insofar as it applies to controls on wages and prices, I agree that there should be a legal amendment of any negotiated agreement for working conditions and pay to the extent that they have been modified by the Anti-Inflation Board or by the administrator and not merely deemed to be a roll-back with a subsequent time bomb.

As my colleagues have pointed out, the first part of the bill is but a retroactive application of a recommendation made by the AIB at the request of the government. I do not like the retroactivity of clause 1 and clause 8. The government had the opportunity and did amend the act, and to that extent I find the act objectionable. Personally, I think the anti-inflation program in its present form has to be wound down and out. It was in a bad form to begin with, and it now has a deleterious effect on our economy. The sooner we get rid of it, the better off we shall be.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is on the record in Hansard that I have been opposed to wage and price controls as imposed by this government since Day 1.

Mr. Stevens: You voted for them twice.

Mr. Hogan: I voted for selective price controls.

Mr. Stevens: You voted for them twice.

Mr. Hogan: Do you want to make your speech now, Sinc?

Mr. Stevens: When you sit down.

Mr. Hogan: The ungracious intervention by the so-called finance critic, who I think used to be the president of a western bank and now has a bleeding heart for the unemployed in this country, to the effect that I personally voted for price and wage controls as imposed by this government is a complete distortion, if not an outright fallacy.

As everybody in this House and as this whole country knows, in both the 1972 and 1974 elections this party took a stand in favour of selective price controls, and our continuing conviction was enunciated in the House yesterday by our leader when he said that in such things as mortgages, automobiles and in other particular sectors of the economy, whether we are elected or in the opposition, we would still push for selective price controls as a means of overcoming price instability and price inflation in the economy. What was imposed by the government was altogether different.

The government has almost total control of wages but loose control of prices. Prices of imports and other commodities which are important to ordinary families are exempt from controls. That is the basic reason the New Democratic Party opposes wage and price controls. We keep repeating, and the Canadian people should remember, that what this government says on the campaign trail may not necessarily be what we get six months later.

● (1632)

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his party, even this party and the Social Credit party, stood against the then leader of the opposition when he advocated wage and price controls. I have no qualms about that because while this party believed in selective price controls, we could not agree to tying up the economy with wage and price controls. Every country in the western world that had tried this, including the United States, had found it inadequate as a means of controlling prices. We know that in reality wage and price controls are simply a means of controlling wages. The results are there for all to see.

In a year-end interview with journalist Bruce Phillips of CTV, the Prime Minister was asked to defend the economic record of his government. Mr. Phillips pointed out that the cost of living had increased by 9.5 per cent over the last twelve months, but the Prime Minister countered that it was unfair to look at the year-to-year change in the consumer price index—the figures for the latest month available showed it standing at 9.1 per cent—without reference to the over-all trend during controls. Just the other day the Prime Minister referred to the increase in the gross national product for the last three months but he did not mention that in the last three months the consumer price index has been growing at an annual rate of 11 per cent.

In the interview with Mr. Phillips the Prime Minister claimed that by the end of the three-year control period the inflation rate will have been brought down from almost 12 per cent to 6 per cent. A few moments later he said that on the over-all three-year average, we will be on target. Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was wrong in his view of recent economic history and he will be proven wrong in his forecast.

The Prime Minister claimed that the inflation rate was almost 12 per cent when the controls program was introduced in 1975 but, according to Statistics Canada, the consumer price index was 10.6 per cent when controls were imposed. The three-year target that the Prime Minister mentioned was not 6 per cent, but was 4 per cent. As for the Prime Minister's forecast of 4 per cent this year, every economist that I know of says this country will be lucky to have an inflation rate of 8 per cent for 1978.

Everybody knows that the national unemployment rate will be at least 8 per cent this year—perhaps 8.5 per cent. This does not allow for the forecast by the Department of Labour of decreased participation by all groups in the work force. This is an important measure of the under utilization of people in the economy.

When Hon. John Turner was minister of finance this party told him and the government that inflation cannot be controlled by deliberately creating more unemployment. The Liberals seemed to believe that expansionary policies would push up the cost of living, but this party regards such thinking as a fundamental error. The results are shown in the one million unemployed and the fact that for the last three months there has been an 11 per cent increase in the cost of living, considered on an annual basis. Things are particularly bad in the Atlantic region and areas like mine where there is low income and unstable employment.

Both Mr. Turner and the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), when they occupied the finance portfolio, accused this party of not caring about inflation. We responded by accusing them of hurting regions, individuals, and national unity by waging the fight against inflation on the backs of the unemployed. Just recently Mr. Ralph Sultan, chief economist of the Royal Bank of Canada, who is not known as a wild-eyed radical, said that the current thinking is that expansionary policies would be inflationary. That is the thinking of this government which the former minister, Mr. Turner, got from Mr. Simon, who was secretary of the treasury in the United States at one time. Mr. Sultan said that this may be one of our fundamental errors, and we certainly agree with that. He also said that inflation seems to be built into our economy regardless of our growth rate.

The Prime Minister's economic policy for the last three or four years has been based upon this notion, which is prepared to see unemployment rise as a trade-off for less inflation. I suggest that 1977 has shown this policy to be bankrupt, and 1978 will prove that to be the case even more. There will be no double-talk during the next election campaign to fool the Canadian people.

When we look back over this period of wage and price controls introduced by a government which was elected after pushing hard against this type of thing, we see how the Atlantic region, for example, suffered from these small "c" conservative fiscal and monetary policies. It also suffered as a result of a stupid commercial policy that for too long allowed an over-valued exchange rate, as well as a complete failure to co-ordinate the monetary, fiscal, commercial and exchange rate policies in order to bring about a balance between stimulation of the economy and stable prices.

They fell hook, line, and sinker for what the American people were telling them under a very conservative Republican administration. I think this happened to the former minister of finance, Mr. Turner, and the hon. member for Rosedale willy-nilly had to follow. As a result the latter is practically out of politics today, because all he got was an increase from following these policies, an increase of unemployment, and he could see an increase in inflation coming up at the same time.

As I mentioned yesterday in another speech, despite the good intentions of the Prime Minister on national unity through his bilingual policy, and I was never so mean or small to attack that policy except in its implementation but never concerning intention, this government has mismanaged in an extremely poor way the economy of our nation. The Atlantic region has worsening unemployment, in northern New Brunswick, Newfoundland and in Cape Breton which we, as a nation, should be absolutely ashamed about. It is not only now in these areas which have been traditionally hard hit but also right into the heartland of the industrial part of this country. In Ontario 7.1 per cent of the work force is unemployed. If you added the discouraged workers of Ontario the figure would likely be 8 per cent. It is no longer then a strictly Atlantic region problem or a problem for the other hard hit areas such as the Northwest Territories.

The national policy being implemented and used by this government has made it much worse for the hard hit and traditionally low income and heavy unemployment areas of the Atlantic region. Together with ridings such as the one where I come from, the one where the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) comes from, and the various other areas I have mentioned, the unemployment situation is spreading now into northern Ontario and seeping down into the heartland of southern Ontario.

In 1967, when the Cape Breton Development Corporation was set up, the coal industry was declining and being phased out. The Sydney steel plant was the cornerstone industry so far as Cape Breton was concerned, but the federal government would not take over that industry.

It said to the government in Halifax, the small provincial government with a bureaucracy which did not have the expertise, a government which did not have the financing, that it should take it over so that the provincial government would be looking after the steel plant. If there was anything that was designed and planned, and stupidly planned if it was planned, to bring trouble to the people in that region in the future, it was that kind of an arrangement. To this very day we have suffered. I am not saying that the federal government did not make contributions, perhaps up to $100 million to the Sydney steel plant within the last ten years. However, because of the fact the main owner was the provincial government which did not have the expertise, they did not know and did not recognize that this plant had to compete internationally if it was going to exist. As a result of the federal government's refusal to make it a separate division under Devco we are in a plight in Cape Breton now which can only be classified as grim.

I would like to make a suggestion both to the Deputy Prime Minister—I see him in the House—and to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion although the minister of that department is not present at the moment. I would like them to give serious consideration at this stage of the Sydney steel plant history to making it a separate division under Devco. I will explain why I feel this is necessary.

The provincial government has made a complete mess of trying to renovate the steel plant. A lot of money has been spent there. Before I came into politics I pleaded with them to put in basic oxygen furnaces as a substitute for the old open hearth furnaces. Although you might not know the technology of the steel industry it was plain you could cook a batch of steel in about half the time with these furnaces that you could with the old open hearth ones. Incidentally this was introduced into North America in Hamilton by Dofasco in 1955. By the time we were in difficulty in Sydney in 1973, the Japanese were producing 95 per cent of their steel by this method. It is no wonder they cleaned out the markets and everybody is trying to keep restrictions on imports and using quotas and tariffs against the Japanese because they are beating all the so-called free enterprisers in the United States at their own game. Under Japan's system the government did not back out. They actually helped these Japanese firms without actually nationalizing them.

There have been literally hundreds of millions of dollars put into that plant, and it was wasted. Some $20 million was recently given by the federal government and that is just for housekeeping chores. If the job had been done five or six years ago they would not need to give them that money now. It is ridiculous to be given money to lift open hearth furnaces which should now be completely non-existent. In the proposed plans they were to replace the open hearth furnaces with basic oxygen ones. The result would have been that today, instead of a loss of $30 million in these plants, the maximum loss would be some $10 million taking into account output and the depressed international situation in steel during the last three or four years. More important we would be ready for a new influx of capital with a base to allow us to compete in the future.

The situation is unrealistic. Either the Sydney steel plant should be closed or it should be taken out of the hands of the provincial government. They should pick up the debt that is owed. There is a continuing debt, not from general revenues, but from guaranteed loans which they gave to that corporation. Devco ought to take it over and renovate it. Devco or Sysco are going to be coming in there within the next year and a half—it will be after the election—and I am sure promises will be made during the election campaign with a plan which will require $200 to $250 million from the federal government in order to renovate that plant.

When my leader spoke yesterday about the need for national planning, everybody got uptight about it, because they take it to mean continual government intervention. We want some sense in the steel sector. It is not difficult to run a steel plant in Hamilton which is near the source of raw materials and the markets. They use coal from the United States. Possibly in ten years there will be some difficulty. The coal may not be available. A lot of government help may be needed there yet.

It will take a special effort in order to build up the Atlantic region and the steel industry there. I plead with the Deputy Prime Minister because he is the only representative of Nova Scotia in cabinet. He knows about these problems. There is no way to bring back the Sydney steel plant unless it is taken over by Devco and made a separate division. I admit that because of mistakes which have been made it will be tough sledding, but there is no other way it can be done.

As a result of wage and price controls, along with the international situation, the situation at that steel plant has gone from bad to worse. It is sickening to hear a former Liberal premier of Nova Scotia, who now exists in the other place while at the same time trying to run a big university, telling the Halifax Rotary Club that most of the blame must be put on the Sydney steel workers instead of on mismanagement by the Nova Scotia government and their cohorts in running that plant.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Hogan: It is a damned shame. It is even worse than what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) had to say about the "unappreciability" of the Cape Breton workers. I do not think that word is even in the dictionary, but that does not matter to him. He has made a slur against people who have long suffered in our Confederation. They have been alienated by economic forces and a lack of political clout.

One does not have to be here very long to know that the maritimes have no political clout. The west is now starting to get some because it has economic clout. Those who represent the maritimes do not apologize for having to ask for these things because, in a well planned economy, they would be sharing in the wealth.

There is no way an international steel plant can operate without government money in such an area after private enterprise has pulled out. What is the alternative? There are 125,000 people in one county. Are they to be put on welfare? There are enough people on welfare and unemployment insurance already. As one member pointed out earlier today, every day there are 2,000 people coming off unemployment insurance and going on welfare. Is that where our economy is heading?

In addition to the government failing miserably with regard to the Atlantic steel situation over the past ten years, it has also failed with regard to what has traditionally been a basic and important industry in the Atlantic region, namely, the fishery. I think the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) is on the right track. If we had had his type of thinking ten or 15 years ago, our stocks would not be depleted to the extent they are at present. The government would not now have to make such an enormous investment in order to bring the fisheries back to a viable level. Jobs could have been provided that are now desperately needed in the Atlantic region fishing communities.

New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and, in particular, Newfoundland, are heavily dependent upon the fishery. In the past, large foreign fishing fleets have been allowed to come in. Because it was thought that every species was renewable, they were permitted to take all they wanted. Our independent and inshore fisheries were allowed to die off. The fishermen were given small subsidies. They were pushed onto special unemployment insurance benefits. That is not good enough.

Whether we like it or not, this has contributed as much to national disunity in this country as the linguistic question or any other factor. As I said before, I am not convinced that the separatist movement in Quebec is only as a result of cultural and other deep historical reasons. It is also as a result of policies of this government over the past ten years, specifically the past five.

Mr. Pelletier: Come on.

Mr. Hogan: That has inflamed the situation. Moving from 7.1 per cent to 11.5 per cent unemployment in five years has inflamed the cause of the young people. It is hard to deny that. I would be dishonest if I said that was the only cause. However, I believe that increasing unemployment among the young people in Quebec and in general has added to the difficulties of keeping this country together. The hon. member is an old student of mine and I kind of took it to heart.

Mr. Pelletier: He was my professor.

Mr. Hogan: The Atlantic region has traditionally suffered as a result of the geographic distance from its central markets. We have the same complaint as western Canada with regard to freight rates and rail transportation.

I may be very wrong on this. I know the experts are mixed up in view of the energy situation. However, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) places a lot of emphasis on the future of air travel even though gasoline prices are increasing to the point where they now constitute 22 per cent of the operating costs of Air Canada. He talks of road building as the predominant way of helping the Atlantic region. The minister almost neglects rail passenger transportation for the future. Tax rates are not being adjusted equitably to give us some chance to compete in the central market. That is the traditional complaint at both ends of the country. There is no real attempt to plan the economy.

It is not a God-given thing in economics for the manufacturing industry only to be here and not there. That protection of artificial barriers which pushes up the price to consumers is the price we have to pay to keep Quebec and Ontario going. We are witnessing that now. The furniture industry, textile industry, clothing industry, and footwear industry constitute, directly and indirectly, hundreds of thousands of jobs in these two central provinces. Many of these will go down the drain if the protection they have had in the past is not continued.

It is a sad commentary on a government that has been in office so long that it has not tried to change the economy structurally in order that this area would not be so heavily dependent upon tariffs, and that the west and the east are still disadvantaged in the area of transportation. This has built up into a feeling of alienation.

Despite these difficulties, we all love Canada. However, you can only push people and regions to a certain edge before they become less Canadian. We must lessen the income disparity between the better off and poorer regions, such as the one I represent. I am saying nothing new. The government has had ample opportunity to take action. Indeed, one could almost argue that we have a one-party system in Canada since, for historical reasons in the province of Quebec, the Liberals always start with 55 seats. We are in a desperate economic plight and at the same time we face this problem of national disunity involving not only Quebec but the Atlantic region and the western provinces.

● (1702)

I have mentioned the Atlantic region. I want to turn, now, to conditions in my home town and draw attention to what has happened under wage and price controls there, bearing in mind that the measures through which the government has sought to fight inflation have resulted in increased unemployment. I am not saying this was done deliberately but it has been the result of government policy and the party opposite should be turned out for it. If John Turner followed incorrect advice and if the hon. member for Rosedale persisted in the error, then it is time the Canadian people held the Prime Minister responsible for this gross mismanagement of the economy and the high unemployment which has resulted.

The largest town in my riding is Glace Bay which, according to the 1976 census, had a population of 21,836, less than the number recorded in the 1971 census. The town is presently facing serious difficulties as a result of the slump in the national economy. As members in this group have consistently pointed out, it is the lower income regions which are most seriously affected.

The provincial government of Nova Scotia is super cautious, afraid to adopt deficit financing at a time of such high unemployment in the province, and as a result we in Glace Bay find ourselves unable to get loans from the provincial government to create jobs, provide services, and look after the aged in the recently-built Seaview Manor. A further factor is the stubbornness of Atomic Energy Ltd. which refuses to increase its payments to the town in lieu of taxes as it has done with respect to projects in Ontario. This raises a question I intend to put to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) when I have the opportunity. Atomic Energy of Canada is a Crown corporation and if it is behaving as badly as everyone in my riding feels it is, the situation is one which should be corrected.

The town of Glace Bay is faced with increasingly heavy welfare costs. Surely the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), who seems to be one of the few in cabinet with a strong social conscience, one of the few one can admire for good intentions, anyway, could use her influence to see that the department of social assistance in Halifax increases its payment to the town of Glace Bay. Perhaps representatives of the Department of Finance and the ministry of urban affairs could meet with officials of the municipal affairs department in Nova Scotia to arrange for special payments to be made to Glace Bay so that the town could meet its escalating costs.

I return to the general topic, that of the dismantling of controls. We in this party fought to end controls in 1977. The bill as it now reads would extend the controls beyond the date of December 31, 1978, originally anticipated. The regulations accompanying it provide for an allowable wage increase in the third year of controls amounting to 6 per cent when, under the original legislation, the figure was to have been 8 per cent.

I draw attention to the fact that the cost of living has been increasing at the rate of about 11 per cent for the past three months. In the opinion of most economists the figure for the year is not likely to be less than 8 per cent. I say to the government that it is inviting further confrontation not only from organized labour but from many workers who are being asked to take 6 per cent at a time when the cost of living has risen to 8 per cent or higher. There is no way in which the Liberal party can get away with another flip-flop during an election campaign. No credit will be given to protestations by the Minister of Finance that inflation next year will be 6 per cent instead of 11 per cent. The people of Canada will not fall for it this time.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as the last to speak on the bill from the Progressive Conservative caucus in this House I feel I must say immediately that we cannot, we must not, and we shall not vote for the legislation at second reading later today.

The bill does three things. Initially, the clauses patch up certain deficiencies which have existed for more than two years in the government's anti-inflation program. It refers to certain decrees issued by the government in December, 1975—and they are in effect now, in 1978—asking parliament to ratify or sanction what has been done as far back as 1975. In my view it is almost contemptuous of parliament that this state of affairs should have been allowed to exist for so long, notwithstanding the fact that members opposite have had ample opportunity to bring in remedial legislation embodying the ratification they are now seeking. To bring in such a bill now is contemptuous of parliament, bearing in mind that the government intends to decontrol the whole system by April 14 of this year.

The second thing the bill does is patch up loopholes which existed, and exist, in the initial legislation—Bill C-73. As my hon. friends have pointed out, we in this party drew attention to these deficiencies at the time the legislation was introduced. The original bill did not provide for so-called AIB clauses, that is, clauses which could be written into contracts and which would be in effect upon termination of the anti-inflation program.

The third thing the bill does is, in effect, to give life after death to the control program. There are certain measures the government wishes to take notwithstanding the fact that on December 31, under the present legislation, the controls terminate. So we are asked to make provision for the continuance of a substantial public service and to ensure that some level of activity may continue after 1978.

I should like to indicate the more general reasons why we intend to vote against Bill C-18 on second reading. The Conservative party is the only party in this House that has consistently voted against the government's anti-inflation legislation. At third reading on Bill C-73 we voted against the government's legislation. On Bill C-86 we voted against the government's legislation as well. Notwithstanding the fact that the NDP like to pretend they have been violently opposed to the anti-inflation legislation, we know they joined with their cousins on the government side to support Bill C-86 when it was going through the House. Once again we will vote against the government's bill which is now before us.

We intend to vote against the government because it has not conducted the economic affairs of this country, especially in relation to inflation, in a satisfactory manner. Time and again this government represents that somehow or other it feels it has done a relatively good job compared to other countries. Fortunately, we have the "Economic Outlook" which was published by the OECD last December. As an independent body it can be relied upon for an independent judgment as to what in fact has transpired in the Government of Canada, its record on inflation, and the record of other countries.

In 1975 when this program was brought in, the facts show that there were only six other nations which were doing better as far as inflation was concerned. Those nations were the United States, Germany, Austria, Denmark, Sweden and Switzerland. In short, we had the seventh best inflation level of any of those countries. At that time we had a 10.8 per cent inflation level, compared to the United States at 9.1 per cent, Germany at 6 per cent, Austria at 8.4 per cent, Denmark at 9.6 per cent, Sweden at 9.8 per cent, and Switzerland at 6.7 per cent.

In October, 1975, we were told that our record was not good enough, and that if we accepted the suggestions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) concerning the anti-inflation program, he would somehow bring inflation down to a much lower level in relation to other countries. According to the OECD, in the 12 months to October, 1977, we are running as number ten among world countries. We have lost ground. There are three more countries which are ahead of Canada as far as the inflation level is concerned. That has occurred under the controls program of this government. How can any thinking member of this House stand up and support Bill C-18 later today?

The countries which are ahead of Canada have gained on us, as far as inflation is concerned, since this controls program was inflicted upon Canadians. The countries which now have better inflation levels than Canada are the United States, Japan, Germany, Austria, Belgium, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and Switzerland. The total OECD average inflation level is now below that of Canada. The government's anti-inflation program has been a disgrace.

I know many, including members of the press, who like to say: "Yes, but what is your alternative? What would you have done differently?" In this respect our credentials are good.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Consistently we have asked the government to take steps to relieve inflation in this country, which it has failed to do. We called for the termination of controls on June 30, 1977. We indicated that following termination there should be a monitoring for approximately six months. Also we indicated that we felt the counterproductive nature of controls was such that it was time to call a halt to them. Using its brutal majority, the government voted us down. Consequently, in insisting its program should continue, the government has contributed to unemployment in this country and has not come up with a satisfactory inflation level.

A credible government should provide us with a two-year guideline setting out what inflation levels exist in the nation. It should set out what real growth targets it intends to work toward. The anticipated job creation programs should be set out, as well as where the jobs will be located on a regionalized basis. Not only should the government partake in rhetoric concerning restraint, but it should set out a clearcut program for the reduction of the government's share of the gross national product, in conjunction with the provinces. The government must accept a more restrained approach to monetary growth than we have witnessed in the past decade under the leadership of the present Prime Minister.

I should like to refer to the remarks made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to the Canadian Club in Toronto. He said:

> To sum up, we expect real growth this year of 5 per cent, more than any other leading western country with the possible exception of Japan.

I do not mind the Minister of Finance going to a town that I know something about, but I wish he would at least give the facts. The figures he gave are not correct. He can anticipate a 5 per cent or 10 per cent real growth, if he wishes, but in his heart he must realize that credible independent agencies such as the OECD do not agree with him. Those agencies do not feel we will experience a 5 per cent real growth in the current year. In fact, if one looks at their predictions for the larger industrialized nations, one will find a rather sad picture for Canada. They predict our real growth will be 3¾ per cent, which means that Canada's real growth will be behind that of the United States, Japan, and almost equal to that of Germany. Most important, according to the OECD, Canada's real growth will be virtually tied with or equal to the average real growth of all countries which it has reviewed, including Italy which has an anticipated 1 per cent real growth.

There is a developing pattern with the Minister of Finance, of giving wrong facts to the Canadian public. Obviously he feels he is beyond his depth. It is fine for the minister to pluck out of the air a 5 per cent real growth figure. Obviously he is doing that to take attention away from the actual real growth figures of 1977. For that year the OECD indicates that Canada had a real growth of 2¼ per cent. Incidentally, that real growth was less than that of the United States, Japan, Germany, France, and it was less than the real growth of all the countries reviewed by the OECD.

• (1722)

We have a Minister of Finance who ignores the real growth figures for 1977, because they are very damning of this government, but plucks figures out of the air from which he in effect creates the illusion that in this current year, 1978, we are going to be ahead of any country, with the possible exception of Japan. It is time we knew the minister for what he is. He is misleading the facts to the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: A part-time, do-nothing minister.

Mr. Stevens: It was demonstrated today that this minister is nothing but a part-time Minister of Finance. Everytime he is under pressure because of economic issues he quickly wraps himself in the flag and begins to defend national unity. If the Prime Minister wanted a minister to defend national unity he should have given the present Minister of Finance the job of Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, and let him spend full time travelling across the country talking about national unity. I would then say, more power to him.

I suggest there is no ministry in which it is more important to have a man with the strongest available talent working full time than the ministry of finance. If this minister cannot produce or come up with a proper budget to stimulate this country, it is time we got rid of him and, hopefully, got somebody else who could do the job.

The other startling thing I noted today is the fact that the Minister of Finance, in a rather desperate state, is now beginning to quote the bankers of Canada to justify his position. Just how naïve does he think we are in the opposition? Does he not know we realize that by giving these same bankers three eights of one per cent as a standby fee for $1.5 billion credit, which the minister obtained to shore up our dollar, he is putting into the respective banks a credit of $5,600,000 per year for the next seven years? With that type of standby fee payable, whether or not there is any money taken out, who would not expect favourable comments from the bankers when the Minister of Finance asks them how he is doing?

Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker, and I have checked them out. I have discovered that Libya and other countries obtained comparable credit terms with no standby fee comparable to the fee paid by the Government of Canada. Those are the facts.

I have already referred to the provisions and calculations found in reports of the OECD regarding economic outlook. There is one other thing I should put on the record. This government has been told repeatedly that if it does not correct some of the inflationary forces it has put into the economy we will have greater inflation. In this connection I should like to refer hon. members to the thirteenth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada published in late 1976. It is entitled "The Inflation Dilemma." I think it is very important that we read some of these economic reviews.

For reasons not fully disclosed we now have a new chairman of the Economic Council of Canada. The time has now come when we must ask ourselves whether the new chairman of the Economic Council of Canada will come forward with the same critical opinions of this government's action we have seen in the past, or will we find that this chairman has been chosen because our august Prime Minister, the emperor, likes no criticism from the Economic Council or any other body?

Before voting on Bill C-18 let me quote a few statements made in that review by the Economic Council over a year ago. At page 57 it is stated, and I hope hon. members will note this—

An hon. Member: Why don't you use the latest one?

Mr. Stevens: It states:

> The federal government is not a neutral participant in the inflationary process. It contributes to the determination of inflation through its influence and objectives in the conduct of monetary policy, its control and administration of the national debt, and its expenditure patterns and fiscal structure.

We all agree with that and I think it is important the Economic Council made that point.

At page 72 of the same review we find the following statement:

> From our examination, it is clear that the federal government has been the principal benefactor from the rising inflation of recent years, through the unanticipated transfers of real income from businesses and individuals. It has gained in real terms through the built-in progressivity of personal income taxes, through the cost and inventory accounting required in the corporate tax regulations, and through its situation as a net debtor.

The Economic Council has called it the way it is. It is the federal government which manufactures inflation, and the council has pointed out how the federal government is the chief benefactor of inflation.

At page 84 of the review the Economic Council in fact refutes one of the common excuses raised by this government for its sad performance in respect of the oil situation in Canada. It states:

> Among the main western countries, those initially injured the most by the oil "crisis" were Japan, Italy and France; the least injured was Canada, a net oil exporter at that time.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the Council is saying we had the smallest disadvantage because of the oil situation, as compared to other countries.

Perhaps one of the most significant things to be said is found at page 135 of the report. It reads:

> Over the medium term, of particular importance in our view is the labour market situation. For the terminal year 1979, the unemployment target is set at a minimum of 4.5 per cent of the total labour force—

In 1976 the Economic Council of Canada was talking about an unemployment level of 4.5 per cent for next year. In view of the statements I have read into the record, is it any wonder the Prime Minister of Canada finds it embarrassing to be living with an 8.5 per cent unemployment level and a 9.5 per cent inflation level? I would recommend that members read that Economic Council of Canada review again.

I heard one Liberal backbencher suggest that I should read a more up-to-date review. That is typical of Liberal attitude. Those people always like to read the current press release which gives them the reassurance that all is well, but rarely do they go back to find out what in fact was anticipated in earlier releases, particularly those things which have not materialized.

I have outlined what we in this party feel are the most serious problems in this country, particularly the interrelationship between high inflation and high unemployment, which are not being satisfactorily coped with by the present government.

● (1732)

At a time when we need the strongest minister of finance since confederation, we have one of the weakest. I think it is time that we pressed the minister and the Prime Minister consistently to get on with some of the meaningful things that must be done in this country if we are to have our unemployment level and inflation level go down. If they cannot produce, then let us give the Canadian public an opportunity through a general election to say who should be governing this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Resign.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Chrétien) which was agreed to on the following division:
